There was always danger from the Germans. The partisans had sabotaged the Germans, for example, by dynamiting the railroad and blowing up bridges. Therefore, the Germans used to chase us all the time. I remember being chased and shot at by Germans. A bullet passed so close by my head that my ear was inflamed.

I remember the conditions in the forests. While we were in the camp, I never felt as though we were living like human beings. We were constantly being chased. There was very little food. We were very cold all the time. In the winter we had to contend with snow and ice; even in summer it was cold. Sun did not penetrate through the trees. I remember during the summer, even in July and August, that we had to wear winter clothes. What was left of them! They were ragged. The soles of my shoes were held on by string. We were cold, but at the same time we were bitten by huge mosquitoes. There was always mud. However, when morale was low, as it often was, Tuvia knew what to say to perk us up.

In the camp my mother became friendly with friends of the Bielskis. Mr. Dvoretzky, his wife and two daughters, Cyla and Luba. Mother and I would go together with her and her daughters and beg for food. One day a peasant sent drunken Russian partisans after us. Mother said that it was not good coming to these farms with young girls. So the Dvoretzskys and my mother built an underground shelter where we could hide. Dvoretzky was a good man. People who knew him, liked him. The peasants would give him bread. . . .

While we were with the Dvoretzskys, I developed a horrible rash from mosquito bites that became infected with pus. I didn’t want my mother to know about the rash. I knew she would be upset and worried, so I hid it from her. My sweater became stiff with pus. Mr. Dvoretzky, our friend, told me to go off to the side to pick up the big green leaves growing there. He said to put the leaves against my arm, holding them on with string. I couldn’t stretch my hand to reach the leaves, the wounds hurt. My mother followed me and then asked what I was doing. I took off my sweater and she saw my arms covered with infected wounds. Mother said, “Why didn’t you tell me?”

I said, “It is much better. I was afraid to tell you. The women would have thought I was contagious.” Eventually I healed.

We were always running from the Germans. Eventually the Germans mounted a huge operation to rid the forests of partisans. They put a price on Tuvia’s head of 100,000 Reichmarks. . . .

As we were running through the Naliboki Forest swamp, something bit me on the little toe. It swelled three times its normal size. My mother was very worried because she figured that a snake had bitten me and that I would die of the venom. Eventually the swelling subsided, and I was able to walk with ease. We stayed in this swampy place for the last few months of the war.

Towards the end of the war, my mother caught typhus. Her hair fell out and she was emaciated. She looked old, like a seventy-year-old woman. One day she looked in the mirror but quickly turned around to see who was behind her. She thought the face in the mirror was someone else’s face.

ZINA GURLAND

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Zina Gurland (translated from Yiddish by Odeda Rosenthal and edited by Maryann McLoughlin). But Where Is Tanya? Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2013, pp. 9–13. Used by permission.

The Nazi occupation of the Lithuanian city of Vilna—known colloquially as “the Jerusalem of Lithuania”—was characterized by two major developments: the introduction of ghetto life for the city's large Jewish population, and the massive bloodletting that took place in the nearby Ponary Forest, an area that had traditionally been a weekend retreat for Vilna's residents. Zina Gurland was a young mother who experienced the terror of Nazi rule in Vilna and tried desperately to find ways to protect her daughter while at the same time being forced to work as a slave laborer in the ghetto. Her realization is that only through possession of a work permit could she find some form of guarantee that she would not be sent on a convoy to Ponary. Hers is a story that ends on a poignant note of uncertainty.

We must again warily worm our way across the large city on foot, babies in our arms, balancing our few belongings and some food. A gypsy approaches us in a whining voice: "Don't go back! Run to the woods! They are slaughtering all the Jews in town: I saw it myself!"

How can we go into the woods with infants? But the gypsy cries and wails, "such pretty infants. Such young women. Don't go to the slaughter." His tearful eyes beg us to save ourselves. They haunt me still. We should have believed him I suppose, but we thought, "How can you trust a . . . a gypsy?"

Back home we see neighbors run around aimlessly, crying. Last night a son, a sister, a child was kidnapped. . . . The gypsy appears before me again as I head to my apartment. He emerges like a ghost, and I hear him cry in a high-pitched voice resembling that of a beaten animal. "They are murdering Jews in Ponar!" Ponar? Ponar was one of the open areas of woodland and ski facilities outside the sprawling city of Vilna, the historic, elegant, and cultured capital of Lithuania. Ponar is a place that has held many sweet childhood memories for us. It is the wooded park where we spent many winter hours skating, skiing, and giggling as we glided down on sleds flushed with the warmth of youth and the sunshine that glistened on trees and snow.

But already before the war, when the Russians had overtaken free Lithuania after its short period of proud independence from Poland, they had begun to build holding tanks for oil in the area of Ponar. The gypsy says that the Germans order Jews to stand on top of the lip of the unfinished tanks and use them as target practice, shooting at them until they drop inside. He says they pour chlorine on the still-alive bodies, writhing while dying. He says he saw it with his own eyes.

Some sport. Once Jewish Maccabee Sports club events were held there. We had been members and competed. We often used the spacious locker rooms to change our uniforms and to clean up after the events and skiing. Can we really imagine that these locker rooms have been transformed into a house of slaughter? Is this image real? I rush back to my mother and sister, but my mother is gone. I return to my own place, at Zawalna Street No. 60, change, wash, and nurse my baby, falling asleep from exhaustion.

In the morning an announcement is made on a loud-speaker. Jews must go to ghettos. Until now, we were merely harassed and attacked by soldiers or hauled away. Now they come and shoot us on the spot if we do not obey. Certain limited areas have been announced, and Jews must stay within those areas. There are officially two ghettos, but it seems that Ponar is an unspoken third choice.

My sister and I are so used to putting on lipstick and makeup before dealing with the public at my mother's restaurant that even now when we go out, we still find ourselves doing it, and I do so before leaving the house to check what is going on. I decide to see if my mother returned. I am grabbed by Lisa, her neighbor, and whisked into her place. The Germans confiscated all of my mother's belongings. As we speak in whispers, a knock is heard at the door. Lithuanians and Germans rush into the apartment. We are ordered out and told we have fifteen minutes to report for assignment to a ghetto. I begin to descend the stairs with Tanya on my arm, aiming for my sister's place. My head is swimming. A mass of humanity is in motion below me. Jews from all over are streaming down the street with packages, with children at their sides or on their arms. They are being rushed by guards, faster, faster, faster, into the ghettos. Packages dropped by trembling, hurried people tumble onto the streets, tripping up some, and are soon to be picked up by other townspeople. Jews from afar appear to be among the masses. Who knows how long they have managed to carry their belongings? Perhaps they let go of these items while holding the more precious weights of infants and terrified toddlers. I see Germans hitting Jews with weapons that look like sawed off broomsticks. They whip at random. They prod. They punch. They yank. They slap. The screams reach the heavens.

I cannot allow myself to be swept up in this mass. I squirm back upstairs to my mother's empty house. As I open the door I see to my surprise that my mother is there. When did she get here? Never mind. She tells me that she had managed to survive, and that she had heard that his house would be within the ghetto. Quickly we decide that we will all stay in Ethel's apartment, which has three rooms plus a kitchen.

Before long, this limited space is filled with others. My sister's bedroom becomes home for her and her baby—Chazie, my mother, my daughter Tanya, and me. The living room becomes the abode of my husband's sister Raya, her husband, Joseph (who is the vice president of the Jewish Bank), their daughter, Ola, who is twelve, as well as Liza, her daughter, mother, and brother, and the brother's girl friend who has a daughter aged four. In the second bedroom are Dr. Zlatkin, one of the physicians in the Jewish Hospital, his wife and two sons, one aged five and the other, twelve, and their old uncle.

Once members of a sophisticated community, we are all like hunted animals enveloped in terror. Within days we are told there will be some changes. We need white passes to remain where we are. We are, in fact, according to the Germans, in Ghetto No. 2. Those who have no pass will have to go to Ghetto No. 1. Ghetto No. 1, we soon find out, is the last stop before being sent to Ponar. No one who is shipped to Ponar is seen again. Only those who "work" there return. And how do we get a white pass? The only way to get a pass is to report to work. I go. Then my sister goes, and my mother follows. We get white passes. I am assigned work in the barracks on Willkomirshe Street. I shovel horse manure.

A few weeks pass. A new ruling is announced. An "Occupational Pass" is required. I get a pass from the office of the director of the ghetto whose name is Mürer. His office is on Povulanske Street, in a makeshift hut, near the grounds of an estate that is being built. Who is this estate for? Ah, yes, for Mürer.

My new job is to carry batches of bricks to this project. My hands are ripped to shreds. My strength ebbs. My breasts, filled with milk, hurt. No doubt my child is hurting too. She has not been nursed the whole day. I hope she has been given some food, but I must not allow myself to think. I dare not take one brick less. I have seen how the German's stick cracks bones. We are "lucky" to have work.

It is now the end of July 1941. Someone has just run down the street and shouted that they have emptied the ghetto. Manya, who had been working on the same project as I, comes and tearfully whispers to me the same awful news while we are carrying bricks. I scream inside, "My mother, my child!" But we dare not stop carrying those bricks.

Two men convince the guards that they should be given some time to check the ghetto. They return to inform us that no, it was not Ghetto No. 2, but Ghetto No. 1 that has been emptied. We are relieved for the moment. But is this fair? What did those people do to deserve this? The long day ends and we return to our homes. It is nighttime. Like a moving shadow, my mother stands by the stairs holding my child. I cry with joy. They are alive!

Within days we are told that we need a yellow pass. Such a pass allows a man to have a mother, a wife, and two children. But how can we get a yellow pass? Not everyone at my work was given passes. I have no husband and no pass. Nor does my sister, nor my aunt, nor Tanya.

Can anyone tell us how to get a pass so that we may stay alive?

LUSIA HABERFELD

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Lusia Haberfeld. Lauferin: The Runner of Birkenau. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2002, pp. 40–48. Used by permission.

Luisa Haberfeld was a child transported, with her mother, from the death camp at Majdanek to Auschwitz-Birkenau. Whereas at Majdanek she was registered with a metal identification disc, at Auschwitz she was tattooed, her head was shaved and she was cast into the labor pool—"branded forever," as she writes, "like cattle." In this account, Luisa chronicles a little of her experiences at Auschwitz, in particular her efforts at finding ways to live in an environment not designed for the purpose of facilitating survival. One of the features of her testimony concerns the ways in which trade and barter were prevalent, exchange relationships common among prisoners in her area owing to its proximity to the otherwise closed world of the Sonderkommando.

For some reason, the Germans decided to move us from Majdanek. They made another Selection, and we were naked again, except only for the metal discs with our registration numbers, which we wore round our necks. This time, cigarettes saved my life. The doctor who was selecting young and healthy women lit up a cigarette, thus distracting himself for a second. In that moment, my mother pushed me through to the selected side. The Polish women who were writing down the numbers of those selected to live, quickly put my number down. I was saved again.

Two thousand women were selected to march out of Majdanek. When the Germans counted us, there were two thousand and one! They re-counted us many times. We stood for hours being counted. Eventually, they called out our numbers, and the one person not on their list was about my age. Her name was Halinka Finkelstein, and she had attached herself to this transport to be with her aunt, whom she pretended was her mother. We expected that they would shoot her, but for some reason they did not, and allowed her to join the transport. Possibly because we were all going to be gassed anyway.

Our column was followed by an ambulance, and I remember thinking how kind and caring of the Germans this was. We only found out later that, in that ambulance, was the deadly Zyklon B gas, the gas used for killings. And en route, we actually spent a whole night in the gas chambers! We were herded into a large area, with a concrete floor and shower heads overhead. The heavy door was shut on us very tightly, and there was one small window in that door. Later, we found out that the window was there so that the Germans could watch their victims dying. It was only in the morning, when a German soldier opened the door and said to us “Children, you have been spared,” that we understood that we were in Majdanek’s gas chambers.

As I am writing of this episode, the most devastating thought has just occurred to me. Rysio, my brother Rysio, could have been gassed in the same spot where my mother and I spent the night. I have met some women in Melbourne who spent that night with us in the gas chambers. Everybody whose tattooed number starts with forty-eight thousand, is a witness to that night.

Once again, we marched and then again were herded onto cattle trains. This time, nobody suffocated, and this time, every carriage had a German soldier—for us to have his doubtful company, for him to amuse himself. And amuse himself he did. Every few hours he would point his gun and shoot somebody, just for sport and fun. I might have killed ants the way he killed his victims.

Starved and half dead, we arrived in Auschwitz-Birkenau. The date was July 1943. Once again, we were formed into a column, in rows of five, and were marched through a big double gate, with the inscription above it, Arbeit Macht Frei—Work Will Set You Free. Imagine our feelings as we passed through the gates to the music of a Strauss waltz, played by an orchestra of young women only, seated by a gate. We were totally confused. What a wonderful reception! I think, perhaps, the whole idea was to confuse us.

What followed was sheer hell. They took us to a building where they cut our hair and tattooed numbers on our arms. Being a child, I started crying. My mother turned to me and said, “Lusia, if we will have our heads, we will grow our hair.” I gazed at her, and she looked terrible. My beautiful mother with shaven head. She went first to have her arm tattooed, to show me that it would not hurt. Thus, she became 48702, and I, 48703. We were branded forever, like cattle. But the human spirit is not killed so easily. They did not kill ours. They came very close many times, but the final victory was ours.

An announcement came over the speakers that if any children were in this Transport they should go to special barracks where they could get better food and treatment. Remembering my father’s advice always to do the opposite to what the Germans tell you, I did not go for that special treatment. And Special treatment they did get. Four weeks later, all the children who went to the Children’s Block were taken out one night and gassed.

Then one day, our luck changed. It all started when my mother caught malaria. We had many diseases in Auschwitz, because of the terrible conditions, and some people said that the Greek girls had brought the malaria with them. I don’t know. My mother used to get her attacks every afternoon at four o’clock. I was devastated. She was very sick, shivering and feverish. We desperately needed quinine. The price of quinine in camp was a loaf of bread for one tablet. We had not seen a whole loaf of bread since before the Camps. It was a hopeless situation.

Then a woman gave me some advice. The Gas Chambers and Crematorium were next to our camp, divided from the camp by a ditch and electric wires. The woman told me to ask somebody from the Sonder Kommando for quinine, as they had everything that the people on the Jewish transports brought with them to Auschwitz. The people of the Sonder Kommando were Jewish men who worked in the Crematorium. We were forbidden to go anywhere near this place, and going there was risking my life. But I took that woman’s advice—I had no option. I lay low in the ditch, and presently a man arrived and asked me through the wire, what I wanted. “Quinine,” I said. “My mother is very sick.” He looked me over, then said, “My name is Moshe. I am from Grodno. I will send you our doctor.”

I waited, and another man came, Chaim Kaminski. Chaim Kaminski saved my life many times although I saw him only twice. He was a good-looking man of medium size, dressed in navy jacket and riding boots. He had been a teacher of Hebrew language in Grodno, and he was the Capo of Sonder Kommando. He wanted to know how old I was, and I told him the truth. He looked at me for a while, and then he said something very touching and sad. He said, “you remind me of my little daughter who was killed by the Germans. I will look after you.”

After asking me which block I was in he said, “Don’t ever come here again, they will kill you. Go back to your block.” I went. Four hours later, the Blokova called me to her room. Chaim Kaminski had sent a whole bottle of quinine for my mother, a toy for me, and a big piece of cake for us. For the Blockova, he had sent perfumes, cosmetics, and other gifts, with instructions to look after me and my mother, and not to send us out to work. He also sent a beautiful letter to me, as though to his own child. My mother and I became very special, for we had somebody to protect us, someone who had a big pull in that Camp. We used to call it protekcija.

One day, I went to the ditch again, and he came. I wanted to get a good job. A good job was a passport to life. This time, he sent me to a place called Beiklerdungs Kammer, which was the clothing depot. In it was deposited all the clothing that came with the Jewish transports from all over Europe. It was our job to sort it, good clothing going to Germany, the rest, the unwanted things, staying in the Camp.

Kaminski gave me a very long cigarette holder with a cigarette, similar to the one Audrey Hepburn smoked in one of her films. This he sent as a gift to the Capo of Beiklerdungs Kammer, Frau Schmidt—better known in the Camp as Frau Schmitka. He sent her this gift with his love. Later, I found out that they were in love.

I presented myself to Frau Schmidt. She called me her little heart and asked me whether I would like a dress or shoes, or both. She was most surprised when I declined and asked her for a job. She looked me over and started to laugh. Then she stopped and said, “Come tomorrow. I will talk to the Ausferin.” The Ausferin was an SS woman who was in charge of the Beiklerdungs Kammer. I thanked Frau Schmidt, and promised to come the following day.

Frau Schmidt, Schmitka, was a well-known personality in the Camp, and had enormous power. She was chic, a Christian and a political prisoner. Apparently, she had been secretary to one of the Ministers in Czechoslovakia. To me, she looked old, because I was a child. Today I see her differently. She always ran through the Camp, as fast as the wind, always in a black silk uniform, with a white scarf on her blonde hair. While we all lived worse than pigs, she had a room of her own in the barracks of the Beiklerdungs Kammer, beautifully decorated in pink, with pink curtains and bedspread. Her room would be luxurious even today, in a free world. She also had her own cook and valet; and yes, she was a Capo, but she harmed nobody. She most certainly saved my life on many occasions.

I presented myself to her the next day, as she had told me, and I became a messenger girl for the clothing store, being sent everywhere by the SS woman. I was called Lauferin, which, in German, means “messenger girl.” Both my mother and I owe our survival in Auschwitz to Chaim Kaminski and Schmitka.

The Germans had worked out that on the daily food rations we received, we could survive only three months. That meant that if you wanted to live, you had to organize extra food, and I became the best organizer there was. There was a huge metal water container in the store, and whenever I was sent for water, I hid items of clothing in the container. Each time I was sent out on an errand, I wore extra clothing on me. This clothing I used to sell to the Polish girls who worked in the camp kitchen. They had plenty of food. Of course, it was forbidden for us to enter this area, but I bribed my way in, and sold the things I had smuggled out of the store for margarine and other food.

Cigarettes were like currency in the Camp. For some reason they were illegal in the women’s Camp, but of course, some women still did smoke, although I do not know how cigarettes found their way into Auschwitz. There were people who would even change their meagre portion of bread for a cigarette—they did not live very long. Then, again, there were people who had enough food and could afford a little luxury like a cigarette, although the punishment if found smoking was twenty lashes. There were people who had better positions than others and so had more food, and those who had enough to eat looked for other things, like warm clothing, or a pillow, or a blanket—things that had found their way into the Camp from new arrivals. The people who worked on the railway had these things for sale. And the currency was cigarettes.

Whenever we had more food than we could eat, having bartered the things I had taken from the Beiklerdungs Kammer and sold them, my mother would exchange the surplus food for cigarettes. When our food ran out, we changed the cigarettes for bread. People who lived only on the given rations did not live long. As long as you had that little extra, you lived, another day of misery and hell.

I also used to trade at barracks called Paketen Kammer, which was where non-Jewish women used to receive parcels of food from relatives living free, outside our hell. Thanks to all this wheeling and dealing, my mother and I survived. I also bribed the Blokova not to send my mother to work outside. Such outdoor work was a death sentence.

MAGDA KELEMAN HAFTER

Context: Central Europe

Source: Magda Keleman Hafter and Maryann McLoughlin. No Longer Does the Wind Weave: Magda’s Memoir. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2010, pp. 1–5. Used by permission.

Magda Keleman Hafter was still a child when the Nazis destroyed Czechoslovakia during the period 1938–1939. First, under the terms of the Munich Agreement of September 1938, the country was mutilated when it had the Sudetenland ripped away; then, in March 1939, Germany took over the Czech lands and transformed Magda's native Slovakia into a "Protectorate." For Magda, these developments shattered her otherwise contented childhood. The Slovak puppet government instituted discriminatory measures against Jews, prior to her town being taken over by the Hungarians who then introduced antisemitic measures of their own. Magda's account here ends when, at the age of 16, she became aware of the dangers young women faced at the hands of the occupying Hungarians—a terrifying prospect for a girl from an otherwise sheltered background.

I was born in 1926, during the inter-war period (1918–1939) in Zemianska Olča (Hungarian: Nemesócsa), a town on the Danube River in central Europe, west of Kománo, in southwest Slovakia. We were about 50 to 60 kilometers from Pressburg (Bratislava), later the capital of the Slovak Republic. In 1926, Zemianska was in Slovakia, a part of the Republic of Czechoslovakia. Before that, for about one thousand years, according to Buhler and Fatran, the area had been part of the Hungarian Empire. Zemianska Olča is now in the Slovak Republic. My history, along with the history of all the Jews of Slovakia—Oberlander Jews—is intertwined with Slovakia's chaotic twentieth century history.

At the time of my birth in 1926, although Slovakia was part of the Republic of Czechoslovakia, my parents remembered when the Hungarians still ruled Slovakia. They spoke both Hungarian and Slovakian. They said that Zemianska Olča had always been a Hungarian area. The policemen and teachers were Hungarian, for example.

My family was not large. My father, Eugen (Jenö) Kelemen, from Zemianska Olča, had originally been a Kohn. His father, Ignatz Kohn, had four sons who all changed their names in 1916. (It is a mystery to me why they changed their names. Possibly antisemitism, but I am not sure.) Their father's only stipulation was that the names they chose began with a K. My father changed from Kohn to Kelemen. My father married Yolanda (Jolan) Weiss, a Hungarian. My brother Alexander, was born on January 3, 1926.

I came from a loving and comfortable home. We lived at 63 Main Street in a lovely house in Zemianska Olča. We had electricity, hot water, and even a radio. Our house was well-heated by coal.

My father's business was across from our home. My father owned a small but prosperous department store . . . he also owned a warehouse for milled grain. His store was divided into two attached sections in one store, he sold yard goods such as corduroys, silk, wool, and flannel, ready-made clothes such as men's suits, heavy shawls, rain coats, umbrellas, glass, cakes, candy displayed in jars, packaged cookies, and dry goods such as flour, sugar, chocolate. In the other store, he sold pots, pans, leather shoes, work boots, work pants, socks, lamps, kerosene, oil, and petrol. He also sold liquor, but "closed" liquor, which meant he was not allowed to pour glasses for customers.

When I was five or six years old, my father used to put me up on the counter where I would dance and sing for his customers. When I was older, I used to watch that people didn't steal from the store. We had help in the store as well as at home.

My mother worked with my father in this department store. She was very fashionable and a good mother. She cooked sometimes because we liked her cooking, and she cooked Passover dishes and preserved fruit. Most of the cooking and housework, however, was done by a live-in servant. Once a week a woman came and washed our clothes. She hung the clothes in the attic in the winter and outside in the summer.

My family was orthodox but not Hasidic. In Zemianska Olča, two percent were Jews, about eighty families. Of these ninety percent were orthodox. We kept the Sabbath and my father attended synagogue. Our family kept kosher.

My father closed his store on Saturdays and on Jewish high holidays such as Rosh HaShanah and Yom Kippur and out of respect for his Christian neighbours on Christmas. He also closed if there was a funeral. None of his customers expected us to be open on those days; we all knew each other in Zemianska Olča.

We kept Shabbos and walked on the Sabbath (from Sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday) to synagogue or wherever. There were horse and buggies and bicycles, but walking was nothing to us. We walked many places.

My family was very close with our relatives. I remember one uncle, my father's brother, came often to our house to visit. My paternal grandmother, Antonio Berger Kohn, lived with us. She died in 1938 at home. I never knew my paternal grandfather, who died before I was born.

The people in Zemianska Olča were not antisemitic. Our neighbours were Christians. On Christmas they served us candy and fruit but no cakes. They knew what, as Jews, we didn't eat. No one offended us or our religion. We exchanged gifts at Christmas and Rosh HaShanah. On New Year's we welcomed people in to listen to the radio. We served them potato latkes, donuts, and fried chicken.

Our best friend was Mariska Szanis, a Methodist, my neighbor. We went to school together up until I had to leave the gymnasium. I called her parents “aunt” and “uncle” and she did the same with mine.

For two years, I went to the Catholic school with three or four other Jewish children (my school is still there). The nuns at the school respected Jews. When the Catholics prayed or attended chapel, we were excused. Then through eighth grade I attended the public school. I was good in math and science. On Tuesday afternoons I went to Hebrew school. After I had finished the eighth grade, I went on to gymnasium in Komárno about thirty-five kilometers (21.7 miles) west of Zemianska Olča. I traveled there by train with Mariska. I was in the third year of gymnasium when my schooling was interrupted. Mariska completed gymnasium. . . .

By the late thirties we were hearing very scary rumors about Hitler. To frighten us, teenagers would shout: “Hitler’s coming!”

Despite the rumors, no one believed that anything bad would happen to us. That is until the end of 1938 and the spring of 1939.

What did affect my town and my family was the First Vienna Award, giving parts of Slovakia to the Hungarians. . . .

Then in March of 1939, in addition to being threatened by Hungary, according to “Holocaust in Slovakia,” Hitler warned Józef Tiso (1887–1947) to declare Slovakia independent of the republic of Czechoslovakia. Tiso, a professor of theology, a parish priest, and a fascist politician, became the president of the Slovak Republic, a protectorate of Nazi Germany between 1939 and 1945, and a member of the Axis from November 1940.

Our town was not immediately affected by the breakup. Life continued as before until the Hungarians occupied Zemianska Olča. When the Hungarians marched in, the Slovaks had to leave. We were allowed to stay because my mother was Hungarian, and my father had gone to a German school.

However, the Hungarians took over Jewish businesses. . . . In 1941, my father had to give up his store. His store license was revoked; therefore, his store had to be closed. They made him leave all the merchandise in the store. However, he was allowed to rent his business to a non-Jew, so he rented his business to Mr. Luki. My father was heart-broken by this.

Although many Jews became poverty-stricken, we were solvent because my parents had saved money. However, we did not live as comfortably; for example, we were not allowed to have a servant.

Beginning in September of 1941, we had to wear the yellow Star of David outlined in black with the word “Jew” in the center; thus, we were easily identifiable as Jews and subject to persecution, ghettoization, and deportation. Passed in September 1941, the Jewish Codex, “a code of extreme anti-Jewish laws,” . . . according to Buchler and Fatran, “defined Jews on racial grounds and required them to wear the yellow Jewish Badge.” In 1942, we were only able to shop at certain times. During the rest of the time we had to stay in our homes. We were also subject to deportation to forced labor camps.

Jews were afraid to disobey these laws because we felt there was no escape. The Germans were all over the place. The only place to go was to Palestine and that was a difficult journey, especially with a family.

Zemianska Olča had become Hungarian; the Hungarians, but especially the Hungarian gendarmes, were very cruel. During the years, 1941–1942, as persecution increased, I often had to hide, staying away from home, in a family friend’s home—with a non-Jewish couple. The Hungarians would force their way into Jewish homes looking for young women; my mother had heard what they did to girls and was afraid for me. I was sixteen then. My parents wanted me to be safe staying in a non-Jewish home.

LESLIE HARDMAN

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Leslie Hardman. The Survivors: The Story of the Belsen Remnant. London: Vallentine Mitchell, 1958, pp. 1–3, 9–10. Used by permission of Vallentine Mitchell.

Rabbi Leslie Hardman, a British military chaplain, came to Bergen-Belsen soon after its liberation in April 1945. When he arrived, what he saw beggared all description. In this memoir, he has attempted to convey something of what he encountered in the camp. We read his incredulity, for example, at seeing those still alive, who, he writes, were “a tottering mass of blackened skin and bones, held together somehow with filthy rags.” As for the vast number of dead, his immediate feeling was that they were asleep; he had no idea that so many could be dead in such a concentrated space. With such carnage, he felt overwhelmed: “a pygmy grappling with a mountain.” The challenges he would face over succeeding weeks would be enough to make him question everything he had thought was “normality” up to this time.

The day after the entry of the British troops into Belsen on April 15th, 1945, I returned from Holland to my regimental headquarters at Celle. When I arrived I was greeted with a brooding, heavy stillness; over everything was an ominous hush. I went into the mess and found several officers, all of them strangely quiet. They greeted me in silence. I asked,

“What’s happening? What’s wrong?—there seems to be a peculiar feeling. . . .”

One of them came over to me; he said reluctantly:

“We’ve uncovered a concentration camp.”

He turned his head away, but not before I caught the pity in his eyes.

The Colonel sent for me, and I went with a stone instead of a heart. I found him grim and white-faced; something had changed him too.

“Keep a stiff upper lip, Padre,” he said. “We’ve just been into Belsen concentration camp, and it’s horrible; but you have got to go there; you’ll find a lot of your people. It’s too late to go now, go tomorrow morning.”

The following morning I went by car from Celle to Belsen, some twelve miles’ distance. I drove at reckless speed, and yet I felt that my truck was moving at a snail’s pace. By the time I had steeled my nerves to pin-pointing my thoughts on how soon I could reach my people, how soon I could do something for them.

As I drew closer to the camp, before reaching the gate I saw nailed on almost every tree the warning sign, “Danger—Typhus.” As I got out of the truck I had a sense of shock; I knew I should have anticipated it, but to be faced suddenly with that dreadful disease enveloped me in a chill which was almost paralysing. I did not need to be reminded of the Colonel’s words:

“A lot of your people are there.”

I showed my pass to the two British Tommies guarding the entrance, and walked into Belsen Camp.

I shall always remember the first person I met. It was a girl, and I thought she was a negress. Her face was dark brown, and afterwards I learned that this was because her skin was in the process of healing, after being burnt. When she saw me she made as though to throw her arms around me; but with the instinct of self-preservation, I jumped back. Instantly I felt ashamed; but she understood, and stood away from me.

I looked at her; fear, compassion and shame were struggling for mastery within me; but she was the more composed of the two. We walked into the compound, keeping our voluntary “no-man’s-land” between us. Suddenly my body stiffened, and I stood in my tracks. Before and around me were lying dozens of emaciated bodies, naked, semi-naked, huddled together.

“Are they all asleep?” I asked.

“No, they’re dead; they’ve been there for days,” the girl replied unemotionally, stating the simple fact.

I tried to look at them again. I had to look in order to know, to learn, and if possible help; but these were beyond help; these, my people. The foul stench which polluted the air sickened me, and only the girl’s presence enabled me to overcome my nausea.

As we walked on, towards us came what seemed to be the remnants of a holocaust—a tottering mass of blackened skin and bones, held together somehow with filthy rags.

“My God, the dead are walking!” I cried aloud, but I did not recognize my voice.

“They are not dead,” said the girl. “But they soon will be.” . . .

This was what confronted me on the 17th day of April 1945. I had walked into something a thousand times more appalling than I had steeled myself to meet. . . . “Keep a stiff upper lip, Padre!”

A terrible feeling of helplessness engulfed me. What could I do? How could I save them? Where could I begin? I was a pygmy grappling with a mountain.

“Many of your people are there.” My people?—anyone’s people—everyone’s people. These once human beings, flesh and blood like you and me, were now reduced to hideous apparitions bearing no resemblance to man, but only witnessing to man’s inhumanity.

God help me! I am small and alone but I must help them; and I must not waste a moment, because every moment another soul dies.

ANNA MOLNÁR HEGEDŰS

Context: Central Europe

Source: Anna Molnár Hegedűs. As the Lilacs Bloomed. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 13–21. Used by permission.

The German invasion of Hungary on March 19, 1944, hit the Jews of that country like a whirlwind. Up to this point Hungary, though allied to Germany, had refused to hand over its Jews to the Third Reich. Now, the SS moved in under “Jewish specialist” Adolf Eichmann, and the full force of the Final Solution was brought to bear. One of the first measures the Nazis and their antisemitic Hungarian collaborators introduced was the registration and concentration of Hungary’s Jews, and in this testimony Anna Molnár Hegedűs chronicles the impact of some of these first steps at “ground level.” The ways in which the Nazi onslaught was brought to bear against Hungary’s Jews forced a vast number of adjustments, compromises, and evasions, as Anna details here.

We were roused from our restless sleep by the strident ringing of the doorbell. Just as the maid, frightened, came in to announce that a policeman was looking for my husband, the policeman entered our bedroom. In a polite tone, he said, “Don’t be alarmed, there is no problem. I would just like to ask Mr. Director to quickly get dressed, and Mrs. Hegedűs to pack two sets of underwear for him and enough food for two days.” I asked him to leave the room while I got out of bed but he insisted that he could not, nor even turn his back. Most likely, he was supposed to keep an eye on us to make sure that my husband did not commit suicide.

We both got up with wild panic in our hearts, appearing calm on the surface. Zoltan started to get dressed and I began to pack as the policeman continued to reassure us that there wouldn’t be any problem. My husband said good-bye to me, Ágnes and János, who were terrified, but we all held back our tears valiantly. We burst out crying only when he and the policeman had left the apartment. Dr. Endre Borgida, an elderly and ailing lawyer, was also taken from the building.

No sooner had they left than the doorbell rang again. Even in those early days, every ring of the doorbell jangled our nerves and made our hearts race, as we could not expect anything good from any new arrival. But what came next exceeded all our expectations. In burst a cocky, young Hungarian officer, whom I happened to know by sight. It was Lieutenant Solyom, a leader of Levente, the fascist youth corps. He was an infamous antisemite and sadist who habitually beat up and tortured not only Jews but even the gentile Levente members. He didn’t bother to introduce himself. “I want to see the apartment,” he declared at the top of his voice.

The army had already claimed two rooms of my apartment. One was occupied by a physician and ensign, a rather decent man who, after my husband was taken away, came to offer his assistance in case I needed anything. I concluded that the lieutenant was interested in the other room requisitioned by the army and I indicated exactly that. “I told you I am interested in the apartment, not this room!” he shouted vehemently.

Shocked, I asked, “Are you telling me that you want to take over the whole apartment?”

“No, that’s not the case,” he answered in an honest manner, just as one would expect of an officer. Then he rushed out.

He reappeared an hour later with his wife, a farmer’s daughter whom he had married along with her three hundred acres. This young woman in her twenties came in without saying hello, looked over the apartment, and, with her nose in the air, declared that it would do. That didn’t surprise me—we had moved into this beautiful, brand new place only three weeks earlier. She stated that I had to hand over the apartment in twenty-four hours and that I needed to vacate the premises right away. I thought I hadn’t heard her right. “You might have the right to throw me out of this apartment in my own building,” I said, “but I demand to have the order in writing. On second thought, I will not move out. I have no place to go. You may throw me out on the street if you feel you have the right.” At that point she declared that I could leave the furniture behind if there wasn’t any place to store it, but the curtains and curtain rods belonged to the apartment, so I couldn’t remove them. This was a novel assertion, but in those days bigger surprises were a regular occurrence.

I had had enough excitement for one morning, and left to find out what had happened to my husband and the others who had been picked up with him. I met up with my girlfriends, who were busy trying to deal with the same problem. In all, eighty prominent Jews had been arrested—doctors, lawyers, factory owners, wholesalers—in other words, anyone who was considered sufficiently wealthy.

We managed to get permission to provide dinner for the men and took turns cooking sumptuous meals at the community kitchen. Ági signed up as courier and carried the cauldron just to be able to see her adored father and talk to him. In this way, we found out that the men had not been harmed. A Gestapo officer was conducting an investigation into their financial affairs.

My mind somewhat eased about my husband. I dashed to the hospital to see my dear mother, who had been admitted with a case of pneumonia. She had fallen ill while we were in Bikszád. My sister Erzsike Blum, whom my mother lived with, had taken her to the hospital. She was out of danger as far as the pneumonia was concerned, and we were overjoyed to see one another. I told her about the pleasant time we had had in Bikszád and that we were well off and weren’t having any problems. I said that the only reason Zoltán hadn’t come to visit was that he had been called away on business. Our prime concern was to shelter her from anything that might trouble her, to spare her the disturbances that each new day brought. After all, it could cause her to take a fatal turn to learn that her son-in-law, whom she loved as if he were her own son, was in prison, that we had been ordered off the train, and that we were about to be evicted from our own home. Let her continue in blissful ignorance for as long as possible.

I anxiously awaited her full recovery and rejoiced to learn that she was over the crisis. If I'd had an inkling of what the future held in store for us, I would have begged God to take her soul then, to spare her the ghetto and the trauma of deportation at the age of eighty-four. Then we could have given her a burial, wept for her and mourned her, as was her due after having raised six children as a widow. Instead, once home from hospital and restored to health, she found out all that had happened so far, and she would soon experience all that was to come.

The next day, I went downtown to find out whether Lieutenant Solyom had the right to throw me out of my apartment, and there I ran into a girlfriend of mine. "I guess," she said with a mournful face, "you haven't heard yet what happened." All the blood rushed out of my heart. Had something happened to my husband? Seeing my fear she quickly continued, "The Germans ransacked your apartment." Relieved that it was nothing worse, I hurried home to be received by a sight similar to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The contents of the wardrobe were scattered all over the floor; the beds were upended in the middle of the room. Frantically, our maid recounted how a German officer had burst in with a white-bearded civilian interpreter. They had headed straight for the wardrobes, opened them, scrutinized their contents, taken some items and tossed the rest aside. She had no idea exactly what was gone because she had been sent out of the room. I went to the other wardrobe where we kept our files, documents and other valuables, which at the time we still thought important, and in the lock I spotted a key I didn't recognize. I turned the key and the wardrobe opened—nothing had been touched.

The maid was surprised, since the intruders had not noticed the key and had sent her for a hatchet to break open the wardrobe. Instead, she had run to fetch the ensign, who wouldn't allow them to break open the beautiful piece of furniture. The ensign recounted the rest of the story. The Germans declared that they would seal the apartment, which was now officially requisitioned, and no one was allowed to enter it. The ensign protested, at which point they considered leaving his room open, but they did not accept this proposal until finally he pledged to ensure that we not remove anything from the apartment. The Germans left, carrying off quite a few items and promising to return soon to transport the rest away. In the meantime, no one was to touch a thing.

I stood, panic-stricken, slowly discovering how much was missing. First and foremost, the knapsack filled with all the essentials that I had prepared for my husband. How would I replace it? Among the missing items were pillows, duvets, men's underwear, János's suitcase that had not been unpacked since our return from Bikszád, and a lot of women's hosiery; there was not a handkerchief or stocking left in the whole house.

"What am I supposed to do?" I asked the physician. "The Hungarian officer ordered me to vacate the premises in one day. According to the German officer, I'm not allowed to remove anything. Where will all this lead? Whose orders should I follow?" He reassured me that I should just go ahead and tidy up the apartment. He was convinced that this attempt at thievery was a private undertaking on the part of the German officer en route from the front, and that we wouldn't ever see him again. He said that if I was still worried, I could store our valuables in his room.

Distressed, I ran upstairs to see my friend, whose elderly, ailing husband had been taken away along with mine. She was sitting, dejected, in her locked apartment. I found out from her that the man who had visited us was not an officer in transit but rather a lieutenant of the Gestapo, the same one who was in charge of guarding and interrogating our husbands. She had gleaned this from their conversation.

Later, while in the city, I learned that we had gotten off lightly compared to some, whose apartments were completely sealed, never to be entered again, not even to remove so much as a handkerchief. From then on, I didn't have a peaceful moment in the apartment, as there was always the chance that they would come back at any minute. I was worried day and night, and my only desire was to get away from this place.

Lieutenant Solyom soon showed up with the authorization to requisition the apartment and offered again, now in a congenial tone, to let me leave my furniture behind if I had no means to store it. I was not ready to do him this favour, but since I had no use for the light fixtures, I offered to leave them behind, at which point his wife interjected haughtily that she had no use for Jewish light fixtures. Amazingly, she didn't hold it against the curtains that they were Jewish! They kept those for good.

It was time to move, but where? I turned to the gentile manager of our factory for advice. He listened to my story with indignation and immediately offered to hand over his own apartment to us. “How could I accept such a sacrifice?” I asked.

“Just go ahead and move in without a second thought,” he replied. It was rumoured that this part of the city would become the ghetto, in which case he’d have to move anyway. That’s when the possibility really struck me for the first time, even though it had been mentioned frequently of late, that we would be returning to the Middle Ages, with Jews forced into ghettos.

I thought through his offer carefully, but realized there was no point in accepting it. It made no sense to furnish a big apartment since, if this area was to become the ghetto, I wouldn’t be allowed to keep it anyway. I thanked our good and faithful friend for his kindness, and rented a large room on a street that was sure to be included in the ghetto. I furnished it handsomely and thus freed myself from the chore of taking care of a large apartment and household, for which I no longer had any patience. I had much greater problems to deal with.

Among all my concerns, the one that weighed most heavily on my mind was still Ágnes. How could I save her from the ghetto? Where could I hide her before moving there with my son? I didn’t want her to accompany us, as I was tormented day and night by horrible images. It would simply drive you mad, just imagining what might happen to young women exposed to every whim of the German soldiers.

During these days of tribulations, a kind Christian friend of ours, Gizi (née Strempl) Steir, was a true support. She and I discussed what needed to be done and, with my husband under arrest, it was she who took care of our affairs. She stood by us body and soul. She suggested that we send Ágnes to a convent in Felsőbánya, where she had good connections as her son had been schooled there for several years. She could take Ágnes and enroll her as a student. Ágnes was willing to entertain the idea. She had always done her studies at a convent and she liked the sisters; her only concern was how she would be able to correspond with her fiancé from there, but we set that aside for the time being. We packed her oldest outfits, the ones from her school days: black stockings, shoes, cotton underwear left over from my trousseau, all the while laughing at the prospect of how this fashionable young lady would look in such garb. We agreed that Gizi would pick her up in a car the next morning, and since those wearing a yellow star were not able to travel any more, Gizi would also procure some gentile identifying document for her.

After having made the big decision, Ágnes spent the whole night crying at the thought, once again, of being separated from us, and when Gizi arrived the next morning, Ági implored us not to subject her—perhaps needlessly—to the anxieties of travelling with false papers. Let Gizi travel alone, she said, and once it was certain that she had been accepted, she would go back with her the following day. In vain, Gizi tried to cajole her into sticking with the original plan, in case some obstacle might arise, but she could not convince Ági to accompany her. Gizi drove off and returned that same evening, beaming. “It’s all arranged,” she said. “It’s a pity though, that Ágnes did not come along, because she could have moved in right away.”

The head of the convent school had driven back with Gizi to discuss the financial arrangements and to take Ági back with her the next day. In the meantime Ági had come to accept this solution, and while we were trying to figure out how she could manage to keep corresponding with Pali, a letter arrived from the mother superior. She wrote that they would not authorize Ágnes’s enrollment, that they were afraid of the consequences. Our joy exceeded our disappointment: Fate wanted us to stay together after all! We had passed up the last chance for her escape.

The next day, May 3, the ghetto order was issued. I started dashing around to place my furniture and other valuables with gentile acquaintances and friends, so that I would be ready to move as soon as possible. When all was done and my lovely new apartment that I had outfitted only a few weeks earlier stood empty, I said goodbye to the physician-ensign who had shared our trials during those awful days. “You see,” I said to the doctor, “this is what it looks like when they put into practice those things that sound so “appealing” in the editorials: Let’s break the spirit of the Jews; let’s bring them to their ruin. Here, a happy home has fallen apart; a happy family, whose only thought was for each other, has become destitute and homeless.”

I moved into the ghetto well ahead of time and was next faced with the problem regarding the “Declaration of Property.” I had to do this all on my own and in the most detailed fashion possible, including each and every asset, all the while being threatened with what would be done to those who made a false declaration or left something out. The spectre of internment was constantly thrust in our faces and, in our naivety, we never imagined what a delight internment might have been compared to what actually awaited us. Thus, I declared every valuable without a single omission, and listed the names of our gentile friends who were storing my surplus furniture and items of value.

At the same time, my husband was also being interrogated on the same subject. I was fearful of inadvertently contradicting him. Indeed, I was living in fear of everything. After dealing with this matter, I could at last go out to see my mother, who had been brought home from the hospital. I also needed to do some grocery shopping, which I hadn't been able to find time for amidst all of my problems. Needless to say, we had to stock up on goods for our life in the ghetto.

My errands complete, I headed up to my new home, the ghetto. On the way, a troop of soldiers drew up beside me and broke into a horrible Jew-baiting song, full of the most obscene insults. It made my face burn. I started running like someone being pursued, and it wasn't until I arrived home that I finally glanced at the newspaper I had picked up earlier. This was an antisemitic rag called Szamos, run by Mr. Albert Figus, a former freemason and a current member of parliament for the Arrow Cross Party.

The announcement right on the front page, in large type, read: "The gates to the ghetto will be closed as of four o'clock this afternoon and no one will be allowed to leave through them. Starting tomorrow, Jews will be forced to move into the ghetto from the city." The signatories, county prefect Barnabás Endrődi and Mayor Lászlo Csóka, had proudly completed their work for Lászlo Endre, the antisemitic hangman-in-chief who organized the establishment of the ghettos. Perhaps he would recommend these glorious patriots for higher honours.

ELSA HELLINGER

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Elsa Hellinger. Luck, Again and Again: A Survivor from Michalovic. Caulfield South (Victoria): Lamm Jewish Library of Australia, 2013, pp. 41–42, 43, 44–48. Used by permission.

Elsa Hellinger was a young girl from rural Hungary who went to Budapest in the hope that she might be spared persecution at the hands of the Nazis. In this memoir she describes her attempts at finding safety, made more difficult owing to her unfamiliarity with a big city and inability to adjust to the many changes she was forced to make. She also shows the combined effects of hunger and unsanitary living conditions, and why, as a result, she was vulnerable even without enforced measures from the Germans. Living one step away from the Nazis did not, as we see, necessarily guarantee survival.

Everyone was telling me it was not good to stay in Kassa and it would have been better if I went to Budapest. I had never been to a big city before and I was scared, so my cousin Jacob offered to take me there. Henrik told me of an old widowed relative, Berta Stern, who lived in Budapest with her maid. He said that maybe I could stay with her.

When I arrived in Budapest I went to Berta's house and told her my story. I thought she would tell me I could stay with her, but she told me to go to Jewish Welfare and said they might be able to help me. At the Jewish Welfare office there were about four people also looking for assistance. The man in charge said, "If any of you are refugees, I'm sorry but I can't help you." He had to say that, even if he didn't mean it. I was so naïve at the time I didn't realise that, and left the office.

I went back to Aunty Berta (who was not really an aunt) and found that her son, Sandor Stern, a wealthy stockbroker, and her grandchildren were there. It was Friday evening, when she had dinner with them. When I told Sandor my situation he said, "Don't go anywhere; stay here with my mother because then at least she will have company." Even though she also had a maid. I stayed there for a few months but ran out of money. I needed clothes, so I said, "Aunt Berta, send your maid away. Pay me something and I will do her work." And that is what happened.

Hungarian citizens had ration cards, but refugees could not get them. Aunty Berta sent me to buy bread on her card, which didn't always mean I'd get just a whole loaf. Sometimes one or two slices were added to make up your ration. I always ate these extra slices on the way home. Berta kept everything behind locked doors and the keys hung from her belt. One day she made walnut rolls and hadn't yet locked them away when she went to the bathroom. I took advantage of this to eat some. . . .

She (Berta) was really very understanding and probably also knew that many times I ate the extra bread slices. . . .

I was falling ill from a combination of heavy goose fat and lack of nutrition.

I wrote to my aunt Esther Baum Englander and told her I was sick. Her family had fled to Debrecen, but she came to Budapest to see me. While she was there, Aunty Berta sent me to the caretaker for something and he said, "Tell me, Miss, how come you haven't got ration cards?" I replied, "As I told you before, my parents are very poor and have a lot of children, so I left my card with them." The caretaker continued, saying, "A man was here and said you are a refugee." I immediately guessed that no man had come at all and that the caretaker himself had become suspicious. So I went upstairs and said to Aunty Esther Baum Englander that I thought I had better escape. I packed up a few things and left the house with her. One hour later the police came to look for me! We went to see Margaret and spent an hour with her, then my aunt had to return to Debrecen and I was on my own again.

I was always in fear of my life. People were often caught with false papers and shot by the side of the Danube so their bodies fell into the river. Although it was dangerous, I went around looking for work and accommodation. I saw a sign on a gate that read not “Room for rent” but “Bed to let.” I went into the house and asked the woman there, “Who else is sleeping in this room?” She said “Just myself and my little boy.” So I rented the bed. When I came back in the evening I saw there were four beds lined up in a row and the “little boy” was about nineteen years old and six foot tall. Of course, I couldn’t sleep all night because I needed privacy. I left the next morning. That day I got a very good job working in a factory making ladies’ coats. By this time, I had changed my name again. At first I had used my own name that was on the document the Feldmans arranged that said I was born in Hungary. When I left Aunty Berta’s I took the same name as my sister was using, that of Rose Landau, the girl who was already living in Palestine. So we both lived under her name but with no ration card.

My food problem was worse than ever. Milk, butter and meat were only available with ration cards, which I did not have. I found out you could get yoghurt without a ration card, so before I went to work every day I got up early and stood in a queue to buy yoghurt. I took it to work and made sure I ate it only at 10.00 am, so it served as breakfast and lunch. After work I went to various restaurants to eat, but could only have a bowl of soup or some vegetables—either cabbage, beans, lentils or potato goulash without meat. If you wanted to eat meat in a restaurant you had to have a ration card. One day they brought me some soup and there was a fly in it, so I asked for another bowl and ate that. I mentioned this to a friend at work and she said, “Are you kidding? It was the same bowl of soup—they just took the fly out!”

I looked around for another place to stay after I found out the “little boy” was nineteen and went to live with a gypsy lady. The gypsies were as persecuted as the Jews were. The lady’s husband, a musician, was in labour camp. I lived with that lady for a few months. Her flat was in the street opposite Nemzeti Színház, the main theatre of Budapest, which was off a street called Sziv Utca (street in Hungarian), which means Heart Street. This was the red-light district, though I did not know it at the time. When I walked home from the factory in the evening men used to call out to me, “Little one! Sweetie-pie!” Then someone explained to me what was going on there.

I was scared to stay with the gypsy lady any longer and left for another place with an old maid who had just one room. She slept in one bed, another girl in another bed and I slept on the couch. It was full of bedbugs. One night I was twisting and turning so much the old lady put the light on and there were blood spots all over my nighties from where I had been bitten. I got used to it after a while. There was no bathroom and the toilet was outside. That was on the corner of Izabella Utca and Király Utca. I stayed there a few months. Then I had to change my job because the factory ran out of work. I got another job working in a millinery factory in Király Utca, where I stayed for some time.

Then it was time to move on again. It was a Saturday when I left and took another place. On the Sunday morning the Americans carpet-bombed Budapest. Many planes flew overhead and a bomb fell on the building I had just moved out of. I heard the old lady was very badly injured and a few others in the building died. The other young girl had already left by then. I forget where I went next, but after that I moved in with a lady called Mrs Kohn in Péterfi Sandor Utca. I knew her through a girl from Michalovce who used to live there, but had already been gone for some time. I changed my name again.

I ran into two brothers I had known in Michalovce, though they originally came from a village. They had managed to escape from Germany in uniform. Being tall, blond and blue-eyed, they looked like real Germans. They told me they saw a German soldier take a little baby and smash its head on a rock. They saw another woman with a baby in her arms. One soldier said to the other, “I’ll get the mother and you take the baby.” Then they shot them.

I never told anybody my address. If I met anyone I knew on the street I would always walk off in the wrong direction and then stop at an open gate and say I lived there. When the person walked off I would carefully make my way home. I had to be very careful, as the police would beat people for information about Jews in hiding and promise to let them go in exchange for information. I had to make sure they had no information about me.

TERRY GOLDSTEIN HERSKOVITZ

Context: Salvation

Source: Terry Goldstein Herskovitz with Maryann McLoughlin and Judith Herskovitz Wizmur. Once a Flower always a Flower. Margate, (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2012, pp. 20–24. Used by permission.

Terry Goldstein Herskovitz was a young Hungarian Jewish woman who turned 20 at the end of 1944—just as Soviet forces were closing in on the Hungarian capital of Budapest and liberation seemed only days away. She had survived the murderous Nazi assault against the Jews of Hungary, and now had to face a future of uncertainty and insecurity. Indeed, surviving the liberation presented considerable problems on its own, as Terry shows. Barely escaping rape at the hands of her rescuers, she received solace from her comrades in the safe house that had enabled their salvation from the Nazis, though she remained the lone surviving member of her family for a considerable period. Some of her family members, she recalls, “struggled back,” but many others had been murdered. The experience of liberation was, therefore, double edged; although she survived the Holocaust, it was at the expense of a future in which she could not count most of her loved ones still around her.

I am not sure about dates, but sometime in early 1944, while I was living in Budapest, all the Jews were required to wear stars designating them as Jews, and young Jewish girls were rounded up for work camps. I wore the star at first. But I soon realized that something had to be done. I was still living with Lazar Gizi and Pali, who were like parents to me. By this time Pali had been forced into a work camp. My parents were taken away from their home in Beregszász in March or April of 1944, to Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration Camp, along with all of my siblings, Regina, Aurum, Louis, and Armen. Along with their children, Regina and Aurum perished. I never heard from my parents again.

Gizi told me that she would not let me go to a labor or a concentration camp. Gizi and I decided to assume false identities and go into hiding. I ripped off my yellow star and bleached my hair blonde. A Christian friend of Pali’s agreed to help us. Gizi and I left Budapest, travelling to a remote rural location near Szombathely, Hungary’s oldest city. Pali’s friend took us to a remote farm where his sister lived. We holed up in a tiny attic in the farmhouse, where we hid for six months, from May until October. We never left the attic, so we had no access to the outside world. The woman passed up a little food each day. Because there was no bathroom, we had to pass down a bed pan daily. In the summer the attic was stifling hot; we felt as if we would suffocate. With no activity of any kind, the days were very long. I lay in the excruciating heat. There were no diversions, and I couldn’t leave, even at night.

We stayed in this hiding place until one night when we heard someone walking outside. A group of thirteen Russian soldiers, escapees from a German prison, were passing by. When we heard Russian voices, we rejoiced, thinking that we were being liberated. For the first time we came out of hiding. They asked for a map that we were able to provide them; then they went on their way. A few days later these Russians were captured by the Wehrmacht (German army). The soldiers revealed our location, and the Germans came to the farm and arrested us. After a terrible series of train rides through areas under attack by the U.S. and British forces, we were taken back to Budapest. The Germans took us to the infamous Andrássy út 60, headquarters of the Gestapo, a place used by the Nazis to process, interrogate, and torture Jews. The place was swarming with people, rats and lice. The lice were the worst thing—horrible. They were crawling all over us. We were forced to stay there for a time until we were processed and sent to the Jewish quarter of Budapest—several blocks of the old Jewish quarter of the city surrounding the main synagogue, a closed ghetto established in 1944. We burnt all our clothes to kill the lice and get new clothes. Amid this terror, one sweet and unexpected moment stands out. On December 13, my twentieth birthday, Gizi somehow found a little flour and baked a small bun to wish me “Happy Birthday.”

I honestly don’t remember how long we spent in the ghetto before there was a selection. After the selection, we were sent from the Budapest ghetto to the Ujlaki brickyards in Obuda. Young, healthy people were selected to board trains leaving Budapest, presumably headed for concentration camps or labor camps, while older or sickly people were left behind in the ghettos. Gizi put rags on me so that I would look old. However I was a healthy twenty-year-old at the time, so the disguise didn’t work. I was selected to get on the train. I was separated from Gizi and Pali because they were older and somewhat sickly; they remained in the ghetto. (Pali had returned to Budapest from the labor camp.) I was herded onto the train along with what seemed to be hundreds of others. As the train was pulling away from the station, one of the Hungarian guards, commenting that I was a pretty girl—I had beautiful long hair—threw me down from the train, muttering something like “it’s a shame.” The train was slowly leaving the station, so miraculously I landed without being hurt. I was later told that no one who was on that train survived. . . .

The siege of Budapest began on December 29, 1944. Bullets were flying. During the siege all the windows of Spanish House were blown out. I was in bed on the eighth floor when a bullet flew in through the window, missing me by a centimeter. I spent the rest of the battle in the basement of the house. It was winter and I was freezing cold. We had no heat and had to scavenge for food, which was nearly impossible because we were locked in the house and could not leave. But the hardships we endured in the basement of the Spanish House were nothing compared to what was going on in the other parts of the city.

Even this late in the war, the Germans were still rounding up as many Jews as they could. . . . There was no safe place to go to in Budapest.

Finally, after six weeks, the fighting was over. The siege ended when the city unconditionally surrendered to the Soviets on February 13, 1945. The Soviets then took control of the streets.

However, my nightmare was not over. As the youngest in the Spanish House where we had all sought refuge, I was sent out to forage for food for the older people in the house. I left the Spanish House and had gone only one block when the shooting resumed. They were shooting like crazy. I ran into a house. To my horror it seemed to me like the whole Red army was there. I understood a little Russian, and I heard one soldier say to the other, "Give her to me. Give her to me." The first guy who wanted to rape me dragged me into another room. He was very drunk. I was fighting him, but he started to rip off my clothes anyway. I fought him fiercely. Luckily he was so drunk that he fell down, giving me the chance to run out. As I was running, the others shouted lewd taunts at me. The soldier who tried to rape me actually grabbed his gun and shot at me; he missed me by a hair as I rounded the corner of the street.

I was badly shaken, traumatized, but I understood that it could have been much worse. I barely escaped being raped by this large group of drunken Soviet soldiers. I knew the Soviets had a penchant for raping women. Some say it was retaliation for what the Germans had done to them during Operation Barbarossa when they laid waste to the U.S.S.R., raping and pillaging.

When I returned to the house, the others saw that my clothes were ripped, assumed that I had been raped, and worried that I would be pregnant. I asked, "How do you get pregnant?" I didn't know. Because of their concern, I thought for a while that I was pregnant and was relieved eventually to find out I was not.

As the Soviet siege of the city ended and life started to get back to normal, those of us who had survived the brutality of the Nazi occupation of Budapest waited anxiously and eagerly for word about our relatives. We had no inkling—how could we?—about gas chambers, death camps, or the millions of Jews who had been murdered by the Nazis.

I learned that as people drifted back from the labor camps in Germany and concentration camps such as Auschwitz-Birkenau, a center for inquiries about Jewish survivors had been set up in Budapest. I ventured to the center to seek word of my parents and siblings. There, I experienced the most momentous awful and shocking moments of my life—to that point. I was told something so unfathomable and so gruesome that it was impossible to believe. They told me, "Don't wait for your parents or the children." I was told that they would never return home. I was told that they were all dead—murdered—gassed at Auschwitz-Birkenau! Gassed! Murdered!

I could not believe any of this. All I could do was scream and scream. How could this happen? How could such kind, loving, caring, honest and peaceful people like my parents have had this happen to them? I screamed and screamed! I found no answers anywhere, only an overwhelming sense of grief and desolation for what was lost. My world was shaken to its core. The only hope was that some of my siblings had survived and would return.

Around the corner from where I lived was a school where survivors would come to check in. I was frantic, visiting the site every day, praying that family members would appear. One day I was told that a young boy named Goldstein had returned. My heart practically stopped, hoping beyond hope that he was someone from my family. It turns out that even though I suffered terrible losses, I was one of the "luckier" ones. Eight of the original twelve survived.

My brother, Miki, who was only fourteen, vaguely remembering my old Budapest address, was able to find me! We met on the stairs of Gizi's apartment; he was coming up and I was going down. I almost didn't recognize him; he was so much older looking, so changed.

My siblings, Lilly, Shami, Miki, Shari, Sam, Louis and Armen straggled back. Avrum and Regina were murdered along with their spouses and three or four children each. The spouses and children of both Louis and Armen were also murdered, along with my youngest siblings, Mutchu and Lulu. Murdered!

When I think back on all that was lost, my thoughts sometimes wander to Mutchu and Lulu, both of whom were extraordinary in their own ways. Mutchu was precocious; at the tender age of five he had saved up enough money from who knows where to actually board a train to Kivjzd to visit the rest of the family. We had no idea where he had gone, so we frantically searched everywhere for him. After several days he returned from Kivjzd, relieving our anxiety. Mutchu was particularly skillful at playing practical jokes and embarrassing his older siblings.

On one occasion, when Shari's boyfriend came to visit on the train from Budapest and the family was trying to make a good impression, he appeared at the railroad station pretending he was a pauper who wanted to earn a coin carrying the boyfriend's suitcase. As for Lulu, he was a gorgeous child with big, bright blue eyes and the blondest hair. In fact, since my parents and all the other children had dark hair, we wondered where he had come from. To think that these two precious children, along with a million and a half others, perished, is unbelievable.

HELENA JOCKEL

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Helena Jockel. We Sang in Hushed Voices. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 25–33. Used by permission.

Opportunities for surviving in a place like Auschwitz were always limited, but in a system that relied on slave labor there were sometimes ways in which enterprising prisoners could make it work on their behalf. Helena Jockel shows two examples of this. The first is through a profile of a young prisoner named Regina, who was a Lauferin, or “runner”—one who acted as a messenger conveying SS commands from one part of the camp to another. The other is through Helena’s own example as a kitchen worker. Working indoors, with access to warmth and the occasional bit of extra food, enabled her to gain an advantage over the fate otherwise intended by the SS. Helena’s account goes beyond these two examples, however, and gives a good set of insights into “the small acts of courage” that “made it possible to survive.”

It was my incredible luck that shortly after I arrived in Auschwitz-Birkenau, I met a young woman named Regina and we became very close friends. Regina, who was Polish, had been only thirteen years old when she arrived at the camp. It was extremely rare for a girl so young to survive beyond the initial selection; most went straight to the gas chamber. By the time I met her, Regina was probably fifteen or sixteen. In some ways she was still a child, but an exceptional, unusually smart child. She saw terrible things, even more than I did, yet she had incredible strength and an unusual instinct for survival.

Regina worked as a Läuferin, a messenger and interpreter, in Auschwitz-Birkenau. The Läuferin played an invaluable role as a liaison between the Blockführer (the leader in charge of a prisoner barracks), the Kommandoführer, who was the leader of a specific labour detail, the kapos (prisoners who supervised their fellow inmates) and the prisoners. She had to stand next to the SS guardhouse waiting for orders and if SS officers wanted important messages passed to other officers, Regina would run back and forth with the messages. This gave Regina access to key information that most of us prisoners did not have. In many ways, the Läuferin had some semblance of power, at least compared to the powerlessness of other prisoners.

Because Regina knew some of the female SS guards personally, she sometimes received special treatment and could ask for favours. It helped that she was beautiful. She was often helpful to other prisoners and was therefore also somewhat protected by them. To this day, I do not know why she chose to help me, but I do know that Regina was responsible for saving not only my life, but also that of my sister Agi, who had arrived at Auschwitz from Mukačevo about the same time that I did. Regina helped us intentionally by finding us both jobs in the kitchen. There is no doubt that our kitchen work helped me and Agi survive.

For one thing, in the kitchen I had access to water, which was extremely rare, and I also got warmth from the kitchen fire. I didn't use soap because I believed the stories that the soap in the camp was made from the fat of human flesh; nevertheless, I was able to wash with warm water and a rag every day. I scrubbed my body vigorously so I wouldn't get lice and scabies or any of the other diseases that were killing so many of the prisoners. Most importantly, I could also get a bit more food (if you can call it that) than most, which I could in turn share with some of my friends. Given that we were on a starvation diet, every morsel made a difference.

Regina not only helped by getting us work in the kitchen. There were numerous other ways in which I owe my survival to her. She read newspapers and informed me about what was going on with the war, information that I passed on to my group. People listened to me. Any news of how the war was going meant so much to me and my friends. The link with the outside world was invaluable to us.

Out of gratitude, I tried to help Regina in return. I translated secret letters between Regina and her boyfriend, Eric, a Czech prisoner who worked as a maintenance man for the SS. Since they both moved around the camp for work, they managed to meet and fall in love. Regina didn't speak Czech and Eric didn't know any Polish, but I helped them communicate with one another. Eric had an important role in my life as well. As a skilled worker who fixed things all over the camp, he, too, had good connections and access to newspapers. After updating me on how the Germans were faring in the war, he would sometimes say, “Pass it on to your girls.”

When I spread the news in the barracks, knowing that the Germans were being defeated gave us hope. And hope, in Auschwitz-Birkenau, was like gold. Sadly, when the camp was evacuated, I lost contact with Regina. Someone told me that both she and Eric had survived, but that somehow they were lost to each other. . . .

The everyday routine of a kitchen worker at Auschwitz was grueling. Every morning, I was woken up at 4:30 a.m. to go to the kitchen and light the fire so that we could prepare the daily “soup.” It wasn’t really soup—It consisted of water with a few carrots and rutabagas thrown in. The soup also included a powder called “ava” or “awa” that the kitchen staff scooped out of a paper bag. We were told that the powder was supposed to calm us down so that we wouldn’t get overly excited and riot or revolt. We were sure that it wasn’t good for us, this ava, but we ate the soup anyway. It tasted bad but gave us some feeling of fullness.

After we prepared the soup, we had to line up in the Appellplatz, the outdoor roll-call area. We stood out in the Appellplatz at attention until about 7:00 a.m., no matter what the weather was like. We were forced to wait until we were all counted. Then, my group went back to the kitchen to work until noon. Each day at noon all the women stood in line to be given the ersatz soup that we had made in the morning. Thin and watery, it tasted terrible, but at least for an hour or two we didn’t experience a feeling of starvation. Then we went back to work until three or four in the afternoon. The other girls who worked with me in the kitchen had the same routine. There was some comfort in being with the same group of women every day. It made me feel, somehow, more alive.

At seven o’clock each evening we lined up outside, at attention, for another roll call in the Appellplatz. Standing there, exhausted from hunger and hard labour, we were counted to make sure we were all present. Often, the SS women were not successful at reaching the same number of prisoners as they had counted in the morning. But the numbers were never the same from one Appell to the next—how could they be? The dimwitted SS guards didn’t even realize that women had died between the morning roll call and the evening one. Nevertheless, when the prisoner count was short, we stood, waiting, until it was corrected. We stood and stood and stood. It could be all night.

In the evening we were each given a piece of bread that tasted like mud. It was mouldy. Sometimes there was also a piece of hard cheese that came with it. There were times when I would hoard my piece of black, mouldy bread, saving it for later. When I lay down to sleep at night, I put it under my head so no one could steal it. I also slept with my soup cup next to my body to keep it safe. One time, I woke up and realized that the pathetic piece of bread that I had so carefully saved was gone. I cried so hard. Under the circumstances, it was not unreasonable that a fellow prisoner would steal my bread. We all had to survive. But I still cried pitifully for that mouldy bit of bread.

A few weeks after I began work in the kitchen, I got a number tattooed on my arm. Not everyone in Auschwitz-Birkenau received a tattooed number, but the kitchen workers did. You cannot imagine how elated and happy I was when I got that number. It may seem strange that getting a number was something positive for me—most of us believe that being identified solely by a number is humiliating and degrading. In this case, however, I imagined that somewhere, somehow, the truth would come out. To me, that number on my arm meant that I was unique and identifiable—and that I could be found by someone. In fact, in the end, it was because of that number, #A16501, that my brother Joseph was able to find me in Prague, after the war.

It hardly seems possible that amidst the horror and chaos at Auschwitz-Birkenau, I could have recollections of some experiences of astonishing beauty and great poignancy. And yet, I do. One of those instances involved a group of Italian women who arrived just a few weeks after I did. They were artists, or more specifically, engravers. I don’t remember how I found out this detail, but somehow I knew their profession. What I remember most is that these women were hauntingly beautiful. They had sorrowful eyes, full of pity and regret.

The Italian women stuck together as a group. It felt like such a tragedy that nobody could speak with them. I think they spoke Italian, a Judeo-Italian dialect. Since I knew Latin and a bit of Hebrew from school, I was able to have a bit of exchange with them, with the help of some hand gestures. What impressed me was that in order to survive they seemed to be blocking out the tragic reality in which they found themselves. I tried to convey to them that what they were experiencing was not normal. I tried to tell them that we loved them. To me, these women were spiritually and physically magnificent. They appeared to be so pure, so naïve, their hearts open with an emotional transparency that penetrated my soul. I still do not clearly understand why my encounter with them had such a powerful and lasting effect on me. I was strangely affected by them, even to this day. None of them survived. Not one.

That spring, around the same time that I met the Italian women, I spotted my sister Roszie, through the electrified barbed-wire fence that separated various sections of the camp. She was holding her infant son in her arms. I had lost touch with her when she and her husband, Emil Jockel, had been deported from Znojmo in 1941 and I didn't even know that they had a child. They had been sent to Terezin (Theresienstadt) concentration camp in 1942, where she had given birth to her son, Henri, in 1944.

Some months later, all three were moved to the Czech Family Camp in Auschwitz-Birkenau, known as the Familienlager Theresienstadt (Theresienstadt Family Camp). The men, women, and children in the so-called family camp were assigned to separate barracks, but they were allowed to gather together in the open space outside their barracks. When I saw Roszie, it was from a distance of about twenty metres. All we could do was shout at each other over the fence dividing the sections of the camp. We weren't close enough to have a proper conversation. We spoke like this a few times over the next days and I was able to learn about what had happened to her since we had last seen each other. One of the things Roszie told me stuck with me: if she died and I survived, she told me, she wanted me to take care of her husband and little Henri.

From mutual acquaintances, I was able to figure out what happened to Roszie next. The Familienlager was scheduled to be liquidated in July 1944. Out of 11,000 prisoners held there (from the original transports of 20,000), those who were young and healthy were selected to work in other concentration camps. Roszie was among them. She told me that she planned to give her baby a sleeping pill so that she could sneak out with him, but sadly the baby woke up and the SS guards took him away from her before she left.

An aunt of ours was also in the camp with Roszie. Because she was old, she was not selected to leave Auschwitz-Birkenau and little Henri ended up with her. So they stayed in the camp, my aunt and little Henri. Then, from July 10 to July 12, 1944, with dogs and sticks they came. The SS took the old people, including my aunt and my nephew Henri, to the gas chambers. I heard the barking and the screaming. The liquidation of the family camp was complete. . . .

In addition to these individual tragedies, every day at Auschwitz held a new humiliation. We were not allowed to speak to the female SS guards directly. We had to wait to be addressed and then follow orders absolutely. One time, someone in the camp had broken one of the tanks in the latrine. There was human waste on the floor and the smell was disgusting. An SS woman ordered me to clean it up and as I started to clean the latrine, I began to gag and wanted to vomit. The guard kicked me with her high boots and beat me.

Another prisoner, Terka, a Muslim girl, saw what was happening and jumped in to help me. She cleaned the latrine with me while covering me with her body so I didn't get killed. I felt so humiliated and ashamed. I suffered not only from the pain of the beating, but also from an overwhelming feeling of helplessness. It was difficult to accept that one human being could inflict that much misery and torment on another.

I often felt worthless. It was clear to me that our lives were not worth anything. In the kitchen one day, a female SS guard said that she was surprised that Agi was Jewish since she was so attractive. The guard had been taught that Jewish women were covered in hair and crawled on all fours when no one was looking. In the eyes of the SS, we were worse than animals because we were worthless. When a human life is not appreciated there is nothing much you can do to protect yourself or others. You have no power. You cannot explain your actions or defend yourself. You are totally exposed and totally vulnerable.

The small acts of courage were what made it possible to survive. One evening, for example, we were made to stand for hours and hours in the Appellplatz for roll call. When we were finally released, some of the women who need to go to the bathroom went straight to the barracks to relieve themselves in the latrines. When they got there, however, the doors were locked. A few of the poor women were in agony after holding it in for so long. Not being allowed to empty their bladders was torturous. This was the last straw for some of us, and we began to shout in resistance, "Let us pee!" over and over again. "Don't let them suffer!" I called out. "Don't torture people so much!" One of the female guards heard us yelling and came to the barracks.

The guard must have recognized my voice because she came directly over to me, as if I were to blame for the rebellion. The other women were sure that I would be killed. Then, something unexpected happened. A friend of mine from Mukačevo, a woman named Hilda, came to my aid. I had known her before the war, and she was normally very quiet and reserved. Yet she rallied everyone together and encouraged them all to shout. All seven or eight hundred women in the area began shouting so loudly and with such intensity that the female SS guard grew afraid and left.

There was another way we could resist—with hope. As we sat on the hard wooden bunks in our barracks, with only our thin, torn dresses to cover us, we still hoped that we would survive. Some of us even tried to learn new languages. By that time, I had already learned some English and spoke it quite well. I also remembered Hebrew from high school and taught Hebrew words to my friends. It was a time of emptiness, pain and desperation, a time when it was impossible to imagine a way out. There was no way out. But I often thought about miracles.

An extremely important part of our resistance was singing. Although it seems paradoxical to talk about music and Birkenau in the same breath, singing was a key part of our existence. When our work was done and the guards weren't present, we could find safe moments to sing Hebrew songs. We had to be careful never to sing in front of the SS because they would have beaten us to death. I couldn't sing well, but it didn't matter. None of us were really singers. I would teach my friends the words to songs I had learned in school and the women with good voices would figure out the tune. Together we combined words and voices, our voices hushed so that no one would hear us. It gave us encouragement and lifted our spirits; in those moments, we didn't speak about death and killing.

These were not the only music events in the camp. There were also concerts organized by the SS—although these were hardly happy occasions for the Jewish prisoners. I recall one concert that was spontaneously arranged under orders from the camp administration.

We were called to the Appellplatz and commanded to sit on the ground. What we saw in front of us was a group of men in their filthy, striped prison uniforms, emaciated from hunger, each one holding a violin, a cello or a wind instrument. They were told to take their places on a platform and began to play—and, oh, how beautifully they played. Starving and ill, the musicians played waltzes by Johann Strauss II while the SS guards danced to the music.

I began to cry. I cried inconsolably because those musicians were playing music that had been created to make the world a more harmonious and beautiful place. Yet, these men, imprisoned and starving, were forced to play through suffering and humiliation. Strauss's waltzes and operas, which brought joy to listeners for a hundred years, had nothing in common with Hitler and his ideology.

CHAIM A. KAPLAN

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Chaim A. Kaplan. Scroll of Agony: The Warsaw Diary of Chaim A. Kaplan. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1966, pp. 305–312; 318.

Chaim Aron Kaplan was an educator and diarist of the Holocaust who chronicled the day-to-day events of the Warsaw Ghetto, making a record of life there under German occupation. He had devoted his efforts to education and writing. In September 1939, at the start of World War II, he decided to detail Jewish life in Warsaw and thereby preserve a record for posterity. This was to become Kaplan's Scroll of Agony, in which he commented on the frequent murder of Jews and the constant ill-treatment they experienced. Scroll of Agony would become one of the most powerful and inspiring testimonies from the Holocaust period, as the entries in this account show. He attempted to remain objective despite the dire conditions and saw his mission as preserving a record for posterity, focusing strictly on facts and situations as they appeared.

Anyone who could see the expulsions from Warsaw with his own eyes would have his heart broken. The ghetto has turned into an inferno. Men have become beasts. Everyone is but a step away from deportation; people are being hunted down in the streets like animals in the forest. It is the Jewish police who are cruelest towards the condemned. Sometimes a blockade is made of a particular house, sometimes of a whole block of houses. In every building earmarked for destruction they begin to make the rounds of the apartments and to demand documents. Whoever has neither documents that entitle him to remain in the ghetto nor money for bribes is told to make a bundle weighing fifteen kilos—and on to the transport which stands near the gate. Whenever a house is blockaded a panic arises that is beyond the imagination. Residents who have neither documents nor money hide in nooks and crannies, in the cellars and in the attics. When there is a means of passage between one courtyard and another the fugitives begin jumping over the roofs and fences at the risk of their lives; in time of panic, when the danger is imminent, people are not fussy about methods. But all these methods only delay the inevitable, and in the end the police take men, women and children. The destitute and impoverished are the first to be deported. In an instant the truck becomes crowded. They are all alike: poverty makes them equal. Their cries and wails tear the heart out.

The children, in particular, rend the heavens with their cries. The old people and the middle-aged deportees accept the judgment in silent submission and stand with their small parcels under their arms. But there is no limit to the sorrow and tears of the young women; sometimes one of them makes an attempt to slip out of the grasp of her captors, and then a terrible battle begins. At such times the horrible scene reaches its peak. The two sides fight, wrestle. On one side a woman with wild hair and a torn blouse rages with the last of her strength at the Jewish thieves, trying to escape from their hands. Anger flows from her mouth and she is like a lioness ready for the kill. And on the other side are the two policemen, her “brothers in misfortune,” who pull her back to her death. It is obvious that the police win. But during the fight the wailing of the captives increases sevenfold, and the whole street cries with them.

But isolated incidents don't hold up the operation. The police do what is incumbent upon them. After the completion of the arrests in one house, they move on to another. The Judenrat prepares a daily list of houses in which blockades will be made that day. And here a new source of income is opened up for the graft-chasing police. The wealthy and the middle-class have yet to be brought to the transports. For those who have no documents, banknotes turn into documents. There is almost a fixed price for ransom, but for some it is cheaper, all according to the class of the ransomed one and the number of people in his household.

Two actual cases are known to me. One of the members of our family ransomed himself off with a substitute for money. In place of the ready cash which he didn't have at the time of the hunt, he gave a silk umbrella as a “gift” not to be returned. An acquaintance of mine, a Hebrew teacher, a downtrodden pauper with a crippled son, was forced to give 300 zloty—his last nest egg, since he had no expectation of new earnings from teaching Hebrew. In this instance the price was too high, for expulsion of a cripple means expulsion to the gates of hell. Sick people and cripples are killed by the Nazis while still en route.

But from the time they began to hunt down passers-by on the street, the sorrow of the expulsion became even greater. For this barbarism the beloved Judenrat will find no atonement. One who is seized in his apartment supplies himself with some clothing and food for the journey. His loved ones take their leave of him, fall on his neck. Not so one who is seized on the street. He is taken to the transport as he is, without extra clothing, without food and sustenance, and usually without a penny. No treaties avail him. He is led out to the transfer point like a lamb to the slaughter.

Life in the ghetto has been turned upside down. Panic is in its streets, fear on every face, wails and cries everywhere you turn. Trade has ceased; bargaining has been silenced; and most importantly, smuggling has stopped. Where there is not smuggling, costs go up, so that the price of bread has reached sixty zloty. Prices have increased tenfold, all businesses have ceased to exist. Everyone's staff of bread has been broken. From whence cometh our help? We are lost! We are lost!

July 28, 1942

The situation grows graver by the hour. Through the window of my apartment near the scene of the “hunting,” I beheld those trapped by the hunt, and was so stricken that I was close to madness. For the detainees, the thread of his life is cut in an instant, and the work of an entire lifetime in which his best efforts were invested becomes abandoned property.

Before my very eyes they capture an old woman who walks with a cane. Her steps are measured, and she makes her way with great exertions. She is unable to straighten up. On her face there are marks of nobility and signs of a family status now past. She too was arrested by a lawless Jewish scoundrel. He needs clients, and even this old lady counts, “as is,” without clothes or linens, without even food. She will be sent “to the east.” She will be fortunate if she doesn't live long.

A young mother of two little children from 19 Nowolipki Street was caught and sent off. The dear children were left orphans. There is not comfort for her husband and their father. And there are similar victims by the hundreds. Today, about 10,000 people were taken. They are shoved into freight cars which have no places to sit and no sanitary facilities. If anyone survives that journey, it is nothing less than a miracle. In truth we have reached extremity. Death is precious when it is quick and swift, when it takes your soul and you pass on into your eternity. But a death which comes by the agonies of starvation and the tortures of the oppressor, who prolongs the death agony and turns his victims into living skeletons—this is the cruelest of punishment. Have we truly sinned more than any other nation: have we transgressed more than any generation?

Never in my life had I known the pangs of hunger. Even after I was pushed into the ghetto I ate. But now I too know hunger. I sustain myself for a whole day on a quarter-kilo of bread and unsweetened tea. My strength is diminished from such meagre fare. At times I can't even stand up. I fall on my bed, but rest eludes me. I am in a state of sleep and am not asleep, of wakefulness and yet I am not awake. I am plagued by nightmares. Fear and worry pre-occupy me—fear lest I be seized and deported; worry about where to find my bread. My income has stopped. The sums owed to me by others are lost. Besides what he needs for food, no one has a penny to his name, and payment of debts isn't taken into consideration at all.

But the main thing is fear of expulsion. The only ones partially insured against expulsion are workers in the factories that German firms have taken under their protection. Many factories accept workers skilled in their trades, and even those who are unskilled but have money. Thus a new economy has begun in the lives of the ghetto Jews who have not yet been expelled.

I am tired. The sequel will come tomorrow, if I'm not caught.

July 29, 1942

The expulsion is reaching its peak. It increases from day to day. The Nazis are satisfied with the work of the Jewish police, the plague of the Jewish organism, and the police too are satisfied: the Nazis, because through industry and cruelty, the police have succeeded in supplying exiles above and beyond the daily quota originally specified, and close to 70,000 people have already gone into exile; the police, because they are lining their pockets. This income is fortuitous and apparently not dangerous. The Nazis don't bother about details. Give who what you will, as long as there is no shortage of human material for expulsion. In any event, the respite that the bribe creates is only temporary. A house which is blockaded today can be blockaded tomorrow too, and the next day, and so on ad infinitum. A man who was released once can be caught again—even by the same policeman who let him go the first time—especially since the police have nearly 2,400 dogs. The wiles of the policemen know no bounds. Besides taking bribes, they also steal and rob. How? They order the inhabitants of the house to go down, while they themselves remain in the unguarded apartment. Thus they profit from all that is abandoned.

This criminal police force is the child of the criminal Judenrat. Like mother, like daughter. With their misdeeds they besmirch the name of Polish Jewry which was stained even without this. At the transfer point where the exiles are collected, the policemen traffic in bread. These loaves of bread, which the police force gets in abundance free of charge, are sold to the hungry and oppressed captives at eighty zloty a loaf. For delivering a letter, ten zloty. They are growing rich on these profits, and for the time being they are experiencing the eternal reward in this life—until the Nazis take pity on them as well. Their day will come, and they too will be destroyed, but they will be the last.

Nazism is not original. They took everything from Bolshevism, only that they expanded its rottenness. This is the same Bolshevism in black paint. There is no difference but that of colour. Bolshevism came and said: "Everyone must work!" Nazism came after it and said likewise: "You are idle! Go ye unto your burdens!" But Bolshevism spoke out of its desire to improve the world; Nazism spoke out of hatred for the Jewish people.

With one stroke of the pen the face of Warsaw was changed. They made an end of its peddlers; its beggars and paupers and down-and-outers were collected; its stores were closed; its streets were emptied. Everywhere there is the silence of the graveyard. Everything has passed away—disappeared in one day. It is as if the earth had opened and swallowed up all its crowds and noises, its secrets and vices, and the entire tribe of ants that scurried through its streets from dawn until curfew.

When the Nazis decreed expulsion for the "unproductive population," people went into hiding as though they had been erased from the face of the earth. Now there is hunting for the sake of expulsion, where once they traded and bartered.

The unproductive population included most of the ghetto dwellers. In the eyes of the Nazis, anyone who doesn't take a needle or shovel in hand is in no way productive. Based on this, the entire population of the ghetto was scheduled for expulsion. They therefore tried to save themselves by a change in approach: You want us to work? By all means—only allow us to live. One is not overscrupulous about the means in time of danger. Immediately a great movement arose to set up factories to work for the good of the German army, and the German commandant invited German firms to establish branches in the General Government. The Jewish shop-factories received raw materials from these firms and began to manufacture for each one what was required to meet their obligations to the commandant. In this way factories for the various trades were opened which employed tens of thousands of people. Thus the expulsion decree caused people who had been store-keepers, tradesmen, peddlers, servants, teachers, lawyers, engineers, and all kinds of other middle-class people to stream towards the factories. Hence-forward, only one who is enrolled as a worker in one of the factories under the protection of some German firm has the right to remain in the ghetto. A certificate (Ausweis) granted by a firm of the Reich has the power to save its bearer from expulsion and from all the other troubles that have attached themselves to us. Within a week, tens of thousands of tradesmen, peddlers, unemployed men, idlers, spreaders of false rumours, and bums have been turned into creative workers, into a productive element; they sit hunched over a needle, sewing buttons on a pair of army pants.

The entire ghetto is a mammoth factory producing for the good of the German army. We have become a laughing-stock!

July 30, 1942

The seventh day of the expulsion. Living funerals pass before the windows of my apartment—cattle trucks or coal wagons full of candidates for expulsion and exile, carrying small bundles under their arms. Their cries and shrieks and wails, which rent the very heavens and filled the whole area with noise, have already stopped. Most of the deportees seemed to be resigned to their fate. Only an occasional sound, the tear-drenched echo of a protest, is heard from some unfortunate seized while she was engaged in the activities of everyday life. Misfortune descended upon her unforeseen. She knew that there was an expulsion, but she was almost positive that it would never come to her. And behold, it is come! Woe to her! Alas for her soul! But her shrieks and complaints are sown upon the wind. It is finished, decided. She is going toward a new “life.”

Amid the tragedy of sudden expulsion, one minor detail is perhaps the most tragic of all: People come to the transfer point voluntarily, saying: “Take me! Save me from the quagmire of the ghetto! I will die anyhow; there is famine in the ghetto. Comfort the dying!” But these are the words of a small minority of people with no roots in the soil of the ghetto.

Besides the blockading of houses and hunting in the street, there is still a third method of expulsion—premiums. Large posters have been put in many courtyards to say that all those who voluntarily come to the transfer point for expulsion will receive three kilos of bread and a kilo of marmalade to take with them in their wanderings. They are given until the thirty-first of July. Today I haven’t gone outside the house, because the sword of expulsion strikes all in the streets of the ghetto. They take everyone who comes to hand, those dressed in finery and those dressed in cast-offs—all of them, all of them swallowed up by the wagon. They are not even paying attention to the certificates of those who work for the German factories, which should be a protection for them.

The soothing rumours that the expulsion will cease, that only a certain percentage will be exiled, that the many factories abetting the victory of the German army will enable the rest of the Jews to remain in the ghetto, have not materialized. Nothing of the sort. The tempo of the expulsion increases from hour to hour. On every hand there are catchers. Besides the uniformed Jewish police and the non-uniformed auxiliary police, pure Germans have also come to this task. They dress in civilian clothes so that people won’t spot them.

All day long the ghetto has been deathly silent. During the working hours in the factories the number of passers-by decreased to a minimum. Those who have not yet managed to be accepted in some factory are afraid to stick their noses out for fear of being caught. They hide until the wrath shall pass. Perhaps salvation will come! Perhaps there will be a change for the better! But for the time being, the oppressor does not stay his hand.

There is one category among those “insured” against expulsion whose eyes reflect fear, who, despite the documents in their pockets never go out of the doors of their houses and, within their houses, hide in inner rooms. These are the “officials” of the Jewish Self-Aid Society, who numbered over two thousand at the outbreak of the catastrophe. It is the strength of the Jewish people that in times of disaster they invent something out of nothing, build bridges out of paper. If it works, it will work; and if not, what have you lost? Before the expulsion, the Self-Aid employed about four hundred people who were registered with the labour office, and there were also full-time officers who held work cards in accordance with the laws of officialdom. Suddenly, the calamity! Thousands of people were left without legal protection and doomed to exile. Accordingly, the directors of the society, with the consent of the Judenrat, decided to provide their friends with a legal haven in the form of “legitimizations,” documents stating that So-and-so was an official of the society. They based their plan on the fact that the expulsion decree had a paragraph which stated specifically that officials of the Jewish Self-Aid Society would have privileges comparable to those of officials of the Judenrat. A veritable factory for legitimizations was set up. Anyone who had had any connection whatever with the activities of the society from the time of its establishment to the present day, whether as a salaried employee or a volunteer, received certification as one of its officials.

Within three days, over two thousand certificates were prepared and distributed—a tremendous job even for a well-equipped and refined technical apparatus, let alone an organization as inefficient as the Self-Aid. Here no one stood in long queues, but rather on top of one another. The pushing and crowding of hundreds of people with the fear of death in their eyes reached horrible proportions. Mobs pushed their way into the officials’ offices and urged them to speed up their work. The result was exactly the opposite. Order was disrupted, work was interrupted and delayed: anger and hysterics from both sides. No one had any assurance that such a certificate would be legally accepted, but it is good to have something in writing to lean on. People seek comfort in the fact that for the time being the Jewish police are handling everything, and the police are under the orders of the Judenrat, which considers the certificates legal. Everyone said, “It carries no real guarantee. In the end it will come under censure and be nullified. But for the time being it has validity in the eyes of the Jewish police, and that’s enough for me. I’ll at least be able to go and look for a more secure hiding place.” In point of fact it did save many people. They were seized and later released. I too find refuge in the shadow of a certificate. Blessings upon the Self-Aid.

I have just been informed that 57,000 people have already been deported. The teacher and writer Aron Luboszycki, a refugee from Lodz, was among them. . . .

August 2, 1942

My lot is even worse because I have neither money nor a factory job, and therefore am a candidate for expulsion if I am caught. My only salvation is in hiding. This is an outlaw’s life, and a man cannot last very long living illegally. My heart trembles at every isolated word. I am unable to leave my house, for at every step the devil lies in wait for me.

SONIA KEMPLER

Context: Before the War

Source: Sonia Kempler. The Wheels of Memory: Growing Up with a War on My Shoulders. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2010, pp. 29–34. Used by permission.

The night of November 9–10, 1938, is universally remembered by the name the Nazis gave to the anti-Jewish pogrom they instituted at that time, Kristallnacht. A joke name for the “crystals” shining in the moonlight—shards of glass from the tens of thousands of broken windows from Jewish homes and businesses—the Kristallnacht was a signal to Jews that their future in Nazi Germany was at an end. In this account Sonia Kempler relates what it was to be a Jewish child during that awful night and in the weeks that followed, and what the experience of living through it portended for her family.

The evening of 9 November 1938 was to become known as Kristallnacht (literally, “night of crystal” but more commonly, “night of broken glass”). On that night and all through the following day, the Nazis went on their first intense rampage. Jewish shops, schools and synagogues throughout Germany were attacked by Nazis, Hitler Youth, and their followers. The windows of Jewish homes and shop fronts of Jewish-owned businesses were broken and looted right across the country.

Broken glass covered the streets everywhere. The reflection of streetlights shining on all that broken glass and the rays of the sun next morning gave the whole place an eerie crystal-like appearance. What a sight it must have been! What pain and heartbreak, tears and suffering it took to achieve this unforgettable landscape.

My parents, my two brothers and I huddled quietly in our apartment. The drapes were drawn closed, the lights were out. We sat in complete darkness, in total silence, not daring to make the slightest sound for fear the mob might come upstairs and break into our home. My little brother, Max, was only two and a half years old and it was difficult to keep him still, but with his beloved baby bottle and some gentle cradling he slept blissfully through most of the commotion going on outside.

Fear is contagious. I could sense my parents’ fear and although I did not comprehend the seriousness of the situation, I knew instinctively that we were in great danger and that I had to keep quiet. I remember looking at my parents’ frightened faces and becoming terrified when I saw tears glistening in their eyes. I was only nine years old, a scared little girl. I was shocked to see that my parents, grown-up “old people” could be so terrified. When I look back I still find it hard to believe that my dear “old” parents were only thirty-eight and forty-two years of age at that time.

The noise rising from the street was intensifying and coming nearer. I remember the sound of breaking glass, of screaming victims and bellowing Germans.

My father had covered Max and me with a heavy quilt so that if we did make a noise it would be muffled by the blanket. In the middle of the night, when everybody thought I was asleep, I overheard snippets of whispered conversation. Across the road at the butcher’s place somebody had tried to run away from the pursuing mob and seek refuge on the rooftops of the building. But he was spotted and his attackers came after him. He fell from the roof and was killed. Did he fall or did he jump? The question seemed to hang heavily in the air. Somebody ventured to say that he was probably lucky, that he may be better off dead. I cried silently into my pillow.

History confirms all the cruel details of that horrible night. Many people were badly beaten. Old men were dragged along the streets by their beards. Religious Jews in their ritual garb were forced to parade with derisive and insulting placards around their necks. They were ridiculed, kicked and beaten by the raging hordes.

Jewish schools and synagogues were burned to the ground. Books and prayer books were burned publicly, the fires watched by hysterically cheering crowds. This was the night when all our lives changed forever. This was the beginning of the bitter end. . . .

The rioting and destruction in Leipzig was repeated simultaneously all over Germany. In the city of Jena three professors of its well-known university were among those arrested. No distinction was made between rich and poor, workers or professionals. The only criteria needed to qualify as a victim was to be Jewish.

Thousands of Jewish businesses were destroyed during that horrific night. More than 200 synagogues burned to the ground. Hundreds of people were beaten up and at least a hundred killed. Countless homes and schools were vandalized. The fire brigades did not respond and the police were ordered not to intervene. More than 3,000 Jewish men were taken to concentration camps such as Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen. The resulting wave of righteous indignation from some quarters was feeble and did not last long.

On 12 November 1938 new orders were issued. Jews were no longer to own any businesses. Their driver's licenses were revoked and they could no longer visit or use sports grounds or other public venues. There was even a decree forbidding Jews from owning homing pigeons.

To add insult to injury the Jewish population of Germany was fined one billion Deutsche Mark for damages incurred on Kristallnacht. The events of November 1939 truly portended the destruction of European Jewry.

Anybody who still believed that life might return to normal and that there could still be a future in Germany for any Jew, whether German or not, should at that stage have come to the realisation of utter hopelessness.

Next morning everything seemed to have quieted down. My father covered our radio with a blanket, which I remember finding a very odd thing to do. He then climbed under the blanket to listen to the morning news. He seemed relieved when he told my mother there had been an announcement about the events on the previous night. According to the news reader, all the rioting and destruction had been the doing of the populace gone wild. The pogrom had definitely not been instigated by the government or any higher authorities. Jewish people were urged to accept this explanation. They should feel free to leave their homes and venture outside to resume their normal lives. They had nothing to fear!

My father announced that he would go down to buy bread, milk and a newspaper, and would be back in ten minutes. We were gathered around my mother in the dark room, for neither the windows nor the drapes had been opened since the riots had started. The minutes ticked by. Mutti peeped outside from the corner of the curtains to see if Vati was on his way back. We could sense that she was becoming more and more anxious. The minutes turned into hours but there was still no sign of our father. We sat there waiting all day long, and throughout the next days, and the next weeks.

It was obvious that the Germans had made a false conciliatory radio announcement to lure people out of their homes. They certainly succeeded, for people left their homes by the hundreds only to be arrested as soon as they reached the street. Many of our friends and relatives were apprehended in the same round-up that morning, among them my favourite uncle, Lutz, and my cousin Jupp.

The next day Heini took me for a walk past both our schools and to our synagogue. There had been fires everywhere and piles of books were still smouldering in the schoolyard. Tears stung our eyes, partly from the smoke and partly from the devastation we witnessed. When Heini saw my tears he said, "Look at what the Nazis did and don't ever forget it!" We were both crying when he finally dragged me away from those scenes of destruction and took me back to the relative safety of our home.

After a while my mother managed to find that my father, uncle and cousin had all been incarcerated in Buchenwald, one of the early German concentration camps. Mutti and Tante (Aunt) Julchen began discussing horror stories, which somehow filtered through to them. They often spoke in F-Sprache, a kind of pidgin German we kids were not supposed to understand. They spoke of beatings and horrific cruelties, of prisoners dying and their ashes being returned to their families. Mutti's eyes were constantly red from crying and we all walked around in fear. After weeks of trying to contact the powers that be, there finally came a promise of Vati's immediate release if proof could be provided that he would leave the country within three days of leaving the camp. The same went for my uncle and cousin, and probably for many other prisoners.

Three days! Without passports, visas or emigration papers! After great effort and expense a travel agent was found who was willing to sell them a passage on a boat leaving Hamburg for Ecuador. The agent knew perfectly well these tickets could not be used without the necessary travel documents, but he was interested in making money and Mutti was grateful for his help. Thanks to those tickets, my father, uncle and cousin Jupp were liberated from Buchenwald in time to travel to Hamburg “to catch the boat.” Of course they never went to Hamburg. Instead, they went into hiding in Leipzig.

Six weeks after he had gone out that day to buy bread, Vati came home. It was late December 1938. He was lucky to escape from the Nazis’ clutches, for even in those early days many people disappeared, never to return.

What rejoicing when our haggard-looking father locked us in his arms, amongst laughter and tears. This was the first joyful reunion of several others to come, for our family was to be separated and united several times more before emerging from the long, horrible nightmare, only in its infancy in 1938.

RUTH FISCH KESSLER

Context: Before the War

Source: Ruth Fisch Kessler and Maryann McLoughlin. The Blue Vase: A Memoir of a Vienna Kindertransport Child. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2013, pp. 4–12. Used by permission.

In the aftermath of Kristallnacht, Jews all over Germany scrambled to try to find a way out of the Nazi trap. In this account from Ruth Fisch Kessler, we see one element of this; the surrender, by her parents, of their daughter in one of the Kindertransport transfers to safety in Britain. A little girl of only five years of age, Ruth’s testimony here is told honestly and in memory images, through which she attempts to compose a narrative of her time with her host family, the Webbers of north London. Safe in this friendly environment, Ruth recalls the impact of the outbreak of war in September 1939, and her experiences of life in the street where she was living.

In March 1938, the Third Reich incorporated the Republic of Austria, the birthplace of Adolf Hitler, into the German Reich. This union, or Anschluss, was disastrous for the Jews. Anti-Jewish legislation that had been promulgated in Germany also applied to Vienna and the rest of Austria. Austrian Jews were excluded from the cultural, social, and economic life of their communities. Jewish-owned factories and businesses were closed or Aryanized, that is, forcibly transferred to be owned by Aryans.

Then, on the 9th and 10th of November of 1938, appropriation turned to destruction. The Nazis called this Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass because of the shards of glass from synagogues, Jewish homes and businesses that littered the streets, especially in Berlin and Vienna. Kristallnacht is certainly a euphemism. What really happened was a violent anti-Jewish pogrom, now called the November Pogrom by historians. This state-sponsored pogrom was carried out in Germany but also in Austria and the Sudetenland, a part of Czechoslovakia occupied in 1938 by German troops. During these brutal two days, synagogues were looted and burned; Jewish stores and homes were vandalized and plundered. Thousands of Jewish were arrested, beaten and sent to Dachau, Buchenwald, and Sachsenhausen Concentration camps where hundreds died because of the brutal treatment that they experienced. After the November Pogrom—the turning point in the Nazi persecution of the Jews—many Austrian Jews emigrated from their homeland so that by the spring of 1939, only about 115,000 Viennese Jews remained. I don’t know if my father’s store was vandalized. My parents and sister kept these troubles from me. I knew nothing about any of these horrible things.

During the spring of 1939, when I was still five years old, my small, close, safe world became large and scary. I remember it as if it were yesterday. My parents came to me and told me that they were sending me away. I would be going away on a train to England. They explained that they would come later. I did not understand the reason I was being sent away.

On May 12, 1939, I remember being put on the train with other children. My father, mother, and Erika were standing on the station platform. I repeatedly asked them, “Are you coming soon?”

“We’ll see you soon” they cried in return, tears flowing. I will never forget the tears in my mother’s eyes. She was crying, despairingly. I never saw my sister or my mother again. Then the train pulled out of the station. The train was like the trains we see in movies—a dark cave. Most of the children on the train and the ship were older than I. I was one of the youngest.

The Jewish Community Organisation (Kultusgemeinde) in Vienna had planned the transports, which became known as “Kindertransports” (children’s transports). . . .

Before I left on my Kindertransport, my father had sent a letter through the Hebrew Immigration Aid Society (HIAS) to sponsors in England. Although my safety was his foremost concern, my father wanted to be sure that I would be cared for by not only a Jewish family but especially a Jewish family that was religious.

It was very hard to find homes for the youngest children, and most families would only take one child. The Webber family wrote back to my father promising that I would be sent to Hebrew school. The Webbers could only take one child. By the time a home was found for my sister, Erika, it was too late. Erika did not want to leave my mother.

I don't remember where we disembarked the train or the ship that took us across the English Channel. But I have since read that convoys of children traveled by train to ports in Belgium and the Netherlands, from where they sailed to Harwich, a seaside town. From Harwich they traveled by train to Liverpool Street Station in London where they were met by their foster parents. I do remember Liverpool. I can still see the huge room crowded with children. HIAS delivered me to the Webbers. The Webbers, Stella and Michael Joseph, and their daughters, Joan, sixteen years old, and Greta, ten years old, were there to greet me. They picked me up and took me to the heart of London, to Cricklewood, London, NW2. I can still recall the phone number: Gladstone 3036. . . .

The Webbers' home in Cricklewood was near Hampstead Heath in North London. The house had a gate that led to a big backyard in which there was a garden. Later a bomb shelter was built in the backyard. Their home was beautiful. This was unlike how we lived in Europe. Rarely did an urban family had a single home; most lived in apartments. The house had two kitchens because the family kept kosher. There was a lounge, a sitting room, and a dining room. At the top of the elegant winding stairs were the bedrooms, a bathroom and a room with tub and running water. I was awed by all these rooms and the conveniences.

Each of the daughters had their own room. At first I had my own room, but then the family hired a maid and I shared the room with her. Another bedroom was a nursery where they had more dolls and games than the legendary F.A.O. Schwarz toy store in New York. I wanted only to read the fairy tale books. Perhaps I needed "and she lived happily ever after" stories.

I arrived carrying my little suitcase. I had "European" hair, frizzy hair, and I was wearing knee socks, a dress, and a coat. I could not speak English, and they could not speak German. But in two weeks I was speaking near fluently. The Webbers asked me to call them "Mommy" and "Daddy." Mrs. Webber was very strict; Mr. Webber wasn't. The girls were very kind. I adapted and became part of the family. They gave me a signet ring with an "RWF" on it that I still have. They had put their initial "W" in the middle.

They were a nice Jewish family. They kept kosher and celebrated Pesach, Yom Kippur, and Rosh HaShanah. They made sure that I continued to practice the Jewish religion. I fasted on Yom Kippur a half day up to the age of thirteen, when I then fasted all day. The Webbers sent me to synagogue on Saturday; I walked the $\frac{3}{4}$ mile to synagogue by myself.

Mr. Webber loved me. He owned a pub in Piccadilly Circus in London's West End. He brought gum and candy home from the pub. Servicemen, such as American GIs, gave these treats to him. Preparations for D-Day had brought thousands of GIs to the U.K. Great Britain was rationing candy, bread, milk, meat—almost everything, so it was fantastic to receive these treats.

I had attended kindergarten in Vienna, but now I was old enough for primary school, what we call elementary school in the U.S. I walked to a public school up a hill, about a mile and a half to two miles away. I made friends. During the holidays, the school had a Christmas tree that was marvelously decorated. In addition, the Webbers sent me to cheder (Hebrew school) three times a week; I went from 5:00 to 7:00 in the evening. I walked three-quarters of a mile during the blackout period. There were no street lights at all, and home had blackout shades. I wasn't frightened. I wasn't scared of the dark, and probably I didn't realize what was happening. . . .

On September 3, 1939, when I was five years old, the war against Germany started. In March 1939, Great Britain and France had promised to attack Germany in the event of that country's aggression against Poland. Indeed, Great Britain had signed a formal treaty in August 1939, guaranteeing the integrity of Poland's borders. Therefore, when Germany attacked Poland on September 1, 1939, Great Britain and France declared war on Germany two days later.

At the beginning of September, British citizens were ordered to cover their windows with black material, so their lights would not be seen by any German bombers. Millions of gas masks were distributed. Chemical weapons such as mustard gas and chlorine had been used during World War I, by both the Allies and the Central Powers; therefore, the British were anxious. Like another school book, I had to carry a gas mask under my arm to school every day.

By June 1940, the bombings began in earnest. This air war was called the Battle for Britain. Germany had already conquered France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Belgium. Hitler was determined to take Great Britain. The bombings were very bad. At home, during air raids, I remember going under the bed or under the dining room table. One time after an intense bombing raid, the plaster came down from the ceiling, but that was as bad as it was for the Webbers and me.

If there was a raid during the day, I had to put on my gas mask and get under my desk. One day I would play with a friend, and the next day her home would be bombed and she would be killed. No bombs hit the Webbers' home, but four houses across the street were bombed. The homes were flattened; only rubble remained.

MURRAY KOHN

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Murray Kohn and Maryann McLoughlin. Weep Tears of Blood. Pomona (NJ): Richard Stockton College of New Jersey, 2009, pp. 55–60. Used by permission.

Moniek (later Murray) Kohn was a young prisoner in Auschwitz who, with his father, suffered numerous torments at the hands of the Nazis. Entering Auschwitz in November 1942 at the age of 12, he was liberated from Theresienstadt in May 1945. In the account produced here, he shows the numerous ways in which daily life at Auschwitz was accompanied by violence, and where death was a constant companion. Showing just a sliver of the nature of existence in the camp, Murray Kohn provides a detailed view, in just a few words, of the kind of things for which a prisoner could be punished, and of what the impact of this was for a person's sense of self-worth. It is a penetrating look into the concentration camp experience from a perceptive witness-participant.

Dr. Mengele was responsible for the selections. Imagine standing with your father in line, hearing Mengele say, "Rechts," (Right). That would be okay. But when he said, "Links" (Left), you were finished. We were dying every minute during selection. Everyone was envious: "You are still with your father." But when we were separated, all night long I could not sleep. In the morning, I ran to see if he had been spared.

Mengele also experimented on people. He was especially fond of experimenting on twins and dwarfs. He was responsible as well for sterilization experiments. As a warning against escape, surgically dissected bodies with their intestines pouring out were displayed on planks at the entrance to the camp. This was our frequent "show and tell."

Such beatings! We were beaten by the SS or by the Kapos, usually German prisoners, "lifers," released from prison to supervise inmates of concentration camps. The Kapos would beat us if the bedding was not straight. There was also the Stubemeister, the one responsible for the barrack. He would beat us for having straw on our bunks. These beatings hurt, but they hurt more when my father was beaten. When I saw my father suffering, my pain was unbearable. We were constantly insulted, molested, beaten, one day after the next.

If the Stubenältester didn't like us, he would skim the soup and give us the watery part or cut a smaller portion of bread. If he liked us, he dipped the ladle deeper into the cauldron for a thicker soup. Food was life. However, the food they gave us was a teaser, 500 calories or less—an active boy should consume anywhere from 2500–2800 calories. They gave us bread in the evening and a little soup. This had to hold us until the next bowl of soup at lunch. I couldn't sleep because I was hungry. But I saved a little piece of bread for the morning, which I had to hide; otherwise, it would have been stolen. The morning liquid was an herbal mixture that tasted more like medicine water.

We were dead bodies in motion. Father had a habit of not eating. He would give his bread to me, telling me, "I found a piece of bread elsewhere." One day a man died, and my father broke off a piece of bread which stuck out of his pocket. A Ukrainian prisoner reported him to Hoess, "He stole bread." He assigned father to twenty lashes.

The head of Block 11 said to father quietly, "Yell loud and clear. I'll pretend that I am hitting you hard." For six weeks after this whipping, father could not sleep; his body was black and blue. All of a sudden, father's foot swelled up. He had to tear the seams of his pants in order to wear them. He barely could walk. I had to take him to the emergency room, which usually was a death sentence. For four to six weeks I didn't hear from my father. When Mengele came in, he ordered them to send father on a cart to Birkenau. The inmate doctors there loved my father; therefore, they exchanged a dying inmate's ID card for my father's.

Six weeks later one of the male nurses came to my block and asked, "Does anyone know Moniek Kohn?" The nurse had brought me a note. Father had an interesting calligraphy. The paper said, "Mein kind, ich leb." (My son, I am alive.) When he left the clinic, he was emaciated. Hungry, but alive.

I was working at D.A.W. (SS workshops and armament industries) where I got to know a couple of men. After lunch, which was usually a watery soup served from a barrel, one said, "Go. Have your father clean out the can." I signaled my father to come. He used to finish two gallons of soup. How he swallowed all this, I don't know, but he slowly regained his strength.

As hungry as we were, we did not eat bread on Pesach (Passover). We would barter bread for potatoes on Pesach. On Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement) we fasted. We davened. Sundays were supposed to be a day for rest and cleaning. If we were not chased out to work, we got together and sang Hebrew and Yiddish songs and told stories. Some led Talmud classes, by heart, for we had no books.

People from Ciechanów got together every Sunday. We started out with the question: "What are you doing? Do you have enough food? Where are you working? Do you have an extra portion of food?" We put everything together—some had too much, sometimes from stealing or becoming sick and not being able to eat. In this way we spread food to the needy. Nobody from Ciechanów was starving because we were sharing. Our friend and landsman, Motel Bergson, worked as a bread distributor for the camp. He made sure that every landsman received some bread. He kept us alive.

Did we act like human beings? Yes. Did we act like animals? Yes. People do not understand what it is like to be really hungry. . . .

One time I was working in a building that was an extension of a salami factory. The salami was made from horse meat, from dead horses; this is what they fed us. I was there for three months. I ate as much as I wanted during this period. I walked in and grabbed a salami. But we were not satisfied with this. We wanted to share with others, so we stole and brought back to camp. I helped my father by giving him food. And how many times they caught us! We were beaten, really beaten up, terribly beaten up. Not only bloody noses. But we kept on doing this because we wanted to help and to share with others.

Many people did turn into animals; hunger can do many terrible things to human beings. You could see this when a man died. Other inmates grabbed his piece of bread from his hand. Moreover, after work, at Appell, we were given our watery soup and our bread ration for the day. No sooner had lights gone out than people went around, crawled in the dark, to steal the piece of bread from their fellow prisoner who had kept a piece for the morning. Many nights people could not sleep because they feared losing their bread. I cannot blame people for this. "Hunger" in a concentration camp meant certain death. Even before a person died from starvation, Mengele hastened the process through his selections.

People were also kind. I was separated by a fence from Canada, a warehouse where they brought the clothing and possessions of those murdered and those waiting to die from malnutrition and over work. These were sorted in Canada. One day I was sitting by the fence to gulp down a little soup at lunch when someone yelled, "Moniek. Moniek." I recognized a girl from my public school. She said, "I have something for you. Come tomorrow at the same time." The next day I came and found my mother's pocketbook and photographs of my mother, sister, father, and me. They had been wrapped around a stone and thrown over the fence. She was later shot by an SS guard over a cigarette.

Not long after, another SS guard found the photograph of my mother. For having the photo, I was beaten continually for two hours. Then my body was as black as my father's. They asked me, "What else are you hiding? Gold, diamonds, money?" They said, "If you could hide a picture, you must have hidden other things." I never disclosed who had given me the photograph because I would have endangered her life.

Being searched was just part of the daily routine in Auschwitz! Murdering and torturing were part of the Nazis' jobs. They murdered and tortured during the day, and at night they played with their children and went to the theatre with their wives. That is the irony. The concentration camps were not 700 miles away. They were next door. This was their work—professional murderers, without conscience.

JUDY KOLT

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Judy Kolt. Tell It to the Squirrels. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 57–65. Used by permission.

Judy Kolt, born Izia Jablonska in 1936, spent much of the World War II years on the run with her older sister Tosia. In the testimony produced here, she describes just a tiny snippet of the life she led when hidden by Catholic nuns in a convent boarding school in Poland. In showing how the nuns sought ways to disguise the Jewish identity of the girls in their care, she sketches a small cottage industry of subterfuge and life-saving deception. As the war closes in on the girls, however, Judy outlines the constant necessity forced upon them to move on to other places of refuge. This account points up an important element regarding the practice of hiding Jewish children from the Nazis; the fact that long-term refuge was rarely possible and that ceaseless movement was often the only way to facilitate (though never guarantee) some measure of safety.

The events of that fateful day, 3 June 1943, will stay fresh in my mind till the day I die.

The big girls who were to take Communion were being pampered and groomed by the novices. All was chatter and bustle, as they arranged the girls' hair, which had been tied into curls with white scraps of cloth overnight, to make Shirley Temple locks when released. Each girl was wearing a long, flowing, silky dress embroidered with gold thread. Some of the dresses were being adjusted for the last time, with a tuck here and a stitch there. I watched as my big sister, Tosia, donned her white dress and a crown of white flowers that was placed on her dark hair. There were times when our hair was dyed blonde, but the picture I have from that day bears witness to my memory of her at that dark time. There was surely no one as beautiful in the entire world as my Tosia! Love for her filled me entirely. How I wished I was a big nine- or ten-year-old and could walk proudly in a white dress beside her!

The ceremony passed like a dream. Then we had a party and the parents came—all those blonde women with their little hats. Mamusia wasn't there but my Tatus was. I was so proud to stand beside him as we posed for a photograph with Tosia and Father Ussas. It was such a wonderful day that I forgot the constant fear and tension that resided deep inside me. To celebrate, Tatus took us to a restaurant for lunch. I had never been in a real restaurant before, and I was floating on air. How could I imagine what was about to unfold? The following events remain engraved in my memory as if they happened just yesterday. Like a newsreel in my head, I am destined to see it played again and again in my waking hours and in my sleep:

We are eating rolls and waiting for the soup—tomato soup with rice. My stomach is making noises in anticipation. Two men in gabardine coats walk through the door. They come towards us. The waitress comes out of the swinging door with a tray of soup, but stops walking. The men bid my father to accompany them into a room. The waitress brings the soup and spills some on Tosia's beautiful white gown. She leans down to wipe the stain and whispers, "Run children." Tosia takes my hand and we do not run but walk slowly to the door. We pass the office and hear a rasping voice shouting at my father. Tosia grips my hand very hard. We open the door and go out into the street. Steadily we walk to the corner, and then we run and run. We seem to run forever, and eventually get to the Pole Mogotokie (Mogotowskie Field), where the agricultural plots are. We squat in a patch of maize and rest. I don't know how long we are there. I remember it getting very cold and finally, when it is dark, we make our way back to the convent. . . .

Sister Wanda worried that when tortured, our father might give away our whereabouts, and so she lost no time in transferring us immediately away from the convent. We were given temporary shelter by the Sisters of Resurrection in their convent boarding school located in the Warsaw suburb of Sady Zoliburzkie. The girls there were very curious about where we came from, but we had been well trained to give away as little as possible. Tosia, normally so outgoing, kept chatting away about her First Holy Communion, but she was pale and tense. When I questioned her about it, she hugged me and said, "Go to sleep, little sister. Let's pray that we'll see Tatus again." I felt shaking and frightened, but could not quite understand what had happened.

Anna Kaliska in her memoirs (April 1959. The original is in the Szymanow Archives) writes:

The father of two little girls who used to be with us and later were sent away to Wrzosow, a Jew hiding under a different identity, has been captured; between his papers was found a note with the address of the Kazimierzowska Street convent. An order came for Sister Wanda to present herself at Gestapo headquarters. A few days in a row she went there for interrogation. I remember her marching off with a determined look, carrying a large black umbrella, which she took with her, while we conducted heated, emotional prayers in the chapel for her safe return. Sister Wanda would return unhurriedly, with a smile on her face. After some days—peace, and the little Jablonskis were away safely in Wrzosow.

In fact, it was not until some weeks later that we went to Wrzosow. After spending some time with the Sisters in Zoliburz, I believe we were taken for a short while to Szymanow, a country retreat belonging to the Niepokalanki Order. I guess Sister Wanda did not want to keep us in any place for too long, so as to mislead anyone trying to find us.

From there, we were taken one early morning when it was still dark, together with three or four other children and two nuns, back to Warsaw. This was no easy feat. There were aggressive German patrols everywhere. When we were woken and dressed, each of us was given a cube of sugar with a Valerian drop on it—to strengthen our hearts, sister said. It tasted delicious.

As provisions, we had a small sack of flour, a loaf of bread, a jar of beetroot jam and a pot of lard. As the sun rose we walked through a forest and stopped for a breakfast of bread, jam and berries. Sister suggested we all take a little nap. When we woke the lard was gone. All that was left was an empty little pot and a satisfied dog resting in the sun. Someone must have left the top off. Sister was devastated. After a couple of hours of walking, we reached a convent belonging to another order of nuns, who wore black habits. This convent housed a boys' boarding school. These nuns agreed to give us shelter until it was possible to travel on.

The atmosphere was very tense, because the siren sounded very often. We spent most nights in bomb shelters. After some days, our small bag of flour dwindled away. When we approached our hosts for food, they were reluctant to feed us. Perhaps they had fears of running out of supplies themselves if many others in need arrived unexpectedly, as we had, especially with the war escalating around them.

Our Sisters did not approve of this reluctance to keep us from hunger. Their own convent shared whatever they had with those who entered their doors, to the best of their ability. Having discovered ample supplies in the cellar, they decided that we should "borrow" some. Since I was the smallest, it was easy to lower me down through the small window into the cellar. I filled the sack with flour, passed it through the window, and then the sister helped me up again. At that moment, we were confronted by our hosts. With an angelic smile on her face, Sister pointed a finger at me and said, "This is a saintly child. It is through her that Our Lord feeds us. With my own eyes, I witnessed a miracle. I looked and saw her suspended in the air, and when I looked again, our sack of flour was full." This must have shamed our hosts, who blushed a little, smiled, and no more was said.

After some weeks in this convent, our little group moved on. We were again in the Mironowskie Hills on the outskirts of Warsaw, I think in Czerno. I have memories of a long park within sight of a villa. At the end of the park, there was a large cellar, with a rather low ceiling. I have since discovered it was a wine cellar. We were there with two nuns, one of them Sister Irene, as well as three or four other girls. We had to be very quiet and were not allowed to move about. There were also a few other groups of people there. I vividly remember that food was brought to us three times a day by the Grey Nuns: mock coffee and bread with beetroot jam in the morning; hot soup, occasionally with some bread for lunch; and again, bread, sometimes with a spread, but mostly plain, in the evening.

Finally, we moved on to Wrzosow. I have a distinct memory of being driven there in a German military truck, and can only surmise that the nuns were able to spin some convincing tale to a sympathetic soldier. We ended up in Willa Jutrzenka in Wrzosow, a very large, impressive white building in a rural area. During the occupation, it served many purposes, one of which was a secret warehouse for defence materials and weapons for the underground. It also had a primary school that was teaching forbidden subjects to its pupils. When the Germans came by, all they found was an orphanage, a soup kitchen, a kindergarten, and trade courses for girls, such as dressmaking. We finished up in the orphanage. The nuns who looked after us were not our familiar "white nuns." They wore the short grey habits and grey caps of the Ursulan Order, although I believe that the gracious mansion, the Willa Jutrzenka, had been bequeathed to the Niepokalanki in July 1940.

There were many babies and toddlers there, and it was the older girls who were responsible for them. The lack of food was a problem for everyone and the atmosphere was very tense. Nightly alarms were so frequent that in the end nobody went into shelters unless we heard bombs or grenades exploding. The nuns, although caring, were run off their feet. The front was coming closer and closer and they had wounded fighters and many refugees to worry about.

Tosia, who at the age of ten was one of the big girls, was given the job of changing the babies' nappies in the morning, washing them and changing their linen. Changing dirty nappies is not a job any ten-year-old girl easily takes to, so she became ultra-religious and started going to early morning mass at the crack of dawn before the babies woke. In this way, she was often able to avoid this particular task.

Her new devoutness proved very profitable. She met a woman in church who took a liking to her and would often bring her some homemade bread or even cake, which Tosia of course shared with me. This woman also arranged for Tosia to wash the windows of her first-floor apartment, for which she paid her in food. Eventually, some of the woman's neighbours also had their windows washed. This was a wonderful supplement to our meagre diet, although a dangerous way for a ten-year-old to earn food. She had to lean out of the first-floor windows to reach the panes, risking losing her balance. Another way that my brave sister had of gaining extra food was nightly excursions to steal apples in a nearby orchard, which she exchanged for bread with some of the local urchins who were always hanging around the villa. I was allowed to help in this activity as well.

My headaches and nosebleeds were getting more frequent, often preventing me from being helpful in the daily work. This did not endear me to the nun in charge. She often told me what a burden I was. Secretly I named her the Grey Nun with the Black Heart.

In the garden, there was a little fountain adorned with an angel on top. It was almost hidden by high bushes, and I loved going there. It became my haven, a private place for dreaming. In the quiet and solitude, I allowed myself to imagine Tatus coming for us one fine day, and taking us back to Mamausia. In my daydreams, I saw us bringing her a bunch of forget-me-nots, as we had done once before on Mother's Day, when Tatus took us to see her in the convent of the Sisters of the Family of Maria. Only this time, Mamusia would keep the flowers, instead of us having to take them to the chapel to present them to the Virgin Mary.

When lost in these beautiful thoughts, I did not feel the pain in my limbs, the weeping sores caused by my chilblains, the rumble in my stomach or my headaches. Tosia had told me more than once that Tatus was dead, that he would never come back for us again, but I knew that this was absolutely not true.

The nuns tried to make life as pleasant as the circumstances allowed. We were all suffering from malnourishment but, as children will, we still had fun. We played games, skipped and sang. One day, we had a special party. I was told there would be bread with real mock honey for lunch. We children waited for the lunch bell with anticipation, and when we sat down at the long tables, to our delight, there was the promised bread and honey. Quite a few guests were there, amongst them some German soldiers with their Polish girlfriends, who, I was told, were visiting their babies. The prayers over, I reached for my bread and honey, when the Grey Nun with the Black Heart took hold of my wrist and said, "Honey is not good for your headaches. You are not to have any."

As she walked away, Tosia whispered in my ear, "Go to your fountain." I did, straight after lunch. Tosia met me there with half of her honey bread. I bit into it and tasted sheer ecstasy. Just then, I saw the Grey Nun with the Black Heart come towards me. I quickly stuffed the rest of the bread into my mouth and proceeded to swallow it. The woman grabbed hold of my hair, pulled my head back, and stuck her finger down my throat again and again, until I vomited. "I told you it would make you sick," she said as she walked away. She was the only nun who was ever unkind to me. She should have been a prison warden.

August 1944—Another clear memory:

There is a lot of commotion in the sick room. Men are coming and going, some under their own steam, others helped by friends. Sisters wearing aprons are bringing hot bowls of soup, tending the men's wounds where necessary, and preparing straw pallets for them. The children help wherever possible. Forgotten are the childish games. Many other people are now arriving in Wrzosow. Some are family groups, others are alone. They all find shelter, and somehow the food is made to go round. The nightly alarms are increasing. The children help out with the labour on nearby farms, as all the men seem to have disappeared. My back is continually hurting and I find it difficult to straighten it. The only thing to look forward to is the generosity of the farmers' wives. They are very kind to the orphan children, and we often get to share their meals of Zurek (fermented rye flour borsht) and potatoes, or foods I remember eating with my nanny in the kitchen when I was a little girl. I'm happy here at the orphanage but I'm always so tired. I wish I could just shut my eyes and sleep and sleep and never have to go anywhere else again. But that is not to be. We are being evacuated to Laski.

HENRI KORN

Context: Before the War

Source: Henri Korn. Saviours: The Story of a Jewish Altar Boy. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2004, pp. 41–45. Used by permission.

Henri Korn was a German Jewish boy living through the first years of the Nazi regime in the 1930s. Sometime during the second half of 1938 he received an intense personal shock when he was taken to the principal's office and told that he could no longer attend the school where he was enrolled. He did not understand at the time that this was on account of his Jewish identity; all he remembered was the pain it caused him to be told that "I was no longer part of all this," and that "I was lost and alone." Soon enough, all his schooling came to an abrupt end.

Despite all the experiences I lived through in Poland at the time, it did not connect me to my Jewishness. As soon as we returned to Germany, the family observed none of the Jewish rituals, so they retained no importance or meaning to me. Due to my family's assimilation into the Germanic way of life, I believed I was the same as any of the other children in my class. I had noticed the painting of incomprehensible slogans on shop windows and walls that had something to do with Jews. There were posters plastered wherever a vacant spot was available, with caricatures ridiculing ugly people with hooked noses, but they were people who meant nothing to me.

Soldiers were marching during the day, preceded by bands belting out stirring marches. On occasional nights, groups of men in different-coloured uniforms would parade, holding torches and shouting raucous anthems. These men belonged to the fanatic factions of the Nazi regime, the SA who wore brown shirts and the SS who were fitted out in black. They screamed at, threatened and attacked people for no apparent reason.

All these events had an eerie feeling about them, but I wasn't personally affected, mainly because my parents kept any concerns they had away from their children. It is also possible that my father didn't feel seriously threatened at that time. He still thought Nazism was a passing phase, a mental aberration that the common sense of the German people, his people, would eventually reject.

In the autumn of 1938, an edict became law, which forbade Jewish children from attending Aryan schools. It caught up with me when I was eight years old, nearly nine. By then I was in my third year of primary school. One morning, my teacher tapped me on the shoulder. This was no cause for alarm. She had been my mentor for three years and I liked her a lot. "Follow me," she said. "We are going to see the principal."

I felt myself beginning to shake and fear gripped my chest, forcing me to breathe in short bursts. Good children were never summoned to the principal's office. What had I done wrong? One never questioned a teacher, so I followed her silently up the marble staircase, which rose like a mountain towards the heavens. I had never been up those stairs before, as the primary section was housed on the ground floor. My teacher, tall and straight in posture, didn't speak or look at me as we passed the floors where the middle and high school classes were held. We reached the top floor where the administrative offices were located. A discreet knock on a door and we entered a spacious room furnished with a large desk, behind which sat our principal. I had only ever seen him at a distance during the Monday morning flag-raising ceremonies. I approached him, my legs like jelly. In a most friendly manner, he asked us to sit down. My teacher flattened the back of her skirt with both hands and sat first, as good manners dictated. "My dear boy, it is my sad duty to inform you that you are no longer able to attend this school. You won't be able to understand the reasons for this decision, so we won't discuss it. Yet it is with much regret that I am obliged to tell you that you are no longer welcome here."

I was stunned, not able to grasp the significance of his words. I looked at my teacher. Tears were rolling down her face. She did not look at me, but stared at the principal, who leaned over towards me.

"Accept this book as a gesture of friendship and to remind you of this school. When you read it in the future, remember us."

He opened the book, signed and dated it. He then asked the teacher to also sign it. He handed it to me and shook my hand. My teacher and I climbed down those many stairs and when she reached the door of our classroom, she stopped me from going in. "Wait here," she said and went inside to fetch my school bag. At the front door, which she opened for me, my beloved teacher said good-bye with a quick wave of the hand and told me to go straight home.

I slowly walked across the schoolyard clutching the book. I made my way home on that cold November morning, uncomprehending and miserable.

"Mother!" I yelled. "I'm no longer allowed to go to school. Why? Why can't I go to school?"

My mother stared at me. Tears rolled down her face, but she said nothing, not one word of explanation or comfort that I can remember. I was shocked to see my mother so helpless and upset. I got the message that nothing could be done. I asked no more questions. I was filled with yearning for what I had lost.

What a beautiful school it was. I loved Monday morning when the flag was raised. All the classes were lined up in columns three abreast. The formations were perfect and each group was a long rectangle, so accurate, as if drawn with a ruler. I also liked the ceremonial way documents were handed to the teacher during class. If messages were delivered, issued from the headmaster for instances, there would be a loud knock on the door. In would come a student dressed in the uniform of a senior Hitler Youth. He would click his heels to attention and raise his arm shouting "Heil Hitler." He would then proceed in still military steps towards the low platform occupied by the teacher. Two metres away, he would again click his heels, his body straight as a ramrod and exclaim once more "Heil Hitler" with arm raised. Slowly advancing, he would hand over the note. Stepping back, he would again raise his arm in the Nazi salute, turn on his heels and walk out of the classroom. This routine always impressed me. I was longing to grow up so I could also be part of this wonderful display of military discipline.

Now I was no longer part of all this. I was lost and alone. The book I had been given became my treasured possession. It was a compilation of German history, literature and science, put together for older children. Later on, when the situation became more and more dangerous, my mother tore out the page with the signatures of the principal and the teacher to protect them from possible Nazi vigilantes.

The local synagogue community, to which my parents did not belong, organized emergency classes for about eighteen children staffed by sacked Jewish teachers. Our classes were held in the community hall. We learned the basic skills—reading, writing and counting and the Hebrew alphabet. We were also shown how to plant vegetables on a tiny plot of land in front of the synagogue, in response to government instructions that every German had to plant vegetables on whatever land they owned, or even on public land, to overcome chronic shortages of food.

My schooling there lasted no more than three weeks. Day after day, groups of men in uniform, encouraged by screaming women, abused us in the foulest language. Our little garden was vandalized and the walls smeared with slogans of hatred. All of this forced the closure of the synagogue and its tiny classes. Each of the teachers invited five or six children to come to their homes for further tuition. One week in my new venue, we were discovered, possibly reported by a neighbor. An angry mob made up of Hitler Youth, a few SA men and an ill-assorted group of adults congregated outside, shouting abuse, hurling stones and breaking the windows. The police didn't intervene. Luckily the hecklers did not invade the house, they just stood outside and screamed. We did not dare leave the premises. As night fell, the hooligans retired. All was not quiet and dark. Parents had been advised not to pick up their children. The teachers delivered us home later that night.

It was not an isolated incident, and within about three weeks, all schooling stopped. Soon people we knew as friends and acquaintances turned their heads away as we passed them in the street. It hurt my father a great deal, and he would mumble bitter words about disloyalty.

HENRI KORN

Context: Western Europe

Source: Henri Korn. Saviours: The Story of a Jewish Altar Boy. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2004, pp. 110–116. Used by permission.

From his home in Germany, young Henri Korn moved to Belgium, where, his parents hoped, he would be safe from Nazi antisemitic depredations. The German invasion of Belgium in May 1940, however, precluded all possibility that Henri Korn would be guaranteed a safe future. In this account, we see what life was like for him in the boarding school to which he was sent—where antisemitism, far from being something that happened on the outside, was very much in evidence. It was here, also, that he began to learn the horrible truth about what was happening to Jews in other parts of Europe.

The dormitory we were to occupy looked like a recent addition and was at some distance from the mansion. Each floor opened to a large room containing about forty beds. Reserved for our female caretaker was an area which was totally surrounded by a white curtain that slid on an elevated rail. I was surprised to find that all our guardians were female. The only male seemed to be the gardener, who looked very old.

The women in charge wore white dresses and covered their shoulders with purple capes. They never smiled or spoke words of encouragement to us. On Saturdays all the inmates were sent to the showers. I noticed that some of the bigger boys were already well developed and hairy but they still had to submit to being washed by women. These female attendants assisted our cleansing by wielding brushes with stiff bristles running down our backs. They seemed to enjoy the cruel pleasure of cleaning our ears by driving into the ear duct a fine ivory shaft, the tip thinly covered in cotton wool. The pain was excruciating and everybody attempted to run past our minders, ears covered with outstretched hands.

The 1940 invasion had swept through the area, leaving in its wake the burnt-out shell of a tank sitting in the middle of our playground. We acted out war-like games within and around it, debating the combat value of soldiers of the nations caught up in the present conflict. When we went on excursions, we were given strict orders not to pick up anything that lay around, as it might be dangerous. I remember seeing a helmet behind some bushes but was not game enough to break rank and retrieve it. A few of the boys, more defiant of rules, picked up cartridges, bullets and other debris. Guy, my friend, with whom I always walked, bent down and grabbed what turned out to be the detonator of a grenade. He hit it against a tree and it blew up. It was a small explosion, but enough shrapnel entered his leg to create an emergency and he was sent to hospital. I never saw him again and no amount of inquiring revealed what had happened to him. I was alone now and had nobody to confide in. This accident happened just one week after we had arrived.

On Sundays all the boys marched off together to somewhere unknown. I was left all on my own to pace the large wooden shed that passed for our indoor playground, or walk around the yard. Nobody told me they were going to church. I was shocked to be left behind, imagining it as a punishment for some misdemeanor I had unknowingly committed. Everybody was back by lunchtime and I noticed a rise in the level of noise and boisterous behaviour. I took that as proof that all the others had gone to a treat, like a Sunday parade.

The worst thing that happened to me in the three months at "rehabilitation" was an anti-Semitic attack on me personally. It came from a woman teacher during class. How well I remember this particular incident! Classes were held six days a week. Two female teachers took different subjects and pupils, aged from ten to fourteen, sat in the same class. One of the instructors lived on the property; the other pedalled in from a nearby town and taught us two days a week. The latter wore sports-style clothes and had a mannish, ugly face, round and large, with two closely set eyes. In one of her classes, she launched a question at me I couldn't answer. Her face turned red with rage.

"You son of Judas!" she screamed at me, literally pointing me out to the class. "This is the son of Judas!"

The students sat in stunned silence. The end of the period could not come soon enough, and as we filed out of the classroom the other boys kept an uncomfortable distance from me. It was already dark as we silently climbed the steel stairs that ran behind our mansion, for our weekly weigh-in. The food, although plentiful, consisted mainly of potatoes glistening with pork fat. Every Friday night, the scales would tell the nursing staff whether we were gaining weight. After our evening meal we all went to bed where, at last, I could be alone with my thoughts. Who was Judas? I knew by the viciousness of the teacher's outburst that calling me his son was meant to be insulting. I felt very alone. Sadness rose inside my chest. I didn't know how I would cope if she attacked me again in that crazy manner. I stayed awake for a long time on that cold night. Contrary to my expectations, over the next few days none of the boys teased me or tried to hit me. Their obvious sympathies did not lie with the teacher.

The Sunday following the incident, I was informed, along with some other boys, that our parents were coming to visit us that day. I was thrilled. It was so unexpected. All of us receiving visitors were scrubbed, combed and dressed in fresh clothes and presented to our parents in fine fettle. Visits lasted about three hours and took place in the old spacious glasshouses, formerly used to grow exotic fruit and trees.

I rushed up to greet my mother with great excitement. Turning to the man who I expected to be my father, I faced a complete stranger. He was a short man of about forty and wore the peaked cap so favoured by working class men. He was obviously not Jewish. "This is Jacques Van Zeebroek, a close friend," said my mother. She gave no further explanation of why he was there. Later, I was to find out that my mother had met him when she went to visit my sister at her sanatorium and had asked for directions from him, a total stranger. He was to become the savior of our family, and to this day, I do not know why he decided to undertake this dangerous task. I asked him where my father was. Mother said it was better for him not to be out in the open too much. He couldn't speak French and looked Jewish.

Mother was eager to find out how I was faring. I didn't want to tell her about the abusive teacher in front of this stranger, but my self-control vanished in a flood of tears. Finishing my tale of woe, I cried as never before. Mr. Van Zeebroek rose, and without a word, strode toward the lady supervisor, who sat behind a small desk.

"I must see the Principal immediately!" said my newly-found defender.

"Oh! The Principal's busy. I'm not sure whether she's available right now." Mr Van Zeebroek interrupted her sternly.

"I am acquainted with the Department's Director-General and I demand to see the Principal before I lodge a serious complaint."

The supervisor got up from behind her desk and without further ado told us to wait. "I'll be back shortly."

On her return, she directed us to a door by the side of the mansion. It opened up to a steep staircase rising quite high to the floor above, which contained the offices. On top of the landing stood a large lady dressed in black, who introduced herself as the Principal. Beside her stood a tall clerical gentleman wearing a long, dark frock and a metal cross on his chest. I had never seen the lady in black nor the chaplain before. We all sat down in a small office. On being asked the nature of the complaint, Mr. Van Zeebroek began to describe the incident and berate the pair for allowing an innocent child to be bullied in this unfair manner. To allow a teacher to make these remarks was beyond comprehension.

"I know the Director-General and I shall lodge a strong complaint tomorrow morning." Looking at the priest, he said loudly, "Your teaching encourages hatred and prejudice."

In flustered tones, the chaplain denied the charges but conceded that in these difficult times full of frustration, some people behaved badly. The principal promised to follow up the result of the investigation.

We left the office and came downstairs. I was both delighted and shocked at Mr. Van Zeebroek's attack on such eminent personages. The three of us walked towards the gate to explore the wide expanse of frozen countryside. It was a silent landscape with the frost covering everything. Only the pussy willows were out, their furry little beads braving the severe cold. I kept pleading to be allowed to leave the sanatorium. I begged and cried, but was told it could not be done half-way through the cure. My mother begged me to be patient, saying that I would be home in a month. They left soon after for the station.

Monday passed uneventfully, but Tuesday was when my tormentor would be taking the class. The next morning my heart was beating a drum charge. With great reluctance I dragged myself towards the classroom. Standing on the podium was a young woman who introduced herself as our new teacher.

What a sense of relief! Heads turned towards me with quizzical looks and a number of faces broke into sympathetic smiles. The warmth of budding friendship grew out of this incident, and the rest of my stay was much more pleasant.

I went back to school in Brussels at the beginning of 1942. The war situation kept everybody guessing. The Americans had entered the war while I was at rehabilitation. The Germans kept claiming that Moscow would fall any day. It never happened, and the news filtering through from illegal sources spoke of huge German losses on the Eastern Front. I remembered the prophecies of the German sergeant in May 1940, and hoped they were turning out to be correct.

Frightening tales of persecution against Jews in Poland, Russia and other countries were becoming more frequent. At school, in spite of Nazi rhetoric about Jews, there was little abuse from non-Jewish teachers or students. Nevertheless, on one school outing, we had a terrific fight. Our class was the only one where the first and second best were not Jewish students. We put to flight our gentile opponents but cornered the top two students and gave them a beating for their presumption. The combatants who had escaped our onslaught did something that had never been done before. They went to get help from the Flemish boys who were generally quite a lot bigger and heavier than those in the French section. In normal times, there was little love lost between French-speaking and Flemish-speaking boys. The Flemish boys seemed more prone to believing the incessant anti-Semitic propaganda, so we didn't hang around in order to be beaten up by them.

The Nazis had issued an order early that spring under which all Jews had to wear the Yellow Star of David. We duly collected the cloth badges and began to sew them on all our outer garments. Remarkably, as a sign of solidarity, a number of gentile students at our school asked for spare badges and sported them proudly in support of the Jewish students.

Shortly after, the round-ups began. At first Jews went peacefully, having been asked to take sufficient clothing to "resettlement." My father ran around urging people not to go.

Rumours had turned to reality and the deportations had begun. In May 1942, an article appeared in the German press, claiming that Pabjanice, the town my mother grew up in, had been declared Judenrein (cleansed of Jews). A week later, a second article appeared revealing that all the elderly men had been executed at the local market square. This presumably included my grandfather. The Germans complained that the doomed Jews refused to obey orders. They were told to kneel and bend the head forward for easier targeting. They refused and instead threw themselves down on their stomachs, wrapping their prayer shawls tightly around their bodies. This made the shooting more difficult and stressful to the killers.

CHAIM BENJAMIN KÜNSTLICH

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Chaim Benjamin Künstlich. L'Chaim: Surviving Soviet Labour Camps to Rebuild a Life in Postwar Poland. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 53–56. Used by permission.

In line with the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of August 23, 1939, the Polish city of Lwów (modern-day Lviv) was occupied by the Soviet Red Army on September 22, 1939. Given its location and large Ukrainian-speaking population, the city became a major center for the newly installed communist regime in the region of eastern Poland. In this account, Chaim Benjamin Künstlich describes what life was like under the changed conditions, forced as a result of the earlier Nazi invasion of Poland that allowed the Soviet takeover. A hint is given, moreover, of how the circumstances would change even further, when he writes that the Soviets began deporting Jews out of the city when “war broke out between Russia and Germany” in June 1941. Although short, the account provides a neat summary of life on the “other side” of the Polish invasion.

It was still September when we arrived in Lwów. We three brothers rented a room at 7 Maczyńskiego Street, from a Mrs Mochinicka. We worked at different jobs to earn a little money. I gave lessons to younger boys in mathematics, though for a time I didn't work and my brothers supported me.

I had a nice golden Omega pocket watch one of my brothers had given me and I sold it to buy food. We had a few złoty and bought things such as a pair of trousers, socks or shoes at the market and resold them at other markets for a little profit. Everyone else was doing that too. Other family members fled towards the Russian border, to escape from the Germans. Hamek came, as did Lola and her husband Arnold, with his sister Ella, and her husband Jashek Cygielfarb. Arnold was conscripted into the Red Army and died on the front on his first day. Cesia and Henek came with Lus'ka and Amnon, who were unable to return to Palestine because, unfortunately, they did not have their papers. Lus'ka had arrived on a three-month visa and had applied for an extension. When the war broke out in September 1939 her passport was still with the authorities (Starostwo Grodzkie). Their offices closed and she was unable to retrieve her passport, thus precluding her from leaving Poland.

Hania came to Lwów in December 1939. By this time the town had been occupied by the Russians. Hania had to walk across the Bug River barefoot. This was now the border. It was dangerous, but women were less likely to be harassed than men. Once across, she was able to find transport into Lwów.

As we found various family members in Lwów, the room filled up with people. At times we had maybe seven or eight people living together.

My mother wrote a letter to me soon afterwards saying that if I was with Hania I should marry her. We were married on 8 January 1940. My mother liked Hania very much and we had a wonderful marriage.

It is the Jewish custom that a marriage simply needs to be recognized by three Jewish people who will swear that they know the couple by their names and by where they grew up, and know that they are free to marry. Ours was a very simple wedding with only ten people present. It took place in a private house belonging to a friend of Hania's sister and we celebrated with a kiddush.

I was no longer living with my brothers when we got married. By that time, Efraim was already married to a girl from Lwów. Her father was a lawyer named Landau and her family lived in 52 Lwowska Street. She was a nice-looking girl, a teacher. They had a small wedding, which Eliezer, Hania and I attended. Efraim's wife was very nice to me—everyone always loves the baby in the family and they looked after me.

We continued to make a few złoty on which to live. I got a job as a waiter in Lwów in a licensed restaurant that sold beer and vodka. But Hania and I had only six months together as a married couple before we were deported to Siberia.

When the war broke out between Russia and Germany, the Russians began collecting Jewish and Polish refugees and sending them to Siberia on goods trains. The rule was that only people who had been born in Lwów, or men who had married girls born in Lwów, could stay in the city.

Cesia and Henek were both working in Lwów and got permission to stay. The Russians knew them as communist sympathisers and gave them Russian passports. Efraim had married a Lwów citizen and was thus allowed to stay.

Eliezer went to live in Tarnopol. Lola ran away to the depths of Russia with her deceased husband's family—where she spent the war years. Some people went back to Poland rather than go to Siberia. We heard later that they were taken by the Germans.

MICHAEL KUTZ

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Michael Kutz. If, By Miracle. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2013, pp. 45–51. Used by permission.

In and around the forests of Minsk, partisan units were active almost from the beginning of the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union. While there was a resistance movement in the Minsk ghetto led by Mikhail Gebelev and Hersh Smolar, in the forests vigorous partisan resistance was undertaken at the order of (and with support from) the Soviet government. Michael Kutz, who was in one of these units, has left us an illuminating account of his time as a Jewish partisan, describing not only the life of his unit and the activities in which they engaged, but also his personal story until the relief of the unit by the Red Army in the summer of 1944. His shock at seeing the ruins of Minsk was offset by the pride he felt at being a legitimate soldier in the fight against Nazism.

By mid-summer, our partisan group had increased to 150 people. Throughout the year, and during the fall in our area, the Central Committee of the Communist Party in Moscow established links with several partisan groups. Under the direction of their Belorussian Headquarters of the Partisan Movement, they helped us partisans co-ordinate our efforts against the German occupation. Political commissars from the Soviet government helped to expand the operations against Germany.

Our enemies were definitely feeling the impact of the partisan resistance. In response, the Wehrmacht launched offensives against us, surrounding the forests and shooting at us with heavy artillery. At night, they threw rockets that lit up the woods, enabling them to drop their bombs with accuracy. In the fall of 1942 our group decided to break through the German blockade that encircled the forest where we were living and go deeper into the Bobruisk forest near the Berezina River to the base of a partisan detachment, an otriad, under the leadership of Commander Leventzow. The commissar was Comrade Lepeshkin and the group's unit took orders from Semyon Ganzenko, the head of a brigade in Western Belorussia. Our group, and our smaller detachments, joined this larger group and obeyed the orders of the Central Command. Their otriad included civilians and Red Army soldiers who had escaped from the labour camps, Jews from Bobruisk and Slutsk, and thousands of Jews who had escaped from the Minsk ghetto and brought with them a great deal of ammunition. The Minsk Jews could protect themselves and therefore didn't have to deal with the antisemitism that other Jews who had escaped into the forest did. In general, antisemitism wasn't as prevalent in the Leventzow otriad because the Bobruisk Jews had been members of the underground in the ghetto, and they were able to contribute significantly to the partisans in terms of both weapons and manpower; some had also acquired important skills from doing forced labour in the German military aerodrome.

At the beginning of 1943, parachutists from Moscow landed in our forest—they were members of the Komsomol, the youth division of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, who had volunteered to fight with the partisans. The Central Command had recently ordered partisan groups to include Soviet citizens in the partisan fight, which automatically applied to Jews as well as non-Jews. As a result, Jewish men, women, children and the elderly were now more protected, and some partisans even provided weapons to unarmed Jews in the forest. In the early spring of 1943, Semyon Ganzenko established a partisan unit in West Belorussia to specifically recognize and protect Jewish partisans, including women, children and the elderly. Sholom Zorin led this otriad of about four hundred partisans, most of whom were Jews from Minsk. I also heard about a detachment of around one thousand Jewish men, women and children under the leadership of Tuvia Bielski and his brothers, who had assumed responsibility for protecting all Jews, even the elderly and those who were malnourished and in poor health. To provide for all the survivors, the Jewish leaders of this partisan group set up their own self-sustaining camp, complete with workshops and a kitchen. They would come out of the forests at night and order peasants in the nearby villages to give them food and warm clothing. News of these partisan groups encouraged me to continue to fight.

I was also thrilled to learn that about two hundred Jews had escaped from the ghetto in Mir and that among them was my cousin Meir Zaturensky, who was a year older than me. Sadly, I never met up with him—I heard he was killed during an operation.

I also heard the story of a young man from my town, Shlomo Lansky, who had become an active partisan in an otriad outside Pinsk. He had been a leader of the Betar youth movement before the war and had succeeded in escaping into the forest from Nies' wiez ghetto uprising in July 1942. During one of his partisan operations he was captured, tied to a horse, dragged to a village and tortured, but he didn't reveal any information. Belorussian informants who witnessed his execution told us that when he was hanged in the public square in the town of Hancevicz, he cried out from the gallows, "I am not the first Jew and I am not the last Jew to be hanged, but we will survive you, and all you murderers will be brought to justice. We Jews and the groups of fighters in the forest will kill you wherever you are. We will give you no peace. Your bodies will be swallowed up by the swamps of Polesia."

We received orders from Moscow to intensify the struggle against the Nazis, to attack them on the main roads, to tear up railway tracks that carried soldiers and heavy artillery and tanks to the front, to set fire to the bases where gasoline and oil were stored, and to destroy the police guard posts and those who manned them. Our orders were to give them no rest, day or night.

Since we now had radio contact with Moscow, we heard everything that was happening on the frontlines. We got the good news about the defeat of German Field Marshal Rommel's army in North Africa at the end of October 1942. In the Second Battle of El Alamein, the German army had lost their best tanks and weaponry and approximately 30,000 soldiers, while others had been taken prisoner. We also reveled in the news about the battle of Stalingrad: German Field Marshal Paulus and the powerful Sixth Army had surrendered on February 2, 1943. Soviet Marshal Rokossovsky, the commander of the Stalingrad front, gave them generous terms of surrender: they would not be killed. Field Marshal Paulus and twenty-two high-ranking generals were taken prisoner along with 90,000 Wehrmacht soldiers. Hitler proclaimed three days of mourning throughout Germany and all the lands occupied by the German army. We rejoiced at the news of those defeats, which indicated that Germany would lose the war.

We also heard quite a bit about Wilhelm Kube, the General-Kommissar for Weissruthenien (Belorussia) who worked out of Minsk. He was the one responsible for allowing the Jews in the Minsk ghetto to stay alive for the time being. Most were tradesmen who were forced to do a great deal of work for the German war machine—in particular to supply the Wehrmacht with underwear, uniforms, warm boots, warm coats and other items. The Jews in the Minsk ghetto knew that of all the ghettos of eastern Belorussia, theirs was the only one left, and that the same fate that befell Jews in other cities awaited them. They were well organized and kept in contact with the partisans. Often, groups of hundreds of Jews armed with weapons managed to smuggle themselves out of the ghetto and join the partisans. The Minsk ghetto ended up being liquidated in October 1943; by that time thousands of Jews, especially young people, had managed to escape into the forests.

In the fall of 1943, the Partisan Movement Staff of the Belorussian Command ordered Wilhelm Kube's assassination. A Belorussian girl by the name of Yelena Mazanik worked as a maid in Kube's residence, and lived on the premises. After many secret meetings, the partisans convinced her to carry out the attack on Commisar Kube, promising her that she would go down in history as a heroine of the Soviet Union. On September 22, 1943, she placed a time-bomb under the mattress in Kube's bed. When she got off work that evening, she managed to leave the premises, despite the fact that the building was guarded by the Wehrmacht and the SS. Later, when Commissar Kube went to sleep, the bomb exploded, blowing him into pieces. The partisans were able to get Yelena safely into the woods and she worked with them until after liberation. Hitler declared a week of mourning for Kube's death and in retaliation ordered the authorities of Belorussia to kill one thousand citizens of Minsk.

Early in 1944, we received news that the siege of Leningrad had been broken, the historic city had lost hundreds of thousands of its civilians, but had not surrendered. With the daily news that the German armies were experiencing substantial losses and being forced to retreat, we expected the Allied armies to open up the second front any day, which would hasten the destruction of the Hitler regime. As the Yiddish saying goes, as men lebt, derlebt men alles—if you live long enough, you experience everything. Finally, the exciting news arrived from Moscow that on June 6, 1944, the Allied troops—American, British and Canadian soldiers—under the command of American General Dwight D. Eisenhower and British general Bernard Montgomery, had stormed the coast of Normandy and destroyed the German positions there. In Belorussia, the German army began retreating toward our area. All the partisan groups were ordered to be careful of retreating German soldiers, who, with the Red Army in pursuit, were trying to hide in the forests.

Eventually, the Germans surrendered to the partisan units. Defenceless and demoralized, hungry and thirsty, the Wehrmacht soldiers and officers begged us to spare their lives. Our orders, however, were to interrogate them and shoot them. The partisan intelligence officers extracted very important information and although the soldiers told us that they were only following orders, among the captured were members of the SS and Einsatzgruppen officers responsible for murdering the Jewish population in the occupied areas and sending people to labour camps in Germany.

The members of the Red Army to reach our part of the forest that June were the reconnaissance groups. When we saw the columns of tanks and artillery, we celebrated, embracing and kissing the Red Army soldiers. Several Jewish officers and soldiers among them, with tears in their eyes, spoke to us in Yiddish and reassured us all that they had routed the Germans on all fronts and had taken revenge on them.

We had been liberated! Finally, we were free. We were excited, of course, but each one of us wondered where we would go once we left the forest. Most of our homes and families no longer existed. We had survived, but what awaited us?

The Red Army soldiers started clearing out the mines that the Germans had placed on roads and bridges. After they left the area, the Red Army advanced further to liberate Minsk, so we couldn't yet leave our encampment because the front was not far away. We waited impatiently for the liberation of Minsk, the capital city of Belorussia. After fierce fighting, Minsk was liberated on July 3, 1944. We prepared to leave the forest and walk to Minsk, where a grand parade was being organized for July 16. During the two-day journey to get there, as we walked through fields and along the roads, we saw destroyed German tanks and army trucks, as well as the bodies of German soldiers. From all directions, partisans walked toward Minsk with smiles on their faces, carrying their weapons and singing patriotic songs.

When we arrived in the capital, we saw a city in ruins, with most of the walls and buildings reduced to rubble. At the city centre, we stood in military columns, ready to march past the platform where the high command of the Belorussian partisans stood. Red flags and pictures of Lenin and Stalin decorated the platform. Crowds of people applauded each group and its leaders. When I marched by the high command with my unit, I heard tremendous applause for our group. The leaders made speeches in which they presented statistics on the number of military operations that had been carried out during the German occupation and the number of German soldiers and collaborators who had been killed. According to the chief commissar, 1.5 million partisans had fought in the forests against the Nazis in the German-occupied areas. Giving us all certificates stating that we had been members of the partisans, he called upon the younger partisans to enlist in the Red Army to help expedite the defeat of Nazi Germany. The rest he told to return to their former homes so they could participate in the reconstruction of their towns and cities and rebuild the local economies. At the end of the ceremony, as the orchestra played the "International," everyone sang along.

The most difficult moment for me was saying goodbye—probably forever—to everyone I had lived with as a family, over the two years in the forest. We had no addresses to give to one another because none of us knew where we would end up. But we all cried tears of joy at having survived the Nazis and regained our freedom. We comforted each other with the hope that we would see each other in the future.

ALICE LANDAU

Context: Central Europe

Source: Alice Landau. Snippets from My Family Album. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 151–157. Used by permission.

Hungary was occupied by Nazi Germany on March 19, 1944, and almost immediately the full force of the Holocaust, so apparent elsewhere, descended on the country's Jewish population. Alice Landau was one of those caught in the Nazi net. Roundups of Jews took place around the country, with prisoners incarcerated in makeshift ghettos and labor camps while arrangements were made for them to be deported to their deaths at Auschwitz. Alice's account here chronicles her experiences from the summer of 1944—when deportations were taking place in full swing—to her arrival in the late fall at a police station in central Budapest, there to await an uncertain future.

The forced camp in Király Erdő had a very high fence around it and approximately 3,000 Jewish men were already in residence when I arrived. There was an additional high wooden fence in one corner where a few hundred ultra-Orthodox men from Szatmár were housed. We managed to peep behind this fence. I had never seen people of this type, dressed in the Chassidic manner with tallit and tephillin, praying morning and night. Further inside the camp was another wire mesh fence separating us fifty-two closely guarded women from the men.

A loud bell woke us at 5.30 am. The cleaning and washing facilities were only a few cold taps. There was mud all around. What was called breakfast consisted of watery ersatz coffee and a hunk of stone-hard bread. Eventually this bread broke two of my front teeth, necessitating extraction. Later I got a bridge to replace them and have worn it ever since. By 6.00 am we had to line up, four by four, and march to the steel factory. Guards and wolfhounds watched us. At the Manfred Weisz Steelworks in central Csepel we were allocated to the dirtiest and hardest task. With many other women I worked alongside bricklayers, mostly repairing bomb damage where it was absolutely necessary. We carried second-hand bricks or cement from one site to the next in large wooden boxes with handles on each end. This had to be done fast, and G-d help you if you dawdled. We were all city girls and not used to this kind of work.

There were often air raids during the day. The blaring sirens gave us the shivers. I felt them in every nerve. Moreover, it was forbidden for us to enter any of the shelters. I always tried to reach a corner of the factory where some men in our group could be found. Most of them were my father's age and they tried to calm and protect me as much as possible.

It gave us great delight when we noted the planes had British signs on them as they swooped low over the factory. We hoped they would land one day. Maybe we just felt less terrified by the sight of their insignia.

On 2 July 1944 the morning shift arrived with the news that the Gestapo had surrounded the ghetto and were marching all the unfortunate Jews, including my mother, brother and many other relatives and friends, to the railway station, where they were shoved rudely into cattle wagons and transported. At that stage we had no idea where to. Others came to inform us of this with much glee and many derogatory comments. Each of them felt like a knife stab in my heart. Some others said they were being taken to the country for farm work. A few, with more sympathetic hearts, made kinder comments.

Oh, we camp inmates felt so helpless! Although we learned the real truth only after the war, none of us slept that night. We all just cried out in agony. I was blaming myself for not going with my mother and brother. I just kept repeating over and over again: "I should have gone."

The following weeks brought much more uncertainty and an increasing number of air raids. The factory was manufacturing ammunition, tanks and other war supplies. At the beginning of the war it had been taken away from its original owners, Baron Manfred Weisz and Sons, a Jewish family, and put entirely under Nazi management. Naturally it was a prime target for the Allies.

One day our good friend Sanyi Csicsics stopped beside me and whispered: "Alice, if you can, meet me near the fire station." I managed to sneak away and he told me: "very shortly a lot of the labour camp people will be taken away to be deported." He pointed at a big cupboard and said: "get in there, fast!" The next minute I found myself locked in with a big key. I was frightened out of my mind. I curled up and I am embarrassed to tell you that I wet myself and vomited.

All kinds of yelling, swearing and rude noises reached me. This left me even more terrified. After a couple of hours it was dead quiet again. This was even more frightening. Not much later my well-meaning friend appeared with the key and released me from my confined space. I am most grateful to him, that he found a way to save me. I discovered that a large percentage of my fellow prisoners had been taken away and the camp in the Royal Forest was now half empty.

At one stage a Protestant minister came along, bringing with him a number of copies of the New Testament. He made us an offer: "Should you consider converting to Christianity, the Church could find a way to save you." It was agonizing. He left with a promise to return in a couple of days. I must admit I was tempted. This was a situation in which any human being would grab at straws, but when the time came I pulled out. Thinking of my grandparents and my childhood, I just could not face a life of living as a different human being. Judaism was not really strong in me, but it was impossible to deny my heritage. In fact, converting proved of no help to those who did so.

We struggled on. By this stage I had become a very undernourished young girl, just skin and bone, and with very little hope or courage left in me. Only thoughts of being reunited with my family one day kept me going. I still had not received any news of their whereabouts. News of the horrors of Auschwitz only reached us later. Thinking back over the passage of events, I am almost embarrassed by the fact that I spent the war under much more comfortable circumstances than millions of others. At least I survived.

We received unreliable stories about the Red Army approaching from the east, very fast. It could not be quick enough for us. Hitler's army was desperate, but the more desperate they became, the more Jews they murdered.

The great river Danube was a natural border and the combined German-Hungarian army prepared their defense along it. On 25 October 1944 (my birthday) Miklos Horthy, the Hungarian Regent (Hungary was still a monarchy) declared the end of Hungary's involvement by laying down arms. The steel factory gates opened and happy music played. We were informed that the war was over, that we were free to go. There was great celebration and relief, but regretfully, this did not last long. With a friend, Bandi Szilágyi, I went to the only place I knew I would feel safe, to the home of Sanyi Csicsics and his family. I received a big welcome and we went on celebrating.

Late the next day the radio started blaring Nazi songs again and announced that Hitler's troops had once again taken over the city and given much more power to the Hungarian Arrow Cross. All of Hungary was virtually collapsing, though at the time we could not claim to be witness to this development.

The next morning my friend Sanyi went out, returning white as a ghost. He told us he expected to be arrested again any minute. He had found another friend who was prepared to take the risk of hiding me, but it was not my friend Bandi. Sanyi gave me the address and said I should leave at once. I had a giant red triangular shawl I had knitted in school, which seemed like a hundred years ago. I wound it around my head as it was late October and very cold. Also, I mistakenly believed no one would recognise me.

I did not get very far before I ran into a very anti-Semitic gatekeeper from the steelworks. He greeted me with a tirade of anti-Semitic curses and dragged me by the arm, shouting: "you bloody communist Jew!" (According to the enemy, Jews were all communists.) "I know what your kind can do," he continued. "I hated your father for doing so much for the Social Democratic Party and the trade unions. I will see you dead! You will see!"

Meanwhile, he forced me along the road, all the way to the police station.

At that infamous place I was questioned for several hours. "Why were you wandering the streets? What were your intentions? How come you left the labour camp?" There was no taking into consideration the events of the past couple of days. "We know your parents were stupid socialists, out to destroy the new system. We will deal with you, you rotten Jew!"

After some hours of agony, a prison van materialised and I was pushed into it with much force. It was pitch dark. I could hardly see beyond my nose. I could not see my companions or where we were heading. We had a jerky ride, stopping every so often to collect more unfortunate Jews picked up on the boulevards of Budapest.

Finally, in what appeared to be the middle of the night, we arrived at the infamous Marko Street jail. There was more questioning, more beatings. Some hours went by until I was dragged into one of the cells, which was already full of prostitutes. My torturer's final remark was: "Early in the morning we will put an end to your miserable life."

I landed in the lap of one of the elderly "ladies of the night." They could not have been nicer to me, cuddling my poor battered body and wiping my tears. My mind was racing. How had I got myself into this position? If only my mother were here to cuddle up to. Where is my beloved father? I could not see any hope, but tried preaching to myself: "Alice! Pull yourself together! You are known to be such an optimist, so where did your courage go?" Finally I fell into a sleep of utter exhaustion.

Every time I woke up there was one single thought racing through my mind: "I am so young! I want to live and they won't let me! There is so much to life. I am a good person and this evil mob wants to take it all away!" Maybe this thought was blinding me to other thoughts. I could not accept what I had been told, that I would be shot in the morning.

HELEN LAWNER

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Helen Lawner. Surviving the Warsaw Ghetto: A Three Generational Perspective (Reflections by Miriam Tisher and Her Children). Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2006, pp. 34–41, 43–46. Used by permission.

Life in the Warsaw Ghetto presented risks every day, in myriad ways, and yet people managed to find ways of staying alive if the opportunity presented itself. The portents were never good, with massive overcrowding, poor food and not much of it, disease, and the periodic depredations of the Nazis. In one sense, given this, it was left largely up to the ghetto residents to get on with the process of managing the ghetto on their own. So long as they were productive, they might still have a chance of surviving, so finding suitable work in the ghetto was an ongoing quest. Helen Lawner writes here that periodic "selections" often meant death through deportation to Treblinka, and that, therefore, efforts were made continually to find a way out before that eventuated. The account here actually mentions a transport to Treblinka, and how it was that the residents of the Warsaw Ghetto knew what went on there.

In 1940, on Yom Kippur, the Jewish ghetto in Warsaw was established. It consisted of a big ghetto and a small one, joined by a pull-up pedestrian bridge. There was an area under the bridge where Jewish people were not allowed to stay. The Nazis, the Ukrainians and the Jewish policemen guarded all the entrances to the ghetto. They shot at anybody who tried to get out without an official pass.

Soon after, the Nazis put up very high brick walls all around the ghetto, making it still harder for all of us. There was little food inside the ghetto and every morning I could see corpses on the street. The epidemic of typhoid killed the young and the old. It was sometimes a “blessing” when a case of typhoid occurred within a block of flats, because then the Germans avoided coming near so as not to catch the sickness, and for a while all the other inhabitants lived in peace.

There were many so-called shops (slave factories) within the ghetto. To name a few: Toebens, Schultz, Hofmans, Nuss and Brushmakers, where we were employed, meaning myself with my husband, his parents and two sisters (one married to Ignac) and their little daughter, Naomi.

My parents, my brother with his wife and my sister belonged to the Nuss group. Their work was to sort out iron-ware, hardware, scrap iron, etc. It was a hard job but my brother, Marek, was employed there to carry the goods out of the ghetto and on the way back he had a chance to smuggle some food into the ghetto in his trousers without being checked on.

Most of the factories employed women who knew how to sew and they worked on sewing machines. At the “Brush” factories I had to quickly learn how to make brushes and to my surprise, after only a few days of work, a supervising German declared that I was the best and quickest brushmaker. What an honour!!! . . .

We were not allowed to go out of the ghetto at all and the cruel Ukrainians and Latvians made sure of that. Every few days, people were taken away to the Umschlag Platz in Stawki Street, where the cattle trains waited for new victims to go to the infamous concentration camps. Unfortunately many died from hunger and suffocation during the long horrible journey without water or food. In the ghetto we used so-called rickshaws to travel around and for the boys on the bikes hooked up to the rickshaws, it was also a means of earning a bit of money.

I will never forget 6 September in 1942 when we were all woken up in the middle of the night and ordered to gather in the square formed by four streets: Geşia, Smoka, Niska and Zamenhofa. A selection was to take place between five and seven in the morning. We decided that my husband’s parents would stay back, hidden in the Brushmakers shop and the rest of us would go. My family at the Nuss shop decided that my sister, Lola, would go into hiding with our parents, but my brother and his beautiful wife, Hela, would come out.

Everybody was so confused and frightened, especially the older people. I remember when, at this difficult time waiting at the square for selection, Mrs Prylucka, the headmistress of the college I had graduated from in 1937, approached me with tears in her eyes, asking for help. I just did not know what to tell her since I was in the same situation and nobody could do anything to help anybody there, as we were all in the same terrible danger.

Soon after the selection started, somebody let us know that all the people from the Nuss shop were straight away being put on the train to Treblinka because the Nazis had decided that there were not too many people in this group worth worrying about. So, with one finger, the notorious Gubernator Frank showed them all to the left, which meant going on the train to Treblinka. I burst into tears and could not stop crying, when all of a sudden the Brushmakers were ordered to be ready for selection. My husband pleaded with me to stop crying and to be brave and courageous in the front line, to face Frank, with his riding whip, and to look straight into his cold eyes. I managed to do it, but just before Frank lifted his finger up to the right, Adek moved his one foot a little bit forward, being anxious to get it over with, because of my wet eyes. Frank noticed that and in anger whipped my husband, splitting his forehead and then stopped for a few minutes and angrily looked at Adek. But, supposedly, only because my husband did not move his head and did not show any reaction to the pain of his forehead, we finally got the order to turn right and we were safe. It was a miracle.

Over 1,000 men and women returned to the Brushmakers shop. . . .

Marek and Hela were taken to Treblinka death camp. At the time, nobody knew that the transports were going straight to the gas chambers. Marek and Hela, two young healthy and good-looking people, decided to approach an elderly German, telling him that they were both good, experienced farmers and would be pleased to work as such. The German did not answer, and there was straightaway an order for men and women to part. So they did. Luckily a working man who knew my brother called him by his name and told him not to take his shoes off but to lean down next to him and to do what he was doing, namely, sort out clothing.

Marek followed him and after a little while, to his horror, he picked up a white blouse with photos in the pocket and said to his friend that it was his wife’s blouse and their photos. He wondered how it was possible? His friend informed him that his wife had already been gassed. My brother was terribly shocked, as nobody knew at the time that Treblinka was a death camp and not a labour camp. He said to the friend that if this was the case he would not spend one night there. He decided to escape straightaway, which he did. Whilst he was putting the chloroformed victims' clothes onto the train back to Warsaw, he immediately decided not to fill up one wagon and instead slipped in and hid under the clothes. A few other boys did the same thing. Before the train started to move, the Nazis checked the wagons but did not worry about the ones that were not filled up. The boys were safe.

Just before approaching the capital, Marek jumped from the train and made his way back to Warsaw. He visited his Christian friends in the evening to make a decision about what to do. A lady friend, a professional cosmetician, bleached Marek's hair and asked him to stay the night with them. Marek thanked the people, but refused the hospitality, for their sake. He decided to get on the roofs of Warsaw's buildings at night, to check whether there was any life left in the ghetto.

Early in the morning, he noticed some people moving around, so he got down from the roof and eventually met up with our sister and our parents, who were out of their hiding place. The next day he rang Adek and myself to let us know what had happened and asked us to tell everybody the truth that Treblinka was a concealed death camp and not a labour camp. As it happened Marek was the first person to inform the Jewish people about it.

Meanwhile, at the Brushmakers shop after selection, a few of our boys, mostly in the family, decided that the only way to eventually survive would be to get out of the ghetto and make some connection with the Christians outside. To make it more possible and less dangerous, they thought of building an underground tunnel. It seemed to be a crazy idea, but things were getting worse and more people were disappearing and we were losing all hope of survival.

The initiator of it all was Ignac Bursztyn, my husband's brother-in-law, a very wise man with an open mind. He told his brother Adam and my husband, Adek, about it in great secrecy. Adam was extremely clever with his hands and had a good knowledge of carpentry. The three men made a pact of trust, decided to involve a few friends to help and vowed that no wives nor sisters nor anybody else would be told about it. The work started. Every night in the dark the boys would disappear, coming back before daylight. They worked underground for a few weeks, night after night, and made brushes for the Nazis during the day.

I did not know where Adek was disappearing to. At first he told me that there was some work for him to do for the Germans and this was why he was coming back so tired.

Eventually, however, as we were a young married couple and very much in love, he decided to confess to me and I promised not to say a word to anybody. After a few weeks, they finished the tunnel which was equipped with electric lights and a big plaque with all their names on it. It was a masterpiece. . . .

Soon after the tunnel was completed, Ignac got in touch with a lady named Anka, who lived alone in a little house in Krasieński Park. He promised her some money to allow our people who were trying to get out of the ghetto to spend the first night at her place. She needed money and agreed to the plan. So the boys organized the outlet of the tunnel to finish in the park, on the other side of the ghetto. . . .

The tunnel was a blessing in these terrible times. Adam's sister-in-law Stefa had already been on the other side of the ghetto, on Aryan papers, and she had contacts with some Poles who were issuing false Kennkarten for lots of money. When my husband and I decided to get out of the ghetto using the tunnel, we let her know and met her at Anka's place. We paid her money and signed the documents. We sent her our photos a few days before leaving, and she had our two Kennkarten ready for us. My husband's name became Adam Krzeczowski and mine, Stanisława Kozyra, a maid servant who disappeared off the street having left her identity card at home. . . .

We stayed with Anka a couple of days and then we went to another place that had been organized for us just opposite the ghetto. Janek had a big flat at our disposal, and he was ready to accommodate the rest of our family as well as some friends. So, slowly, a few more people came out and joined us there. . . .

On 5 August 1942, the Nazis invaded the well-known Jewish Orphanage in Warsaw. I remember the terrible shock to the remaining Jews in the ghetto. They surrounded the streets Wielka, Sosnowa, Śliska and Złota in the small ghetto where the orphanage was. The SS men were accompanied by Ukrainians and members of the Jewish ghetto police. The children were given fifteen minutes to get ready. It was eight o'clock in the morning. The Nazis yelled, "Alle Juden raus" whilst blowing whistles. The children came down and lined up.

Doctor Janusz Korczak, the head of the orphanage, led the procession with their green flag in his hand, whilst nurses in their uniforms and teachers joined in. They all marched together despite the fact that Doctor Korczak had been given the option to stay back. The 200 children were singing all the way to the Umschlag Platz in Stawki Street where they were to get onto the train which would take them to the Treblinka death camp. We all cried bitterly.

CELIA LEDERMAN

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Celia Lederman. Becoming Celia: The Story of Hafilng 46996. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, pp. 29–33. Used by permission.

Celia Lederman was a prisoner at Majdanek, the infamous concentration and death camp established by the Nazis in Poland. She survived there longer than most, exploited as slave labor doing “useless work” in which she spent her time “dragging stones from one place to another and then dragging them back again.” Her account evokes much that seemed characteristic of concentration camp existence: harsh treatment, a regimented lifestyle, little chance of survival, and the uncertainty of any form of permanency. Without any hint that it was coming, Celia and her comrades, after nine months or so at Majdanek, were moved to Auschwitz—where her ordeal was to begin afresh.

We travelled for about one day and a night, stopping and starting again. It was late at night when we arrived at Majdanek. They let us out of the wagons like dogs and we discovered we had been sleeping on coal and were covered in black soot. A lot more people died during that night. In the morning the men were separated from the women. Laibl went with the men and I experienced my first selection. Older people, children and those who looked too weak to work were sent in one direction and those who looked strong were sent in another. Of course the weak ones went straight to the crematorium.

Those of us chosen to live were made to undress and German women in uniform looked to see if we had hidden any gold or jewellery on our bodies. I had absolutely nothing. We were thrown random items of clothing and taken to barracks. I wore the same clothes all the time I was at Majdanek, though between ourselves we swapped the things we were given to get something that fit. We had wooden clogs. A big German woman in uniform with the face of a murderer stood at the entrance to the barracks and whipped us as we walked in. Some of the people in charge of us were prisoners convicted of various crimes.

We slept in bunks and there were rats running everywhere. Every day people died and the corpses were piled up outside the barracks where the rats ate them. If I see a rat today I just go berserk. I can't stand it. I can't even cope with possums because even though I know they are vegetarian they look like rats to me.

We were rostered into duties loading the corpses onto the back of carts pulled by horses. It was a good job because we could remove any good clothing. We never left the bodies completely naked and shared what we took with whoever needed something. I stayed in the same barracks the whole time I was in Majdanek.

It was the usual camp nightmare, with Appel (roll-call) every morning, during which we stood for hours and hours in rain, wind and snow. Many people collapsed. Appel was always before sunrise, sometimes hours before sunrise. We could never wash ourselves or our clothes properly. Sometimes we managed to wash our underwear in a puddle somewhere and put it back on wet. This constant dirt led to open sores on our bodies. Although one of our duties was to keep the barracks clean, we were all covered in lice.

There were regular outbreaks of typhus in Majdanek but because I had overcome it in the ghetto I must have gained immunity and didn't get it again. The soup we got in the evenings was mostly water with a few vegetables, mostly turnips. Today I can't even look at a turnip, nor can I stand any dirt or untidiness.

One day, a few months after we arrived, I saw Laibl working on the other side of the wire fence. I called out to him and he waved back at me. Next thing I saw a Kapo (Jewish guard) step up behind him and hit him very hard on the head. I saw blood pouring down Laibl's face and thought he had been killed. I screamed and the Kapo on my side of the fence told me to shut up. From that moment I was convinced my brother was dead.

At Majdanek I was forced to do useless work, dragging stones from one place to another and then dragging them back. If we didn't work fast enough we were beaten. We worked at different sites, some of them a few kilometres from the camp so we had to walk there and back. If I went to get some water I was whipped across the back or shoved with a rifle butt. If someone died at work the body had to be carried back to be counted, to prove to those in charge that no one had run away. The Kapos had to account for every person.

There was a selection about two months after we arrived, during which they took a young girl away from her mother. The mother began to scream so they said, “Verfluchte Judin! (Filthy Jewess!) You can go with her!” There were selections all the time. It was so bad. We were so terribly hungry, covered in sores and almost wishing to die.

On the other hand I kept a light in my heart that I would meet up with my family. I had no idea anything had happened to them at Treblinka, as we knew nothing of the death camps. New transports arrived in Majdanek constantly, sometimes weekly, sometimes every two days, sometimes dozens in one day. We were always looking to see if there was anyone from our family among the crowd.

We came back from work one day and were all holding our dirty little tin soup bowls and waiting for the soup to be brought to the barracks, when suddenly there was an order: “Antreten!” (Report!) They announced they were taking us away. The railway station was right at the camp and once again we were herded into cattle trucks. I was hoping to be with the girls I had become close to, but that wasn’t possible.

The train left that night and stopped at smaller camps where more Jews were packed into the wagons. We could barely breathe it was so crowded and people died in the wagons.

I spent about nine or ten months in Majdanek. . . .

We arrived at Auschwitz-Birkenau in the morning, to be greeted with a selection led by the infamous Dr Mengele. He stood at the famous gate with Arbeit Macht Frei (Work sets you free) written above it, a slim elegant man with a monocle on a chain, high patent-leather boots and the uniform of a high-ranking officer. I can never forget that image of him. Mengele was the judge of life. He gave it and he took it away.

I don’t know how many people there were in our transport, more than a thousand, maybe two thousand. It was a sea of desperate people. An orchestra was playing as he sent people either to the left or right. As usual those sent to the left went straight to the crematorium. I was young and healthy and went to the right.

DES LEE

Context: Central Europe

Source: Des Lee. I Had Nothing to Lose: A Life of Ups and Downs. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library 2010, pp. 38–41. Used by permission.

Des Lee (born Lévi Deszö) was a Hungarian Jewish boy from the city of Debrecen. In this account, he describes the establishment of a ghetto after the arrival of the Nazis in 1944, told from the standpoint of a perceptive 11-year-old witness-participant. He describes his understanding of ghetto life, the ways in which people tried to accommodate themselves to the changed circumstances, and, in tiny ways, to resist the Nazi impositions. At this stage of the war, he notes, the feeling was that after the war “everyone would go back home and live a normal way of life again.”

On 20 March 1944 German soldiers entered Debrecen. We saw them with their tanks and motorcars and their big boots. It was very frightening. From 31 March we were forced to wear a yellow star sewn onto the front of our clothes. Jews who had converted to Christianity in the mistaken belief this would save them had to wear white armbands.

A few weeks later the Jewish area in the middle of Debrecen, around Jozsef Herzög Utca, was closed off and made into a ghetto. Although it was May, I remember the weather was still cold. The Hungarian Csendő, along with just a few Germans, pushed all the Jews of Debrecen into this area. We brought along some mattresses and simple household goods but had to leave everything else behind. We walked to the ghetto pushing handcarts with our things piled up on them.

My parents were very strong and stoic, just accepting whatever events arose. The chief rabbi of Debrecen, Rabbi Pal Weisz, had always sworn that nothing would happen to us, but my father knew this was not true.

Until this point we had lived in a flat by ourselves, but now we had to share a couple of rooms with other families in a big apartment building. Uncle Jenő came with us. Everyone slept on mattresses on the floor and my mother cooked for all the people in the flat. She constantly thought about food and preserved whatever she could for the winter months, such as fruit and vegetables. She had brought all her preserves with us to Debrecen, including the precious goose fat. Anyú had brought so much food we had to leave some of it behind in the flat. We were probably much better off than many other families in the ghetto and the people who were in our apartment were really very lucky to be with my mother. She was a first class cook. Everybody in the ghetto had something to eat because they had stocked up and brought food with them.

As the ghetto was established within the Jewish neighbourhood of Debrecen, there was a Jewish school in the middle and a shul beside it. Most of the children in the ghetto attended the school. The regular classes were conducted in Hungarian and we also learned Hebrew.

We young children still had our school life and I was in training with the physical education teacher. I was a chubby boy. My uncle Feri had been a champion wrestler and even got a medal from the Governor of Hungary, Miklos Horthy. Our physical education teacher was an ex-European wrestling champion who had been in the 1936 Olympics and had trained with my uncle. He set up a gymnastics club in the basement and taught us how to wrestle. We loved it!

Ghetto life wasn't easy but we were alright, mainly because my mum was so capable. At first there were only a few thousand people in the ghetto but as time went on more and more Jews arrived and were just crammed in together, with three families to a flat. We were living right on top of each other.

My favourite teacher at this school was Mrs Stern. I have never forgotten her name because she treated me so nicely. I was her favourite, too, possibly because her family was short of food and I was able to supply her with a little. She survived the Holocaust and ended up teaching in Israel.

There was a Jewish Council in the ghetto, known as the Zsido Tanács, as well as a Jewish police force made up of ex-soldiers. They tried to keep everything stable and the ghetto clean. They had special orders from the Germans about how they were to look after everything. We still had a few business opportunities and there was plenty of racketeering on the black market. Our family had plenty of cash but I saw other people selling jewellery for just a small amount of food. There were the usual stories about swapping a mink coat for potatoes, a gold watch for bread. My father was a very heavy smoker and he would give anything for cigarettes. He had a good smuggling system for obtaining them while we were in Debrecen.

On 7 June 1944 the ghetto was sealed and my parents begged me not to go outside. There was a wall built all around the ghetto, part of it was in brick but other parts were wood and wire. We young cheeky boys crawled under the fence at a couple of different spots which we then carefully closed up again. We bought potatoes in the shops, where of course they overcharged us. We had to pay whatever they asked, but it didn't matter because we had plenty of money, thanks to trading on the black market. The main things we smuggled back in were potatoes and we were very careful to keep away from the Csendör. I used to sneak out with Pista Klein and some of his friends. I think my father used to sneak out too. The ghetto police didn't know what was going on.

People from the Zsido Tanács ran a ghetto kitchen where they cooked soup and some potatoes. My father was involved in cooking there, so we had a little bit extra. We had a family tradition of "all for one and one for all" that lasted throughout our lives. If I found food I always brought it back to share with everyone.

Our family managed but not everybody did. The old people died and their bodies were taken away on handcarts. That was the first time I ever saw a dead body. There was a cemetery not too far from the ghetto and those people may have even had a proper Jewish burial. I don't really know. Babies were also being born in the crowded rooms, but there were plenty of Jewish doctors and nurses to help. More and more Jews from many different places were being pushed into the ghetto and the rooms became more and more crowded.

At about six or seven o'clock in the evening I listened to the radio with Pista Klein, who was full of courage. Radios were completely banned for Jewish people by this time and we had to be extremely careful. We listened to the British World Service in Hungarian, called Angolrádio.

By this time I was nearly eleven years old. For the past few years I had been listening to what people were saying about what was going on. We heard about death camps, but it was only rumour. We couldn't really believe that this was going on and wanted to survive until all the chaos was over. Already people were saying the Americans and the Russians were not very far away. Everybody believed in the Moschiach (Messiah) and that we would be protected. We prayed in the ghetto at the shul beside the school. We lived two houses away from the chief rabbi, Rabbi Pal Weisz, who tried to console his community. Nobody believed anything would happen to us other than that they would probably take us to labour camps to work. After the war everyone would go back home and live a normal life again. That was the general feeling and the common belief.

HELEN LEPERERE

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Helen Leperere. Memories and Reflections. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2002, pp. 29–35. Used by permission.

Fourteen-year-old Helen Leperere was a Polish girl from Sosnowiec. In January 1941 she was forcibly removed from her family and transported to the Gabersdorf labor camp in Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland. Here, Jewish women were forced to work at local privately owned textile factories. By March 1944 the camp became a subcamp of the much larger complex of Gross-Rosen; it was liberated on May 6–7, 1945. Helen's account tells of her arrest and deportation, together with her arrival at the camp and orientation to its regime. It provides an insight into the otherworldliness of the concentration camp and is an important testimony from one who was a young girl wrenched from her family and thrust into this thoroughly alien environment.

It is difficult for me to recollect precisely the first moments in the camp. I am trying hard to go over the first steps again and again but my memory fails me. There are so many blank spots. Fifty-eight years have passed—and that in itself would justify losing track of the events of so many years ago. But with me, it is not just the length of time; it is as though I would like to erase from my mind all that has happened to me. But I am getting old and it is time to put history into writing. Perhaps memory will guide my hand deeper into the past.

So . . . it really happened and in my family home, where I felt secure and protected. On a winter's night, in January 1941, a horrible banging at the door woke us up. A banging with rifles, yelling and kicking with boots. My mother moved fast. Immediately she ordered Bronia and my father to hide. Every household has a hiding place. Ours was an invisible opening concealed behind a normal wall in the bathroom. The banging on the door became quite frantic now, the screaming even louder.

Mother opened the door and two S/S men with rifles jumped in like wild dogs, shouting Bronia's name to come out. I said to my mother that I would go in her place. My devastated father agreed, saying that children would surely be sent back home at once. I was 14 years of age. I dressed myself warmly in woolen scarves and Natek's snow-boots, his only Barmitzvah present from our parents. This boy, whom I believed to be so spoilt by my parents, was now opening his heart and offering his most prized possession to me. The enormous despair in my parents' eyes, Maniusia's tears running down her pale face, haunts me still. This is how I remember them. I never saw any of them again. Never. Ever. Except my father once more from a distance.

"Escorted" by the two tall S/S soldiers with rifles on their shoulders, I was out on the street covered with deep, white snow. It was a beautiful frosty night, with clear sky and lots of crisp snow. Snow can be very beautiful and peaceful. But it can also be very frightening. Like when it combines with the sound of heavy boots marching on the snow . . . crisp, crisp . . . crackle, crackle. . . . Whenever I see snow on paintings or films, I hear the sound of those awful boots worn by the two S/S. Two tall soldiers with rifles escorting one 14-year-old-girl.

We were soon joined by other groups of bewildered young women and girls and were ordered to form groups of five abreast and march "Schnell, schnell (fast, fast)." Orders were barked with occasional pushes with rifles. We arrived at a three storey building in Skladowska Street. This school was now transformed into a segregation point. That was at the beginning, because later the Germans did not bother with this way of "resettling." They simply caught people off the street and sent them away, to Auschwitz mainly. Thus the destruction of our people was conducted at a much quicker pace.

Chaos and commotion greeted us at the entrance to the school. Orders were shouted in German. We were pushed and screamed at and ordered to walk fast up to the third floor. The door was unlocked in a huge hall room, empty of furniture, but packed with women squeezed in like sardines. We were pushed and pushed until we were all in. Standing room only! Then the door slammed behind us. Women were sobbing and moaning all around us. Buckets were placed under the walls, which gave out suffocating smells.

Slowly the dawn began to appear and some daylight entered the hall. A commotion was heard from the street below. We heard names of people shouting to us, calling us. Our families stood in large crowds on the ground, trying desperately to call names of their loved ones inside, or trying to catch a glimpse of them. Inside everybody was struggling to get to the window. I was one of those who managed to fight through and get to the window. I was sure that my family would all be there. It was my poor father, standing all alone and looking, looking up searching for me. I kept shouting and trying to tell him: "Do not worry about me, I will be fine, I can work."

I think and hope he heard me, for he waved his hand. But he could not utter a word. In that one night he looked so much older and greyer. On the next day, I received a note from him, which he smuggled in through a Jewish policeman he knew. In that note he told me that the reason mother did not come to see me was because she was running around trying to bribe, pay, beg, anything to get me out.

It also told me to do everything I was ordered to and to look after myself and they would do all that is humanly possible to bring me back home.

We were kept at this school for about three days and nights. We were given no food, but some water and some watery soup. Standing all the time. Some were lucky to get a small spot on the floor and were able to sit, until they were kicked or pushed by others who fought for the place and thus were forced to get up. Loud barking greeted us at dawn of the fourth day: "Raus, raus, schnell, schnell" (out, out, fast, fast)! These words were to become very familiar for the next few years. Again we were ordered to form groups of five abreast and march. Fast, faster! Some women had to be held from both sides, as they were half dead from the ordeal of the last few days.

We arrived at a train station that I had never seen before, as it was used for commercial transports only. Large cattle trains were lined up, their doors open wide. Again the familiar yelling and pushing until we were all in. Finally the doors were slammed behind us. Darkness again. Somehow my wagon was not so terribly overcrowded. We managed to take turns in sitting on the floor. I do not remember how long the journey lasted. Some women said it was five days, but it seemed like five years. We were of course unaware of the destination. But we all longed for the journey to be over, regardless of where it ended. Anything would be better than this dark, stinking wagon. Later I found that much worse is possible.

We were let out at some intervals to relieve ourselves, in the presence of S/S guards, and to collect our meagre rations of bread and water. Icicles were our saviours. Finally the train stopped. A lot of voices were heard from outside. After a very long time, the doors were unbolted. Familiar shouts and pushing. "Out, faster!" The barking of human voices was this time mixed with those of real dogs. Again, five abreast and march faster, faster! Deep snow was all around us. The trees and shrubs were thickly covered with snow. It was a beautiful picturesque scene, a valley surrounded by mountains.

Suddenly loud shrieks: "Halt!" Stop! We arrived in front of huge barracks, surrounded by barbed wire. A few German women in uniforms were standing awaiting us, legs apart, hands behind, their heads proudly held up, sarcastic smiles on their faces. How can such pretty, young women display such hatred on their faces, such mean looks in their eyes? We were to be at their mercy for the next few years. The place was called Gabersdorf. It was situated in Sudetenland, which was once Czechoslovakia and had now been annexed by the Germans.

It was January 1941. We were liberated by the Russians in May 1945.

During those years, women came and disappeared, "resettled." The sick and the old were sent to Auschwitz, also the "punished" ones, for crimes such as stealing a little food. Life in the camp began.

For a "welcome" we received the first taste of Appel (assembly). We had to stand to attention and listen to a speech in German, delivered by the Lager Fuhrer (camp leader). She was a highly-strung, unbalanced woman with long, black hair. We called her Schwartzte Laya (Black Laya).

She amused herself by chasing women into the barracks after we came back from a 12 hour-work day and she would have a bucket in her hand with which she would blindly hit us right, left and centre, yelling out: "Laufen, schnell (run, faster!)." I was very proud and vowed not to run and hide from her. The result was, of course, that I copped quite a few whacks on my head, after which I would cry half the night. It was not so much from the pain, but the loss of dignity. The girls laughed at me and called me stupid, they urged me to run and run. She called me die Stolze (the proud one). But my pride would not permit me to run. I walked with my head high, vulnerable to the whacks with the bucket that she bestowed with will. The foolishness of youth!

In her daily spectacle she would repeat over and over again that we were here to work, work. The lazy ones would be punished. Fortunately she was replaced after a while, as the higher German authorities must have realized that she was very unbalanced and incapable of running anything. We always suspected that the German guards complained about her and she was forced to resign.

After her "maiden" speech we were ordered into the barracks and allocated to our dormitories. We got our double decker beds, with thin straw mattresses, and one thin blanket each. It was winter, January, when frost painted the windows in the unheated barracks, but by then we were beyond feeling anything.

We just collapsed on the beds, me wearing Natek's snow boots. I do not remember what happened to them afterwards. Later on, as the camp started to fill with more incoming transports of women, we were forced to share our narrow bed with another woman. I do not remember if it was night or day for it was still dark outside. I remember the horrible shriek of the Elteste (the oldest). She was a Jewish woman called the oldest, not because of her age, but her position. "Aufstehen (get up)!" Shivering, we had to stand at the assembly. The "oldest" was the one who counted us and reported to the camp leader. This woman was extremely rough and particularly disliked me from the first moment. Power tends to turn ordinary people into villains.

Women were needed to scrub floors in the long corridors of the barracks. Why she picked me, I do not know—me and another young girl, Guta, a pretty 17-year-old. She ordered us to fetch the bucket with water, gave us each a small nail-brush and a rag and yelled: "Scrub, but fast!" Needless to say, we were quite hopeless. Every few minutes she would come to us and kicked the bucket of water with her boots, screaming: "Is this what you call clean? Scrub, scrub, faster, faster." We noticed that the camp leader was standing at the end of the corridor with a nasty smirk on her face. I no longer recall how the ordeal finished. This incident completely broke my spirits for a while. I started to walk like a zombie, dragging my legs. I even gave up rations of bread to other women in exchange for them washing my underwear—we still possessed some at that time. I just cried and cried.

Then a girl I never knew before, from a different town even, stepped in. “Listen here,” she said in a stern voice, “This place is not for crying. We are here to work. You are not going to give up food for someone to wash your underwear, you are going to wash it yourself.” She watched over me like a guardian angel all through the years in camp, and thus my life-long friendship with Pola began.

FANNY LESSER

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Fanny Lesser. Lives Entwined: Fanny and Max Lesser, Holocaust Survivors. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2007, pp. 32–38. Used by permission.

Fanny Lesser, one of eight children in her family, was born in Czechoslovakia. In 1944 she and her family were sent from the Chust (Khust) ghetto, then under Hungarian rule, to Auschwitz. They were among the five thousand or so ghetto inhabitants who were deported in four transports in late May and early June of that year. Most were sent directly to the gas chambers of Auschwitz, but a few, such as Fanny, managed to stay alive as a result of being sent on further. In this memoir, Fanny describes these and other developments until she was selected by Dr. Josef Mengele for slave labor and deportation with 300 other women to Weisswasser, a Nazi labor camp, later in 1944.

The freight cars we traveled in were closed cars with no toilets. The toilet was a hole in the floor to use to go to the bathroom but only when the train was moving. We were on this train for quite a few days. We had only the food we had brought. We had no water. I have no idea how people managed. Every time the train stopped, people would scream: “Water! Water!” The SS would then spray the train with water, tantalizing us.

Whenever the train stopped between Chust and Auschwitz-Birkenau, the SS used to come and holler, “If you have any gold or money, surrender it now. They will kill you, when you get there, if you still have money or gold.” At every stop people gave the SS their jewelry and money.

Grandfather Noah and Grandmother Ethel, my mother’s parents, were with us. Grandfather had sold a cow for 300 pengars. My father said to him, “Noah, give us the money. We have to tear it up and throw it out.” Grandfather would reply, “We have to have money. What will we do when we arrive at this place? We need to buy food for the little ones.” My father became very stern with him, saying, “Noah, you have to give us the money. You see what is happening.” He finally gave the money to my father. We chewed it up into little pieces and threw it down the toilet hole.

The last stop! What it was, was Auschwitz! . . .

When we arrived at Auschwitz, the doors opened and I saw many SS officers with their dogs. I also saw boys in striped uniforms; I didn’t know then that they were our own people. The SS told us to get out of the freight car. I had my little sister, Ruhala, on my arm. One boy in a striped uniform came over to me and said, “Whose baby is that?” I answered, “My mother’s.” He told me, “Give the baby to your mother.” I thought, “Why is he saying this?” I gave Ruhala to my mother. I stayed with my cousin, Blanka, who was on our transport.

We got out of the freight car and they took us to the right. We were not allowed to turn around. I never saw my mother or Ruhala again. A friend told me that she had seen my father and older brothers alive after the selection. I prayed to G-d that they would survive.

Sarah—I never saw her again. She didn’t come with Blanka and me. Solomon was in line with my father and two older brothers, but he saw Mommy and insisted on going with her. Lea was young, so she went with my mother, as did Yosef and Ruhala. My sisters—Sarah and Lea—and my brothers, Yosef and Solomon, all were murdered, as well as my mother’s parents.

My uncles and aunts were in other ghettos, such as the Munkacs ghetto. My father had four sisters; three sisters from Munkacs died with all their families. In Korosmezo, another of my father’s sisters and a brother survived. This sister, Suri (Sarah), lost two children but after the war found her husband and had two more children that she named after the two that had been murdered—Zipporah and Moishe—now in Israel. My cousin Blanka survived with her three sisters: Ruska, Suri, and Helen, but her mother and father and four younger children died in Auschwitz. My father also had brothers with so many children that did not survive. My mother’s brother, Alex, who had married in 1940, survived in Budapest, Hungary, but his wife died in Auschwitz. He is still alive and living in Florida.

With the deportations from Hungary, the role of Auschwitz-Birkenau as an instrument in the German plan to murder the Jews of Europe achieved its highest effectiveness. Between late April and early July 1944, approximately 440,000 Hungarian Jews were deported, around 426,000 of them to Auschwitz. The SS sent approximately 320,000 of them directly to the gas chambers in Auschwitz-Birkenau and deployed approximately 110,000 at forced labor in the Auschwitz concentration camp complex. The SS authorities transferred many of these Hungarian Jewish forced laborers within weeks of their arrival in Auschwitz to other concentration camps in Germany and Austria.

After our selection at Auschwitz-Birkenau, the SS led us to a big hall. They shaved us everywhere. They made us stand nude for a long time until we had received the clothes they gave out. We were unrecognizable. I was not tattooed, although my brothers were. I got a number but I don't remember what it was. Then we walked to Birkenau that was only a few kilometers away. There we went to Block (Street) C to Barrack Sixteen. There were thirty-two barracks in Camp C, two of which were washrooms.

In Block C everyday selections occurred but in different barracks. Every day people were selected to go to work or to go to death. When I came into the barracks, I did not know about the gas chambers but there were girls who had been in Auschwitz since 1942 and 1943. They told us right away: "Don't think about if you have a mother or a father. All are dead!" I was fourteen years old. I cried. I still did not believe what they were saying.

They gave us very little food, watery coffee and soup, and a small piece of bread. We were always hungry. Every night we talked about cooking and baking. We were going to bake huge loaves of bread and never peel potatoes so we wouldn't waste even the peels.

In Block C, my cousin Blanka met this Kapo, Peter, a Polish prisoner, who cooked for the SS. He told Blanka that he would give her some food. I used to go to Peter, and he would give me a tin container of soup or stew. By the time I reached my barrack with this container, I had given away nearly all of the food; Blanka and I had hardly anything.

One day I said to Peter, "Oy! The cherries are in season. I love cherries." Soon after, Peter went to Krakow and brought back cherries for us. Oh, my G-d! I remember how they tasted.

Even raw potatoes—if we could find one—tasted like the best dessert.

Before this the International Red Cross had come in and the SS had showed them how well they were treating the prisoners. "Why there is even a Czech family camp!" the SS told the Red Cross. The Red Cross never got off the lorries (trucks). The Nazi propaganda seemed to fool the Red Cross. However, they had killed them all, just as they had done to those in the Gypsy camp.

Dr. Mengele selected us. Mengele came every day and did the selections. Mothers and daughters were not supposed to be together. It was a law to separate families. People hid their relationships. My cousin, Blanka, and I were always together; this was dangerous.

Another danger was pregnancy. I remember a girl, Miriam, from the same city as my cousin Blanka. The aelteste (barrack leader) kept asking us, "Is Miriam pregnant? If she is, we will all be in trouble." Blanka answered her, "No! She does not even understand what pregnant is." But Miriam was pregnant, although she didn't know it—she was so innocent. Soldiers had raped her and she had a baby in the barracks. My cousin had learned to be a nurse and had worked in a hospital. She delivered the baby boy. Miriam was surprised when she saw the baby. He was a big boy but stillborn. I put him in a pail and went to the toilet and buried him. I had to do this to protect Miriam and the rest of the women in the barracks. Miriam survived and later lived in Israel.

Another case of a pregnant woman occurred in another barrack. One group consisting of four sisters and a cousin were together. The oldest sister was married and pregnant. Her sisters and cousin knew the SS would get rid of any pregnant woman. I risked my life helping her to hide out during selections. We knew which barrack would go through the selection process that particular day. When I heard there would be a selection in her barrack, I used to take her into my barrack, and I went to her barrack and answered for her during roll call—Zahlappel. The baby was born in the Revier (medical clinic). Her sisters took the baby out the Revier's little window, took the baby to the gate, and gave the baby to Germans who said they would give the baby to German people. The sisters didn't know for sure that the baby would survive. But, for sure, they tried to save the baby. They did save the mother, and all the sisters survived.

The SS officers would have roll call and count every single morning and night. We would line up—five to a row. If the count was off, no matter what, they would count again and again. Do you know where they found the missing? They found them dead. It was not possible to escape. During the day we stayed in the yard. Sometimes we were not allowed to stand up so we had to kneel for a long time. I heard in some barracks that they had to hold bricks up in the air when they were kneeling.

After roll call, we would go to the washroom where there was running water once a day. In back of the barracks there were holes where we could have gone to the bathroom. Our stupid aelteste, the head of the barracks, would not let us go to the bathroom behind the barrack because then she would have to clean up the area by hosing it down. She would hit us if she caught us.

We feared even more Irma Griese, the beautiful camp leader. She would beat us for the smallest thing; when I cut off my hem and used this material for a headscarf, she saw this and beat me. During the Nuremberg Trials after the war, Griese was sentenced and hanged.

In August of 1944, Mengele selected from C Block three hundred women. He selected young ones, examining our eyes and hands. We didn't know why. We were crying because we were afraid that he was sending us to the front to the soldiers. After we were selected, we waited four weeks in B Camp, across the wires, for a transport.

This waiting for the transport was especially bad because of the conditions. We were waiting on the other side of the barbed wires for the transport. We waited four weeks to go to Mährisch-Weisswasser, one of the 97 sub-camps of the Gross-Rosen, a Nazi slave labor camp in Poland. While waiting for the transport, we had no running water. Trucks brought water that we had to catch in our hands. Early in the morning, we would go into a little stream and wash ourselves because there were no washrooms.

One morning I saw outside many nude women. They had been on a transport that was turned back because the trains had been bombed. The SS brought the women back and then took all their clothes. Nobody could go anywhere. What they did was for spite—for no reason. I gave them something to wear. Among these women I saw my cousin, also named Fanny, and Aunt Rozia. Both survived and went to Israel.

Finally one day our transport arrived. We left for Mährisch-Weisswasser, a slave labor camp, in Germany.

ALEX LEVIN

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Alex Levin. Under the Yellow and Red Stars. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 25–29. Used by permission.

One way of evading the Nazis, adopted by many throughout Eastern Europe, was escape into the forest—the deeper, the better. For some, this translated into the quest for acceptance into a partisan unit, though often this was denied Jews owing to an all-pervasive native antisemitism in certain regions. For other Jews, avoidance of the Nazis was compounded by a secondary avoidance of partisan groups, leading to a much-reduced third option: withdrawal into the forest and establishment of some sort of self-sufficient community. This was fraught with potentially devastating challenges, but, as Alex Levin describes in the testimony presented here, the little group of which he formed part managed to get by, albeit with tragic consequences for some of their number.

One night, after Samuel and I had been wandering for about two weeks, living hand to mouth, we saw a small campfire in the woods. When we approached it carefully we found a group of Jews we knew from Rokitno—Rachel Wasserman, Rachel's two children, Bluma and Taibele, and her sister Dosya, Dvoshil Svetchnik with her son, Haim, and daughter, Henya, Shmuel Bagel, Avraham Eisenberg and Todres Linn.

The feeling of safety that we found in our reunion was brief. That night we were awoken by noises and saw three armed men standing in front of us. They introduced themselves as partisans, gave us food and left. The next night they came back and said they could take one woman to help them out. Dosya volunteered. But we'd been deceived—we soon found out that they were actually bandits. We never learned what happened to Dosya.

This event made us really understand how desperate our circumstances were. We couldn't go back to any civilized place and it was now getting cold and we would soon be in real danger of freezing to death. We were frightened and desperate and yet within each of us was a flicker of purpose, a determination to survive whatever might come. Motivated by fierce emotions we were unable to comprehend, we went deeper into the woods.

I don't remember how it happened, who might have made the decisions, but a group of us started working together. If that hadn't happened I'm sure that Samuel and I would have died. I don't remember how the plan took shape, but we began to make a shelter in the middle of the woods, far from the perimeter where it might be found. It was a crude dugout that was to be shared by ten people—Samuel and me; Dvoshil Svetchnik, her son, Haim (now Haim Bar On) and her daughter, Henya; Rachel Wasserman and her two daughters, Bluma and Taibele; and Gil Gamulka and her son Lova (now Larry).

Both adults and children helped make this ramshackle structure; each of us contributed what we could. We began by digging a deep hole in the soil and reinforcing it with wood and bark around the sides and edges, which we built up slightly above ground level. Over the hole, which we came to call “the cave,” we piled branches and sticks over the top to form a roof that would both serve as camouflage and protect us. We were careful to make the dugout look like a natural outcrop of bushes.

Around the sides on the inside of the dugout were crude bunk beds for sleeping. We built a simple but effective fireplace in the centre of our hiding space and left an opening above it to allow the smoke to escape. We only burned oak since it gave off little smoke; fortunately the forest was very rich in old oak trees. We dug a small well outside the cave to provide us with pure water.

We called ourselves “the forest Jews.” It was an affectionate name, something that gave us a feeling of family and togetherness. This dugout became our home. We disguised it as well as we could—in fact it was sometimes even hard for us to find it when we returned from looking for food. An unusual oak with a branch bent in a particular way served as our only marker.

Our days passed with difficulty, mostly because of our fear of being caught but also, most immediately, because of the ever-present reality of hunger. Even in this seeming chaos, however, we established some sense of routine. We would approach the outskirts of a village, see a light in a window and beg for food. We never went into the centre of a village. Our days were focused on getting food and not getting caught. We were always looking for ways to fill our stomachs. Sometimes we looked for metal cans that we could turn into lanterns to scare away wolves. We looked out for police, horses and Germans. Sometimes we’d see tire tracks from a car.

Under less desperate circumstances, living in the woods might have been an adventure, but there was no sense of adventure for us in any of this. We had lost our parents, and now hunger and death followed us constantly. We had to find wood, mushrooms, whatever food we could find. We kept having to go farther away from our cave to find what we needed.

Because we knew it was a matter of pure survival, we felt no guilt at stealing what we needed. To get beets, turnips or potatoes from farmers’ fields in winter we had to dig through the frozen ground. We learned from the wild boars how to steal potatoes without leaving any trace that people had been there. We ate the white beets and turnips that farmers grew to feed to the barn animals, digging them up from the ground or stealing them from the storage sheds. Day after day went on like this. We always had to find food. There was never enough food. I have never forgotten what it means to be so hungry.

We had no idea what was going on in the outside world. We didn’t have access to any information—no newspapers, no electricity, no radio. But the most important thing is that we two orphans adapted to life in the wild and survived.

By the time a year had passed, our situation had somewhat improved. Although our lives were still fraught with danger and hunger, the forest became more and more our home. We had learned more and more skills that helped us survive and made us that smallest bit more comfortable. Despite the odds, we hadn’t been caught. We became more secure and hopeful, extremely resourceful and clever. Survival was not a game for us but an earnest pursuit.

We learned how to make moccasins out of oak bark steamed over the fire. Instead of socks we wrapped our feet in sacks that the peasants used to separate the buttermilk from sour clotted milk to make cottage cheese. We stole these sacks during our nightly missions, ate the cheese and used the cloth. In winter we wrapped our feet in volosin, a very thin and soft but warm material woven from dried hay. We learned how to use the riches of the forest to survive. We learned to identify which mushrooms and berries were poisonous and which ones were good. We picked blackberries, blueberries, cranberries and raspberries. We learned to tap birch trees for a bittersweet-tasting syrup and made cups out of birch bark to catch the sap. Sometimes my brother even managed to get some wild honey from beehives.

We were always aware of the very real dangers around us, but in addition to them, we forest wanderers were tormented by another scourge—the terrible and incessant lice. They were large and insatiable. We had them not only in our hair but under our armpits and in our groins—they crawled everywhere. The worst thing about them was the constant itching that kept us awake at night. But the forest also taught us how to get rid of them: we stripped naked and buried our clothes in anthills. The ants ate the lice and their nits. We weren’t as successful in avoiding another plague—an awful rash that spread from between our toes all over our bodies to our arms, legs, chest and even our buttocks.

Other vivid, fearful and even painful memories of our time in the forest have long stayed with me. The screams of owls, like human screams, pursued us at night. They seemed almost mystical because they were ever-present, but also, in a sense, invisible. I can still hear the sound of howling wolves and see their glittering eyes following us as they looked for prey. I remember frequent encounters with foxes and with swamp snakes when we collected tall oak saplings.

Death, too, was a real part of our life in the forest. We had to bury two people in our group. In the fall of 1942, death came for Haim's mother, Dvoshil, and his sister, Henya. Dvoshil leaned on my brother's shoulder to sleep one night and by morning she had frozen to death. Soon her daughter Henya died as well. They both died of malnutrition and hypothermia, their bodies grey and swollen, their skin cracked. We buried them in a state of shock without any real ceremony. These nightmarish images still haunt me. Seeing these members of our group perish slowly was a very profound experience for a little boy of ten. The tragedy of what I had witnessed was almost too much to bear. I was more than frightened—I was literally dumbstruck and remained silent for a long time after these deaths.

"Everything passes—and childhood, and fairytales of the woods . . . Everything passes, alas, and only the grey wolves—oh, ever so immortal—greet us along the way." These words of the poet Naum Sagalovsky describe very well our life and struggle during that time. Some of what it was like in the forest is also expressed in a poem written by a friend of mine, Fred Zolotkovsky, when he visited Rokitno with me many years later:

*These dark woods are our salvation.
Knee deep in water, yet we are alive!
Dreams preserve us.
Our dugout is the sweetest home.
Our only hope that the Germans don't rush in
All at once with a pack of dogs,
That police won't notice with trained eyes
Smoke rising through the darkness.
We all are worth only a carton of salt.
One kilogram is the price for your whole life:
Your soul, and heart, and blood
And only because you are a Jew.*

BEREK LEWKOWICZ

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Berek Lewkowicz. A Boy from Będzin: The Last Jewish Survivor of the Small Fortress at Terezín. Caulfield South (Victoria): Lamm Jewish Library of Australia, 2014, pp. 5–8. Used by permission.

The arrival of the Nazis into the Polish town of Będzin in early September 1939 certainly came as a shock to young people who had never known what war could be like. And for the Jews of Będzin, this was to be no ordinary war. As Berek Lewkowicz shows in this account, not only was the arrival of the Germans an event for which "I instinctively knew there was something wrong," but within a very short space he became aware of what that "something" was: an assault against the civilians rather than a war between combatants. Seeing the Nazis target the synagogue was an incident the likes of which "has remained with me all my life."

Będzin, 9 September 1939

The sound of many heavy motor vehicles, engines roaring, split the silence of the night. Waking to that unusual noise, I instinctively knew something was wrong. As the noise of the engines died down it was replaced by the tramp of heavy boots and shouted commands in German. I jumped out of bed and peered through the curtains of my bedroom window. What I saw about 200 metres away was an indication of what was to come, the memory of which has remained with me all my life.

The dark of night had become as bright as day with the light coming from the shining headlights of ten large military trucks with canvas awnings over the roof and sides. Two trucks were parked sideways across each end of the street to form a barrier with their open rears facing into the street. Mounted on the back of these two trucks were small but powerful floodlights manned by black-uniformed SS troopers.

The remaining trucks had been positioned to make a similar barrier blocking off the streets forming this area known as Die Alte Markt. In the street a black Mercedes staff car was parked opposite the entrance to the synagogue.

I could see German soldiers wearing heavy black military greatcoats and black battle helmets, each displaying the insignia of the SS, the dreaded Schutzstaffel. They all carried weapons—some a rifle, others a machine gun. Under the direction of an SS Scharfführer (sergeant) they were positioning themselves in a line down the centre of each street, weapons held at the ready.

As I watched I saw an SS Hauptsturmführer (captain) get out of the staff car. He was wearing a black raincoat and black cap and highly polished black jackboots. I could clearly see the silver death's head badge he wore on his cap. As his greatcoat swung open I saw the double lightning flash in the silver braid on the collar of his black tunic. A man wearing the black uniform of the German Polizei (police) followed him out of the car.

The officer held a clipboard in his hand and was smoking a cigarette. Taking it from his mouth he looked first to the left and then to the right to see that his troops were all in position. Satisfied they were where he wanted them, he called out an order and a group of men began to unload one of the trucks.

They appeared to remove square metal boxes, each with two canvas straps attached to them. They looked like the packs I had seen farmers carrying on their backs when spraying weed-killer on their fields. I was certain that's what they were when the soldiers started strapping them onto their backs. A long rubber hose with a metal nozzle at the end was attached to each box.

The SS Hauptsturmführer and the policeman had been standing at the door of the synagogue. They both moved back to the other side of the street and the officer called out a single word, "Zweig" (Branch out). The soldiers carrying the packs each turned on the small tap attached to the pack and directed the nozzle toward the synagogue and the houses standing on each side of it. Immediately a steady jet of fuel shot out of the nozzle. The soldiers began to spray the fuel over the buildings, going from one to the next to ensure that all of them were well saturated.

I could see other soldiers, similarly burdened with packs, spraying the houses in the streets that backed onto the shule. As I stood at my bedroom window and watched, the strong smell of kerosene came through the open top of the window. Horror-stricken, I suddenly realised what the German soldiers were doing.

After ten minutes of spraying continually, the packs were all empty. The soldiers went back to the trucks, unhooked the tanks from their backs and replaced them in the trunks. Then they each took a rifle from the stacks in the trucks and joined their comrades already lined up in the streets. When all was ready the Hauptsturmführer barked out the command "Anfang Brennen!" (Initial burn!).

At this the Scharführer, standing with a small group of Unterscharführer (sergeants), lit the torches they were carrying and began systematically to set fire to the kerosene-drenched buildings. There was a booming roar as the fuel caught fire and the buildings began to burn ferociously. Soon the agonized cries of trapped Jews could be heard and the stench of burning flesh filled the night air. People trapped in the burning houses were breaking windows to enable the mothers to push babies and young children out into the street, so the young at least might be saved. Seeing this, a trooper waited until the child began to fall from the window then, pointing his rifle upwards, caught the small body on the point of his bayonet.

By this time the synagogue was blazing fiercely from floor to ceiling, as were the houses surrounding it. Those men still trapped in the burning buildings tried smashing down the doors to push the women and children into the street, but as soon as the Germans saw anyone getting out of a burning building they shot at them. Soon the cries of the wounded and dying could be heard everywhere, along with the laughter of the SS, who called out to each other as though it were all great fun.

Sick at heart and full of horror at what I was seeing, tears of anger and sorrow ran down my cheeks. But there was nothing I or anyone else could do. Had I shown myself in the street, or tried to help the Jews trapped in the burning buildings, there was no doubt that I too would have been shot. To this day I don't know why our apartment building was spared.

By this time Die Alte Markt was ablaze from one end to the other. The heart-breaking cries of the wounded and dying filled the ears of those Jews who lived just outside the area being destroyed. Still watching helplessly through a chink in the bedroom curtains, I saw the SS captain and the policeman getting back into the staff car. They were then driven to the other end of the street where the heat from the fiercely burning buildings was not so intense.

After about two hours the fires began to die down somewhat, but the sickly smell of burning flesh was still strong on the air. The cries of those still trapped had also died down. All that remained of the buildings was smouldering ruins. There was little chance that many of the Jews trapped inside could have survived. Those who managed to get outside now lay in the street, dead or dying from the bullets or bayonets of the troops placed there to prevent anyone escaping.

The staff car returned to the middle of the street, where I had a perfect view of what happened next. The captain alighted from the car and stood leaning on the bonnet. He took a silver cigarette case from the pocket of his tunic and, extracting a cigarette, placed it between his thin lips. He put the case back, took out a gold lighter from another pocket and lit his cigarette. Then he stood erect from his leaning position, tossed the lighter into the air, caught it and replaced it in his pocket.

Slowly he walked along the street looking at the bodies strewn in the road. Now and again he nudged one with the toecap of his highly polished boot. If he saw any movement or sign of life in the body he took his Luger pistol from the holster in his belt, pointed it at the head of the body at his feet and pulled the trigger. It mattered little to him whether the shot he fired was into the head of a man, woman or even a child. If it was a Jew and the body still had life in it, that life had to be extinguished. He saw the body of a dead woman with a baby lying whimpering beside it. Without hesitating for a moment he drew his pistol and shot the baby dead.

STEFAN LORANT

Context: Before the War

Source: Stefan Lorant. I Was Hitler's Prisoner: Leaves from a Prison Diary. Harmondsworth (Middlesex): Penguin Books, 1939, pp. 26–34. Copyright © Stefan Lorant, 1939. Used by permission of Penguin Books Ltd.

Stefan Lorant was a journalist who originally came from Hungary. In 1933, when the Nazis came to power, he was the editor of the Münchner Illustrierte Presse, a nonpolitical illustrated newspaper with the largest circulation in southern Germany. On March 12, 1933 he was arrested, and for six-and-a-half months held in "protective custody" as a political offender. This account is taken from his diary, which he kept during his imprisonment. He noted down everything that happened to him on odd scraps of paper, pocket handkerchiefs, the backs of letters, envelopes, even toilet paper. He managed to smuggle these out of the prison. The published work appeared in English about eighteen months after his release, in April 1935, under the imprint of left-wing British publisher Victor Gollancz.

Next morning—it is the 14th of March—there comes a loud knocking at my bedroom door.

"What's the matter? Who's that knocking at this unearthly hour?"

The cook's sleepy voice answers me from inside the door:

"Two men are here. They say they've come from the police. Shall I open the door to them?"

"Yes. Open the door and let them in."

It is pitch dark in my bedroom. I jump out of bed, and throw open the shutters. Day is breaking. I look at my watch. It is six o'clock.

Who can want me so early?

The police. I repeat the syllables mechanically. "The police." The police!

Suddenly I am wide awake.

"Good heavens alive, the police have come to arrest me?" I am sleepy no longer. I put on my dressing-gown, and run into my wife's room.

"Get up, the police have come."

Niura stares at me in surprise. She does not seem to understand. In a voice heavy with sleep, she asks: "What do the police want you for?"

Meanwhile the cook has admitted the two officials. It is just like a film. The elder of the two shows me his written authorisation. "We are going to make a house-search," he says solemnly. "Where do you keep your papers and documents?"

"In my study."

"We'll look through them."

I unlock my desk. The elder rummages among the letters and manuscripts, while the younger turns his attention to the books in the book-case.

An hour passes—the two men have looked through everything.

"Please get dressed," says the elder. "We shall have to search your office too. You will come with us."

"Am I under arrest?" I ask.

"No. Our orders are only to bring you up for examination."

"Are you aware that I am a foreigner, under the protection of the Hungarian consulate?"

"Yes. We know that."

"And yet you are arresting me?"

"We are not arresting you. We are simply taking you to the police station."

I go to the telephone.

"Whom are you going to ring up" cry both at once, in startled tones.

"My consul. I am going to report this matter to him."

"I can't allow that," the elder official says, pressing down the telephone rest. "We can't have the consul turning up at the police station before you get there. After we've gone, we can't stop your wife ringing up the consulate. You can't telephone now."

I go to my bedroom to dress. For a second I reflect. Wouldn't the most sensible thing be to escape?

The two officials are waiting for me in the library. I am alone in my bedroom. I can easily get away by the back entrance. But, after all, why should I escape? I have done nothing wrong. I go back into the library. The two detectives stand on either side of me. I am allowed to take leave of Niura and Andi.

Andi howls as if his heart would break. He is not used to his father leaving the house so early.

"You haven't told me any stories this morning!"

"I'll make up for it this afternoon, my little man. Don't cry, now. I'll tell you a lovely story about the elephant then."

"And about the tiger, too," Andi instructs me through his tears. "And about the hippopotamus and the parrot and the monkeys, too. . . ."

"Yes, of course, I'll tell you stories about all of them when I come back. Don't cry, now."

The little fellow calms down. He calls after me down the staircase:

"Mind you don't forget to come home this afternoon."

"No, I won't forget."

Andi's words sound in my ears. When was it he called after me? Yesterday, the day before yesterday, ages ago? No, was only a week ago. . . .

The detectives drive with me to the office. Soldiers with rifles stand guard at the entrance to the building. What for?

We enter my office.

The two police officials begin to rummage in my desk.

"What are you really looking for?" I ask. "Can I help you at all?"

"What are we looking for?" one of them repeats irresolutely. "What are we looking for?" his companion echoes.

They seem perplexed. Apparently they don't know themselves.

"Let's ring up the inspector," the younger man proposes.

The elder official agrees. He telephones to police headquarters. He reports stiffly: "We haven't completed our search . . . no, we didn't find anything incriminating . . . are we to search for anything in particular? Very good, sir, I understand. Caricatures likely to bring members of the Government into contempt. . . ."

I laugh.

"We have no caricatures of members of the Government. The Münchner Illustrierte Presse is, as you know, an illustrated paper of a non-political character."

"Yes, yes, we know that," the official replies. "But we shall have to take something along with us, you know, to satisfy the inspector."

"Perhaps you'd like to take this basket of photographs?" I suggest, by way of a joke, pointing to a large basket filled to the brim with old photographs which we do not want.

The official nods, satisfied. He had taken my suggestion seriously.

"That'll give them something to do, up at the station, anyway," he says.

That finishes the search.

It is eight o'clock.

We leave the building.

The commissionaires salute as the big police Mercedes leaves the office yard with a basket full of unwanted photographs, a few private letters, and myself, guarded by two detectives. One of the compositors calls after me heartily:

"See you again soon!"

When we reach police headquarters the two detectives conduct me to the offices of the Political Police. We stand on the threshold of room 147. One or the officers already has his hand on the door, ready to go in, when a sudden thought strikes him.

He gives a start, and pulls me away from the door.

"I forgot to ask you whether you were armed."

"I never carry weapons," I answer, smiling.

He runs his hands over my body, gives a sigh of relief when he finds I have no revolver on me.

I am taken into the room. It is full of young men arguing excitedly. One or the other of them dashes into the next room, then comes back. There is a senseless rushing to and fro. Apparently the young men have no idea what they ought to be doing. It is easy to see by the look of them that they have not been attached to police headquarters very long.

No one takes the slightest notice of me.

We wait for some time.

Then the elder of the two detectives calls the attention of one of the young men to my presence. The latter gapes at me for a moment, scribbles something on a card, dashes into the next room, comes back after a while, gives the card to the detective, points to me, and shouts:

"Take him away!"

"Am I under arrest now?" I ask.

"You are being placed in protective custody."

"For what reason?"

The young official turns his back without answering. I am left to draw the conclusion that he does not know himself why he has had me arrested.

The two detectives conduct me to the floor below, into the receiving-room of the police prison. It is a strange sort of room. There are iron bars all around. This system of bars forms a number of gangways, all leading to a door in the farther wall. That door is the entrance to the prison.

A warder takes my hat, and places it on a shelf. There are many other hats on the wooden shelves. Respectable-looking bowlers, elegant soft hats, cheek by jowl with ragged, greasy caps. They are all waiting for their owners who are in the prison. It is a graphic still-life.

I am also relieved of my fountain-pen, pencils, keys, and pocketbook. An official searches my pockets, and runs his hands over my clothes to make sure I have not concealed anything.

I am not asked to give any personal particulars. The warrant for my arrest is already neatly typed out, lying in front of them. It has been made out in advance. I take a stealthy look over the official's shoulder, and read on the sheet the words: "Reason for Arrest: Deportation."

So they want me out of Germany! What for?

A warder conducts me through the iron door. I am in the prison.

We go along an extensive corridor. Iron doors on each side. On the right a door stands open. I look into the cell. There is a wooden bunk fixed near the floor, with a drain near it, covered by a grating. No window. No light.

"Am I to be put in a cell like that, too?" I ask the warder, in alarm.

He laughs. "Why, that's the Dark Cell, for drunks. They sleep off their liquor there. You'll be on the fourth floor with the political prisoners."

We go upstairs.

The same scene on every floor: a long corridor, with a row of iron doors to left and right; over each door a number—the number of the cell.

We reach the fourth floor. A few prisoners are standing in the corridor. The warder points to one of the cells.

"That's yours," he says. "Number 47."

The cell is just being cleaned. The occupants, three unshaven men, are waiting in front of the door, and I stand with them.

As soon as the prison servant has finished cleaning, we go inside.

The iron door is locked behind us. I am a prisoner.

It seems a comic situation to me.

I remember the times when I had been naughty as a boy. I used to be locked in a room, when I had got up to mischief. Even then solitude was no punishment for me. And now it seems absurd to lock up grown men.

I laugh.

My three cell companions look at me in shocked amazement.

We introduce ourselves.

"My name is Karl Bach."

"My name is Link."

"Count Strachwitz," says the third of my cell companions.

"Delighted! Delighted! Delighted!"

Prison etiquette does not differ in the slightest from that obtaining in the best society among free men.

"Why have you been arrested?" My cell companions besiege me with questions.

"I have no idea."

They look at me searchingly.

"And why have you been arrested?" I enquire.

"We don't know any more than you do!" answers Count Strachwitz and Herr Bach in the same breath.

Herr Link, an oldish man with grey hair, is the only one of us who was aware of the reason for his arrest.

"I am a Social-Democratic trades union official," he says. We have scarcely started to speak when a warder comes to fetch Herr Link. He has to pack up his things, for he is being transferred to the prison at Stadelheim. He asks us to let his wife know where he is, in the event of any of us being released in the near future.

We three remain behind.

Herr Bach's bed is opposite the door, Strachwitz's and mine against one of the side walls of the cell. We sit talking on our mattresses.

Herr Bach, owner of one of the largest ready-made tailoring establishments in Munich, is in despair. He was arrested four days ago, and his case has not yet been heard. He has been racking his brains in vain for the reason for his arrest.

"Weren't you ever engaged actively in politics, then?" I ask.

"Never! I am only a business man. I have never had anything to do with politics."

"Then I can't understand why they've arrested you."

"It's because I am a Jew," he answers, in an expressionless tone.

Count Strachwitz tries to cheer up the downcast Herr Bach. "You'll see, Herr Bach," he says. "You'll be released tomorrow."

"You've been telling me that since yesterday morning." Herr Bach refuses to be comforted.

He draws up his legs, and sits on his bed like a harem attendant. There are parcels, paper bags, and leather suitcases all round him—on the bed and under the bed—all filled to overflowing with provisions. There are dates, choice fruit, cakes, sausages, chocolate, roast beef, new bread, chicken, butter, a thermos flask full of tea, another full of soup. Everything is to be found in these parcels. The worthy Frau Bach clearly does not intend to let her husband starve.

Twice a day, in the morning and in the afternoon, the supplies are replenished. But, each time a fresh parcel of food arrives, Bach observes: "I'd rather be hungry and free!" Then he cuts himself a slice of fresh roast beef, and consumes it with an expression of profound melancholy.

Out in the corridor people come and go uninterruptedly.

The heavy boots of the S.A. men clump over the stone floor. Every moment an inquisitive eye looks through the spy-hole in the door of the cell. The S.A. men have been allowed to inspect the prison. The young fellows feast their eyes on the sight of the prisoners.

Now and then one will shout from outside:

"We'll soon show you, you pigs of Jews!"

Or else:

"You'll be hanged: the whole lot of you will be hanged!"

Sometimes we hear our own names mentioned, and then we see their eyes peering in at us.

The hours pass slowly. We are waiting to be fetched, for our cases to be heard. Bells are continually ringing from all the cells. All the prisoners want the same thing—to be examined.

The warders do not know what to say. They always give the same answer:

"When you're wanted, you'll be sent for."

The cathedral bells chime the quarter hours. One, two, three, four strokes. Another hour gone. And still no news.

Herr Bach grows more and more nervous every hour.

The afternoon drags on endlessly.

We lie down, and try to sleep.

My cell companion, Count Strachwitz, is the typical Austrian aristocrat as portrayed in novels—charming, friendly, cultured. He has travelled all over the world, and speaks many languages. He has only been in Munich a year, engaged in historical studies, and has written several political articles for Catholic newspapers.

"I was a windfall for the police," he tells me. "Last night I was sleeping in the house of my cousin, Baron Aretin. When they arrested him this morning, they took me along as well. That's how I got here."

"But Baron Aretin is a colleague of mine," I exclaim. "What's happened to him?"

"They've put him in the cell opposite ours, in number 39, along with Büchner, the editor."

"I'd very much like to see him! Are there many other prisoners here besides him?"

Count Strachwitz laughs at my simplicity.

"The whole building is full of political prisoners, and they keep bringing new ones in."

Evening comes.

The door of the cell opens. We are allowed to go and fetch water. Then each of us is given two blankets, and we are ready for the night.

The waitress from the police canteen brings our supper, consisting of cold meat, cheese, and bread and butter.

The day is over.

Herr Bach asks the warder to leave the light on overnight. He is afraid of the dark. The warder promises to do so. But Herr Bach does not trust him. He made the same promise yesterday, but turned the light out at twelve.

"Can't we switch it off ourselves?" I ask, ignorant of prison customs. The other two laugh. "You seem to forget that we are prisoners. The switch is out in the corridor. It is not we, but the warders, who decide when it is to be turned off."

Bach repeats gloomily:

"We are prisoners."

All the poor man can think of is that he is in prison. The very mention of the word throws him into despair.

"Don't keep on worrying yourself so, Herr Bach," I say, trying to console him. "Try to think of something else instead of the prison, and you'll feel better at once. Look at these blue check mattresses. Aren't they just like those on the beds in a ski-hut? Try to imagine that we are sitting in one of those huts, high up in the mountains. Outside a storm is raging, the wind is whistling, the entrance to the hut blocked with snow and we can't get back to the valley tonight. The hut is well heated; we have just eaten a supper fit for a king; we lack nothing. Only the . . . snow-storm we can't open the door, so what shall we do? We'll go to bed. When we get up, the sun will be shining again. We shall wax our skis, and speed away downhill like greased lightning."

Bach groans.

"Oh, you journalists, with your flowery fancies! You say we might be in a ski-hut. But look at my feet, they're dangling almost into the W.C. In front of me that horrible iron door with its spy-hole, eyes staring at me, voices abusing me . . . and you ask me to imagine we are in a ski-hut?"

"Try to think that you will be released tomorrow. You'll see that will help you," says Count Strachwitz.

Bach does not answer. He lies down on the bed in his clothes. He does not trust himself to undress. He folds his winter overcoat under his head, and stares at the ceiling.

In a few moments he is asleep. The cell resounds to his snores.

Sleep is out of the question. Herr Bach's symphony is far too loud. At one moment he snores in a high note, at another in a deep one, all in the most varied tones and modulations.

"A good conscience is a soft pillow," Count Starchwitz whispers.

We laugh.

So ends my first day in prison.

FRED MANN

Context: Western Europe

Source: Fred Mann. A Drastic Turn of Destiny. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2009, pp. 66–73. Used by permission.

Fred Mann was a young teenager when war broke out in September 1939. His German Jewish family had earlier moved to Belgium from their home in Leipzig, trying to stay one step ahead of the Nazis. When Germany invaded Belgium in May 1940, Fred's status changed for a second time; from being a hated Jew in Germany, he was now a detested German, notwithstanding his refugee status. The account produced here describes his attempts at weaving an acceptable path through the various misunderstandings accompanying his days at school in Brussels, and how he overcame his classmates' prejudices. The testimony takes readers up to March of 1940, just two months before the Nazi invasion, and gives a very good snapshot into what it was to be a refugee from Nazism in a still-neutral (though threatened) country.

We hadn't been in Belgium very long before our world suddenly went topsy-turvy. The events causing this upset didn't take place in our immediate neighbourhood, but we felt the breath of disaster blowing in our direction nonetheless. When Hitler had seized the whole of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, the world didn't say, "Enough," and he clearly wasn't satisfied with his conquest of Poland. The unscrupulous bombing of Polish cities in September of that year should have served as a warning to the countries of Europe of what else they could expect from the Nazis, but even after war had been declared, all parties seemed to be waiting patiently for his next move.

Even more disquieting was listening to Hitler's speech to the German parliament on September 1, 1939, when the full force of his oratory came into play. On September 3, 1939, the Brussels newspapers quoted French prime minister Edouard Daladier's September 2 speech before the Chamber of Deputies that laid bare Hitler's nefarious schemes. To us it spelled doom and instilled renewed fear for our lives. We had little doubt that the Germans would attack Belgium as soon as an outright war began.

That came to pass on September 3 when France and Britain declared war on Germany and within a few weeks, on September 27, 1939, Warsaw had surrendered.

Our life in Brussels continued with the possibility of a German invasion hanging over our heads like the sword of Damocles. We weren't sure when it would descend. We were, at best, living in a precarious existence with a suitcase mentality. Our landlord assured us that the Belgian fortifications were impenetrable, that the dykes, in particular, would repel any German access into Belgium. He magnanimously extended this bit of military theory to Holland, but didn't even bother to mention the famous Maginot Line of France since he was sure that the Germans would never get through the Belgian and Dutch defences.

It was in this atmosphere that I first entered my new school at the beginning of September 1939. I soon discovered that my situation had changed dramatically. I was no longer the "dirty Jew" ostracized and threatened by my school friends as I had been in Leipzig—now I was the sale boche, the "dirty German." What a transformation for a boy of thirteen and a half! I remember asking myself how it was possible that even though we hated the Germans, I was maligned as one. It no longer mattered in this Brussels school that I was Jewish, but the fact that I was born in Germany seemed more important than the fact that I had fled Germany to stay alive.

Under these circumstances I found it difficult to concentrate on my studies—even more so when the subjects were taught in a language I had yet to master. My comprehension was most challenged in the sciences. Fortunately, I found French relatively easy to learn and by Christmas the headmaster called my father in to discuss my progress. When I was first enrolled in the school, it was decided that because of my need to learn a new language I should repeat the school year I had just completed in Leipzig. The headmaster had thought that while this would slow down my academic advancement, it would significantly lessen the psychological effect of failing my year. At Christmas, though, the headmaster told my father that my French had improved enough for me to move into the class commensurate with my age. I wouldn't end up losing any time whatsoever. All I needed to do during the Christmas holiday was catch up on the work that the class had already studied. By Easter my school grades were up to par, although due to a subsequent event, I never did find out what the end result of this switch at Christmas would have been.

My upgrade did bring about a change in my classmates' approach, though. Because I was with a whole new crowd in my new class and my French was now good enough to explain who I was and where I came from, I was no longer considered to be the "Dirty German" but was accepted as one of their own. They introduced me to some of the interesting sites of Brussels, including "Mannekin Pis," a statue that has caused a lot of controversy but in Brussels is highly revered. It is a bronze statue of a little boy standing at a corner urinating that is draped in different clothes appropriate for the season or ceremonial occasions. There are always fresh flowers at the foot of the tall pedestal. My classmates also showed me the magnificent Grand Place and the town hall with its statues of Belgian royalty and prophets on the bell tower crowned by St. Michael, the city's patron saint. The inside of the building, with its tapestries, is something to behold.

I was most grateful to my schoolmates for this exposure to Brussels history. I was now invited to their homes and parties. I went skating with them, and they in turn came to our apartment. They no longer looked upon my parents as German people to be avoided but as people who had fled from the Nazis and suffered at their hands. There was still not much interaction between their parents and mine, but this may have been due to the language barrier. My parents found it difficult to learn French, even though my father did acquire a smattering of the language.

I remember two very funny incidents concerning my father's lack of French. One day when he left to go to a meeting, my mother asked him to get a dozen eggs from a store on his way home. In those days men like my father did not go grocery shopping. When he arrived home he told us that he had a great deal of difficulty getting the grocery store clerk to understand what he wanted since the man didn't speak any Flemish. In desperation my father crowed like a cock and reached behind him with his hand, bringing the open hand forward to show that he had just laid an egg. The clerk got the message and, using his fingers, asked my father how many eggs he wanted. Another time, my father came home and declared that he wanted to meet Mr. "A. Louer" since he clearly owned a lot of real estate in Brussels and he could possibly do some business with him. He was not aware that "A Louer" means "For Rent" in French.

My parents settled into a circle of German-speaking friends, mostly people who, like us, had fled Germany. They met at the Café Royal at the Hotel Royal on the Place du Midi with their emigrant friends on Saturday afternoons and one could almost believe that they had been transplanted from Café Felsche in Leipzig to Café Royal in Brussels. What a wondrous generation of people who, despite the hardships, attempted to conduct as normal a life as they could. Uncle Dadek had left Leipzig for Brussels three years ahead of us and established a small business, so he was able to employ my Aunt Rena. Her fiancé, Kurt Berliner, had come to Brussels from Berlin and, for a few months, life did take on some degree of normalcy.

We started to appreciate Belgian food and my aunt and I both especially loved the famous Belgian pommes frites that were sold at street stands wrapped in newspaper. It was quite surprising that the fat-laden and steaming French fries didn't melt the newsprint, but even if it had, it would probably have only added to the incredible taste. The secret to making Belgian pommes frites is that they are fried twice. There were other stands that served Belgian waffles covered with powdered sugar and whipped cream, and stands that sold the most delicious chocolates Belgium is so famous for. But best of all were the fresh oysters. The fish boats anchored below the bridge that spanned one of the canals between Brussels and Laeken. We would put money into one of the baskets attached to the bridge with long cords and lower it to the fisherman. He would then load the basket with the number of oysters, already pried open, that we had paid for and we would hoist the basket up. What a feast to eat these fresh oysters just a few hours after they had been harvested!

There were lots of new things for me to experience in Brussels—museums to visit, movies to see, parks to walk in and outdoor concerts to listen to. These were the things that I had not been allowed to do in Germany for the last three years of my residency there. It is only when you are not permitted to do something that you begin to realize the pleasure of experiencing it again. Freedom of movement can only really be appreciated by those who have been deprived of it.

After September, discussions about the state of war between Germany on the one side and France and England on the other seemed to fade into the background. My parents and their friends talked about it when they met at the coffee house, but in school we paid little attention. The Belgians really believed that their dyke system was a powerful deterrent to a potential German invasion.

We felt deeply for the people who were still under the German yoke. The news emanating from Germany and Poland sounded ominous for the Jews. The first Judenräte (Jewish Councils) had been established in September 1939, almost immediately after Poland's surrender. In October the Nazis established the first ghetto in Piotrów, Poland as an unguarded and unfenced residence. There was no world reaction and it came as no surprise when we learned about it in Brussels since there had been many instances of such enclaves for Jews throughout history. In November 1939 the Germans introduced a decree that all Jews in Poland over the age of ten had to wear white armbands with a blue Star of David prominently displayed on the outside of their clothing. Forced labour for Jews had commenced and the first deportation of Jews from Austria and the Protectorates to the Polish ghettos started.

A boy's bar mitzvah is scheduled to take place on his thirteenth birthday and parents make arrangements for this event long in advance. The Torah portion that the young man is to read must be determined so that he can practice, but his recital includes various prayers, blessings and chants that must also be learned. When my thirteenth birthday approached in February 1939, we were still in Germany and the Germans had destroyed many of the synagogues during Krystallnacht. While some Jewish Orthodox services were held in secret, it was difficult for us to adjust to these services since we were members of the Reform movement of Judaism. Part of our religious service was conducted in German, but the Orthodox did all their traditional singing and conducted all their services in Hebrew. As a result, I couldn't be presented to "manhood" on my scheduled day.

One of the first tasks my father undertook when we arrived in Brussels was to look for a Reform congregation where my bar mitzvah could take place. Reform Judaism was practiced in the Grand Synagogue in Brussels, making it easier for me to be called to the Torah. It was a sad sort of affair that took place on March 2, 1940, shortly after my fourteenth birthday. Only my parents, Aunt Rena and her fiancé Kurt Berliner, and Uncle Dadek attended. I had no Jewish friends and certainly no childhood friends. There was really nothing of the joyous feeling we experienced when my brother had his bar mitzvah. Our present fate of running for our lives and being in strange surroundings was really highlighted during the event.

While the Saturday service was fairly well attended, most of the people present were there to witness the bar mitzvah of another boy on the same day. The rabbi had consented to let me attend as well on that Saturday, even though the other bar mitzvah had been scheduled a long time ago. The reading of the Torah was split between us and we both recited the "Baruch Sheptarani" blessing. After the service, the family of the other boy had their Kiddush in the community hall of the synagogue. From the synagogue we proceeded to our small apartment to have lunch, but the spirit of Celebration was not with us. My parents were very aware of being in a foreign land where they encountered language problems daily and where the future was uncertain. Within two months their trepidation was confirmed.

PAULA STOTSKY MAY

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Paula Stotsky May and Maryann McLoughlin. To Tell of Fire in the Night: A Holocaust Survivor's Memoir. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2010, pp. 22–29. Used by permission.

Born in Belitza, Poland, Paula Stotsky May was a happy girl whose life was turned upside down with the Soviet occupation of September 1939 and then the Nazi invasion of June 1941. Forced into the ghetto of Zhetel (Zdzięcioł) in February 1942, she survived the liquidation of the ghetto later that year and fled to the forest outside. In this account, Paula outlines some of the issues surrounding the difficulties she and her husband, Louis, encountered in trying to remain alive despite the difficulties presented by their situation.

On Wednesday night, Lisa, the teacher's daughter and my friend, brought me a bag with a cucumber and a piece of bread inside. I had not eaten for a week and had been in the Kino for four days lying on the floor.

Lisa whispered to me, "Tomorrow will be your last day here. They will take you away. Louis is alive and has returned to Belitza. Louis hid in our neighbor Billinkovich's barn with your sister and an older man, Dovidershl. When Louis left the barn, Billinkovich saw him and chased him away, telling him, 'Go away. We'll be killed if they find you in here.'

"However, Billinkovich didn't know that Betty and Dovidershl were still in the barn. Billinkovich gave Louis a bottle of water. After he was gone, Louis pulled a board away and gave Betty and Dovidershl a drink.

"Louis told them 'Be quiet.'

"Louis then hid in the garden. When it was dark, the three left there and went into the forest."

Dovidershl's brother, a partisan, later took Dovidershl to the forests to join the partisans. When he was with the partisans, one day, they were looking for potatoes, but the Germans found and killed him.

When I knew that my husband and sister were alive, I was determined to survive.

On Wednesday the guards in front of the Kino let us outside to go to the bathroom. I had some money from the sewing machine that I could use to bribe the guards.

I said to this man, whom I knew from Belitza, “Zamke, you know the neighborhood. Let’s escape from Zhetel. Come with me.”

Another woman said to me, “I, too, want to go with you.”

I paid the Polish guards to let us go out to the toilet.

At twilight I left with Zamka and two others—one woman and another woman who had left her child and her mother.

The mother said to her daughter, “Take my shoes.”

Zamke knew how to leave Zhetel, but first we had to climb over the five-foot high wooden fence, jump down, and go through the garden, hopefully to safety. A ten-year-old Christian boy saw us and brought the Germans. They took us back inside.

I told Zamke, “We have to try again.”

Zamke’s wife was pregnant, so she could not leave. Her seventeen year old brother Baruch wanted to stay with his sister to protect her.

The second time some people and I went out and jumped into the same garden. The same little boy was watching. I ran into the garden and fell into a hole. I took a branch from a tree, covering the hole, so I could hide myself.

The Germans came searching, shooting in the air, and yelling, “Raus. Raus.” (Out. Out.)

Everyone but me was caught. I was the only one left. No one was allowed out even if people had to go to the toilet.

In the meantime I was lying in the hole. I didn’t know the town. I didn’t know where to go. I was crying. I knew I had to go to my teacher’s house.

My friend Lisa had said, “If you escape and come to us, don’t go to the front of our place because it is across from the post office, and there is always a big light shining into Slonmer Street.”

Therefore, I started walking toward Lisa’s house through back gardens, climbing over one fence, walking through the garden, and then climbing over the next fence until I reached Slonmer Street. There was a full moon, I remember. I was walking and walking and soon I was very tired. When I came to the end of Slonmer Street, I made a right turn and came to the street where the light from the post office was shining. I went past there and crossed the street. I went to the toilet behind their house and closed myself in.

Mr. Billinkovich, their neighbor and the owner of the house, rented half his house to my teacher. Billinkovich came out next morning to let his cow out of the barn. While he was letting the cow out, I climbed up into the attic on the teacher’s side.

In the morning when the family woke up they heard me walking in the attic. They were very happy to see me.

The teacher’s wife, Mrs. Kurelow, brought me pancakes. I said that I was not hungry. She encouraged me to eat.

She said, “We love you, Perelka, but we can’t keep you. They will kill us and they will kill you. Mr. Billinkovich is scared; he may betray us.”

I said, “What do you want me to do? I could leave and hide near the Neman River.”

She said, “Wait till twilight. Lisa will take you out of the city.”

When I was hiding waiting for twilight, I heard trucks passing. In these trucks were the 360 people, including Besheva and her son, whom they had rounded up and held in the jail at the Kino. I heard the Nazis singing, “When Jewish blood runs, we gain strength.” These trucks were taking the Jews to the pit where they were shot by the Einsatzgruppen and buried in a mass grave.

At twilight, Lisa’s mother put a scarf over my hair and tied the scarf under my chin. Then she covered me with a huge five-foot shawl. She also put on my arm a sickle for cutting weeds, so I would look like a Christian coming from work. She gave me a bag of bread. Lisa took me to the Christian cemetery. She kissed me. We both were crying.

I never saw her again. . . .

I wanted to leave the cemetery, but I could not find a way out. I kept running around, searching. I eventually found the exit and started walking away from Zhetel. Everybody who had been working was coming back from the fields. They turned around and looked at me, wondering why I was going out of the city in the opposite direction from everyone else.

I walked until it was very dark. I came to a house and lay down. I made a mark so I would know which way I had come from. I was still not sure in which direction was the Neman River. While I was sleeping, I dreamed that I had to cross a creek with a log bridge.

In my dream, our neighbor, Judis Shykis said, “Don’t be afraid. Go across; you will make it.”

I heard someone walking. I called out, but no one answered me.

I said “Don’t be afraid.”

All I saw were fireflies. I lay down again.

In the morning I found two farmhouses.

I stopped at one of the farmhouses and asked the farmer, Shevilka, “John Shevilka, how do I get to the Neman River?”

His daughter was my age, so I guess he wanted to help me. He told me to take the road and showed me where to go into the forest.

I started walking through the dense Lipichanski Puscha (Dense forest). The trees were so tall and thick that I couldn’t see the sky. I walked in the darkness, crying, for hours.

Toward morning, I met Katia Shimenovich, from our village, Belitza. She saw me and said, “Who are you?” Katia didn’t recognize me with the scarf and shawl.

I said, “Perla.”

She said, “Who else?”

I replied, “Only me.”

Katia told me, “Come with me. My parents, Samuel and Czarna, and Ida, my sister, are here. All four of us survived.”

I stayed a while with them. Then I told them that I had to go to the Neman River to find Louis and my sister.

Shimenovich asked me, “Will you go and see a Christian woman by herself? Maybe you can buy bread from her.” I left. I was still in the clothes that my teacher’s wife had given me.

Shimenovich and another man hid under a tree while I tried to buy the bread. I went to the home of the Christian woman, Mrs. Trichicha.

She told me: “Come back tomorrow. I will have bread then.”

I went the next day to her house. When I came to the house, Rifka and her brother were there from Belitza.

“Perelka, where are you coming from? Louis is here with your sister Betty.”

My husband had learned from Shimenovich that I was alive. Louis’s brother Dovid was a teacher who taught with a Christian teacher. When I came to buy bread, the Christian teacher saw me and told Schlmen, another of Louis’s brothers, that he had seen me.

After this, Louis’s brother Schlmen, his girlfriend, her brother, and Louis’s four sisters, a total of seven people, gave material to a Christian woman to hide them. They built a bunker and stayed there one night. The next morning she brought the Germans and all seven were murdered. After the war Louis dug and found their graves. He knew the graves were theirs because in the grave he found and recognized his sister Ruthie’s hair pins.

I found out from my sister that they had also stayed with the Shimenovichs before I had gone there. Louis and I reunited. We started crying and laughing. He gave me honey and long pants, which later saved my life during the long winter of ice and snow. Louis had a rifle that he had bought to protect us.

We had to find hay or straw to put on the ground; I didn’t want to sleep on the cold and damp forest floor. Louis and I left my sister, Betty in the forest. As we were walking we heard the wolves howling.

Louis said, “I’ll shoot the gun into the air.”

I said, “No. Either the wolves or the Germans will hear and come into the forest after us.” We were scared and decided not to continue looking for hay and straw. It was so dark that we couldn’t find my sister. We decided to lay down to rest. I lay on the ground on top of the heavy shawl. The woods were so dark that I could not even see my hands.

We decided that we would look for Betty when it was light. Then we heard a voice.

It was Betty, saying, “You are here!”

It was so dark that we had not even seen her.

HANIA HARCSTARK-GOLDFEDER MAYER

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Hania Harcsztark-Goldfeder Mayer. A Lucky Human Being: An Incredible Story of Survival. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 76–80. Used by permission.

While death marches at the end of the war were designed to evacuate the Nazi concentration camps in the east, their destinations were often hurriedly improvised. Many prisoners eventually arrived at Bergen-Belsen, which soon became hopelessly overcrowded, disease-ridden, and completely devoid of food and supplies of every kind. In this account, Hania Harcsztark-Goldfeder Mayer describes her march, the uncertainty of the day-to-day existence through which she suffered, and her eventual illness and delirium at Belsen; only the camp’s liberation by the British in April 1945, it could be suggested, saved her life.

As I witnessed the daily shootings and loss of strength among most of us, I had the craziest idea. One night, unable to sleep, I decided to escape! In my eagerness to flee I could not even think clearly about what on earth I was doing or hoping for.

I walked out in the middle of a dark night, wearing my prisoner's attire and without waking my cousins. Shivering, I ran over the road to the woods and hid among the bushes. At dawn I began to watch the road for any movement. As it slowly became lighter I heard a noise and looking up saw a horse and buggy. The driver sat up front on the seat with another man and at the back of the buggy some large metal containers stood on a wooden platform. They may have been for milk.

I was not able to stay in the woods any longer as my feet and body were frozen. I walked onto the road to stop the cart and to my surprise, the driver pulled up. In my school-girl's German I asked the farmers if they could take me to the nearest township. They nodded their heads and pointed in the back, to where the cans were. I climbed up eagerly and sat among them. I could smell a very strange aroma, of vegetables dressed with Mayonnaise and onions—a salad. Hungry as I was, my saliva glands became very active. The two men were talking happily together when I noticed a small township nearby. Instead of asking to be let down I just sat, like a zombie. They stopped in front of a police station. All of a sudden they indicated I should step down. Keeping me between them they took me straight inside. Me, timid Hania! After all my bravery, to end up like that!

The two men kept me between them. They probably thought I would run away, but stunned as I was, there was little hope of that. They spoke to the officer in charge who listened to them, then looked at me. I can only imagine what he saw. He thanked the two men and they left. The officer was polite to me. He told me to sit and wait while he telephoned someone. After a short conversation he told me to follow him. A horse and carriage was waiting outside and I was told to get in and sit in the back. I did not know what was going to happen to me. My heart was beating so loudly I thought everyone could hear it.

The officer did not say a word, but after travelling down the road for a while I noticed some farm buildings nearby. The carriage stopped and the officer indicated I should step down and walk with him to one of the buildings. A man who looked like a farmer came outside and the officer spoke to him. I understood he was expecting a contingent of prisoners to arrive that night. Without saying anything the officer left. The farmer, for that is what he was, took me inside his house—a warm, living house with a family! They all looked at me as though I was a specimen from a circus.

The woman, probably the farmer's wife, indicated I should sit down. Speaking slowly in German and probably thinking I would not understand, she asked if I was hungry. I nodded my head eagerly. I had not been served such a fulfilling meal since before the war.

I stayed at the farmer's house until nearly nightfall, when he took me to the sheds to meet my co-prisoners. The surprise on their faces when they saw me was indescribable. After all their questions, the only thing of note for my single day of adventure was a strong smell of salad from sitting next to the containers in the back of the buggy.

As one day was much the same as another, I don't know for how much longer we walked. Eventually we arrived at a place where we encountered scenes I would not wish on anyone. We were completely at the end of our physical strength and shaking at the knees from exhaustion. We stood, longing to be able to sit down, while no one took the slightest notice of us. Around us we saw corpses left lying with their eyes open and mere skeletons of what had once been human beings. We just felt numb as we regarded what our future might yet bring, after having survived the Łódź Ghetto and the time in Auschwitz. The sight that lay before our eyes was a vision of hell.

After quite a while some people—I don't know who they were—divided us into groups and told us to follow them. I don't even remember what the barracks we were allocated looked like. We were told to stay there until morning and that this place was called Bergen-Belsen. We were also told that due to the conditions, several different epidemics were raging.

Maybe the incredible cruelty of living in hell makes one forget most of what went on. Maybe this is a device for self-preservation in order to be able to continue to struggle. I don't know. I mention this because I do not remember much of the days I spent in Bergen-Belsen. Perhaps, after having lost more than half my body weight, my brain just refused to function. That could have been a blessing.

On waking each morning we faced the fact that someone else from our group was missing and knew they had either died or been struck down with some disease. After some weeks I woke up one morning and could not lift my head. I felt hot and also shivery. The people in the barrack with me noticed my condition and called to someone in charge who took my temperature, which was over forty degrees. I was transferred to a so-called hospital, put to lie on the straw-covered floor and covered with grey army blankets.

There were other people in that place who were there before me. Each one probably looked like I did, or worse.

Later I was told this was a hospital for typhoid sufferers. I did not even know what typhoid was. I just lay there with my high fever noticing only that some people were taken out in the morning and others arrived during the day.

In the middle of one night I woke up to feel a heavy weight upon my chest. I was barely able to open my eyes but saw that a tall woman was standing on me. My head was against the wall and the woman was speaking in Polish. It seemed she wanted to climb up the wall to see her baby boy. She was talking about him and her eyes were red. I could not help her, but in any case, there was no one who could help me. After a few attempts at walking up the wall, her bare feet on my face, the woman lost her balance and fell sideways on top of me, where she stayed until morning. When the people working in this hospital arrived they took a dead body with open eyes off me.

I was getting weaker by the day as the high fever of typhoid took its toll. In that makeshift hospital we had to lie on the floor with our knees bent to make room for the next row of sick people. So many had to be accommodated as more and more people became infected with typhoid. The woman in the row below me rested her head on my bent knees.

Then I was liberated.

In my hazy state I was not aware of much. I opened my eyes just once. Several weeks later something of what I saw then came rushing back to me. I recalled having seen people crawling all over the floor. That vision was on the day the British Red Cross liberated us from Bergen-Belsen—15 April 1945. It was a miracle that they found me there alive, though barely.

LESLIE MEISELS

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Leslie Meisels. Suddenly the Shadow Fell, Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 35–42. Used by permission.

When Germany invaded Hungary in March 1944, the full weight of the Holocaust descended on the Jews of that country. Leslie Meisels, having survived deportation to Auschwitz owing to a rail bridge on the route to the camp having been blown up by resistance fighters, was sent instead to a labor camp in Austria prior to being evacuated to Bergen-Belsen. Surviving that experience, he and his family were then sent on to Theresienstadt—though this train, too, never reached its destination. Leslie’s account here describes his experiences at Bergen-Belsen until his 18th birthday on February 20, 1945.

The Bergen-Belsen Camp was about half way between Hannover and Hamburg in north-western Germany. When we arrived at the gates of the camp in mid-afternoon, the weather was bitterly cold, rainy and snowy. I saw a long main street lined with pleasant bungalow-like buildings on one side—which turned out to be the guards’ quarters—then a kitchen complex, and farther down, a dark building with a tall chimney from which black smoke billowed. On the other side of the street were large blocks of barracks separated by barbed wire and in them I later saw hundreds and hundreds of emaciated, staggering and skeletal male and female inmates wearing striped uniforms made of thin fabric.

The guards led us into the right side of a building where we had to disrobe and shower. Then our clothing and belongings were given back to us and our group was taken to block 11, barracks F. Blocks were known by number, and the barracks within them, by letter. We soon found out that block 11 was a Sonderlager, which means special camp. We didn’t yet know exactly what that meant and why it was “special,” but we soon learned that the very fact that we remained together was unusual; in the other blocks, men and women weren’t kept together. It was also different that we were given back our own clothing—everybody in Bergen-Belsen was dressed in the striped Häftling (prisoner) uniform, with no overcoats or other warm clothing.

Back at the farm in Hollabrunn, my mother had told me to put my stamps, which I had brought from my album, into small envelopes, and she sewed them into the lining of my jacket. Those stamps survived with me inside my ragged jacket.

After liberation, we found out that our unusual situation was largely due to a single individual, Rezső (Rudolf) Kastner, a Hungarian Jew originally from Kolozvár (Cluj), Transylvania. Through his efforts, an unprecedented agreement was reached between some western Jewish organizations and high-ranking SS officers Adolf Eichmann and Kurt Becher. Using bribery, manipulation and cajolery, approximately 30,000 Hungarian Jews would be, as they referred to it, “put on ice”—taken to Austria for slave labour and exchanged, for money and other goods, to eventually end up in neutral Switzerland. Kastner, as a Hungarian Jew, was negotiating specifically on behalf of Hungarians and since the majority of Europe’s Jewry had already been slaughtered, only the Hungarian deportees fit the requirements. In the end, about 18,000 Hungarian Jews were actually brought to Austria.

A very interesting coincidence happened as my mother, grandmother, brothers and I entered the barracks: on a worn-out cabinet, I noticed a message that read, "Today Dec 4, 1944 they are taking me and my family away from here, we do not know where to. Avrom Jungreis rabbi of Szeged." This had special meaning to us because he was the eldest son of our beloved rabbi from our hometown who had blessed me in Strasshof. He was the same age as my father and had grown up with him, so we knew him and his family very well. My mother and grandmother and I often talked about it later, that we had been so close to seeing him in Bergen-Belsen.

Rabbi Avrom Jungreis and his family were among the nearly 1,700 people from that block who were exchanged on December 4, 1944. They were part of a different group of people whose release had been negotiated by Kastner and, having arrived in Bergen-Belsen off a train from Budapest in July, they had been waiting for the technicalities to be worked out so they could reach Switzerland. The Plan was that the next train—ours—would bring in a similar number of people to be put into the same block for a future exchange. The fact that we were among the Hungarian deportees who had been collected from various slave labour locations in Austria was another miracle for my immediate family and certainly resulted in our survival. As it turned out, though, the exchange of our group never took place, in part because of the advancement of the Allied forces and in part, I think, because of a breakdown in negotiations.

The barracks, which housed around 130 of us, was about ten by fifteen meters, with narrow triple-decked bunk beds pushed next to each other. The beds were seventy-five centimeters wide and were shared by two people. My mother, two brothers and I slept on the top, on the third level. My grandmother, being older and in poor health, got a single bed close to the entrance, where there were other single beds for people like her who couldn't climb up to the higher beds. There was no heat and the building, made of simple wooden walls, wasn't insulated; if we left a cup of water at the end of our bunk bed at night, in the morning we would find a block of ice.

In our Sonderlager, the biggest difference I noticed from other blocks was that we were not forced to work. Every single day, regardless of rain, snow or cold, we were ordered to stand for an Appell, a roll call, from about 10:00 a.m. to 2:00 p.m., lined up in columns of five to be counted.

Across the main street from our block was the kitchen complex for the entire concentration camp. SS guards on motorcycles or in cars patrolled the street and prisoners pushed and pulled wagons along it, either with supplies for the kitchen or dead bodies piled like stacked wood. We soon learned that to our left stood the crematorium, which constantly, day and night, belched out black, horrible-smelling smoke. It was the smell of burning flesh, from Jews and others—political prisoners or Gypsies (Roma) or other "non-desirable" human beings. Sometimes, looking through the barbed wire, we saw some of the emaciated men who were pulling or pushing the wagons collapse. When that happened, the man was stripped of his clothing, thrown on top of the wagon and taken to the crematorium whether or not he was dead.

Bergen-Belsen didn't have gas chambers, but we later heard that it was infamous for being one of the cruelest of all the concentration camps. Its inmates were annihilated in unprecedented numbers through starvation, illness, sadistic beatings, and by being worked to death. Inmates arrived continually but the population of the camps pretty much stayed the same because of all the deaths. When the crematorium couldn't consume all the dead bodies, they were piled up in a mountain near it.

Although those of us living in the Sonderlager were given more food than the other camp inmates, this still meant that in the morning we only received about half a litre of brown liquid—called coffee—that was at least lukewarm and helped a bit in the freezing cold. At noon we got some sort of soup that had some potato or beet skins floating in it, and in the evening, again, some coffee-coloured water. For every ten people, we were also given one loaf of bread that was ten by ten by twenty-five centimetres. We could tell that the bread was made from a combination of sawdust, wheat flour and cornmeal, but that was our main staple of the day. It became extraordinarily important to divide it in even slices because starvation was taking its toll even within our Sonderlager. We couldn't risk people wanting to kill each other because, in their desperation, they might think that someone else had gotten a bigger piece. So somebody fashioned a kind of a blade to cut the bread into equal pieces so that everybody would have a 100 × 100 × 25 millimeter slice.

Because I had been a cabinet maker's apprentice before we were deported and as such had learned to measure, cut and judge dimensions properly, I volunteered to cut the bread. That made me an important person in the barracks and the few morsels (they had to be very few) that remained on the table after the slicing were my reward. I knew that if I didn't do a proper job and someone felt that their piece was smaller, I could be lynched. Thankfully, everybody seemed satisfied and having this important job contributed to my survival.

In our block, life—if I could call it that while being imprisoned, stripped of my individuality and dignity—went on but the starvation diet made us all weaker by the day. We only endured because we had been given enough food during our slave labour on the farm and the strength and resilience that we had built up helped slow the devastating effects of hunger. The few pieces of dried fruit that my mother doled out to the five of us helped a little, too. With very sparing daily consumption, those dried fruits that we had brought with us lasted for a few months and contributed to the fact that, although we were skeletal when we eventually left the camp, we were still able to move.

It soon became evident just how different our Sonderlager was when we didn't experience the level of physical abuse we saw on the other side of the barbed wire dividers. The other prisoners were beaten regularly, without reason, just at the guards' whims. We saw them beaten with rifle butts and sticks, and we saw some of them being shot to death just for not being able to do the work they had been ordered to do.

We were also less restricted in our movements after the 10:00 p.m. curfew and were allowed to leave our barracks to go to the latrines. On a December night during Channukah in 1944, some young men in our block pretended to go to the latrines and instead came in our barracks near the window close to our bed bunks and entertained us by singing Chanukah and other Hebrew songs—"Maoz Tzur," "Hatikva" and "Tumbalalaika," with its repetitive refrain, as well as "Techezkna," with its lyrics in Hungarian. The latter song speaks about a time when all the chalutzim scattered all over the world will be in the land of the Jews and a Jewish flag will fly at the top of Jerusalem. The majority of us, me included, had never heard it before. Living amidst such hopelessness, hearing its uplifting, heartwarming and inspiring words were the most beautiful unforgettable experience. Even now, when I think about this moment, I get goosebumps.

Close to Christmas, the children from our block were ordered to go to the commandant's barracks, where they were given little pieces of chocolate or little bags of cookies that had come in packages from the International Red Cross. Again, we found out that the treats were only for our block. Children always welcome presents but in that moment it meant so much more—that they could go on living a little bit longer.

As the days went by, however, we grew more and more depressed by our surroundings. One day, during a roll call in late December, I noticed something crawling on the back of the person standing in front of me. When I asked the person next to me a whisper, "What is that?" he answered, "Oh, that's lice." We didn't have proper sanitary facilities, which made lice infestation unavoidable and lice brought typhus, a life-threatening disease that quickly became an epidemic. Soon, people either couldn't get up for roll call or fell while standing in it; they were taken away and never seen again. At my mother's urging, we spent a long time each day searching out the eggs and squashing them between our fingernails to decrease our chances of getting infested with lice; thankfully, we all managed to avoid the deadly typhus illness.

During those dreadful months, so much happened that I can only mention a few incidents. When there weren't any minor chores to do after roll call, we were usually allowed to roam around inside the block. Once, when I was standing by a barbed wire fence, I saw a group of inmates pushing a wagon filled with red beets toward the kitchen complex. I saw a few pieces fall off, either because a wheel rolled over a stone or an inmate "accidentally" shook it, and one rolled toward me. I grabbed it, hid it under my coat and took it to my mother.

Fortunately, none of the guards saw me do it. I was so starved that I hadn't thought about the times that I'd seen people get shot for that kind of thing; just seeing the beet rolling my way, I had to pick it up. A few bite-size pieces of that raw beet lasted a couple of days and was a critical additional food source for the five of us. Still, we so lacked vitamins that many of us, including me, were developing scurvy with its festering, open wounds. I still have scars on my legs relating to my experience with the disease.

On the night of my eighteenth birthday, February 20, 1945, I witnessed something extremely disturbing. Sometime after the 10:00 p.m. curfew we heard agonizing screams coming from outside our barracks. I went over to the window and defrosted a small hole with my breath so I could see the next block, which was about one metre away from the window. I saw a large group of inmates herded in there—already looking to be on the verge of collapse—being beaten with rifle butts and sticks with nails and other metal objects protruding from them. The scene that played out in front of me has forever remained in my mind and caused many nightmares. Just a few feet from my face, a man was savagely beaten by an SS guard using a stick with nails and as he fell down, the guard yelled at him to get up. When the man couldn't, he kept beating him until he died right there and then. We found out later that those men had been driven thousands of miles on foot from the forced labour camp in the copper mines of Bor, Yugoslavia during those winter months. I tell this horrific story to the students who visit the Toronto Holocaust Centre to illustrate the fact that such hatred-fueled incidents like this from my past should never become their future.

Yet, another incident with an SS guard was just the opposite; this guard looked like Popeye—he always had a pipe in his mouth and even his features were similar—and he came in every night at 10:00 p.m. to turn off the lights and order us into our bunks. Each time, he would barely step into the barracks before starting to yell, scream and curse at us but while doing this, he would hand out small chocolate bars to the children. Amidst all the inhumanity, there were individuals who still had human feelings and were capable of demonstrating it.

ARLETTE DEMONCEAU MICHAELIS

Context: Western Europe

Source: Arlette deMonceau Michaelis. Beyond the Ouija Board: A WWII Teenager in Occupied Belgium. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2005, pp. 40–46. Used by permission.

Arlette de Monceau Michaelis lived in Brussels, Belgium, during the Nazi occupation of that country from 1940 onwards. Although not Jewish, she and her family had a close relationship to Belgian and refugee Jews in Brussels, and sheltered many during the war years (resulting many years later in their being recognized by Israel's Yad Vashem as Righteous among the Nations). While covering a number of topics in the testimony that follows, an ongoing theme relates to the quest for an adequate supply of food during the Nazi occupation. It is an admirable glimpse into a theme discussed only fleetingly when others look at the refugee issue; how to provide adequate supplies for those being protected by those doing the sheltering.

One of the most important things for a teenager is FOOD. We were always at the receiving end of new and economical recipes. Everybody was skinny where I lived, and anybody that showed any increase in his or her girth or weight became immediately suspicious. We were dieting in unison. The question most often asked of thin Belgian women was, “Madame, what has happened to your opulent bosom?” To which she would answer: “The Germans went away with it.”

To men the comments were less delicate, more like “Your neck looks like a turkey’s.” A few months into the occupation we found out that there was a street in Brussels where you could find any kind of food you craved at extravagant prices. The street was the Rue des Radis, and there you could buy butter, coffee, potatoes, dried beans, white flour, all the things that made life precious now and yet were so ordinary in peacetime. I never went to the Rue de Radis although it was located close to my school. This was commercialism of the worst kind. Later on I found out that papa was buying “black market” butter for his own use, sneaking it into his office at the Savings Bank. It was his way to compensate for the vicissitudes of life and his way to rationalize his fall from grace—from civil engineer to mere bank clerk. This had been humiliating to him, but the butter he sneaked in and shared with me was his consolation. I never told my mother or my siblings about my discovery. Papa and I tacitly agreed to keep this our secret.

For our family, Rue des Radis was out of the question. We didn’t have the money to pay approximately $50.00 for a kilo of butter, but the people who could afford to pay those prices were not all collaborators or “Nazi friendly.” Many had money. Belgium was a rich country before the war yet there also was a class of citizens that had made a lot of money selling soap on the black market during the First World War and they were the force behind the black market operation at Rue des Radis. The “Soap Barons” of WWI were at it again.

We used to dream of white bread, but flour was not available. Some times we could buy wheat grain on the black market and bring it home and grind it by hand on a small grinding machine. That was my reluctant brother’s job. My father had fastened the hand-operated machine on a sturdy table and had placed the whole contraption in the garage. However, after seeing how hard it was for my brother to grind the wheat kernels and turn the crank by hand, papa decided to “go electric.” He fastened a motor to the grinding thing with straps and metal hinges and fan belts and it looked rather professional. Brother Guy was delighted until he turned the switch on. The motor was so powerful that it sent table, grinding machine, and precious wheat grain, all over, almost taking my brother into the maelstrom it had created. Since the machine was made of cast iron, which happened to be breakable, you can imagine what had happened; but not to worry, Papa went to its rescue. He patched it so well with metal straps, screws, bolts, that made it look like an armored tank. I will never forget that machine and the way it looked after papa fixed it. In my mind it became comparable to a mutilated, bandaged war veteran, hobbling on crutches needing our respect and getting it. However, the electrification had broken and now poor Guy had to turn the crank once again, pushing the kernels into the funnel with a screwdriver to make them go down more easily.

My sister and I sifted the roughly ground wheat kernels to make the precious flour, but we had to make sure that it wasn't sifted too finely. We had to make it as coarse as possible, no waste permitted, and the by-product was excellent. It was whole-wheat flour at its best not to be compared to the oat kernels we had tried before. It didn't happen often that we could buy wheat in the rough because it was very expensive. But the time had come for us to find some farmer who would sell us the surplus that the Nazis let them keep for their own use. My grandfather after searching his memory remembered some old buddy who had a farm and lived close to Brussels. However, the good people spoke Flemish only (Belgians living in Brussels spoke French and Flemish; however, many Belgians in the north spoke only Flemish and many in the south spoke only French). Since I didn't speak Flemish very well, the expedition to their farm was reserved mainly to my brother who dabbled in Flemish and my grandmother who spoke Flemish fairly well.

The farm was located in Meerbeek, a two-mile walk from the streetcar terminal in Ninove. Once there, we had to socialize a bit and then find out what extras the farmers had. They used to sell us butter, bacon, or potatoes depending on availability. I went there a few times though because one of the farm boys had a crush on me and had called a newborn calf "Arlette" in my honor. I tried to speak Flemish with him, but he was a shy young boy. The most painful thing was going back home with the provisions that weighed a lot and facing that long walk back to the streetcar stop.

The Germans eventually found out about the farmers' selling the surplus to the people and didn't like it. They used to stop the streetcars, inspect the packages, confiscate our food, and either fine us or send us to jail. Therefore, we had to conceal the food we brought back. We heard fabulous tales of a lady who had hung a slab of bacon between her legs, under a full skirt. Tales too of boys hiding butter under their caps. Oops, I borrowed that one from Tom Sawyer. Tales of potatoes being put in ladies' bloomers which had once again become fashionable, circulated.

We even heard of a man who went to get provisions armed with two suitcases and his German shepherd dog. He had bought a half pig and had put the meat in one suitcase keeping the other one empty. At the sight of a German patrol, he would sneak the dog into the empty suitcase and when the soldier would ask what he had in it, he would reply honestly,

"My dog," which of course the patrolmen would not believe. Then the police would renew his request and open the suitcase while looking at his prey with daggers in his eyes and then he would be totally surprised to be either licked or bitten by the confined dog. The patrolman never inquired about the content of the other suitcase being glad to be rid of the suspect.

My father once brought home a whole fresh ham, which my mother cooked. However, because it was huge we had to conserve it carefully. We hung it in the bathroom vent, a cool place—free of bugs, but not as cold as a refrigerator. It was fine until days later when it started moving. Maggots had taken residence near the bone but I think that Pelot scraped them out, rinsed it and ate the rest of the ham. Once again, Pelot to the rescue.

We also tried to grow our own veggies. Since our neighborhood was being planned and built, the sidewalks had not been completed. Space between the curb and the uncompleted sidewalk gave us the opportunity to grow something there. Moreover, Papa decided to cultivate the vacant lot next to our house. Not only How to Raise Chickens for Dummies hadn't been written yet, but also its comparison How to Grow Vegetables for Dummies hadn't been written either. So papa went to his favorite bookstore and bought the most complicated and convoluted guide on how to raise tomatoes, potatoes, onions, carrots, etc. that you could find. But we tilled the clay, sowed the seeds, planted the tomatoes and whatever we planted grew. Papa later sent me his book when I bought a house in the country and had plans to cultivate a garden.

The Belgians cultivate a lot of sugar beets, which becomes cattle fodder after the extraction of the sap, which in turn is used in making sugar. That crop also found its way to Germany, and sugar became heavily rationed although we were allotted a bigger ration during July and August, permitting us to make jelly and preserves for the winter. Our cravings for sugar, as well as our appetite for candy, had to be curbed because both were absolutely unavailable. However, papa found an article in some publication stating that if you were a beekeeper in good standing you were permitted to obtain twenty kilos of sugar as bee food. My father immediately applied for his ration of sugar, which was given him without even having a bee inspector check the states of the hives or their number.

Papa was raising phantom bees in phantom hives, and he was smiling with utter joy at his own cunning and licking his chops in anticipation of tasting sugar again. My mother didn't share his enthusiasm, wondering how he was going to get out of an eventual inspection by the bee people, unable to show the authorities that the bees were just a ploy to get sugar. Oh, but papa was ahead of her. He had been studying bees and bee diseases and was ready to tell the inspectors that the bees had a disease called Loque and not only had the bees had to be destroyed but the hives as well since the Loque was such a virulent affliction that it threatened the lives of all bees in the country. So papa was especially happy to have hoodwinked the enemy once again.

The task of getting the sugar fell on us girls, so Ginette and I gladly obliged since we were promised an extra ration. We walked the ten miles to the destination and were given the heaviest bags of sugar that we could carry. It was deadly hot that day and the ten kilos might have been one hundred pounds that we each had to carry. We finally made it home, and papa used a teaspoon of the famous sugar to put on his strawberries. After one bite he got up gagging, grabbing his throat with his hands and spat the whole thing into the kitchen sink.

This famous sugar was mixed with sand but that didn't deter papa from counter attacking the problem. He melted the sugar in water, hoping for the sand to sink to the bottom of the container so he could harvest the sweet water and eventually crystallize the sugar by evaporation. We found out to our chagrin that the water was turning pale purple and after a thorough analysis, we found out the sugar contained the chemical aniline and therefore was unfit for human consumption. Now we understood why the "bee people" had appeared to be so lax when we put in the application; they knew all along that we were going to be fooled into believing we were going to fool them. We had tried and it had not worked out, but papa was not defeated. What will come next, we wondered?

As soon as my brother came home from school he would rush to the kitchen and search the food locker for something to eat. But that was strictly forbidden and considered stealing since all our food was divided equally among the five of us. Nobody was entitled to eat more than his or her share. But Guy had developed the knack of talking with his mouth full; therefore, if my mother asked him a question without seeing him, he could answer her perfectly normally as if his mouth were empty. Yet my mother smelled a rat and sought to catch him the act of stealing using clever methods of detection, but it had to be done quickly in order not to arouse his suspicion. She finally found the right thing to do and commanded him abruptly, "Guy, whistle." That he could not do with food in his mouth, so he was caught eating OUR food. And from that day on the door between the dining room and the living room had to remain open when we came back from school.

Hunger was terrible to experience day after day. Sometimes the food we ate was of unknown origin. For example, we never knew what kind of flour was used in the bread we bought at the bakery. I believe that it was made from a variety of grains almost unfit for human consumption and we also knew that in order to cheat us the baker added an inordinate amount of water in the preparation of the bread, which increased its weight and made it hard to keep from spoiling. After two days the bread was moldy—my father swore it glowed in the dark, yet we never hesitated about eating it. Throwing out food was unthinkable.

We found out soon enough that the Great Reich needed coal and plenty of it. Therefore, we were unable to buy coal from our prewar supplier. Instead we had to burn wood, which became very expensive and hard to find. Furthermore, the wood we bought was sold by the ton or fraction thereof and the merchants used to deliver the logs soaking wet. After a few days the ton of wood had shrunk to half its size.

We were also unable to use our central heating system. The coal-burning furnace required too much wood; therefore, we had to use space stoves and hook them up to the fireplace. Then wood became scarce and we were forced to buy some kind of wet coal dust mixed with mud that when ignited smelled of rotten eggs. That pseudo coal was called schlam. Usually we were able to ignite it after a series of unsuccessful attempts. The warmth it radiated was minimal; the stoves were not big enough to heat our apartment, and our bedrooms had no heat at all. After having known a rather comfortable existence before the war, this cold was hard to bear.

As in every big city we had city gas, which became regulated by the enemy. It was given full strength two hours a day, between 7:00 AM and 8:00 AM and between 6:00 PM and 7:00 PM. In between there was not enough pressure to amount to anything; then after a short while the pressure died down altogether. The two hours per day rationing stayed the same for a few months until it was changed again. Then it became available every other day for one hour in the morning one day, and one hour at night the next.

We had a cooking stove in the kitchen that used wood, but it was hooked to a corner chimney which lacked the draft necessary for good combustion, but at least it was an alternative to gas cooking. And then papa once again had an idea that was worth a cool million. He discovered that if you placed an electric space heater on its back, took off the protective grill and put a different kind of resistance—the kind you found in an electric hot plate—replaced the grill, keeping the space heater on its back, you found yourself the proud owner of a great electric range more stable and stronger than a flimsy hot plate. With the help of my sister, he turned out a lot of these and sold them to the grateful Belgians.

Our German tenants had plenty of coal and they used it in their private furnace but that didn't help us. They soon found out that their furnace was hooked on to our bedroom radiators upstairs, and they had the pipes cut off immediately. It felt as though our last contact with our previous life of comfort had been ripped away from us.

MARGA MINCO

Context: Western Europe

Source: Marga Minco. "The Stars," Chapter 3. Bitter Herbs. A Little Chronicle. London: Oxford University Press, 1960, pp. 12–17. Translated by Roy Edwards. Originally published as Het bittere kruid. Een kleine kroniek. 1957. Used by permission of Marga Minco and Prometheus.

Anti-Jewish measures in the Netherlands were introduced progressively. As elsewhere, one of the ways in which the Nazis began the process of alienation of Jews from the wider population was through isolating them by marking them off visually. As of April 29, 1942, therefore, Jews were required to wear a yellow Star of David on their clothing. In this account, Dutch girl Marga Minco relates the impact this had on her home life, as family discussions ensued over how the star was to be affixed and worn—a very personal aspect of the Holocaust that at one time or another had to be faced by all Jews.

The Stars

From the window of my bedroom I saw my father approaching in the distance. I had been out of hospital for some weeks. I still had to rest for a couple of hours each day, but I was quite well again.

The road in which we lived was all I knew of Amersfoort as yet. It was in a quiet suburb of new semi-detached houses, set in gardens. My father was walking along with short, firm steps, and raised his hat with a flourish to a woman who was standing in her front garden picking flowers. She appeared to say something to him, for he checked his pace for a moment. When he was close to the house I saw that he was carrying a parcel in his hand. A small brown parcel.

I went downstairs, stuck my head around the door of the sitting room, and announced:

'Here comes Father, with a parcel.'

I went towards the front door. 'What is in it?' I asked.

'In what?' asked my father, placidly hanging up his hat and coat. He had put the parcel on top of the hallstand.

'What a question!' I said impatiently. 'In that parcel you've got there?'

'You'll see,' he said. 'Come.'

I followed him inside. He put it down on the table, while everyone looked curiously on. It was tied up with string, the knots in which he first patiently unpicked. Then he unfolded the brown paper.

It was the stars.

'I've brought several for each of us,' he said. 'Then you'll be able to sew them on all your coats.'

My mother took one from the parcel and examined it closely. 'I'll just see whether I've got any yellow silk in the house,' she said.

'They're orange,' I said. 'You'll have to use orange thread for them.'

'I think it would be better to take thread of the same colour as the coat you sew it on,' said Lottie, my brother Dave's wife.

'It'll look awful on a red jacket,' said Betty. She had come from Amsterdam to stay with us for a few days.

'I leave it to you,' my father said. 'But don't forget, they've got to be on the left side, at the height of your chest.'

'How do you know that?' asked my mother.

'It was in the newspaper, wasn't it?' said my father. 'Didn't you read it? They've got to be clearly visible.'

'What a lot you've brought,' said my mother, doling out two or three stars to each of us. 'Could you have as many as all that?'

'Oh yes,' said my father, 'as many as I liked.'

'It's certainly convenient,' she said. 'Now we can keep some in reserve for our summer clothes.'

We fetched our coats from the hallstand and got down to sewing stars on them. My sister Betty did it very carefully, with small, invisible stitches. 'You must hem them,' she said, when she saw how I was fixing the star on my coat with big, untidy stitches. 'That looks much neater.' 'I think they're awkward things to sew on,' I complained. 'How on earth can you get a hem round those beastly points?'

'You have to turn the hem in first,' said Betty. 'Then you tack the star on to your coat, sew it firmly in place, and pull the tacking-thread out; if you do that, it's bound to look alright.' I tried again. I wasn't so skillful with needle and thread as my sister. After all my efforts, the star was still crooked.

'Now you can't read what's on it,' I sighed. 'But I don't suppose that'll matter. They'll know all the same.'

'Look,' said Lotte, 'it fits exactly into one of the squares on my coat.' We looked at her coat, which she put on at once.

'Very nice,' my mother pronounced. 'You've done it very neatly.'

Betty threw her coat on too. Together they walked up and down the room.

'Good as the Queen's Birthday,' I said. 'Wait a moment and I'll put mine on as well.'

'Yours'll fall off in no time,' said Lottie.

'Oh no,' I said. 'It'll never come off.'

'What are you doing?' asked Dave. He had appeared in the doorway and was looking at us in surprise.

'We're sewing the stars on,' said Lottie.

'I'm looking for my overcoat. Has anybody seen it?' he asked.

'It's here,' said Lottie. 'It isn't ready yet.'

'I've got to go out,' said Dave. 'Can I still put it on as it is?'

'Today you can still put it on as it is,' my father said.

'Would you like to wait a minute while I fix it for you?' I offered. 'I'm very good at it.'

'No,' said Dave, 'if I can, I'd like to be ordinary, for today.'

When he opened the garden gate and walked down the road, the five of us gaped after him as if there was something very extraordinary about him.

JANET ZUCHTER MOSKOWITZ

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Janet Zuchter Moskowitz (edited by Maryann McLoughlin with Ida Margolis). The Miracle of Survival: Angels at My Back. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2007, pp. 44–47. Used by permission.

Janet (Jadzia) Moskowitz was born in the Polish city of Będzin, which was in the direct line of the Nazi advance in September 1939. In 1943 she and her family were deported to Auschwitz where, despite the odds, she managed to survive. Upon being sent to the women's concentration camp at Ravensbrück, Janet Zuchter Moskowitz was sent to Neustadt Gleve (Neustadt-Glewe), a subcamp of Ravensbrück where she became part of the slave labor force. This account is an excellent short report of the routine in the camp, but arguably more important is the lengthy personal reflection she provides in italics, in which she gives her thoughts on the concentration camp experience overall, and of its aftermath.

When we saw Ravensbrück, we thought, "This is the end." We said: "We came out from Auschwitz, but we will never come out of here!" Ravensbrück was large with a 25' high stone wall, with electrified barbed wire, enclosing the concentration camp. We went into the place and talked with the inmates there—mostly women. They said this camp was a tough, tough place. We had known the bad; now we knew the worst; Ravensbrück was the worst. . . .

We were also told about the terrible "medical" experiments they did at Ravensbrück. I saw a few girls who were not walking. I was told that SS doctors had done bone marrow experiments on them. . . .

When we were in Ravensbrück, we met girls from many concentration camps; some sent there on death marches as we were. We were put up in barracks that were cleaner than Auschwitz-Birkenau. We didn't talk too much together. Mostly we thought about the bread or water that we would be given. At Ravensbrück, in the morning, we also had the daily roll call. Then we sat and talked a little. We kept together with our group. We thought they would take us out to work. We talked together and decided that we wanted to be first on the list to go to work. We thought we should try to leave Ravensbrück because we were afraid of the medical experiments. We hoped that then maybe we would survive. This was March 1945.

While we were in Ravensbrück, we heard planes going over. The men, who had come to work on toilets or to take out bodies, sent notes to us and told us that the planes were American. A few weeks later the Germans asked us, "Who wants to work?" we raised our hands and registered our names. We wanted to leave this terrible place. Two hundred to two hundred and fifty women went by cattle cars to a town near Mecklenburg, Germany, to Neustadt Gleve, a sub-camp of Ravensbrück, where they were making Dornier airplane parts.

While I was waiting for them to send me to work, I stayed in a barrack with the other girls. We slept on the floor. However, we weren't beaten as much. Here there were no lice, and, therefore, there was not so much sickness. They brought in food for us to eat. Also several girls worked in the kitchen and brought us potatoes to eat.

A woman in the barrack, from Będzin, Jeme Oksenhändler (now Eisenstein) had only one arm that was amputated, in 1937, in a street car accident. Her mother and sister, Regina, always put Jeme between them during selections so that the Nazis would not see that she had only one arm. Jeme had been very lucky: she was not sent immediately to the gas chambers. Later the Nazis discovered that Jeme had a beautiful voice, so they allowed her to sing and gave her jobs that she could do, such as taking messages. . . .

Each day the stubendienst (room orderly) marched girls out from the barracks to the factory. One day when I was waiting to be taken to the factory after roll call, they counted us but only sent about a quarter of the girls to the factory. It seemed as if they didn't need as many workers as before.

One time they said they needed people to unload the bread. Two older girls and I went to unload the bread. While I was unloading the bread I stuffed some into my pockets to take to my friends. Then they took us and put us in a room, and finding the bread we had hidden, they started to beat us. I thought, How long will this continue? I started to scream and scream. They took me to the barrack and put compresses on me. I was swollen and bruised black and blue. I couldn't get up the next day. I couldn't walk for a couple of days.

My time in the concentration camps changed my feelings about people. I heard such terrible, terrible stories about people—and not just about the Nazis—and what they did to other people. My husband, who had been married before the Holocaust, had a fifteen-year-old daughter Adele, who was just starting high school. In Auschwitz his daughter and wife had rashes on their bodies. They had an ointment to heal these but someone stole the ointment, and then during a selection because of the sores, my husband's wife and daughter were selected for the gas chambers.

Another time I heard that one evening the SS brought in water hoses and sprayed a group of Polish men, leaving them outside all night. By next morning they were frozen to death. Another time when a transport arrived, the SS doctors were wearing white coats, part of their efforts at deception. The doctors measured and weighed the people on the transport and then stood them against a wall and shot them from the other side. Such ways to kill us!

We were sent to concentration camps from all over Europe. The train conductors took us to the gas chambers and were glad. The SS marched us to the gas chambers and were glad. They worked us to death in slave labor camps and were glad.

When we were liberated, we thought we would come out of the concentration camps, tell the world what had happened to us, and they would feel bad for us and welcome us back to the towns and homes we had been driven from. When we came out of the camps, nobody wanted to see us or hear us. The Poles hated us even more than the Germans. Not one Jew had been left in Będzin; Będzin was Judenfrei (free of Jews). I cannot picture Będzin without Jews. It was such a large Jewish community. Yet most of the non-Jewish Poles were glad the Jews were gone.

Town after town, in every corner of Europe. Even shtetls with only ten Jews—Judenfrei. Incredible! They found every Jew in every little town—even when fighting on two fronts. How? Why did people allow this to happen? Why, when we returned, did they murder us?

JANET ZUCHTER MOSKOWITZ

Context: Salvation

Source: Janet Zuchter Moskowitz (edited by Maryann McLoughlin with Ida Margolis). The Miracle of Survival: Angels at My Back. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2007, pp. 42–43. Used by permission.

In this short account of a death march on which she was sent when Auschwitz was being evacuated in January 1945, Janet Zuchter Moskowitz describes the cold, the fatigue, and the horror accompanying her every moment after leaving Auschwitz. Her ultimate destination, Ravensbrück, was only reached after the survivors of the death march were placed on cattle cars; as she relates, only about two hundred of those who left Auschwitz survived to reach their new destination.

In January 1945, as the Russian front advanced, the Germans were afraid that the Russians were coming too close to the death camp. They did not want the world to know about what was happening at Auschwitz. Therefore, on January 17, 1945, after roll call, they told us to get ready to leave Auschwitz. They took us out — no extra clothes, no food. Yet I did have a warm coat and shoes. The coat had a red cross painted down the back. The SS wanted to be sure we stood out from the townspeople. With the red mark, people knew who we were. Walking through the towns along the way, it would not be easy to escape.

We marched through snow that was 3' deep. Why didn't they just leave us in Auschwitz? We marched without food in deep snow. We were dragging ourselves. Thousands of people died on this march.

After weeks by foot, train, and cattle cars, most prisoners of the 58,000 on the death march were killed (shot by the SS if they fell behind) en route to Germany. However, back in Auschwitz-Birkenau, a few days after we left, the Russians arrived and liberated those left there. . . .

We were marched and taken by trains to Ravensbrück Concentration Camp, Germany, located 90 kilometers north of Berlin, near Fürstenberg. On our journey, we went through Rybnik, a town in southern Poland where many of our customers lived. I thought that maybe I should escape and find someone to hide me, but I didn't have the courage to do this. If I had been successful, I would have been saved; however, if I had been turned in to the Germans, I would have been shot. When we reached Germany, German civilians saw us. They looked really sad either because the war was almost lost or they regretted what the victims had experienced. We marched from morning until evening. Then they put us in barns, and we covered ourselves with straw. We debated hiding in the straw. In the morning they came with pitchforks and routed us—we were afraid they would shoot us. Very close friends stuck together. We ate ice and snow. I don't remember if they gave us any bread. We fed Mrs. Strubel the little bread we still had to keep her alive.

After a few days, they put us in cattle cars and we traveled two days to Ravensbrück. I think we were given bread on this train. The train stopped two or three times, so we ran down and got ice and snow to drink. In one place that we passed, people at the station tried to hand us food. But the German soldiers wouldn't let them. Not many prisoners from Auschwitz survived this death march—two hundred or so.

FILIP MÜLLER

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Filip Müller. Auschwitz Inferno: The Testimony of a Sonderkommando. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979, pp. 97–100. Used by permission of Routledge and Rowman & Littlefield.

Filip Müller was a Czech Jew from the city of Sered. In April 1942, at the age of twenty, Müller was deported to Auschwitz and became Prisoner Number 29236. Placed in a work group responsible for the construction and maintenance of the crematoria, Müller was destined to be one of the very few Sonderkommandos to survive Auschwitz. Although in subsequent years his story was told in piecemeal fashion, it was only in 1979 that a full account was published in English. In Auschwitz Inferno: The Testimony of a Sonderkommando (U.S. title, Eyewitness Auschwitz: Three Years in the Gas Chambers), Müller gave one of the most detailed accounts of how the gas chambers and crematoria operated, from one who was there as a witness-participant.

In the first Republic of Czechoslovakia Theresienstadt, now Terezin, remained a garrison town. But after the occupation of Bohemia and Moravia by the Germans, all inhabitants were compulsorily resettled, while the town which is surrounded by wide ramparts became a ghetto for Jews from Bohemia, Moravia, Germany, Austria, and later also from Holland. From the autumn of 1941 an increasing number of Jews were quartered in the depopulated residential districts as well as in the roomy barracks of Theresienstadt. They provided a reservoir for the places of extermination which had been established further east, and very few of them survived the Third Reich. The little fortress, on the other hand, was used as a prison for political prisoners.

In September 1943 a few thousand Jews were deported from Theresienstadt to Auschwitz and put in the camp without the usual selection on the ramp. To us older prisoners this seemed almost unbelievable. Still more unbelievable was the fact that behind the barbed wire of their camp the detainees did not wear prison garb but were allowed civilian clothes. They did not even have their hair shaved off. Compared to the rest of the camp inmates their physical and mental condition was relatively good.

Nobody could find a valid reason why it was these Jews from Theresienstadt had been spared the walk to the gas chamber, or why their living conditions were incomparably better than those of the other prisoners. They were made to do the work of building their own camp, but they were never used as forced labour. Every month they were allowed to write one post-card and receive one parcel from outside. Pregnant women were given small quantities of milk, butter and even white bread. Children under six went to a nursery school, while the older children were taught by Jewish teachers. In the Family Camp there existed an excellent orchestra among whose members were well-known artists, and which on occasions had to perform before the SS. There was even a hospital where noted university professors and doctors worked, and all this in a place where, not 100 metres away, a human life was worth nothing. It was, therefore, not surprising that these unusual conditions led us to assume that the Family Camp was under the special protection of the International Red Cross. However, the secret order which I had read that night showed me that this was not so. It was more likely that the Jews in the Family Camp were used to provide an alibi for the Nazis, to demonstrate to the world how well they treated the Jews in concentration camps, and that this was the reason why they had been given special status.

Voss was still sitting at the table, thoughtfully drumming the table top with his pencil and consulting his wrist-watch; then he began scribbling figures on a scrap of paper. After a while he turned to the Kapos and said: "To get the stiffs burnt by tomorrow morning is no problem. All you have to do is see that every other load consists of two men and one woman from the transport, together with a Mussulman and a child. For every other load use only good material from the transport, two men, one woman and a child. After every two loadings empty out the ashes to prevent the channels from getting blocked." Then he continued menacingly: "I hold you responsible for seeing to it that every twelve minutes the loads are stoked, and don't forget to switch on the fans. Today it's working flat out, understood?"

"Yes, Herr Oberscharführer," cried the two Kapos.

"And another thing," Voss snapped, "when you've finished, clean up everything, you know, hosing down, chlorinating, and all that sort of thing. And to finish up, lime-wash the walls! Everything clear? By 8 tomorrow morning everything's got to be shipshape! Off you go!"

About 500 dead bodies were still lying in heaps in the changing room. They must now be sorted according to their combustibility: for the corpses of the well-nourished were to help burn the emaciated. Under the direction of the Kapos, the bearers began sorting the dead into four stacks. The largest consisted mainly of strong men, the next in size of women, then came children, and lastly a stack of dead Muselmans, emaciated and nothing but skin and bones. This technique was called "express work," a designation thought up by the Kommandoführers and originating from experiments carried out in crematorium 5 in the autumn of 1943. The purpose of these experiments was to find a way of saving coke. On a few occasions groups of SS men and civilians visited the crematorium to watch the experiments. From conversations between Voss and Gorges we gathered that the civilians were technicians employed by the firm of Topf and Sons of Erfurt who had manufactured and installed the cremation ovens.

In the course of these experiments corpses were selected according to different criteria and then cremated. Thus the corpses of two Muselmans were cremated together with those of two children or the bodies of two well-nourished men together with that of an emaciated woman, each load consisting of three, or sometimes four, bodies. Members of these groups were especially interested in the amount of coke required to burn corpses of any particular category, and in the time it took to cremate them. During these macabre experiments different kinds of coke were used and the results carefully recorded.

Afterwards, all corpses were divided into the above-mentioned four categories, the criterion being the amount of coke required to reduce them to ashes. Thus it was decreed that the most economical and fuel-saving procedure would be to burn the bodies of a well-nourished man and an emaciated woman, or vice versa, together with that of a child, because, as the experiments had established, in this combination, once they had caught fire, the dead would continue to burn without any further coke being required.

As the number of people being gassed grew apace, the four crematoria in Birkenau, even though they were working round the clock with two shifts, could no longer cope with their workload. According to the makers' instructions the ovens required cooling down at regular intervals, repairs needed to be done and the channels leading to the chimneys to be cleaned out. These unavoidable interruptions resulted in the "quota" of no more than three corpses to each oven load being kept to only very rarely.

The decision as to whether it was to be "express" or "normal" work was taken by the Kommandoführers. If outsiders or perhaps even the Lagerkommandant arrived at the crematorium for an inspection we switched over to normal work immediately. On such occasions Voss and his Kommandoführers would put on a grand performance. They pretended to pay meticulous attention to the strict observing of instructions, bustling about in a show of efficiency, ordering us around, hustling us along and generally creating the impression that the smooth running of the crematorium was their sole purpose in life. And if a stoker dared to push his iron fork against the fire-brick lining, if the fans were not switched off in time, or if anything else unforeseen occurred there would be much shouting on the part of the SS. "Can't you watch what you're doing, you bloody Jewish bastard," they would yell. "Watch it, or you'll end up inside the oven too!" Once the visitors had gone "express work" continued at the usual pace, significantly raising the output of the ovens.

In crematorium 5 the most floor space was taken up by the changing room, about 300 square metres. With its exposed rafters it looked just like a spacious barn. The changing room was on the same level as the two gas chambers and the cremation room. As in the other crematoria its scanty furnishings consisted of two wooden benches, numbered clothes-hooks and signboards along the walls. However, there was in crematoria 4 and 5 one signboard whose inscription was actually correct. It was the one which referred to return “after the bath.” For in these two crematoria the changing rooms served also as mortuaries: after each gassing the corpses had to be dragged back there from the gas chamber. Nowhere were the omnipresence and inexorability of death more obvious than in this place. Because of our constant handling of the dead we seemed to forget they were corpses. We would talk to them as if they were still alive, and even though there was no reply it appeared to worry no one, for we supplied our own answers.

MIKLOS NYISZLI

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Miklos Nyiszli. Auschwitz: A Doctor's Eye-witness Account. London: Granada Publishing, 1978, pp. 88–93. Used by permission of Penguin Books Ltd. and Skyhorse Publishing.

Miklos Nyiszli was a Hungarian Jewish medical doctor who was ordered to work with the notorious SS Dr. Josef Mengele at Auschwitz. As such, he was a de facto member of the Auschwitz Sonderkommando, though not engaged in the hard physical work of forcing other Jews into the gas chambers and operating the crematoria. In this amazing account, he describes the bizarre circumstance of a young girl who survived a gassing—and the pandemonium this caused among the Sonderkommando members who had never before encountered such an unprecedented occurrence. No one was supposed to come out of the gas chamber alive; therefore, the question arose as to what should be her fate? With little other option, Nyiszli had to take action, and he describes here what form that took—and why.

In number one crematorium's gas chamber, 3,000 dead were piled up. The Sonderkommando had already begun to untangle the lattice of death. The noise of the elevators and the sound of their clanging doors reached my room. The work moved ahead double-time. The gas chambers had to be cleared, for the arrival of a new convoy had been announced.

The chief of the gas chamber commando almost tore the hinges off the door to my room as he arrived out of breath, his eyes wide with fear or surprise.

“Doctor,” he said, “come quickly. We just found a girl alive at the bottom of the pile of corpses.”

I grabbed my instruments case, which was always ready, and dashed to the gas chamber. Against the wall, near the entrance of the immense room, half covered with other bodies, I saw a girl in the throes of a death-rattle, her body seized with convulsions. The gas commando men around me were in a state of panic. Nothing like this had ever happened in the course of their horrible career.

We removed the still living body from the corpses pressing against it. I gathered the tiny adolescent body into my arms and carried it back into the room adjoining the gas chamber, where normally the gas commando men change clothes for work. I laid the body on a bench. A frail young girl, almost a child, she could have been no more than fifteen. I took out my syringe and, taking her arm—she had not yet recovered consciousness and was breathing with difficulty—I administered three intravenous injections. My companions covered her body which was as cold as ice with a heavy overcoat. One ran to the kitchen to fetch some tea and warm broth. Everybody wanted to help, as if she were his own child.

The reaction was swift. The child was seized by a fit of coughing, which brought up a thick globule of phlegm from her lungs. She opened her eyes and looked fixedly at the ceiling. I kept a close watch for every sign of life. Her breathing became deeper and more and more regular. Her lungs, tortured by the gas, inhaled the fresh air avidly. Her pulse became perceptible, the result of the injections. I waited impatiently. The injections had not yet been completely absorbed, but I saw that within a few minutes she was going to regain consciousness: her circulation began to bring color back into her cheeks, and her delicate face became human again.

She looked around her with astonishment, and glanced at us. She still did not realize what was happening to her, and was still incapable of distinguishing the present, of knowing whether she was dreaming or really awake. A veil of mist clouded her consciousness. Perhaps she vaguely remembered a train, a long line of box cars which had brought her here. Then she had lined up for selection and, before she knew what was happening, been swept along by the current of the mass into a large, brilliantly lighted underground room. Everything had happened so quickly. Perhaps she remembered that everyone had had to undress. The impression had been disagreeable, but everyone had yielded resignedly to the order. And so, naked, she had been swept along into another room. Mute anguish had seized them all. The second room had also been lighted by powerful lamps. Completely bewildered, she had let her gaze wander over the mass huddled there, but found none of her family. Pressed close against the wall, she had waited, her heart frozen, for what was going to happen. All of a sudden the lights had gone out, leaving her enveloped in total darkness. Something had stung her eyes, seized her throat, suffocated her. She had fainted. There her memories ceased.

Her movements were becoming more and more animated; she tried to move her hands, her feet, to turn her head left and right. Her face was seized by a fit of convulsions. Suddenly she grasped my coat collar and gripped it convulsively, trying with all her might to raise herself. I laid her back down again several times, but she continued to repeat the same gesture. Little by little, however, she grew calm and remained stretched out, completely exhausted. Large tears shone in her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. She was not crying. I received the first reply to my questions. Not wanting to tire her, I asked only a few. I learned that she was sixteen years old, and that she had come with her parents in a convoy from Transylvania.

The commando gave her a bowl of hot broth, which she drank voraciously. They kept bringing her all sorts of dishes, but I could not allow them to give her anything. I covered her to her head and told her that she should try and get some sleep.

My thoughts moved at a dizzy pace. I turned towards my companions in the hope of finding a solution. We racked our brains, for we were face to face with the most difficult problem: what to do with the girl now that she had been restored to life? We knew that she could not remain here for very long.

What could one do with a young girl in the crematorium's Sonderkommando? I knew the past history of the place: no one had ever come out of here alive, either from the convoys or from the Sonderkommando.

Little time remained for reflection. Oberschaarführer Mussfeld arrived to supervise the work, as was his wont. Passing by the open door, he saw us gathered in a group. He came in and asked us what was going on. Even before we told him he had seen the girl stretched out on the bench.

I made a sign for my companions to withdraw. I was going to attempt something I knew without saying was doomed to failure. Three months in the same camp and in the same milieu had created, in spite of everything, a certain intimacy between us. Besides, the Germans generally appreciated capable people, and, as long as they needed them, respected them to a certain extent, even in the KZ. Such was the case for cobblers, tailors, joiners and locksmiths. From our numerous contacts, I had been able to ascertain that Mussfeld had a high esteem for the medical expert's professional qualities. He knew that my superior was Dr. Mengele, the KZ's most dreaded figure, who, goaded by racial pride, took himself to be one of the most important representatives of German medical science. He considered the dispatch of thousands of Jews to the gas chambers as a patriotic duty. The work carried on in the dissecting room was for the furtherance of German medical science. As Dr. Mengele's pathological expert, I also had a hand in this progress, and therein lay the explanation for a certain form of respect that Mussfeld paid me. He often came to see me in the dissecting room, and we conversed on politics, the military situation and various other subjects. It appeared that his respect also arose from the fact that he considered the dissection of bodies and his bloody job of killing to be allied activities. He was the commandant and ace shot of number one crematorium. The three other SS acted as his lieutenants. Together they carried out the "liquidation" by a bullet in the back of the neck. This type of death was reserved for those who had been chosen in the camp, or else sent from another on their way to a so-called "rest camp." When there were merely 500 or less, they were killed by a bullet in the back of the neck, for the large factory of gas chambers was reserved for the annihilation of more important numbers. As much gas was needed to kill 500 as to kill 3,000.

Nor was it worthwhile to call out the Red Cross truck to bring the canisters and gas butchers for such a trifling number of victims. Nor was it worth the trouble of having a truck come to collect the clothes, which were scarcely more than rags anyway. Such were the factors which determined whether a group would die by gas or by a bullet in the back of the neck. And this was the man I had to deal with, the man I had to talk into allowing a single life to be spared. I calmly related the terrible case we found ourselves confronted with. I described for his benefit what pains the child must have suffered in the undressing room, and the horrible scenes that preceded death in the gas chamber. When the room had been plunged into darkness, she had breathed in a few lungfuls of cyclone gas. Only a few, though, for her fragile body had given way under the pushing and shoving of the mass as they fought against death. By chance she had fallen with her face against the wet concrete floor. That bit of humidity had kept her from being asphyxiated, for cyclon gas does not react under humid conditions.

These were my arguments, and I asked him to do something for the child. He listened to me attentively, then asked me exactly what I proposed doing. I saw by his expression that I had put him face to face with a practically impossible problem. It was obvious that the child could not remain in the crematorium. One solution would have been to put her in front of the crematorium gate. A kommando of women always worked here. She could have slipped in among them and accompanied them back to the camp barracks after they had finished work. She would never relate what had happened to her. The presence of one new face among so many thousands would never be detected, for no one in the camp knew all the other inmates.

If she had been three or four years older that might have worked. A girl of twenty would have been able to understand clearly the miraculous circumstances of her survival, and have enough foresight not to tell anyone about them. She would wait for better times, like so many other thousands were waiting, to recount what she had lived through. But Mussfeld thought that a young girl of sixteen would in all naïveté tell the first person she met where she had just come from, what she had seen and what she had lived through. The news would spread like wildfire, and we would all be forced to pay for it with our lives.

“There’s no way of getting round it,” he said, “the child will have to die.”

Half an hour later the young girl was led, or rather carried, into the furnace room hallway, and there Mussfeld sent another in his place to do the job. A bullet in the back of the neck.

LUBA OLENSKI

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Luba Olenski. A Life Reclaimed: A Child among the Partisans. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2006, pp. 63–67. Used by permission.

The challenges of staying ahead of the Nazis while on the run were many and, all too often, dangerous. In this account, a Polish Jewish woman, Luba Olenski, describes a little of her ordeal as she hid from the Germans by working her way through forests and streams toward an unknown destination where she hoped she would be safe. As she writes, she was on the run for five and a half weeks, during which time “my hopes began to fade of ever reaching the partisans”—her preferred destination.

I was later to learn that my decision to shelter at night and travel by day was by far the most dangerous one I could have made. The partisans did the exact opposite. Necessity dictated my chosen routine. Firstly, there were no streams, so the only place I could obtain water was at a well, usually situated at the edge of the forest, and because I wasn’t strong enough to wind the heavy bucket to the top for myself, I had to ask for help. Generally, when I approached people at the well, they would leave me some water in the bottom of the bucket. Most often, there was a mug hanging by a chain that I could use. Secondly, if I tried to creep through a village at night, the barking of the dogs would have aroused the entire village and brought the soltys [village head] to investigate the disturbance. It was also quite possible that, if people could not see who was snooping around, the dogs may have been let loose to attack me.

I soon had a routine of walking through the fields by day, approaching the workers in the fields during their midday break and begging for scraps, and as evening fell, begging for food and shelter at houses in the village. No one ever offered me shelter. I was warned off by being told to make myself scarce. If I had hung around, there were always some people in the village who would not hesitate to take me to the soltys. Despite my fears, I got used to settling myself for the night at the wooded edge of the fields. On a good night, I had a piece of black bread to eat with a slice of salted fat from under the skin on the pig’s back, called slonina, but I was not always that lucky.

As August rolled into September, the days grew shorter and the nights colder. I had no jacket and no experience of country life. A peasant woman took pity on me and advised me to burrow into a haystack to sleep. I was extremely tired and the haystack was warm and dry and I slept deeply until I was woken by a loud and completely unfamiliar noise close by. I imagined that wolves were attacking me in my hiding place, but the noise turned out to be nothing more than the mooing of two cows as they chomped from the haystack. I was so city bred and unused to animals that cows used to frighten me, and I made detours to avoid them. I slept in haystacks a few more times, enduring the rustling and sounds of fellow lodgers—field mice. I could not always find a haystack nearby when night was about to fall. In any case, I decided that I felt better sleeping in the safety of the forest, hidden by branches or bushes, than emerging from a haystack into an open field before I knew who was in the vicinity.

The forest also had its terrors. I always feared wolves, though I never saw one. On one occasion, I was lying under a tree and woke to bright moonlight. The white birch trunk reflected the light, and the bark it had shed looked to me like heaps of writhing worms. Everywhere I looked, they seemed to surround me. I fled in terror until I realized what they were. As each night approached, I was filled with dread. Loneliness and despair overwhelmed me before I found respite in sleep.

As scared as I was of entering the forest, the approach of morning brought no relief. Worry about eluding capture for another day, worry about whom I could trust and where I might find the next scrap of food overwhelmed me. But there was no option but to crawl out of the forest and start again. I soon became a familiar figure moving through the countryside. After a few weeks it seemed that everyone in the area knew me, or had heard about me. I remember the names of only a couple of the villages I passed through: Hodeszew and Szweridi.

At the end of the potato harvest, the women disappeared from the fields and I soon found that the male farm labourers, who were harvesting the wheat, were not as generous as the women. Only a few of the older men were prepared to leave their scraps for me. I did not change my habit of approaching the villages at nightfall when the farmhands had returned from the fields. I was never offered shelter and only sometimes given food on condition that I take it and hurry away before any of the neighbours realised that help had been given to a Jew. Those few decent people who were prepared to give me food were understandably themselves very frightened, because the penalty for harbouring a Jew was death.

Looking back, I wonder how I remained free for so many weeks—how nobody handed me over to the Germans, despite the threats. It would not have been at all hard to detain me, as they still had the four young men. I can only surmise that the skinny girl, still very much a child, was so obviously vulnerable and innocent, nobody could quite bring themselves to betray her. Perhaps not every soltys, who I feared as much as the Germans, would have wished to collaborate with the hated invader by turning me in. Whatever the reason, although terrified, starved and exposed to the elements, I remained uncaptured.

I'm sure there must have been those who hated Jews even more than the Germans or, as in all situations of war, were willing collaborators with the enemy for whatever they could gain. There must have been plenty of others happy to prey on anyone as helpless and vulnerable as I was. I was about to meet somebody just like that, just when my daily life, such as it was, was becoming routine.

One day I came across an isolated farmhouse compound, far from any village—a colonia in Polish. As I approached, the dogs first began to bark and then to chase me. I was very frightened and began to run away, but a woman came out, silenced the dogs and invited me in, saying, "Come on, you poor child." She took me into the barn, where a large number of pigs were penned, and told me I could stay in the loft providing I made no sound and remained completely hidden. She brought me food and told me that she would bring me more, once each day when she fed the pigs. The loft was warm and dry and there was soft hay to sleep in. After my meal of bread and potatoes, the most I had eaten in my wanderings, I fell into a long, deep sleep. I must have woken late the next morning. As the woman didn't bring me food on that first day, I noticed that there were dried pods stored in the loft and I tried eating the black seeds inside, and discovered that they actually tasted good. They were poppy seeds. All I could do to while away the time was to look out through the cracks between the weatherboards of the barn. The view I had was of bare and lonely fields. The barn seemed so much warmer and more secure than the bleak, chilly countryside.

After four days, I was feeling quite comfortable in this situation and began hoping I might be allowed to stay for an extended period, maybe even until the end of the war. On the fifth day, however, to my great disappointment the woman told me that the Germans were conducting house-to-house searches for runaway Jews and I would have to leave that very night for the sake of her safety and the safety of her child. I pleaded with her but to no avail. She took my clothes away stating that she needed them for her daughter, who was my size, and she replaced them with an old dress of her own, which was so ragged it was hardly a dress at all. She made me remove my shoes and handed me a pair of old, high-heeled shoes much too big for me and incongruous in the extreme. Needless to say, I had no option but to walk away barefoot and in flimsy rags much too large for me.

The loss of my shoes was a catastrophe. The soles of my feet were soft and the ground already cold. The daytime temperatures were continuing to fall, as winter approached. Worst of all, the grain harvests had almost been completed and the fields were covered in hard, unyielding stubble that easily pierced the tender skin of my feet and introduced infection. Nevertheless, I couldn't afford to stop. I was desperate to reach the sanctuary of the Bialawierza forest to find the partisans, although I had no idea how far it might be or even if I was heading in the right direction. I learned to carry a stick both as a protection to fend off dogs and as a support as I crossed rough ground with bare feet. . . .

My ordeal continued for five and a half weeks. I did not keep track of the days, although I always knew when it was a Saturday afternoon because the labourers used to tidy the fields in readiness for Sunday, when the fields were empty and I could hear the church bells. Having no regular food or water, and with painfully infected feet, my hopes began to fade of ever reaching the partisans.

FELIX OPATOWSKI

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Felix Opatowski. Gatehouse to Hell. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2015, pp. 85–92. Used by permission.

Originally a native of Łódź, Poland, Felix Opatowski was sent to Auschwitz at the age of 17, after having been caught by the Nazis smuggling goods out of the ghetto in exchange for food. While at Auschwitz, he became involved with the resistance movement. In the aftermath of the revolt of the XII Sonderkommando in October 1944, suspicion fell on Felix as having somehow been involved in the revolt from outside the crematoria. In his wrenching testimony reproduced here, he describes how he was tortured by the SS for information regarding the smuggling of explosives into the Sonderkommando, and his eventual fate in the face of his ordeal.

The Underground had been working with the Sonderkommando for a while to organize resistance. As I mentioned earlier, the Sonderkommando had to deal with the dead bodies of prisoners; when they were sent to work in the crematoria they too were already condemned to die—because of their work, what they witnessed, the Germans only kept them alive for a period of time. Because there was no shortage of Jews, they didn't have to keep the same ones. But they always needed a few experienced people to teach the new ones what to do, so they left a few men there who became kapos. Maybe later on they got rid of them. I don't know. In each crematorium I think there was one kapo in charge, with numerous Sonderkommando prisoners under him and maybe a few foremen.

There were four crematoria in Birkenau. Crematoria I and II had grounds close together, III and IV were on the same grounds and then there were ditches. By the end of the summer of 1944, the Sonderkommando at Crematorium III knew that they were soon going to be killed, and the Jewish kapo there, in collaboration with the Underground, formed a plot to blow up the facility. I don't know how or if the prisoners working in Crematorium III got in touch with the prisoners at the other crematoria to let them know that something was going to happen but from what I understand, plans were somehow being made for an uprising.

There had been a terrible selection of Jews in the camp at the end of September 1944. A lot of people went to the gas chambers and I really don't know how I was spared. We had to go in through one washroom, walk past Mengele, and the ones who weren't chosen had to go in to another washroom.

I was free to go back to my regular work with kapo Manfred and I remember working near the Gypsy barracks. By this time, the Gypsies had been murdered. Sometime in August, a transport from Lodz had arrived and those who didn't go to the gas chamber went to the Gypsy camp. I was always trying to get near there because I thought that maybe I could find somebody I knew from Lodz. I happened to also be there when the uprising started.

At the time, I didn't know about the planning of the uprising. I'll tell you what happened from what I know. I don't know if it's all true, mind you. I want you to know that this is what I heard from one of the Sonderkommando who took part in it and whom I met later. There are probably other versions of this story, but I have to tell you what I know and what I heard from the horse's mouth.

Sometime in March or April 1944 they began to be very busy at the crematoria and the ovens never stopped; they were working round the clock. The Hungarian Jews, the Jews from Lodz, the Jews from France and from Belgium were coming in massive transports, one after the other. In the summer following this increased activity, I started to have a strong feeling that something was up. After all, I was smuggling packages from Buna, so I guessed something was going to happen, but I didn't know what—I didn't know that there would be an uprising on October 7, 1944. As a matter of fact, it wasn't supposed to be October 7. That's part of the reason that the uprising didn't go off as planned.

All around Auschwitz was countryside with lots of trees and fields. The Polish Home Army had somehow arranged with the Auschwitz Underground that on a certain date they would be close to the camp and would need a signal so they could make a surprise attack on the SS guards. It was decided that the Underground should blow up one of the crematoria as the signal. When the crematorium blew up, the Home Army would cut the electric wires and enter the camp. The Underground, along with prisoners in the camp, would seize and kill the German guards.

By August 1944, there were about 135,000 inmates at Auschwitz, Birkenau and Buna-Monowitz. The majority were women, but there were those who, even in their weakened state, were ready to fight anybody and anything, especially Germans. An Auschwitz inmate was no longer just any ordinary inmate. Many of us were ready to go and kill Germans with our bare hands, even knowing we would be killed ourselves. Our hate was so powerful that we didn't even care if we were going to die. As a matter of fact, I remember that toward the end of the war, areas near Auschwitz were bombed once or twice and we were happy. Why didn't they bomb the crematoria and us together? We were begging for this.

The Underground knew that if they could get enough people like this going, they could form a small fighting force. There were also some soldiers in Auschwitz who could be helpful, too. On top of that, there were the factories, like Buna-Werke and I. G. Farben, and there were the hospitals—they thought they would be able to get everything they needed for a battle. But they needed a surprise attack to succeed.

The Germans, from what I heard later on, had dissolved most of the ghettos and were running out of Jews to bring into the camps. After all the activity of the spring, they didn't need the crematoria as much as they did before. Aside from this, although we didn't know it at the time, the Soviet army had already advanced into Poland. The German authorities at Auschwitz had received an order from Berlin to start shutting the camp down, starting with killing the inmates who knew the most, the Sonderkommando. When this became clear to the Sonderkommando, they knew they had to act quickly, or they would be killed before they had the chance to carry out their mission. Even though the timing was still being figured out, they knew what they were supposed to do with the supply of gunpowder. But they jumped the gun.

They knew that their time was short because the Germans had shot the Jewish kapo from Crematorium I and, soon after that, there was a big selection of Sonderkommando workers. The prisoners who saw this started to get panicky. On the day of the uprising, there was no communication with the rest of the Sonderkommando in the other crematoria. When the Germans next came for the Sonderkommando, some of them decided to put up a fight right away. The Germans began shooting and these men fought back. They grabbed whatever was at hand—sticks, bricks—and began shouting and fighting. The Germans called for more guards and the guards came with dogs and more guns.

I think it was maybe ten or eleven o'clock in the morning when I heard the explosion. We all looked up. A crematorium was exploding and burning. The Sonderkommando at Crematorium III must have set off their gunpowder, which started a fire. Crematorium III started burning. All this happened in a matter of half an hour to an hour.

From my vantage point near the Gypsy camp, it seemed to me that two of the crematoria were burning—I can still see it in my mind's eye—but I know now that only Crematorium III burned to the ground. I also know that because of this, transports temporarily stopped coming to Auschwitz.

The outbreak in the crematorium was premature because it turned out that the Polish Home Army wasn't yet ready to act. Some of the Sonderkommando from Crematoria III, however, still managed to cut the electric wire and escape. The rest were shot on the spot. In the end, the ones who escaped were also caught. From what I heard later, the Germans found them in a cabin about ten kilometres from Birkenau, surrounded it and attacked them with flamethrowers. Most of the Sonderkommando from Crematoria III were killed that day. But I was told by some of the Sonderkommando from Crematoria I who survived, and who I later got to know, that they caught one of the German kapos and threw him alive into the ovens. Either because of lack of communication or because the SS moved quickly to shut things down, the Sonderkommando in Crematoria II and IV didn't take part in the uprising at all.

Nothing happened to me at first. I finished my work and went back to the barracks. By then, everything was quiet. The only thing I saw were Germans, driving trucks that were bringing back the Sonderkommando who had escaped; they were dead. It was a shock for all of us. We hadn't known about the plans. It was apparently also a shock for the SS that in their pet camp, the pride and joy of the Third Reich, one of the crematoria could be blown up. Even more so, however, I can only imagine that it was a shock for the Nazi leadership in Berlin, especially Reichsführer Himmler.

It didn't take them long to figure out about the gunpowder. They realized that somebody must have smuggled it in. Who was going from the various camps and factories to Birkenau? The very first man the Gestapo arrested when they came into the D camp after the uprising was kapo Ziggy. There were others, but they knew of him and they took him first because he was a Jewish kapo. They asked him how many times he had brought the explosives into the camp. He said he didn't know anything. They told him to give them the names of all the men who worked with him.

The SS went around to the barracks with Ziggy, an officer keeping his rifle pointed at Ziggy's back. That showed us that kapo Ziggy was in trouble, but hardly anybody knew why. They were going from barracks to barracks because he said he didn't remember anyone's names, he only remembered faces. Little by little he pointed out a few hundred men to the SS, including me. I still wasn't sure what it was all about, but I had a hunch.

They took us to the main building of the Birkenau office. A high-ranking officer came out and talked to kapo Ziggy for a few minutes. Then he took out a revolver and shot him in front of us. We were stunned. They had shot kapo Ziggy and maybe they were going to shoot us too. But still, nobody knew why for sure, though I guessed by then that it was something to do with the burning crematorium. They announced that they were going to interrogate us.

After the SS shot Ziggy, they assembled all the men who had gone from Birkenau to Buna on work details—in all, they had rounded up a few hundred prisoners. Other kapos were also taken since Ziggy couldn't name all the names and the SS didn't want to miss anyone. They divided us into groups of five and took us to an SS barracks, a Schreibstube, for interrogation. Before even beginning the interrogation, two SS came in and started torturing us. They started beating me over the head, left and right. Soon my left eye was hanging out so that I had to take my hand and push it back in again. I can't see out of that eye anymore. Luckily it wasn't severed altogether, so my eye was saved, but there's no sight in it. I was bleeding from my eye, my nose and my body and then I passed out.

I was lucky. They left me at the Schreibstube while they sent the rest to Block 11 for interrogation. I was unconscious for maybe a day. It was night when I finally got up, but I really don't remember if it was the same night or the next night. I came to in a pool of blood and it wasn't just my blood. There were many other guys lying around. I don't know how many were living or dead. When the SS went around and kicked the bodies, they saw that I was still alive. They dragged me out with a group of about fifty people and they tortured us some more. Some of the men in the group died right away. Soon there was shooting all around me, and people were killed left and right.

Meanwhile, from where I was, I could hear the telephones ringing and the voices of the women operators yelling to the officers to take calls from the administration in Berlin. The officers didn't want to talk to the officials in Berlin, who wanted to know if they had caught the guilty parties and killed them. In fact, the officials didn't know who was who. They didn't know where to start.

An SS officer hauled me to a bench where there was a vice. He took one of my fingers, put it in the vice and asked me in German if I had been at Buna. "Buna?" I answered. I wasn't going to admit I was there. If he was asking me, that meant he wasn't sure. I just shrugged and got hit over the head. He kept asking me and hitting me. This went on and on, but I wouldn't say anything. I had been a veteran for too long. If I'd said, "Yes," I'd be dead already. If I didn't admit anything, then I might have a chance. By the fifth or sixth time I said nothing, he started tearing out my fingernails. I screamed and passed out. I'm lucky that I faint easily. I was plain unconscious.

The SS man revived me with a pail of water and when I came to he asked again, "Are you going to tell us? Where did you get explosives? Who was in charge? Who did you give it to?"

He grabbed another fingernail. I probably would have started talking but I fainted again. After a few fingernails he gave up. One nail is completely gone now. A few are partially gone. It's not easy to tear out fingernails and this guy was not an expert, just a plain, ordinary SS man. Some of the nails he tore out more, some he tore out less. But I was already in such pain that I resigned myself that either he was going to shoot me or he was going to take more fingernails so I just fainted.

After that ordeal was over I was left on the ground with a bunch of other guys. There was blood everywhere and nobody bothered us for a while. Two of the men near me had been shot and many others soon died from the torture. We were there for quite awhile, maybe a few days, with no food or water and nobody came in to talk to us for that time.

Imagine lying on a concrete floor, bleeding, in perpetual darkness. I didn't know if it was day or night. We were in a little room with small windows high up. There were several chairs, a bench and a table. There was an electric lamp hanging from the ceiling, which was only on when the SS came in, which they soon did again. At first, they interrogated prisoners one at a time, but later they took more of us together. I don't know if they planned it this way but it was definitely worse.

More than once, they tortured five or six inmates to death right in front of me. The only thing that was worse was hearing the screaming and crying from the hallways or the next room. It was clear that nobody could help us. I knew I was going to die and I only hoped it would be sooner rather than later. Even though I was not a big believer, I tried repeating prayers from memory to whatever God there was.

Finally it came to a point where they didn't get anything from us. My sense of time was vague but after what was probably a few days, they came in to take all of us out. They wanted to see who was able to walk. There were about fifteen or twenty of us who were able to get up after the torture.

From what I know, of the few hundred rounded up for interrogation and tortured, there were only two or three men who were runners for the Underground like I was. The rest of them were innocent people who just happened to go to work at Buna. The two Polish inmates who were my link to the Underground were also there. I only remember the name of one of them, Vlad. He was very good to me, trying his best to stop the bleeding and helping me later. When we got a little bit better physically, he worked closely with me because he knew me and wanted me to survive. He also gave me a lot of information. The other Pole died during the interrogation.

If this chapter of my story is confusing, believe me, it was hard for me to figure out and write about. Think about where I was and what happened to me in those few days. Every event of those days is like a nightmare, even today, especially at night. I still feel the pain, mentally and physically. Whenever I think about this part of my life, I start getting anxious. I hallucinate so that I imagine that I'm talking about somebody else and my wife has to bring me back to reality.

GISELLA PERL

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Gisella Perl. I Was a Doctor in Auschwitz. New York: International Universities Press, 1948, pp. 26–30.

Gisella Perl was a Jewish medical doctor specializing in women's health. From Sighet, Romania, in 1944 she was deported, along with most of Sighet's Jews, to Auschwitz. This account, taken from her 1948 memoir, relates her arrival in Auschwitz and the orientation she underwent along with the other women who had been selected to live from her transport. Upon learning that she was a German-speaker, a Nazi officer called upon her to translate on his behalf, leading to her attempting to calm those around her so that a panic would not break out—with the likely outcome that they would all be shot. As she relates, though, by that stage her own future was in doubt; having swallowed a copious amount of morphine, she entered the next phase of camp life in something of a stupor.

For eight days we travelled, day and night, toward an unknown goal. The police who accompanied us to the frontier spoke of a big, common Ghetto where we would be put to work. But when we saw, through the small opening of our sealed car, that the S.S. (Storm Troopers) took over our train at the frontier, we knew there was no hope for us. From then on we received no food, no water. The small children cried with hunger and cold, the old people moaned for help, some went insane, others gave life to their babies there on the dirty floor, some died and their bodies travelled with us. . . . Once in a while our jailer would enter the car in a renewed search for valuables, or only to beat us and silence plaintive voices with brutal threats.

Then we arrived. We strained our tired, weakened eyes to read the name of the station: AUSCHWITZ. When the S.S. guards unsealed the door of our car and ordered us to get out, I ran to my parents, embraced them and begged them to forgive me if I had ever caused them heartaches. "You were always the best child any parents could have," they comforted me. My sisters and brothers embraced me silently. My husband drew me close. "Take care of yourself . . ." he whispered, "take care of your warm, generous heart . . ." My son just looked at me with his big, blue eyes. "Mother . . ." they said. "Mother."

No one who came out alive of a German extermination camp can ever forget the picture that greeted us at Auschwitz. Like big, black clouds, the smoke of the crematory hung over the camp. Sharp red tongues of flame licked the sky, and the air was full of the nauseating smell of burning flesh. A detachment of S.S. men with guns, whips, and clubs in their hands attacked us, separating the men from their wives, parents from their children, the old from the young. Those who resisted or were too weak to move fast were beaten, kicked and dragged away. In a few minutes we were standing in separate groups, almost unconscious with pain, fear, exhaustion, and the unbearable shock of losing our beloved ones.

Now, with a handful of S.S. officers, the camp physician took over the direction of this infernal game. With a flick of his hand he sent some of us to the left, some to the right. It took some time before I understood what this meant. Of every trainload of prisoners, ten to twelve thousand at a time, he selected about three thousand inmates for his camp. The others, those who went "left," were taken to the crematory to die a horrible death in the constantly burning fire. They were loaded into Red Cross trucks, in a weird mockery of human decency, and carted away; and all we ever saw of them again were their clothes in the storeroom of the camp.

Later I learned all about this bestial procedure. They were taken into small wooden houses, undressed, given a towel and a piece of soap and told to stand under the shower. They were trembling with expectation, yearning for the drops of water which would cleanse their soiled, exhausted bodies after the long days of travelling, and which would quench the thirst of their dry, hot throats. But instead of water a heavy, choking gas came out of the jets. Within seven or eight minutes some of them were asphyxiated, others only became unconscious and were tossed into the flames alive. The screams, the gurgling, choking sounds coming out of those wooden houses will forever ring in my ears.

The children, little blond or dark-haired children from every part of Europe, did not go with their mothers into the gas-chambers. They were taken away, crying and screaming, with wild terror in their eyes, to be undressed, thrown into the waiting graves, drenched with some inflammable material and burned alive. Hundreds of thousands of little children, the beautiful and the plain ones, the rich and the poor, the well-mannered and the naughty, the healthy and the sick, blue-eyed Polish children, dark-haired little Hungarians, round-faced Dutch babies, solemn little French boys and girls, all died to satisfy the sadistic instincts of these perverts.

We, who by mere chance were sent to the “right,” formed a column and set out towards the camp. The roadside was littered with rotting corpses showing the fate of those who fell out of line. We arrived before a large wooden building and were told to enter.

But suddenly the columns disintegrated, the unbearable tension exploded and the terror, the pain, the sorrow, and the loneliness turned women into screaming, panicky, and hysterical creatures. They refused to enter the building which had the sign Disinfection painted on it in big letters. Bullets flew, whips cracked and clubs fell with a dull sound, leaving broken bones and open skulls in their wake—but the pandemonium would not subside.

“Where is a doctor?” yelled one of the S.S. men. I stepped forward. He stood me on a table and I was given the first order of my camp-life.

“Tell these animals to keep quiet or I’ll have them all shot!”

“Listen to me . . .” I called to them. “Do not be afraid! This is only a disinfection center, nothing will happen to you here. Afterwards we’ll be put to work, we’ll all remain together, friends, sisters in our common fate. I am your doctor . . . I’ll stay with you, always, to take care of you, to protect you . . . Please, calm down. . . .”

My words had their effect. The women believed me, they fell silent and entered the building, one after another. Under the supervision of S.S. men and women other prisoners carried out the program of disinfection. We were undressed there before the laughing S.S. guards who showed their appreciation of some of the beautiful bodies by slashing them with whips. Everything that could have reminded us of our past life was taken away from us.

I was beyond caring. After my encouraging speech to the hysterical women I had swallowed the forty centigrams of morphine which I had hidden in a small bottle. I felt an ironical superiority as I held out my head to the scissors and smiled under the cold shower. . . . My feet were winged by the effect of morphine as I entered the doors of Auschwitz, certain that I was going to the supreme happiness of oblivion.

MARGUERITE ÉLIAS QUDDUS

Context: Western Europe

Source: Marguerite Élias Quddus. In Hiding. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2013, pp. 25–33. Used by permission.

The testimony presented here, from Marguerite Élias Quddus, is a highly evocative account of the arrest of her father, taken from the family home by French police. The collaborationist French gendarmerie, which carried out the orders of the government in Vichy, were those most frequently associated with roundups and deportations to Auschwitz. In the aftermath of her father’s arrest, Marguerite’s mother realizes that the only option is to flee and find refuge somewhere out of the Nazi (and Vichy) orbit. As Marguerite’s testimony shows, there were some good people who tried to help, despite the odds against them—but that doing so carried enormous risks.

I’m suddenly awakened by loud banging. My heart is pounding. The sound is coming from the back door. It’s hardly daylight. I hear Papa ask, “Who’s there?”

“Police! Open up! It’s the police!”

I’m trembling, hiding behind the curtains. Their feet come thundering up the stairs. They come into the room. I hear a lot of voices talking at once and I make out my father’s voice, arguing with them. The officers look mean.

“Why am I being arrested? On what grounds? And by what right? My papers are in order.”

The dog barks and Mama picks her up.

“We’ve been ordered to take you in. Bring the bare necessities and come with us.”

“Take me where?” Papa’s not letting them push him around.

“Get dressed. Hurry up!”

“It’s a mistake!” Papa says. Angry.

I’m terrified. Mama puts her hands to her head and mutters, “Oy vey iz mir . . . Oy vey iz mir. . . .” over and over. Papa is tight-lipped. He says softly, “It’s a mistake, there must be a mistake.”

“But you’re Jewish, aren’t you? There’s no mistake.”

“But I’ve never made a secret of it! I’ve declared it, as the government required. I can prove it, I have all the papers.”

They prevent him from moving. “Hey! Don’t touch anything.”

“I need to get my papers,” Papa forces his way past them. “Look here. See! ‘Voluntary recruit for the duration of the war.’ And here’s the declaration I spoke of, and my income tax. You can see everything’s in order.”

The officer interrupts, “You’re still a Jew. That’s enough. As for the rest, you’ll explain it at the police station. It doesn’t concern us.” Papa starts to go around the room, gathering his clothes.

“Where are you going? Stay here.” They follow him. My father replies, “Look, let’s be reasonable in front of my family. You know I’m no criminal. I’m a businessman. I have clients. Everyone in the neighbourhood knows me. This doesn’t make sense. . . .”

“That’s enough! Hurry up or else we’ll take you in like this.”

Papa answers, “Would you at least have the decency to let me get dressed in private.”

“Hurry up, then, instead of standing around talking. This is no time for discussion! Do what you’re told instead of creating trouble.”

If only I could scream “Papa is not a troublemaker!” He starts to dress quickly, frowning. Mama has put on her robe and her stockings. Her eyes are wild and I’m frightened. She turns away. With all that’s happening, I don’t think she sees my sister and me.

I do not feel sleepy anymore. I’m barefoot and shivering. My feet suddenly feel warm. . . . Oh, no! My sister has peed on the floor. I hold my breath but I feel like shouting.

Papa already has his trousers, shirt and jacket on. He quickly ties the knot of his tie. The officers are watching my parents out of the corners of their eyes. I’m shaking like a leaf. I’m so miserable! Papa ties his shoes and stands up. Adjusting his jacket, he says, “I just need to have a quick wash, if you don’t mind.”

“Certainly not. Who do you think you are?” They prevent him from going.

“I need to get my razor. LET ME PASS!”

“Don’t make trouble!” shouts the meanest one.

The three of them laugh. Papa takes advantage of the opportunity to open a drawer. One of them grabs his hand. “Okay, that’s enough, Éliash. We have others to pick up.” Papa pretends he doesn’t hear. “Rachel, remember what I’m telling you: the children’s certificates of French citizenship are in there. Call Madame Graziani if you need to. Don’t worry about me. I won’t let the officials push me around.” My mother is still wailing, which infuriates me. Papa changes his tone and pleads with them, “Give me a minute with my wife, please.”

“Would you like us to play the violin as well?” says an officer with a smirk.

“There’s no time,” bellows the third one, already at the door. “We have to get going. He’d take advantage of it to run away. They’re sneaky!”

I don’t dare move. My legs are numb. You’ll be punished. If only Papa had his gun. He’s speaking Yiddish now. I don’t understand what he’s saying. I don’t care because the policemen don’t either. “Enough of that babbling. We’re in France here! Get a move on!” shouts an officer, pushing him toward the door. The dog leaps up and bites the lout. The other one gives the dog a kick in the ribs, yelling, “Filthy beast. Down!” Poor Choukette!

Mama croons her “Oy vey iz mir . . . Oy vey iz mir.” What does it mean? “Calm down, Rokheleh! Don’t get upset,” says Papa. With one shove, they push him out onto the landing. “Let me give my children a kiss!” he demands. My knees are shaking. “They can follow you to number 97, that’s where we’re meeting.”

I know that number, it’s Nicholas’ house. Papa puts his hat on askew and the collar of his overcoat is turned under. Mama hands him a small suitcase. “Here are a few clothes,” she says, sounding distressed. They rush down the stairs. I watch them from the top of the stairs, stunned, and then I follow Mama to the kitchen window like a sleepwalker. Papa tries to go into the toilet in the courtyard, but they don’t let him. They grab him by the arm and drag him like a convict. The concierge finds it funny, watching from her window. She infuriates me.

“See you soon,” calls Papa, looking back. My father knows what he’s talking about. She’ll see, he’ll come back! The officers and Papa are walking so fast that by the time we get to the window facing the street, they’re already far away. “He didn’t even shave and he had nothing to eat,” says Mama, upset. Seeing my sister and me, she changes her tone. “Get dressed, girls. We’ll go with him!”

I’ve never gotten dressed so fast in my life. Mama has made herself pretty. She’s holding a parcel in case Papa needs it. She goes out with Henriette without closing the door. Then she comes back and gets me. She walks very fast and Henriette follows us. When we get outside, they’re still there. Phew! We’re going to see Papa again! We’re wearing our slippers. He's talking with Dr. David, Dr. Weisman the dentist, Monsieur Salonès and some other people.

"Moisheleh . . . Moisheleh!" Mama calls. He turns around. He's seen us. I'm so excited! He takes a big step forward. "Stop! Don't move!" says a nasty man.

The three of us walk toward him. With one leap, my sister and I are in his arms. He holds me so tightly I can hardly breathe but I don't get angry. I cling to his body and look hungrily at his face. I won't let him go without me. I kiss him in spite of the bristles of his beard. He looks into my eyes. I'll never let go of him.

What's this racket? A car has just pulled up and the policemen are pointing their guns. "My dear little girls, Henriette and Marguerite, we have to part now. But it won't be for long. Be good with Mama, don't give her any trouble. Promise?" We nod in agreement.

Someone opens the beautiful gate to the courtyard and they start lining the men up. Papa bends down, releases us from his embrace and sets us both on the ground. I refuse to let go of him. "Come on, children, it's Mama's turn now." I hold on even tighter to him. I'm the youngest, after all.

"You have to let me go. I need to talk to her." He gives me a gentle push. My mother is crying and he comforts her instead of me. In my distress, I'm jealous. He takes her tenderly in his arms. "Calm down, Rokheleh, calm down, please!" They whisper things into each other's ears.

"We've got everybody. It's time to go, ladies and gentlemen!" The officers call out the names, one by one, and roughly separate the women from the men. "David. Éliash. Solanès. Weisman." The men are packed like sardines into the khaki Citroën. Papa leans out and shouts, "Courage, Rachel! Courage, children! I'll see you soon!" I'm so miserable. Mama murmurs under her breath, "Courage, Moishinkeh, courage."

I have a stomachache. I have to go home. The cars pull quickly away. We wave to the one Papa is in as it disappears in the distance. The sun is rising and with it, my hatred. My heart is so heavy. . . .

Later that day, after Papa's arrest, Madame Dupont, a client of my parents, takes Henriette and me to her house. We turn at the corner at the Salvation Army Women's shelter and we walk and walk and walk, very fast! I don't even have time to look at what we are passing so that I can remember the way. I pray that we stop soon.

"Number 23!" exclaims Henriette. "Shhh!" says the lady, adding, "Someone might recognize you. That's why I didn't take your mother. We have to take precautions and be very careful because of the arrests." We go up to the third floor and we have something to eat with the lady and her husband. Before we go to bed, she tells us, "You're going to sleep in trunks. If someone comes to the door, I'll close the lids and push them under our bed. Do you understand? Because if the police find you, they will take you away. Okay? Goodnight, children."

She goes back to her husband, who's already snoring. Soon, she's snoring too. It would be better if Mama were here. I can't sleep. I stretch and get up and my sister and I tiptoe to the window. It's dark out but we can see the blue sign of the municipal showers almost right across the street. "There! Do you see that? We're on rue Jules-Vallès, near home. Rue de Charonne is at the end," whispers Henriette. "If they're not nice to us, we'll run away without telling anyone." I change positions ten times before managing to fall asleep.

The next day, we try to leave, but the people grab us by our coat collars and stop us. They scold us, saying, "Honestly, children!" It's dangerous now and we have to be patient and wait. We spend three days playing with their cats before we can finally return home. . . .

Mama found a place for us with a kind lady in the country. I eat well and drink as much milk as I want, and the cat lets you pet it. We take turns on the swing under the tree in the yard. The lady never gets angry. When she has a minute she talks to us. Mademoiselle Aubertin, our violin teacher, came this morning with a parcel full of our clothes from Mama.

The weather is getting cold. The lady writes to Mama to ask for warmer clothes for us. But it's the concierge who answers:

Dear Madame,

Did you know that you do not have the right to keep Jewish children in your home? It is against the law. If you do not return them immediately, I will be forced to report you to the police. It is up to you not to be complicit. . . .

Madame Decuinière.

"What should I do?" the lady asks, wiping away tears. She reads the letter. "I could be convicted because you're in my house! I really don't have a choice." She gets her bicycle out. With Henriette's help, she puts our clothes in the suitcase, which she attaches to the baggage carrier on the back. She picks up everything that belongs to us, making sure not to forget anything. She puts it all in a cardboard box, which she places on the handlebars. Wearing our raincoats, we climb on. It's uncomfortable. "I can't do any better," she says, sitting in the middle. The weather is bad and she pedals hard in the wind and the rain and the darkness, oblivious to the late hour.

It's fine with me. I'm not afraid anymore. I'm going back to Mama. We don't meet a single person on the road the whole way. My hands are wet through my gloves and my feet are soaked to the bone.

We get to Paris at sunrise. I'm delighted to get back. "We'll soon be at your house!" says the woman, out of breath. I can't wait to get there. I can hardly keep my eyes open. We stop. Here we are! The concierge is not at her window. Good! Everyone is sleeping. We knock on the door and in seconds my mother is there, taking me, dripping, into her arms. Oh, I'm so happy. The woman doesn't come up. She inflates her tires with the pump and heads off down the street.

That's the last I ever see of her.

IZZY RANDEL

Context: Salvation

Source: Izzy Randel and Maryann McLoughlin. From Black Dust to Diamonds: A Memoir of the Holocaust in Dąbrowa Górnicza. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2010, pp. 24–27. Used by permission.

Klettendorf was a small forced labor camp in Poland where, as in many other places, private companies exploited Jewish slave labor. Izzy Randel, a young boy from Dąbrowa Górnicza, was a prisoner there until the camp was closed and he was evacuated in the face of the advancing Soviets in 1944 and sent to another labor camp at Bunzlau. He describes the harshness of conditions there, which became more intense with the onset of winter and a German sense of impending defeat. On February 8, 1945, it was Bunzlau's turn to be evacuated. Prior to a death march, arrangements were made to count the prisoners once more before setting out. By the time the Russians arrived the camp had been evacuated, but those few who had hidden, such as Izzy, were able to greet the first Soviet soldier who came into the otherwise empty camp soon after. Although they were now liberated, however, they were far from safe; the advice they received from a Soviet officer was to leave the area as soon as possible.

I was deported by train from Dąbrowa Górnicza. That train whistle was always in my ears—for me a scary sound. The train stopped in a few labor camps along the way. However, those didn't need workers, so they sent us on. I was with Josek Lenczner, his father and two brothers from Dąbrowa Górnicza. We stopped finally in Klettendorf (Klecina, Poland), which was twenty to thirty kilometers from the German-Polish border.

Founded in August 1940, Klettendorf forced labor camp existed until the end of 1943. German companies used Jewish slave labor to work for them. . . .

After arrival and being processed, I was assigned work at a rail yard. Unlike many other camps, we still dressed in civilian clothing; we didn't have camp uniforms. I had to load and unload railroad tracks from freight trains. These steel rails were asymmetrical I-beams, 39 feet long (11.89 meters). A group of seventeen people, including me, carried one long railroad track. The railroad tracks were extremely heavy, weighing 480 to 720 pounds; therefore, even with the pillow I put on my shoulder as a buffer, my shoulder was bruised, hurting every day. Another of my jobs was sorting very long railroad tracks. They kept moving my group around so that we would keep working.

In 1942, I could still receive one package a month in Klettendorf. One day I received a piece of bread and when I began to chew on it, I discovered a letter inside the bread. A Polish man, who had worked a little for my father, mailed this package of bread and a letter, which Erna had prepared. In the letter Erna told me that my father, sister Sara, and brother, Motek, were very concerned about me. The good news was that they were still at Dąbrowa Górnicza. They were, however, very concerned about my health. I wrote them a long letter, telling them not to worry about me. I didn't ask more about them. I just wanted them to know that I was still alive.

I remembered the address of the Polish man who had mailed the package, but I had no stamp. I had to have someone mail the letter to the Pole; I wanted to contact my family to tell them that I was alive because their letter had brought me consolation and I wanted the same for them. I didn't know who to ask, but suddenly I had an intuition: I went to the worst SS officer; he was always angry, known as a killer. I watched him for a couple of days as he walked through the building where I was working. Then I took a risk, stopping him and giving him the letter, begging him, "German, please send this away for me."

He looked at me. He said not one word. He put the letter in his pocket and walked on. I turned and quickly walked away. He did mail the letter. I know he did because I received an answer to my letter. I received a package with bread and inside was another letter. This was the last package I received from home.

In the meantime, I began learning a trade, sewing. They had asked, “Who knows upholstery?” I told them that I did; I knew a little from working with my father. They sent us to a factory that made canvas covers. Every day we walked to the train station, then took a train, and walked to the factory at the military camp; then we reversed this returning to the barracks. At the factory I sewed canvas covers for military trucks. I sewed on a big sewing machine that I pedaled—the factory had no electric machines. Everything was okay. Life went on for a while at Klettendorf. I felt secure at the thought that my family was surviving at Dąbrowa Górnicza. . . .

Of my family, only Erna was left in Dąbrowa Górnicza. During the selection, she had hidden to save herself. From August 1943 to January 1944, she was in hiding; otherwise, she would have been deported as the rest were. But in January 1944, she, too, was caught and deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

By 1944, Dąbrowa was Judenrein—without Jews. . . .

In 1944, the Nazis dissolved Klettendorf labor camp because the Soviets were advancing nearer and nearer. Jozek Lenczner, my friend from Dąbrowa Górnicza was deported to a different camp. I was transported by train to Bunzlau (Pl: Bolesławiec) about thirty kilometers west of Breslau (Wrocław).

At Bunzlau Concentration Camp, a former Arbeitslager (work camp), where conditions were especially harsh, we wore blue and white concentration camp uniforms. We wore a number, which we had sewn on the left side of the uniform jacket. We no longer had names or identities; instead, we were numbers. (I don’t remember mine.)

In addition to hunger and disease, the winters in Germany and Poland were terrible, extremely cold. My uniform was light weight, so in winter I put paper inside my clothing. I found paper in their trash cans, whatever paper I could find, and lined my clothing with it. I didn’t use newspaper; newspapers were like gold because they could give us a clue about how the war was going. Taking paper, even paper in the trash, was forbidden. I did it anyway because I knew I could die from hypothermia otherwise.

We frequently had our hair cut in Bunzlau—with hand clippers, in addition, they shaved our heads with straight-edge razors, one inch wide down the middle, so if we escaped, we would immediately be recognized as inmates of the concentration camp.

I hoped I would find friends from my hometown in Bunzlau, and I did find one, Herschel Rizman (who passed away in 2005 in Canada!). He was a landsman, a person from my place of origin—thus our relationship was very close, almost like family. One could depend on a landsman more than strangers.

To supervise us, the Germans had brought in Polish Kapos who wore red triangles, the badge for criminal activities such as murder or for political reasons. They cooperated with the Germans and received more food. These Kapos told us, “You won’t last long here.”

One of the Kapos was especially brutal. A German Kapo, probably a killer, had lost his hand and arm up to his elbow. He could still beat us: he hit us with his elbow; he was quite proficient and powerful at this. I was told that a person should fall down when he was hit and he would have a chance of living, or if he didn’t fall down immediately, the Kapo would continue hitting him until he either died or fell down. This Kapo hit me for trying to take a potato from a truck. I was hit, fell down immediately, and he stopped. So I was safe.

Our work at Bunzlau was constructing barrack walls, floors, and roofs for soldiers. Trees came in by train and were unloaded and taken to the mill, where they were cut into boards. They gave us the boards into which we hammered nails to make 8 × 6 sections, for walls, a kind of prefabrication. Others constructed floors and foundations for pre-fab factories, where military equipment would be repaired, and for barracks, where soldiers would sleep.

I worked at this hard physical labor, and I was starving, malnourished. There was little to eat. We were given soup once a day and bread, very little, every three days. Some ate all their bread immediately. I could control myself and make the bread last. Some would exchange their bread for cigarettes; therefore, they lost the nourishment they could have gotten from the bread.

There were selections at Bunzlau, too. Every month there were two or three selections. I remember one Russian Jew who was praying for a piece of bread with some water; he wanted to have enough to eat once before he died. He died the next day—probably without the bread and water. At first, I thought the sick were taken away, so they would be treated and become well again. Then I realized that the sick never came back. They were sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration Camp and were murdered. We were close to Auschwitz-Birkenau, but, at that time, I never knew the camp was there or what was going on.

A half-year before liberation I was sick with typhus. In fact, about half the people in the camp had typhus. I had just gotten over the worst when we heard there was going to be another selection. A Jewish male nurse from Sosnowiec told me and the others that he realized that we had typhus and were still weak; nonetheless, he told us that we must try to get work because if we stayed sick in the barracks, we would be selected. He told us, "Try to get up and go to work. You can die here after being selected, or you can die on the job. But you may live if you go to work and are not selected." He also advised us to eat first and to drink after we ate, but not together. He said we would get more nutrition that way.

All during those years we didn't hear any shots or airplanes. It was as if the world had died completely or that everybody had forgotten about us. Sometimes I found a German newspaper and read it; perhaps about ten times in all those years. I saw nothing about the Allies. Later I found out that the German army did not always tell their citizens if they had lost a battle, for example, the Battle of Stalingrad. . . . So I guess it is not surprising that I didn't read anything about the Allies in the newspapers that I found.

Then, Saturday, February 8, 1945, the Germans announced that we were moving out from Bunzlau.

They said, "Whatever we have in storage we are giving out. Everything will be given out. You don't need your uniform or your shoes or anything. We will give you others better than what you have."

They gave me wooden shoes to march in.

Shocked, I said, "Wooden shoes!"

I was in the children's barracks with the younger ones, those who were at least thirteen years old but capable of working. My friend, Herschel Rizman, was in another barracks; he was a little older.

We were talking. I asked him, "Will there be a selection?"

He didn't know.

I said to Herschel, "Let's stick together. We'll find each other and march together."

He agreed and went to his barracks to avoid our marching orders.

Then I realized that I could not possibly walk in those wooden shoes. Snow would stick to the wood, weighing my feet down, so I would not be able to walk. And my feet would freeze. I would be dead before long. I decided to hide. I looked for my friend to tell him, but I could not find him.

That Saturday they had brought in a transport of prisoners in transit. They were just to sleep over one night before moving on; about one hundred Polish prisoners or criminals were in the one barrack. One took a chance and escaped; he left the camp through the open gate, and went over to the other side, where the Russians were. The SS didn't seem to care.

After midnight, as we were lining up for Appel (roll call) to be counted, I heard one SS man say to another:

"Get them out; it's too late to count them."

I thought: "If it's too late for you, maybe it's time for me."

I then went quickly inside my barrack, which was near where we were lining up. I went underneath the bed and hid. The Germans didn't miss me; they chased the others out as if they were herding cows. The dogs followed, barking and snarling. Ten minutes later no one was there but those of us who had hidden, maybe six or eight of us.

Later, after the war, I found my friend Herschel who told me that after weeks and weeks of walking that long distance in the cold and ice of winter, one half of the people did not make it from Bunzlau to Bergen Belsen in Germany. They were shot or froze along the way.

On February 8 and 9, 1945, we started to hear shooting from airplanes. I knew this was a life or death situation. Although we were joyous, we still felt we were in danger. We worried that the Soviets would kill us, thinking we were Germans, or that the Germans would come back suddenly and murder us. Bullets flew back and forth. Shrapnel killed people who were standing and looking at what was happening. Airplanes were dropping bombs.

Fortunately, however, the Russians soon realized that the camp had been evacuated. The Polish prisoner who had run to the Soviet side told them not to shoot or bomb us. In the meantime, the rest of the barracks were in flames.

A Soviet tank, with the gun turret rotating, advanced inside the gate. An officer began calling out, "We are Russian and Polish. Come out! Don't be afraid."

One went out. Then another. Then the rest went out.

They were Russians. I saw the red star on the tank. We were all dancing—we were so happy. Sadly, one boy was dancing around and touched the electric wire fence and was electrocuted.

The Russians advised us what to do if a plane began strafing us, "If you see a plane, no matter what kind, just go into the ditches. Don't run into the fields."

Apparently the air force bombers would not know who was running—Germans or prisoners—and would strafe us in the fields. If we were in the ditches, they would not see us as easily.

A Russian soldier next advised us, "get away from the front as fast as you can. Today we are here; tomorrow perhaps the Germans will be back. This is the way of war."

BETTY RICH

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Betty Rich. Little Girl Lost. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 36–43. Used by permission.

In the first phase of the war between Poland and Germany in September 1939, sixteen-year-old Betty Rich's brothers were called into the army. At home, the immediate imposition of Nazi rule led to changes in the daily routines of life. Betty's recollections are of German harassment of Orthodox Jews; of the imposition of yellow armbands marking out Jews from the rest of the population; and of the arbitrary arrest (accompanied, as she was told, by beatings) of her father. Realizing that there were greater chances of securing her safety if she were to move, she left her home and went to Łódź—where, she anticipated, life would be a little easier. Beyond Łódź, she had heard that the Soviet occupation of eastern Poland was less harsh than that of the Nazis elsewhere, and set her sights on moving there. The account shows something of the confusion and uncertainty experienced as a result of this early time in the war, and of how this "little girl lost" dealt with the challenges it created.

When we came home from the countryside, my parents' first concern was for their three sons in the army. Were they still alive? Had they been taken prisoner? Nobody knew anything. Then we began to deal with our daily survival, which meant adjusting to the very strict orders that were exclusively targeting Jews. The ordeal began slowly at first with a curfew—we had to be in our house by five o'clock in the afternoon. If we were caught on the streets after that, we could be arrested or shot. These rules were posted in public and announced on the radio. Later on, the Jews were all forced to live in a particular part of the city—which happened to be the neighbourhood in which we were then living—and that was the beginning of the ghetto in Zduńska Wola. I don't think that I can describe my reactions to all of this as a very idealistic sixteen-year-old. I was numb and the shock didn't wear off. I remember only too well my first encounter with German soldiers. There was a shortage of everything immediately and we needed bread. The father of a girlfriend of mine, Esther, had a bakery, so I decided to go and ask her if I could get some without waiting in the very long line-up. The bakery was located in the centre of town with stores around it; in the middle was a big market square where merchandise could be displayed on portable tables.

Nobody was in the square when I went, as there was still so much chaos in the streets. But as I walked over to the bakery, I saw a group of German soldiers laughing very loudly, having real fun. As I got closer to the group, I saw about eight or ten Orthodox Jewish men with long beards. The Germans were forcing them to pull the hair out of each other's beards. I could see the pain on their faces and hair flying all over; I heard the Germans' laughter mixed with the faint, suppressed crying of the victims. I stood there for a few minutes, frozen to the spot. I couldn't survive in Zduńska Wola. I ran home, forgetting all about the bread, and crying hysterically, threw myself on my bed.

The days under the Germans passed without much thinking on our parts. We couldn't afford the luxury; we had to preserve all our strength to just get through each hour and each day. Meanwhile, two of my brothers, Yakov and Abram, returned. It turned out that they had been taken prisoner during the defense of Warsaw and then released. Fishel was still in prison. The battle in Poland had been over in just under four weeks—it was just a breeze for the Germans. Now life in our part of town was becoming somewhat normalized. People were called back to work and food coupons were handed out as payment; it was enough to survive.

Then a new traumatic experience occurred—putting on the yellow armband that all Jews were required to wear by November 1939. Somehow I determined it would only be temporary for me, although I didn't have any specific plan—I really hadn't yet come to grips with what was happening. I was lost in my own maze of anxieties and wished that I could control my thoughts; strange and conflicting emotions suddenly overpowered me. It's impossible for me to find the words for what I felt.

My next experience was even worse. In the second week of November, we heard that the Germans were rounding up all the Jewish men. What could we do with my father? He wasn't well. He wouldn't survive. But where could he hide? The German soldiers came and dragged him out of the house to join the other Jewish men, pushed them into buses and drove to the Sieradz prison. Why? Nobody asked and nobody knew.

Fortunately, my father came back after two weeks, but what a sight. They had shaved off his long beard and he wore some ordinary old clothes and a cap. We didn't recognize him. My heart was breaking, along with my poor mother's. But at least he was alive. They had subjected the men to constant beatings and some hadn't survived. This was one of the first tactics the Germans used to scare us in preparation for what was to come.

At the same time, there was a great strength being born in me—a tremendous resistance and will to survive. We heard that our relatives in Lodz were starving. My mother's two sisters and their families couldn't even get any bread. I told my friend Esther, who was a member of Hashomer Hatzair, and she gave me six two-kilogram round loaves of rye bread from her father's bakery. I put them into a big sack, threw it over my shoulders, took off my yellow band and walked away to the railway station about twelve kilometres away.

I was determined to get on the train to Lodz—something indefinable was driving me. Whether I wanted to test my courage on top of wanting to help starving relatives I'm not sure, but either way, I had to do it. My parents didn't try to stop me from leaving and I boarded a train full of Germans. They even helped me up the few steps to the train. I did everything I could not to be noticed by some Poles on the train. I was at their mercy. I wasn't wearing my yellow band and all they had to do was point their fingers at me. I guess luck was with me. My relatives couldn't believe their eyes when I arrived. In retrospect, I can't say whether I did it for them or for a strange need in me to test my endurance under stress and fear. Was it all in preparation for the great moment to come?

One day, I saw my mother walking into the house looking completely discouraged and despondent. I knew right away what had happened because we had all been waiting for her. She had gone to get some bread and the line-up was very, very long. When five o'clock struck she had no choice but to come back empty-handed. The pain in her eyes was killing me. I picked myself up as if on command and quickly walked out the door. No one paid any attention to me. They probably thought that I was in one of my moods, that maybe I was going to walk around in a circle in the backyard as I usually did when the tension in me was unbearable. Again I took off my yellow band and I walked with my head up, with long steady strides, very determined. I felt certain that if I just showed complete confidence, the Germans would not suspect that I was Jewish. I knocked on the back door to Esther's parents' bakery and when they opened the door, they looked at me in surprise. Not many words were exchanged. I only said that my mother had been here and had not made it to the front of the line. I didn't have any ration coupons with me, but they let me take a few kilograms of bread.

No weight would have been too heavy for me, but I must have appeared not very strong to one passerby. A tall German soldier behind me said in German, "Little girl, isn't it too heavy for you?" He was about ten steps away from me. I could almost hear my heart pounding with fear. My poor brain was racing like mad. What was I to say? I kept walking and didn't stop. There was no time to waste, though, and I had to come up with an answer for him. Suddenly, he was already beside me. "Please," he said. "Can I help you carry it?" I looked at him with my probably bewildered and fearful eyes and handed over my precious cargo. "Yes, it's heavy," he said. I still didn't know what to say. I already had a sense of impending disaster. The few minutes that had passed seemed a century long. "Where do you live?" he asked me. "Not that far." By that time, some of my father's distant relatives from a nearby town had moved in with us as their town had pretty much burnt down. I felt that I was left with only one choice as we got closer to my house: to sacrifice myself in place of all of the people in the house.

As I have always done throughout my life, I thought through all the possible outcomes before deciding how to reach into the depths of someone's heart. My intuition was right, but luck was also with me again. I said gently, "You know that I am Jewish. As you can see, I took off with my band. My mother came home without any bread and I can't stand seeing everyone go hungry tonight." He looked at me and said, "Okay, let's go to your house." "But we can't!" I responded. "Don't worry, I will not harm anybody." I didn't believe him and I was starting to feel desperate. "My father just came back from the prison," I said. "He won't survive seeing me walk into the house with a German soldier." "Please trust me," he said. "You can go ahead of me and tell them." I still didn't believe him but I went in anyway. I must have been shivering. "What is it?" Mother asked. "Are you cold?" "No, it's worse than that," I said. I told them the story and in walked the German soldier. There was dead silence. He spoke up first. "You have a very nice daughter; please don't be scared of me. I am just a man, like you. I also have a family and seeing this little girl carrying such a heavy load for her family, risking her life, touched something deep in me." Everybody took a breath of relief.

My father spoke perfect German. The man sat down at the table, asked for a cup of coffee if we had some and started a very normal, intelligent conversation with my father. Again, I don't have the words to describe the unreal scene. As the soldier was leaving, he emptied out everything he had in his military bag: sardines, canned meat, some chocolate. It turned out that he didn't approve of the whole damned war and, in a sense, he was also a victim.

Needless to say, we had a feast that evening, and, better yet, the soldier showed up a couple more times for a talk with my father, bringing for us whatever he could. He was transferred out of Zduńska Wola before I left, and he came to say goodbye. Even if this man was only one isolated case, a drop of water in an ocean, it still reinforced in us the belief that there must be some decent human beings left among those Jew-haters, as we had initially perceived them all to be.

By November the weather had already grown colder and it became difficult to get coal. Winters in Poland can be very severe. Our places were heated by burning coal in big tiled ovens that were more or less like fireplaces. The heat from the ovens would radiate through the tiles. It was a very pleasant heat and we would sometimes leave the oven door open so we could look into the fire. I loved it. We used to throw in potatoes to bake on the burning coals. When the coal supplies suddenly dried up, I got a brilliant idea. The parents of Kazia Shapiro, one of my wealthy school friends, had a big textile factory, I remembered seeing a huge pile of coal in the backyard when I played at her place, which was just across from our orchard. Nobody would see me if I went in the dark, I thought. I made many trips, carrying the coal in big sacks, until I had accumulated enough for the whole winter. My girlfriend stood watch. I met up with Kazia after the war—she was one of the survivors I came across in Lodz. It's too bad I never saw her again after that. She was extremely bright and had enrolled at a university in Poland. As far as I know, she never left.

We had heard that the Soviet Union had signed a pact of neutrality with the Germans, known popularly as the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact. The Soviets took over the eastern part of Poland, next to their border. Then we heard rumours that there were Polish Jews who were escaping to the Soviet-occupied area. Some of my friends' older sisters or brothers were intending to leave. Of course, everything was being organized in great secrecy. When I heard about it, I didn't even dare to think about it for myself at first. Then I tried to talk my parents and my whole family into leaving—we really had nothing to lose. But to my father, the Soviet Union was a godless society, so it was unthinkable for him. Besides, it wasn't easy to get to the border. We would have to travel by train to Lodz, then to Warsaw and then to the small town of Malkinia, where there was a strip of land that was on the border between the German- and Soviet-occupied areas. One could get caught at any moment. We never talked about my suggestion again—it had been instantly dismissed.

But the idea of leaving home was in my head, drilling and drilling its way through, and I continued to get more and more depressed and increasingly restless. I just didn't know where to begin. I didn't have any money, not even enough to buy the first train ticket. So as much as I heard about some young people's plans, I couldn't really crystallize my thoughts at all. How and with whom could I go? Then I started to verbalize my thoughts. My father just shut me up, but my mother, as always, was listening. As time went on, I became obsessed with the idea. The more we felt the Germans' heavy boots in our lives, the more I knew that I had to leave. All my instincts were telling me to go, but I was scared. Where was I going to go and what would I live on? I had no occupation and would be all alone.

I used to lie in bed at night, giving in to my fears about leaving. And then I tried to tell myself that each one of us must find our own way, even though the entire world might be set on fire, even though everything might be in turmoil; each one of us had to take on the final responsibility for action. The idea of leaving persisted and completely consumed me. I couldn't think of anything else. My parents worried that I was losing my mind. I would go out during the day, meet with my friends, come home—leaving was all I could talk about. My siblings were content to stay and wait. They hoped for better times, but I couldn't see that in the future.

My parents argued about me all the time. Meanwhile, I was working at full speed, trying desperately to attach myself to a group of young people older than me who were planning to escape. I contacted some of them through my Zionist organization and finally persuaded them to let me join one particular group. But I needed two things: my parents' permission and some money—first to pay for the train and then, if we made it to the border, for a smuggler, a Polish farmer living in the area who knew how to get people across.

My campaign to leave had taken a couple of months and finally, near the end of December 1939, my parents said to each other, and to me, that they had no right, in a time of war like this, to hold me back. Maybe this was my fate. It required all my strength to hold back my tears. The tension of the last weeks was now overshadowed by the thought of parting, the final break and the total uncertainty of the future. My parents couldn't give me any money, though. My sister and one of my brothers gave me a little and the group took me in with less than the required funds.

I remember the last night I spent at home. I was very scared. My mother asked what I was going to do to support myself in a strange place, with no skills. I said, "I will wash floors and not take anything from the Germans." I packed a knapsack and said goodbye to my family. Only my mother took me to the bus station where I was to meet the group to go to Lodz, our first leg of the trip. I wasn't wearing the yellow band because Jews weren't allowed to travel from town to town. We walked and talked; this was the last time I saw her. I had to detach myself quickly from any feeling of loss or sorrow. I needed every bit of strength to get to my destination, to be free.

PAUL-HENRI RIPS

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Paul-Henri Rips. E/96: Fate Undecided. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 21–30. Used by permission.

A 10-year-old when the Nazis invaded Belgium in 1940, Paul-Henri Rips, from Antwerp, fled south with his family in advance of the Germans as the invasion proceeded. Persuaded to return, they then began to try to live as best they could under Nazi rule. This attempt at compromise was not to last, however, and in due course Paul-Henri found himself imprisoned under the SS. As he writes, it was “quite terrifying” given his young and vulnerable age; “I was alone and unhappy.” The situation for the rest of his family was hardly any better, and young Paul-Henri was especially worried about his father throughout this time. This account is one that signifies frightening times through which a child lived; a time when he was forced to grow up rapidly, or be lost.

When I was awakened some time later we were still in the border post, but we were soon ordered to climb into a truck. It was daylight, but we had no idea what time it was because the Wehrmacht soldiers had taken all our watches. We were driven into Dole and dropped off at the city prison, which was administered by the French police under the orders and supervision of the German SS. After our paperwork had been processed, a French gendarme took me to what looked like a dining room. The people in charge must have had some concern about having a child in the prison—they gave me a plate of brown lentils cooked with a little piece of meat and some of the French police officers sat around the table watching me eat. I was ravenous because I hadn’t eaten since noon the day before and I’ll never forget the taste of that plate of food for as long as I live. It tasted better than fantastic. After this superb meal, I rejoined my father in a cell-like room with barred windows, a long table and benches. It was in a semi-basement and one of the barred windows overlooked the cobbled exercise yard. There was a wash basin in one corner and a big bucket for body waste.

This room had been set aside for Jews only and at the time housed a few other Jews who had been arrested trying to cross the demarcation line. It seems that we were indeed the “Chosen People”—even in jail they gave us “reserved” rooms so we wouldn’t have to be bothered by the common riff-raff.

So began my first sojourn in prison. My mother and sister had been put in the women’s section of the same building, but we couldn’t communicate with them. You can imagine my father’s state of mind during the six weeks that we were held in the Dole city prison, not knowing how they fared. Rosh Hashana of 1941 came and went, and then Yom Kippur was upon us. My father was a traditional practicing Jew and I shall always remember his first Yom Kippur in jail: for the seuda, the meal before the fast, he received a piece of bread, a raw onion, a piece of raw cabbage and a raw potato. The next evening he broke his fast with the same ingredients, along with a cup of water.

The Jewish prisoners were not allowed to work in the fields like the other inmates—another proof of our “special status” that was actually intended to keep us away from the “Aryan” prisoners—a mix of resistance fighters and not-so-petty criminals. The patriotic non-Jewish prisoners who worked in the fields would hide vegetables under their shirts and throw them through the open part of the window. These men risked serious punishment if they were caught doing this. Our regular diet consisted of prison fare under wartime conditions, so whatever we received was a welcome addition to the prison’s menu. During the day the Jewish prisoners all sat in the room with the long table and benches and at night we were divided up into smaller cells. My father and I had a cell to ourselves.

On our first day in Dole German Feldpolizei (secret military police) officers took my father, mother, sister and me out to the Kommandantur for interrogation. They wanted to know everything about how my father had found the smuggler. They took my father in first and when he came out, we could see that he had been beaten, although we heard nothing through the door. His jaw was badly swollen, his breathing was shallow and he had two broken teeth. He told us that his chest was aching and a visit to the prison infirmary revealed that one or two of his ribs were cracked or broken. When we were alone for a little while later that day, my father told me softly in Yiddish that if I was called in for questioning, I must keep on telling them that as a boy I didn’t know anything about the arrangements my parents had made, adding, “Henri, a klapt vargayt, a wort bestayt.” (Henri, the pain of a slap on the face will go away, but a spoken word will remain.) It was a piece of advice that I would have cause to remember later. Luckily, this time I wasn't called in, but we were very worried about how my mother and sister would fare under questioning. When we were briefly reunited with my mother and Sina that afternoon, we were relieved to find that, miraculously, they had been questioned only superficially. The guards then brought us back to the prison and we were separated again.

A few days later I woke up again covered in a rash and itching terribly. We were sleeping on bags of jute burlap sacking filled with straw, so my father assumed that various little creatures had sought refuge from the cold and taken up residence in our beds. Diseases in prison are treated with the utmost speed to prevent them from spreading, so I was bundled up and taken to the Hôpital Pasteur in town, on the banks of the Doubs River. When I arrived, there were no doctors available to diagnose what I had, so the staff put me in the isolation ward along with two African men—one from Côte d'Ivoire and the other from Senegal—and an Arab man from Algeria. All three of them were prisoners of war who had served with the French colonial troops during the blitzkrieg campaign in France in May 1940 and had been captured by the Germans. They had been taken prisoner and then released to help the farmers by working in the fields. The French farmers were happy to have them—with so many young men still in POW camps there was a huge shortage of farm labour. The farmers had a paternalistic attitude toward these men and treated them very well. The Senegalese, who must have been at least two metres tall and looked like a giant to me, received visits from the farmer and his family every few days, and they brought him sweets, nuts and other goodies.

The isolation ward was on the first floor with a window looking out onto the hospital's big garden and the Doubs River or one of the canals at the end of it. The Hôpital Pasteur was run by nuns and the one assigned to our ward was Sister Marie. She was well past middle age and of small stature, but what she lacked in physical appearance she made up for in attitude. She ran the ward with military discipline, her emphasis first on religion and then on cleanliness and obedience to her commands. Every morning at five o'clock, she would march in, switch on the light, fall to her knees, recite some prayers and only then say, "Good morning." Every evening at about six o'clock she would come in, distribute some sort of homemade brew that apparently had some sedative qualities, say, "Good night" and then turn out the lights.

The day after my arrival at the hospital, I was examined by a doctor who prescribed a black, foul-smelling ointment for the large, sensitive blisters all over my body. He recommended opening the blisters so that the ointment could penetrate well into the skin and Sister Marie applied the first treatment in a rather brusque manner. It was most unpleasant and painful, making me squirm and complain.

The next day I met Sister Pidoue, whom I remember as a sweet, young, soft-spoken woman. When she administered the treatment, she did so with a light touch, all the time enquiring about any pain or discomfort. She was obviously from an upper-class family—her speech, vocabulary and demeanour showed education and refinement. She knew the circumstances of how I came to be in the hospital and tried to make me feel less lonely and depressed about not being with my family. She was worried that I was not getting enough nourishment, so she brought me fruit and sweets. After several days and an improvement in my health and appearance, she brought me a fishing rod and took me down to the river and showed me how to fish.

The hospital also served as a convent and a sort of haven where girls from poor families were given shelter, trained in the domestic arts and guided toward becoming nuns. They were general simple country girls and very much under the influence of their village and parish priests. As a result, when they learned that I was Jewish from one of the male orderlies who had befriended me, they began to regard me with certain distrust and maybe even a little fear. The reason for their attitude emerged during an encounter we had in one of the medieval galleries around the hospital's inner garden. Keeping a distance of about four feet away from me, they first asked me if the devil was my God and then insisted that he was. Over and over again they demanded, "Don't you worship the devil?" I was only eleven, but having attended the Tachkemoni School in Antwerp, I was able to explain that the God I worshipped was the one who created the world, that Jesus was a Jew, and that the Old Testament was the only one that counted for me. My friend the orderly laughed his head off over this exchange but didn't want to antagonize the girls too much because he liked one of them and wanted to get closer to her.

Sister Pidoue happened along during this high theological debate. She took me gently by the arm and in her soft lovely voice, said, "Henri, do not get into discussions with the girls or the cleaning staff or anyone else, as they are ignorant and don't know what they are talking about." She had been riding a bicycle, which she pushed into my hands. "Take the bike and go for a ride in the garden." If ever there was the perfect nurse, gentle, caring, comforting, then it was Sister Pidoue, may God bless her soul. I was a child, alone and bewildered, separated from my family and far from my comfortable childhood world of Antwerp. Sister Pidoue was my guardian angel, just like the one described in the verse in the Traveler's Prayer: "Behold I send an angel before you to protect you on the way and to bring you to the place that I have prepared."

I'm sure that most of the hospital staff knew about the Jewish boy from the prison. After a few days I was allowed to roam around within the grounds of the hospital, which looked like a medieval castle. During my wanderings, I became friends with the pharmacist who was a jovial, rotund man. He showed me his little museum of pharmaceutical articles, and proudly displayed a surgeon's kit that had apparently belonged to Napoleon's personal physician.

The ward room I was in was a rectangular room with the beds set against the walls and a table and chair in the middle of the room. At the far end, opposite the door, was a hand basin between the two windows that overlooked the garden. In the first bed was the black soldier from Côte d'Ivoire who, I am convinced, was mentally disturbed. He never answered when spoken to, but sang the whole day until he fell asleep. What he sang was just a few words in his language on an equal number of notes. In the beginning I was irritated and even angry with him, but eventually I became deaf to his monotonous aria. He didn't react even when the other African in the ward tried to speak to him. I think he was so homesick that he cut himself off from the present and lived in his own world.

The second bed was empty and in the third bed was the other African man, the Senegalese. He was goodness personified and as generous as Sister Pidoue. The orderly told me that he was in the last stage of tuberculosis—the coughing, blood-spitting stage. The specialist in contagious diseases who was attending him scolded Sister Marie for putting a child in a room with a patient in the last stages of tuberculosis. Nothing came of it, however—Sister Marie must have told him of my particular status because I never saw him again. The farm family with whom my Senegalese friend had lived and worked came to visit him the Sunday after I arrived and brought him fruit, nuts, sweets and biscuits. I remember how concerned they were for him. After they left, he brought me some of the goodies, telling me that he wanted to share with me because he couldn't eat it all and I had nobody to bring me treats. A few days later, I woke up in the middle of the night and saw Sister Marie and some orderlies around his bed. Between his coughing spasms, he saw me looking at him and gave me a big smile, as only he could, telling me not to worry, that it would be alright. He died the next morning, and I watched the orderlies carry my new friend, whose heart was as big as he was tall, to his last and pain-free resting place.

The fourth bed was mine, where I lay in a sticky mess for a few days each time Sister Pidoue treated my blisters.

The fifth bed was occupied by a goumier, a Moroccan or Algerian soldier in the French colonial army who had been sent to work on a farm as a POW. He was in hospital because his toes had been frostbitten and had to be amputated. He wasn't exactly friendly and was always complaining. He told me he didn't like Jews, but he found me good enough to play checkers with, although he got very upset whenever I won.

After I had received treatment for about two weeks, a German doctor examined me and declared me fit enough to return to prison. After an emotional farewell from Sister Pidoue, I was escorted back to the prison and reunited with my father.

I was now back in jail, in the Jews' cell. It was really ironic—the Germans wanted the French prison authorities to keep the majority non-Jewish prison population who worked in the fields every day away from the much smaller Jewish population, so they claimed we weren't working because the Jews shunned physical work, especially farm work. The real result was that they spared us any physical exercise and, as the days went by, cut us off from any contact with the outside world and my mother and Sina. Not knowing how they were doing was torture for my father. We didn't know what was coming next and feared that we would be deported directly to Germany and beyond. Then, one afternoon without warning, my father and I were called out from the day cell and marched into the office. A few minutes later, we were overjoyed to see my mother and Sina come in to join us. The officers from the Feldpolizei, the German secret military police, who had interrogated my father the day after our arrest were there too. They were in a jovial mood, and we soon found out why.

We still weren't sure what was in store for us, but when we were taken out of our day cell we had been told to collect all our belongings and in the office, the French prison authorities began the process of signing us out. I suspect that my parents thought they would never again see any of the documents, money and jewellery that they had had to surrender when we were arrested. Before we left the prison, however, the guard handed us a parcel with at least some of our things, including my father's money and the purse with my mother's jewellery. After checking the contents, my parents had to sign a receipt for them. We were then escorted out of the prison into the late afternoon of a late autumn day and as we headed toward the station, the guards told us that we were being transferred to a Sammellager, or collection camp, in Pithiviers, not far from Paris. We would have to change trains in Paris and because of the train schedule, we would be spending the night there—in a prison, of course. It suddenly became clear why the two officers were in such a good mood: the Germans were eagerly anticipating a night in Paris.

We boarded the train to the gare de Lyon station in Paris and were taken to a first-class compartment that had been commandeered by the officers. Although we were definitely not free and my parents were understandably worried about the future, it was good to be reunited with my mother and sister. We were allowed to converse, but only in German. One of the officers warmed up to us after my father bought him a few drinks. His name was Heinrich, which he translated into French as Henri. He kept repeating that all Heinrichs and Henris were “the best boys and men in the world.” At one point during the journey the train stopped at a fairly large station—it may have been Dijon—and the other officer stepped out. He returned with a big smile on his face, waving a newspaper. Addressing my father, he announced, “Tobruk ist gefallen”, that the Germans had captured the Libyan military post of Tobruk from the British, and proceeded to spend the rest of our trip talking to Heinrich about German successes in the war. By the time we arrived in Paris, it was evening.

I don’t recall how we got to the prison in Paris or how long it took us to get there, but we must have been quite a sight marching through the streets of Paris, flanked by German military police officers. After delivering us to the prison warden at the Prison de la Rue du Church-Midi, our two guards took off to enjoy Paris by night and papa and I were separated once again from Maman and Sina. We were led through locked gates down into the bowels of the prison until we came to a cell where we were left alone. I vividly remember walking through a number of gates that had to be unlocked and then locked again after we passed through. I can still hear the clanking of the jailer’s keys, the thud of the heavy cell door and the key turning in the locks. Soon after our arrival, the prison guards fetched my father for what I assumed was another interrogation. I was left alone in the cell deep in the bowels of the basement with a thin mattress on a pallet, a blanket and a high naked bulb that gave off only a weak light.

It was quite terrifying for an eleven-year-old boy—I was alone and unhappy and worried about my father. I was afraid that they would forget about me, like the prisoners in my favourite books. I had been an avid reader of The Adventures of the Three Musketeers and other novels of chivalry in which noble heroes were always fighting either to free the unjustly imprisoned or to bring villains to justice. I thought about these tales as I lay on my straw mattress and stared at the ceiling. If these were the concerns of a frightened boy, you can imagine what my father’s state of mind must have been, separated from his wife and daughter, not knowing what was happening to them and afraid of what the Nazis had in store for us.

MOSHE ROBIN

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Moshe and Stefa Robin. Stepping Into Life. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2002, pp. 54–63. Used by permission.

A Polish Jew from Sosnowiec, Moshe Robin’s account of life in the ghetto is noteworthy given that it focuses on the inter-relationship between the Nazi occupiers (in particular, an SS officer named Alfred Dreier) and the Nazi-appointed Jewish Council (Judenrat) led by one Moniek Merin, for whom Moshe Robin had little to say that is positive. All this time, as he notes, “the Jewish population in Sosnowiec dwindled,” with the Nazis extracting every ounce of labor from the young men and placing all who could not be of benefit to the Third Reich on transports to an unknown destination.

The Gestapo had a special department called the Yot Abteilung. Yot is the German name for the letter J, for Jude (Jew). The head of that department in Sosnowiec was an SS man by the name of Alfred Dreier.

The New Town Hall was built on land reclaimed from a disused iron smelting works. Behind the town hall there were a dozen acres of uninviting hilly land, full of sulphur-reeking iron slag dross. Few people ventured there during normal times. We called that land Holdy. The day after the burning of the synagogue Alfred Dreier, with a detachment of soldiers, marched out the hostages from the town hall basement into Holdy. He picked a low-lying spot and made them all sit down there, surrounded by his soldiers. He himself, with a small jockey-like horse whip under his arm, climbed on to a nearby hillock so that he could dominate the scene. From above he asked, “Who of you belongs to the Jewish Community Council?” Nobody owned up. He tried again: “I want those belonging to the Jewish Community Council to step forward.”

Although there were several dignitaries of the council in the crowd below, nobody moved. It didn't augur well for anybody to be picked out by the Germans. After another vain try, Dreier uttered an order to his soldiers, who quickly rounded up five of the hostages and marched them off to the base of the next hillock. Those that lingered or didn't jump were helped with licks and rifle butts. They were told to kneel down and were then mowed down with machine-gun fire.

After that, Dreier lit a cigarette and smoked it long enough to let the horror of what his soldiers had done to sink into the minds of the hostages below. He then came back again: "I want an elder of the community council to step out immediately, or my soldiers will pick out five more of you."

A short, thin young man pushed himself to the front. His name was Moniek Merin. As soon as he came forward, the soldiers kicked him around and a rifle butt broke some teeth. He fell down, bleeding from his mouth. Dreier came down from his hillock and approached him. He told his soldiers to lift the bleeding man. "You, Jew," he said, poking him in the chest with his whip, "you haven't obeyed my orders immediately and that's why the soldiers knocked your teeth out, but from now on you will be der Judenälteste (the eldest of the Jews, a sort of liaison between the Jews and the Gestapo). You will be responsible to me personally and if you don't obey any of my orders, you will pay with your head! Verstanden (understand)?" With that he smacked him across his face again with his switch to seal his appointment.

Thus started the nefarious career of Moniek Merin. He was a smallish man in his 30s, but looked 25. He had darting eyes with pin-size pupils and his movements were quick and nervous. Before the war he was a haberdasher, but he spent most of his time in the café houses playing cards. He lost most of his money there. He was divorced and led the life of a bachelor. He didn't have a good name among the merchants of the city. He liked to play the game of local politics, but even here, he wasn't very successful as he didn't have the command of the Germanic language.

With the backing of the German authorities, Merin built an organization called Der Judenrat (the Jewish Council), whose official aim was to administer to the needs of the Jewish population in the occupied territories of Zaglembe and Upper Silesia. In reality it was a tool in the Germans' hands, as they didn't want to waste manpower for things the Jews could do better than they could. Moniek Merin was in charge of the Judenrat. Closer to him was Fania Czarna, his offsider/secretary, who spoke and wrote German perfectly. She was his official translator and interpreter during meetings and conferences with the German authorities.

Shortly after the German occupation began, Sosnowiec became part of the Third Reich and Merin's organization became Die Zentrale—the central office for 27 smaller Jewish assemblies in the adjoining townships of Zaglembe and Upper Silesia. Merin became a source of energy and a great organizer. Of course, there was not a skerrick of democracy in any of his dealings. You had only to see how he appointed people to different functions in his set-up. He milked funds and gold from the smaller towns for the Central and the Gestapo. He was also the one who decided who went to work and to the labour camps, the forerunners of the concentration camps. Those Jews who quickly realized what it meant to be sent to a camp could bribe their way out by paying big sums of money to Merin. The Central exploited people's fears very artfully and asked for more and more contributions. Whoever could not buy their ephemeral freedom was sent away to a camp. The Germans kept demanding ever more slave labourers and Merin kept delivering.

Some means of enforcement was necessary to support these activities, so Merin created the Jewish Police. It was established on the pretext of keeping law and order, but it was responsible for bringing Jewish youths to the Dulag (Durchgang Lager, the transit camp), from where they were shipped to Germany.

Many German manufacturers, especially those involved in the war effort, found it profitable to establish factories in the new territories of the Third Reich. They simply confiscated existing buildings and didn't have to pay any rent. And they had a steady supply of unpaid workers in the Jews who preferred to work for them for nothing than be sent to Germany, away from their families. Those workers were issued certificates from the German bosses exempting them from deportation to the camps. What is more, because these factories usually worked in two shifts, these certificates also exempted them from the curfew, which could sometimes be of benefit for other purposes.

With the blessing of Alfred Dreier, Merin's Judenrat, as it came to be known, quickly appropriated the right to be the sole supplier of labour to those factories. For a hefty sum of money or jewellery, you could buy yourself a job, which spared you the anguish of being sent away to camp, at least temporarily.

In April 1940, my brother Shayek and I started working in a German factory owned by Hans Held, a shirt maker who produced shirts for the Wehrmacht. We were never paid for our labour, but our Scheinen (safe conduct) kept us in town.

Like any other family we tried to avoid deportation as long as we could, but we felt the noose tightening. In May 1941 my father was caught in one of the street round-ups which the Jewish Police, with the help of the Gestapo, organized periodically when they couldn't achieve the necessary quota of deportees. His presence at home was indispensable. As Shayek and I were temporarily safe because of our passes, but Fishek felt that his turn was coming soon, he volunteered instead. So, for a sum of money, the Jewish Police substituted him for my father at the Dulag. Thus Fishek was the first to be torn from the family.

Two weeks later my maternal grandparents were taken with a transport of older people to the Dulag and I never heard of them again. The Jewish population of the town was thinning out all the time. Soon there wasn't a family, bar those who belonged to the Central, which didn't have someone in a camp somewhere in Germany.

Hell Deepens

The only news we could get at the time was what came through the grapevine. There were no papers and it was strictly forbidden to own a radio set. Of course, there were some sets hidden away by people in attics and other places, but when they tried to listen, all they could hear were German bulletins. Not many radio sets made before the war in Poland could pick up foreign stations and those people who had expensive, foreign made short wave sets didn't fare much better, because the Germans jammed all enemy stations, even for their own population.

However, Sosnowiec was an arterial town for road and train traffic and in the Spring of 1941, we saw train after train going eastward from Germany. Later on, those trains carried soldiers by the thousands, all going eastwards. Since Poland at that time had been conquered, we wondered where Hitler was planning to hit next.

We didn't have to wait for long. In June 1941 Germany attacked the USSR. Our hidden joy was enormous. The two felons in crime had fallen out and were fighting between themselves. Maybe, being busy with the Russians, Hitler would forget about those Jews. Some people who had fled previously to the USSR came back and told us that the German offensive had come as a complete surprise to the Russians. As well as intelligence being poor, they also firmly believed that Hitler would keep to the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact, so they were totally unprepared for the onslaught. They described the complete chaos as the Russians retreated in disarray, leaving equipment and wounded behind. The Germans were advancing at enormous speed, taking thousands of prisoners on the ground and strafing those fleeing from the skies.

Our hopes of a let-up did not last long. If anything, the Gestapo increased the frequency of transporting Jewish slave workers. They also started to take away old people in the transports. After several of these transports, different rumours started to circulate in town, but they were so horrendous and revolting that nobody wanted to accept their credibility. We knew that there was a war going on and using the enemy's population for the war effort seemed a reasonable thing to do. But, to take old people and gas them! No! Not the Germans, who prided themselves on being a bastion of culture in the midst of Europe. The Volk (people) of Nietzsche, Schiller and Beethoven wouldn't stoop to kill old men and women. Nobody wanted to believe it and thought it was just malicious talk. But the rumours kept coming ever stronger, with more detail and from more credible sources. A deep gloom set in over the community. "If they take the old people now, who is going to be next? Where will it end?"

The Jewish community in Sosnowiec had a beth yesomim (orphanage). There were usually 30 to 40 children at a time, but because of the latest happenings—parents killed or sent to camps—their numbers increased to nearly double. One morning in June 1941, three military trucks arrived in front of the institute. The children, nurses and other staff were loaded onto the trucks. The cries of the children and nurses mingled with the SS soldiers yelling "Schnell (hurry)! Macht schnell!" It took them half an hour to empty the orphanage. The burly soldiers tossed the babies and small children onto the truck like pieces of wood. The trucks departed and nobody ever heard of them again. One of the nurses in that transport was a cousin of mine—Cesia Ehrlich.

There was a resistance movement in town, but it was very hush-hush, so much so that we only found out about most of their exploits after the war. Of course, the Germans didn't consider it in their interest to publicize the feats of the Resistance. From time to time we heard of a soldier who had been killed or of a bomb which had exploded. Usually, the next day, Gestapo cars raced wildly through the streets. There were arrests of people, whole families sometimes, and executions on the Holdy. There were several reasons why it was so pathetic. First and foremost was the shortage of any kind of arms. In pre-war Poland it was forbidden for the general public to own firearms. Obtaining a licence for a hunting or sporting rifle was fraught with difficulties. One had to produce certificates of good conduct, sobriety and trustworthiness from the police, a justice of the peace, a minister or similar. And, of course one had to be relatively wealthy. Poland didn't produce those things and as they were imported, they were quite expensive and considered as luxury items. In any case, who needed them?

They were needed now, but were unavailable. It was a hard task fighting a well-armed enemy, with hardly any arms at all. A single rifle here or there, or a crude home made bomb which sometimes exploded early and maimed the guerrilla fighter, couldn't do much damage to the Germans. And the repercussions were always tenfold. It didn't help that there was no assistance whatsoever from the Polish population. On the contrary, they were only too happy to point the finger and inform the Germans about the Jews. Their endemic hatred for the Jews was much greater than their enmity towards the German occupiers.

In 1942 the Poles created their own underground movement, which they called AK, abbreviated from Armia Krajowa (Country Army). The AK was even more ineffective against the Germans than the Jewish partisans were. However, they were very good at luring the Jewish fighters into the forests under the pretext of helping them, and later taking away their few miserable arms and murdering them. The history of those years is full of such episodes. After the war, they were the ones who threw out returning Jews from moving trains and organized the pogroms in Kielce and other towns. They created the slogan: "Hitler didn't do a good enough job with the Jews. We shall complete it." During the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, a big banner across the buildings stated "for our freedom and yours," but no Pole lent a hand. Even the few rifles and pistols used in the uprising, the Jews had to buy for good money and smuggle them into the ghetto through the sewers. The Jews fought against the Germans alone, to the last. The outcome was predictable, but at least they died with a gun or a stone in their hands and not in the gas chambers of Treblinka.

As the war progressed the Jewish population in Sosnowiec dwindled. Most of the able-bodied men and women were sent to slave camps in Germany. The old and the very young were being sent to Auschwitz on journeys of no return. Those who could, made hideouts or built bunkers in cellars for themselves. Others tried to get into protected jobs in German factories. The SS, however, kept demanding more and more fodder for the German Works and Services Instrumentalities, from the Central. The pressure Alfred Dreier exacted on Moniek Merin was so great that eventually Merin gave way and declared all Arbeitsscheinen, the work safe-conducts for local factories, null and void. Suddenly, we became fair game to be caught on sight by the Jewish Police, or the SS, and sent on the nearest transport to Germany.

MOSHE ROBIN

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Moshe and Stefa Robin. Stepping Into Life. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2002, pp. 94–100. Used by permission.

Moshe Robin was sent to Buzlau, a subcamp of the much larger camp complex at Gross-Rosen, Germany. In this account, he outlines the routine whereby as a newly arrived prisoner he was acculturated into the camp routine. He also shows how, over time, the camp developed; while the physical characteristics of the camp were built up, the condition of the prisoners deteriorated. Nonetheless, the prisoners did the best they could with what they had—and all they really had was their own determination to stay alive and work together in order to achieve that end. As he shows, awareness of the imminence of a Nazi defeat and liberation by the Soviets kept the prisoners going.

One Sunday morning in April 1944, while we were being mustered on the Appelplatz, a car and a truck arrived in the camp, stopping right in front of the prisoners. Three uniformed SS men alighted from the car and about a dozen men from the truck. These men were dressed in the striped, pyjama-like concentration camp uniforms, with different-coloured triangles on their left breasts. Most had black triangles, about two had purple ones and one, red. Later we found out that black meant criminal, purple Jehovah's Witness and red political, Communist or Socialist. All of these men had numbers on the triangles on their uniforms and none of them looked Jewish.

When one of the SS approached, the officer in charge of the guardsmen spoke to him and handed him something that looked like a letter. The officer saluted smartly, turned on his heel and stood aside to let the SS man take over. He announced, "From now on this camp will be known as Konzentrationslager Bunzlau (Bunzlau Concentration camp). Your present administration is now summarily dismissed, and these prisoners I brought with me will take over the running of the camp. They must be obeyed without contradiction." He pointed to the men in the striped pyjamas. "There will be a selection in half an hour. You will undress totally. You will only keep your belts and your footwear. You will be called by name and if you pass the inspection, you will be issued with a uniform like these prisoners have, and a piece of cloth with a number and a yellow triangle which you must sew on to the left breast of your jacket. All your clothes, undergarments and other private possessions will be confiscated. The lockers will be removed; you won't need them any more. That's all for the time being. You can start undressing now. Put your clothes in the middle of the yard in a heap. You can't enter your rooms any more until after the selection."

Some of the black-triangle prisoners posted themselves before the doors of the barracks, to prevent the inmates from entering. Others armed with trolleys started wheeling the lockers out of the rooms. We were standing bewildered, in the middle of the yard, not knowing what to do, very loath to undress and part with our clothes.

On a nod from the SS officer, three burley black triangles with canes in their hands came forward and started beating up the perplexed inmates. "Ausziehen (undress)", they shouted, "Schnell machen (hurry up), schnell, schnell!" as their blows rained down on the hapless inmates. For about ten minutes pandemonium prevailed, until some started to remove their clothing. The others soon followed until the yard was full of stark naked men. The black triangles removed bundles of striped uniforms from the truck, then threw the discarded clothes, then the garments from the lockers, onto the trucks.

We were mustered again, naked and shivering and waited to be called before the selection panel by a purple-triangled German prisoner, one by one. My name was called and I ran into the room. There were two tables, a bigger one for two German officers and a smaller one for the second purple-triangled prisoner, who acted as a clerk. He asked the questions—name, date of birth and occupation in camp, which he recorded on a sheet, then the two Germans, who were probably doctors, took over. They asked about the state of my health and any complaints I had, but I didn't complain about anything as I remembered what happened to the sick ones in the infirmary at Markstädt. They hastily inspected my hands, feet, mouth and teeth and even my genitalia, then one of them nodded to the clerk, who handed me a piece of cloth with a number.

"From now on you will be addressed and you will report as 'Prisoner Number 35268', the clerk told me. "Your private name isn't relevant any more." He ushered me into an adjoining room where I was given a striped pair of pants and a jacket. My hair was clipped short and a 3–4 cm wide stripe was shaved down the middle of my head, from the front to the nape of the neck. The German prisoners had a name for that stripe—they called it Lausenstrasse (Lice Street).

It was late in the afternoon when they finished. About eight or nine inmates, older and ailing ones from the infirmary, were ushered, still naked, onto the truck, which drove off. . . .

Life in the camp became hard. The criminals, who were now running the camp, didn't mix with the Jewish prisoners. They kept aloof to accentuate their Aryan superiority. They usurped a whole barrack for themselves, squeezing the inmates from there in with the rest. They always walked with a rod in their hands and beatings from the black triangles became commonplace. There was no after-shift or Sunday rest and they always found some additional chores in the camp or in the barracks for the inmates. Life became more regimented. There were very frequent inspections, often in the middle of the night, when they kept the tired inmates up for hours before another day's work.

One day, the SS officer accompanied by the burliest of all the black triangles who now acted as the Lagerälteste, came to our barrack and ordered the middle room emptied. The inmates from that room now had to double up with other prisoners in the remaining rooms. The SS officer said he was going to make a "showpiece toilet hall" there instead.

The prisoners, in their own time, removed the floorboards and installed the necessary piping. The hall was painted a beautiful white and cream. The floor was cemented and tiled, as were the walls to half their height. Six new toilet bowls were installed, as well as a new stainless steel urinal. The electricians were called in to put in new fluorescent lights and then, wonder of wonders, holders with elegant toilet paper in them were fitted on the wall next to each bowl. When it was finished even the Ritz wouldn't have been ashamed to own such a "toilet hall"! Two prisoners were assigned to clean, dust and polish the metal fittings, but it was strictly forbidden for anybody to go in and use it.

The quality of the food for the inmates deteriorated immensely, while the black triangles ate well and plentifully. The inmates grumbled under their beards. On the morning muster the SS Lagerführer (person in charge) came out with that kind of a sermon: "You are a very ungrateful lot. You wanted a beautiful toilet hall and I gave you one. You didn't think about how I paid for all those pretty fittings, did you? My budget is very limited. Well, I saved on your food. It won't hurt you to eat a bit less if you want to live in beautiful surroundings. I don't want to hear any more grumbles or you will regret it."

The real point of the story became apparent two weeks later. A commission of the Red Cross in Switzerland came for an inspection of the camp. The first thing our Lagerführer showed them was, of course, the "toilet hall" and the commissioners duly noted that: “The inmates of the Konzentrationslager Bunzlau lived in luxury unparalleled in any other camp in the world.”

In all that misery, we tried to keep up our spirits in any way we could. We formed a “singing circle,” a quasi choir. Every Sunday afternoon, circumstances permitting, those whose voices were pleasing gathered around our Dirigent (conductor), Pinchas Orbach (I met him again after the war, here in Melbourne). We entertained ourselves and the other inmates by singing songs, mostly in Yiddish and Hebrew, but occasionally also in Polish and Russian. One of our capos, Naftali Feder, was an accomplished actor. He quite often recited for us, from memory, passages from I. L. Perez, Sholem Aleichem, Mendele Mocher Sforim and others, as well as poems by different Jewish poets. Sometimes even the black triangle German prisoners sat in the crowd and listened to the songs.

The other coloured triangles, although they lived in the barracks with the blacks, behaved more humanely. Of the two purple triangles, one acted as secretary in the office. The other, the one who assisted the two German doctors, helped the Jewish doctor who remained at his post as a male nurse. The red triangle replaced the cook.

One day a truck dumped a dead horse in the yard near the kitchen. Apparently it was the horse of our SS Lagerführer. It had fallen into a mole hole while he was riding it and had broken a leg. The Lagerführer shot the horse and decided that the meat was good enough for the inmates.

Suddenly there was meat ad nauseam. For three days each of the inmates was given a big chunk of horsemeat in his soup. On the third day, the cook let it be known that whoever wanted could have a second helping. There were many takers, with disastrous results. It was late August and the weather was pretty warm. There was no refrigeration in the camp and the horsemeat started to go bad. Our digestive systems, which for years now hadn't handled any fat, or meat of any kind, couldn't manage the sudden load of rotten horsemeat.

First, a lot of people were sick and vomited all over the place. The diarrhoea set in, to such an extent, that the infirmary couldn't handle it. Besides, they didn't have any drugs to administer. Sick inmates who couldn't wait were defecating in their pants, in the beds and in the aisles and the camp reeked like a sewer. The attendance at work halved and even those who turned up were green in the face and couldn't do much. It took over a week before the disease began to abate. Two of the inmates died. I was one of the early vomiters and maybe that saved me from the much worse, the diarrhea that set in later. After that episode, even the black triangles eased off and slowly the camp came back to life.

The grapevine brought the news about the allied and Russian offensives, which lifted our spirits. In late November, in the quietness of the night, we could hear the cannon shots of the approaching Soviet Army in the distance. Those reports became louder and more distinct from day to day.

We could plainly see the unease in the Germans' faces. Their consternation shortly became raw fear, and the higher officials and military advisers disappeared from the plant, going deeper inland. Production in the factory stopped and tradesmen were ordered to remove the machines. They too were crated and shipped inland. More prisoners were assigned to the earthworks, digging deep trenches in the fields for protection against Russian tanks. As a last resort, the civil population was issued with Panzerfausts (anti-tank weapons).

In the first few days of February 1945 panic set in. Two of the SS officers disappeared. The Lagerführer decided to evacuate the camp and march the prisoners deeper inland.

ELFIE ROSENBERG

Context: Before the War

Source: Elfie Rosenberg, Serry and Me: A Story of the Kindertransport and Beyond. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2001, pp. 25–37. Used by permission.

Bad Salzbrunn (modern day Szczawno-Zdrój), a spa town in Lower Silesia, saw happy prewar days for young Elfie Rosenberg; as she writes, it “had been a haven for my family before Hitler took power.” That came to an end, however, with the advent of the Nazis, after which everything seemed to change. Elfie’s highly descriptive account is related here with richness and care, as she chronicles her life and the many changes wrought by Nazi rule during the 1930s. With the Kristallnacht of November 9–10, 1938, she saw that it now became official policy for all Jews to leave Germany and that, as a result, she and her sister Serry were placed on a Kindertransport for Britain. They only just made it; “the boat we sailed on was the second last boat out of Germany.”

There were two Jewish guesthouses in Bad Salzbrunn. One belonged to the family Ruschin and the other to the Quartners. There wasn't a synagogue in Bad Salzbrunn so off we would go to one of the guest houses. Each had converted a room into a prayer room, one for the women and the other for the men. My mother didn't always go so I usually sat beside my father with the men. The hum of the praying and having to sit still was often too much for me. I would start to fidget, which brought stern looks from my father. On Saturdays, Serry, who was more religiously observant than I, wouldn't even carry a handkerchief. "Carrying" is considered work, which is forbidden on the Shabbat.

For the High Holidays there were always enough people for the services and in the summer, also for Shabbes. But at other times, when there weren't enough men to make a minyan, Serry would ask the Jewish hawkers to help out. There were usually a few staying in cheap lodgings in our town, barely eking out a living. Dad would invite the hawkers home for a glass of tea and a card game. He sometimes let them win, considering it a mitzvah to let them think they had won some money rather than demeaning with a handout. My father always looked for the opportunity to help others.

The German population had their food rationed to help rearm the Fatherland. Serry tells me that meat could be obtained only once a fortnight, and that because of her bad heart, my mother was permitted to receive from Breslau a little extra—500 grams of kosher meat. This was around 1937. I was too young to appreciate what my mother was going through to provide for us. I certainly don't remember ever going hungry. Ironically, we were sent smoked chicken with a salami placed inside it by our "poor" maternal grandparents in Poland. They were then not suffering from food rationing as we were. Mum would hang the sausage on the kitchen window, where Serry and Dad would reverently slice off a small piece at a time. For them it was a huge treat, whereas Mum and I couldn't see what all the fuss was about. I can still remember the strong, smoky smell of that sausage. Our grandparents continued sending these luxuries right until the time we left Germany.

I remember another strong food smell, that of speck—bacon fat and cabbage in the passageway outside our apartment. It came from across the hall where a large non-Jewish family lived. I envied the freedom the children had running up and down the stairs. When I was very little I used to play with them. One of the boys, two years older than me, was my special friend. Then a time came when we started avoiding each other. Things soon got worse. My old friend, when he reached the age of ten, joined the Nazi Youth Movement. He was the same boy that not so long ago had played "doctors" with Herman and me and shared our toys. He wore his uniform with pride and strutted around as if he was king of the world. He became my tormentor.

Whenever we passed on the landing he would spit at me and call out, "Jude." He could reduce me to tears with merely a venomous glance. Then his abuse led to pushing and elbowing me out of his way. One day, he scratched my face so badly that I carried the scar for many years. There was nobody to complain to.

My parents had suffered a lot in Poland from anti-Semitic persecution. My mother told me about the pogroms that she had experienced as a girl and how badly they had affected her. When they moved to Germany, my parents thought that they had escaped this primitive racial hatred for good. Now they felt trapped and helpless. It was no longer their "safe, civilised Germany."

Bad Salzbrun had been a haven for my family before Hitler took power. German culture required people to be polite and courteous to each other and we happily fitted into this pleasant, orderly society. We got on well with our neighbours and the shopkeepers were friendly and helpful. The customers and suppliers with whom my father did business appreciated his trustfulness and integrity. Now, my parents felt betrayed by how easily the veneer of gemutlichkeit had fallen away. The situation in our small town was as bad as in the rest of Germany. I didn't understand much. I simply thought how horrid and repulsive I must be that so many people should hate me so.

Our young neighbor was one of the thousands of children who were willingly given by their parents to the Nazis for indoctrination. Propaganda films surviving from those years show strapping young boys and girls marching to bands singing: "the Flag is Greater Than Death." By 1933 the Hitler youth ruled the streets. They were made to feel powerful in their smart uniforms, as they marched in their multitudes carrying swastika-emblazoned banners and flags aloft. The boys sang songs like, "Happiness is an Authoritarian Regime." They took all their activities, even boxing and running, very seriously. They were being toughened up and groomed for a specific and deadly purpose, to be the rulers of the world. Toughness was the order of the day. They tried to "persuade" boys who had been reluctant to join them by marching in the streets of every city beating their drums, a message for them to come out of their homes and join in. The drum-beats must have sounded terrifying to those not taken in by the Nazi propaganda.

I could not understand how children could be so full of hate and arrogance. I was frightened of them. And yet, at times I yearned to be one of them. If only I wasn't a dark little Jewish girl but rosy-cheeked and confident, with blonde plaits wound around my head, I could belong, to also be part of the glamour and excitement. It wasn't until recently, after seeing a movie on television that I could begin to see it from their point of view, to comprehend how totally indoctrinated they had been. I shuddered remembering that I was an eyewitness to the madness.

Serry started to attend a girls' Lyzeum (high school) in Waldenburg at the age of twelve. She stayed there for two years and then Jewish children were not accepted in state-run schools any longer. Catholic schools were still accepting Jewish children so my parents transferred to the private Catholic school in Bad Salzbrunn. She was a very good student, especially at Maths. Some of the pupils in her class would bully her to come early so they could copy her homework and woe betide, if she got her sums wrong! They would lie in wait, and in winter, put stones in snowballs and pelt her with them. Serry and I were verbally abused daily. The term "Jude" still gives me the shudders and, if I put my mind to it, I can still hear the echo of those demeaning taunts today.

By 1936, almost 100,000 boys and girls were in the arena for Hitler's birthday. Children commanded children. There were thousands upon thousands, all in the same uniform, carrying flags. Those smart uniforms, their Aryan ideals and their common purpose made them all equal. They were comrades. Hitler was their idol, their god.

The Nazis wanted to eradicate anything that was Jewish. Just three and a half months after coming to power in 1933, Hitler began the process of "cleansing" German libraries. Books by famous German authors such as Heine and Schnitzler were taken from libraries and personal collections and burnt in the streets. Paintings by Jewish artists were also destroyed.

In this atmosphere of sanctioned violence towards Jews, my father's business started to fall away. Some of his customers wouldn't pay, because who pays a Jew for his work? They knew that Jews had no legal recourse to complain. For years, there had been notices in shop windows saying "Jews not wanted as reps or customers" and Gentiles were urged not to buy from shops belonging to Jews. He was lucky to find a little out of the way shop where the Gentile owner wasn't afraid to sell him our daily provisions of food.

Now the terrifying threats and harassment of our small Jewish community began in earnest, with no authority willing to intervene. Every Friday night when the Shabbes candles were lit, the Gestapo would knock on the doors of Jewish homes and threaten whoever was within, shouting at them to leave, get out of the country or they would be arrested. Everybody was terrified but there was nowhere to go. Dad tried to find a country that would be sympathetic to our plight, but to no avail. Even to return to Poland would not have been possible because Dad had avoided army duty due to the atrocious treatment meted out to Jews.

There was also a suggestion that Serry go on Hachshara. This was a youth program started by the Kibbutz Movement all over Europe whereby Jewish teenagers lived on collective farms learning Hebrew and farming whilst waiting permission from the British to enter Palestine. Only a trickle was granted that permission. But this plan did not go very far. We were too far from where such programs were being organised, and it was probably too late, with many people ahead of her wanting to take that option. Dad also suggested he try to go to South America on his own but Mum, fearing that something bad might happen to him, persuaded him not to go.

On October 10th, 1938, my father, together with many other Jews, was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to a prison in Waldenburg. Luckily, he was released after a couple of days. Then, on the 28th of October, there was an attempt to extradite us. The Germans decreed that all Polish nationals had to return to their "homeland" even though the Polish government had revoked their passports, making them stateless. 15,000 Polish-born Jews who had been living and working in Germany, some up to thirty years, were forced to take one suitcase, leaving all their other possessions behind. We were amongst these people.

I remember my mother packing her large handbag full of silver cutlery, possibly thinking she would be able to sell it, and a small suitcase of clothes. In her panic she forgot to take food. My vivid recollection is of many people milling around on the station platform and a blind old man sitting on a suitcase quite alone. Serry remembers a man wearing three hats. We made our journey by train to the border to Beuten (known as Bytom in Polish) amid gunfire shots from both sides of the border. We spent the night at the railway station and the next day we were transported in a cattle truck to Breslau. Then we were released to go home. How lucky we were that the Polish guards wouldn't let the train pass through into Poland.

Although we were very relieved to be back in our apartment, things got worse and worse. My father's working permit was confiscated and we had to live on our savings and any outstanding money from customers who still felt some obligation to pay. Then on the 9th November, 1938, the earnest anti-Jewish onslaught began with Kristallnacht when synagogues, houses and shops were burnt and Jews were beaten and tormented. I must have been protected from knowing what was going on because I carry no memory of that momentous turning point in the lawlessness against Jews.

Our town with very few Jews had one incident that we know of. The large guesthouse owned and run by the elderly Ruschin sisters was the easy target. Serry remembers being told the next day, that they were put on an upstairs landing and a group of hooligans chopped down the bannisters around them, and then broke everything, including the windows. . . . “The Nazi scum broke into the guesthouse and beat up the sisters and closed them down as a Jewish ‘den of iniquity.’”

Now it was official policy. All Jews were told to leave the country. Those who could afford to pay or who somehow scraped together the money for the compulsory taxes were allowed to leave—if they could find a country to accept them. They were forced to surrender 80 percent of their property and savings and were allowed to take just 250 Reichsmarks, a paltry amount. Those who were unable to leave, had their bank accounts frozen. Most countries were reluctant to accept hordes of impoverished refugees. No wonder many of the poorer Jews were left to their fate to perish later in the concentration camps.

If there was one positive outcome of Kristallnacht it was the action of the Jewish community in England. A plea by British Jews in the House of Commons under Neville Chamberlain enabled unaccompanied children under the age of seventeen years to be allowed into Britain without a visa. The British organisation, the World Movement for the Care of Children from Germany, was begun by a Dutch social worker Gertrude Wijsmuller-Meyer. She went to Vienna to see Adolf Eichmann and demanded that 10,000 children be allowed to leave for England immediately. After suffering many indignities at the hands of the Gestapo, Wijsmuller-Meyer was granted permission to take 600 children out of Austria. And so the first Kindertransport was born and my life was ultimately saved by the heroic actions of this courageous lady. I regard her as my personal heroine. The Kindertransport between 1938 and 1939 saved approximately 10,000 children from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia. I am pleased that this book allows me, in a small way, to keep the knowledge of her actions alive more than sixty years later.

My parents saw this Kindertransport as the last opportunity to save their children. They thought we might have priority since we had family in London who would take us in. They had earlier written to distant family in Miami, pleading for them to help us. Their answer to my father was that they would see what they could do when they returned from their holidays. We never heard from them again. Luckily our English family didn’t feel the same way. They concentrated all their efforts on helping Serry and me. The English authorities would not accept the adults, except to be employed in menial jobs. Mum could not imagine becoming a maid. Even if she had accepted such an arrangement, it would not have included my father.

By May 1939, my parents had to assure the authorities in writing that they would leave Germany within four weeks. The police came daily to want us to go or we would be sent to a concentration camp. When the papers came through for my sister and me to leave, it was too late for my parents to leave legally.

So they then had only one possible escape route, the one provided them by Uncle Foal who was the husband of my mother’s oldest sister, Golda. He had visited us from Paris in 1937 and clearly saw “the writing on the wall.” After he returned home, Mum started sending some of her more precious possessions out of the country for them to take care of. The result of it is that some of her monogrammed linen, crockery and Havdala and Sabbath candlesticks were saved. I inherited the candlesticks and have passed them on to my daughter, Yvette. They now adorn her table on Friday nights. We are proud to tell Rachel, Daniel and Mimi about how lucky we are to have them, and talk to them about their great-grandparents. In one of the parcels, Mum hid a diamond ring in a tube of toothpaste called “Idol” and wrote a note to Golda telling her that the toothpaste would make her teeth shine like diamonds. Golda fortunately, had no trouble understanding the message.

Before they could contemplate leaving, my parents had to make arrangements for Serry and me to be looked after until we were safely on the boat to England. They felt that we would be safe but obviously, there were no guarantees. They organised their trusted friends the Ruschins to look after us until we were taken to Breslau to an orphanage. From there, we would be taken by train to board the boat to England. The letters back and forth to the relatives in England and to the Refugee Children’s Movement would also have taken some time. All the details had to be documented and sent—exactly who would be looking after us and who would escort us to the orphanage.

All the arrangements now in place, my parents finally had no reason to stay. They bid us farewell on that traumatic night of June 20th, only weeks before war was declared. We can never imagine the heartache, fear and desperation they felt at leaving us behind. There could have been many unforeseen developments, living as we were at the mercy of the Germans. They also knew that there was no certainty that they would successfully cross the border to Belgium. They had paid the smuggler 3,000 Reichmarks to escort them by train to a place close to the border. The rest of the way they needed to walk under cover of darkness, carrying a very small suitcase each.

From the moment they left us, Serry and I functioned on auto-pilot until we reached England. We simply did as we were told with no outward emotion. Neither of us remembers much of those last two weeks in Germany. We repressed our grief and fear as if in a deep hole.

Just before he left, Dad gave his tallis and tefillin to Serry and asked her to keep them safe for him until after the war. Was it because he really believed that we would meet again some day, or was it to leave a symbol of deep significance to future grandchildren if he didn't survive? The very next day the Gestapo came to arrest my parents because all Polish-born Jews were now being arrested. They had really left their escape till the very last minute. Of course, there was nobody at home. For many years I did not fully appreciate what a narrow escape they had had. A day or two later, a coded telegram came to the Ruschins from Brussels, letting us know that they had arrived safely at Dad's nephew's home. The telegram cryptically stated: "the uncle sends greetings." They were now preparing to travel to France to be with Mum's family in Paris. Frau Ruschin made Serry burn the telegram just in case the Gestapo thought Frau Ruschin was involved and she didn't want to be implicated.

Serry was, in fact, summoned to the Gestapo and it was Frau Horn who accompanied her, risking her own safety. Imagine a fifteen-year-old girl brought before a Nazi official in full regalia with the swastika flags all around, to be interrogated about parents who had just illegally left the country! Asked where they were, Serry, who was shaking with terror, blurted that they were out of the country and that she had received a telegram but had destroyed it. The Gestapo didn't believe her but Frau Horn supported her story. The Frau had a very strong character and was very German. She stood very erect and, with her stern demeanour, cut an imposing figure. They were both allowed to leave.

A few days later we were taken by train to the Jewish orphanage in Breslau where we stayed until we were shipped out to safety. Our kindly neighbours did not keep us because it was believed that orphan children were more easily allowed to exit Germany. From the orphanage to the arrival in London, my sister and I have a huge gap in our memory. I do remember a few things, for instance, that I had a small suitcase and on the inside of the cover was a list of its contents. The Government had restrictions on what we could take with us. There was a name-tag attached to a string around my neck and I was clutching my two dolls, Ruth and Peter, the only toys I was allowed to take with me. They were my comfort and somehow helped me to keep in touch with reality. Everything else around me seemed like a dream. In Serry's suitcase she had her knitting and hidden in a skein of wool was a ring Mum had given her. It was forbidden to take jewellery out of the country and Serry was absolutely terrified of the ring being discovered. She realised that she was jeopardizing our safety, but followed our mother's wishes.

The trauma must have been immense for both of us, to have such a blank about those events. The things that were happening to us were overwhelming, almost impossible for the mind to grasp. I don't remember anything of my time at the orphanage, or the name of the ship that we left on. I remember other children being given their last cuddles and kisses and their parents waving goodbye to them. I badly missed my parents and felt again that I had been abandoned. There were so many children and so many instructions! As I write, I am trying hard to remember any other details, but I only find confusion. I am still making efforts to find out about that time in our life. . . .

Neither Serry nor I remember eating on our train journeys, nor drinking, nor going to the toilet, although someone must have been taking care of us. It was almost as if we were frozen all the way. . . .

The boat that we sailed on was the second last boat out of Germany. I found out later that one other boat was able to leave in July. Serry has memories of shaking off her distress to comfort some of the younger children who were sea-sick. I shared a bunk with a girl with curly red hair and I inherited her lice. On my arrival at my cousin's house in London, I suffered the humiliation of having lice for quite a long time before I alerted my cousin to my discomfort and shame.

JOSEPH ROSENBERG

Context: Central Europe

Source: Joseph Rosenberg. Cutting My Life in Two: A Holocaust Memoir. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2010, pp. 1–4. Used by permission.

Joseph Rosenberg was born and raised in the small Hungarian city of Nyírtass, but moved to Nyíregyháza, near Budapest, in 1941. At that stage the Holocaust had not yet hit Hungary, though a number of antisemitic measures were already in place. As a 12-year-old, his life revolved largely around school and home, though he was certainly aware of some of the unsavory developments taking place outside. In this account, he provides a useful glimpse into what it was like to be a young boy in this pre-Holocaust environment, where it seemed as though peace would prevail indefinitely. His testimony ends with the ominous words that by 1943 “my parents and neighbors were becoming very anxious about the war and the situation of the Jews.”

I was born Josef Rosenberg on a farm in Nyírtass, Hungary, in 1929, on December 23 or December 26. I don't know the exact date because we didn't celebrate birthdays. My parents were Nachman (Nathan) and Mindel (Malwyn). My father, Nachman, was a salesman, and my mother, Mindel, was a housewife, raising five sons. I had four brothers: Jenó, or Jachiel (1923), Ferenc, or Fischel (1925), Beru (1926), Miklós, or Miksa (1927), and then me, Josef (1929).

When I was three years old, my parents decided to leave the farm. I am not precisely sure why they left the farm; however, I know those years were hard times for farmers in Hungary. After World War I . . . prices for agricultural products were unstable and subject to tariffs in Europe and the United States. This made it difficult to export agricultural products. Then in the late 1920s and early 1930s, during the beginnings of the Great Depression, grain prices declined. . . .

We moved to Nyíregyháza, in northeast Hungary, a bigger city, with a population, in 1941, of 59,156. . . .

In Nyíregyháza, my family eventually owned an apartment building with six apartments: one for us; one for my aunt and uncle, my father's brother; one for the rabbi; one for a widow and her son; and the two others were rented by businessmen.

Because he was a salesman and had to travel, my father was away for long periods of time, but he came home some weekends and always on holidays. I remember one time when my father was home on Chanukah when we played cards, usually the game “21,” with him and other relatives.

My mother worked very hard, doing housework and raising five boys. She worked every hour, every day—24/7 as they say nowadays. In those days, life was more arduous; we had to carry the water from a neighbor's well. Mother would wash our clothes in a wooden tub, scrubbing them on a washboard. Although she had many chores, she prayed every night, seven days of the week; she was religious. Mother was a fine cook. I especially remember a delicious dish she made for Passover—sweet brine and matzos. Everyone liked this dish and would tell us: “Make sure your mother brings the matzos.”

Mother was very loving, I remember her taking me to a doctor when I was sick. She was crying because I was so ill. When we were walking home from the doctor's I told her, “Don't cry.” Another time when I was seven or eight years old I had a terrible toothache, but I didn't tell my mother. But my mouth and cheek swelled, and she realized something was wrong. When she took me to the doctor's, he told her the tooth was infected and if I didn't have surgery, the infection would go to my brain. My parents took me to a hospital where I had surgery and the infection cleared up.

Once I remember that Mother and I walked a few blocks from our home to a farm to buy milk. The farmer let my mother milk the cow for our milk. My mother squirted a little warm milk in my face. She also let me drink the milk directly from the cow. She was fun to be with.

I was a happy little boy growing up. I helped around the house. I played. I remember friends coming over to my house. Once I was sick, and my schoolmates came to visit me.

I was a religious person like my parents. My family was orthodox; therefore, we kept the Sabbath. We went to synagogue nearly every day. We had a synagogue in our back yard, for the rabbi rented an apartment from us. He had a shul where fifty families belonged. There was a minyán [a quorum of ten Jewish males] nearly every day. We sometimes went to the magnificent orthodox synagogue, which was famous because it was designed by the renowned architect, Lipót Baumhorn. Our synagogue was built between 1924 and 1932. I remember the bright colors on the walls and the Biblical scenes.

This synagogue survived the Shoah. . . .

Nyíregyháza was a famous religious community. In 1864 the city was chosen to be the site of a conference of forty-five Orthodox rabbis. The conference's aim was the condemnation of Hasidism, a sect of these forty-five rabbis, known as misnagdim (literally, “opponents”). Nyíregyháza was also the site of nineteenth-century blood libel trial—the belief that Jews use the blood of Christian children to make matzos for Passover.

Years later, antisemitism was still a problem and became worse as the 1930s and 1940s trudged on. I experienced some myself. I went to Hebrew school, to cheder. I attended public school for seven grades, learning history, grammar, reading, and writing. I didn't go to gymnasium, similar to U.S. high school but more advanced, because of the quota laws. . . .

I remember other persecutions because I was Jewish. As I said, antisemitism was nothing new for Nyíregyháza. By the late 1930s and early 1940s, even children were targets of antisemitism. The non-Jewish kids called me “Jew,” as if it was an epithet. I could tolerate their calling me names; however, when they hit or shoved me, I fought with them. My brothers protected me a couple of times; they were stronger than I. There was not as much discrimination in school, mostly on the street.

One day, when I was eight or nine years old (1937 or 1938), I went to the barber shop. The barber, a non-Jew, cut off one of my side curls, payos. He did this to mark me. I never felt the same about my country again; we were always second class citizens in Hungary.

Despite the antisemitism and the rumors of persecution of the Jews in Poland and other countries, my life went on fairly normally. In 1942, towards the end of December, when I was thirteen, I had my Bar Mitzvah. On Saturday evening, I was called up to the bimah to the Torah and I said Berakhot (beginning with the word barukh, [blessed or praised]). All my brothers had gone through the same rite of passage when they had become obligated to obey the commandments. My parents had a gathering afterwards when I had to say a speech about my responsibilities as a Jewish man. Gefilte fish, challah, and wine were served at this reception. It was a relatively simple affair—there were no caterers then.

By 1943, my parents and neighbors were becoming very anxious about the war and the situation of the Jews.

FELA ROSENBLOOM

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Fela and Felix Rosenbloom. Miracles Do Happen: Memoirs of Fela and Felix Rosenbloom. Newham (Victoria): Scribe Publications, 1994, pp. 11–14. Used by permission.

Fela Perelman (later Rosenbloom) was a 16-year-old when the Nazis invaded Poland in September 1939, and in this account she describes the very personal impact the invasion had on her and her family relationships. Strictly speaking, this is an account of Fela's experience in a German labor camp, once she had been “recruited” from the ghetto to go and work in Germany. It is an intimate description of an often-overlooked dimension of how wartime was encountered; not of murder, but of a way in which staying alive could be found in and when an opportunity presented itself.

When the war broke out in 1939 I could not comprehend what had happened, could not make any sense out of it. I was only sixteen years old. Suddenly I found myself living under German occupation. All Jews, including my father, lost their livelihoods. Then, in April 1940, the whole Jewish population was herded into a ghetto, like in medieval times. Over 200,000 were squeezed into a few kilometres in the poorest, dirtiest part of the city. Most of them were disposed, without work, without food. I grew up quickly to understand the enormity of the tragedy.

Felix did not trust the Germans from the first day of their arrival in our city. As their brutality towards Jews mounted from day to day, he feared that the situation of the Jewish people in Poland, especially the young men among them, would deteriorate dramatically. On 21 November 1939 Felix fled Lodz, with the consent of his parents, and went to the eastern Polish territories, occupied by the Soviet Union. It was a very sad day for his family and for myself. His parents worried a lot about how he would cope with the difficulties of everyday life in those uncertain times. Not one day went by that they did not mention Felix, their beloved, only son. His mother had tears in her eyes whenever she spoke about him.

I knew that Felix's parents loved me, but his departure brought us closer together. Immediately after his departure, they asked my mother's permission for me to stay with them for a week. Fulfilling his mother's wish, I slept in Felix's bed during the whole week I was with them. I left the ghetto in April 1941 when Felix's mother insisted that I take a portion of her bread ration, and practically forced me to eat it on the spot.

I wrote regularly to the Rosenblooms from Unterdiessen by Landsberg, my first labour camp in Germany. Once I received from them a parcel, containing summer dresses, shoes and a beautiful scarf: it was a special gift from Felix's father. I was envied by every girl in the camp. In the end I had to cut the scarf in two and give away one half to my friend. Felix was in the Soviet Union and I was in Germany—a world apart—with a slim chance of seeing each other again. However, that did not stop Felix's parents from caring for me. I loved them and respected them, hoping to show them my gratitude one day. Unfortunately, their lives were cut short—they perished in the gas ovens of Auschwitz in August 1944. . . .

The first summer in the ghetto was bad enough. Then came the winter. There was not yet any organized food or ration distribution. People—especially the elderly—starved to death or died of cold. Bread queues stretched for miles. Soup kitchens were the main supply of nourishment. But to obtain a bowl of soup one had to line up from early morning until late in the day.

My family suffered terribly. They believed that God was with them and would not let them down. I was the oldest and my brothers and sister looked to me for an example; but I just lay in bed, starving and crying all the time. I was not pushy enough for the bread queues and too proud to stand all day in line for a bowl of soup. I was disappointed with life, depressed, and very weak.

When spring arrived at last, there was an announcement that young women were sought to work in German labour camps. I enlisted as soon as possible. Of 15,000 women registered, only sixty-eight were accepted. I was the last one. My parents agreed that I should enlist. They knew that I would not survive in the ghetto. I was too proud, I was not tough enough for it. In Germany, they thought, I might have a slim chance.

A few days later, in April 1941, I took leave of my family and went to the assembly point for the departure to Germany. The most difficult one to part with was my young sister Bella. She loved me so much. She was ten years old at the time and was very dear to me. The first labour camp they brought me to was Underdiessen, near Landsberg, in Bavaria. They housed us in three wooden barracks, surrounded by a barbed-wire fence, and we were sent out to work in the fields of a large flax enterprise. It was very hard work for us, city girls not used to such labour. Our hands bled and all our bones ached after a long day in the field.

We were given not enough food; however, we were better off there than in the ghetto. Nevertheless, it was a sad life. We were not allowed to go out of the compound or to have any contact with the outside world. We entertained ourselves by celebrating each girl's birthday; we wrote cards and poems. I used to do a lot of the latter to occupy my mind. We also read books.

In the autumn we were transferred to Buchl, to work in a factory which processed the raw flax. We stayed there all winter. In the spring of 1942 they sent us to Lohof, near Munich, where we did the same work as in Underdiessen. Late in 1942 our whole group was sent to an ammunition factory in Augsburg. There we were employed in the production of very small weapons' parts. They taught us to operate machines and to use magnifying glasses and tweezers. They called us by our proper names—"Fraulein this" or "Fraulein that"—instead of by the first names we had been called in other camps. The German supervising engineers were the first people in Germany to treat us like human beings.

Although it was strictly forbidden to have any contact with us, one incident is worth noting. A German worker quietly approached us and told us that he, his wife, and son would like to help us. He suggested that he and his young son could mend our worn shoes and his wife would try to get for us articles of hygiene, which we needed very much. Every day we left a parcel of a few pairs of worn shoes at an arranged spot and he picked it up, mended the shoes at night, and delivered them to the same spot the next day. We also got from him the articles of hygiene, which his wife brought for us. All of us were very grateful to those noble Germans. They kept helping us until we left Augsburg.

FELA ROSENBLOOM

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Fela and Felix Rosenbloom. Miracles Do Happen: Memoirs of Fela and Felix Rosenbloom. Newham (Victoria): Scribe Publications, 1994, pp. 14–21. Used by permission.

In this remarkable account, Fela Rosenbloom describes how, in early 1943, she arrived at Auschwitz and was "processed" into the camp; tattooed, shaved, showered, and dressed in clothing deemed appropriate for a prisoner, prior to being released into the camp proper. It is a detailed account that explains what happened next; after a regimen of hard labor with poor food, and in a situation of little or no sanitation, she contracted typhoid fever and almost died. In fact, she describes how she begged for death to take her and release her from her dreadful state. That she survived was exclusively on account of her being "adopted" by another prisoner (also named Fela) in the infirmary. This is a remarkable story of salvation in the face of a situation that would otherwise almost certainly have resulted in Fela's death.

In the spring of 1943, the policy of the Nazis changed: they set about making Germany Judenrein—that is, to cleanse it of all Jews. They gave each of us a ration of bread and marmalade, told us to pack our meagre belongings, and put us on a train, ostensibly going to a labour camp in Poland. While we were being searched before our departure, one official told me to throw away my many small items of a sentimental nature—my friends' birthday greetings and letters—and to replace them in my suitcase with food. There was, however, no food available. Two days later we arrived at a railway station marked Auschwitz. . . .

The first thing they did was to take away all my possessions and tattoo in ink a number with a triangle on my left forearm. Each time the needle went into my skin it drew blood. It seemed to take such a long time but I still did not know what was ahead of me. This was only the beginning; we were so ignorant. We had no idea what was happening to us because we had never heard of this place before.

Then they shaved off my hair completely. I cried so much. I had such beautiful hair. At that time it was fashionable to have ringlets like Shirley Temple's, and when they shaved off my hair I became numb. With every cut I died a little. Everything inside me died. From that moment on, I felt that I was not alive any more, because my mother had always been so proud of my hair. My mother always used to tell me: "Oh, you're beautiful." When the Germans invaded Poland, her only worry was that they might cut off my hair. That was her biggest worry. She did not suspect that something worse could happen to me.

I will never forget the beginning of that madness. I felt: "this is the end. Something is very wrong."

Afterwards we had to stand completely naked in a queue and a woman started to shave off my pubic hair. German SS men with machine guns were standing around us and watching. I was told to stand with my legs wide apart to make her job easier. I was an innocent girl. No man had seen me naked before.

Then they sent us for a shower in a big building. After the shower, we had to get some clothes. Our own had been taken away by the female inmates who were in charge of us. There was a huge table with clothing on it, from which I was handed a Russian soldier's uniform which felt as though it had come from the First World War. After I put it on, somebody painted a large cross on my front and back. They also gave me a scarf to put on but my bare head could not hold anything; it was too slippery.

When I went out I caught a look at my face in the reflection of a window. I thought: "This is Hell. This is impossible. What is happening here cannot happen in a real world among normal people. How could normal people do things like this to other people?" It did not make any sense. I did not understand it. Why did they do this to me? What for?

I thought: "The one who arrived here is dead. This is not me. From now on, I am not the same. I am a different person and I don't know what they want from me." I wanted to die. I said to myself: "I'm still alive. I'm dead and alive." I did not know whether I was more alive or more dead. I was thinking: "How can I walk? How can I look at myself? The best thing for me would be to drop dead. Just to drop dead." That was my wish.

Afterwards, they kept us in quarantine for six weeks. When it ended, we sixty-eight girls, who had been together for so long, were separated and sent to different barracks. I was assigned to Auser-kommando 104 (outside work outfit 104). We were led to work by armed SS men with large dogs. We were made to carry heavy rocks from one place to another. The hard labour was of no use to anybody; its only aim was to inflict pain and humiliation, to torment us. On the way to and from the camp we saw the smoking crematoria chimneys. We understood. This was where all of us would end up. The German guards jokingly told us that this was the Himmel-kommando (the heavens' work outfit).

The daily routine of terrible hunger, cold, exhaustion, overcrowding, and lack of the most basic means of personal hygiene, coupled with cruel beatings, soon reduced the number of able-bodied inmates considerably. To make things worse, an epidemic of typhoid fever raged in the camp. In the late autumn I, too, succumbed to the epidemic.

A lot of people were sick. They were taken to the so-called sick-bay, an empty barracks with no doctors, no medications, without anything to help the sick. There were just a number of orderlies doing their best—which did not amount to much. The sick were cramped on the bunks as in the other barracks.

They put me beside a girl who had diarrhea. I could feel her wet, soiled legs. She had high temperature and so had I. Once a day they came round with some food—a piece of bread and some watery stuff called tea. I covered my head and refused to take it. I said: "I am not hungry, I do not want to live." I was not sorry for myself, I was quite happy. I thought: "Now is probably the end of my suffering and I'm glad it will soon be over." I had lost my will to live. I was sure that I could not survive in those surroundings. It was just a matter of time.

In the sick-bay, selections were an everyday occurrence. When a selection was on, everybody had to be down from their bunk and on their feet. The SS men would walk through the barracks and assess each inmate. The inmates whose numbers were written down by them were sent to the gas chambers. The people who did not come down from their bunks were automatically sent to the gas chambers.

A few days after I was admitted to the sick-bay, a selection took place. I did not come down from the bunk. Some people were afraid to show their forearms. They wanted to live. In those terrible conditions, sick and miserable, treated worse than animals, they still wanted to live. If they could, they would hide in the tiniest nook or cranny, just to escape being sent to death, just to stay alive a little longer.

It was a large barracks, housing about 1,000 sick women. I was lying semi-conscious and happy in the knowledge that I would not suffer much longer. That evening somebody woke me up. It was Fela Hamer, a girl from our original group of sixty-eight. She was a nursing aide in the sick-bay, and she had spotted me by pure accident.

She said: “Fela, is that you? I can’t believe it. You have been put on the list for the gas chamber. You are too young to die. I must save you.” I begged her to leave me, to let me go. I kept on repeating: “Please let me die.” Another girl overheard us and started to yell at Fela: “Please save me, I want to live, she doesn’t want to, please save my life.” Fela told her that she could save only one and she wanted to save me. To this very day the desperate voice of that girl rings in my ears.

The notorious Dr. Mengele was at that time the commanding officer. Fela went to him and told him that I was her sister and the only one left in the family. She begged him not to send me to the gas chambers. Although he was not such a noble person, Mengele granted her wish because Fela was respected by the Germans for being a very good worker. Maybe it was pure luck that, when Fela approached him, the usually beastly doctor was in a good mood.

I had been having a dream when Fela Hamer woke me up. My body felt as light as a feather, and I was moving upwards, higher and higher. I felt no pain at all. I heard a horrible noise of the wheels of a passing express train and through it a loud voice calling my name: “Fela Perelman, Fela Perelman” (my maiden name). When I woke up at Fela Hamer’s urging, I heard a nursing aide say: “This one will not survive the night. In the morning we will have a corpse.”

That following night was the night of the crisis. Without medication, lying beside a diarrhea sufferer, I survived. But to survive the crisis was not enough. I was still sick with typhoid; I was still so weak. The problem was, how could I survive the next selection and not be sent to the gas chamber? In normal times, when one has typhoid fever, one goes to a hospital, has medical attention, is on a proper diet, is cared for, and has the affection of one’s family and friends. I was alone, without help, worse than an animal. Nobody cared about me except my girlfriend, Fela Hamer. To me, she was like an angel. What she did for me was the only normal thing in that mad world with mad people called Auschwitz. She took me into her quarters and gave me some food, but I had no appetite.

The next day, before the trucks came to pick up the sick people marked for the gas chambers, Fela gave me a nurse’s uniform to put on. She forced me to get up, because it was dangerous to stay on the bunk. I could not walk, so she made me lean on her back. When the SS men made a roll-call I stood behind her and nobody could see that I was so sick. She washed me, dressed me, and did everything else that was needed.

As sick as I was, I had to do some work, because I was supposed to be a nursing aide. I had to help my friend get the sick people onto the trucks—the trucks that were taking them to the gas chambers. What an irony! I was meant to be one of them. I was too weak to be of any help.

I was given a chance to survive but I needed the physical strength to carry out some nursing duties. There were no toilets in the barracks. To relieve themselves, people used large buckets, one in each corner. I was asked to carry the buckets to a special truck, a fair distance away. It was winter, snow was falling, and the ground was slippery as I went out carrying a heavy bucket. I walked step by step, frightened that I might slip. While carrying the heavy bucket, I had to cross over a deep gutter. I had no strength at all. I put the bucket on the ground first, then lifted one knee with both my arms, and then the other knee. To empty the bucket into the truck I had to lift it up on a ladder. In the days to come, this was the job I had to do a few times daily.

When I recovered and was fit enough, Fela told me that it would be better for me to go back to the camp. She saved my life and I regained the will to live.

RITA ROSS

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Rita Ross. The Sum of Three: Rutka, Jadzia, Rita. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2013, pp. 32–39. Used by permission.

During the Holocaust, Jews not only subsisted as best they could in ghettos; they often also hid in the so-called “Aryan” areas outside the ghetto walls. In order to do so, they inevitably needed the assistance of friendly non-Jews prepared to take enormous risks in carrying out their life-saving work. Rita Ross and her family were the recipients of such help, and in this account Rita provides a very useful set of insights into how those in her position managed to find ways to live under the most trying of circumstances—and, importantly, also how the interactions took place between the Nazis and the righteous Poles who tried to shield their Jewish neighbors.

My father had always been an optimist, positive in his thoughts and actions. This attitude is what enabled him to survive during that time. Once again, he was determined to harness his natural resources and try to earn some money. He managed to obtain Aryan identity documents as although he had dark eyes and hair, he did not look Semitic. He even grew an “Adolf Hitler mustache,” then the fashion among many men, and was quite confident in his ability to pass as a Pole.

He began dealing in scrap metal in Warsaw, where he rented a room at the back of a Konditorei, a cake shop. He came to Pruszkow only at weekends, always with a box of pastries and my favourite, cheesecake.

The watch-repairing venture had resumed between Mozenko and Karol; now my father and Lucja Klimek joined the team. My father collected watches from Mozenko while Lucja sourced others in need of repair. They were all brought to Pruszkow to be repaired by Karol, and then taken back to Warsaw by Lucja and my father. In this way we managed to create a small source of income, which was supplemented by my father’s scrap metal deals.

Antoni Klimek was unable to contribute financially as he was in hiding as well, though for different reasons. Having witnessed the atrocities committed when the Wołomin Ghetto was liquidated, he found it abhorrent to continue working on the railway for the German army. When he helped the Bermans escape from their temporary refuge in the Wołomin railway station, he too became a fugitive. Knowing he was now a wanted man, and that the Nazis would come searching for him, Antoni and the Bermans fled to Pruszkow together. This was an additional element in a situation already volatile and fraught with extreme danger.

Antoni had to keep a very low profile and left our building only for a few hours every day, while always keeping a lookout for German soldiers. Not only did he risk his and his family’s lives by hiding us, our welfare drove him to take extraordinary chances. He returned from his daily escapades with wheat he had somehow obtained from farmers, as well as sausages, potatoes and onions. I don’t know if any of these items were obtained legally or not. Antoni milled the wheat and Lucja, Mania and my mother were the bakers and pastry-cooks. He insisted we consume large amounts of onions daily, as they were the only available source of vitamin C. This was necessary to avoid dental problems. It worked, because I do not recall any of us having to consult dentists.

Occasionally Antoni came back with a treat, horse meat. No one asked him how he had obtained it—it was food and very much appreciated by the adults as a change from our staple diet of bread, potatoes and onions. However it did not appeal to me. I still preferred my rye bread sprinkled with sugar, or the ultimate treat, cheesecake, which I consumed with passion whenever my father could supply it.

For the first fifteen months of our time in hiding my father commuted between Pruszkow and Warsaw. He and Karol Berman, two Jews, were the breadwinners for eleven people. They continued to do this until early 1944, when it became too dangerous, particularly after the heroic Warsaw Ghetto Uprising which lasted from 19 April to 16 May 1943. The situation was very tense. Poles prowled the streets looking for anybody with Semitic features.

My father’s luck seemed to have run out. One day, while still in Warsaw, he was accosted by two Poles, taken to an alley and ordered to drop his trousers. When the evidence of his religion became apparent he was threatened with immediate exposure. His false identity card was taken from him. Speechless with terror, he stared death in the face. For some unknown reason he never understood, the Poles said they would not denounce him and would even return his identity card, on condition he met them at a designated place with a certain amount of money. Some years later my father spoke to me of this episode. He told me he had said to the thugs, “How do I know I can trust you? How do I know you will let me go?” They replied, “You have no choice.”

He borrowed and scraped together an amount of money, met them as agreed and against all odds, they returned his identity card and let him go. But from then on there was no choice for him but to go back to Pruszkow and stay permanently hidden. And so he became a permanent occupier of the foldaway bed.

I was overjoyed to have my father (my Tata) with me at all times and not to have to wait for a whole week, or sometimes more, until I saw him again. I missed the cheesecake he always brought me but nothing was as good as having him with me, without being separated.

Years later, during Reginka’s and my frequent reminiscences, she spoke of our incredible good fortune in knowing the watchmaker, Mozenko. Now that my father was unable to collect the watches, Mozenko brought them to Karol out in Pruszkow and collected them in due course. I did not remember any of this, but Reginka did.

Recalling this, I am overcome. Mozenka—that is all I know of him, just that name. The man who informed my father of the Bermans’ survival and their hiding place; the man who was instrumental in the meeting that led to our survival, and who subsequently assisted us financially by providing work for Karol. I am astounded by his extraordinary compassion and selflessness. There was no turning back, no alternative to the situation facing us. There was only one goal—survival—for six Jews, four Poles and a new baby born on 1 September 1944.

To supplement our living expenses, my mother, Lucja and Mania began baking biscuits, which Lucja and Reginka took around the shops to sell. There was little chance of Reginka's blue eyes and blonde hair endangering our lives and Lucja had no problems introducing "her niece." Although my mother bleached her hair as protection in the remote possibility of unannounced visitors arriving, she could not risk venturing outside and in the two years we spent with the Klimeks, like me, she never did. There was always an air of danger, as the Poles had a special talent for identifying Jews and the financial reward was enticing.

What did I do with myself in those two years? I had my special little chair in the corner of the living room and there I sat with my doll, entering a world of fantasy in which I had freedom, friends, could go to school and play in the park. Although restrained physically, there were no frontiers in the world of my imagination.

My mother taught me to read and write, so I read all sorts of novels copiously. The first novel I read was a Russian classic by Mikhail Sholokhov. It might not have been quite suitable for a little girl and my mother refused to explain certain parts of it to me. Until the day she died she recalled the pain she felt at seeing me play by myself, while Halinka and Zosia were at school and Reginka able to go out without much risk.

The Klimeks seldom had visitors, but for when they did the adults had devised a plan. The door was taken off the toilet and the back removed from a free standing wardrobe, which was pushed against the open space. If anyone knocked on the door we would immediately walk through the wardrobe into the toilet and stay there until it was safe to come out. I recall an incident when a neighbour came to visit Lucja. As usual, we climbed through the door of the wardrobe, my mother being the last one in. But her dress caught in the wardrobe door and she had to stay there while the neighbour admired Lucja's dress.

Just as we had always feared, one day the Nazis came looking for Antoni. He had also prepared for this and used his electrical expertise to install two front door bells. One in a hidden crevice was known to very few people, while the other was in open view. When the Nazis pressed the easily accessible bell, Antoni sensed danger. He quickly hid in the attic while we hid in the toilet. Lucja let them in. Upon being questioned, she innocently told them she had not seen her husband for two months.

Lucja's origin was an immense help to us. Antoni spoke German. He and Lucja would often deliberately argue loudly in the apartment to make sure their German conversation was overheard by the neighbours. Lucja's nationality and mother tongue now became a formidable shield, a safety net for six Jewish lives.

When the Nazis came that time, Lucy was heavily pregnant and utterly Germanic in her speech and manner. Her portrayal of a typical German Hausfrau (housewife) was faultless. It was such a convincing performance she would never have been suspected of harboring Jews. The Germans' only interest in her family was Antoni's whereabouts.

That this slight, pregnant woman standing at the threshold of the door was the only barrier between us and the Nazis was barely plausible. They were only a few feet away from us, separated by a flimsy wardrobe, some hanging clothes and Lucja's small frame. The Nazis left believing she was a deserted wife, but warned her they would be back.

MARIANNE ROTH

Context: Before the War

Source: Marianne Roth. "Krystallnacht 1938: The Sister's Story." In Julie Meadows (Ed.). Memory Guide My Hand: An Anthology of Autobiographical Writing by Members of the Melbourne Jewish Community. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 1998, pp. 48–50. Used by permission.

The testimony that follows is best read alongside that of Hans Friend, also in this volume. Marianne and Hans, a sister and brother, lived in Berlin before the outbreak of war. When Marianne wrote her recollection of the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, Hans decided it was necessary for him to also put pen to paper by way of a corrective to Marianne's account. Together, they show how two eyewitnesses can arrive at different conclusions from the same experiences. In Marianne's case, as can be seen from the testimony, her observations were drawn largely from what she witnessed at home, while those of Hans came from a walk outside in the streets. Marianne's account ends with a postscript in honor of her mother, who became a victim of the Nazis after having been sent to Poland during the war.

This date marked the death sentence for European Jewry. The German Reich, on that day, demonstrated an open display of violence and murder against its Jewish population and there was nobody there to stop them. It led inevitably to the murder of my mother and of our whole large extended family—old people, young people, children. A thriving, educated, industrious society disappeared. Those few who managed to escape enriched their adopted countries in many fields of endeavor.

Hans and I were eyewitnesses to that dreadful night. The year was 1938; I was 18 years of age and still at school studying for my matriculation. I was attending a Realgymnasium, a private Jewish high school, where English, French and Latin were being taught, as well as mathematics, physics, chemistry, art, music, geography and biology. My father Eugene was Head of the Science Department.

On 9 November we were sent home from school at lunch-time, as a private aktion against Jews was anticipated. My mother asked me and my young brother Hans not to go out. Against her wishes I said, “Hans, we have to know what’s going on. We need to know for posterity.” Neither of us looked Jewish and I felt we were safe in the streets.

We left our apartment in Charlottenburg, Berlin, and walked towards our synagogue on the Fasanen Street. There we witnessed a mob of people, in broad daylight, shouting and cheering as they watched our synagogue burn. The mob was ecstatic, calling out vile and vicious things about the Jews. I believe the caretaker was burnt together with the synagogue, but whether he was trapped or had been locked in, I do not know.

We made our way home and saw Jewish shops being looted, windows smashed or painted over with swastikas or Magen Davids. Jewish men were being beaten. We later learnt that synagogues all over Berlin were burnt to the ground. The same night, the Nazis started rounding up Jewish men and even boys once they reached the age of sixteen. Most who were arrested were sent to concentration camps—to Dachau, Buchenwald or Sachsenhausen.

My father had been warned by his non-Jewish colleagues not to stay at home where he could be picked up. So my mother, father and brother stayed with Aunt Liese, who was widowed and then with another single aunt, as only where there were houses where there was no husband were safe to stay in. On 10 November, my father and brother walked the streets all through the night. So many arrests had taken place they no longer felt safe anywhere. My mother stayed with Aunt Liese that night and finally in the morning both Father and Hans went back there. They didn’t know what else to do.

Meanwhile, I was left in our flat in Charlottenburg with our maid, a woman in her late forties. Jewish families were forbidden to keep servants under the age of forty-five in case, horror of horrors, a sexual relationship developed between them which could produce a “racially impure” offspring. There had been no incidents where women or children had been taken away and it was felt that I was quite safe at home with the maid, keeping an eye on things.

But unknown to my parents, I was enduring daily, terrifying harassment since the day they left. Every night at eleven o’clock and every morning at six, two huge Gestapo men in black uniforms came to the door. They asked for my father and when I told them that I didn’t know where he was, they searched the flat, looking under beds and into wardrobes. They then asked me many questions about my family.

Each time they came, I would shake with fear, although I would hide it as best I could. After they would leave, the only thing that calmed my terror was to go into my father’s study and begin sketching. Art was my passion then, as it is today and I remember during that traumatic period doing many sketches of my left hand in various positions. The hand is not easy to capture on paper and the concentration it took helped the fear to subside and my courage to return a little.

One time, the Gestapo men saw the Blue Box and asked what it was. I was too afraid to lie and I said that we put money in it for Israel. One of them sneered, “Why don’t you all go to Israel?” If only we had! For a number of years, I felt that we were like flies caught in a spider-web, but my parents could not see it at all.

The men in black asked again and again, each time more violently, “Where are your parents?” I replied as I always did that I didn’t know, that they had gone out, but I didn’t know where. My interrogators finally lost all patience with me. One of them said, “You cheeky brat! You tell your father to stay at home or we’ll take you in his place!” I became very agitated. I had no way of knowing whether this was a mere threat of more stringent punishment of Jews.

The next day they came in the afternoon. When they had gone through the whole charade again, they made me ring my aunt to find if my parents were there. When she answered the phone I said, “Aunt Liese, I am so worried. Do you know where my parents are? I haven’t seen them for some days.” She answered, surprised, “They are right here drinking coffee. You know they are with me.” The Gestapo men were only three feet away, and watching me closely. “Auntie,” I said, “Is there any way you can find them for me? I need to talk to them urgently.” I hung up. “She says she’ll ring around and try to find them for me,” I said. “Maybe by tomorrow I will be able to tell you where they are.”

The Gestapo men left and I knew that it would be impossible to face them again. I left the flat, informing the maid that I was going to look for my parents. The Underground was close to our home and I took it to my aunt’s place. In a short time, to my great relief, I was reunited with my parents and Hans. When I told them what had been happening, they had to consider what to do next.

My father decided to trust that his reputation would protect him and to risk revealing his whereabouts. After all, he was highly regarded in his field and had warm relationships with many gentiles. He was a respected high school teacher, an examiner and a district head of teacher training. So a few days later, he went to the Charlottenburg Police Station, where he was questioned. The Police were quite civil to him and told him to go home and lock his door.

Four weeks later, he died from bronchial pneumonia and peritonitis. He had been sick since that fateful Krystallnacht when he had walked the freezing streets with my brother. His fear for our future had also worn him down. He was buried in the Berlin Jewish Cemetery, in Weisensee.

My brother Hans left in April 1939 for England with the Children’s Transport. One of my father’s colleagues was in charge of the list and he made sure that Hans was included. The reason he gave was that Hans was the only male left to carry the family name. After that, Mother sold most of our furniture and we moved into two rooms to live more cheaply.

Two years ago, nearly fifty years later, I visited the grave of my father. The pain that I could not express adequately when he died I had to feel in all its devastating strength this time. My mother has no grave that I can visit. Through a number of fortuitous events, I reached Melbourne at the onset of the war. Although we tried in every way possible to get her an entry visa, neither Hans nor I could get the authorities if England or Australia to accept our mother. It is a matter of continuing anguish for me that she was left to fend for herself and that we could not save her. . . .

Cecilie Margerethe Freund, aged 52, was taken from 31 Wielandstrasse on 14 April 1942, first to the Warsaw Ghetto and then to the gas chambers of the Trawnicky Concentration Camp soon after.

STEVE ROTSCCHILD-GALERKIN

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Steve Rotschild-Galerkin. Traces of What Was. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 60–64. Used by permission.

A child in Vilna (Vilnius), Lithuania, Steve Rotschild was born in 1933. While it was difficult enough for his family to hold body and soul together during the war years, by the summer of 1944 it seemed as though all options for keeping the Nazis at bay were exhausted. As a result, the decision was made to go into hiding and await liberation from the advancing Russians. Walking the highways and byways of Poland in the hope of finding the forest presented a number of problems, as outlined in this memoir. Eventually encountering some Russian soldiers, Steve and his mother were advised to wait before they could emerge into the light of day; their liberators were combat troops, and there was as yet no guarantee that German forces in the area had been vanquished.

It was a hot sunny day in the middle of July 1944. Two women carrying bundles and leading three small children didn’t raise any suspicion. We were walking to the kominy, which means chimneys in Polish, a neighbourhood about five kilometers away, on the other side of town where Fruma and her family had a big house and business. It was too dangerous to walk on the main road because too many people knew her there, so we had to take a longer, roundabout way.

She led us off the road into some woods not far from her house, then up a hill where among the tall pines we found a trench dug most likely by some soldiers as some kind of defensive position. There was no one in the woods, so Fruma told us to climb into the trench and wait for her. She herself would go to see some of her neighbours whom she could trust.

It was pleasant on the hill among the pines and even though it was a hot afternoon, the air was dry and breezy and I soon fell asleep in the shade of the trench. I woke up when I heard Fruma’s voice. She had returned with a few boiled potatoes tied up in a kerchief and a jar of milk. Fruma was a few years older than my mother, of average height with light brown hair tied in a bun and a fine, light complexion with rosy cheeks. She was very energetic, always busy doing something, and stood for no notice from anybody. She told Mother that there wasn’t anywhere to hide out here but she had a plan. We would walk to Charnobur, a village about fifteen kilometers away where Fruma was born and grew up, and where she had a good friend who might be able to help.

By now it was evening, too late to start out and the women decided that we should spend the night in the woods and start out early in the morning. As the sun set and night fell we settled down in the trench and I was soon fast asleep. Suddenly, I was awoken by a blinding white light that shone through my eyelids. I saw above us something that looked like a bright star with rays radiating from it, descending slowly. I heard the drone of airplanes, the shrieking whistle of a falling bomb and finally, an explosion that shook the earth. Then more earthshaking explosions preceded by the nerve-wracking shriek of the bomb and flares in the sky, turning night into a strange bluish-white daylight. Even at the bottom of the trench we were completely exposed, everyone's face a contrast of white planes and black shadows.

Mother was holding my little brother in her arms, Miriam was clinging to Fruma and I was sitting with my back against the wall of the trench, looking up at the sky. I wasn't afraid. These were Soviet planes, piloted by Russians; they were bombing the Germans and I was totally confident we wouldn't be harmed by these liberators in the sky. I remember feeling grateful that someone was finally coming to rescue us. Fruma said there was a munitions factory not far from where we were and that the Soviets were trying to bomb it. Eventually the last of the flares burnt out, the bombs fell further and further away and soon it was dark and quiet again and I fell asleep once more.

The next time I awoke it was with a feeling of dread. I heard a man's voice speaking in German and opened my eyes to see a German soldier standing above us on the edge of the trench, holding a rifle. We all looked up at him and didn't move. Assuming that we didn't understand what he was saying, he spoke in broken Polish, "Go home, bomb finished." Then he disappeared.

I looked out over the lip of the trench. Although the sky was a pale blue, the sun was not yet up and a low-lying mist in the trees was making everything look grey. There was no sign of the soldier who had taken us for Poles.

We left the trench and descended slowly from the hill. At the bottom, the woods ended at a dirt road. With Fruma leading, we crossed the road and went down into a field of tall grass sprinkled with purple, yellow and blue flowers. The air was fresh and cool and we were walking down a narrow path running straight east toward the sun. The long grass, wet with dew, bent toward the middle of the path and brushed my bare legs with a pleasant coolness. The scent of grass and flowers was strong and I felt good, almost happy, and all at once I got the urge to run.

I ran past Fruma and Miriam. I ran down the path through the wet grass, scaring some birds that flew away, twittering in panic, and as I ran faster I felt so light that I imagined I could fly away, just like those birds. When I reached a small rise in the field I stopped and looked back, picked a handful of stems and began to chew, extracting a sweetish milk liquid from the thick stems while waiting for the others to catch up.

Finally, we came to a major road, the one that would take us to the village of Charnobur, but after walking some distance, we encountered too many people, horse-drawn wagons and a truck full of German soldiers. Fruma led us back into the woods and we continued walking down a path that ran alongside the road. But even here we met people going the other way and it felt as though our luck was about to run out.

It must have been close to noon, for the air in the forest was hot, even in the shade. We weren't far from the village when a man walking toward us blocked our path. He was short and wiry, in his forties, wearing a dark suit and hat and his small face was tinted grey, with the stubble of hair of several days. In his clenched fists he carried a sturdy staff, with which he now blocked the way.

"I know who you are," he said. "You are Jews."

He had recognized Fruma. The women pleaded with him to let us go, but he wouldn't budge. Mother took my father's gold watch from her wrist and gave it to him. As she handed him the watch, his gaze fell on the two wedding rings on her fingers. She removed them quickly, and he took them also. Then Fruma removed her wedding ring and gave it to him as well. All the while, Mother and Fruma were begging him to let us go.

Through the trees we could see a convoy of German soldiers going toward Vilna, mostly retreating from the Russian front. The man, holding his staff like a weapon, ordered us to stay there and walked quickly to the road, stopping one of the trucks in the convoy, all the while pointing at us.

I thought for sure that this was the end and was getting ready to run into the forest, but then the German, whose arm was hanging out the open window of the truck, gave a dismissive wave with his hand and the truck took off, leaving the man standing in a cloud of dust. Not waiting another moment, we took off at a fast pace toward Charnobur, glancing back to see if the man would come after us. Fortunately we never saw him again.

Fruma's friend lived on an isolated farm that bordered one side of the forest near the village. There was a small house where the family lived and a large barn that stood some distance away on the fields between the house and the woods. It was in that barn, up in the loft where the hay and straw were kept, that Fruma's friend let us hide.

We stayed up there several days, maybe a week, without incident. Fruma's friend would come to the barn, usually at dawn, and bring some bread, potatoes, water and sometimes milk. There was nothing to do but look out at the fields and the woods through the cracks in the boards of the wall, but I saw no one, not even an animal. I don't know if we were there for three, four or ten days, as each day was exactly the same as the one before.

One morning as I lay on the hay, half-awake, waiting for the sound of the farmer's wife bringing food, I heard something from the direction of the woods. I quickly put my eye to a small hole in the edge of the board and looked out. Coming from the forest were several soldiers holding long rifles or machine guns, walking slowly toward the barn. A shiver went down my spine, my scalp tingled as the blood rushed to my head. Then I felt a surge of relief as if a threatening cloud had dissipated, letting the sun shine again. In the sharp, clear light of the early morning I had no doubt at all—these men were our liberators, the soldiers of the Red Army.

I told Mother and Fruma and then scrambled down the ladder and ran out the barn door. Mother and the others followed behind me. The soldiers stopped and waited for us to approach. The one in front, who must have been an officer, wore a round peaked hat with the red star on it and was holding a submachine gun with a round magazine attached, like the ones you see in the gangster films of the thirties. He was dressed the same as the others, in faded khaki shirts and pants tucked into dusty leather boots. The soldiers behind him wore long caps without the peaks, the red star on the front, and they were armed with rifles. As a group they did not look intimidating; they were smaller than the German soldiers we had seen the week before.

I was the first to speak. I said in Russian, "We are Jews." Mother, who was now beside me, also spoke in Russian, telling them we were hiding in the barn from the Germans. The reaction from the officer was not what I had expected. As far as I knew, most, if not all, the Jews of Vilna had been killed. I didn't imagine that anyone else from our camp had survived, so I expected that we would be taken to a safe place and treated as celebrities. Instead, the officer looked around before saying anything, as if he expected to see something beyond the barn and house. He told us that there were still Germans around and that we had better stay hidden another day or two. The Russians continued past the barn and past the house toward the village. Reluctantly, we went back to the barn and stayed there overnight.

KAZIMIERZ SAKOWICZ

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Kazimierz Sakowicz. Ponary Diary, 1941–1943: A Bystander's Account of a Mass Murder. New Haven: Yale University Press, © 2005, pp. 70–78. Used by permission of Yale University Press.

The Ponary Forest was the primary murder site of the Jews of Vilna and the region surrounding it. The forest was situated just a few miles south of Vilna (modern-day Vilnius, Lithuania), on the road to Grodno. It was well known before the war as a recreation area used for vacations and weekends away. From June 1941 until July 1944 at least 70,000 Jews were murdered at Ponary, together with Soviet prisoners of war and local residents who resisted the Nazis. In this extraordinary account, an eyewitness to the massacres, Kazimierz Sakowicz, relates his own observations of one of the massacres in an astonishing contribution to the memory of the Holocaust.

At last it [the train] arrived from Wilno and did not pass the house. So it remained in Ponary, because the sounds of the train's maneuvering could be heard. The policemen start a bonfire. Quiet! After midnight they go to sleep.

I wake up very early; quiet, already light. It is 5:20 in the morning. At about 6 the Gestapo arrive by vehicle. They open four freight cars and order the Jews to get out, but they don't move. Earlier, they were surrounded by a thick fence of Lithuanians and Gestapo. There are approximately 5–6 people in a row. They move.

The Jews are nervous, but they go. But when they came through the gate with the barbed wire and caught a glimpse from afar of the pits they understand what awaits them. The younger ones, even women, rushed to escape. A volley is fired. Five Jews [run] in the direction of the track—come up against the barbed wire; a German is after them and a few policemen heavy fire; 3 fall, and 2 get through a hole in the wire; but one immediately falls, hit before he even crossed the tracks. The second crossed the tracks to the forest facing me, but he began to limp and fell near a tree.

The rest of the Jews, mainly children and women, moved on. Facing the first pit a part of the procession is halted. A part—half of them—went on. When they reached the place where there is a thick forest, some courageous ones from this group again escaped.

The first group in front of the first pit is ordered to undress. Weeping, groaning, pleading, falling to the feet of the Lithuanians and Germans, who kick them and shoot the most importunate. But after they have been beaten, they undress about ten metres from the pit.

Those who have poor clothing do not undress. They are driven to the pits and the Lithuanians began to shoot from the side. Then a man, already half undressed, at a German's order, dragged a woman to the pit, evidently fainted or dead of a heart attack. When the woman was thrown into the pit, the man who threw her turned around. The Lithuanians shot him in the head from a short distance; the way in which the skull burst into pieces could be easily seen, and the person, cut down, fell. At the same time the rest are being beaten. Already 5 people, a woman and three little girls, have been placed at the end of the pit with their legs inside it; from the back a Lithuanian with a revolver shoots, and all of them disappear in the pit. Again a few dozen people are beaten with rifle butts and quickly driven to the bottom, to the pit. From the edges of the pit the Lithuanians shoot at them.

At that moment further shooting begins—as can be seen, the second half of the group is also being shot. On the edge of the pits, 7–8 men and women are positioned. From the back a revolver is placed practically at their heads, and a Lithuanian shoots. One after the other falls, cut down into the pit. At the same time, some of the Lithuanians, [after] the liquidation of the majority of the first group, march back to the train for more victims. At last 3 men in their underwear remain in front of the pit along with clothing scattered about the sand. A policeman, taking advantage of the inattention of the Germans, kicks some clothing into the bushes. The German issues an order and three Jews quickly run toward the clothing, from which we see that they drag out (it can be clearly seen) a woman. This maneuver is repeated twice. At last they themselves jump into the pit. Three shots are fired. The end.

No, not the end. The Lithuanians throw the clothing onto a pile; suddenly one of the Lithuanians pulls a child from under the clothing and throws him into the pit; again a child, and again another. In the same way—to the pit. One of the Lithuanians stands over the pit and shoots at these children, as we can see.

What is this? The desperate mothers thought that in this way “they had saved” the lives of the children, hiding them under the clothing. Evidently they expected that when the clothing was collected the children hidden in that way might be saved. Unfortunately.

A few minutes' break and then comes a new group, which had been lying eighty to a hundred meters from the pit near the barracks, faces to the ground. And that group is divided in half. Again the torment begins: they must undress; weeping, moaning, pleading. A woman shows the Lithuanians a child, evidently an infant; one grabs the woman and pushes her into the pit with the child.

At last a large group of men and women, not undressed and thus in miserable clothes, is driven to the pit. Shooting begins from above. At last 7 women in their underwear are positioned above the pit and shots are fired. Again from the other side of the pit 10 men and women are positioned above the pit and shots are fired. On the square 4 men remain in their underwear. They [the murderers] order them to place their clothing on the pile.

Again, a child. A Lithuanian directs them to throw him into the pit. The Jew picks him up and rushes with the child into the forest. They run after him; shots are fired. The Jew disappears into the thicket; shots can still be heard. Shortly afterward the Lithuanians return. Did he escape? One of the Lithuanians says something to the remaining three men—Jews accompanied by two policemen go into the forest. At this time the third group appears, preceded by furious shooting; the same starts again; undressing. A woman (it can be clearly seen) spits into the face of a German; at the same time a Lithuanian beats her with a rifle butt; the woman falls. On order of the German two Jews pull her into the pit. The shots do not hit her.

At this time Jews, accompanied by three policemen, come out of the forest; two are carrying a Jew, the third a child. Together they go to the pit. Three shots are fired. Shortly afterward, 40–50 people rush to the pit, driven by rifle butts. Again shooting from above into the pit. Again the same.

A man resists, shouts something, points to the children. A shot is fired—the man falls. A woman gets up, goes alone and crouches on the edge of the pit. She is followed by a teen-aged girl in a red sweater shouting “Mama” who crouches next to her. A German then indicates 4 people and from behind shoots each in the back of the skull from a distance of two to three meters.

Again they drive a few dozen people to the pit, holding back 4 men in their underwear. The Lithuanians standing over the pit start shooting. The end. A German gives an order and the 4 remaining run to the pit. No shots are fired. The German standing over the pit gesticulates, says something to the 4 in the pit. He lights a pipe, looks about, again shouts something toward the pit. Evidently those in the pit are busy with something. Maybe they are stacking the murdered bodies, leveling them, making piles? At last the German gives the Lithuanians the sign and four shots are fired.

A new group, the fourth, and the same, more or less in the same order, to another seven groups; all together eleven groups. At about 11 o'clock everything quiets down. Would that be all? Not at all. Because the train remains empty and a locomotive arrives to haul it away.

All the property of the murdered was off-loaded from the [train] wagons earlier and put on the ground. It made an enormous mountain of things—food, pillows, mattresses, baby carriages, baskets, suitcases, kitchen equipment, sacks with potatoes, of which there were the most, loaves of bread, clothes — all the stuff mixed together.

It seems that from 7 o'clock until 11 o'clock, forty-nine freight cars [of Jews] were shot; this was the composition of the first freight train.

And so in less than four hours, about 2,500 people were murdered—actually, even more. Very few escaped, some 50 people. The fact that such a small proportion were saved can be explained mainly because only individuals escaped. For example, when a group of 200–250 of the condemned are being led [to the pits], only 4–5 would suddenly start running to escape. However 50–60 Lithuanians would go after them, creating a commotion. As a result, the escapees are shot without any great difficulty, particularly because practically all commit the same error; they run through open ground, which is not forested. Nervous (evidently), this causes them to lose their smekalka [quick wits] to begin the escape attempt when the procession nears the forest.

It is not yet the end.

A new train arrives with victims.

Apparently the new arrivals immediately understood which “Kovno” they had been taken to, and what awaited them shortly. Consequently they changed their escape tactics, which generally yielded better results than with the first train.

When the railroad cars were opened and the condemned pushed out onto the tracks in front of the cars and arranged into groups, they immediately (practically all) rushed to escape in different directions. The majority escapes across the tracks in the direction of the road, etc. The Lithuanians shoot. One of the policemen falls, struck by a bullet, and they take him away. It turns out that another policeman aimed at a Jew and hit his colleague who got in the way. A Jewish woman in a beet-red sweater escapes, followed by a little girl. The woman got past the dangerous open place in front of the station and turned onto the little street. At that moment a shout was heard behind her and then the shout of the child, “Mama, Mama.” She turns around and ran back, practically tripping on a policeman. A shot is fired—she falls dead.

The majority ran in the direction of Nowosiolki. The largest number of dead lay there on the streets, but there too the greatest number escaped. From that group, barely a few dozen people crossed beyond the wire [of the base], mainly women and the elderly. They are executed in front of the pit; a woman in a long, dark coat crying something, shouts in the direction of the German. A Lithuanian shoots from two to three meters behind her, and the woman falls.

The rest run away slowly and heavily. And a few Lithuanians charge them and beat them on their heads with clubs. Some of them jump to escape into the pit, blindly, like madmen. Numerous shots are fired; a woman, smeared with blood, in her underwear, creeps out of the pit with a dreadful shriek; a Lithuanian stabs her with a bayonet. She falls and a second one finishes her off with gunfire from nearby.

The rest are driven to the pit and placed in front of the pit; about 15–20 people.

I see children in their underwear; shots are fired. From the gate a new group, perhaps 400 people, appears, quite closely surrounded. Apparently the Lithuanians, learning from the escape of the first group, are guarding the second one carefully. All lie down in front of the pit with their faces to the ground. They count off several dozen people and lead them to the pit. They are saying something. At last one of the Lithuanians says something to the condemned, who begin to undress. A woman with a child in her arms and with 2 small girls hanging onto her dress: a Lithuanian begins to beat them mercilessly with a club. A Jew without a jacket throws himself on the Lithuanian to defend the woman being beaten. A shot is fired—he falls, practically at the feet of his Jewess. A second Lithuanian seizes the Jewish woman's child and throws him into the pit; the Jewish woman, like a madwoman, runs to the pit, followed by her 2 little girls. Three shots are fired.

Oh horror! That group—women, men and children—all are stripped naked. By themselves they obediently run to the pit—shots are fired.

Again, those who lie down are divided into two groups. They drive them [toward the pits]. The shouts of the Lithuanians—“Faster, faster”—are heard. They crowd around in front of the pits and are again stripped naked. Five Jewish women with children in their arms are sitting on the edge of the pit; a blonde in gray underwear; her hand shields the little heads of the children. Shots are fired. Three Jews are shot; from the place where the people are undressed they are dragging a woman to the pit. Evidently she died suddenly. They return, carrying a woman by the arms and legs, then a man, then they return. A Lithuanian orders them to lie face down.

The rest of the groups get up; two women do not get up and lie there. A Lithuanian kicks them in the legs. Nothing. Other Jews carry them. All are stripped naked. They shoot. Three Jews stand up, tidy up the place, and then they themselves die. Among the clothing the Lithuanians find 2 children—to the pit.

KITTY SANDY

Context: Central Europe

Source: Kitty Sandy. Stormy Weather: A Life's Journey from Budapest to Melbourne. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2006, pp. 18–25. Used by permission.

Kitty Sandy's observations of the German invasion of Hungary on March 19, 1944 furnishes readers with an admirable set of images that provide a measure of appreciation for how unexpected the event was for those who lived through it. In giving a little of her backstory, she then recounts some of the early measures instituted by the Nazis against the Jews—measures that were introduced within weeks of the takeover. Kitty's story is a summary of the horrible year of 1944 in Budapest, though the current testimony ends prior to the Soviet siege of the city and subsequent liberation of the Jews from Nazi (and Hungarian fascist) rule.

Sunday, 19 March 1944 was a windy, cool day. I was walking along Andrassy Út, that lovely boulevard in the middle of the city. The police were directing traffic as usual and the birds were consuming breakfast at their favourite cafes along the boulevard. I was going to a jazz concert for teenagers. The band had just started playing Stormy Weather when a man rushed on stage and whispered something into the ear of the conductor and rushed out. The conductor turned around to face the audience and announced that the Nazi army had occupied our country. He put down his baton and walked out. I always remember this scene when I hear Stormy Weather.

Going out into the street the picture that greeted me was frightening—tanks and more tanks. Apparently eleven German divisions rolled into Hungary on that day. It was all very orderly, there was no resistance.

I was attending school at this stage, where we learnt shorthand, typing, bookkeeping and related subjects. It was the only school that would accept me with my Jewish background. In Hungary numerus clausus and later numerus nullus meant that Jews were blocked from higher education. After completing eight years of schooling it was time for me to move on.

My application to the secretarial school was knocked back with the excuse that only two Jewish girls were allowed in that class for the year 1943/1944 and I missed out. My grandfather could not come to terms with this and was extremely upset. He decided to meet the schoolmaster personally and try again. We got in to see the schoolmaster and my grey-haired, well-known architect grandfather knelt down in front of him and begged him to enroll me in class. The schoolmaster took pity on him and I was enrolled. The incident left me devastated.

The humiliation my grandfather had to suffer on account of me was a terrible blow. He was a great man, respected by everyone and well known all over Budapest for his architectural designs. One of the buildings he designed with his partner was the Budapest Orthodox synagogue, for which they adopted motifs from early Zionist architecture, known as the Bezael style. This famous building still stands in Budapest and carries a plaque bearing my grandfather's name.

Another indelible incident took place near the apartment building where we lived. On the first floor resided a couple with a young army officer son, who was in the medical corps. One day in the summer of 1944 I met him on the staircase. We walked out into the street together, when one of the residents in our building came by. He called out in a loud voice, to be heard by all and sundry: "Shame on you, officer, walking with a Jewish girl." Of course Hitler had decided we were all untermensch.

In 1942 or so, a young man from Slovakia rented a room in my grandparents' flat. He was a Jewish refugee who had run away from his German-occupied country. About 55,000 Jews were deported to Auschwitz from Slovakia. His nightmarish stories sounded almost unreal and the people of Hungary certainly did not believe the same thing could happen to them. But of course it did. Soon after the Nazis occupied Hungary in 1944, posters appeared daily on the streets of Budapest. The Jewish people realized they would be annihilated and by then it was too late to think of fleeing the country.

Prior to my stint at the secretarial school (called commercial school in Hungary), I attended a private school maintained from Scotland. It was a Protestant school, where discrimination against other religions was not known and we studied the Bible every morning. My thinking was no different to that of my schoolmates. I was a Hungarian and that was that. But the incident with the schoolmaster made me realise that I was deemed different.

By 5 April 1944, we had to sew the yellow star onto our clothing. It had to be visible at all times. This was one of the early atrocities forced upon us after the Nazi occupation. Others followed. The Gestapo also got rid of anyone suspected of being anti-German. Non-Jewish people were not allowed to be employed in Jewish households, and we had to say goodbye to Margit, our maid. Travelling by public transport was not allowed. Telephones were taken away. Jews had to register all property and valuables. By 16 June, yellow-star houses came into being.

All Jewish publications were stopped.

One of the apartment blocks in the middle of Budapest became the headquarters of the Gestapo. Here interrogations, tortures and murders were the order of the day. As it happens, this same building was occupied in the 1950s by the ÁVO, the feared secret police of the Communist regime.

Early in April the bombing of Budapest began.

Frequent air raids resulted in students being sent home from school and the citizens of Budapest began to spend more time in the cellars and air raid shelters. The dreaded posters signaled more and more atrocities against the Jews. In the country, deportations began and in the capital city, Jews had to hand in jewellery, radios and valuables. My stepfather, who was Jewish, was called up for labour camp. He was first stationed in Budapest, but soon he was taken out of the country.

We were still in the apartment where we had lived for so many years and were constantly spied upon by the caretaker, who had to have been a citizen trusted by the Arrow Cross (the Hungarian Nazis). We tried to listen to the BBC news on our hidden radio, but this was a very dangerous exercise. If discovered we could have been shot. The caretaker's duty was to report anything suspicious. To hear some "real" news we had to listen to the BBC under the doona.

The ghetto was being established and the next step would have been moving into it. From the ghetto people were taken to concentration camps.

At this stage a poster appeared instructing women between the ages of eighteen and sixty to report to the grounds of the brick factory. My mother and her only sister had to go. I don't think I will ever forget that day. My dear old grandmother, whose life revolved around her two daughters, was completely devastated. She was sure she would never see them again. Lying on a couch, she would not eat or drink anything all day long. I sat with her. I felt cold, lost, and everything seemed hopeless. But then a miracle occurred. My mother and aunt walked in the door late at night. For some reason I no longer recall, a number of women were sent home to reappear the next day.

This was the defining moment when we had to save our skins.

My mother's male cousin, Géza, was married to an Aryan. He worked with the Resistance and during the night manufactured false identification papers for the whole family, including my grandparents. Early in the morning we left everything behind and moved to various places on the other side of Budapest.

After 15 October 1944, the Arrow Cross leader Szálasi decided the easiest way to get rid of the remaining Jews was to march them to the riverbank and shoot them into the river. This was the fate of many Jews. By this time all Jews living in country towns were deported to various concentration camps.

A few weeks after living under false names, I was walking to the shops when I was stopped by two uniformed Arrow Cross soldiers asking for identification papers. I handed them my papers, which of course were fake. One of them scrutinized the documents for a few minutes. This seemed like an eternity to me. Finally he handed them back to me and allowed me to go. I was paralysed with fear. My only solace was the fact that I did not look suspicious and did not show my fear.

Soon winter set in and food was becoming scarce. One day early in December when I woke up feeling hungry and cold, I remembered when we celebrated this day known as Children's Day. We had to put our shoes in the window the night before and St Nicholas was supposed to fill them with chocolate if we behaved during the year. If we misbehaved, instead of presents we received a bundle of twigs, to smack our bottoms.

We were always a bit afraid when we woke in the morning and tiptoed to the window to see what St Nicholas (called Mikulás in Hungarian) had left for us. Now the only thing I felt was tremendous fear for what the future will bring.

My mother and I lived in a rented flat, but not as mother and daughter. We were "distant relatives," refugees from a small country town. I had to be very careful not to call her Mother. It was not an easy task, but I managed quite well until one night when we were in the air raid shelter during a heavy bombing raid, I called out: "Mother!"

A young Arrow Cross officer who lived in the next apartment from us heard it all. He was rather interested in flirting with me and I did my best to avoid him. I was frightened of him. His revenge came unexpectedly. “That Jewish whore, I had a feeling she was a fake,” he yelled. “I am going to shoot her.” He grabbed his revolver. The smell of alcohol was overpowering as he came closer in the dark, brandishing his gun. Because he was rather wobbly on his feet he decided to deal with the matter in the morning. Before daylight I crawled out of the shelter with just a small bag containing some bare necessities and took off for the other side of Budapest.

The only other place to go was where my grandparents, aunt and uncle were staying, in another rented flat in Buda.

The trip to Buda from Pest was daunting. By then almost all the bridges had been blown up by the Germans and I had great difficulty getting to the other side of the Danube. There were dead bodies and dead horses lying on the streets. I also passed some wounded civilians and soldiers.

When I finally arrived I certainly was not welcome. The four of them were hiding, equipped with false identification papers. Anything unusual would have rendered them suspicious. When I explained my situation there was no choice but to allow me to stay. By this time they were living in the cellar, due to heavy bombing day and night.

All the shops were closed and there was nothing to buy. As we were surrounded by the Russians, no supplies came in from the country. There was only dried potato skin, which we cooked in water, and black coffee. I had a packet of dry biscuits my mother packed for me before I left.

On my second day I noticed some activity in the courtyard. As we no longer had any air raid warnings (they did not function any more) we ventured out of the cellar when the sky looked clear.

During this “Safe” Period the German soldiers stationed on some of the flats were preparing to shoot one of the horses. They had nothing to eat either, nor did they have any food for their skinny horse. I stayed around, secretly hoping for some donation. As I was a rather nice-looking girl, the soldiers noticed me and started to talk to me. I explained to them that I was very hungry and would love a piece of that horseflesh.

Ever since my childhood I had loved dogs and horses. I cannot describe the sick feeling in my stomach when I witnessed the shooting of the horse. I had to close my eyes not to see the poor skinny horse falling to the ground. One of the soldiers handed me a piece of horseflesh, still warm, wrapped up in newspaper. I ran to the cellar, triumphantly clutching this treasure. Grandmother cooked it and we had two meals out of it.

The soldier who gave me this “treasure” was called Franz. He was seventeen years of age. I don’t know if he knew what he was fighting for. I did not like to think what he would have done to me if he knew my background. He gave me most of his rations every day. It consisted of some biscuits, chocolates and coffee. These rations arrived in containers dropped from aeroplanes. More often than not they finished up on the Russian-occupied side of the Buda hills. Franz introduced me to the others. There were some officers amongst them. Luckily they did not wear the fearful SS uniform, as they were attached to the Wehrmacht forces. One evening he called me to listen to the guitar music they were playing. The song was Papa Lehmann, Papa Meyer, Papa ich, meaning that three soldiers had fathered the same baby. The other song was Sehnsucht hab ich immer nur dir gehabt, which translates as: I was always yearning for you.

I have never forgotten these two songs.

He gave me my first cigarette. I was terribly hungry and the awful taste of that cigarette took my appetite away. I kept dreaming of a piece of chocolate cake and every time, just as I was going to take a bite, I woke up. Every bit of food Franz gave me I passed over to my astonished grandmother, not letting on where it came from, just inventing some stories.

ILONA ELEFÁNT SCHWARCZ

Context: Salvation

Source: Ilona Elefánt Schwarcz with Eta Elefánt Hubscher (edited by Marianne M. Meyer and Maryann McLoughlin). Leaves Swept by a Cruel Wind: The Holocaust Journals of Ilona Elefánt Schwarcz. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2013, pp. 1–15. Used by permission.

When Germany brought the Holocaust to Hungary after March 1944, one of the more immediate of many tasks required was the registration and concentration of the country’s Jews. Registration was a relatively simple process, as earlier Hungarian antisemitic measures had to a large extent already completed that task. Concentration prior to deportation was more difficult, as there were in Hungary neither ghettos nor concentration camps in the German sense. Consequently, improvisation had to take place—in factories, quarries, and (remembered most frequently by survivors) brickworks. In this memoir, Ilona Elefánt Schwarcz writes of her experiences having survived such incarceration. She reflects from the relative security of the Feldafing Displaced Persons camp in Bavaria, and offers a compelling set of recollections and contemplation that have both a therapeutic and remembering function for her.

May 27, 1945

Feldafing am See, at a Displaced Persons (DP) Camp

After a long, long sorrow-filled year, I can once again take paper and pen in hand. How should I begin? In other words, how should I continue my interrupted journal?

My G-d, with a grateful heart I turn to You. You gave me, this tiny speck of dust, strength to survive this horrid storm. I prayed to You with a burning heart and You helped me. I thank You again, Lord, and on my knees I beg you—if You helped me withstand this trauma till now, please don't abandon me in the difficult days ahead. Give me stamina so that I can stand my ground and carry out my responsibilities. Return my dear husband; my poor, tortured, old mother; and my dear young brother—who only together can mean life for me.

About Mother, I dare not even think; I'm afraid. Please G-d! Allow me to know gladness once more, for life is so short; it's over before we realize.

Only two of us from a large family are left—my sister and I. The circumstances here are tolerable; we now have decent living quarters and enough food, and most importantly, we are able to keep ourselves clean.

It happened so suddenly that it is still hard to believe that we are really free again. Tomorrow the second homeward transport departs. Supposedly the truck will stop at another station, Marienbad or Carlsbad, to drop off the Czechs, where they will spend a few weeks. This stopover will mitigate the anxiety for those soul-searching people who can only think with much trepidation of what they will find at home.

Unfortunately, many of the young women were unable to cope, and very few can emerge with a clear conscience from the cursed Hitler mire. Thank G-d, our room could be considered one of the best, in that, sad as it sounds, the women with us have been able to maintain their decency longer than the others. Very few of the women have maintained their morals. Even among the more mature, married women and mothers, there were many who succumbed to their most base instincts. The concentration camp destroyed good taste, good upbringing, and extinguished the torch of purity and sacred love. What remains is only the flickering flame of profane love.

June 2, 1945

Feldafing DP Camp

I will attempt, from memory, to record the horrors of those sad days. It won't be easy—not that they otherwise wouldn't remain vividly in my mind, but because I don't think I have the skill to relate my feelings in writing. It would require greater intelligence and more knowledge than I possess. One would have to be a professional writer to be able to accurately describe those painful hours, days, weeks, and months that followed the days we were forcibly taken from our homes.

My last lines were written only a few hours before we were driven out of our home, ready to leave, to where only G-d knew. I know now, in retrospect, after a year filled with pain and humiliation, “to where”: into destruction, extermination, extinction, and into an infectious quagmire of bodies and souls; into the torture, suffering, want and hunger, filth, beastliness and more. I search for stronger words, but cannot find them. All I ask is how could a human mind cause so many tears, bloodshed, mass graves and all the horrors of Hell, and in all this bury millions of innocent lives? Was he human, or was he the devil? It cannot be that the human brain is capable of such a plot! Only in the very depths of Gehenna could such satanic schemes be born.

A large nation became so decadent and simultaneously brought about their own destruction, and now the Germans are begging us for bread?

They can come and go only with a passport. The Americans constantly check the Germans' activities. Their faces reflect doubts and fears. When they are reminded of our plight, they quickly and easily absolve themselves by claiming they knew nothing and it was not their fault. The Auschwitz-Birkenau crematorium was supposedly unknown to them, and now they listen with pale, stone faces—“Gott mein Gott. G-d, my G-d!” They said they knew nothing of Auschwitz-Birkenau, Dachau, Buchenwald, Gross-Rosen, Bergen-Belsen, Theresienstadt, Mühldorf and many other camps where tens of thousands of us, mostly the men, fell like flies last winter alone. Only what I myself saw on the day of arrival to Mühldorf, and during our stay there, is in itself enough for a lifetime of gnawing memories. However, what I saw, compared to what I have heard from others, is a pleasant dream.

Mühldorf is a small camp, and in this place alone, more than 2,000 people died by artificially induced “natural” death [injected with fatal diseases]. Even now the thought of it, the look in their eyes, and their wretched condition makes me break out in a feverish sweat.

June 3, 1945

Feldafing DP Camp

Today is a beautiful day! The Starnberger See sparkles in the sunshine. It seems almost impossible that the story I am writing is true.

Nature—G-d's free world—is so magnificent. The sun's rays beam equally and indiscriminately on everyone, and yet the whole world is like a jungle—a jungle of human beasts. The vigilant tigers and leopards among the undergrowth could well take lessons in savagery from civilized man—the twentieth century “modern and cultured” man.

Even here where I'm surrounded by this glowing array of flowers, my heart aches unspeakably. Why can't I fly? Why am I bound to the earth? Why can only my soul grow wings, while my body is shackled helplessly? Why can't I search for my dear ones? I'm afraid of the future; what will I find? What will happen? Was it worthwhile surviving this Calvary where I still walk?

June 4, 1945

Fledafing DP Camp

I shall try to organize my thoughts. I am afraid that I'm overestimating my weak talent in undertaking the writing of these journals. Nevertheless, I will try.

The dates are not exact; I cannot remember them precisely. Only some of the dates are carved into my soul indelibly for eternity: MAY 20, 1944.

On that day we were driven out of our dear home and crammed into a ghetto—medieval times in the middle of the twentieth century—or can it be that the scientists erred and confused the order of the ages. People in the Middle Ages would have been astounded to witness modern-day man outdoing their barbarism. Not even in ancient times did such savagery occur where the victims numbered 6,000,000 Jews as well as [5,000,000] non-Jews. Such mentally unbalanced thugs, sadists, insane assassins could destroy countries, even an entire continent. That despicable mob of worthless trash would do anything for blood money and gold. They [the SS] used very selective methods of torture to destroy millions of innocent people, including infants and children. They plunged world Jewry into the depths of mourning, since none of us in any country escaped the horrors without losing someone beloved and dear to us.

Remembering May 20, 1944, Miskolc Ghetto

There were thousands upon thousands who were stripped naked in mid-winter for the “selection process,” after which groups of about 120 men were locked into cattle cars and dispatched to a destination unknown to them at that time. The journey lasted five to six days. Upon arrival, all the SS henchmen had to do was bury most of them. The Gestapo was spared any effort; their work was done by frost and starvation.

May 20, 1944, was a Saturday. I have not much to write about my days in the ghetto. Those were a series of endless humiliations. Police cordons and barricades; innocent Jews delivered to the wondering, pitying, and even gloating looks of—for the most part—malicious, curious, and stupid people. The Római II [the Roman II] carried out its mission—murder. They searched for hidden Jewish riches, and if any were found, the Jew was summarily clubbed to death. These were not the Germans; they were Hungarian, but, oh, how beautifully they worked hand in hand.

Present Time, Feldafing

Today, those who rendered those “services” would be happy to undo what they had done, if it were possible, but I hope they won't escape the hangman's noose! I, who always professed with heart and soul to be a patriotic Hungarian, am remembering now a poem by Petőfi: “You, my nation, have sunk into depravity.” It is very appropriate.

We met Hungarian Arrow Cross families roaming the highways. They were hungry and homeless and we felt somewhat satisfied. They became fugitives as we had been. Let them be eternal wanderers.

Remembering, The Miskolc Ghetto

The poor among us remained in the ghetto. Presumably because members of Római II fancied themselves as having good taste, they gave work assignments only to those who appeared to be of some means. For example, they summoned a group of young women to the synagogue where the gendarmes had already taken up residence. There, the women were ordered to clean up, wash and iron the gendarmes' laundry. Already then, the Guardian of Israel began to slumber.

To leave the ghetto or speak with a non-Jew was strictly forbidden. But there were “good-hearted” people such as those who would bring, for money, a loaf of bread. And for their trouble they would charge us a damask tablecloth with two wall covers, and “if we wouldn’t mind, some pots and pans, but don’t forget the lids.” They were nauseating, repulsive, like vultures—small but “dear” little memories.

June 5, 1945

Feldafing

I am outdoors again, under a tree with my blanket—the weather is beautiful.

Yesterday a new transport arrived. We found, among them, a few acquaintances from our city [Miskolc, Hungary]. They too had suffered through the winter, and just to hear how they were tortured was painful for us. At dawn—3 a.m.—they had roll call. There were days when they stood barefooted in the snow while the Nazis made them sing a song. Many of them perished. Hands and feet frozen—nails, even fingers, fell off due to freezing. They hungered and slept in unheated places—thirty-six on bunks intended for six! Everything was organized with a satanic mind. The motto was to kill the most, fast—and they did.

Remembering, June 5, 1944, Displaced from the Miskolc Ghetto

It was 4 a.m. at the break of day on June 5, 1944, and we heard noises. We were startled—or were we? We were kind of expecting all this for over a week now. A debilitating sight—observing our people’s displacement out of the ghetto into yet another place. Trucks loaded with knapsacks, suitcases, and bedding were on the move and, on top, were seated old people and children who could not make the long march on foot. The Gendarme’s coarse, wild shouting was heard all around us.

My G-d! Now they were here for us, and we must go off—again. We dressed; it took only moments. They had already pushed their way into our small ghetto room, and with a whip in hand, the man in charge ordered us in a brutal tone: “Everybody out with the bundles!”

We were in readiness—bundles tied. Each of us had one knapsack, one shoulder bag, and one large sack specially designed for food and bedding. Standing in lines in the yard, we lifted our eyes to heaven. The skies were cloudy; the dawn was very dark for us, and the drizzling rain slowly descended upon us.

The gendarme was checking everyone’s bundles, yelling, cursing. Fear was mirrored on our faces. We were the last in line. The officer opened our bundles one by one. From our already down-to-the-minimum belongings, he rummaged through, all the while cursing loudly, and threw our items. Poor Mother’s prayer book was on the ground. The gendarme yelled: “Documents, photographs over here. Pocket-books, money, jewelry over there!” Everyone was frightened. I slipped off to the outhouse and cast into the sewer my remaining paper money, crumpled. I hid my wedding ring.

The inspection was over; the rain was falling more steadily.

We stood in pouring rain with our bundles. The gendarme refused to let us put our bundles back into the house. What meagre food we had in the sack had become inedible. Our tears blended with the falling rain as we were required to put our bundles in the outhouse. Next, prostitutes from the bordello examined the women among us, putting their dirty fingers into our bodies in search of hidden jewelry. The blood runs hot in my face, even today, just to think about the madness of such a filthy act. All we could do in our helplessness was to cry from the loathsome touch of these detestable tramps.

A policeman stood guard in the kitchen. With municipal assistance, the robbery went on. The policeman looked embarrassed; apparently he hadn’t lost his humanity yet. Before the body search our nerves broke down. My sister, Etz, and I asked the policeman to shoot us. He talked quietly, humanely, and tried to calm us. He could hardly believe what he saw, yet he did nothing!

The “examination” was over. We stood outside again. Long tables were set up. A young girl of sixteen or seventeen, and a man, were in charge. There was evil in her eyes. The man looked more humanlike. We proceeded, one by one. “Wallets, leatherware, gold collection. Turn over all your valuables,” the voice demanded. I did.

“That’s all the money you have?”

“Yes,” I said.

“Not true. You are a liar! Where is the rest? Where did you hide it? I warn you.” And so it went on.

Etz and Mother turned in forty pengő. The “honourable” thief put the money in an envelope and wrote the name and address on it. I was stunned! I had nothing to lose, so I asked: “Since when do holdup men do bookkeeping?” That question stirred up a big commotion, but who feared the consequences?

Poor Mother hid the glass cutter that belonged to Imre (my brother whom the Nazis killed in the Ukraine). It had only sentimental value to her, but the gendarme—stupid peasant that he was—thought he found a diamond, and triumphantly snatched it for the table. The Little bastard girl remarked: “They still hide—they can’t resist it.”

“But it is only a tool; you can buy it for two pengő.”

The girl answered: “You liar; you know very well that it is a diamond.” Then I insulted her: “If your heart is so rotten now, what will become of you ten years later?” They warned me again, but who cared anymore? All was finished!

June 6, 1945

I continue my sad story.

Remembering, Deportation to the Brick Factory

We were beggars already. All we had were the clothes on our back, two pairs of shoes, some underwear, two dresses, one comb, one brush, one pillow, and one quilt. We took half the amount of down out of the quilt to make it lighter. Nothing else! Food, we had; that they did not touch.

The wagons arrived—ten or twelve families for each one. First they loaded the packages. The gendarmerie was heavily armed. People were crying, some screaming, some sighing, some quietly sobbing. A woman was pleading for permission to take her washing bowl. “What for?” was the coarse reply. “There will be no need for washing where you are going.”

We helped Mother to the wagon; she did not even cry. She did what she was told. I don’t know where her strength came from, but she was strong—though one little incident did break my heart and her strong spirit as well. She was carrying a bottle of black coffee that she had to put down while changing hands to ease the burden of its weight.

The Gendarme yelled at her: “If you put that thing down again, I won’t let you pick it up.” Mother said, “The bottle is too heavy.” To which the peasant beast answered: “Shut up, you old Jew-woman, or I will knock your eye-glasses off your nose.” He wasn’t more than perhaps twenty or twenty-one years old—ripe for the rope! I wonder if he lived through the turmoil.

The procession was now ready to leave. We said a final goodbye to our last refuge, the small ghetto home, and then set out toward an unknown destiny. How we looked was written on the faces of the street people. They stared at us. Some bent their heads in shame. A good friend of the family, Louis Gacsal, in his army uniform, stood on the corner of Csengey Gustav Street, his head bent, perhaps in salute to us. He came to show his respect. Greeting a Jew was forbidden—especially for a soldier wearing the uniform of the Hungarian Army. He could be hanged for this.

Forward, forward, to the brick factory. Terrible place! No doors, no walls—only ceilings were there. The floor consisted of 25 centimeters of red brick dust.

June 12, 1945

Feldafing

Today is an anniversary date—one year since we were loaded as animals into wagon trains—seventy-five to eighty men in a wagon that could hold no more than six to seven horses. My G-d, what an anniversary! What a journey that was. The last journey of so many human beings—old and young, innocent, tiny babies as well.

Remembering, June 12, 1944, Brick Factory Barracks

We arrived! The wagons came to a halt. Packages were unloaded; there was chaos, hollering: “That’s my bag. Don’t step on it. Don’t break it.”

Small children were crying; mothers were weeping, too. What would they do with their tiny babies? Mothers cried: “How will I feed her?” “How will I bathe him?” “How will we keep them clean?”

There was a so-called office in the first barrack; two women were tending the administration. They had a list with all the names of those in the transport, and they had to be sure no one was missing. The two employees’ responsibility was to compare our names on their list with those on the second list which the gendarme had just handed over. They breathed with ease now; everything was fine; not one Jew was left behind in the city. All were caged.

Have you ever seen chaos? Everybody was running around, looking for a place to be. The barracks were numbered. Which one would be the best? It was not as dusty in this one; there were more people in that one. The entire county was here already. We met many friends and neighbours; we cried more and more. Frightened faces and frightening questions: “Where are they taking us?” “What is going to happen to us?” We knew we were in transport, but we didn’t know our destination.

Eight bitter days and nights we spent in the brick barracks. We had a taste of what would follow in the days and weeks to come. Too little water. One water supply for tens of thousands of people. The city fire company brought some water, but that was only a drop in the ocean for 30,000 thirsty mouths. We stood in lines for a drink of water. If we were lucky to fetch a half-bucket we used some for cooking and some for washing up. We built a fire between two bricks, on top of which we cooked something to eat—potatoes or watery soup.

On the other side of the fence an armed police guard stood every ten meters. Strangers couldn’t come near the camp. A fifty-meter distance was the closest anyone could get.

On our side of the wire fence, the German SS, with whips in hand, ordered the people around. Dirty beasts—trash of their German race.

With every passing day, we lost a little bit of our dignity. The first couple of days men and women tried to hold back nature's ways. Who would even dare think of using the latrine side by side? But on the third day, people gave up. There was no other way. How long can you deny your body its normal functions? So, on the third day we could no longer care about who sat next to us on the latrine pit. Men and women looked at each other with tears in their eyes. On the fourth day half-naked women could be seen here and there, while another held a towel to cover as much as possible. Whose shame was this? Ours?

They made the Jews dig a deep, long ditch. Then on both ends of the pit two wooden legs forming an X were erected. On the legs a board was placed for seating. It looked something like this: X-----X. Open for everyone's eyes—there it was. No fence around it. For two days people looked at it, but wouldn't humiliate themselves by using it. Finally they had no choice! German "civilization," not Jewish, came tumbling down!

A public kitchen came into being. That was another, though different, shame. Cooking became more of a problem day-by-day. Therefore, the kitchen collected the dry goods from all of us. The food would be cooked and distributed equally. In the end, the givers of goods were served beans and potato soups, while the kitchen personnel ate the chicken roast and drank the black coffee. The people rioted and demanded an explanation. They said the meat was for the sick, and since there was not enough coffee for everyone, it shouldn't be served at all. Mr. Gyémánt poured it out. It happened before in the city ghetto. G-d, forgive them. None of them survived.

June 26, 1945

Feldafing

It's been quite some time since I last wrote. I lack the patience. Time passes slowly; each day seems like a week. Life here suggests that nothing ever happened—a psychological puzzle. I can't forget, even for one second, what I have lost. I am sleepless, which for me is a tragedy. Day and night I fret. My thoughts are gnawing. I see the crematoria all the time. I don't like being among people, crowds. To be alone in the forest, listening to the beautiful song of birds, is what I enjoy. Since our liberation I feel more nervous.

BABA SCHWARTZ

Context: Central Europe

Source: Baba Schwartz. The May Beetles: My First Twenty Years. Carlton (Victoria): Black Inc. Publishing, 2016, pp. 108–113. Used by permission.

Baba Schwartz was a young Hungarian Jewish girl when, in the late spring of 1944, she and her family were deported from their home town to an unknown destination. The account she provides here is a concise and highly evocative memoir of the train journey they experienced during their deportation. Not only does Baba describe the nature of the trip; she also relates something of the textures, smells, and emotions accompanying it. While some excellent accounts exist of train deportations, few come as close as this one to recapturing, in a straightforward manner, the essential characteristics of such a harrowing ordeal.

On the twenty-second of May, everyone in the camp was ordered to pack up their belongings, except for their bedding, and march to the railway station in Nyíregyháza, a distance of about fifteen kilometers. "Why is the bedding to be left behind?" I wondered. "Are we going to a place where beds and bedding are provided? Or are we going to a place where we will not be permitted to sleep?" We did as we were told. There were a thousand or more of us—we vastly outnumbered those who were issuing the orders—but we dared not disobey. To rebel would have been futile: we would have been shot. And despite the rumours, we still had some hope that all would be well. Hope is tenacious.

From the Simapuszta ghetto we walked to the railway station in Nyíregyháza, carrying our rucksacks. My family kept close together and spoke little. Indeed, amongst the great throng marching to Nyíregyháza there was very little conversation. We were not baffled by the enmity of the Germans, nor by the eager complicity of the Hungarians. We were Jews, and this is what Jews suffered. Some survived, some perished.

A train with many carriages was waiting for us, not at the station itself but before the station, in a field. It was a train designed to carry cattle and the like. The carriages were made of horizontal planks of timber, once painted but now ancient and flaking. When the sliding doors of each carriage was drawn open, the interior appalled us. There were no seats, and the carriages stunk to high heaven.

We looked at each other, all of us in the crowd beside the train, and on each face one could see a recognition that our lives meant nothing to those who had brought us here. The beasts that had once been conveyed in these carriages would have been going to slaughterhouses. And these carriages were now thought suitable for human beings. “Seventy to a carriage,” the guards shouted. “Seventy to a carriage!” Families were permitted to stay together. Fathers climbed into the carriages and reached down for their children, who were lifted up by their mothers. By this time there was fear in the air; many children were crying.

I clambered into a carriage with my backpack, then stood up and looked about quickly for Marta and Erna, who had gone ahead of me. My mother was already in the carriage too, and now Father climbed in and we were all together.

More and more people climbed into the carriage, and we were forced further and further back. “Dear God, there is no more room,” I thought to myself. But there was more room: our carriage did not yet hold seventy people. We were pushed further in, away from the door, keeping track of each other out of the corner of our eyes. “They can’t treat people this way!” I thought. Despite all we’d been through, I hadn’t fully accepted that the guards and gendarmes could do anything they wished to do; that they were unrestrained by any humane consideration.

On the faces around me, I saw terror, resignation, exhaustion. I looked down at the upturned faces of children who only came up to my waist. They were hoping, I’m sure, for some guidance from the adults around them. If anything in the world can be considered to be simply wrong—for all people, at all times, regardless of culture or religion—it is to subject children to the sort of dread and confusion that the Jewish children in that train carriage experienced. That can never be anything other than wrong. We can’t have a world unless we believe that.

The twenty or so carriages of the train were loaded with the Jews of Nyírbátor over a period of perhaps half an hour. We all had to stand as there was not enough room for us to sit. We waited for whatever was to come next. The train began to move, very slowly at first, building up speed. I had travelled on trains many times before, of course. I had always enjoyed the moment when the train pulled out of the station, and I loved watching the scenery change. But this time my heart sank when I felt the train begin to move. “People are not forced to travel in this way if the destination is anywhere good,” I thought. “We are going to a bad place, I know it.”

Many aboard the train were weakened by hunger, having spent a month at the Sumpuszta camp, and a number were ill. We ate what we had in our backpacks, and shared what we could with those who had nothing. It might be thought that a type of solidarity would develop in a situation such as ours, but in reality it did not. Sympathy, yes, but not true solidarity. My mother’s great priority was to keep her children and her husband alive, so she fed us as best she could. It was the same for other mothers and families. There was no need to apologise for favouring one’s own family; everyone understood, I’m sure.

For the sick and weak, a journey of three hours on their feet would have been an ordeal. This journey would last three days. All were exhausted by the ordeal, driven almost mad by the continual dread we felt, and by the endless clatter of the metal wheels.

People must relieve themselves, whatever the situation. Our toilets were buckets. On the first day of that nightmare journey, we managed some modesty when we were forced to use the buckets. As we squatted, a family member would shield us from view with a coat. But crammed together in a cattle car as we were, we soon came to see that modesty would have to be dispensed with. Some took longer than others to accept this necessity, but by the second day, coats were no longer held up to screen those using the buckets. Initially I felt shame, but I soon came to accept that it was our common lot—that I was one amongst seventy, and all of us were compelled to overcome our embarrassment.

Then the train came to a halt. In the course of the journey, I had registered other stops. Even in the near delirium of my exhaustion, I had known at times that we were not moving. Maybe the train drivers were changing over; maybe something was blocking its way. But the train always resumed its journey, slowly at first, then, gathering speed until the clack-clack-clack of its wheels had returned to its regular, rapid interval. This time it was different.

I heard the release of steam from the engine, then silence. The tiny ventilation opening high on one of the walls of the carriage showed that it was dark outside. I’d been keeping track of time in a ragged way, and estimated that it was around four in the morning. It was the middle of spring and the days were lengthening.

“We’ve stopped,” I whispered to my mother. “We have arrived.”

My mother didn’t reply. I think all of us in the darkness shared the same feelings of anticipation and dread. Then I heard something like the clanking of a chain, very brief. After that, the silence grew more intense. I wanted to whisper to my mother again but I restrained myself.

What I did not know, what I could not have known, was that we had come to the gates of hell.

ZUZANA SERMER

Context: Central Europe

Source: Zuzana Sermer. Survival Kit. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 35–40. Used by permission.

The German occupation of the Czech lands was taxing for everyone, but for Jews especially so. While ghettos were not established, the number of restrictions placed on Jewish life meant that food, medicine, clothing, and shelter were all in short supply for Jews. Zuzana Sermer explains how these constraints over daily life substantially robbed Jews of any opportunity of retaining an autonomous existence, and that as a result they were reliant on the help of others in a variety of ways. In describing the assistance provided by the Roskov family, for instance, she introduces us to the notion of the “White Jew”—non-Jews who helped Jews. To be labeled as one not only led to social ostracism; as Zuzana notes, “it could also have jeopardized their safety.”

After that first transport of 1942, I periodically went into hiding to avoid the razzias aimed at Jewish homes. One day, when it was safe for me to be at home, I was approached by two of my friends from Hashomer Hatzair. They asked me to meet with one of their “cells.” I had heard about these cells—they were often made up of four people and were a testing ground for young people who might be considered later on (once they had reached about eighteen years of age and proven their loyalty) to be part of a dangerous but righteous cause—an underground resistance.

Without giving it much thought I agreed and was given a task—to go to a store on Masaryk Street that sold electrical supplies and collect a sum of money from the owner. I removed my yellow band and went to the shop, discreetly conveying my password to the shopkeeper behind the counter. I then asked him for a particular sum of money, as instructed. The owner of the store was the last man in our town whom I would ever have suspected of being part of the underground. Perhaps he thought the same about me. We knew each other, but beyond the script, we didn’t say another word. He gave me the money and I took it and left.

My instructions were to purchase certain items of food with the money. I stopped at a delicatessen and then a bakery, running into no difficulty at either place. In spite of all going smoothly, my heart was pounding wildly. What if I were caught? What if this was a trap? Who were these people to whom I must deliver the purchases? But the rule of the cell was never to ask questions, so I kept them to myself.

The final destination was a Greek Orthodox church located on Lipová, the street where I now lived. I had to ring twice in order to get a response. Finally, the huge main gate was opened and I entered a courtyard. The main entrance was twenty steps further, but to me it felt like nearly twenty kilometers. I gave two short rings, as I had been told, and the massive, wooden doors were opened. I gave my password and was told to leave the basket of food at the door and then to leave. I did so with great haste. When it was over I felt invigorated, as though I had accomplished something important and was part of a chain that mattered. I never told my parents about this episode.

One week later I met up with the two friends who had recruited me and they thanked me for a job well done. It was then that I discovered how lucky I had been. The whole enterprise was betrayed the day after my task had been completed. The police raided the church and took those who were hiding inside it to an unknown destination. No more cell sessions took place. My two friends were also lucky not to be caught. Soon after, they slipped away to hide and fight with the partisans in the Carpathian Mountains.

To tell what became of one of them, Jan, I have to skip ahead to September 1945. The war had been over for more than three months and I was living with my husband, Arthur, in Bratislava. In the course of our efforts to establish a new home, I had decided to return to Humenné to retrieve some articles belonging to my late father. At that time, the journey of approximately 450 kilometers took more than two days to travel by train, with a long stopover in the city of Košice. I passed the time by browsing along the streets, and by chance I met some old acquaintances. It was then I learned of Jan’s fate—he was in jail in Košice. He had been there for two months, awaiting a hearing. Jan had lost his whole family, fought the fascists as a partisan and survived the war only to sit in a Slovak jail. This information infuriated me and no logical reasoning could have stopped me as I went off in search of the prison to see my friend.

The story was that Jan had been accused of participating in the Slovak National Uprising. While denying these allegations, he sat, frustrated, in jail. On impulse, I sought out the prosecutor and remarkably was granted an appointment in just one hour. I presented my case passionately, voice trembling, insisting that Jan had been falsely accused and must have a hearing at once. The prosecutor thought that my jailed friend and I were lovers; I assured him that our friendship was made of other stuff, born from the solidarity created by sharing a philosophy in desperate circumstances and a gruesome fate. My certainty of Jan’s innocence must have been convincing. The prosecutor promised me that there would be a hearing the very next day.

By then, my train was due to depart in just thirty minutes. My feet barely touched the ground as I ran to the station, fueled by the promise I received—happily, a promise that was honoured. Jan was found innocent. He survived this last obstacle of the war and moved to Prague. We remain friends to this day. . . .

During the horrific, eventful summer of 1942, we heard rumours that new transports would soon begin. My parents were understandably frightened by these reports and did not want me to stay at home. They couldn't hide because of my mother's illness and miraculously, for some reason, they weren't deported. Others in our town who were bedridden or in wheelchairs or otherwise disabled had already been deported, but she was not. Masaryk Street was busy now, filled with strangers in uniform. Whenever new faces appeared on the main street, it was a bad omen. By now we knew that organizers of the transports transferred members of the Hlinka Guard between cities because they were afraid that the local militia would be more sympathetic to the Jews than strangers.

During these months of unrest I hid in a variety of places, some that I cannot believe I managed to endure. These hiding spots were both my refuge and my private hell. It is an understatement to say that surviving such an ordeal deeply affected me. It was a waking nightmare.

One such abhorrent hiding place was a crawl place in another family's home, where I hid for about two weeks. I could do nothing but sit or lie in one position for hours on end. At night I could go out to attend to my personal hygiene and to stretch my muscles, but then I had to return to my prison. For about a week in the summer I also hid in an attic. It was unbearably hot—so much that I fainted a few times. Still, each day in hiding was a day that I survived and was another day closer to the end of the war. Did I mention that I had been spoiled as a child? I was pampered no longer.

One of our neighbours from Masaryk Street, Mrs. Rokov, who was very fond of our family, suggested that I come to stay in their wine cellar for a short time. Certainly no one would look for me there. The house was very old and solid, built of stone and bricks, and had withstood both natural and manmade catastrophes. The wine cellar, however, was everything I dreaded and despised. It was deep underground where it was damp, cold and dark and it didn't take me long to discover that I shared my quarters with a nest of mice. I dread rodents. Even now when I see a mouse, I shriek and jump up on a table or chair. In truth, I would even climb walls if I could, to avoid any kind of rodent. I cannot even look at a hamster. Even if a rodent is a remote image on television, I avert my eyes. It has been this way for all my life, so imagine then, knowing my revulsion for these creatures, how insufferable it was. Yet, I had no choice but to hide in this rodent-infested place.

Although I was provided with food, a small round table, a comfortable chair and a dim light, the basement was nonetheless cold and frightening. Whenever I unlocked the door and turned on the light, I gave the mice time to disappear into their holes. Only then would I enter. Still, I felt their presence and heard them squeaking. Sometimes I saw mice running from one hole to another and I would try shining my flashlight at them to stop them from scurrying and squeaking. I think that mice must reproduce frequently. More times than I care to remember, I saw newborns, as many as ten mice in one litter. But miserable as I was, I had to consider myself lucky—I had no rats for roommates. I couldn't handle more than two or three days of this in a row, but hid there on and off for about three weeks. It's no surprise that I developed a severe case of claustrophobia after this period of hiding.

Mrs. Rokov had known my mother for many years and felt sorry for her because of her illness. The Rokov family was wealthy and owned estates in the countryside near our town. They had two children—a daughter a few years older than me and a son who was younger. The Rokovs were traditional conservative parents who brought up the children in a religious and conventional manner. Both children attended the town's only Catholic school. Before the war the couple had been completely apolitical—they focused on their family and business matters. As long as these were prospering, they didn't appear to care much about what was going on in the rest of the world.

As is often the case, in spite of their identical upbringing, the couple's children chose different directions in life. The daughter, essentially a good-natured girl, was less ambitious than her parents. She was introduced to a young man from a nearby village who had just recently finished law school. Both sets of parents approved of and encouraged this relationship and blessed their plans for the future.

As an ambitious young lawyer, however, the young man found it advantageous to enroll in the Hlinka Party to secure a significant position. Although neither he nor his wife had previously been particularly political, this was common in those days. Eventually the young couple moved to Bratislava, the capital, where better jobs were available. I lost track of them during the war, but met them again later in Bratislava.

Mrs. Rokov's son had gravitated to the youth group of the Hlinka party while still living with his parents. I don't know how his parents found the courage to hide me under their house while a member of their own family wore the black Guardists' uniform. I was even more afraid of the son, with his allegiance to the Hlinka party, than I was of the mice in the cellar. Fortunately he had no taste for alcohol and so had no reason to go downstairs to the cellar. Much to his parents' chagrin, his interests lay completely outside of the house and he was seldom at home.

My parents, of course, felt deep gratitude toward the family and included them in their prayer. These people placed themselves in a position of very great danger for us. Neither the daughter nor the son was aware of my hiding in their cellar—their parents had to be very cautious. To be discovered helping a Jew would have earned them the label of “White Jew.” Not only would it have damaged their reputation, but it could also have jeopardized their safety.

ANNITA SHARPE

Context: Western Europe

Source: Annita Sharpe. Escape to Les Vignes: A Childhood in Nazi-Occupied France. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2007, pp. 39–49. Used by permission.

The fall of France in June 1940 led to a great many changes—not only for the country, which was divided into “occupied” and “free” zones, but also for the Jews of France. Henceforth their treatment would be determined by whether they were French-born or foreign-born; and the distinction made all the difference in the world for the latter. Annita Sharpe, a young girl at the time, was too little to be able to appreciate fully the events swirling around her, though certain things did stand out. The observations to which she refers in this account are full of detail, providing a very useful window to understanding what life was like at “ground level” during the first years of the German occupation of France.

With the Débâcle, the capitulation of France, and in the wake of the German occupation in 1940, Papa came back from the army. As a child I was not aware of these historical events and the names they would be remembered by but I have clear recollections of how they impacted on my family. I remember being grateful that Papa had not been made a prisoner of war like so many French soldiers, including my friend Hélène's father. Nor was he badly wounded in the fighting like his brother, Oncle Sam, who had to be treated for many months in a military hospital. He was officially designated “mutilé de guerre à 100%” (100% war wounded). This gave him, in the brief period before the German occupation, benefits such as reductions in fares and other advantages. He was never to fully recover from his wounds.

We had been living for too long in our cramped two-room apartment in Rue des Envierges. . . . Soon after Papa returned, we moved to Rue du Faubourg St Denis in the 10th arrondissement, to a larger apartment, which was very well situated opposite the Gare du Nord, the big northern railway station. Ironically, it had become easier and more affordable to rent good apartments during the occupation because so many people had fled Paris to take refuge in the country. This one was particularly spacious, with a big kitchen and a separate toilet and washing facilities. Our parents had a huge bedroom and we children shared another, even bigger. There was a room large enough to act as both a dining and living room and Papa even had a room for a workshop. It was sheer luxury!

Maman and Papa furnished each room with beautiful second hand furniture, which today would be considered valuable antiques. I can still remember the huge wardrobes with their bevelled mirrors and our antique beds. The dining room had a double-tiered buffet reaching up to the ceiling, all carved with lions' heads, fruit, flowers, leaves and columns. The table, with its carved pedestal, stood in the middle of the room. Maman often told how Grand-mère was so pleased for us to be in such a beautiful apartment. On her first visit she exclaimed, “You will even be able to make weddings for your children here!”

Nobody then knew what was in store for us. It was assumed by most people, even after the horrors of the past months, that life was going to resume with some sort of normality. I loved our new location and felt very grown up going to the local primary school on my own. I made a new friend called Hélène Conan, who lived across the road from us. We were in the same class. Later, our mothers befriended each other and were able to give each other moral support during the difficult times that were coming.

We hardly had time to enjoy our lovely apartment when Papa was arrested in a street roundup in Rue St Maur. It was August 1941, when I was eight years old. Somebody knocked on the door and when we opened it, there was a young man with a note from Papa, telling us this terrible news. He had left on his bike, as he had numerous times before, to pick up materials for his work: leather, frames, cardboard and glue. That day he didn't come back home. He was caught in one of the street arrests ordered by the Germans and carried out by the French police. Till then, they had arrested foreign Jews but not French nationals.

Later, Maman was notified to come and fetch his bicycle from the police station, We kept hoping that he would soon be released but when that didn't happen, Maman was able to find out where he had been taken. It was to a suburb called Drancy, on the outskirts of Paris. At the time, it was a place where a lot of building was taking place, including large, cheap housing blocks and the first skyscrapers ever built. My Uncle Sam's parents-in-law, the Freilich family, fortuitously for us, lived in a pleasant little house in Drancy. Later, just to say the word "Drancy" would make anyone shudder because it became the dreaded transit camp for the deportation of Jews by cattle trains to Auschwitz and other concentration camps.

Maman took the three of us to stay overnight with the Freilich family. Maman had no plan other than to be near Papa and was hoping to gain permission to see him. No one was allowed near those unfinished grey concrete towers where he and many others were being detained. We could see, through spaces left for doors and windows and on the balconies, lots of men standing, stripped down to their singlets.

It was August and very hot. We stood on the footpath across the road trying to spot Papa amongst the others. Policemen kept coming over to us, warning us to move on. We moved a little way and then continued our vigil. We finally spotted Papa and he could see us, for Maman had deliberately put huge white bows in our hair. He waved at us and we jumped for joy and called to him, even though we knew he could not possibly hear us. We spent each Sunday for three months in Drancy, trying to bring this small comfort to Papa. Each time, the police tried to stop us. We could see he had lost lots of weight and Maman tried to send him food parcels but nothing was permitted the prisoners. Grand-mère Boubelou was distraught and kept saying, "I wish I could save him. I would gladly give my life to save him!"

But because Maman was often in tears, she would tell her, "You will see. He will come out of there and you will yet enjoy life together. You will be both laughing and you will be together! I can see it."

At one time we met a friend of Uncle Sam and Tante Germaine, at their apartment. I remember my aunt being heavily pregnant at the time. This woman knew that Papa was in Drancy. She had a talent for reading cards and offered to read them for Maman. I remember what she said to her because Maman often retold this story in the years to come: "There will be a death of someone close but that will bring much good to your life. I see you making a very long voyage in the future."

In November 1941 Grand-mère Boubelou took sick with a bad chest infection. She stayed in hospital for a few days but then begged Uncle Sam to take her home. He promised to bring her clothes the next day but she insisted on leaving straight away. She said that if Charles were there, he would understand and take her home immediately because the next day, she would no longer be alive. This is exactly what happened and this is what Uncle Sam blurted out when he arrived at our place sobbing like a child. Grand-mère Boubelou had died during the night.

I shall never forget that day. It was terrible for me to see everyone so bereft, and, young as I was, I understood how sad a loss it was for me as well. My paternal grandmother had been a vivid presence in my life. In spite of being severely diabetic, she was very lively and loved to laugh. She was interested in everything. She always encouraged me to sing all my French nursery rhymes and songs to her and her own French was good. She was often at our place and she never stopped her granddaughters from looking in her bag. In fact, she carried special bread, which we liked to nibble; also some fruit, particularly small pears and there was always enough to share with us. I didn't see her as often as my other grandmother but I loved her very much. Very quickly, the whole family got together and took counsel. It was decided that every effort had to be made to get Papa out of Drancy so he could attend his mother's funeral. . . .

Maman went to the French authorities that ran the Drancy camps. Uncle Sam went with her to give her courage but waited some distance outside. He didn't go on for fear of being arrested himself. She often told us how the French guards railed at her, calling her dirty Jew. How dare she come and ask for a permit! She was made to go from one counter to another but wasn't getting anywhere. She was crying and kept repeating, "C'est dégoûtant!" (It's disgusting)—Papa was as French as they were. He had gone to fight for France and this was the treatment he was getting from his own compatriots!

One kind policeman, who had heard the whole altercation and seen how distraught Maman was, followed her as she walked out banging the door. He suggested she should try and go to the German authorities and told her where to go. Uncle Sam took her there. Again, as she walked into the office, the French staff started to jeer at her, calling her “sale youpine,” which meant dirty Jew, but with an even more derogatory meaning.

She screamed at them, “I haven’t come here to address myself to you. You are only the lackeys here. I want to see the German officer in charge!” The altercation brought the German officer out of his room to see what was going on. He took her into his office and she explained that Papa needed permission to get out of Drancy to attend to his mother’s burial. There was no one else to do it. She was a woman alone with three children and it was impossible for her to handle it. He listened to her and said, “All right but only for twenty-four hours.” He rang the camp at Drancy to order a special release. Maman requested that Papa be told only that his mother was very sick and he was needed, so as not to be given a shock.

Papa told us that before they released him he was made to sign a paper and to swear on his honour to return to Drancy within twenty-four hours. I have no way of knowing for sure but I imagine that such a permit was unique in the history of Drancy. Again, the whole family took counsel. They decided that Papa was not going back; in fact he was not even going to his mother’s funeral. This was his opportunity to save himself. Tante Madeleine and Oncle Sam arranged everything to get him across the demarcation line to the Free Zone. They even had to pay for this costly operation because Maman didn’t have the money.

Papa arrived from Drancy. He was so thin! He told us how they had been herded into those unfinished buildings that had no water connected and how at first they were given no food for days. They were kept compliant only by being told that they would soon be released but three months had passed in the same terrible conditions.

After he had eaten and cleaned himself up, Papa was taken to the hospital to say goodbye to his mother. When he was told that everything was ready for him to escape to the Free Zone, he argued that he had sworn on his honour to go back to Drancy. He was persuaded not to be foolish and to agree to not even going to the funeral the next day. That same evening I saw my father cut open a long baguette (it was all we had in the house), pour some oil on it and devour it in a few minutes. He was starved. He told us how they had been given only one loaf of bread a day for all the men on his floor and how he had been nominated to apportion each morsel fairly.

Papa left early the next morning. Just as well he did not turn up at the funeral. The police were waiting for him at the cemetery. I didn’t know then that he was hidden in Paris for a number of days. It was likely that the train stations leading to the Free Zone were being watched, so no risks were taken. Also, he was in a weak state and needed time to recuperate a little before undertaking this dangerous trip. It took some time before we knew that Papa had safely crossed into the Free Zone. He had gone to Limoges, where there was a family contact to help him.

I was only eight years old but had understood all the turmoil the family had gone through but had obviously not understood the dangers, since they were probably kept from me. I still thought with a child’s mind. When I told Maman that I knew Papa had not gone back to Drancy but had gone to the Free Zone, she slapped my face and told me never to say this, not to anyone! If asked, I was to say, “He has gone back to the camp at Drancy.” I was shaken and hurt. I still could not understand why I had been punished like that but the lesson was learnt.

It did not take long for Maman and us children to suffer the backlash from the authorities. We were followed, questioned and constantly badgered by the French police and their inspectors. They would barge in on us early in the morning, waking us and running from room to room, opening windows, hoping to surprise Papa at home or caught in flight. They were full of zeal and kept telling us that if they caught him, he would be shot. They kept asking me, “Where is your father?” I replied only “In the camp in Drancy.” We were all terrified.

Maman would sometimes leave Fanny and Bernadette for a few short moments to run downstairs to do some quick shopping. She must have been watched because as soon as she left, they would knock and talk to Fanny behind the door, asking her if Papa was home. When Maman surprised the inspector, he quickly started to run down the stairs. She was not afraid to tell him off for questioning a four-year-old.

Once I was followed from school and asked where my father was. Another time, Maman had sent me to the shop nearby to get milk and bread. I was on my way back when a man came running after me saying, “Here is the money you dropped. Lucky I saw it happen.” I was about to tell him that I didn’t think I’d lost any money, when he pushed some paper notes in my hand, where I was already clutching some change and walked quickly away. He was gone before I could work out what happened. I was already in our stairway when all of a sudden, he came running after me shouting that I was a little thief and liar. He was going to teach me a lesson. I had lied about the money and he was coming to see my parents. He then asked me if my father was at home.

Maman opened the door when she heard the shouting in the stairway. I rushed in, sobbing my heart out and threw myself into the arms of Grand-mère for protection. We were all standing in the hallway and both Maman and Grand-mère tried to work out what had happened. I was crying too much to explain. The man was still shouting, “Little thief! Little liar! She should get a good hiding from her father! If he isn’t at home, I will do it myself.” All the time he was talking, he was stretching his neck to look into the other rooms. Maman told him that if anyone was going to punish me, she would do so herself. She gave him back his money and ordered him to go. I have a terrible knot in my stomach just thinking about this particular experience. This clumsy but frightening surveillance went on for six months.

Life was very difficult for Maman. She was left alone to care for and feed the three of us. I can’t imagine how she did it. It was winter and cold but we could afford very little heating, only the wood stove in the kitchen. My grandmother was often at our place helping as much as she could.

One morning, Maman sent me to the boulangerie to get bread with the requisite ration tickets. I stood in a long queue for some time and when it came to my turn, the boulangère told me that there was no more bread and, in any case, that my tickets were false ones. Maman was furious and went down to tell her off for taking advantage of a child so that she could keep the bread for her own dishonest purposes.

Once, Fanny took sick with a severe nosebleed in the middle of the night. Maman, in desperation, rushed across the road where there was a police station and appealed for help. A policeman came back to the apartment with her, wrapped Fanny in a blanket and helped take her to hospital. I was left, worried and fearful, to look after Bernadette. Fortunately, Fanny’s problem proved not to be as serious as first thought.

Everyone was suffering in those days, including my school friend whose father was a prisoner of war. Her mother also had three children to care for, no heating and little food. In this bleak time, both our mothers helped each other in small ways and gave each other moral support. We gave this woman all our family photos to take care of. Maman didn’t want them in the house because they could identify Papa and other family members. At the end of the war those and our radio were the only belongings that we were able to retrieve.

ANNITA SHARPE

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Annita Sharpe. Escape to Les Vignes: A Childhood in Nazi-Occupied France. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2007, pp. 87–92. Used by permission.

The French commune of Les Vignes was long renowned as a place of tranquility and peace. As Annita Sharpe relates in this account, for some time during the war she barely saw any Germans at all. By the spring of 1944, indeed, it seemed as though everything would be well and that she and her family would survive the Nazi onslaught. But then one day without warning, “two black Citroën cars” appeared and arrested her and her family. While they were being driven away—at first, to Limoges—Annita’s questions were many, though she did her best to keep her thoughts to herself. The account she provides is an excellent example of how, even deep into the final phase of the war, the Nazis still maintained their quest to round up and eliminate Jews.

It was spring, 1944. We had been at Les Vignes for two years and had become part of the uncomplicated lifestyle of the countryside. Apart from those occasional raids to remove food from the farms, we didn’t see Germans in our hamlet. The short distance we were from the main road seemed to protect us from their presence. So on the day when the Gestapo caught up with us we were completely unprepared. They came in two black Citroën cars, which they parked right at the entrance of Les Vignes, just a bit further up from our place. This in itself was unusual and ominous. The local people used bikes. We rarely saw a car.

Maman and Fanny have told me something I was not aware of because I may have been at school or on an errand at the time. Sometime before our arrest, a woman, a stranger to our area, had come by on her bicycle and ridden backwards and forwards a number of times in front of our house, as if she was looking for something or someone. Maman was outside and was aware of her scrutiny. It made her nervous but since nothing further happened, the incident was forgotten.

We children were all at home the afternoon the men came. Why, I can’t remember. Was it a holiday or was it a Thursday when schoolchildren are at home? Memory simply eludes me. Hélène was still staying with us. Maman was outside talking to Mme Devoyon when the black cars arrived.

Papa was in a small room he had rented in a villa belonging to an elderly woman in the village. He had made this arrangement only a short time before and we were not supposed to tell anyone, let alone take anybody there. Sometime earlier, Maman had found hidden in our house some tools, false papers and rubber stamps that Papa was using for his work for the Resistance. She was not sure of the extent of his involvement but insisted that this incriminating material had to be removed from our place. Just as well it had all been hidden somewhere in the little room where Papa also moved his sewing machine and some of his tools of trade. In case of a raid, he could say that this was where where he was making bags and leather goods.

A rather tall man, wearing a hat and glasses and dressed in dark civilian clothes, got out of one of the cars. He approached Maman and asked her, "Where does Mme Charles Szkop live?" Maman pointed in the direction of the house. He tapped her on the shoulder and said, with a smile on his face, "You are Mme Szkop." He gestured for her to go inside.

We have retold and relived the following moments in our lives many times, as if compelled to do it. They appear to me as frozen images, captured in time.

Next we are all inside the house. This man begins to ask a lot of questions and is joined by another in a leather coat. He turns to me. "Where is your father? What is he doing?" Maman answers for me that Papa is working in the fields, helping the farmers in their work. Meanwhile Hélène has understood who these men are and is getting agitated. She starts wringing her hands. I am sensing something awful but feel that Maman has not quite understood the situation yet. A terrible feeling of doom and terror comes over me. We are caught! All our fears are coming true. The fellow turns to me and asks, "What is your name?" I tell him, "Annita" and in a sickening, honeyed tone, he continues, "Do you know where your father is?"

I nod mutely and he replies, "Please go and get your father." Hélène pipes up, "I will go quicker" and starts for the door, which he is blocking. He points to me, "No, she will go." Maman then says, "Look, this girl is a friend of my daughter and came here to do some homework. She needs to go home." As I start to go outside, Hélène precedes me and runs across the road into the fields and disappears. I run down the road to my father.

Maman relates that while I was gone the man began opening cupboards and tossing everything out and he was soon joined by his off-sider. Maman asked them angrily who gave them the authority to do this and what were they searching for. "We are the German police," they replied. Her heart sank and she prayed Papa and I would not come back.

I ran into Papa's room and, breathless, told him what had happened, about the men wearing hats and rimless glasses, one in a leather coat, and how I thought they were Germans because they had an accent when they spoke French. Papa turned white. Without a moment's hesitation, he took off his leather apron and we rushed back home. He was walking so fast, I had to run after him.

Maman was beside herself when she saw the two of us returning. The Gestapo, for that was who they were, asked for our papers and were surprised to see our name. They accused us of having false papers and being Jews. I do not understand why our name Szkop did not seem to them a Jewish name.

Maman started to scream that she was the Jewish one and that Papa was not Jewish. At that point they asked Papa to drop his pants. Papa refused to do it in front of us children. They took him into the bedroom. It took an instant and he was back in the front room, livid and shaking. Seeing my strong Papa like that, I began to cry. They asked us to pack a few belongings. We were under arrest.

Maman was defiant. She shouted at them, "We are not going with you. You are not taking me out of here alive!" One of them turned to her and hit her across the face so hard, she went reeling against the wall. We children started to scream and cry and saw Papa rush towards the man, his eyes blazing in fury, ready to hit him or jump on him. The other German pulled out his gun, shot in the air and held the gun at my father's head saying, "Toi, ne fais pas le con!" (You, don't be an idiot!) They gave us ten minutes to pack. My parents stood immobile and distraught, the gun still pointing at Papa.

I was the one who moved. I started to gather a few belongings. I opened our cupboard and found some underwear for both of us. I took a big, tan woolen shawl and spread it out on the floor and put everything in it. As I was taking a small sheet from the cupboard, I found some money hidden among the bed linen. I collected a few items of clothing for each of us, whatever I could find and made it up into a bundle. I then went to the cupboard under the window where we kept all our school books and equipment. I pulled out my library book and was hesitating about taking exercise books and pens and pencils when the Nazi with the unctuous voice said to me, "Don't bother with all this. There is a school where you are going!" I half-believed him but still took the library book. . . .

There was a shot outside in the vicinity of the cars. One of the Germans went out to investigate. Apparently a Jewish woman had been arrested ahead of us. She had asked the French driver who was guarding her if she could relieve herself behind the bushes. She had tried to escape, so he had shot into the air. She had come out rather than risk being shot.

We were led out at gunpoint. As we walked out of the house toward the parked cars, one of the Gestapo men told Bernadette, “Go away, you are too little!” Bernadette was walking next to me. She looked up at me for a moment, stopped, turned on her heels and went running in the direction of her friend Denise Carreau’s place. We had no time to beg to keep our five year old with us, or to say goodbye! Mme Devoyon and her daughter Celine, who was holding her little daughter Solange, were watching the whole scene without moving or being able to say a word. They were probably in a state of shock.

The driver brought the first car up to the front door and we were all ordered into it. I paid little attention to the Jewish woman already there because I was still watching Bernadette through the back window of the car, still running on the road to her little friend’s place. I watched as one Gestapo man got into the second car. He pulled out onto the road and our car followed. I was without feeling by then, as if made of ice.

We drove towards Limoges in total silence and all the way the Gestapo man stayed swiveled round in his seat, watching us closely, as if he expected us to mount some resistance. As I relate this, my stomach is in a knot and I find myself reliving the terror of that day.

Much later, thinking about our arrest, the question arose as to why one of the Gestapo men had not accompanied me to my father? Papa had actually been denounced as a member of the Resistance, not as a Jew. We are guessing that they knew that this area was a hotbed of resistance and they worried about venturing deeper into this isolated village without more back-up. This is surmise but seems the only valid explanation.

SIDNEY SIMON

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Sidney Simon with Maryann McLoughlin (edited by Rosalie Simon and Maryann McLoughlin). In the Birch Woods of Belarus: A Partisan’s Revenge. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2009, pp. 34–38. Used by permission.

When war came to Belarus in July 1941, Sidney Simon and his family were taken forcibly to a ghetto after the Nazis arrived in his area. One of five children, he was then 14 years old. After a period of terror at the hands of the Nazis the family escaped the ghetto and sought sanctuary in the woods. Simon then joined the partisans and fought the Nazis until joining the Soviet army. His memoir, which recounts his experiences as a partisan and with the Soviets, provides an account of how and when Jewish opposition could take place, through the lens of what has become known as “forest resistance.”

My brother Mojshe belonged to a group of about twenty or twenty-two men. When Mojshe heard about the liquidation, he went to the woods with this group of men to meet up with the partisans.

After a short time as a partisan Mojshe was killed by the Germans and the police. The Germans had surrounded a clearing. As the partisan group went through this clearing that they had thought was safe, the Germans opened fire from all four sides. The partisans didn’t have a chance. One partisan, Jankel Orzhechowski, survived by jumping into the bushes when he wasn’t noticed.

After our family escaped the ghetto, we met Jankel. Jankel told us that my brother had escaped; Jankel said he had seen Mojshe running, running. My father and I didn’t believe Jankel, but he insisted this was the truth. Out of pain and concern to make Jankel tell us the truth, as if to stab himself, my father grabbed a knife, which I immediately took away from him. Jankel continued lying. He lied to protect my parents from pain.

A few days later—this was after Mojshe had left—my family escaped the ghetto because we were warned that, on April 28, 1942, all the Jews in the Żetel Ghetto were to be taken outside the ghetto, massacred, and buried. We went into a hiding place under a small stable—8’ by 12’. My brother, Richard, sisters Katie and Ida, my parents, and three more people—neighbours—hid there. We made a shallow, square box and filled this with manure. Under this we made a hole. We would get in the hole and pull the box over the hole to cover our hiding place. The Germans would open the door and look around, but they didn’t see anything but manure. We stayed there until night on the day the ghetto was liquidated. We heard a lot of explosions.

My father looked through the hole of the pipe we used for air and said, “They just got your mother’s sister Bashe Malke, her husband Shimen, and the baby (two or three months old).” They had hidden in another place under the floor of a house. My father continued, “They took them outside; she is holding the baby. Oh G-d, a German is choking the baby to death in his mother’s arms. Now he is killing Bashe! And her husband is watching. The German beast killed Bashe’s husband.” Can you imagine the brutality of this!

Then we found that my cousin, Hirshe Leizer, the Hebrew teacher, who had been with us and was married to Civia, and now with a little baby, was hiding too. The baby started to cry. The others said, "Smother the baby or they'll find us." Hirshe said, "I am not killing my baby. I'll go out." He went out, and they killed him; they threw in hand grenades and everybody was murdered, including Civia and the baby. . . .

This horror was our life every day. I never dreamed we would ever get out. This goes for the ghetto, the partisans, and whatever else I went through.

Night came. Father said, "I am going to walk out first. If you hear shooting, don't come out." He left. There were no shots. We did not wait. Without hesitation, my mother, then the children, and then the neighbors followed my father and so we left the hiding place. It was dark but flames flared occasionally. My father took a stick and held it over his shoulder so if anybody saw this they would think he had a rifle.

We made it to the woods and slept there. We saw no partisans. We had no food, except wild berries. At night my mother went to the village from house to house asking for a slice of bread. She would not let us go because it was too dangerous. I saw my mother leaving and I didn't know if she would ever come back. Life was treacherous.

We were looking for a place to settle. We saw a place close to houses. But could the occupants be trusted? Would they betray us? This place was not far from a house occupied by a family named Shavel. We felt safe even though we were not close to him. He could give us news about the Germans. He couldn't give us much food, however, because he was poor.

Finally the Germans decided to go into the woods and kill the "Stalin dogs," what the Germans called the partisans. Everybody heard the news and abandoned their hiding places. We ran deeper into the forest. We had to run through creeks. My boots got wet. It had been rainy and the ground was deep with mud; then it turned cold and the ground froze. My feet were frostbitten. They swelled so much that they had to cut my boots off.

The Germans were still searching in the woods; we were short of places to hide. To be safe we dug an underground shelter that we shored up with saplings so that it wouldn't cave in. There were steps going up to the door. Inside there were bunks. We made torches from moss and sticks, lighting these with a flint stone. Sometimes we would inhale soot, the residue of these torches. Eight or nine people, including my family, lived in this bunker—Majewski, his wife, and a baby, Sanford. The baby caused us anxiety because if the baby cried our bunker could have been discovered. The father said, "if you want my baby killed, you kill him." So one of them put pillows over the baby's face. When they lifted the pillows, the baby was still breathing. They say that this baby was meant to live. After this, they agreed not to kill the baby, no matter what happened. The parents wanted to give their baby to a non-Jew; however, this man saw that the mother was having a hard time giving the baby away, so he said no. That baby, Sanford, is alive today with a family of his own. We were invited to his wedding.

When the Germans were in the woods looking for Jews, all the others from the bunker, except me, would leave the bunker and go deeper into the woods to flee. I could not leave; because of my frostbitten feet, I could not walk. When they left they would cover the opening of the shelter with wood to which they had attached moss and pieces of branches to camouflage the opening. I would be in the bunker hiding. I would hear the Germans calling to each other. I often would hear horses trotting and whinnying. Once a horse stepped right near me. If his hoof had been any closer, he and his rider would have been in the hole with me and I would have been killed. I had to wait in the bunker until the rest returned.

When the Germans were not searching for Jews and we were all in the bunker, I would sometimes climb out and put my feet in the sun. That seemed to help with the sores and cracks in my feet. During the night my feet would crack again. The next day I would start over again with my feet in the sun. I could feel the reforming during the day and then at night it would crack again. I would wrap my feet in burlap potato bags—these were dirty—full of mud and sand, but they were all I had. It was a wonder my feet did not become infected. In my old age, my feet are numb from the frostbite and I have trouble walking.

I tried to keep clean, using the snow to wash and rinse myself. We had to wear the same clothes all the time. In the spring when it was warmer, I would bathe and wash my clothes in a creek.

We had to move deeper into the woods to hide from the Germans who continued searching for Jews. I had to walk, leaning on two sticks, like crutches. I was in pain and very thirsty. One day I was so thirsty that when I saw a spot where a horse had urinated and the snow had melted, I knelt down and sucked the melted snow.

With me I had a hand grenade without the lever and a gun without ammunition. They were of no use to me but I kept them, hoping, I guess, that I would run into ammunition for the gun and a lever to arm the grenade. Eventually my feet were somewhat better. We continued hiding in the woods. We would still go to the villagers to ask for some food. We would go out and get potatoes and bread and bring these back. Sometimes the partisans would drop off some food.

That was our life for a while until one day a group of partisans came along to see us and give us information, dropping off some potatoes. They had heard that someone had buried a gun in the vicinity, so they had come along and dug up the gun. It had been buried in the woods, wrapped in an oiled cloth. While they were visiting with us, they asked me if I wanted to be a partisan. I said, “Yes, but I don’t have a good gun nor any ammunition.” To be allowed to join the partisans a person would usually need to bring a gun and ammunition or they didn’t want him. But they said they had an extra rifle. They gave me the rifle—the buried one.

The partisans also received weapons from Russian planes that dropped ammunition and dynamite attached to parachutes. At the same time, they would also drop a Russian officer who made sure the partisans received the ammunition. For the time being, he became part of the partisans group.

The partisans would then make signal fires for the planes—in different designs at different times—so that they not only would know where to drop the supplies but also so that the Germans would not anticipate where they would be dropping the supplies. On rare occasions the planes circled but did not drop any supplies, as if they had intelligence that the drop was unsafe. This was disturbing to us, waiting for supplies that were desperately needed.

The partisans told me to ask my father if I could join them. I walked up to my father and said, “I would like to become a partisan. They have a rifle for me.” He said, “my son, do what you think is right and G-d should watch over you.” Thus, I joined the partisans.

GERTA SOLAN

Context: Central Europe

Source: Gerta Solan. My Heart Is at Ease. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2014, pp. 13–16. Used by permission.

The German occupation of what remained of Czechoslovakia after the Sudetenland crisis of 1938 saw huge changes in the lives of Czech Jews. Gerta Solan, who lived in Prague, provides here an overview of some of those changes, as seen from the perspective of one who was a child living at home at the time. She shows, too, the steady attrition in the Jewish population, who became subjected to deportations from 1941 onwards.

Eventually, for Gerta and her family, this culminated in their own deportation to Theresienstadt (Terezín)—observed, as she tells us, by the local baker, who “watched smugly . . . as we left for the unknown.”

At the beginning of 1939, people, especially Jewish families, started to feel the strain of political changes. The Czech government of Emil Hácha was unable to prevent Slovakia’s separation from the rest of the country that was encouraged by Hitler and the ensuing crisis. Slovakia’s independence—led by Slovak premier Monsignor Jozef Tiso, albeit under German control—was declared on March 14, 1939. The very next day, German troops occupied the rest of Czechoslovakia and proclaimed it the German Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. The area of Carpatho-Ukraine also declared its independence from Czechoslovakia, but Hungary soon overran and annexed it.

The fall of Czechoslovakia signaled the definitive end of the political system put in place by the Treaty of Versailles at the end of World War I, weakened France and England, and isolated the Soviet Union. Germany was now the dominant power on the European continent. Soon after this, my parents decided to move out of my grandparents’ place on Legerova Street and find an apartment just for the three of us. My mother found an apartment around the corner that she really fell in love with, but there was a catch—a German family was supposed to move into it. My mother, however, refused to see this as an obstacle. She made up her mind to go to the German Kommandantur on Bredovská Street and speak to the authorities about it. Father told her not to go, but she was determined. No one went there who didn’t have to. I myself wonder why she went.

Inside the building, with Father waiting nervously outside, Mother was taken to see a German officer. They could be gallant, especially with charming ladies. She told us later that he had kissed her hand, offered her a seat and when she explained her problem, he responded with a handsome smile that there should be no problem in assigning her the apartment. Mother started to give him the information he requested, but he suddenly looked at her directly and, with raised eyebrows, asked her, “Are you Jewish?” As soon as she nodded yes, he got up from his swivel chair, looked at her with fury and yelled, “Raus!” (Out!), pointing his finger to the door. My mother didn’t waste a second; she flew to the door, ran down the stairs and out into the street, took Father by the hand and said, “Run around the corner!” They were lucky to be safe and I guess Mother was happy to have gotten away that easily.

Mother found another beautiful apartment on the same street, on Platněřská, next to and across from the City Hall buildings. The entrance was elegant, the stairs and walls covered with marble. The building had an elevator and our apartment on the fourth floor had wonderful stained glass windows. We moved in and I think that my parents were happy there.

Unfortunately, City Hall soon needed to expand and as we were the neighbouring building, we received a notice to move out. Our new apartment building on the corner of streets Dlouhá 19 and Rámová 1 was, it turned out, right across the street from where the writer Franz Kafka had lived about two decades earlier. Today, there is a national memorial plaque on the house.

By the beginning of 1940, our situation had worsened drastically. Jews were only allowed to shop during certain hours and had an 8:00 p.m. curfew. We had to board the last compartment of the streetcar and we weren't allowed to attend theatres and movies or go to public parks. I could only play nearby in the old Jewish cemetery at Maiselova Street, where my friends and I jumped from one gravestone to another without any sentiment. We were just children who needed to be children. When I returned to this cemetery after the war, I spotted the large ancient gravestone of the well-known scholar Rabbi Loew right next to the entrance of the cemetery and then many others whose names were so familiar to me. There are twelve layers of graves there, one on top of the other. This was a piece of my past, my childhood. Sometimes even stones talk of sadness and human suffering. I took pictures of the stones and framed the photographs to hang on the wall in my living room.

Gradually, we were restricted from other aspects of regular life. That fall, Jewish children were expelled from Czech schools. There was one school for Jewish children right in the old Jewish quarter of the city but there were too many Jewish children in Prague to accommodate in that building. We had to take exams to be accepted and I was lucky to be one of the ones who made it in. There were still so many of us that we had to take turns going to class with another group of Jewish children. One group went to school for two months and for the other couple of months we did homework.

A year later, in September 1941, we were ordered to wear a yellow Jewish star on our dress or coat whenever we were outside. My mother liked to take advantage of her "Aryan" looks and didn't follow the restrictions for Jews. Sometimes she walked on the street without the star and came home after the curfew. Both Father and I got extremely nervous when she went out because if she had been caught, she could have been arrested and we might never see her again. We were also ordered to hand over all our valuables, such as gold and silver jewellery and watches, to the Gestapo. I remember lining up in front of the Gestapo building in Střeřovice, on the outskirts of Prague, waiting for hours in the cold.

Far from our home, in the Strařnice district, the huge field that belonged to the Jewish Hagibor sports club was one of the only places where we could participate in all kinds of sports competitions and games. Close to my home, next to the only Jewish coffeehouse of Prague, was an exercise hall called Maccabi Hatzair where I met Fredy Hirsch again. He was a twenty-year-old gymnastic teacher of German origin, a leader and trainer of Jewish youth I had known from Mrs. Fridlander's gym hall on Wenceslas Square. He was such a handsome young man, every girl's dream, although we were too young to know he was homosexual. Everyone loved him and respected him. Led by Fredy, we participated in many wonderful games. My parents' friends still came every week in the afternoons to play chamber music, but had to be back home before curfew. I had a good voice and liked singing, and I was a member of the choir at the synagogue. It was one of the few activities I still did, along with playing piano every day, until the Nazis closed the synagogues.

In November 1941, Jewish families started to be deported to various camps, although we didn't know that then. There was nervousness in the air as Jewish people lost their homes. We helped friends and neighbours pack their things, sadly saying goodbye and wishing them good luck. It was the end of a carefree era and I felt the seriousness of the times.

Then, in June 1942, my parents and I were called up and we too had to leave our home. We marched out of our house with the allotted fifty kilograms in a knapsack and into a transport destined for Theresienstadt. The local baker, Mr. Matys, who lived on the corner opposite our apartment with his wife and six children, watched smugly with his big belly protruding as we left home for the unknown.

FRED SPIEGEL

Context: Western Europe

Source: Fred Spiegel. Once the Acacias Bloomed: Memories of a Childhood Lost (edited by Maryann McLoughlin O'Donnell). Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2004, pp. 74–79. Used by permission.

While the story of Anne Frank is well known, that of Fred Spiegel has barely surfaced except among a limited few. Born in Dinslaken, Germany, in 1932, Spiegel and his sister, Edith, were sent to live with relatives in Holland after Kristallnacht, the “Night of Broken Glass”—the anti-Jewish pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, when the Nazis destroyed Jewish homes, shops, and villages in Germany and Austria. Separated from their mother, the Spiegel children were subjected to persecution after the German army invaded and occupied the Netherlands in May 1940. Fred Spiegel was sent to the concentration camps at Vught, Westerbork, and Bergen-Belsen, and was only liberated on April 13, 1945. Later, he was reunited with his sister in England in the fall of 1945. Spiegel’s memoir, as seen through this extract, deepens our understanding of the Holocaust as seen through the eyes of a child.

We were assembled early on the morning of May 23, 1943, and put on a train—destination Transit Camp Westerbork. I had just turned eleven. I was with my sister Edith, fifteen years old, Uncle Max, Aunt Paula, and cousin Alfred, twelve years old.

Westerbork had been established in 1939 by the Dutch, as a camp for German Jewish refugees who had crossed the border illegally after Kristallnacht and had nowhere to go. It was taken over by the Germans in 1942; they considered it a perfect place for a transit camp because of its location in north-eastern Holland in the middle of nowhere, near the German border, and with good railroad connections east. It had previously been well organized by the Jews themselves when the camp was under Dutch control. The Germans took over on July 1, 1942.

Westerbork was very crowded because nearly everybody had a deferment, or exemption from being transported east to the so-called resettlement or work camps. These deferments were given for various reasons: for “essential” workers at the camp and for foreign or enemy nationals. Sometimes, with enough money, deferments could be bought. Because of this, it became difficult to fill the trains heading east every Tuesday. However, it was a transit camp, not a concentration camp, and very much better than Vught.

The problem was the weekly transports east to the “resettlement or work camps.” We had noticed a very long train, consisting of cattle wagons standing on a siding. Inmates of Westerbork told us newcomers, “This is the train that takes Jews east to resettlement and work camps—every Tuesday.”

The lists of those to be deported were prepared by the Jewish Council within the camp and submitted by the head of the council, Kurt Schlesinger, to the German commander, Albert Konrad Gemmeke. In order to make things easier for themselves, the Judenrat, or Jewish Council (Jewish leaders selected by the Nazis) often put all the people arriving the previous few days on the lists before they knew them and often before the new arrivals had the opportunity to obtain an exemption or deferment.

Soon after my arrival in Westerbork, I narrowly escaped being deported on one of these transports. . . .

We had arrived in Westerbork late Monday afternoon after about a six hour train ride, and we were immediately separated, my cousin and I in one huge barrack, my sister elsewhere, and my uncle and aunt also in different barracks. Most people in our barrack had arrived together with us. Yet our first night in Westerbork was uncomfortable. Nobody was able to sleep much that night. The barracks were huge, noisy, and very crowded; each barrack held about 500 to 1000 people. Bunks were stacked three high.

Very early in the morning, the barrack leader started to read out the names of the people to be put on the train that day. As my name and my cousin Alfred’s name was called, we walked towards the train, carrying the few belongings we were allowed to take with us. It was dawn and the walk to the train was very scary. Nearly everybody was crying, especially the little children. The people not going on that train were under total curfew and could neither leave their barracks nor look out of the few windows. The only people we saw were the German SS guards with their dogs, Dutch policemen, and the Jewish camp police, or Ordnungsdienst (OD). I saw nobody I knew, nor anyone from my family, except Alfred.

When the OD started to push us on the train, I panicked. Everything was so crowded. Some people cried, but most went quietly onto the train. I screamed loudly, “I don’t want to go onto this train.” When Alfred heard me screaming, he also started to scream. This caught the attention of an SS guard who asked a Dutch policeman what the screaming was all about. He apparently answered, “I think the children are afraid and do not want to go on the train.” The SS guard then immediately gave the order to take my cousin and me off that train. The same OD, who had been pushing us on, took us off, and we were put in a small room isolated from everybody else until after the train departed—without us. I did not realize at the time that I had narrowly escaped death.

As I found out years later, this was very unusual. There was always commotion when these trains left because nobody wanted to be crammed on the trains going to an unknown destination eastwards. However, it was indeed a rare occasion when a German guard ordered a Jew to be taken off a train destined for the gas chambers. The Germans preferred that the Jews went quietly and orderly. Apparently my screaming did not fit in with their plans.

Years later, I also found out that nearly everybody who had arrived from Vught the day before was on this train and sent to the death camp at Sobibor in Poland. There were no survivors. Between March and August 1943, about 35,000 Jews were transported from Westerbork to Sobibor. Only nineteen people are known to have survived.

Uncle Max and Aunt Paula had not been aware that we were almost deported. Immediately upon arrival in Westerbork, Uncle Max had applied for an exemption, not to be sent on one of those trains east. He had been a soldier in the German army in World War I and for this, for the time being, he had received an exemption. He thought this would keep all of us safe from being deported.

However, he soon realized, especially after what nearly happened to us, that his deferment would not apply to my sister and me because we were not his children. He felt it was his responsibility to try and save us. My uncle consulted with Kurt Schlesinger, the head of the Jewish council. Schlesinger suggested that my uncle put us on the so-called Weinreb deferment list. For a large amount of money paid to Weinreb, a German Jew living in Holland, people were put on a special list of people who would not be put on those transports east. My uncle was ready to do this, even though it meant that it would cost him almost all the money he still had hidden with non-Jewish friends.

Weinreb had been highly recommended because he was able to pay off the Nazis to save himself, his family, and other people who were willing to pay. My uncle decided to go ahead, but somehow at the last moment changed his mind. He then decided to go to see the German SS Camp Kommandant, Albert Gemmeker, even though everybody, including Kurt Schlesinger, strongly advised him against it, as this was considered very dangerous and might cost him his life. But he saw Gemmeker and tried to convince him that my sister and I were British citizens and as proof he brought with him the Red Cross letters we had received from my mother who was living in England at that time. We were foreign nationals. We had those Red Cross letters to prove it. I was never quite sure what transpired, whether we now had deferments as British citizens or if we were still on the Weinreb list.

About six weeks after this incident, my Uncle Max's exemption expired, as all exemptions and deferments eventually did in Westerbork. My uncle, aunt, and Alfred's names were on the list to be sent east to one of those "work or resettlement" camps. I spoke to my cousin before he left and I said to him, "I will see you soon." I believed that my sister and I would probably follow them, being sent on a later transport. Alfred seemed to have a premonition that this would not happen. He was crying and said, "I don't think so." Unfortunately he was right; as I found out after the war, they were deported to Sobibor and killed in the gas chambers on July 2, 1943.

Even though he would never know, my uncle's maneuvering had succeeded in keeping us off those trains to Sobibor and Auschwitz and allowed us to stay in Westerbork.

We could remain in Westerbork for the time being as we apparently were considered "Foreign Nationals" because our mother was living in Leeds, England, as an au pair, a foreign maid. We would now live in the orphanage of Transit Camp Westerbork, which was still under the jurisdiction of Kommandant Gemmeker.

JOSEPH STEINBERG

Context: Central Europe

Source: Joseph Steinberg and Maryann McLoughlin. Death, Hideous, Hovers Overhead: A Memoir of the Hungarian Labor Service. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2014, pp. 24–25, 27–30. Used by permission.

It is sometimes an overlooked fact that Hungary was an ally of Germany in its invasion of the Soviet Union, and that the Hungarian military drafted thousands of Jews into labor battalions to serve on the Eastern Front. Joseph Steinberg, who tells his story in the third person, had a brother who was in one such unit; the good news he received was not just that his brother had survived this experience, but that he had escaped his captivity and joined the Red Army. By October 1944 the Russians were advancing on Budapest; the city was in a state of siege by Christmas. These events ultimately led to the end of the Holocaust for many of Hungary's Jews, though Joseph was among those who were instead marched at gunpoint out of Budapest on a death march into Austria, as this account describes.

While Joseph was in the labor brigade at Komáron, his brother Mark and many other Jews and political prisoners were in labor battalions on the Eastern Front aiding the Hungarian army that at that time was fighting alongside the Wehrmacht (German army). Most of them died of disease, cold or malnutrition. Others were killed fighting, especially at Stalingrad.

At the battle of Stalingrad, in January 1943, the Red Army had broken through at the Don River, obliterating the Second Hungarian Army, and some 40,000 forced laborers, Jews and political prisoners whose job it had been to clear minefields, died or were captured by the Soviets. In this action, Hungarian combat fatalities jumped by 80,000.

After the German defeat at Stalingrad in February 1943, Joseph remembers, Miklós Horthy, the Regent, went on the radio, addressing Hungarian soldiers. He told them not to fight any longer with the Germans. Horthy wanted to pull out of the alliance with Germany. This was dangerous for Hungary and for the Jews of Budapest who had been relatively sheltered up to this point.

But during this period, Joseph did have some good news. His older brother Mark, a forced laborer at Stalingrad for the Hungarian army, had joined up with the Czech army in Russia. He eventually followed the Red army all the way to Prague, Czechoslovakia. Travelling in a little truck with a doctor, he supplied medicine for the soldiers. Joseph found out Mark was alive because he had heard that Mark had sent a postcard to one of their neighbors in Svalyava. . . .

In October 1944, the Soviet army marched past Esztergom labor camp where Joseph had been sent from Komáron. They stopped, wanting to help the brigade. They gave labor members food. They also gave them transit papers, so they could travel by train to Budapest.

At this time the labor brigade received schutzpass (safe passage) documents from Switzerland. This meant that they were a protected (védelem) company, a company that enjoyed the protection of a neutral country such as Switzerland. Influential Jewish men, perhaps Joel Brand or Rudolph Kastner, who were in negotiation with Adolf Eichmann, chief of the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), to trade safe passage for Jews in exchange for goods such as trucks to aid the war effort, had managed to get these passes for the labor brigade members.

They were told they could stay in a safe house already occupied by other men from the labor camps until the end of the war, but they stayed only for one night. They were in a five-storey building with two sub-basements. Joseph sheltered in one of the sub-basements at night during the heavy bombings by the Soviets. That night he fell asleep and when he awoke, he found that 400 people had been forced on death marches, ending up in concentration camps. Some of these were the men who were upstairs in the “safe” house. Others on that death march were young women who had worked next door in the sugar factory.

They were taken away by Germans, assisted by Hungarian soldiers.

The next morning after a night of bombing, two Hungarian soldiers came in with rifles. They told Joseph and the others: “We are your friends. Don’t worry.” Then they lined up the group and took them to a bunker that was nearby. As they were leading them, Joseph saw German tanks retreating from Budapest. The Hungarian soldiers marched them past the Germans to a bunker.

After a day and a night in the bunker, Joseph heard someone say that it was cold outside. Then a Soviet soldier with a machine gun opened up the bunker door. Because Joseph spoke Czech, he was able to explain that they were Jews with a labor company. When the fighting subsided, they were marched toward the areas that the Red army had already occupied. Some from their group went their own way—some of the women and three brothers. The women wanted to get away from the Soviet soldiers who had a reputation for assaulting women. A Jewish Soviet officer had tried to make the soldiers behave. This behavior by the Red army soldiers became a huge problem for women, not only the women of Budapest but also the women in the countries the Soviets passed through on their way to Berlin and especially in Berlin.

The siege of Budapest began on Christmas Eve 1944. The Red army continued the siege of Budapest until February 1945. . . .

At least 120,000 of the 200,000 Budapest Jews survived the siege: around 80,000 in the only remaining ghetto in Europe; another 20,000 living in houses protected by neutral countries like Switzerland; and another 20,000 hidden by Christian families.

Before the siege was over, Joseph, along with other labor brigade members, was marched to the border between Hungary and Austria to Kőszeg labor camp in Vas County, Hungary. The Hungarians were still allied with the Germans who needed slave laborers. Kőszeg labor camp (German: Guns) had been established in late 1944. With the approach of the Red army in 1945, the camp was liquidated. . . .

Joseph was spared the horrors of a death march because he had escaped. In March 1945, the Hungarian commander, Béla Király, later recognized as “Righteous among the Nations” by Yad Vashem, surrendered Kőszeg to spare it further destruction.

Joseph said that it felt tremendous to be free, to realize that he would not be deported to a death camp. His first concern, however, was his family. He wanted to find out who had survived.

MAX STERN

Context: Central Europe

Source: Max Stern. My Stamp on Life. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2003, pp. 40–47. Used by permission.

During the war years, a Slovak Jew, Max Stern, managed to hold body and soul together through various means until, in late 1944, it appeared as though his worst fears would finally be realized. With the certain knowledge that the Nazis were about to close in on the Jews of Bratislava, he decided that it would be best for him to go on the run. In hiding in various towns and villages, he received assistance from friends along the way, but always had to be careful lest tell-tale signs of his hiding place be revealed. Here he shows some of the pitfalls that befell those in hiding, as well as some of the necessary stratagems that needed to be addressed if these pitfalls were to be overcome.

As Hitler’s “Final Solution” gathered pace, we knew the time was not far off when we would all need a hiding place. I had contacts through the underground and forged Aryan papers, at that time in the name of Milan Stransky—with the initials M.S. for Max Stern. I also obtained a forged Argentine passport I never had the opportunity to use.

There was a German prisoner in Bratislava, a Volksdeutscher, who helped us a lot. I think he moved to Israel after the war. He printed anything we wanted—forged birth certificates, baptism certificates, passports. I still have a forged baptism certificate made out for my cousin. We chose Argentinian passports because it would have been too easy for the authorities to check on us if we had passports for other European countries. Argentina was too far away to check. We did not always have to pay for these forged documents, sometimes people who worked for the underground handed them out. If you had good contacts, good connections, you could get anything. We could also obtain genuine blank identity cards from the police. We just inserted our own names and photos.

In October 1944, late on the night of Yom Kippur, when most of the Jews were home after a day of prayers, the Germans decided to make our city “Juden rein”—cleansed of Jews. All Jews were to be immediately deported and all papers of exemption declared invalid. I’m not a great believer in miracles but one of them occurred that fateful night, when the Gestapo bypassed the house we lived in. We all slept through the night and had no idea what was happening around us.

The next morning I left home, said goodbye to my parents and went to work. I never saw them again. I was twenty-three years old. As I walked down the street on that fateful day, I saw columns of people being led towards the railway station by S.S. guards with machine guns. I ran to police headquarters and asked my friends what was happening. They said: “Max we can’t help you anymore, go and hide.” The order had come through that Slovakia must be “Juden rein” and nothing could protect the Jews any more.

A long time before this, the family had discussed where we would all go into hiding when the need arose. Everybody had something organized. My father, mother, two sisters and two small brothers had arranged to hide in the greengrocer’s shop in the front of our building. That was where we always bought our fruit and he knew us very well. But my mother developed pneumonia and became very sick. My parents found it very hard to cope with all the children in hiding and the fruiterer became afraid. After they had been with him only two or three weeks he called the Gestapo and handed them in. It was very dangerous for him to hide them. If caught, he risked being deported himself. I don’t know whether my father paid him or not. I never came in contact with that man again, though I have a photo of him with my little brother Josi. My family was very, very unlucky.

Many years later I talked with other people who had been in hiding. We all agreed it was often worse than being in the camps. It was completely nerve wracking—we were afraid of every little noise and lived in constant fear of being caught. It’s a strange thing—when you are finally caught, you really couldn’t care less any more. It was often a relief.

My family was moved to a special camp, Marianka, for Jews with foreign papers, so called “foreign nationals.” Marianka is an old castle near Bratislava. My family all had forged Argentinian passports complete with a visa and an entry stamp, as well as proper police registration of their place of residence. Almost everybody had some kind of a forged document saying they were born Catholic or Protestant but these didn’t help. The Germans were always one step ahead of us.

Several hundred people were held in Marianka. My father sent me a message saying they were being well treated and had enough food, even meat. He wrote that it was safe there, that I should join them. The message was brought to me in hiding by Arnold, a detective in the Ustredna Statna Bezpecnost—the Central Security Police. I was very tempted to go, but Arnold told me to stay put, as “you never know what the Germans are planning.” I took his advice and that probably saved my life. Later Arnold visited me in my hiding place and even took me to the barber for a haircut.

He always said you can’t trust the Germans. They were alerted to the fact that there were suddenly hundreds of Argentinian citizens in Bratislava. At the outbreak of the Second World War only three were officially registered. Arnold insisted I stay in hiding until we were convinced these passports would be recognized by the Germans.

While in hiding I was informed through an outside contact that all detainees at Marianka were deported on a special train which went directly to Auschwitz. Before they left I had a despondent letter from my father, but never heard from him again. Unfortunately my father, my mother, my brothers and sisters, my grandmother Marie, then in her late 80’s, together with my uncles Hugo, Dudi and their families were all in the same transport.

When I went into hiding immediately after the fateful Yom Kippur night of October 1944, I lost absolutely everything. I arrived at the place where my friends had previously arranged to meet in case of such an emergency, with only the clothes I was wearing, nothing else. Kiki Danzig, Laci Blumgrund and his girlfriend Erika Friedlieb arrived later in the morning. They too were really fortunate not to be caught on that critical night. My school friend, Fritz Bruck, with whom I had been imprisoned, did not make it to our hiding place and was deported to Auschwitz.

Erika had been living as an illegal in Hungary with her parents for some time, then came back to Bratislava and lived with Laci’s parents. . . .

Our hiding place was in one of the large picture theatres in the city, “The Redoute.” This was a famous and very beautiful baroque building, built in 1912. In peace time, balls, weddings of prominent people, concerts, dances, theatre performances and other events took place in its large ballroom. There was a high-class elegant café on the ground floor. Today it is the home of the Slovak Philharmonic Orchestra.

The underground movement had referred us to the theatre’s operator, Mr Alfons Drobny, a Czech national. He was a small man, about five feet high and wore a moustache. He was the uncle of Jaroslav Drobny, a very famous tennis player. Alfons Drobny was a wonderful person and risked his life purely for humanitarian reasons. A deeply religious Catholic, he never accepted or demanded any payment in return for what he did for us. Drobny supplied us with food and I doubt whether we had any money to pay him at that time. He took great risks and the obvious consequences did not bother him. Leo Winter, the assistant projectionist, lived under the cover of Aryan papers and was actually employed in the theatre. We knew he was a Jew and he helped us when he could. Drobny had an assistant Joseph, who also helped us. . . .

Our hiding place was between the ceiling of the theatre and the roof. Here we placed stretchers and prepared food. The projection room was closed until five o’clock in the evening, during which time we were free to move around. The projectionist had another young apprentice we had to avoid however, so during screenings we had to leave the projection room and hide on the censors’ balcony, behind a curtain.

The picture theatre was poorly attended during the war, so only the ground floor was open. The balcony and private boxes remained closed. There were three film sessions—five till seven, seven to nine and nine to eleven o’clock. We watched them all from one of the closed boxes, three times a night. After a week or two we could act out the whole picture amongst ourselves, from memory—some were in German, others in Slovak. That is how we passed our time during the day.

The newsreels showed a lot of propaganda. Under the title “Wehrmacht News,” they showed the German army successfully advancing in Russia, but whenever they announced that “the heroic troops defended their territory” in such and such a city, we knew they were actually retreating. We heard about the battles in northern Italy and the liberation of North Africa, as we watched newsreels from various fronts in North Africa, Morocco and Egypt. We were amused when the Germans reported they had captured Tobruk. The next day they announced they had “withdrawn to secure positions.” The Germans never admitted they had been defeated or pushed out of anywhere.

In hiding it was very difficult for all of us, as there was no privacy. All the things you take for granted in everyday life became a problem. You can do with little food for a few days, but you cannot do without water and toilet facilities.

The disposal of human waste posed lots of problems for us, as there were no toilets. Next door to the projection room was a music school. They had evening classes between five and seven in the evenings, teaching violin to young boys. Mr Drobny managed to get a violin case for us and we wrapped the human waste in newspaper and put it to the side. After the musicians finished their classes, one of us would walk out with them, carrying the violin case. We would then deposit the waste in the park downstairs and return to the hiding place.

We also needed haircuts. This was when my friend Arnold from the police took us to a hairdresser who helped us and never charged us for his services. These visits were dangerous, but we felt safe accompanied by a police officer.

Besides the food Drobny brought us, we also had a supply of lard hanging under the roof. It was winter so the cold kept it in good condition. We could cut a slice off it whenever we got hungry. Sometimes we had nothing else to eat. We also had some Hungarian salami, which keeps fresh for months.

WILLIE STERNER

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Willie Sterner. The Shadows Behind Me. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 63–75. Used by permission.

The story of the German industrialist, war profiteer, and Nazi party member Oskar Schindler is now well known. That through his actions more than 1,200 Jews were saved from certain death at the hands of the Nazis has also been established conclusively. Several of those he saved have left their accounts of life with Schindler, including Willie Sterner, part of whose account is reproduced in the testimony that follows. The full story of Schindler inevitably involves a discussion of the Nazi commandant of the notorious Płaszów concentration camp, Amon Göth, but Willie's account here begins with him leaving the camp for Schindler's Emalia factory, located outside of Płaszów. It is a fascinating story, and a priceless addition to the legend of Oskar Schindler, "his" Jews, and the life-saving work in which he engaged.

I had never heard of Oskar Schindler or the Deutsche Emailwaren Fabrik, but I was happy to leave Płaszów. I thanked my friend Greenberg for keeping his promise and said goodbye. Greenberg said that he wished he could go with me because he had heard that things were very different at Schindler's place. I was ready to see what was different and hoped that Greenberg was right.

A guard took me to the Emalia, the enamel factory. A guardhouse stood on the left side of the front entrance. I gave my papers to the guard and he took me to the office on the right side of the entrance. My heart was beating furiously—who knew what would happen in this new place? I was greeted by Schindler's secretary, a lovely young Polish woman who smiled at me—that was a pleasant surprise—and said that I was all registered to start work. She said that I would be fine there, that I shouldn't be scared, that I was in a good place. Then she wished me luck.

My new camp was at the back of the enamel factory. Compared to Płaszów, the camp was small. The barracks were much smaller and there weren't as many barracks nor as many inmates in them. The camp looked a little better than Płaszów, but it was still a labour camp officially under the command of Amon Göth.

I asked a Jewish man who worked there if conditions in this camp were the same as Płaszów and he said that they weren't, that I would be safe because of the fine director Oskar Schindler. We were much better off than people in all the other camps, he told me, even if we were affiliated with Płaszów. We were very lucky to be here because we were being watched over by an angel. I felt better after talking to him and hoped that it would turn out to be true.

The next morning I was called to Oskar Schindler's office. He was a tall man with a friendly smile and he greeted me warmly. I was surprised that a German industrialist would talk to me not as a Jew but as a normal person. When he asked me for my name and I told him that it was Willie Sterner, he said that he would call me Willie. He talked to me the way a proper boss talks to a worker. I immediately felt more relaxed and comfortable with him. I wasn't afraid of him. I thought that I must have been having a nice dream because I knew that Schindler was a member of the Nazi party, and I didn't expect decent treatment from a Nazi.

Schindler asked me if I knew how to retouch old, damaged oil paintings. I said yes, that I had done that kind of work in Krakow. At the technical school for painters, I had helped my art teacher Professor Wagner retouch oil paintings at the Wawel Palace. I had also refinished antique furniture, so I said yes with confidence. Smiling, Schindler said that I would work out well there.

I needed tools, tubes of oil paint, and some dryer and turpentine, so Schindler drove me in his fancy car to buy the materials for my work. I was a free man for a few hours. Even though, when we got back to the Emalia, I lost my freedom again, my good friend Greenberg had been right—Schindler's camp was a much better place. I was very grateful to Greenberg and wished that he could come too.

I met other Jews at the Emalia—about 1,000 worked at the factory. A Mr. D. Shein (I don't remember his first name) was a nice man—he was a spray-painting specialist. Victor Dortheimer was a house painter from Krakow; I had known him before the war. Itzhak Stern, who worked as a bookkeeper, wasn't much of a talker, nor was he a particularly friendly person—he was always busy with his books. Another man I met was Abraham Bankier from Olkusz, Poland. He had been the manager of Emalia before the war, and Schindler took pity on him and gave him a job. Bankier worked in the Emalia as the chief of the warehouse.

Mr. Wohlfeiler, a sign painter, was a gentle older man. Wohlfeiler's hands were weak, making it difficult for him to paint a straight line with his paintbrush. Schindler knew about Wohlfeiler's problem, so he told me to help him paint his signs and I said that I would do so gladly. Wohlfeiler was a very experienced sign painter and I learned a lot from him. I even learned how to do gold lettering.

The camp at Emalia also had its own Jewish police force, but there weren't many officers on it. The commandant, Zelinger, was a decent man from Olkusz. The Jewish police treated us well because Oskar Schindler had ordered it.

Although life at Schindler's place was a little more humane, as Jews, we still weren't free people. We lived with the same rules as in the camp at Płaszów and we were locked up just as we had been there. We didn't have much to wear and what clothing we had was worn and dirty. The small barracks in the camp, located about five minutes' walk behind the factory, were as sparsely furnished as the ones in Płaszów had been. We also lived with terrible nonstop noise, day and night, from large heavy machines in a nearby factory, but after a while I got used to it. We had no choice but to live with it. The truth is that we remained prisoners in a labour camp, but—thanks to Schindler's protection—nobody was beaten up or killed.

We also worked with Poles in the Emalia factory. Our Polish co-workers were paid employees who could go home to their families and friends at the end of the day—they were free people, free to walk around the streets of Krakow after work. I missed going home to my loving family. The Polish workers were the tradesmen in the Emalia—they had worked there before the war. The Jewish workers were their helpers. The Poles were very helpful to us and gave us news about the war, but they either didn't know our families or were afraid to tell us the truth. I enjoyed working with the Poles. Through these Polish workers I again started trying to make arrangements to join the Polish partisans.

The enamel factory produced pottery, dinner plates, cups, and pots and pans for the German army and Nazi party members. Schindler sold about 60% of our products on the black market, so he had plenty of money to spend on the Nazi big shots. Schindler bribed Nazi officers and party members with gold, cash, furs and jewellery, and hosted lavish parties with gourmet food, champagne and young, beautiful women. He did all of this to stay in the good graces of the patriotic and fanatical Nazis. Schindler did not have an easy time—he always had to be careful and alert. If he had made any wrong moves with the Nazis, we would all have been dead—including him—but he was much smarter than them.

The Jews at the Emalia were all very lucky that our director was Oskar Schindler. He had charisma and he did a terrific job of watching over us. Determined to keep us away from all danger, he put his own life in danger. In our workplace, we had old people and young people. If they had been in another camp, they would have been killed because, according to the Nazis, they were not productive. But in the Emalia they were protected by Schindler, who made false documents for them. A sixty-eight-year-old man became forty-nine years old. A twelve-year-old boy became fifteen years old. There was another man who had only one arm. The Nazis were ready to kill him, but Schindler told them that this man did specialized work on important parts and that he did a delicate job with his fingers. This one-armed man, he told them, was the only man who could do the job. The Jewish man was then safe. Schindler made miracles happen that nobody else could. It is hard to describe how heroic he was. I was so glad that I was transferred to his camp.

At the Emalia I became Schindler's art restorer, retouching all his damaged oil paintings. I loved the artistry of the work and it wasn't a grueling job. I matched the colours to the old paint to make a damaged oil painting look beautiful again. The task took time, precision, concentration and some knowledge of art painting. I retouched and finished antique furniture as well. My workplace was upstairs next to Itzhak Stern's office. Stern sometimes watched me work and asked, "Are you an artist?" I said, "No, I'm a housepainter, but I have some knowledge of art painting." As I've already mentioned, though, Stern didn't talk much. I also did some work for high-ranking Nazis by decorating cups, dinner plates, mugs, and pots and pans with German slogans in gothic letters for birthdays and other important occasions for the Nazis from Berlin.

Schindler was very friendly and always talked to me. He had time for me even though I was a Jew. It was a real pleasure to have a conversation with him. He was a real mensch (a decent and honorable person). He always gave me news about the war, telling me, "Willie, don't worry. The war will be over soon." I knew he wanted to give me hope. I sometimes smoked cigarettes with him—he was a chain smoker—and he always "forgot" to take his cigarettes with him so that I could have them. We sometimes had a small glass of Schnaps (fruit liqueur) as well. Oskar Schindler was a wonderful boss. I met his elegant wife, Emilie Schindler, when she came to visit her husband. Schindler introduced us by telling her, “This is Willie, the Kunstmaler (art painter).” After being introduced to me as Frau Schindler, she talked to me for a few minutes.

As a member of the Nazi party, Schindler had easy access to high-ranking Nazis, even in Berlin. Amon Göth was still our boss, but Schindler kept Göth away from us. It cost a lot of money, but he really did a good job of it. Schindler was like a father to me and his other Jewish workers. He was always there when trouble came to our people, but I didn’t know how long he would be able to protect us from Nazi tyranny and mass murder. He was playing at a dangerous game with the Nazis, but I trusted him.

I made some very nice artwork for Schindler. He was pleased, so he came to me with a gift certificate, telling me to take it to the warehouse to pick up my gift. Abraham Bankier, who, as I’ve said, was in charge of the warehouse, took the paper, looked at it and told me that I didn’t need all those things. He gave me a few cigarettes and said, “That’s all.” So I told him to keep the cigarettes for himself. I told him that I didn’t need his charity. I was really angry, so I told him that he was behaving like a small, stupid Nazi. After that, Bankier and I were no longer on friendly terms.

The next morning, I was retouching an oil painting in my workplace when Schindler came in. He was in a cheerful mood and after he said good morning, he asked me how I liked my gift. I told him that I didn’t get it because Bankier had told me that he didn’t have those articles in the warehouse. Schindler looked at me with disbelief and disappointment. He told me to come with him to the warehouse. When we got there, Schindler asked Bankier why he hadn’t given me any gift and Bankier got red in the face. In front of me, Schindler told Bankier that he hoped this wouldn’t happen again. I would get many more gifts, Schindler said, and he was sure Bankier would have enough merchandise in the warehouse to give me them. Then Bankier got all the merchandise that Schindler had ordered for me.

If this incident had happened with another German, Bankier would have received fifty lashes and lost his job or been shot. Bankier was lucky it was Schindler. The bonus I received was very nice—shoes, a shirt, coveralls, cigarettes and soap. I was sure that Bankier hated me now, but I didn’t care about him. Although Schindler was a Nazi and Bankier was a Jew, I preferred the Nazi Oskar Schindler.

While I was at the Emalia, Schindler decided to remodel his office, so I did a special job for him. He wanted a natural finish on the wood paneling and didn’t want me to use any stain so the wood grain would show through. I’d never done a job like that before, so I had to think about how to do it. I decided to burn the top layer of the wood from the side with a hand torch. The fire caught only the top of the grain, and I was very pleased with the effect. After this part was done, I put three coats of clear varnish on the wood to create a beautiful natural finish. Schindler liked the finish very much, so I got another bonus certificate. I had no more problems with Bankier, but he didn’t talk to me—he definitely wasn’t gracious when he gave me my bonus.

Another job that I did was to paint a large map of Europe on one of the walls in the big dining room. I had never painted a map of Europe and only had a small printed map to work from, but the job came out professionally and I was happy with my map. Stern even came out of his office to tell me that I had done a nice job and asked me a second time if I was an artist. I told him again that I was a house painter, but that I now considered myself an amateur artist as well.

When I was nearly finished painting the map of Europe, Schindler came straight to me and, pointing to a place on the map with his finger, told me how stupid the Nazis were. He told me that the stupid German army was in disarray and had no chance against the Allies. Schindler was excited and had a smile on his face as he told me this. I didn’t know what to say, so I said nothing to be on the safe side.

It was a real pleasure for me to see how happy Schindler was that the Germans were losing on the battle front. He was an inspiration to our people. He gave us hope every day to stay on our feet, to endure our hard lives and hope for a better future. It felt good just being around him.

One day, while I was retouching an oil painting, I overheard a conversation in the office next door. Schindler was saying in a loud voice, “No, I cannot bring your parents from Płaszów—I don’t have much power there.” A young Jewish woman was in his office, with false non-Jewish identity papers from another country, a free person in Krakow. She was pleading with him and crying, but he said that he couldn’t help. The young woman left disappointed, but the next day her parents arrived at Emilia from Płaszów and their daughter came to visit. What a happy reunion! It was something only Schindler could have done. We were very happy for them.

On another day—I remember that it was a very hot day—I got nervous when I saw an SS unit arrive from Płaszów. They surrounded and entered the Emalia camp to take 10 per cent of our Jewish workers. All the camps affiliated with Płaszów—including ours—had been ordered to send 10 per cent of their Jewish workers to be shot in the main camp. Commander Amon Göth had given the order and the SS had a free hand to take us because Oskar Schindler was out at the time.

The SS put all the Jewish inmates in a line in front of our barracks and selected who would go to Płaszów. I was one of the “lucky” ones chosen. As the SS army trucks waited to load up the victims, I knew it was the end of me. The rest of the chosen victims and I were all scared and shaken up. We were going to die.

Just then, our luck changed. Schindler’s private secretary—the beautiful, good-natured young Polish woman—saw the SS from Płaszów in the camp and called Schindler on the telephone to tell him what was going on. Schindler then called the Emilia guard commandant and gave him the order that no one was to leave the camp until he returned. We really enjoyed seeing the Emilia camp guards watching over the SS so they couldn’t take us to Płaszów. But I was so scared. We were all worried about losing our lives.

It wasn’t long before Schindler’s car sped into the camp like a jet. This was something beautiful to see—Schindler was with us. When he arrived, we felt some hope. But I also knew Commandant Amon Göth only too well. We waited to see whether we would survive or die.

Schindler was both furious and nervous. He took the SS commandant into his car and they drove to Płaszów to speak to Amon Göth. I’m sure that Schindler paid a very high price to get Göth to change his order. Then Schindler and the SS commandant returned to the Emalia and the SS commandant and his men drove back to Płaszów with empty military trucks. We were left behind—alive—in the Emalia camp thanks to our protector Oskar Schindler and his fine Polish secretary. They had saved us from a massacre.

From then on, Göth sent no more such orders to our camp. But other camps affiliated with Płaszów remained in danger because the 10 per cent muster still applied to them. They didn’t have angels like Oskar Schindler to protect them.

One morning not long after this terrifying event, Schindler called all the Jewish inmates to a meeting and gave a speech. He told us that he was going to create a strictly Jewish shift of workers at the plant. He wanted to make sure that all the Jewish workers survived and if we were deemed skilled, essential workers we would have more of a chance. As I’ve explained, up to this point the Jews had worked side by side with the Poles at the plant. The Polish tradesmen worked at the jobs that required experience, while the Jewish workers assisted them. In Schindler’s plan, however, a Jewish shift would take over the plant whenever the Nazis came for a big inspection so the Jews would be seen as essential workers. The Polish workers would go home for the day, with pay.

We were very keen to make this clever plan work. We had little experience in making enamel products, but we learned fast from our Polish co-workers. Luckily, we didn’t have bad capos and Nazi sadists to make our lives more difficult. The camp was also only five minutes walking distance from the plant, so we wouldn’t have any problem getting there quickly if an inspection occurred with little warning.

We worked conscientiously to produce good work. We didn’t want to disappoint our director and protector, Oskar Schindler. We washed all the metals with a strong acid and chemicals and after the washing, put the metal pots, pans, cups and plates into big paint barrels. The paint was heavy and we couldn’t use brushes. Instead, using long pliers, we dipped the metal items in and took them out, shook them so that the paint spread evenly, and then took them to the drying area. Using long pliers again, we put the dry pots, pans, plates and cups into a barrel of finishing enamel. When we took them out, we shook the enamel to even it out, took the enamel articles to dry and then baked them in a very hot oven. The finished products came out beautifully and we felt real satisfaction in the job we had done.

Our people weren’t very strong, but they had the will to make this project work. Schindler was proud because the Jewish shift did the best work possible to help him save us. I wanted to show Schindler that we deserved to be saved, that we all appreciated his protection and that we would never let him down, so even in my spare time I volunteered at the plant to help out the Jewish shift.

A large group of Nazis did come from Berlin to inspect the factory. Schindler was smart, as usual. Before the inspection took place, he invited the Nazis to lunch and served them the best champagne and caviar. He gave gifts to the inspectors such as expensive oil paintings, gold, fur coats for their wives and cash. Schindler knew how to handle the German top brass—the inspection of the factory and camp was a success. Schindler was a genius at saving our lives.

Some time after this, Commander Amon Göth and his SS man, Green, came from Płaszów to inspect the Emalia camp. Göth and Schindler walked around our camp, with Green following behind. Green wasn’t too smart, but he was serious about the inspection and looked for any problems he could find with the Jewish workers. Göth, however, had come to mooch some cash from Schindler. The inspection was just an excuse.

After snooping around for a while, Green found a Jewish man named Chaskel whom he didn’t like. Green told Chaskel to walk in front of him to a large hole in the middle of the camp, then ordered him to drop his pants. Chaskel thought that Green wanted to give him lashes. (Whipping Jews was normal in all other camps but not in the Emalia camp.) While he was waiting for the lashes, Chaskel turned his head and saw Green reaching for his revolver, so he started running toward Schindler and Göth.

With his revolver in his hand, Green ran after Chaskel, but couldn't shoot because he was afraid that he might accidentally hit Schindler or Göth. When he got closer to Schindler, Chaskel started to cry and said in Yiddish that he was the best worker there and that the SS man wanted to shoot him. Smiling, Göth watched the incident with great enjoyment. Schindler took Green aside and offered him a deal. Schindler told him that he needed Chaskel at work because he was a specialist and offered Green two bottles of Schnaps to let Chaskel go free. Green agreed, but said that the Jewish man had to be punished because he had tried to run away from him. Green ordered ten lashes, but Schindler told him that five lashes was enough because Chaskel had to be fit enough to go to work at a hard job. Green agreed to give Chaskel only five lashes. Göth stood nearby watching Green and Schindler negotiate. But Schindler was smart enough to deal directly with Green. If Göth had intervened, the deal would have been very expensive. Schindler was always clever at making deals with the Nazis. Schindler saved Chaskel's life and I was proud of him.

On another occasion, all the Jewish and Polish workers were eating in the factory's dining room. An SS man from Płaszów got very upset at what he saw and started screaming, "Juden raus!" (Jews, get out!). He told the Jewish workers that they had no right to eat with the Poles. It was Rassenschande, a racial disgrace. So we had to start eating our lunches outside.

When he found out what the SS man had done to us, Schindler got angry. He gave an order to demolish the dining room, so that all the Poles and Jewish workers had to eat outside. Schindler made sure that, at least in the Emilia, our people weren't humiliated by the Nazis.

One morning while I was retouching an oil painting, Schindler came into my workplace to lecture me about sabotage. He was very nervous and his face was white. Schindler asked me why I wasn't working and why I wasn't letting others work. I was really surprised to hear him talk to me like that. I knew that he liked me very much. I asked him who had told him such a terrible lie. He said that Victor Dortheimer had reported me to the office. I had known Victor Dortheimer before the war. He had been a house painter like me in Krakow, and he now worked in the Emilia as a house painter. I had done nothing bad to him and was, I thought, on good terms with him, so I had a hard time understanding why he had reported me to the office for sabotage.

Schindler told me that he would normally have to send a report like this to Płaszów and that if Göth received such a report, I would be shot for sabotage. But Schindler was too good and smart for this, so he told me to avoid Dortheimer and not to even talk to him. He wasn't a foreman or a kapo or my boss. Schindler advised Dortheimer just to get back to work—he didn't want to hear any more complaints from him. Schindler told me not to talk about this stupid incident any more, and Schindler's relationship with me returned to what it had been before the "Sabotage" incident. I still don't know why Dortheimer did what he did, but I do know that if another German had been in Schindler's place, he wouldn't have questioned me. I would have been guilty as charged and shot for sabotage immediately.

The fact is that Jews did find small ways to sabotage things—often by working as slowly as possible. Schindler knew that we weren't killing ourselves for the Germans. That was OK with him. He understood Jewish feelings toward Nazi brutality. I think he was even glad, only too happy to keep silent.

There was a small ammunition plant at Schindler's factory. Jewish workers made grenade parts for the German army, but we didn't want to help the Nazi war machine, so as we worked, we did some damage to some of the finished products. We also never produced as much as the plant inspector was expecting. He was an evil Nazi—a military type—and our passive resistance made him furious. He prepared a report saying that production was down in the ammunition plant because of Jewish sabotage, and threatened to send the report to Płaszów. That report posed a serious threat to the Jewish workers—we would all be shot—but Schindler got a copy of the report, called the German manager into his office and told him that if he didn't destroy it, Schindler would make sure that he got transferred to the Soviet front. After this incident, the manager actually became friendly to all the Jewish workers. Production—and the same small sabotage—continued as before.

I remember another episode when two house painters were working on the stairwell that went up to Schindler's office. They were lying on the steps because they weren't feeling well, and were talking to me when Schindler came along. He told the two painters that if they didn't feel well, they should come with him and he would give them something to help. I went along, and Schindler gave us some liquor to drink. It was really good. He told us that we'd be fine now. Any other German who knew that Jews didn't feel well on the job would have shot them.

I was lucky and proud to have known Oskar Schindler and to have worked for him. I will always remember his great help and protection. He will always be my hero and I will always think of him as my best friend. He did much more for us than I could write about. I will never forget him.

NINA STONE

Context: Central Europe

Source: Nina Stone. Born to Survive: A Long Journey to Freedom. Caulfield South (Victoria): Lamm Jewish Library of Australia, 2015, pp. 28–39. Used by permission.

The experience of Nina Stone, a small Jewish child from Poland, was as confusing as it must have been frightening. After escaping from the Nazis with her mother and grandmother, she was placed in a Catholic orphanage in Hungary, where she resisted the temptation to become a Christian in circumstances where doing so would have made her life much easier. The account here shows the experience of separation and concealment from a child's perspective, but is interspersed with extracts from the testimony of Nina's mother, as well. The result is a dual memoir that provides evidence of Nina's experience in layers, offering a richness of understanding sometimes lacking in other testimonies.

My mother heard they were taking children to extermination camps because the Nazis had decided they were not an asset. Somehow she got hold of someone my uncle knew in Budapest. Her name was Klara. She came to Riese, picked me up and took me to an orphanage in Budapest. My mother sent me off with a tiny old brown suitcase and said that if we could not meet after the war I would find the names and addresses of my grandmother's relatives in the USA carefully hidden between the two layers of cardboard the suitcase was made from. Someone would help me find them. That was the only security I had, besides my portion of bread.

My father was in the Szabolcz internment camp in Budapest. When I was on my way to the orphanage with Klara, I managed to spend a few hours with him at that camp. We had been separated for a long time and I really enjoyed my time with him.

It must have been terribly hard for my mother to send me away. . . .

For the first time since the war had begun I was totally on my own. There were many children in the orphanage, but I didn't mix well. Not only did I not know the language, though I was picking it up very quickly, I was a loner. The other children frightened me a little because they were so dirty and bedraggled, though I was too. I hated the orphanage and couldn't eat the food even though I was hungry. They gave us thick pea soup which stuck in my throat and I used to hide it. All the food was thick, like turnip and kohlrabi in thick sauce I could not swallow. But there were also jars of tiny little pickled fish I loved to eat with a scrap of bread.

I don't know how long I was in the orphanage—a few months. When they asked me where my parents were I said they were dead; I had killed them off in my mind. I was an orphan, just like the others. It was a kind of survival instinct to think the worst.

Many of the children fell sick as a result of an epidemic of scarlet fever and I caught it too. I was delirious with high fever and my teeth started to become loose. The Jewish lady Klara, who had brought me to the orphanage, was a social worker who knew my uncle Artur, as well as Raoul Wallenberg and a lot of other influential people. She came to see me, told my uncle I was dying and somehow they managed to get me out of there. I don't know how. I think I was very close to death when I left the orphanage. I can remember people looking down at me in bed and I could hardly see. Everything seemed very blurry.

Through the help of Klara I landed in a beautiful villa in Guggerhegy, a suburb of Budapest. The house was on a hill and out of danger and the owner had about twelve Jewish children staying there, along with a young couple with a baby to look after us. They let me help with the baby and I was happy because for the first time in my life I had children to play with. The young couple saw that I was pretty responsible and put me in charge of a girl who was older than me and much taller, but wet the bed every night. It was my job to wake her and take her to the toilet. I must have been around eight years old by then. The people made a fuss over me and I just loved it there.

Every Friday night we sat around the dinner table and our carer gave us each a small piece of bread with a bit of bone marrow on it. That was a treat we looked forward to every week. At least something nice happened there.

I spent about three months in that villa and could have stayed there forever because I was so happy. We were never hungry but never got sweets because there were none available. One day we got a box of biscuits and found they were full of maggots, but we brushed them off and ate them anyway.

From my mother's memoir:

Around forty people were to be released from the camp and over the next few days we packed our things and left by train. At one station we had to wait for a connection with the next train and went to the restaurant for a meal. My brother found a violin and played while we all sang along and danced like crazy—the happiest and craziest night of my life.

On arrival in Budapest I went to see my daughter in the vial for homeless immigrant children. I was lucky to have the address and did not waste a moment getting there. I found Nina asleep and did not want to wake her in case seeing me gave her a shock because she didn't know I was coming. To my surprise she did not even know who I was. The poor child thought that both her parents had died and I was a distant relative, a forgotten auntie maybe, but not her real mother. What a painful experience.

Since she had left Ricse my appearance had changed considerably. We never had a mirror in the camp but once I found one in a shop in the nearby village and when I looked in it I nearly fainted as I could not recognize myself.

Also we could not communicate because in the year in which we had been separated she had forgotten how to speak Polish and my Hungarian was not good enough for a conversation.

Luckily, there was a girl there from Poland who was able to translate for me. Nina had already picked up Hungarian so well she had no accent and spoke like a native.

After our emotional reunion I decided to see Dr Polgar, the patron and owner of that villa, who was also the head of the Jewish community. I spoke to his secretary explaining that I was the mother of one of the children in his care. At the time Dr Polgar was in conference, but on hearing Nina's mother had arrived he interrupted this meeting and came out to greet me. He was so overwhelmingly warm and friendly it made me cry. He liked Nina very much and even said she was his favourite little girl. He said she was a very gentle and subtle girl who was also very disciplined and obedient. With tears in his eyes he told me I should be a very proud mother.

When my mother turned up for me I didn't even know who she was because I had decided I did not have a mother. She looked familiar and I thought she was an auntie. She couldn't speak Hungarian and I could not speak Polish anymore because I had forgotten it. I spoke good Hungarian and understood Polish, while she understood Hungarian; so we could communicate. She told me she was my mother and had come to collect me. I said I didn't want to go. She had to force me to leave and took me back to Budapest where she had found somewhere to live. I don't know how she got away from Ricse. I think Raoul Wallenberg got them out before they were to be transported to Auschwitz. The whole family was on Wallenberg's list.

My mother was living in Budapest with my father, her parents and Uncle Artur, who was an exceptional man. He was working for a Zionist organization, supplying weapons and false papers and through him my mother got me a new birth certificate. She thought it was dangerous for me to stay in Budapest because at that time they were shooting Jews on the banks of the Danube, including many children, and throwing the bodies into the river. She tried to get me into a convent where I would be safe.

By this time I think it was 1944. My mother never wrote down any dates when she put her own memoirs together and I cannot be sure. Her nature was that when she decided to do something, nothing would stop her. She got an audience with a Hungarian cardinal by standing at his gate when he came out and just begged him to see her. She told the cardinal that although she herself was not Jewish I had a Jewish father, so she feared for my life. The cardinal told her to bring me to him and she made an appointment. I was brought before the cardinal and my mother gave him my new birth certificate. He was dressed in long deep scarlet and black robes with a big cross hanging round his neck. He also wore a big ring I had to kiss.

When the cardinal found out I couldn't speak Polish he said, "She is not Polish she is Hungarian," because my Hungarian accent was perfect. He said the only way he could help was if my mother could prove I was Polish. The he said, "I will ask her a question and she can write the answer in Polish." The trouble was that I had never been to school, but when I was around four my mother had got me a teacher who taught me the alphabet. The cardinal asked questions and I wrote the answers in Polish. I didn't think I even knew how to write whole words in Polish and to this day I believe God must have written the words for me. They took my writing to an interpreter who said I was definitely a Polish child, that no Hungarian child could have written answers like that. The cardinal said he would try to get me into a convent in Esztergom, about fifty kilometres north of Budapest, where I would be safe.

From my mother's memoir:

The cardinal wanted to meet my daughter personally before giving her a letter of recommendation to the convent. My third visit to the cardinal was with my daughter Nina who did not look at all Jewish, which helped at the time. He asked her to speak in Polish with me and to write a few words in Polish, which she did, although she had never attended any schools. The cardinal left the room with Nina's writing and returned looking satisfied—he had probably shown it to somebody who knew Polish. He then gave us a letter of introduction sealed with his personal stamp and addressed to the biggest convent in Hungary, which was in Esztergom.

The convent was a very old building with a big courtyard and built just below one of the most important cathedrals in Hungary. I hated that place. It was cold and miserable and the nuns scared me. Every time you passed the chapel you had to kneel and cross yourself. I had big sores on my legs from malnutrition and my knees hurt from all the kneeling.

One day my mother visited around midday. At noon every day we had to check the time on the clock and say a prayer. I was scared she was going to laugh and I looked hard at her, trying to tell her not to laugh or smile but just pray. I was terrified she would do something wrong.

We had to go to communion but I didn't want that holy wafer on my tongue, believing that if it went into my Jewish bloodstream I would not be Jewish any more. That was my worst nightmare. I got out of communion three times by saying I had to go to the toilet or simply disappearing. I never did get that wafer on my tongue. I was blonde with green eyes and while I loved being told I didn't look Jewish because it made me feel safe, in my heart and my blood I was Jewish.

From my mother's memoir:

After some time I had the feeling that my daughter was not happy and decided to visit her, travelling illegally to Esztergom. When I left the next day my little girl said goodbye to me with sad eyes, as though she was accusing me for leaving her behind. I could find no peace in my mind and Nina's sad eyes followed me constantly, day and night. I decided to bring her back and we would be together, no matter what happened. When she returned to Budapest after around nine months in the convent, Nina looked like a typical orphan—pale and lost with a long skirt and short hair. She told us about some of her experiences, which made us cry. Three times the poor child had managed to avoid taking communion. A priest came to bless the children with holy water and she always found some excuse not to attend that ceremony. Apparently she thought that taking the wafer in her mouth and having holy water sprinkled on her would cause these things to enter into her bloodstream and she would become a Christian. It must have been very difficult for her to arrange all that in a convent. Frightful experiences and there were many others.

ANN SZEDLECKI

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Ann Szedlecki. Album of My Life. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2009, pp. 53–61. Used by permission.

Ann Szedlecki, a 14-year-old Jewish girl from the city of Łódź, describes here the chaotic, frightening first few months of the German occupation, and how it was played out on a daily basis. With the keen eye of an observer, she shows not only how life changed, but a number of specific details characterizing the new arrangements; shortages, curfew, arbitrary punishments, and executions. Eventually, we see how Ann made up her mind to take her life into her own hands by leaving the stifling ghetto with her older brother, Shoel. While this was a huge step for one so young, Ann was also excited at the prospect—while at the same time not quite realizing that “my happy and carefree childhood was over.”

Our lives changed abruptly in the fourth week of August 1939 when a loud knock at the door woke us up at five o'clock in the morning. It was one of my father's employees letting us know that he wouldn't be coming to work—the government had announced a mobilization and he had been called up; he was being sent to the border. After he left, I opened the balcony door and stepped outside. I saw a lot of movement, mostly men in uniform on horseback and in horse-drawn carriages setting out to fight the enemy. Even at my age I could see that they were going to be sitting ducks. The newsreels and the newspapers told us how well the Germans were prepared. They had already occupied Czechoslovakia and claimed Austria as their own without firing a single shot. The Germans knew that they couldn't fail because the rest of the world had turned a blind eye to what was going on.

When my brother-in-law, Janek, was called up, we faced a serious problem. He had decided to sell his hardware store in Lodz that summer and relocate to the nearby smaller town of Koluszki, about twenty kilometres east, but he had received his draft orders before he could close the deal. My sister went to the authorities to explain that he was in Koluszki, but they assumed it was an excuse and that he was planning to desert, so they gave him twenty-four hours' notice to show up or face court martial. Luckily, Manya was able to get in touch with him. He came to say good-bye, wearing a uniform, and that was the last time we saw him. We later heard rumours that he had been taken as a prisoner of war on the outskirts of Warsaw and shipped to a camp in Romania. But there was no way to know for sure.

September 1, 1939 arrived and the Nazis started sealing the fate of European Jewry. Murder and unimaginable horrors were in store for us. The city was actually very quiet—the calm before the storm—except for newsboys shouting, “Extra!” and proclaiming that Poland was preparing Hitler’s coffin to bury him. Everyone said that with England and France on our side, it was going to be a short war. We read in the newspapers that the Germans were shooting with ersatz ammunition, and that it was up to Poland to finish the beast. Nevertheless, we started buying up food and other supplies.

Then, in the days immediately before the Germans entered Lodz, the looting of stores began, particularly Jewish and liquor stores. My sister’s store was no exception, even though there wasn’t much to steal since most of the merchandise had already been moved to Koluszki. We decided to close up our apartment and move in with Manya. We didn’t know what the next day was going to bring, but we had a premonition of things to come. We grew closer to each other, as if there was safety in numbers.

Lodz wasn’t bombed at all, but for days, every time we looked up at the sky there were hundreds of German planes flying on their way to bomb Warsaw into surrender. The weather was perfect for flying and bombing accurately and the invaders took advantage of it. Soon the capital city was under siege.

Panic broke out as news of the Germans approaching Lodz reached us. People started leaving the city by the thousands by whatever means possible. We wanted to go but our father, intent on keeping the family together, wouldn’t let us. He may have been right to make us stay. All those poor people ended up trapped outside the city and were bombed mercilessly by low-flying planes; dead bodies littered the highways. There was nowhere to run.

A week of uncertainty ended when German troops marched into Lodz on Friday, September 8, 1939. It was a warm, sunny day and I walked to the Plac Wolności to watch the arrival of the occupiers. They came on foot and in trucks, looking immaculate in their uniforms, boots shining. Many of them carried flowers from the German population of the city. City Hall and other buildings were decked out with huge flags with swastikas. In other words, the city rolled out the red carpet to welcome the invaders, whom some regarded as liberators. The large German population of the city opened their arms for their brethren, even though the community had lived in Poland for generations. There weren’t many sad faces in the throngs, and there were fewer Jews.

Signs of things to come appeared almost immediately. I witnessed a soldier pulling an elderly Jewish man’s beard and kicking him to the ground because he wasn’t working fast enough to fill the trenches that had been dug only a few days before to stop the German tanks. I remember how enthusiastic and patriotic we had felt when we dug those trenches.

At the end of September, after weeks of siege and relentless bombing, Warsaw capitulated and the triumphant German army occupied the city on October 1, 1939. In the conquered city, burned out, demolished buildings bore witness to the results of modern warfare. A beautiful, cultural city was reduced to rubble. Most of Warsaw’s defenders were dead, and while the valiant survivors could resist no longer, they were full of spirit.

My sister’s store faced the Zielong Rynek, the Green Market. On one Sunday soon after the Germans arrived, the stalls in the market were closed and some boys were playing soccer there when a truck with German soldiers went by. They stopped and joined the boys in the game, which frightened everybody. Another time, when I took my niece for a stroll in the park—this was before the harsh laws banning us from parks were passed—an older soldier next to me started playing with Miriam. With tears in his eyes, he told me that he had left a baby the same age back in Germany. I don’t remember any other demonstrations of kindness. Maybe the same soldier would think nothing of bashing a Jewish baby’s head against a wall to kill it. These examples are just too minor when you consider what was about to happen to us.

The Germans dynamited the monument to the Polish hero Tadeusz Kosciuszko at the centre of Plac Wolności as soon as they entered Lodz. I remember walking by one day and seeing it lying on the ground. Its head was separated from the torso and a victorious German soldier was having his picture taken with his arm around his girlfriend and his foot on Kosciusko's head.

Before long, all kinds of decrees and restrictions started appearing, each one more dehumanizing than the last. There were so many of them that it's hard to remember them all, although a few stand out in my memory. No Jews were allowed to attend school or institutes of higher learning, regardless of age, which brought my formal education to an end at fourteen. We were banned from using public transportation and from entering any park, theatre or cinema. A curfew was imposed from seven at night until seven in the morning. We had to get off the sidewalk when a German soldier approached. Most shameful of all, we had to wear an armband as a sign of our Jewish identity on our sleeves. Disobeying this rule was punishable by death.

It wasn't safe for a male Jew of any age to be in the street. They were constantly being caught and put to work in forced labour, whether the Germans needed them or not. One of them was my father. We didn't see him once for a whole day and were very relieved when he came home with a loaf of bread after working in a bakery.

One evening, just before the curfew, I was walking home past the Deutsche Shul after visiting a girlfriend and saw a big crowd gathered. I stopped and watched in horror as soldiers rolled in barrels full of tar and set the building on fire.

"It's a great day," gloated one Pole.

"Don't be so happy," warned his friend. "They will start with the Jews, and finish with the Poles."

I couldn't stay too long to eavesdrop because it was so close to curfew. When I went past the synagogue the next day, there was nothing left except the lingering smell of fire. Another sign of things to come.

There was a public hanging of a Jewish man named Radner and two Polish men in the poor Jewish section of Lodz. Although the bodies were on display for some time, I wasn't allowed to go see them. I don't know what their crimes were. In Radner's case, it may have been that he wasn't wearing his armband, or some other "heinous" crime.

The bread lines were now longer and whenever a Jew got to the front of the line, he or she was pointed out and sent back to the end. Many times people went home without any bread. Some Jews thought they didn't look Jewish and didn't wear the armbands, putting themselves in terrible danger. Even if the Germans couldn't identify them, the Poles had no trouble spotting them and pointing them out. Sometimes I was able to get in line by four o'clock in the morning and, with any luck, came home with bread.

Any kind of social life stopped for us altogether. Our radios had been confiscated immediately after the Germans occupied Lodz. Ours had been a beautiful Philips short-wave radio with a "magic eye," a cathode tube for adjusting the station. I missed being able to listen to the music from France, the international news from Moscow, or short-wave broadcasts from the United States—even though I didn't understand what they were saying. All of the newspapers except German ones published in Polish had been shut down. My favourite had been Express. The curfew kept us from venturing out from early evening until morning, so we were left with each other for company. Our only joy was watching little Miriam, who at six months old was a delight. We hadn't heard any news from Malka's husband.

Poland's independence, which had lasted between the two world wars, was now ended. Germany occupied most of the western part of Poland and, because of the pact between the Soviet Union and Germany signed by Soviet minister Vyacheslav Mikhailovich Molotov and German foreign minister Joachim von Ribbentrop earlier in 1939, the Soviets now occupied the eastern part. For a brief period in 1939, the Germans allowed people to cross into the eastern parts of pre-war Poland now under Soviet administration. A steady exodus started, and my brother, Shoel, along with a few friends, decided to join the mass of people fleeing. Just a few days after leaving, however, Shoel returned home minus the gold watch and money that had been taken as payment by a guide who promptly disappeared. When Shoel returned home, we were relieved to be a family again and face our future together.

But the situation in Lodz was getting worse every day, so my brother decided to give it another try. His intent this time was to go to Soviet-occupied Bialystok, some 330 kilometres to the northeast, find a place to stay and then come back for the rest of the family. As things turned out his plan was impossible. My parents wouldn't leave Manya alone with baby Miriam and she had decided to stay in Lodz until she heard from her husband. As November 1939 drew to a close, my brother decided he would go alone. I, however, had a plan of my own—I wanted to go with him. For some reason, my parents didn't object. Did they have a premonition?

Shoel and I were ready to leave at the end of November, taking quite a bit of luggage with us. A horse-drawn carriage was called to take us to the railroad station and we said tearful goodbyes, not realizing that it would be the last time we'd ever see each other. We kissed for the last time and went out into the cold, dark night to face the unknown. As I entered the carriage, I heard my mother calling me. She rushed out of the house, took the pink wool shawl off her shoulders and wrapped it around me. She kissed me again and said the words that I would always remember: “Be decent.”

I stuck to these principles in spite of terrible difficulties. I would have made her proud had she known. I was good and decent, but at what price? I was rewarded with years of hunger, loneliness and homelessness. And yet, I always felt her protective arms around me. Even though her woolen pink shawl was later stolen, it kept me warm—if only in the abstract. She kept watch over me.

There would be no more listening to family stories, no more bananas or mandarins when I was sick. No more being blessed every night before bedtime. No more good-night kiss.

From now on, life for me was going to be serious business, just trying to survive. As we were pulled away from our home, I turned for the last time to see my mother. She was wiping her eyes and waving. I waved back until we disappeared from each other’s view. The truth is that I didn’t feel apprehension about leaving. I was excited and ready for the first adventure of my life. But as it turned out, my happy and carefree childhood was over. I just didn’t know it yet.

TOVA TAUBER

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Tova Tauber. Out of the Ashes: How I Survived the Lodz Ghetto, Auschwitz-Birkenau and Torgau Lager in Germany. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2010, pp. 14–20. Used by permission.

Tova Tauber was a 12-year-old girl when the Nazis enclosed the Jews of Łódź into a ghetto—a ghetto that, unforeseen at the time, would become the longest-lasting of any of the major ghettos in Poland during the Holocaust. In this short account, Tova concentrates especially on what daily life was like in the ghetto, where work was a major focus of existence and hunger was a constant companion.

Who could possibly imagine the systematic way in which the Germans began our annihilation? The ghetto was closed on 1 May 1940, when I was twelve years old. The ghetto was in the poorest part of Lodz, a very deprived area. There was quite a lot of poverty among Jews in Poland at that time, though people don’t want to admit that now. The majority just made do. And so began our hellish experience of five years in the Lodz Ghetto, or the Litzmannstadt Ghetto. The Germans renamed Lodz Litzmannstadt, after one of their generals.

The first thing the Germans did was burn the synagogues, including a particularly beautiful one on Wolborska Street. They turned them all into stables. Many years later I went to Prague and Vienna with my husband and saw that the synagogues were not destroyed as they were in Poland. I was told the Germans had in mind a thousand year empire and planned to create a museum in Prague to show the world how the “sub-humans,” as they called us, lived. This is one of the reasons they recorded and filmed so much, to prove they were the master race. . . .

Aunt Esther was in the ghetto, as were other members of our extended family, but their number diminished by the day. They died of hunger or were sent to places unknown. My grandmother Sarah was lucky to die in the ghetto, as she did not have to experience the horrors of Auschwitz and was properly buried according to Jewish tradition.

The Germans insisted that Jews did not have blue eyes, which was ridiculous. They were obsessed with finding out if someone had Jewish relatives two generations back. But even some SS had Jewish blood, because German Jews intermarried more than any other Jews in Europe. . . .

Every day Jews from all over Europe came into the ghetto. The place was incredibly crowded, often with two families to a room. Poland was a backward country in normal circumstances, so these newcomers from the west succumbed quickly to sickness and death. Many were also shot. Bodies were collected from the streets every day and there was no end in sight. The ghetto was tightly sealed and it was very difficult to escape.

Our rations were miserly—too much to die and not enough to live on, though many people died anyway. The meagre ration of horsemeat could be exchanged for bread or vegetables, which meant standing on the street displaying the product in our open hands. I always felt embarrassed when doing this. Everything was rationed and you got so much bread to last you so long. Potato peels were prized. Today everyone says how healthy they are, but we didn’t get the potatoes, only the peels. Coffee was always mixed with chicory in Poland. In the ghetto we used to boil it and eat the sediment, which was not digestible. It pierced the stomach wall and people died from eating it. The Germans forbade that practice, not because they cared about us; they just needed workers.

The winter of 1940 was particularly severe. We received no fuel and had to scrounge and steal wherever and whatever, just to keep alive. Each family was allocated a little bit of soil and we tried to cultivate vegetables. Hunger dominated our lives throughout those five years in the ghetto.

The German Kommandant, Hans Biebow, “Master of Life and Death,” said the Lodz Ghetto would be a place where the Jews would work. The Germans got what they wanted and Lodz was one of the longest lasting ghettos in Poland. Biebow became very wealthy because the Germans paid him for each slave who worked for him. He was a ruthless man and one of the first to be hanged at the end of the war.

There were factories producing everything, and of course we didn’t get paid anything. My job was to knit woolen caps for German pilots. We sat at a table and knitted all day long. Other factories produced uniforms for the German soldiers. We were happy just to be left alone. While we worked we thought, albeit naively and full of hope, we would be left alive. My sisters Adela and Bluma worked in the hospital. . . . My father tried to make a little business of buying and selling vegetables. I can’t remember what work Bella did, but she must have worked in a factory.

Practically everyone in the ghetto had similar experiences of starvation, torture and misery. We tried to keep a semblance of a life that would emotionally and morally sustain us, though some young people went to extremes of behavior. They thought they had nothing to lose. We tried to keep up our spirits. I was still quite young and had a thirst for knowledge. I still do. We couldn’t have a normal school, but some teachers gave us lessons secretly. I remember one taught us Jewish history. We also had a choir and a Sunday literary circle where literature was explained and discussed. We were given a little sandwich, an extra piece of bread and sausage, which was a great incentive to come along. Everyone tried to live as normally as possible despite the confined and terrible circumstances. . . .

Then came the fateful day when they ordered all children under the age of ten to be gathered. We knew what that meant. Marylka was nearly eleven, but we still hid her. Many people tried to hide their young children. One woman handed over her two beautiful children to the Germans and the next day she committed suicide. People went into a stupor and didn’t realize what they were doing. As they assembled, the Germans handed out chocolate to pacify them, but those children went to their deaths. The Jewish police in the ghetto wanted to save their own families, so they helped the Germans carry out this unfortunate task. It’s impossible to convey what people did to save their own skins. Not everyone followed blindly, but the majority did. Some still had the moral fibre to resist, to their cost. Others committed suicide rather than succumb. The ones with the task of executing German orders lasted a little longer.

It was the German policy to lull us into a false security. That way we would be easier to manage. Slowly, we heard a very little about the goings on elsewhere in Poland, but no Jew could really believe it. It couldn’t be possible. We could not believe they would kill us all—it was beyond anybody’s imagination.

ELSA THON

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Elsa Thon. If Only It Were Fiction. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2013, pp. 45–50. Used by permission.

At the outset of the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Elsa Thon’s father decided that he had to go to his country’s defense immediately. This led to an early confrontation with the Nazis; as Elsa’s family alternated between Warsaw and their home town of Pruszków, they met an advance guard of SS troops who began at once to taunt them on account of their Jewishness. From this point on, Elsa’s testimony recounts the increasing antisemitic measures as the fall of 1939 developed into winter, and then the year of 1940. By early October of that year the Nazis had organized the Jews of Pruszków into a ghetto. Elsa’s account offers an admirable description of Jewish life under the Nazis in this first phase of the war prior to the later liquidation of the ghetto.

It was a sunny day in “golden autumn,” as we called the season in Poland, when we heard the sound of heavy aircraft. The roar of engines was unusually loud and menacing. We all ran outside the house to look at the sky. Suddenly, darkness spread over us. I felt wrapped in a thick, smoky black cloud. I heard people saying, “Niemcy!” (Germans!) The darkness isolated me from my family. Although my mother and sister were near me, I felt surprisingly alone at that moment. That was the day war broke out. In Pruszków, the first bombs fell on the railway line. Then, the bombs fell all over the city.

After a few days of uncertainty, my father decided to go to Warsaw to help organize resistance. “We will fight the German forces,” he said. “We won’t let them occupy our capital city.” He was also hoping for help from his nephews in Warsaw, who had served in the military a few years earlier.

My whole family walked the seventeen kilometers to Warsaw. When we arrived at the homes of our relatives, my father asked my cousins about joining the army, but it was already too late for volunteers to defend our homeland. There was no army to join—Poland was defeated only a few weeks after the outbreak of war. The speed at which the Nazis invaded crushed the Polish army's resistance in a short time. Now, I can see how mistaken my father's expectations were. He didn't realize that the mechanisms of war had advanced so much since 1914. In 1939, technology replaced old-fashioned combat as the barbaric means of destroying human lives. We walked back from Warsaw to Pruszków. Along the same road, German troops, who appeared to me to be all the same height, marched triumphantly towards Warsaw, singing.

Soon, the SS Death's Head Brigade began harassing religious men in the streets of Pruszków by cutting off their beards. Those they couldn't recognize as Jews were pointed out to them by local Polish Nazi sympathizers. Now, there were collaborators within Poland. Even children in the street pointed to a Jew, shouting "Żyd" to make the Nazis' work easier. The Lithuanians and the Ukrainians in the German military beat up Jews who were pointed out by the Poles. This was just in the first weeks of the invasion.

Then, German soldiers grabbed us in the street and we were forced to do cleaning jobs all around the city, no matter how old we were. My father was assigned to the Nazi headquarters since he spoke perfect German—he had learned the language when he was a prisoner of war in World War I. My mother was sent to clean a technical school and my sister to clean in a factory. I was sent to clean a technical school for a short time, where the students laughed at me and told obscene jokes at my expense.

I kept working at the studio, although Mrs Helena was careful not to let me be seen there. To avoid any contact with the German soldiers who came in to have their pictures taken, I worked in her bedroom by a table by the window. One day, Mrs Helena's father was beaten on the street. He had lived in Pruszków all his life, was well respected and until two years earlier, he had been the only photographer in the city. Photographs for schools, police and official institutions, as well as weddings, graduations and religious events had all been taken at the Abramowicz Photo Studio. Everyone in town knew him. He still worked in the darkroom, developing negatives and printing the positives. He was a huge man, old by this time. Even he wasn't exempt from the pattern of general harassment of Jews.

In November, Jews were ordered to wear an armband with the Star of David. Jews continued to be grabbed in the streets, beaten and forced to work. Terrorized, they submitted, resigning themselves to obeying German orders.

One day, I met a former classmate at the library. He was the son of the principal of Gymnasium Zana and we had shared the same bench in the Józef Piłsudski primary school for many years. Now he turned to me and said, "What are you doing here?"

"The same as you, borrowing books," I answered innocently.

"Not any more! You are a Jew!" he retorted. I told him that I had the same right to be there as he did. The two women clerks at the checkout counter stopped working, frightened. They knew me and my family, as far back as my grandparents. It was a Saturday afternoon, the library was crowded and people began to express their opinions on the situation. I can't say it was evenly divided and, although not all of them objected to my being there, no one defended my right. I was lucky that just at this moment a neighbor, a poet whom I knew from my work at the studio, came into the library and risked his own safety to get me out of there.

Actually, this was the second time I had come up against the principal's son. Our first run-in had happened when we were schoolmates. Polska Kasa Oszczędności, the Polish Savings Bank, had organized an essay competition on the subject of the floods in the Polesie region of Poland. The prize was a small strongbox with a lock. After we wrote our essays, my teacher told me that mine was the best and that she had sent it to the principal's office with the highest possible mark, 5+. Nevertheless the Gymnasium principal's son won the prize. During recess, the teacher told me, "You must know why that happened, but yours was the best." I recall it as the first time I felt discrimination in the school. Jewish boys were constantly harassed, shoved and mocked, but not so much the girls. Once war broke out, the distinction between Jewish boys and girls vanished.

In early October 1940, the Nazis ordered us to leave our homes, forcibly resettling us in the ghetto they had set up in a very poor area of Pruszków where Polish workers used to live. They ringed the area with barbed wire and an SS soldier guarded the one gate. The Nazis established a Jewish Committee, who designated a place for everyone to live. We were assigned one bedroom and a kitchen in a house where there was a little garden. An elderly couple and their daughter, who used to own a dairy store, lived upstairs. Dad immediately started to dig the soil to plant potatoes and cabbage in case our circumstances didn't change quickly. My father tried everything possible to assure our well-being, but he couldn't improve our lot. The entire Jewish population was suddenly in the same confused situation. I can't erase my memories of the ghetto and the misery we all felt.

Because the Nazis were rounding up the Jews for forced work and beating them on the way, Dad could no longer go out to continue his business. As my sister was older than me, my parents thought that she would be in danger too, so I was the one designated to sneak out of the ghetto, get to the outskirts of the city and go to a woman in a nearby village to ask for food. I brought back potatoes, molasses and bread. I had money to pay for it, but the woman wouldn't accept any money because she knew my father.

Although my mother and Aunt Dina still didn't get along, my mother asked my father to bring Dina and her daughter Toby to stay with us. Toby had worked in a bank but they wouldn't employ her any longer because she was Jewish. It didn't matter that Toby was associated with the Polish scouting organization and had served as a guard at the municipal building. Dina's other daughter, Marysia, had fled to the Soviet Union when the Germans invaded, but returned to Poland when she gave birth to a baby girl. Almost everyone from the Synalewicz family perished in the Holocaust. Only Aunt Dina's younger son, Benjamin, survived, and that was because she had pleaded with him to leave Poland and avoid being drafted into the military, as his father had been. In 1931, he was able to get to Argentina with his new wife, Sofia. My father had tried to persuade Benjamin not to marry her for some reason, so we weren't invited to their wedding, nor did Benjamin come to say goodbye before he left for Argentina.

During our time in the ghetto, my mother fell ill. Despite the ghetto curfew, I ran to a friend's place to get some kind of remedy. But she didn't get any better by the morning. Dad managed to sneak out of the ghetto and get to Dr. Stefen's private clinic to ask him for help, and the doctor took his bag and hat and followed him. He knew our family because my grandparents used to deliver food supplies to his clinic. At the entrance to the ghetto, Dr. Stefen explained that one of his patients was sick and the soldier let him in. The doctor diagnosed my mom with a liver disorder, gave my father some medication for her and recommended a light vegetable soup. I didn't know how to cook, but I figured that vegetables had to be peeled, cut up and cooked in water with salt. Aunt Dina offered to cook for my mom, but I wouldn't let her or anyone else do it. After a few days, she felt better.

Life in the ghetto was intolerable. We coped because there was nothing else we could do. The young people I knew held meetings in different houses to avoid being detected by the Nazis. A teacher, Mr. Koziebrodski, often came to our meetings. It was only a distraction—there was nothing we could do to help ourselves.

No one came to our rescue. The Catholic Church chose to be silent in the face of our torment. Maybe one word from them to stop the hatred in the name of God would have had some effect, but maybe not. Antisemitism was often taught in church. Polish priests such as Father Trzeciak who worked at a parish in Warsaw, fervently preached hatred toward Jews, without any encouragement from the Germans.

That January in the ghetto, in 1941, was my last birthday with my parents and sister. Friends dropped by and one of them, Zachariah Artstein, brought a poem he had written as a gift for me. Years later, I learned that he had been one of the heroes who fell in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

Although we lived in precarious conditions, we still hoped that our lives would soon improve. But, little by little, stressed by the ongoing danger and daily humiliation, we began to feel hopeless. Then, we heard a rumour that we were going to be deported to the Warsaw ghetto.

AGNES TOMASOV

Context: Central Europe

Source: Agnes Tomasov. From Generation to Generation. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 11–14. Used by permission.

The Slovak "Protectorate" was established on March 14, 1939, as a result of the Nazi invasion of rump Czechoslovakia. Established under the effective dictatorship of Monsignor Josef Tiso, Slovakia became a pro-Nazi puppet state of Germany. At first, under German occupation, the Jewish population became subjected to a number of Nazi-imposed antisemitic measures; by 1940 these had become entrenched in what became known as Slovakia's Jewish Code—the anti-Jewish legislation that formed the basis of all that was to follow—with the aim of ridding the country of its Jewish population. Agnes Tomasov not only relates the effects of this legislation as it pertained to daily life; she also shows how Jews were deported from her district, and why her family was exempted from the deportation. The pressure to find a way to survive eventually became too much, and in desperation her family, together with others, finally converted to Christianity. While this would not have counted for anything so far as the Nazis were concerned, it bought time in the quasi-theocratic Slovak state, time that contributed toward the goal of survival.

Looking back, I can see how much my childhood was marked with anticipation of the war and the war itself—fortunately, perhaps, I didn't understand then how much I was affected by it. I was only nine years old when tragedy struck Slovakia and not yet fifteen when World War II ended.

On April 18, 1939, just over a month after the new Slovak state was officially proclaimed, its collaborationist government legislated its first anti-Jewish law: "a definition of the Jews," which classified Jews by religion. Other new laws soon followed, such as the "aryanization" of Jewish-owned businesses ("legally" transferring their property to non-Jewish citizens) and confiscation of their valuables, such as furs and jewellery. The government banned intermarriages and restricted Jews from certain modes of travel, no longer allowing them to drive cars or travel in first- and second-class trains.

In 1939, Jews and gentiles were still in public schools together and most of the non-Jewish children treated us horribly. We couldn't play in the park in the middle of the town: a sign at the entrance read, "JEWS AND DOGS ARE NOT ALLOWED HERE." I would look enviously at the gentile children who were playing there and think, "Why can't I be like them?"

We were restricted from all forms of entertainment. We were taken from school directly to our houses and I could only play inside with a few of my friends, Magda Neumann, Sipos and my non-Jewish friends, Eva Korinkova and Anna Simkova. But, as children will do, we still tried to have a little fun and one day my friend Magda suggested we go to a football game. This was strictly prohibited for Jews, but we went anyway. Unfortunately Mrs. Grofcik, whose husband was a high-ranking police officer, noticed us and began shrieking, "Jewish children are here; Jewish children are here!" We started to run. I felt a policeman grab me. He happened to be a patient of my father's, so he took me home and told my father what happened, asking him to punish me, which he did. I was not permitted to meet my friends anymore. I was devastated.

Public school was a daily grim experience until, in 1941, when I was eleven, the authorities threw us out of the public school and forced us to attend a separate Jewish school. Despite the shock of having to leave our school, we were happier than we had been in the regular public school where we had suffered so much humiliation.

The next step in the process of our degradation happened in the fall of 1941 with the establishment of forced labour camps in Sereď, Nováky and Vyhne. On March 9, 1942, the Jewish star, which had become compulsory to wear on the outside of our clothes on September 9, 1941, was enlarged from two and a half inches to four inches. As a child who didn't understand the implications, I was actually proud to wear this yellow Jewish star.

On April 18, 1942, hundreds of horse-drawn carriages arrived from neighbouring villages bringing Jewish families to Bardejov; they were driven to the train station—at that time we didn't know where they were being taken. Almost a month later, on May 15, 1942, all of Bardejov's Jews were rounded up in the main synagogue and smaller houses of worship. My father was allowed an exemption by the minister of the interior because, as a dentist, he was considered to be providing an essential service. The deportation of the Jews who were being detained in the synagogues began on May 15, 1942; we found out much later that they had been deported to the Lublin district in Poland. They were crushed into cattle wagons, eighty people in each, without any food or water. The deportations continued in Bardejov until October 1942. By then, in total, over 58,000 Jews had been deported from Slovakia to Poland, over 2,000 of them from my hometown of Bardejov.

Altogether only seven Jewish families, including our own, were spared because they were designated as essential to the economy. According to the new laws, my father's exemption could cover his immediate family and two close relatives, so my stepmother's mother and her brother, Miklos, moved into our house. Our Jewish school was closed in 1942; the remaining few of us were placed back into the public school system. It was a miserable situation for us—the gentile students and teachers had only contempt for us. One of my Jewish friends, Vera Grosswirth, was in my class—her parents were also exempt because they were doctors. We were so terrified of the gentile students that during recess, when we had to leave the classroom, we went to the washroom and hid until the bell rang. It was the only way we could think of to avoid the constant abuse.

My brother, Ivan, who was then eight years old, would wait for me outside of the school every day so that we could run home together. One day, I came out and he wasn't there. I was terrified and searched frantically for him. I finally found him by the post office, where some students had pulled off his pants and started kicking him. I was able to drag him away from them since I was almost twelve years old and much stronger than his fellow students. The months that we were in this degrading school environment were hell.

I came home from that horrible school one day to find a Hungarian peasant sitting in our kitchen, waiting for my father. He told my father that he had been sent from Levice to take me back with him to my grandmother's place. Many Slovakian Jews had escaped to Hungary, of which Levice was now a part, for safety. My grandmother had sent all the necessary documents for me to cross the border. I was elated, but my father gave the messenger some money and food and said, “Tell my mother-in-law that I appreciate her efforts, but Agi is my daughter and she will stay with me. If we survive, she will survive.” I broke down, completely dejected. I know now, however, that if my father had let me go, which I so desperately wanted, I would have died two years later with my grandmother in Auschwitz. She perished in the concentration camp with all her sisters and their families in 1944.

In 1942, the local authorities in Bardejov recommended that the remaining seven Jewish families in Bardejov convert to Christianity in order to remain there safely. Even though I had not been brought up in a religious environment, I didn’t want to convert because I knew that my mother was buried in a Jewish cemetery. My father couldn’t convince me, so he took me to see my schoolmate’s mother, Dr. Elisabeth Grosswirth. Dr. Grosswirth put pressure on me to convert, telling me that if I didn’t, I would be putting my whole family in danger.

A Protestant priest volunteered to help the remaining families go through their conversion—he would convert the parents first and, a few days later, all their children. Doing this would ensure that the baptismal documents showed that the parents were already Protestants when their children converted. Unfortunately, in my case, only my father would be identified as Protestant; my mother would still be identified as a Jew. On the day of our conversion, eighteen Jewish children went to the church, among them our friend Dr. Robert Zeman. Within an hour, we had all been converted.

CLAUDINE VEGH

Context: Western Europe

Source: Claudine Vegh. I Didn’t Say Goodbye. London: Caliban Books, 1984, pp. 20–24.

A little girl in France during the Holocaust, Claudine Rozen-gard was placed by her parents with a non-Jewish family in order to guarantee her life. Living in hiding presented all sorts of problems, but for Claudine the biggest of them all was surmounting her resentment at having to live like this at all, and, from her perspective, betraying her parents by living apart from them. As this account shows, separation from loved ones during the Holocaust—particularly for children—was especially hard.

In 1942 my parents and I took refuge in a village in the Pyrenees where there was already another Jewish family, from Belgium. The youngest of their children, Régine, was my friend. Very early one morning, the French police came for them; her mother had collected some of their belongings together; a motor coach was waiting for them.

As they passed our house, Régine asked the driver if he would stop for five minutes so that she could say goodbye to me. He stopped the coach and she came into our house. I remember my father went out, thinking that if the driver had stopped to let Régine come in, perhaps he would agree to leave without her? It was her mother who stopped him. It would be too complicated, she said. Régine had never been away from her family. The coach left; the whole family was deported. Nobody returned.

After the War we read an advertisement in a Jewish newspaper; a relative had published a photograph of the family, asking anyone who recognized one of its members to get in touch with him. My mother wrote to him and he insisted on coming from Belgium to talk about them. The day that Régine was taken away, my parents decided to leave the village; perhaps we would not be spotted so quickly in a larger town? We arrived in Saint-Girons, in the Ariège region. My father was torn between two apartments; he chose the second one as the neighbor who had shown him round seemed to be a “good person,” he said. Later events proved him right; the same neighbor and her husband became my “godparents,” and it is they who hid me for more than two years.

One morning some French police inspectors came to warn us that they would be coming back to take us to a special residence. . . . and so, “godfather,” who was the manager of the Credit Lyonnais Bank, had one of their trailers brought over which he attached to the bicycle. In less than half an hour, my parents were hidden inside. When it was time for me to get in, there was not much room and “godmother” suddenly suggested: “Why not leave the child with us? She will only be a burden to you. We have no children; she’ll be our daughter, our pride and joy, trust us.”

I was trembling with fear. I only wanted them to hurry up and leave quickly so that they would not be arrested. I said: “Go quickly, go quickly. I’m staying.” I often heard my “godparents” say I was a gift from God: that is how important I was to them. My parents reached Toulouse and then the region of Grenoble. I wrote to them every day. It was my own decision to do so. Did they receive all my letters? I have no idea. A short time after their departure, they managed to send me a false identity card, but I refused to change my name. I was called Claudine Rozengard and I did not want to be Christine I-don't-know-what.

I was so stubborn that, in spite of my "godparents" exhortations, I still refused. "Godmother" suggested that I adopt their name: Caperan; "godfather" had a niece, they would try to find a way. . . . I refused even more vehemently; I can still picture them, it was quite beyond their understanding: "She is usually so reasonable," they kept saying.

I wanted to keep my name. I was very much afraid that my parents would not be able to find me again. I would grow, change; and supposing they would not be able to recognize me? One incident has stayed in my mind; I was a bright pupil at school; prize-day was drawing near. My "godparents" were bursting with pride at the thought of the prize I was going to receive. Then a letter arrived from my father, instructing me not to attend the prize-giving ceremony. I was to report sick beforehand, so that my name would not be read out and repeated: it was too dangerous. When my "godparents" read the letter, it was too much for them. "Godfather" had been waiting for this day all year, and "godmother" was planning to dress up for the occasion. I had to go; I could not do that to them.

As for me, I wanted to go on to the platform and receive my prize books; and so I went. Every time my name was spoken I looked around the room like a hunted animal, expecting to be arrested at once. Nothing of the sort happened. The following year I was at the bottom of the class; the problem did not arise.

For the oral part of my matriculation examination, the last test was geography. Before I began, the teacher told me in a triumphant voice that I only needed two more marks to gain a distinction; it was virtually in the bag. Then, suddenly, I asked him to give me a naught for that test. As I knew that I had passed my matriculation, I did not want to go on with it.

He suggested that I had a little rest, he tried to understand what was going on; I retorted obstinately:

"Please give me a naught, I cannot go on any longer."

"You must be very tired, I am only going to ask you a very simple question; it will be impossible to give the wrong answer. What is the name of the river that flows through Lyon? Look, I know you know the answer; I will help you: the Rh . . . the Rh . . ."

And I answered: "The Rhine, which separates us from Germany."

I was not awarded a "distinction;" he was shattered; I was relieved; neither he nor I understood what had happened.

Subsequently, I refused to take any competitive examinations. It took me years to understand the significance of that decision.

In 1943 my parents made preparations to cross to Switzerland. They phoned to let "godfather" know, and asked him to take me to a certain town. "Godfather" and "godmother" refused to let me leave, they said they didn't want to give me back to my parents. "Besides, it's too dangerous," they added, "here at least you are safe." But, as I refused to stay, and because I begged them to take me there, they added: "If your parents abandon you again, there won't be anyone to take you in, we're warning you, we won't be able to take you back."

Had my parents "abandoned" me? It wasn't possible, it wasn't true! But, after all, they had gone away and left me with strangers, so. . . . My parents did not want to leave for Switzerland without me. At that time, any Jewish child could be arrested. I, however, was not worried.

The whole town of Saint-Girons knew that I was a little Jewish girl that Mr and Mrs Caperan were looking after, their adopted daughter: "the poor things, they so desperately wanted a child," people would say. When I had a teacher whose husband was a pro-German sympathizer, I stopped going to school; she was then replaced and I went back.

The headmaster had assured "godfather" that if the Germans raided the school, he would be the first to hear about it, and, as he lived on the premises, there was nothing to be afraid of. As for "godmother," one day she went to see the leader of the Militia (they had been very good friends before the War) and asked him to protect me. "I want you to know that if they touch a hair of that child's head, I'm the one who'll die." I was in the room during that conversation; she cried, he reassured her and promised that nobody would harm me.

After France was liberated, each day I awaited my parents' return. I would picture it; one day I'd come home from school and they would be waiting for me. I could hear the laughter, I could imagine the hugs and even the presents they would bring. The reality was not quite like that.

Effectively, one day, on my way home from school, a neighbor said to me: "Claudine, hurry, there's a surprise for you." I flung down my satchel, I said: "It's my parents!" and rushed off.

“Wait!” she then shouted, “your mother’s there but your father’s dead. . . .”

I stopped in my tracks, I picked up my satchel, I climbed the stairs that led to the flat, went towards my mother, and without shedding a tear, I simply said to her: “I’ve heard . . . at least I’ve got one of you, let’s never talk about it again.”

And, for more than twenty years, I was never able to pronounce the words “daddy” or “father,” nor could I bear to hear any allusion to that period of my childhood.

ANKA VOTICKY

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Anka Voticky. Knocking on Every Door. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 37–41. Used by permission.

While the Nazis sought the removal of all Jews from Germany prior to introducing the murderous killing phase of the Holocaust in the death factories of the war years, they nonetheless also made the process of leaving as difficult as possible. In this account from a Czech woman, Anka Voticky, we see this contradiction in action. Striving to obtain exit papers in order to be able to purchase a ship ticket that would let her and her husband leave the Reich, she found a number of unnecessary bureaucratic obstacles placed in her way—and these hindrances were not only imposed by the Nazis. Anka’s account reads like a thriller, but one with a satisfactory conclusion in that “on schedule at five o’clock in the afternoon on April 10, 1940, we boarded the Conte Rosso and settled into our cabin.”

Since our plans to immigrate to England had been scuttled, we started looking for another possibility. We knew that our cousins Karel and Franta Gross were organizing an illegal transport to Palestine, so the next morning, Arnold and I went to their office. Slavek Polak, another cousin, was also there, along with a man from Vienna named Mandel who was a brother-in-law of my late uncle Zigmund, my mother’s brother. The four of them were trying to get people out of the country and we decided to go too. They took our names and in preparation for life in Palestine I went shopping for children’s clothes in large sizes that Milan and Vera could grow into. Unfortunately, we soon found out that this new plan had fallen through too.

On New Year’s Day 1940, we were still living together in my parents’ home. Life was more difficult from day to day because of the anti-Jewish restrictions and there didn’t seem to be any hope of getting out. Then, in February, just when we were beginning to feel really hopeless, my brother phoned from Zurich to tell us that he could get us to China. My first reaction was to tell Arnold, “for heaven’s sake, if we’re going to die, let us die here. . . .” I didn’t know anything about China. Obviously, I wasn’t being very smart, but I had no way of seeing what our future would have been if we stayed in Czechoslovakia.

We received Vilda’s phone call on a Monday and on Thursday morning there was a radio announcement that Jewish men age eighteen to forty would now be allowed to leave the protectorate. I realized that we would have to seize the opportunity and said to my husband, “Arnousku, there seems to be no other way—we have to go to China. . . .” Arnold called Vilda and asked him to do everything possible to make the arrangements, the sooner the better.

I started immediately making the rounds of the necessary Nazi government ministries all over again to get exit visas. The official red tape had always been irritating, but what we had to do now was enough to drive a person crazy. One day I came home with an armful of forms that had to be filled out and signed—I sat at the table and signed forty times for myself, then forty times for Milan (Milan Josef Israel Voticky) and forty times for Vera (Vera Sarah Voticky); because the children were both minors I also had to sign each of their forms (Annamarie Sarah Voticky as mother). We had to add the name of Israel to each Jewish male’s name and the name Sarah to each Jewish female’s name so that we could be more easily identified as Jews. I signed the forms 120 times, endlessly signing, until I started banging my head on the table. Everyone gathered around me, trying to calm me down. My parents kept saying, “It’s nothing, it’s all right, it’s ridiculous, but look at the bright side, you are getting out of here. . . .”

In late March 1940, when the time came for us to get our exit visas, my husband came with me to the police headquarters. When we got inside, however, I asked him to stay in the corridor and let me go in by myself. At that point I thought that Arnold, as a Jewish man, was more at risk of being detained than I was—I couldn’t even imagine that Jewish women and children were just as vulnerable. Arnold agreed and waited in the hallway, pale with fear for me. I took out a 1,000 korun banknote and placed it inside my passport, then marched into the office and put the passport on the desk. The official at the counter slid the money deftly into the desk drawer and stamped the document—much relieved, with the stamped trophy in my hand, I turned and left the room.

But the hardest part was still to come—we now had to go to the Gestapo office in the affluent Dejvice district in downtown Prague. It was located in a villa that had been confiscated from the Weinmann family, wealthy Jewish financiers and coal mine owners. There was another Gestapo office on Panská Street in the centre of Prague, in a building that had been confiscated from a family of wealthy bankers, the Petscheks. Taken over by the Gestapo, it was transformed into the sinister building known as “Pečkárna”—a place where people were killed. Just being in the vicinity of Gestapo offices was dangerous for us. Jewish men had to take off their hats from at least a block away—if they were seen with their heads covered, the Nazi thugs would beat them up. Foolishly we thought that if we came there with two small children, they would be softer on us.

When our turn came and we stood in front of the desk, the Gestapo man closely examined my passport. In the document, where the children were described as having blond hair and blue eyes, he crossed the words out and said, “Jewish children are not blond!” I kept quiet and just told myself, “Never mind him. . . . Who cares? . . . Just give me the stamp.” He finally did and Arnold and I walked happily all the way home from Dejvice. It was a miracle to have the exit papers for me and the children. We could really appreciate the significance of it because of all our experiences with how hard it was to secure them.

All that was now behind us—we had the precious exit visas. We could go to China! About a week later, on Saturday, April 6, 1940, at eleven o’clock in the evening, we left Prague. There were ten of us—me, Arnold, Milan and Vera; my brother Erna, his wife, Hilda, and their daughter, Eva. My parents and Liza had decided not to come with us—we all believed that elderly people would be safe from the Nazis, as would Liza as a professional social worker. Hermina Müller, my sister-in-law’s mother, came with us part of the way and my sister, Liza, and Aunt Herda, my father’s sister, accompanied us as far as Brno. My aunt Heda—who I looked very much like—was an exceptional cook and made the most wonderful pastries. On the train, as a parting present, she gave me some of her recipes. I still use them even now, and every time I do I think of my dear aunt and of that very last time I saw her.

I have an indelible memory of this fateful journey. Hilda’s mother, Mrs. Müller, left the train when we stopped in Pardubice and we watched her standing alone on the dark, deserted station platform howling in agony. The sound of her crying haunts me to this day. By the time we got to Brno, where Liza and Herda left us, we were all crying bitterly.

Early the next morning we arrived at the train station in Vienna, so familiar to us in the past. Then the train took us through the Austrian countryside, past picturesque villages, so similar to the ones we knew at home. When we reached the Italian border and the SS men guarding the train got off, everybody else was cheering and jumping up and down, but we were too exhausted and emotionally drained to feel anything at all. By midnight, our train full of refugees had reached Trieste, Italy. There was an active Jewish community there and some of the local people as well as representatives of international Jewish organizations were waiting for us, offering sleeping accommodations. Arnold declined with thanks, saying that there were people who needed help more than we did. The ten of us went to a hotel.

In the morning, my husband and I went to the Swiss consulate, where Arnold presented our papers, showing that we had the proper documentation to board the ship the SS Conte Rosso on Wednesday, April 10, at five o’clock in the afternoon. We already had our tickets. Without any difficulty, the Swiss consul gave him a transit visa to travel from Italy into Switzerland—he was going to Zurich to meet my brother Vilda and get access to our funds in the bank there. But as soon as Arnold arrived in Zurich, he called to tell me that he was having trouble with the Italian authorities—they didn’t want to let him cross the border back into Italy. “The war in Western Europe is imminent,” explained the Italian consul.

In desperation, Arnold went back to the Swiss authorities, showed the official in charge the ticket and told him, “I have no choice—if I’m not back, my family will have to go to China without me. I’m staying right here, unless you call the Italians and persuade them to let me in, because I have to be aboard the ship by Wednesday.” He finally got permission to leave, but at two o’clock in the afternoon on Wednesday we were all waiting anxiously at the station in Trieste, not knowing whether he would arrive in time. You could have cut the tension with a knife. At last Arnold arrived, having successfully concluded all his business in Zurich. I heaved a sigh of relief and, on schedule at five o’clock in the afternoon on April 10, 1940, we boarded the Conte Rosso and settled into our cabin.

HALINA WAGOWSKA

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Halina Wagowska. People and Places in War and Peace. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 23, 25–31. Used by permission.

The Łódź ghetto, where 10-year-old Halina Wagowska was, as she writes, in “prison,” was divided off from the “Aryan” side of the city by an elevated bridge, or walkway. Although very young, Halina survived by passing herself off as older than her years and thus eligible for a work permit. Here, she describes her working life in the ghetto, which, it was believed, was able to last as long as it did on account of it being highly productive and lucrative for the war effort. As the war progressed, despite developments in other parts of Nazi-occupied Poland, Łódź remained “open for business.” Halina chronicles her time in the ghetto right through to its ultimate evacuation in mid-1944, which saw her start a new phase of her life under the Nazis.

My transition from a sheltered childhood to this, my first prison, put me in a state of shock that lasted for months. . . .

I now had to pretend that I was thirteen, not ten years old, and do it convincingly with no hesitation, blushing or averting eye contact when asked my age. We practiced it and I was chided for not performing well (when just a while ago, telling a lie was a big no-no in our family). But Father, the wise pessimist, said that I must be seen as useful, as children under the age of twelve were not regarded as much of a workforce and were thus at greater risk of disposal. Fortunately, I was tall for my age and with my long plaited hair coiled on top of my head, I did look older.

We moved into the (Litzmannstadt) ghetto shortly before the gates of the surrounding barbed wire were closed in on 1 May 1940. The area was known as Baluty, the industrial, inelegant part of Lodz. We were allocated one room in a first-floor flat in Limanowska Street. Kitchen and bathroom were shared with families who occupied other rooms. The window in our room looked out over a functioning tramline which traversed a part of the ghetto. The barbed-wire walls ran along the gutters on both sides of the street. I later wondered whether there were other streets in the world where the middle belonged to the free and the pavements to the imprisoned.

Further down the street a high, arched, wooden footbridge connected both pavements and allowed the tram to pass beneath. When the guard was looking the other way, many a gob of spittle landed on the passing tram.

I trudged up and down that bridge twice each day on the way to and from work. Mother worked in a clothing factory, Father in a place where empty food containers, such as barrels, crates and hessian bags were cleaned, counted and returned for further supplies of food rations. I worked in a factory where hats and various accessories were made.

In charge of the ghetto was a former social worker, Chaim Rumkowski, an elderly man given to shrill, rambling speeches in the open square where we had to assemble to hear the latest announcements. He called us either his beloved children or lazy thieves and was regarded as mad and a megalomaniac. He was the puppet of the German commandant of the ghetto. We also had to gather in this square to watch public executions. The first one I saw, the hanging of six young men, recurred in my nightmares for a while. The German police raided the ghetto periodically to remove “unproductive elements” such as the ill, the crippled, the old and frail, and any children they could find.

My place of work was a large room in the basement. Two small windows near the ceiling reached street level but, covered in grime, they denied daylight. The walls and floor were of stone, as in any proper dungeon. It was here that the materials for hats, such as long rolls of felt, were dyed, steamed, stretched, stiffened and shaped. The acrid dye stuff simmered in large metal bathtubs; steam issued continuously from boilers; the floor was wet and slippery, light and fresh air minimal. We all looked like witches with eczema, red eyes, and multicoloured stained skin. But all this was overshadowed by the constant threat to life, the unpredictability of the next moment and the hunger.

My workmates were female milliners. They were very tough and rough and full of resentment towards me, a “Jewish princess” who could not even speak Yiddish. Nevertheless, on a couple of occasions they probably saved my life by hiding me under a table covered by a sheet of felt during a sudden inspection of the factory by the German police. They said I looked too young and stupid to be of any use as a hat maker. These women were brutalised by their poverty and awful working conditions.

A year later I was transferred to another section of the building where I embossed leather for hat bands, belts, etc. Later still I made epaulettes for military uniforms. This involved operating a special machine that embroidered a set pattern with silver and gold threads.

One day I noticed that if one particular thread were cut under the epaulette, it would all very slowly unravel into a shaggy clump of loose threads. The image of an immaculate army officer with a disintegrating epaulette delighted me. Here was my chance to sabotage the enemy! I told the lady in charge of this section of the factory, expecting praise for my scheme. She said, “Don’t you dare! It’ll be easily traced back and we’ll all hang for your tricks.” My parents also said as much.

It was the constant threat of mass killings for single small acts of disobedience—threats that were often carried out—that kept us going meekly towards the gas chambers. This behavior still puzzles outsiders.

There were weekly rations of food, mainly clay-like bread, potatoes or just their peels from German army kitchens, occasional portions of horsemeat and processed beetroot left after extraction of sugar. Variations of this occurred when a product no longer regarded as edible outside the ghetto was sent in. Each factory had a kitchen where hot soup was issued in the afternoon, one ladleful into our pannikins in return for the coupon received from the supervisor.

This was the main meal of the day, available only to those present at work. We urged the cooks to keep stirring the soup while they dished it out so that the few solid particles—bits of cabbage, potatoes or carrots—were distributed evenly. The soup coupon became a sort of currency and could be exchanged for other goods.

With the weekly rations it was difficult, but necessary, to divide the food evenly over the week and a feast-or-famine approach sped up physical deterioration. My parents were very strict about equal daily portions, but mine was always larger than theirs. My protests were to no avail. I was growing rapidly, at more risk of tuberculosis, so had to eat more and that was that. I felt very guilty about my eating part of their meagre rations and it led to an incident I'll never forget. At work I heard that a whole loaf of bread could be had for fourteen soup coupons. I decided to save mine and bring home this extra food. I felt light-headed and fainted a couple of times in those soupless days, but the anticipation of the great moment kept me going. It was timed for my parents' wedding anniversary when we were to share the ecstasy of a full stomach and for once I would be giving instead of taking. I was going to present it with a ditty I composed for the occasion—"Tonight we banish one tormentor, tra-la, tra-la," etc.—inspired by a popular melodrama. I thought my parents would be overjoyed and we would eat the bread until we were no longer hungry.

But it all went terribly wrong. I did not get a chance to sing my ditty. When I presented the bread my parents gasped, looked at me in horror and there was a long and ominous silence. I was told to explain how and where I got this bread. At first they were relieved to know that I had not committed some foul deed to get it. (Much later I realized that they were thinking of sexual favours, another currency in the ghetto, and panicked.) There followed a very angry reprimand for me going without the daily soup for a fortnight. They said I was a boundless idiot to behave so irresponsibly when health was so precarious. Never before had my parents reprimanded me so angrily. We had a slice of the bread each on that night and the rest was added to my ration over the next week. I was bitterly disappointed and resentful. (A couple of years later Mother referred to this incident and said she knew it hurt but she had to teach me not to do it again.)

My favourite place was the garden. The tenants in our block of flats formed a working bee to remove the concrete floor of the back yard and plant potatoes. Someone miraculously obtained turnip and carrot seeds. Sewage enriched the soil and we soon had a crop of these vegetables, little though these were per person. This crop had to be continuously guarded against theft and we were rostered for a few hours duty each, outside our working shifts. I was usually on watch at night and used to meet several people from next door. We composed abusive doggerel about the Germans or planned perfect crimes against them. And we mocked Chaim Rumkowski, the appointed leader of the ghetto. I still recall one such gibe but it loses rhyme and rhythm in translation: Bells are ringing/Crows are crowing/Mad Chaim the First/Rules over millions. I enjoyed these meetings. There was an air of conspiracy and defiance and the Germans were not in control of these. It was in the garden that I formed a close and enduring friendship with Judith Winograd, who was of my age and lived with her parents in a nearby building.

Watching the passing trams from our window or the street below led to musings about the passengers: What did they think or feel on their trips through this prison? Many adults read books or newspapers or dozed. Some looked at us blankly. Once I saw someone grinning, another shook her fist at me. But children always stood at the tram windows, wide-eyed and agape. What did they think? What were they told about us? Particularly in 1943 and 1944, when we were so skinny and shabby, and so many were collapsing in the streets? Did these clean, secure and well-fed people feel comfortable on these trips? . . .

Gradually, during the ghetto years of slave labour I lost the habit of daydreaming and of recollecting moments, objects and sounds of beauty and happy events in my past. I guess that at first this was a way of dealing with the collapse of my world. But survival instincts concentrated my tiny wits on dealing with each moment in a guarded way in order to minimize the risks and dangers of each day and to cope with the sudden, unpredictable whims of our masters.

This adjustment to reality and its demands was costly as it prevented normal development and learning and caused a regression to the existence of a primitive creature. This process intensified during the following year. By mid-1944 starvation, the freezing winters and disease had claimed many lives in the ghetto. I am told that of the initial 167,000 inmates there were 70,000 left when, in July 1944, it was announced that we would be transferred to another labour camp. We were each allowed to take a small suitcase of belongings. I filled all my pockets with family photographs.

The journey out of the Litzmannstadt Ghetto was memorable. The closed trains were so overcrowded that we had to take turns at sitting down. We travelled very slowly and there were frequent stops for several hours. On two occasions we got off to get bread and water from the last wagon. Though this was in an open field, we were not allowed to take out the dead or clean the wagons, only to empty the buckets that served as toilets.

One of the escorting soldiers found a very young baby in our wagon. He tore it from the mother, swung it upwards by the leg and smashed its skull on the floor. Blood and yellow bits of brain oozed out. He was about to shoot the mother but changed his mind, grinned and left. An officer looked in and said something about not allowing vermin to multiply. The mother went berserk. She wailed or laughed like a hyena—a nightmarish sound—for the rest of the journey, which took three days and nights

HALINA WAGOWSKA

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Halina Wagowska. People and Places in War and Peace. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 44–49. Used by permission.

Stutthof concentration camp, located near Danzig (Gdansk), was an especially brutal place that claimed more than 85,000 victims during its existence from September 2, 1939 until its liberation on May 9, 1945. Halina Wagowska and her mother were imprisoned there, and in this report she describes a few of the characteristics of the camp as they pertained to her own personal story of survival. The viciousness of the place is especially in evidence here, with Halina experiencing a flogging in addition to witnessing some horrific treatments meted out to others by the Nazis. The account ends in January 1945 with the sound of the advancing Russian guns able to be heard in the distance.

Our morale was sinking fast, but on the rare days when the watery soup contained a few solid particles, potato or cabbage, there would be a wave of rumours about the imminent end of the war. It seemed that an extra calorie could generate a spark of hope.

Another momentary morale booster was any message thrown secretly over the fence by the men. It would usually be good news about German defeats or allied advances, all probably invented to cheer us up. The messages were written on a piece of paper which was wrapped around a pebble and tied with a thread pulled out of cloth. Once, they sent us a small pencil and extra paper and asked us where we came from. In reply we asked about the date, since we had lost count of days and weeks. Sending it over the fence was my task and involved waiting till the tower guard looked the other way, then throwing the message and pebble swiftly and far enough over the fence and into a group of men so it was not seen landing on open ground.

One day I was caught by the overseer and became the star of a public flogging. The “special assembly” whistle ordered all to gather outside the nearby barracks. My crime was announced and I was put face down across a wooden box and lashed with a leather strap. The usual quota was fifty lashes. There was a strange silence, a lack of the usual noises in the camp. After forty lashes (counted aloud by the lasher) there was a sudden stop and the whistle to disperse. This started a rumour that the Germans were leaving the camp. It had to be something of that magnitude to cut short a public flogging! The reason remained a mystery. I remember staggering back to the barrack in the arms of a very distressed Frieda. She, Mother and Goldie spent the night putting wet rags on my swollen and bleeding back.

I think it was a few days after this that the front door of the barrack was opened up for inspection by high-ranking army officers. I was curled up on the floor nearby and heard the woman overseer say, “Da haben wir unsere Untermenschen.” (Here we keep our sub-humans.) I thought that, yes, it was a fair description. We now barely resembled normal humans. Covered in lice, filth and festering sores, many of us with double incontinence, we fought for scraps of food and abused each other. The language we used matched the surrounding reality. We referred to our guards in strings of obscenities and used crude, single, angry words instead of sentences. The normal language used by newcomers sounded pompous and ridiculously out of place. I thought any form of aesthetics would seem incongruous here. Frieda agreed and said that after five-and-a-half years of systematic deprivations, indignities and the special inhumanities practiced in Stutthof, we were now sub-human. Mission accomplished.

Late in 1944 groups of new inmates were put into our half-empty barracks—young Hungarian women forced to work on German farms. They arrived healthy and well fed and stood in shock at the sight of us. Those of us who could still feel anything felt sorry for them, for they were doomed to die from dysentery and dehydration within days. We had slid into this hell gradually, acquiring immunity and coping tricks on the way, but they had suddenly crashed from a great height. Few could cope with that. Frieda tried to help by answering their many questions. They spoke in Hungarian and huddled in a corner away from the sub-humans.

One night I found one of them lying on the slippery edge of the latrine and screaming in pain. I got Frieda and others to help drag her inside. Soon she delivered a five- or six-month-old dead foetus. To cut the umbilical cord we cracked a small side window and used the sharp pieces of glass. But there was no way to stem her profuse bleeding. Goldie raised the woman's legs, but shook her head in despair. Frieda spoke to the woman softly and cradled her head in her lap. I wrapped the baby and pieces of glass (keeping one for some unforeseen need) in rags, took the parcel to the latrine and pushed it well down with a wooden paling. Frieda stayed with the woman till she died of blood loss. A few days later the baby's body could be seen floating on the surface of the excreta. (I see it occasionally popping up in my nightmares). We feared repercussions, but none came.

We rarely knew the exact date of our days. The months of the year announced themselves, approximately, through the seasonal weather. It was winter now, late November or early December, we thought. The random beatings and punishments became more frequent and more brutal. We hoped this meant that Germany was losing the war and the guards were venting their frustration on us. Our female overseers used a variety of gadgets: rubber hoses, pleated wires, sharpened sticks, long leather whips with a metal ball at the end. They swapped them for the fun of using a new one. We used the trick of shifting slightly so that not all blows fell on the same spot, but it was difficult to dodge these sudden, frenzied attacks.

The camp commandant visited more often too. He lived in a cottage outside the camp at the edge of the forest and we could see him playing with a toddler and a puppy dog outside his house. We saw a very tender and affectionate man, but once inside our camp he became a monster and his attacks, unlike the others, were always predictable. His method was a karate-like chop delivered with the edge of his palm to the area between the ear and the chin, which never failed to cause a loss of balance and one always fell backwards. He would then sink the heel of his heavy army boots into various parts of the victim's body. We learned not to turn over to protect the face and abdomen because he then kicked harder to turn the victim up again. Frieda called him a Jekyll-and-Hyde type, another puzzle to me until she related Stevenson's story of good and evil.

Mr Hyde used his routine on me one day and it got me a broken nose and a fracture at the base of the skull (the ethmoid, as I later learned), several broken ribs and two days in a coma. I was still unconscious the next day, and absent from the roll call. I was even dumped onto the pile of bodies outside the barrack, but Mother and Frieda dragged me back before the cart arrived. Somehow they propped me up for roll call on the following day. For some days afterwards I was badly bruised and all movement, even breathing, was painful. At roll call Frieda, who stood behind me, was caught propping me up again and got several lashes for doing so.

The special assemblies also became more frequent and we were required to watch the hangings of Russian POWs. I remember one in particular. Some struggled and others went quietly, but this young boy burst out singing the Soviet national anthem in a beautiful tenor voice. He sang until he slumped in the noose. He too is a sharp picture in my memory, with Frieda sobbing quietly beside me. That night Mother said she could no longer find words to talk and we huddled in silence.

The date of Christmas Eve announced itself through the raucous singing of carols by the drunken guards in their quarters. Christ's birthday was celebrated with more beatings and a lot of random shooting.

I think it was a few days later that Frieda spoke to me about my mother and some childhood memories. She added that in a world that allowed Stutthof to happen she did not want to be. I took it as one of her "global" statements and did not focus on it. Later, when she did not return to our usual place in the barrack I thought that she was with the Hungarian group. I set out looking for her in the morning and spotted her body "on the wire," electrocuted and suspended by the barbs caught in her clothes. The guard in the tower yelled and pointed his gun at me when I tried to approach. "In a world that allows Stutthof to happen I do not want to be," she had told me the day before, and I did not get the message. If I had I could have talked her out of suicide, watched her all night to stop her "going on the wire."

A panicky thought added itself to my guilt and despair: that Mother might also "go on the wire." Like Frieda she too made "global" remarks. I spent the whole night stressing her obligation to me and to Father, who would look for us after the war. I extracted a promise that she would not give up. Mother was now very weak and emaciated.

Then, within two days most of us became very ill and our barracks had large signs outside saying "Typhus." Overseers in gas masks and protective clothing entered our enclosure only to roll a barrel of soup on the snow-covered ground from the gate toward the barracks. I lost consciousness. When I regained it some days later, I was among the very few survivors, surrounded by many dead, all in puddles of excreta.

Mother was next to me, skeletal, unconscious and unable to hear my pleas to hang on. She had terrible pressure sores and from one of her elbows the bone was protruding. It would have helped to get some snow from outside to wash the pus and muck out of these sores, but I was too weak to crawl out. So I tried to lick them dry. There was no other way.

A few in our barrack had not succumbed to typhus, apparently due to immunity from a previous exposure to the disease. They tried to feed those unable to move. Goldie, too, was alive nearby.

I don't know when we heard the distant thunder, a storm, we thought. But a message from the male side said it was the artillery of the approaching Russian army. I kept repeating this into Mother's ear, as if to penetrate the wall of unconsciousness. I hugged her and then felt her long sigh and her last heartbeat. Goldie felt her pulse and cried. I think it was late January 1945, and I don't know how to describe my feelings then.

ABRAHAM WAJNRYB

Context: Salvation

Source: Abraham Wajnryb. They Marched Us Three Nights: A Journey into Freedom. Melbourne: Jewish Holocaust Centre, 1988, pp. 1–10. Used by permission.

The death marches experienced by tens of thousands of prisoners are often portrayed as having taken place during the last days of the war, but what is often overlooked is the fact that the Nazis were constantly removing prisoners and closing down smaller concentration camps for a full year before the end of the war. In this account, a Polish Jewish survivor, Abraham Wajnryb, describes what it was like to be on one of the earlier forced evacuations, when he was moved from one camp to another while the killing processes of the Holocaust were still very much in train.

We stood ready to leave the barbed wire fence while the sun was still shining. The camp was lit up by its rays which looked as if they had come from far away to have another glimpse at the camp because what had happened on that day in the camp would never happen again. We built this camp and we knew everything that happened there—but what took place on that day had never happened before.

The rays of the sun had already lost their warmth, and their golden glow disappeared and with it the ball of light descended and faded. The sky became red and the illumination of the camp reddened and faded. Despite this we were able to see what was going on in the grounds of the camp. From the peaks of the cliffs surrounding the grounds came the first shadows questioning whether it was the right time to lower the veil of dusk. The shadows stood at the foot of the mountains waiting for the signal and with one stroke they would submerge the camp in total darkness so that no man would ever find out what had happened on that day. But the sun hesitated, realizing perhaps that this occasion might never be repeated and continued to cast its light. Thus we were able to see thousands of prisoners leaving the camp while there was still light.

This is what happened on that day, the day we left the concentration camp.

In Stutthof

We arrived at the camp in Schomberg in the autumn of 1944. We were sent from Stutthof in a goods train. It was a long row of carriages lined up at the railway station. As soon as the cattle had been unloaded we were pushed into the available spaces. It was getting closer to the end of summer and the air in Stutthof was still warm, clear and fresh. We worked there in a beautiful pine-forest, thick as a jungle. There were tall trees all around us so we could not see the blue of the sky. Hardly a ray of sunlight penetrated the dense tree-tops to let us know that there was still a sun and that it was still shining. We never even saw the tops of the trees. All day long we stood bent over the fallen trees chopping off branches and peeling bark back to reveal the white, smooth and clean trunks.

We would raise the tree trunks and place them on our shoulders—six shoulders on one side and six shoulders on the other—and we would carry them to an open cleared spot in the forest, where tens of hundreds of trunks were already lying. Our shoulders ached, our bodies bowed when carrying the trunks and they remained bowed when we returned to work to clean yet another trunk. No one could straighten his back to look up at the beautiful crowns. Only a prisoner who had lost his strength and collapsed was able to notice the fine shape of the tree tops, somewhere up there, very high. The cudgel of the supervising kapo forced the weak “culprit” to his feet, and still bowed, he returned once more to the vicious cycle: tree-trunk-clearing, again and again. When the first blow of the cudgel failed to raise the exhausted prisoner the kapo tried a second and a third blow. The kapo made sure that the creature lying on the ground at his feet would stay there—and indeed the creature did so. Meanwhile the eyes of the prisoner remained open, gazing at the lovely crowns and beyond. Perhaps they were looking for the gates of heaven. Gates without barbed wire.

On the train to Schomberg

We were in carriages seven days and nights. We stood, squatted and sometimes sat down. In the last few days some found room to lie down and rest on the floor of the carriage because every day one, two and sometimes three prisoners died so we moved all the corpses to one side leaving more room. One day the guards opened the door of the carriage and brought a few buckets of water but after a short while they closed the door and locked it.

The movements of the train were not always the same. At times it moved quickly, sometimes we heard it crossing over from one track to another, at other times it moved slowly and calmly and there were also times when the train stood motionless for hours and hours. There were no real windows in the carriages just holes, cracks and crevices sufficient to allow some oxygen to enter for breathing—so only a few suffocated. The openings in the carriages also fulfilled another purpose, they enabled us to differentiate between day and night. In this way we were able to count the number of days we had been in transport. Some of the rays of the sun disrespected the orders of the S.S. penetrating the cracks and crevices to let us know when it was day.

The noises outside the carriages were also helpful in locating the sun in the sky. They were mostly the noises of explosions from bombs dropped by the airforce. The bombs usually exploded early in the morning and toward the evening. The hours in between were unduly long. We didn't have a watch in the carriage and we would listen to the roar of the planes as they drew nearer. When the bombs went off we knew what time it was. We soon learned that in time of hardship a watch loses its importance. Amongst the prisoners in the carriage were some who thought they could distinguish between the roar of the German planes and the roar of the Allied ones. Perhaps they really could distinguish or perhaps they had made the right assumption: the roar of a plane followed straight after shouts of "Flak" and explosions meant Allied planes, while a roar without bombs and without the artillery shots clearly indicated the planes were German. Mostly they were Allied planes. They flew in big formations and bombed German towns and eventually the response of the Flak to the bombing got weaker and weaker. In vain we hoped for the day when they would bomb our train, moving or stationary. With this hope was a desire for vengeance akin to "May I die with the Philistines" (Samson in the Book of Judges), and also a spark of hope that in the confusion and disarray following the bombing, some of us would succeed in escaping. Such a possibility obviously out of the question and contrary to all common sense, was the product of the morbid atmosphere which prevailed in the carriage.

We never heard a bomb explode anywhere close to the train, and the camp at Schomberg was never bombed. Never—until the last day, when we left the barbed wire behind us. That was the day when the sun refused to set.

In Schomberg the planes used to appear with frightening speed, in great quantities, hundreds of them, coming from the north west. They would pass high over our heads, at the level of the cliffs and the tree covered peaks. Then they would turn in the direction of Ulm and Munich—but they never bombed the camp. They looked like silver threads passing in long rows, arranged in a strange formation that seemed to have no distinct pattern. But nothing changed in the camp.

The Brick Kiln

Close to the camp, at the southern edge was a big industrial plant with many buildings. It was a brick kiln. There prisoners would dig clay and prepare it to be baked in the kiln. Barbed wire encircled the buildings and the spacious grounds around them. From our camp we would see only part of the grounds, a few buildings and the big stack of the furnace. We could see the rest of the plant from the road which led to and from work, on the other side of the barbed wire.

We, the prisoners in the camp in Schomberg, did not work in the brick kiln. From this point of view we were the "privileged" ones. In the kiln a hundred, perhaps two hundred prisoners worked and it was said that they were taken from many different other camps in that region of Germany. Sometimes, from far away, we could see people going to and fro, in and out of buildings. They appeared to us to be soldiers, they were in uniforms, and they carried weapons, like the S.S. in our camp. On rare occasions we would notice the head of a prisoner jut out of the pit and disappear again. The pit was deep, nearly the height of a man, a terrifying quadrangle like a big grave waiting for the dead. The buildings stood next to the pit. The men worked in the pit. They worked there and they died there.

We heard stories about what was going on in the pit from the kapos in the camp, it was said that those special prisoners sentenced to die a hard and long death were sent to the kiln.

And it was also said that the commandant of our camp, himself, used to select whom to send there. He chose both: the prisoners suspected of planning to escape and the unsuccessful escapees who had the bad luck of not being killed on the spot. The prisoners in the pit did not survive more than one or two months. Once in the sick barracks with Tola Reznik and Szymon Gitelson, both good mathematicians, we worked out a “game of statistics” proving that the life expectancy in our camp was more than four months, we were the “privileged” ones because we could expect to live twice as long.

Traffic to the kiln was one way, there was no exit and no escape. When a prisoner died in the pit another one was immediately sent to fill the vacancy because the number of prisoners working in the pit had to correspond to the number of bricks planned to be produced. Prisoners were sent to the kiln in the morning after roll call. One would see bodies moving, only the panic in their eyes proved they were alive. Turning the clay into bricks, there in the pit, would ultimately turn their panic into eternal peace and their bodies into corpses.

The bottom of the pit was covered with water. On frosty nights in the winter months the water froze and when the prisoners stood on the ice it broke under their feet. They stood and worked in a mixture of water and clay waiting for night to come. At night they remained within the enclosure of the plant freezing and waiting for day to come. This was what their daily existence was like until they drew their last breath.

The Stack and the Barbed Wire

The smokestack stood amongst the buildings of the brick kiln. We could not see its base. It stood out above the roofs of the buildings—a challenge to the mountains and rocks surrounding it. The stack came to symbolize the pride, power and conceit of Germany and its desire to enslave the entire world. We reacted to it with hatred and repulsion together with intense horror. When we saw the Allied planes passing over the camp and the grounds of the brick kiln, we hoped, as we had on the train from Stutthof for a bomb which would obliterate the stack, the symbol of slavery and of a savage scoundrel ready to wipe out all human values in life.

Until the days of Schomberg barbed wire alone had symbolized the cruel authority and rough arrogance of the German soldier. In barbed wire we saw oppression. Pain and brutality. Barbed wire was still with us: it indicated the borders of the camp and separated us from the outside world. We would leave the camp for this other world twice daily: going to work early in the morning and returning from work at sunset.

For while we were in Schomberg the stack took the place of the barbed wire.

The wire surrounding the camp was electrified. Sometimes in the morning during roll-call, we would see a prisoner suddenly leave his line and run to the fence. He would reach the barbed wire and grab it; only a short shriek would pierce the air for a moment and then a brief flash of lightning would temporarily brighten the dim gloom of the early morning hours—bearing evidence of a “successful” escape, successful because the prisoner had left the camp forever. He was free, free forever. Only a whitish streak of smoke could be seen on the barbed wire fence; it soon vanished in the morning wind, while roll-call continued, as if nothing had happened. The S.S. never stopped the escapees from running to the wires, they did not shoot and they did not send the dogs in pursuit as if they did not care whether a prisoner escaped. When a prisoner did “escape” he was still counted. Other prisoners were sent to retrieve the corpse. They laid it down in the line next to the other prisoners. The kapo had only to transfer the dead prisoner’s number from the list of “leaving-for-work” to the list of “leaving-not-to-return.” Later on, the commandos working inside the camp would take care of the corpse and carry it to a small hill outside the barbed wire not far from the camp. A big mass grave was already waiting there. When it was full, soil was heaped upon it and another grave was dug for the corpses yet to come.

The barbed wire was not a German invention for World War II. Even before the War, I often used to see the same kind of wire, but the significance of its function never occurred to me. I had never felt the barbs in the barbed wire. Perhaps there is some negative connotation in every fence: some limitation of freedom, some partitioning between what is allowed and what is forbidden; perhaps every fence engenders fear, because of its power to divide. But I never thought that barbed wire, apart from serving as a fence could become a way of life; both symbol and witness of the power and hostility of the oppressor. It also became a symbol of those inside the fence who were reduced to shrieks, flashes and streaks of smoke vanishing into the air.

The first time the wire barbed my eyes was when I was first entering the ghetto (September 1941). The boundaries of the ghetto cut up the streets of Wilno, sometimes they ran along the footpaths and sometimes across the width of the streets. In the first case, the doors and windows of the buildings within the ghetto were shut, blocked up and often walled up, dividing the street into two worlds: one an Aryan world allowed to live, the other a Jewish world destined to die. In the second case a wall was erected from the façade on one side of the street to the façade on the opposite side. Such a wall would completely close off the ghetto. On the wall was barbed wire. It is doubtful if this barbed wire had any real function in finalizing the division between the two worlds. The wall was very high, inside stood a Jewish policeman from the ghetto police, and outside an S.S. soldier whose sole duty was to watch the wall and shoot at will. But the barbed wire also carried a moral message signifying the way of life of the oppressor. It was the barbed wire which warned, day and night, without interruption, “verboten.”

Ever since then barbed wire has remained in my memory. It was in the ghetto, in all concentration camps, and did not cease to exist in the free world for many years after the War. I was in Jerusalem in 1960 and in many streets, adjoining the Jordanian territory I saw big yellow warning signs: “The frontier is ahead of you.” On the signs was a child squatting with the barbed wire behind him, and again I was re-reminded that the wire was still with us, that perhaps it was meant to stay with us as an integral part of our culture.

But in Schomberg the barbed wire lost its importance and symbolism. The stack took its place. It stood forcefully high and mighty, ruling the place surrounded by mountains. Hundreds of planes flew over and thousands of bombs exploded somewhere near the mountains, but only their echo reached us and sounded like the laughter of a hyena. This laughter woke us every morning together with the first scream and beatings of the day. The same laughter “saluted” us at the final roll-call after work. It was followed by another round of beatings.

We got up early in the morning, as usual. Within a few minutes we were standing in a row beside the planks which served as our beds. We got our piece of bread which was meant to be breakfast and to last until mid-day, when boiling water, with or without a trace of vegetables, was brought to our work site. After a few minutes we stood in another row ready to be counted for work. The living trembled because of the frosty winds blowing from the mountains at that early morning hour. Those who died at night rested quietly near the row of prisoners. They were not trembling, although their clothes, the prisoners’ uniforms, had already been removed. It was important that the number of prisoners living and dead was correct. As long as the sum total of prisoners at the morning roll-call was equal to the sum of prisoners who had returned from work the evening before—everything was in perfect order. The living went to work and the dead remained in the camp to be taken to the hill. The order was “wunderbar.” It was a day like any other.

ARNOLD WEITZENHOF

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Arnold Weitzenhof. This I Remember: A Polish Youth Survives the Shoah. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2006, pp. 11–16. Used by permission.

A native of Gdov, Poland, Arnold Weitzenhof was only 12 years old when the Nazis invaded in September 1939. By 1940, the SS had rendered the town Judenfrei, or “free of Jews.” Arnold and his brothers were taken to a hastily improvised concentration camp at Stalowa Wola, and from there to a succession of other camps as the war unfolded. Eventually, he was the only member of his family to survive the Holocaust. In the account that follows, he describes a number of his experiences and observations during the war, and of how he managed to find opportunities to stay alive in spite of all he had to confront. It was a lot for one so young to have to take in, but his grasp for detail, sometimes understated, is excellent.

So Eddie and I escaped and went on to the highway. From the highway, not far from the river, we saw German boats. There were Russians on the other side. We saw a farmer on a wagon of potatoes, and I asked him if I could ride in the back. I told him that I was very tired. I had red hair and didn’t look Jewish as Eddie did with his black hair, so the farmer agreed. When the man said yes, I then asked him if Eddie could come too. He said yes. The farmer left us off at the train station at Sandomierz, where we asked directions to the ghetto there. However, in order to get into the ghetto we had to cross a bridge over the River Vistula, guarded by Germans. I bought a soda with some money I still had, and drinking this, Eddie and I crossed the bridge and were not questioned by the German guards who were in the guard booth.

Now we were inside the ghetto. We did not know anyone here; we still wanted to go to Kraków, where we planned to meet my brothers, but we needed help to get there. When we came to the first house in the Sandomierz ghetto, I knocked on the door, explaining to the woman who answered that we were from the work camp and were filthy and hungry. We told her that we wanted to go back to Kraków. The woman said, “I have two daughters and one is working outside the ghetto. She will tell you what train to take to Kraków. The woman gave us food and a bath. Soon the daughter returned from outside the ghetto, explaining that we should take the 8:00 PM train to Kraków. So we left the ghetto, again crossing the bridge, and again none of the soldiers stopped us.

At the station as the train was coming, I heard the whoo, whooo. But I ran back into the station to buy some candy for our journey. By the time I got back—in minutes—they had closed the gate. No other train was going to Kraków until 8:00 AM. So we sat in the station and waited for daylight. Two Germans came in asking for people's papers. They went to almost every table, but they didn't come to ours. In the morning we boarded the train. At the first stop people came in from farms to sell butter and eggs. I was so hungry. I was sitting next to a Polish woman who was cutting off big slices of bread from a loaf and then she would cut a slice of cheese. I was dying of hunger.

So I leaned over and said to her, "I am very hungry." She looked me over and then took her knife and cut a piece of bread and a piece of cheese. My cousin Eddie was across the aisle, so I said, "He is hungry too." She took out the knife again and cut another slice of bread and a piece of cheese for Eddie. She was a kind person. While we were on the train, we heard that the 8:00 PM train had been stopped by Germans and all the young people had been taken off and sent to work in Germany. That could have been Eddie and I. I was now happy I had bought the candy and missed the train. This was bashert (meant to be).

We arrived in a suburb of Kraków where we got off the train. I decided to head for the Jewish Quarter—Kazimierz. I figured there would be fewer chances of being picked up in the Jewish Quarter, I told Eddie that we would walk from there to the ghetto—Podgórze. We wanted, strange as it may sound, to get into the ghetto to meet Szymek and Samek. It was the evening and people were coming back from their jobs outside. The Jewish police at the gate said, "You can't get in there." A little later we came back and just went in with the rest. My cousin had lived there before the war. We found out that my two brothers had made it. We saw them in the ghetto. My older brother, Szymek, was thinking about running away to Palestine. . . .

While we were in Podgórze, they decided to liquidate the ghetto on March 13 and 14, 1943. However, they still needed laborers; they carried placards for us to stand under. They needed 120 people in the nearby labor camps. They chose me, and then my cousin Eddie was chosen. My middle brother, Samek, had shaved and developed a rash, so they did not choose him, because he looked diseased. At this time I didn't know what had happened to my older brother Szymek. Later I had heard from one of Szymek's friends that Szymek had been caught crossing the border and killed. I never heard from either brother again.

We were then taken ten kilometers from Podgórsze to Płaszów (originally a labor camp but later a concentration camp), to Julag One (abbreviation for Judenlager)—a sub-camp, which was on a highway; on the other side of the highway was the other section of the camp in the old Jewish cemetery. The site chosen for Płaszów was the two Jewish cemeteries: the new Jewish cemetery on Abraham Street and the old Jewish cemetery on Jerozolimska Street. The old Jewish cemetery had had the richest gold roofs on the tombs and beautiful marble stones. The Germans had made these cemeteries into a concentration camp. They had desecrated the graves, removing the tombstones and using these slabs to pave the roads of the camp. The best marble had been sent to Berlin, and they made a horse stable of the synagogue there.

We were told to work on building a factory to make an assembly line for cars. I had to carry hods of bricks and run up and down scaffolding. This was very difficult work because the bricks, piled three or four feet high were extremely heavy. We had to run up and down with these bricks. Later I had to have a back operation, I think, because of this work.

After a time, I remember that typhus developed in Julag One. People were dying one after the other. By the third day I was lying on the floor so sick that I could not even pick up my head; what made it even worse was that the people on either side of me were dead. They sent in Jewish doctors and one, Dr. Margolis, said he was allowed to give only one shot, but he said to me, "I will give you two shots." He also gave me orange juice and a roll. Then one day he came in before I had really recovered and told me that I had to go to work because they were planning a selection of the barracks and any sick would be killed. I could not yet pick up my head, but I got up and as I ran, I started to feel better. After this, they closed the camp, burning the barracks, and we were taken to houses near the station. They had emptied houses there and we lived in them and worked on building the factory. By this time Eddie was very ill with dysentery and jaundice. SS-Oberscharführer Franz Müller saw Eddie and told the Ukrainian guard to kill my cousin. The guard said, "I can't." Müller took the guard's gun and shot Eddie, right before my eyes.

Then I had to carry huge square stones. We had to pick them up and run with them. We worked, both men and women. Six of the men's wives were there. The ordinary German soldiers were usually okay to us. That is, until they came and loaded the men into trucks and began to shoot the six women. One husband jumped out of the truck and ran into the gunfire. He too was killed. . . .

They drove us to the Płaszów camp, . . . in the old Jewish cemetery, and painted yellow oil paint on our clothes—to discourage escapes. I lived in Barrack #20. . . . This was the camp where the Schindler Jews stayed. I never knew about the Schindler Jews who were in Płaszów at this time until after the war.

The Kommandant, Goth (the third Kommandant, who came in February 3, 1944 to September 1944), killed three or four people before breakfast. He would ride his white horse after killing indiscriminately.

On the road my job was breaking up big stones into little ones to make a road. One day when I was breaking up stones, I was on a hill or mound overlooking the concentration camp. I saw through the fence a number of trucks arriving, bringing “used up” girls. They stood them before a tremendous ditch and then murdered them with machine guns. One of the guards who did this was named Yannos, whom I seen before in the first work camp at Stalowa-Wola. Yannos never betrayed me.

I was in Płaszów three or four months. The barracks were awful—wooden bunks, three deep, with only a little straw for a mattress. Here I was lonely without brothers or my cousin. I continued working, breaking large stones into finer stones for the roads that the Germans were building.

Once a huge truck was going to Gdov to pick up cement pipes. I asked if I could go with them. I went to my house but someone else was living there. I didn’t try to go in; I felt sad for my family and what had been.

YANKIEL WIERNIK

Context: Extermination Camps and Sites

Source: Yankiel Wiernik. A Year in Treblinka: An Inmate Who Escaped Tells the Day-to-Day Facts of One Year of His Torturous Experiences. New York: American Representation of the General Jewish Workers’ Union of Poland, 1945, located at <http://www.zchor.org/treblink/wiernik.htm>

The prisoner revolt at Treblinka was carefully planned down to the last detail. On August 2, 1943, after having built an arsenal consisting of hand grenades and rifles stolen from the camp armory, between 150 and 200 inmates rose in a coordinated action, rushed the fence, and attempted a breakthrough. Yankiel Wiernik was one of the few survivors of Treblinka, and in this account he relates the events surrounding the revolt. Most clearly, he shows how he was able to live through the revolt, make it through to the forest—and live.

The final, irrevocable date for the outbreak of the revolt was set for August 2, and we instinctively felt that this would really be the day. We got busy with our preparations, checking whether everything was in readiness and whether each of our men knew the part he had to play. It so happened that I did not go to Camp No. 1 for several days because I was busy constructing an octagonal building with a suspended roof, resembling a guard station, that was to house a well. I was also constructing a portable building in Camp No. 2 which could be taken apart and which I subsequently had to move to Camp No. 1, where it was supposed to remain permanently. I was becoming impatient because I was unable to get in touch with Camp No. 1 and zero hour was approaching.

August 2, 1943 was a sizzling hot day. The sun shone brightly through the small, grated windows of our barrack. We had practically no sleep that night; dawn found us wide awake and tense. Each of us realized the importance of the moment and thought only of gaining freedom. We were sick of our miserable existence, and all that mattered was to take revenge on our tormentors and to escape. As for myself, all I hoped for was to be able to crawl into some quiet patch of woodland and get some quiet, restful sleep.

At the same time, we were fully aware of the difficulties we would have to overcome. Observation towers, manned by armed guards, stood all around the camp, and the camp itself was teeming with Germans and Ukrainians armed with rifles, machine guns and revolvers. They would lock us up in our barracks as early as 12 noon. The camp was surrounded by several rows of fences and trenches.

However, we decided to risk it, come what may. We had had enough of the tortures, of the horrible sights. I, for one, was determined to live to present to the world a description of the inferno and a sketch of the layout of that accursed hell-hole. This resolve had given me the strength to struggle against the hangmen and the endurance to bear the misery. Somehow I felt that I would survive our break for freedom.

A presentiment of the coming storm was in the air and our nerves were at high tension. The Germans and the Ukrainians noticed nothing unusual. Having wiped out millions of people, they did not feel they had to fear a paltry handful of men such as we. They barked orders which were obeyed as usual. But those of us who belonged to the committee were worried because we had no instructions about the timing of the outbreak. I was fidgety. I kept on working but all the time I worried that we might fail to establish contact which, in turn, would mean that we would perish miserably and in vain.

However, I found a way of communicating with Camp No. 1. My superior, Loeffler, was no longer there; he had been replaced by a new man whose name I did not know. We nicknamed him “Brown Shirt.” He was very kind to me. I walked up to him and asked him for some boards. Boards were stored in Camp No. 1 and he, not wanting to interrupt our work, went off with some workers to get them. The boards were brought. I inspected and measured them, and then said they weren't right for the job. I volunteered to go over myself to select the material I needed, but I made a wry face as if I did not like the idea. And so I went to the storage shed with my superior, all the while shaking with excitement. I felt that unless I made the most of this opportunity, all would be lost.

Presently I found myself in Camp No. 1 and nervously looked around, appraising our chances. Three other men were with me. The storage shed was guarded by a Jew about 50 years of age, wearing spectacles. Because he was an inmate of Camp No. 1, I knew nothing about him, but he was a participant in the conspiracy. My three helpers engaged the German superior in a conversation to divert his attention, while I pretended to be selecting boards. I deliberately went away from the others, continuing to select boards. Suddenly, someone whispered in my ear: "Today, at 5:30 p.m." I turned around casually and saw the Jewish guard of the storage shed before me. He repeated these words and added: "There will be a signal."

In feverish haste I collected whatever boards were nearest to me, told my comrades to pick them up and started to work, trembling with fear lest I betray my emotions. Thus time went by until noon, when all hands returned from work. Again our committee met furtively and the word was passed around. I asked everyone to keep cool and remember their individual assignments. The younger ones among us were greatly agitated. As I looked at our group, I began to believe that we would really win.

Volunteers for the afternoon work shift were then selected. We assigned the weaker and less capable men to the first shift because it had no task to perform. The first afternoon shift returned from work at 3 p.m. The men we had picked then went to work, thirty in number. They were the bravest, the pluckiest and the strongest in the lot. Their task was to pave the way for the others to escape. A crew was also picked for fetching water from the well. At around 5 p.m. there suddenly was a great need for water. The gate leading to the well was opened wide and the number of water carriers was considerably augmented.

All those assigned to work with the corpses wore only striped overalls. A penalty of 25 lashes was meted out for wearing any other clothing while doing this particular job. On that day, however, the men wore their clothes under their overalls. Before escaping, they would have to get rid of the overalls, which would have given them away at once.

We remained in our barracks, sitting close together and exchanging glances; every few minutes someone would remark that the time was drawing near. Our emotions at that point defied description. We silently bade farewell to the spot where the ashes of our brethren were buried. Sorrow and suffering had bound us to Treblinka, but we were still alive and wanted to escape from this place where so many innocent victims had perished. The long processions, those ghastly caravans of death, were still before our eyes, crying out for vengeance. We knew what lay hidden beneath the surface of this soil. We were the only ones left alive to tell the story. Silently, we took our leave of the ashes of our fellow Jews and vowed that, out of their blood, an avenger would arise.

Suddenly we heard the signal—a shot fired into the air.

We leaped to our feet. Everyone fell to his prearranged task and performed it with meticulous care. Among the most difficult tasks was to lure the Ukrainians from the watchtowers. Once they began shooting at us from above, we would have no chance of escaping alive. We knew that gold held an immense attraction for them, and they had been doing business with the Jews all the time. So, when the shot rang out, one of the Jews sneaked up to the tower and showed the Ukrainian guard a gold coin. The Ukrainian completely forgot that he was on guard duty. He dropped his machine gun and hastily clambered down to pry the piece of gold from the Jew. They grabbed him, finished him off and took his revolver. The guards in the other towers were also dispatched quickly.

Every German and Ukrainian whom we met on our way out was killed. The attack was so sudden that before the Germans were able to gather their wits, the road to freedom lay wide open before us. Weapons were snatched from the guard station and each one of us grabbed all the arms he could. As soon as the signal shot rang out, the guard at the well had been killed and his weapons taken from him. We all ran out of our barracks and took the stations that had been assigned to us. Within a matter of minutes, fires were raging all around. We had done our duty well.

I grabbed some guns and let fly right and left, but when I saw that the road to escape stood open, I picked up an ax and a saw, and ran. At first we were in control of the situation. However, within a short time pursuit got under way from every direction, from Malkinia, Kosow and from the Treblinka Penal Camp. It seemed that when they saw the fires and heard the shooting, they sent help at once.

Our objective was to reach the woods, but the closest patch was five miles away. We ran across swamps, meadows and ditches, with bullets pursuing us fast and furious. Every second counted. All that mattered was to reach the woods because the Germans would not want to follow us there.

Just as I thought I was safe, running straight ahead as fast as I could, I suddenly heard the command "Halt!" right behind me. By then I was exhausted but I ran faster just the same. The woods were just ahead of me, only a few leaps away. I strained all my will power to keep going. The pursuer was gaining and I could hear him running close behind me.

Then I heard a shot; in the same instant I felt a sharp pain in my left shoulder. I turned around and saw a guard from the Treblinka Penal Camp. He again aimed his pistol at me. I knew something about firearms and I noticed that the weapon had jammed. I took advantage of this and deliberately slowed down. I pulled the ax from my belt. My pursuer—a Ukrainian guard—ran up to me yelling in Ukrainian: “Stop or I’ll shoot!” I came up close to him and struck him with my axe across the left side of his chest. He collapsed at my feet with a vile oath.

I was free and ran into the woods. After penetrating a little deeper into the thicket, I sat down among the bushes. From the distance I heard a lot of shooting. Believe it or not, the bullet had not really hurt me. It had gone through all of my clothing and stopped at my shoulder, leaving a mark. I was alone. At last, I was able to rest.

DAVID S. WISNIA

Context: Salvation

Source: David S. Wisnia, with Doug Cervi and Robin Black (edited by Maryann McLoughlin). One Voice, Two Lives: From Auschwitz Prisoner to 101st Airborne Trooper. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2015, pp. 64–72. Used by permission.

The end of the concentration and extermination camps in the East was in most cases accompanied by death marches of prisoners, long columns of which were sent out of the camps ahead of the advancing Soviet forces. David Wisnia was on one of these death marches, which made its way from Auschwitz-Birkenau to Gleiwitz in January 1945, prior to being forced onto a train for Dachau concentration camp in Bavaria. From there he was moved on again, but on this occasion he and his comrades contrived to find a way to escape the train on which they had been loaded. Recaptured, David Wisnia escaped once again, on this occasion with greater success. As he writes, “guided only by the sounds of artillery fire” he “walked towards the Soviets . . . relieved to be alone.”

Death March

My group was one of the last to march out of Birkenau in January 1945. I was more fortunate than most of my fellow prisoners in that I wore two heavy jackets, a hat, socks, and a sturdy pair of boots that I had stolen from the Sauna.

But I was weaker in one respect. My cushy work detail in the Sauna had left me soft, unused to and unprepared for exposure to a Polish winter. The wind and flying snow menaced my exposed face and hands. Still, my boots would see me through whatever trials lay before me, and I was grateful to have them.

The SS guards, wielding machine guns, told us we were going to Gleiwitz, the closest large city in German territory, about twenty-five kilometers away. The term “death march,” which was given after the war, was accurate. Those who weren’t marching fast enough were shot on the spot, and people walking on the perimeter of the group were easy targets.

The Germans wanted as many people as possible to perish on the journey. As we marched in our rows of five, I made sure I stayed in the middle of the group. Indiscriminate shootings became commonplace enough for us to barely flinch at the sound of gunfire. We’d just quickly step around the bodies and keep on going. It was every man for himself, as usual.

As we marched towards Germany, I noticed German tanks, trucks, and soldiers attaching themselves to us. Some of the soldiers were in bad shape, wearing only paper bandages to dress their wounds. I didn’t know if I’d survive whatever came next, but those soldiers were a hopeful sign. Those German soldiers looked just as cowardly as any other human beings on the other side of victory.

Another threat to our survival during the march was the intermittent strafing our pitiful column received from Allied airplanes. When the planes swooped down, they were close enough for us to spot the red stars painted on them, but the Soviet pilots couldn’t tell there were prisoners among the Germans, so they continued to shoot at us.

Gleiwitz

We reached Gleiwitz after a full day of marching and spent the night in the large train depot there. There were about 900 prisoners who had survived the ordeal. We weren’t given any rations. I spent the night walking around the depot. The huge Gleiwitz train station, the biggest depot in the coal region of Silesia, had dozens of trains on tracks going in all directions. I contemplated trying to escape by hiding on a train and waiting out the imminent end of the war, but I was in German territory now. Who in Germany would help me should I be discovered? Moreover, the SS guards surrounding the depot from the outside with their machine guns were a discouragement. I decided it would be less risky to continue on to Dachau, a regular concentration camp, because I knew there weren't any death camps in Germany.

The next morning, we were loaded onto open-roofed coal cars. I will never forget the bitter cold of that trip. Even though we were packed in as tightly as possible, with our bodies pressing against each other, they failed to offer much warmth. We headed deeper into Germany, away from the approaching Soviet army.

I thought I had witnessed horrors in Birkenau of such repugnance and evil that I could never be shocked by anything again. I was wrong. The punctiliousness with which the Nazis had carried out their murderous duties had only been possible because of their precision and orderliness: Transports arrived. Prisoners were sorted. Some entered the camp. Most went to the gas chambers. Corpses were incinerated in the crematoria. Ashes were carried to the ash pile. A new day dawned in Birkenau.

Dachau

At Dachau, all the sick harmony of a well-regulated killing machine was abandoned. Dachau was by far the largest of the four camps that served as a receptacle for the many thousands of human leftovers from all the camps in the East. The other three were Sachsenhausen, Mauthausen, and Buchenwald. The Nazis had simply run out of time to murder all the Jews they'd collected. The Soviets were rapidly approaching.

I had never seen so many people confined to one place. It seemed like millions. Bodies lay where they fell or were tossed out of the bunks and into the hallways of the wooden barracks, where they were stepped on. These bodies were rotting in place. Most of the living were dead on the inside—Muselmann, waiting for nature to finish the job. There was no place to sit, to stand, or to lie down, even outside of the barracks. The Nazis had given up with pretences. It was a sure sign that the end of the war was near.

The question was: Could anyone survive the filth, deprivation, and disease of Dachau? It was its own kind of death-camp. My mantra became, "Survive another day. Survive another day." But how?

Initially in Dachau we received no rations. Luckily, I had left Birkenau with a rucksack filled with bread, turnips, and conserves that I'd been hoarding. Fellow Dachau prisoners tried to steal my food, grabbing for it. But I would punch them away. I was much stronger than most of them. Eventually, watery soup was distributed, but by the time you reached the front of the line for your share, someone would kill you for it. People behaved like animals because they were so hungry. I, on the other hand, had almost no appetite due to the stench of the place.

When a man died in his bunk, I finally found a place to sleep. As soon as he was thrown over the side, I managed to scramble up and take his place. Unlike Birkenau, where it was three to a bunk, these were single slats. Because I was strong enough to fight, I was able to maintain the space for myself. If I hadn't been able to do this, I would have frozen to death outside. There was no such thing as an elite prisoner at Dachau.

On my third day at Dachau I went to the office, the Schreibstube, and learned that the Nazis were looking for young volunteers in good physical shape for Arbeit (work). The labor would be hard. They needed prisoners with the strength to carry twenty-five kilogram sacks of cement into underground bunkers that were being built to protect German airplanes from Allied raids. I immediately offered my services. I would have done any kind of labor to get out of Dachau. The office recorded my number and told me where to report when it was time to get on the train. I just had to hang on for a few more days.

Train Journey

Finally it was time to leave. Word spread that we were going southwest of Dachau, to a place called Mühlendorf to pick up more prisoners. From Mühlendorf, we would continue to Austria. A couple hundred of us, all men and young boys, got into cattle cars. The doors were locked shut with a metal latch, and one tiny window gave the only light.

As we travelled towards Austria, the retreating German Army attached themselves to us and other prisoner trains all over the area, trying to get away from the Eastern Front. We could hear the artillery at night becoming increasingly louder, so we knew the Soviets were close. We had no idea how far the Americans were at this point. We knew that the American and British forces were fighting in the West, but to us that seemed like a million miles away.

Because the German Army was attached to our train, with anti-aircraft guns at the front and the back as well as German vehicles and tanks travelling parallel to the tracks, we were again strafed by Allied fighter planes. The first time that happened, the train stopped and we were evacuated into the ravines next to the tracks for about half an hour. Our guards were actually trying to keep us alive because they needed our labor in Austria. We assumed the planes were Soviet because they had white stars painted on them.

During our second evacuation, the SS tried to shoot at the attacking planes with anti-aircraft weapons. The Allied planes again didn't know there were prisoners on the trains. We felt the ground shake as bombs detonated quite close to us. The last car of our train was destroyed. I said to my companions, "We better get away from here. Somewhere along the way, we're going to get killed."

Before the third air raid, a small group of us decided to attempt an escape. We didn't want to survive the Nazi death machine only to be killed by friendly fire. And I had noticed something during the previous air raids that made me believe that an attempt could be successful. The guards were changing frequently. After each raid, it seemed as if they were becoming older and more haggard. The strongest SS members had been sent to the Front, where they were sorely needed. Paradoxically, we prisoners were young and strong. It gave us confidence.

While everyone, including the guards, was ducked over, trying to keep cover during the strafing, about twelve of us started moving away from the ravine in a group. It was open country, and we managed to get about a kilometer away. The land was flat, and we could see our trains in the distance. We approached a farmhouse with trees, gardens, and a barn surrounded by a wooden and wire fence. The majority of us got into the garden and lay down. The air raid stopped and it became quiet. It wasn't long before we could hear the SS screaming at the prisoners to get up and climb back onto the train. A few of the guards aimed their fury at us escapees and began shooting into the sky.

Soon, five SS guards arrived at our defenseless spot. "Hande hoch! Arms up!" they shouted. Slowly we stood up and lifted our arms. My luck had finally run out. Our liberation was possibly days away and I was going to be shot. Why had I survived so much only to die this way?

But surprisingly, after the guards lined us up in rows of five, they escorted us back to the train. We were numb with shock. Apparently they had no intention of shooting us in open country and staining Germany with the evidence. True, Dachau was in Germany, but Dachau was enclosed. After the war, German citizens could claim ignorance of the atrocities taking place there.

An illustration of how irrational they were: our guards were worried about the evidence of a few dead Jewish prisoners on German soil, in stark contrast to the millions they had already murdered in Poland and elsewhere in Europe.

I felt more daring after that close call. "They're not going to kill us, so why not try again?" I said to my buddies once we were back on the train.

This time we decided it would be smarter if the next time we tried to escape we separated immediately. We had made it too easy for the guard by being together. If we scattered in opposite directions, maybe one person would be caught and surely shot this time, but at least some would get away.

Within the hour, we heard the inevitable BA-BOOM of another air raid. It was safer to remain in the ravine than to attempt an escape during the attack. When it finally ended, it took the SS a long time to get moving. Bomb-damaged trains needed to be unhooked from the line. We stayed in the ravine, guarded by men standing about 500 meters apart from each other. The sky began to darken.

Escape

As I was lying in the ravine with my arms over my head, I felt something hard under my hand. Miraculously, I had found a little hand shovel. To me it was a sign that I was meant to survive. Emboldened by this gift, I grabbed the shovel, snuck up to the closest guard from behind, and smacked him over the head and at the back of his neck as hard as I could. He crumpled to the ground, and my friends and I scattered. I'd never run so fast. I don't even remember my feet touching the ground. It was completely dark by the time I spotted a barn and stopped running. The barn wasn't locked so I went inside. Inside were hay, straw, animals, and pantries containing moldy cheese and heavy brown bread. I spotted a ladder leading to a loft and climbed up, feeling exhilarated by my successful escape. I had no idea where I was and was terrified of being caught. I decided to stay in the barn until the next evening and travel towards the Soviet Army during the night. I slept heavily on the warm, soft straw. No one came in to feed and water the livestock. The farm had been abandoned.

I woke up the next day to the sounds of the barn: the creaks of the old wood, the breathing of the animals. It was so peaceful. I stayed in the loft, eating bread and cheese, and contemplating my future. I had made my first objective. I was free. Now I had to figure out how to stay alive.

I could hear what I believed to be the Soviet artillery in the distance. As the hours rolled by it sounded as if it was getting ever closer. It was the fire of my liberators, so I decided I would leave the barn at nightfall and walk towards it. The closer I got to the artillery, I thought, the farther I would be from the SS and the site of my escape.

I was still wearing the same civilian clothes I had marched out of Birkenau in, with the hat to cover my short hair. I doubted I would be detected as an escaped prisoner. Similar to Vladék's peasant son over three years before, I now took on the persona of a young German worker.

When it was dark, I stuffed my pockets with the rest of the bread and cheese and crept quietly out of the barn. I walked towards the Soviets, guided only by the sounds of artillery fire, walking in fields and farms, avoiding roads, until dawn. I hadn't seen any people or vehicles all night. It reminded me of my arrival in Sochaczew when the world seemed void of any people. This time, though, I was relieved to be alone.

GODEL WROBY

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Godel Wroby. My Battle for Survival: From Mlyny to Melbourne. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2004, pp. 41–51. Used by permission.

The labor camp of Skarzysko-Kamienna was a large compound located in Poland, comprising three factories employing slave labor. Attention was focused on a large munitions plant in the town. It was a place of particular brutality, with a very high death toll for those sent there. Godel Wroby, a young Polish Jewish worker from Łódź, was one of those deported to Skarzysko-Kamienna. His descriptions of life as a worker in this environment are abundant with detail, providing an in-depth profile into how Nazis, Poles, and German civilians viewed those under their dominion. As it was with a great many other similar situations, however, the workers were evacuated toward the end of the war as the Russians approached from the east, and Godel Wroby found himself on a train for the concentration camp at Buchenwald, deep inside Germany.

After five or six hours inside Czarnieckiego, I was put on a cattle train in a group of several hundred people. We traveled for a few hours until at about 4.00 am we came to a stop. The Germans called out “Raus!” (Get out!). We looked around and saw the station was called Skarzysko-Kamienna, so we were still in Poland. Ours was the only transport from the Lodz Ghetto to Skarzysko-Kamienna.

We were taken to an enormous camp, housing thousands of Jews in row after row of barracks and shown which one we were to live in. The barracks were fitted with two- and three-tier bunks, with one person to a bunk. Each bunk had a thin mattress and one lice-filled blanket. There were separate barracks for women.

The labor camp of Skarzysko-Kamienna consisted of three huge factories, called Werk A, Werk B and Werk C. They manufactured ammunition of all kinds and had been owned by the Polish government until 1939 when the Germans took over and handed them to the Hasag Corporation—an old, established German manufacturer of ammunition, which, during the war, became the third largest privately owned company manufacturing ammunition after I.G. Farben and Hermann Goering Werke. By August 1942, the Skarzysko plant was using Jewish slave labour.

We new arrivals from Lodz were sent to work in Werk A. Less than half a kilometer from the barracks, Werk A was not only the biggest factory and the closest, it was also the cleanest, as the work there did not involve the use of poisonous gases or toxic ingredients. Werk B and Werk C, the smallest of the three, were a few kilometers further away, one to the east, one to the west. The day began with an alarm at 6.00 am, when the entire population of the camp had to assemble in rows of six for Appel, the roll call. While I was standing there I took one of the hankies out of my pocket and blew my nose on it. Immediately the man next to me snatched it off me. “What are you doing!” he said to me. I told him I was wiping my nose. “You don’t wipe your nose with a hankie like that here,” he told me. “For a hanky like that you can get a loaf of bread and two bottles of milk.”

Well, I was very happy to hear that. I understood exactly what he was saying and I had a whole sack full of these hankies. It was like money in the bank. That man told me he was coming from Warsaw and had already been in a camp in Lublin before coming here. He rolled up his sleeve and showed me the “KL” for Konzentrationslager tattooed on his left arm. He told me the camp at Skarzysko-Kamienna ran on starvation lines, but if you had money or anything to exchange, it could be a paradise.

The soup was made from dried sugar beets, which were as tough as the soles of shoes when they were cooked. They called it “Shoe-sole soup.”

My new friend already knew something about camps, while I knew nothing about how hard life could become. I only knew about the ghetto. He told me people were dying in this camp too, but that he knew the place from A to Z. He said that if I had anything to exchange I should make him my partner and we could survive together. I agreed and told him I had about one thousand of these hankies.

The camp was actually in the middle of the town of Skarzysko-Kamienna, where there was a flourishing black market. The manufacturer of ammunition required the presence of some experts, as well as we slave labourers. Polish engineers had worked these for years before the war and their children followed them in the trade. Even though the economic situation for these local people was much better than it was for us, they were hard pressed for some of the luxuries they were used to having before the war and were willing to exchange food for things like gold, shoes and fine handkerchiefs. These exchanges were made inside the factories.

The Polish engineers were nice people and the factory to which I was assigned did very classy, fine, precision work, which involved using enormous machinery. I can't remember now exactly what we were making but we had to measure every tiny little thing. I enjoyed that work. The Polish Meister in charge of me sometimes worked a night shift beginning at 7.00 pm and ending at 6.00 am. The Poles could come and go as they wished, not like us, who were counted in and counted out of the factory. One evening he told me it was his wife's birthday. He showed me where he was putting his food for the evening and said that if the German supervisors came around and asked me where he was, I should say that he had been there but had just gone off somewhere. I could point to the food he had left as evidence he was still on the job. Then he went home. Of course the food was for me.

That was in Werk A. Fortunately, I was never sent to Werk C, which was the worst place. You only lasted two or three months working there, because in that place they packed picric acid, an extremely toxic yellow substance used in making hand grenades. The workers were given no protection against this poison, which turned their skin yellow within two months. We saw them when they came to Werk A for baths. They walked there from Werk C, several kilometers away, where it seemed there was no baths.

I was transferred out of Werk A to Werk B, as punishment for something I did.

I was still only a teenager and the bored fourteen-year-old son of a German Meister set out to make my life a misery. He found new ways to annoy me every day, such as pushing me while I was working. His father had no idea, but because he was the boss, this boy was able to wander around and probably annoyed others too. He was always turning up in the area where I was working and finding ways to make my life more difficult. He got me so annoyed that I decided I just had to knock him down, even though it meant risking my life. I just didn't care anymore.

I was working beside this huge machine in a row of such machines with a passage between them. My job was to lift up these iron bars, which were four meters long. They were longer than the machine, which was about three meters long. When out of the corner of my eye I noticed him coming up behind me, I picked up the iron bar and turned, so that it hit him hard. He fell back against the machine in the row behind us. Everybody saw this happen. I don't recall whether he was injured or not, but the Germans made a big deal out of it.

I was called up to their office, where they asked me why I had hit him with the iron bar. I told them it was an accident, that I had not seen him coming up behind me and had just gone on doing my job, which was to lift this iron bar off the ground and swing it around. I told them I had not seen him there. I had never seen him before. This young boy could not argue with that—he could not say that I had seen him and that I had seen him the day before and the day before that too, because it was not his place to be there in that row of machines. I knew he would not tell them he had been coming there just to annoy me. I just told them I did not expect anyone to be standing behind me while I was working.

The German boss did not believe me, but I told him that if he himself had been standing there behind me at that moment and I didn't know it, I could have hit him too. Finally they accepted that as the case, but also said that they had to punish me. So I was sent to Werk B. It wasn't that bad. I still had some money I had made selling the hankies. They had been a lifesaver for me. I was in Werk B for only about four or five months, though every day seemed like a year. The days were so long, the months were years. That's why I can't really say how long I was there—it must have been a few months. Time was something different back then. This was in 1944 and I was nearly nineteen years old.

I did the same work as everyone else there, but the food supplies were very bad and people around me were dying of hunger. Not me though. Thanks to the hankies I was well nourished and was never that hungry in Skarzysko. I was well off and I knew it.

My "business partner" was okay too. He was much older than I was and lived with a girl in the camp. That was a very common arrangement in Skarzysko, where girlfriends were known as "cousins." You would say: "She is my cousin." The women would come into the men's barracks. They were slaves, just like we were, and as women they didn't receive any favours. There were no morals at all in the camp. My friend wanted to introduce me to a "cousin," but I was still a virgin and didn't want that kind of relationship. I just wasn't interested and didn't even think about it. Some of the "cousins" got married in camp, but I don't know how long those relationships lasted, because I was not involved.

We were all waiting for a miracle. We didn't know anything about the movements of the Russian armies at that point, but we knew something was going on. You never heard anything directly, but there were rumours. We still knew nothing about other concentration camps.

One day at Werk B we were told they were liquidating the Skarzysko camp and we would be sent out of Poland. It was because they were frightened of the advancing Russian Army. I still had a little money left.

We were put into cattle trains once again and travelled via Czestochowa, where the train stopped and we rested there for a day. We were divided into groups and some people were taken away to work in Czestochowa. By sheer coincidence, I met an older cousin there that day who had spent most of his time in Narutowicza Street in Czestochowa. His name was Godel Abrahamovich, the son of my mother's step-brother. He had come to the station just to look around and see who was there. He wanted to arrange things for me so that I could stay in Czestochowa, but there was no time to do it.

We got back on the train, where the conditions were very bad and so crowded we could only stand. The railway tracks had been destroyed in many places so we often had to get out and walk to another train. We found water at some of these stops, which was precious because we were not given anything to eat or drink. Many people died on the way. It took a few days to reach our destination, which turned out to be Buchenwald.

By this time it was autumn, but the day we arrived was beautiful, sunny. The sign over the gates read "Arbeit macht Frei," which means "work makes one free." We were shaved, deloused and given showers. Not even my hankies could do anything about that and those conditions were the same for everybody. When we were clean we were issued a striped uniform with a number on it and led into barracks.

Before 1939 Buchenwald had been a prison for German political prisoners. When Hitler took command he sent all his enemies there and when we arrived communists were running the camp. They were not kapos, they had their own ranking.

The barracks we were shown into was one big, clean hall, where we lay on the floor with loose straw as a mattress. There were about one hundred of us to a barrack. The communists came in and asked us where we had come from, noting that we looked very undernourished. They told us: "This is not a concentration camp in which you will disappear, where we will kill and burn you. This is a political prison for political prisoners and we have democracy here. So if you have a grudge against someone, you can talk about it and there will be no one to charge you for it or anyone to blame you for anything you might do." It was an invitation to take revenge. That was something we wanted to hear, as there were a few among us who did deserve to be very harshly punished—ten Jewish men who had gone beyond the limit, who thought themselves gods and treated us very badly in Skarsysko. They were under German command, but I'm sure that the Germans did not force them to do the things they did. I had not been in Skarsysko as long as the others and did not know the details of what those men had done and continued to do, right up until the last moment. Now they had their chance for revenge.

I only knew one particular kapo who had approached us on our very first day in Skarsysko, asking us what we had brought with us. We didn't tell him, so he searched through our things. Fortunately, I had already given all my handkerchiefs to my new "business partner," but this kapo found the leather coat the woman had given me in Czarnieckiego and said he wanted it. I said no, because it was the only coat I had. I knew nothing about camps—I had just arrived. We argued, but he didn't get the coat, which I eventually sold to someone else.

We were given one bowl of soup in the factory and another when we returned to our barracks, but every time this man served us, he never aimed directly at the bowl but always poured it over our hands. He made sure he did it to me especially, because I had not given him anything that first day. The soup had usually cooled down a bit by the time my turn came, so at least it did not burn me, but pouring on my hands meant I always got less than I should have. That kapo was the only one of those ten men I knew. Maybe the other kapos had done worse things to people, but I didn't know of it personally. I didn't know these things because I didn't want to know and I think that was one of the reasons I survived. Knowledge could be dangerous. Interestingly though, every time I was hit it was by a Jew. There was just one occasion on which a German hit me, but that was much later on.

After the war and right up to this very day, I never hated kapos who survived, because many of them were forced to do what they did. But a lot of them did not have to go as far as they chose to in their cruelty to us. They took pleasure in humiliating us and were confident in their power. They thought themselves as powerful as the Pope—as more Pope than the Pope.

I was pretty young in comparison with the other people I was with in Buchenwald, who were twice as old as me. They identified the ten bad men amongst us who deserved punishment and held a meeting to decide what should be done to them. I was told that they could not be killed outright, because that is not the Jewish way of doing things. Instead, they decided to beat them for so long that they would die. And that's what happened. There were no weapons or pieces of wood or anything like that, so we beat them with just our hands and feet.

I don't regret contributing to that beating because those ten men were horrible, horrible people who had tortured their own people and degraded them to such a level it made their lives so worthless they just gave up.

Those men were already very weak and it did not take much for some of them to die quickly. Some died during that beating, others died the next day. The German supervisors just took the bodies away and no one said a word. It was a simple case of rough justice—an eye for an eye. I have always believed in that and I still do.

Everyone in the camps wanted to survive, but did not know how. The kapos thought that by serving the Germans they would be saved from the kind of hell the rest of us were going through. They believed there would be some kind of German paradise, just for them. On the other hand, if they had not done what the Germans ordered them to do, I don't know what would have become of them.

I don't just assume that people like those ten bad men were murderers because they were born murderers, or because they were forced to be like that. But they had to be punished because they did not have to treat us the way that they did. In Skarsysko the Germans were not in the camp, but much further away. The kapo leaders all came from the cities, though they couldn't care less where we came from—we were all just Jews in camp.

So on my first day in Buchenwald we punished those ten men and they died.

In comparison with the Ghetto and Skarsysko-Kamienna, Buchenwald was clean. We had no work to do and received meals three times a day. For us, this was a kind of paradise. In the two weeks I spent there I regained some of my natural strength.

I was still with the same group I had been with in Skarsysko, but although we knew each other quite well by this time, I never made any special friends in camp and remained a solitary person in every situation I was in. Maybe I was like that because I had lost my family while I was still so young, or because I was not used to communicating with so many people. Others came from more progressive, wealthier families, but life had been hard for me from the day I was born. There had never been any luxuries in my life and I was quite used to that. There was much less poverty in the city than in the country, where poverty was our daily companion. We were known as the provincer. Of course we did enjoy a natural freedom out in the countryside and knew how to organize ourselves, but city folk had a different mentality than us. It was interesting that, for all their wealth and sophistication, city-bred people did not last as long as those who came from the little villages in the provinces. We could survive the most difficult circumstances and I knew I had to make all my own decisions, by myself.

HALINA ZYLBERMAN

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Halina Zylberman. Swimming under Water. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2001, pp. 21–25. Used by permission.

Often one of the inhibitions for Jews seeking to evade Nazi persecution was a lack of assimilable traits. If a person spoke unaccented German, Polish, or French, or possessed stereotypical “Jewish” looks, that made all the difference between life and death. In the case of Halina Zylberman, her family’s assimilation into prewar Polish society gave them a distinct advantage over a great many other Polish Jews. In this testimony, Halina describes her experiences of “hiding in plain sight” in wartime Poland. While life was far from easy, she was nonetheless provided with opportunities denied others, including—remarkably for its time—finding a place to live.

One of the benefits of having been assimilated before the war was that my parents had a number of close friends who were not Jewish. Some of them had been trying to rescue us since the Nazis started rounding up the Jewish population. Finally, they put in place a plan that had a chance of succeeding. The first step was to remove us to a safe haven where we could begin to shed our Jewish identity. This eventuated, and two and a half years after the Germans marched into Poland, we found ourselves in the apartment of a judge and his wife. They had been our neighbours and acquaintances in our original apartment block, but they had moved to another part of the city.

For two weeks, we never left the apartment. We spent our time sleeping, reading and listening to the radio. We stayed hidden there for about two months while people arranged false documents for us. A woman friend of our hosts came and taught us the rituals and prayers we would need as Aryans. The only times we forgot our troubles were the evenings. After we had eaten, the judge would relate in detail the most fascinating cases in his career. Because my father had been a trained lawyer, the judge would go into all the finer points of the law, but he was never boring. He was a wonderful storyteller. For a while, we would forget that we were hunted outcasts and that a cruel war was all around us.

This wonderful man did not survive the war. Although we did not know it at the time, he was an active member of the Polish Underground. He was eventually caught and perished in a concentration camp. I will not name these wonderful people, because his widow, even after the war, chose to remain incognito for reasons of her own, but I am pleased to acknowledge their altruism in this book.

Then it was time to go. Every day we were with our brave hosts, they were in danger. Father explained to me that we would be moving to Warsaw where nobody knew us. We would be accompanied on our trip by the caretaker of the building. This man had to go to Warsaw on business and offered to escort us. If we struck trouble, he would claim that we were distant relatives.

My father had bought our new identity papers at considerable cost. His were genuine papers, those of a Mr. Kucharski who had been killed in the first year of the war. The Polish Underground Organisation had replaced his photograph and signature with those of my father. They were expert at their work and the papers could pass close scrutiny. I had fabricated documents. The church where I was supposed to have been baptized had been destroyed by a bomb, so there was no proof to the contrary. My mother was on my father's passport as his wife. My papers named me as Halina Kucharska, which meant that I would be seen as their daughter. Before we left, my mother begged the judge to organize false papers for Stasia who was now in the ghetto in Lvov. He promised to do what he could.

It was 5:00 a.m. when we left and the streets were still dark. The judge's wife placed a cross around Mama's neck for luck. Then she and her husband saw us into a taxi. Our guide, Piotr, was waiting for us at the station. We had to queue for our tickets and I trembled at the sight of two German policemen, the Gestapo, standing with an Alsatian dog next to the gate leading onto the platform. The huge dog terrified me. I knew that it could be ordered to tear people into pieces. I panicked, thinking, "Can you smell Jewish blood in us?"

I froze and my legs refused to carry me further. Piotr said softly: "Halinka, come. And smile! The dog won't bite you." He gave me a little nudge. I smiled at Piotr as we approached the Gestapo. They seemed to study our papers for an endless time, and I was sure they would hear the pounding of my heart. Then, "Alles ist in Ordnung, all is in order," they said to the ticket checker, and turned to the next passengers without another glance in our direction.

On the platform, Piotr said to me: "From now on let a smile be your shield. Watch the people around you and try to behave like them." We were unpleasantly surprised to find that all the seats on the train were occupied and we had to stand. It was going to take some hours to reach Warsaw. A few peasant women with baskets full of eggs, milk and fruit were sitting on the seats, keeping their precious possessions on their knees. They all wore several skirts, one over the other, and looked so huge, I suspected that their skirts concealed meat and other items that it was illegal to sell.

The train moved slowly and gradually, it became dark outside. I was exhausted from the preparation for our trip, so I closed my eyes and tried to relax. I was jerked awake when a Polish conductor came in to check our tickets and identification papers. He went indifferently from passenger to passenger, checked them off the list, said, "Thank you," and left.

Shortly afterwards, we heard the shuffling of heavy boots outside our compartment and the guttural sounds of the German language. Through the window in the doorway we could see the gleaming of police helmets. Instantly, everybody in the compartment became tense. No doubt, we were united by the same fearful question: "Will they come to us?" Then two of the SS men entered our compartment and again, we had to produce our tickets and identification papers. They examined them and the faces of the men by torchlight, since the light in our compartment was dim. I held my breath while they examined my father's face closely, but they seemed satisfied and passed onto the next man.

Finally they left, taking with them one of the peasant women, who began sobbing uncontrollably. There was no explanation why she had been singled out.

Eventually we arrived in Warsaw. Under happier circumstances I would have fallen in love with this great city. I had never before seen such heavy traffic and so many people in the streets. We hired the cheapest form of transportation, a bike-rickshaw, something I had never seen in Lwow or Krakow. Looking at the elegantly dressed men and women on Marszalkowska Street, I reflected on how little the war seemed to have affected them.

Our first contact was with a Mrs. Luisa Ratomska, who was an attractive, distinguished-looking lady in her mid-thirties. She was a blonde with striking blue eyes. She told us that she had done favours for Jewish people before us. Her husband, a major in the Polish army, had escaped to London.

While the adults spoke, I went out onto the balcony and was struck by an absolutely breathtaking view of Warsaw. I could see theatres, churches and parks spread out in front of me. There was hustle and bustle everywhere as people went about their affairs. My ears were assailed by the sound of passing trams and the tooting of taxis. I realized, teary-eyed, just how much of life I had missed since the Nazis had marched into Poland, making the annihilation of Jews their priority. "I'm free again!" I thought, exhilarated. "Free to go wherever I want!"

We stayed on in Mrs. Ratomska's apartment for two days. She had a sixteen-year-old son, Romek, and I was smitten by his good looks. He had his mother's blue eyes and bore himself proudly. I was thirteen and had never been particularly interested in boys before, but I wanted so much for him to like me. He was polite, but didn't want to be friends. I was just one of the unfortunate people who found brief refuge at his mother's home, or possibly, I even only represented a danger to him.

Mrs. Ratomska was a patriotic Pole and a woman of principle. She hated the German invaders and had deep compassion for people who were persecuted by them. Today, I wonder at her courage. She must have known that if she was caught, she risked losing her life, and maybe Romek's too.

My father slept on a couch in the living room. My mother and I shared Romek's room. She was given his bed and I was on a mattress on the floor next to her. At the first sight of light I got up to look out of the window, assuring myself that I really was in Warsaw and that this wasn't a wishful dream. I couldn't wait to go out and explore.

"Why are you in such a hurry?" Mama asked. "Warsaw is not going to run away." I sat patiently through breakfast and then as soon as I was able, I went out. It was a beautiful day and the fragrance of summer was in the air. I was wearing a light dress and melted into the crowd, relaxed and happy. Stopping to look at a window display, I noticed a young girl smiling at me, then realized with a start that I was looking at a reflection of myself.

I must have walked for miles, savouring the people, the shops and the buildings. When I started out, it was from a church which I planned to use as my landmark. Later, I saw a similar church and mistaking it for mine, proceeded to get myself completely lost. How foolish to think that I could find my way around Warsaw by looking out for one church when there were so many of them!

Eventually I hailed a rickshaw. Riding in a rickshaw was such a novelty. I chattered incessantly to the driver, but was careful not to mention anything personal. I felt like a bird that had escaped from a cage to freedom; suddenly a glorious world was available to me. I found myself in a beautiful park-like boulevard lined with majestic oaks. I asked the driver to stop and climbed down and paid him. This was Aleje Szucha, a lovely part of Warsaw, and I wanted to explore it. Mrs. Radomska later told me that, before the war, the Polish aristocracy had their apartments there. Now the Germans had evicted the Poles from their homes and established their Gestapo headquarters there. I returned home by another rickshaw and my mother observed, "How radiant you look, Halinka."

We began to search for places to live. Mrs Radomska advised us to separate from my father in order to minimize the danger of being caught by the Germans. She said there were secret agents mingling with people, specifically searching for Jews in disguise. If a man were suspected of being a Jew, the fact that he was circumcised would immediately give him away. No Polish Gentiles were ever circumcised. My father didn't want to endanger our chances of survival and he decided that we had to live apart from him. Each of my parents was issued with kenkarte, documents one always had to carry wherever one went, but since they did not refer to marital status, we would be safe if my father was apprehended.

HALINA ZYLBERMAN

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Halina Zylberman. Swimming under Water. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2001, pp. 64–73. Used by permission.

Although Halina Zylberman and her family were living in hiding in Poland, life—and threats—continued. In the account that follows, Halina describes some of the daily trials confronting her family and those with whom they inter-related. In particular here, she alerts readers to how easy it was for the Nazis to shatter an otherwise secure environment with just one visit. By the time the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of April 1943 arrived, Halina's world had been turned completely upside down. She now became more than aware of the precariousness of her situation, even though still "passing" on the "Aryan" side of the ghetto wall.

Another young couple came to rent a room. Still remembering vividly how Marysia and her mother had arrived with their large empty suitcases, I couldn't help noticing that this young couple entered the villa carrying two suitcases with apparent ease. The young man appeared to be in his late twenties while his companion was a little younger. He looked a typical Pole, with his blonde hair, round face and blue eyes, but his wife's complexion was dark and her black hair was cut very short. Her hand must have been broken, as it was in a plaster cast. As we became better acquainted we often sat on the verandah while Zula sang for us. She had a very sweet voice and knew quite a few Polish songs. Occasionally we joined in humming. Zdzich talked to us of his pre-war life, which was very interesting. He had obviously come from a very wealthy background and had travelled a great deal. He brightened up our lives with his anecdotes of his life in Paris, Rome and Vienna. I enjoyed his company and looked forward to our pleasant evenings outside among the oak trees. These quiet nights soothed our tired nerves and lifted our spirits.

Later, when we all confided in each other that we were Jewish, this couple told us that they had jumped from a cattle train. I knew nothing of how they ended up in our villa, but it must have been soon after their daring escape, because Zula had broken her arm during the leap to freedom.

It was Zdzich who taught me how to cook potatoes and which vegetables to put into a soup. I asked him how he knew so much about cooking and he replied that he was a chemist by profession, and that cooking was very much like chemistry. You just had to learn how to mix things.

I found myself becoming infatuated with Zdzich. I was fifteen and at an age where during normal times, I would be starting to “fall in love.” The fact that Zdzich was twenty-six, married, and that we were all in great peril, didn’t stop me from developing a real bout of puppy love. I knew I was being foolish and was careful not to let anyone, even my mother, suspect how I felt. Zdzich once told me, with a captivating smile, that when I lost weight and grew a little more, I would develop into an attractive woman. Though I felt terribly hurt that he saw this to be sometime in the distant future, it was still exciting to think that he, a mature man, was interested enough in me to make such breathtaking observations.

Zdzich was completely at ease with me, and I am quite sure that he never suspected the turmoil of emotion he aroused in me. And so we, for a few months, lived in relative peace, aware of the carnage around us, yet for a little while, almost untouched by it. One night when my father was with us, he answered the phone. “Please warn Mr Gestwinski to be careful tonight,” he heard a strange male voice say then the line went dead. Zdzich, when told the message, was terribly upset. He thought he knew who sent the warning and took it seriously. He was white faced and shaking but didn’t know where to go.

Around two a.m. we were woken by a terrifying pounding on the door. We were paralysed by fear knowing straight away that the Gestapo had arrived. The heavy sound of marching boots approached our door. There were two of them, and at the sight of their terrifying steel helmets with the swastika symbol—the death heads, their revolvers, their whips in hands, and those shiny, ominous boots, I thought I was going to faint.

They asked my father if his name was Geswinski and demanded to see his identification papers. With trembling hands he passed them his German Occupation Papers, his Kenkarta, which showed his name as Kucharski. “Who is Mr Gestwinski?” he was asked. “You are not hiding him here?” one of them asked. He pocketed Papa’s identification papers and they began a search of our room. They were looking in the wardrobe when we heard a piercing whistle and the sound of running coming from the garden, followed by guttural shouts and a volley of shots.

There were, it seemed, two other Gestapo men in the garden. Then from Zdzich and Zula’s room we heard scuffling and Zdzich’s voice saying, “Yes, I am a Jew, but my father fought side by side with you during the First War and was decorated for bravery. Look, I can show you his Iron Cross.” There was the sound of a heavy blow, then Zdzich’s voice pleading, “Please take me, but leave my girlfriend out of it. She’s not Jewish. She’s completely innocent.”

For a moment the world stood still, then the words, “Bloody Jew” assaulted my ears, followed by a shot. The Gestapo men came back to our room. One of them said, “Maybe these ones are Jews too. What do you think we ought to do? Should we investigate them as well?” The other answered “We have orders only to arrest Gestwinski and his wife.” Then he laughingly asked my father: “Are you a Jew?” “Certainly not!” my father replied indignantly. Our Gestapo “friend” looked at his watch and commented that he was tired and wanted to go home to get a little sleep. He returned our papers to my father apologizing for the disturbance and they left. By mere luck or God’s will we were spared again, but this night haunted me in my nightmares for years to come.

As soon as we were sure all the Germans had left we headed, hearts in our mouths, for the Getswinkis’ room, only to be met in the hall by a pale and incensed Mrs. Skсыpkowa. “Imagine that! They have been living all this time under my roof and I never suspected them of being Jewish. How could they do this to me?” she exploded in anger. “Endangering my life like that! The Germans could have accused me of voluntarily hiding Jews. I could have been sent to the concentration camp!” Mama commiserated with her, saying it had never occurred to her either that they could have been Jewish. I looked at my mother and thought how convincingly she lied.

My father asked if she knew what had happened and she explained that as far as she could gather, Zdzich and Zula must have tried to escape through the garden when they heard the Germans pounding on the villa door, but the Germans had the place surrounded. When they were taken away she had glimpsed Zdzich with blood flowing from his eye. Mrs. Skсыpkowa, still upset, entered Zdzich’s room, only to back out quickly, her face pale and sick. “How horrible!” she cried. “What sort of animals are these Germans to do a thing like that?" Anxiously I looked into the room, and felt my stomach leap in revulsion at the pool of blood on the floor beside an upturned broken chair.

A few days later, when Mrs. Skyspkowa had recovered from the shock of the incident and fully realized the implications, she decided to give her tenants notice. So once again we were faced with the problem of finding a room in overcrowded Warsaw, where the Poles were suspicious of each new face and increasingly reluctant to rent out a room.

One of my father's sayings was that our lives are like a wheel which constantly turns round and round, and that we should do everything in our power to turn the wheel upwards again. In retrospect, his attitude did much to help us perpetually struggle to stay alive. We never allowed ourselves to believe that one day we might also get caught up in the net, and killed. . . .

Our eviction notice coincided with the uprising of the last remaining Jews of the Warsaw ghetto, and the thunder of the battle became our daily companion. We learned, after the war, that the Jews put up a strong fight, using all available weapons including hand-grenades and stones, that they had constructed a network of tunnels under the streets of the ghetto, connecting various cellars so that they could travel freely from one area to another.

The Germans, never having considered the Jews as fighters, were stunned by the strong resistance they encountered, and retreated to await further orders from Germany. When those orders came through, hell erupted. In their attempt to crush the resistance, they attacked the ghetto with everything they could muster, including bombing from the air, but they couldn't quell the desperate, starving remnants of humanity. The Jews dug themselves into the cellars, living in indescribable conditions, moving constantly from one bombed-out building into another.

Then orders came from Berlin to raze the ghetto, so building after building was set on fire. I was on my way to school, waiting for a tram in front of a children's playground. I was not close to the ghetto, but a little distance away, perhaps a couple of city blocks. I was, like the rest of Warsaw, going about my business while people inside the ghetto were being burned alive.

A black pall of smoke was spreading and carrying its sickening smell all over the city. Then, before I could avert my horrified gaze, I saw people jumping out of windows like human torches. I could hear screaming. In the playground there were children on the swings. Some of them were making them go as high as possible to try to catch a glimpse of the horror over the wall. How could they? This image is seared into my brain along with the smoke, the indescribable smell of burning buildings and human flesh and the screams, but at the time I was numb with shock. I continued to school. At night the fire was still burning fiercely and crackling flames reached to the sky. I remember nothing of the next few weeks.

My next clear memory is of some time later when the ghetto was still smouldering. I myself became an unwitting voyeur. It was a Sunday morning when Marysia begged me to come rowing with her on the Vistula. She did not tell me the reason but once on the river, she positioned us to a certain spot, where she was able to see if her building in the ghetto was still standing. It was, and somehow the fact that it had not been burned to the ground gave her a deep feeling of relief and satisfaction. And in some way I understood how she felt. . . .

The Germans began to arrest a huge number of people. Frustrated in their attempts to find the headquarters of the Polish Underground Organisation they went berserk, vengefully executing innocent people in reprisal for P.U.O. activities. We lived fearfully from day to day, waiting with whatever calm we could muster for the war to end, but it was almost impossible to stay calm or walk in the streets without dread. Even at night, we slept fitfully. Whenever we heard the sound of a car approaching, or German spoken, or somebody banging on a door, we trembled with fear.

We had added reason to be fearful. It seemed that a number of Jews had managed to escape from the ghetto in its last weeks. As a result, human vultures were redoubling their efforts to apprehend anyone in any way "suspicious" for purposes of blackmail or betrayal. Sometimes, the danger came from sources one couldn't begin to imagine.

My father was warned that a Jewish acquaintance, originally from Krakow, had turned "Jew-spotter" for the Gestapo. Soon after, they met in the street and although my father's blood froze, he greeted him warmly and invited him to a nearby café for a cup of tea. The informer suggested that they exchange addresses and my father readily agreed, and gave him a different pseudonym and address. He wandered the streets for some hours till he was sure he was not being followed, till he dared to go home. Fortunately, their paths never crossed again, but we were shocked to find that someone who was so well-educated and well-liked could have fallen so low.

One day, we were sickened to hear the sound of shooting from inside the ghetto. We were told that Jews had been found in hiding and were taken back to the ghetto to be shot. I looked in the mirror one day and noticed that my eyes looked like the eyes of a stranger to me. There was so much sadness in them. It scared me because the Poles said they could always pick Jews by the sad look in their eyes. So I walked in the streets of Warsaw with my eyes downcast.

Though Ewa Kwiecinska had left our villa some time earlier and taken a flat of her own, my mother still worked in her dye factory, and they remained good friends. Mama was forced to take two days off work to look for accommodation and went vainly from place to place, but there wasn't a vacant room available in the whole of Warsaw. Mama returned to the factory totally dispirited. Ewa, seeing my mother so upset, suggested that we could rent a room in her flat. Mama was delighted. The only drawback was that Ewa's flat was situated in Zelazna Street, just outside the ruins of the ghetto. To keep a smiling face while walking next to its walls proved to be a heartbreaking and enervating experience.

I went to school every day but couldn't concentrate. I was depressed and terribly afraid. My mind no longer seemed capable of absorbing the horror of the things I was seeing, and I wished with all my heart that I was a little girl again, unable to comprehend the danger surrounding me.

I became increasingly exhausted, both mentally and physically. I lost my self-confidence and my usually placid disposition and looked pale and ill. I could not bear living in Zelazna Street and suffered an inner turmoil of emotion I could not control. Sometimes I had to keep my hands in my pockets to hide their trembling. I was afraid of everyone and everything. I went through the motions—eating, sleeping, and going to school, but I had lost interest in everything around me.

Fortunately the political news we received through Ewa's P.U.O. friends was comforting. The Russians were advancing on all fronts and hopefully they would be approaching the Polish border soon. We also heard that the Polish Underground Organisation was at last preparing for an uprising against the Germans. With something realistically to hope for, I snapped out of my depression.

THE HOLOCAUST

THE HOLOCAUST

An Encyclopedia and Document Collection

VOLUME 4: DOCUMENTS ON THE HOLOCAUST

Paul R. Bartrop and Michael Dickerman,
Editors

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC
Santa Barbara, California • Denver, Colorado

Copyright © 2017 by ABC-CLIO, LLC

Every reasonable effort has been made to trace the owners of copyright materials in this book, but in some instances this has proven impossible. The editors and publishers will be glad to receive information leading to more complete acknowledgments in subsequent printings of the book and in the meantime extend their apologies for any omissions.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except for the inclusion of brief quotations in a review, without prior permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Bartrop, Paul R. (Paul Robert), 1955- editor. | Dickerman, Michael, editor.

Title: The Holocaust : an encyclopedia and document collection / Paul R. Bartrop and Michael Dickerman, editors.

Description: Santa Barbara, California : ABC-CLIO, [2017] | Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2016059758 (print) | LCCN 2016059898 (ebook) | ISBN 9781440840838 (set : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848322 (volume 1 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848339 (volume 2 : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848346 (volume 3 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848353 (volume 4 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440840845 (ebook)

Subjects: LCSH: Holocaust, Jewish (1939-1945)—Encyclopedias.

Classification: LCC D804.25 .H655 2017 (print) | LCC D804.25 (ebook) | DDC 940.53/1803—dc23

LC record available at <https://lccn.loc.gov/2016059758>

ISBN: 978-1-4408-4083-8 (set)

978-1-4408-4832-2 (vol. 1)

978-1-4408-4833-9 (vol. 2)

978-1-4408-4834-6 (vol. 3)

978-1-4408-4835-3 (vol. 4)

EISBN: 978-1-4408-4084-5

21 20 19 18 17 1 2 3 4 5

This book is also available as an eBook.

ABC-CLIO

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC

ABC-CLIO, LLC

130 Cremona Drive, P.O. Box 1911

Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

www.abc-clio.com

This book is printed on acid-free paper ☺

Manufactured in the United States of America

Contents

Volume 1

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

Preface xix

Historical Introduction xxi

Essays 1

- What Caused the Holocaust? 1
 - Who Were the Perpetrators of the Holocaust? 3
 - Who Were the Victims of the Holocaust? 4
 - What Was the Response of Bystanders to the Holocaust? 5
 - How Did the International Community React to the Holocaust? 6
 - What Were the Consequences of the Holocaust? 8
- A–K Entries 11

Volume 2

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

L–Z Entries 383

Chronology 745

Glossary 751

Bibliography 759

Contributors List 765

About the Editors 769

Volume 3: Holocaust Testimonies

Testimonies List vii

Topical Guide to Testimonies ix

Preface xi

Introduction xiii

Holocaust Testimonies 771

Volume 4: Documents on the Holocaust

List of Documents vii

Introduction xiii

Documents 1051

I. The Othering of the Jews 1051

Antisemitism and Nazi Ideology

Anti-Jewish Legislation

Nazi Propaganda

German and Occupied Jewry

II. The Nazi Assault 1138

III. Genocide 1191

IV. Responses and Other Victims 1321

V. Post-Holocaust Developments 1353

Index 1397

List of Documents

I. The Othering of the Jews

1. Excerpts from Martin Luther, On the Jews and Their Lies, 1543
2. Excerpts from “Cum nimis absurdum,” a Papal Bull by Pope Paul IV, July 14, 1555
3. The Twenty-Five Point Program of the National Socialist German Workers’ Party, February 24, 1920
4. Excerpts from German Publications, Various Aspects of NSDAP Ideology, Various Dates
5. Excerpts from The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, 1903
6. Excerpts from Mein Kampf, by Adolf Hitler, 1923
7. Excerpts from the Speech by Heinrich Himmler on the Responsibility to Beget Children, October 28, 1939, and January 30, 1940
8. “My Political Testament,” by Adolf Hitler, April 29, 1945
9. Decree of the Reich President for the Protection of the People and the State (Reichstag Fire Decree), February 28, 1933
10. The Enabling Act: Law to Remove the Distress of People and State, March 24, 1933
11. Boycott Declaration, March 28, 1933
12. Excerpts from Joseph Goebbels’s Diary, April 1 and 2, 1933
13. Excerpts from the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, April 7, 1933
14. “Wear It with Pride, the Yellow Badge!,” April 4, 1933
15. Law Regarding Admission to the Bar, April 7, 1933
16. First Decree for Implementation of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, April 11, 1933
17. Excerpts from the Law against Overcrowding of German Schools and Higher Institutions, April 25, 1933
18. Editorial Law, October 4, 1933
19. Law Excluding Jews from Military Service, May 21, 1935
20. Reich Citizenship Law of September 15, 1935
21. Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor, September 15, 1935
22. First Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law of November 14, 1935
23. Compilation of Excerpts from Nazi Antisemitic Articles in Der SA-Mann, 1935–1938
24. Extracts from Pamphlet on “The Jewish Question and School Instruction,” 1937
25. Protective Custody for Jewish Race Defilers, June 12, 1937
26. New Legal Status of the Jewish Communities, April 5, 1938
27. Decree for the Reporting of Jewish Owned Property, April 26, 1938
28. American Jews Living in Germany and Reporting of Jewish Property, May 9, 1938
29. Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law, June 14, 1938
30. Decree Excluding Jewish Doctors from Practice, July 25, 1938
31. Regarding the Exclusion of Jewish Doctors from Practice, August 13, 1938

viii List of Documents

32. Second Decree for the Implementation of the Law Regarding Changes of Family Names, August 17, 1938
 33. Elimination of the Jews from the Bar, September 27, 1938
 34. Police Regulation of the Appearance of Jews in Public, November 28, 1938
 35. Regulation for the Elimination of Jews from the Economic Life of Germany, November 12, 1938
 36. Jews Banned from Universities, November 15, 1938
 37. Order Concerning Utilization of Jewish Property, December 3, 1938
 38. Decisions by Hitler on the Jewish Question, re: Housing, Property, and Segregation, December 28, 1938
 39. Excerpts from the Law Concerning Jewish Tenants, April 30, 1939
 40. Excerpts from the Tenth Decree Relating to the Reich Citizenship Law Establishing the Reichsvereinigung, July 4, 1939
 41. Decree on Identification of Jewish Men and Women in the General Government, November 23, 1939
 42. Letter Explaining Amendment to Nuremberg Laws on Punishment of Women Guilty of "Racial Disgrace," February 28, 1940
 43. Police Decree Concerning the "Marking" of the Jews, September 1, 1941
 44. Eleventh Decree of the Reich Citizenship Law, November 25, 1941, and Ordinance Extending Same to Territories Occupied or Administered by Germany, December 3, 1941
 45. Regulation on the Definition of the Term "Jew" in the Generalgouvernement, July 24, 1940
 46. Administration of Penal Justice against Poles and Jews in the Incorporated Eastern Territories, December 4, 1941
 47. Mischlinge: Comments Regarding Treatment of Jews of Mixed Blood and Their Descendants, March 12, 1942
 48. Thirteenth Regulation under the Reich Citizen Law, July 1, 1943
 49. Speech by Joseph Goebbels on Propaganda, September 1934
 50. Article in Der Stuermer on the Hebrew Bible, January 1935
 51. Report on Anti-Jewish Propaganda, August 6, 1935
 52. Article in Der Stuermer on Ritual Murder, April 1937
 53. Article in Der Stuermer: "Two Little Talmud Jews," December 1938
 54. Extracts from "The Poisonous Mushroom," a Children's Story, 1938
 55. Extracts from the Introduction to the SS Pamphlet, "The Subhuman," n.d.
 56. Newspaper Article by the SS, "Jews, What Next?," November 24, 1938
 57. Report on the "Situation in War-Time Germany," March 6, 1940
 58. Memorandum Regarding Food Supply and Shopping Time for Jews, September 18, 1942
- ## II. The Nazi Assault
59. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 1, October 28, 1938, 5:00 p.m.
 60. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 2, October 28, 1938, 8:00 p.m.
 61. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 3, October 29, 1938, Noon
 62. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 4, October 29, 1938, 3:00 p.m.
 63. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 5, October 29, 1938, 7:00 p.m.
 64. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 6, October 30, 1938, 9:00 a.m.
 65. Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 7, October 31, 1938, 5:00 p.m.
 66. Memorandum from the U.S. Embassy in Poland to the U.S. Secretary of State Regarding Plight of, and Negotiations over, Polish Jews Expelled from Germany, January 5, 1939
 67. Establishment of the Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration, January 24, 1939
 68. Circular on "The Jewish Question as a Factor in German Foreign Policy in the Year 1938," January 25, 1939
 69. Conference Minutes on Deportation of Poles, Jews, and Gypsies, January 30, 1940
 70. Memorandum to Himmler Regarding Conditions of Deportation Marches, March 28, 1940
 71. The Madagascar Plan, in "The Jewish Question in the Peace Treaty," July 3, 1940
 72. Report from Alfred Rosenberg to Hitler on Confiscated Jewish Art Collections, March 10, 1941
 73. Teletype Exchange Regarding Treatment of Foreign National Jews, October 30, 1941
 74. Regarding Ribbentrop's Instructions on Speeding Up Evacuation of Jews from Europe, September 24, 1942
 75. Regarding Deportation of Jews from Hungary, June 17, 1944
 76. Regulation Banning Jewish Emigration from the Generalgouvernement, November 23, 1940
 77. Kristallnacht: Telegram on German Press Coverage of vom Rath Shooting, November 8, 1938, 4:00 p.m.

78. Kristallnacht: Telegram on Additional Observation about German Press Coverage of vom Rath Shooting, November 9, 1938, 12:30 p.m.
 79. Order Banning Jewish Emigration from the Reich, October 23, 1941
 80. Kristallnacht: Heydrich's Instructions, November 10, 1938
 81. Kristallnacht: Telegram to United States Secretary of State Announcing Outbreak of Destruction, November 10, 1938
 82. Kristallnacht: Telegram to United States Secretary of State Regarding Anti-Jewish Demonstrations in Bremen, November 10, 1938
 83. Kristallnacht: SA Report on Destruction, November 11, 1938
 84. Kristallnacht: Telegram to United States Ambassador Hugh R. Wilson Regarding Antisemitic Persecution in the Stuttgart Consular District, November 12, 1938
 85. Kristallnacht: Payment of Fine by Jews of German Nationality, November 12, 1938
 86. Kristallnacht and Aryanization: Excerpts from a Conference on "the Jewish Question," Chaired by Goering, November 12, 1938
 87. Kristallnacht: Conditions in the Stuttgart Consular District, November 15, 1938
 88. Kristallnacht: Antisemitic Onslaught in Germany as Seen from Leipzig, November 21, 1938
 89. Kristallnacht: Affidavit November 26, 1945, of Benno Franz T. Martin Regarding Destruction in Nurnberg, November 8–9, 1938
 90. Aktion T-4: "Permitting the Destruction of Life Unworthy of Life," 1920
 91. Aktion T-4: Hitler's Authorization to "Euthanize" the Incurably Ill, September 1, 1939
 92. Aktion T-4: Note Describing the Method of Selection for Euthanasia, December 6, 1940
 93. Aktion T-4: Extract from the Affidavit of October 14, 1946, of Viktor Brack Describing Administration and Procedures of the Euthanasia Program
 94. Confiscation of Property: Hitler Decree, March 1, 1942
 95. Confiscation of Property: Letter from Hermann Goering to Alfred Rosenberg Regarding Confiscation of French Cultural Goods, November 21, 1940
- III. Genocide
96. Affidavit of August 28, 1945, of Raymond H. Geist Describing Nazi Activities in Germany, 1933–1939
 97. Memo from Alfred Rosenberg: Directions for the Handling of the Jewish Question, n.d.
 98. Reinhard Heydrich's Instructions on Jews in Occupied Territories, Including Ghettoization, September 21, 1939
 99. Aktion T-4: Sermon by Bishop Clemens August Graf von Galen, August 3, 1941
 100. The Black Book of Poland, Regarding Ghettos and Decree on Compulsory Labor, October 26, 1939
 101. Establishing Jewish Councils (Judenrat), November 28, 1939
 102. Kaunas Ghetto: Affidavit August 10, 1946, of Khaim Kagan, August–October 1941
 103. Telegram from Leland B. Morris to the U.S. Secretary of State Regarding the Death Penalty for Jews Leaving Ghettos, November 1, 1941
 104. Schaulen Ghetto: Affidavit of August 10, 1946, of Leib Kibart, 1941–1943
 105. Rowno Ghetto: Affidavit of November 10, 1945, of Hermann Graebe Regarding Liquidation of the Rowno Ghetto, July 1942
 106. Counteracting Rumors Regarding Treatment of the Jews, October 9, 1942
 107. Warsaw Ghetto: Jewish Food Situation, December 15, 1942
 108. Extracts from "Der Stürmer" Regarding Hitler's Promise to Free the World of Jews, January 28, 1943
 109. Warsaw Ghetto: Himmler Orders Its Destruction, February 16, 1943
 110. Indoctrination of Indigenous Security Units, March 15, 1943
 111. Ghettos of Ostland: Himmler Order for Liquidation, June 21, 1943
 112. Excerpts from a Speech by Himmler during Political Indoctrination Course for Wehrmacht Soldiers, January 15–23, 1937
 113. Excerpt from a Speech by Hitler to the Reichstag, January 30, 1939
 114. Commissar Order, June 6, 1941
 115. Goering's Order to Heydrich to Make Preparations for a General Solution of the Jewish Problem, July 31, 1941
 116. Operation Barbarossa: Order Regarding Conduct in the Eastern Territories, October 10, 1941
 117. Einsatzgruppen: Extracts from the Operational Situation Report, U.S.S.R. No. 94, September 25, 1941
 118. Report on the Execution of Jews in Borrisow, October 24, 1941
 119. Murder of Jews in Belorussia: Police Battalion Report, October 30, 1941

x List of Documents

120. German Army Report on Shootings of Jews and Gypsies in Yugoslavia, October 27–30, 1941, November 1, 1941
 121. Einsatzgruppen: Extracts from the Operational Situation Report U.S.S.R. No. 128, November 3, 1941
 122. “Night and Fog” Decree, December 7, 1941
 123. Einsatzgruppen: Excerpts from Testimony January 3, 1946 of Otto Ohlendorf Regarding the Einsatzgruppen, June 1941–June 1942
 124. Einsatzgruppen: Excerpts from Affidavit June 6, 1947, of Paul Blobel Regarding Activities on Sonderkommando 4 A, June 1941–January 1942
 125. Einsatzgruppen: Affidavit July 2, 1947, of Ernst Biberstein Regarding Einsatzkommando 6, September 1942–June 1943
 126. Einsatzgruppen: Affidavit of November 10, 1945, of Hermann Graebe Regarding Einsatzgruppen Killings, October 5, 1942
 127. Speech by Hans Frank to his Cabinet, Krakow, December 16, 1941
 128. The Wannsee Protocol, January 20, 1942
 129. Dachau: Affidavit of November 24, 1945, of Franz Blaha Regarding Medical Experiments and Mass Murders at Dachau, April 1941–April 1945
 130. Buchenwald: Affidavit October 24, 1946, of Waldemar Hoven Regarding Medical Experiments at Buchenwald, Late 1941–September 1943
 131. Use of Gas Vans in the Ukraine, May 16, 1942
 132. Proposal Regarding Sterilization of Jews, June 23, 1942
 133. Correspondence Regarding Transport of Jews to Auschwitz from France, the Netherlands, and Belgium, June 28–July 27, 1942
 134. Letter to Himmler Regarding Sterilization, August 24, 1942
 135. Deportations: Affidavit of July 24, 1946, of Dr. David Wajnapel Describing the Role of the SS in Deportations and Extermination Camps, August 1942–July 1944
 136. Minutes of Conference Concerning Further Handling of the Jews, October 27, 1942
 137. Auschwitz Monowitz: Affidavit June 3, 1947, of Norbert Wollheim Concerning Auschwitz Monowitz, March 1943–September 1944
 138. Excerpts from Himmler’s Summation, October 4, 1943
 139. Auschwitz: Affidavit of July 24, 1947, of Charles J. Coward Regarding Treatment of British Prisoners of War, Treatment of Inmates, and I.G. Farben at Auschwitz, December 1943
 140. War Refugee Board Estimate of Jews Gassed in Auschwitz and Birkenau from April 1942 to April 1944, Dated November 1944
 141. Order by Himmler for the Completion of the Final Solution, July 19, 1942
 142. Auschwitz: Letter Regarding Construction of Buildings, including Crematoria, June, 13, 1943
 143. Auschwitz: Telegram on Transporting Jews from Ghetos to Auschwitz, April 23, 1944, 1:30 a.m.
 144. Auschwitz: Affidavit of April 5, 1946, of Rudolf Hoess Regarding Extermination at Auschwitz, May 1940–December 1943
 145. The Auschwitz Protocol: The Vrba–Wetzler Report
 146. Excerpts from Report by Kurt Gerstein Regarding Extermination Camps, May 1945
 147. Affidavit of November 26, 1945, of Wilhelm Höttl Regarding Eichmann’s Estimate of the Number of Jews Killed during the Holocaust, Late 1944
 148. Affidavit of September 13, 1945, of Dr. Rezsoe (Rudolf) Kastner, Especially Regarding the Hungarian Jewish Community in 1944
 149. Affidavit of July 16, 1947, of Douglas Tilbrook Frost Concerning I.G. Farben’s Auschwitz Plant
- ### IV. Responses and Other Victims
150. Reprisal Action against Jewish Resistance in Belgrade, July 29, 1941
 151. “The Warsaw Ghetto Is No More”: Report of General Jürgen Stroop, May 16, 1943
 152. Treblinka: Revolt on August 2, 1943
 153. Alexander Pechersky on the Sobibór Revolt of October 14, 1943
 154. Jehovah’s Witnesses’ Declaration of Renunciation of Religious Beliefs, 1936
 155. “Reflections on the Treatment of Peoples of Alien Races in the East”: A Secret Memorandum Handed to Hitler by Himmler, May 25, 1940
 156. Letter to Bormann on “Administration of Justice against Poles, Russians, Jews, and Gypsies,” October 13, 1942
 157. Criminal Procedures against Poles and Members of the Eastern Peoples, November 5, 1942
 158. Circular Letter Regarding Decrees against Jews and Gypsies No Longer Needed, March 10, 1944
 159. Evian Conference: Decisions on Jewish Refugees, July 14, 1938
 160. Letter from Rabbi Stephen Wise to President Roosevelt Regarding the Plight of the Jews of Europe, December 2, 1942

- 161. "To the 5,000,000 Jews in the Nazi Death Camps Bermuda Was a Cruel Mockery," May 4, 1943
- 162. Report to the Secretary on the Acquiescence of This Government in the Murder of the Jews, January 13, 1944
- 163. To Theater Commanders on Rescue and Relief to Jews and Other Victims, January 28, 1944

V. Post-Holocaust Developments

- 164. Excerpts from the Report on the Liberation of Dachau, Prepared by the Office of Strategic Services Section, Seventh Army, May 1945
- 165. Report by Earl G. Harrison to President Truman on Living Conditions and Needs of Displaced Persons, August 1945
- 166. Letter from President Truman to General Eisenhower in Response to the Harrison Report, August 31, 1945
- 167. London Agreement among Allies to Establish an International Military Tribunal, August 8, 1945
- 168. Charter of the International Military Tribunal, August 8, 1945
- 169. Opening Statement of the International Military Tribunal, November 20, 1945
- 170. Nuremberg Trial: Excerpts from the Opening Statement of Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson, November 21, 1945
- 171. Nuremberg Trial: Excerpt from Testimony by Franz von Papen, June 19, 1946
- 172. Nuremberg Trial: Excerpts from the Closing Statement of Justice Robert H. Jackson, July 26, 1946
- 173. Nuremberg Trial: Excerpts from Judgment, "The Persecution of the Jews," September 30–October 1, 1946
- 174. From "The Justice Case": Direct Examination of Defendant [Dr. Franz] Schlegelberger
- 175. Excerpts from the Cross-Examination of Defense Witness [Hermann] Jahrreiss, June 24/25, 1947
- 176. Nuremberg Code, August 19, 1947
- 177. Nuremberg Principles and United Nations Commentary per General Assembly Resolution 177, November 21, 1947

Introduction

The documents that constitute this volume reveal nothing less than the extremes of human nature, exposing both the savagery of the perpetrators and the suffering of the victims. By doing so, they also reveal the tissue-thin nature of Western civilization during the dark days of the Holocaust: 2,000 years of Western values and culture were rendered impotent in the face of the Holocaust, totally helpless against the combination of a demagogue, an ideology that appealed to the basest of human instincts, a fearful citizenry desperate to hear what it needed to hear, and the power of the state that harnessed these forces and transformed them into terror and death.

It is not anticipated that these documents will be read from beginning to end. Almost always they will be read as each is needed for a particular purpose, but there would be much of value if they were read from start to finish. The insight gained by doing so, by seeing the whole picture and not just a piece of it, as overwhelming as it might be for the reader, provides a look into one of the most terrifying moments in modern history.

The documents here are arranged in the order of the “continuum of evil” that was the Holocaust. There are almost limitless alternatives to the way these documents could have been organized, but as laid out here they tell a story, with a beginning born of religious and then economic, political, and finally racial antisemitism; with a middle that includes the march from legal ostracism to the actualization of industrialized mass murder; and an end of victory, grief, and, for some, justice.

As will be seen in the first section of documents (“The Othering of the Jews”), antisemitism did not begin with Adolf Hitler, but he brought to it a “basic principle of the blood”¹ that became the foundation of an entire worldview (Weltanschauung), one that could be seen in its embryonic stage in his book Mein Kampf, written a full decade before his rise to power. There he used words that would become his lingua franca of evil:

Was there any form of filth or profligacy, particularly in cultural life, without at least one Jew involved in it? . . . If you cut even cautiously into such an abscess, you found, like a maggot in a rotting body, often dazzled by the sudden light—a kike!

Elsewhere, in an echo of Martin Luther some five centuries earlier (Document 1) and as a harbinger of what would come: “no one need be surprised if among our people the personification of the devil as the symbol of all evil assumes the living shape of the Jew.”

The othering process did not stop with an ideology of extreme racial stratification. It next took the form of innumerable anti-Jewish laws that oppressed and separated members of the so-called Jewish race. One need only read the titles of a few of the thousands of pieces of anti-Jewish legislation to understand their intent. Note the absence of direct reference to Jews in the titles of the earlier laws, whereas the later laws make no effort to hide the group to which they are directed:

xiv Introduction

- Law to Remove the Distress of People and State (Document 10, March 1933)
- Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service (Document 13, April 1933)
- Law against Overcrowding of German Schools and Higher Institutions (Document 17, April 1933)
- The Reich Citizenship Law (Document 20, September 1935)
- Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor (Document 21, September 1935)
- Decree Regarding the Reporting of Jewish Property (Document 27, April 1938)
- Regulation for the Elimination of Jews from the Economic Life of Germany (Document 35, November 1938)
- Police Decree Concerning the “Marking” of the Jews (Document 43, September 1941)

Note should be made of the types of documents included in the above list: laws, decrees, and regulations. Raul Hilberg explains in his book *Sources of Holocaust Research*² that these “public lawmaking acts” (Rechtsetzungsakte) reflect a hierarchy of authority. Thus, for example:

The law, as the highest enactment, might be signed by Hitler himself and by the ministers responsible for its creation. . . . Decrees [were] usually signed by a minister. . . . Whether something was a law or a decree was mostly a reflection of the rank of the signer rather than the intrinsic importance of the subject.³

As the reader will see, there are many other forms of Rechtsetzungsakte in this volume, but even this collection does not contain every type of Nazi government pronouncement. Hilberg again:

Every order had a specific effect on its recipients, enlarging or diminishing their authority or burden. The impact would be widened as soon as they passed it on to their subordinates, until the full brunt of what had been ordered might be felt by the victims. A letter, in turn, was a way of achieving clarity and agreement about an action to be taken. A report . . . fulfilled two purposes. It confirmed to the leadership the continual functioning of the administrative machine, and provided an overview that was a tool for shaping future decisions.⁴

Elsewhere, Hilberg writes of a color coding system:

In the Administrative Code of 1926, a color scheme was specified for . . . initialing and notations [on a document]: a green pencil for a minister, red for a Staatssekretär, blue for a Ministerialdirektor. . . . Adolf Eichmann . . . recalled the following colors for officials in descending order or rank: green for Himmler, blue for Heydrich, orange for Müller, and violet for Eichmann.⁵

The reader is urged to consult Hilberg’s book when “decoding” certain elements of the Nazi documents in this volume, including aspects not addressed here, such as the security classifications of the documents, signatures, formatting, distribution lists, notations, and so forth.

The othering process was made more acceptable to the broader German population as a result of a barrage of virulent antisemitic propaganda that was generated by the Nazi regime throughout its campaign of racial superiority. Legitimized by Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels (Document 49, September 1934) and disseminated in ways including the odious articles in Julius Steicher’s Der Stürmer (Documents 52 and 53, among others), Jews were so vilified—and so effectively and constantly vilified—as the source of all that was evil in the world that with few exceptions, Germans and later the people of many occupied territories throughout Europe came to accept the portrayal of Jews as subhuman, as akin to disease-carrying rats with the same right to life.

The next step along the “continuum of destruction” (and the next section of documents—“The Nazi Assault”) was the physical violation of the Jews. Efforts to “encourage” the Jews to emigrate quickly became orders to leave, but for many Jews, leaving Germany—whether voluntarily or not—meant leaving behind what had been their homeland for generations, forfeiting virtually all of their assets, being forced to live as impoverished strangers in a country with a strange language, and worrying desperately about how they would provide for themselves and their families, assuming, of course, that they could find a country willing to take them in. Even this option was closed to Jews once the Nazis banned emigration altogether. To see the policy on emigration change over time, compare Document 67 (January 1939) and Document 73 (October 1941).

Then came the first state-organized pogrom of widespread anti-Jewish violence: Kristallnacht, in November 1938. Jews who were surprised that they were the subject of onerous legal restrictions and humiliations now were stunned to see their homes, businesses, and synagogues destroyed, often by raging fires that were allowed to burn unless they threatened the homes, businesses, or churches of non-Jews. SS leader Reinhard Heydrich's instructions (Document 80, November 1938) regarding the "spontaneous" demonstration of outrage by the German and Austrian citizenry over the murder of Ernst vom Rath includes the delineation between what should be destroyed and what should be protected. That the Jews were required to pay a fine for all of the damage done to themselves (Document 85, November 1938) adds insult to extensive injury and destruction.

In the latter years of the 1930s, the actual killing of innocent "others" began not with the Jews but instead with the non-Jews of Germany and Austria who were mentally or physically impaired. Building on an academic paper written in 1920 with the ominous title "Permitting the Destruction of Life Unworthy of Life" (Document 90), Hitler's authorization (Document 91, backdated to September 1939) to murder those who, pursuant to a perverse cost-benefit analysis had no right to live, resulted in the murder of more than 70,000 innocents. By the use of relatively crude methods of gassing their victims, the ironically named "Euthanasia Program" became a practice ground for the more sophisticated methods of mass gassing that would be found in the extermination camps.

As for the Jews, even the violence of Kristallnacht would not satisfy the Nazis. The third section of documents ("Genocide") traces the development of genocide as it moved from ghettoization to mass shootings and finally to the industrialization of extermination. The purpose of the walled-in societies of the ghettos was twofold: to kill Jews by the cumulative effect of overcrowding, starvation, disease, exposure to the elements, and the all too common occurrence of arbitrary beatings and executions and to control and make easily available large numbers of Jews when the decision was made to proceed along the continuum of death to what came next. Almost all of the documents from 100 through 111 focus on various aspects of life in the ghettos, such as the constant threat of starvation; governance by the Judenräte, Jewish Councils required by the Nazis to be established in each ghetto; deportations; and ultimately liquidation of the ghettos themselves.

Then the story begins its terrible climax, as the ghastly mass murders by the Einsatzgruppen (Documents 117 and 119 through 126), whose reports of their deadly actions turn mass murder into nothing more than a production report to a supervisor, was only a part of the Nazis' remorseless and even enthusiastic determination to exterminate every Jew on the face of the earth. Although the killing methods of the Einsatzgruppen were not as efficient as what was to come, they nonetheless resulted in the murder of more than 1 million Jews.

The step to efficiency came with the camps, but they were not all of the same type. Ranging from camps for political prisoners to slave labor camps to extermination camps, the Nazi vision of a world that is Judenfrei (free of Jews) drove an effort to exterminate an entire people in the fastest and most cost-effective way possible. The documents associated with this effort (Documents 129 through 149) are so damning, so inconceivable in the most literal sense, that it has been written about this entire undertaking that

There is something in the nature of thought—its patient deliberateness and care for logical order—that is alien to the enormity of the death camps. There is something no less in the reality of the death camps that denies the attentions of thought. Thinking and the death camps are incommensurable. . . . It is to think the unthinkable.⁶

The fourth section of documents ("Responses and Other Victims," Documents 150 through 163) reminds the reader that the victim groups—although the subject of the most horrible deprivation and despite being the target of the entire apparatus of the state—actually attempted and sometimes found a way to push back against the Nazi machine even though the ultimate outcome was known from the outset.

This section also makes clear that although the Jews alone were viewed as an existential threat to all of humankind, there were non-Jewish groups—the Romas and Sintis, homosexuals, Soviet prisoners of war, Jehovah's Witnesses, the Poles, and so forth—whose very existence, although they did not create a cosmic crisis as the Jews did, nonetheless was considered incompatible with the Nazi Weltanschauung, and they paid a heavy price indeed.

In this same section we see a disturbing reaction by the international community, one that was so inadequate to the task as to be almost nonexistent. Whether it was the refusal to offer refuge to the desperate victims (Documents 159 and 161) or the damning evidence of the U.S. State Department's intentional efforts to delay or deny immigration into the country (Document 162), the victims were too much left on their own as the Nazi death machine ground on.

The fifth and final section of documents ("Post-Holocaust Developments") brings us to what happened after the "continuum of evil" had run its awful course. Liberation forced the world to confront what it had ignored, minimized, or could not believe could happen. There were scenes described in the reports by the liberators that no one who saw them could ever forget (Document 164). Also very disturbing were the conditions under which the victims were forced to live after their liberation with many of them still remaining behind barbed wire, and with inadequate efforts made on their behalf to connect them to family survivors, if any (Documents 165 and 166).

As the war came to its end, a commitment was made to bring the perpetrators to justice through the establishment of an International Military Tribunal (Documents 167 and 168), an effort that played out in a series of trials, most of which were held at Nuremberg, Germany. By reading trial records, including testimony on behalf of the prosecution and the defense as well as judgments of the court (Documents 170 to 175), a picture emerges of an effort to bring at least a modicum of justice to an event and individual actions so horrific as to leave even the severest of penalties wanting; ultimately, no punishment was commensurate with the crimes. However, coming out of these trials were the Nuremberg Code (Document 176) and the Nuremberg Principles (Document 177) that continue to this day to set internationally accepted standards of behavior.

On Sources and Citations

The majority of documents in this volume come from the voluminous record of the trials conducted in Nuremberg shortly after the end of World War II. The use of the Nuremberg record as the source for these documents was intentional, and this for several reasons.

First, the very fact that a document was included in the prosecution's efforts to bring the perpetrators of the Final Solution to justice confers a significance on it and vests in it a level of gravitas that demands its inspection and analysis. These documents are of great importance to our understanding of what happened, why it happened, and who—whether an individual or organization—was involved and responsible.

Second, Nuremberg trial documents are in the public domain,⁷ meaning there are no copyright restrictions on the text of those documents. The documents as formatted and presented in this volume are, of course, subject to copyright protection of the publisher, but the text itself of each document—unless otherwise noted—is available for use without restriction. Thus, by following the citations to the source of the documents, readers will find texts that can be used by students, teachers, and researchers in their efforts to come to grips with this moment in history.

In order to make full use of the Nuremberg trial documents, some explanation is in order. Trials that were held in Nuremberg after World War II can be divided into two subsections:

The first—the one that most people think of when they hear references to the Nuremberg trials—is the trial that indicted 24 major Nazi war criminals for crimes against peace (aggressive war), war crimes, crimes against humanity, and conspiracy to commit any of these crimes. This trial was held by the four major Allied powers: the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and Russia. Because of the international composition of the plaintiffs, the court that was created to hold these trials was the International Military Tribunal.

The second is a series of 12 trials held by the United States, sometimes referred to as “Subsequent Nuremberg Proceedings.” Since these trials were not held by an international body, they are officially called the Nuremberg Military Tribunals and were conducted “under the direct authority of the Allied Control Council, Law No. 10.”⁸ Although some of these trials are known by their official names—such as United States v. Oswald Pohl et al., Case No. 4—many of them are better known by their unofficial names, such as “The Medical Case,” “The Justice Case,” “The Einsatzgruppen Case,” and “The RuSHA Case.”⁹

There are three sets of volumes relating to the trials held in Nuremberg:

1. The “Blue Series” is a set of 42 volumes that forms the official proceedings of the trial of the major Nazi war criminals. It is referred to in the citations for the documents in this volume as “Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series.” This is followed by the volume and page numbers of the document and the document number.
2. The “Red Series” is a set of 11 volumes that forms the “Collection of Documentary Evidence and Guide Materials Prepared by the American and British Prosecuting Staffs for Presentation before the International Military Tribunal at Nurnberg, Germany.” It is referred to in the citations for the documents in this volume as “Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series.” This is followed by the volume and page numbers of the document and the document number.

3. There is one set of volumes related to the 12 Subsequent Nuremberg Proceedings. The “Green Series” is a set of 15 volumes that forms the official condensed record of those trials. It is referred to in the citations for the documents in this volume as “Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series.” This is followed by the volume and page numbers of the document and the document number.

The easiest way to access the Blue, Red, and Green Series is to enter the following URL into your browser: https://www.loc.gov/rr/frd/Military_Law/Nuremberg_trials.html. This will take you to the Library of Congress Military Legal Resources. Here you will find links that take you directly to each of the series of volumes described above.

Document numbers have been assigned to each document by the Nuremberg trial prosecutors,¹⁰ with each number preceded by a prefix. The prefixes of the documents cited in this volume are:¹¹

1. NG (Nuremberg, Government). Documents pertaining to the activities of Reich ministries.
2. NO (Nuremberg, Organizations). Documents pertaining to the activities of Nazi organizations, particularly the SS and Security Police.
3. PS (Paris Storey). Documents selected under the direction of Colonel Robert G. Storey, Chief of the Documentation Division of the Office of United States Chief of Counsel for the prosecution of Axis Criminality.
4. L (London). Documents on German war policies and concentration camps obtained or processed in London.
5. UK Documents supplied by the United Kingdom.
6. NI (Nuremberg, Industrialists). Documents pertaining to German industrial and financial companies.
7. NOKW (Nuremberg, Oberkommando der Wehrmacht). Documents pertaining to the German Armed Forces.
8. D. Documents collected by the British on German industry and forced labor camps.

When making use of the documents in this volume, please keep the following in mind:

1. Some of the documents in the Nuremberg trials’ evidence volumes are produced in those volumes in whole, that is, without any language deleted from the original. Other documents are “extracts” (as they are called in those volumes), meaning that the documents that appear in the evidence volumes do not contain all of the language in the original. Sometimes they are titled as “Extracts,” but other times they are not. To complicate the matter further, there are instances when language that appears in the documents in the evidence volumes has been deleted by the editor of this volume, and therefore what you read here is not the entirety of what you would read in the evidence volumes. Accordingly, the reader is urged to be mindful of the presence or absence of ellipses in the documents in this volume: if none exist this means that the document was produced in whole in the evidence volumes and this volume. If there are ellipses and/or the word “extracts” or “excerpts” appears in the title of the document, the reader should use the reference to the source that can be found at the end of the document to locate the document in the evidence volumes.

2. With one exception, footnotes are not reproduced in the documents in this volume. This is because most of the footnotes in these Nuremberg trial documents refer to other documents or sources not otherwise mentioned or included in this volume. The reader is urged to examine the original documents, using the citations in this volume, to determine if footnotes are in the original. The only exception is Document 145 (“The Auschwitz Protocol: The Vrba–Wetzler Report”), where the footnotes are explanatory without reference to outside documents.
3. All underlining and italics are in the original documents; none were added.
4. Misspellings and grammatical errors in the original documents are reproduced here without editing. Inconsistencies in spelling from document to document are not corrected, so the reader may see “Nuremberg” as well as “Nurnberg.” Similarly, diacritic marks are or are not used based on the original (e.g., “Führer” and “Fuehrer.”)
5. Unless indicated by “editor’s note,” all text in parentheses and brackets is in the original documents.

Some of the decisions as to which primary documents are to be included in a collection such as this are obvious—for example, no volume of documents can be complete without the Reich Citizenship Law of 1935—but the inclusion or exclusion of other documents reflect, for better or worse, judgments by the editor. For example, this volume includes not only the Wannsee Protocol, as expected, but also excerpts from a lengthy report by the Office of Strategic Services, Seventh Army, on the liberation of Dachau, a document not often included in these compilations but one that provides important observations for the reader. Similarly, Reinhard Heydrich's orders initiating Kristallnacht are included, of course, but in addition telegrams sent by personnel in the United States Embassy, in Berlin, at the time the Kristallnacht terror was happening are also included, providing a perspective on that critical event not often seen.

Arguments can be made that some documents in this volume should have been excluded, while others not in this volume should have been included. Such is the problem an editor faces with tens of thousands of documents and a finite amount of space: choices must be made with the recognition that no two people will agree completely on what goes in and what stays out.

The documents that follow are the basic building blocks of the Holocaust. They provided the structure and foundation of the actions that would consume two-thirds of all European Jews. They also reveal the victims' response to a world that was becoming increasingly dangerous. Together they paint a picture of human nature that is as compelling as it is frightening.

Notes

1. Edouard Calic, Secret Conversations with Hitler (New York, 1971), p. 68, quoted in "Hitler's Racial Ideology: Content and Occult Sources," by Jackson Spielvogel and David Redles, accessed at: <http://motlc.wiesenthal.com/site/pp.asp?c=gvKVLcMVIuG&b=395043#1>.
2. Raul Hilberg, Sources of Holocaust Research: An Analysis, Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2001. Hilberg explains that after decades of using documents for his research, he asked himself, "what is the nature of my sources? They are not identical to the subject matter. They have their own history and qualities, which are different from the actions they depict. . . . This book is . . . an analysis divided into five chapters that deal in succession with the types of materials, their composition, style, content, and usability." Preface, pp. 7–8.
3. Ibid., p. 24.
4. Ibid., p. 32.
5. Ibid., p. 63.
6. Arthur A. Cohen, The Tremendum: A Theological Interpretation of the Holocaust (New York: Crossroad Publishing, 1988), p. 1.
7. Also included in this volume are documents in the National Archives that were not included in the Nuremberg trial collection. The text of those documents is also considered to be in the public domain.
8. Library of Congress, Military Legal Resources, at https://www.loc.gov/rr/frd/Military_Law/NTs_war-criminals.html.
9. This is a reference to the Nazi Race and Resettlement Office, or Rasse- und Siedlungshauptamt.
10. There are exceptions to the assignment of document numbers in the three series described here. Document numbers are not assigned, for example, to excerpts from trial testimony.
11. The following information is taken from Jacob Robinson and Henry Sachs, eds., The Holocaust: The Nuremberg Evidence, Part One: Documents; Digest, Index, and Chronological Tables (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1976), p. 11.

Documents

I. The Othering of the Jews

1. Excerpts from Martin Luther, On the Jews and Their Lies, 1543

Born at Eisleben, Saxony, in Germany, Martin Luther became a professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg in 1512. There he developed his belief that faith was the sole means to salvation. The famous posting in 1517 of his Ninety-Five Theses to reform the church, and his unwillingness to renounce them, led to his excommunication from the Catholic Church and the establishment of what would become Lutheranism. Luther's attitude toward the Jews was initially one of tolerance, convinced that they would eagerly convert to Christianity. When that failed, he condemned them in no uncertain terms, urging that they be rejected by his followers, even as they had been rejected by God. The following excerpts are from Luther's book The Jews and Their Lies, published in 1543. Given the large number of Germans who, in the years leading up to and during the Holocaust, were Lutherans, his influence on what would happen some five centuries later cannot be discounted. It should be noted that on April 18, 1994, the ELCA (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) Churchwide Assembly adopted the "Declaration," which repudiates Luther's anti-Jewish writings, expresses deep regret for their historical consequences, and reclaims the desire to live in "love and respect for Jewish people."

I had made up my mind to write no more either about the Jews or against them. But since I learned that these miserable and accursed people do not cease to lure to themselves even us, that is, the Christians, I have published this little book, so that I might be found among those who opposed such poisonous activities of the Jews who warned the Christians to be on their guard against them.

* * * * *

Learn from this, dear Christian, what you are doing if you permit the blind Jews to mislead you. Then the saying will truly apply, "When a blind man leads a blind man, both will fall into the pit" [cf. Luke 6:39]. You cannot learn anything from them except how to misunderstand the divine commandments. . . .

* * * * *

Therefore be on your guard against the Jews, knowing that wherever they have their synagogues, nothing is found but a den of devils in which sheer selfglory, conceit, lies, blasphemy, and defaming of God and men are practiced most maliciously and vehemingly on them.

* * * * *

Moreover, they are nothing but thieves and robbers who daily eat no morsel and wear no thread of clothing which they have not stolen and pilfered from us by means of their accursed usury.

* * * * *

. . . for us Christians they stand as a terrifying example of God's wrath.

* * * * *

Alas, it cannot be anything but the terrible wrath of God which permits anyone to sink into such abysmal, devilish, hellish, insane baseness, envy, and arrogance.

* * * * *

. . . but then eject them forever from this country. For, as we have heard, God's anger with them is so intense that gentle mercy will only tend to make them worse and worse, while sharp mercy will reform them but little. Therefore, in any case, away with them!

* * * * *

Let the government deal with them in this respect, as I have suggested. But whether the government acts or not, let everyone at least be guided by his own conscience and form for himself a definition or image of a Jew.

* * * * *

Therefore we Christians, in turn, are obliged not to tolerate their wanton and conscious blasphemy.

* * * * *

What shall we Christians do with this rejected and condemned people, the Jews? Since they live among us, we dare not tolerate their conduct, now that we are aware of their lying and reviling and blaspheming. If we do, we become sharers in their lies, cursing and blasphemy. Thus we cannot extinguish the unquenchable fire of divine wrath, of which the prophets speak, nor can we convert the Jews. With prayer and the fear of God we must practice a sharp mercy to see whether we might save at least a few from the glowing flames. We dare not avenge ourselves. Vengeance a thousand times worse than we could wish them already has them by the throat. I shall give you my sincere advice:

First to set fire to their synagogues or schools and to bury and cover with dirt whatever will not burn, so that no man will ever again see a stone or cinder of them. This is to be done in honor of our Lord and of Christendom, so that God might see that we are Christians, and do not condone or knowingly tolerate such public lying, cursing, and blaspheming of his Son and of his Christians. For whatever we tolerated in the past unknowingly and I myself was unaware of it will be pardoned by God. But if we, now that we are informed, were to protect and shield such a house for the Jews . . . it would be the same as if we were doing all this and even worse ourselves, as we very well know.

Second, I advise that their houses also be razed and destroyed. For they pursue in them the same aims as in their synagogues. Instead they might be lodged under a roof or in a barn, like the gypsies. . . .

Third, I advise that all their prayer books and Talmudic writings, in which such idolatry, lies, cursing and blasphemy are taught, be taken from them. . . .

Fourth, I advise that their rabbis be forbidden to teach henceforth on pain of loss of life and limb. . . .

Fifth, I advise that safe conduct on the highways be abolished completely for the Jews. For they have no business in the countryside . . .

Sixth, I advise that usury be prohibited to them, and that all cash and treasure of silver and gold be taken from them and put aside for safekeeping. The reason for such a measure is that, as said above, they have no other means of earning a livelihood than usury, and by it they have stolen and robbed from us all they possess. . . .

Seventh, I commend putting a flail, an ax, a hoe, a spade, a distaff, or a spindle into the hands of young, strong Jews and Jewesses and letting them earn their bread in the sweat of their brow, as was imposed on the children of Adam (Gen 3[:19]). For it is not fitting that they should let us accursed Goyim toil in the sweat of our faces while they, the holy people, idle away their time behind the stove, feasting and farting, and on top of all, boasting blasphemously of their lordship over the Christians by means of our sweat. No, one should toss out these lazy rogues by the seat of their pants.

* * * * *

. . . it must and dare not be considered a trifling matter but a most serious one to seek counsel against this and to save our souls from the Jews, that is, from the devil and from eternal death.

* * * * *

My essay, I hope, will furnish a Christian (who in any case has no desire to become a Jew) with enough material not only to defend himself against the blind, venomous Jews, but also to become the foe of the Jews’ malice, lying, and cursing, and to understand not only that their belief is false but that they are surely possessed by all devils. May Christ, our dear Lord, convert them mercifully and preserve us steadfastly and immovably in the knowledge of him, which is eternal life. Amen.

Source: Luther’s Works, Volume 47: The Christian in Society IV (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1971), pp. 268–293. Used by permission of Fortress Press. [See also: http://download.elca.org/ELCA%20Resource%20Repository/Declaration_Of_The_ELCA_To_The_Jewish_Community.pdf?_ga=1.44553060.1796196638.1479227285]

2. Excerpts from “Cum nimis absurdum,” a Papal Bull by Pope Paul IV, July 14, 1555

Gian Pietro Carafa, who took the name of Paul IV upon his election to the papacy in May 1555, came to his calling from a family of nobility in Naples, one that groomed Carafa for the affairs of the papal court. He brought with him to his various roles in the Vatican a high expectation of personal piety and intolerance of what he considered to be heresy. His was an uneasy and unpopular papacy, beset as it was by the combination of his temper and his exalted sense of his papal role and what he considered to be his rightful exercise of power. As Pope Paul IV, he issued a papal bull in 1555 that has been characterized as being more of a reflection of his own biases than a pattern of papal intolerance. It takes its name from the Latin for its opening words, “since it is absurd.” In it he imposes restrictions that foreshadow what was to be seen in Nazi-occupied Europe: limits on where Jews may live, the requirement that they wear some type of distinctive marking, and a prohibition on owning property.

Laws and Ordinances to be observed by Jews living in the Ecclesiastical State Bishop Paul, the servant of the servants of God, for the future and memory of this matter

Since it is exceedingly absurd and improper that Jews, whose own guilt has consigned them to perpetual servitude, under the pretext that Christian piety receives them and tolerates their presence, should be so ungrateful to Christians, that instead of gratitude they return arrogance to them, and they seek to exchange the servitude they owe to Christians for dominion over them; we, to whose notice it has lately come that these same Jews, in our dear city and in some other cities, holdings, and territories of the Holy Roman Church, have erupted into insolence, so that they presume not only to dwell side by side with Christians and near their churches, with no distinction of attire intervening, but also to erect homes in the better known sections and streets of the cities, holdings and territories where they dwell, and to buy and possess fixed property, and to have nurses, housemaids, and other hired Christian servants, and to perpetrate sundry other things in ignominy and contempt of the Christian name, considering that the Roman Church tolerates these same Jews as testimony of the true Christian faith and to the end that they, led by the piety and kindness of the Apostolic See, should at length recognize their errors, and make all haste to arrive at the true light of the Catholic faith, and thereby to agree that, as long as they persist in their errors, they should recognize through experience that they have been made slaves while Christians have been made free through Jesus Christ, God and our Lord, and that it is iniquitous that the children of the free woman should serve the children of the maid-servant—

1. Desiring to make sound provisions as best we can, with the help of God, in the above manner, we sanction by this our perpetually valid constitution that, among other things, in all future times in this city, as in all other cities, holdings, and territories belonging to the Roman church, all Jews should live solely in one and the same location, or if that is not possible, in two or three or as many as are necessary, which are to be contiguous and separated completely from the dwellings of Christians. These places are to be designated by us in our city and by our magistrates in the other cities, holdings, and territories. And they should have one entry alone, and so too one exit.
2. And in the individual cities, holdings, and territories where they dwell, they should have one synagogue alone in its customary location, and they may construct no new synagogue. Nor may they possess any real property. Accordingly, they must demolish and destroy all their synagogues except for this one alone. The real property which they now possess, they must sell to Christians within a period of time designated by the local magistrates.
3. And so that they be identified everywhere as Jews, men and women are respectively required and bound to wear in full view a hat or some obvious marking, both to be blue in color, in such a way that they may not be concealed or hidden. . . .

4. [And they shall not] have nurses or serving women or any other Christians serving them, of whatever sex. Nor shall they have their children wet-nursed or reared by Christian women.
5. Nor may they themselves or anyone in their employ labor in public on Sundays or other feast days declared by the Church. . . .
7. Nor should they be so presumptuous as to entertain or dine with Christians or to develop close relations and friendships with them. . . .
9. Additionally, these Jews may carry on no business as purveyors of grain, barley, or other items necessary for human sustenance, but must be limited to dealing only in second-hand clothing. . . .
10. As for those among them who are physicians, even if they are summoned and requested, they may not come forth and attend to the care of Christians. . . .

Given at Rome at St. Mark's, in the year of the Incarnation of the Lord one thousand five hundred fifty-five, on the day before the Ides of July, in the first year of our pontificate.

Source: Steve Hochstadt, Sources of the Holocaust. (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004), pp. 16–17. Used by permission of Palgrave Macmillan.

3. The Twenty-Five Point Program of the National Socialist German Workers' Party, February 24, 1920

The Program of the National Socialist German Worker's Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsch Arbeiterpartei), also referred to as the "25 Point Program," was initially the party platform of the German Workers' Party, but when it was announced on February 24, 1920, Adolf Hitler publicly took the opportunity to proclaim the new name of the party, which he would shape henceforth as he envisaged it should be. As the party's official program, it was to remain unchanged in view of the fact that it was already "perfect" and a guiding light for all Germans, until realized. Note should be made of both the antisemitic provisions (e.g., point 4) and the other provisions that suggest a party platform that is wider than antisemitism.

Given that this program was announced shortly after the German defeat in World War I, it is easy to see how it might appeal to the German populace.

National Socialistic Yearbook

Edited by: Dr. Robert Ley

Published by: Central Publishing House of the N.S.D.A.P.

Franz Eher, successor Munich

The program is the political foundation of the NSDAP and accordingly the primary political law of the State. It has been made brief and clear intentionally.

All legal precepts must be applied in the spirit of the party program.

Since the taking over of control, the Fuehrer has succeeded in the realization of essential portions of the Party program from the fundamentals to the detail.

The Party Program of the NSDAP was proclaimed on the 24 February 1920 by Adolf Hitler at the first large Party gathering in Munich and since that day has remained unaltered. Within the national socialist philosophy is summarized in 25 points:

1. We demand the unification of all Germans in the Greater Germany on the basis of the right of self-determination of peoples.

2. We demand equality of rights for the German people in respect to the other nations; abrogation of the peace treaties of Versailles and St. Germain.

3. We demand land and territory (colonies) for the sustenance of our people, and colonization for our surplus population.

4. Only a member of the race can be a citizen. A member of the race can only be one who is of German blood, without consideration of creed. Consequently no Jew can be a member of the race.

5. Whoever has no citizenship is to be able to live in Germany only as a guest, and must be under the authority of legislation for foreigners.

6. The right to determine matters concerning administration and law belongs only to the citizen. Therefore we demand that every public office, of any sort whatsoever, whether in the Reich, the county or municipality, be filled only by citizens. We combat the corrupting parliamentary economy, office-holding only according to party inclinations without consideration of character or abilities.

7. We demand that the state be charged first with providing the opportunity for a livelihood and way of life for the citizens. If it is impossible to sustain the total population of the State, then the members of foreign nations (non-citizens) are to be expelled from the Reich.

8. Any further immigration of non-citizens is to be prevented. We demand that all non-Germans, who have immigrated to Germany since the 2 August 1914, be forced immediately to leave the Reich.

9. All citizens must have equal rights and obligations.

10. The first obligation of every citizen must be to work both spiritually and physically. The activity of individuals is not to counteract the interests of the universality, but must have its result within the framework of the whole for the benefit of all.

Consequently we demand:

11. Abolition of unearned (work and labour) incomes. Breaking of rent-slavery.

12. In consideration of the monstrous sacrifice in property and blood that each war demands of the people personal enrichment through a war must be designated as a crime against the people. Therefore we demand the total confiscation of all war profits.

13. We demand the nationalization of all (previous) associated industries (trusts).

14. We demand a division of profits of all heavy industries.

15. We demand an expansion on a large scale of old age welfare.

16. We demand the creation of a healthy middle class and its conservation, immediate communalization of the great warehouses and their being leased at low cost to small firms, the utmost consideration of all small firms in contracts with the State, county or municipality.

17. We demand a land reform suitable to our needs, provision of a law for the free expropriation of land for the purposes of public utility, abolition of taxes on land and prevention of all speculation in land.

18. We demand struggle without consideration against those whose activity is injurious to the general interest. Common national criminals, usurers, Schieber and so forth are to be punished with death, without consideration of confession or race.

19. We demand substitution of a German common law in place of the Roman Law serving a materialistic world-order.

20. The state is to be responsible for a fundamental reconstruction of our whole national education program, to enable every capable and industrious German to obtain higher education and subsequently introduction into leading positions. The plans of instruction of all educational institutions are to conform with the experiences of practical life. The comprehension of the concept of the State must be striven for by the school [Staatsbuergerkunde] as early as the beginning of understanding. We demand the education at the expense of the State of outstanding intellectually gifted children of poor parents without consideration of position or profession.

21. The State is to care for the elevating national health by protecting the mother and child, by outlawing child-labor, by the encouragement of physical fitness, by means of the legal establishment of a gymnastic and sport obligation, by the utmost support of all organizations concerned with the physical instruction of the young.

22. We demand abolition of the mercenary troops and formation of a national army.

23. We demand legal opposition to known lies and their promulgation through the press. In order to enable the provision of a German press, we demand, that: a. All writers and employees of the newspapers appearing in the German language be members of the race: b. Non-German newspapers be required to have the express permission of the State to be published. They may not be printed in the German language: c. Non-Germans are forbidden by law any financial interest in German publications, or any influence on them, and as punishment for violations the closing of such a publication as well as the immediate expulsion from the Reich of the non-German concerned. Publications which are counter to the general good are to be forbidden. We demand legal prosecution of artistic and literary forms which exert a destructive influence on our national life, and the closure of organizations opposing the above made demands.

24. We demand freedom of religion for all religious denominations within the state so long as they do not endanger its existence or oppose the moral senses of the Germanic race. The Party as such advocates the standpoint of a positive Christianity without binding itself confessionally to any one denomination. It combats the Jewish-materialistic spirit within and around us, and is convinced that a lasting recovery of our nation can only succeed from within on the framework: common utility precedes individual utility.

25. For the execution of all of this we demand the formation of a strong central power in the Reich. Unlimited authority of the central parliament over the whole Reich and its organizations in general. The forming of state and profession chambers for the execution of the laws made by the Reich within the various states of the confederation. The leaders of the Party promise, if necessary by sacrificing their own lives, to support by the execution of the points set forth above without consideration.

Adolf Hitler proclaimed the following explanation for this program on the 13 April 1928:

Explanation

Regarding the false interpretations of Point 17 of the program of the NSDAP on the part of our opponents, the following definition is necessary:

“Since the NSDAP stands on the platform of private ownership it happens that the passage” gratuitous expropriation concerns only the creation of legal opportunities to expropriate if necessary, land which has been illegally acquired or is not administered from the view-point of the national welfare. This is directed primarily against the Jewish land-speculation companies.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 208–211, Doc. 1708-PS.

4. Excerpts from German Publications, Various Aspects of NSDAP Ideology, Various Dates

This collection of 14 excerpts from speeches, primarily by Adolf Hitler, and various statements range in date from the early 1920s to 1939. They set forth some of the political and ideological positions that formed the foundation of the National Socialist German Workers' Party. Several of them address the perceived unfairness of the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles that were imposed on Germany following World War I, defiantly promising to ignore those provisions and calling for revenge on the “November criminals” who signed the treaty on behalf of Germany. Although other excerpts blame the Jews for the peace provisions and urge that Germany should rely on its own genius and has no need for the Jews, most of these pronouncements speak to the ideology of the Nazi party, including references to social Darwinism, Lebensraum (living space), German unification, the need for remilitarization, and protection against communism.

1. “It was no Peace Treaty which they have signed, but a betrayal of Peace * * * So long as this Treaty stands there can be no resurrection of the German people; no social reform of any kind is possible. The Treaty was made in order to bring 20 million Germans to their deaths and to ruin the German nation. But those who made the Treaty cannot set it aside. At its foundation our movement formulated three demands:

1. Setting aside of the Peace Treaty
2. Unification of all Germans
3. Land and soil [Grund und Boden] to feed our nation. Our Movement could formulate these demands, since it was not our Movement which caused the War; it has not made the Republic; it did not sign the Peace Treaty.”

Hitler, Speech at Munich, 13 April 1923.

Adolf Hitler's Reden, Munich 1935, p. 66.

2. “The day must come when a German government shall summon up the courage to declare to the foreign powers: “The Treaty of Versailles is founded on a monstrous lie. We fulfill nothing more. Do what you will! If you want battle, look for it! Then we shall see whether you can turn 70 million Germans into serfs and slaves!”

Hitler, Speech of 1 August 1923.

Adolf Hitler's Reden, Munich, 1935, p. 90.

3. “Is it not these criminals, this Jewry, who are the real foes of the Republic, these men who from the day of its birth burdened it with the lie that this people was guilty of the World War? And have they not undermined the Republic and thereby given to the foreign powers the spiritual arms with which these Powers for the last three years shower blows upon us and oppress us and say to us ‘You deserve it, for you yourselves have confessed your guilt!’ And have they not opposed the Republic, who have so reduced all power of resistance that today every Hottentot State is in a position to lord it over Germany? And do they not ceaselessly oppose Germany, who have brought us, once the people of honour, so low that we have a reputation for the meanest economic corruption and the most debased political outlook?” [Gesinnungslumperei]

Hitler, Speech on “Free State or Slavery,” 28 July 1922.

Adolf Hitler's Reden, Munich 1925, p. 39.

4. “We must call to account the November criminals of 1918. It cannot be that 2 million Germans should have died in vain and that afterwards one should sit down as friends at the same table with traitors. No, we do not pardon, we demand-Vengeance.”

Hitler, Speech of 18 September 1922, p. 48.

Adolf Hitler's Reden, Munich 1925, p. 48.

5. “Clear away the Jews! Our people has genius enough—we need no Hebrews. If we were to put in their place intelligences drawn from the great body of our people, then we have found anew the bridge which leads to the community of the people.”

Hitler, Speech, 27 April 1923 on “The Paradise of the Jew or the State of the German People.”

Adolf Hitler’s Reden, Munich 1925 (Pamphlet), p. 77.

6. “Amid the most terrible disintegration the old Nordic racial spirit is none the less awakened to new, higher consciousness. It realizes finally that there can be no equality in the neighbourly existence [gleichberechtigtes Nebeneinander] of mutually and necessarily exclusive supreme values, to which either neighbour might at some time consent to its own present destruction [Verderben]. It realizes that elements racially and spiritually related may be included, but that foreign elements must undoubtedly be excluded, and, when necessary, overcome. Not because they are ‘false’ or ‘bad’ in themselves, but because they are foreign generically [artfremd] and destroy the internal structure of our essence.”

Rosenberg, Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts. Eine Wertung der seelischgeistigen Gestaltenkämpfe unserer Zeit.

Munich, 1931; 4th ed., 1934, pp. 118–119.

Vansittart, Ed. Thus Spake Germany, 1931, p. 149.

7. “Therefore, the call for our own space, our own bread, is a condition for the validation of spiritual values, the forming of the German character. In this great struggle for existence, for honour, freedom and bread on the part of such creative nation as Germany, consideration cannot be given to presumptuous speakers of other people, who are as impotent as they are devoid of values. The land must be made free, so German Farmers’ Fists can plow it. Only through this, will there be a possibility for Free Breathing [aufatmen] for the German people, who are into the smallest space. Through this, too, the beginning of a new era of culture for the white man.

Rosenberg, Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts. Eine Wertung der seelischgeistigen Gestaltenkämpfe unserer Zeit.

Munich, 1931; 4th ed., 1934, p. 676.

Vansittart, ed., Thus Spake Germany, p. 282, 1931.

8. “Always before God and the world, the stronger has the right to carry through his will. History proves it: He, who has no might, has no use for might.”

Hitler, Speech of 13 April 1923.

Adolf Hitler’s Reden, Munich, 1925, p. 55.

9. “Four and a half years after the proclamation of universal conscription [Wehrfreiheit], which restored the right of every German to fight with the weapon in his hand for the vital rights of his country, the German Wehrmacht was mobilized for the preservation of the Greater German Lebensraum. The Wehrmacht was prepared for this battle . . .”

Major Schmidtke, Nationalsozialistisches Jahrbuch 1941, p. 168.

10. “The only possible conditions under which a German State can develop at all must therefore be: Unification of all Germans in Europe, education toward a national consciousness, and readiness to place the whole national strength without exception in the service of the nation * * *”

Hitler, Speech, 10 April 1923 in Munich.

Adolf Hitler’s Reden, Munich, 1925, p. 50.

11. “We were not founded for an election, but to jump in as the last help in the hour of greatest need, at a moment when in fear and despair it sees the approach of the Red Monster. Therefore, the task of our movement is today not to prepare ourselves for any coming election but to prepare for the coming collapse of the Reich, so that when the old trunk falls the young fir-tree already stands there.”

Hitler, Speech, 5 September 1923.

Adolf Hitler’s Reden, Munich, 1925, p. 108.

12. “Only those organizations can lay claim to the institution of the leadership principle and to the national socialist meaning of the state and people in the National Socialist meaning of the term, which . . . have been integrated into, supervised and formed by the Party and which, in the future, will continue to do so.

“All others which conduct an organizational life of their own are to be rejected as outsiders and will either have to adjust themselves or disappear from public life.”

Organisationsbuch der NSDAP, 1937 and 1943 editions, p. 92.

13. “In the NSDAP, the Fuehrer has created for himself an instrument which, built up, developed, and geared to action by him, sets the goal and direction for the entire German people. * * *

“The taking over of leadership by the NSDAP in 1933 brought about the seizure of all power instruments [Macht-mittel] and institutions of the state by National Socialism in order to mobilize these (instruments and institutions) for the intellectual and psychological preparation of the people for the complete removal of the oppressing treaties and of the humiliating situation of the Reich.”

Fritz Mehnert, Chief of the Main Organization Office of the NSDAP.

Nationalsozialistisches Jahrbuch, 1941, Munich, p. 175.

14. “The organization of the Party is so strong and so thoroughly developed that today it embraces [erfasst] all homes [Haushalte] of all Volksgenossen in the territory of the Reich, including the territories added in the years 1938 and 1939.”

Fritz Mehnert, Chief of the Main Organization Office of the NSDAP.

Nationalsozialistisches Jahrbuch, 1941, Munich, p. 179.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 79–82, Doc. 2405-PS.

5. Excerpts from The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, 1903

The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion purports to be notes of a meeting held by Jewish leaders setting forth their plans for world domination. Although discredited shortly after its publication, it nonetheless has been the cause of countless Jewish lives lost over the years. Reflecting all the elements of classic antisemitism, it was originally used by the Russian secret police in an effort to fan Jew-hatred, and it has remained available and has been published in countries all over the world despite the indisputable fact that its origin is based on a French farce written by Maurice Joly in 1864, “The Dialogue in Hell between Machiavelli and Montesquieu.” One of its most ardent believers was Henry Ford, who serialized it in his newspaper, Dearborn Independent, in 1920. It is so extreme and so clearly fraudulent that it might be read with amusement were it not for the antisemitism it inspired and the victims who died as a result. Reference was made to it by several Nazi leaders, including Alfred Rosenberg, Josef Goebbels, and Adolf Hitler in his book Mein Kampf.

From the First Protocol

... A government finding itself under the influence of internal upheavals, or one that is at the mercy of external enemies because of the disordered conditions in its own land, must be undoubtedly consigned to oblivion. Then it is in our power. The dominance of money, over which we alone dispose, extends a straw to the government, which it must grasp for good or ill if it wants to keep from sinking helplessly into the abyss. . . .

Statecraft and the moral law have not the slightest to do with one another. A ruler who wants to rule by the moral law understands nothing about statecraft and is never for a moment secure upon his throne. He who would rule must labor with slyness, cunning, evil, hypocrisy. High moral character—openness, honor, honesty—these are the reefs of statecraft upon which the best will founder, because the enemy makes use of different and truly more effective measures. Let these character traits be the hallmarks and principles of non-Jewish realms. We can never and under no condition labor with such wrong-headed principles.

Our right lies in strength. “Strength” is a limited expression, not a universally valid concept. The word in itself never signifies more than: “Give me what I want so that it may be clear and self-evident to all the world that I am stronger than you.”

Where does right begin? Where does it end? In a state where power is badly managed and laws and governors are rendered impersonal by free-thinking rights, I shall create a new right. [I shall] demolish all institutions according to the right of the stronger, lay hands upon the law, transform all governing bodies, and become master of them. The power of these rights shall voluntarily transfer to us—because of freethinking.

The Invulnerability of Jewish Freemasonry

Since at present all the powers have begun to totter, ours will be more invulnerable than any of the others because it will be invisible. Thus it shall remain unshakable until that time when it has become so empowered that no act of violence can repress it. . . .

Before us lies a plan, the lines of which are drawn according to the rules of war. We cannot deviate from it without endangering the labor of many centuries.

The Masses Are Blind

To achieve the goal of common efforts, we must learn to grasp the worthlessness, inconstancy, and vacillation of the masses. We must understand their incapacity to understand the questions of state life and their own welfare. We must comprehend that the great masses of the people are blind, wholly without understanding, and that they willy-nilly stagger from Right to Left, backward and forward. A blind man cannot lead the blind without leading them into the abyss. Consequently, even the “inquisitive” and creative among the masses can never perform as leaders in governing the states. Even when they supposedly possess some intelligence, they are still not fit to act as trailblazers and leaders of the masses. They will attain to no other goal than the ruin of the entire people.

Only a personality, educated to self-mastery from youth, can recognize and act upon the great tendencies and principles of statecraft. . . .

Observe the drunkards, befogged by alcohol. They believe themselves to possess the right to unlimited pleasure, which they confuse with the concept of freedom. From that idea we take leave for all time. The non-Jewish peoples are befogged with alcohol; their youths are infatuated with humanism and premature vices. To these they have been led by our agents, administrators, teachers, servants, governesses to the rich, educational institutions, etc., as well as by our women in pleasure resorts and public houses. Among these I also count the so-called “society ladies,” who willfully ape the example of vice and ostentation. . . .

Force forms the basis, but cunning and fraud work as the means to power for such governments that are not willing to lay their crowns at the feet of the representatives of a new power. These are the only means to the goal that hovers before us. Therefore, we must not shrink from bribery, fraud, treason, if they serve for the attainment of our plans. In statecraft we must be clever enough not to shrink from strange methods, if power and subjection be achieved thereby. . . .

Already in antiquity we allowed the call for “Liberty, Equality, Fraternity” to echo from the ranks of the peoples. Since that time, these words have been endlessly repeated in the most varied disturbances and upheavals. Sometimes the intentions have been honorable—to bring actual well-being and true freedom of the personality to the world; sometimes it has just been to satisfy the vanity of the masses. Not even the intelligent and clever non-Jews have recognized the inner contradictions in these words. They have not said that there can be no equality, no freedom in nature. All of nature rests upon the inequality of forces, characteristics, peculiarities. Nature is subject to eternal laws. It is clear that the masses are a blind force. And the chosen upstarts are as blind as the masses themselves. The initiated, even if he is a fool, can govern, while the uninitiated, even when he is high-minded, can understand nothing about statecraft. All these things are forgotten by the non-Jews. . . .

In all the corners of the world, and with the help of our secret societies, the words “Liberty, Equality, Fraternity” led gigantic crowds to our ranks and carried our banners to victory. Those words were the worms that gnawed at the welfare of non-Jews, everywhere undermining peace, calm, community, common values, and thereby destroying the foundation of their domination. Gentlemen, you see the consequences that have served the triumph of our cause. They gave us the possibility of playing out the highest trump: the annihilation of noble privilege, or, better said, the actual system of non-Jewish noble dominance, which has been the only means of defense of the non-Jewish peoples and states against us. . . .

From the Second Protocol

Economic Wars as the Basis for Jewish Hegemony

By all means we must seek to prevent wars from resulting in territorial gains. [If we can manage this, then the profits] will be transferred to the economic realm where we shall make clear to the nations that we hold complete power. Such situations deliver the warring parties into the hands of our associations, which are distributed over the entire globe, which have a million eyes at their disposal, and which know no territorial boundaries. Then our rights shall wipe out the rights of the nations and these shall be governed [by us] as the individual citizens are governed by their civil codes.

The Bureaucracy

We shall pick administrative officials from the citizenry on the basis of their slavlike capacities, and we shall not train them for administration. They will therefore sink to the level of pawns in our chess game and be in the hands of our schooled, gifted counselors, who have been trained from youth to exercise dominion of the entire world. As you know, these experts have created their knowledge of statecraft from our governmental plans, from the lessons of history, and from observation of the present. Non-Jews don’t understand [governmental] praxis based on the dispassionate observations of history. They are guided by a knack for science that does not use comparative results as a test. It makes no sense for us to debate with them. Let them live on hope of future joys or in remembrance of the past. Most important is that they firmly believe in what we have slowly administered to them as the behests of science. To this end, our press continually instills a blind confidence in our doctrine. The intelligent among the non-Jews will give themselves airs on account of their knowledge, and skillfully they will seek to implement this “scientific” information without examining it logically. And neither will they suspect that it was injected by our representatives in order to educate people in the tendencies advantageous to us. . . .

Tasks of the Press

There is a great power in the hands of the present governments that decisively influences the mind of the people—the press. It has the task of advertising allegedly necessary demands, of giving expression to the grievances of the people, voicing, awakening, and deflecting their discontent. The press revels in the free expression of opinion. But governments do not understand how to use this power, and so they find themselves suddenly in our hands. Through the press we come into influence yet remain in the shadows. Thanks to it we have heaped up mountains of gold in our hands without having to bother ourselves about the streams of blood and tears that created it. . . .

From the Third Protocol

. . . We appear, as it were, to be the saviors of workers because we urge them to join the ranks of our army of socialists, anarchists, and communists. These, we pretend, are in universal service to humanity in a fraternal sense, and we recommend them to the workers fundamentally on this pretext. The nobility, which espoused the rights of productive workers, was so interested in their prosperity that the workers were of necessity satisfied, healthy, and strong. We, however, want just the opposite—that is, the debasement of non-Jews. Our power rests on the permanent hunger and weakness of the worker. Only in this condition will he have to subordinate himself to our will in everything. In his own circles, he will not find the independent strength to oppose us.

Hunger will procure the rights over labor for the money power far more securely than the legal power of the king was able to do for the nobility. With want, and the envy and hatred that spring from it, we will move the masses. With their help we will cast aside all those who are obstacles in our path. As soon as it is time for the crowning of our world ruler, these same masses will sweep aside everything that could still resist us.

The Principles of Instruction in the Future Public Schools of the Freemasons

The non-Jews cannot escape our scientific counsel, but we nevertheless do not disclose the correct way to them. That is why their school system overlooks the main thing, which we will adhere to unshakably after the erection of our realm. The one true doctrine of the social basis of life must be preached in the public schools—that which demands the division of labor and the consequent distribution of men into classes and castes. Everyone must be absolutely conscious that human equality is totally out of the question because of the necessity of the division of labor. The differentiation must be legally regulated. . . .

The true doctrine of the social basis of life, which we keep secret from non-Jews, states that position and occupation must be limited to a definite circle of men; otherwise the disparity between training and profession will give rise to human suffering. Once the peoples have made this doctrine their own, they will voluntarily subject themselves to the power of the state and the order deriving from it. With the present state of science and the direction that we have given it, the people trust blindly in the printed word and in the misleading doctrines that go with it. In their limitedness they hate every class they think stands above them; they misunderstand the significance [of these social distinctions].

Universal Economic Crisis

The conflicts described thus far will be essentially heightened by the approaching economic crisis, which will paralyze the stock exchanges and industry. With the help of gold, which we control entirely, and the underhanded ways at our disposal, we shall call forth a universal economic crisis. Simultaneously, we shall throw hordes of workers out onto the streets. Seized by a sort of rapture, the simpleminded masses will shed the blood of those whom they have always envied and whose property they can then steal without resistance.

However, they will not molest our people because the moment of the attack will be known to us. We shall take timely measures to defend our people. . . .

Since we already constitute a world power, we are invulnerable. As soon as we are attacked by one state, other states defend us. Our impregnable position is strengthened by the unceasing baseness of the non-Jewish nations, which cringe before power but are merciless toward the weak. They severely punish misdemeanors but judge real crimes leniently; they will not tolerate the contradictions of a free social order but are endlessly tolerant of the violations that arise from the lust for power. They tolerate in their elected representatives misdeeds, the smallest of which would have resulted in the beheading of twenty kings! . . .

The word freedom plunges human society into the struggle against all powers, against the power of the divine and natural order of the world. When we come to sit upon the throne, we will expunge this word from the vocabulary of humanity. It is the essence of animalistic force and places the masses on the same level as the beasts of prey. These beasts are satisfied only, after they have tasted blood. Then they allow themselves to be put in chains quite easily. Deny them the drinking of blood and they do not sleep but rather slough off their skin.

•••

From the Ninth Protocol

The Application of Our Principles in the Education of the People

In the application of our principles, we must consider the peculiarities of the peoples and proceed according to plan. The uniform application of our principles to all peoples will not bring success, unless we do the necessary preparation. However, if we proceed cautiously, you will see that it takes no more than a decade to bring down the firmest character. Then we can list a new people among the ranks that have already been subjected to us. . . .

The Significance of Antisemitism

We have need of antisemitism, in order to hold our brothers in the lower strata together. I shall not go into this further since we have already spoken of this subject repeatedly.

The Rule of Force of the Jewish Lodges

As a matter of fact, there are no more obstacles for us. Our supreme rule stands outside legal limitations. Its principles are so firm that only the strong term “rule of force” can describe it. I can say with utter conviction that we are at present the legislators; our word is law and executive power is ours. We punish and pardon. We sit like the commanders of armies upon our chargers. A firm will guides us. We are heirs to a once-mighty party, which is now wholly dependent on us. We have at our disposal an unbending ambition, burning greed, pitiless revenge, and unrelenting hate.

From us goes forth the phantom of all-embracing Terror. . . .

The Subways of the Capitals

You can well imagine that the non-Jews, full of bitterness, will fall upon us with weapons in hand as soon as they discover how everything fits together. For this eventuality we have in hand a last, fearful means, before which even the bravest heart shall tremble. Soon all the capital cities of the world will be criss-crossed with tunnels and subways. In case of danger we shall, from these tunnels, blow up the whole city—government offices, courts, archives, and the non-Jews with all that they possess.

•••

From the Eleventh Protocol

Non-Jews Are Castrated Sheep

The non-Jews are a herd of castrated sheep; we Jews are the wolves. Do you know, gentlemen, what becomes of the sheep when the wolves break into the fold? . . . They will close their eyes and stay silent because we will promise them the return of all their stolen freedoms. But first [we shall tell them] all the enemies of peace must be overcome and all the parties must be overpowered. Need I tell you how long the non-Jews will have to wait for the return of their rights?

We have thought out a mendacious doctrine of the state and instilled it tirelessly among the non-Jews, without giving them time to reason about it. This has occurred because we can achieve our goal only along circuitous paths; the straight path is beyond the powers of our scattered tribes. To this end we have established the secret Jewish freemason lodges. No one knows about them or their goals, least of all the non-Jewish oxen whom we have drawn into participation in the open freemason lodges, in order to throw sand in the eyes of their tribal brothers.

God has bestowed upon us, his chosen people, the gift of being scattered throughout the world. In this apparent weakness of our tribe lies its whole strength. It has brought us to the threshold of world domination. The foundation is laid; only the building remains to be completed.

From the Twelfth Protocol

The Press under Future Jewish World Dominance

What tasks does the press fulfill now? It serves to inflame the passions of the people in the sense that we desire, or it fosters self-seeking political purposes. It is hollow, unjust, and mendacious. Most men do not know whom the press actually serves. We Jews have made it serviceable to our purposes. When we arrive at power, we shall place it in chains and punish every attack upon us without mercy. The current situation is nonsensical. On the one hand, the necessary precensorship of books, periodicals, and newspapers costs the non-Jewish state a fortune. On the other hand, out of respect for alleged “public opinion,” it allows any mudslinger to cover it with filth, without intervening. We will know better how to protect ourselves from this and simultaneously create a considerable source of income from supervision of public opinion. It will happen in this way. Printed matter of all sorts . . . will be liable for a stamp tax, which shall limit the quantities of the same. Further, we shall demand a sizable sum as security from every newspaper publisher, printing house, etc. In case of attacks upon us, all or a sizable part of it will be forfeited. Now it may happen that a few parties will nevertheless sacrifice great sums of money in order to make their views known. But we have an answer to this, as well: as soon as a newspaper attacks us for a second time, it will be suppressed. None shall encroach upon the aura of our political infallibility without being punished! As a pretext for the suppression of a newspaper or periodical, we shall always employ the general formula that it has incited public opinion without grounds or cause. I ask you to note that in other cases attacks will be made upon us by newspapers that we ourselves have established. Such attacks will, however, always limit themselves to the points that we ourselves have earmarked for our uses. . . .

[Thanks to unfair taxes and fines] what we ourselves will publish in order to educate people in the desired intellectual direction will be so cheap as to find a ready market. The taxes will calm the fanatical desire to write, and the fines will bring writers under our control. Should a few of them, in spite of this, wish to write against us, they will be unable to find a publisher. Every publisher or printer will be obligated to get permission from us before accepting a work for publication. In this way we will learn in timely fashion of any planned attacks and be able to render them innocuous. We shall be able to take the appropriate measures or at least announce them in advance. For example, we can deny permission to publish on the grounds that the work deals with abuses that the government is already taking steps to correct. In certain circumstances, we may wish for the late publication of an attack because it will then involuntarily bear witness to the vigilance of the government, which has already begun to eliminate the abuses.

Newspapers and periodicals are the two most important tools for controlling intellectual life. Therefore, our government will acquire ownership of most newspapers and periodicals. It will thus block the harmful influence of the unofficial press and work upon the mind and mood of the people in the most sustained way. For every ten newspapers or periodicals that stand aloof from us, there will be thirty that we ourselves have established. This, of course, cannot be divulged to the public. Outwardly, our newspapers and periodicals shall therefore adopt the most varied orientations and even feud with one another. Thus we shall gain the trust of the unsuspecting non-Jews, lure them to their downfall, and render them harmless.

In the first place will stand the official press, which will have the task of representing our interests in all cases and instances. Its influence will, for this reason, be relatively slight.

In the second place comes the semiofficial papers, which shall win the indifferent and apathetic for us.

In the third place we shall set our apparent enemies, who must maintain at least one paper that stands outwardly in the sharpest opposition to us. Our real enemies will consider this apparent resistance to be genuine. They will see the people who represent us as their own political friends, reveal themselves to them, and thereby to us.

Our newspapers will adopt the most varied orientations. We will support aristocratic, bourgeois, liberal, socialist, and even revolutionary papers. Like the Indian god Vishnu, they will have a hundred hands, each with the beating pulse of an intellectual tendency. As soon as one pulse beats faster, the invisible hands will direct the supporters of this tendency to our goals. Nothing is easier than to influence an excited mob that acts without reflection. Those ignorant fools who believe that their party paper represents their views [will not know that the papers] speak only our opinion or at least the opinion that suits us at the moment. They imagine they are following the guidelines of their party and do not notice that they march behind the flag that we have put in front of them. . . .

Since the real state of affairs will not become public, we will win the confidence of the people. Supported by this confidence, we will, as needed, arouse or pacify, convince or confuse public opinion so far as it concerns political questions. We will now print the truth, now lies, now facts, now corrections, all according to how we conceive of the news.

It is one of our principles always to test the ground cautiously before we set foot upon it. In consequence of these measures against the press, we shall surely defeat our enemies. In serious cases they will be unable to find a paper in which they can bring their views to full expression. We shall make the most strenuous efforts to defeat them in a final way. . . .

•••

From the Fourteenth Protocol

Religion of the Future

As soon as we have succeeded to world domination, we shall tolerate no beliefs other than our belief in the one God, who has chosen us from among the peoples so that we shall determine the destiny of the earth. Therefore shall we destroy every other religion. Should the number of the godless be thereby increased, this can only serve our purposes. We shall point to the godlessness of the non-Jews as a deterrent example, and we shall spread the entrenched and thoroughly thought-out Mosaic doctrine over the entire world. This will contribute to the subjection of all peoples to us. We Jews, however, will explain our success as a result of the secret power of our doctrines, from which, as we shall say, all the creative and educational works of humanity issue. . . .

Pornography and Future Literary Activity

We have created, in the so-called leading states, a mindless, dirty, repellent literature. We shall favor this tendency for a little while after the achievement of world domination. In this way, the nobility of our political plans and speeches will stand out in sharper contrast. . . . Our leading men, whom we have educated in advance to rule the non-Jews, will suddenly and quickly conquer public opinion for us with a profusion of well-thought-out plans, speeches, essays, pamphlets, and so on. Then will the world finally fall to us.

From the Fifteenth Protocol

Simultaneous Revolution throughout the World

Some time will pass, perhaps even a whole century, before the revolution we are preparing shall break out in all states on the same day. [It will] reveal to all the total incapacity of the existing governments. Once we have achieved full dominance, we will take care that no kind of conspiracy takes place against us. Anyone found with weapons in hand or who rejects our domination, we shall mercilessly put to death. Every attempt to establish new secret societies will likewise be punished by death. The existing secret societies, which are well known to us and which have rendered us good service, we shall dissolve completely. . . .

You cannot imagine, gentlemen, how easy it is to lead even the cleverest non-Jew by the nose, especially when you find him in the state of self-exaltation. He is of such childish disposition that should he meet with even the slightest failure—for example, the absence of applause—this is enough to move him to slavish obedience to anyone who promises him success next time. While we Jews scorn outward success and focus all our senses and endeavors on the carrying out of our plans, the non-Jews, by contrast, are ready to sacrifice all plans if only they can pocket the slightest external success. The mental gifts of the non-Jews make the task of directing them to our purposes uncommonly easy. With the outward forms of tigers, they have the souls of gentle lambs. Their heads are full of drafts.

We have puffed them up and humbugged them into believing that the individual personality must dissolve into the totality, into so-called communism. The non-Jews are apparently unable to recognize that the idea of universal equality violates the supreme law of nature. Since the creation of the world, various species of beings and men have come forward, and the personality claims a decisive role. If we succeed in blinding non-Jews to this, that just shows, with surprising clarity, that their intelligence cannot measure up to ours. This is the best security for our success.

Source: Richard S. Levy (ed.), Antisemitism in the Modern World: An Anthology of Texts. (Lexington, MA: D. C. Heath, 1991), 149–165. Used by permission of Richard S. Levy.

6. EXCERPTS FROM MEIN KAMPF, BY ADOLF HITLER, 1923

Adolf Hitler was imprisoned in Landsberg prison in 1923 following his and his very small group of followers' failed efforts to overthrow the government in Berlin and replace it with a government run by the National Socialist German Workers' Party. It was during his surprisingly short prison term (he was sentenced to nine months even though four policemen had been killed during the violence) that Hitler dictated Mein Kampf (My Struggle). Part autobiography, part racial screed against the Jews, and part an explication of his worldview (Weltanschauung) that would drive what would become the Holocaust, it has been criticized by readers as "bloated" and "plodding" and excoriated for its tortuous sentences. Nonetheless, it serves as a disturbing harbinger of what was to come and provides some insight into the early thinking of the man most responsible for the Holocaust. Published in 1925, it became required reading during the Third Reich. The last two words of the book are "Dietrich Eckart," a tribute by Hitler to the man who was the source of many of Hitler's ideas regarding race, nationalism, and antisemitism.

Today it is difficult, if not impossible to say, for me to say when the word 'Jew' first gave me ground for special thoughts. At home I do not remember having heard the word during my father's lifetime. I believe that the old gentleman would have regarded any special emphasis on this term as cultural backwardness. In the course of his life he had arrived at more or less cosmopolitan views which, despite his pronounced national sentiments, not only remained intact, but also affected me to some extent.

Likewise at school I found no occasion which could have led me to change this inherited picture. . . .

Not until my fourteenth or fifteenth year did I begin to come across the word 'Jew', with any frequency, partly in connection with political discussions. This filled me with a mild distaste, and I could not rid myself of an unpleasant feeling that always came over me whenever religious quarrels occurred in my presence.

At that time I did not think anything else of the question.

There were few Jews in Linz. In the course of the centuries their outward appearance had become Europeanized and had taken on a human look; in fact, I even took them for Germans. The absurdity of this idea did not dawn on me because I saw no distinguishing feature but the strange religion. The fact that they had, as I believed, been persecuted on this account sometimes almost turned my distaste at unfavourable remarks about them into horror. . . . Then I came to Vienna. [Gradually], I encountered the Jewish question. . . .

My views with regard to antisemitism thus succumbed to the passage of time, and this was my greatest transformation of all.

It cost me the greatest inner soul struggles and only after months of battle between my reason and my sentiments did my reason begin to emerge victorious. Two years later, my sentiment had followed my reason, and from then on became its most loyal guardian and sentinel.

At the time of this bitter struggle between spiritual education and cold reason, the visual instruction of the Vienna streets had performed invaluable services. There came a time when I no longer, as in the first days, wandered blindly through the mighty city; now with open eyes I saw not only the buildings but also the people.

Once, as I was strolling through the Inner City, I suddenly encountered an apparition in a black caftan and black hair locks. Is this a Jew? was my first thought.

For, to be sure, they had not looked like this in Linz. I observed the man furtively and cautiously, but the longer I stared at this foreign face, scrutinizing feature for feature, the more my first question assumed a new form: Is this a German?

As always in such cases, I now began to try to relieve my doubts by books. . . .

I could no longer very well doubt that the objects of my study were not Germans of a special religion, but a people in themselves; for since I had begun to concern myself with this question and to take cognizance of the Jews, Vienna appeared to me in a different light than before. Wherever I went, I began to see Jews, and the more I saw, the more sharply they became distinguished from the rest of humanity. . . .

The cleanliness of this people, moral and otherwise, I must say, is a point in itself. By their very exterior you could tell that these were no lovers of water, and, to your distress, you often knew it with your eyes closed. Later I often grew sick to my stomach from the smell of these caftan-wearers. Added to this, there was their unclean dress and generally unheroic appearance.

All this could scarcely be called very attractive; but it became positively repulsive when, in addition to their physical uncleanliness, you discovered the moral stains on this 'chosen people'.

In a short time I was made more thoughtful than ever by my slowly rising insight into the type of activity carried on by the Jews in certain fields.

Was there any form of filth or profligacy, particularly in cultural life, without at least one Jew involved in it?

If you cut even cautiously into such an abscess, you found, like a maggot in a rotting body, often dazzled by the sudden light—a kike!

What had to be reckoned heavily against the Jews in my eyes was when I became acquainted with their activity in the press, art, literature and the theatre. All the unctuous reassurances helped little or nothing. It sufficed to look at a billboard, to study the names of the men behind the horrible trash they advertised, to make you hard for a long time to come. This was pestilence, spiritual pestilence, worse than the Black Death of olden times, and the people was being infected with it! . . .

And now I began to examine my beloved "world press" from this point of view.

And the deeper I probed, the more the object of my former admiration shrivelled. The style became more and more unbearable; I could not help rejecting the content as inwardly shallow and banal; the objectivity of exposition now seemed to me more akin to lies than honest truth; and the writers were—Jews.

The relation of the Jews to prostitution and, even more, to the white-slave traffic, could be studied in Vienna as perhaps in no other city of Western Europe, with the possible exception of the southern French ports. If you walked at night through the streets and alleys of Leopoldstadt, at every step you witnessed proceedings which remained concealed from the majority of the German people until the War gave the soldiers on the eastern front occasion to see similar things, or, better expressed, forced them to see them.

When for the first time I recognized the Jew as the cold-hearted, shameless and calculating director of this revolting vice traffic in the scum of the big city, a cold shudder ran down my back.

But then a flame flared up within me. I no longer avoided discussion of the Jewish question; no, now I sought it. And when I learned to look for the Jew in all branches of cultural and artistic life and its various manifestations, I suddenly encountered him in a place where I would least have expected to find him.

When I recognized the Jew as the leader of the Social Democracy, the scales dropped from my eyes. A long soul struggle had reached its conclusion . . .

Only now did I become thoroughly acquainted with the seducer of our people. . . .

The Jewish doctrine of Marxism rejects the aristocratic principle of Nature and replaces the eternal privilege of power and strength by the mass of numbers and their dead weight. Thus it denies the value of personality in man, contests the significance of nationality and race, and thereby withdraws from humanity the premiss of its existence and its culture. As a foundation of the universe, this doctrine would bring about the end of any order intellectually conceivable to man. And as, in this greatest of all recognizable organisms, the result of an application of such a law could only be chaos, on earth it could only be destruction for the inhabitants of this planet.

If, with the help of his Marxist creed, the Jew is victorious over the other peoples of the world, his crown will be the funeral wreath of humanity and this planet will, as it did thousands of years ago, move through the ether devoid of men.

Eternal Nature inexorably avenges the infringement of her commands.

Hence today I believe that I am acting in accordance with the will of the Almighty Creator: by defending myself against the Jew, I am fighting for the work of the Lord.

To what an extent the whole existence of this people is based on a continuous lie is shown incomparably by the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, so infinitely hated by the Jews. They are based on a forgery, the Frankfurter Zeitung moans and screams once every week: the best proof that they are authentic. . . . For once this book has become the common property of a people, the Jewish menace may be considered as broken.

His unfailing instinct in such things scents the original soul in everyone, and his hostility is assured to anyone who is not spirit of his spirit. Since the Jew is not the attacked but the attacker not only anyone who attacks passes as his enemy, but also anyone who resists him. But the means with which he seeks to break such reckless but upright souls is not honest warfare, but lies and slander.

Here he stops at nothing, and in his vileness he becomes so gigantic that no one need be surprised if among our people the personification of the devil as the symbol of all evil assumes the living shape of the Jew.

The ignorance of the broad masses about the inner nature of the Jew, the lack of instinct and narrow-mindedness of our upper classes, make the people an easy victim for this campaign of lies.

While from innate cowardice the upper classes turn away from a man whom the Jew attacks with lies and slander, the broad masses from stupidity or simplicity believe everything. The state authorities either cloak themselves in silence or, what usually happens, in order to put an end to the Jewish press campaign, they persecute the unjustly attacked, which, in the eyes of such an official ass, passes as the preservation of state authority and the safeguarding of law and order. Slowly fear and the Marxist weapon of Jewry descend like a nightmare on the mind and soul of decent people.

They begin to tremble before the terrible enemy and thus have become his final victim.

The Jew's domination in the state seems so assured that now not only can he call himself a Jew again, but he ruthlessly admits his ultimate national and political designs. A section of his race openly owns itself to be a foreign people, yet even they lie. For while the Zionists try to make the rest of the world believe that the national consciousness of the Jew finds its satisfaction in the creation of a Palestinian state, the Jews again slyly dupe the dumb Goyim. It doesn't even enter their heads to build up a Jewish state in Palestine for the purpose of living there; all they want is a central organization for their international world swindle, endowed with its own sovereign rights and removed from the intervention of other states; a haven for convicted criminals and a university for budding crooks.

It is a sign of their rising confidence and sense of security that at a time when one section is still playing the German, Frenchman or Englishman, the other with open effrontery comes out as the Jewish race.

How close they see approaching victory can be seen by the hideous aspect which their relations with the members of other peoples takes on.

With Satanic joy in his face, the black-haired Jewish youth lurks in wait for the unsuspecting girl whom he defiles with his blood, thus stealing her from her people. With every means he tries to destroy the racial foundations of the people he has set out to subjugate. Just as he himself systematically ruins women and girls, he does not shrink back from pulling down the blood barriers for others, even on a large scale. It was and it is Jews who bring the negroes into the Rhineland, always with the same secret thought and clear aim of ruining the hated white race by the necessarily resulting bastardization, throwing it down from its cultural and political height, and himself rising to be its master.

For a racially pure people which is conscious of its blood can never be enslaved by the Jew. In this world he will forever be master over bastards and bastards alone.

And so he tries systematically to lower the racial level by a continuous poisoning of individuals.

And in politics he begins to replace the idea of democracy by the dictatorship of the proletariat.

In the organized mass of Marxism he has found the weapon which lets him dispense with democracy and in its stead allows him to subjugate and govern the peoples with a dictatorial and brutal fist.

He works systematically for revolutionization in a two-fold sense: economic and political.

Around peoples who offer too violent a resistance to attack from within he weaves a net of enemies, thanks to his international influence, incites them to war, and finally, if necessary, plants a flag of revolution on the very battlefields.

In economics he undermines the states until the social enterprises which have become unprofitable are taken from the state and subjected to his financial control.

In the political field he refuses the state the means for its self-preservation, destroys the foundations of all national self-maintenance and defense, destroys faith in the leadership, scoffs at its history and past, and drags everything that is truly great into the gutter.

Culturally, he contaminates art, literature, the theatre, makes a mockery of natural feeling, overthrows all concepts of beauty and sublimity, of the noble and the good, and instead drags men down into the sphere of his own base nature.

Religion is ridiculed, ethics and morality represented as outmoded, until the last props of a nation in its struggle for existence in this world have fallen.

Now begins the great revolution. In gaining political power the Jew casts off the few cloaks that he still wears. The democratic people's Jew becomes the blood-Jew and tyrant over peoples. In a few years he tries to exterminate the national intelligentsia and by robbing the peoples of their natural intellectual leadership makes them ripe for the slave's lot of permanent subjugation.

The most frightful example of this kind is offered by Russia, where he killed or starved about thirty million people with positively fanatical savagery, in part amid inhuman tortures, in order to give a gang of Jewish journalists and stock exchange bandits domination over a great people.

The end is not only the end of the freedom of the peoples oppressed by the Jew, but also the end of this parasite upon the nations. After the death of his victim, the vampire sooner or later dies too.

Source: Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf. Translated by Ralph Manheim. Copyright © 1943, renewed 1971 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. Used by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.

7. EXCERPTS FROM THE SPEECH BY HEINRICH HIMMLER ON THE RESPONSIBILITY TO BEGET CHILDREN, OCTOBER 28, 1939, AND JANUARY 30, 1940

Begun in 1935, the Lebensborn (fountain of life) project promoted the birth of German children conceived by couples with "racially pure" blood. It was not necessary for the couple to be married; all that mattered was that there should be an increase in the Aryan population. Heinrich Himmler started this program and directed SS men to grow the German population that had been decimated by the large number of deaths incurred in World War I. He considered it the responsibility of "German women and girls of good blood" to become mothers "even out of wedlock." The Nazi government offered incentives and rewards for each child born. Here Himmler outlines the responsibilities of the SS men, explains the help that will be provided to pregnant women, and, in a subsequent statement, clarifies that this program will not result in SS men approaching the wives of soldiers in the field.

SS SOLDIERS FRIEND

[Der Soldatenfreund]

Pocket Diary for the German Armed Forces

With calendar for 1943.

Edition D: Waffen-SS

Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police in the Reich Ministry of the Interior

Berlin, 28 October 1939

SS ORDER FOR THE ENTIRE SS AND POLICE

Every war causes the best blood to be shed. Many a victory of arms meant for a people at the same time a disastrous loss of living strength and blood. But unfortunately inevitable death of its best men, deplorable as that may be, is not the worst. Of much more disastrous consequences is the lack of those who were not begotten by the living during, and by the dead after the war.

The old saying that only those who have children can die in peace must again become an acknowledged truth in this war, especially for the SS. Only those who know that their kind, that all for which they and their ancestors have striven, is continued in their children, can die in peace. The possession most prized by the widow of a fallen soldier is always the child of the man whom she loved.

Though it may perhaps be considered an infraction of necessary social standards and convention in other times, German women and girls of good blood can fulfill a high obligation even out of wedlock by becoming mothers of children of soldiers going to the front, whose eventual return or death for Germany lies entirely in the hands of fate—not because of promiscuity, but because of the deepest sense of ethics. It is the sacred duty also of these men and women whose place has been determined by the state to be on the home front, to become parents of children again, especially now.

Let us never forget that the victory of the sword and of the spilled blood of our soldiers remains fruitless if it is not succeeded by the victory of the child and the colonizing of conquered soil.

In past wars, many a soldier has decided, out of a deep sense of responsibility, to beget no more children during the time of war, so as not to leave his wife and an additional child in want and distress in case of his death. You SS men need not have such worries; the following regulations eliminate them.

1. Special commissioners, personally appointed by me, shall be entrusted in the name of the Reich Leader with the guardianship of all legitimate and illegitimate children of good blood whose fathers were killed in action. We shall support these mothers and humanely assume the responsibility for the education and upbringing of these children so that no mother and widow need to have any material worries.

2. During the war the SS will care for all legitimate and illegitimate children begotten during the war and for pregnant mothers in cases of need and distress. After the war, the SS will generously grant additional material aid should these fathers who return request so. SS men and you mothers of these children, the hope of Germany show that in your belief in the Fuehrer and your willingness to do your share in the perpetuation of our blood and people, you are just as willing to continue the life of Germany as you have had the courage to fight and die for it.

The Reichsfuehrer SS
signed H. Himmler.

Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police in the Reich Ministry of the Interior

Berlin 30 January 1940

TO ALL MEMBERS OF THE SS AND THE POLICE

You are all familiar with my order of October 28, 1939, in which I reminded you of your duty to become fathers of children if possible during the war.

This proclamation, which has been made in all decency and which considers, if correctly interpreted, problems to be faced in the future, has been greatly misunderstood by some people. I therefore deem it necessary for each and every one of you to know fully what doubts and misunderstandings have come up and what has to be said about them.

1. People are always shocked by the clearly expressed fact that there exist illegitimate children and that a number of unmarried women and girls have become mothers of such children, outside of matrimony. There is nothing to be discussed about that.

2. The greatest misunderstanding, however, resulted from the following statement: “Though it may perhaps appear an infraction of necessary social standards and convention in other times, German women and girls of good blood can fulfill a high obligation even out of wedlock, by becoming mothers of children of soldiers going to the front, whose eventual return or death for Germany lies entirely in the hands of fate—not because of promiscuity, but because of the deepest sense of ethics.”

Many have misconstrued this statement and think it is an encouragement for SS men to approach wives of soldiers who are in the field. Impossible as it is for this thought to be understood, it must nevertheless be cleared up.

a. That no one approach the wife of a soldier who is in the field is as much matter of fact to us SS men as it is to every other German. This is a simple and natural law of ethics and comradeship.

b. I further assert that out of the app. 250,000 SS men before the war, 175,000 are under arms today, mostly with the Wehrmacht in the front lines, others with the SS units and regiments of Verfügungstruppen, SS Death Head Units, military police, and with the SS Death Head Units on the Eastern front. That should be more than ample proof that the majority of SS are themselves at the front and not at home.

c. It is also feared that this order would tend to destroy family and honor, and that this order would cause men to be unwilling to marry. This can be refuted clearly by the following data: The percentage of married SS men on January 1, 1939, was 39%, while a year later it was 44%. These data speak for themselves and have not been surpassed by anyone so far as we know.

d. Another point comes up in connection, with this question: What do these people who spread or repeat such opinions, think of the German women? Even should some one man out of a population of 82 millions have the baseness or the human weakness to approach a married woman, then there are still two prerequisites necessary for seduction: the one who does the seducing and the other who lets herself be seduced.

We do not only believe that it is unethical to approach the wife of a comrade but also that the German woman herself is probably the best guardian of her marriage. Any other opinion should be regarded by all men as an insult to German women.

e. The question why, according to the order of October 28 1939, the women of the SS and the policemen are accorded special care which is not being granted to other women, is also being raised.

The answer is very simple: because the comradeship and the will to sacrifice has induced SS leaders and men to make voluntary contributions which incidentally have been paid for years to the organization “Lebensborn”—thus raising the necessary means.

This should have cleared up all misunderstandings. It is up to you SS men, however, to make all German men and women understand the full implication of this so vital and sacred a question so much above any frivolity and ridicule, as must always be done in epochs where people are representatives of ideologies.

The Reich Leader of the SS
signed H. Himmler.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 466–469, Doc. 2825-PS.

8. “MY POLITICAL TESTAMENT,” BY ADOLF HITLER, APRIL 29, 1945

On April 29, 1945, one day before he and his long-term friend and newlywed wife, Eva Braun, committed suicide as Allied forces approached his bunker in Berlin, Adolf Hitler signed two documents: his private will and testament and what he called his Political Testament. In the former he appointed Martin Bormann, whom he calls his “most faithful Party comrade,” to be his executor, speaks of the decision he and Braun had made to commit suicide, and expresses their wish that their bodies should be burned immediately after their death. In the latter, he asserts that it was Jewry that wanted a world war despite his best efforts to avoid one. He expels Hermann Göring and Heinrich Himmler from the Nazi Party and appoints a new cabinet. It is notable but not surprising that in his final statement, his final words to the world, Hitler refers to “the universal poisoner of all peoples, international Jewry.”

The Secretary of the Fuehrer, Reichsleiter Martin Borman

Fuehrer Headquarters
29.4.45

Postal address Munich 33. Fuehrerbau.

Dear Admiral of the Fleet,

As, owing to the non-arrival of all divisions, our position appears hopeless, the Fuehrer last night dictated the enclosed political Testament.

Heil Hitler!

Your

[signature illegible, presumably Martin Bormann]

[Seal]

ADOLF HITLER

My Private Will and Testament

As I did not consider that I could take responsibility, during the years of struggle, of contracting a marriage, I have now decided, before the closing of my earthly career, to take as my wife that girl who, after many years of faithful friendship, entered, of her own free will, the practically besieged town in order to share her destiny with me. At her own desire she goes as my wife with me into death. It will compensate us for what we both lost through my work in the service of my people.

What I possess belongs—in so far as it has any value—to the Party. Should this no longer exist, to the State, should the State also be destroyed, no further decision of mine is necessary.

My pictures, in the collections which I have bought in the course of years, have never been collected for private purposes, but only for the extension of a gallery in my home town of Linz a.d. Donau.

It is my most sincere wish that this bequest may be duly executed. I nominate as my Executor my most faithful Party comrade, Martin Bormann.

He is given full legal authority to make all decisions. He is permitted to take out everything that has a sentimental value or is necessary for the maintenance of a modest simple life, for my brothers and sisters, also above all for the mother of my wife and my faithful coworkers who are well known to him, principally my old Secretaries Frau Winter etc. who have for many years aided me by their work.

I myself and my wife—in order to escape the disgrace of deposition or capitulation—choose death. It is our wish to be burnt immediately on the spot where I have carried out the greatest part of my daily work in the course of a twelve years’ service to my people.

Given in Berlin, 29th. April 1945, 4:00o’clock.

(Sd.) A. Hitler.

As Witnesses:

(Sd.) Martin Bormann.

(Sd.) Dr. Fuhr.

As Witness:

(Sd.) Nicolaus von Below.

[Seal]

ADOLF HITLER

My Political Testament

More than thirty years have now passed since I in 1914 made my modest contribution as a volunteer in the first world-war that was forced upon the Reich

In these three decades I have been actuated solely by love and loyalty to my people in all my thoughts, acts, and life. They gave me the strength to make the most difficult decisions which have ever confronted to mortal man. I have spent my time, my working strength, and my health in these three decades.

It is untrue that I or anyone else in Germany wanted the war in 1939. It was desired and instigated exclusively by those international statesmen who were either of Jewish descent or worked for Jewish interests. I have made too many offers for the control and limitation of armaments, which posterity will not for all time be able to disregard for the responsibility for the outbreak of this war to be laid on me. I have further never wished that after the first fatal world war a second against England, or even against America, should break out. Centuries will pass away, but out of the ruins of our towns and monuments the hatred against those finally responsible whom we have to thank for everything, International Jewry and its helpers, will grow.

Three days before the outbreak of the German-Polish war I again proposed to the British ambassador in Berlin a solution to the German-Polish problem—similar to that in the case of the Saar district, under international control. This offer also cannot be denied. It was only rejected because the leading circles in English politics wanted the war, partly on account of the business hoped for and partly under influence of propaganda organized by international Jewry.

I also made it quite plain that, if the nations of Europe are again to be regarded as mere shares to be bought and sold by these international conspirators in money and finance, then that race, Jewry, which is the real criminal of this murderous struggle, will be saddled with the responsibility. I further left no one in doubt that this time not only would millions of children of Europe's Aryan peoples die of hunger, not only would millions of grown men suffer death, and not only hundreds of thousands of women and children be burnt and bombed to death in the towns, without the real criminal having to atone for this guilt, even if by more humane means.

After six years of war, which in spite of all set-backs, will go down one day in history as the most glorious and valiant demonstration of a nation's life purpose, I cannot forsake the city which is the capital of this Reich. As the forces are too small to make any further stand against the enemy attack at this place and our resistance is gradually being weakened by men who are as deluded as they are lacking in initiative, I should like, by remaining in this town, to share my fate with those, the millions of others, who have also taken upon themselves to do so. Moreover I do not wish to fall into the hands of an enemy who requires a new spectacle organized by the Jews for the amusement of their hysterical masses.

I have decided therefore to remain in Berlin and there of my own free will to choose death at the moment when I believe the position of the Fuehrer and Chancellor itself can no longer be held.

I die with a happy heart, aware of the immeasurable deeds and achievements of our soldiers at the front, our women at home, the achievements of our farmers and workers and the work, unique in history, of our youth who bear my name.

That from the bottom of my heart I express my thanks to you all, is just as self-evident as my wish that you should, because of that, on no account give up the struggle, but rather continue it against the enemies of the Fatherland, no matter where, true to the creed of a great Clausewitz. From the sacrifice of our soldiers and from my own unity with them unto death, will in any case spring up in the history of Germany, the seed of a radiant renaissance of the National-Socialist movement and thus of the realization of a true community of nations.

Many of the most courageous men and women have decided to unite their lives with mine until the very last. I have begged and finally ordered them not to do this, but to take part in the further battle of the Nation. I beg the heads of the Armies, the Navy and the Air Force to strengthen by all possible means the spirit of resistance of our soldiers in the National-Socialist sense, with special reference to the fact that also I myself, as founder and creator of this movement, have preferred death to cowardly abdication or even capitulation.

May it, at some future time, become part of the code of honour of the German officer—as is already the case in our Navy—that the surrender of a district or of a town is impossible, and that above all the leaders here must march ahead as shining examples, faithfully fulfilling their duty unto death.

Second Part of the Political Testament

Before my death I expel the former Reichsmarschall Hermann Goering from the party and deprive him of all rights which he may enjoy by virtue of the decree of June 29th, 1941, and also by virtue of my statement in the Reichstag on September 1st, 1939, I appoint in his place Grossadmiral Doenitz, President of the Reich and supreme Commander of the Armed Forces.

Before my death I expel the former Reichsfuehrer-SS and Minister of the Interior, Heinrich Himmler, from the party and from all offices of State. In his stead I appoint Gauleiter Karl Hanke as Reichsfuehrer-SS and Chief of the German Police, and Gauleiter Paul Giesler as Reich Minister of the Interior.

Goering and Himmler, quite apart from their disloyalty to my person, have done immeasurable harm to the country and the whole nation by secret negotiations with the enemy, which they conducted without my knowledge and against my wishes, and by illegally attempting to seize power in the State for themselves.

In order to give the German people a government composed of honourable men,—a government which will fulfill its pledge to continue the war by every means—I appoint the following members of the new Cabinet as leaders of the nation:

President of the Reich: Doenitz.
Chancellor of the Reich: Dr. Goebbels.
Party Minister: Bormann.
Foreign Minister: Seyss-Inquart.
Minister of the Interior: Gauleiter Giesler.
Minister for War: Doenitz.
C-in-C of the Army: Schoerner.
C-in-C of the Navy: Doenitz.
C-in-C of the Air Force: Greim.
Reichsfuehrer-SS and Chief of the German Police: Gauleiter Hanke.
Economics: Funk.
Agriculture: Backe.
Justice: Thierack.
Education and Public Worship: Dr. Scheel.
Propaganda: Dr. Naumann.
Finance: Schwerin-Grossigk.
Labour: Dr. Hupfauer.
Munitions: Saur.

Leader of the German Labour Front and Member of the Reich Cabinet: Reich Minister Dr. Ley.

Although a number of these men, such as Martin Bormann, Dr. Goebbels etc., together with their wives, have joined me of their own free will and did not wish to leave the capital of the Reich under any circumstances, but were willing to perish with me here, I must nevertheless ask them to obey my request, and in this case set the interests of the nation above their own feelings. By their work and loyalty as comrades they will be just as close to me after death, as I hope that my spirit will linger among them and always go with them. Let them be hard, but never unjust, above all let them never allow fear to influence their actions, and set the honour of the nation above everything in the world. Finally, let them be conscious of the fact that our task, that of continuing the building of a National Socialist State, represents the work of the coming centuries, which places every single person under an obligation always to serve the common interest and to subordinate his own advantage to this end. I demand of all Germans, all National Socialists, men, women and all the men of the Armed Forces, that they be faithful and obedient unto death to the new government and its President.

Above all I charge the leaders of the nation and those under them to scrupulous observance of the laws of race and to merciless opposition to the universal poisoner of all peoples, international Jewry.

Given in Berlin, this 29th day of April 1945. 4:00 a.m.

Adolf Hitler.

Witnessed by

Dr. Josef Fuhr.

Martin Bormann.

Wilhelm Buergdorf.

Hans Krebs.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VI, pp. 260–263, Doc. 3569-PS.

9. DECREE OF THE REICH PRESIDENT FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE PEOPLE AND THE STATE (REICHSTAG FIRE DECREE), FEBRUARY 28, 1933

On February 28, 1933—one day after a fire had destroyed the Reichstag, Germany's parliament building—Germany's recently installed chancellor, Adolf Hitler, on the pretext that revolution was imminent, persuaded President Paul von Hindenburg to sign a Decree for the Protection of the People and the State, suspending all basic civil and individual liberties guaranteed under the constitution. It empowered the government to take such steps as were necessary to ensure that this threat to German society was removed. Significantly, it made no specific references to definite adversaries; while directing itself in this instance toward communism, it contained the menacing portent of later restrictions that might be applied toward other "enemies." Its terms enabled the new regime to begin to entrench itself in office, paving the way for the Nazi dictatorship and dismantling Germany's Weimar Republic.

DECREE, 28 FEBRUARY 1933,
BY REICH PRESIDENT VON HINDENBURG,
COSIGNED BY REICH
CHANCELLOR HITLER AND REICH MINISTERS
FRICK AND GUERTNER, SUSPENDING CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS AND INSTITUTING OTHER MEASURES
1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART 1, PAGE 83

1072 Decree of the Reich President for the Protection of the People and the State (Reichstag Fire Decree)

Decree of the Reich President for the Protection of People and State of 28 February 1933.

Pursuant to article 48, paragraph 2 of the German constitution, the following is decreed as a defensive measure against Communist acts of violence endangering the State:

Article 1

Articles 114, 115, 117, 118, 123, 124, and 153 of the constitution of the German Reich are suspended until further notice. Thus, restrictions on personal liberty, on the right of free expression of opinion, including freedom of the press, on the right of assembly and the right of association and interferences with the secrecy of postal, telegraphic, and telephonic communications, and warrants for house searches, orders for confiscations as well as restrictions on property, are also permissible beyond the legal limits otherwise prescribed.

Article 2

If in a state [Land] the measures necessary for the restoration of public security and order are not taken, the Reich government may temporarily take over the powers of the highest State authority.

Article 3

The authorities of the states [Laender] and local communities have to comply, within their competency, with the orders of the Reich government issued on the basis of article 2.

Article 4

Whoever disobeys the orders issued by the supreme State authorities or by the authorities subordinate to them for the implementation of this decree, or the orders issued by the Reich government in pursuance of article 2, or whoever solicits or incites others to disobey such orders, will be punished with imprisonment of not less than 1 month or a fine from 150 up to 15,000 Reichsmarks, unless other regulations make his act liable to a more severe punishment.

Whoever, by a violation of paragraph 1, induces a common danger for human life, will be punished with hard labor, or, in case of extenuating circumstances, with imprisonment of not less than 6 months, and, if the violation causes the death of a person, with death, or, in case of extenuating circumstances, with penal servitude of no less than 2 years. In addition, his property may be confiscated.

Whoever solicits or incites to commit a violation under the qualifications of paragraph 2, will be punished with hard labor or, in case of extenuating circumstances, with imprisonment of not less than 3 months.

Article 5

The crimes, which under the penal code are punishable with hard labor for life, are to be punished with death; i.e., in articles 81 (high treason), 229 (poisoning), 307 (arson), 311 (use of explosives), 312 ([intentional] flooding), 315 paragraph 2 (damaging of railroad installations), and 324 (poisoning causing public danger).

Insofar as a more severe Punishment has not been previously provided for, the following are punishable with death or with hard labor for life or with hard labor not to exceed 15 years—

1. Whoever undertakes to kill the Reich president or a member or a commissioner of the Reich government or of a state government, or solicits such a killing, or volunteers to commit it, or accepts such an offer, or conspires with another for such a killing.

2. Whoever under article 115(2) of the penal code (serious rioting) or of article 125 (2) of the penal code (serious disturbance of the peace) commits the act with arms or cooperates consciously and intentionally with an armed person.

3. Anyone who deprives a person of his liberty under article 239 of the penal code with the intention of making use of the person deprived of his liberty as a hostage in the political struggle.

Article 6

This decree comes into force on the day of its promulgation. Berlin, 28 February 1933.

The Reich President
VON HINDENBURG

The Reich Chancellor
ADOLF HITLER

The Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

The Reich Minister of Justice
DR. GUERTNER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 160–163, Doc. NG-715.

10. THE ENABLING ACT: LAW TO REMOVE THE DISTRESS OF PEOPLE AND STATE, MARCH 24, 1933

Within 24 hours after the fire that destroyed the Reichstag building on February 27, 1933, an Emergency Decree was declared by President Paul von Hindenburg that allowed for the suspension of all personal liberties otherwise guaranteed under the constitution of the German Reich (the Weimar Constitution) to protect the Reich against the communist threat that the fire represented. Less than one month later, on March 24, 1933, the Law to Remove the Distress of People and State (the Enabling Act) was passed by the Reichstag, vesting in the government the authority to decree laws without regard to the provisions of the constitution that require laws to be passed by the Reichstag. It also allowed for those laws that were passed by the government to “deviate from the constitution.” Thus, the Enabling Act codified in legislation the sole power of the government to control all legal authority at the expense of the safeguards and procedures in the constitution that were intended to prevent that very thing.

THE “ENABLING ACT”

1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART 1, PAGE 141
Law for the Solution of the Emergency of People and Reich of 24 March 1933

The Reichstag has decreed the following law, which is hereby promulgated in agreement with the Reich Council [Reichsrat], after it has been duly established that the prerequisites of legislation changing the constitution have been fulfilled.

Article 1

Laws of the Reich can be decreed, apart from the procedure provided by the constitution of the Reich, also by the government of the Reich. This also applies to the laws mentioned in articles 85, paragraphs 2, and 87 of the constitution of the Reich.

Article 2

The laws decreed by the government of the Reich may deviate from the constitution of the Reich as far as they do not concern the institution of the Reichstag and the Reich Council [Reichsrat] as such. The rights of the Reich President remain untouched.

Article 3

The laws decreed by the government of the Reich are certified by the Reich Chancellor and promulgated in the Reichsgesetzblatt. Unless they dispose otherwise, they will come into force on the day following the promulgation. Articles 68 through 77 of the constitution of the Reich do not apply to laws decreed by the government of the Reich.

Article 4

Treaties of the Reich with foreign countries concerning subjects under Reich legislation do not require the approval of the authorities taking part in the legislation. The government of the Reich issues the ordinances which are necessary to carry into effect these treaties.

Article 5

This law comes into force on the day of its promulgation. It will become invalid on 1 April 1937; it will further become invalid if the present government of the Reich will be replaced by another one.

Berlin, 24 March 1933.

The Reich President
VON HINDENBURG

The Reich Chancellor
ADOLFHITLER

The Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

The Reich Foreign Minister
BARONVON NEURATH

The Reich Finance Minister
COUNTSCHWERINVON KROSIGK

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 163–164, Doc. NG-715.

11. BOYCOTT DECLARATION, MARCH 28, 1933

The anti-Jewish intent of the Nazi Party was well known even before its ascent to power in January 1933. Fearful of what might befall the Jewish community in Germany once Hitler took power and aware of a growing number of abuses of the Jews there, Jewish organizations throughout the United States, the United Kingdom, and some European countries implemented a boycott of German goods. In response to this, the Nazi government announced a boycott of Jewish businesses in Germany, to begin at 10:00 a.m. on April 1, 1933. The Nazi government put the rabid antisemite Julius Streicher in charge of organizing the boycott and called for a concerted program of propaganda directed at convincing the public in Germany as well as in the countries that boycotted German goods that this was a defensive action intended to protect the German Volk while punishing Germany's Jews, who were seen as the source of the rumors of abuses and atrocities that set off this round of boycotts.

1074 Boycott Declaration

An Order to the Whole Party!

The following order is accordingly issued to all Party offices and Party organizations.

Point 1:

Action Committees for the Boycott against the Jews

In every local branch and organizational section of the NSDAP [National-Socialist German Workers' Party] Action Committees are to be formed immediately for the practical systematic implementation of a boycott of Jewish shops, Jewish goods, Jewish doctors and Jewish lawyers. The Action Committees are responsible for making sure that the boycott will not affect innocent persons, but will hit the guilty all the harder.

Point 2:

Maximum Protection for all Foreigners

The Action Committees are responsible for ensuring maximum protection for all foreigners, without regard to their religion, origin or race. The boycott is solely a defensive measure, directed exclusively against the German Jews.

Point 3:

Propaganda for the Boycott

The Action Committees will immediately use propaganda and information to popularize the boycott. The principle must be that no German will any longer buy from a Jew, or allow Jews or their agents to recommend goods. The boycott must be general. It must be carried out by the whole nation and must hit the Jews in their most sensitive spot.

Point 4:

Central Direction: Party Comrade Streicher

In doubtful cases the boycott of the store concerned is to be postponed until definite instructions are received from the Central Committee in Munich. The Chairman of the Central Committee is Party Member Streicher.

Point 5:

Supervision of Newspapers

The Action Committees will scrutinize newspapers most stringently with a view to observing the extent to which they take part in the information campaign against Jewish atrocity propaganda abroad. If any newspaper fails to do this or does so to a limited extent only, then they are to be excluded immediately from every house in which Germans live. No German person and no German business may place advertisements in such newspapers. They [the newspapers] must be subjected to public contempt, as written for members of the Jewish race, and not for the German people.

Point 6:

The Boycott as a Measure for the Protection of German Labor

The Action Committees, together with Party cells in industry, must carry into the enterprises explanatory propaganda on the consequence of Jewish atrocity campaigns for German production, and therefore for the German worker, and explain to the workers the need for a national boycott as a defensive measure to protect German labor.

Point 7:

Action Committees Right Down into the Smallest Village!

The Action Committees must reach out right into the smallest peasant village in order to strike particularly at Jewish traders in the countryside. On principle, it is always to be stressed that this is a matter of a defensive measure which has been forced on us.

Point 8:

The Boycott Will Start on April 1!

The boycott is not to begin piecemeal, but all at once; all preparations to this end are to be made immediately. Orders will go out to the SA and SS to post guards outside Jewish stores from the moment that the boycott comes into force, in order to warn the public against entering the premises. The start of the boycott will be made known with the aid of posters, through the press and by means of leaflets, etc. The boycott will start all at once at exactly 10:00 a.m. on Saturday, April 1. It will continue until the Party leadership orders its cancellation.

Point 9:

Mass [meetings] to Demand the Numerus Clausus!

The Action Committees will immediately organize tens of thousands of mass meetings, reaching down to the smallest village, at which the demand will be raised for the introduction of a limited quota for the employment of Jews in all professions, according to their proportion in the German population. In order to increase the impact of this step the demand should be limited to three areas for the time being:

- a) attendance at German high schools and universities;
- b) the medical profession;
- c) the legal profession.

Point 10:

The Need for Explanations Abroad

The Action Committees also have the task of ensuring that every German who has any kind of connections abroad will make use of these in letters, telegrams and telephone calls. He must spread the truth that calm and order reign in Germany, that the German people has no more ardent wish than to go about its work in peace and to live in peace with the rest of the world, and that its fight against Jewish atrocity propaganda is solely a defensive struggle.

Point 11:

Quiet, Discipline and No Violence!

The Action Committees are responsible for ensuring that this entire struggle is carried out in complete calm and with absolute discipline. In future, too, do not harm a hair on a Jew's head! We will deal with this atrocity campaign simply through the incisive weight of the measures listed. More than ever before it is now necessary for the whole Party to stand in blind obedience, as one man, behind the leadership. . . .

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Israel Gutman, and Abraham Margalioth eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, translated by Lea Ben Dor (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press/ Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 32–35. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

12. EXCERPTS FROM JOSEPH GOEBBELS'S DIARY, APRIL 1 AND 2, 1933

Two entries from the diary of Joseph Goebbels, Reich minister of propaganda, written at the time of the German boycott of Jewish businesses, includes observations about the German public's reaction to the boycott that for the most part were inaccurate. He insists that the boycott was proceeding with "tranquility" and that the German people were fully supportive of the boycott. In fact, the boycott proved to be quite disruptive and was not well received at all by the public. Stationing members of the SA (Sturmabteilung, also known as the Stormtroopers or the Brown Shirts) to intimidate shoppers who might consider ignoring the boycott was not in keeping with the German concept of law and order. Further, not a few Germans chose to shop where they always had, regardless of the boycott declaration. In this sense, it seems that the entries by Goebbels were themselves written as propaganda rather than as an objective description of the situation. The boycott was cancelled by the Nazis after one day.

FROM THE IMPERIAL HOUSE TO THE REICH
CHANCELLORY

[Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei]

By Dr. Joseph Goebbels

Published by

"Zentralverlag der NSDAP, Franz Eher Nachf."

Munich, 1934. Pages 208, 290–292.

1 April 1933.

The boycott against the world atrocity propaganda has incited Berlin and the entire Reich to the fullest extent. For my own information I drive through the Taucutzien street. All Jewish stores are closed. At their entrances SA sentries are standing. The public has declared its solidarity everywhere. An exemplary discipline prevails. An imposing spectacle! Everything takes its course in the utmost tranquillity, within the Reich too.

2 April 1933.

The effects of our boycott are already plainly to be felt. The foreign countries are slowly coming to reason. The world will learn to understand, that it does not do any good, to try to learn facts about Germany through Jewish emigrants.

We are facing campaign to conquer with intellect, which will have to be carried out in the world in exactly the same manner, as we have carried it out inside Germany herself.

In the end, the world will learn to understand us.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 83–84, Doc. 2409-PS.

13. EXCERPTS FROM THE LAW FOR THE RESTORATION OF THE PROFESSIONAL CIVIL SERVICE, APRIL 7, 1933

In keeping with the Emergency Decree and the Enabling Act that shortly preceded it, the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service suspended the protections of law by requiring the dismissal of non-Aryan (i.e., Jewish) officials from the professional civil service. In addition to setting forth this requirement (known as the “Aryan Paragraph”), the law defined what is meant by the term “officials,” addresses rights to pensions of those who are dismissed, includes exceptions to the application of the law, and provides for dismissal of Aryan officials if their “former political activity” suggests that they may not in all cases act “in the interest of the national state.” The application of this law—specifically, the prohibition of non-Aryans from doing certain things—resulted in the dismissal of thousands of Jews, and its specific application to the church led to great concern in the Catholic Church as well as a split in the Protestant Church.

1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PAGE 175, Art 1–18, 7 April 1933.

Law for the Reestablishment of the Professional Civil Service

7 April 1933

The Reichsgovernment has enacted the following law, which is hereby proclaimed:

Art. 1

1. For the reestablishment of a national professional civil service and for the simplification of administration, officials may be discharged from office according to the following regulations, even when the necessary conditions according to the appropriate law do not exist.

2. Officials, as used in this law, means immediate [unmittelbare] and mediate [mittelbare] officials of the Reich, immediate and mediate officials of the federal states [Laender], officials of communes [Gemeinde] and communal associations, officials of public legal corporations as well as institutions and undertakings placed upon the same status as these public legal corporations (Third decree of the Reichspräsident for the safeguarding of business and finance of 6 October 1931—RGB1. I P. 537, 3rd part, Chapter V, Section I, Art. 15, subparagraph 1). The stipulations apply also to employees of agencies supplying social insurance, who have the rights and duties of officials.

3. Officials as used in this law also includes officials in temporary retirement.

4. The Reichsbank and the German State Railway Co. are empowered to make corresponding regulations.

Art. 2

1. Officials who since 9 November 1918 have attained the status of officials without possessing the required or usual preparation or other qualifications are to be dismissed from service. Their former salaries will be accorded them for a period of 3 months after their dismissal.

2. A right to waiting allowances, pensions, or survivors pension and to the continuance of the official designation, the title, the official uniform and the official insignia is not possessed by them.

3. In case of need a pension, revocable at any time, equivalent to a third of the usual base pay of the last position held by them may be granted them, especially when they are caring for dependent relatives; reinsurance according to the provisions of the Reich’s social insurance law will not take place.

4. The stipulations of Section 2 and 3 will receive corresponding application in the case of persons of the type designated in Sec. 1, who already before this law became effective had been retired.

Art. 3

1. Officials, who are of non-aryan descent, are to be retired; insofar as honorary officials are concerned, they are to be removed from official status.

2. Section 1 is not in effect for officials who were already officials since 1 August 1914, or who fought during the World War at the front for the German Reichs or who fought for its allies or whose fathers or sons were killed in the World War. The Reichsminister of the Interior can permit further exceptions in understanding with the appropriate special minister or the highest authorities of the federal states in the case of officials abroad.

Art. 4

Officials, whose former political activity does not offer a guarantee that they at all times without reservation act in the interest of the national state can be dismissed from service. For a period of 3 months after dismissal they are accorded their former salary. From this time on they receive 3/4 of their pension and corresponding survivor’s benefits.

Art. 5

1. Every official must allow himself to be transferred to another office of the same or equivalent career, even into such a one having less rank or regular salary—reimbursement for the prescribed costs of transfer taking place, if the needs of the service require it. In case of transferment to an office of lower rank and regular salary the official retains his previous official title and the official income of his former position.

2. The official can, in place of transfer to an office of lesser rank and regular income (section 11) demand to be retired.

Art. 6

For the simplification of administration officials can be retired, even if they are not yet unfit for service. If officials are retired for this reason, their places may not be filled again.

Art. 14

1. Against the officials who have been dismissed or transferred upon the authority of this law, the institution of civil service punishment proceedings on account of misdemeanors committed while in office with the object of cancellation of pension, survivors benefits, designation of office, title, official uniform and insignia. The institution of the proceedings must take place on 31 December 1933 at the latest.

2. Section 1 is also valid for persons who within one year of the date that this law becomes effective have been retired and upon whom the Articles 2 and 4 would have applied, if these persons had still been in service when this law came into effect. * * *

Art. 17

1. The Reichsminister of the interior will issue in agreement with the Reichsminister of Finance, the necessary regulations for the execution and carrying through of this law and the general administrative provisions.

2. If necessary the highest federal state authorities will issue supplementary regulations. In this matter they must confine themselves to the framework of the Reichs regulations.

Art. 18

With the expiration of the periods established in this law, the general provisions valid for the professional civil services will be again completely valid, without prejudice to the measures taken on the basis of this law.

Berlin, 7 April 1933

The Reichschancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reichsminister of the Interior
Frick

The Reichsminister of Finance
Count Schwerin von Krosigk

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 981–986, Doc. 1397-PS.

14. “WEAR IT WITH PRIDE, THE YELLOW BADGE!” APRIL 4, 1933

Robert Weltsch was editor of Berlin’s Jüdische Rundschau newspaper (a pro-Zionist paper). By the time Hitler had seized power in 1933, Weltsch had become one of the most articulate interpreters of the German Jewish plight, and on April 4, 1933, in response to the Nazi-led boycott of Jewish shops of April 1, Weltsch published an article titled “Tragt ihn mit Stolz, den gelben Fleck” (“Wear It with Pride, the Yellow Badge”). While this was a time before Jews were required to wear the Star of David under the Nazis, it was, nonetheless, a call for unity, strength, and solidarity in the face of Nazi persecution. He called on German Jews to accept the reality of the Nazi obsession with a “Jewish question” and to affirm their Jewishness with dignity and pride.

The first of April, 1933, will remain an important date in the history of German Jewry—indeed, in the history of the entire Jewish people. The events of that day have aspects that are not only political and economic, but moral and spiritual as well. The political and economic implications have been widely discussed in the press, though of course the need for agitation has frequently obscured objective understanding. To speak of the moral aspect, that is our task. For however much the Jewish question is now debated, nobody except ourselves can express what is to be said on these events from the Jewish point of view, what is happening in the soul of the German Jew. Today the Jews cannot speak except as Jews. Anything else is utterly senseless—Gone is the fatal misapprehension of many Jews that Jewish interests can be pressed under some other cover. On April 1 the German Jews learned a lesson which penetrates far more deeply than even their embittered and now triumphant opponents could assume

We live in a new period, the national revolution of the German people is a signal that is visible from afar, indicating that the world of our previous concepts has collapsed. That may be painful for many, but in this world only those will be able to survive who are able to look reality in the eye. We stand in the midst of tremendous changes in intellectual, political, social and economic life. It is for us to see how the Jews will react.

April 1, 1933, can become the day of Jewish awakening and Jewish rebirth. If the Jews will it. If the Jews are mature and have greatness in them. If the Jews are not as they are represented to be by their opponents.

The Jews, under attack, must learn to acknowledge themselves.

Even in these days of most profound disturbance, when the stormiest of emotions have visited our hearts in face of the unprecedented display of the universal slander of the entire Jewish population of a great and cultural country, we must first of all maintain: composure. Even if we stand shattered by the events of these days we must not lose heart and must examine the situation without any attempt to deceive ourselves. One would like to recommend in these days that the document that stood at the cradle of Zionism, Theodor Herzl’s “Jewish State,” be distributed in hundreds of thousands of copies among Jews and non-Jews.

They accuse us today of treason against the German people: The National-Socialist Press calls us the “enemy of the Nation,” and leaves us defenseless.

It is not true that the Jews betrayed Germany. If they betrayed anyone, it was themselves, the Jews.

Because the Jew did not display his Judaism with pride, because he tried to avoid the Jewish issue, he must bear part of the blame for the degradation of the Jews.

Despite all the bitterness that we must feel in full measure when we read the National-Socialist boycott proclamations and unjust accusations, there is one point for which we may be grateful to the boycott Committee. Para. 3 of the directives reads: “The reference is . . . of course to businesses owned by members of the Jewish race. Religion plays no part here. Businessmen who were baptized Catholic or Protestant, or Jews who left their Community remain Jews for the purpose of this Order.” This is a [painful] reminder for all those who betrayed their Judaism. Those who steal away from the Community in order to benefit their personal position should not collect the wages of their betrayal. In taking up this position against the renegades there is the beginning of a clarification. The Jew who denies his Judaism is no better a citizen than his fellow who avows it openly. It is shameful to be a renegade, but as long as the world around us rewarded it, it appeared an advantage. Now even that is no longer an advantage. The Jew is marked as a Jew. He gets the yellow badge.

A powerful symbol is to be found in the fact that the boycott leadership gave orders that a sign “with a yellow badge on a black background” was to be pasted on the boycotted shops. This regulation is intended as a brand, a sign of contempt. We will take it up and make of it a badge of honor.

Many Jews suffered a crushing experience on Saturday. Suddenly they were revealed as Jews, not as a matter of inner avowal, not in loyalty to their own community, not in pride in a great past and great achievements, but by the impress of a red placard with a yellow patch. The patrols moved from house to house, stuck their placards on shops and signboards, daubed the windows, and for 24 hours the German Jews were exhibited in the stocks, so to speak. In addition to other signs and inscriptions one often saw windows bearing a large Magen David, the Shield of David the King. It was intended as dishonor. Jews, take it up, the Shield of David, and wear it with pride! . . .

Source: Robert Weltsch, Juedische Rundschau, No. 27, April 4, 1933, From Yitzhak Arad, Yisrael Gutman, and Abraham Margalio, eds., Documents on the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1981), pp. 44–47. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

15. LAW REGARDING ADMISSION TO THE BAR, APRIL 7, 1933

The Law Regarding Admission to the Bar required that non-Aryan (i.e., Jewish) lawyers no longer be admitted to the bar. A significant exception to the application of this law to Jews was included: the law did not apply to Jewish lawyers who were admitted to the bar before August 1, 1914; who fought at the front for Germany in World War I; or who lost their fathers or sons in World War I. The law also applied—without exceptions—to all lawyers who were involved in communist activities. As expected, the law reduced the number of Jewish lawyers allowed to practice their profession, but a significant number continued to do so under the exceptions included in it. Further, the language of the law—its frequent use of “may” rather than “must” and the absence of punishments set forth for the law’s violation—meant that this was not an absolute prohibition that made disbarment mandatory. That would happen, however, by a law passed in September 1938.

1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 188
Law Regarding Admission to the Bar, 7 April 1933

The Reich Government has enacted the following law that is promulgated herewith:

Art. 1. The admission of lawyers who, according to the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, of April 7, 1933 (RGL, I 175), are of non-Aryan descent, may be cancelled till September 30, 1933.

The provision of clause 1 does not apply to lawyers already admitted before August 1, 1914, or, who, during the World War fought at the front for Germany, or her allies, or who lost their fathers or sons in the World War.

Art. 2. Persons who, according to the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service of April 7, 1933 (RGL, I, p. 175) are of non-Aryan descent, may be refused permission to practice law, even if there exists none of the reasons enumerated in the Regulations for Lawyers. The same rule applies in cases, as where a lawyer described in Section 1, clause 2, wishes to be admitted to another court.

Art. 3. Persons, who were active in the communistic sense are excluded from the admission to the Bar. Admissions already given have to be revoked.

Art. 4. The Justice-Administration can issue an injunction against a lawyer until it is decided, if use will be made of the right to revoke the admission in accordance with Art 1/1, or Art 3. The prescriptions of Art 9/b/2-4 of the Bar regulation (Reichs-Law-Publication 1933, I, page 120) apply accordingly to the injunction against representation.

Against lawyers of that type as described in Art. 1/2 the injunction against representation is only then permissible when the use of Art. 3 is concerned.

Art. 5. To revoke the admission to the Bar is considered an important reason for the cancelling of employment contracts, which were concluded by the lawyer as employer.

Art. 6. In case the admission of a lawyer is revoked in accordance with this law, then for the cancelling of leases of rooms, which were rented by the lawyer for himself or his family, the regulations of the law about the cancelling right of persons concerned by the law for the renovation of professional bureaucracy, 7 April 1933, (RGL, Part I, page 187) will accordingly be used. The same will apply to employees of lawyers, who lost their job owing to the fact that the admission of the lawyer was revoked or an injunction against representation against him was issued in conformity with Art. 4.

Berlin, 7 April 1933

The Reichs-Chancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reichs-Minister for Justice
Dr. Guertner

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 989–990, Doc. 1401-PS.

16. FIRST DECREE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF THE LAW FOR THE RESTORATION OF THE PROFESSIONAL CIVIL SERVICE, APRIL 11, 1933

Four days after the promulgation of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service and the Law Regarding Admission to the Bar, both of which deprived non-Aryans of rights, this decree was passed to define what the term “non-Aryan” means. A non-Aryan is defined as a person who is the descendant of one Jewish parent or one Jewish grandparent. Note the difference between this definition of a Jew and the one set forth in the Nuremberg Laws of 1935. In those laws, a person’s status as a Jew was based on the number of the person's grandparents who were Jewish, requiring three or four Jewish grandparents to be considered a "full Jew." By comparison to that definition, the definition in this decree is far broader, resulting in a greater number of individuals who would be dismissed from the professional civil service or unable to practice law.

Pursuant to § 17 of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service of April 7, 1933 (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 175) the following is decreed:

I

To § 2 All civil servants who belong to the Communist Party or to Communist auxiliary or front organizations are unfit. They are accordingly to be dismissed.

II

To § 3 (1) A person is to be regarded as non-Aryan if he is descended from non-Aryan, especially Jewish, parents or grandparents. It is enough for one parent or grandparent to be non-Aryan. This is to be assumed especially if one parent or one grandparent was of the Jewish faith.

(2) If a civil servant did not already have civil service status on August 1, 1914, he must prove that he is of Aryan descent, or that he fought at the front, or that he is the son or father of a man killed in action during the World War. Proof must be given by submission of documents (birth certificate or parents' marriage certificate, military papers).

(3) If Aryan descent is doubtful, an opinion must be obtained from the expert on racial research attached to the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

III

To § 4 (1) In determining whether the conditions specified in § 4, Paragraph 1, are present, the civil servant's entire political activity, particularly since November 1918, is to be taken into consideration.

(2) Each civil servant is required to inform the highest Reich or state authorities (§ 7), upon demand, to which political parties he has heretofore belonged. In the context of this ruling, Reichsbanner Schwarz-Rot-Gold, the Judges' Association for the Republic, and the Human Rights League are also considered political parties.

IV

All transactions, documents, and official certifications required for the implementation of this law are exempt from fees and stamp duties.

Source: Lucy S. Dawidowicz, A Holocaust Reader (Springfield, NJ: Behrman House, 1976), pp. 41–42. Copyright © Behrman House, Inc. www.behrmanhouse.com.

17. EXCERPTS FROM THE LAW AGAINST OVERCROWDING OF GERMAN SCHOOLS AND HIGHER INSTITUTIONS, APRIL 25, 1933

The Law against Overcrowding of German Schools and Higher Institutions imposed a restriction on the number of non-Aryans (i.e., Jews) who could be admitted to German secondary schools, colleges, and universities. It also required a reduction in the number of non-Aryan students already enrolled. It was explained that this was being done to eliminate a surfeit of students relative to the number of professional opportunities available. However, rather than basing reductions to correspond to those opportunities, the law required that the number of non-Aryans admitted and the number allowed to remain could not exceed the proportion of non-Aryans in the population to Aryans (although there was provision for using a higher proportion when determining how many currently enrolled students needed to be removed). Given that the Jews represented less than 1% of the German population at the time, the impact on Jewish applicants and students was dramatic.

1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 225
Law against overcrowding of German Schools and Higher Institutions of 25 April 1933

The Reich Government has enacted the following law that is promulgated herewith: * * *

Article 3

In those special schools and faculties where the number of pupils and students is greatly disproportionate to professional demand, the number of registered students must be reduced during the school year 1933 as far as it is, without excessive rigor, consistent with a proper proportion.

Article 4

The number of non-Aryan Germans, within the meaning of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, of 7 April 1933 (RGBl I, p 175), who may be admitted to schools, colleges and universities, must not exceed a number proportionate to the Aryan students in each school, college or university compared to the percentage of non-Aryans within the entire German population. This proportion is fixed uniformly for the whole Reich.

If, in accordance with Article 3, the number of pupils and students is to be reduced, there is likewise a proper proportion to be established between the total number of students and the number of non-Aryans. In doing so a somewhat higher proportion may be fixed.

Clauses 1 and 2 do not apply in the case of non-Aryans, whose fathers have fought at the front during the World War for Germany or her allies, or to children whose parents were married before the enactment of this law, if the father or mother or two of the grandparents are of Aryan origin. The number of these students is not to be included when calculating the quota of non-Aryans. * * *

Article 7

The decree is valid upon promulgation.

Berlin, 25 April 1933

The Reich Chancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reich Minister of the Interior
Frick

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 651–652, Doc. 2022-PS.

18. EDITORIAL LAW, OCTOBER 4, 1933

The Editorial Law eliminated Jews from any role in the owning, editing, or publishing of newspapers by authorizing the state to regulate them. The law also applied to political periodicals and establishments that “supply newspapers with intellectual content.” Section 14 of the law is notable for the limitations it puts on what cannot be put in a newspaper: anything that “tends to weaken the strength of the German Reich . . . the common will of the German people, the German defense ability, culture or economy . . . [or] offends the honor and dignity of Germany.” Professional Courts are required to be established “for the protection of the editorial profession,” including the determination of whether what is put into a newspaper is in accordance with this law. Detailed instructions to administer this law are also included.

1933 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 713

Editorial Law

4 October 1933

The Reich Government has resolved upon the following law, which is hereby published:

Part One

The Editorial Profession

Section 1

The cooperative work carried on as main employment or based upon appointment to the position of chief editor in the shaping of the intellectual contents by written word, dissemination of news or pictures of the newspapers or political periodicals, which are published within the area of the Reich, is a public task, which is regulated as to its professional duties and rights by the state through this law. Its bearers are called editors. Nobody may call himself an editor who is not entitled to do so, according to this law.

Section 2

(1) Newspapers and periodicals are printed matters which appear in regular sequence at intervals of at most 3 months, without limiting their circulation to a certain group of persons.

(2) All reproductions of writings or illustrations, destined for dissemination, which are produced by means of a mass reproduction process are to be considered as printed matter.

Section 3

(1) The provisions of this law relating to newspapers are valid also for political periodicals.

(2) This law does not apply to newspapers and periodicals which are published by official order.

(3) The Reich Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda will determine which periodicals are to be considered as political within the meaning of the law. In case the periodical affects a certain vocational field, he will make the decision in agreement with the highest Reich or State agency concerned.

Section 4

Cooperation in the shaping of the intellectual contents of the German newspapers is also considered as such, if it does not take place in the management of a newspaper, but in an establishment, which is to supply newspapers with intellectual contents, (written word, news, or pictures).

Part Two

Admission to the Profession of Editor

Section 5

Persons who can be editors are only those who:

1. possess the German citizenship,
2. have not lost the civic rights [buergerliche Ehrenrechte] and the qualification for the tenure of public offices.
3. are of Aryan descent, and are not married to a person of non-Aryan descent.
4. have completed the 21st year of age,
5. are capable of handling business,
6. have been trained in the profession,
7. have the qualities which the task of exerting intellectual influence upon the public requires.

Section 6

For the requirement of the Aryan descent and the Aryan marriage, section 1a of the Reich Law for Officials [Reichsbeamten-gesetz] and the provisions issued for its implementation will be applied.

Section 7

(1) Whoever has acquired the knowledge of an editor by training for at least one year (editor in apprenticeship) with the editorial staff of a German newspaper or an establishment of the kind mentioned in Section 4 and can prove this by certificate to the editorial staff will be considered as professionally trained. The apprenticeship served with a foreign newspaper may be made equivalent to the apprenticeship served with a German paper by means of the implementation order.

(2) The provisions of this law also pertain to the editors in apprenticeship with the exception of Section 5, Subsections 4, 5, and 6.

Section 8

The admission to the editorial profession will be affected by entry upon request in the professional editors' list. The professional rosters are kept by the offices of the regional associations [Landesverbaende] of the German press. (Section 24, Subsection 2). The registration will be passed upon by the head of Regional association. He must decree the registration, if the requirements which are set forth in Section 5 are fulfilled. He has to reject it if the Reichsminister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda protests.

Section 9

(1) Upon application by the head of the regional association the head of the Reich Association of the German Press (Section 23) with the approval of Reich Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda may permit exceptions from the requirements set forth (Section 5, Nos. 1, 3, and 6). This exception can be limited to certain branches of the activity of an editor. In this case the Reich Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda grants the permission in accordance with the highest competent Reich or State authority.

(2) Exemption from the requirement of German [Reich] citizenship is to be granted to those of German origin if no special objections exist.

Section 10

The nominator must be notified in writing together with a statement of reasons of a decision by the head of the Land Association [Landesverband] rejecting an entry into the professional roster. The nominator may call for a decision by the professional court within four weeks after the notice. The appeal is not permitted if the circumstances fall within the purview of Section 8, 5th sentence.

Section 11

The head of the Land Association is required to decree the deletion of an entry in the professional roster if the requirements set forth in Section 5, Nos. 1, 2, 5, are not present, or the data furnished under Nos. 1–6 has been found incorrect, or the editor has given up his profession. Section 10, sentences 1 and 2 are correspondingly applicable.

Part Three

Exercise of the Profession of an Editor

Section 12

By registration in the professional roster, the editor becomes entitled to execute his profession with German newspapers or with German enterprises of the kind described in Section 4. If he moves into the district of a different Land Association, he will be transferred to the respective professional roster without further examination.

Section 13

Editors are charged to treat their subjects truthfully and to judge them according to the best of their knowledge.

Section 14

Editors are especially bound to keep out of the newspapers anything which:

1. in any manner is misleading to the public, mixes selfish aims with community aims
2. tends to weaken the strength of the German Reich, outwardly or inwardly, the common will of the German people, the German defense ability, culture or economy, or offends the religious sentiments of others,
3. offends the honor and dignity of Germany,
4. illegally offends the honor or the welfare of another, hurts his reputation, makes him ridiculous or contemptible,
5. is immoral for other reasons.

Section 15

Editors are bound to exercise their profession conscientiously and by their behavior inside or outside their professional activities prove themselves worthy of the respect which this profession demands.

Section 16

The publisher of a newspaper may compel an editor by means of a contract to observe the fundamental policies of a newspaper. The public duties and rights of the editor which derive from Sections 13 to 15, cannot be affected by policies.

Section 17

Contracts for the hiring of an editor must be in writing.

Section 18

The publisher of a newspaper must appoint an editor-in-chief and is required to report his name in writing to the Land Association concerned.

Section 19

The editor-in-chief is required to draw up in writing a plan for distribution of work, from which must be evident what part of the tasks of editing are to be taken by each editor and to what extent he has the authority to issue directions to other editors, in accordance with the terms of the contracts of employment and the supplementary directives of the publisher.

Section 20

(1) Editors of a newspaper are responsible under professional, criminal and civil law, for its intellectual content so far as they themselves wrote or selected it. The responsibility under criminal or civil law of other persons is not thereby excluded.

(2) The chief editor is responsible for the over-all editorial policy of the newspaper.

(3) The editor-in-chief is required:

(a) to take care that only such contributions are accepted as have been written or selected for acceptance by an editor.

(b) to take care that the first and last names as well as the residence of the editor-in-chief and his deputies, as well as that of each editor to whom a specific part of the direction of a newspaper is delegated, is reported.

(c) upon request to give information to anyone establishing a legal interest therein, as to which editor bears the responsibility for a contribution, so far as this is not evident from the data under subdivision b.

Section 21

Editors who cooperate in the shaping of the intellectual contents of a newspaper by their activity with an enterprise of the kind mentioned in Section 4, are responsible for the contents to the extent of their cooperation.

Part Four

Protection of the Editorial Profession Afforded by the Laws Relating to Association.

Section 22

The editorial group as a whole will watch over the fulfillment of duty on the part of individual professional colleagues and will look after their rights and their welfare.

Section 23

Editors are legally united to the Reich Association of the German Press [Reichsverband der Deutschen Presse]. By virtue of his registration on the professional roster every editor belongs to it. By virtue of this law the Reich Association becomes a public corporation. It has its seat in Berlin.

Section 24

(1) The Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda will appoint the head of the Reich Association who will issue a charter for the Reich Association, which will require the approval of the Minister. The head of the Reich Association will appoint an advisory councilor.

(2) The Reich Association is organized in Land Associations. Further details are regulated by the charter. Editors who live abroad must belong to a Land Association in whose district there is a newspaper or an establishment of the kind outlined in Section 4, by which they are employed.

Section 25

(1) The Reich Association is required:

1. to establish educational, advanced training and welfare institutions for the editors,
2. to give expert advice to Reich and Land authorities,
3. to cooperate in the making of stipulations for employment of editors,
4. upon request of one party, to negotiate among editors, and to settle differences in case both parties agree.
5. to maintain professional courts for the press.

(2) The Reich Association may assume additional duties for the achievement of the purposes provided for in Section 22.

(3) The Reich Association is authorized to impose dues on its members in order to meet its expenses. The regulations governing this must have the approval of Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda. The dues are to be collected like public taxes.

Section 26

The Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda will exercise supervision to ensure that the Reich Association fulfills tasks which have been assigned to it.

Section 27

(1) Professional Courts [Berufsgerichte] will be established for the protection of the editorial profession.

2) Professional Courts of the first instance are the District Courts [Bezirksgerichte] of the Press. Professional Courts of the second instance is the Press Court [Pressegerichtshof] in Berlin.

Section 28

The Professional Courts have jurisdiction:

1. to try and to decide whether the registration in the professional roster for cases set forth in Section 10 is to be decreed.
2. to try and to decide upon removals under Section 11.

3. to interpret termination clauses in editors' contracts of employment [Anstellungsverhaeltnisses] under Section 30.

4. to try and to decide offenses of a professional nature on the part of editors (proceedings of an honor court).

Section 29

The termination of employment must be in writing and must contain a statement of reasons.

Section 30

A publisher may dismiss an editor because of the views expressed by him in the newspaper only if they are in conflict with the public professional duties of an editor or if they contravene the agreed policies. The Professional Court will, at the request of the editor, state whether the dismissal, in its opinion, has been contrary to the provisions of the preceding sentence or amounts to an evasion of them. Legal proceedings before the regular courts, if any have been initiated, are to be deferred until the requested opinion has been obtained.

Section 31

(1) An editor who fails in his public professional duties, as set forth in Sections 13 to 15, 19, 20, subsection 3, commits a professional misdemeanor. In such case the Professional Court may:

1. warn the editor,
2. punish him with a fine not exceeding the sum of one month's professional earning,
3. decree the removal of his name from the professional roster.

(2) His license to exercise the editorial profession and to call himself an editor is terminated with such removal.

(3) The Professional Court may temporarily deny an editor, against whom proceedings in an honorary court have been instituted, the right to exercise his profession.

Section 32

Professional Courts shall consist of the President and the lay judges [Beisitzer]. Alternates are to be appointed for the President and the lay judges. The President and the lay judges must be eligible for the office of judge or for higher administrative offices. They must possess judicial independence. The lay judges and their alternates have to be editors and publishers in equal numbers. All members of the Professional Courts are appointed by the Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda. The head of the Reich Association will nominate the editors, while the head of the Organization of Publishers in the Reich Press Chamber will nominate the publishers.

Section 33

The District Press Courts with five members, the Press Court [Pressegerichtshof] with 7 members, the President being included in both cases.

Section 34

The procedure before the Professional Courts will be regulated by a code of procedure which is decreed by the Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda in agreement with the Reich Minister for Justice after obtaining the opinion of the head of the Reich Association.

Section 35

The Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda may decree the removal of an editor from the professional list independent of the proceedings of the Professional Court, if he deems it necessary for pressing reasons of public welfare.

Part Five

Protection of the Editorial Profession Afforded by the Penal Laws

Section 36

Whosoever works as an editor despite the fact he is not registered in the professional rosters, or despite the fact that the exercise of his profession has been prohibited temporarily, will be punished with imprisonment up to one year, or fined.

Section 37

A publisher who entrusts a person who is not registered in the professional rosters or an editor who has been temporarily suspended from the exercise of his profession with the work of an editor as a main profession, or who maintains a newspaper without having appointed a chief editor, according to Section 18, will be punished by imprisonment of up to 3 months or by a fine.

Section 38

An editor who demands, accepts a promise of, or accepts a remuneration or any other advantage for an action which violates Sections 13 or 14, will be punished with imprisonment or fined.

Section 39

Whosoever attempts to induce an editor or a publisher or his deputy, by an officer, promise or granting an advantage, to undertake, bring about or tolerate the shaping of the intellectual content of a newspaper, in violation of Sections 13 or 14, will be punished with imprisonment or fined for bribery of the press.

Section 40

(1) Whosoever attempts to induce an editor or a publisher or his deputy by means of threats to undertake, bring about or tolerate the shaping of the intellectual content of a newspaper in violation of Sections 13 or 14 will be punished with imprisonment or fined for unlawful interference with the press.

(2) If the unlawful interference with the press is exerted by misuse of the dependent employee-status of the editor, then the punishment must be not less than 3 months imprisonment.

Section 41

In cases under Sections 38 to 40 the judgment may include less of civil rights in addition to imprisonment.

Section 42

Whosoever assumes the title of an editor, despite the fact he is not registered in the professional roster, will be punished by fine of up to 150 Reichsmark or by imprisonment [haeft].

Section 43

The license of a publisher against whom there is a final judgment for violation of provisions contained in Sections 37, 39 and 40, may be revoked by the administrative authority having jurisdiction in such matters under the laws of the State.

Part Six

Concluding Provisions

Section 44

Regulations enabling delegates of a law-making body to limit prosecutions are not applicable to cases under sections 31 to 35 of this law.

Section 45

(1) Sections 7, 8, of the Reich Law relating to the Press of 7 May 1874 (RGB I page 65) are not applicable to newspapers and political periodicals

(2) Otherwise the provisions of the Reich Press Law relating to the responsible Editor in charge [Redakteur] are applicable to the responsible editor [Schriftleiter or Hauptschriftleiter] of newspapers and political periodicals, insofar as Section 20, subsection 1 and Section 21 of this law are concerned.

Section 46

The Reich Minister for Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda in agreement with the other Reich Ministers concerned may issue directives for the execution of these laws and for conversion from the old legal basis to the new one.

Section 47

The Reich Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda will set the date on which this law becomes valid.

Berlin, 4 October 1933

The Reich Chancellor
Adolf Hitler
The Reich Minister for Public
Enlightenment and Propaganda
Dr. Goebbels

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 709–717, Doc. 2083-PS.

19. LAW EXCLUDING JEWS FROM MILITARY SERVICE, MAY 21, 1935

For the Jews of Germany, military service represented a portal to assimilation and acceptance in the larger German society. Some 100,000 German Jews served in the military in World War I, with approximately 12,000 losing their lives in the process. These numbers exceeded the percentage of Jews in the German population. Jews who served in World War I were confident that they would be seen as strong nationalists on a par with any other German soldiers, and they assumed that service would help eliminate the stereotype of the Jew as unwilling or unable to take up arms. Thus, it was with understandable disappointment that Jews learned in 1935 that their military service was no longer wanted or allowed. The timing of this law only served to further separate the Jews from the rest of German society: it coincided with Hitler's call for all-out remilitarization and the imposition of mandatory conscription, both of which were in direct contravention of the Treaty of Versailles.

1935 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGES 609, 611, 614
Law concerning Armed Forces of 21 May 1935, Chapter II, Section 15.
Aryan Descent.

(1) Aryan descent is a prerequisite for active service in the Armed Forces.

(2) An examining committee will determine whether and to what extent exceptions may be permitted in accordance with directives which the Reich Minister of the Interior sets forth, in agreement with the Reich Minister of War.

(3) Only persons of Aryan descent may become officers in the Armed Forces.

(4) Members of the Armed Forces and of the reserve who are of Aryan descent, are prohibited from marrying persons of non-Aryan descent. Contraventions will result in the loss of any military rating.

(5) The service of non-Aryans during war remains subject to special regulations.

* * * * *

The Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor
Adolf Hitler
The Reich Minister of Defense
von Blomberg
The Reich Minister of the Interior
Frick.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 686–687, Doc. 2984-PS.

20. REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW OF SEPTEMBER 15, 1935

The Nuremberg Laws consisted of two constitutional laws issued by a special session of the Reichstag on September 15, 1935, at the Annual Nazi Party Rally in Nuremberg, both of which were designed to further exclude Jews from all manner of public life. One of those laws, the Reich Citizenship Law (the other was the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor), stated that only Germans or those related by blood could be citizens of Germany, thus excluding Jews from citizenship. This represented the ultimate legal division between Jews and non-Jews in Germany. For the many Jews who had been hoping that earlier anti-Jewish laws would not last or would become too draconian, this law represented undeniable proof of the extent to which their presence in German society was not wanted and would not be tolerated. Stripped of the rights and protections afforded to German citizens, their place in Germany became more tenuous and dangerous.

1935 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART 1, PAGE 1146
The Reich Citizenship Law of 15 Sept 1935

The Reichstag has adopted unanimously, the following law, which is herewith promulgated.

Article 1

1. A subject of the State is a person, who belongs to the protective union of the German Reich, and who, therefore, has particular obligations towards the Reich.

2. The status of the subject is acquired in accordance with the provisions of the Reich- and State Law of Citizenship.

Article 2

1. A citizen of the Reich is only that subject, who is of German or kindred blood and who, through his conduct, shows that he is both desirous and fit to serve faithfully: the German people and Reich.

2. The right to citizenship is acquired by the granting of Reich citizenship papers.

3. Only the citizen of the Reich enjoys full political rights in accordance with the provision of the laws.

Article 3

The Reich Minister of the Interior in conjunction with the Deputy of the Fuehrer will issue the necessary legal and administrative decrees for the carrying out and supplementing of this law.

Nurnberg, 15 Sept 1935 at the Reichsparteitag of Liberty

The Fuehrer and Reichs Chancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reichs Minister of the Interior
Frick

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 7-8, Doc. 1416-PS.

21. LAW FOR THE PROTECTION OF GERMAN BLOOD AND GERMAN HONOR, SEPTEMBER 15, 1935

The Nuremberg Laws consisted of two constitutional laws issued by a special session of the Reichstag on September 15, 1935, at the Annual Nazi Party Rally in Nuremberg, both of which were designed to further exclude Jews from all manner of public life. One of those laws, the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor (the other was the Reich Citizenship Law), prohibited Jews from marrying or having extramarital relations with non-Jews. It also prohibited the employment of German female domestic servants under the age of 45 in Jewish households, and the raising of the German flag by Jews. Of great importance, it set forth a definition of the term "Jew" to be used for application of these and subsequent laws. Generally, a Jew was defined as someone with three of four Jewish grandparents. A person with one or two Jewish grandparents would be considered, respectively, a Mischling of the second class and a Mischling of the first class. Many discussions and heated debates ensued among Nazi leaders about how each class of Mischling was to be treated under Germany's many anti-Jewish laws.

LAW, 15 SEPTEMBER 1935, FOR THE PROTECTION OF GERMAN BLOOD AND HONOR
1935 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART 1, PAGE 1146

Imbued with the conviction that the purity of the German blood is the prerequisite for the permanence of the German people, and animated by the inflexible will to safeguard the German nation for all future, the Reichstag has unanimously enacted the following law, which is promulgated herewith:

Article 1

(1) Marriages between Jews and German nationals of German or related blood are prohibited. Marriages concluded despite of this are void, even if concluded abroad in order to circumvent this law.

(2) Only the public prosecutor can file an action for nullification.

Article 2

Sexual intercourse (except in marriage) between Jews and German nationals of German or related blood is forbidden.

Article 3

Jews may not employ female German nationals of German or related blood below 45 years of age in their households.

Article 4

(1) Jews are forbidden to show the Reich and national flag or the colors of the Reich.

(2) They are, however, allowed to show the Jewish colors. The exercise of this right will be protected by the State.

Article 5

(1) Whoever violates the prohibition of article 1 will be punished with hard labor.

(2) Any man violating the prohibition of article 2 will be punished with imprisonment or hard labor.

(3) Whoever violates the regulations under articles 3 or 4, will be punished with imprisonment up to 1 year or with a fine, or with both of these penalties.

Article 6

The Reich Minister of the Interior, in agreement with the deputy of the Fuehrer and the Reich Minister of Justice, will issue the legal and administrative regulations required for carrying out and supplementing this law.

Article 7

This law comes into force on the day following its promulgation; article 3, however, not until 1 January 1936

Nuernberg, 15 September 1935, at the Reich Party Congress for Freedom.

The Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor
ADOLF HITLER

The Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

The Reich Minister of Justice
DR. GUERTNER

The Deputy of the Fuehrer
Reich Minister without Portfolio
R. HESS

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 180–181, Doc. NG-715.

22. FIRST REGULATION TO THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW OF NOVEMBER 14, 1935

With the passage of the Reich Citizenship Law and the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor—and with their elimination of citizenship for Jews and the prohibition of marriage or extramarital relations between Jews and non-Jews—the need for an unambiguous definition of who is a Jew became critical. This regulation sought to provide that definition by looking at the race of the person’s grandparents or parents. If three or four of an individual’s grandparents were “full Jews,” then the individual would be considered a “full Jew.” If two of the parents were “full Jews,” the individual would be considered a “full Jew” if any one of four additional conditions were met. The regulation, which also makes reference to an individual “of mixed Jewish blood” but does not define what that means, reflects the difficulty of maintaining the Nazi ideological position that Jews are a race, not a religion: Jewish status depended, under certain circumstances, on whether a person’s parents or grandparents belonged to the Jewish community or if a person was married to a Jew. Clearly, an unambiguous definition had not yet been achieved.

1935 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART 1, PAGE 1333

First Regulation to the Reichs Citizenship

Law of 14 Nov. 1935

On the basis of Article 3, Reichs Citizenship Law, of 15 Sept. 1935 (RGBl I, page 146) the following is ordered:

Article 1

1. Until further issue of regulations regarding citizenship papers, all subjects of German or kindred blood, who possessed the right to vote in the Reichstag elections, at the time the Citizenship Law came into effect, shall, for the time being, possess the rights of Reich citizens. The same shall be true of those whom the Reich Minister of the Interior, in conjunction with the Deputy of the Fuehrer, has given the preliminary citizenship.

2. The Reich Minister of the Interior, in conjunction with the Deputy of the Fuehrer, can withdraw the preliminary citizenship.

Article 2

1. The regulations in Article 1 are also valid for Reichs subjects of mixed, Jewish blood.

2. An individual of mixed Jewish blood, is one who descended from one or two grandparents who were racially full Jews, insofar as does not count as a Jew according to Article 5, paragraph 2. One grandparent shall be considered as full-blooded if he or she belonged to the Jewish religious community.

Article 3

Only the Reich citizen, as bearer of full political rights, exercises the right to vote in political affairs, and can hold a public office. The Reich Minister of the Interior, or any agency empowered by him, can make exceptions during the transition period, with regard to occupying public offices. The affairs of religious organizations will not be touched upon.

Article 4

1. A Jew cannot be a citizen of the Reich. He has no right to vote in political affairs, he cannot occupy a public office.

2. Jewish officials will retire as of 31 December 1935. If these officials served at the front in the World War, either for Germany or her allies, they will receive in full, until they reach the age limit, the pension to which they were entitled according to last received wages; they will, however, not advance in seniority. After reaching the age limit, their pension will be calculated anew, according to the last received salary, on the basis of which their pension was computed.

3. The affairs of religious organizations will not be touched upon.

4. The conditions of service of teachers in Jewish public schools remain unchanged, until new regulations of the Jewish school systems are issued.

Article 5

1. A Jew is anyone who descended from at least three grandparents who were racially full Jews. Article 2, par. 2, second sentence will apply.

2. A Jew is also one who descended from two full Jewish parents, if: (a) he belonged to the Jewish religious community at the time this law was issued, or who joined the community later; (b) he was married to a Jewish person, at the time the law was issued, or married one subsequently; (c) he is the offspring from a marriage with a Jew, in the sense of Section 1, which was contracted after the Law for the protection of German blood and German honor became effective (RGBl. I, page 1146 of 15 Sept 1935); (d) he is the offspring of an extramarital relationship, with a Jew, according to Section 1, and will be born out of wedlock after July 31, 1936.

Article 6

1. As far as demands are concerned for the pureness of blood as laid down in Reichs law or in orders of the NSDAP and its echelons—not covered in Article 5—they will not be touched upon.

2. Any other demands on pureness of blood, not covered in Article 5, can only be made with permission from the Reich Minister of the Interior and the Deputy of the Fuehrer. If any such demands have been made, they will be void as of 1 Jan 1936, if they have not been requested from the Reich Minister of the Interior in agreement with the Deputy of the Fuehrer. These requests must be made from the Reich Minister of the Interior.

Article 7

The Fuehrer and Reichs Chancellor can grant exemptions from the regulations laid down in the law.

Berlin, 14 November 1935.

The Fuehrer and Reichs Chancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reich Minister of the Interior
Frick

The Deputy of the Fuehrer
R. Hess
(Reich Minister without Portfolio)

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 8–10, Doc. 1417-PS.

23. COMPILATION OF EXCERPTS FROM NAZI ANTISEMITIC ARTICLES IN DER SA-MANN, 1935–1938

The Sturmabteilung (SA, also known as the Stormtroopers or Brown Shirts) was a paramilitary group that grew in size and popularity under the leadership of Ernst Röhm, a long-time friend of Hitler and a member of the Nazi Party from its earliest years. It was a violent group that was used by the party for protection of its officials, intimidation of members of other parties, and fighting similar groups of other parties. With some four million members, it lost a large part of its purpose when Hitler and the Nazi Party came to power. It sought the acceptance of the German Army, but the officer corps considered it to be an undisciplined group led by a highly unprofessional man. During its existence as an organization it published a newspaper, Der SA-Mann (The SS Man), to report on SA matters and, as will be seen in the excerpts below, to constantly confirm and inflame violent anti-Jewish sentiments. It is in many ways reflective of the antisemitic rhetoric common to the Nazi Party in these years.

THE SA MAN
[Der SA-Mann]

* * *

[Articles Designed to Create and Foster an Anti-Jewish Attitude]

Article entitled: “Finish up with the Jews”, with subtitle: “We want no women to buy from Jews, and no Jewish girl friends.” 27 July, 1935, p. 4. [This article reads in part as follows:] “German women finally wake up and do not buy any more from Jews. And you, German girl, also finally wake up and do not go with Jews any longer.

“The Jew is also a person? Quite right! Nobody has ever argued that point. The only question is: What kind of a person is he? Oh, I know German women, your groceryman is such an obliging and decent Jew, and your friend, German girl, is such a nice and polite person! Yes, I understand.

To the devil finally with this nursery tale.

Snake remains a snake, and Jew remains a Jew! * * *

* * * “German women, if you buy from Jews and German girl, if you carry on with Jews, then both of you betray your German Volk and your Fuehrer, Adolf Hitler, and commit a sin against your German Volk and its future! Finally, wake up German woman, aren’t you ashamed to give your household money to Jews? Do you know what you are doing thereby? You give the deadly enemy of the German Volk as well as your own and your children’s deadly enemy the weapons into his hands for the fight against Germany. Must that be? Can’t you really go two or three houses further and obtain your needs from a German national?

“And you, German girl, you give your best, your honor and your blood to one of a strange race?

“Aren’t you ashamed of yourself?” * * *

Article entitled: “The Jewish World Danger.” 2 February, 1935, p. 5.

Article entitled: “Jewish Worries” (defending the practice of excluding Jews from certain resorts). 20 July, 1935, p. 4.

Article entitled: “Jews aren’t wanted Here”, with pictures posted on outskirts of villages showing signs bearing the same message. 1 June, 1935, p. 1. [The last portion of this article reads as follows:]

“Since the day when National Socialism unrolled its flag and the march began for the Germany for Germans, our battle also included the Jewry * * * Let the Jew continue with his methods against New Germany. We know that at the end we will remain the victor, for every day and every National Socialist deed brings out the Jewish lies and horror system more and more, and by waking up the people and their knowledge of the Jewish world danger, the last hope of the Jewry for the undermining of Germany will suffer shipwreck.

“But the high point of Jewish impudence and arrogance is, on the one side, to wage the war against Germany to the last, and on the other side, to expect that the German working people should carry their money into Jewish stores. Here our explanation and our battle must be employed.

“It does not do for innumerable citizens to daily buy from Jews and to fill the pockets of our enemies with their money, who find their work and bread through the National Socialist Germany, and who are citizens of the National Socialist Reich, and benefited by the National Socialist battle. He who buys from Jews takes goods and wages from his citizens.

“The greatest part of our people have given the right answer to his lies and boycott campaign. In thousands of towns and villages signs and posters say: “Jews are not wanted here!” Many thousands of new citizens have become anti-Semitic because of Jewish dealings. However, the whole German folk must realize and grasp the Jewish world danger.

“We break no windows of Jewish stores, we do not carry out any program or any demonstrations in front of Jewish stores. We only elucidate or explain to our blood brothers regarding the methods of the Jew, his fight against us and against all peoples of the earth. Then, also, outside of the last German village, the sign will stand “Jews are not wanted here!” and then, finally, no German citizen will again cross the threshold of a Jewish store. To achieve this goal is the mission of the SA man as political soldier of the Fuehrer. Next to his word and his explanations stands his example.”

Article entitled: “God Save the Jew.” 17 August, 1935, p. 1.

Photograph showing SA men gathered around trucks upon which are pasted signs reading: “Read the Stuermer and you will know the Jew.” 24 August, 1935, p. 3.

Photograph apparently representing public SA rally showing large sign which reads: “He who knows a Jew knows a devil.” 24 August, 1935, p. 3.

Article entitled: “The Face of the Jew” (with portrait of a Jew holding the hammer and sickle). 5 Oct., 1935, p. 6.

Article entitled: “Jews, Blacks and Reactionaries.” 2 November, 1935, p. 2.

Article entitled: “The Camouflaged Benjamin-Jewish Cultural Bolshevism in German Music.” 23 November, 1935, p. 2.

Article entitled: “The Jewish Assassination.” 15 February, 1936, p. 1.

Article entitled: “Murder—the Jewish Slogan.” 4 April, 1936, p. 11.

Series of articles entitled: “The Jewish Mirror.” 8 weekly installments beginning 22 May, 1936, p. 17.

Series of articles entitled: “Gravediggers of World Culture.” beginning 5 December, 1936, p. 6 and continuing weekly to 13 March, 1937.

Article entitled: “Rumania to the Jews?” 2 January, 1937, p. 6.

Article entitled: “Bismark’s Position on Jews.” 2 January, 1937, p. 7.

Article entitled: “Jewry is a Birth Error.” 13 February, 1937, p. 5.

Article entitled: “The Protection of the German Blood.” 24 April, 1937, p. 1.

Article entitled: “Crooked Ways to Money and Power.” 24 April, 1937, p. 1.

Article entitled: “The Camouflage of Jewry—Beginning or End?” 22 May, 1937, p. 14.

Article entitled: “How come still German Jews?” 18 June, 1938, p. 2.

Article entitled: “Westheimer Jew Servants.” 22 January, 1938, p. 2.

Article entitled: “The Poor Jew—Well! Well!” 19 March, 1938, p. 15.

Article entitled: “Jewish Methods, Churchly Parallel.” 9 September, 1938, p. 4.

Article entitled: “Jewish World Revolution—out of the U.S.A.” 30 December, 1938, p. 4.

Article entitled: “Jews and Free Masons.” 13 January, 1939, p. 15.

Article entitled: “Friends of the World Jewry—Roosevelt and Ickes.” 3 February, 1939, p. 14.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 789–793, Doc. 3050-A-E-PS.

24. EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ON “THE JEWISH QUESTION AND SCHOOL INSTRUCTION,” 1937

Der Stürmer, a weekly Nazi newspaper/tabloid edited by the notorious antisemite Julius Streicher, printed in a 1937 edition of the paper a pamphlet for teachers regarding how to teach German children about Jews and the so-called Jewish Question. Introduced by Streicher and authored by Fritz Fink, the pamphlet’s tone is clear early on when it refers to “the monstrous character and dangerousness of the Jew.” Consider the impact made by teachers who followed Fink’s directions. It is little wonder that German children schooled during the 1930s and 1940s harbored a deep-seated antipathy toward Jewish children and, indeed, all Jews.

Pamphlet “The Jewish question and school instruction” by Municipal School Inspector [Stadtschulrat]
Fritz Fink, published and printed by “Der Stuermer,” 1937 with a preface by Streicher
Preface

The National Socialist state brought fundamental changes into all spheres of life of the German People.

It has also presented the German teacher with some new tasks. The national socialist state demands that its teachers instruct German children in social questions. As far as the German people is concerned the racial question is a Jewish question. Those who want to teach the child all about the Jew must themselves have a thorough knowledge of the subject. School Inspector Fritz Fink, with his publication “The Jewish Question and schools instruction,” will help the teacher in acquiring some knowledge of the subject. He can and is entitled to do this, for he himself has been called upon by circumstances to take part in a struggle which enabled him to gain experience and knowledge concerning Jewish blood and its influence on the German People. Those who take to heart all that has been written with such feeling by Fritz Fink who for many years has been greatly concerned about the German People, will be grateful to the creator of this outwardly insignificant publication.

City of the Reich Party Rallies Nurnberg in the year 1937.

(Sgd) Julius Streicher

* * * * *

Introduction

“Racial and Jewish questions are the fundamental problems of the national socialist ideology. The solution of these problems will secure the existence of National Socialism and with this the existence of our nation for all time. The enormous significance of the racial question is recognized almost without exception today by all the German people. In order to attain this recognition, our people had to travel through a long road of suffering. In order that the coming generation be spared this suffering, let us, the German educators of our youth, instill in their hearts, from their early childhood, all there is to know about the Jews. No one should be allowed to grow up in the midst of our people without this knowledge of the monstrous character and dangerousness of the Jew.” * * *

Knowledge of racial and Jewish questions must grow organically out of our general system of school education. The racial doctrine and the Jewish question must be like a red thread marking the education of all age groups in our school education. There is no subject from which cannot be drawn an unsuspected full measure of valuable knowledge of the Jewish question.

The attached pamphlet, “The Jewish question and School Instruction,” was brought out in an urgent desire to show up some of these possibilities.

* * * * *

“From the ranks of the teachers comes now the question: ‘How should we represent the Jew to our pupils?’ Only one answer can be given to this question: ‘In all his monstrosity, horror and dangerousness.’ Such as he is.”

* * * * *

A teacher who has come to a thorough understanding of the Jewish question will make use in his work of the “Stuermer.” He reads to the class extracts from an Article which describes how a Jew deceived a peasant etc.

Thus we glide from the purely outward appearance of the Jew to his inner nature. Our fight against the Jew is not for the reason that he is different in body to ourselves. The bodily difference is not the dangerous part of the Jew. We must make it clear to a child that in the strange appearance of a Jew, which is immediately conspicuous to us, lies a soul, which is fundamentally different in all its emotions and manifestations, from our souls. We must point out that the Jew thinks, feels, and behaves in a different manner from ourselves. That his way of thinking, of feeling and of behaviour is diametrically opposed to our morals and our laws.”

* * * * *

Jewry is Criminality

“ * * *. But the fact, that in deceit, usury, murder, etc. Jews see no crime but consider them as acts pleasing to their God when they are directed against non-Jews—will appear most monstrous to our children. At first it will frighten the children and they will shake their heads incredulously. In the same way as millions of people in Germany scornfully shook their heads when the national socialists and foremost of all the “Stuermer” exposed the criminal methods and criminal laws of the Jews. “But deceit, usury, falsehood are sins.” A boy in the class will cry out, “We are forbidden to commit them!” The teacher will ask: ‘Who forbade you to commit them?’ “Our conscience. The laws of the State, God.”

But if deceit, usury, falsehood, etc. are not crimes, not sin in the eyes of the Jews, then a Jew must have a different conscience, different laws, and a different God than we have, and thus the teacher and his pupils will suddenly find themselves thoroughly involved in the Jewish question and in its most serious aspect.

The manner in which he (the teacher) pursues the question with the children should make clear to them the fundamental reason for all Jewish acts.

One who has reached this stage of understanding, will inevitably remain an enemy of the Jews all his life and will instill this hatred into his own children.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VIII, pp. 30–32, Doc. M-46.

25. PROTECTIVE CUSTODY FOR JEWISH RACE DEFILERS, JUNE 12, 1937

This short directive was sent by Reinhard Heydrich, Heinrich Himmler's second-in-command, to various police offices. It is a chilling indicator of just how far the rule of law had fallen in the four years since Hitler's rise to power. Heydrich addressed how the law should treat a German man who had violated the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor by engaging in intimate relations with a Jewish woman and thus had become a "race defiler" (Rassenschänder). In response to an increase in race defilement, he ordered that each man who had been convicted of that crime and who had completed his mandated prison sentence should be considered a candidate for continuing confinement in "protective custody," presumably a status in the Nazi criminal justice system that could be continued indefinitely. In addition, he ordered that the Jewish woman involved in the incident should also be placed in "protective custody," even though she had not been subject to a prison term.

DIRECTIVE OF 12 JUNE 1937 FROM HEYDRICH,
CHIEF OF THE SECURITY POLICE, TO POLICE OFFICES, CONCERNING
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY FOR JEWISH RACE DEFILERS
Copy

The Chief of the Security Police Berlin, 12 June 1937
S-P (II B) No. 4021/37

[Handwritten] Annulled 28 August 1937
[Handwritten] Ku

Subject: Protective custody for Jewish race defiler.

From what I can see from a statistical survey, cases of race defilement have increased considerably recently. In order to take preventive measures against this danger, it is to be examined in every single case of race defilement whether protective custody is necessary after the sentence inflicted by law has been served.

For this purpose I request that a short report be made 1 month prior to the discharge of the condemned from prison with the valid judgment concerning the case of race defilement attached.

Apart from this I request that immediately after termination of legal proceedings in a case of race defilement in which a male person of German blood has been sentenced, the Jew-ess involved be taken into protective custody and reported to this office.

No publicity whatever is to be made of this order.

[Signed] HEYDRICH
S. Certified : [Signed] KASKATH
Clerk

To all—

Higher State Police Offices
State Police Offices
Higher State Police Offices
Criminal Police Offices

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 317–318, Doc. NG-326.

26. NEW LEGAL STATUS OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITIES, APRIL 5, 1938

This letter from Hugh R. Wilson, U.S. ambassador to Germany, to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, is a detailed description of a law effective March 31, 1938 (an English copy of which was enclosed) that changed the legal status of the Jewish community in Germany to the detriment of that community. Specifically, the law deprived the Jewish religious community of its status as a "corporation under public law," something it had long enjoyed and that continued to be enjoyed by the Protestant and Catholic communities. As Wilson explained, this change removed the Jewish community's right to rely on "the State to collect taxes for the support of their religious and welfare activities," thereby jeopardizing the community's ability to pay, for example, its clergy or to maintain its synagogues, schools, and welfare organizations. It was also feared that the law might subject the community to paying taxes on its assets, including its synagogues, cemeteries, and administrative buildings, all of which were protected from taxation by the legal status that was now being eliminated.

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES

Berlin, April 5, 1938

No. 74

Subject: New Legal Status of the Jewish Communities

The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose a copy of Gesetzblatt Part I, No. 45, of March 30, 1938, containing a law depriving the Jewish religious communities of the semi-public status they have enjoyed as "corporations under public law" (Körperschaften des öffentlichen Rechts) and reducing them to the position of private societies. An English translation of this law is likewise enclosed.

According to information received from authoritative Jewish sources, the Jewish religious communities, or Gemeinde, have until now possessed in each city privileges in some respects similar to the established churches, receiving protection from the State and being able to depend upon the State to collect taxes for the support of their religious and welfare activities. In the same sense that the Catholic and Protestant clergy are regarded as State officials, the Jewish Rabbis also enjoyed that privilege. As a result of the law referred to above, the Jewish communities now become merely private bodies with a status similar to that of other duly registered associations (eingetragene Vereine) or clubs.

It is provided that this change shall take place as of March 31. It may be noted that the law is considered to have become law last January 1, but by virtue of the fact that it was only promulgated March 30, the Jewish communities have thus been deprived of a three months' period of notice which might have made it easier for them to adjust themselves to the new arrangement. Application of the law to Austria remains for the time being in abeyance.

As judged by local Jewish authorities, the law may have the following effects. The Jewish Gemeinde may no longer receive, as of official right, the taxes levied upon their members by the state for the meeting of community expenses, such as the Rabbis' salaries, the upkeep of synagogues, Jewish schools and hospitals, relief work, old age pensions of contributing members and the payment of the salaries and pensions of officials of the community. It is understood, however, that it has been intimated to the officials of the Jewish communities that they may bring civil suit against non-paying members, just as certain other private associations and clubs are entitled to bring suit for the non-payment of dues. With the former legal basis removed whereby contributions were collected as State taxes, it is feared in some quarters that many members of the Jewish communities, particularly in the degree that they may suffer from the pressure of official and Party economic discrimination, may refuse to pay their contributions voluntarily, and it is perceived that the collection of these contributions by court process would be a costly procedure. On the other hand, certain other Jewish authorities rely upon the esprit de corps of the Jewish community members to induce them to continue to pay as contributions the sums they formerly paid as assessed taxes. It may be regarded as of some significance, however, that the competent Government officials have stated that they will refuse to divulge the sums formerly paid to the communities by individual members as taxes which in turn were based upon a proportion of the total income tax paid to the State.

Officials of the local Jewish community perceive that the law may work another hardship in that, following the termination of their public status, the communities may be called upon to pay taxes upon their property such as synagogues, cemeteries, administrative buildings, and so forth. Certain of the communities are understood, moreover, to possess archives and art collections of historic and intrinsic value, but they may not sell these (in order, possibly, to meet rising current expenses) without the permission of the Government.

While the new law in theory reduces the Jewish communities in Germany to the private status they occupy in other countries, it is nevertheless deplored as discriminatory, if taken in relation to the position that the other religious communities enjoy as established churches, and it is counted upon to hamper, to a degree that may possibly be very great, the social and welfare work of the already seriously harassed Jewish Gemeinde.

Respectfully yours
Hugh R. Wilson

Enclosures;

1. Copy of Reichsgesetzblatt Part I,
No.45 of March 30, 1938;
2. Translation of Law,
800
JDB-gw

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1709: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

27. DECREE FOR THE REPORTING OF JEWISH OWNED PROPERTY, APRIL 26, 1938

Expropriation of property owned by Jews in Germany was a goal of the Nazi Party from the very beginning of its rise to power, if not earlier. In order to accomplish that goal, the property to be expropriated had to be registered with the government. This decree implemented such a plan by defining who will be required to register their property and what property must be registered. The already difficult and tedious task of making this initial registration was compounded by the requirement that "every change of said individual's total property" that exceeded a certain threshold also had to be reported, making this an ongoing requirement. In addition to providing other details regarding the program, including penalties for failure to comply, this law included two provisions that were especially problematic. The first is its requirement that Jews of foreign citizenship must register their property. The second is the empowerment of the appropriate government official to make use of the reported property in the best interests of the German economy. The implications of this for the Jews of Germany could not have been made any clearer.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 414

Decree for the Reporting of Jewish Owned Property of 26 April 1938

On the basis of the Decree for the Execution of the Four Year Plan of 18 October 1936 (RGBl I, 887) the following is hereby decreed:

Article 1

1. Every Jew (Article 5 of the First Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 November 1935 (RGBl I, 1333)) shall report and evaluate in accordance with the following instructions his entire domestic and foreign property and estate on the day when this decree goes into force. Jews of foreign citizenship shall report and evaluate only their domestic property.

2. The duty to report holds likewise for the non-Jewish marital partner of a Jew.

3. Every reporting person's property must be given separately.

Article 2

1. Property in the sense of this law includes the total property of the person required to report, irrespective of whether it is exempt from any form of taxation or not.

2. It does not include movable objects used by the individual or house furnishings as far as the latter are not classed as luxury objects.

Article 3

1. Every part of the property shall be valued according to the usual value it has on the effective date of this regulation.

2. No report is necessary when the total worth of the property to be reported does not exceed 5000 marks.

Article 4

The report is to be presented on an official form by 30 June 1938, to the administrative official responsible at the place of residence of the reporting individual. When such a report is not possible by this date the responsible office can extend the period. In such case, however, an estimate is to be presented by 30 June 1938, together with a statement of the grounds of delay.

Article 5

1. The reporting individual must report, after this decree goes into force, to the responsible office, every change of said individual's total property as far as it exceeds a proper standard of living or normal business transactions.

2. The reporting requirement applies also to those Jews who were not required to report on the effective date of this regulation, but who have acquired property exceeding 5000 Reichsmarks in value, after this date. Article 1 (1) clause 2, shall apply respectively.

Article 6

1. The administrative offices responsible under this regulation are in Prussia—Highest Administrative Officer [Regierungspraesident] (in Berlin the Police President);

Bavaria—Highest Administrative Officer [Regierungspraesident]; Saxony—The District Head [Kreishauptmann]; Wurtemberg—The Minister of the Interior; Baden—The Minister of the Interior; Thuringen—Reich Governor [Reichsstatthalter]; Hessen—Reich Governor; Hamburg—Reich Governor; Mecklenburg—Ministry of the State, Interior Department; Oldenburg—Minister of Interior; Braunschweig—Ministry of Interior; Bremen—Senator for Administration of Interior; Anhalt—Ministry of State Interior Department; Lippe—Reich Governor (Land Government); Schaumburg-Lippe—Land Government; Saarland—The Reich Commissioner for the Saar.

2. Austria—The Reich Governor has jurisdiction. He may transfer his authority to another board.

Article 7

The Deputy for the Four Year Plan is empowered to take such necessary measures as may be necessary to guarantee the use of the reported property in accord with the necessities of German economy.

Article 8

1. Whoever wilfully or negligently fails to comply with this reporting requirement, either by omitting it, or making it incorrectly, or not within the time specified, or whoever acts contrary to any instruction issued pursuant to Article 7 by the Deputy of the Four Year Plan shall be punishable by imprisonment and by a fine or by both of these penalties, in particularly flagrant cases of wilful violation the offender may be condemned to hard labor up to ten years. The offender is punishable notwithstanding that the action was in a foreign country.

2. Any attempt to commit such actions is punishable.

3. In addition to the imposition of the penalties under (1), the property may be confiscated, insofar as it was involved in the criminal action. In addition to hard labor confiscation may be made. Where no specific individual can be prosecuted or convicted, confiscation may be decreed independently, where the prerequisites for confiscation warrant it.

Berlin, 26 April 1938

The Deputy for the Four Year Plan
Goering

General Field Marshal
The Reich Minister of the Interior
Frick

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 1001–1003, Doc. 1406-PS.

28. AMERICAN JEWS LIVING IN GERMANY AND REPORTING OF JEWISH PROPERTY, MAY 9, 1938

On April 26, 1938, German Jews and Jews of foreign citizenship were ordered to register total assets with the German government. This letter, dated two weeks later, is from Hugh R. Wilson, the U.S. ambassador to Germany, to Germany's minister for foreign affairs, Joachim von Ribbentrop, protesting the requirement that Jewish U.S. citizens must declare their property to a foreign government. The letter of protest cites the treaties that would be violated by the imposition of this requirement on U.S. citizens and notes that the protection afforded to foreign citizens in those treaties applies without regard to race or creed. Wilson requests a quick response to what he, on behalf of the U.S. government, sees as an urgent matter.

Abschrift.

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES

Berlin, May 9, 1938

No. 69

Excellency,

I have the honor to inform Your Excellency that I have been instructed by my Government to bring the following matter to the attention of the German Government.

On April 26, 1938, a decree was issued by the German Government and supplemented by instructions under which all Jews and their spouses whether German or foreign nationals are called upon to declare, subject to certain small exceptions, all property held in Germany while such declarations are not required from Germans generally nor from other foreigners. It appears further that the Commissioner for the Four-Year-Plan is authorized to use the fortunes so declared "in harmony with the requirements of German economy."

The Government of the United States considers that the application of measures of the nature indicated to the property of American citizens of the Jewish race would violate rights accorded American citizens under the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Consular Rights between the United States and Germany signed December 8, 1923. Article I of this treaty in part provides:

“The nationals of each of the high contracting parties shall be permitted to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other, to exercise liberty of conscience and freedom of worship; to engage in professional, scientific, religious, philanthropic, manufacturing and work of every kind without interference; to carry on every form of commercial activity which is not forbidden by the local law; to own, erect or lease and occupy appropriate buildings and to lease lands for residential, scientific, religious, philanthropic, manufacturing, commercial and mortuary purposes; to employ agents of their choice and generally to do anything incidental to or necessary for the enjoyment of any of the foregoing privileges upon the same terms as nationals of the state of residence or as nationals of the nation hereafter to be most favored by it, submitting themselves to all local laws and regulations duly established.

“The nationals of each high contracting party shall receive within the territories of the other, upon submitting to the conditions imposed upon its nationals, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property and shall enjoy in this respect that degree of protection that is required by international law. Their property shall not be taken without due process of law and without payment of just compensation.”

The foregoing provisions respecting rights in one country are applicable to all the nationals of the other country without exceptions based upon race or creed.

In view of the scope and purpose of the decree and its discriminatory character, the Government of the United States enters emphatic protest against its application to American citizens. It feels that on further consideration of the matter, the German Government will agree with the considerations set forth above and will give early assurance that the measures will not be applied to American citizens.

In view of the urgency which this matter presents, the Government of the United States would appreciate an early reply from the German Government.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

(sgd.) R. Wilson

His Excellency Joachim von Ribbentrop, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Berlin

Source: Nuernberg Doc. NG-1413. Also in Foreign Relations of the United States Diplomatic Paper, 1938: The British Commonwealth, Europe, Near East, and Africa, Vol. 2 (Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1954), Document 290.

29. THIRD REGULATION UNDER THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW, JUNE 14, 1938

Less than two months prior to the issuance of this regulation, all Jews were ordered to register the entirety of their property and estate with the German government. In keeping with that decree, this regulation orders the registration of all Jewish-owned industrial enterprises as well as any “societies, foundations, institutions and other enterprises which are not industrial undertakings.” Much of this regulation sets forth the conditions that caused an enterprise to be “considered as Jewish.” It also provides instructions regarding how and when registration is required, as well as the process by which a determination that an institution is Jewish can be appealed.

THIRD REGULATION UNDER THE REICH CITIZENSHIP
LAW, 14 JUNE 1938, STATING THE CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISES ARE CONSIDERED JEWISH, THE REGISTRATION OF JEWISH
ENTERPRISES, AND RELATED MATTERS
Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law,
14 June 1938, 1938
Reichsgesetzblatt, Part I, Page 627

On the basis of section 3 of the Reich Citizenship Law of 15 September 1935 (Reichsgesetzblatt, pt. I, p. 1146), the following is decreed:

Article I

Section 1

(1) An industrial enterprise is deemed to be Jewish if the owner is a Jew (sec. 5 of the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 Nov. 1935, Reichsgesetzblatt, pt. I, p. 1333).

(2) The industrial enterprise of a private partnership or a limited partnership is considered to be Jewish if one or more of the personally liable partners are Jews.

(3) The industrial enterprise of a legal person is considered as Jewish

1098 Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law

- (a) if one or more of the persons appointed as legal representatives or one or more of the members of the supervisory board of directors are Jews;
- (b) if Jews have a decisive interest in the concern by capital or by votes. Decisive interest by capital is obtained if more than one-fourth of the capital belongs to Jews; decisive interest by votes is obtained if the votes of Jews attain one-half of all votes.

(4) The provisions of (3) apply equally to companies operating under the mining laws but having no legal personality.

Section 2

If, in the case of a limited liability company or a joint stock company in which at least one holder is personally liable, no Jew was a member of the Vorstand or of the Aufsichtsrat on 1 January 1938, it is assumed that Jews are not decisively interested by capital or votes (sec. 1, 3b). The opposite is assumed on the date mentioned above one or more of the members of the Vorstand or of the Aufsichtsrat were Jews.

Section 3

An industrial enterprise is also considered as Jewish if it is under the dominant influence of Jews.

Section 4

(1) A branch of a Jewish industrial enterprise is considered a Jewish industrial enterprise.

(2) A branch of a non-Jewish industrial enterprise is considered a Jewish industrial enterprise if the manager or one of several managers of the branch is a Jew.

Section 5

The Reich Minister of Economics may allow exceptions to the provision in section 1 (3) (a) up to 1 April 1940.

Section 6

The provisions in sections 1, 3, and 4 apply equally to societies, foundations, institutions and other enterprises which are not industrial undertakings.

Article II

Section 7

(1) Jewish industrial enterprises shall be entered into a register. The Reich Minister of the Interior designates the authorities where the register shall be kept.

(2) Registration of industrial enterprise in which Jews of foreign nationality are interested requires the approval of the Reich Minister of Economics.

Section 8

(1) Entry in the register is decided by the authorities (sec. 7).

(2) The decision must be delivered to the owner of the industrial enterprise. Within a time limit of 2 weeks of delivery he may lodge a protest.

Section 9

(1) The deciding authority (sec. 8) can remedy the protest; if it refuses to do so, it must submit the case to the superior administrative authority for decision.

(2) The superior administrative authority also decides in other cases of doubt.

(3) Within 2 weeks of notification, the owner of the industrial enterprise is entitled to lodge a further protest with the Reich Minister of Economics against the decision of the superior administrative authority.

Section 10

(1) The protest (sec. 8 (2), sec. 9 (3)) must be submitted in writing to the authority whose decision is being contested and must be substantiated.

(2) In case of blameless failure to observe the time limit for lodging a protest, protest may be lodged subsequently.

Section 11

Entry of an industrial enterprise in the register will be effected when the decision to enter the industrial enterprise has become incontestable.

Section 12

If the conditions leading to registration cease to exist, the industrial enterprise is canceled in the register. If the owner of the industrial enterprise claims that the conditions have ceased to exist and if his application for cancellation is rejected, the provisions governing protestation (sec. 8 (2), sec. 9, sec. 10) apply.

Section 13

In the Province of Austria the foregoing administrative provisions are replaced by the provisions of the General Administrative Procedure Law (OeBGB1. No. 274-1925). Protests are under section 8 (2), section 9 and section 12 are deemed to be appeals.

Section 14

A decision of the superior administrative authority or of the Reich Minister of Economics may also be applied for by the competent Gauleiter of the National Socialist Party.

Section 15

Inspection of the register is open to everyone.

Section 16

Lists or compilations of Jewish or non-Jewish industrial enterprises may only be made according to the official list.

Article III

Section 17

The Reich Minister of Economics is empowered, in agreement with the Reich Minister of the Interior and the Deputy of the Fuehrer to decree that industrial enterprises entered in the register of Jewish industrial enterprises must bear a distinguishing mark after a date still to be fixed.

Berlin, 14 June 1938

Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

Deputy of the Fuehrer
R. HESS

Reich Minister of Economics
WALTHER FUNK

Reich Minister of Justice
DR. GUERTNER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. VI, pp. 477–479, Doc. 1404-PS.

30. DECREE EXCLUDING JEWISH DOCTORS FROM PRACTICE, JULY 25, 1938

The licenses of Jewish doctors were terminated by this decree as of September 30, 1938, and no new licenses were allowed to be issued. Exceptions could be granted by the Reich minister of the interior, but even then the doctor's practice had to be limited to his wife, legitimate children, and Jewish patients.

Jewish doctors who practiced medicine in violation of this decree were subject to one year in prison and/or a fine. The economic impact on Jewish doctors prohibited from practicing was addressed in this decree but only for doctors who had been frontline soldiers in World War I and then only to the extent of a "maintenance subsidy" that the chamber of Reich doctors might choose to provide.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 969.

4th Decree relative to the Reich Citizen Law of 25 July 1938.

By virtue of Section 3 of the Reich Citizen Law of 15 Sept, 1935, (RGBl. I. p. 1146), the following is ordered:

Section I.

Appointment approvals of Jewish physicians expire on Sept. 30, 1938.

Section II.

The Reich Minister of the Interior or the Authority appointed by him, may authorize, on the recommendation of the Reich Chamber⁷ of Physicians [Reichsarstekammer]—the practice of medicine physicians until further notice whose appointment has expired by virtue of Section I. The permission may be granted by imposing taxes

Section III.

1. Jews, whose appointment approval has expired and who have not received an authorization, by virtue of Section II, are forbidden to practice medicine.

2. A Jew who has received an authorization by virtue of Section II must, with the exception of his wife and legitimate children, only treat Jews.

3. Whoever violates the regulations of Subsection I or II, either deliberately or carelessly, will be sentenced to one year of prison and a fine, or to either one of those punishments.

Section IV.

A Jew cannot be licensed as a physician.

Section V.

1. Physicians, whose appointment expired, according to the regulations of this decree, may be given, revocable at any time, a maintenance subsidy by the chamber of Reich physicians, in the case of want and worthiness, if they have been frontline soldiers. * * *

1100 Regarding the Exclusion of Jewish Doctors from Practice

2. The chamber of Reich-physicians will decide upon further details in agreement with the Reich-Minister of the Interior and the Reich Minister of Finance.

Bayreuth July 25, 1938.

The Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor, Adolf Hitler

The Reich Minister of the Interior, Frick

The Deputy of the Fuehrer, R. Hess

The Reich-Minister of Justice, Dr. Guertner.

The Reich-Minister of Finance by order : Reinhardt.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 533–534, Doc. 2872-PS.

31. REGARDING THE EXCLUSION OF JEWISH DOCTORS FROM PRACTICE, AUGUST 13, 1938

This letter from Hugh R. Wilson, U.S. ambassador to Germany, to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, addressed the impact of the Fourth Decree relative to the Reich Citizen Law of July 25, 1938, which prohibited Jewish doctors, with very few exceptions, from practicing medicine. Including statistics regarding Jewish doctors and non-Jewish doctors taken from a survey presented by Völkischer Beobachter (the Nazi newspaper), Wilson observes that the elimination of Jewish doctors from practice had been a long-held goal of the Nazi government and represented another step in the Nazi program of excluding Jews from the professions. He also comments on a seemingly unrelated matter, namely stories circulating about the treatment of Jews in Buchenwald, the largest concentration camp in Germany. When taken together, both actions by the Nazis—eliminating Jews from the medical profession and abusing Jewish prisoners in Buchenwald, prisoners who upon their release spread terror throughout the Jewish community by recounting what happened to them—served the same purpose: to strongly encourage Jews to leave Germany.

Berlin, August 13, 1938

No. 288

Subject: The Jewish Situation with Particular Reference to the Exclusion of Jewish Doctors from Practice

The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

Sir:

Referring to the Embassy's telegrams No. 374 of August 3, 5 p.m., and August 4, 4 p.m., I have the honor to enclose copies of REICHSGESETZBLATT, Part I, No. 122 of August 2, 1938, containing a law which terminates as of September 30, 1938, the validity of licenses to practice held by Jewish physicians. An English translation of this law is also enclosed.

The VOELKISCHER BEOBACHTER of August 4 presented a survey of the number of doctors who will be affected by the law. It explained that at the beginning of 1933 there were 6,480 Jewish doctors in Germany, including the "non-Aryan" crossbreeds and those with Jewish wives (the latter two categories, however, being numerically unimportant inasmuch as most of the Jewish doctors were full-blooded Jews). In the old Reich territory there are at present 4,220 Jewish doctors, 3,738 of whom actively engage in practice. The total number of doctors in the old Reich territory is given as 37,525, the Jews therefore representing roughly 10 percent of this figure. As of July of this year there were 6,949 doctors in Berlin, 1,561, or 22.4 percent of whom were Jews. Despite the steps hitherto taken to eject Jewish doctors from the more profitable of the various state sickness insurance institutions (see despatch No. 3832 of January 17, 1938), it would appear from VOELKISCHER BEOBACHTER'S survey that 816 Jewish doctors still work for these organizations in Berlin. The VOELKISCHER BEOBACHTER makes no attempt to describe the situation in Austria beyond mentioning that the proportion of Jewish physicians in Vienna is probably still greater.

It has been an open secret for a long time that the National Socialist authorities have been determined to exclude Jewish doctors, but have until now refrained from doing so for fear of creating a shortage of physicians when they were particularly needed to meet the requirements of a greatly expanded army. Even with the entry into practice of the new corps of young doctors who have been pressed into service with abbreviated periods of training, it would seem doubtful whether the sweeping removal of 22.4 percent of the doctors in Berlin, for instance, will not create a serious shortage.

Official commentaries explain that the licenses which henceforth will be granted certain Jewish doctors by way of exception will be issued only to a limited number of physicians to enable them to care for Jewish patients in cities where numerous and compact concentrations of Jews are to be found, as in Berlin and Vienna. The provision in the law with respect to the summary denunciation of rent contracts is interesting. On the one hand it seems designed to assist Jewish doctors to free themselves from leases likely to prove onerous in view of the curtailment of their incomes. On the other hand it also enables landlords to rid themselves of Jewish tenants. This they are invited to do by the Berlin association of house-owners which explains that a shortage of premises has been a detriment in the past to "Aryan" doctors. The association requests landlords to inform it of possible vacancies which it in turn will endeavor to fill with "Aryan" doctors.

The preamble to the DEUTSCHES NACHRICHTEN BÜRO announcement of the enactment of the doctors law is worthy of notes. It states: "The Jewish question in Germany will be solved step by step, but resolutely, by legal ways." The proof of this assertion may be found in the recent and progressive exclusion of Jews from a number of professions such as watchman's services, private detective work, trading in real estate, etc., (see Embassy's despatch No. 246 of July 16, 1938). Incidentally the law canceling the licenses of Jews to engage in itinerant trades is being employed to deny them activity as travelling salesmen and commercial agents. The approximate coincidence of all these measures with the meeting and conclusion of the Evian Refugee Conference is perhaps too striking to necessitate further comment.

At present wide circulation is being given to extraordinary stories with respect to conditions in the new concentration camp at Buchenwald near Weimar where it is estimated that some 1,500 Jews are being detained (see Embassy's despatch No. 196 of June 22, 1938). While some of these stories appear somewhat extreme, such as the report that Jewish victims are being utilized to test the efficacy of new poison gases, the accounts of relatives of inmates and released prisoners seem to indicate that brutality and sadism are being practiced by the guards on a scale that has not been equalled since the early days of the regime in 1933. That the primary purpose of the camp is to encourage emigration rather than to punish specific delicts, is evident from statement received at the Consulate General from persons who have been released with the warning that if they did not leave the country by a certain date they would be reincarcerated. It is not too much to say that the apparently indiscriminate (sic) arrests without specific cause has created a state of near terror in many Jewish circles.

In accordance with the Department's circular instruction of July 21, 1938, two copies of this despatch are being sent to the American Embassy, London, for the attention of the American Representative on the Inter-governmental Committee for Political Refugees.

Respectfully yours,
Hugh R. Wilson

Enclosures:

1. REICHSGRESETZBLATT I, 122
 2. Translation of law.
- File 800
JDB-MJP

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1777: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

32. SECOND DECREE FOR THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE LAW REGARDING CHANGES OF FAMILY NAMES, AUGUST 17, 1938

By August 1938, the campaign against the Jews took something of a bizarre step with the issuance of this decree as a supplement to an earlier law regarding Jewish surnames and given names. Referring to a list that had previously been published of acceptable given names for Jews, this decree requires that any Jew with a given name not on the list must assume the middle name of Israel, for men, and Sara, for women. Further, the assumption of these names is required to be reported at the office at which the person's "birth and marriage are registered," as well as to the appropriate police office. The decree ends with penalties for its violation. The fact that the government had published a list of "Jewish given names," mandated these middle names for Jews with given names not on the list, and would require two months later that each Jew's passport have a large capital letter J on it, reflected the growing focus on identifying—and making public the identification of—Jews as a means of further stigmatizing them in German society.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PAGE 1044, 17 Aug. 1938

The second decree for the execution of the law regarding the change of the surnames and forenames of 17th August 1938.

1102 Elimination of the Jews from the Bar

On the basis of Article 13, of the law of 5 January 1938 (Reichsgesetzblatt I.S.9) concerning the change of the surnames and given-names, the following is ordered:

Art. 1

1. Jews may be given only such given-names as are cited in the directives issued by the Ministry of Interior concerning the utilization of given-names.

2. Para. (1) is not applicable to Jews who are foreign citizens.

Art. 2

1. In so far as the Jews are still using some other given-names different from those which are at their disposal according to Art. 1,—they are obliged to assume by the 1st January 1939, a second, additional given-name as follows; for males, the given name Israel and for females the given-name Sara.

2. The person having to assume an additional forename according to para (1) is obliged to give a written notification in this matter to the registration office at which his birth, and marriage are registered. The same notification is to be given to the proper police-official in the registerer's place of residence or customary habitat. The notifications are to be reported within a month from the date requiring him to assume an additional given-name.

3. In so far as the birth or marriage of the person who must register has been verified by a German diplomatic representative of a Consul, or has been verified in a German protectorate,—the notification, which must be made, is to be forwarded to the Register-Office I, Berlin. If the place of residence or customary habitat of the person registering is abroad, the notification in question, mentioned in Para (2), sentence (1) is to be forwarded to the competent German Consul instead of to the competent police-official.

4. For people who are unable, or are partially unable to conduct their own affairs, the obligation to register rests upon the legal representative.

Art. 3

As far as is customary in juridicial and business procedure to indicate the given-names, the Jews are obliged always to indicate at least one of their given-names. In so far as they are required to assume an additional given-name as mentioned in Art. 2,—this additional given-name is to be indicated also. The present directives regarding the management of a business are not hereby altered.

Art. 4

1. Whoever deliberately disobeys the directives of Art. 3 is to be punished by imprisonment of up to six months. Cases of negligent disobedience will be punished by imprisonment of no more than one month.

2. Whoever deliberately or carelessly neglects to give the proper notification according to Art. 2 is to be fined or punished by imprisonment of no more than one month.

Berlin, 17th, August 1938.

Reichs Minister of the Interior:
Representative, Dr. Stuckart.
Reichs Minister of Justice:
Dr. Guertner.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 185–186, Doc. 1674-PS.

33. ELIMINATION OF THE JEWS FROM THE BAR, SEPTEMBER 27, 1938

The April 7, 1933, Law Regarding Admission to the Bar reduced the number of Jewish lawyers allowed to practice law, but due to exceptions included in it and the fact that it did not impose mandatory disbarment, a not insignificant number of Jewish lawyers continued in their profession. This was changed, however, by this Fifth Decree to the Law Relating to the Reich Citizenship, making elimination of Jewish lawyers from the bar mandatory, with only a very limited exception. The application of the law is set forth separately for Germany and for Austria, which was annexed by Germany and became a part of the Reich on March 12, 1938.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, NO. 165, PAGE 1403.
Fifth Decree to the law relating to the Reich Citizenship of 27 September 1938.

Article I.

Elimination of the Jews from the Bar (Attorneyship).

Section 1.

Jews are excluded from the profession of a lawyer. In as much as Jews are still lawyers they are to be eliminated from the bar pursuant to the following provisions:

Old Reich

a. Within the Territory:

The admission of Jewish lawyers to the bar is to be discontinued as from 10 November 1938.

b. Within the country of Austria:

1. On order of the Reich-Minister of Justice Jewish lawyers have to be taken off the roster of lawyers until 31 December 1938 at the latest.

2. Jews, however, who are entered on the roster of the Chamber of Lawyers [Reichs-anwaltskammer i.e. Bar Association] in Vienna, whose family has been resident in Austria at least 50 years and which have been fighting in the front-line may be exempted from the deletion for the time being. In this case the movement of deletion will be determined by the Minister of Justice.

3. The Reich Minister of Justice may forbid a lawyer to exercise his profession for the time being, until it will be decided, whether a deletion from the roster of lawyers will be effected.

Signatories:

The Fuehrer and Reich-Chancellor,
Adolf Hitler

The Reich Minister of Justice
Dr. Gursner

The Reich Minister of Interior
Frick

The Deputy of the Fuehrer
R. Hess

The Reich Minister of Finance
(in the name of Reinhardt)

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 535, Doc. 2874-PS.

34. POLICE REGULATION OF THE APPEARANCE OF JEWS IN PUBLIC, NOVEMBER 28, 1938

This short regulation gave local authorities the power to impose restrictions on Jews as to which parts of a city they could enter and when they were allowed to be out in public. Its brevity belies its importance. In many ways it was the precursor of ghettoization, which restricted the Jews to a single, often walled-off location and, by enclosing Jews in a single area, eliminated altogether their ability to be seen in public, meaning, in this case, seen by non-Jewish Germans. Note the date of this regulation: it came less than three weeks after the infamous Kristallnacht, which resulted in widespread government-initiated and organized violence against Jews and their property, including their synagogues. This regulation continued the process of othering of the Jews that was so central to the Holocaust.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 1676
Police Regulation of the Appearance of Jews in Public of 28 November 1938

On the basis of the Decree of 14 November 1938 Regarding the Police Decrees of the Reich Ministers (Reichsgesetzblatt I, P. 1582), the following is decreed:

ARTICLE 1

The Government Presidents in Prussia, Bavaria, and the Sudeten German areas, the proper authorities in the remaining provinces of the old Reich, the district captains (the Mayor in Vienna) in Austria and the Reich of the Saar district may impose upon Jews, both subjects of the German State and stateless Jews (Article 5 of the First Decree of 14 November 1935, Regarding the Reich Citizen Law, Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 1333), restrictions as to place and time to the effect that they may not enter certain districts or may not appear in public at certain times.

ARTICLE 2

Whoever wilfully or negligently violates the regulations of Article I is to be fined up to 150 Reichsmarks or punished with imprisonment up to six weeks.

ARTICLE 3

This police decree goes into effect the day after its promulgation.

Berlin, 28 November 1938

The Reich Minister of Interior

By order:

Heydrich.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 6–7, Doc. 1415-PS.

35. REGULATION FOR THE ELIMINATION OF JEWS FROM THE ECONOMIC LIFE OF GERMANY, NOVEMBER 12, 1938

This regulation was issued by Hermann Göring in his capacity as plenipotentiary of the Four-Year Plan, a comprehensive economic plan for the years 1936 through 1939. Coming just days after the anti-Jewish violence of Kristallnacht that swept through Germany and Austria, it represented the achievement of two major goals of the Nazi government: elimination of the Jews from Germany's economy supported the basic Nazi party ideology that Jews were seeking total control not only of Germany's but of the whole world's economy, and by shutting off virtually all means available to Jews to earn a living, it exerted further pressure on Jews to emigrate. The regulation is comprehensive, barring Jews from operating a retail shop or managing a firm as well as selling goods or services or being a member of a cooperative society.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 1580
Order eliminating Jews from German economic life of 12 November 1938

On the basis of the Decree of 18 October 1936 for the execution of the Four Year Plan (RGBl I, p. 887), the following is ordered:

Article 1

1. From January 1, 1938, operation of retail shops, mail order houses, independent exercise of handicrafts is forbidden to Jews. (Article 5 of the First Decree to Reich citizenship law [Reichsbürgergesetz] of 14 Nov 1935—RGBl I, 1933).
2. Moreover it is forbidden to Jews from the same date to offer goods or services in the markets of all kinds, fairs, or exhibitions or to advertise such or accept orders therefor.
3. Jewish shops operated in violation of this order will be closed by police. (Third Decree to Reich citizenship law of 14 June 1938-RGBl I, 627).

Article 2

1. No Jew can manage a firm according to the interpretation of the term "manager" under the law for national labor of 20 Jan 1934. (RGBl I, 45).
2. If a Jew is a leading employee in a business concern he may be dismissed with notice of six weeks. At expiration of this period all claims resulting from the employee's contract, especially claims of compensation or pensions, become null.

Article 3

1. No Jew can be a member of a cooperative society.
2. Jewish members of cooperatives lose membership from 21 Dec 1938. No notice is necessary.

Article 4

Competent Reich Ministers are empowered to issue rules required by this decree. They may permit exceptions so far as this is necessary for transfer of Jewish firms into non-Jewish hands or for liquidation of Jewish concerns and in special cases in order to insure supplies. Berlin, 12 November 1938

The Commissioner for the Four Year Plan
Goering
General Field Marshal

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 172–173, Doc. 1662-PS.

36. JEWS BANNED FROM UNIVERSITIES, NOVEMBER 15, 1938

Announced in the Völkischer Beobachter (the Nazi newspaper) less than a week after the anti-Jewish violence of Kristallnacht that swept through Germany and Austria, this decree banned Jewish students from German universities by prohibiting them from lectures, exercises, and even entering university buildings. It referenced an April 1933 law that severely reduced the number of Jews allowed in universities but allowed some to remain, especially in the sciences. Consistent with the ever-tightening restrictions on Jews issued throughout 1938, the university doors were now literally closed to Jews. This was yet another blow to any in the Jewish community who still hoped for some normalization of relations between them and the broader German community.

VOELKISCHER BEOBACHTER
15/16 November 1938
UNIVERSITIES BARRED FOR JEWS

A decree of the Reich Minister for Education taking immediate effect.

It is known that the Reich Minister for Science, Training, and Education for a long time has admitted Jews to the German universities to a very modest extent only. The draft of a bill now in preparation provides that in future no more Jews will be admitted to German universities.

The indignation of the German people aroused by the infamous crime of the Jew Gruenspan called for immediate action as German students cannot be expected to work along with Jews in the universities and their installations any longer. Reich Minister Rust, therefore has ordered the rectors of German universities by telegraph to prohibit Jews from participating in the lectures and exercises as well as from entering the university buildings.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 371, Doc. 2683-PS.

37. ORDER CONCERNING UTILIZATION OF JEWISH PROPERTY, DECEMBER 3, 1938

This order by Reich minister for economic affairs Walther Funk and Reich minister of the interior Wilhelm Frick addressed the disposition of various assets owned by Jews in the Third Reich. It focused specifically on industrial enterprises; real estate and other properties; stocks, bonds, and similar securities; and jewels, gems, and objects of art. Relative to those assets, Jews could be ordered to sell or liquidate an industrial enterprise and sell real estate or other properties, in whole or in part. They were required to deposit securities at a foreign exchange bank and were prohibited from acquiring, pawning, or selling jewels, gems, or objects of art. This order was actually counterproductive for the Nazis. If their goal was to have more Jews emigrate, this order as well as others turned wealthy Jews into poor Jews, exactly the type of emigrant other countries were loathe to accept.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 1709
Order concerning the Utilization of Jewish Property of December 1938

On the basis of Article 1 of the Second Regulation by the Administrator for the Four Year Plan based on the Decree of November 24, 1938 for the Reporting of Jewish-owned Property (RGBl. I, 1668), the following is decreed in cooperation with the competent Reich Ministers:

Chapter I Industrial Enterprises

Article 1

The owner of a Jewish industrial enterprise (Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 June 1938, RGBl. I 627) may be ordered to sell or liquidate the enterprise within a definite time. Certain conditions may be stipulated in the order.

Article 2

1. A trustee may be appointed for Jewish industrial enterprises, the owners of which have been ordered to sell or liquidate (Article 1), for the temporary continuation of the enterprise and for the completion of the sale or liquidation, especially if the owner of the enterprise has not complied with the order within the definite period and his application for an extension of time has been rejected.

2. The trustee is empowered to undertake all judicial and extra-judicial actions and legal measures, which the business of the enterprise, its liquidation or sale require. His authority replaces any legally required power of attorney.

3. The trustee must exercise the care of a responsible businessman and is subject to State control.

4. The owner of the enterprise is to pay the expenses of the trustee in connection with his work.

Article 3

1. The owner of the Jewish industrial enterprise is to be notified of the instructions specified in Articles 1 and 2.

2. In case of absence of the person affected, notification may take place through publication in the Deutsche Reichsanzeiger and Preussische Staatsanzeiger. In these cases the day of publication is to be considered the day of notification.

Article 4

As soon as the owner of the enterprise is notified of the order through which a trustee is appointed according to Article 2, he loses the right to dispose of the property for the administration of which the trustee has been appointed. He regains this right only if the appointment of the trustee expires.

Article 5

The consent for the sale according to Article 1 of the Decree based on the Decree of April 26, 1938, for the Reporting of Jewish-owned Property (RGBl. I, 415) is necessary also in such cases in which the sale has been ordered; this also applies to the sale by a trustee.

1106 Order Concerning Utilization of Jewish Property

Chapter II Land and Forest Enterprises

Real Estate and other Property

Article 6

A Jew (Article 5 of the First Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of November 14, 1935) (RGBl I, 1333), may be ordered to sell wholly or partly his land or forest enterprise, his other land or forest properties, his other real estate or other properties within a definite time. Certain conditions may be stipulated in the order. The regulations of Article 2 to 4 are to be applied accordingly.

Article 7

1. Jews cannot legally acquire real estate and mortgages.
2. The regulations of Article 2, 4, 5 and 6 of the Decrees based on the Decree of 26 April 1938, for the Reporting of Jewish-owned Property (RGBl I, 415) are to be applied accordingly.
3. At the foreclosure of real estate, the court ordering such sale must reject bids if there is reason to suspect that the bidder is a Jew.
4. The rejection according to Paragraph 3 loses its force if the bidder protests against it immediately (Article 72, paragraph 2 of the Law Regarding Foreclosure) and if he proves that he is not a Jew.
5. If, as is provided in (4) the bidder protests the rejection of an offer, the decision on the public adjudication must not be made before two weeks after the conclusion of the auction.

Article 8

1. Jews require authorization to dispose of real estate and mortgages. They require authorization to dispose of other property if the sale has been ordered according to Section 6 of this decree. This also applies in the case of a trustee disposing of said property.
2. The regulations of (1) also apply to contracts in which an obligation to sell is assumed.
3. The regulations of Article 1 (2) and Article 2 of the Regulation under the Decree of 26 April 1938 for the Reporting of Jewish-owned Property (RGBl. I, 415) are to be applied accordingly. In disposing of immovable property, the regulations of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of said Decree are also to be applied accordingly.
4. In case of foreclosure of a piece of land, the bidder requires authorization for his bid; a bid for which the necessary authorization is not proven immediately is to be rejected. Where the Reich Law regarding Foreclosure and Forced Administration is in force, in cases of Article 81, (2) of said law, public adjudication to a person other than the highest bidder is permissible only if the person can prove that consent was for this deal.

Article 9

1. The authorization according to Article 8 replaces those authorizations required according to the Regulation regarding Traffic in Real Estate of 26 January 1937 (RGBl I, 35), the Settlements (RGBl I, 659), the First Decree for the Execution of the Law of 17 August 1937, Regarding the Protection of the Reich Frontiers and Reprisals (RGBl I, 905) as well as according to price fixing regulations.
2. At the sale of land or forest enterprises or the granting of usufruct in such enterprises, the authorization according to Article 8 replaces the authorization according to Article 1 of the decree based on the Decree of 26 April 1938 for the Reporting of Jewish-owned Property.

Article 10

1. If a Jew sells a piece of land which is situated within the confines of Berlin, the Reich Capital Berlin has a right of preemption for the purpose of carrying out the measures of the General Building Inspector for the rebuilding of the City.
2. Articles 12 and 13 of the Decree of 5 November 1937 Regarding the Reconstruction of the Reich Capital Berlin (RGBl I, 1162) are to be applied accordingly.
3. The right of preemption does not exist if the Reich, one of the German States, or the National Socialist Party is involved in the legal transaction as a buyer.

Chapter III Compulsory Deposit of Securities

Article 11

1. Within a week after this decree goes into effect, Jews must deposit all their stocks, shares in mines, bonds, and similar securities at a foreign exchange bank. New securities must be deposited within a week after their acquisition. The holder of securities belonging to a Jew may not deliver them to anyone but a foreign exchange bank for the account of the Jew.
2. Insofar as securities are already deposited at a foreign exchange bank on behalf of Jews or titles registered or coupons deposited with an administrative authority for which preferred annuities will be granted, the Jews must immediately notify the said bank, the Administration of Public Loans or the administrative authority by a written declaration of the fact that they are Jews. In case of (1) Sentence 3, this declaration must be made to the said holder.

3. The deposits and the registered titles are to be marked as Jewish.

Article 12

The disposing of securities deposited as Jewish, as well as the release of such securities require the consent of the Reich Minister of economics or an authority named by him.

Article 13

The provisions of Articles 11 and 12 do not apply to foreign Jews.

Chapter IV Jewels, Gems and Objects of Art

Article 14

1. Jews are forbidden to acquire, pawn or sell objects of gold, platinum or silver as well as precious stones and pearls. Such objects, except in the case of existence of attachments on behalf of a non-Jewish creditor at the time when this decree goes into effect may only be acquired by public purchasing offices, established by the Reich. The same applies to other jewels and objects of art insofar as the price of the individual objects exceeds one thousand Reichsmarks.

2. The provisions of (1) does not apply to foreign Jews.

Chapter V General Regulations

Article 15

1. The authorization for the sale of Jewish enterprises, Jewish real estate, or other Jewish property can be given under conditions that may consist in the payment of money by the buyer on behalf of the Reich.

2. Authorizations of the kind mentioned in Paragraph 1 may also be granted with the proviso that the Jewish seller is to receive obligations of the German Reich or registered titles against the German Reich instead of the total or partial consideration as provided for in the sales contract.

Article 16

The regulations specified for Jews in Article II also apply to industrial enterprises as well as organizations, foundations, institutions, and other enterprises which are not industrial, insofar as they are to be considered Jewish according to the Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 June 1938 (RGBl I, 627).

Article 17

1. The higher administrative authorities are qualified to issue instructions based on the regulations of Article I and II insofar as the special provisions of Paragraphs 3 and 4 are not to be applied. The higher administrative authorities are also to supervise the appointed trustees.

2. Section 6 of the Decree of 26 April 1938 determines which authorities are higher administrative authorities within the meaning of this Decree Regarding the Registration of Jewish Property (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 414) with the proviso that the following authorities are qualified:

In Anhalt—the Anhalt State Ministry, Department of Economics;

In Baden—the Baden Minister of Finance and Economics;

In Wuerttemberg—the Wuerttemberg Minister of Economics;

In Austria—the Reich Commissar for the Reunion of Austria with the German Reich or the authorities named by him;

In the Sudeten German territories—the Government Presidents.

3. Insofar as it is a question of agricultural property, the Oberpraesident in Prussia (Agricultural Department) and the Higher Settlement Authorities in the non-Prussian States take the place of the higher administrative authorities. Insofar as it is a question of forest property, the Higher Forest Authorities take the place of the higher administrative authorities.

* * * * *

[Articles 18 to 23 are not necessary for understanding of law]

Article 24

This decree goes into effect on the day of publication.

Berlin, 3 December 1938

Reich Minister of Economic Affairs,
Walter Funk

Reich Minister of Interior
Frick

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 1–6, Doc. 1409-PS.

38. DECISIONS BY HITLER ON THE JEWISH QUESTION, RE: HOUSING, PROPERTY, AND SEGREGATION, DECEMBER 28, 1938

Hermann Gohring, plenipotentiary of the Four-Year Plan and Reichsmarschall, presents here a number of decisions by Hitler regarding the Jews. First, Hitler ordered that certain rules be followed regarding Jews as tenants, pronounced real estate as the last resource to be aryanized, prohibited Jews from using sleepers and dining cars on trains, and addressed things such as bans on swimming pools, pensions to Jewish civil servants, and the need to allow Jewish social care to continue lest Jews become a public burden. Second, Hitler gave instructions regarding mixed marriages, with and without children. Most interesting is the final paragraph of this document, which speaks of the status of a German woman married to a Jewish man. While married she is to be treated, under certain circumstance, as a "pure Jew." If she divorces her husband, she "returns to the German blood-kinship." Moving from the status of one whose blood was tainted to one whose blood was pure, simply because of the legal dissolution of a marriage, is difficult to fit logically in the Nazi blood-centric ideology.

NATIONAL SOCIALIST GERMAN WORKERS PARTY

The Deputy of the Fuehrer, Staff Director
Munich 33, Brown House, January 17, 1939

SECRET

Regulation No 1/39 g

Subject: Jews

After a report of General Field Marshal Goering the Fuehrer has made some basic decisions regarding the Jewish question. The decisions are brought to your attention in the enclosure. Strict compliance with these directives is requested.

Signed: M BORMANN

1 enclosure

Distribution: III b

Official:

[signed : signature illegible]

Office Rosenberg, Rec'd Nr 5827 Jan 19, 39; filed Feb 2
Submitted to

RL Jan 19

Urban Jan 20

Schickedanz Feb 13

COPY

Berlin, Dec 28, 1938

Minister President General Field Marshal Goering, Commissioner for the Four Year Plan

SECRET

Pursuant to my report the Fuehrer has made the following decisions on the Jewish question.

A.

I: Housing of Jews

1. a. Protective regulations for tenants will not be generally revoked in the case of Jews. It is desirable, however, to proceed in individual cases in such a way that Jews will live together in one house, as much as feasible under rental conditions.

b. For this reason the arianization of real estate will be the last step of the total arianization, that means that at present real estate is only to be arianized in individual cases where there are compelling reasons. An immediate concern is the arianization of plants and business enterprises, farm property, forests, etc.

2. The use of sleepers and dining cars is to be prohibited for Jews. Apart from that no separate Jew-compartments must be arranged for. Neither should any bans be pronounced regarding the use of railways, streetcars, subways, buses and ships.

3. The ban for Jews is to be pronounced only for certain public establishments etc. This includes such hotels and restaurants which are mainly visited by Party members (for instance: Hotel Kaiserhof, Berlin; Hotel Vierjahreszeiten Munich; Hotel Deutscher Hof, Nurnberg; Hotel Drei Mohren, Augsburg, etc.) The ban can further be pronounced for swimming pools, certain public squares, resort towns, etc. Mineral baths may, in individual cases and if prescribed by a doctor, be used by Jews, but only in a manner not causing offense.

II. Pensions are not to be denied to Jews who have been civil servants and who have been pensioned. It is to be investigated, however, whether those Jews can manage on a smaller pension.

III. Jewish social care is not to be arianized or to be abolished, so that Jews will not become a public burden but can be cared for by Jewish institutions.

IV. Jewish patents are property values and therefore to be arianized too. (A similar procedure was used during the World War by America and other states pertaining to German citizens.)

B.

Mixed Marriages:

I. 1. with children (half-Aryans 1 class)

a. If the father is German and the mother Jewish the family is permitted to remain in their present apartment. No ban for Jews regarding housing is to be pronounced against these families.

The property of the Jewish mother may be transferred in such cases to the German husband respectively the half-Aryan children.

b. If the father is Jewish and the mother German these families are neither to be housed in Jewish quarters for the time being. This because the children (half-Aryan 1st class) are not to be exposed to the Jewish agitation as they will have to serve later in the labor service and the armed forces. The property may for the time being be transferred partly or entirely to the children.

2. without children

a. If the husband is German and the wife Jewish par. I a holds true accordingly.

b. If the husband is Jewish and the wife German these childless couples are to be treated as pure Jews.

Property values of the husband cannot be transferred to the wife. Both can be lodged in Jewish houses or quarters. Especially in the case of emigration both spouses are to be treated like Jews as soon as the augmented emigration has been set into motion.

II. If the German wife divorces the Jewish husband she returns to the German blood-kinship. All disadvantages for her are dropped in this case.

signed: GOERING

Authenticated copy:

signed : JAHN

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 116–118, Doc. 069-PS.

39. EXCERPTS FROM THE LAW CONCERNING JEWISH TENANTS, APRIL 30, 1939

It is no surprise that yet another set of protections—this one protecting tenants—was stripped from Jews by Nazi authorities. Included in this law, for example, is the right for non-Jews to dissolve a lease if the other party is Jewish, regardless of the terms of the lease on the matter of termination. Also, there are the requirements that a Jewish tenant must take in other Jews if so directed, and Jewish lessors could not rent to others if they did not have the permission of the “communal authority” to do so. As with other laws promulgated in these closing years of the 1930s, there is an article in this law that addresses its application to mixed marriages. Signed by Hitler along with several Reich ministers, this document legalized practices against Jews that no doubt were being used before the date of the issuance of this law. Thus, in many ways this law simply codified anti-Jewish measures already in practice regarding matters of tenancy.

1939 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 864

Law concerning Jewish Tenants of 30 April 1939

The Reich Government has enacted the following law which is hereby promulgated:

Article 1 Abatement of the Tenancy Protection Provisions

A Jew cannot invoke the protection of the tenancy laws where the landlord in giving notice to vacate the premises can furnish him with a certificate from the communal authorities that his shelter is assured for the time subsequent to the expiration of the tenancy. This does not apply where the landlord is also a Jew.

Article 2 Premature Dissolution of Lease

A lease may be dissolved, where only one of the parties to it is a Jew, by the other party at any time within the legal term of giving notice, notwithstanding that the lease is signed for a specified time, or that the stipulated time of giving notice is longer than that fixed by law. . . .

Article 3 Sub-Leases

Sub-leases may be concluded only between Jews and Jews. Permission to sublet is not necessary where the house owner is also a Jew.

Article 4 Billetting

1. Where the communal authority so requires, a Jew shall be required to receive Jews as tenants or as sub-tenants in premises which he occupies as owner or on the basis of a tenancy, or has rented from another Jew. Where he refuses to make an appropriate agreement with the new tenant, the communal authority may fix the terms of such an agreement with binding force on both parties. The amount of the rental and the compensation to the owner for the sub-lease shall be determined by the communal authority, and where it is not the controlling rent authority, in concurrence with the competent rent control authority. . . .

Article 5 New Tenancies

Jews may rent to others new or vacant premises only upon the consent of the communal authority. . . .

Article 6 Application to Cases of Limited Ownership

Where the application of Articles 1–5 depends on the premise that the lessor is a Jew, the owner of the parcel of land, or the person entitled to its use shall be considered the lessor, notwithstanding he cannot sign a lease, or has not signed the lease because of limitations upon his power over such property.

Article 7 Mixed Marriages

Where the application of this law depends on the premise that the lessor or the lessee is a Jew, the following shall apply in cases of a mixed marriage of a lessee or a lessor:

1. Where the wife is a Jew, and where there are offsprings from the marriage, even where the marriage is no longer valid, the provisions of the law do not apply.
2. Where the husband is a Jew and there are no offspring, the provisions shall apply, no matter where the wife or the husband is the tenant or the lessor.
3. This does not apply to offsprings who are considered as Jews.

Article 8 Right of Disposal [Verfuegungsrecht]

1. Where the right of disposal of a parcel of land (property or right to use) [Nutzungsrecht] is transferred by a Jew to a non-Jew, after the effective date of this law, the provisions of this law shall apply as before the transfer, though a giving of notice to vacate before the time fixed is not permissible. This applies also to further transfers of the right of disposal. . . .

Article 9 Term of Vacating Premises

1. Where a Jew is forced to vacate premises under the provisions of this law, an extension of the time limit for vacating may be granted to him only where he can furnish a certificate from the communal authorities that other shelter cannot be found for him, owing to obstacles, or where the immediate vacating of the premises cannot be undertaken without serious danger to the health of one of the persons affected. The term fixed may be extended in accordance with the same premises stated above.

3. An immediate appeal against a decision refusing to grant an extension of time is permissible, even in such cases where only a decision against time extension is being protested by the tenant. . . .

Article 10 Order of Definition

1. Who shall be considered a Jew, shall be determined by the definition given in Article 5 of the First Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 November 1935 (RGB1 I, 1333).

2. The definition of Jewish enterprises under Article 1 of the Third Regulation under the Reich Citizenship Law of 14 June 1938 (RGB1 I, 627) shall be followed except insofar as Article 9 applies. A change in the ownership of a Jewish enterprise shall be considered as a change of the right of disposal in the sense of Article 8.

Article 11 Treatment of Pending Legal Actions affecting Leases

1. Where a legal action against a Jew or the marriage partner of a Jew is pending when this law takes effect, the court may stay the proceedings on the application of the plaintiff, in order to make it possible for him to give the notice required under the provisions of this law. Where the plaintiff has given notice to terminate the lease, he may petition for the reopening of the case and change the plea from termination to dispossession. Where the legal action is terminated by the quitting of the tenant, or his acknowledgment of the obligation to vacate, the court costs shall be voided; the costs out of court shall be borne by the tenant. . . .

Article 12 General Reporting Requirement

1. The communal authority may issue orders for reports on premises rented to Jews, or on premises which may be used for the shelter of Jews in accordance with the provisions of this law.

2. Whoever shall not, either wilfully or through negligence make such obligatory report, shall be punishable by a fine up to 150 Reichsmarks or by custody. . . .

Article 14 Exceptions; Authorization

1. The effectiveness of this law in the Ostmark and in the Sudeten German Territories shall be reserved to a later date.

2. The Reich Minister of Justice and the Reich Minister of Labor with the concurrence of the Reich Minister of the Interior shall be authorized to issue instructions for the administration and the enforcement of this law, as well as introduce the appropriate provisions in Austria and in the Sudeten German Territories.

Berlin, 30 April 1939

The Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor
Adolf Hitler

The Reich Minister of Justice
Dr Guertner

The Reich Minister of Labor
His Deputy: Dr Krohn

The Deputy of the Fuehrer
R. Hess

The Reich Minister of the Interior
Frick

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 10–14, Doc. 1419-PS.

40. EXCERPTS FROM THE TENTH DECREE RELATING TO THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW ESTABLISHING THE REICHSVEREINIGUNG, JULY 4, 1939

The Jewish community of Germany, as early as 1933, sought to organize itself to better deal with the Nazi regime. With various names over the years—the Reich Representation of German Jews, the Reich Representation of Jews in Germany, and, as it became known as a result of this decree, the Reich Association of Jews in Germany (Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland)—its responsibilities extended to all aspects of the lives and needs of the Jewish community. While not an official organization, it is characterized in this decree as being endowed with “legal personality,” meaning that the Nazis recognized it as the nexus of all Jewish organizations and agencies in Germany. The Nazis saw as its primary purpose the promotion of the emigration of the Jews, while still recognizing its necessary functions regarding establishment of Jewish schools and welfare agencies. No doubt its most difficult and repugnant of tasks was the organization of deportations ordered by the Nazis, a role that some saw as collaboration. Not included in the Nuremberg trial document—and therefore not in this volume—are sections in the decree that address the matters of Jewish education and social welfare.

1939 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 1097

Tenth Decree Relating to the Reich Citizenship Law of July 4, 1939.

On the basis of section 3 of the Reich citizenship law of 15 September 1935 (Reichsgesetzblatt, Part I, p. 1146) the following is hereby decreed:

Article 1.

Reich Association of the Jews.

Section 1.

(1) The Jews will be united into a Reich Association.

(2) The Reich association is an organization endowed with legal personality. It bears the name “Reich Association of the Jews”, and has its headquarters in Berlin.

(3) The Reich association uses the Jewish worship congregations as local branch offices.

Section 2.

(1) The Reich association has the purpose of promoting the emigration of the Jews.

(2) The Reich association is likewise:

- a. Supporter of the Jewish school instruction.
- b. Supporter of the voluntary Jewish welfare administration.

(3) The Reich minister of the interior may transfer other missions to the Reich association.

Section 3.

(1) All Jewish citizens and stateless Jews belong to the Reich association, who have their residence or their customary abode in Reich territory.

(2) In case of a mixed-marriage, the Jewish partner is a member only,

1112 Decree on Identification of Jewish Men and Women in the General Government

- a. If the man is the Jewish partner and there are no offspring from the marriage, or,
- b. If the offspring are considered as Jews.

(3) Jews of foreign nationality and those Jews living in mixed marriage, who are not members by virtue of provision 2. are permitted to join the Reich association.

Section 4.

The Reich association is subject to the supervision of the Reich minister of the interior; its statutes require his approval.

Section 5.

(1) The Reich Minister of the Interior may dissolve Jewish clubs, organizations and foundations or decree their incorporation in the Reich Association.

(2) In case of dissolution, the regulations of the civil law are valid for the liquidation. The Reich Minister of the Interior can however appoint and recall administrators and regulate the type of liquidation in departing from the provisions of civil law. After the liquidation is carried out, the property of the dissolved Jewish organizations is to be transferred to the Reich Association.

(3) In case of incorporation, the property of the affected Jewish organizations devolves to the Reich Association. A liquidation does not take place in these cases. The Reich Association is responsible with all its property for the obligation incurred by the incorporated organization (institution).

(4) The Reich Minister of the Interior may abolish and change statutory provisions and resolutions of Jewish organizations and foundations, if they have decided upon regulations concerning the disposal of the property in departing from these provisions. Jews who have profited in some manner as a result of the subsequently repealed statutory provisions or resolutions, are obliged to give it up to the Reich association in accordance with the fundamentals of unjustifiable enrichment. . . .

The Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

The Deputy of the Fuehrer
HESS

The Reich Minister of Education
RUST

The Reich Minister of Church Affairs
KERRL

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 537–538, Doc. 2876-PS.

41. DECREE ON IDENTIFICATION OF JEWISH MEN AND WOMEN IN THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT, NOVEMBER 23, 1939

The occupation of Poland following Germany's successful invasion on September 1, 1939, resulted in Germany occupying the western half of the country and the Soviet Union occupying the eastern half, as a result of a secret agreement between the two countries made immediately before Germany's invasion. Germany subdivided its territory into two sections. It annexed the westernmost part, with the remaining German-occupied territory—the so-called General Government (Generalgouvernement) in the center of the country, between the German and the Russian zones—administered under civilian authority, with Hans Frank as its governor-general. This decree by Frank, issued less than two months after Germany's initial invasion, requires, effective December 1, 1939, all Jews age 10 and above in the General Government to wear an outer marking—in this case, a white armband—so they could be easily identified. This was not the first such order; Jews of all ages in the Polish town of Wloclawek were required to wear a marking a month prior to this decree. The requirement spread more slowly in the West, where the first such order was effective in September 1941.

VERORDNUNGSBLATT OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL FOR THE OCCUPIED POLISH TERRITORY
1939, Page 61.

Decree concerning the designation of Jews and Jewesses in the Government General of 23 November 1939

On the basis of No. 5 paragraph 1 of the decree of the Fuehrer and Chancellor of the Reich on the administration of occupied Polish territory, dated 12 October 1939 (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 2077), I order:

1. All Jews and Jewesses, who are in Government General territory and who have reached the age of ten, shall be obliged to wear a white band not less than 10 cm wide on the right sleeve of their coats and overcoats beginning 1 December 1939.

2. Jews and Jewesses shall procure these arm bands themselves and shall furnish them with the appropriate markings.

3. (1) Failure to comply is punishable by imprisonment.

(2) Judgment will be passed by special courts.

4. The necessary regulations concerning the execution of this order will be released by the Chief of Section for Internal Administration, in the Office of the Governor General.

Cracow, 23 November 1939

The Governor General for the occupied Polish territories
FRANK

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 368, Doc. 2672-PS.

42. LETTER EXPLAINING AMENDMENT TO NUREMBERG LAWS ON PUNISHMENT OF WOMEN GUILTY OF “RACIAL DISGRACE,” FEBRUARY 28, 1940

This letter from Alexander Comstack Kirk, chargé d'affaires in the U.S. embassy in Germany, to U.S. secretary of state Cordell Hull, explains an amendment made to the Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor, one of the Nuremberg Laws. Specifically, it clarifies the provision in that law prohibiting “racial disgrace” (Rassenschande), that is, extramarital relations between a Jew and a non-Jew. The wording of that law made it clear that in the event of such a violation, only the man was subject to punishment. However, in the First Decree of Execution of that law there was no similar statement limiting punishment to the man, resulting in some cases where the woman was also punished. Since this was not the original intent of the Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor, an amendment was issued to correct the situation by emphasizing that punishment is limited to the man. Kirk notes the possibility “for denunciation and extortion” of the man by the woman involved in this violation, given that the woman would not be subject to punishment.

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

No. [unclear]

Berlin, February 28, 1940

Subject: Amendment to the Nuremberg Racial Laws which Specifically Exempts Women from Punishment in the Commission of “Racial Disgrace.”

The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

Sir:

With reference to the Embassy’s despatch No. 2322 of September 19, 1935, forwarding a translation of “The “Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor”, adopted in Nuremberg on September 15, 1935, and with reference to the Embassy’s despatch No. 2474 of November 18, 1935, forwarding a translation of the “First Decree regarding the Execution of the Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor”, I have the honor to transmit the original German text, as contained in REICHSGESETZBLATT, Part I, No. 33 of February 23, 1940, together with an English translation, of a law which supplements the First Decree of Execution referred to above by providing that in the commission of the crime of “racial disgrace” (Rassenschande, or extramarital intercourse between a Jew and an “Aryan”), the man is responsible and that accordingly the woman involved shall not be punished.

Curiously enough the same provision would appear to be inherent in Section 5, paragraph (2) of the original “Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor” of September 15, 1935, which, with respect to Section 2 of that law which prohibits extramarital relations between Jews and nationals of German blood, states: “Any man acting in contravention of the prohibition contained in Section 2 will be punished by imprisonment or penal servitude”. In the First Decree of Execution of this law no mention is made of the degree of responsibility resting respectively upon the man or the woman in the commission of a crime of “racial disgrace”, and several instances are known in which an “Aryan” woman who had sexual intercourse with a Jew, or vice versa, a Jewish woman who had had sexual intercourse with an “Aryan” man, had either been given short terms of imprisonment or had been compelled to serve in a “Retraining Camp” (Umschulungslager), which for this purpose is the practical equivalent of a concentration camp. The law reported on in this despatch is apparently intended to place an end to such wide constructions of the “Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor”, and by re-emphasizing the original provisions of Section 5, paragraph (2) of this law, thus clearly aims at placing sole responsibility upon the man, whether Jew or “Aryan”, who is the perpetrator of “racial disgrace”.

Incidentally, a local legal authority has pointed out that the supplementary law herein discussed represents possibly a radical departure from general penal practice in that it exempts a party to a crime (in this instance, the woman) from punishment as an accomplice or an accessory and furthermore, should the case fall within the scope of Austrian law, exempts the woman from punishment for dissimulation or for giving false testimony not under oath. It has also been observed that the absolute immunity granted women in this respect enhances the opportunities for denunciation and extortion which are known to have already been utilised in connection with this anti-Jewish law in particular.

Respectfully yours,
Alexander Kirk,
Chargé d’Affaires a. i.

Enclosures:

1. REICHSGESETZBLATT, Part I, No. 33, February 23, 1940.
2. Translation of Decree of February 16, 1940.

840.1

JDB/mhg

Source: State CDF 862.4016/2160: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

43. POLICE DECREE CONCERNING THE “MARKING” OF THE JEWS, SEPTEMBER 1, 1941

In March 1939, Bohemia and Moravia became a protectorate of Germany, as Germany occupied what was left of Czechoslovakia after the German annexation of the Sudetenland and Slovakia’s “independence” (actually, Slovakia was a German puppet state). Reinhard Heydrich was the Reich protector (Reichsprotektor) of Bohemia and Moravia at the time he issued this police decree regarding marking of Jews and restrictions on their freedom to move about as they wished. The marking—a yellow “Six Star” (Jewish star or Star of David)—was required to be sewn on the left chest of the outer clothing of all Jews older than six years of age. This was four years younger than a similar marking requirement put into effect in 1939 in the General Government in Poland. Also, Jews were forbidden to leave their “residential district” without written permission. Under certain circumstances, exceptions were made from the marking requirement and the restrictions on movement for Jews in a mixed marriage.

1941 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, NO. 100, PAGE 547
Police decree concerning the “marking” of the Jews of September 1, 1941.

Based upon the decree relating to the police decrees of the Reich minister of November 1938 (Reichsgesetzblatt I S 1582) and the decree concerning the legislative power in the Protectorate Bohemia and Moravia of June 7, 1939 (Reichsgesetzblatt I S 1039) it is ordered hereby in agreement with the “Reichsprotektor” in Bohemia and Moravia as follows:

Section 1

1. Jews (Section 5 of the first decree to the Reich citizen law of November 1935-Reichsgesetzblatt I, S 1333) who finished the sixth year of their age are prohibited to appear in public without a Jewish star.

2. The Jewish star consists of a “Six Star” with black contours in the size of the palm of the hand of yellow material with the black inscription “Jew”. It has to be worn on the left side of the chest of the clothing tightly sewed on.

Section 2

Jews are forbidden

- a. to leave the boundary of their residential district without carrying a written permission of the local police authority.
- b. to wear medals, decorations, and other badges.

Section 3

The sections 1 and 2 will not apply

a. to the Jewish spouse living in a mixed marriage, as far as descendants of the marriage are existent and these are not considered as Jews, and even then, if the marriage does not exist anymore or the only son has been killed in the present war.

b. to the Jewish wife of a childless mixed marriage for the duration of the marriage.

Section 4

1. Who contravenes against the prohibition of Sections 1 and 2, deliberately or carelessly, will be punished with a penalty up to 250 Reichsmark or with imprisonment up to six weeks.

2. Further reaching police security measures and also penal provisions, according to which a higher penalty is incurred, remain effective.

Section 5

The police decree is also effective in the Protectorate Bohemia and Moravia with the provision that the Reichsprotektor in Bohemia and Moravia may adopt the instruction of section 2 to the local conditions in the Protectorate Bohemia and Moravia.

Section 6

The police decree will be effective 14 days after its promulgation.

Berlin, September 1, 1941

The Reich Minister of the Interior
by order
Heydrich.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 539–540, Doc. 2877-PS.

44. ELEVENTH DECREE OF THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW, NOVEMBER 25, 1941, AND ORDINANCE EXTENDING SAME TO TERRITORIES OCCUPIED OR ADMINISTERED BY GERMANY, DECEMBER 3, 1941

In this two-part document, a decree is set forth immediately followed by an ordinance that extends the application of the decree. The decree addresses the circumstances in which a Jew will no longer be considered “a member of the German State [Staatsangehoeriger],” which is defined as meaning a person who loses his “German nationality.” It also makes clear that the assets of a Jew who has lost his or her German nationality will be expropriated by the Reich. The circumstances that trigger the loss of German nationality and expropriation of assets is when a Jew “has his ordinary residence abroad,” a phrase that the decree defines. Ironically, the expropriated assets of such Jews are to be used not for the war effort but instead for “all purposes connected with the solution of the Jewish question.” The related ordinance states that the decree also applies to Jews whose permanent place of residence is in German-occupied countries, or in territories such as the General Government in Poland. This decree and related ordinance are further examples of the Nazi effort to legalize the expropriation of Jewish-owned assets.

EXTRACTS FROM THE 11TH DECREE ON THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW, 25 NOVEMBER 1941, AND ORDINANCE OF 3 DECEMBER 1941, ISSUED BY DEFENDANT STUCKART IN AGREEMENT WITH DEFENDANT LAMMERS, EXTENDING THE APPLICATION OF PARTS OF THE 11TH DECREE TO TERRITORIES OCCUPIED OR ADMINISTERED BY GERMANY

1941 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 722

Eleventh Decree of the Reich Citizenship Law, 25 November 1941

Under section 3 of the Reich Citizenship Law of 15 September 1935 (Reichsgesetzblatt, I, p. 1146), the following is decreed:

Section 1

A Jew who has his ordinary residence abroad cannot be a member of the German State [Staatsangehoeriger]. Ordinary residence abroad is presumed when a Jew lives abroad under circumstances which indicate that his stay is not merely a temporary one.

Section 2

A Jew loses his status as a member of the German State—

- a. On the day this decree goes into effect, if on that day he has his ordinary residence abroad.
- b. At the time he takes up residence in a foreign country, if he takes up ordinary residence abroad later.

Section 3

(1) The assets of the Jew who loses his German nationality by virtue of this decree are expropriated by the Reich when the loss of nationality occurs. Furthermore, the Reich expropriates the assets of those Jews who, at the day this decree comes into force, are stateless but who have last possessed

1116 Eleventh Decree of the Reich Citizenship Law

German nationality, if and when they take or have taken their ordinary residence abroad.

(2) Assets thus expropriated shall serve to further all purposes connected with the solution of the Jewish question.

Section 4

(1) Persons whose assets, according to section 3, are expropriated by the Reich must not acquire anything from a German national by reason of death.

(2) Gifts from German nationals to persons whose assets, according to section 3, are expropriated by the Reich, are forbidden. He who makes or promises such a gift in violation of this prohibition will be punished by imprisonment up to 2 years and a fine, or by one of these penalties.

.....

Section 8

(1) Whether the legal basis for expropriation of assets exists shall be determined by the Chief of the Security Police and the SD (Sicherheitsdienst des Reichsfuehrer SS).

(2) The Senior Finance President of Berlin shall have the duty of administering and liquidating the expropriated assets.

Section 11

In order to avoid hardships caused by the expropriation of property, the Reich Minister of Finance may settle questions arising from the enforcement of sections 3-7 (and sec. 9). This applies also to cases where the assets have been, or in the future will be, declared forfeited on the basis of section 2 regarding the repeal of naturalizations and the revocation of German citizenship of 14 July 1933 (RGBl. I. p. 480).

Section 12

This decree applies also to the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia and the annexed Eastern Territories.

Section 13

Regulations necessary for the amendment and execution of this decree will be issued by the Reich Minister of the Interior, in agreement with the Chief of the Party Chancellery and other Reich Ministers concerned.

Berlin, 25 November 1941

Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

Chief of the Party Chancellery
M. BORMANN

The Reich Minister of Finance
As Deputy: REINHARDT

The Reich Minister of Justice
Acting: DR. SCHLEGELBERGER

Confidential Ordinance, 3 December 1941, concerning execution of the 11th Decree to the Reich Citizenship Law

17512 B-6 December 1941—

[Initial] F.
[Stamp] Reich Chancellery
The Reich Minister of the Interior
I e 5545/41-5013

Kindly mention the above file no. and subject in your reply

[Stamp] Confidential

[Illegible initials]
Berlin, 3 December 1941
NW 7 Unter den Linden 72
Phone: Local 120034
Long distance: 120037
Teletype: Local 317
Long distance: K 1617
Telegraph address:
Reich Ministry of the Interior

To:

- a. Supreme Reich Authorities
- b. Reich Governors of the Reich Gaue (State Governments)
- c. Reich Protector for Bohemia and Moravia
- d. Governor General
- e. Reich Commissioner for Strengthening of Germanism
- f. Oberpraesidenten
- g. Regierungspraesidenten
- h. Police President of Berlin
- i. City President of the Reich Capital Berlin
- k. Repatriation Office for Ethnic Germans
- l. Main Trustee Office East

[To] b, g, and i with additional copies for the Police Presidents, Police Directorates, Landraete, and Lord Mayors.

Subject: Ordinance for the execution of the 11th decree to the Reich Citizenship Law.

Pursuant to Article 13 of the 11th decree to the Reich Citizenship Law of 26 November 1941, Reich Law Gazette I, page 722, I order in agreement with the Chief of the Part Chancellery the following:

(1) The loss of citizenship and the forfeiture of property refers also to such Jews coming under this decree who have their permanent place of residence, or who will reside later on, in territories occupied by German troops or such territories which are under German administration, especially also in the Government General or in the Reich Commissariats Ostland and Ukraine.

(2) The publication of this ordinance shall be avoided. So far as authorities subordinated to the Supreme Authorities have to be informed of this ordinance, I request to effectuate it in a confidential manner.

As deputy

[Initial] L [LAMMERS]

[Signed] W. STUCKART

[Handwritten] For the information of the Reich Minister.

[Initial] F, 6 December

[Stamp] K

[Handwritten] JPD JPD 1830

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 189–192, Doc. NG-2499.

45. REGULATION ON THE DEFINITION OF THE TERM “JEW” IN THE GENERALGOUVERNEMENT, JULY 24, 1940

Hans Frank, governor-general of the General Government (Generalgouvernement), that section of German-occupied Poland not annexed to Germany, issued this regulation to clarify and confirm the working definition of the word “Jew,” including the concept of Mischlinge, persons who are considered Jews but not “full Jews,” for purposes of applying anti-Jewish laws in the General Government. After rejecting broader definitions, Frank used the one that was in conformance with the definition in force in the Reich, except that here there was also reference to persons who are former Polish citizens or stateless. In addition, this regulation defines what was meant by a “Jewish business enterprise,” including “Associations, Endowments, Institutions and other organizations which are not business enterprises.”

Section 1

Where the word “Jew” is used in Legal and Administrative Provisions in the Government-General, it is to be interpreted as follows:

1. Anyone who is a Jew, or is considered a Jew, in accordance with the Legal Provisions in the Reich;
2. Anyone who is a Jew, or is considered a Jew, and is a former Polish citizen or stateless person, under § 2 of this Regulation.

Section 2

1. A Jew is a person descended from at least three fully Jewish grandparents by race.
2. A person is considered a Jew if he is descended from two grandparents who are full Jews by race and
 - a. if he was a member of the Jewish Religious Community on September 1, 1939, or joined such a community subsequently;
 - b. if he was married to a Jew on the date on which this Regulation came into force, or married a Jew subsequently;
 - c. if he is the product of extra-marital intercourse with a Jew in accordance with para. 1 and was born after May 31, 1941.
3. A grandparent is automatically considered a full Jew if he was a member of a Jewish community.

Section 3

1. Where the concept [person of] Jewish Mischling is used in Legal and Administrative Provisions of the Government-General, it is to be interpreted as follows:
 - a. a person who is a Jewish Mischling in accordance with the Reich Legal Provisions;
 - b. any person who is a former Polish citizen or stateless, and is descended from one or two grandparents who are full Jews by race unless he is considered a Jew under § 2, para. 2.
2. The provisions under § 2, para. 3 apply similarly.

Section 4

1. A business enterprise is considered Jewish if the owner is a Jew in accordance with §, 1.

2. A business enterprise which is owned by a Limited Company is considered Jewish if one or more members who are personally responsible are Jews. . . .
3. A place of business is also considered Jewish if it is in practice under dominant influence of Jews.
4. The provisions under para. 1–4 also apply to Associations, Endowments, Institutions and other organizations which are not business enterprises.

Section 5

Legal and Administrative Provisions issued for Jews apply to Jewish Mischling only where this is expressly stated.

Section 6

This Regulation comes into effect on August 1, 1940.

Cracow, July 24, 1940

The Governor General for the Occupied Polish Territories
Frank

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Israel Gutman, and Abraham Margalio, eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, translated by Lea Ben Dor 8th ed. (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press/ Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 214–215. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

46. ADMINISTRATION OF PENAL JUSTICE AGAINST POLES AND JEWS IN THE INCORPORATED EASTERN TERRITORIES, DECEMBER 4, 1941

This decree addresses crimes committed by Jews and Poles in the Incorporated Eastern Territories (Eingeliederte Ostgebiete), meaning the western section of Poland that was annexed by Germany following its successful invasion of that country in September 1939. Reading this decree is chilling: it starkly reveals the extent to which the legal system in Germany had been corrupted and co-opted by the Nazi regime, providing virtually no rights for the accused, and placing all legal power in the hands of the state. This decree requires that Poles and Jews conduct themselves in conformance with German laws and regulations, and it then sets forth various offenses, the commission of which would result in the death penalty. Those offenses include such actions as manifesting “anti-German sentiments” or “making anti-German utterances.” The death penalty is allowed to be imposed even when it is not prescribed by law. The fact that the right to appeal a decision is made available only to the prosecution is just one example of the ways in which the accused were completely unprotected by the laws and the procedures that were applied to them.

DECREE OF 4 DECEMBER 1941 CONCERNING THE ADMINISTRATION OF PENAL JUSTICE AGAINST POLES AND JEWS IN THE INCORPORATED EASTERN TERRITORIES 1941 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 759

The Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich herewith decrees:

1. Substantive Criminal Law

I

(1) Poles and Jews in the Incorporated Eastern Territories are to conduct themselves in conformity with the German laws and with the regulations introduced for them by the German authorities. They are to abstain from any conduct liable to prejudice the sovereignty of the German Reich or the prestige of the German people.

(2) The death penalty shall be imposed on any Pole or Jew if he commits an act of violence against a German on account of his membership in the German ethnic community.

(3) A Pole or Jew shall be sentenced to death, or in less serious cases to imprisonment, if he manifests anti-German sentiments by malicious or inciting activities particularly by making anti-German utterances, or by removing or defacing official notices of German authorities or agencies, or if he, by his conduct, lowers or prejudices the prestige or the well-being of the German Reich or the German people.

(4) The death penalty or, in less serious cases, imprisonment, shall be imposed on any Pole or Jew—

1. If he commits any act of violence against a member of the German armed forces or its auxiliaries, of the German police force or its auxiliaries, of the Reich labor service, of any German authority or agency or of an organization of the NSDAP;
2. If he purposely damages installations of the German authorities or agencies, objects used by them in performance of their duties, or objects of public utility;
3. If he solicits or incites another person to disobey any decree or regulation issued by the German authorities;
4. If he conspires to commit an act punishable under paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), subparagraphs 1 through 3, or if he enters into serious negotiations about committing such an act, or if he offers to commit such an act, or accepts such an offer, or if he obtains credible information of such act, or of the intention of committing it, and fails to notify the authorities or any person threatened thereby at a time when danger can still be averted; and

5. If he is found to be in unlawful possession of a firearm, a handgrenade, or any weapon for stabbing or hitting, of explosives, ammunition or other implements of war, or if he has credible information that a Pole or a Jew is in unlawful possession of such an object, and fails to notify the authorities forthwith.

II

Punishment shall also be imposed on Poles or Jews if they act contrary to German criminal law or commit any act for which they deserve punishment in accordance with the fundamental principles of German criminal law and in view of the interests of the State in the Incorporated Eastern Territories.

III

(1) Penalties provided for Poles and Jews are—imprisonment, fine, or confiscation of property. The term of imprisonment is to be not less than 3 months and not more than 10 years in a penal camp; for more serious offenses, imprisonment consists of 2 to 15 years in a penal camp in which a more severe regimen is enforced.

(2) The death sentence shall be imposed in all cases where it is prescribed by the law. Moreover, in those cases where the law does not provide for the death sentence, it shall be imposed if the act shows a particularly base attitude or is particularly serious for other reasons; in these cases the death sentence may also be passed upon juvenile offenders.

(3) The minimum penalty or a fixed penalty prescribed by German criminal law cannot be reduced unless the criminal act is directed against the offender's own people exclusively.

(4) If a fine cannot be recovered, it shall be substituted by imprisonment in a penal camp from 1 week to 1 year.

2. Criminal Procedure

IV

The public prosecutor shall prosecute a Pole or a Jew if he considers that punishment is in the public interest;

V

(1) Poles and Jews shall be tried by a Special Court or by the local court.

(2) The public prosecutor can file the indictment with a Special Court in all cases. He can file the indictment with the local court if the punishment to be imposed is not likely to be heavier than 5 years in a penal camp, or 3 years in a more rigorous penal camp.

(3) The jurisdiction of the People's Court remains unaffected.

VI

(1) Every sentence will be carried out without delay. The public prosecutor may, however, appeal from the sentence of the local court to the court of appeal. The appeal has to be lodged within 2 weeks.

(2) The right to lodge complaints is also reserved exclusively to the public prosecutor. Complaints will be decided upon by the court of appeal.

VII

Poles and Jews cannot challenge a German judge on account of alleged partiality.

VIII

(1) Arrest and temporary detention are allowed whenever there are good grounds to suspect that a punishable act has been committed.

(2) During the preliminary investigations, the public prosecutor may also order arrest and any other coercive measures permissible.

IX

Poles and Jews are not sworn in as witnesses in criminal proceedings. If the unsworn deposition made by them before the court is false, the provisions as prescribed for perjury and false sworn statements shall be applied accordingly.

X

(1) Only the public prosecutor may apply for the reopening of proceedings. In a case tried before a Special Court, the decision on an application for the reopening of the proceedings rests with this court.

(2) The right to lodge a nullity plea rests with the attorney general. The decision on the plea rests with the court of appeal.

XI

Poles and Jews neither can file private suits nor bring about action as coplaintiffs.

XII

The court and the public prosecutor shall conduct proceedings within their discretion according to the principles of the German Law of Criminal Procedure. They may, however, dispense with the provisions of the Judicature Act and the Law of Criminal Procedure, whenever this may be expedient for the rapid and more efficient conduct of proceedings.

3. Civilian Court Martial Proceedings

XIII

(1) Subject to the consent of the Reich Minister of the Interior and the Reich Minister of Justice, the Reich governor (or provincial governor) may, until further notice, enforce martial law in the Incorporated Eastern Territories, either in the whole area under his jurisdiction or in parts thereof, upon Poles and Jews guilty of grave excesses against Germans or of other punishable acts which seriously endanger the German work of reconstruction.

(2) The courts established under martial law impose the death sentence. They may, however, dispense with punishment and refer the case to the Secret State Police (Gestapo).

(3) Subject to the consent of the Reich Minister of the Interior, the constitution and procedure of the courts established under martial law shall be regulated by the Reich governor.

4. Extent of Application of this Decree

XIV

(1) The provisions contained in sections I-IV of this decree apply also to those Poles and Jews who, on 1 September 1939, were domiciled or had their residence within the territory of the former Polish state, and who committed the punishable act in any part of the German Reich other than the Incorporated Eastern Territories.

(2) The case may also be tried by the court within whose jurisdiction the former domicile or residence of the perpetrator is situated. Sections V-XII apply accordingly.

(3) Paragraphs 1 and 2 do not apply to punishable acts tried by the courts in the Government General.

5. Concluding Regulations

Within the meaning of this decree, the term "Poles" includes protected and stateless persons who belong to the Polish racial community.

XVI

Article II of the decree of 6 June 1940, concerning the introduction of German Criminal Law in the Incorporated Eastern Territories (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 844) no longer applies to Poles and Jews.

XVII

The Reich Minister of Justice is authorized to issue rules and administrative regulations concerning the execution and implementation of this decree and to decide in all cases of doubt, in agreement with the Reich Minister of the Interior.

XVIII

This decree shall come into force on the fourteenth day after its promulgation.

Berlin, 4 December 1941

The President of the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich
REICH MARSHAL GOERING

The Plenipotentiary for the Administration of the Reich
FRICK

The Reich Minister and Chief of the Reich Chancellery
DR. LAMMERS

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 632-636, Doc. NG-715.

47. MISCHLINGE: COMMENTS REGARDING TREATMENT OF JEWS OF MIXED BLOOD AND THEIR DESCENDANTS, MARCH 12, 1942

More important than the critical tone that begins this memorandum is its discussion of a question that had been asked but remained unanswered since 1935: How should Mischlinge (individuals with "mixed race") of the first degree (those who have two Jewish grandparents) and Mischlinge of the second degree (those with only one Jewish grandparent) be treated under the law? The answer to this question was literally a matter of life or death. With regard to Mischlinge of the second degree, there seems to be a consensus among Nazi leaders tasked with resolving this issue that they would not be treated as Jews. However, the treatment of Mischlinge of the first degree had always been problematic. Contrary to the assumption that the Nazis would not hesitate to treat them as they would full Jews, they were very sensitive to the upheaval such a policy would have on tens of thousands of families and marriages throughout the Reich. The proposal made by the author of this memorandum, Dr. Franz Schlegelberger, the Reich justice minister, would give Mischlinge of the second degree the choice between being sterilized or being treated as a full Jew.

Berlin, 12 March 1942

In Charge of the Office of the Reich Minister of Justice

Dear Reich Minister Dr. Lammers:

I am just being informed by my advisor about the result of the meeting of March 6 regarding the treatment of Jews and descendants of mixed marriages. I am now expecting the official transcript. According to the report of my advisor, decisions seem to be under way which I am constrained to consider absolutely impossible for the most part. Since the result of these discussions are to constitute the basis for the decision of the Fuehrer, and since one of the advisors from your Ministry participated likewise in these discussions, I urgently desire to discuss this matter with you on time. As soon as I have received the transcript of the meeting, I shall take the liberty in calling you to ask you if and when a discussion may take place.

With sincerest regards and Heil Hitler!

Yours devotedly
/s/ Dr. Schlegelberger

To the Reich Minister and Chief of the Party Chancellery
Dr. LAMMERS, Berlin
In charge of the Office of the Reich Minister of Justice charged with the conduct of official business.

IV b 40 g RE

Berlin W 8, 5 April 1942
Wilhelmstrasse 65
Secret Reich Matter

1. The Chief of the Party Chancellery
SS-Oberfuehrer Klopfer
2. The Reich Minister of the Interior
Attn: The Secretary of State Dr. Stuckart
3. The Chief of the Security Police and the SD
SS-Obergruppen Heydrich
4. The Deputy of the Four-Year Plan

Attn: State Secretary Mr. Neumann

5. The Foreign Office
Attn.: Undersecretary Luther
6. The Reich Minister for the Occupied Eastern Territories
Attn: Gau Leader and State Secretary Dr. Meyer
7. The Race and Settlement Main Office of the Reichsfuehrer-SS
Attn: SS-Gruppenfuehrer Hofman

RE: Final Solution of the Jewish Question

1. The final solution of the Jewish question presupposes a clear-cut and permanently applicable definition of the group of persons for whom the projected measures are to be initiated. Such a definition applies only when we desist from the beginning from including descendants of mixed marriages of the second degree in these measures. The measures for the final solution of the Jewish question should extend only to full Jews and descendants of mixed marriages of the first degree, but should not apply to descendants of mixed marriages of the second degree [Note: first degree presumably those with two non-Aryan grandparents, and second degree with only one].

2. With regard to the treatment of Jewish descendants of mixed marriages of the first degree, I agree with the conception of the Reich Minister of the Interior which he expressed in his letter of 16 February 1942, to the effect that the prevention of propagation of these descendants of mixed marriages is to be preferred to their being thrown in with the Jews and evacuated. It follows therefrom that the evacuation of these half-Jews who are no more capable of propagation is obviated from the beginning. There is no national interest in dissolving the marriages between such half-Jews and a full-blooded German.

Those half-Jews who are capable of propagation should be given the choice to submit to sterilization or to be evacuated in the same manner as Jews. In the case of sterilization, as well as in that of evacuation of the half-Jew, the German-blooded spouse will have to be given the opportunity to effect the dissolution of the marriage. I see no objection to the German spouse's obtaining the possibility of divorcing his sterilized or evacuated spouse in a simplified procedure without the limitations of Par. 53 of the Marriage Law.

3. An exception might be worthy of consideration with respect to those half-Jews who have descendants who are to become a part of the German national community and who are to lose themselves in it, once and for all. If these descendants are to be incorporated into the German folk community as full-fledged members—which has to be the aim in the case of a genuine final solution of the Jewish question—it seems advisable to keep them from being judged as inferiors or from having feelings of inferiority which could arise easily out of the knowledge and the conscience that their immediate ancestors have been affected by the planned defensive measures of the racial brotherhood. It is for this reason that it should be considered whether or not half-Jews whose still-living descendants are likewise half-Jews should be spared from evacuation as well as sterilization.

4. I have no scruples against facilitation of divorce in marriages between racial Germans and Jews. This facilitation should then extend to marriages with those who are considered as Jews. The divorce will have to be granted upon the request of the German-blooded partner in a simplified procedure. I have considerable scruples about compulsory divorces, on motion of the public prosecutor. Such compulsion is unnecessary because the spouses will be separated in any case by the evacuation of the Jewish partner. An enforced divorce, moreover, is without avail, because, though it cuts the marriage ties, it does not cut the inner tie between the spouses; moreover, it does not relieve the German partner from the scorn to which he is exposed by clinging to his marriage. Finally, a clinging to marriage on the part of the German-blooded partner is to be expected only in the case of older marriages which have endured throughout many years. In these cases, in which the Jewish partner as a rule is not evacuated but confined to an old people's ghetto, the German-blooded partner who disclaims his membership in the German community should not be prohibited from being admitted to the ghetto.

[signed] Dr. Schlegelberger

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. Supplement A, pp. 814–816, Doc. 4055-PS.

48. THIRTEENTH REGULATION UNDER THE REICH CITIZEN LAW, JULY 1, 1943

This short regulation, signed by Wilhelm Frick, Reich minister of the interior, and Martin Bormann, chief of the Party Chancellery, and others addresses the disposition of the property of a Jew after his death. The regulation orders that the property in question be confiscated by the Reich, although exceptions are allowed to be granted for non-Jewish heirs. In the case of those exceptions, the regulation does not include a mandatory form of payment by which the non-Jewish heirs would receive their legal share.

THIRTEENTH REGULATION UNDER THE REICH CITIZENSHIP LAW, 1 JULY 1943 1943 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 372

Under article 3 of the Reich Citizenship Law of 15 September 1935 (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 1146), the following is ordered:

Article 1

1. Criminal acts committed by Jews shall be punished by the police.
2. The decree concerning penal law for Poles [Polenstrafrechtsverordnung] of 4 December 1941 (Reichsgesetzblatt I, p. 759) shall no longer apply to Jews.

Article 2

1. The property of a Jew shall be confiscated by the Reich after his death.
2. The Reich may, however, grant compensation to the non-Jewish legal heirs and persons entitled to sustenance who have their domicile in Germany.
3. This compensation may be granted in the form of a lump sum, not to exceed the ceiling price of the property which has passed into possession of the German Reich.
4. Compensation may be granted by the transfer of titles and assets from the confiscated property. No costs shall be imposed for the legal processes necessary for such transfer.

Article 3

The Reich Minister of the Interior with the concurrence of the participating supreme authorities of the Reich shall issue the legal and administrative provisions for the administration and enforcement of this regulation. In doing so he shall determine to what extent the provisions shall apply to Jewish nationals of foreign countries.

Article 4

This regulation shall take effect on the seventh day of its promulgation. In the Protectorate Bohemia and Moravia it shall apply where German administration and German courts have jurisdiction; article 2 shall also apply to Jews who are citizens of the Protectorate.

Berlin, 1 July 1943

The Reich Minister of the Interior
FRICK

Chief of the Party Chancellery
M. BORMANN

Reich Minister of Finance
COUNT SCHWERIN VON KROSIGK

Reich Minister of Justice
DR. THIERACK

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 685–686, Doc. NG-715.

49. SPEECH BY JOSEPH GOEBBELS ON PROPAGANDA, SEPTEMBER 1934

This lengthy speech by Joseph Goebbels, Reich minister of propaganda, provides great insight into his fundamental beliefs about the significance of propaganda in governing. Perhaps the most cogent definition that he provides of political propaganda is that its “purpose is to lead the people to an understanding that will allow it to willingly and without internal resistance devote itself to the tasks and goals of the leadership.” Elsewhere he describes it as being “indispensable to building a modern state.” And this: “A good idea does not win simply because it is good. It must be presented properly if it is to win.” Goebbels provides several examples of situations where propaganda was key to the acceptance by the people of changes made by the Nazi Party in German political and economic policy, adding this statement: “We could eliminate the Jewish danger in our culture because the people had recognized it as the result of our propaganda.” His conclusion reflects the importance he and the Nazi regime accorded to propaganda: “It may be good to have power based on weapons. It is better and longer lasting, however, to win and hold the heart of a people.”

It is difficult to define the concept of propaganda thoroughly and precisely. This is especially true because, in past decades, it was subject to unfavorable, and in part extraordinarily hostile, definitions by us Germans. First, then, we must defend it. Those abroad frequently claim that in the past we Germans were particularly knowledgeable in this area, and knew how to apply it, but that unfortunately is not consistent with the facts. We learned the consequences of our neglect all too clearly during the World War. While the enemy states produced unprecedented atrocity propaganda aimed at Germany throughout the whole world, we did nothing and were completely defenseless against it. Only when enemy foreign propaganda had nearly won over the greater part even of the neutral states did the German government begin to sense the enormous power of propaganda. It was too late. Just as we were militarily and economically unprepared for the war, so, too, with propaganda. We lost the war in this area more than in any other.

The cleverest trick used in propaganda against Germany during the war was to accuse Germany of what our enemies themselves were doing. Even today, large parts of world opinion are convinced that the typical characteristics of German propaganda are lying, crudeness, reversing the facts, and the like. One needs only to remember the stories that were spread throughout the world at the beginning of the war about German soldiers chopping off children’s hands and crucifying women to realize that Germany then was a defenseless victim of this campaign of calumny. It neither had nor used any means of defense.

The concept of propaganda has undergone a fundamental transformation, particularly as the result of political practice in Germany. Throughout the world today, people are beginning to see that a modern state, whether democratic or authoritarian, cannot withstand the subterranean forces of anarchy and chaos without propaganda. It is not only a matter of doing the right thing; the people must understand that the right thing is the right thing. Propaganda includes everything that helps the people to realize this.

Political propaganda in principle is active and revolutionary. It is aimed at the broad masses. It speaks the language of the people because it wants to be understood by the people. Its task is the highest creative art of putting sometimes complicated events and facts in a way simple enough to be understood by the man on the street. Its foundation is that there is nothing the people cannot understand; things must only be put in a way that it can understand. It is a question of making it clear by using the proper approach, evidence, and language.

Propaganda is a means to an end. Its purpose is to lead the people to an understanding that will allow it to willingly and without internal resistance devote itself to the tasks and goals of the leadership. If propaganda is to succeed, it must know what it wants. It must keep a clear and firm goal in mind, and seek the appropriate means and methods to reach that goal. Propaganda as such is neither good nor evil. Its moral value is determined by the goals it seeks.

Propaganda must be creative. It is by no means a matter for the bureaucracy or governmental administration, but rather it is a matter of productive creativity. The genuine propagandist must be a true artist. He must be a master of the people's soul, using it as an instrument to express the majesty of a genuine and unified political will. Propaganda can be pro or con. In neither case does it have to be negative. The only thing that is important is whether or not its words are true and genuine expressions of a people's values. During its period of opposition, the National Socialist movement proved that criticism can be constructive, indeed, that in a time which the government is in the hands of destructive powers it may be the only constructive element.

The concept of public education is fundamentally different. It is basically defensive and evolutionary. It does not hammer or drum. It is moderate in tone, seeking to teach. It explains, clarifies, and informs. It is, therefore, used more often by a government than by the opposition. The National Socialist state, growing out of a revolution, had the task of centrally leading both propaganda and education, uniting two concepts that are related but not identical, molding them into a unity that in the long term can serve the government and people.

Even during the time when we were in the opposition, we succeeded in rescuing the concept of propaganda from disfavor or contempt. Since then, we have transformed it into a truly creative art. It was our sharpest weapon in conquering the state. It remains our sharpest weapon in defending and building the state. Although this is perhaps still not clear to the rest of the world, it was obvious to us that we had to use the weapon with which we had conquered the state to defend the state. Otherwise we faced the danger that we could lose the people even though we had the power, and that, without the people, we lose power. We put what we had learned during our attack on the November pseudo-state in the service of our state. The great wealth of ideas and never failing creativity of our propaganda, proven during our struggle for power, was perfected to the last detail. Now we turned it to serve the state itself, to find meaningful and flexible ways to influence the people's thinking. The people should share the concerns and successes of its government. These concerns and successes must therefore be constantly presented and hammered into the people so that it will consider the concerns and successes of its government to be its concerns and successes. Only an authoritarian government, firmly tied to a people, can do this over the long term.

Political propaganda, the art of anchoring the things of the state in the broad masses so that the whole nation will feel a part of them, cannot therefore remain merely a means to the goal of winning power. It must become a means of building and keeping power.

This requires alert attention to the events of the day, and a trained and lively creativity that must include a complete knowledge of the soul of a people. A people must be understood in its deepest depths, or intuitively understood, for only then can one speak in a way that a people will understand. Propaganda must be the science of the soul of a people. It requires an organized and purposeful system if it is to be successful in the long run.

That is what we lacked during the war. That is where our enemy was superior to us. We must make up for that. We must take the techniques and dominance of the other side's opinion apparatus, which is all they really had, and fill it with the fire of the soul and the glow of new ideas.

Propaganda, too, has a system. It cannot be stopped and started whenever one wishes. In the long run, it can only be effective in the service of great ideals and far-seeing principles. And propaganda must be learned. It must be led only by those with a fine and sure instinct for the often changeable feelings of a people. They must be able to reach into the world of the broad masses and draw out their wishes and hopes. The effective propagandist must be a master of the art of speech, of writing, of journalism, of the poster, and of the leaflet. He must have the gift to use the major methods of influencing public opinion such as the press, film, and radio to serve his ideas and goals.

This is particularly necessary in a day when technology is advancing. Radio is already yesterday's invention, since television will probably soon arrive. On the one hand, successful propaganda must be a master of these methods of political opinion, but on the other hand, it may not grow stale in using them. It must find new ways and methods every day to reach success. The nature of propaganda remains the same, but the means provided by advancing technology are becoming ever broader and far-reaching. One need only consider the revolutionary impact of the invention of radio, which gave the spoken word true mass effectiveness. The technology of propaganda has changed greatly in recent years, but the art of propaganda has remained the same. Understood in this sense, propaganda has long since lost its odium of inferiority inherited from the past. It holds first rank among the arts with which one leads a nation. It is indispensable in building a modern state. It is something of a connecting link between government and people.

All propaganda has a bias. The quality of this bias determines whether propaganda has a positive or negative effect. Good propaganda does not need to lie; indeed, it may not lie. It has no reason to fear the truth. It is a mistake to believe that the people cannot take the truth. It can. It is only a matter of presenting the truth to the people in a way that it will be able to understand. A propaganda that lies proves that it has a bad cause. It cannot be successful in the long run. A good propaganda will always come along that serves a good cause. But propaganda is still necessary if a good cause is to succeed. A good idea does not win simply because it is good. It must be presented properly if it is to win. The combination makes for the best propaganda. Such propaganda is successful without being obnoxious. It depends on its nature, not its methods. It works without being noticed. Its goals are inherent in its nature. Since it is almost invisible, it is effective and powerful. A good cause will lose to a bad one if it depends only on its tightness, while the other side uses the methods of influencing the masses. We are, for example, firmly convinced that we fought the war for a good cause, but that was not enough. The world should also have known and seen that our cause was good. However, we lacked the effective means of mass propaganda to make that clear to the world. Marxism certainly did not fight for great ideals. Despite that, in November 1918 it overcame Kaiser, Reich, and the army because it was superior in the art of mass propaganda.

National Socialism learned from these two examples. It drew the correct practical conclusions from that knowledge. The ideal of a socialist national community did not remain mere theory with us, but became living reality in the thoughts and feelings of sixty-seven million Germans. Our propaganda of word and deed created the conditions for that. Mastering it kept National Socialism from the danger of remaining the dream and longing of a few thousand. Through propaganda, it became hard, steady everyday reality.

That which we only imperfectly and inadequately understood during the war became a virtuously mastered art during the rise of the National Socialist movement. Today one can say without exaggeration that Germany is a model of propaganda for the entire world. We have made up for past failures and developed the art of mass influence to a degree that puts the efforts of other nations into the shadows. The importance the National Socialist leadership placed on propaganda became clear when it established a Ministry for Public Education and Propaganda shortly after it took power. This ministry is entirely within the spirit of National Socialism, and comes from it. It unites what we learned as an opposition movement confronting the enemy and under persecution from an enemy system, sometimes more from necessity than desire. Recently some have tried to imitate this ministry and its concentration of all means of influencing opinion, but here, too, the slogan applies; "Often copied, never equaled."

The organizational union of mass demonstrations, the press, film, radio, literature, theater, and so forth, is only the mechanical side to the matter. It is not so much that all these means are in one hand. The important thing is that this hand knows how to master and control them. Establishing a central office is not difficult. What is difficult is finding people who are experts in an area previously not a concern of the state.

We could not have done that ourselves had we not been through the great school of our party. It was our teacher. During fourteen years of opposition we gathered an enormous amount of knowledge, experience, wisdom, and ability. This made us able to use the wide-reaching methods of government propaganda without running the risk of losing the spirit behind them. Effective propaganda avoids any form of bureaucracy. It requires lightning-fast decisions, alert creativity, and inexhaustible inventiveness. The machinery of the organization would remain lifeless and rigid were it not constantly driven by the motor of the spirit and the idea.

It is, therefore, wrong to think that a ministry could replace what the movement alone is able to do. Cooperation between the party and the government was necessary for the major successes that we are proud of. Only when all means of propaganda are concentrated and their unified application assured is it possible to carry out major educational and propaganda battles, as we did before 12 November 1933 or 19 August 1934, which were of true historic significance.

If such an art of active mass influence through propaganda is joined with the long-term systematic education of a nation, and if both are conducted in a unified and precise way, the relationship between the leadership and the nation will always remain close. From authority and following will develop that type of modern democracy for which Germany is the model for the entire world in the twentieth century.

That is also the basic requirement for any practical political activity. A government that wishes to be successful over the long term cannot ignore it. Its projects and plans would fail were they not supported by the people. But the people must understand them in order to accomplish them.

One can only smile when one looks over our borders at the efforts of parliamentary-democratic parties that are all worried about this. Their attitude seems to be: "How can I explain it to my child?" A fear of the people is the characteristic of liberal government theory. It has set the people free, and now does not know what to do with it. The hunt for popularity usually leads to nothing other than concealing the truth and speaking nonsense. One dares not say what is right, and what one does say leads to disaster. But that is presumably what the people wants. One no longer has the courage to say unpopular things, much less do them. The result is that major European problems are lost in useless debates while political, economic, and social crises of unprecedented magnitude face the nations.

There are times when statesmen must have the courage to do something unpopular. But their unpopular actions must be properly prepared, and must be put in the proper form, so that their peoples will understand. The man on the street is usually not as unreasonable as some think. Since it is he who usually has to bear the heaviest burdens that result from unpopular policies, he at least has a right to know why things are being done this way and not that way. All practical politics depends on how persuasive it is to the people. It is no sign of wise leadership to acquaint the nation with hard facts overnight. Crises must be prepared for not only politically and economically, but also psychologically. Here propaganda has its place. It must prepare the way actively and educationally. Its task is to prepare the way for practical actions. It must accompany these actions step by step, never losing sight of them. In a manner of speaking, it provides the background music. Such propaganda in the end miraculously makes the unpopular popular, enabling even a government's most difficult decisions to secure the resolute support of a people. A government that uses it properly can do what is necessary without running the risk of losing the masses.

Propaganda is therefore a necessary life function of the modern state. Without it, seeking great goals is simply impossible in this century of the masses. It stands at the beginning of practical political activity in every area of public life. It is its important and necessary prerequisite.

Let me give several recent examples. I need only sketch the details. They are too fresh in our memories to require elaboration.

There are no parliamentary parties in Germany any longer. How could we have overcome them had we not waged an educational campaign for years that persuaded the people of their weaknesses, harms, and disadvantages? Their final elimination was only the result of what the people had already realized. Our propaganda weakened these parties. Based on that, they could be eliminated by a legal act.

Marxism could not be eliminated by a government decision. Its elimination was the end result of a process that began with the people. But that was only possible because our propaganda had shown the people that Marxism was a danger to both the state and society. The positive national discipline of the German press would never have been possible without the complete elimination of the influence of the liberal-Jewish press. That happened only because of the years-long work of our propaganda. Today, particularism in Germany is something of the past. The fact that it was eliminated by a strong central idea of the Reich is no accident, but rather it depended on psychological foundations that were established by our propaganda.

Or consider economic policy. Does anyone believe that the idea of class struggle could have been eliminated by a law? Is it not rather the fact that the seeds we sowed in a hundred thousand meetings resulted in a new socialist structure of labor? Today employers and workers stand together in the Labor Front. The Law on National Labor is the foundation of our economic thinking, realizing itself more and more. Are not these social achievements the result of long and tireless labor by thousands of speakers?

Germany suffers from a shortage of foreign currency. This affects the people in serious ways. Propaganda once again is the key to dealing with the problem.

The Hereditary Farming Law, the idea of the Reich Agricultural Estate, market regulations in agriculture, all these need propaganda to show the people their importance, which is necessary if they are to succeed.

We could eliminate the Jewish danger in our culture because the people had recognized it as the result of our propaganda. Major cultural achievements such as the unique "Kraft durch Freude" are possible only with the powerful support of the people. The prerequisite was and is propaganda, which here, too, creates and maintains the connection to the people.

The Winter Relief last year raised about 350 million marks. This was not the result of taxation, but rather many gifts of every amount. Everyone gave freely and gladly, many of whom in the past had done nothing in the face of similar need. Why? Because a broad propaganda, using every modern means, presented the whole nation with the need for this program of social assistance.

Forty-five million Reich marks of goods and services were provided. Eighty-five million Reich marks worth of fuel were distributed. One hundred and thirty million Reich marks worth of food were given out. Ten million Reich marks worth of meals were provided, and seventy million Reich marks worth of clothing.

Some of these achievements were the result of donations in kind, others of cash contributions. Street collections, donations of a part of paychecks, contributions from companies, and gifts subtracted from bank accounts resulted in cash totaling 184 million Reich marks. Twenty-four million marks alone were the result of "One Pot Sundays." The Reich itself added fifteen million marks to the contributions of the people. The railway system provided reduced or free shipping with a value of fourteen million marks.

Of our population of 65,595,000, 16,511,000 were assisted by the Winter Relief. There were 150,000 volunteers. There were only 4,474 paid workers, of whom 4,144 were in the thirty-four regional party offices, and 230 at the national headquarters.

Propaganda and education prepared the way for the largest social assistance program in history. They were the foundation. Their success was that, over a long winter, no one in Germany went hungry or was cold.

Over forty million people approved of the Führer's decision to leave the League of Nations on 12 November 1933. That gave him the ability to speak to the world in the name of the nation, defending honor, peace, and equality as the national ideals of the whole German people. The issues of disarmament were put on firm and clear foundations. Once again, propaganda was the foundation for the nation's unity on 12 November, and therefore of the freedom of action that the Führer had in foreign affairs.

Each situation brings new challenges. And each task requires the support of the people, which can only be gained by untiring propaganda that brings the broad masses knowledge and clarity. No area of public life can do without it. It is the never resting force behind public opinion. It must maintain an unbroken relationship between leadership and people. Every means of technology must be put in its service; the goal is to form the mass will and to give it meaning, purpose, and goals that will enable us to learn from past failures and mistakes and ensure that the lead National Socialist strength has given us over other nations will never again be lost.

May the bright flame of our enthusiasm never fade. It alone gives light and warmth to the creative art of modern political propaganda. Its roots are in the people. The movement gives it direction and drive. The state can only provide it with the new, wide-ranging technical means. Only a living relationship between people, movement, and state can guarantee that the creative art of propaganda, of which we have made ourselves the world's master, will never sink into bureaucracy and bureaucratic narrow-mindedness.

Creative people made propaganda and put it in the service of our movement. We must have creative people who can use the means of the state in its service.

It is also a function of the modern state. It is the firm ground on which the state must stand. It rises from the depths of the people, and must always return to the people to find its roots and strength. It may be good to have power based on weapons. It is better and longer lasting, however, to win and hold the heart of a people.

Source: Randall L. Bytwerk, ed. and trans., Landmark Speeches of National Socialism (College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2009), pp. 41–51. Reprinted by permission of the Texas A&M University Press.

50. ARTICLE IN DER STUERMER ON THE HEBREW BIBLE, JANUARY 1935

Published by the rabid antisemite Julius Streicher, Der Stürmer, a tabloid-type newspaper, played a very different role than the Völkischer Beobachter, the official Nazi Party paper. While that paper at least pretended to be a real newspaper, Der Stürmer was a crass assemblage of antisemitic rants and crude, sometimes pornographic renderings of stereotypical Jewish males ravishing innocent Aryan girls and women. Its purpose was undeniable: to arouse in its readers a visceral anti-Jewish response that would eventually—and inevitably—spill over into violence. A leitmotif of the paper was blood libel, the charge from the Middle Ages that Jews killed Christian children to make use of their blood for the preparation of matzoh, the unleavened bread eaten during the Passover seder. Streicher was one of the defendants in the Trial of the Major War Criminals in Nuremberg, Germany, where he was convicted of crimes against humanity and hanged on October 16, 1946. This excerpt reflects the attitude often expressed in Der Stürmer regarding the Hebrew Bible.

DER STUERMER, No. 2, January 1935, Page 4.
THE CHOSEN PEOPLE OF THE CRIMINALS

The history book of the Jews which is usually called the "Holy Scriptures" impresses us as a horrible criminal romance * * *

This "holy" book abounds in murder, incest, fraud, theft, and indecency. * * *

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 372, Doc. 2697-PS.

51. REPORT ON ANTI-JEWISH PROPAGANDA, AUGUST 6, 1935

This letter from Douglas Jenkins, consul general in the U.S. embassy in Berlin, to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, transmits an English translation of a truly disturbing example of Nazi propaganda. The leaflet it transmits accuses Jews of committing some of the most heinous crimes of which one could be accused, including murder, rape, theft, corruption, and did so in a way that was most likely to inflame a violent response. This type of scurrilous propaganda was not unusual in Nazi Germany. As noted by Jenkins, it was similar to the widely read tabloid Der Stürmer, the sole purpose of which was to incessantly reinforce the Nazi stereotype of Jews, and do so in the crudest of terms. The transmittal letter also addressed the encounter of a Jewish American who, despite her U.S. citizenship, was harassed and feared violence.

AMERICAN CONSULATE GENERAL
Berlin, Germany, August 6, 1935

CONFIDENTIAL

Subject: Anti-Jewish Propaganda

The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose herewith a copy of a leaflet recently picked up on the streets in Berlin. A translation of this document is also enclosed. It will be observed that the leaflet violently attacks the Jews in the most unrestrained language. Unfortunately it is not known from what source these leaflets have come, but it may be said that they resemble the sort of propaganda published regularly in Streicher's weekly DER STUERMER.

While there have been no personal attacks on individuals of the Jewish race recently, the anti-Jewish campaign is being continued without any indication of abatement. In a recent speech Dr. Frick, the Minister of the Interior, declared that the anti-Jewish program would continue without hesitation but that the public must realize that individual attacks against Jews would not be tolerated. The Government, he said, would carry on the campaign in a legal and orderly manner.

Signs "Jews are not Wanted Here" are still displayed at the entrance of many villages and smaller towns, and considerable anti-Jewish activity has also been noted at seashore resorts along the Baltic.

Recently a Miss Berta Gordon, a naturalized American of the Jewish race, called at the Consulate General to complain of treatment she had received at various bathing resorts on the Baltic Sea. According to Miss Gordon, who made an affidavit to be filed in this office, she went first to Kolberg where there was a large sign "Jews Not Wanted" hung across the highway leading into the town. Because of this sign Miss Gordon and her party decided to go on to another place called Henkenhagen where there was no indication of anti-Jewish activity. At Henkenhagen the hotel keeper assured the party they would be perfectly safe and that there would be no trouble. However, later in the afternoon Miss Gordon and the others were required to turn in their passports to the police, and the next morning the hotel manager asked them all to leave because he said he had received a warning from S.A. men that Jews could not remain in Henkenhagen. After some delay in the return of her passport. Miss Gordon says she and her friends left Henkenhagen and there was no further trouble. However, Miss Gordon insists that the landlord of the hotel was warned by the S.A. that if she remained she would be maltreated regardless of her American citizenship.

This case is the only one that has come to the attention of the Consulate General in many months involving direct threats against an American citizen, and for this reason may be of some interest to the Department. I may add that no action was taken by the Consulate General in Miss Gordon's case because her mother and brother reside in Berlin and she was afraid a protest from this office might result in the persecution of her relatives.

Respectfully yours,
Douglas Jenkins,
Consul General.

Enclosures:
Leaflet; with original of dispatch only;
Translation thereof, with original of dispatch only.

800
DJ: EMP

Translation of Leaflet
GERMAN CITIZEN
DO YOU KNOW

THAT THE JEW

oppresses	your Child
rapes	your Wife
rapes	your sister
rapes	your Fiancee
murders	your Parents steals	your Property
ridicules	your Honor
derides	your Manners
destroys	your Church
spoils	your Culture
corrupts	your Race

THAT THE JEW

lies to you robs you deceives you calls you a beast

THAT JEWISH

doctors slowly murder you lawyers never help you attain your right stores sell you spoiled foodstuffs butcher shops are dirtier than pig-sties.

THAT THE JEW

has to do all the above according to the laws of the Talmud as it is for him a deed pleasing to his God.

GERMAN CITIZENS—THEREFORE DEMAND: Hard labor, cancelation of civil rights, confiscation of property and deportation for Germans who have sexual intercourse with non-Aryans. In cases of repetition, the death penalty. Their children are to be sterilized and cannot become citizens. They and the non-Aryan parent are to be deported. Women and girls who of their own free will start an affair with a Jew, are never to be granted legal protection. Hard labor for deceit and frauds.

THE JEW LIVES OF LIES AND WILL DIE OF THE TRUTH.

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1459: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

52. ARTICLE IN DER STUERMER ON RITUAL MURDER, APRIL 1937

Der Stürmer, the Nazi Party tabloid-type newspaper published by Julius Streicher, was one of the primary means by which the party disseminated its antisemitic propaganda. In addition to antisemitic stereotypes, including hook noses, obsession with money, and the carnal danger Jewish men represented for Aryan girls and women, Streicher kept alive a myth stemming from the Middle Ages. “Blood libel” was the accusation that Jews used the blood of non-Jewish boys and girls to make matzoh that is eaten during Passover. As absurd as that accusation was, Jews were killed throughout the centuries whenever a non-Jewish boy or girl went missing or had been killed. The picture that Streicher paints in this article from Der Stürmer is the classic accusation, including references to the “Talmud Jew” and supposed prayers from verses of the Hebrew Bible.

DER STUERMER, Nurnberg, April 1937, Number 14,
Vol. 15, Pages 1–2.
RITUAL MURDER

The murder of the 10 years old Gertrud Lenhoff in Quirschied (Saarpfalz) * * * The Jews are our MISFORTUNE!
* * *

Also the numerous confessions made by the Jews show that the execution of ritual murders is a law to the Talmud Jew. The former Chief Rabbi (and later monk) Teofiti declares, f. i., that the ritual murders take place especially on the Jewish purim (in memory of the Persian murders) and Passover (in memory of the murder of Christ).

The instructions are as follows:

The blood of the victims is to be tapped by force. On Passover, it is to be used in wine and matzos; thus, a small part of the blood is to be poured into the dough of the matzos and into the wine. The mixing is done by the Jewish head of the family.

The procedure is as follows: the family head empties a few drops of the fresh and powdered blood into the glass, wets the fingers of the left hand with it and sprays (blesses) with it everything on the table. The head of the family then says: “Dam Izzardia chynim heroff dever isyn porech harbe hossen maschus pohorus” (Exod. VII, 12) (“Thus we ask God to send the ten plagues to all enemies of the Jewish faith.”) Then they eat, and at the end the head of the family exclaims: “Sfach, chaba, moscho kol hagoyim!” (“May all Gentiles perish—as the child whose blood is contained in the bread and wine!”)

The fresh (or dried and powdered) blood of the slaughtered is further used by young married Jewish couples, by pregnant Jewesses, for circumcision and so on. Ritual murder is recognized by all Talmud Jews. The Jew believes he absolves himself thus of his sins.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 372–373, Doc. 2699-PS.

53. ARTICLE IN DER STUERMER: “TWO LITTLE TALMUD JEWS,” DECEMBER 1938

This excerpt from a Der Stürmer article is one of many such attacks by Julius Streicher, the editor of the tabloid-type Nazi paper. Its characterization of the Torah—the first five books of the Hebrew Bible and the holiest of all Jewish writings—and the Talmud—a compendium of Jewish law, arguments and discussions among rabbis over the centuries and the ways of Jewish life and tradition—reflects the Nazis’ propaganda efforts to demonize the Jews by demonizing these books that are central to Judaism. It also speaks of Jewish rituals and practices as criminal, making Jews all the more vulnerable to a growing sense within the Reich (meaning at this time in 1938, Germany, Austria, the Sudetenland, and Bohemia and Moravia) that Jews and their “foreign ways” had no place in a Nazi-occupied Europe.

DER STUERMER, No. 50,

December 1938, Page 1.

TWO LITTLE TALMUD JEWS

The Thora is the old testament law book of the Jews. It contains:

The five books of Moses and all the oaths, curses, the criminal recipes and provisions of the God Jehovah for the Jewish people. The Talmud is the great Jewish book of crimes that the Jew practices in his daily life.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 372, Doc. 2698-PS.

54. EXTRACTS FROM “THE POISONOUS MUSHROOM,” A CHILDREN’S STORY, 1938

Published in 1938, The Poisonous Mushroom (Der Giftpilz) contained seventeen short stories, each with its own brightly colored illustration. It was written by Ernst Hiemer, illustrated by Philipp Rupprecht (Fips), and published by Julius Streicher, the infamous publisher of the Nazi tabloid-type newspaper Der Stürmer. The title of the book is explained in the book’s first story. While searching in the forest for mushrooms, a mother tells her young son that bad mushrooms are poisonous and look very much like good ones that are edible, making it hard to tell one from the other. The distinction between mushrooms becomes the model for the distinction between Germans and Jews: the Germans are the good people, the Jews the bad people who can disguise themselves, making their evil hard to recognize. The mother tells her son about the different kinds of “poisonous Jews,” each of which is depicted in its own chapter of the book: the Jewish peddler, the Jewish cattle dealer, the kosher butcher, the Jewish doctor, etc. Each story depicts the very worst of antisemitic stereotypes, and each ends with a short jingle, such as the one in the first of three excerpts included in this document.

THE POISONOUS MUSHROOM [Der Giftpilz]

A Stuermer book for young and old Fables by Ernst Hiemer Pictures by Fips

Published by Der Stuermer—Nurnberg copyright 1938

* * *

[P.6] “It is almost noon,” he said, “now we want to summarize what we have learned in this lesson. What did we discuss?”

All children raise their hands. The teacher calls on Karl Scholz, a little boy on the first bench. “We talked about how to recognize a Jew.”

“Good! Now tell us about it!”

Little Karl takes the pointer, goes to the black board and points to the sketches.

“One usually recognizes a Jew by his nose. The Jewish nose is crooked at the end. It looks like the figure 6. Therefore it is called the “Jewish Six”. Many non-Jews have crooked noses, too. But their noses are bent, not at the end but further up. Such a nose is called a hook nose or eagle's beak. It has nothing to do with a Jewish nose."

"Right!" says the teacher. "But the Jew is recognized not only by his nose . . ." The boy continues. The Jew is also recognized by his lips. His lips are usually thick. Often the lower lip hangs down. That is called "sloppy". And the Jew is also recognized by his eyes. His eyelids are usually thicker and more fleshy than ours. The look of the Jew is lurking and sharp

[P.9] Then the teacher goes to the desk and turns over the black board, on its back is a verse. The children recite it in chorus:

From a Jew's countenance—the evil devil talks to us,
The devil, who in every land—is known as evil plague.
If we shall be free of the Jew—and again will be happy and glad,
Then the youth must struggle with us—to subdue the Jew devil.

[P.32] Inge sits in the reception room of the Jew doctor. She has to wait a long time. She looks through the journals which are on the table. But she is most too nervous to read even a few sentences. Again and again she remembers the talk with her mother. And again and again her mind reflects on the warnings of her leader of the BDM [League of German Girls]: "A German must not consult a Jew doctor! And particularly not a German girl! Many a girl that went to a Jew doctor to be cured, found disease and disgrace!"

When Inge had entered the waiting room, she experienced an extraordinary incident. From the doctor's consulting room she could hear the sound of crying. She heard the voice of a young girl: "Doctor, doctor leave me alone!"

Then she heard the scornful laughing of a man. And then all of a sudden it became absolutely silent. Inge had listened breathlessly.

"What may be the meaning of all this?" she asked herself and her heart was pounding. And again she thought of the warning of her leader in the BDM.

Inge was already waiting for an hour. Again she takes the journals in an endeavor to read. Then the door opens. Inge looks up. The Jew appears. She screams. In terror she drops the paper. Frightened she jumps up. Her eyes stare into the face of the Jewish doctor. And this face is the face of the devil. In the middle of this devil's face is a huge crooked nose.

Behind the spectacles two criminal eyes. And the thick lips are grinning. A grinning that expresses: "Now I got you at last, you little German girl!"

And then the Jew approaches her. His fleshy fingers stretch out after her. But now Inge has her wits. Before the Jew can grab hold of her, she hits the fat face of the Jew doctor with her hand. Then one jump to the door. Breathlessly Inge runs down the stairs. Breathlessly she escapes the Jew house.

[P.61]

The pimf [Hitler boy between 10–14] so far has not said anything. Suddenly he stops. Then he grasps his two friends by the arm and pulls them away. They stop in front of a billboard. They read a large poster. It says Julius Streicher makes an address in the People's Hall about "The Jews are our misfortune".

"That is where we go!" shouts Konrad, "I wanted to hear him speak for a long time." "I have heard him once before at a meeting two years ago," says Erich. "Do tell us all about it!" the two pimfs beg.

The Hitler youth recounts:

"The meeting was overcrowded. Many thousands of people attended. To begin with, Streicher talked of his experiences in the years of struggle, and of the tremendous achievements of the Hitler Reich. Then he began to talk about the Jewish question. All he said was so clear and simple that even we boys could follow it. Again and again he told about examples taken from life. At one time he talked most amusingly and cracked jokes, making all of us laugh. Then again he became most serious, and it was so quiet in the hall that one could hear a needle drop. He talked of the Jews and their horrible crimes. He talked of the serious danger which Judaism is for the whole world.

"Without a solution of the Jewish question there will be no salvation of mankind".

That is what he shouted to us. All of us could understand him. And when, at the end, he shouted the "Sieg-Heil" for the Fuehrer, we all acclaimed him with tremendous enthusiasm. For two hours Streicher spoke at that occasion. To us it appeared to have been but a few minutes.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 358–360, Doc. 1778-PS.

55. EXTRACTS FROM THE INTRODUCTION TO THE SS PAMPHLET, “THE SUBHUMAN,” N.D.

Although not dated in the Nuremberg Trials evidence volume, the infamous pamphlet The Subhuman (Der Untermensch) was published by the SS (Schutzstaffel) in the early 1940s. It is a prime example of the Nazi conception of its war against the Jews as a cosmic battle for civilization itself. A passage not included in this document reads: “These subhuman creatures dwell in the cesspools, and swamps, preferring a hell on earth, to the light of the sun. But in these swamps and cesspools the subhuman has found its leader—The Eternal Jew!” In addition to these descriptions of the Jews, the pamphlet also equates Bolshevism and the Jews, saying “Bolshevism is as old as the Jew itself!” Similar to the phrase used so often by Hitler, “Judeo-Bolsheviks,” this only served to add political antisemitism to the pamphlet’s extreme racial antisemitism. Perhaps most disturbing about this pamphlet is that it seems to have been considered appropriate material to be used in schools.

EXTRACT FROM THE INTRODUCTION TO THE 5S PAMPHLET “THE SUBHUMAN,” A PUBLICATION OF THE SS MAIN OFFICE * * * * *

“As long as there are human beings on earth, the fight between humans and subhumans will be a historical law and the fight led by the Jew against the nations belongs, as far back as we can see, to the natural course of life on our planet. One can safely arrive at the conclusion that this struggle for life and death is as much a law of nature as the fight of the plague germ against the healthy body.”

Reich Leader SS Heinrich Himmler 1935

Just as the night rises against the day, as light and shadow are eternal enemies—so the greatest enemy of man who rules the earth is man himself. The subhuman—this biologically apparently entirely man-resembling creation of nature with hands, feet, and a sort of brain, with eyes and mouth, is yet an entirely different, a terrible creature, is only tending towards a human with anthropoid facial features—but mentally and morally lower than any animal. In the interior of this being is a cruel chaos of wild, unsuppressed fury—the inexpressible will to destruction, most primitive greed, entirely inconcealed obscenity.

Subhuman—nothing else. For not all that wears human features is equal. Woe to him who forgets this!

Whatever this earth possesses of great works, ideas and arts—man has contrived, created, and completed; he meditated and invented, for him there was only one goal—to work himself up to a higher level of existence, to shape the inadequate, and to replace the insufficient by something better.

So culture grew.

So the plow, the tool, and the house came into existence.

So man became gregarious; so family, nation, and state came into existence.

So man became good and great. So he rose far above all creatures.

So he became nearest to God.

But the subhuman also lived. He hated the work of the other. He raged against it, secretly as thief, publicly as slanderer—as murderer.

He associated with his ilk.

Beast called to beast.

Never did the subhuman preserve peace, never did he relax. For he needed semi-darkness, chaos. He avoided the light of cultural progress.

* * * * *

Publisher.—The Reich Leader SS, the SS Main Office.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 226–227, Doc. NO-1805.

56. NEWSPAPER ARTICLE BY THE SS, “JEWS, WHAT NEXT?,” NOVEMBER 24, 1938

This article attributed to the SS (Schutzstaffel), an elite paramilitary unit under the leadership of Heinrich Himmler, was written just two weeks after Kristallnacht, which resulted in widespread government-initiated and organized violence against Jews and their property, including their synagogues. It also followed by about four months the conclusion of the Evian Conference at which no nations—including the United States and the United Kingdom—except for the Dominican Republic agreed to take in more Jewish refugees. This explains the article’s cries of hypocrisy against the Western powers when they accuse Germany of ill treatment of Jews. It states that now is the time to eliminate the Jews, but that did not yet mean physical annihilation; it meant the physical separation of the Jews from the rest of German society. It included references to the Jews' wealth, their unwillingness to engage in physical labor, and the threat of revenge by the Jews, all of which are long-standing antisemitic stereotypes.

Jews, What Next?

In 1933 and later we were simple-hearted and naïve. When so-called public opinion in the world lost control of itself because our "barbaric ways" prevented the Jews from abusing our wives and daughters, then we took it very seriously, and tried to explain the Jewish Question to the others from the beginning—what holy simplicity! As though one of these waterproof democrats ever had the least interest in it!

What is the real position? Neither Mr. Roosevelt, nor an English Archbishop, nor any other prominent diploma-democrat would put his dear daughter in the bed of a greasy Eastern European Jew; only, when it is a question of Germany, they suddenly know nothing of any Jewish question, only of the "persecution of the innocents because of their religion," as though we had ever been interested in anything a Jew believes or doesn't believe.

The real situation and truth is that these diploma-democrats know the Jewish question very well, in fact—one need only look at their immigration regulations and their fear of Jewish immigrants—and even derive practical conclusions from them, but pretend to be stupid and ignorant when they think they can harm Germany by this means.

Well then, that might still have surprised us a couple of years ago. Today we react to their screeching as to a continuous noise that is not capable of becoming any louder. It is known that the human ear can hear sounds only up to certain level of vibration. Sounds and noises of still higher frequencies are not heard. We have become immune to any increase in the great screaming of world Jewry.

Simple people derive an unshakable wisdom from this. . . .

There is a view that is heard at every step: if we had solved the Jewish Question completely and by the most brutal methods back in 1933, the outcry would have been no worse than it has been all the time since then, because we are solving the Jewish Question piecemeal, by single measures forced on us by the Jews themselves and their friends. This view is correct in itself. But it had to remain theoretical because at that time we lacked the military might that we possess today. At that time the Jews might have succeeded in inciting the nations into a war of revenge against us; today the loudest of the democratic screechers will be the ones to hesitate the longest.

Because it is necessary, because we no longer hear the world's screaming, and finally because no power in the world can stop us, we shall therefore now take the Jewish Question towards its total solution. The program is clear.

It is:

total elimination, complete separation!

What does that mean?

It means not only the elimination of the Jews from the German national economy, a position which they brought upon themselves following their murderous attack and their incitement to war and murder.

It means much more!

It can no longer be asked of any German that he should continue to live under one roof with Jews, a race stamped with the mark of murderers and criminals, and deadly enemies of the German people.

The Jews must therefore be driven out of our apartment houses and residential areas and put into series of streets or blocks of houses where they will be together and have as little contact as possible with Germans. They must be marked and the right must be taken from them to own houses or land or a share in either, because it cannot be expected of a German that he should submit to the power of a Jewish landlord and maintain him by the work of his hands.

Into a Criminal Existence

But once this nation of parasites is in every way dependent on itself and isolated, it will become impoverished because it is unwilling and incapable of doing work itself. Even if the Jews still call billions their own today, and even if there are still many hundreds of millionaires among them, and even if the individual so-called "poor" Jew has disguised and hidden enough, they will still very soon have eaten up their capital, once the vital artery of these parasites has been blocked.

And if we force the rich Jews to support the "poor" comrades of their race, which may prove necessary, they will still all sink down into a criminal existence, in accordance with their deepest blood-conditioned nature.

But let nobody believe that we will calmly watch such a development. The German People has not the least wish to put up with hundreds of thousands of criminals in its territory, who will seek not only to secure their existence by means of crime, but also to take revenge!

1134 Report on the “Situation in War-Time Germany”

Least of all do we wish to see a breeding-ground for Bolshevism and a roof-organization for the political and criminal sub-humans who crumble away from the edge of our nation as the result of a process of natural elimination. . . .

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Israel Gutman, and Abraham Margalio, eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, translated by Lea Ben Dor (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press/Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 118–121. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

57. REPORT ON THE “SITUATION IN WAR-TIME GERMANY,” MARCH 6, 1940

This report from Alexander Kirk, chargé d'affaires in the U.S. embassy in Berlin, to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, provides an on-the-ground, real-time assessment of the plight of the Jews in the Third Reich some six months after Germany invaded Poland to begin World War II. Its focus is on the “Old Reich,” meaning the Reich prior to its expansion into Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. It addresses such matters as the Jews’ elimination from the German economy; the significant reduction in the Jewish population in various areas of the Reich; the increased difficulties of Jewish emigration as a result of the war; the problems the Jews encounter in purchasing food and receiving coal deliveries; the inconsistent treatment of Mischlinge, meaning persons who are considered Jews but not “full Jews”; the forced relocation of Jews; and other matters. It also explains the Jewish communities’ fear that a large-scale deportation of Jews to eastern Poland may be in the making.

EMBASSY OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

No. [unclear]
Berlin, March 6, 1940

Subject: Situation of the Jews in War-Time Germany

Confidential
The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

With reference to the Embassy’s telegram No. 529 of March 1, 2 p.m., and previous recent telegrams dealing with developments affecting the Jews in Germany, I have the honor to submit herewith, for the possible convenience of the Department, a recapitulation of the situation of the Jews in Germany in war-time. This survey is based on information obtained in Berlin and while it touches upon conditions in Austria, in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia and in Poland, it relates particularly to the status of the Jews in the territory formerly comprising the “Old Reich”.

As a result of the anti-Jewish legislation enacted late in 1938, the German Jews, i.e., those persons legally defined as Jews on the basis of having three or more Jewish grandparents or of belonging to the Jewish faith, have been virtually eliminated from commerce, trade and the professions, except medicine, which they may practice among themselves. Many Jews consequently live upon savings or upon the charity of the central Reich Association of Jews in Germany, which is the body authorized by the German Government to administer the public affairs of the Jews and to levy contributions upon them for Jewish relief. During the late summer months of last year, and particularly since the outbreak of the war, some twenty thousand Jews have been re-employed as day laborers in industry and have been put to work on land improvement and outdoor construction projects. Jews are not accepted for army service.

Shortly after the outbreak of the war the German Government authorities instructed the various Jewish agencies that they should continue to promote emigration by every means possible. This has proved, however, to be more difficult than formerly, owing to the closing of enemy countries as direct areas of reception, as well as owing to new obstacles arising from complications regarding transportation and the acquisition of foreign exchange.

With respect to the emigration of German national Jews from the territory of the Old Reich, the Government has as yet imposed no restrictions based upon age or profession or other considerations.

There is presented below a table indicating the number of Jews (i.e., Jews in the sense of the definition mentioned above), still left in various German territories, following reductions brought about by emigration or flight. These statistics, which have been obtained from the central Jewish Association in Berlin, are more or less exact as regards the Old Reich, while with respect to the other districts they represent approximate estimates.

Jewish Population in the German Reich (Old Reich)
Number beginning of 1933		522,700
in the census of June 16, 1933	499,682
plus in the Saarland	5,000	504,700
Number End of 1939		202,400
Emigration from the beginning of 1933 to the end of 1939		281,900
Emigration since the beginning of the war:
a. to the end of 1939		6,000
b. January and February 1940 together		2,000
Excess of deaths over births from the beginning of 1933 to the end of 1939		38,400
Jewish Population in the Ostmark
Number in 1933		191,481
Before incorporation in the German Reich		170,000
Present number		56,000
In particular in the City of Vienna:
Number in 1933		176,034
Before incorporation in the German Reich		160,000
Present number		55,000
Jewish Population In the Protectorate
Before affiliation with the German Reich	250–270,000
Present number		160,000
Jewish Population in Danzig
Former number		3–10,000
Present number		1,400

In general the treatment of the Jews in the Old Reich has not changed to any great extent since the beginning of the war. As a rule they receive the same food rations as the rest of the population, although they are subjected to petty discriminations in being compelled to call at the Government Food Offices for their ration cards and in being forced to make their purchases at specified hours. The Jews, moreover, do not receive supplementary rations for comestibles such as chocolate, honey and cakes, and extra meat rations, and furthermore they have for the time being been refused clothing ration cards. In certain sections of Berlin coal deliveries have not been made to Jewish families nor apartment houses predominantly occupied by Jews. During the recent severe weather several thousand Jews in Berlin were enlisted for forced work for the cleaning of snow and for the loading and unloading of coal trucks.

The situation of the so-called "crossbreeds" and half-Jews, of whom there are perhaps a million in the Old Reich alone, would appear to vary locally. On the whole they are treated somewhat better than the full-blooded Jews, but in certain districts they are understood to suffer unofficially imposed disabilities.

With respect to Austria, the legal status of the Jews there is now practically assimilated to that prevailing in the Old Reich, and the same process is apparently under way in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. The Reich Association of Jews in Germany is not permitted to concern itself with the welfare of the Jews in either Austria or in the Protectorate, and it is understood that, owing to the still comparatively unsettled state of National Socialist Party discipline in these areas, and particularly in Austria, the Jews are subjected to considerably severer extra-legal persecution and restrictions than in the Old Reich.

Shortly after the conquest of Poland reports circulated that plans had been made for a general deportation of the Jews in Germany to the new Jewish "reservation" established in Eastern Poland in the district around Lublin. A detailed statistical survey carried out by the police of Jewish families in the Old Reich was thought to portend such a development. With the exception of Stettin, however, the Jewish population of the various Reich German cities have so far been permitted to remain in Germany.

In Stettin the entire Jewish population of some 1,200, including casual Jewish visitors to the city and Jews who had completed preparations to emigrate abroad, were assembled on seven hours' notice during the night of February 12 and were shipped off by special train to Poland. They were permitted to take with them only small quantities of baggage and, following their departure, their houses were sealed and it was officially stated that their belongings in Stettin would be liquidated and the funds thereby realized would be placed in a blocked account. It is learned that the Stettin Jews have arrived in Eastern Poland, with at least one death occurring en route, and that they are now settled in the towns of Piaska, Biala and Terespol in the Lublin district. They are being cared for by already existing Jewish communities in these cities and it is said that they are experiencing considerable hardship and distress.

The central Jewish Association in Berlin was officially informed that this action had been initiated by the Gauleiter of the Stettin district, Herr Schwede-Coburg, and that although the Reich authorities were not "responsible" therefor, they could not rescind the action already taken. It was furthermore stated that the Stettin Jews would have to remain in Poland and that for the time being permission to leave could not be given to those who had completed their preparations for emigration abroad.

On or about February 15 an order was issued in Schneidemühl, which is also within Herr Schwede-Coburg's district, that the Jews in that city should prepare for deportation within a week's time, presumably also for Eastern Poland. The Jewish authorities learned after inquiring in Berlin that Herr Schwede-Coburg planned that all Jews should be evacuated from the Grenzmark, the region lying on the former Polish frontier and including Schneidemühl, and that their place here, as well as in Stettin, should be taken by returning Baltic Germans. The central Jewish authorities have apparently succeeded in obtaining a modification of the original plan to send the Jews from Schneidemühl to Poland and arrangements are now being considered whereby these Jews should be sent farther back into the Reich, where they will be settled in small towns and on Jewish-owned farms.

Information is not available as to how many Jews in all have been sent to the Lublin reservation. It is known that approximately 4,500 have been despatched from Vienna and 1,000 from Mährisch-Ostrau in the Protectorate. There have also been heavy deportations of Jews from the former Polish territories, in particular the Corridor and Posen areas, including Lodz, now formally annexed to the Reich; the Jews, together with a large number of Poles, are being removed from these districts to make room for Baltic Germans. Official intimations have also been given that some 1,400 Jews from Danzig, as well as the Jews in East Prussia, will be moved to Poland in the early spring.

According to German official estimates there are some two million Jews within the former Polish territory now comprising the Government General. As far as can be ascertained there has as yet been no large scale transfer of Jews within the Government General to the Lublin reservation which, in addition to the Jews sent from Stettin, Austria and the Protectorate, comprises many Jewish communities which have been settled there for a long period of time. The Jews in the Government General are compelled to wear arm bands and are subject to a forced labor obligation, as well as many restrictions. Although they have been forced out of leading positions in commerce and industry, they apparently still continue to be active in trade.

Those Polish Jews who were caught in Germany at the outbreak of the Polish war were immediately imprisoned, some of them being confined in work camps from which they have been subsequently released to be sent back to Poland, and some of them being detained in concentration camps, where a number estimated between one and two thousand still remain.

Although government officials in Berlin have assured the central Jewish Association that no plan is being entertained at present to deport Jews from the Old Reich to Eastern Poland, the Jewish authorities are apprehensive that steps along these lines may be taken in the course of this year. Among the factors which encourage such an apprehension are the following; 1) the recent completion of the already-mentioned statistical survey of Jewish families in the Reich, the exact purpose of which, although undefined, would appear to be adapted to just such an aim as mass deportation; 2) the possibility that other Gauleiter may be tempted to rival each other in following the precedent set in the district of Stettin; 3) reports concerning the construction of barracks in small towns in Poland which are reputedly for the reception of Jews, who would be put to work on land improvement projects in the surrounding countryside; 4) the fact that an example for the removal and transfer of populations has been set in the case of the Baltic Germans and the Germans from Russian Poland, and the fact furthermore that the organization and equipment which would be necessary for the deportation of Jews has thus, so to speak, been tested and tried and would be ready for use. Although it is learned that pressure from radical Party circles is increasing in favor of a mass removal of the German Jews to Poland particularly in view of the slackened rate of emigration resulting from the war, no definite decision in the matter is known so far to have been taken, and it is thought likely that further consideration of possible action along this line may be postponed at least until the spring when a change in the weather would be conducive to further transfers of populations.

Respectfully yours,
Alexander Kirk,
Chargé d'affaires a.i.
840.1
JDB/mhg

Source: State CDF 862.4016/2161: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

58. MEMORANDUM REGARDING FOOD SUPPLY AND SHOPPING TIME FOR JEWS, SEPTEMBER 18, 1942

This memorandum sent under the authority of Hans-Joachim Riecke, Reich minister for nutrition and agriculture, to various state authorities severely curtails foodstuffs available to Jews, such as meat, eggs, wheat products, and milk. No relief is provided for Jews who are sick, in hospitals, pregnant, or nursing. Times when Jews are allowed to shop for food are to be restricted so as "to avoid inconveniences in the supply of the Aryan population." Furthermore, any food received by Jews as gifts sent from abroad must be counted against an individual's rations. To make sure that ration cards make it clear that the bearer is a Jew, the memorandum requires that those cards be overprinted with the word "Jew." These and other directions make it abundantly clear that matters regarding the nutritional health of the Jewish population were of little concern to the governing Nazis.

The Reich Minister for Nutrition and Agriculture
Berlin W 8, Wilhelmstr. 72
18 September 1942.

To the State Governments [Landesregierungen] (State Nutrition offices) the Prussian Provincial Presidents (provincial nutrition offices) with the exception of the Eastern territories not incorporated into Upper Silesia.

For information of the district presidents [Regierungspraesidenten] and respective authorities

Re: food supply for Jews.

2. Rations.

Jews will no longer receive the following foods, beginning with the 42nd distribution period (19 October 1942): meat, meat products, eggs, wheat products (cake, white bread, wheat rolls, wheat flour, etc) whole milk fresh skimmed milk, as well as such foods are distributed not on food ration cards issued uniformly throughout the Reich but on local supply certificates or by special announcement of the nutrition offices on extra coupons of the food cards. Jewish children and young people over 10 years of age will receive the bread ration of the normal consumer. Jewish children and young people over 6 years of age will receive the fat ration of the normal consumer, no honey substitute and no cocoa powder, and they will not receive the supplement of marmalade accorded the age classes of 6 to 14 years. Jewish children up to 6 years receive 1/2 liter of fresh skimmed milk daily.

Accordingly no meat, egg or milk cards and no local supply certificates shall be issued to Jews. Jewish children and young people over 10 years of age will receive the bread cards and those over 6 years of age the fat cards of the normal consumer. The bread cards issued to Jews will entitle them to rye flour products only. Jewish children under 6 years of age shall be issued the supply certificate for fresh skimmed milk. "Good for 1/2 liter daily" shall be noted on it.

Jews cannot be self-providers in the sense of any decrees.

1. Regulation for sick persons, etc.

The regulations for sick and infirm persons, expectant and nursing mothers and women in childbed do not apply to Jews.

The regulations of this decree apply also to Jewish inmates of hospitals.

4. Special allotments.

Jews are excluded from special allotments.

1. Exchange of food cards for travel and restaurant coupons.

The exchange of food cards for travel and restaurant coupons may be allowed to Jews only in urgent exceptional cases.

2. Ration-free food.

For the purchase of non-rationed food the Jews are not subject to restrictions as long as these products are available to the Aryan population in sufficient quantities. Ration-free foods which are distributed only from time to time and in limited quantities, such as vegetable and herring salad, fish paste, etc., are not to be given to Jews. The nutrition offices are authorized to permit Jews to purchase turnips, plain kind of cabbage etc.

3. Marking of ration cards.

Ration cards issued to Jews shall be printed over diagonally (i.e. over all individual coupons) with the repeated over-print "Jew". A color in contrast to the basic color of the cards shall be chosen for this. Cards and coupons over-printed "Jew" do not entitle the bearer to special allotments. Cancellation of these coupons before issue of the cards is therefore not necessary.

4. Special shopping time for Jews.

In order to avoid inconveniences in the supply of the Aryan population, it is recommended that the nutrition authorities establish special shopping times for Jews.

5. Food gift parcels for Jews.

The nutrition offices have to charge in full against the rations of the received all gift food parcels from abroad addressed to Jews. Should it be products which are rationed but not regularly distributed (such as coffee, cocoa, tea, etc.) the entire shipment or in case of a delayed report on the receipt of the package, the still unused part—will be made available to big consumers, such as hospitals and will be charged against their rations.

In the decree of 29 April 1941, of which a copy is enclosed, the Reich Minister of Finance instructed the Customs Offices to report weekly to the competent nutrition offices all gift packages, regardless of the quantity of the incoming merchandise, when it is known or can suspect that the receiver is a Jew. In case the report of the Customs Office to the nutrition office is delayed until the food received in the gift package is consumed, it can still be charged against their rations. Insofar as the State Police Offices are informed of these food parcels from abroad addressed to Jews, they will secure the packages and put them at the disposal of the nutrition offices [Ernaehrungs-Aemter].

For the Secretary of State Reicke

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 914–915, Doc. 1347-PS.

II. The Nazi Assault

59. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND: TELEGRAM 1, OCTOBER 28, 1938, 5:00 P.M.

The telegrams that follow (documents 59 through 65) from members of the U.S. diplomatic staff in Leipzig, Berlin, and Warsaw to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, concern a policy by the Polish government that spurred a response by the German government, all with ramifications neither government had anticipated. The Polish government issued a decree intended to prevent Polish Jews living in Germany from returning to Poland after October 30, 1938. The German government then instituted a mass expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany in order that they enter Poland before the deadline. As a result, some 18,000 Jews found themselves in no man's land at the German/Polish border, held in terrible conditions pending negotiations between the two governments. Herschel Grynszpan, a 17-year-old Jew studying in Paris at the time, whose family was among the Jews held at the border, entered the Germany embassy in Paris on November 7, 1938, and, as an act of revenge, shot and killed Ernst vom Rath, a low-level German functionary at the embassy. This murder was used by the Nazis as an excuse for what became known as Kristallnacht, the Nazi government-sponsored and organized pogrom against the Jews of Germany and Austria.

REB

From Leipzig

Dated October 28, 1938

Secretary of State,

Washington.

October 28, 5 p.m.

I have the honor to report that a forced [unclear] of Polish Jews from Leipzig to Poland is now in progress. Without any warning whatsoever radical measures have been applied, since 5 a.m. three train loads are said to have departed already. Schools, shops, homes, even [unclear] home being combed and occupants marched to railroad irrespective of age, health, sex, or property. [unclear] are roughly 6,000 Polish Jews in Leipzig most of whom are identified with the fur trade. American interests as yet only indirectly involved. One American fur merchant reports that all of his employees as Polish Jews have been arrested. Chaotic aftermath fur business expected here.

Bufful

CSB

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1798: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

60. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS
FROM GERMANY TO POLAND:
TELEGRAM 2, OCTOBER 28, 1938,
8:00 P.M.

See the introduction to document 59.

GRAY
From Berlin
Dated October 28, 1938
Rec'd 5:22 p.m.
Secretary of State,
Washington
578, October 28, 8 p.m.

During the course of the day the German police authorities have rounded up a large number of Polish Jews and are issuing orders for their expulsion to Poland. This has taken place in Berlin and we understand in other big cities in the Reich. As far as we can ascertain only male Polish Jews have been arrested and none up to this time have actually been sent over the Polish border. We understand that the grounds for the action are a recent Polish decree to the effect that no Polish citizen may reenter Poland after October 30th unless his passport has previously been validated by a Polish consulate or diplomatic mission.

The Polish Embassy states that it is negotiating with the Germans in an endeavor to get them to rescind the expulsion orders. American correspondents report the explanation of the German officials is that the Polish decree produced the probability of Germany having several [Heading on page two of the telegram: 2-#578, From Berlin, Oct. 28, 8 p.m.] thousand foreigners without nationality (staatenlos) who after October 30th could not (repeat not) be deported. The Polish Embassy sometime ago informally estimated that there were 50,000 Polish Jews in Germany proper and 5,000 in Austria.

More specific information should be available tomorrow.
Repeated to Warsaw and London for Rublee.

Wilson
NPL
EMB

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1799: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

61. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS
FROM GERMANY TO POLAND:
TELEGRAM 3, OCTOBER 29, 1938,
NOON

See the introduction to document 59.

From Warsaw
Dated October 29, 1938
Rec'd 4:25 p.m.
Secretary of State,
Washington
242, October, noon. (GRAY)

As a result of the promulgation by Polish Government of recent decree ordering inspection of all Polish passports abroad with a view to application of the citizenship law of March 31, 1938 (Embassy's despatches 412 and 757 April 1 and October 22, 1938) and which appears to have been designed primarily to prevent wholesale expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany and Austria the German Government yesterday began expulsion of Polish Jews. According to aforementioned decree holders of Polish passports not (repeat not) examined and validated by consuls abroad will be refused admission into Poland after midnight tonight. A prominent official of the Foreign Office today informed me 7,000 Jews have already entered Poland from Germany and 15,000 more are expected today. This of course will create a grave problem for Poland especially since the refugees mainly male Jews were [Heading on page two of the telegram: LMS 2-No, 242, October 29, noon, from Warsaw] allowed to take only 10 marks each from Germany. The Polish Government protested when news of the expulsion order became known and proposed a 15 day extension of the time limit of the aforementioned decree to permit negotiations regarding restoration of refugees' property but this proposal was refused by Germany. (END GRAY) The Polish Government considers the German action brutal and it is intimated at the Foreign Office that certain retaliatory measures may be taken against Germans residing in Poland. Poland will continue to take measures to obtain satisfaction with regard to restoration of refugees' property.

Repeated to Berlin and London for Rublee.

BIDDLE
NPL:JRL

1140 Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland: Telegram 4

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1800: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

62. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND: TELEGRAM 4, OCTOBER 29, 1938, 3:00 P.M.

See the introduction to document 59.

GRAY
From Berlin
Dated October 29, 1938
Rec'd 11:10 a.m.
Secretary of State,
Washington
582, October 29, 3 p.m.

Referring to the Embassy's 577, October 28, 8 p.m., Geist was officially informed today at German police headquarters that on October 6 the Polish Government issued a decree by virtue of which all passports of Polish Jews abroad became invalid on October 29. German authorities state they are convinced this decree was shortly to be followed by another expatriating all such persons. To prevent these thousands of Polish Jews from becoming stateless and undeportable the German authorities are expelling all Polish male Jews and expect to finish the deportations by tonight. Women and children are not included, it being assumed they will follow voluntarily their male relatives. Police have assured us that they are not deporting Polish Jews holders American immigration visas.

Repeated to Warsaw and London for Rublee.

RR Wilson

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1802: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

63. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND: TELEGRAM 5, OCTOBER 29, 1938, 7:00 P.M.

See the introduction to document 59.

GRAY
From Warsaw
Dated October 29, 1938
Rec'd. 5:25 p.m.
Secretary of State,
Washington
243, October 29, 7 p.m.

Supplementing my 242, October 29, noon, condition of Jewish refugees arriving via Silesian frontier is characterized as appalling by members of Jewish relief committee for refugees from Germany. Many of these are reported to have been forced to make the journey on foot; many are said to have been beaten and have arrived in miserable condition. Polish doctors and Red Cross nurses have been rushed to the frontier. For want of better accommodations Polish authorities have assigned refugees to quarters in the mines of the district. Joint relief committee aforementioned and Jewish joint distribution committee are also giving aid and the head of the former states that the Polish Government is rendering full assistance. All those whose documents are in order are permitted to proceed to the interior. It should be emphasized that only [Heading on page two of the telegram: LMS 2-No. 243, October 29, 7 p.m., from Warsaw.] passports issued abroad are affected by the Polish decree cited in my telegram 242; documents issued here continue to be valid for entry into the country without special consular validation.

Repeated to Berlin and London for Rublee,

BIDDLE.-
NPL:JRL

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1801: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

64. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND: TELEGRAM 6, OCTOBER 30, 1938, 9:00 A.M.

See the introduction to document 59.

From Warsaw
Dated October 30, 1938
Rec'd 8:50 p.m.
Secretary of State,

Washington

244, October 30, 9 a.m.

(GRAY) My 243, October 29, 7 p.m.

Polish Government has issued communique stating that as result of conversations negotiations with Germany will be recommenced early this week looking to a solution of the present problem and to a return of the refugees to their homes in Germany. According to a communique further expulsion from Germany has ceased and the Polish Government will not carry out the retaliatory measures it had contemplated. (END GRAY).

Journalistic circles inform me that approximately 1000 Germans in Poland chiefly in Lodz were quietly placed under arrest yesterday for deportation but have since been released. (GRAY) Jewish relief committee reports that about 13,000 refugees have now entered Poland and are being gradually sent to the interior. [Heading on page two of the telegram: #244, October 30, 9 a.m. from Warsaw.] According to the committee the Government has been very lenient in this respect, Polish press has been significantly silent through this affair and only official communiques have appeared.

Repeated to Berlin and London for Rublee. (END GRAY)

BIDDLE

RR

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1803: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

65. MOVEMENT OF POLISH JEWS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND: TELEGRAM 7, OCTOBER 31, 1938, 5:00 P.M.

See the introduction to document 59.

GRAY

From Berlin

Dated October 31, 1938

Rec'd 2:48 p.m.

Secretary of State

Washington

583, October 31, 5 p.m.

Reference my 582, October 29, 3 p.m.

It is learned from American press and other sources that a sort of "armistice" has been reached between Germany and Poland with regard to the banishment from Germany of Polish Jews whose passports were allegedly invalidated by decree of the Polish Government. Negotiations for a final settlement of the matter are to be begun in Warsaw tomorrow. It is stated that Polish Jews now in German jails have been released and that those who were in the process of being deported but had not yet crossed the border are being returned to their homes. The Polish Government is said to have agreed to permit the Jews already sent to Poland from Germany to remain for the time being.

By mail to Warsaw and London for Rublee,

WILSON

CSB

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1804: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

66. MEMORANDUM FROM THE U.S. EMBASSY IN POLAND TO THE U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE REGARDING PLIGHT OF, AND NEGOTIATIONS OVER, POLISH JEWS EXPELLED FROM GERMANY, JANUARY 5, 1939

Sent by A. J. Drexel Biddle Jr., U.S. ambassador to Poland, to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, this memorandum addresses renewed negotiations between the governments of Germany and Poland over the status of Polish Jews expelled by Germany in October 1938, who were not allowed entrance into Poland and were being held at a camp at the Polish/German border. It would appear that an impasse between the two countries has been resolved, thereby allowing entrance into Poland, although only due to threats by the Polish government that Germans residing in Poland would suffer retaliatory acts. Some of the concerns of the Polish government include the disposition of property and assets that the Polish Jews had to leave in Germany upon their expulsion. In addition, it wanted to be certain that the 60,000 Polish Jews still in Germany were not also expelled in an effort to return them to Poland. Biddle frames this information as part of the bigger issue of the refugee problem already building in Europe.

EMBASSY OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

No. 880

Warsaw, January 5, 1939

Subject: Expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany; Refugee Camp containing approximately 5,000 established October 29 still maintained at Zbaszyn; negotiations in course between Polish-German authorities with respect to refugees; Polish authorities and Jewish organizations appeal to British Government for assistance in transferring Zbaszyn refugees abroad. Special significance of the negotiations to the general refugee question.

The Honorable
The Secretary of State,
Washington

Sir:

Supplementing my dispatch No. 784 of November 5, 1938, and other reports from this Mission treating of the expulsion on October 28, 1938 of Polish Jews from Germany, I have the honor to set forth below certain observations with respect to the status of these refugees and the several aspects of the situation created by their expulsion from Germany.

It will be recalled that the German authorities deported without advance warning on October 28 some 13,000 Polish Jews to Poland on the grounds that the Polish Government was preparing to prevent their eventual return to Poland by withdrawing their Polish citizenship and thus to leave them permanently on the hands of the Reich. These deportees were forced across the Polish frontier suddenly and left on the hands of the surprised border officials. Most of them were permitted by the Polish authorities to establish themselves with the aid of local relatives at interior points and to take up at least semi-permanent residence in Poland. However, the largest single group, composed of some 5,000 refugees, forced across the frontier on the main Berlin-Warsaw railway at Zbaszyn, have not been permitted "to enter Poland for residence" but are still being maintained under close police supervision at that border point in barracks and other temporary accommodations.

The Polish authorities immediately after these deportations took place entered into conversations with the German Government with a view to (1) stopping additional deportations from among the 60,000 Polish Jews still residing in the Reich, (2) obtaining, if possible, the return to Germany of the deportees maintained at Zbaszyn, and (3) persuading the German Government to enter into some arrangement whereby Polish Jews forced to leave Germany would be able to take with them at least a fair amount of their property in that country. These conversations, which were accompanied by a threat of retaliatory action against Germans residing in Poland, were successful in bringing about a cessation of the deportations by Germany but were completely broken off in a few days when Germany, possessing the whip hand, refused to take back the deportees at Zbaszyn or to make any acceptable property provision for Polish Jews leaving Germany. The von Rath affair and the ensuing "Black Thursday", which arose directly out of these deportations, made it impossible for conversations to be renewed until just recently and the deportees, with the exception of some half dozen or so who have been granted immigration visas by Latin American countries, have continued to live miserably in the concentration camp at Zbaszyn mainly on charitable contributions from Polish and foreign Jews.

It now appears that preliminary discussions in this matter between the Polish and German Governments have reached a stage where formal negotiations can be resumed and the Polish Foreign Office sent on January 3 a delegation to Berlin to participate therein. An announcement of the negotiations in the Warsaw Kurjer Polski of January 3, 1939, ran as follows:

"The object of the negotiations will be the liquidation of the Camp at Zbaszyn where the Jews—Polish citizens expelled from Germany—are kept.

"The concrete object is to enable them to return to Germany so that they may attend to the property left there and to settle their financial affairs.

"The negotiations will also cover the question of the settlement of Jewish property questions in respect to Jews of Polish origin, who have been expelled from Poland and either returned to Poland or departed for other countries.

"The Polish delegation is said to have ample material available pertaining to the value of the status of property belonging to Polish Jews who have been expelled from Germany."

It would appear that the Polish authorities, in bringing about a resumption of the conversations, have been able to force a concession from Germany. This concession most likely had its origin in the general discussion on matter of political importance now in course between the two Governments. The following factors appear, according to the Embassy's information, in the background of the negotiations:

1. The insistence of the Polish authorities that the question of the property of Polish citizens, including Jews, in Germany, is bound up directly with property in Poland of German citizens and Polish-German trade and financial relations.
2. The determination of the Polish authorities to maintain the concentration camp at Zbaszyn in order to (a) stop further unilateral expulsions by Germany, (b) dissuade Polish Jews domiciled abroad from returning voluntarily to Poland or Polish relatives of such Jews from endeavoring to bring them back to Poland, and (c) to force foreign countries, particularly Great Britain and the United States, to include Polish Jews residing in Germany (and those at Zbaszyn) in any and all plans for caring for refugees from Germany. In other words, to ensure that 60,000 Polish Jews residing in Germany do not return to Poland but that they receive the same consideration from the Western powers as Jews of German citizenship.
3. The contention of the German authorities that Polish citizens domiciled in Germany cannot be expatriated without Germany first having an opportunity to return them to Poland.

The Polish Government has already made known to the Western Powers interested in the refugee situation its views with respect to the status as refugees of Polish Jews formerly or at present domiciled in Germany. The concentration camp at Zbaszyn has, I understand, been used as an example in presenting these views. At the same time organizations of Polish Jews in Poland have made earnest efforts to obtain some place of refuge outside of Poland for racial compatriots in Germany. Count Edward Raczyński, Polish Ambassador at London, informed me during the course of his recent visit to Warsaw that he had little hope of being successful in his efforts to persuade the British Government to give special consideration to the refugees at Zbaszyn. It is, however, reported that the Jewish organizations in Poland, evidently working in direct contact with organizations of British Jews, have arranged that a certain number, said to be several hundred, of Jewish children now at Zbaszyn will shortly be admitted into Great Britain in much the same manner in which groups of Jewish children have recently been allowed to enter England from Germany and former Austria. It does not appear likely at this writing, however, that Poland will be able to obtain foreign destinations for many of the inmates of the Zbaszyn Camp.

I have gone into this matter somewhat at length in view of the significance which it possesses in the general refugee situation. The mere fact that conversations with respect to Jewish deportees from Germany and their property in that country have been resumed between the Polish and German authorities leads me to believe that some sort of a compromise between the two Governments on the problem is not only feasible but even imminent. Such a compromise, which apparently would limit German freedom of action vis-à-vis Polish citizens, including Jews, domiciled in Germany could, in my belief, be reached only on the basis of Polish threats and willingness to invoke sanctions against German citizens domiciled in Poland and German trade and financial interests in this country. The outcome of the negotiations now in course at Berlin should, consequently, be of genuine interest in connection with the consideration being given by the Western countries to the refugee problem.

Respectfully yours,
A.J. Drexel Biddle, Jr.

840.1

AJDB/LMH.fh

(In quintuplicate)

Copies sent to:

Mr. Rublee, London.

Embassy, Berlin

Source: State CDF 862.4016/2069: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

67. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REICH CENTRAL OFFICE FOR JEWISH EMIGRATION, JANUARY 24, 1939

In August 1938, the Central Office for Jewish Emigration (Zentralstelle für Jüdische Auswanderung) was established in Vienna, under the leadership of Adolf Eichmann, to expedite the ponderous process by which Jews were approved to emigrate from Austria. The success of that office led to the establishment by Herman Göring of a similar organization in

1144 Circular on “The Jewish Question as a Factor in German Foreign Policy in the Year 1938”

Germany in January 1939, the Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration (Reichszentralstelle für Jüdische Auswanderung), headed by Reinhard Heydrich. It was responsible for the facilitation of emigration of Jews from throughout the Reich. Heydrich appointed Heinrich Müller, chief of the Gestapo, to direct the office.

GOERING DIRECTIVE TO THE REICH MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. 24 JANUARY 1939, CONCERNING THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE EMIGRATION OF JEWS FROM GERMANY AND THE APPOINTMENT OF THE CHIEF OF THE SECURITY POLICE, HEYDRICH, AS CHIEF OF THE REICH CENTRAL OFFICE FOR JEWISH EMIGRATION

Berlin, 24 January 1939

The Plenipotentiary for the Four Year Plan Field Marshal Goering
To the Reich Minister of the Interior
Berlin

The emigration from Germany of Jews is to be advanced by all means.

A Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration [Reichszentrale fuer die juedische Auswanderung] is established within the Reich Ministry of the Interior from the representatives of the agencies concerned. The Reich Central Office has the mission to uniformly within the whole territory of the Reich—

1. Take all measures for the preparation of an increased emigration of the Jews, among other things to create a Jewish organization which is qualified to prepare all steps to make available and utilize the internal and foreign funds, and to determine, in collaboration with the Reich Bureau for Emigrant Matters, countries suitable for emigration.

2. Direct the emigration; and to favor among other things, particularly, the emigration of the poorer Jews.

3. Expedite emigration in individual cases by central coordinated processing of the necessary applications, State certificates and vouchers needed by the individual emigrant and by the controlling of the course of the emigration.

The Chief of the Security Police [Heydrich] is in charge of the Reich Central Office. He appoints the manager and regulates the management of the Reich Central Office.

I will be currently informed of the work of the Reich Central Office. My decision must be requested before measures of fundamental importance are taken.

In addition to the other agencies concerned, Ambassador Eisenlohr as Delegate for Official International Negotiations and Ministerial Director Wohlthat as Delegate for the Negotiations on the Rublee Plan, are to be members of the executive committee.

Signed: GOERING

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 129–130, Doc. NG-2586-A.

68. CIRCULAR ON “THE JEWISH QUESTION AS A FACTOR IN GERMAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE YEAR 1938,” JANUARY 25, 1939

The year 1938 was one of great significance to pre-World War II Nazi Germany. In that year, Germany annexed Austria (thereby greatly increasing the number of Jews in the Reich), was handed the Sudetenland, took Bohemia and Moravia as a German protectorate, and initiated Kristallnacht, the pogrom in Germany and Austria organized by the Nazi regime. In addition, the Evian Conference was held at which not a single country—including the United States and the United Kingdom—other than the Dominican Republic expressed willingness to take in additional Jewish refugees. This document provides an overview of the 1938 German foreign policy as it was impacted by the Reich’s desire to force the emigration of Jews to countries outside the Reich. Much of the circular focuses on the disposition of Jewish property upon emigration, arguing that Jews who previously immigrated to Germany made money at the same time that German citizens suffered economically under the reparations requirement of the Treaty of Versailles. The question of a Jewish state in Palestine is also referenced and found to be unacceptable. Finally, the circular notes the rise of antisemitism wherever Jewish immigrants have relocated outside of the Reich.

Ministry for Foreign Affairs, 83-26 19/1 Ang. II

Berlin, 31st January 1939.

Enclosed please find for your attention a circular which has been sent to the German authorities abroad on the subject of “The Jewish Question as a factor in German Foreign Policy in the year 1938”.

By Order

Signed: Hinrichs.

To All Senior Reich Authorities and NSDAP Bureau for Foreign Affairs.

to No. 611-39 secret, Foreign

Secret

Foreign 6.2.39
No. 611 39 Secret. Foreign If.

Copy to:

Abw. I (Counter Intelligence I)
W.Stab.
Chief Dept. 3
Att. Gr. of the Army General Staff
OKM. Dept. 3. SKL
Ob.d.L. (Z A)
Ob.d.L. Dept. 5. General Staff.
Ausl. III
[Pencil note] Chief W Wi.

attention is requested.

By Order

I Enclosure

Ministry for Foreign Affairs. Berlin, 25th January 1939.
83-26 19/1

Contents:

The Jewish Question as a factor in German Foreign policy in the year 1938.

1. The German Jewish Policy as basis and consequence of the decisions for the foreign policy of the year 1938.
2. Aim of German Jewish Policy: Emigration.
3. Means, ways and aim of the Jewish Emigration.
4. The emigrated Jew as the best propaganda for the German Jewish Policy.

It is certainly no co-incidence that the fateful year 1938 has brought nearer the solution of the Jewish question simultaneously with the realization of the "idea of Greater Germany", since the Jewish policy was both the basis and consequence of the events of the year 1938. The advance made by Jewish influence and the destructive Jewish spirit in politics, economy and culture paralyzed the power and will of the German people to rise again more perhaps even than the power-policy opposition of the former enemy allied powers of the World War. The healing of this sickness among the people was therefore certainly one of the most important requirements for exerting the force which in the year 1938 resulted in the joining together of Greater Germany, in defiance of the world.

To All diplomatic and qualified consular representatives abroad.

The necessity for a radical solution of the Jewish question arose however also as a consequence of the foreign political development, which resulted in a further 200,000 Jews in Austria in addition to the 500,000 of the Jewish Faith living in the Old Reich. The influence of Jewry on Austrian economy which had grown to enormous proportions under the Schuschnigg Regime, made immediate measures necessary, with the aim of excluding Jewry from German economy and utilizing Jewish property in the interests of the community. The action carried out as reprisal for the murder of Legation Councillor von Rath accelerated this process to such an extent that Jewish shops—till then with the exception of foreign business—disappeared from the streets completely. The liquidation of the Jewish wholesale trade, manufacturing trade, and of houses and real estate in the hands of Jews, will gradually reach a point where in a conceivable time there will no longer be any talk of Jewish property in Germany. Nevertheless it must be emphasized that this is no seizure of Jewish property without compensation, as for instance the confiscation of Church Property during the French revolution. On the contrary the dispossessed Jew receives Reich Bonds for his goods, and the interest is credited to him.

The final goal of German Jewish Policy is the emigration of all the Jews living in Reich territory. It is foreseen that already the thorough measures in the economic sphere, which have prevented the Jew from earning and made him live on his dividends, will further the desire to emigrate. Looking back on the last 5 years since the assumption of power, it is, however, obvious that neither the Law for the Reestablishing of the Professional Character of the Civil Service nor the Nurnberg Jewish laws with their executive regulations, which prevented any tendency of Jewry being assimilated, contributed to any extent to the emigration of German Jews. On the contrary every period of domestic political tranquility has resulted in such a stream of Jewish immigrants returning, that the Gestapo has been obliged to put Jewish immigrants with German passports into a training camp for political supervision.

The Jew was excluded from politics and culture. But until 1938 his powerful economic position in Germany was unbroken, and thereby his obstinate resolve to hold out until "better times" came. Indicative of the tactics of this "delaying" resistance is the programme of a Jewish Party recently formed in Poland, to fight against all Polish measures aimed at Jewish emigration. As long as the Jew can earn money in Germany, then in the opinion of World Jewry the Jewish bastion in Germany need not be given UP.

But the Jew has underestimated the consequences and the strength of the National Socialist purpose. The powerful Jewish positions in Vienna and Prague collapsed in 1938 at the same time as the system of states in Central Europe created at Versailles to keep Germany down. Italy stood at Germany's side, with her racial Laws in the fight against Jewry. An expert on the Jewish question, Prof. Goga took over the Government in Bukarest with a programme aimed against Jewry, without however being able to carry it out because of overwhelming international pressure from Paris and London. Jewry in Hungary and Poland was subjected to special laws. Everywhere the success of German foreign policy now begins to shake Jewish strongholds which have been established for hundreds of years from Munich and in far off States, like the tremours of an earthquake.

It is also understandable that World Jewry, "which has selected America as its Headquarters" regards as its own downfall the Munich Agreement, which in American opinion signifies the collapse of the democratic front in Europe. For the system of parliamentary democracy has always, as experience proves, helped the Jews to wealth and political power at the expense of the people in whose country they live. It is certainly the first time in history that Jewry must evacuate a secure position.

This resolution was first formed in 1938. It showed itself in the efforts of the western democracies particularly those of the United States of America, to put the now finally determined Jewish withdrawal from Germany, in other words Jewish emigration, under international control and protection. The American President Roosevelt "who it is well known is surrounded by a whole row of exponents of Jewry among his closest confidants" called a State Conference as early as the middle of 1938 to discuss the refugee questions, which was held in Evian without any particular results. Both of the questions, the answering of which is the first essential for organized Jewish emigration remained unanswered: firstly the question of how this emigration should be organized and financed and secondly the question: emigrate to where?

In answer to the first question, International Jewry in particular did not appear willing to contribute. On the contrary the Conference—and later the Committee formed by it in London under the direction of Rublee, an American—regarded its main task as that of forcing Germany by international pressure to release Jewish property to the greatest possible extent. In other words Germany was to pay for the emigration of her 700,000 Jews with German national property. It is at the same time to be doubted whether International Jewry ever seriously desired the mass emigration of their fellow Jews from Germany and other states at all, unless there was an equivalent of a Jewish State. The tactics hitherto employed in Jewish proposals, were in every case aimed less at mass emigration of Jews than at the transfer of Jewish property.

It goes without saying, that the transfer of even a fraction of Jewish property, would be impossible from the point of view of foreign exchange. The financing of a mass emigration of German Jews is therefore still obscure. Questions could be answered casually thus, that Germany for her part reckoned that International Jewry—particularly relatives of Jews who have emigrated—would support this emigration as vigorously as it made it possible for its destitute fellow Jews to immigrate to Germany, at a time when Germany was so weak that she could not stop the stream of Jews from the East. It should be emphasized, however, that according to police and taxation records, the greater proportion of Jews immigrated to Germany without means and made money in a few years or decades, while the German people lost their possessions as a result of the reparations imposed by the Treaty of Versailles or joined the ranks of the unemployed. Consequently Germany for her part had no sympathy for the compassion, with which an ostensibly humanitarian world accuses Germany of illegally appropriating property which was taken away from the German people by Jewish business methods.

The second question, to what country should an organized Jewish emigration be directed, could similarly not be answered by the Evian Conference, as each of the countries taking part having announced that they were fundamentally concerned with the refugee problem, declared that they were not in a position to take large numbers of Jewish emigrants into their territory. After over 100,000 Jews even in 1933/34 had succeeded either legally or illegally in escaping abroad and establishing themselves in someone else's country either with the help of their Jewish relatives living abroad or circles sympathetically disposed from a humanitarian point of view, almost every State in the World has in the meantime hermetically sealed its borders against these parasitical Jewish intruders. The problem of Jewish emigration is therefore for all practical purposes at a standstill. Many States have already become so cautious, that they demand a permit made out by German authorities from Jews travelling in the ordinary way with German passports, saying that there is nothing against them returning.

The emigration movement of only about 100,000 Jews has already sufficed to awaken the interest if not the understanding of many countries in the Jewish danger. We can estimate that here the Jewish question will extend to a problem of international politics when large numbers of Jews from Germany, Poland, Hungary and Rumania are put on the move as a result of increasing pressure from the people of the countries where they are living. Even for Germany the Jewish problem will not be solved when the last Jew has left German soil.

It is even today an important duty of German policy to control and when possible direct the flow of Jewish emigration to be sure there is no incentive to cooperate with other countries such as Poland, Hungary and Rumania, who themselves are striving for the emigration of the Jewish sections of their population, in an attempt to solve this problem. From experience with this procedure interests clash, although directed towards the same goal, and retard the realization of Germany's urgent claim for German Jews to be admitted into other particular countries.

It is true that the Rumanian Government sent an official appeal to the Reich Government in the name of human ethics and justice, to join with them in an international action to solve the Jewish question. On the other hand, Poland at the end of October last year issued a decree, the execution of which has made it practically impossible for 60,000 Jews of Polish Nationality residing in Germany to return to Poland. As is well known, the Reich Government had then to decide to deport to Poland 60,000 Jews of Polish Nationality who will be followed by their families, shortly before the Polish Decree came into force. The Hungarian Government, it is true, appreciates the German Jewish policy in so far as they themselves have in mind the "Aryanization" of Hungarian-Jewish businesses in Germany, that is, Jewish owners of firms will be replaced by Hungarians. In general, however, it is apparent that the States concerned are more egotistically interested in deporting their own Jewish elements than in any international solution. Germany will therefore take the initiative herself, in order next of all to find ways, means and destination for Jewish emigration from Germany.

Palestine—which has already become the slogan of world opinion, as the land for the emigrants—cannot be considered as the target for Jewish emigration, because it is incapable of absorbing a mass influx of Jews. Under the pressure of Arab resistance, the British Mandatory Government has restricted Jewish immigration into Palestine to the minimum. For the time being Jewish emigration to Palestine was helped to a great extent, as far as Germany was concerned, by the signing of an agreement with the representatives of Jewry in Palestine, which made it possible to transfer Jewish property in the form of additional exports (Haavara-Agreement). Apart from the fact that emigration was made possible by this method for a small number of wealthy Jews only, but not for the mass of Jews without means, [Pencil note: Are there such people?] there were fundamental considerations of foreign policy against this type of emigration: the transfer of Jewish property out of Germany, contributed to no small extent to the building of a Jewish State in Palestine. Germany must regard the forming of a Jewish State, as dangerous, which even in miniature would form just such an operational base as the Vatican for political Catholicism. The realization that World Jewry will always be the irreconcilable enemy of the Third Reich, forces the decision to prevent any strengthening of the Jewish position. A Jewish State however would bring an international increase in power to World Jewry. Alfred Rosenberg expressed this idea in his speech in Detmold on 15 January this year as follows:

"Jewry is striving today for a Jewish State in Palestine. Not to give Jews all over the world a homeland but for other reasons: World Jewry must have a miniature State, from which to send exterritorial ambassadors and representatives to all countries of the world and through these be able to further their lust for power. But more than anything else they want a Jewish centre, a Jewish State in which they can house the Jewish swindlers from all parts of the world, who are hunted by the Police of other countries, issue them new passports and then send them to other parts of the world. It is to be desired, that those people who are friendly disposed to Jews, above all the Western Democracies who have so much space in all parts of the world at their disposal, place an area outside Palestine for the Jews, of course in order to establish a Jewish Reserve and not a Jewish State."

That is the programme expressing the foreign policy attitude of Germany towards the Jewish question. Germany is very interested in maintaining the dispersal of Jewry. The calculation, that as a consequence boycott groups and anti-German centres would be formed all over the world, disregards the following fact which is already apparent, the influx of Jews in all parts of the world invokes the opposition of the native population and thereby forms the best propaganda for the German Jewish policy.

In North America, in South America, in France, in Holland, Scandinavia and Greece, everywhere, wherever the flood of Jewish immigrants reaches, there is today already a visible increase in anti-semitism. A task of the German foreign policy must be to further this wave of anti-semitism. This will be achieved less by German propaganda abroad, than by the propaganda which the Jew is forced to circulate in his defense. In the end, its effects will recoil on themselves. The reports from German authorities abroad, emphasize the correctness of this interpretation:

The press and official correspondents continually report antisemitic demonstrations by the population of North America. It is perhaps indicative of the domestic political development in USA, that the listening-audience of the "Radio Priest" Coughlin, who is well known to be Anti-Jewish, has grown to over 20 millions. The Embassy in Montevideo reported on 12 December last year "that the Jewish influx continues for months, week by week. It goes without saying, that anti-semitism is growing"—Salonica reported on 30 November 1938: "that forces are at work to stir up the hate against the Jews" and that at the same time Greek Freemasonry is endeavoring to stem the anti-semitic movement. In France, the Paris Town Council (Stadtversammlung) was in April of this year to discuss a proposal, by which the naturalization of Jews was in future to be refused. The meeting on the Jewish question ended with the speaker being beaten up—Lyon reported on 20 December last year: "The immigration of Jewish refugees has lately led to undesirable occurrences. The antipathy towards the new intruders based on business and competitive grounds, which is general throughout France, is unmistakable." This aversion has grown to such an extent meantime that a Jewish defense has already been organized against the anti-semitism in France (Report Paris dated 19 November last year).—The Embassy at the Hague reported on 30 December last year: "Under the pressure of countless immigrants from Germany, who make themselves objectionable particularly in Amsterdam antisemitism is growing very much in Holland. And if this continues, it can easily come to pass that Dutchmen will not only appreciate Germany's action against the Jews but will also find themselves wishing to do the same as we."—The embassy at Oslo reported on 8th April last year: "While only a few years ago, the streets of Oslo were hardly marred by Jews at all, lately a great change has come about here. On the streets, in restaurants and above all in the coffee houses, Jews sit around in hideous cluster. The Norwegians are being crowded out, more and more. The Norwegian Press, which formerly did not understand the Jewish question at all, suddenly realized what it meant to have the Children of Israel invade the country like a swarm of locusts. It will be a very salutary lesson, which is being meted out to the Norwegians".

These examples from reports from authorities abroad, can, if desired, be amplified. They confirm the correctness of the expectation, that criticism of the measures for excluding Jews from German Lebensraum which were misunderstood in many countries for lack of evidence would only be temporary and would swing in the other direction the moment the population saw with its own eyes and thus learned, what the Jewish danger was to them. The poorer and therefore the more burdensome the immigrant Jew is to the country absorbing him, the stronger this country will react and the more desirable is this effect in the interests of German propaganda. The object of this German action is to be the future international solution of the Jewish question, dictated not by false compassion for the "United Religious Jewish minority" but by the full consciousness of all peoples of the danger which it represents to the racial composition of the nations.

By Order

Schaumburg

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VI, pp. 87–95, Doc. 3358-PS.

69. CONFERENCE MINUTES ON DEPORTATION OF POLES, JEWS, AND GYPSIES, JANUARY 30, 1940

On the seventh anniversary of Hitler's ascension to power, a meeting, led by Reinhard Heydrich, Heinrich Himmler's second-in-command, was held to discuss evacuation of Poles and Jews from the Warthegau, the westernmost section of Poland that was absorbed into the Reich, to the General Government (Generalgouvernement), the central part of German-occupied Poland that was governed by the Nazis as a separate administrative unit. Specifically, three large-scale evacuations were discussed: 40,000 Jews and Poles from the Warthegau to the General Government to allow Baltic Germans to be resettled in the Warthegau; 120,000 Poles to allow the Volhynia Germans to be resettled in the Warthegau; and then the deportation of all Jews in "the new eastern provinces and of 30,000 Gypsies from the Reich territory to the General Government." In addition, it was anticipated that another 100,000 to 120,000 persons in the General Government would need to be resettled in other areas of the General Government to meet the needs for training grounds for various branches of the German military. Concern was expressed about the difficulties of the General Government to absorb so many people. The matters discussed at this meeting include what today would be called "ethnic cleansing."

MEMORANDUM OF A CONFERENCE ON 30 JANUARY 1940, CONCERNING THE EVACUATION OF POLES AND JEWS FROM THE WARTHEGAU

Copy

Berlin, 30 January 1940

-IV D 4-III ES

Subject: Conference on 30 January 1940.

Memorandum

1. SS Major General [SS Gruppenfuehrer] Heydrich stated that today's meeting was called by order of the Reich Leader SS for the purpose of achieving uniformity in carrying out the resettlement tasks ordered by the Fuehrer. The evacuations carried out up to now included approximately 87,000 Poles and Jews; this was done to provide space for the Baltic Germans to be resettled there. In addition, an uncontrolled so-called illegal emigration took place.

On the basis of statements of Reich Minister SS Major General Seyss-Inquart and Lieutenant General [SS Obergruppenfuehrer] Krueger, SS Major General Heydrich stated that no objections in principle were voiced against the evacuations into the General Government by the competent authorities of the Governor General. The complaints lodged up to now were only directed against the fact that in the evacuation accomplished up to now, the designated figures were not complied with but were exceeded. Since [Section] Referat IV D 4 has been organized for the central regulation of all evacuation measures, the objections voiced do not hold any more.

It is of the utmost importance that 40,000 Jews and Poles be deported from the Warthegau into the General Government in order to make space for Baltic Germans. The order of the Reich Leader SS, namely, that no people of German extraction are to be deported, regardless of their past behavior, will serve as a guiding principle for the selection.

After this operation is finished, an additional, improvised evacuation is to be carried out for the benefit of the Volhynia Germans who are to be settled in the eastern provinces [Ostgaue]. On the assumption that the Volhynia German families have 6 to 7 children on an average, we have a figure of about 20,000 families to be settled. The number of the Poles to be evacuated for this purpose is to be set for the time being at 120,000; a certain decrease in this figure can be expected, since some of the evacuated Polish landowners will be used as farm laborers either in the eastern Gauen themselves or in Germany proper. In this connection, congress Poles are to be used as far as possible. Using this number as a basis, the General Government should state before 15 February 1940, what distribution to the various unloading terminals is contemplated. The actual time when this operation is to start will be designated later and all agencies involved will be informed in time.

The Warthegau, West Prussia-Danzig, Zichenau and eastern Upper Silesia have to determine the number of the Volhynia Germans to be resettled and the number of Polish landowners whose evacuation is thereby necessitated and submit them to Referat IV D 4 by the same time (15 February 1940).

Referat IV D 4 has to collect this statistical material and to formulate the evacuation plans. Whereas the persons to be evacuated on account of the resettlement of the Volhynia Germans consist almost exclusively of rural population, those persons evacuated on account of the Baltic Germans are almost exclusively city dwellers.

SS Major General Koppe states that the evacuation to be carried out for the benefit of the Volhynia Germans must be accomplished in such a manner that the operation of the farms is not interrupted. The Volhynia Germans are to be brought by truck to the selected places of settlement and are to be exchanged against the previous Polish owners. The Poles are to be collected 856 in camps and then subjected to a selection. The part not usable in the eastern provinces or in Germany proper is contemplated for deportation into the General Government. Therefore, the exact number of persons to be sent to the government can only be determined after this selection.

Furthermore, there are already 4 to 5,000 Poles and Jews collected in camps in the Warthegau, who have already been evicted for the benefit of the Baltic Germans, but it has been impossible to deport them up till now.

SS Lieutenant General Krueger mentions that 60,000 refugees from Russia are to be expected in the General Government who also have to be accommodated there.

2. SS Major General Heydrich announces the following basic orders issued by the Reich Leader SS. No ethnic Germans nor people of German extraction are to be deported, also no Kashubes, Masurs, and similar races; the reason for the latter is that these groups have shown a pro-German attitude and have intermingled racially with the German people. But the Reich Leader SS does not desire a Kashube or Masur problem be created in this respect. In connection with the deportation, it is only to be stated that the German provinces are to be cleansed of the alien population. Thereby, a way is left open for the future to deport inferior Kashubes, etc., after a racial examination.

Concerning the general Polish question, it has been ordered that a racial examination is not to be carried out at present in connection with the allocation of the farm laborers. If any differentiations were to be made among good and bad Poles among the multitude coming into Germany proper, the German population might get some erroneous impression. In connection with the labor allocation of the Poles in Germany, it should be seen that men and women are assigned in the proper ratio. According to the last figures, 800,000 to 1 million Poles will be allocated in Germany in addition to the prisoners of war. The assignment will be carried out via the labor offices. To a certain extent Poles from the eastern provinces will also be taken into Germany. When preparations were made, it was found that the local agencies in the eastern provinces declared that these Poles could not be spared, since they would be needed there. For example, the Warthegau declared that only 20,000 could be spared and West Prussia-Danzig could only make 8,000 available. For these reasons, it is necessary to take without any compromise all the Poles from the eastern provinces who could possibly be used as farm laborers.

An exception among the general prohibition of a racial selection in the course of the allocation of agricultural laborers could possibly be made in the case of the Polish agricultural families to be settled. Elements with higher racial qualifications could be retained in the Reich territory.

3. After the two large-scale operations, i.e., (a) the removal of approximately 40,000 Poles and Jews in the interest of the Baltic Germans, and (b) of approximately 120,000 Poles in the interest of the Volhynia Germans, the deportation of all Jews within the new eastern provinces, and of 30,000 gypsies from the Reich territory to the General Government shall be executed as a last large-scale operation. Since it has been found that the deportation of 120,000 Poles will start about the beginning of March, the deportation of Jews and gypsies must wait for the termination of the above operations. In any case, the distribution figures should be given by the General Government, so that the planning for those operations may be initiated.

SS Lieutenant General Krueger informs the participants that rather extensive troop training grounds for the Wehrmacht, Luftwaffe, and SS must be provided within the General Government, an operation which will necessitate the resettlement of approximately 100,000 to 120,000 persons within the General Government. It seems, therefore, desirable to take that fact into consideration when deporting people into the General Government, in order to avoid a repetition of resettlement operations. SS Major General Heydrich remarked in this connection that the construction of the East Wall and of other projects in the East would probably offer an opportunity to concentrate several hundred thousand in forced labor camps, in which case, the family of those Jews would be distributed to the other Jewish families already living in the General Government, a procedure which probably would solve the problem mentioned. SS Obergruppenfuehrer Krueger also mentioned that ethnic Germans (mainly rural elements) should be evacuated from the General Government and transferred to the Reich. SS Brigadefuehrer Greifelt answered that that question was considered by the Reich Leader SS as a long-range problem.

SS Major General Heydrich announced that, after the termination of the three large-scale operations which had been mentioned, a racial selection in the eastern provinces should be made by the resettlement offices. Some of the Poles and their families would be dispersed in Germany proper. In the middle of February 1940, 1,000 Stettin Jews whose apartments are urgently needed for war purposes are scheduled to be evacuated and also deported to the General Government. SS Major General Seyss-Inquart repeated the figures which the General Government would have to absorb in the near future. i.e., 40,000 Jews and Poles

120,000 Poles as well as all the Jews from the new eastern provinces, and 30,000 gypsies from Germany proper and Austria.

He mentioned the transportation difficulties arising for the Reichsbahn by that task and, finally, the bad food situation in the General Government, which would not improve before the next harvest. That situation necessitated further subsidies from the Reich. Reich Minister Seyss-Inquart requested SS Major General Heydrich to support them in this matter if it should turn out imperative for the General Government to obtain further food subsidies. SS Brigadier General (SS Brigadefuehrer) Waechter requests that the deportees, coming from regions where the food situation is very much better than that of the General Government, be provided with adequate quantities of food.

SS Major General Heydrich remarks as regards the possibility of transportation difficulties mentioned by Reich Minister Seyss-Inquart, that that possibility would be taken into consideration, inasmuch as all transportation movements would be centrally coordinated in the Reich Ministry of Transportation, a procedure which should make it possible to avoid wasteful utilization of rolling stock.

Finally, SS Major General Heydrich draws the attention of the participants to the necessity of giving lists of the deportees, especially the urban residents, to the competent trustee agencies in time, so that securing of their assets can be affected.

After this conference, which lasted from 1130 to 1315 hours, the experts [Sachbearbeiter] of the inspectors of the new eastern provinces and of the commander of the security police and the SD in the General Government, convened with III ES and IV D 4 in order to discuss details.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. IV, pp. 855–859, Doc. NO-5322.

70. MEMORANDUM TO HIMMLER REGARDING CONDITIONS OF DEPORTATION MARCHES, MARCH 28, 1940

Hans Lammers, head of the Reich Chancellery, forwarded this memorandum—which he received from an unknown source—to Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader (Reichsführer) of the SS (the Schutzstaffel), discussing the continuing deportations of German Jews into the General Government (Generalgouvernement), the central part of German-occupied Poland that was governed by the Nazis as a separate administrative unit. It is a protest against these deportations, making an urgent appeal, not to the Nazis, but to “the conscience of mankind” that these deportations be halted. It describes and decries the terrible conditions these deportees experienced, both during the deportation march and upon arrival in Jewish communities in the General Government. Given that they were not allowed to bring with them anything other than the clothes on their back, they were totally unable to provide for themselves, resulting in deaths due to starvation, illness, and exposure to the elements as well as resentment by the already settled Jews who were deported earlier and who themselves were suffering dearly.

MEMORANDUM FROM DEFENDANT LAMMERS TO HIMMLER, 28 MARCH 1940, TRANSMITTING A REPORT SENT TO LAMMERS ANONYMOUSLY, ENTITLED “DEPORTATION IS BEING CONTINUED—THE DEATH MARCH FROM LUBLIN—DEATHS FROM FREEZING—GOERING’S DECISION APPEALED TO”

Berlin, 28 March 1940
now at Berchtesgaden

The Reich Minister and Chief of the Reich Chancellery
Rk. 4797 B

1. To the Reich Leader SS and Chief of the German Police in the Reich Ministry of the Interior

Berlin SW 11, Prinz-Albrecht-Strasse 8

Written: Ko

Read: Le./Bru

Dispatched: 29/3 Ma with 1 encl.

Dear Mr. Himmler:

In accordance with the wish expressed in your letter of 14 January 1940—1 185/40 Ads.—I am pleased to send you herewith a photostatic copy of a memorandum (Eingabe), “The Deportation is Being Continued,” which was sent to me anonymously. [Handwritten] blue Photostat of RK 4797 encl.

Heil Hitler!

Very respectfully yours
(name of the Reich Minister [Initial] L [LAMMERS])

2. To the files

[Illegible initials] 20 March

Bt.

[Enclosure]

*Deportation is Being Continued
The Death March from Lublin—Deaths from Freezing—Goering’s Decision Appealed to*

The following report is based on the findings of the mixed Polish Jewish Relief Committee in the Government General which is cooperating with the American Quaker Organization (The Society of Friends) as well as with delegates of the Red Cross and the district authorities of the Governor General for the Occupied Polish Territory. [Handwritten] (1) Received anonymously (2) Herr Kritzinger [Illegible initials] [Initial] L [Lammers].

The contents represent an urgent appeal to the conscience of mankind and the sense of responsibility of the entire world.

Krakow, 14 March 1940

In spite of the objections of the Government General to a hasty and unplanned continuation of the deportation of Jewish German nationals to eastern Poland this is being continued at the order of the Reich Leader SS.

On 12 March 1940, 160 more Jews were evacuated from Schneidemuehl in a freight car to the Lublin district. Additional transports are reported in Lublin. The deported persons had to leave their entire property behind. They were not allowed to take even a suitcase with them. The women had to give up their handbags before the trips. Some persons had their overcoats taken away from them, these being men and women who had tried to put on several coats or suits of underwear over each other as a protection against the cold. They were not allowed to take one cent in cash with them, not even the 20 zloty which those deported from Stettin were allowed. Nor were they permitted to take food, beds, household articles (cooking pots, etc.) with them. Upon their arrival in Lublin the deportees only had with them what they wore on their bodies.

The deportees are divided up among the villages of Piaski, Glusk, and Belcyca at a distance of about 26–30 kilometers from Lublin. The deportees from Stettin are also living there, as many of them as are still alive.

Men, women, and children had to march from Lublin to these villages on foot in a temperature of 22° [centigrade] below zero, along country roads deeply covered with snow. Shocking things occurred during this march. Of the approximately 1,200 persons deported from Stettin, 72 persons, including men and women up to 86 years old, were left lying on the march, which lasted more than 14 hours. The greater part of these people froze to death. Among them was a mother who was carrying her 3 year old child in her arms, tried to protect it from the cold with her clothes and was left lying in this position after inhuman hardships. Furthermore, the body of a child about 5 years old was found in a half frozen condition. It carried a cardboard sign around its neck with the name “Renate Alexander from Hammerstein in Pomerania.” It appeared that this child was deported with the others while visiting relatives in Stettin, while its parents are still living in Germany. This child had to have its hands and feet amputated in the Lublin hospital. After the transport the corpses were collected on sleds along the country road and brought to the Jewish cemeteries in Piaski and Lublin.

Upon their arrival in the three villages the deportees were left to seek lodgings in the overcrowded houses and huts of the local Jews. Since there were no additional quarters available anywhere, the greater part of the deportees had to be lodged in stables, sheds, etc.; and since, besides this, there is no food except black bread, and the sanitary conditions are desperate, numerous persons are dying every day, especially old people and children. Up to 12 March the death rate among the Jews deported from Stettin alone increased to a total of 230. The Relief Committee is doing everything in its power. But it cannot procure any quarters and can also improve the food situation only to an insignificant degree. Medicine, ointment against chilblains, etc. are completely lacking. There is a lack of clothing, underwear, in short, everything. In view of the almost indescribable misery, some of the local Jews are on bad terms with the ones deported from Germany which is primarily caused by the diversity of languages and educational background. In addition to this the deportees arrive completely without means, have no cooking facilities, and in this way are slowly perishing. The Government General for the Occupied Polish Territories (District Chief Governor Zoerner) has disclaimed any responsibility for these occurrences and consequences resulting therefrom. Field Marshal Goering has been informed of these occurrences.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 144–146, Doc. NG-2490.

71. THE MADAGASCAR PLAN, IN “THE JEWISH QUESTION IN THE PEACE TREATY,” JULY 3, 1940

Franz Rademacher had recently been appointed to head the Jewish Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Judenreferat, or Referat D III) when he wrote this memorandum suggesting that the Jewish question in Europe (die Judenfrage in Europa) could be solved by deporting all Jews to the island of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean off the southwest coast of Africa. Although not a new idea, it became a matter of particular interest for the Nazi regime after the defeat of France in May 1940 made this French colony available to the Germans. The idea was positively received by the highest levels of the Nazi government, including Hans Frank, Reinhard Heydrich, and even Hitler. Rademacher envisioned the island as a German mandate, to be administered by the Jews themselves, subject, of course, to the authority of a German police governor. The idea was abandoned when Germany lost the Battle of Britain, meaning that the ability to transport millions of Jews over the tremendous distance from Europe to the island could not be assured. Serious consideration of the plan suggests the Nazis had not yet made a decision to exterminate the Jews of Europe.

MEMORANDUM BY RADEMACHER, 3 JULY 1940, ENTITLED “THE JEWISH QUESTION IN THE PEACE TREATY,” NOTING THAT THE DESIRABLE SOLUTION IS TO “GET ALL THE JEWS OUT OF EUROPE,” PROPOSING THAT MADAGASCAR BECOME A GERMAN MANDATE TO WHICH EUROPEAN JEWS BE SENT, AND RELATED MATTERS

The Jewish question in the peace treaty

The imminent victory gives Germany the possibility and, according to my opinion, also the obligation to solve the Jewish question in Europe [die Judenfrage in Europa]. The desirable solution—Get all the Jews out of Europe. The task of the Foreign Office in this respect is—

a. To lay the foundation for this demand in the peace treaty and to carry the same demand into effect by individual negotiations with the countries in Europe that are affected by the peace treaty

b. To secure in the peace treaty the territory, necessary for the settlement of the Jews and to establish the principle for the collaboration of the enemy countries on this problem

c. To determine the position in public law of the new overseas territory for Jewish settlement

d. As preliminary work—

(1) Clarification of the wishes and plans of the Party, State, and scientific bureaus interested and the coordination of these plans with wishes of the Reich Foreign Minister. Part of this is also

(2) The creation of a survey on factual basic dates which are to be found at the individual bureaus (number of the Jews in the individual countries), utilization of their property by an international bank

(3) Negotiations with Italy, our friend

The Referat D III has already approached the Reich Foreign Minister through Department Germany about initiating preliminary work and was commissioned by him to start this preliminary work immediately. Conferences with the bureau of the Reich Leader SS, with the Ministry of the Interior, and with some Party offices have already taken place. These offices approved of the following plan of office (Referat) D III.

Referat D III suggests the following for the solution of the Jewish question: The peace treaty with France contains a clause whereby France has to put the isle of Madagascar at our disposal for the solution of the Jewish question, and its approximate 25,000 Frenchmen domiciled there are to be evacuated and compensated. The island will be transferred to Germany as a mandate. The bay of Diego-Suarez, important for reasons of naval strategy, as well as the harbor of Antsirana become German naval bases (there will perhaps also be the possibility for the further extension of these naval bases to the harbors—open landing places—Tamatave, Andevorante, Mananjary, etc., if the Navy so desires). Apart from these naval bases merely parts of the country which are suitable for establishing air bases are cut out from the territory of the Jews. The part of the island that is not required for military reasons is put under the administration of a German Police Governor, who in turn is subordinated to the administration of the Reich Leader SS. Otherwise the Jews will get autonomy in the territory; their own mayors, their own police, their own post and railway administration, etc. The Jews are responsible as joint debtors for the value of the island. The whole European property, owned by them so far, is transferred for this purpose to an European bank which is to be founded. As far as this property is not sufficient for the payment of the real estate values which change into their hands and for the purchase in Europe of goods, necessary for the reconstruction of the island, they will receive at their disposal bank credits from this source.

As Madagascar becomes only a mandate, the Jews settling there do not acquire German citizenship. However, all Jews who are deported to Madagascar are deprived of their citizenship of the individual European countries, effective from the time of deportation. Instead they become members of the Mandate Madagascar. This regulation removes the chance that the Jews establish a Vatican state of their own in Palestine and thus exploit for their own aims the symbolic value which Jerusalem has for the Christian and Mohammedan world. Besides, the Jews remain under German domination as a pawn for the future good conduct of their racial comrades in America. The generosity shown to the Jews by Germany in granting the cultural, economic, administrative, and judicial autonomy, can be exploited from the point of view of propaganda. It can be emphasized in this respect that our German sense of responsibility toward the world forbids to offer immediately the gift of an independent state to a race which knew no national independence for thousands of years; national independence must of necessity stand the trial of history.

Berlin, 3 July 1940

[Signed] RADEMACHER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 154–156, Doc. NG-2586-B.

72. REPORT FROM ALFRED ROSENBERG TO HITLER ON CONFISCATED JEWISH ART COLLECTIONS, MARCH 10, 1941

Alfred Rosenberg played several roles in the Nazi Party. He was one of the earliest members of the German Workers' Party (Deutsche Arbeiterpartei), the predecessor to the Nazi Party; participated in the failed Beer Hall Putsch with Hitler in 1923; and was an important contributor to Nazi ideology. It was, however, in a different capacity that he wrote this document: as a leader in the field of expropriation of Jewish-owned art. Here he is informing Hitler of the plunder he was sending from France to Germany, amounting to some 4,000 pieces of art. In this respect, Rosenberg exemplifies the Nazis' broader policy dedicated to the theft of important pieces of art from throughout Europe, including, as in this case, collections owned by Jewish families.

Report to the Fuehrer

I report the arrival of the principal shipment of ownerless Jewish "cultural property" [Kulturgut] in the salvage location Neuschwanstein by special train on Saturday the 15th of this month. It was secured by my staff for Special Purposes [Einsatzstab] in Paris. The especial train, arranged for by Reichsmarschall Hermann Goering, comprised 25 express baggage cars filled with the most valuable paintings, furniture, Gobelins, works of artistic craftsmanship and ornaments. The shipment consisted chiefly of the most important parts of the collections Rothschild, Seligmann, Bernheim-

Jeune, Halphen, Kann, Weil-Picard, Wildenstein, David-Weill, Levy-Benzion.

My Staff for Special Purposes started the confiscatory action in Paris during October 1940 on the basis of your order, my Fuehrer. With the help of the Security Service (SD) and the Secret Field Police [Geheime Feldpolizei] all storage—and hiding-places of art possessions belonging to the fugitive Jewish emigrants were systematically ascertained. These possessions were then collected in the locations provided for by the Louvre in Paris. The art historians of my staff have itemized scientifically the complete art-material and have photographed all works of value. Thus, after completion, I shall be able to submit to you shortly a conclusive catalogue of all confiscated works with exact data about origin plus scientific evaluation and description. At this time the inventory includes more than 4000 individual pieces of art, partly of the highest artistic value. Besides this special train the masterpieces selected by the Reichsmarschall—mainly from the Rothschild collection—have been forwarded in two special cars to Munich already some time ago. They have been deposited there in the air raid shelters of the Fuehrer-building.

According to instruction the chief special train has been unloaded in Fussen. The cases containing pictures, furniture etc. have been stored in the castle Neuschwanstein. My deputies accompanied the special train and took care of the unloading in Neuschwanstein too.

First of all the paintings have to be unpacked to determine any possible damage suffered during the transport. Furthermore, the observation of climatic influences upon the paintings and their future careful maintenance necessitate their unpacking as well as their skillful setting-up. Due to lack of time a part of the shipment has not yet been fully inventoried in Paris. This has to be taken care of by my co-workers on the spot in Neuschwanstein to supplement the inventory in full. I have detached for Neuschwanstein the necessary technical and scientific personnel of my staff for the execution of this work. The required time for the unpacking and arranging in Neuschwanstein as well as the preparing of the exhibition rooms will take approximately 4 weeks. I shall report the completion of the work to you then, and request you, my Fuehrer, to let me show you the salvaged works of art at the spot. This will give you a survey over the work accomplished by my staff for Special Purposes.

Over and above the chief shipment there are secured in Paris a mass of additional abandoned Jewish art possessions. These are being processed in the same sense and prepared for shipment to Germany. Exact accounts about the extent of this remaining shipment are at the moment not available.

However, it is estimated that the work in the Western areas will be finished entirely within two to three months. Then a second transport can be brought to Germany.

Berlin, 20 March 1941

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 40–41, Doc. 014-PS.

73. TELETYPE EXCHANGE REGARDING TREATMENT OF FOREIGN NATIONAL JEWS, OCTOBER 30, 1941

One of Nazi Germany's ongoing concerns was the treatment of Jewish foreign nationals in Europe during the Nazi occupation. This exchange of teletypes deals with the arrest of a considerable number of such Jews in France. The German embassy in Paris is seeking guidance on their treatment from Ernst von Weizsaecker, chief of state secretary in the Foreign Office in Berlin. Specifically, the question is whether the military commander who made these arrests in France is correct in his position that it would create an unwanted precedent to release any of those Jews. The draft of Weizsaecker's response makes a sharp distinction between American Jewish nationals and those of other countries, directing that the former should be released, while the general rule regarding the latter should be that they be treated like all other Jews. The special treatment to be accorded to Jewish foreign nationals from America is an effort to avoid reprisals against Reich Germans living in America.

TELETYPE FROM THE GERMAN EMBASSY IN PARIS AND DRAFT REPLY ORIGINATING WITH DEFENDANT VON WEIZSAECKER, OCTOBER 1941, CONCERNING THE ARREST IN FRANCE OF JEWS WHO ARE NOT NATIONALS OF FRANCE

I. Teletype from Schleier in Paris, 30 October 1941
TELEGRAM
(Teletype, secret)

Paris, 30 October 1941, 1030 hours
Received 30 October 1941, 1100 hours

Urgent

No. 3382 of 30 October

Military Commander France has arrested a considerable number of Jews including foreign nationals, in the course of the big round-up on 20 August 1941 of French and foreign Jews involved in Communist and de Gaullist activities and in attempts against members of the Wehrmacht in the occupied zone of France. Foreign consuls in Paris have requested assistance of Embassy for the release of Jewish nationals of their respective countries. [The last sentence is underlined by hand.] [Handwritten] Submit to me 31 October. [Initial] W [Weizsaecker]

Military Commander and Security Service take the view that the fact that arrested Jews are foreign nationals, can in no way influence the measures taken. Release of individual Jews would create precedents.

Also, the French law of 4 October 1940 creates a basis to put French and foreign Jews into the concentration camps. The French Government has already put more than 20,000 Jews into concentration camps in the unoccupied part of France due to this law. Jews of foreign countries had the opportunity of leaving the occupied zone as late as end of last year, if they wanted to escape anti-Jewish measures. All interventions by representatives of foreign countries have been unsuccessful.

Request basic directive as to what attitude should be taken by the Embassy. [Handwritten] Competence? [Initial] F [Freytag]

SCHLEIER

In ten copies distributed to:

1. Pol I g
2. Reich Foreign Minister
3. State Secretary [defendant Weizsaecker]
4. Office of Foreign Minister
Ambassador Ritter
Chief Political Division [defendant Woermann]
Chief Commercial Policy Division
Chief Press Division Deputy Chief Political Division
No. 5, 3

2. Draft Teletype from defendant von Weizsaecker to von Ribbentrop, with handwritten changes, stating that the arrests of foreign Jews generally gives rise to no objection, but that the arrest of Jews of American nationality creates a special problem to Pol IX 7751/41 g

1156 Teletype Exchange Regarding Treatment of Foreign National Jews

Carbon Copy

Berlin, October 1941

Referent: Senior Counsellor of Legation Freytag

[Initialed] E [Erdmannsdorf] 3 November

Dg.Pol

U.St.S.Pol [Woermann]

St.S [Weizsaecker]

[Handwritten] To the files State Secretary
[Illegible initial] 5 November.

[Handwritten on margin] Urgent! To Under State Secretary Pol. Div. on account of the alternations made in the draft by the State Secretary [Illegible] S [Siegfried] 3 November

Teletype

(Teletype, Secret) [G-Schreiben]

Through Office Reich Foreign Minister to Special Train

For the Reich Foreign Minister

Concerning telegram from Paris No. 3382 of 30 October, the following is stated:

[Handwritten note] H. [Illegible] Please alter our copy.
F [Freytag] 4 November

1. With respect to the arrest [Note.—Changed to “arrests” in handwriting] of Jews of foreign nationality, the measures of the Military Commander France give rise to no objections.

2. The arrest of Jews of American nationality on the other hand create a more difficult [Note.—“More difficult” changed to “difficult” in handwriting] situation. It must be anticipated with certainty that the North American Government as well as all Ibero-American States concerned, will take action on these arrests and will make them the subject of diplomatic interventions. The Ambassador of Chile has already Undertaken [Note.—the capitalization of the first letter of the verb is corrected in handwriting] steps following the arrest of two Jewish Chileans and suggested that they be released from arrest and expelled. The Mexican Charge d’Affaires, a few days ago, lodged a protest on account of the arrest of a Mexican Jew. Embassy Paris [Note.—“has” inserted in handwriting] in telegram No. 3882 reported also that “foreign consuls in Paris” [Note.—“have” inserted in handwriting] requested assistance of the Embassy for the release of Jewish nationals of their respective countries.

Embassy has been instructed to send a supplementary report giving the names of those countries.

3. In the meantime, following the steps taken by the Chilean Ambassador, Germany Division (D III) has got in touch with the Reich Security Main Office in order to procure the release of the Chilean Jews arrested in the occupied zone of France. The Reich Security Main Office has promised examination of the matter in concurrence with the Paris Bureaus of the Security Service [Sicherheitsdienst].

[The following sentence was stricken out by hand.]

4. The following has to be borne in mind for the evaluation of this matter. [Handwritten] F. We would get the worst of it. It * * *.

[Numeral handwritten.]

4. In case we decline the release of Jewish nationals of American countries, we must anticipate reprisals by the governments concerned against Reich nationals. [Note.—The balance of this paragraph was stricken by hand. Originally the stricken part read: “In this respect we are at a considerable disadvantage (sitzen wir am kuerzeren Hebel) since the number of Reich Germans in America is many times in excess of the number of nationals of American countries in territory under our control. In addition we must expect strong propagandist reaction in the Jewish press, which would even further impair our already strained relations with several Ibero-American States. Any anticipated favorable results in domestic politics would therefore be strongly outweighed by the disadvantages likely to result in our foreign relations.”]

It is therefore planned to instruct our Paris Embassy to make a request, stating all relevant political reasons, to the Military Commander France and the Chief of the Security Service (Sicherheitsdienst), to release the arrested Jews who possess an American nationality, as far as their arrest is not justified by any criminal act. In addition it might be worth considering whether all Jewish nationals of American countries should not be expelled from the occupied territories with a view to removing the causes of friction created hereby [Note.—“hereby” changed to “by their residence” in handwriting].

WEIZSAECKER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 174–177, Doc.
NG-5095.

74. REGARDING RIBBENTROP'S INSTRUCTIONS ON SPEEDING UP EVACUATION OF JEWS FROM EUROPE, SEPTEMBER 24, 1942

Martin Luther, undersecretary (Unterstaatssekretär) of the Foreign Ministry, is conveying in this document to Ernst von Weizsaecker, chief of state secretary in the Foreign Office in Berlin, a decision made by Joachim von Ribbentrop, Foreign Minister, to expedite evacuation of Jews from various occupied countries in Europe. At this time, mass murders were occurring at extermination camps in Poland, including Auschwitz, where only two months earlier more than 4,000 children deported from Paris were exterminated. The reason given for the need to increase evacuations is that the Jews "stir up" others against the Nazi regime. In fact, the increased evacuations were part of the overall Nazi plan to deport as many Jews as possible "to the East," meaning to their deaths in the extermination camps.

NOTE FROM LUTHER TO DEFENDANT VON WEIZSAECKER, WITH COPIES TO DEFENDANT WOERMANN AND OTHERS, 24 SEPTEMBER 1942, CONCERNING VON RIBBENTROP'S INSTRUCTIONS ON SPEEDING UP EVACUATION OF JEWS FROM EUROPE AND NOTING THAT ALL STEPS TAKEN BY DEPARTMENT GERMANY WILL BE SUBMITTED TO VON WEIZSAECKER FOR APPROVAL

Under State Secretary, D.-No. 6062

[Handwritten] Instructions received
Berlin, 24 September 1942

Secret!
Memorandum

The Reich Foreign Minister has given me instructions today over the telephone to hurry as much as possible the evacuation of Jews from the various countries of Europe, because it is a known fact that the Jews stir up people against us everywhere and that they must be made responsible for attempts of murder and acts of sabotage. Upon a brief report concerning the present stage of evacuation of the Jews from Slovakia, Croatia, Rumania, and the occupied territories, the Reich Foreign Minister has given instructions now to start contacting the governments of Bulgaria, Hungary, and Denmark with the object of starting the evacuation of the Jews from these countries.

With regard to the settlement of the Jewish question in Italy, the Reich Foreign Minister has reserved for himself all steps to be taken. This question shall be discussed personally either between the Fuehrer and the Duce or between the Reich Foreign Minister and Count Ciano.

Herewith to the State Secretary v. Weizsaecker with the request to take notice. All steps taken by us will be submitted to you at the time for your approval.

Original returned.

[Signed] LUTHER

Copies:

Under State Secretary
Political Division [Initial] W [Woermann].
Under State Secretary
Legal Division [Handwritten initials and illegible notes].
Dirigent Trade Policy
D II
D III
Dirigent Pol [Illegible initials] 26/9
Pol IV
Pol X
[Illegible initial] 29/9 [Initial] W 26/9

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 255–256, Doc. NG-1517.

75. REGARDING DEPORTATION OF JEWS FROM HUNGARY, JUNE 17, 1944

Hungary had a Jewish population of over 800,000 in 1941. It was a German ally but refused to allow the mass deportations of its Jews despite Berlin's directions. When in February 1943 it suffered significant casualties in the failed effort by Germany and its allies to defeat Russia, Hungary's prime minister, Miklos Kallay, sought to negotiate an armistice directly with the Allied forces, prompting Germany to invade and occupy the country. Mass deportations to Auschwitz began in May 1944, and within two months 440,000 Jews were gone. In this document, Edmund Veesenmayer, Reich plenipotentiary to Hungary, provided an interim report to Karl Ritter, senior official in the Foreign Ministry and close associate to Joachim von Ribbentrop, German foreign minister, that cites some

1158 Regulation Banning Jewish Emigration from the Generalgouvernement

326,000 Jews who had been deported to date. It is a harsh reminder of the speed with which the last major Jewish community in Europe was decimated.

TELEGRAM FROM DEFENDANT VEESENMAYER TO DEFENDANT RITTER, 17 JUNE 1944, REPORTING THAT 326,009 JEWS HAVE BEEN DE.PORTEED FROM HUNGARY

[Stamp] Foreign Office
Inland II 1213 g
Received: 20 June 1944
encl.

[Stamp] To be treated as sealed matter only.

Telegram from Budapest No. 1820 of 17 June for Ambassador Ritter

Addition to wire report No. 258 of 15 June. The Higher SS and Police Leader reported to me on 15 June:

Note—Telegram was sent by Budapest Embassy directly to FuschI. Telegram control.

1. Communism.—KDS [Commander of Security Police] Budapest arrested the Jew Deutsch and his wife because he is suspected of being a Bolshevik agent. Deutsch was in Moscow from 1932 to 1936 and was visited there a number of times by his wife. After her return from Moscow she frequently stated that she worked there as a tailor for GPU commissars.

[Handwritten] (1) . . . Inland II . . . (2) Pol VI for information (3) to the files—S—Hungary . . . [initials] v. Th. [von Thadden] 20/6

2. Jews.—Total number of Jews deported to the Reich, 326,009. From circles of the Rumanian Consul General in Cluj we found out that the Hungarian Jews who have fled to Rumania are treated there like political refugees and that the Rumanian Government intends to make it possible for them to emigrate to Palestine.

[Stamp] Working copy to be registered with Inland II
[Handwritten] Jews Hungary
VEESENMAYER

Distribution list:

Reich Foreign Minister 2x
State Secretary 3x
Under State Secretary Pol. Div 1x

Deputy Chief, Pol. Div. 1x
Pol. I M 1x
Pol. IV b 1x
Inland II (working copy) 1x
Minister Frohwein 1x

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 358–359, Doc. NG-5567.

76. REGULATION BANNING JEWISH EMIGRATION FROM THE GENERALGOUVERNEMENT, NOVEMBER 23, 1940

This document was sent on behalf of SS Sturmbannführer Karl August Eckhardt to district governors in the General Government (Generalgouvernement), that part of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into the Reich. It transmits a decree from the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) that bans the emigration of Jews from the General Government. A ban on Jewish emigration would seem to be inconsistent with the German government's efforts to encourage Jewish emigration. However, according to the decree, Jews in the General Government are primarily from Eastern Europe, are more likely to be orthodox in their beliefs and practices, and are well educated in Jewish law and tradition. If they emigrate to the United States, they will be in great demand, could strengthen and unify the Jewish community, and perhaps will be in a position to build U.S. opposition to the Nazi regime. Further, if they are allowed to emigrate they will use up some of the very few opportunities to emigrate that are available to Jews in other areas of the Reich from which the Nazi government would like to see more emigration.

In a Decree of October 25, 1940, the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) has informed me of the following:

“Owing to the fact that the emigration of Jews from the Government-General still further considerably reduced the already shrinking opportunities for emigration for Jews from the Altreich, the Ostmark [Austria] and the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, contrary to the wish of the Reich Marshal, I request that no such emigration be considered.

“The continued emigration of Jews from Eastern Europe [to the West] spells a continued spiritual regeneration of world Jewry, as it is mainly the Eastern Jews who supply a large proportion of the rabbis, Talmud teachers, etc., owing to their orthodox-religious beliefs, and they are urgently needed by Jewish organizations active in the United States, according to their own statements. Further, every orthodox Jew from Eastern Europe spells a valuable addition for these Jewish organizations in the United States in their constant efforts for the spiritual renewal of United States Jewry and its unification. It is United States Jewry in particular, which is endeavoring, with the help of newly immigrated Jews, especially from Eastern Europe, to create a new basis from which it intends to force ahead its struggle, particularly against Germany.

“For these reasons it can be assumed that after a certain number of emigration permits have been issued, creating a precedent for Jews from the Government-General, so to speak, a large part of the entry visas, [which are] mainly for the United States, will in future only be made available for Jews from Eastern Europe.”

I fully accept the point of view of the Reich Security Main Office and request that you will not pass on to the office here for decision any more applications by Jews to emigrate. Such applications would of course have to be rejected here.

I empower you to reject without further investigation any applications by Jews from the Government-General for permission to emigrate. It is requested that applications to emigrate shall be forwarded here only if they involve Jews holding foreign citizenship. As there is no further question of emigration by Jews from the Government-General as a matter of principle, there is also no need for a Jew to receive a permit to visit the Reich for the purpose of obtaining a visa from a foreign consulate in the German Reich. It is requested that even applications by Jews for the issuing of a permit for the purpose of obtaining a visa from a foreign consulate in the Reich should also be rejected.

(for) Eckhardt

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Israel Gutman, and Abraham Margalot, eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, translated by Lea Ben Dor (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press/Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 219–220. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

77. KRISTALLNACHT: TELEGRAM ON GERMAN PRESS COVERAGE OF VOM RATH SHOOTING, NOVEMBER 8, 1938, 4:00 P.M.

Hugh R. Wilson was U.S. ambassador to Germany for just ten months, but during his last week in that capacity the Nazis initiated and organized Kristallnacht, the first mass violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria. This telegram and the next are from Wilson to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, informing him of the German press coverage of the shooting of Ernst vom Rath, secretary of legation in the German embassy in Paris, by Herschel Grynszpan, a 17-year-old Polish Jew who was seeking revenge for the way his family was being treated in Germany. This event, reported by the German press to inflame antisemitism, was used by the Nazi leadership as the excuse to unleash Kristallnacht and its vast destruction of Jewish businesses, the loss of some 90 Jewish lives, complete destruction or desecration of synagogues throughout all of Germany and Austria, and the arrest of 30,000 Jewish males.

GRAY

From Berlin

Dated November 8, 1938

Rec'd 1:25 p.m.

Secretary of State,

Washington

600, November 8, 4 p.m.

The shooting of Secretary of Legation Rath in the German Embassy in Paris by one Grynszpan, a Polish Jew, is featured in the morning press here.

The tenor of extensive German press comment is exemplified by the following quotation for the DEUTSCH ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG

“The Jewish crime in the German Embassy in Paris, nobody should be in doubt, will have the severest consequences for the Jews in Germany and for the foreign Jews in Germany as well (* * *) the suspicion is obvious that it was the intention of the possible inciters of the crime to cause difficulties between Germany and France in an era of commencing rapprochement * * * (as in the case of Gustlof Indavas) the entire people and the entire Reich stands by the victim not only in mourning and complaint but doubtless also with acts of state power.”

Text to London for Rublee.

Wilson
WWC-PEG

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1808: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

78. KRISTALLNACHT: TELEGRAM ON ADDITIONAL OBSERVATION ABOUT GERMAN PRESS COVERAGE OF VOM RATH SHOOTING, NOVEMBER 9, 1938, 12:30 P.M.

See the introduction to document 77.

GRAY
Berlin
Dated November 9, 1938
Rec'd 12:30 p.m.
Secretary of State,
Washington
603, November 9, 5 p.m.

Further to my No. 600 of 4 p.m., yesterday, German press continues to feature Grynspan case insisting he must have had instigators "in Paris, Geneva, Moscow or New York" and demanding reprisals against Jews in Germany both German and foreign.

Wilson
CSB

Source: State CDF 862.4016/1810: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

79. ORDER BANNING JEWISH EMIGRATION FROM THE REICH, OCTOBER 23, 1941

This order came just months after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union—Operation Barbarossa—in June 1941. It was during the spring or summer of 1941 that Hitler made the decision to exterminate the Jews of Europe. Accordingly, it should come as no surprise that Jewish emigration was being terminated because it was no longer seen as a solution to the Jewish question (Judenfrage). It was only a year earlier—in November 1940—that a decree banned the emigration of Jews from the General Government (Generalgouvernement), that part of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into the Reich, but rather than being a precursor to this order that banned emigration from the Reich, that earlier decree was made in part in order to allow for greater emigration from other parts of the Reich. Now, with the decision made to kill all Jews in Europe, emigration—whether from the General Government or elsewhere in German-occupied Europe—was viewed as inadequate to the task of making Europe free of Jews (Judenfrei).

Reich Security Main Office
Berlin, October 23, 1941
IV B 4 b(Rz) 2920/41 g (984)

To. . .

The Officer appointed by the Chief of the Security Police and the SD for Belgium and France

SS Brigadeführer Thomas Brussels

Secret

Re: Emigration of Jews
Reference: none

The Reichsführer SS and Chief of the German Police has decreed that the emigration of Jews is to be prevented, taking effect immediately. (Evacuation Aktionen will remain unaffected.)

I request that the internal German Authorities concerned in the area of service there may be informed of this order.

Permission for the emigration of individual Jews can only be approved in single very special cases; for instance, in the event of a genuine interest on the part of the Reich, and then only after a prior decision has been obtained from the Reich Security Main Office.

signed Müller

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Israel Gutman, and Abraham Margalio, eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, translated by Lea Ben Dor (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press/Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1999), pp. 153–154. Used by permission of Yad Vashem.

80. KRISTALLNACHT: HEYDRICH'S INSTRUCTIONS, NOVEMBER 10, 1938

Issued by SS Gruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich (1904–1942) during the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, this document contained the following explicit instructions: German citizens or property were not to be destroyed, Jewish businesses and apartments were not to be looted, foreign nationals (including Jews) were to be left alone, Jewish archives were to be seized, and as many Jews as possible were to be imprisoned. As a result of this event, 90 Jews were killed in the attacks, and 30,000 were arrested and incarcerated in concentration camps. Jewish homes, hospitals, and schools were ransacked, as the attackers destroyed such buildings while avoiding German-owned ones. Over 1,000 synagogues were burned and over 7,000 Jewish businesses damaged or destroyed.

Copy

Teletype Message Munich 47 767 10 November 1938—0120—

To all State Police Main Offices and Field Offices

To all SD—Main Sectors and to SD—Sub-sectors

SECRET

Flash Urgent to be submitted at once. Urgent—to be submitted immediately to the Chief or his deputy.

Regards: Measures against Jews to-night.

Because of the attempt on the life of von Rath, Legation Secretary in Paris, demonstrations against the Jews are to be expected in the entire Reich in the course of this night—from the 9th to the 10th of November 1938. For the handling of these actions the following directions are issued:

1. The chiefs of the State Police Offices or their deputies will immediately after receipt of this teletype message establish telephone contact with the political leadership offices—Gau Directorate or Kreis Directorate—within their region and arrange a conference about the handling of the demonstrations. The respective inspectors and commanders of the Order Police are to participate in the conference. In this conference the political leadership offices are to be informed that the German police have received the following directives from the Reichsfuehrer of the SS and Chief of the German Police, which directives are to be conformed to by the political leadership offices in an appropriate manner:

a. Only such measures may be taken which do not jeopardize German life or property (for instance, burning of synagogues only if there is no danger of fires for the neighborhood).

b. Business establishments and homes of Jews may be destroyed but not looted. The police have been instructed to supervise the execution of these directives and to arrest looters.

c. In business streets special case is to be taken that non-Jewish establishments will be safeguarded at all cost against damage.

d. Subjects of foreign countries may not be molested even if they are Jews.

2. Under the provision that the directives given under No. 1 are being complied with, the demonstrations are not to be prevented but merely supervised regarding compliance with the directives.

3. Immediately after receipt of this teletype the archives of the Jewish communities are to be confiscated by the police, so that they will not be destroyed in the course of the demonstrations. Important in this respect is historically valuable material, not recent tax lists, etc. The archives are to be delivered to the respective SD Office.

4. The direction of the measures of the Safety Police regarding the demonstrations against Jews is in the hands of the State Police Offices, in as much as the inspectors of the Safety Police do not issue different directives. For the performance of the measures of the Safety Police, officers of the criminal police as well as members of the SD, the special troops and the SS, may be used.

5. As soon as the events of this night permit the use of the designated officers, as many Jews, particularly wealthy ones, as the local jails will hold, are to be arrested in all districts. Initially only healthy male Jews, not too old, are to be arrested. After the arrests have been carried out the appropriate concentration camp is to be contacted immediately with a view to a quick transfer of the Jews to the camps. Special care is to be taken that Jews arrested on the basis of this directive will not be mistreated.

6. The content of this order is to be communicated to the respective inspectors and commanders of the Order Police and to the SD Chief Sectors and the SD Sub-sectors with the notification that these police measures have been issued by the Reichsfuehrer of the SS and the Chief of the German Police. The Chief of the Order Police issues appropriate orders to the Fire Department Police. The Safety Police and the Order Police are to work in closest coordination in the execution of these measures.

1162 Kristallnacht: Telegram to United States Secretary of State Announcing Outbreak of Destruction

The receipt of this teletype is to be confirmed by the State Police Director or a deputy via teletype to the Secret State Police Office into the hands of SS Colonel [Standartenfuehrer] Muller.

Signed : HEYDRICH
SS General [Gruppenfuehrer]

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 545–547, Doc. 765-PS.

In the early hours of this morning systematic breaking of Jewish owned shop windows throughout the Reich and the burning of the principal synagogues in Berlin was carried out. * * *

WILSON
WWC: CSB

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 311, Doc. 2602-PS.

81. KRISTALLNACHT: TELEGRAM TO UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE ANNOUNCING OUTBREAK OF DESTRUCTION, NOVEMBER 10, 1938

This telegram and the next are reports from U.S. diplomats in Germany to the U.S. secretary of state, Cordell Hull, about the demonstrations and destruction in Berlin and Bremen as a result of Kristallnacht, the first mass violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria. The first is from Hugh R. Wilson, U.S. ambassador to Germany, with a brief statement to the effect that anti-Jewish violence has broken out in Berlin. The second is from Edwin C. Kemp, U.S. consul general in Bremen, with a slightly more detailed description of the destruction in Bremen and the arrest there of Jewish men. Of significance is Kemp's observation that what happened in Bremen was not the result of a spontaneous outburst by a mob, but a planned and coordinated action.

CONFIDENTIAL
TELEGRAM RECEIVED
—————GRAY

FROM Berlin
Dated November 10, 1938
Rec'd 10:35 a. m.

Secretary of State,
Washington
605, November 10, 2 p. m.
My 600, November 8, 4 p. m. and 603, November 9, 5 p. m.

82. KRISTALLNACHT: TELEGRAM TO UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE REGARDING ANTI-JEWISH DEMONSTRATIONS IN BREMEN, NOVEMBER 10, 1938

See the introduction to document 81.

Report by: Edwin C. Kemp
U. S. Consul General in Breme

To the Secretary of State
Washington, D. C.
Date: 10 November 1938

Subject: Anti-Jewish Demonstrations in Bremen

I have the honor to report that on the night of November 9th the Jewish synagogue and cemetery chapel in Bremen were burned, and the show windows of all the Jewish shops were smashed to pieces. Large notices written in red and black reading "Revenge for the murder of vom Rath", "Death of international Jewry" and similar phrases were left conspicuously in sight.

During the early hours of the 10th a number of arrests of Jews were made, and about nine o'clock in the morning about fifty Jewish men, some of decrepit age or health, were paraded along the main street under guard of about six S.A. men.

The attitude of the population, the presence of the many written notices which were done by the same hand and must have required some time to prepare are sufficient evidence that the destruction was not the work of a spontaneous mob enthusiasm, as claimed by some official authorities.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 312, Doc. 2603-PS.

83. KRISTALLNACHT: SA REPORT ON DESTRUCTION, NOVEMBER 11, 1938

This report of damage committed during Kristallnacht, the first mass violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria, is explicit in its intent. The Fuehrer of Brigade 50 in Starkenburg in Rhineland-Palatinate (in western Germany), having received an order to immediately blow up or set on fire the synagogues in the area, notified the leader of the paramilitary Standartenführer (SA) unit to begin the process, noting, however, that it must be done without damage to non-Jewish property, and with the men dressed in civilian clothes, in keeping with Nazi propaganda that the destruction was a spontaneous expression of the anger of German citizens at the murder by a Jewish teenager, Herschel Grynszpan, of a functionary in the German embassy in Paris. The list then follows of synagogues that were destroyed by fire, had their interior and furnishings destroyed, or were blown up. This document is one of many such reports from throughout Germany and Austria that recorded and catalogued the destruction not only of synagogues, but also of Jewish homes and businesses.

CONFIDENTIAL

SA der NSDAP

50th Brigade (Starkenburg)

Division F Reference No 4309

DARMSTADT, 2 Moosbergstrasse 11 November 1938

Tel. 7042 and 7043 Postal checking account: Frankfurt on the Main 234-38 Bankaccount City Savings Bank 155

To: SA Group Electoral Palatinate [Kurpfalz] Mannheim

The following order reached me at 3 o'clock on 10 November 1938.

“On the order of the Gruppenfuehrer, all the Jewish synagogues within the 50th Brigade are to be blown up or set on fire immediately.”

“Neighboring houses occupied by Aryans are not to be damaged. The action is to be carried out in civilian clothes. Rioting and plundering are to be prevented. Report of execution of orders to reach Brigade Fuehrer or office by 8:30.”

I immediately alerted the Standartenfuehrer and gave them the most exact instructions; the execution of the order began at once.

I hereby report that the following were destroyed in the area of:

Standarte 115

1. Synagogue at Darmstadt, Bleichstrasse destroyed by fire.
2. Synagogue at Darmstadt, Fuchsstrasse destroyed by fire.
3. Synagogue at Ober/Ramstadt interior and furnishings wrecked.
4. Synagogue at Graefenhausen interior and furnishings wrecked.
5. Synagogue at Griesheim interior and furnishings wrecked
6. Synagogue at Pfungstadt interior and furnishings wrecked.
7. Synagogue at Eberstadt destroyed by fire.

Standarte 145

1. Synagogue at Bensheim destroyed by fire.
2. Synagogue at Lorsch in Hessen destroyed by fire.
2. Synagogue at Heppenheim destroyed by fire and blown-up.
3. Synagogue at Birkenau destroyed by fire.
4. Prayer House Alsbach destroyed by fire.
5. Meeting room Alsbach destroyed by fire.
6. Synagogue at Rimbach furnishings completely destroyed.

Standarte 168

1. Synagogue in Seligenstadt destroyed by fire.
2. Synagogue in Offenbach destroyed by fire.
3. Synagogue in Klein-Krotzenburg destroyed by fire.
4. Synagogue in Steinheim on the Main destroyed by fire.
5. Synagogue in Muehlheim on the Main destroyed by fire.
6. Synagogue in Sprendlingen destroyed by fire.
7. Synagogue in Langen destroyed by fire.
8. Synagogue in Egelsbach destroyed by fire.

Standarte 186

1. Synagogue in Beerfelden blown up
2. Synagogue in Michelstadt furnishings wrecked.
3. Synagogue in Koenig furnishings wrecked.
4. Synagogue in Hoechst i/Odenwald furnishings wrecked.
5. Synagogue in Gross-Umstadt furnishings wrecked.
6. Synagogue in Dieburg furnishings wrecked.
7. Synagogue in Babenhausen furnishings wrecked.
8. Synagogue in Gross-Bieberau destroyed by fire.
9. Synagogue in Fraenk. Crumbach furnishings destroyed.
10. Synagogue in Reichelsheim furnishings destroyed.

Standarte 221

1. Synagogue and Chapel in Gross Gerau destroyed by fire.
2. Synagogue in Ruesselheim torn down and furnishings destroyed.
3. Synagogue in Dornheim furnishings destroyed.
4. Synagogue in Wolfskehlen furnishings destroyed.

The Fuehrer of Brigade 50 (Starkenburg)
/s/ [Illegible]
Brigadefuehrer

Stamped: SA Group Electoral Palatinate (Kurpfalz)
11 Nov 1938

/s/ [Illegible]

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 215–216, Doc. 1721-PS.

84. KRISTALLNACHT: TELEGRAM TO UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR HUGH R. WILSON REGARDING ANTISEMITIC PERSECUTION IN THE STUTTGART CONSULAR DISTRICT, NOVEMBER 12, 1938

This report by Samuel W. Honaker, American consul general in Stuttgart, Germany, to Hugh R. Wilson, U.S. ambassador in Berlin, confirms the execution of the directions given by SS Gruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich to all state police offices throughout Germany and Austria on November 10, namely, that they were to destroy synagogues while assuring that non-Jewish buildings did not suffer any damage. This report speaks about what occurred in the Stuttgart Consular District in southwest Germany. While most of his report is couched in diplomatic objectivity, it is noticeable that Honaker begins his report with a highly emotional statement of the suffering of the Jews during Kristallnacht, a level of suffering that would have been unthinkable in “an enlightened country during the twentieth century.” His incredulity conveys to the reader of his report the dramatic impact of the destruction that occurred.

Report by Samuel W. Honaker, American Consul General to U. S. Ambassador Hugh R. Wilson, Berlin

Date: 12 November 1938

Subject: Antisemitic Persecution in the Stuttgart Consular District.

I have the honor to report that the Jews of Southwest Germany have suffered vicissitudes during the last three days which would seem unreal to one living in an enlightened country during the twentieth century if one had not actually been a witness of their dreadful experiences, or if one had not had them corroborated by more than one person of undoubted integrity.

Early on the morning of November 10th practically every synagogue—at least twelve in number—in Wuerttemberg, Baden and Hohenzollern was set on fire by well disciplined and apparently well equipped young men in civilian clothes. The procedure was practically the same in all cities of this district, namely, Stuttgart, Karlsruhe, Freiburg, Heidelberg, Heilbronn, et cetera. The doors of the synagogues were forced open. Certain sections of the building and furnishings were drenched with petrol and set on fire. Bibles, prayer books, and other sacred things were thrown into the flames. Then the local fire brigades were notified. In Stuttgart, the city officials ordered the fire brigades to save the archives and other written material having a bearing on vital statistics. Otherwise, the fire brigades confined their activities to preventing the flames from spreading. In a few hours the synagogues were, in general, heaps of smoking ruins.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 312–313, Doc. 2604-PS.

85. KRISTALLNACHT: PAYMENT OF FINE BY JEWS OF GERMAN NATIONALITY, NOVEMBER 12, 1938

In what can only be described as a stunning demand, this decree by Hermann Göring, plenipotentiary of the Four-Year Plan, requires that the Jewish community must pay for the damage inflicted on them—on their synagogues, homes, and businesses—during Kristallnacht, the first mass government-organized violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria. The explanation for the decree is equally illogical, namely that the demand for payment is due to the “hostile attitude” of the Jews, an attitude that gave rise to the commission of murder, this despite the fact that the only deaths to occur during Kristallnacht were those of some 90 Jews.

1938 REICHSGESETZBLATT, PART I, PAGE 1579

Decree relating to the payment of a fine by the Jews of German nationality of 12 Nov. 1938.

The hostile attitude of the Jewry towards the German people and Reich, which does not even shrink back from committing cowardly murder, makes a decisive defense and a harsh punishment (expiation) necessary. I order, therefore, by virtue of the decree concerning the execution of the 4-year Plan of 18 Oct. 1936 (RGBl. I, page 887) as follows:

Section 1

On the Jews of German nationality as a whole has been imposed the payment of a contribution of 1,000,000,000 Reichsmark to the German Reich.

Section 2

Provisions for the implementation are issued by the Reich-Minister of Finance in agreement with the Reich-Ministers concerned.

Berlin, 12 November 1938.

The Commissioner for the Four Year Plan

Goering
General Field-Marshal.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, p. 6, Doc. 1412-PS.

86. KRISTALLNACHT AND ARYANIZATION: EXCERPTS FROM A CONFERENCE ON “THE JEWISH QUESTION,” CHAIRED BY GOERING, NOVEMBER 12, 1938

In a three-and-a-half-hour conference led by Hermann Göring, plenipotentiary of the Four-Year Plan, discussion was held in response to Hitler’s request that “the Jewish question be now, once and for all, coordinated and solved one way or another.” These words would become far more chilling in the years to come, but at this point in the Nazi “continuum of evil,” the intent was to further burden and isolate the Jewish community economically in an effort to ensure Jewish emigration from the Reich. One of the principal concerns of the meeting was to ensure that German insurance companies would not pay members of the Jewish community for the extensive destruction done to their homes, businesses, and synagogues during Kristallnacht, the first mass government-organized violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria. Another area of significant discussion was the “aryanizing” of Jewish stores, as well as Jewish-owned factories and large industrial concerns. The conference also considered various restrictions to be imposed on Jews in public life, such as in theaters and trains. Further, attention was paid to the issue of Jewish emigration from the Reich, as well as the establishment of ghettos.

STENOGRAPHIC REPORT OF THE MEETING ON “THE JEWISH QUESTION” UNDER THE CHAIRMANSHIP OF FIELD MARSHALL GOERING IN THE REICHS AIR FORCE (12 November 1938-11 o’clock)

Part I

Goering: Gentlemen! Today’s meeting is of a decisive nature. I have received a letter written on the Fuehrer’s orders by the Stabsleiter of the Fuehrer’s deputy Bormann, requesting that the Jewish question be now, once and for all, coordinated and solved one way or another. And yesterday once again did the Fuehrer request by phone for me to take coordinated action in the matter.

Since the problem is mainly an economic one, it is from the economic angle that it shall have to be tackled. Naturally a number of legal measures shall have to be taken which fall into the sphere of the Minister for Justice and into that of the Minister of the Interior; and certain propaganda measures shall be taken care of by the Minister for Propaganda. The Minister for Finance and the Minister for Economic Affairs shall take care of problems falling in their respective resorts.

In the meeting, in which we first talked about this question and came to the decision to aryanize German economy, to take the Jew out of it, and put him into our debit ledger, was one in which, to our shame, we only made pretty plans, which were executed very slowly. We then had a demonstration, right here in Berlin, we told the people that something decisive would be done, but again nothing happened. We have had this affair in Paris now, more demonstrations followed and this time something decisive must be done!

Because, gentlemen, I have enough of these demonstrations! They don't harm the Jew but me, who is the last authority for coordinating the German economy.

If today, a Jewish shop is destroyed, if goods are thrown into the street, the insurance company will pay for the damages, which the Jew does not even have; and furthermore goods of the consumer goods belonging to the people, are destroyed. If in the future, demonstrations which are necessary, occur, then, I pray, that they be directed, so as not to hurt us.

Because it's insane to clean out and burn a Jewish warehouse then have a German insurance company make good the loss. And the goods which I need desperately, whole bales of clothing and what-not, are being burned; and I miss them everywhere.

I may as well burn the raw materials before they arrive. The people of course, do not understand that; therefore we must make laws which will show the people once and for all, that something is being done.

I should appreciate it very much if for once, our propaganda would make it clear that it is unfortunately not the Jew who has to suffer in all this, but the German insurance companies.

I am not going to tolerate a situation in which the insurance companies are the ones who suffer. Under the authority invested in me, I shall issue a decree, and I am, of course, requesting the support of the competent Government agencies, so that everything shall be processed through the right channels and the insurance companies will not be the ones who suffer.

It may be, though, that these insurance companies may have insurance in foreign countries. If that is the case, foreign bills of exchange would be available which I would not want to lose. That shall have to be checked. For that reason, I have asked Mr. Hilgard of the insurance company, to attend, since he is best qualified to tell us to what extent the insurance companies are protected against damage, by having taken out insurance with other companies. I would not want to miss this, under any circumstances.

I should not want to leave any doubt, gentlemen, as to the aim of today's meeting. We have not come together merely to talk again, but to make decisions, and I implore the competent agencies to take all measures for the elimination of the Jew from German economy and to submit them to me, as far as it is necessary.

The fundamental idea in this program of elimination of the Jew from German economy is first, the Jew being ejected from the Economy transfers his property to the State. He will be compensated. The compensation is to be listed in the debit ledger and shall bring a certain percentage of interest. The Jew shall have to live out of this interest. It is a foregone conclusion, that this aryanizing, if it is to be done quickly, cannot be made in the Ministry for Economy in Berlin. That way, we would never finish.

On the other hand, it is very necessary to have safety precautions so that the lower echelons, Statthalter, and Gauleiter will not do things unreasonably. One must issue correction directives, immediately.

The aryanizing of all the larger establishments, naturally, is to be my lot—the Ministry for Economy will designate, which and how many there are—it must not be done by a Statthalter or his lower echelons, since these things reach into the export trade, and cause great problems, which the Statthalter can neither observe, nor solve from his place.

It is my lot, so that the damage will not be greater than the profit, which we are striving for.

It is obvious gentlemen, that the Jewish stores are for the people, and not the stores. Therefore, we must begin here, according to the rules previously' laid down.

The Minister for Economic Affairs shall announce which stores he'll want to close altogether. These stores are excluded from aryanizing at once. Their stocks are to be made available for sale in other stores; what cannot be sold, shall be processed through the “Winterhilfe” or taken care of otherwise. However, the sales values of these articles shall always be considered, since the State is not to suffer but should profit through this transformation. For the chain and department stores—I speak now only of that, what can be seen, certain categories have to be established, according to the importance of the various branches.

The trustee of the State will estimate the value of the property and decide what amount the Jew shall receive. Naturally, this amount is to be set as low as possible. The representative of the State shall then turn the establishment over to the “Aryan” proprietor, that is, the property shall be sold according to its real value.

There begins the difficulties. It is easily understood that strong attempts will be made to get all these stores to party-members and to let them have some kind of compensations. I have witnessed terrible things in the past; little chauffeurs of Gauleiters have profited so much by these transactions that they have now about half a million. You, gentlemen, know it. Is that correct?

(Assent)

Of course, things like that are impossible. I shall not hesitate to act ruthlessly in any case where such a trick is played. If the individual involved is prominent, I shall see the Fuehrer within two hours and report to him.

We shall have to insist upon it, that the Aryan taking over the establishment is of the branch and knows his job. Generally speaking he is the one who must pay for the store with his own money. In other words, an ordinary business transaction is to be sought—one merchant selling, the other one buying a business. If there are party members among the contenders, they are to be preferred, that is if they have the same qualifications: first shall come the one who had the most damage, and secondly, selection should be according to length of Party membership.

Of course, there may be exceptions. There are party-members who, as may be proven, lost their business concessions by action of the Schuschnigg or Prague Government, and so went bankrupt. Such a man has naturally first option on a store for sale, and he shall receive help if he does not have the means to help himself. The trustee of the State can justify this help, if he is more business like in the transfer. This party-member should have the chance to buy the store for as cheap a price as possible. In such a case the State will not receive the full price, but only the amount the Jew received. Such a buyer may even receive a loan besides, so that he will get off to a good start.

I wish to make it clear that such a proceeding shall only be legal if the party-member has once owned such a store. For example, a party-member was the owner of a stationery store, and Schuschnigg took away the concession to operate it so that the man lost the store and went bankrupt. Now, if a Jewish stationery store is being aryanized, this party-member should get the store on conditions which he'll be able to fulfill. Such a case shall be the only exception though, in all other cases the procedure shall be of a strictly business-like nature whereby the party-member, like I said before, shall have the preference, if he has the same qualifications as any other candidate, who is not a member of the party.

When selling for the actual value we shall find only about 60 Aryans ready to take over 100 Jewish stores. I don't think that we have a German for every Jewish store. You must not forget that the Jew sees his main activity in the field of trade, and that he owns 90% of it. I doubt that we'd have a demand big enough. I even doubt that we'd have enough people, particularly now since everybody has found his field of work.

Therefore, I ask the Minister for Economy to go beyond what we think ought to be done for the sake of the principle, in liquidating the establishments. I ask him to go further, even though there won't be any candidates. That'll be perfectly alright.

The transfer of stores and establishments shall have to be executed by the lower echelons, not through Berlin but through the Gaue and through the Reichstatthalterschaft. Therein shall be the seat of the members of the Board of Trustees, even if it consists of a few people only. The Statthalter and his people cannot do this job; the trustees will have to tackle it. But the Statthalter shall be the authority which supervises, according to the regulations given him, the trustees, particularly in dealings such as the transfer to party-members.

Naturally, these establishments cannot disappear all at once but we'll have to start by Monday, in a manner that shall make it obvious that a change has begun to materialize. Besides that, certain stores could be closed which will make things here easier.

Another point! I have noticed that Aryans took over a Jewish store and were then so clever to keep the name of the Jewish store as “formerly,” or kept it altogether. That must not be; I cannot permit it. Because it may happen—what has just happened—stores were looted because their signboards bore Jewish names—because they had once been Jewish, but had been “aryanized” a long time ago. Names of former Jewish firms shall have to disappear completely, and the German shall have to come forward with his or his firm's name. I ask you to carry this out quite definitely. That much then regarding aryanizing of stores and wholesale establishments, particularly in regard to signboards and of all that is obvious!

Of the consequences resulting from this for the Jew, I shall speak later, because this is connected with other things.

Now for the factories. As for the smaller and medium ones, two things shall have to be made clear.

1. Which factories do I not need at all—which are the ones where productions could be suspended? Could they not be put to another use? If not, the factories will be razed immediately.

2. In case the factory should be needed, it will be turned over to Aryans in the same manner as the stores. All these measures have to be taken quickly, since Aryan employees are concerned everywhere. I'd like to say right now that Aryan employees shall have to be given employment immediately after the Jewish factory is closed. Considering the amount of labor we need these days, it should be a trifle to keep these people, even in their own branches. As I have just said; if the factory is necessary, it will be aryanized. If there is no need for it, it being abandoned shall be part of the procedure of transforming establishments not essential, for our national welfare into one that is essential for it—a procedure that shall take place within the next few weeks. For it, I shall still need very much space and very many factories.

If such a factory is to be transformed or razed, the first thing to be done is check the equipment. The questions arising will be: Where can this equipment be used? Could it be used after the place is transformed? Where else might it be needed badly? Where could the machinery be set up again? It follows that aryanizing factories will be an even more difficult task than the aryanizing of stores.

Take now the larger factories which are run solely by a Jewish owner, without control by a Board of Directors; or take corporations where the Jews might be in the Supervisory Council or Board of Directors. There the solution is very simple: the factory can be compensated in the same manner as in the sale of stores and factories; that is, at a rate which we shall determine, and the trustee shall take over the Jew's interest as well as his shares, which he in turn may sell or transfer to the State, which will then dispose of them. So, if I have a big factory, which belonged to a Jew or a Jewish corporation, and the Jew leaves, perhaps with his sons who were employed there, the factory will still continue to operate. Maybe a director will have to be appointed because the Jew has run the factory himself. But otherwise, particularly if the maintenance of the establishment is very essential everything will run smoothly.

Everything is very simple. I now have his shares. I may give them to some Aryan or to another group or I may keep them. The State takes them over and offers them at the stock market, if they are acceptable there and if it so desires, or it makes use of them in some other way.

Now, I shall talk of the very big establishments, those in which the Jew is in the Board of Directors, in which he holds shares etc., and so is either the owner or one of the coowners; in any case in which he is greatly interested. There too, things are comparatively simple; he delivers all of his shares which shall be bought at a price fixed by the trustee. So the Jew gets into the account book. The shares shall be handled like I've just explained. These cases cannot be taken care of by the Gaue and Reichsstatthalter, but only by us here on top; because we are the only ones to decide where these factories are to be transferred to, how they may be affiliated with other establishments or to what an extent the State shall keep them or hand them over to another establishment belonging to the State. All this can only be decided here. Of course, the Gauleiter and Statthalter will be glad to get hold of the shares, and they'll make great promises to beautify our capital cities, etc. I know it all! It won't go! We must agree on a clear action that shall be profitable to the Reich.

The same procedure shall be applied where the Jew has a share in, or owns property of German economy. I am not competent enough to tell off hand in what forms that might be the case, and to what an extent he'll have to lose it. Anyway, the Jew must be evicted pretty fast from German economy.

Now, the foreign Jews. There we'll have to make distinctions between the Jews who have always been foreigners—and who shall have to be treated according to the laws we arranged with their respective countries. But regarding those Jews who were Germans, have always lived in Germany and have acquired foreign citizenship during the last year, only because they wanted to play safe. I ask you not to give them any consideration. We'll finish with these. Or have you any misgivings? We shall try to induce them through slight, and then through stronger pressure, and through clever maneuvering—to let themselves be pushed out voluntarily.

Woermann: I'd like the Foreign Office to be included, since a generally valid decision could hardly be made.

Goering: We cannot consult you in every case, but on the whole we will.

Woermann: Anyway, I'd like to make known the claim of the Foreign Office to participate. One never knows what steps may become necessary.

Goering: Only for important cases! I do not like to take this category under special consideration. I have learned only now to what extent that has been done, particularly in Austria and Czechoslovakia. If somebody was a Czech in Sudetenland, we do not have to consider him at all, and the Foreign Office doesn't have to be consulted because that person now belongs to us. And in Austria and also in Sudetenland, too many become all of a sudden Englishmen or Americans or what-not—and speaking we cannot consider that a great deal. Generally

[Part II is missing]

Part III

Funk: That is quite a decisive question for us: should the Jewish stores be reopened?

Goebbels: If they will be reopened is another question. The question is will they be restored? I have set the deadline for Monday.

Goering: You don't have to ask whether they'll be reopened. That is up to us to decide.

Goebbels: Number 2. In almost all German cities synagogues are burned. New, various possibilities exist to utilize the space where the synagogues stood. Some cities want to build parks in their place, others want to put up new buildings.

Goering: How many synagogues were actually burned?

Heydrich: Altogether there are 101 synagogues destroyed by fire; 76 synagogues demolished; and 7,500 stores ruined in the Reich.

Goering: What do you mean “destroyed by fire?”

Heydrich: Partly, they are razed, and partly gutted.

Goebbels: I am of the opinion that this is our chance to dissolve the synagogues. All these not completely intact, shall be razed by the Jews. The Jews shall pay for it. There in Berlin, the Jews are ready to do that. The synagogues which burned in Berlin are being leveled by the Jews themselves. We shall build parking lots in their places or new buildings. That ought to be the criterion for the whole country, the Jews shall have to remove the damaged or burned synagogues, and shall have to provide us with ready free space.

Number 3: I deem it necessary to issue a decree forbidding the Jews to enter German theaters, moving houses, and circuses. I have already issued such a decree under the authority of the law of the chamber for culture. Considering the present situation of the theaters, I believe we can afford that. Our theaters are overcrowded, we have hardly any room. I am of the opinion that it is not possible to have Jews sitting next to Germans in movies and theaters. One might consider, later on, to let the Jews have one or two movie houses here in Berlin, where they may see Jewish movies. But in German theaters they have no business anymore.

Furthermore, I advocate that the Jews be eliminated from all positions in public life in which they may prove to be provocative. It is still possible today that a Jew shares a compartment in a sleeping car with a German. Therefore, we need a decree by the Reich Ministry for Communications stating that separate compartments for Jews shall be available; in case where compartments are filled up, Jews cannot claim a seat. They shall be given a separate compartment only after all Germans have secured seats. They shall not mix with Germans, and if there is no more room, they shall have to stand in the corridor.

Goering: In that case, I think it would make more sense to give them separate compartments.

Goebbels: Not if the train is overcrowded!

Goering: Just a moment. There'll be only one Jewish coach. If that is filled up, the other Jews will have to stay at home.

Goebbels: Suppose, though, there won't be many Jews going on the express train to Munich, suppose there would be two Jews in the train and the other compartments would be overcrowded. These two Jews would then have a compartment all themselves. Therefore, Jews may claim a seat only after all Germans have secured a seat.

Goering: I'd give the Jews one coach or one compartment. And should a case like you mention arise and the train be overcrowded, believe me, we won't need a law. We'll kick him out and he'll have to sit all alone in the toilet all the way!

Goebbels: I don't agree. I don't believe in this. There ought to be a law. Furthermore, there ought to be a decree barring Jews from German beaches and resorts. Last summer * * *

Goering: Particularly here in the Admiralspalast very disgusting things have happened lately.

Goebbels: Also at the Wannsee beach. A law which definitely forbids the Jews to visit German resorts!

Goering: We could give them their own.

Goebbels: It would have to be considered whether we'd give them their own or whether we should turn a few German resorts over to them, but not the finest and best, so we cannot say the Jews go there for recreation.

It'll also have to be considered if it might not become necessary to forbid the Jews to enter the German forests. In the Grunewald, whole herds of them are running around. It is a constant provocation and we are having incidents all the time. The behavior of the Jews is so inciting and provocative that brawls are a daily routine.

Goering: We shall give the Jews a certain part of the forest, and the Alpers shall take care of it that various animals that look damned much like Jews,—the Elk has such a crooked nose,—get there also and become acclimated.

Goebbels: I think this behavior is provocative. Furthermore, Jews should not be allowed to sit around in German parks. I am thinking of the whispering campaign on the part of Jewish women in the public gardens at Fehrbelliner Platz. They go and sit with German mothers and their children and begin to gossip and incite.

Goebbels: I see in this a particularly grave danger. I think it is imperative to give the Jews certain public parks, not the best ones—and tell them: “You may sit on these benches” these benches shall be marked “For Jews only.” Besides that they have no business in German parks. Furthermore, Jewish children are still allowed in German schools. That’s impossible. It is out of the question that any boy should sit beside a Jewish boy in a German gymnasium and receive lessons in German history. Jews ought to be eliminated completely from German schools; they may take care of their own education in their own communities.

Goering: I suggest that Mr. Hilgard from the insurance company be called in; he is waiting outside. As soon as he’ll be finished with his report, he may go, and we can continue to talk. At the time Gustloff died, a compensation for the damage Germany had suffered, was prepared. But I believe that at present we should not work it through raised taxes but with a contribution paid only once. That serves my purpose, better.

(Hilgard appears)

Mr. Hilgard, the following is our case. Because of the justified anger of the people against the Jew, the Reich has suffered a certain amount of damage. Windows were broken, goods were damaged and people hurt, synagogues burned, etc. I suppose that the Jews, many of them are also insured against damage committed by public disorder, etc.

(Hilgard: “Yes”)

If that is so, the following situation arises; the people, in their justified anger, meant to harm the Jew; but it is the German insurance companies that will compensate the Jew for damage. This situation is simple enough; I’d only have to issue a decree to that effect that damage, resulting from these risks, shall not have to be paid by the insurance companies. But the question that interests me primarily, and because of which I have asked you to come here, is this one: In case of reinsurance policies in foreign countries, I should not like to lose these, and that is why I’d like to discuss with you ways and means by which profit from reinsurance, possibly in foreign currency will go to the German economy, instead of the Jew. I’d like to hear from you, and that is the first question I want to ask: In your opinion, are the Jews insured against such damage to a large extent?

Hilgard: Permit me to answer right away. We are concerned with three kinds of insurances. Not with the insurance against damage resulting from revolt or from risks. But with the ordinary fire insurance, the ordinary glass insurance, and the ordinary insurance against theft. The people, because of their contracts, who have a right to claim compensation are partly Jews, partly Aryans. As for the fire insurance, they are practically all Jewish, I suppose. As for the department stores, the victim is identical with the Jew, the owner and that applies more to the synagogues, except for neighbors to whose places the fire may have spread. Although the damage done to the latter’s property seems to be rather slight, according to the inquiries I made late last night. As for the glass insurance which plays a very important part in this, the situation is completely different. The majority of the victims, mostly the owners of the buildings are Aryans. The Jew has usually rented the store, a procedure which you may observe all over, for example on Kurfuerstendamm.

Goering: That is what we’ve said.

Goebbels: In these cases, the Jew will have to pay.

Goering: It doesn’t make sense, we have no raw materials. It is all glass imported from foreign countries and has to be paid for in foreign currency! One could go nuts.

Hilgard: May I draw your attention to the following facts: the glass for the shop windows is not being manufactured by the Bohemian, but by the Belgian glass industry. In my estimation, the approximate money-value to which these damages amount is $6,000,000—that includes the broken glass, glass which we shall have to replace, mainly to Aryans because they have the insurance policies. Of course I have to reserve final judgment in all this, Your Excellency, because I have had only one day to make my inquiries. Even counting on about half of the $6,000,000 being spent in transacting the business-specialists from the industry itself are more confident in this matter than I am, we might well have to import glass for approximately $3,000,000. Incidentally, the amount of the damage equals about half a whole year’s production of the Belgian glass industry. We believe that half a year will be necessary for the manufacturers to deliver the glass. Goering: The people will have to be enlightened on this Goebbels: We cannot do this right now.

Goering: This cannot continue! We won’t be able to last with all this. Impossible! Go on then! You suggest that the Aryan is the one who suffers the damage; is that right?

Hilgard: Yes, to a large extent, as far as the glass insurance goes.

Goering: Which would have to replace the glass.

Hilgard: Yes. Of course there are cases in which the Aryan, the owner of the store is identical with the owner of the building. That is so with all department stores. In the case of the department store Israel, the owner is the Jew.

Goering: And now the third category.

Hilgard: Under this fall the victims of thievery.

Goering: I have to ask you a question. When all kinds of goods were taken from the stores and burned in the streets, would that also be thievery?

Hilgard: I don't think so.

Goering: Could that be termed as “Riot”?

Hilgard: That is just the question which we are unable to decide at this moment. Is it ordinary theft if entry into a dwelling or a container of any kind is forced and something is taken away?

Goering: That is a case of “Riot.”

Hilgard: Riot does not mean much since we have very little insurance against damage caused by riots—these were discarded by us long ago.

Goering: But this here is “Rioting.” That is the legal term. There was no theft, and no individual broke into any place. But a mob rushes in and knocks everything to pieces, or “Public Disturbances.”

Hilgard: Public disturbance. It is no riot.

Goering: Are they insured against damages caused by public disturbances?

Hilgard: No, no more. May I show this by an example. The most remarkable of these cases is the case Margraf Unter Den Linden. The Jewelry store of Margraf, is insured with us through a so-called combined policy. That covers practically any damage that may occur. This damage was reported to us as amounting to $1,700,000 because the store was completely stripped.

Goering: Daluege and Heydrich, you'll have to get me this jewelry through raids, staged on a tremendous scale!

Daluege: The order has already been given. The people are being controlled all the time. According to reports, 150 were arrested by yesterday afternoon.

Goering: These things will otherwise be hidden. If somebody comes to a store with jewels and claims that he has bought them, they'll be confiscated at once. He has stolen them or traded them in all right.

Heydrich: Besides that, looting was going on in the Reich in more than 800 cases, contrary to what we supposed; but we have already several hundred people who were plundering, and we are trying to get the loot back.

Goering: And the jewels?

Heydrich: That is very difficult to say. They were partly thrown into the street and picked up there. Similar things happened with furriers, for example, in Friedrichstrasse, district C, there the crowd was naturally rushing to pick up minks, skunks, etc. It'll be very difficult to recover that. Even children have filled their pockets, just for fun. It is suggested that the Hitler Youth is not to be employed and to participate in such actions without the Party's consent. Such things are very easily destroyed.

Daluege: The Party should issue an order to the effect that the police will immediately receive a report in case the neighbor's wife, (everybody knows his neighbor) has a fur coat altered or in case somebody appears wearing new rings or bracelets. We'd like the Party to support us here.

Hilgard: These damages are not covered by the policy, I believe. May I say a word in general about our liabilities and a “Petidum” of the Versicherungswirtschaft report. We'd like to make it our point, Mr. General Field Marshall, that we shall not be hindered in fulfilling the obligations for which our contracts call.

Goering: But I have to. That is important for me.

Hilgard: If I may give reasons for this request, I'd like to say that it simply has to do with the fact that we carry out, to a large extent, quite a number of international transactions. We have a very good international basis for our business transactions, and in the interest of the equilibrium of the Foreign exchange in Germany, we have to make sure that the confidence in the German insurance shall not be ruined. If we now refuse to honor clearcut obligations, imposed upon us through lawful contract, it would be a black spot on the shield of honor of the German insurance.

Goering: It wouldn't the minute I issue a decree—a law sanctioned by the State.

Hilgard: I was leading up to that.

Heydrich: The insurance may be granted, but as soon as it is to be paid, it'll be confiscated. That way we'll have saved face.

Hilgard: I am inclined to agree with what General Heydrich has just said. First of all, use the mechanism of the insurance company to check on the damage, to regulate it and even pay, but give the insurance company the chance to * * * Goering: One moment! You'll have to pay in any case because it is the Germans who suffered the damage. But there'll be a lawful order forbidding you to make any direct payments to the Jews. You shall also have to make payment for the damage the Jews have suffered, but not to the Jews, but to the Minister of Finance.

(Hilgard: Aha!)

What he does with the money is his business.

Schmer: Your Excellency, I should like to make a proposal. A certain rate should be fixed, say 15% or maybe a little higher, of all the registered wealth, I understand one billion is to be confiscated so that all Jews shall pay equally, and from the money raised this way, the insurance companies shall be refunded.

Goering: No. I don't even dream of refunding the insurance companies the money. The companies are liable. No, the money belongs to the State. That's quite clear. That would indeed be a present for the insurance companies. You make a wonderful Petidum there. You'll fulfill your obligations, you may count on that.

Kerl: It seems that in one respect, we'll have to arrange this somewhat differently. As far as the glass insurance goes, the fact of the matter is that the owners of the buildings will definitely have to be paid for the damage, as stipulated. The majority of these companies, with the exception of one Joint Stock Company in Cologne, are all very small reciprocity companies [Gegenseitsvereine]. They won't be able to make up for the damage. We'll have to find out how far they are covered by reinsurance which I cannot tell at the moment.

Hilgard: In this connection, the reinsurance plays a relatively small role, except for the large fire-insurance policies taken out by department stores. There is not reinsurance in the glass insurances, for the simple reason that, under normal conditions glass insurance is one of our best branches in the insurance business; and therefore does not need reinsurance. I have to add, though, that the amount of this damage is approximately twice as high as the amount of damage for an average year. It makes all our calculations wrong and completely wipes out our chance for profit.

(Interrupted by Kerl)

No, sir, that is the way it is. The whole premium of the German glass insurance amounts to $14,000,000, if I am not wrong. Under normal conditions it amounted to 4 or 5 million. The glass insurance is our greatest asset. So far, the greatest profits were made in it. But now, the amount of this damage is alone twice as high as the amount for one ordinary year. With the various special glass insurances, it is altogether different.

Goering: One moment! 4 to 5 millions normally. Twice as much would be about 10 million. You suggested 14 million. There are still 4 million left.

Hilgard: We'll also have to pay for the expenses. No, it is a very great catastrophe for us. Let me point out that the damage in the whole of Germany, in my estimation, shall amount to approximately 25 million mark. I wanted to be careful.

Heydrich: We estimate that the damage to property, to furniture and to consumer-goods amounts to several hundred million; although that includes the damage the Reich shall suffer from loss of taxes—sales taxes, taxes on property, and on income. I assume that the Minister for Finance too, has been informed of all this.

V. Krosigk: I have no idea about the extent.

Heydrich: 7,500 destroyed stores in the Reich.

Daluege: One more question ought to be cleared up. Most of the goods in the stores were not the property of the owner but were kept on the books of other firms, which had delivered them. Then there are the unpaid for deliveries by other firms, which definitely are not all Jewish but Aryan, those goods that were delivered on the basis of commission.

Hilgard: We'll have to pay for them, too.

Goering: I wished you had killed 200 Jews, and not destroyed such values.

Heydrich: There were 35 killed.

Kerl: I think we could do the following: Jews we don't pay anyhow. As for Aryans, payment shall have to be made. The insurance company may contact us through the “Reichsgruppe” and we shall investigate each case. I am thinking of the small reciprocity companies; it should be easy to find out whether they are capable of paying or not. In their cases, the amounts involved are not too large. We may find an arrangement for this later on; I am thinking of one in which the insurance companies arrange for recompensation exclusively to Aryan, and once they know the results of their inquiries, contact us. We shall then find a way out for these small companies. Of course only in cases where it is absolutely necessary.

Funk: That is not necessary. I'd like to refer to what I've said before about the decree. That seems to be the easiest solution.

Goering: We cannot do that. These people make a point of their ability to pay.

Funk: If the Jews pay for it, the insurance companies don't have to pay.

Goering: Right, well, gentlemen, this is all very clear. We'll stick to it. At this moment every insurance company, except Mr. Hilgard who is here, counts on having to pay for the damage. They want to pay too, and I understand this very well. They'll have to want that, so they cannot be reproached for not being secure enough to pay. The glass insurance, and a point was made of that, has brought the highest profits so far. That means they'd have enough surplus money, and if they haven't divided it all up in dividends, they'll have savings enough for the compensation. Such an insurance company will have to be in a position to pay for a damage of 10, 12, 15 million, that is three times the amount paid in the normal year. If they are unable to do that, then we’ll have to wonder whether we should let small companies live at all. It would be insane to keep insurance companies which would be unable to pay for such a damage. To permit an insurance company like that to exist would simply mean to cheat the people. I suggest now the following. The damage shall be determined in each case. And for the time being, the insurance companies shall have to honor their contract in every respect and shall have to pay.

[Part IV is missing]

Part V

Goering: Now for the damage the Jew has had. At Margraf’s the jewels disappeared, etc. Well, they are gone, and he won’t get them refunded. He is the one who has to suffer the damage. As far as the jewels may be returned again by the police, they belong to the State. Now for the consumer foods which were thrown into the street, stolen, or burned. There too, the Jew will be the one who has the damage.

As for the goods that were kept on the basis of commissions, the Jew shall have to make good for the damage.

Goebbels: That doesn’t have to be put in the decree, though. This decree is quite sufficient the way it is.

Hilgard: I wonder to what an extent insurance companies in foreign countries might be involved in this.

Goering: Well, they’ll have to pay. And we’ll confiscate that.

Hilgard: As for this merchandise sold on the basis of commissions, I can imagine that the American supplier of fur coats, shipping them from England or from America would in many cases insure it with English or American insurance companies!

Goering: Then they’ll pay him for the damage. The question merely is the following: do you think there are reinsurances for all this damage in foreign countries?

Hilgard: Very few, amounting to very little.

Goering: Of course, the Aryan cannot report any damage because he hasn’t had any. The Jew will make good.

The Jew shall have to report the damage. He’ll get the refund from the insurance company but the refund will be confiscated. After it’s all said and done, there will remain some profit for the insurance companies since they can’t have to make good for all the damage. Mr. Hilgard, you may enjoy yourself.

Hilgard: I have no reason for that—the fact that we won’t have to pay for all the damage is called profit!

Goering: Just a moment! If you are compelled under the law to pay 5 million and all of a sudden there appears an angel in my somewhat corpulent form before you, and tells you: you may keep 1 million—why, cannot that be called making a profit? I should actually split with you, or whatever you’d call it. I can see it, looking at you. Your whole body grins. You made a big profit.

(Remark: Let’s initiate a tax for damages, resulting from public disturbance, to be paid by the insurance companies)

Hilgard: For me it goes without saying that the honorable German merchant cannot be the one who suffers. I have discussed this matter with the enterprises and I have spoken for it that the Aryan must not be the one who has the damage. But it is decidedly he who has it, because all the insurance companies, not one insurance company, are the ones that shall have to pay higher rates and at the same time shall receive lower dividends. Therefore, all the insurance companies are the losers. That is so, and that’ll remain so, and nobody can tell me differently.

Goering: Then why don’t you take care of it that a few windows less are being smashed! You belong to the people too! Send your representatives out. Let them instruct the people. If there should be any more questions speak to Mr. Lange.

(Reichsgruppenleiter Hilgard leaves the meeting)

* * * *

Funk: The decisive question is: Are the Jewish stores to be reopened or not?

Goering: That depends on how big a turnover these Jewish stores have. If it is big, it is an indication that the German people are compelled to buy there, in spite of its being a Jewish store, because a need exists. If we’d close all Jewish stores which are not open right now, altogether before Christmas, we’d be in a nice mess.

Fishboeck: Your Excellency, in this matter we have already a very complete plan for Austria. There are 12,000 Jewish artisan and 5,000 Jewish retail shops in Vienna. Before the National Revolution, we had already a definite plan for tradesmen, regarding this total of 17,000 stores. Of the shops of the 12,000 artisans, about 10,000 were to be closed definitely and 2,000 were to be kept open. 4,000 of the 5,000 retail stores should be closed and 1,000 should be kept open, that is, were to be aryanized. According to this plan, between 3,000 and 3,500 of the total of 17,000 stores would be kept open, all others closed. This was decided following investigations in every single branch and according to local needs, in agreement with all competent authorities, and is ready for publication as soon as we shall receive the law which we requested in September; this law shall empower us to withdraw licenses from artisans, quite independently from the Jewish question.

Goering: I shall have this decree issued today.

* * * *

Fischboeck: Out of 17,000 stores 12,000 or 14,000 would be shut down and the remainder aryanized or handed over to the bureau of trustees which is operated by the State.

Goering: I have to say that this proposal is grand. This way, the whole affair would be wound up in Vienna, one of the Jewish capitals, so to speak, by Christmas or by the end of the year.

Funk: We can do the same thing over here. I have prepared a law elaborating that, effective 1 January 1939, Jews shall be prohibited to operate retail stores and wholesale establishments as well as independent artisan shops. They shall be further prohibited from keeping employees or offer any ready products on the market. Wherever a Jewish shop is operated, the police shall shut it down. From 1 January 1939, a Jew can no longer be employed as an enterpriser as stipulated in the law for the Organization of National Labor from 20 January 1934. If a Jew holds a leading position in an establishment without being the enterpriser, his contract may be declared void within 6 weeks by the enterpriser. With the expiration of the contract all claims of the employee, including all claims to maintenance, become obliterated. That is always very disagreeable and a great danger. A Jew cannot be a member of a corporation; Jewish members of corporations shall have to be retired by 31 December 1938. A special authorization is unnecessary. The competent Ministers of the Reich are being authorized to issue the provision necessary for the execution of this law.

Goering: I believe that we can agree with this law.

(Remark : Yes)

* * * *

Fischboeck: . . . I'd like to make a few more remarks. What we are very much concerned with, is the situation regarding the Jewish apartment houses which contribute a large percentage of Jewish wealth. Surprisingly enough, the Jewish national wealth in Austria is reported to amount to 320 million marks only; the value of the apartment houses alone amounts to 500 million. We should appreciate it very much if the regulation which makes it possible to requisition Jewish property would be made to be valid also for the apartment buildings; thus we would be enabled to have these houses administered by a board of trustees and to give the Jews the right to have a claim on the debit ledger of the Reich.

* * * *

Fischboeck: I should also like to have a decision made on the following question. In Austria, individuals, not institutions, owe the Jews 184 billion Reichsmarks. This way the Jews certainly have invested money in a way we don't like. That is money which they have loaned out to other Jews, oftener enough to an Aryan. This way, a dependency of the Aryan artisan from the Jewish creditor is created which we do not want. Now the question arises, and I would answer yes. Should trustees not be created to administer these debts and then pay with claims on the debit-ledger, according to demand coming in. The goal of this procedure would be to make the debtor independent from the Jewish creditor, to insert Aryan trusteeship and pay the Jew, as far as his demands could actually be met. Therefore it does not have to be paid. So we should have to insert trusteeship in this case also, but the difference to that in the case of the bonds would be that we won't simply pay but leave the decision for payment up to the trusteeship.

Funk: If word of this debate should reach the public, we'd have a run on the capital market tomorrow.

Fischboeck: That's why we have postponed these ideas all the time. We have examples for it that the Jews have sold, head over heel, bonds of internal loans, shares and everything they had.

Goering: I could stop that with a single decree, ordering the immediate stoppage of traffic of Jewish capital. He is punishable who buys from Jews, and his purchase shall be confiscated. I would not do it any other way.

[Part VI is missing]

Part VII

* * * *

Heydrich: In spite of the elimination of the Jew from the economic life, the main problem, namely to kick the Jew out of Germany, remains. May I make a few proposals to that effect?

Following a suggestion by the Commissioner of the Reich, we have set up a center for the Emigration of Jews in Vienna, and that way we have eliminated 50,000 Jews from Austria while from the Reich only 19,000 Jews were eliminated during the same period of time; we were so successful because of the cooperation on the part of the competent Ministry for Economic Affairs and of the foreign charitable organizations.

Goering: The main thing is, you cooperated with the local leaders of the “Green Frontier.”

Heydrich: That amounted to a very small number, your excellency. Illegal * * * Goering: This story has gone through the whole world press. During the first night the Jews were expelled into Czechoslovakia. The next morning, the Czechs grabbed them and pushed them into Hungary. From Hungary, they were returned to Germany and from there into Czechoslovakia. They traveled around and around that way. They landed finally on an old Barge in the Danube. There they lived, and wherever they tried to go ashore, they were barred.

Heydrich: That was the report. There weren’t even 100 Jews.

Goering: For practically two weeks, a number of Jews left every midnight. That was in the Burgenland.

Heydrich: At least 45,000 Jews were made to leave the country by legal measures.

Goering: How was that possible?

Heydrich: Through the Jewish Kulturgemeinde, we extracted a certain amount of money from the rich Jews who wanted to emigrate. By paying this amount, and an additional sum in foreign currency, they made it possible for a number of poor Jews to leave. The problem was not to make the rich Jew leave but to get rid of the Jewish mob.

Goering: But children, did you ever think this through? It doesn’t help us to extract hundreds of thousands from the Jewish mob. Have you ever thought of it that this procedure may cost us so much foreign currency that in the end we won’t be able to hold out.

Heydrich: Only what the Jew has had in foreign currency.

(Goering: agreed)

This way. May I propose that we set up a similar procedure for the Reich, with the cooperation of the competent government agencies, and that we then find a solution for the Reich, based on our experiences, after having corrected the mistakes, the General Field Marshall has so rightly pointed out to us.

(Goering: agreed)

As another means of getting the Jews out, measures for Emigration ought to be taken in the rest of the Reich for the next

8 to 10 years. The highest number of Jews we can possibly get out during one year is 8,000 to 10,000. Therefore, a great number of Jews will remain. Because of the aryanizing and other restrictions, Jewry will become unemployed. The remaining Jews gradually become proletarians. Therefore, I shall have to take steps to isolate the Jew so he won’t enter into the German normal routine of life. On the other hand, I shall have to restrict the Jew to a small circle of consumers, but I shall have to permit certain activities within professions; lawyers, doctors, barbers, etc. This question shall also have to be examined. As for the isolation, I’d like to make a few proposals regarding police measures which are important also because of their psychological effect on public opinion. For example, who is Jewish according to the Nurnberg laws shall have to wear a certain insignia. That is a possibility which shall facilitate many other things. I don’t see any danger of excuses, and it shall make our relationship with the foreign Jew easier.

Goering: A uniform?

Heydrich: An insignia. This way we could also put an end to it that the foreign Jews who don’t look different from ours, are being molested.

Goering: But, my dear Heydrich, you won’t be able to avoid the creation of ghettos on a very large scale, in all the cities. They shall have to be created.

Heydrich: As for the question of ghettos, I’d like to make my position clear right away. From the point of view of the police, I don’t think a ghetto in the form of completely segregated districts where only Jews would live, can be put up. We could not control a ghetto where the Jews congregate amidst the whole Jewish people. It would remain the permanent hideout for criminals and also for epidemics and the like. We don’t want to let the Jew live in the same house with the German population; but today the German population, their blocks or houses, force the Jew to behave himself. The control of the Jew through the watchful eye of the whole population is better than having him by the thousands in a district where I cannot properly establish a control over his daily life through uniformed agents.

Goering: We’d only have to forbid long-distance calls.

Heydrich: Still I could not completely stop the Jews from communicating out of their districts.

Goering: And in towns all of their own?

Heydrich: If I could put them into towns entirely their own, yes. But then these towns would be such a heaven for criminals of all sorts that they would be a terrific danger. I’d take different steps. I’d restrict the movement of the Jews and would say; in Munich, the governmental district and the district * * *

Goering: Wait a minute! I don't care so much for it that the Jews don't appear in spots where I don't want them. My point is this one; if one Jew won't have any more work, he'll have to live modestly. He won't be able to go far on his 31/2%—to restaurants, etc. He'll have to work more. That'll bring about a concentration of Jewry which may even facilitate control. You will know that in a particular house only Jews are living. We shall also have concentrated Jewish butchers, barbers, grocers, etc., in certain streets. The question is of course whether we want to go on tolerating that. If not, the Jew shall have to buy from the Aryan.

Heydrich: No, I'd say that for the necessities in daily life, the German won't serve the Jew anymore.

Goering: One moment. You cannot let him starve. But there'll be the following difficulty. If you say that the Jews will be able to have so and so many retail stores, then they'll again be in business, and they'll continually have to sell for the wholesaler.

Schmer: In a small town that wouldn't work at all.

Goering: It could only be worked out if you'd reserve in advance whole districts or whole towns for the Jews. Otherwise, you'll have to have only Germans do business, and the Jew shall have to buy from them. You cannot set up a Jewish barbershop. The Jew will have to buy food and stockings.

Heydrich: We'll have to decide whether we want that or not.

Goering: I'd like to make a decision on that right now. We cannot make another subdivision here. We cannot argue: so and so many stores will remain for the Jew because then again no control will be possible since these stores in turn would have to work with wholesale stores. I'd say, all stores should be Aryan stores, and the Jew may buy there. One may go one step further and say that these and these stores will probably be frequented mostly by Jews. You may set up certain barbershops operated by Jews. You may make concessions in order to channel certain professions into certain streets for certain tasks. But not stores.

Heydrich: What about the ghetto? Would the Jew have to go to an Aryan district to buy.

Goering: No. I'd say that enough German storekeepers would love to dwell in the ghetto if they could do some business there. I wouldn't alter the principle that the Jew shall have no more say in German economy.

Heydrich: I shouldn't like to comment on that. Now a few things which are important also from a psychological angle.

Goering: Once we'd have a ghetto, we'd find out what stores ought to be in there, and we'd be able to say; you, the Jew so and so, together with so and so, shall take care of the delivery of goods. And a German wholesale firm will be ordered to deliver the goods for this Jewish store. This store would then not be a retail shop but a cooperative store, a cooperative one for Jews.

Heydrich: All these measures would eventually lead to the institution of the ghetto. I'd say one shouldn't want to build a ghetto. But these measures, if carried through as outlined here, shall automatically drive the Jews into a ghetto.

Funk: The Jews will have to move quite close together. What are 3 million? Everyone will have to stand up for the next fellow. The individual alone will starve.

Goering: Now, as to what Minister Goebbels has said before, namely compulsory renting. Now, the Jewish tenants will be together.

Heydrich: As an additional measure, I'd propose to withdraw from the Jews all personal papers such as permits and drivers licenses. No Jew should be allowed to own a car, neither should he be permitted to drive because that way he'd endanger German life. By not being permitted to live in certain districts, he should be furthermore restricted to move about so freely. I'd say the Royal Square in Munich, the Reichsweihestatte, is not to be entered any more within a certain radius by Jews. The same would go for establishments of culture, border fences, military installations. Furthermore, like Minister Dr. Goebbels has said before, exclusion of the Jews from public theaters, movie houses, etc. As for cultural activities, I'd like to say this; cultural activities in holiday resorts may be considered an additional feature, not absolutely necessary for the individual. Many German Volksgenossen are unable to improve their health through a stay at a resort town. I don't see why the Jew should go to these places at all.

Goering: To health spas, no.

Heydrich: Well, then I'd like to propose the same thing for hospitals. A Jew shall not lie in a hospital together with Aryan Volkgenossen.

Goering: We'll have to manage that gradually.

Heydrich: The same applies to public conveyances.

Goering: Are there no Jewish Sanatoriums and Jewish hospitals?

(Remarks—Yes!)

We'll have to finagle all this. These things will have to be straightened out one right after another.

Heydrich: I only meant to secure your approval in principle so that we may start out on all this.

Goering: One more question, gentlemen: What would you think the situation would be if I'd announce today that Jewry should have to contribute this 1 billion as a punishment?

Buerckel: The Viennese would agree to this wholeheartedly.

* * *

V. Krosigk: . . . I don't imagine the prospect of the ghetto is very nice. The idea of the ghetto is not a very agreeable one. Therefore, the goal must be, like Heydrich said, to move out whatever we can!

Goering: The second point is this. If, in the near future, the German Reich should come into conflict with foreign powers, it goes without saying that we in Germany should first of all let it come to a showdown with the Jews. Besides that, the Fuehrer shall now make an attempt with those foreign powers which have brought the Jewish question up, in order to solve the Madagascar project. He has explained it all to me on 9 November. There is no other way. He'll tell the other countries. "What are you talking about the Jew for?—Take him!" Another proposal may be made. The Jews, gotten rid of may buy territory for their "coreligionists" in North America, Canada, or elsewhere.

I wish to summarize: The Minister of Economic Affairs shall direct the committee and he shall in one form or another, take all steps necessary within the next few days.

Blerning: I fear that during the next few days, beginning Monday, the Jews will start to sell bonds on internal loans for hundreds of thousands, in order to provide themselves with means. Since we control the course of the internal loan in order to sell more bonds, the Reich-Treasury, Loan-Committee or the Reich Minister for Finance should have to back this internal loan.

Goering: In what way could the Jew bring his bonds on the market?

(Remark: "Sell them")

To whom? (Remark: "on the stock market—he orders a bank to do it.") Well, I'll prohibit selling internal loan bonds for three days.

Blerning: That could be done only through a decree.

Goering: I can't see any advantage for the Jew. He won't know himself how and he'll have to pay. On the contrary, I believe he won't move.

Goebbels: For the time being he is small and ugly and stays at home.

Goering: I don't think it would be logical. Otherwise we'll have to do it. The reason why I want this decree in a hurry is that for the time being we have peace but who can guarantee that there won't be new trouble by Saturday or Sunday. Once and for all I want to eliminate individual acts. The Reich has taken the affairs in its own hand. The Jew can only sell. He can't do a thing. He'll have to pay. At this moment, the individual Jew won't think of throwing anything on the market. There'll be some chatter first, and then they will begin to run to us. They'll look for those great Aryans with whom, they'll think they may have some luck, the so-called various mail-boxes of the Reich with whom they can lodge their protests. These people will run my door in. All that takes some time, and by then we'll be ready.

Daluege: May we issue the order for confiscating the cars?

Goering: Also the Ministry of the Interior and the Police will have to think over, what measures will have to be taken. I thank you.

[Conference closed at 2.40 PM]

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 425–457, Doc. 1816-PS.

87. KRISTALLNACHT: CONDITIONS IN THE STUTTGART CONSULAR DISTRICT, NOVEMBER 15, 1938

Just five days after the destruction of Kristallnacht, the first mass government-organized violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria, this report was sent to George S. Messersmith, assistant secretary of state, in Washington, D.C., from the American Consulate in Stuttgart regarding the damage done to Jewish property and the harassment and abuse of individual Jews in the Stuttgart Consular District in southwest Germany. It references beatings, arrests, and destruction of home furnishings. It also describes Jews' access to non-Jewish doctors, which was prohibited unless it could be shown that no Jewish doctor was available. Automobiles owned by Jews were confiscated by the police. These various assaults were visited even upon Jews who had converted and been baptized as Christians. Despite the terror that ran rampant, this report notes that there were instances of non-Jews secretly helping their Jewish neighbors.

THE FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

American Consulate

Stuttgart, Germany, November 15, 1938.

Dear Mr. Messersmith:

Appreciating your keen interest in German matters I believe that you will wish to have a first-hand account of the reprisals which have been taken against the Jews in this section of Germany during the last few days. Therefore, I am enclosing for ready reference a copy of my report no. 307, of November 12, 1938, entitled "Anti-Semitic Persecution in the Stuttgart Consular District." After careful investigation and personal knowledge this report was very hurriedly written so that it could reach the Embassy at Berlin at the earliest practicable date. You may wish to have additional information on the subject.

Of all the places in this section of Germany, the Jews in Rastatt, which is situated near Baden-Baden, have apparently been subjected to the most ruthless treatment.

The Honorable

George S. Messersmith,
Assistant Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

Many Jews in this section were cruelly attacked and beaten and the furnishing of their homes almost totally destroyed. Practically all male Jews in that city were arrested and transported either to prisons or to concentration camps. Those that escaped arrest are hiding in the woods or have sought refuge with friends. Similar developments occurred in other places, and there were doubtless many outrages of which I have not yet heard. Even Jews directing charitable organizations were seriously molested, although it must have been apparent to the authorities that these Jews could have rendered much necessary relief had they been allowed to remain at liberty and retain the use of funds which were immediately confiscated. In the meantime, Aryan doctors in Stuttgart have been refusing to render medical aid to Jews greatly needing their services, unless evidence is furnished that no Jewish doctor is available. An old Jew living in Bad Cannstatt, a suburb of Stuttgart, suffered a heart collapse on Friday (November 11th) and, when a member of his family called a well-known heart specialist in Stuttgart, the latter is reported to have replied that "as long as there is a Jewish doctor still at liberty I cannot come." So far as I have been able to learn, all Jewish doctors in Stuttgart, except Dr. Einstein, a child specialist of over sixty-five years of age, have been arrested in spite of the overwhelming demand for medical treatment on account of ruthless action most apparently inspired by the German authorities.

All Jewish automobiles are systematically being confiscated. As a rule, two men in civilian clothes with police authority visit the homes of Jewish owners of automobiles and demand the keys of their garages and cars. Upon request receipts are usually given for the automobiles, and these receipts are signed "by the Criminal Police."

A few Aryan people have been arrested for giving too open expression to their disgust over the events of the last few days. Many persons secretly sympathizing with the Jews or discountenancing such ruthless treatment of helpless people are becoming more and more afraid to give expression to their feelings. However, I have heard of many instances where Aryans are rendering secret service to afflicted Jewish families and are even providing them with money and food.

Even consideration of religion has not prevented the arrest of persons of the Jewish race who were born and baptized as Christians. A typical example of this character is the arrest in Stuttgart of Dr. Gabriel, who until 1933 was the head of the Bureau of Academic Information at the University of Cologne. It is understood that Dr. Gabriel, who is said to have collaborated for some time with Professor Sprague of Columbia University, has been placed in a concentration camp at Welzheim, Württemberg.

So far as Stuttgart is concerned, I can state confidently that these so-called reprisals against the Jews were not a spontaneous movement originating from the people as a whole. In any event, the movement clearly seems to have been well organized and planned and carried out by persons having the confidence of the authorities. For instance, the fire brigade was stationed in the vicinity of the synagogue in Bad Cannstatt before the building was ever set on fire. Again, on Thursday morning (November 10th) while the demolition of Jewish shops was in full swing at Stuttgart, a new 12-cylinder Mercedes automobile carrying high S.S. officials drove up in front of the shops under devastation. These men made an inspection of what was going on, and apparently after giving their approval drove pompously away while the destruction continued.

Dr. Max Immanuel, a member of the board of the Berlin Credit Investment Company, who is said to have collaborated closely in the past with Herr Schacht, has informed me that all the interior furnishings of his sister's home in Nuremberg were completely destroyed. Nuremberg seems to have been the scene of much destruction and illtreatment.

Only yesterday (Sunday, the 13th of November) the wife of a prominent Jew in Nuremberg whom I have known well for several years, and who has been of much assistance to me in connection with certain reports, called at my home in the hope that I could render some assistance in obtaining the release of her husband who was arrested about 3.30 o'clock on the morning of November 10th. This lady told me that she had been awakened about 1 o'clock by rude knocking and ringing of her door bell. Men in S.A. uniform entered abruptly when the door was opened and immediately began to destroy the furnishings of the drawing room and dining room. Leather chairs were cut and stabbed with knives to such an extent that they are now practically worthless. China was thrown on the floor and broken. Not a piece of glassware was left unbroken in the apartment. When these men left, the interior of the building, except the bedrooms which they did not enter, were a mass of ruins.

This destruction did not satisfy the people responsible for it, for at approximately 4 A.M. two men dressed in civilian clothes and representing the police again called at her home and rudely demanded that her husband dress immediately. Her husband was placed under arrest and transported to prison. Although this lady is a person of some influence and has contact with the police at Nuremberg, she has not yet been able to ascertain to what prison or concentration camp her husband has been transported.

During the course of the day two people reported to me that the Jewish Old People's Home in Neustadt, Palatinate, had been burned to the ground and that about sixty inmates, all of whom were old people, and some of whom were ill and crippled and some just merely infirm from age, had been removed to the Jewish Old People's Home at Mannheim. There was really no accommodation for them in the latter institution and apparently they have been lying on the floor here and there in the building.

There are many similar stories, but I feel that you will be sufficiently informed to wish me now to turn to the immediate experiences which I have had during the past few days as the officer in charge of the Consulate at Stuttgart.

In a figurative sense, my home has been bombarded by visitors and telephone calls giving evidence of the distressing circumstances in which many people are finding themselves.

Hundreds are appealing for help and encouragement, and with husbands in concentration camps many are without funds. Late last night an American woman of over sixty years of age begged for assistance in ascertaining the whereabouts of her aged and sick husband who had been rounded up with the German Jews. I have strong hopes that he will be at her side again within a few hours. Many other Americans are appealing on behalf of their Jewish relatives.

The Consulate received almost one hundred telegrams yesterday and almost as many to-day. Many of these have been from the United States and have expressed the utmost interest in their relatives in Germany. In the majority of cases the male members of the families concerned were ascertained to be in concentration camps. Even up to this minute arrests have been made in Stuttgart and telegrams are constantly being received, although it is late at night.

For more than five days the office has been inundated with people. Each day a larger and larger crowd has besieged the Consulate, filling all the rooms and over-flowing into the corridor of a building six stories high. To-day there were several thousand. Each person has been handled with the greatest possible consideration and each person must have felt that he or she had been as courteously and sympathetically handled as the enormous crowd would permit.

The entire staff has responded most loyally and efficiently to the demands with which we have been faced. Of the officers, all of whom have worked well under trying conditions, I wish especially to mention, first, Consul L'Heureux, and secondly, Vice Consul Spalding. Of the clerks, Mr. Morton Bernath has been outstanding.

These situations are not entirely new to us at Stuttgart. While this one is on a much greater scale we have been experiencing similar but minor situations during the past three years, some of which appear retrospectively to have been much more difficult and to have required much more ingenuity. In reality, I have handled many protection cases, with the able assistance of Morton Bernath, which have involved arrests for political offences, exchange infractions, et cetera, and I am glad to report to you that we have been uniformly successful. At the present time matters involving the transfer of money on behalf of American citizens in the United States are proving unusually difficult features of our work on account of the attitude of the German Government. Only a few days ago, however, we were successful in prevailing upon the German Government to release its claim on the entire fortune of an aged Jewish woman of American nationality.

I trust that the foregoing description will, in addition to the political reports of this office, with which the Embassy

1180 Kristallnacht: Antisemitic Onslaught in Germany as Seen from Leipzig seems to be very pleased, give you a concrete idea of the situation which has been confronting us from time to time over the last three years, and will especially depict the conditions which are immediately confronting us.

Sincerely yours,

Enclosure:

Copy of report no. 307.

Source: State CDF 862.4016/2002: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

88. KRISTALLNACHT: ANTISEMITIC ONSLAUGHT IN GERMANY AS SEEN FROM LEIPZIG, NOVEMBER 21, 1938

This report was sent to George S. Messersmith, assistant secretary of state, in Washington, D.C., from the American Consulate in Leipzig, in east-central Germany. It details the events both before and during Kristallnacht, the first mass government-organized violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria. It describes the prelude to the violence of Kristallnacht as the gruesome commemoration on the night of November 9, 1938, of martyrs to the Nazi cause prior to Hitler's ascension to power in January 1933. The picture of exhumed corpses in extravagant coffins surrounded by flaming torches makes what happened in the early morning of November 10—the destruction of Kristallnacht—seem like a continuation, albeit on a much more violent level of the previous night's ceremony. The report makes clear that the destruction during the "spontaneous" eruption of anger was anything but spontaneous. It included destruction and looting of stores and Jewish houses, beatings and serious injuries to many Jews, and the bombing of synagogues. Desecration of Jewish graves and the arrest of Jewish males increased the level of turmoil such that many non-Jews were repelled by the actions, though unable or unwilling to protest what went on around them.

Voluntary; political

(Rubber Stamp)
ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE
JAN. 4, 1939
MR. MESSERSMITH

ANTISEMITIC ONSLAUGHT IN GERMANY AS SEEN FROM LEIPZIG

From: /s/ David H. Buffum
David H. Buffum,
American Consul

Date of Preparation: November 21, 1938

Date of Forwarding: To be carried to Berlin by trusted messenger as soon as practicable.

Approved: Ralph C. Busser,
Ralph C. Busser,
American Consul General.

The following resume of the anti-Semitic onslaught in Germany so far as this consular district is concerned, constitutes a narration of Leipzig angles as to this flagitious attack upon a helpless minority that very probably has had no counterpart in the course of the civilized world. The macabre circumstances that form the subject matter of this report had a fittingly gruesome prelude in Leipzig a few hours before they occurred in the form of rites held on one of the principal squares of the city on the night of November 9, 1938 in commemoration of fallen martyrs to the Nazi cause prior to the political take-over in 1933. To such end apparently anything in the corpse category that could be remotely associated with Nazi martyrdom, had been exhumed. At least five year old remains of those who had been considered rowdyish violators of law and order at the time, had been placed in extravagant coffins; arranged around a colossal, flaming urn on the Altermarkt for purposes of display, and ultimately conveyed amid marching troops, flaring torches and funeral music to the "Ehrenhain", Leipzig's National Socialistic burial plot. For this propagandistic ceremony the entire market place had been surrounded with wooden lattice work about ten yards high. This was covered with white cloth to form the background for black swastikas at least five yards high and broad. Flame-spurting urns and gigantic banners completed a Wagnerian ensemble as to pomposity of stage setting; but it can not be truthfully reported that the ceremony aroused anything akin to awe among the crowds who witnessed it. Judging from a few very guardedly whispered comments, the populace was far more concerned over the wanton waste of materials in these days when textiles of any kind are exceedingly scarce and expensive, rather than being actuated by any particularly reverent emotions. On the other hand for obvious reasons, there were no open manifestations of disapproval. The populace was destined to be much more perturbed the following morning during the course of the most violent debacle the city had probably ever witnessed.

The shattering of shop windows, looting of stores and dwellings of Jews which began in the early hours of November 10, 1938, was hailed subsequently in the Nazi press as "a spontaneous wave of righteous indignation throughout Germany, as a result of the cowardly Jewish murder of Third Secretary von Rath in the German Embassy at Paris." So far as a very high percentage of the German populace is concerned, a state of popular indignation that would spontaneously lead to such excesses, can be considered as nonexistent. On the contrary, in viewing the ruins and attendant measures employed, all of the local crowds observed were obviously benumbed over what had happened and aghast over the unprecedented fury of Nazi acts that had been or were taking place with bewildering rapidity throughout their city. The whole lamentable affair was organized in such a sinister fashion, as to lend credence to the theory that the execution of it had involved studied preparation. It has been ascertained by this office that the plan of "spontaneous indignation" leaked out in Leipzig several hours before news of the death of Third Secretary von Rath had been broadcasted at 10 P.M. November 10, 1938. It is stated upon authority believed to be reliable, that most of the evening was employed in drawing up lists of fated victims. Several persons known to this office were aware at 9 P.M. on the evening of November 9, 1938 that the "spontaneous" outrage was scheduled for that night sometime after midnight and several of such persons interviewed, stayed up purposely in order to witness it.

At 3 a.m. November 10, 1938 was unleashed a barrage of Nazi ferocity as had had no equal hitherto in Germany, or very likely anywhere else in the world since savagery, if ever. Jewish dwellings were smashed into and contents demolished or looted. In one of the Jewish sections an eighteen year old boy was hurled from a three story window to land with both legs broken on a street littered with burning beds and other household furniture and effects from his family's and other apartments. This information was supplied by an attending physician. It is reported from another quarter that among domestic effects thrown out of a Jewish dwelling, a small dog descended four flights to a broken spine on a cluttered street. Although apparently centered in poor districts, the raid was not confined to the humble classes. One apartment of exceptionally refined occupants known to this office, was violently ransacked, presumably in a search for valuables that was not in vain, and one of the marauders thrust a cane through a priceless medieval painting portraying a biblical scene. Another apartment of the same category is known to have been turned upside down in the frenzied course of whatever the invaders were after. Reported loss of looting of cash, silver, jewelry, and otherwise easily convertible articles, have been frequent.

Jewish shop windows by the hundreds were systematically and wantonly smashed throughout the entire city at a loss estimated at several millions of marks. There are reports that substantial losses have been sustained on the famous Leipzig "Bruhl", as many of the shop windows at the time of the demolition were filled with costly furs that were seized before the windows could be boarded up. In proportion to the general destruction of real estate, however, losses of goods are felt to have been relatively small. The spectators who viewed the wreckage when daylight had arrived were mostly in such a bewildered mood, that there was no danger of impulsive acts, and the perpetrators probably were too busy in carrying out their schedule to take off a whole lot of time for personal profit. At all events, the main streets of the city were a positive litter of shattered plate glass. According to reliable testimony, the debacle was executed by S. S. men and Storm Troopers not in uniform, each group having been provided with hammers, axes, crowbars and incendiary bombs.

Three synagogues in Leipzig were fired simultaneously by incendiary bombs and all sacred objects and records desecrated or destroyed, in most instances hurled through the windows and burned in the streets. No attempts whatsoever were made to quench the fires, functions of the fire brigade having been confined to playing water on adjoining buildings. All of the synagogues were irreparably gutted by flames, and the walls of the two that are in the close proximity of the consulate are now being razed. The blackened frames have been centers of attraction during the past week of terror for eloquently silent and bewildered crowds. One of the largest clothing stores in the heart of the city was destroyed by flames from incendiary bombs, only the charred walls and gutted roof having been left standing. As was the case with the synagogues, no attempts on the part of the fire brigade were made to extinguish the fire, although apparently there was a certain amount of apprehension for adjacent property, for the walls of a coffee house next door were covered with asbestos and sprayed by the doughty firemen. It is extremely difficult to believe, but the owners of the clothing store were actually charged with setting the fire and on that basis were dragged from their beds at 6 A. M. and clapped into prison.

Tactics which closely approached the ghoulish took place at the Jewish cemetery where the temple was fired together with a building occupied by caretakers, tombstones uprooted and graves violated. Eye witnesses considered reliable report that ten corpses were left unburied at this cemetery for a week's time because all grave diggers and cemetery attendants had been arrested.

Ferocious as was the violation of property, the most hideous phase of the so-called "spontaneous" action, has been the wholesale arrest and transportation to concentration camps of male German Jews between the ages of sixteen and sixty, as well as Jewish men without citizenship. This has been taking place daily since the night of horror. This office has no way of accurately checking the numbers of such arrests, but there is very little question that they have gone into several thousands in Leipzig alone. Having demolished dwellings and hurled most of the moveable effects to the streets, the insatiably sadistic perpetrators threw many of the trembling inmates into a small stream that flows through the Zoological Park, commanding horrified spectators to spit at them, defile them with mud and jeer at their plight. The latter incident has been repeatedly corrugated by German witnesses who were nauseated in telling the tale. The slightest manifestation of sympathy evoked a positive fury on the part of the perpetrators, and the crowd was powerless to do anything but turn horror-stricken eyes from the scene of abuse, or leave the vicinity. These tactics were carried out the entire morning of November 10th without police intervention and they were applied to men, women and children.

There is much evidence of physical violence, including several deaths. At least half a dozen cases have been personally observed, victims with bloody, badly bruised faces having fled to this office, believing that as refugees their desire to emigrate could be expedited here. As a matter of fact this consulate has been a bedlam of humanity for the past ten days, most of these visitors being desperate women, as their husbands and sons had been taken off to concentration camps.

Similarly violent procedure was applied throughout this consular district, the amount of havoc wrought depending upon the number of Jewish establishments or persons involved. It is understood that in many of the smaller communities even more relentless methods were employed than was the case in the cities. Reports have been received from Weissenfels to the effect that the few Jewish families there are experiencing great difficulty in purchasing food. It is reported that three Aryan professors of the University of Jena have been arrested and taken off to concentration camps because they had voiced disapproval of this insidious drive against mankind. Sources of information

Personal observation and interviews.

800

DHB/dhb

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VII, pp. 1037–1041, Doc. L-202.

89. KRISTALLNACHT: AFFIDAVIT NOVEMBER 26, 1945, OF BENNO FRANZ T. MARTIN REGARDING DESTRUCTION IN NURNBERG, NOVEMBER 8–9, 1938

Benno Martin was a high-ranking officer of the SS (Schutzstaffel) in Nuremberg, Germany. As such, he brings a perspective to the event of Kristallnacht, the first mass government-organized violent assault on the Jews of Germany and Austria, that is different from those contained in other documents in this volume. However, despite his different perspective, his description of what he saw during that night of destruction confirms in every respect what has been observed by various U.S. diplomats in their reports to their superiors. In addition to his particular account, Martin states that Julius Streicher, publisher of the notoriously anti-Semitic tabloid-type newspaper Der Stürmer, and Gauleiter (leader of a region) of Franconia, Germany, which includes the city of Nuremberg, "was most active as a leader of the persecution of the Jews," and his "bloodguilt consisted in having been the pathmaker of anti-Semitism in Germany for twenty years."

AFFIDAVIT

Benno Franz T. Martin, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. My name is Benno Franz T. Martin. I was born in Kaiserslautern on 2/12/1893. I hold the degree of Doctor (lawyer) from the University of Erlangen. From 1934 until 1942 or 43 I was Chief of Police [Polizeipraesident] in Nurnberg, Germany. My former rank since 44 (fall) in the "Die Schutzstaffeln der Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Arbeiterpartei" (known as the "SS") was Obergruppenfuhrer Lt. General. I give this affidavit with the knowledge, that it may be used in the trial of persons accused of war crimes before the International Military Tribunal.

2. I personally have known the former Gauleiter of Franconia, Julius Streicher, since 1923, and during my time in office as Chief of Police in Nurnberg I frequently had official dealings with him. In addition, I initiated an investigation of his personal and official activities, which investigation was carried out over a period of two years, and which resulted in Streicher's conviction before a National Socialist Party Court in Muenchen.

I deem myself sufficiently familiar with his person, his activities and the general atmosphere in Franconia, in the Reich, and especially in Nurnberg for the last twenty years to express my conviction, that Streicher was most active as a leader of the persecution of the Jews in Germany, and that his actual bloodguilt consisted in having been the pathmaker of anti-Semitism in Germany for twenty years.

4. As to the events in Nurnberg during the night of 8–9 November, 1938, I distinctly remember the following: During said night I was informed by telephone, that the "Die Sturmabteilungen der NSDAP", known in short as the "SA", had begun excesses against Jewish Synagogues and Jewish stores. I dressed and went to the Synagogue in Essenweinstrasse, which Synagogue had been mentioned to me in the telephone conversation. Upon arriving there, I met there SA Obergruppenfuehrer Obernitz with several leading Nazi Party members. The Synagogue was already in flames. I inquired and was told that it had been set afire by the city fire department. I also saw that the Chief of the city fire department, Bethke, was there in person and was directing the burning down of the Synagogue.

I asked and was told by Obernitz, that this action was taken pursuant to an order from the Fuehrer, an order which was valid for the entire Reich. Upon further questioning, Obernitz told me, that he himself had received these orders from Lutze and Goebbels, and the Gauleiter Streicher had agreed, that the action should be carried out by Obernitz and the SA. According to his description he has visited Streicher in his bedroom, who was in bed on the night of November 8–9, and has asked him for his consent. Streicher is supposed to have said, that he has no objections, then he turned around and continued to sleep. Obernitz also ordered my deputy, Dr. Holz (who later reported this to me), to see to it, that the police should stand by idly when action against Synagogues and Jewish stores was taken, and Bethke, Chief of the fire department, according to Dr. Holz' report, was ordered by Obernitz to set the Synagogue afire and to protect non-Jewish buildings in the neighborhood in case the fire should spread. I also recall, that during my time in office it was almost impossible to induce any district attorneys or other prosecuting authorities to institute procedure, or even investigations of Party members or other persons guilty of excesses against Jewish persons or property.

2. I affirm that this above declaration has been given by me voluntarily and that everything I have said is the truth and nothing but the truth.

Signed: Dr. Martin
BENNO F. T. MARTIN

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 26th day of November 1945 at Oberursel, Germany.

/s/ Dietrich Roetter
Dietrich ROETTER
Sgt, 36989387
/s/ Rudolf Urbach
Rudolf URBACH
Captain, AUS

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 959–961, Doc. 3253-PS.

90. AKTION T-4: "PERMITTING THE DESTRUCTION OF LIFE UNWORTHY OF LIFE," 1920

*"Aktion T-4" is the name that was given to a program in Nazi Germany that is most often described—inaccurately—as a euthanasia program. The name comes from the address of the program's headquarters: number 4, Tiergarten Street (Tiergartenstraße). It was a program to kill children and adults who, because of a mental or physical disability, could no longer contribute to German society. As such, it was anything but a program for the merciful killing of a person on the cusp of death or in severe and constant pain with no prospect for relief. The concept is consistent with Nazi ideology but was proposed years before the party came to power. In this early document, written by the co-authors of an influential book, Allowing the Destruction of Life Unworthy of Living, there is a legal and then a medical explanation given that seeks to justify the killing of these people. This was the first of Nazi* Germany's programs for mass murder. It should be noted that this program was not directed toward Jews; instead, it applied to non-Jews throughout the Reich.

Karl Binding, "Legal Explanation"

. . . Are there human lives which have so completely lost the attribute of legal status that their continuation has permanently lost all value, both for the bearer of that life and for society?

Merely asking this question is enough to raise an uneasy feeling in anyone who is accustomed to assessing the value of individual life for the bearer and for the social whole. It hurts him to see how wastefully we handle the most valuable lives (filled with and sustained by the strongest will to live and the greatest vital power), and how much labor power, patience, and capital investment we squander (often totally uselessly) just to preserve lives not worth living—until nature, often pitilessly late, removes the last possibility of their continuation.

Reflect simultaneously on a battlefield strewn with thousands of dead youths, or a mine in which methane gas has trapped hundreds of energetic workers; compare this with our mental hospitals, with their caring for their living inmates. One will be deeply shaken by the strident clash between the sacrifice of the finest flower of humanity in its full measure on the one side, and by the meticulous care shown to existences which are not just absolutely worthless but even of negative value, on the other.

It is impossible to doubt that there are living people to whom death would be a release, and whose death would simultaneously free society and the state from carrying a burden which serves no conceivable purpose, except that of providing an example of the greatest unselfishness. And because there actually are human lives, in whose preservation no rational being could ever again take any interest, the legal order is now confronted by the fateful question: Is it our duty actively to advocate for this life's asocial continuance, (particularly by the fullest application of criminal law), or to permit its destruction under specific conditions? One could also state the question legislatively, like this: Does the energetic preservation of such life deserve preference, as an example of the general unassailability of life? Or does permitting its termination, which frees everyone involved, seem the lesser evil? . . .

So far as I can see, the people who are to be considered here fall into two primary groups with a third intervening in between.

1. The first group is composed of those irretrievably lost as a result of illness or injury, who, fully understanding their situation, possess and have somehow expressed their urgent wish for release. . . .

But I cannot find the least reason—legally, socially, ethically, or religiously—not to permit those requested to do so to kill such hopeless cases who urgently demand death; indeed I consider this permission to be simply a duty of legal mercy, a mercy which also asserts itself in many other forms). . . .

2. The second group consists of incurable idiots, no matter whether they are so congenitally or have (like paralytics) become so in the final stage of suffering. They have the will neither to live nor to die. So, in their case, there is no valid consent to be killed; but, on the other hand, the act encounters no will to live which must be broken. Their life is completely without purpose, but they do not experience it as unbearable. They are a fearfully heavy burden both for their families and for society. Their death does not create the least loss, except perhaps in the feelings of the mother or a faithful nurse. Since they require extensive care, they occasion the development of a profession devoted to providing years and decades of care for absolutely valueless lives. It is undeniable that this is an incredible absurdity and a misuse, for unworthy ends, of life's powers.

Again, I find no grounds—legally, socially, ethically, or religiously—for not permitting the killing of these people, who are the fearsome counter-image of true humanity, and who arouse horror in nearly everyone who meets them (naturally, not in everyone)! In times of higher morality—in our times all heroism has been lost—these poor souls would surely have been freed from themselves officially. But who today, in our enervated age, compels himself to acknowledge this necessity, and hence this justification? . . .

3. I have mentioned a middle group, and I find it in those mentally sound people who, through some event like a very severe, doubtlessly fatal wound, have become unconscious and who, if they should ever again rouse from their comatose state, would waken to nameless suffering. . . .

I do not believe that a standard procedure can be created for managing this group of killings. Cases will occur in which killing seems actually fully justified; but it can also happen that the agent, in the belief that he acted correctly, acted precipitously. Then he would never be guilty of premeditated murder but rather of negligent manslaughter. The possibility must be left open of letting killings which are later recognized as having been unjustified go unpunished. . . .

Dr. Alfred Hoche, "Medical Explanation"

. . . Thus, economically speaking, these same complete idiots, who most perfectly fulfill all the criteria for complete mental death, are also the ones whose existence weighs most heavily on the community.

In part, this burden is financial and can be readily calculated by inventorying annual institutional budgets. I have allowed myself to take up the task of collecting materials bearing on this question by surveying all relevant German institutions, and thereby I have discovered that the average yearly (per head) cost for maintaining idiots has till now been thirteen hundred marks. If we calculate the total number of idiots presently cared for in German institutions, we arrive at a rough estimate of twenty to thirty thousand. If we assume an average life expectancy of fifty years for individual cases, it is easy to estimate what incredible capital is withdrawn from the nation's wealth for food, clothing, and heating—for an unproductive purpose.

And this still does not represent the real burden by any means.

The institutions which provide care for idiots are unavailable for other purposes. To the extent that private institutions are involved in such care, we must calculate the return on our investment. A caretaking staff of many thousands must be withdrawn from beneficial work for this totally fruitless endeavor. It is painful to think that whole generations of caretakers grow old next to these empty human shells, not a few of whom live seventy years or more.

In the prosperous times of the past, the question of whether one could justify making all necessary provision for such dead-weight existences was not pressing. But now things have changed, and we must take it up seriously. Our situation resembles that of participants in a difficult expedition: the greatest possible fitness of every one is the inescapable condition of the endeavor's success, and there is no room for half-strength, quarter-strength, or eighth-strength members. For a long time, the task for us Germans will be the most highly intensified integration of all possibilities—the liberation of every available power for productive ends. Fulfilling this task is opposed by the modern efforts to maintain (as much as possible) every kind of weakling and to devote care and protection to all those who (even if they are certainly not mentally dead) are constitutionally less valuable elements. These efforts have their particular importance through the fact that, so far, preventing these defective people from reproducing has not been possible and has not even been seriously attempted. . . .

The next issue to explore is whether the selection of these lives, which have finally become worthless for the individual and for society, can be accomplished with such certainty that mistakes and errors can be excluded.

This concern can only arise among lay people. For physicians, there is not the slightest question that this selection can be carried out with one hundred percent certainty and, indeed, with a much higher degree of certainty than can be found in deciding about the mental health or illness of convicted criminals.

For physicians, there are many indisputable, scientifically established criteria by which the impossibility of recovery for mentally dead people can be recognized. This is even truer since the condition of mental death beginning in earliest youth is of the first importance for our discussion.

Naturally, no doctor would conclude with certainty that a two- or three-year-old was suffering permanent mental death. But, even in childhood, the moment comes when this prediction can be made without doubt. . . .

Goethe originated the model for how important human questions evolve. He saw them as spiral. The core of this model is the fact that at regular intervals a spiral line rising in a particular direction perpetually returns to the same position relative to the axis crossing it but each time a step higher.

Eventually, this image will be apparent; even in connection with the cultural question we have been discussing. There was a time, now considered barbaric, in which eliminating those who were born unfit for life, or who later became so, was taken for granted. Then came the phase, continuing into the present, in which, finally, preserving every existence, no matter how worthless, stood as the highest moral value. A new age will arrive—operating with a higher morality and with great sacrifice—which will actually give up the requirements of an exaggerated humanism and overvaluation of mere existence. I know that, in general, these opinions will not even be received with understanding, let alone agreement. But this prospect should not keep anyone from speaking out, particularly a person who, after more than an average lifetime of serving humanity's medical needs, has earned the right to be heard on the general problems of humanity.

Source: Karl Binding and Alfred Hoche, "Permitting the Destruction of Unworthy Life: Its Extent and Form," translated by Walter E. Wright and Patrick G. Derr, Issues in Law and Medicine 8, no. 2 (1992): 246–50, 260–261, 264–265. Used by permission of Issues in Law & Medicine, © 1992.

91. AKTION T-4: HITLER'S AUTHORIZATION TO "EUTHANIZE" THE INCURABLY ILL, SEPTEMBER 1, 1939

In order to protect doctors and other medical professionals from what they were about to do, Adolf Hitler signed a secret order in the fall of 1939, authorizing them to kill individuals determined to have "lives not worthy of living." The program—referred to as Aktion T-4 for the address of the program's headquarters: number 4, Tiergarten Street (Tiergartenstraße)—was the first of Nazi Germany's programs for mass murder. It was not directed toward Jews; instead, it applied to non-Jews throughout the Reich. Hitler's authorization, signed during the fall of 1939, was backdated to September 1—the date on which Hitler invaded Poland and started World War II—to suggest that it was undertaken in response to the war. From a Nazi racial perspective, the death of Germany's finest young men in that war eliminated the very best of the German gene pool, and therefore special measures were required to keep very poor genes—those of the mentally and physically disabled—from poisoning the German race.

[On letterhead A. Hitler]

Berlin 1 Sept 1939

Reichsleiter Bouhler and Dr. Brandt, M.D.

are charged with the responsibility of enlarging the authority of certain physicians to be designated by name in such a manner that persons who, according to human judgment, are incurable can, upon a most careful diagnosis of their condition of sickness, be accorded a mercy death.

signed: A. HITLER

[Handwritten note]

Given to me by Bouhler on 27 August 1940

signed: Dr. Guertner

III a 3/41 g Rs /

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, p. 451, Doc. 630-PS.

92. AKTION T-4: NOTE DESCRIBING THE METHOD OF SELECTION FOR EUTHANASIA, DECEMBER 6, 1940

This document describes a part of the process used to kill individuals determined to have "lives not worthy of living" under Aktion T-4 (or the Euthanasia Program). There are several points that should be noted. First, it is clear that the decision as to which person with a physical or mental disability would be killed was made solely on a review of the patient's medical records as well as a questionnaire that was completed by officials of the institution in which the patient was housed, not on the basis of a physical examination. Second, patients who were selected to be killed were moved from their primary institution and often sent to several others before arriving at the location where the killing would take place. This was intended to make it harder for family members to find their loved ones prior to execution. Third, all victims were cremated, and ashes (of anyone, not necessarily the patient) would be put in an urn and sent to the family with a letter expressing sorrow for the patient's death from one disease or another. Finally, the administrative errors referred to did in fact occur, thereby raising suspicion among many families of murdered patients.

NOTE BY SELLMER, 6 DECEMBER 1940, DESCRIBING THE METHOD OF SELECTION FOR EUTHANASIA

Subject: Mental Institutions

The following is for your personal information. Please destroy this sheet afterwards.

For some time the inmates of mental institutions have been visited by a commission which functions on orders from some very high office. The commission's task is to find out which inmates should be selected for transport to certain other institutions. The commission bases its decision on the records of the institution. The patients who are then transferred are examined again in the institution designated by the commission and then the decision is made whether they should be released from their sufferings.

The body itself is cremated and the ashes are placed at the disposal of the relatives. Small mistakes in notifying are naturally always liable to occur, and in the future it will not be possible to avoid them. The commission itself is anxious to avoid all mistakes. I could give you further information but I would like to abstain from it and beg you to look me up when you visit the Gauleitung.

I believe that we National Socialists can welcome this action which is extraordinarily serious for the affected individual. I beg you, therefore, to oppose all rumors and grumblings with the necessary emphasis by representing our point of view in regard to these matters.

Nuernberg, 6 December 1940

Heil Hitler!

[Stamp]

[Signed] SELLMER
Gaustabsamtsleiter

National Socialist German Labor Party
Gau Franconia

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. I, pp. 855–856, Doc. NO-660.

93. AKTION T-4: EXTRACT FROM THE AFFIDAVIT OCTOBER 14, 1946, OF VIKTOR BRACK DESCRIBING ADMINISTRATION AND PROCEDURES OF THE EUTHANASIA PROGRAM

On August 20, 1947, Victor Brack was sentenced to death in the so-called Doctors' Trial held in Nuremberg, Germany, for his role in the program established by the Nazi regime to kill individuals determined to have "lives not worthy of living" (Aktion T-4, or the Euthanasia Program). In this affidavit, as in other documents, it is clear that no physical examination of patients took place to determine their condition; instead, four doctors read a questionnaire that had been completed by officials of the institution in which the patient was housed. If it was decided that the patient should be killed, he was sent to one of several "Euthanasia Institutions" where he was killed by gas. Brack explained that Hitler considered these patients to be "useless eaters" and therefore an economic and racial burden to society that had to be eliminated. Particular note should be made of Brack's statement that after the program was cancelled, the personnel involved assisted in the mass murder of Jews, confirming that the Aktion T-4 program served as a testing and training ground for experts in mass gassing, an expertise much in demand in the Nazi extermination camps.

EXTRACT FROM THE AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENDANT BRACK, 14 OCTOBER 1946, DESCRIBING ADMINISTRATIVE DETAILS AND PROCEDURE OF THE EUTHANASIA PROGRAM

The Euthanasia Program

4. The Euthanasia Program was initiated in the summer of 1939. Hitler issued a secret order to Professor Dr. Karl Brandt, Reich Commissioner for Medical and Health Matters, and at that time personal physician to the Fuehrer, and to Philipp Bouhler, charging them with responsibility for the killing of human beings who were unable to live, that is, the according of a mercy death to incurably insane persons. Prior to the issuance of this secret order, Bouhler had a conference with Dr. Brandt and Dr. Leonardo Conti, the Reich Chief for Public Health and State Secretary in the Ministry of Interior. On the basis of this order of Hitler, Bouhler and Brandt were to select doctors to carry out this program. Inasmuch as the insane asylums and other institutions were functions of the Ministry of Interior, Dr. Herbert Linden became the representative of the Ministry of Interior. Dr. Karl Brandt and Philipp Bouhler appointed Professor Dr. Heyde and Professor Dr. Nietzsche along with several other medical men to aid in the execution of this Euthanasia Program.

5. Professor Dr. Karl Brandt was in charge of the medical section of the Euthanasia Program. In this capacity, as shown in the chart I have drawn, dated 12 September 1946, Dr. Karl Brandt appointed as his deputies Professor Heyde and Professor Nietzsche. In charge of the administrative office under Brandt was first Herr Bohne and later Herr Allers. Three different names were used by Brandt's section in order to disguise the activities of the organization. The names of the organization are as follows:

- Reich Association-Mental Institutions.
- Charitable Foundation for Institutional Care.
- General Patient Transport Company.

6. In the early stages of this program, Dr. Karl Brandt visited Philipp Bouhler and discussed with him many details of this program. As a matter of fact, after such meetings between Brandt and Bouhler, I received many orders, more often from Bouhler than from Brandt directly.

7. In my capacity as Chief of Office II of Bouhler's Chancellery, I was ordered to carry out the administrative details of the Euthanasia Program. My deputy was Werner Blankenburg, who eventually became my successor, that is, in the beginning of 1942 when I joined the Waffen SS. Von Hegener, Reinh, Vorberg, and Dr. Hevelmann were members of my staff.

8. In the Ministry of the Interior, Dr. Linden was in charge of the Euthanasia Program and his deputy was Ministerialrat Franke. The Department for Public Health in the Ministry of the Interior had authority over all insane asylums of the Reich, and in this position, my department as well as the office of Dr. Brandt maintained close liaison in order to operate this Euthanasia Program efficiently.

The Procedure

9. By order of Dr. Linden, the directors of all insane asylums in the Reich had to complete questionnaires for each patient in their institutions. These questionnaires were drafted by Bouhler, Heyde, Nietzsche, and others in several of their many conferences. The questionnaires were then forwarded to the Ministry of the Interior to be distributed to the various insane asylums and similar institutions. Theoretically, Dr. Linden's office had the questionnaires returned and then forwarded them to the administrative section of the office of Dr. Brandt. The program was so arranged that photostats of each questionnaire were to be sent to four experts consisting of about 10 to 15 doctors. I do not remember the names of all the members of this panel, but Dr. Pfannrnueller, Dr. Schumann, Dr. Falthausen, and Dr. Renaux are fresh in my memory in this connection. Each of these experts indicated by making a certain comment on the questionnaire whether or not the patient could be transferred to an observation institution and eventually killed. The questionnaire was then forwarded to a senior expert. According to the regulation, the senior expert was only entitled to order the transfer of the patient when all four experts voted for the transfer. This senior expert also marked the questionnaire and then submitted it to Dr. Linden who ordered the insane asylum to transfer the patient to one of the observation institutions. Offhand I can remember, among others, the names of the following observation institutions: Eglfing-Haar, Kempten, Jena, Buch, Arnsberg.

10. At these institutions the patients were under the observation of the doctor in charge for a period of 1 to 3 months. The physician had the right to exempt the patient from the program if he decided that the patient was not incurable. If he agreed with the opinion of the senior expert, the patient was transferred to a so-called Euthanasia Institution. I can recall the names of the Euthanasia Institutions—

Grafeneck-under Dr. Schuman.

Brandenburg-under Dr. Hennecke.

Hartheim-under Dr. Renaux.

Sonnenstein-under Dr. Schmalenbach.

Hadamar-(I do not remember under whose leadership).

Bernburg-under Dr. Behnke or Dr. Becker.

In these institutions the patient was killed by means of gas by the doctor in charge. To the best of my knowledge, about fifty to sixty thousand persons were killed in this way from autumn 1939 to the summer of 1941.

11. The order issued by the Fuehrer to Brandt and Bouhler was secret and never published. The Euthanasia Program itself was kept as secret as possible, and for this reason, relatives of persons killed in the course of the program were never told the real cause of death. The death certificates issued to the relatives carried fictitious causes of death such as heart failure. All persons subjected to the Euthanasia Program did not have an opportunity to decide whether they wanted a mercy death, nor were their relatives contacted for approval or disapproval. The decision was purely within the discretion of the doctors. The program was not restricted to those cases in which the person was "in extremis".

12. Hitler's ultimate reason for the establishment of the Euthanasia Program in Germany was to eliminate those people confined to insane asylums and similar institutions who could no longer be of any use to the Reich. They were considered useless objects and Hitler felt that by exterminating these so-called useless eaters, it would be possible to relieve more doctors, male and female nurses, and other personnel, hospital beds and other facilities for the armed forces.

Reich Committee for Research on Hereditary Diseases and Constitutional Susceptibility to Severe Diseases

13. This committee, which was also a function of the Euthanasia Program, was an organization for the killing of children who were born mentally deficient or physically deformed. All physicians assisting at births, midwives, and maternity hospitals were ordered by the Ministry of Interior to report such cases to the office of Dr. Linden in the Ministry of Interior. Experts in the medical section of Dr. Brandt's office were then ordered to give their opinion in each case. As a matter of fact, the complete file on each case was sent to the offices of Bouhler and Dr. Brandt in order to obtain their opinions and to decide the fate of each child involved. In many cases these children were to be operated upon in such a manner that the result was either complete recovery or death. Death resulted in a majority of these cases. The program was inaugurated in the summer of 1939. Bouhler told me that Dr. Linden had orders to obtain the consent of the parents of each child concerned. I do not know how long this program continued, since I joined the Waffen SS in 1942.

The Connection between the Euthanasia Program and SS
Brigadefuehrer Globocnik:

14. In 1941 I received an oral order to discontinue the Euthanasia Program. I received this order either from Bouhler or from Dr. Brandt. In order to preserve the personnel relieved of these duties and to have the opportunity of starting a new Euthanasia Program after the war, Bouhler requested, I think after a conference with Himmler, that I send this personnel to Lublin and put it at the disposal of SS Brigadefuehrer Globocnik. I then had the impression that these people were to be used in the extensive Jewish labor camps run by Globocnik. Later, however, at the end of 1942 or the beginning of 1943, I found out that they were used to assist in the mass extermination of the Jews, which was then already common knowledge in higher Party circles.

15. Among the doctors who assisted in the Jewish extermination program were Eberle and Schumann; Schumann performed medical experiments on prisoners in Auschwitz. It would have been impossible for these men to participate in such things without the personal knowledge and consent of Karl Brandt. The order to send these men to the East could have been given only by Himmler to Brandt, possibly through Bouhler.

* * * * *

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. I, pp. 842–846, Doc. NO-426.

94. CONFISCATION OF PROPERTY: HITLER DECREE, MARCH 1, 1942

This decree by Hitler authorizes the confiscation of written material of Jews, Freemasons, and “opponents of National Socialism,” as well as “cultural treasures” owned by Jews. The order to confiscate property—including, in this case, cultural treasures such as jewelry and fine art—is expected in times of war, but it is not the material or treasures of the military enemy beaten in battle that is referred to here; it is, instead, the property of supposedly internal enemies that is to be taken. They are deemed to be the “authors of the present war against the Reich,” engaged in a “spiritual battle.” The term “Weltanschauung” is a reference to a person’s or group’s worldview. As used here, it is referring to a particular worldview, one that is not in keeping with that of National Socialism.

Jews, Free Masons and those opponents of National Socialism who are affiliated with them on the basis of “Weltanschauung”, are the authors of the present war against the Reich. The systematic spiritual battle against these forces is a task made necessary by the war effort.

I have therefore directed Reichsleiter Alfred Rosenberg to carry out this task in agreement with the Chief of the Wehrmacht High Command. His staff for the occupied territories is authorized to search libraries, archives, lodges and other “Weltanschauung” and cultural establishments for the relevant material and to have this material requisitioned for the “Weltanschauung” tasks of the NSDAP, and for future scientific research by the higher educational institutions. The same regulation applies to cultural treasures which are the property or in the possession of Jews, which are ownerless, or the origin of which cannot be clearly established. Directions for carrying out this order in cooperation with the Wehrmacht will be issued by the Chief of the Wehrmacht High Command in agreement with Reichsleiter Rosenberg.

The necessary measures within the Eastern Territories under German administration will be taken by Reichsleiter Rosenberg in his capacity of Reichsminister for Occupied Eastern Territories.

/s/ HITLER

Headquarters of the Führer, 1 March 1942.

To all Offices of the Wehrmacht, the Party and the State.

Source: National Archives Collection of World War II War Crimes Records. National Archives Identifier: 7582747.

95. CONFISCATION OF PROPERTY: LETTER FROM HERMANN GOERING TO ALFRED ROSENBERG REGARDING CONFISCATION OF FRENCH CULTURAL GOODS, NOVEMBER 21, 1940

This letter from Hermann Goering, plenipotentiary of the Four-Year Plan, to Alfred Rosenberg, a Hitler confidant and driver of Nazi ideology, reveals more than just the purported purpose of the letter, which has to do with the confiscation, cataloging, and securing of some of the finest works of art in Europe. It is also an insight into the ruthless backbiting and competition of the Nazi leadership, each vying for power. In this case, Goering mentions both the Reich foreign minister (Joachim von Ribbentrop) and the Reich propaganda minister (Joseph Goebbels) as claiming some of what Goering sees as his authority with regard to the extensive art collections Goering has obtained. Building his own case for primacy, Goering notes that through his own efforts he was able to bring out "a very large part of the art treasures," but for all his braggadocio he feels compelled to state that he can prove his assertion that the discovery was, in fact, due to his own efforts.

The Reichmarschall of the Greater German Reich Romieten
November 21, 1940

Dear Party Comrade ROSENBERG:

Hearty thanks for your letter and most of all for the wonderful book "Deutsche Grösse" ("German Greatness"). I have already heard much about the exhibition and have read something about it. It is not really necessary for me to assure you how particularly warmly I, for my part, greet this exhibition. As a matter of course, I will avail myself of the next opportunity to inspect it.

I should like to inform you briefly as follows, relative to the cultural goods seized in France. I have especially welcomed that, after much vacillation, an authority for the collection of the articles was finally decided upon although I must point out that other authorities also claim to possess power from the Führer first of all the Reich Foreign Minister, who several months ago sent a circular to all authorities, claiming among other things, power for occupied territory, and stating the safeguarding of art treasures was his responsibility.

Moreover, the Reich Propaganda Minister is still also delegated, I believe, to determine the data relative to these cultural goods, which ones were stolen from Germany and which should not be returned. This, however, pertains mainly to the articles that are found in the possession of enemy museums.

I have promised to support energetically the work of your staff and to place at its disposal that which it could not hitherto obtain, namely, means of transportation and guard personnel, and the Luftwaffe is hereby assigned to give the utmost assistance.

In addition, I should like to call to your attention that I have been able to obtain especially valuable cultural goods from Jewish owners. I obtained them from hiding places that were very difficult to find; I discovered these a long time ago, by means of bribery and the employment of French detectives and criminal agents. This activity continues, as does the activity of my foreign exchange investigation authorities in scrutinizing bank vaults. In both cases the results will be communicated to your staff, which will then be required to seize the articles and transport them. I consider the co-operation between your staff and Herr THURMER's office in PARIS as excellent and answering its purpose to the highest degree.

In order that no incorrect ideas arise regarding the articles that I want to claim for myself, and those I already have obtained through purchase and others which I should like to obtain, I wish to communicate to you the following:

- 1). I already possess today through purchase and barter perhaps the most important private collection, in Germany, if not in Europe. These are works that I include in the category of early-Nordic masters, that is, consequently, the early-German, the early Dutch and Flemish, the works of the French Gothic; that is, paintings as well as sculpture.
- 2). A very extensive and highly valuable collection of 17th century Dutch.
- 3). A relatively small but very good collection of 18th century French and finally a collection of Italian master.

This whole collection will be housed appropriately in CARI HALL and will come later into the possession of the State as my legacy, with the provision that the gallery remain in CARI HALL.

The Führer has welcomed my plan, as well as supported it.

In order to complete this collection I have considered the purchase also of some few pieces from confiscated Jewish cultural goods. This pertains chiefly to masters whose works

I did not hitherto possess or works necessary to supplement the collection. I submit these things from time to time the Führer. The purchase occurs as follows: the objects are examined by a French expert, the president appointed by the government (whose name I have forgotten for the moment). The purchase sum is paid out to the trustee whom the German state has appointed. Arrangements and discussion concerning its use as well as the use of other sums accumulating in the trust funds will be carried out later. In view of the hundreds and thousands of paintings, this is a very modest percentage. Up to now there have been about 15 paintings. By the way, I consider this percentage all the more justified, in that through my efforts, which can be proved, I brought out of their hiding-places a very large part of the art treasures. As a matter of course, the Führer has reserved for himself the right of decision over the most valuable part of the collection. An extraordinarily large number of objects remain, however, the total of which will apparently read into the thousands; these can be employed for the decoration of party and state buildings as well as for the filling of museums.

This, in short for your personal information, so that no false ideas can arise.

As for your letter addressed to Professor SPEER, I can only agree whole-heartedly and most warmly with your opinion. Your lines dedicated to the Theater-Gormantum please me particularly. In this matter my endeavors coincide with yours one hundred per cent. I should be grateful to you if at our next meeting we could discuss means leading to a quick and thorough success.

Sometimes it is almost horrible to see those theater clubs (Theatergormanem) dawdling around during the magnificent Wagnerian Operas. But also everything else you wrote in this letter agrees completely with the line I follow.

It would please me very much to be able to see you again as soon as possible.

The Führer has given me a several weeks' relaxation leave, which I urgently needed, since I found myself for the first time at the end of my strength. I first went to my hunting lodge at [illegible], in order to be able to recover, away from all cares. I shall be in BERLIN for several days around the 18th of December and shall not fail to inquire in due course at your office when it is convenient for you to hold a conference.

Thanking you again for the book, I am with

Heil HITLER!
Yours
/s/ GOERING

Source: National Archives Collection of World War II War Crimes Records. National Archives Identifier: 7582747.

III. Genocide

96. AFFIDAVIT OF AUGUST 28, 1945, OF RAYMOND H. GEIST DESCRIBING NAZI ACTIVITIES IN GERMANY, 1933–1939

In 1945, Raymond H. Geist, former American consul in Berlin, gave a detailed affidavit regarding his activities and observations in Nazi Germany from 1933 to 1939. Gleaned from his own experiences and from multiple conversations—including with Nazi officials—Geist's affidavit addresses several critical aspects of life in Germany during those years: (1) the vast military buildup in armaments and soldiers in uniform, all in view of the eyes of the world and geared to a war of aggression; (2) the programs such as the Hitler Youth and the Deutsche Jungvolk (for boys from ages 6 to 14) that sought to train the next generation of Nazis; (3) concentration camps, initially for political prisoners, and the Gestapo that created an environment of terror; (4) detainment and abuse of American Jews in Germany; (5) the violence directed against German Jews on Kristallnacht and the freely admitted goal of the Nazis to make Germany Judenrein, that is, "clean of Jews"; (6) the view that communists were a danger to the state and needed to be eliminated; and (7) the widespread confiscation of Jewish property for the personal enrichment of those in high positions in the Nazi Party.

AFFIDAVIT OF RAYMOND H. GEIST, FORMER AMERICAN CONSUL IN BERLIN, DESCRIBING NAZI ACTIVITIES IN GERMANY DURING THE PERIOD 1933 TO 1939: MILITARY PREPARATION, CONCENTRATION CAMPS, PERSECUTION OF JEWS, COMMUNISTS, AND OTHERS; ACTS OF VIOLENCE AGAINST AMERICAN CITIZENS

United Mexican States)
Mexico, Federal District |
Embassy of the United -
States of America |
)

Mexico City, D. F.)
) ss.
 Mexico)

RAYMOND H. GEIST, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

I came to Berlin in December, 1929, as Consul and continued in that capacity, exercising my official functions until the end of 1939. In 1938 I was appointed First Secretary of the Embassy and continued in that office discharging at the same time my duties as consul. During the entire period of ten years my work was of such character that I frequently came into contact with many officials of the German Government. After the Nazis came to power in 1933, these contacts increased owing to the much more frequent occasions on which it was necessary to intervene with German officials in order to protect the rights of American citizens and their properties. During this period I not only had many official contacts but also friends and acquaintances, both in Berlin and elsewhere in Germany. My work permitted and occasionally required travel in Germany. It was my custom to make bicycle trips, as well as excursions by automobile to various points particularly in the environs of Berlin, often to the extent of fifty miles. Although I do not have the first-hand information with regard to developments under the National Socialists for all of Germany that I have regarding the neighborhood of Berlin, I saw enough during my excursions, and was told enough by friends and acquaintances to know that the activities hereafter described in and around Berlin were being substantially duplicated all over Germany.

There were indeed few military establishments in the neighborhood of Berlin in 1929 and until 1933 there were the Casernas at Potsdam and the military establishment at Döberitz. After the Nazis came to power, military establishments of all sorts grew up with enormous rapidity. Before the end of 1933, during my frequent excursions, I discovered outside of Berlin on nearly every road leaving from the City new large military establishments, including training fields, airports, barracks, proving grounds, antiaircraft stations and the like. For these establishments most of the ground was broken during the year 1933; there were probably fifty within the immediate vicinity of Berlin. Most of these establishments were being openly prepared; nevertheless they were under guard. It was apparent with respect to others that an attempt was made to preserve secrecy. I recall in particular that the large antiaircraft station near my house in the Gruenwald was built under secrecy, likewise a munitions dump burrowed in the hills of Wildpark near Potsdam was also built under secrecy. Being disguised as a German and speaking the language, I was able on my bicycle trips to penetrate certain of these establishments where at various times I saw military exercises, including the use of tanks, in various maneuvers. I recall from my travels beyond Berlin and the information and reports which I had from friends and acquaintances that the same feverish preparations were in progress throughout the length and breadth of Germany, in fact, all establishments which could serve a military purpose were converted to military uses.

I also saw the preparations being made for building up the new army. I visited the camps of the compulsory labor service, the Arbeitsdienst, which was well under way by the end of 1933, with camps established all over Germany. Though this was ostensibly a labor service, it was essentially military in character, as is well known. I saw the men working on reclamation projects and was informed that they worked two hours in the morning and two hours in the afternoon, the balance of the time being spent in military tactics and in instruction in Nazi ideology. So that when conscription went into effect in 1935, through the medium of these camps, it was possible for the Germans to put up a trained army of at least 3,500,000 men, which formed the nucleus of the future army of aggression.

Particularly through the years 1933 and 1934 the hordes of storm troopers (S. A.) were much in evidence practicing military exercises. They were being converted into a military organization. I frequently encountered the storm troopers deployed in fields and in forests engaged in military technical exercises. This was all the part of a general plan to prepare Germany's manpower for war.

I witnessed, too, scores of times, the training of the Hitler Youth, which included boys from 14 to 17, who, dressed in their uniforms, were likewise generally in evidence wherever I chose to travel. I frequently saw them in the woods near Berlin, deployed in ravines, in fields, woods and hillsides staging mock attacks, employing the technique of actual maneuvers. Frequently they were under the direction of uniformed leaders and at times under officers of the Reichswehr. This type of training of the youth extended everywhere in Germany. Frequently my route of travel had to be changed in order not to find myself in the midst of some maneuvers which required the use of roads or paths along which I was riding. It was not considered wise to get too close to these operations, particularly if they were on an extensive scale.

The Deutsche Jungvolk (boys from the ages 6 to 14) was also the vehicle for military training. They were also in evidence throughout the country. I frequently met them marching. I saw them engaged in military exercises in the school yards during the school recesses, particularly throwing hand grenades usually under expert adult leadership. Often I have seen these children in large numbers engaged in what were obviously military maneuvers, and under the direction of adult uniformed officers.

I had occasion, at times, to witness the organizations which were created for the girls that were part of the Hitler Youth and were also incorporated in the so called Arbeitsdienst, usually located somewhere near the camps for men. The resultant illegitimate children were a definite planned result of the program; they were part of the manpower and the army for the next generation. The shame and the grief of parents over this program fostered and urged by the Nazis although it existed, was seldom openly expressed on account of dangers to which the parents might expose themselves.

So far as the youth were concerned, the entire program was carried on with lavish propaganda and enough benefits to the participants to make it extremely popular. The Nazis provided the youth with special trains, special trucks, special bathing beaches, food and other privileges. At the same time, the semi-hysteria which was maintained about the whole National Socialist program made it impossible for parents or anyone else to speak against it even if they had wished to do so. The German people were well acquainted with the going on in concentration camps and it was well known that the fate of anyone too actively opposed to any part of the Nazi program was liable to be one of great suffering. Indeed, before the Hitler regime was many months old almost every family in Germany had had first-hand accounts of the brutalities inflicted in the concentration camps from someone either in the relationship or in the circle of friends who had served a sentence there; consequently the fear of such camps was a very effective brake on any possible opposition.

In addition to what I saw during these many years with my own eyes regarding the preparation and the building of a huge armed force, I received reliable information from trustworthy sources as to its scope and strength. One of my close friends in Berlin was one George Graffenstein, who lived at 34 Altenauerstrasse, just across the street from me. He was a German, formerly a member of Meile Printing Company of Chicago and a man strongly opposed to the Nazis. He had been an officer in the German army in the First World War; therefore he knew a large number of the officers of Reichswehr. Occasionally he gave in his house beer-evenings which a number of Reichswehr officers attended, including certain Generals. To these parties I was occasionally invited.

One of these Generals was General Goettke, who was the head of the artillery on the General Staff and a very close friend of Graffenstein. In addition Graffenstein's nephew was on the General Staff and was at the same time the liaison between the Reichswehr and the S.A. Late in 1934, George Graffenstein told me that from the information which he had received from his friends, the armament program was already so complete, so far advanced, so gigantic and all-inclusive, that there was no doubt of Germany's winning the war on sheer weight of arms alone. That same information was given to me directly by certain of the high officers of the Reichswehr, whom I met at Graffenstein's house.

By the middle of 1934 it had become obvious that the rearmament program, though in its beginning, was being planned on a vast scale so that it could not possibly be considered as defensive armament but only as a weapon for offensive war. This was, however, not a conclusion of my own; but it was openly stated as such to me. Graffenstein told me in 1934, during the conversations to which I have already referred, that the purpose of the program was an aggressive war. He told me that he had been so informed by General Goettke in particular. This statement was borne out by other persons who were in the know in Germany at that time. I confirmed his statements by my own conversations with the Generals who gathered in his house. They intimated to me, not only that Germany was embarked upon an inevitable program toward war but even gave me indications of the general plan, namely, the drive to the East and the attack upon Russia, after Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Austria had been eliminated. This was as early as 1934 and I had many similar conversations along the same line at Graffenstein's house during the following years.

Similar information was constantly being confirmed from other sources at later dates. For instance, in December 1938, I had a conversation with General Franz Halder, who was then Chief of Staff, at the house of Dr. Etscheit, a prominent Berlin lawyer. Halder stated to me: "You must take into account the National Socialist program in the East. If you, the Western powers, oppose our program in the East, we shall have to go to war with you". During this conversation he made it clear to me that the program of the Nazis for expansion in the East was unalterably fixed and decided upon. It included the attack on Poland, the annexation of Austria, territorial expansion in Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Russia, particularly in the Ukraine. The latter provinces would have to be German. When I replied to Halder that I was positive the Western powers would never tolerate any such aggressive program and that inevitably it would not only mean war with England and France but with the United States as well, Halder replied: "That is a pity".

The same information as to the aggressive intention of the Nazis was given to me by a friend, Count von Bismarck, formerly Counselor of the German Embassy in London. He was violently anti-Nazi. In Germany, where I knew him, he held no official position, deriving his income from his estates in East Prussia; but he was a man with wide contacts in officialdom, particularly in the Foreign Office. He said that the Nazis were headed for war, for huge aggressive adventures, that conquest of the East was a major part of the vast plan and that conquest of the West would only follow, when complete victory in the East solidified Germany's strength and resources in those quarters. He made this statement to me in 1936 and we discussed it often in 1937 and 1938. He was extremely disturbed, not over the aggressive plans of the Nazis, but over their manner of converting Germany into a slave State, which he repudiated entirely. He considered that the course of the Nazis militarily could not be hindered and furthermore, no country was preparing to stop them

I also had the same information from another reliable source. After Hitler came to power in 1933, General von Hammerstein withdrew from public life. He had been head of the Reichswehr under Chancellor Bruening. Although he was then retired, he knew and associated intimately with the Generals of the German Army, as he was among them primus inter pares. He told me of the German program for aggressive war during a long conversation which we had during a musical recital in 1938 at Dr. Paul Kempner's home. The army, he said, was at a highly mechanized strength, extremely mobile and ready for anything. He was sure, in view of the preparations and the excellent character of the German equipment that the German Army was then an instrument of invincible striking power. He stated categorically that it was a superb instrument which had been formed to wage war and that it would not be much longer delayed. He did not know the plans and details but he confirmed the information that I had from all sources, that Germany intended to strike in the East and that the war in the West depended on whether or not the Western powers would endeavor to intervene when the German war machine started moving.

Of these aggressive designs I learned also from other sources. A personal friend, Dr. Hans Henniger, a veterinarian in Berlin, was an intimate friend of an officer by the name of Schlessicher (I believe that is the correct spelling), who was the responsible purveyor to the German Army, therefore a high member of the Quartermaster Corps. I do not remember his exact title. Dr. Henniger received from this man information constantly with regard to the preparations being made by the Germans in 1939.) A month before March 15, 1939,) I was informed of the plans for marching into Prague on that date and that large stocks of food and other equipment were being accumulated near the border of Czechoslovakia. On March 15, 1939,) the German Army rolled into Prague.

I also had a good deal of personal experience with and firsthand knowledge of the internal policies from 1935 to 1939. Indeed, from the very outset of the regime, I had intimate and continuous contact with various officers of the German Government in the course of my duties as an American official protecting American citizens or protesting against their mistreatment. The acts of violence against American citizens were numerous, particularly during the early years of 1933 and 1934. In addition, I was constantly receiving information as regards other Nazi tactics and the nature and number of victims from a variety of sources; the victims themselves on many occasions, both American and German, told me their experiences and appealed for help; relatives and friends of victims, both those who came back and those who did not; the foreign newspaper correspondents and, to a very considerable degree, I received information from the Gestapo itself.)

For a period I dealt directly with Herr Heinrich Himmler, then subsequently with Herr Reinhard Heydrich and often with Dr. Werner Best.

My vigorous relations with the Gestapo began in March, 1933, in fact I knew the organization of the secret police and dealt with that organization before the Nazis came to power. It was then the Politische Abteilung des Polizeipräsident, i.e., the political division of the Polizeipräsidentium, which was charged with supervisory and preventive functions with regard to political matters, then chiefly investigating the terror of Communists. It was located in Berlin at the Polizeipräsidentium. On March 6, 1933, it was moved from the Polizeipräsidentium to No. 8 Prinzalbrechtstrasse and became the famous Gestapo (Geheimstaatspolizei), its first chief was Rudolf Diels, who was succeeded by Heinrich Himmler, in May, 1934. I knew well not only Diels but also Himmler, his second in command, Reinhard Heydrich and his administrative officer, Dr. Werner Best. The organization at No. 8 was huge with over 1,000 persons employed there. Besides, as rapidly as administrative measures permitted, Gestapo headquarters were established throughout Germany, not only in the cities but in provincial places to such an extent that the smallest hamlet and village fell under direct Gestapo supervision. At the beginning of the Hitler regime, the only organization which had meeting places throughout the country was the S. A. (storm troopers). Until the Gestapo could be organized on a national scale the thousands of local S. A. meeting places became the "arrest points". There were at least fifty of these in Berlin. Communists, Jews, and other known enemies of the Nazi party were taken to these points and, if they were enemies of sufficient importance, they were immediately transferred to the Gestapo headquarters. During 1933 and 1934, when the Gestapo became universally organized, the S. A. were gradually eliminated as arresting agents and the S. S. (Schutzstaffel) were incorporated as administrative and executive officials into the Gestapo. By the end of 1934, the S. A. had been fairly well eliminated and the S. S., the members of which wore elegant black suits and were therefore called Elite Guards, became almost identical as functionaries with the Gestapo.

Immediately in 1933, the concentration camps, as soon as they were established, were put under the immediate charge of the Gestapo and they remained exclusively a Gestapo institution. Only "political" prisoners were held in the concentration camps. Ordinary criminals remained the responsibility of the regular police authorities and the established courts. On being sentenced, they were confined in the regular prisons. These confinements were always the result of duly carried out legal procedure. Incarceration in concentration camps was carried out without any legal procedure, neither indictment nor trial. Prisoners were, occasionally, released from the concentration camps and turned over to the prosecuting attorney for prosecution before the legal courts of justice. A prisoner accused of high treason, for example, whose offense might carry a death sentence, would be released to the prosecuting attorney for trial in the people's court. All felonies were tried by the regular courts.

As I have stated, my frequent contacts with this entire Gestapo organization began with the first wave of terrorist acts in the week of March 6-13, 1933. That wave was accompanied by universal mob violence. Since 1925, one of the cries of the Nazi party had been "Jude Verecke" (Death to the Jews) and when the Nazi party won the elections in March, 1933, on the morning of the sixth, the accumulated passion blew off in wholesale attacks on the Communists, Jews, and those who were suspected of being either. Mobs of S. A. men roamed the streets, beating up, looting, and even killing persons.

No American citizen, so far as I am aware, was killed, but a number of them were assaulted and injured and appealed to the Consulate General for aid and protection. For example,

Nathaniel Wolff, an American citizen, who resided in Rochester, New York, made an affidavit which stated:

"This morning, March 6, at 5 o'clock, there came into my room five or six Nazis with drawn revolvers. They abused me, called me a dirty Russian Jew and started going through my belongings. They asked me what remarks I had made. I replied that I had made none that I knew of and that I am not interested in politics. One of them shouted "Do you call throwing bombs not being interested in politics?" Another asked at the same time, "Are you the Wolff who lived in the Pension Stephanie?" Having left the Stephanie on account of difficulties with the Portier regarding the price of the room and his behavior, I whistled very softly, intimating that I understood the source of the denunciation. Thereupon one of the Nazis remarked: "Du Scheiss Jude, warum pfeiffst du?" and hit me in the jaw. They said that they would take me to the police station, whereupon I answered, "The quicker, the better, because my conscience is absolutely clear." One of them said, "Do you call throwing bombs having a clear conscience?" The intruders were not accompanied by an officer, nor did they carry "Hilfspolizei" armbands. They took me in an automobile to an address in the Knewebeck Strasse beyond the Kant Strasse (I believe No. 67 or 76, Gartenhaus left, I think three or four flights up the stairs). I was conducted to a bare room in which the shutters were closed and the windows boarded, evidently to prevent sounds from getting out, where, after my possessions were taken away including my keys, I was left with two guards who spent the time abusing the Jews. At five minutes before seven, the group who had arrested me returned with two or three members including one who was apparently a leader, when I was again abused, that is, they gave me to understand that they imagined I was implicated in communistic activities. I remarked that I should like to send a telegram to my cousin, Alan Steyne at the Hamburg American Consulate, and asked if I had the right to do so, whereupon the leader replied: "As a foreigner you have no right, and especially not as a Jew." One of the men then proceeded to bind my hands and feet as closely and as painfully as possible. I still bear the marks of the bruises on my wrists. I was questioned about various English and French letters which had been found in my room and taken along with them and then I was left about half an hour alone because they evidently discussed my fate. After some time one of the group returned and advised me that every one had a right to his own political opinions as long as no attempt was made to mix into politics. He remarked that nothing was to be gained by brutality, undid the rope and freed my hands and feet and gave me a cup of coffee and said, "Probably the thing isn't so bad because women chatter a great deal" and that I was denounced by a girl. After a few minutes he elaborated the statement that the girl, Paula, of the Pension, had denounced me as having the intention of throwing bombs at the Nazi parade. I expressed my astonishment and told him the facts of the case. He appeared to laugh it off and asked me if I would be willing to sign a paper on the condition that they would release me. I said "yes." They then said I would have to go to the police to have my signature attested to and one of the men who had come in, in the meanwhile, went out to draft the paper I was to sign. He returned with the paper which read: (1) "I am a Jew." (2) "I will leave tonight for Paris," (3) "I promise never again to set my foot on German soil." "I attest that no physical violence was done to me and that none of my property was stolen." This paper I signed. They told me to put on my coat and come to the police. Instead of taking me to the police station they took me to Charlottenburg towards the Gruenwald. When I asked to which police station they were taking me, they replied "You'll get there soon enough." When we were near the Heer Strasse they pretended that the automobile was broken down and informed me that I would have to walk through the woods to get to the police station. We proceeded into the woods where three members drew their pistols and the other two brought straps out of their pockets and informed me that they were going to teach me a lesson and made as if they were about to tie me to a tree. They said that they intended to beat the life out of me and "You can walk back afterwards." I replied that I hoped I would be able to walk. This was probably about eight o'clock and we were entirely alone as nobody had followed us. I took off my coat myself and remarked "If one can't help oneself, one may as well make the best of it." One of them threw my coat to the ground and said "Get ready" and after making a threatening gesture, said "You can go home now." pointing to the wrong direction, whereupon they walked rapidly to the automobile and disappeared yelling after me, "Keep your mouth shut," I was also threatened that if they ever caught me in Germany again, they would know how to get me out of the way. . ."

Another American, Herman I. Raseman, made an affidavit which stated:

"Yesterday, March 10, 1933, in the afternoon at about 4:30, I came out of "KDW" with my fiancee, Fraeulein Else Schwarzlose, residing in Wilmersdorf, Kaiser-Allee 172, and proceeded to walk along Tauentzien Strasse. A man in S. A. uniform stepped on my toe purposely, obviously offended me and said 'Pardon.' I said "Bitte," and walked ahead. He followed me and kicked me saying: "Na und?" A policeman saw this and walked ahead, paying no attention to attacks made on me. Then I took my passport out of my pocket, showed it to the second policeman, and said that I was an American citizen, but he walked ahead, obviously not able to afford me protection, or at least being unwilling. The S. A. man continued to attack me, struck me in the face, wounded me over the eye and continued to do me bodily harm. During this attack, all the time my walking along, we reached another policeman, and I applied to him, showing my passport and said: "I am an American and am entitled to protection." He shrugged his shoulder and said "What can I do?" By this time the S. A. man had obviously inflicted enough attack upon me and walked away.

Upon my appeal the policeman brought my fiancee and me to the station house at 13 Bayreuther Strasse. My fiancee and I reported to the officer in charge. He heard the story and said that he was sorry, but that there was nothing to do. My face was bleeding. The policeman said that he had had orders not to interfere in any affair in which an S. A. man took part. I then asked him what I could do to protect myself. He said that there was nothing to do but to wait until the situation was better. He added that the police were absolutely powerless, and were under the direction of the S. A., and that there were S. A. Sturm-Abteilung in the police itself. Thereupon I departed. . ."

Another American, Mrs. Jean Klauber, made an affidavit which stated:

"That on the night of Friday, March 10, 1933, she and her husband had retired for the night when they were awakened by a prolonged ringing of their apartment bell.

They heard pounding upon the street door and a demand for immediate entry, and a concurrent threat to break the door down. The street door was opened by the janitor's wife, and a party of four or five men entered and went at once to the apartment of the deponent where they again rang and pounded on the door. Mr. Klauber asked who was there, and was answered—"The police". He opened the door and a party of four or five men in brown uniforms, one wearing a dark overcoat and carrying a rifle, pushed in, jostling Mr. and Mrs. Klauber aside. One asked Mrs. Klauber where the telephone was and she indicated the room where it was to be found, and started to go there. Thereupon, she was knocked down by one of them. They went on to the bedroom where Mr. and Mrs. Klauber followed them, and there they demanded their passports. Mr. Klauber went to the wardrobe to get his, and was stopped, being asked by the intruders whether he was carrying any weapons. Being clothed only in pajamas, his denial was accompanied by a gesture indicating his garb. He then turned to the wardrobe, opened it, and reached for one of his four suits hanging therein where he thought the passport was, and was immediately attacked from behind by all but one of the intruders, who beat him severely with police clubs, the one with the overcoat and rifle standing by. Remarks were shouted such as "Look. Four suits, while for fourteen years we have been starving." Mrs. Klauber tried to inquire the reason for their actions, and was answered—"Jews. We hate you. For fourteen years we have been waiting for this, and tonight we'll hang many of you."

When the intruders stopped beating Mr. Klauber he was unconscious, and they demanded the passports again of Mrs. Klauber. Mrs. Klauber found her American passport and her German passport (required by local authorities as the wife of a German citizen, and issued by the police at Munich after her arrival here), and the intruders took both in spite of Mrs. Klauber's protests that she was American. She then searched for her husband's passport, laid hold of his pocket-book, and in her excitement offered it to them. Though full of money they refused it, and again demanded the passport. Mrs. Klauber then found it and handed it over.

Then the intruders returned to the unconscious Mr. Klauber, saying "He hasn't had enough yet", and beat him further. Then they left, saying "We are not yet finished", and just as they departed, one of them said to

Mrs. Klauber "Why did you marry a Jew? I hate them" and struck her on the jaw with his police club. . . ."

I personally can verify that the police had been instructed not to interfere; that is that there was official sanction for these activities. Affidavits taken from numerous victims attest this fact. I had become acquainted with the two police officers stationed at the corner of Bellevuestrasse and Tiergartenstrasse near where the Consulate General was located; these officers told me that they and all the other police officers had received definite instructions not to interfere with the S.A., the S.S. or the Hitler Youth.

For the Germans who were taken into custody by the Gestapo, chiefly Communists at that time, there was, from my experience and from the information that I had from all sources, a regular pattern of brutality and terror. Upon arrest, the victims would be systematically subjected to indignities and brutalities such as beatings, kicking, pushing downstairs, deprivation of food and all comforts, and threats of much worse. After the victims had been imprisoned—usually in cellars, since both the headquarters at No. 8 Albrechtstrasse and the S.A. meeting places usually had them—they would be beaten with various degrees of severity. If the Gestapo believed that the victim—particularly Communist leaders—had information as to other alleged accomplices they would give systematic beatings, usually when stripped and tied on a table. This would go on often for many days until they had extracted the information they wanted or killed the victim.

Based on all of the reports which I had from many sources, my judgment is that the victims were numbered in the hundreds of thousands all over Germany. Many of them were ultimately released. I can state with certainty that the contemporaneous accounts in foreign newspapers, such as the London Times and the American newspapers which I have seen, are accurate.

The second wave of terror was not so systematic nor so concentrated as to point of time. It was directed chiefly against the Jews, and was chiefly the result of the ruthless and occasionally violent enforcement of numerous decrees and orders, such as the Nürnberg Decrees. After the initial outbreak in March, 1933, and all through that year and the next, the Jews still in Germany had, in many cases, come to believe that things might become a little better and that they could live in some sort of peaceable relationship with the Nazis, even though they were reduced to the status of second or third class citizens. In 1935, however, the pressure on them began to increase and they began to be excluded completely from certain civil activities. The terrorism was continued all the time to some degree; but the enforcement of the new decrees in 1935 was characterized by such brutality and ruthlessness that it warrants special attention. Inadvertent violators were dealt with, for example, with great severity.

The 1938 wave of terror was a very pronounced and definite one. Again the object was the Jews, particularly the wealthy ones. The ostensible occasion was the murder of the German diplomat, von Rieth, by a French Jew, but the violence was in no sense spontaneous. Dr. Best, the Administrative Officer of the Gestapo, told me that the terror had been decided upon and ordered by Hitler himself, and that he, Dr. Best, could, therefore, do nothing about it. Actually, that statement corroborated what everyone knew. Innumerable persons with whom I talked and who witnessed the violence told me that at all of the synagogues, which had been set on fire by the Nazis, the fire departments were always present, but never acted except to prevent the fires from spreading to neighboring non-Jewish properties. Nor did the police interfere with any of these acts of vandalism and incendiarism.

I personally did not see any of the violence nor the burning of the synagogues while the acts were being perpetrated, as the mobs throughout Germany commenced to work at midnight on November 8, 1938, and carried through their activities during the early morning hours of November 9. At that time I was on my way to the Wartburg Castle, and on the day of November 9 I saw the burned synagogues and the looted and smashed shops in Eisennach, and later in Berlin. I also know that at this time many of the wealthy Jews, who had previously escaped attack, were arrested, among whom were relatives of American citizens. Pursuant to requests from the United States, some of which were transmitted through the Department of State, I personally intervened with the Gestapo through Dr. Best, and secured the return of nearly twenty victims from the Saxonhausen Concentration Camp. Among these victims were Fritz Warburg and Eugene Garbaty. I think that many, perhaps most of these people, were released in the space of ten days or two weeks with the warning that if they remained in Germany they would have cause to regret it. In all cases the victims were subjected to rough treatment. Those who returned from the concentration camp and whom I saw in my office had their hair closely clipped, a common outward sign that they had been at Saxonhausen.

The Gestapo authorities with whom I spoke on my frequent, and often daily visits to the Gestapo headquarters did not hesitate to state that they regarded Communists in particular as subversive and as an element dangerous to the State, and that it was necessary to wipe them out. Diehls, the first chief of the Gestapo, in particular, whom I saw nearly every day of the March wave of terror in 1933, made no attempt to conceal the systematic character of the roundups of what he called "subversive persons"; though he did attempt to justify it to me as necessary to the safety of the State. While denying that any violence against American citizens was contemplated, he admitted that it was being undertaken against Germans. Terroristic tactics, however, in all their various forms, were so completely and thoroughly the actuating policy, that it would have been wholly redundant to discuss it. They and I both understood that it was the mainspring of all Gestapo activity—indeed of all Nazi activity—and that it was beyond discussion.

On one occasion I received a clear and definite admission of the Nazi terroristic policy with respect to many of their victims. In 1938 I was making strenuous efforts to free a young man from a concentration camp. He had been arrested in March, 1933, for aiding certain of his comrades to escape Germany, and had been sentenced by regular courts to a sentence of 2 1/2 years. When he was released from the Brandenburg Prison at the end of that time, he was taken into custody by the Gestapo and sent to Dachau, the notorious concentration camp, and from there to Buchenwald. I had tried over a long period of time to secure his release by appeals personally to Himmler, Heydrich and Best, and had failed. In 1938, however, I was told by Ministerialrat Krohne, in the Ministry of Justice, that if I could reach Grupenfuehrer Eiche of the Totenkopfverbaende (Death's Head Regiments) I might be successful. Eiche was then the head of all German concentration camps. After having first been told officially by the Gestapo that no such person existed, I was finally able by a ruse to secure his telephone number whereupon, through the recommendation of Krohne, I was able to make an appointment with Eiche at the Saxonhausen Concentration Camp near Berlin. He told me that with respect to Communists and any other persons who were suspected of holding views contrary to the Nazi conception of the State, such persons were "Asociale", that is, impossible of social assimilation and, therefore, they must be physically eliminated from society, or destined to perpetual confinement. Thaelnman, the leader of the Communists in the Reichstag, was, as is well known, kept during the Hitler regime in perpetual confinement. His ultimate fate has never been revealed.

On another occasion I was given considerable information by a high official of the Gestapo as to the policy of the Nazis with respect to the Jews. I had had considerable contact with the head of the Jewish section of the Gestapo, known as the "Judischeabteilung des Gestapos", one Dr. Hasselbacher, in connection with making arrangements for official representatives of the American Joint Distribution Committee to visit certain Jewish centers throughout Germany, for which visits, of course, the permission of the Gestapo was necessary. These negotiations brought me frequently in touch with Dr. Hasselbacher, whom I came to know very well. He told me that Germany will be made "Judenrein", that is, clean of Jews. He said that all the Jews who failed to leave Germany would be exterminated. That statement was made in 1938 before the extermination camps were established, but the statement of Hasselbacher clearly indicated the eventual emergence of extermination camps in accordance with the general Nazi plan; for certainly the Jews were unable to leave Germany, even if they had been permitted to do so by the Nazis, as no world-wide arrangement had been made to receive them in other countries.

I had a great deal of experience with the systematic measures which were taken to confiscate property of non-Nazis, particularly Jews. Force of circumstance and a settled governmental policy made this campaign, a more gradual one. Drestic and sudden action would have lead to the alienation of a great deal of ready assets owned by the Jews and would have tended to destroy the economic value of Jewish-owned property. It would also have resulted in the physical destruction or hiding by Jews of things of value, as indeed did happen to a great extent. Consequently, the Nazis permitted many Jews, particularly those of wealth and position, to remain unmolested for many years, giving the Jews the faithless and false assurance that they were exempted from the general repressive program for various reasons. For example, I knew well the leading German cigarette manufacturer, Eugene Garbaty. Until September, 1938, he was in complete control of his fortune. During that month, however, he was compelled to sell his factory, worth between seven million and ten million marks, for the sum of one million marks. In October, 1938, his country estate near Dresden, valued probably over two million marks, was simply confiscated with no payment at all. It was to be used, as the authorities stated, for a welfare center for German Youth. After his experience in the Pogrom of November 8, 1938, Garbaty applied for a passport and received one only after paying a bribe of 500,000 marks to the corrupt Count Heldorf, Chief of Police in Berlin, and enough other fines to equal the million marks that he had received for his factory. He left Germany with nothing, except that earlier, by bribing the customs officials with approximately 250,000 marks, he had been able to get valuable art treasures out of Germany. Garbaty is now a citizen of the United States and is living in Connecticut.

Another instance of the same nature occurred with respect to my landlord, Mr. Franz Rinkel, who told me the entire story of his persecutions at the hands of the Nazis. He had a fine house at No. 2 Bruckenalle in Berlin, in which I lived. Rinkel was one of the victims sent to Saxonhausen and whom, after the space of a week, I was able to rescue. One Dr. Lilienthal, a fanatical Nazi lawyer practicing in Berlin, coveted Rinkel's house. The general system of expropriating the property of the Jews was illustrated in this particular case. My landlord was approached by Dr. Lilienthal and told the price the latter desired to pay, a mere fraction of the value of the estate. He was given a few days to make up his mind to sell at that price. He sold because he knew that if he did not, he would be accused of some trumped-up crime and taken away to the concentration camp. Dr. Lilienthal took possession of Rinkel's house. I know that on many occasions where it was thought necessary to increase the pressure, the prospective purchaser or his agent would be accompanied by a uniformed S.A. or S.S. man. I know because I lived in the immediate neighborhood and knew the individuals concerned, that Baron von Neurath, one time Foreign Minister of Germany, got his house from a Jew in this manner. Indeed, he was my next door neighbor in Dahlem. Von Neurath's house was worth approximately 250,000 dollars. I know too that Alfred Rosenburg, who lived in the same street with me, purloined a house from a Jew in similar fashion. There were, of course, innumerable instances in which Nazis used their positions in the Party to void debts and the like. An illustration of this were the cases of the persons who came to the Consulate in Berlin and informed us of the circumstances. For example, Max Schussler, an American citizen, made an affidavit which states:

"... I own several apartment houses in Berlin, one situated at Ring Strasse 11, Berlin-Steglitz. On the property at Ring Strasse 11 resides a tenant by the name of Hans Zink, who owns and operates a restaurant in those premises. He has been in arrears in his rent for about a year. Since the first of February of this year, that is, since the new Government came into power, he has refused to pay his rent. I gave instructions to the Sheriff to have him put out. Yesterday two uniformed men came to my office and spoke to my secretary and said that if I do not recall the order to the Sheriff to have Zink evicted, something will happen to me. I did not see these men. My secretary received them. She stated they wore black trousers and brown shirts. She referred them to my attorney, Felix Szkolny, Charlottenstrasse 17, Berlin S. W. 68. They went to the attorney, but he refused to give the order. They came to my office again and said to my secretary that if I did not give the order in writing and hand it over to a certain address within an hour's time, something would happen. I then called the police station at Alexandrinenstrasse 134, Revier No. 113, and a police officer came to my office and accompanied me to a taxi, when I went home.

About a week before, it may be noted, Zink had come to my office and insisted on my rescinding the order of eviction, and said, "I care nothing about law; we are now in power, remember that. Do anything you please, I am not going out of the office until you cancel the order". I called the police, and an officer came. Zink said, "I do not care what you say". After about ten minutes the officer put him out.

At two o'clock Tuesday morning, March 7, I was awakened and faced by two men with pistols, who had come into the house. They were allowed to enter by the janitress, as they claimed to be "Hilfspolizei", and also by my maid. These two men were accompanied by two others in civilian clothes, the former wearing the brown. National Socialist uniforms. They said, "Here, dress yourselves, quick too". My wife asked them to turn about while she dressed, but they refused. She was compelled to remove her night gown at the point of a revolver and stand naked before the intruders. When she protested they said, "Don't be theatrical". My wife then wanted to telephone, but they said, "No, sit down. Do not touch the telephone", while they kept their pistols pointed at us all the time. I sat down. One of them said, "Have you got a fountain pen? You sign that". I had to sign the order to the Sheriff cancelling the order of eviction, and had to sign another letter to the tenant Zink, stating that the order of eviction was called off. I hesitated to sign and they drew their revolvers on me, and my wife in terror fell to her knees, and then I signed. I asked if they had credentials, and they pointed to the "Hakenkreuz" on their sleeves and said that was their credentials. They then said, "If you recall that order tomorrow, you will be dead". After I signed, they left . . ."

Actually, all Nazis used their positions in the Party as a means of enriching themselves. I have already spoken of the bribe to the customs officials and the Foreign Office officials, which Mr. Garbaty was compelled to pay. Another instance of the venality of the Nazi officials was illustrated in the case of Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who owned a house near me and whom I knew well. He was told by Count Heldorf, Chief of Police in Berlin, through his stooge, one Herr Schmidt, that his passport would cost him 250,000 marks. Bartholdy told me the facts and asked me if he should pay. Knowing the Nazi practices and the danger which he ran as a Jew in Germany, I advised him to pay. He did, got his passport and visa, and left Germany. This happened in November, 1938.

I was informed by a personal friend, a Jewish banker in Berlin, Herr Kempner, whom I believed to be qualified to make an accurate estimate, that the total confiscations from Jews in Germany was between seven and eight billion marks.

I had less experience with the manner in which the Nazis operated in industrial firms. However, from the accounts of numerous American businessmen with manufacturing plants in Germany, accounts which agreed with the information which I had with respect to similar activities in German factories, I know that the Nazis used their Party position to obtain authority and power. Many American businessmen told me that they had serious troubles operating their factories because the Nazi officials in the establishment, usually recruited from the workmen, attempted to take over the management themselves, and engaged consistently and ruthlessly in acts of persecution against non-Nazi workmen. Many German firms were actually dominated by fanatical Nazis, usually persons who had had no previous position of importance, such as janitors, timekeepers and the like. Their position in the Nazi hierarchy gave them importance in the enterprise out of all proportion to their standing and position.

Raymond H. Geist

Subscribed and sworn to before me William L. Brewster, Vice Consul of the United States of America, duly commissioned and qualified,
in Mexico, D. F., Mexico, this 28th day of August 1945.

William L. Brewster
William L. Brewster
Vice Consul of the United States of America
Service No. 6684
Tariff No. 38
No fee prescribed.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. XXVIII, pp. 234–254, Doc. 1759-PS.

97. MEMO FROM ALFRED ROSENBERG: DIRECTIONS FOR THE HANDLING OF THE JEWISH QUESTION, N.D.

This memorandum regarding handling of the Jews in the Eastern occupied provinces, meaning the occupied territory in Russia, was written by Alfred Rosenberg, a Hitler confidant and driver of Nazi ideology. Of note is the very broad definition of the term "Jew" that is to be used: a person who belongs to the Jewish religion, has been "recognized as Jewish by other circumstances" (neither "recognized" nor "other circumstances" is explained), or has a parent who is deemed to be Jewish according to either of those requirements. As in Germany, Austria, and other occupied territory, Rosenberg requires that they must be registered, separated from the rest of the population, marked by a yellow Jewish star on their clothing, and put into ghettos. They must be eliminated from cultural, political, and economic activities, and removed from government and all of the professions. Jews are to be used for heavy slave labor to rebuild the occupied Eastern provinces, although whatever work they are assigned must be such that it will be able to continue unimpeded if there is a "rapid withdrawal" of the Jewish laborers.

COPY

Directions for the handling of the Jewish question

1. In General. The competency of the Chief of the Security Police and Security Service, who is charged with the mission of solving the European Jewish question, extends even to the occupied eastern provinces. Accordingly, the offices under the Security Police for the purpose of handling the Jewish question in the occupied eastern provinces are qualified for their present sphere of activity.

In the individual Reichs commissariats, and within these, in the General commissariats, Jewry represents a portion of the population which is very varied in strength. For example, millions of Jews live in White Russia and in the Ukraine who have lived here for generations. In the central province of the USSR however, the Jews have moved in, for by far the greatest part, during Bolshevistic times. Those Russian Jews who followed in the wake of the invading Red Army of 1939 and 1940 to East Poland, West Ukraine, West White Russia, the Baltic lands, Bessarabia, and Buchenland are one particular group.

All measures for the Jewish question in the occupied eastern provinces must be met with the point of view that the whole Jewish question will be solved in general for all of Europe after the war at the latest. They are therefore to be instituted as preparatory partial measures and must be in agreement with those decisions which may otherwise be met in this field. This is especially true for the preparation of at least temporary reception centers for Jews from the Reich province.

An eventual act by the civilian population against the Jews is not to be prevented as long as this is compatible with the maintenance of order and security in the rear of the fighting troops. Namely retaliatory measures are to be allowed against the Jews who come into the provinces which were newly occupied by the Red Army in the last few years. However, strict measures are to be taken against street mobs and other evil elements for whom it concerns only plunder of Jewish stores and stealing Jewish property for their own personal gain.

2. Definition of the term "Jew". The peaceful settlement of the Jewish question requires the previous determining as to who is to be considered a Jew in the occupied Eastern provinces. In reference to the solving of the European Jewish question and to the strong influence which Jewry had upon the remaining Russian population until the invasion of German troops, and which it still exercises at present, it appears necessary from a political, as well as from a popular point of view, for the purpose of avoiding a later regaining of strength of the Jews, to grasp the term "Jew" in the most far-reaching sense.

Therefore, he is a Jew, who belongs to the Jewish religion, or has been recognized as Jewish by other circumstances; he who has a parent who is a Jew in accordance with the above sentence is also a Jew.

3. Comprehension, mark of recognition, suspension of the rights of freedom and segregation. The first main goal of the German measures must be strict segregation of Jewry from the rest of the population. In the execution of this, first of all is the seizing of the Jewish populace by the introduction of a registration order and similar appropriate measures. Soviet Jewry has, constantly, attempted, since the Bolshevistic Revolution, to disguise itself in order to unobtrusively move into leading positions, especially in the grain regions of the USSR. For this purpose many Jews have dropped their Jewish names and have taken Russian family names and Russian surnames. It is to be decreed, that the person who must register must report all changes of name by Jews during his lifetime, or as far as he knows during the time of his forefathers, to his superior and to make them retrogressive. The same goes for previous departure from the religious congregation and acceptance of other faiths (other manifold). The erasure of the Jewish deception will be easier in the Reich commissariat Eastland and Ukraine, where the larger part of the Jews have been living for generations than in the other Reichs commissariats. The Soviet archive material, in so far as it is preserved, is to be brought to use for this.

Then immediately, the wearing of the recognition sign consisting of a yellow Jewish star is to be brought about and all rights of freedom for Jews are to be withdrawn. They are to be placed in Ghettos and at the same time are to be separated according to sexes. The presence of many more or less closed Jewish settlements in White Ruthenia and in the Ukraine makes this mission easier. Moreover, places are to be chosen which make possible the full use of the Jewish manpower in case labor needs are present. These Ghettos can be placed under the supervision of a Jewish self-government with Jewish officials. The guarding of the boundaries between the Ghettos and the outer world is, however, the duty of the police.

Also in the cases in which a Ghetto could not yet be established, care is to be taken through strict prohibitions and similar suitable measures that a further intermingling of blood of the Jews and the rest of the populace does not continue.

4. Removal of the Jewish influence in political, economical cultural and social fields. Relative with the measures to segregate the Jews physically from the rest of the populace, everything necessary is to be used in order to eliminate every influence of the Jewry upon the Russian people. This is to happen immediately in political and cultural fields, whereas in all other cases consideration is to be taken that the common interests are not impaired. This is especially true for the economic missions which are important due to the demands of the war and those which concern the national economy.

An entire reconversion of Jewish professional life must be brought about insofar as it does not deal with manual laborers. The group of State employees in the Russian government along with the strongest Jewish professional groups shall vanish entirely. Likewise, similar professional groups are to be divorced from the public life, whereby, however, the tempo of these measures must correspond with the general economical and social need.

The entire Jewish property is to be seized and confiscated with exception of that which is necessary for a bare existence.

As far as the economical situation permits, the power of disposal of their property is to be taken from the Jews as soon as possible through orders and other measures given by the commissariat, so that the moving of property will quickly cease.

Any cultural activity will be completely forbidden to the Jew. This includes the outlawing of the Jewish press, the Jewish theatres and schools.

The slaughtering of animals according to Jewish rites is also to be prohibited.

5. Forced Labor. The present manpower shortage in the occupied eastern territories as well as ideological-political considerations make the demand appear of basic significance to introduce forced labor commitment in the strictest form. This will have to take place move by move by the elimination of the Jews from their professional life although they are to be permitted to work in their own occupations if they fall within the scope of the labor commitment. Moreover, the Jewish manpower is to be used for heavy manual labor.

The standing rule for the Jewish labor employment is the complete and unyielding use of Jewish manpower regardless of age in the reconstruction of the occupied eastern territories. The missions, which are to be given to the Jews in their labor employment, are especially the highway, railroad and canal construction, as far as the ameliorations, etc. are considered. Also, it seems that agricultural employment above all, will be brought about under strict supervision. Nothing is to be done against the employment of the Jews in cutting of wood, production of straw shoes, brooms and brushes within the Ghettos.

In the employment of the Jews, care is to be taken that Jewish labor is only so used in those productions which will later suffer no noticeable interruption in case of a rapid withdrawal of these labor forces, and which excludes a specialization of Jewish workers. It is to be avoided in every case that Jewish workers become indispensable in essential production.

6. Violations. Violations against German measures, especially against the forced labor regulations, are to be punishable by death to the Jews. All violations are to be dealt with by courtmartial.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 222–225, Doc. 212-PS.

98. REINHARD HEYDRICH'S INSTRUCTIONS ON JEWS IN OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, INCLUDING GHETTOIZATION, SEPTEMBER 21, 1939

Shortly after Germany's invasion of Poland and the start of World War II, Reinhard Heydrich, chief of the Security Police, issued these instructions to the heads of the Einsatzgruppen, mobile killing units that followed behind the German army as it moved east. Their primary role was to kill all Jews and communists they encountered. Heydrich's instructions call for the movement of Jews into "concentration centers," each to be administered by a Council of Jewish Elders (Judenrat) which is to be made "fully responsible (in the literal sense of the word) for the exact execution . . . of all instructions." In evacuating Jews into the concentration centers, care must be taken that doing so does not disrupt critical economic needs, such as the needs of the army. Heydrich also speaks of the "Aryanization" of Jewish factories, meaning they are to be expropriated for the use of the Reich. Further, the leaders of each Einsatzgruppe must provide certain information to Heydrich, such as a census of the Jews in each concentration center, and a survey of Jewish industries in their territory.

COPY

Berlin, 21 September 1939

The Chief of the Security Police
PP (II)—288/39 secret
Special Delivery Letter

To The Chiefs of all detail groups [Einsatzgruppen] of the Security Police.

Concerning: The Jewish problem in the occupied zone.

I refer to the conference held in Berlin today, and again point out that the planned joint measures (i.e. the ultimate goal) are to be kept strictly secret.

Distinction must be made between

- (1) the ultimate goal (which requires a prolonged period of time) and
- (2) the sectors leading to fulfillment of the ultimate goal, (each of which will be carried out in a short term).

The planned measures require thorough preparation both in technique and in the economic aspect.

Obviously the tasks at hand cannot be laid down in detail from here. The following instructions and directives serve at the same time for the purpose of urging chiefs of the detail groups to practical consideration of problems.

I

The first prerequisite for the ultimate goal is first of all, the concentration of the Jews from the country to the larger cities.

This is to be carried out speedily. In doing so distinction must be made:

- (1) between the zones of Danzig and West Prussia. Poznan, Eastern Upper Silesia; and
- (2) the other occupied zone.

If possible, the zone mentioned under item 1 shall be cleared completely of Jews, or at least the aim should be to form as few concentration centers as possible.

In the zones mentioned under item 2, there shall be established as few concentration points as possible so that future measures may be accomplished more easily. One must keep in mind that only such cities are chosen as concentration points which are located either at railroad junctions or at least along a railroad.

On principle, all Jewish communities under 500 heads are to be dissolved and to be transferred to the nearest concentration center.

This decree does not count for the zone of detail group I, which is located East of Cracow and bounded by Bolanico, Jaroskaw, the new demarcation line and the previous Polish-Slovakian border. Within this zone merely an improvised census of Jews should be carried out. Furthermore, Councils of Jewish Elders as discussed below are to be set up.

II

Councils of Jewish Elders

(1) In each Jewish community, a Council of Jewish Elders is to be set up which, as far as possible, is to be composed of the remaining influential personalities and rabbis. The Council is to be composed of 24 male Jews (depending on the size of the Jewish community).

It is to be made fully responsible (in the literal sense of the word) for the exact execution according to terms of all instructions released or yet to be released.

(2) In case of sabotage of such instructions, the Councils are to be warned of severest measures.

(3) The Jewish Councils are to take an improvised census of the Jews of their area, possibly divided into generations (according to age)

- a. up to 16 years of age,
- b. from 16 to 20 years of age,
- c. and those above and also according to the principal vocations—and they are to report the results in the shortest possible time.

(4) The Councils of Elders are to be made acquainted with the time and date of the evacuation, the evacuation possibilities and finally the evacuation routes. They are, then, to be made personally responsible for the evacuation of the Jews from the country.

The reason to be given for the concentration of the Jews to the cities is that Jews have most decisively participated in sniper attacks and plundering.

(5) The Councils of Elders of the concentration centers are to be made responsible for the proper housing of the Jews to be brought in from the country. The concentration of Jews in the cities for general reasons of security will probably bring about orders to forbid Jews to enter certain wards of that city altogether, and that in consideration of economic necessity they cannot for instance leave the ghetto, they cannot go out after a designated evening hour, etc.

(6) The Council of Elders is also to be made responsible for the adequate maintenance of the Jews on the transport to the cities.

No scruples are to be voiced, if the migrating Jews take with them all their movable possessions, as far as that is technically at all possible.

(7) Jews who do not comply with the order to move into cities are to be given a short additional period of grace when there is good reason. They are to be warned of strictest penalty if they should not comply by the appointed time.

III

All necessary measures, on principle, are always to be taken up in closest agreement and collaboration with the German civil administration and the competent local authorities.

In the execution of this plan, care must be taken that economic security suffer no harm in the occupied zones.

(1) The needs of the army, should particularly be kept in mind e.g. it will not be possible to avoid leaving behind here and there some Jews engaged in trade who absolutely must be left behind for the maintenance of the troops, for lack of any other way out. In such cases, the immediate aryization of these plants is to be planned for and the emigration of the Jews is to be completed later in agreement with the competent local German administrative authorities.

(2) For the preservation of German economic interests in the occupied territories it is self understood that Jewish war and ordinary industries and factories and those important to the 4-Year Plan must be kept going for the time being.

In these cases also, immediate Aryization must be planned for and the emigration of the Jews must be completed later.

(3) Finally, the food situation in the occupied territories must be taken into consideration. For instance, as far as possible, real estate of Jewish settlers should be provisionally entrusted to the care of neighboring German or even Polish peasants to be worked by them in order to insure harvesting of the crops still in the fields, or cultivation.

In regard to this important question contact should be made with the agricultural experts of the (C.d.Z.).

(4) In all cases in which a conformity of interests of the Security Police [Sicherheitspolizei] on the one hand, and the German civil administration on the other hand, can be reached,

I am to be informed of the individual measures in question as quickly as possible before their execution and my decision is to be awaited.

IV

The Chiefs of the detail groups [Einsatzgruppen] are to report to me continuously on the following matters:

(1) Numerical survey on the Jews present in their territories (if possible according to the above mentioned classification).

The number of Jews who are evacuated from the country and those who are already in cities are to be listed separately.

(2) Names of cities which have been designated as concentration points.

(3) The time set for the Jews to be evacuated to the cities.

(4) Survey of all Jewish war and ordinary industries and factories or those important to the 4-Year Plan in their territory.

If possible the following should be specified:

- a. Kind of factory (also statement on possible reconversion of factory to really vital or war-important factories or those important to the 4-Year Plan);

- b. which factories should be most urgently Aryanized (in order to avoid loss); what kind of Aryanization is suggested? Germans or Poles, (the decision depends on the importance of the factory);
- c. number of Jews working in these factories (include leading positions).

Will it be possible to keep the factory going after the Jews have been removed or will German or Polish workers respectively have to be assigned for that purpose? To what extent?

If Polish workers have to be used, care should be taken that they are mainly taken from the former German provinces in order to somewhat ease the problem there. These questions can only be solved by incorporation and participation of the labor offices [Arbeitsämter] which have been set up.

V

For the fulfillment of the goal set, I expect the full cooperation of all forces of the Security Police [Sicherheitspolizei] and the Security Service [Sicherheitsdienst].

The Chiefs of the neighboring detail groups shall immediately establish contact with each other in order to be able to cover completely the territories in question.

VI

The High Command of the Army [OKH]; the commissioner for the 4-Year Plan, (c/o State Secretary Neumann) (Staatssekretär); the Reich Minister of the interior (c/o State Secretary Stuckart); the Reich Ministry for Food and Economy [für Ernährung und Wirtschaft] (c/o State Secretary Landfried); as well as the Chief of the civil administration of the occupied territories have received copies of this decree.

Signed: Heydrich
 Certified:
 signed: Schmidt
 Office employe.

Responsible for correct copy signed: signature

Major on the General Staff (Major i. G.)

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VI, pp. 97–101, Doc. 3363-PS.1222.

99. AKTION T-4: SERMON BY BISHOP CLEMENS AUGUST GRAF VON GALEN, AUGUST 3, 1941

Although the Nazis tried to keep it secret, it was almost inevitable that the program established by them to kill individuals determined to have “lives not worthy of living” (Aktion T-4, or the Euthanasia Program) would become known: too many families were receiving the same notices that their loved ones—patients with a physical or mental handicap—had suddenly died of, for example, the measles for there not to be concern about what had happened to them. Clemens August Graf von Galen, at the time the Bishop of Münster, and later to become a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, had heard the same stories from his parishioners. On August 3, 1941, he gave a sermon that took on the Aktion T-4 program with blunt terms that called what the Nazis were doing a violation of the most basic commandment, “Thou shalt not kill.” He denounced the program in such strong terms that Nazi leadership considered having him arrested, but did not do so for fear that the people of Münster would no longer support the regime. For his courageous stand against the Nazi program and other acts, von Galen was beatified by Pope Benedict XVI in 2005.

Dearly beloved Christians! The joint pastoral letter of the German bishops, which was read in all Catholic churches in Germany on 26 June 1941, includes the following words.

“It is true that in Catholic ethics there are certain positive commandments which cease to be obligatory if their observance would be attended by unduly great difficulties; but there are also sacred obligations of conscience from which no one can release us; which we must carry out even if it should cost us our life. Never, under any circumstances, may a man, save in war or in legitimate self-defence, kill an innocent person.”

I had occasion on 6th July to add the followings comments on this passage in the joint pastoral letter:

“For some months we have been hearing reports that inmates of establishments for the care of the mentally ill who have been ill for a long period and perhaps appear incurable have been forcibly removed from these establishments on orders from Berlin. Regularly the relatives receive soon afterwards an intimation that the patient is dead, that the patient’s body has been cremated and that they can collect the ashes. There is a general suspicion, verging on certainty that these numerous unexpected deaths of the mentally ill do not occur naturally but are intentionally brought about in accordance with the doctrine that it is legitimate to destroy a so-called “worthless life”—in other words to kill innocent men and women, if it is thought that their lives are of no further value to the people and the state. A terrible doctrine which seeks to justify the murder of innocent people, which legitimises the violent killing of disabled persons who are no longer capable of work, of cripples, the incurably ill and the aged and infirm!”

I am reliably informed that in hospitals and homes in the province of Westphalia lists are being prepared of inmates who are classified as “unproductive members of the national community” and are to be removed from these establishments and shortly thereafter killed. The first party of patients left the mental hospital at Marienthal, near Münster, in the course of this week.

German men and women! Article 211 of the German Penal Code is still in force, in these terms: “Whoever kills a man of deliberate intent is guilty of murder and punishable with death”. No doubt in order to protect those who kill with intent these poor men and women, members of our families, from this punishment laid down by law, the patients who have been selected for killing are removed from their home area to some distant place. Some illness or other is then given as the cause of death. Since the body is immediately cremated, the relatives and the criminal police are unable to establish whether the patient had in fact been ill or what the cause of death actually was. I have been assured, however, that in the Ministry of the Interior and the office of the Chief Medical Officer, Dr Conti, no secret is made of the fact that indeed a large number of mentally ill persons in Germany have already been killed with intent and that this will continue.

Article 139 of the Penal Code provides that “anyone who has knowledge of an intention to commit a crime against the life of any person . . . and fails to inform the authorities or the person whose life is threatened in due time . . . commits a punishable offence”. When I learned of the intention to remove patients from Marienthal I reported the matter on 28th July to the State Prosecutor of Münster Provincial Court and to the Münster chief of police by registered letter, in the following terms:

“According to information I have received it is planned in the course of this week (the date has been mentioned as 31st July) to move a large number of inmates of the provincial hospital at Marienthal, classified as ‘unproductive members of the national community’, to the mental hospital at Eichberg, where, as is generally believed to have happened in the case of patients removed from other establishments, they are to be killed with intent. Since such action is not only contrary to the divine and the natural moral law but under article 211 of the German Penal Code ranks as murder and attracts the death penalty, I hereby report the matter in accordance with my obligation under article 139 of the Penal Code and request that steps should at once be taken to protect the patients concerned by proceedings against the authorities planning their removal and murder, and that I may be informed of the action taken”.

I have received no information of any action by the State Prosecutor or the police.

. . .

We must expect, therefore, that the poor defenceless patients are, sooner or later, going to be killed. Why? Not because they have committed any offence justifying their death, not because, for example, they have attacked a nurse or attendant, who would be entitled in legitimate self-defence to meet violence with violence. In such a case the use of violence leading to death is permitted and may be called for, as it is in the case of killing an armed enemy.

No: these unfortunate patients are to die, not for some such reason as this but because in the judgment of some official body, on the decision of some committee, they have become “unworthy to live,” because they are classed as “unproductive members of the national community”.

The judgment is that they can no longer produce any goods: they are like an old piece of machinery which no longer works, like an old horse which has become incurably lame, like a cow which no longer gives any milk. What happens to an old piece of machinery? It is thrown on the scrap heap. What happens to a lame horse, an unproductive cow?

I will not pursue the comparison to the end—so fearful is its appropriateness and its illuminating power.

But we are not here concerned with pieces of machinery; we are not dealing with horses and cows, whose sole function is to serve mankind, to produce goods for mankind. They may be broken up; they may be slaughtered when they no longer perform this function.

No: We are concerned with men and women, our fellow creatures, our brothers and sisters! Poor human beings, ill human beings, they are unproductive, if you will. But does that mean that they have lost the right to live? Have you, have I, the right to live only so long as we are productive, so long as we are recognised by others as productive?

If the principle that men is entitled to kill his unproductive fellow-man is established and applied, then woe betide all of us when we become aged and infirm! If it is legitimate to kill unproductive members of the community, woe betide the disabled who have sacrificed their health or their limbs in the productive process! If unproductive men and women can be disposed of by violent means, woe betide our brave soldiers who return home with major disabilities as cripples, as invalids! If it is once admitted that men have the right to kill “unproductive” fellow-men—even though it is at present applied only to poor and defenceless mentally ill patients—then the way is open for the murder of all unproductive men and women: the incurably ill, the handicapped who are unable to work, those disabled in industry or war. The way is open, indeed, for the murder of all of us when we become old and infirm and therefore unproductive. Then it will require only a secret order to be issued that the procedure which has been tried and tested with the mentally ill should be extended to other “unproductive” persons, that it should also be applied to those suffering from incurable tuberculosis, the aged and infirm, persons disabled in industry, soldiers with disabling injuries!

Then no man will be safe: some committee or other will be able to put him on the list of “unproductive” persons, who in their judgment have become “unworthy to live”. And there will be no police to protect him, no court to avenge his murder and bring his murderers to justice.

Who could then have any confidence in a doctor? He might report a patient as unproductive and then be given instructions to kill him! It does not bear thinking of, the moral depravity, the universal mistrust which will spread even in the bosom of the family, if this terrible doctrine is tolerated, accepted and put into practice. Woe betide mankind, woe betide our German people, if the divine commandment, “Thou shalt not kill”, which the Lord proclaimed on Sinai amid thunder and lightning, which God our Creator wrote into man’s conscience from the beginning, if this commandment is not merely violated but the violation is tolerated and remains unpunished!

I will give you an example of what is happening. One of the patients in Marienthal was a man of 55, a farmer from a country parish in the Münster region—I could give you his name—who has suffered for some years from mental disturbance and was therefore admitted to Marienthal hospital. He was not mentally ill in the full sense: he could receive visits and was always happy, when his relatives came to see him. Only a fortnight ago he was visited by his wife and one of his sons, a soldier on home leave from the front. The son is much attached to his father, and the parting was a sad one: no one can tell, whether the soldier will return and see his father again, since he may fall in battle for his country. The son, the soldier, will certainly never again see his father on earth, for he has since then been put on the list of the “unproductive”. A relative, who wanted to visit the father this week in Marienthal, was turned away with the information that the patient had been transferred elsewhere on the instructions of the Council of State for National Defence. No information could be given about where he had been sent, but the relatives would be informed within a few days. What information will they be given? The same as in other cases of the kind? That the man has died, that his body has been cremated, that the ashes will be handed over on payment of a fee? Then the soldier, risking his life in the field for his fellow-countrymen, will not see his father again on earth, because fellow-countrymen at home have killed him.

...

Source: Bishop von Galen, “Three Sermons in Defiance of the Nazis,” The Church in History Information Centre, http://www.churchinhistory.org/pages/booklets/vongalen\(n\).htm.htm). Used by permission.

100. THE BLACK BOOK OF POLAND, REGARDING GHETTOS AND DECREE ON COMPULSORY LABOR, OCTOBER 26, 1939

The Black Book of Poland is an unusual resource. It lists and describes Nazi actions against the Poles from October 1939 to June 1941. It was published in English by G. P. Putnam’s Sons of New York in 1942. Thus, it was a virtually contemporaneous record of arrests, deportations, and killings of Poles, both Jewish and non-Jewish. Its publication makes clear that the Allied countries had a detailed and compelling look at the reality of Nazi oppression and atrocities in the opening years of World War II. This excerpt describes several aspects of life under Nazi control: the conditions in the “Lublin Reservation,” a section of the Generalgouvernement in Poland, as part of a plan to remove Jews from the Reich and resettle Germans in their place; the establishment of the Warsaw, Łódź, and Cracow ghettos; and the terrible health conditions in those ghettos. The excerpt concludes with two decrees addressing the introduction of compulsory labor in the “Government General," one for the Polish population, and one for the Jewish population.

THE BLACK BOOK OF POLAND

[Page 236]

The Lublin Reservation

In a speech on 10 October 1939, Hitler hinted at a general solution of the Jewish problem as one of his war aims, but he did not go into details. Soon afterwards, the establishment of a so-called "Jewish reservation" in the Lublin area was begun. It is significant that the Nazis themselves have written almost nothing about this "reservation." Only through neutral sources did it leak out that large numbers of Jews were being transferred from Western Poland, Bohemia, and Austria to the Lublin area.

"The haste with which the reservation has been established out of nothing is leading to desperate situations. Sometimes trains drive on for 40 kilometers beyond Lublin and halt in the open country, where the Jews alight with their luggage and have to find themselves primitive accommodations in the surrounding villages. Up to November 10 about 45,000 Jewish men, women, and children from Cieszyn, Bogumin, Moravska Ostrava, Prague, Pilsno, other towns of the Protectorate, and from Vienna and the new Reich provinces, Danzig-Westpreussen and Posen-Warthegeau, have been sent to the reservation. Under the supervision of men of the SS-Death's-head Corps, the Jews are compelled to work at road-building, draining marshes, and rebuilding the damaged villages. There is compulsory labour service for men up to seventy years and for women up to fifty-five." (Luxemburger Wort, 21 November 1939.)

"Up to now some 8,000 persons, one-third of them women and children, have been transported to the resettlement camps in the Jewish reservation. These camps are about 15-20 km. from Niske, a Polish town on the San which suffered severely in the war. These camps are completely isolated behind high barbed wire fences and the Gestapo maintains a strict control over them." (National-Zeitung, Basle, 7 November 1939.)

The methods adopted when Jews are transported to this reservation can be gathered from a letter sent by the Israelitische Kultusgemeinde Wien to those of the Viennese Jews who were chosen by the authorities to be transported to Lublin. It runs:

"By order of the authorities a large transport of Jews, fit to work, up to fifty years of age, will go to Poland on October 18, 1939, to start colonizing work. You have been chosen by the authorities to go with this transport and you have to appear on October 17, 1939, at 6 AM in * * *. Every person in this transport is permitted to take with him clothes and equipment up to 50 kg in weight. Every person is allowed to take money up to 300 marks. It is of the greatest importance that all concerned should take builders' tools with them, such as mallets, saws, planes, hammers, and nails, and when reporting, an exact statement must be made as to which of these tools you can provide. Should you disobey this summons, which has been issued by the State authorities, you will have to face the consequences." (See photograph No. 54.)

[Page 241]

The Ghetto in Warsaw

When the ghetto idea was adopted finally, it was carried out with German thoroughness. At first, a few weeks after the occupation, the German authorities had tried to drive all the Jews in Warsaw into a ghetto.

The Warsaw Jews, by payment of a heavy fine, were able to avoid the overhasty establishment of the ghetto, which would have created very difficult problems. This fine, however, did not achieve anything more than postponement.

Already in April 1940, the area destined for the ghetto was called "the closed, contaminated area" and was surrounded by walls. In October last the Governor of Warsaw, Fischer, and his delegate, Leist, issued a series of orders defining the limits of the ghetto, ordering the concentration of Jews from all over Warsaw within these limits, and the expulsion from the newly formed ghetto of all Aryans. These migrations had to take place before 31 October 1940. Thus 110,000 Jews and 80,000 Poles were given 12 days in which to move. Both Poles and Jews hurried to migrate, although the removals were very difficult and expensive in view of the many houses destroyed and of the lack of means of transport. The time limit had to be postponed until 15 November 1940. Meanwhile the limits of the ghetto were twice changed, on one occasion being reduced, on the other enlarged. For various reasons the most fantastic enclaves were made. For instance, the market halls, the Law Courts in Leszne Street, and many works under German direction were not included in the ghetto, although they are in the heart of the old Jewish district. As a result, both Poles and Jews had to move several times. The Jews who were removed to the ghetto were forbidden to take anything with them with the exception of hand luggage.

On 16 November, the ghetto was closed without any warning. An 8-foot high concrete wall was built to enclose the district. The supplies of food to the ghetto were stopped. The German police confiscated the food carried to the ghetto by Poles, and also the food, transported by Poles in tramcars, passing through the ghetto. Food prices in the ghetto soared. When the ghetto was closed the German police started practicing endless chicanery towards the Jews. The Jews had to take off their hats to German policemen. They were ordered to exercise with bricks or concrete slabs in their hands, to climb telephone poles, to wash in the gutters, etc. The police shot at sight Poles or Jews who tried to get food into the ghetto (about 20 Jews and Poles were killed). Germans in uniform rob the homes of the richer Jews (in the Leszne and Ogradowa Street), taking away furniture, money, and even food.

[Page 243]

The Ghetto in Lodz

Warsaw is by no means the only place where the Jews have been herded into a ghetto. The same process took place in many other towns with large Jewish populations, although it was not tackled everywhere with the same thoroughness as in Warsaw. A very similar position to that in Warsaw has developed at Lodz. This big industrial town of Central Poland was formally annexed by Germany and even given a new name "Litzmannstadt."

[Page 244]

On 30 April the Jewish quarter in the northern part of Lodz was finally barred off. Here all the Jews of the town were compelled to live. Again, of course, hygienic reasons were given for this step. But it is admitted that economic reasons too had influenced the Germans to introduce this measure. Jews had played an important part in the economic life of Lodz and had contributed to the importance of this town as an industrial center.

In order to get hold of businesses founded by Jews and to rob them of the raw material in their possession, the ghetto plan proved very convenient. This is openly admitted in the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung of 13 October 1940.

[Page 246]

The Ghetto of Cracow

At the beginning of 1941 the German authorities decided to organize a ghetto in Cracow. Originally, as already said, the Germans intended to expel the Jews from Cracow altogether, and in fact a large number were so expelled. Later a decision was taken to leave same 20,000 Jews in the city. Part of a suburb of Cracow, Podgozre, situated on the right bank of the river Vistula, has been assigned as the ghetto area. The Poles living in this area have been ordered to shift to other parts of the city. The general order issued by Dr. Frank was applied to Cracow in a decree issued by the Chief of the Cracow district on 3 March and published in the Krakauer Zeitung of 6 March 1941. This decree provides for the creation of a special closed ghetto district in Cracow.

[Page 247]

Health in the Ghetto

No official figures have been published relating to the hygienic conditions in occupied Poland, but occasionally notes and articles in the German press reveal that health conditions, particularly in the Jewish quarters, are anything but good. Considering that the Jews are all but starving, this is hardly surprising. According to the Hamburger Fremdenblatt of 29 October 1940, 98 percent of the cases of typhoid and spotted fever in Warsaw were in the ghetto. The delegation of the American Joint Distribution Committee reported that all but 8 percent of the typhoid cases in Warsaw were among the Jewish population. Diseases due to malnutrition and overcrowding are used by the Nazis as a pretext for slandering the Jews and for further restrictions. The head of the Health Department in the "Government General," for instance, issued an order in March 1940, to the effect that in future Jews could only be attended by Jewish doctors.

The catastrophic condition of food supplies and terrible housing and sanitary conditions in the ghetto are causing a very high mortality, which is increasing with every month. In May 1941, the figure was 5,000, which is equal to 120 per thousand per annum. This is a twelvefold increase over the prewar rate. As the birthrate has fallen to a minimum, there is not only no annual increase, but even a decline in the population. But this is more than offset by the continual influx of Jews compulsorily deported from the provincial towns, where the Germans do not propose to set up separate Jewish quarters.

[Page 571]

Decree Concerning the Introduction of Compulsory Labor for the Polish Population of the "Government General"

Dated October 26, 1939

1210 Establishing Jewish Councils (Judenrat)

Section 1

(1) All Polish inhabitants of the “Government General” between the ages of 18 and 60 years are subject to compulsory public labor with immediate effect.

Section 3

(2) Compulsory public labor comprises, in particular, work in agricultural concerns, the building and maintenance of public buildings, the construction of roads, waterways and railways, the regulation of rivers and land work.

[Page 572]

Section 4

(1) The payment of persons subject to compulsory labor shall be effected at rates that may be fair.

(2) The welfare of persons subject to compulsory labor and their families shall be secured as far as possible.

Section 5

The regulations required for the execution of the present Decree shall be issued by the Director of the Department of Labor in the office of the “Government General.”

Warsaw, October 28, 1939.

[Page 573]

Decree Concerning the Introduction of Compulsory Labor for the Jewish Population of the “Government General”

Dated October 26, 1939

Section 1

Compulsory labor for the Jews domiciled in the “Government General” shall be introduced with immediate effect. The Jews shall for this purpose be formed into forced labor groups.

Section 2

The prescriptions required for the execution of the present Decree shall be issued by the higher SS and police leader. He may define territories east of the Vistula in which the execution of the present Decree shall be waived.

Warsaw, October 26, 1939.

The Governor-General for the Occupied Polish Territories
Frank

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 332–337, Doc. 2613-PS.

101. ESTABLISHING JEWISH COUNCILS (JUDENRAT), NOVEMBER 28, 1939

In September 1939, shortly after the German invasion of Poland, Reinhard Heydrich, chief of the Security Police, issued instructions for the movement of Jews into “concentration centers,” with a Council of Jewish Elders (Judenrat) responsible for the administration of those centers and the execution of orders from the Germans. The ordinance that follows was issued five weeks later, this time by Hans Frank, governor-general of the Generalgouvernement, the section of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into Germany. It mirrors Heydrich’s earlier instructions, requiring the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) representing each Jewish community. It stipulates that in communities of 10,000 Jews or less, the council will consist of 12 Jews, but for larger communities, the number is doubled to 24. It warns, as did Heydrich’s earlier instructions, that the Judenrat is responsible for the execution of orders from the Germans.

Pursuant to § 5, Section 1, of the Decree of the Führer and Reich Chancellor on the Administration of the Occupied Polish Territories, of October 12, 1939 (Reichgesetzblatt I, p. 2077), I issue this ordinance:

Section 1

In each municipality a body representing the Jews will be formed.

Section 2

This body representing the Jews will be known as the Jewish Council. In communities with up to 10,000 inhabitants, it will consist of 12 Jews, and in communities with more than 10,000 inhabitants, of 24 Jews, drawn from the resident population. The Judenrat will be elected by the Jews of the community. If a member of the Judenrat ceases to serve, a new member is to be elected immediately.

Section 3

The Judenrat will elect a chairman and a deputy from among its members.

Section 4

1. After these elections, which must be completed no later than December 31, 1939, the Judenrat roster is to be reported to the appropriate senior district official, in urban districts to the senior subdivisional district official.
2. The Kreishauptmann (Stadthauptmann) will decide whether the Judenrat roster reported to him should be approved. He may direct changes in the roster.

Section 5

The Judenrat is obliged to accept the orders of German agencies, through its chairman or his deputy. It is answerable for conscientious execution of orders to their full extent. The directives it issues to implement these German decrees must be obeyed by all Jewish men and women.

Cracow; November 28, 1939

Governor-General for the Occupied Polish Territories
Frank

Source: Lucy S. Dawidowicz, A Holocaust Reader (Springfield, NJ: Behrman House, 1976), pp. 66–67. Copyright © Behrman House, Inc. www.behrmanhouse.com. Used by permission.

102. KAUNAS GHETTO: AFFIDAVIT AUGUST 10, 1946, OF KHAIM KAGAN, AUGUST–OCTOBER 1941

This affidavit by Khaim Kagan, a member of the Judenrat of the Kaunas ghetto, reveals several important aspects of ghetto life under the Nazis. (The ghetto is better known as the Kovno ghetto; Kovno was the capital of Lithuania at the time.) Kagan's description of Nazi abuses and murders in the ghetto in 1941 is fully consistent with other accounts of treatment by the Nazis in other ghettos in Europe. In this relatively short document, Kagan speaks of numerous acts: Nazi plunder of Jewish assets, the mass killing of Soviet POWs, the forced labor that had no other purpose than to amuse the guards as men who faltered were shot and killed, the systematic killing of more than 10,000 Jews in a short period of time, and other indiscriminant murders of Jews. The cumulative effect on the reader of all of these actions is to realize how brutal and unrestrained was the violence inflicted on innocent Jews. Those who survived, like Kagan, did so as much by sheer luck as by any special skills or fortitude.

AFFIDAVIT OF KHAIM KAGAN

I, KHAIM KAGAN, declare as follows:

1. I am a Jew and lived in the Ghetto of Kaunas (Lithuania) during the German occupation. I was on the Jewish Council of the Ghetto dealing with statistics and supplies. As representative of the Jews for rations, etc., I had to deal directly with the Town Governor's Office (Hauptsturmfuehrer SA Jordan's section). The Town Governor's Office was exclusively staffed by SA: even the girls in the office wore brown SA uniform.

2. The German Town Governor (Stadtkommissar) was called KRAMER, and he was a Brigadefuehrer SA. Jordan was the Advisor on Jewish Affairs to Kramer. I know their ranks and that they were in the SA, because they signed the orders which were posted in the Ghetto.

3. About 10 to 15 September 1941 a plundering operation was conducted throughout the Ghetto. It was done exclusively by SA men, Jordan was with them. They all wore brown uniform. They took gold, silver, valuables, furniture, etc. In order to scare people and to induce them to give up their property more easily they shot people indiscriminately in different parts of the Ghetto: they shot twenty-seven in all.

4. After the plundering was over Jews were employed to sort the plunder and pack it into parcels to send to private addresses in Germany.

5. On the 13th September 1941 Jordan and Sturmfuehrer SA KEPEN (with Brigadefuehrer LENZEN, who was Commissioner for the Rural District (Landkommissar) of Kaunas, standing by) shot three men in my presence. One of these men they first pulled out of bed.

6. On the 21st or 22nd September 1941 I was in a labor detachment. I saw about thirty SA men in uniform conducting a group of some 300 Russian prisoners of war. The Russians were quite exhausted, they could barely walk. Two collapsed and the SA shot them. The SA were beating them all the time. My labor detachment had to bury these Russians.

7. In October 1941 300 Jews including myself were taken by the SA from the Ghetto and forced to carry two chairs each, on their shoulders, for a distance of 5 kilometres and then back again, for no object whatsoever. Those who could not carry on were shot. Jordan was following the procession in his car. There were about 100 SA men guarding us: they were armed with automatic pistols.

8. On the 28th October 1941 there was a big "action" on in which 10,500 people from the Ghetto were shot. The Ghetto population was first divided into two groups, those for execution and those who were allowed to stay. The sorting was supervised in the morning by a man called RAUKA (who was I think in the Gestapo or the SD) and later in the day three prominent SA men, Jordan, Kepen and Poeschl came to help him. All these SA men were in uniform. I know the number of those who were shot because my job on the Jewish Council included the rationing for which we had taken a census of the Jews. A new census was taken after these executions.

1212 Telegram from Leland B. Morris to the U.S. Secretary of State Regarding the Death Penalty

9. On the 15th August 1941 the SA shut the Ghetto gates. A number of people had gone out of the Ghetto on the 11th August to try to get food. On the 15th after the gates had been shut Jordan came to me and said: "Go and get 20 bodies which I have just shot as a warning to you all not to have dealings with the outside population."

10. On the same day (15th August) Jordan announced that he wanted 530 intellectuals to work on archives. He was told there were not that number available. Thereupon the SA (assisted by others in German uniform which I cannot identify for certain but I think it was SD) seized 530 people at random. The SA personnel present included Jordan, Poeschl and Lenzen.

I declare the above to be correct:

[signed]:

KHAIM KAGAN

10 August, 1946

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. Supplement A, pp. 1167–69 Doc. D-968.

103. TELEGRAM FROM LELAND B. MORRIS TO THE U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE REGARDING THE DEATH PENALTY FOR JEWS LEAVING GHETTOS, NOVEMBER 1, 1941

Leland B. Morris, chargé d'affaires in the U.S. embassy in Berlin, sent this telegram to Cordell Hull, the U.S. secretary of state, to report that Hans Frank, the governor-general of the Generalgouvernement, that portion of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into Germany, changed the punishment for anyone leaving the ghettos in his territory without permission as well as for individuals who harbored them. The punishment had been imprisonment, a fine, or penal servitude. Now the punishment was the death penalty.

Morris observes that this change is consistent with increasing pressure being brought to bear on Jews throughout occupied Europe. He also notes that as Jews are increasingly being transported into the Generalgouvernement, the severity of this punishment will surely be factored into decisions made regarding escape and, perhaps to a greater degree, will cause those non-Jews who might otherwise be inclined to help an escapee to think more carefully when making that decision. Clearly, that was Frank's intent.

GRAY

Berlin

Dated November 1, 1941

Secretary of State,

Washington

3958, November 1, 10 a.m.

By decree of Governor General Frank Effective October 25 the death penalty is made mandatory for Jews leaving the Ghettoes in the Government General without permission and for persons who harbor them. Hitherto, these offenses were punished by imprisonment or a fine and in severe cases by penal servitude.

The new measure is in accord with the stiffening of anti-Jewish regulations and actions which have been evident throughout German controlled Europe for some weeks. It will presumably affect many of the Jews who are at present being deported to various parts of Poland.

MORRIS

WWC

Source: State CDF 862.4016/2209: Central Decimal File: Records of the Department of State in National Archives Record Group 59, General Records of the Department of State.

104. SCHAULEN GHETTO: AFFIDAVIT OF AUGUST 10, 1946, OF LEIB KIBART, 1941–1943

Leib Kibart, a survivor of the Schaulen ghetto, gave this brief affidavit regarding his observations in and around the Schaulen ghetto, near Riga, the capital of Latvia. It describes the role of the SA (Sturmabteilung, or Storm Detachment, also known as Storm Troopers or Brown Shirts) in abusing ghetto residents and taking them away for the purpose of mass murder. It also shows the SA coercing Jews to manufacture goods as ordered. Perhaps the most chilling statement comes at the end when Kibart recounts how the SA officer in charge of the ghetto, a man identified as Sturmfuehrer Bub, decided to hang a ghetto resident who tried to smuggle cigarettes into the ghetto. Bub explained that he chose to do so in order to show that "he too could hang Jews." This appears to be an effort by Bub to show that he could be as ruthless as the Sturmfuehrer whom he replaced as head of the ghetto.

AFFIDAVIT OF LEIB KIBART

I, LEIB KIBART, declare as follows:

1. I am a Jew and lived during the German occupation in the Ghetto of Schaulen, about 130 kilometres of Riga. I am a leather worker by trade.

2. I was arrested in the street and forced to work for the Germans for three years making mostly women's handbags. I lived in the Ghetto but I was taken daily by SA men to the Courtyard of the District Commissioner where I and other Jews worked on various jobs.

3. While at work we were often cursed and beaten by the SA. Sturmfuehrer SA Bub one day ordered a lady's handbag from me, to be ready by the same evening. I said that was impossible, so he gave me many strokes with a whip. In the evening he thrashed me again because the bag was not ready.

4. The SA came to Schaulen soon after the occupation by the Germans in the summer of 1941 and they took over the administration of the Ghetto. The first SA Chief was SCHROEPFER, a Sturmfuehrer SA. He was either from Bromberg or Bamberg but I cannot remember which. I know it was one or the other because Jews were employed to make trunks for SA officers and I remember his name and address being painted on one. His successor was Sturmfuehrer Bub.

5. It is hard to judge, but I estimate that there must have been 700 to 800 SA men there at the beginning, but they decreased in numbers later. I knew them as SA because they wore brown uniform with Swastika armlets. Later on they often used other Germans in the locality as auxiliaries.

6. There were 4,500 Jews in the Ghetto, which was very overcrowded. In August 1941 the SA therefore surrounded the whole Ghetto, and numbers of them went into the houses and took out women, children and old men, and put them into lorries and drove them away. I saw all this myself. It was done exclusively by SA. I saw them take children by the hair and throw them into the lorries. I did not see what happened to them but a Lithuanian told me afterwards that they had been driven 20 kilometres away and shot: he said he had seen the SA make them undress and then shoot them with automatic pistols.

7. In 1943 working parties were sent out from the Ghetto into the country and they sometimes brought back food such as potatoes. The SA searched them and if they found food on them they beat them in the streets. In June 1943 a man called MAZAWETZKI, a master baker, was caught by Bub with four or five cigarettes and some sausage.

He was beaten and brought to the District Commissioner's office. I was working in the Courtyard with other Jews and Bub said to the working party that the man must be hanged because he wanted to show that he too could hang Jews. Next Sunday we were all kept in the Courtyard and Bub had Mazawetzki hanged in front of us by Jews.

8. The District Commissioner in whose Courtyard I worked was called GEWECKE. I saw him every day. He was in the SA.

9. The SS took over from the SA in September 1943, and the Ghetto then became a working commando.

I declare the above to be true.

[signed]:

10 August 1946

LEIB KIBART

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. Supplement A, pp. 1169–1170 Doc. D-969.

105. ROWNO GHETTO: AFFIDAVIT OF NOVEMBER 10, 1945, OF HERMANN GRAEBE REGARDING LIQUIDATION OF THE ROWNO GHETTO, JULY 1942

Hermann Graebe, a non-Jewish German manager and engineer-in-charge of a building firm in the Ukraine, describes in this affidavit the process by which the Rowno ghetto was liquidated as well as his efforts to protect as many of his Jewish employees as possible. His response when hearing that liquidation was imminent was to order his foreman to remove his Jewish employees to another town. He was forced to have them returned to Rowno lest other employees be arrested. A high-ranking German with whom Graebe then met confirmed that a pogrom was about to take place and authorized that his Jewish employees were not to be included in the liquidation proceedings. Although some were taken away despite the authorization, Graebe was able to protect the others. His success at saving most of his Jewish employees resulted in Graebe being honored as Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem. Graebe's affidavit also tells of the abuse and killings he witnessed during the liquidation of the ghetto.

Before me, Homer B. Crawford, being authorized to administer oaths, personally appeared Hermann Friedrich Graebe, who, being by me duly sworn through the interpreter Elisabeth Radziejewska, made and subscribed the following statement:

I, Hermann Friedrich Graebe, declare under oath:

From September 1941 until January 1944 I was manager and engineer-in-charge of a branch office in Sdolbunow, Ukraine, of the Solingen building firm of Josef Jung. In this capacity it was my job to visit the building sites of the firm. The firm had, among others, a site in Rowno, Ukraine.

During the night of 13th July 1942 all inhabitants of the Rowno Ghetto, where there were still about 5000 Jews, were liquidated.

I would describe the circumstances of my being a witness of the dissolution of the Ghetto, and the carrying out of the pogrom [Aktion] during the night and the morning, as follows:

I employed for the firm, in Rowno, in addition to Poles, Germans, and Ukrainians about 100 Jews from Sdolbunow, Ostrog, and Mysotch. The men were quartered in a building,—5 Bahnhofstrasse, inside the Ghetto, and the women in a house at the corner of Deutsche Strasse,—98.

On Saturday, 11 July 1942, my foreman, Fritz Einsporn, told me of a rumor that on Monday all Jews in Rowno were to be liquidated. Although the vast majority of the Jews employed by my firm in Rowno were not natives of this town, I still feared that they might be included in this pogrom which had been reported. I therefore ordered Einsporn at noon of the same day to march all the Jews employed by us—men as well as women—in the direction of Sdolbunow, about 12 km from Rowno. This was done.

The Senior Jew [Judenrat] had learned of the departure of the Jewish workers of my firm. He went to see the Commanding Officer of the Rowno SIP0 and SD, SS Major [SS Sturmbannfuehrer] Dr. Puetz, as early as the Saturday afternoon to find out whether the rumor of a forthcoming Jewish pogrom—which had gained further credence by reason of the departure of Jews of my firm—was true. Dr. Puetz dismissed the rumor as a clumsy lie, and for the rest had the Polish personnel of my firm in Rowno arrested. Einsporn avoided arrest by escaping from Sdolbunow. When I learned of this incident I gave orders that all Jews who had left Rowno were to report back to work in Rowno on Monday, 13 July 1942. On Monday morning I myself went to see the Commanding Officer, Dr. Puetz, in order to learn, for one thing, the truth about the rumored Jewish pogrom and secondly to obtain information on the arrest of the Polish office personnel. SS Major [SS-Sturmbannfuehrer] Puetz stated to me that no pogrom (Aktion) whatever was planned. Moreover such a pogrom would be stupid because the firms and the Reichsbahn would lose valuable workers.

An hour later I received a summons to appear before the Area Commissioner of Rowno. His deputy, Stableiter and Cadet Officer [Ordensjunker] Beck, subjected me to the same questioning as I had undergone at the SD. My explanation that I had sent the Jews home for urgent delousing appeared plausible to him. He then told me—making me promise to keep it a secret—that a pogrom would in fact take place on the evening of Monday 13 July 1942. After lengthy negotiation I managed to persuade him to give me permission to take my Jewish workers to Sdolbunow—but only after the pogrom had been carried out. During the night it would be up to me to protect the house in the Ghetto against the entry of Ukrainian militia and SS. As confirmation of the discussion he gave me a document, which stated that the Jewish employees of Messrs. Jung were not affected by the pogrom [Original attached.]

On the evening of this day I drove to Rowno and posted myself with Fritz Einsporn in front of the house in the Bahnhofstrasse in which the Jewish workers of my firm slept. Shortly after 22:00 the Ghetto was encircled by a large SS detachment and about three times as many members of the Ukrainian militia. Then the electric arclights which had been erected in and around the Ghetto were switched on. SS and militia squads of 4 to 6 men entered or at least tried to enter the houses. Where the doors and windows were closed and the inhabitant did not open at the knocking, the SS men and militia broke the windows, forced the doors with beams and crowbars and entered the houses. The people living there were driven on to the street just as they were, regardless of whether they were dressed or in bed. Since the Jews in most cases refused to leave their houses and resisted, the SS and militia applied force. They finally succeeded, with strokes of the whip, kicks and blows with rifle butts in clearing the houses. The people were driven out of their houses in such haste that small children in bed had been left behind in several instances. In the street women cried out for their children and children for their parents. That did not prevent the SS from driving the people along the road, at running pace, and hitting them, until they reached a waiting freight train. Car after car was filled, and the screaming of women and children, and the cracking of whips and rifle shots resounded unceasingly. Since several families or groups had barricaded themselves in especially strong buildings, and the doors could not be forced with crowbars or beams, these houses were now blown open with hand grenades. Since the Ghetto was near the railroad tracks in Rowno, the younger people tried to get across the tracks and over a small river to get away from the Ghetto area. As this stretch of country was beyond the range of the electric lights, it was illuminated by signal rockets. All through the night these beaten, hounded and wounded people moved along the lighted streets. Women carried their dead children in their arms, children pulled and dragged their dead parents by their arms and legs down the road toward the train. Again and again the cries "Open the door!" "Open the door!" echoed through the Ghetto.

About 6 o'clock in the morning I went away for a moment, leaving behind Einsporn and several other German workers who had returned in the meantime. I thought the greatest danger was past and that I could risk it. Shortly after I left, Ukrainian militia men forced their way into 5 Bahnhofstrasse and brought 7 Jews out and took them to a collecting point inside the Ghetto. On my return I was able to prevent further Jews from being taken out. I went to the collecting point to save these 7 men. I saw dozens of corpses of all ages and both sexes in the streets I had to walk along. The doors of the houses stood open, windows were smashed. Pieces of clothing, shoes, stockings, jackets, caps, hats, coats, etc., were lying in the street. At the corner of a house lay a baby, less than a year old with his skull crushed. Blood and brains were splattered over the house wall and covered the area immediately around the child. The child was dressed only in a little shirt. The commander, SS Major Puetz, was walking up and down a row of about 80–100 male Jews who were crouching on the ground. He had a heavy dog whip in his hand. I walked up to him, showed him the written permit of Stabsleiter Beck and demanded the seven men whom I recognized among those who were crouching on the ground. Dr. Puetz was very furious about Beck's concession and nothing could persuade him to release the seven men. He made a motion with his hand encircling the square and said that anyone who was once here would not get away.

Although he was very angry with Beck, he ordered me to take the people from 5 Bahnhofstrasse out of Rowno by 8 o'clock at the latest. When I left Dr. Puetz, I noticed a Ukrainian farm cart, with two horses. Dead people with stiff limbs were lying on the cart. Legs and arms projected over the side boards. The cart was making for the freight train. I took the remaining 74 Jews who had been locked in the house to Sdolbunow.

Several days after the 13th of July 1942 the Area Commissioner of Sdolbunow, Georg Marschall, called a meeting of all firm managers, railroad superintendents, and leaders of the Organization Todt and informed them that the firms, etc., should prepare themselves for the "resettlement" of the Jews which was to take place almost immediately. He referred to the pogrom in Rowno where all the Jews had been liquidated, i.e. had been shot near Kostopol.

I make the above statement in Wiesbaden, Germany, on 10 November 1945. I swear by God that this is the absolute truth.

Hermann Friedrich Graebe

Subscribed and sworn to before me at Wiesbaden, Germany this 10 day of November 1945.

Homer B. Crawford
Major, AC
Investigator Examiner,
War Crimes Branch

I, Elisabeth Radziejewska, being first duly sworn, state; That I truly translated the oath administered by Major Homer B. Crawford to Hermann Friedrich Graebe and that thereupon he made and subscribed the foregoing statement in my presence.

Elisabeth Radziejewska
Interpreter

Subscribed and sworn before me at Wiesbaden, Germany, this 10th day of November 1945.

Homer B. Crawford
Major, AC
Investigator Examiner
War Crimes Branch, US Army

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 700–703, Doc. 2992-PS.71222.

106. COUNTERACTING RUMORS REGARDING TREATMENT OF THE JEWS, OCTOBER 9, 1942

Dated October 1942, by which time the Nazi death camps were exterminating Jews and others at an extraordinary rate, this statement by an unknown Nazi seeks to explain away what he refers to as rumors but in fact were accurate reports of what was happening at these camps. The author expresses concern that not all Germans will understand the reasons for such extreme measures, and he sets forth how the “rumors” should be addressed. In doing so, this document refers to a 2,000-year battle against the Jews that is only now proceeding as it should, noting that elimination of Jews from German society and efforts to have the Jews emigrate have been unsuccessful, making the current actions necessary. Jews are being deported to forced labor camps or, if unable to work, to extermination camps (here referred to by an often-used euphemism, “transported to the East”). The rationale set forth for these actions concludes with the statement that the Jewish question “can be solved only with ruthless severity.”

DECREES, REGULATIONS, ANNOUNCEMENTS
[Verfügungen, Anordnungen, Bekanntgaben]
Vol. 2, Pages 131–132.

Preparatory Measures for the Solution of the Jewish Problem in Europe—Rumors About the Position of the Jews in the East.

V.I. 66/881 of the 9 Oct., 1942

In the course of the work on the final solution of the Jewish problem discussions about “very strict measures” against the Jews, especially in the Eastern territories, have lately been taking place within the population of the various areas of the Reich. Investigations showed that such discussions—mostly in a distorted and exaggerated form—were passed on by soldiers on leave from various units committed in the East, who had the opportunity to eye-witness these measures.

It is conceivable that not all “Blood Germans” are capable of demonstrating sufficient understanding for the necessity of such measures, especially not those parts of the population which do not have the opportunity of visualizing bolshevik atrocities on the basis of their own observations.

In order to be able to counter-act any formation of rumors in this connection, which frequently are of an intentional, prejudiced character, the following statements are issued for information about the present state of affairs:

For approx. 2000 years, a so-far unsuccessful battle has been waged against Judaism. Only since 1933 have we started to find ways and means in order to enable a complete separation of Judaism from the German masses.

The work toward a solution which has previously been accomplished can in the main be divided as follows:

1. The repulsion of Jews from the individual spheres of living of the German people. The laws issued by the lawmakers are hereby to be the basis, which guarantees that future generations will also be protected from a possible new overflooding by the enemy.

2. The attempt to completely drive out the enemy from the area of the Reich. In view of the only very limited living space [Lebensraum] at the disposal of the German people it was hoped this problem could be solved in the main by speeding up the Jewish emigration.

Since the outbreak of war in 1939 these possibilities of emigration decreased to an ever greater extent. On the other hand, in addition to the living space [Lebensraum] of the German people, their economic space [Wirtschaftsraum] grew steadily, so that in view of the large numbers of Jews residing in these territories a complete repulsion of the Jews by emigration is no longer possible.

Since even our next generation will not be so close to this problem and will no longer see it clearly enough on the basis of past experiences and since this matter which has now started rolling demands clearing up, the whole problem must still be solved by the present generation.

A complete removal or withdrawal of the millions of Jews residing in the European economic space [Wirtschaftsraum] is therefore an urgent need in the fight for the security of existence of the German people.

Starting with the territory of the Reich and proceeding to the remaining European countries included in the final solution, the Jews are currently being deported to large camps which have already been established or which are to be established in the East, where they will either be used for work or else transported still farther to the East. The old Jews as well as Jews with high military decorations [Kriegsauszeichnungen] (Iron Cross 1st Class, (E.K.I.) Golden Medal for Valor [Goldene Tapferkeitsmedaille], etc.), are currently being resettled in the city of Theresienstadt which is located in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia.

It lies in the very nature of the matter that these problems which in part are very difficult, can be solved only with ruthless severity in the interest of the final security of our people.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 945–946, Doc. 3244-PS.

107. WARSAW GHETTO: JEWISH FOOD SITUATION, DECEMBER 15, 1942

The Polish Fortnightly Review, by the Polish Ministry of Information, included this examination of the “Jewish food situation” in Jewish ghettos established by the Nazis throughout Poland in its issue of December 15, 1942. It describes the insufficiency of vegetables and potatoes for ghetto residents and observes that the ever-changing quantities of food in the ration are continuously going down. This document also shows the severely limited amount of bread, meat, sugar, and fats provided to each Jewish ghetto resident. These near-starvation conditions have given rise to a robust black market and an increasing mortality rate. The document ends with the ominous statement that in July 1942 “the German authorities started a process of wholesale extermination of the Jewish population of the ghettos.”

POLISH
FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW,
Polish Ministry of Information

No. 58 London, Tuesday, December 15th, 1942, Page 7.

THE JEWISH FOOD SITUATION

The Jewish section of the population, as we know, is subjected to general living conditions which are still worse than those of the Poles, and the uncertainty of life for them is increased by the continually changing orders and regulations affecting their day- to-day existence. In regard to food supplies, they are brought under a completely separate system, which is obviously aimed at depriving them of the most elemental necessities of life.

The separate and isolated quarters of towns which the German authorities have assigned as ghettos for the Jewish inhabitants are theoretically autonomously administered and are completely cut off from the outside world. They are under the supervision of special German commissaries, who have unrestricted powers. Economic life inside the ghetto, and in particular the question of food supplies for its inhabitants, is in the hands of the Jewish Council [Judenrat]. All trade and commodity exchange, including the supply of foodstuffs, goes on through a special German organ known as the Transferstelle. This department is responsible for allocating and selling to the ghetto all kinds of goods, including food, as the respective German food or other departments allow at any moment. The goods thus obtained by the ghetto are distributed to the shops by the “Supplies Establishment,” which is a special department under the Jewish Council.

As a rule, the ghetto receives foodstuffs of two main categories. The first group consists of rationed goods, which are allocated in accordance with the number of inhabitants and on a ration unit basis. It includes the main food articles such as bread, meat, sugar, fats, etc. The second category consists of goods which are not rationed in the strict sense of the word, but of which the sale to Jews is controlled and for which permission has to be given on each occasion by the German authorities. No article of food not included in either of these two categories can be sold to Jews, either outside or inside the ghettos. In May, 1941, the German authorities gave permission for barely 154 tons of vegetables to be taken into the Warsaw ghetto, this amount working out at about two-thirds of a pound per person per month. And this was a comparatively high quota, for in the previous month only 48 tons had been allowed to come on to the ghetto market. In June, 1941, the quota of potatoes assigned to the ghetto was 67 tons and other vegetables 189.5 tons. In August there was some improvement in the situation, for the German authorities permitted the import of 100 tons of vegetables weekly into the ghetto, this working out at nine ounces per person.

The quantity allowed in the ration is continually changed, the tendency being to reduce the allotted quantities. The possession of a ration card is by no means a guarantee that a ration will be obtainable. From information received through neutral sources, the weekly rations of the most important articles of food in the Warsaw ghetto during a certain unspecified period of 1941 were as follows:

	Bread	Meat	Sugar	Fats
In grammes.....	420	125	45	25
In ounces (app.)	14 6/7	4 1/2	1 3/5	9/10

Conditions were somewhat better in Cracow, where in March, 1941, the weekly ration for Jews was:

	Bread	Meat	Sugar	Fats
In grammes	1,000–1,090	None.	50	30
In ounces (app.)	36–39 1/5	14/5	1

The above figures call for no comment.

In such conditions the starving Jewish population has to resort to the purchase of food on the ghetto black market, which is supplied by smuggling over the walls at the danger of life, and by the extensive bribery of the German guards. Naturally, prices on the ghetto black market are considerably higher even by comparison with those on the Polish black market. The following figures relating to the autumn of 1941 (in Warsaw) illustrate this disparity:

	Per kilo. (2 1/4 lbs.)
	Polish black market	Ghetto black market
Bread.....	15 zlotys.	32 zlotys.
Potatoes.....	4.31 zlotys.	8.50 zlotys.
Fats.....	45 zlotys.	90 zlotys.

(Pre-war exchange rate was about 25 zlotys to the pound.)

Thus, while the rations for Jews are only a half or a third of the rations for Poles, the prices on the black market are twice as high. A Jewish worker employed on forced labor, and receiving four zlotys a day (about 3s. 4d.) could at that time (autumn, 1941) buy for that amount only half a kilo (1 1/8 lb.) of potatoes; a Jewish tailor earning 50 zlotys weekly could buy only half a kilo of fats.

Therefore the only hope of survival for the great majority of the Jews was in the communal assistance provided by the Jewish Council and various charitable organizations. In the summer of 1941 soup kitchens in the Warsaw ghetto were providing some 120,000 portions daily. This represented assistance to barely 25 percent of the total number of inhabitants, and only half the number actually needing help.

The terrible shortage of food, coupled with the serious overcrowding and insanitary conditions of the ghettos, has led to a fearful increase in the mortality rate from month to month. In August, 1941, there were 5,620 deaths in the Warsaw ghetto, while in June, 1941 (the latest month for which figures have been available), there were only 396 births. The inevitable decline in ghetto population thus resulting was compensated for by the continual influx of Jews driven into the ghettos by the German authorities, who rounded them up not only from all over Poland, but from almost all Europe.

In July, 1942, the German authorities started a process of wholesale extermination of the Jewish population of the ghettos.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VII, pp. 908–911, Doc. L-165.

108. EXTRACTS FROM “DER STÜRMER” REGARDING HITLER’S PROMISE TO FREE THE WORLD OF JEWS, JANUARY 28, 1943

Der Stürmer, the Nazi Party tabloid published by Julius Streicher, was one of the primary means by which the party disseminated its antisemitic propaganda. These two excerpts from late January 1943—the first by Ernst Hiemer, a German author who often expressed his antisemitism in Der Stürmer, and the second from Streicher himself—reflect the obsession of both men with the total destruction of the Jews. According to Hiemer, the ghettos are only an interim step for the Jews along the road to their disappearance. Streicher looks back to a speech that Hitler made to the Reichstag on January 30, 1939, in which he stated that the Jews would be annihilated in the event of another world war (which, if such a war occurred, would be the fault of the Jews). He then characterized what was happening to the Jews in January 1943—the extermination of two-thirds of all Jews in Europe as well on its way by then—as a fulfillment of Hitler’s promise.

Extracts from “DER STURMER”
No. 5. 28 January 1943

But the ghetto, too, which has today been re-established in nearly all European countries, is only an interim solution. For humanity, once awakened, will not merely solve the ghetto question, but the Jewish question in its totality. A time will come when the present demands of the Jews will be fulfilled: The ghetto will have disappeared. And with it Jewry!

[Signed] Ernst Hiemer

When, with the outbreak of the second World War, world Jewry again began to manifest themselves as warmongers, Adolf Hitler announced to the world, from the platform of the German Reichstag, that the World War conjured up by world Jewry would result in the self-destruction of Jewry.

This prophecy was the first big warning. It was met with derision by the Jews, as were also the subsequent warnings. But now, in the fourth year of this war, world Jewry is beginning, in its retrospective reflections, to understand that the destiny of Jewry is finding its fulfillment at the hands of German National Socialism. That which the Fuehrer of the German people announced to the world as a prophecy, at the beginning of this second World War, is now being fulfilled with unrelenting inevitability. World Jewry which wanted to make big international business out of the blood of the warring nations, is rushing with gigantic steps towards its extirpation!

When Adolf Hitler stepped before the German people 20 years ago to submit to them the National Socialist demands which pointed into the future, he also made the promise which was to have the greatest effects in its results—that of freeing the world from its Jewish tormentor. How wonderful it is to know that this great man and leader is making action follow this promise also! It will be the greatest ever to take place amongst mankind. As yet we are too close to the events of the present time to be able to applaud in pious devotion the action that has been commenced. But the day will come when the whole of humanity will enjoy an international peace such as it has longed for for thousands of years.

[Signed] Julius Streicher

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. Supp. A, pp. 1210–1211, Doc. M-136.

109. WARSAW GHETTO: HIMMLER ORDERS ITS DESTRUCTION, FEBRUARY 16, 1943

This letter from Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader (Reichsführer) of the SS (the Schutzstaffel), to Friedrich-Wilhelm Krueger, higher SS and police leader East, ordered Krueger to tear down the Warsaw ghetto. Although not mentioned in Himmler's order, the ghetto was not yet liquidated of all its Jews. In fact, it was two months later that the few Jews still remaining in the ghetto began their uprising that held off the Nazis for a month before they were able to control and destroy it. Himmler explains the need to destroy the ghetto as a necessary measure to quell criminal disorder in the city of Warsaw. He also tells Krueger that once cleared, the area that contained the ghetto will not be used at all, thereby diminishing the size of the city, which Himmler calls "a dangerous center of decomposition and of rebellion."

LETTER OF HIMMLER TO THE HIGHER SS AND POLICE LEADER EAST, KRUEGER (KRAKOW), 16 FEBRUARY 1943, ORDERING THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WARSAW GHETTO

The Reich Leader SS
Journal No. 38/33/43 g.

Field Command Post, 16 February 1943
[Stamp]

Personal Staff Reich Leader SS
Archives
File No. Secret/343

To the Higher SS and Police Leader East
SS Obergruppenfuehrer Krueger
Krakow

Secret!

For security reasons, I give the order to tear down the ghetto of Warsaw after the concentration camp has been removed [Herausverlegung]; all utilizable building material or material of any kind is to be recovered beforehand.

The tearing down of the ghetto and the installation of the concentration camp is necessary, because otherwise we never will quiet down Warsaw, and criminal disorder will never be rooted out as long as the ghetto remains.

A master plan for the pulling down of the ghetto has to be submitted to me. It has to be accomplished in any case that the living space which accommodated 500,000 sub-humans [Untermenschen] and never was suitable for Germans will completely disappear, and that the city of Warsaw with its one million inhabitants will be reduced in size, having always been a dangerous center of decomposition and of rebellion.

[Signed] H. HIMMLER

(2) To the Chief of the Security Police and SD.

Copy transmitted for information.

BY ORDER

[Initialed] BR[andt]
SS Obersturmbannfuehrer

Chief "P" also received copy.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. V, pp. 621–622, Doc. NO-2494.

110. INDOCTRINATION OF INDIGENOUS SECURITY UNITS, MARCH 15, 1943

This document is an agreement between Georg Leibbrandt and Gottlob Berger, both responsible for the Occupied Eastern Territories, regarding the need to indoctrinate members of Nazi security units who are indigenous to the country in which security action is taking place. Leibbrandt and Berger believe that the local security men need to become “convinced cofighters against bolshevism.” The text that follows sets forth, in effect, a list of the key Nazi beliefs and goals, and the rationale for the killing of Jews, who are considered to be one and the same as Bolsheviks. The many Nazi principles included in this document provide an excellent insight into Nazi ideology.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE REICH LEADER SS AND CHIEF OF THE GERMAN POLICE AND THE REICH MINISTER FOR THE OCCUPIED EASTERN TERRITORIES CONCERNING THE POLITICAL INDOCTRINATION OF NATIONALS OF EASTERN NATIONS ASSIGNED TO THE INDIGENOUS SECURITY UNITS (SCHUTZMANNSCHAFTEN)

It has become evident that military-political training, economic improvements, and rigid disciplinary supervision alone are not sufficient to bring to full and reliable assignment the members of the eastern nations enrolled in the indigenous security units. It is necessary, over and above this, that they will be won over spiritually for their particular task and be convinced of it. This has to be achieved through a planned political schooling, adapted to the time and the conditions prevailing.

The political schooling of the non-German members of the indigenous security units is a matter for the Reich Leader SS, who issues implementing instructions to the Chief of the SS Main Office or, as the case may be, the local Higher SS and Police Leader. It will be carried out within the framework of and in conformity with the over-all political line pursued by the Reich Minister for the Occupied Eastern Territories.

The aim of this indoctrination is to convert the non-German members of the indigenous security units to convinced cofighters against bolshevism and for the All-European New Order. Special attention is to be paid to the following points:

1. Effective and quick warding off of Bolshevikist propaganda.

2. Tying up with the strong instinctive anti-Semitism of the eastern nations; the Jewish face of bolshevism; Jewry as motive power behind bolshevism as well as the capitalism of the Western Powers; the Jewish aims for world domination and the various ways toward it (world revolution and capitalism); the nationalist disguises of Jewish bolshevism; Stalin’s army as a power instrument to gain Jewish world domination with the blood of the other peoples. Bolshevik aims and methods (question of land, deportation, GPU., church question, etc.).

3. The Reich’s and its Fuehrer’s fight against world Jewry. The differences between national socialism and bolshevism; national socialism’s positive attitude toward folkdom and racial distinctions, its respect of and care for national culture, homeland, family, property. Germany safeguards life and folkdom, national culture, and order for the European nations. Germany’s social achievements. Personality and life of the German Fuehrer. Everybody fighting on Germany’s side, also fights for his or her folkdom, homeland, and family.

4. Realization of the new European community of nations under the Reich as the leading, protecting, and marshaling power. The common work and fight of the European nations against the Jewish aims for world domination. Causes, meaning, and underlying reasons of the war. (Jewry as instigator of the First and Second World War.) Germany’s and Europe’s allies in a common front in fight against the Jewish-Capitalist and the Jewish-Bolshevist powers. The hard necessities of the war; common work, common sacrifices, and common fight for the New Europe. The joint economic, political, and cultural interests of Germany, the eastern nations, and all Europe’s.

5. Avoidance of any utterance liable to violate self-esteem, honor and self-pride both in words and illustrations. Linking with the ethnological national culture and history, their connections with Europe and the Nordic-Germanic sources must be particularly stressed.

Berlin, 15 March 1943

[Signed] LEIBBRANDT

[Signed] G. BERGER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 289–290, Doc. NO-1818.

111. GHETTOS OF OSTLAND: HIMMLER ORDER FOR LIQUIDATION, JUNE 21, 1943

This order from Heinrich Himmler, Reichsführer (Reich leader) of the SS (the Schutzstaffel), to Oswald Pohl, whose title, among others, was chief of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office, required that all Jews in ghettos in the Ostland (Eastland), a reference to Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia and Belarus, be moved to concentration camps. Himmler provides more specific instructions regarding where Jewish male laborers should be assigned, and reminds Pohl that nothing done pursuant to this order is to result in the reduction of production for the Wehrmacht. As is so often the case, Himmler makes it clear that any Jews not able to serve the Nazis' needs were to be "evacuated to the East," the euphemism for deportation to the death camps in Poland.

LETTER OF HIMMLER TO POHL, 21 JUNE 1943. ORDERING, AMONG OTHER MEASURES, "EVACUATION" OF "NOT REQUIRED" JEWS FROM THE GHETTOS

The Reich Leader SS
RF/Bn. 38195143 g

(1) To the Higher SS and Police Leader Ostland [added in shorthand]: By courier by way of the command staff

(2) To the Chief of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office.

Field Command Headquarters, 21 June 1943

[Stamp]

Personal Staff Reich Leader SS

Archives

File No. Secret 343

[Stamp] Secret

[Pencil note] 1. By courier by way of the command staff

1. I order that all the Jews still remaining in ghettos in the Ostland area have to be collected in concentration camps.

2. I prohibit any taking out of Jews from concentration camps for [outside] work projects beginning 1 August 1943.

3. There has to be erected a concentration camp in the vicinity of Riga, to which has to be transferred all the manufacturing of clothing and equipment in outlying works maintained by the Wehrmacht. All private firms have to be cut out. The workshops are to become plain concentration camp workshops. The chief of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office is requested to take care, that this reorganization does not cause any reduction in the necessary production for the Wehrmacht.

4. The biggest possible part of the male Jews has to be brought to the concentration camp in the oilshale area for the mining of oilshale.

5. Members of the Jewish ghettos not required are to be evacuated to the East.

6. Fixed day for the reorganization of the concentration camps is 1 August 1943.

[Signed] H. HIMMLER

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. V, p. 626, Doc. NO-2403.

112. EXCERPTS FROM A SPEECH BY HIMMLER DURING POLITICAL INDOCTRINATION COURSE FOR WEHRMACHT SOLDIERS, JANUARY 15-23, 1937

Heinrich Himmler, Reichsführer of the SS (Schutzstaffel), made this speech as part of a course of political indoctrination of Wehrmacht soldiers. It was presented in January 1937, four years after Hitler's rise to power, and more than two and a half years prior to the beginning of World War II. In it, he discusses the beginning and evolution of the SS, as well as the prerequisites he instituted for membership, such as purity of blood, height, facial characteristics, perseverance, and loyalty. He describes the organization of the SS in some detail, including age requirements and the training regimen as SS men get older. Himmler also discusses the "Death Head Units," the need to expand the Nazi concentration camp system, the Security Service (the SD, Sicherheitsdienst), and special restrictions applicable to members of the SS. He concludes with warnings about the Jews and Bolshevism and declares the luck of the German people "to be alive just at the time when once in 2,000 years an Adolf Hitler has been born."

National Political Course for the Armed Forces, from 15 to 23 Jan. 1937.

[National-Politischer Lehrgang der Wehrmacht, vom 15.-23. Januar 1937]

Restricted for the Armed Forces.

HIMMLER: Organization and Obligations of the SS and the Police.

[Pages 141–161]

I shall speak first of all about the origin, organization, and the spheres of activity of the SS; secondly, about the organization and obligations of the Police; and thirdly, about the combined efforts of the SS and the Police, and about the important and vitally necessary question on the internal security of the Reich.

The SS originated in 1923, very early in the history of the movement, as shock troop [Stosstrupp] Hitler, was prohibited and disbanded on November 9, 1923. When the party was reestablished in 1925, the SA as a protective organization for the meetings was at first prohibited. The Fuehrer was also denied the right of speech and assembly in Prussia as well as in Bavaria. Assembly was permitted only in Saxony and Thuringia which at that time were entirely red.

In order to insure the success of these meetings, it was necessary to protect them from dispersal. Therefore in 1925 the Fuehrer ordered a small organization to be formed in order to protect these meetings, namely the SS [Schutzstaffeln, protective squadrons]—literally Staffeln at that time, namely small formations with the effective strength of one leader and 10 men in each location. Even as large a city as Berlin had a squadron of only 2 leaders and 20 men at that time. Throughout 1925 and 1926 we succeeded in carrying out and carrying through the meetings of the Fuehrer and also of other party speakers in Saxony and Thuringia with these squadrons.

In 1926 the SA was again permitted to exist, and for a few years the SS withdrew more into the background.

In the year 1929, eight years ago, I was ordered by the Fuehrer to take over the leadership of all SS units in the entire Reich, then totaling 280 men, and to change them according to the order, into a reliable elite organization of the Party.

I decided to tackle this problem—which I should like to discuss here to some extent—because I was a National Socialist, of course. I want to tell you also how this is to be interpreted. I am a strong believer in the doctrine that, in the end, only good blood can achieve the greatest, enduring things in the world. Strengthened by this conviction of mine, I began to work on this problem.

Accordingly only good blood, blood which history has proved to be leading and creative and the foundation of every state and all military activities, only Nordic blood, can be considered. I said to myself that should I succeed to select from the German people for this organization as many people as possible a majority of whom possess this desired blood, to teach them military discipline and, in time, the understanding of the value of blood and the entire ideology which results from it, then it will be possible actually to create such an elite organization which would successfully hold its own in all cases of emergency.

This form of selection of good blood has been very often theoretically recognized. Many books have been written on it from Chamberlain to Guenther of the years 1926/27, and many others which I shall not mention here. Now came the difficult question of the method of selecting these people. There are two kinds of selection procedures: first, the most severe selection procedure brought about by war, the struggle for life and death. In this procedure the value of blood is shown through achievement. In the year 1929, a great number of former soldiers still existed whose worth could be determined by their record during the war. Wars however, are exceptional circumstances, and a way had to be found to make selections in peace time as well, when courage could not be given this test. Thus, I could only draw conclusions from the appearance of the people in question. Of course, many will argue immediately: that is all very well but if you judge by height, blond hair and blue eyes and the dimensions of the skull then the matter is very problematical. That is known to me very well, too. One could never judge by that alone.

I then went on to require a certain height. I did not accept people under 1,7 m—and here I ask you to understand the exact meaning to my words—because I know that people who have reached a certain height must possess the desired blood to some degree. Of course it is impossible to be too discriminating here as it cannot be said that people who are smaller should not possess the same blood. That is natural but by choosing from this pool of people having the desired height there exists a greater probability of obtaining satisfactory results.

But we went further. It was not enough to go by height, but we began to obtain photographs at that time. That amounted to a hundred to two hundred people annually who were eligible for admission. I have personally seen each photograph and asked myself: Does the face of this man have distinct traits of foreign blood, excessive cheek bones, or as is the common way of asking: Does this one appear Mongolic or that one Slavic? Slavic, incidentally, is a faulty expression. It is merely a popular expression.

Why have I done all this? I should like to call to your attention here the types of soldier councils of the years 1918 and 1919. Everyone of you who was an officer at that time knows a number of such people by personal experience. You will have to admit that on the whole they were people whose appearance affected our German eye as rather peculiar, whose features looked strange and who had some foreign blood in them. They were the type of people who could be disciplined, who are orderly in normal times, who would even be brave, bold and daring in time of war but who, because of their blood, would fail to pass the final great test of character and nerves.

Since I knew these things I said to myself: I shall not accept people whom I expect to quit, to complain, to become disloyal and traitors, to have bad soldierly manners and the like at the moment of political tests, because of the nature of the composition of their blood. We had to be all the more careful because we had only voluntary discipline in the SS during the years of struggle, and therefore we were unable to compel a man to do something.

It was only possible to deprive the man of his arm band for a period of three or four weeks or impose on him penal drills, and that only if he voluntarily accepted the punishment. If he was unwilling he could always say: "I resign, I don't like it any longer." We therefore have followed the above-mentioned principle of selection and been able to remove the principal causes of defect.

With this outward screening however, no final selection had been attained, since it was always the performance of the person during the following months and years which was of importance. It was my point of view that we should always require difficult tasks and more than any other organization. Valuable personnel is never trained by means of easy service and conveniences, but by difficulties and added burdens. We therefore began by exacting from our men higher dues in spite of the widespread poverty of the times. At a time when no uniforms were issued to party organizations, we asked our people to acquire black trousers and boots from their own means—a tremendous expense for an unemployed person who had to pay the 40 marks of his own purse. If he failed to do so and declared: I cannot do that, then we explained to him: please go away, for you somehow failed to understand the matter for you do not possess the instinctive willingness to a sacrifice of your own accord, for we cannot use you. Thus we gradually arrived at our intended and desired picture.

This briefly-mentioned theory of selection of people may be criticised, today after eight years I believe I can say with sincerity that its practical application has justified its existence, and that it has really been possible to effect a certain selection of people in the SS already during the time of fighting.

I shall skip the next few periods and shall now occupy myself with the year 1933. This year was for the SS the hardest trial; for it was a time when all organizations flourished, a time of great assault and tidal waves of those who desired membership in the party and its organizations. A very difficult question confronted us at that time. It was a question of deciding whether to close the party and its organizations to further membership and thus remaining pure in quality but small in volume, or of opening them to further membership to increase their volume. This resulted in a dangerous situation, as was shown as a number of people poured in who were not entirely loyal and idealists, so that to a certain degree it became a menace of numbers, of the masses.

The SS too was endangered by this menace. Therefore I closed it in April 1933 while some of the other organizations still accepted as great a number of people as possible. This way I had the SS again under my control in April and said: We shall accept no more people. From the end of 1933 to the end of 1935 we expelled all those of the newly accepted members who proved unsuitable. In these years I have expelled approximately 60,000 men. Today the strength of the SS consists of approximately 210,000 men. This has been of great benefit to the SS and all of its units as its quality has greatly improved whereas it would have suffered considerably through quantity.

I shall close the question of selection by stating that today we accept young men of 18 years of age. We know them already from the Hitler Youth, have studied them already a few years, so that we are sure to get only the best. With 18 years they come to us as candidates.

They are extremely thoroughly examined and checked. Of 100 men we can use on the average 10 or 15, no more. We ask for the political reputation record of his parents, brothers and sisters, the record of his ancestry as far back as 1750 and naturally the physical examination and his records of the Hitler youth. Further we ask for a record of hereditary health showing that no hereditary diseases exist in his parents and in his family. Last, but perhaps most important, is a certification of the race commission. This examining commission is composed of SS leaders, anthropologists and physicians.

The behavior of this young man in front of this commission is now what is decisive: Not only the way he stands at attention but also his manly disciplined bearing, the ease and composition with which he answers the questions posed to him in the course of conversation, his gait, his hands, in fact all that which we have come to regard in the course of our eight years of experience as ideal. This is the way we determine whether to accept the man or not. The first years the company has been very unhappy in many cases. It asked: Why is this man refused us? We have just located in this or that village a man who has in every respect an orderly appearance and now when this man confronts the race commission he is being refused at a time when it is so difficult to obtain people. In such cases we have always remained and still remain severe and that is the right thing. That is the proper way to conduct a veritable selection.

I now come to the organization of the SS. It is necessary to distinguish among the following organizations of the SS. First the General SS which consists of about 190,000 men. This General SS is entirely civilian in nature except for the higher officer corps, which performs its duties on the higher levels, that is from Sturmbannfuhrer up. I am very proud of the fact that only 0.4 percent of the General SS are unemployed. These 0.4 percent come from Upper Silesia where it is really very difficult to obtain work. We have almost only professionals, and it is my opinion that it should be so. For a really capable man is of little value to me if he only excels in arts, he must also be otherwise honest and of good character, and accomplish something in his field, in his profession. A man who changes his position three times without satisfactory reason is expelled as we have no further interest in him. People who stand around idle are of no use to us. The General SS, therefore, is entirely professional in its nature and character and performs its duties nights and Sundays just like in war time. Besides the General SS there is the Verfuegungstruppe; also the Death Head Units, the SD, and the race and population system. I shall now discuss individual units in some detail.

* * * * *

A great many SS men live very far apart. Of course, it would be much more convenient to set up a Sturmabanne in some town and in this way have all the people always together. That would facilitate considerably the exercises which always take place in the evening hours, instruction and sport, and require much less effort. However, that would inevitably result in a decreasing quality because not enough people possessing the desired qualities could be obtained in a town of approximately 20 to 25 thousand inhabitants. We have, therefore, extended our organization considerably and have many platoons in the country side. These platoons are then divided up between the villages, so that in a typical village only the two best young men are SS members. We have meetings over the week ends when the farmer is not too occupied, or one entire afternoon in the winter, while in summer we only have monthly roll calls. That is the outline of the organization of the General SS.

The age groups in the SS are as follows: With 18 years the young man enters the SS. He is first an applicant, after three months he takes the oath on the Fuehrer and thus becomes a candidate [Anwaerter]. As a candidate during the first year he takes examinations for his SA sport insignia and his bronze sport insignia. At the age of 19 or 19 1/2, according to the time of his acceptance, he is conscripted for the labor service and subsequently for the Wehrmacht. After two more years he comes back from the Wehrmacht unless he remains there as a prospective noncommissioned officer or reenlists. If he returns to us he is still candidate. In these weeks he is especially thoroughly instructed in ideology. The first year is for him a period of elementary ideological indoctrination. In these weeks following his return from the Wehrmacht he receives special instruction about the marriage law and all other laws pertaining to the family, and the honor laws. On the 9th of November, following his return from the Wehrmacht, he becomes an SS man in the true sense. The Reichsfuehrer of the SS is just as much an SS man in the sense of the SS organization as the common man at the front. On this 9th of November he is being awarded the dagger, and at this occasion he promises to abide by the marriage law and the disciplinary laws of the SS, since the family is also subject to these laws. From this day on he has the right and the duty to defend his honor with a weapon as laid down by the honor laws of the SS. The applicants and candidates do not yet have this right. The SS man remains in the so called active general SS until his 35th year. From his 35th to his 45th year he is in the SS reserve, and after his 45th year in the Stammabteilung of the SS, identified by the grey color patch. Between the ages of 21 and 35 the SS man has to perform a great many duties, especially up to his 25th year. In these first four years there are a lot of marches, tournaments, i.e., sports of all kinds which take the form of contests that take place each year between Easter and Summer solstice so that we are able to select the best men of every company by these demonstrations of physical ability. Every SS man is being asked to pass some kind of annual test, until his 50th year. And the reason for that? These men are for the most part professionals. In the SS perhaps anywhere from 1/2 to 3/5 live in cities. The workman in the cities is often engaged in occupations requiring him to stand or the intellectual worker to sit for a considerable amount of time. To that is added the misery of big cities which in my opinion is also a very serious military question.

People of the 20th Century no longer walk but travel in the subway, railroad or cars. Nobody is accustomed to marching in all the years of his civilian life. Or take those who hold leading positions as an example, all the professional State and Ministry leaders. These people are condemned to sit. Everybody is so pressed for time he has to take an automobile because there is no other way to keep up with the rush. The result of this is that people grow pale and fat and in some cases phlegmatic which is never good for the State. If we desire to remain young we have to be sportsmen. But all that would remain on paper if I did not hold annual checkups or arouse to a certain degree the ambition of the men so that they really become sportsmen and pass their annual tests. * * *

The performance insignia of the SA have the following meaning: every form of sport which requires the use of arms is being executed with both arms. Shot put is done with both arms; the same holds true for stone putting. Pistols and rifles are fired left and right. That appears terribly awkward and unaccustomed in the beginning, but it is an excellent form of exercise and very successful. Hand grenades and clubs are hurled left and right. In the beginning no record performances can be expected of course of people past their twentieth year, since the left arm or in the case of a left-handed person the right arm, are completely untrained, so that at a distance of 10 m the target is often missed by three or five meters. It will be, however, a very good development and application of all physical strength if we require such performances of youths in the ages of 13 to 14 from the very beginning. I believe that in this way we shall be very successful. Every year the performance insignia differ. Of course, I do not expect the conditions and time from a 40 year old for a 100 meter race as I do expect them from a man of 21, but I do require of the man of 40 greater endurance in marching than I do of the man of 21. I expect a 30 year old man to shoot calmer and better than a 19 or 20 year old with few examples. They are also graded to the extent that a wounded war veteran who e.g. cannot swim need not, for that reason, refuse every sport. But I want to help him by grading the conditions so that one who lost an arm can perform the exercise with the other arm. Such are the sport activities of the SS from the ages of 18 to 50. Aside from the sport activity, those between the ages of 21 and 35 receive complete training in street patrolling and barricading for cases of internal security.

Hand in hand with physical exercise is mental and ideological training. Weekly periods of instruction are held during which pages from Hitler's "Mein Kampf" are read. The older a person, the more steadfast must he be in his ideology and the more training must he get in ideology.

* * * * *

I now come to the Death Head Units. The employment and obligations of the Verfuegungstruppe I shall discuss later in connection with the police. The Death Head Units originated from the guard units of the concentration camps. In connection with these concentration camps, I should like to give a few data. We have in Germany today the following concentration camps which, in my opinion, should not decrease but increase in number for certain reasons:

(1) Dachau near Munich; (2) Sachsenhausen near Berlin, which is the former camp Esterwege in Emsland. I have dissolved this camp in Emsland upon the suggestion of Reich Labor Leader, Hierl, and the judiciary, who declared it was wrong to tell one person that the service in the swamps to make land arable is an honor, and another, by sending him there as a prisoner: "I'll teach you people what it means to get sent to the swamps." This indeed is illogical, and after half or three quarters of a year, I dissolved the camp in Esterwege and transferred it to Sachsenhausen near Oranienburg. Then there is a camp in Lichtenburg near Torgau, one in Sachsenburg near Chemnitz and besides a few smaller ones. The number of prisoners is about 8000. I shall explain to you why we must have so many and still more. We once had a very efficiently organized German Communist Party [KPD]. This KPD has been crushed in the year 1933. A part of the functionaries went to foreign countries. Another part was comprised in the very high number of protective custody prisoners in the year 1933. Because of my extensive knowledge of Bolshevism, I have always opposed the release of these people from the camps. It must be clear to us that the great mass of workmen are absolutely susceptible to National Socialism and the contemporary form of state as long as their way of thought has not been changed by the specifically indoctrinated, trained and financially backed functionaries. * * *

It would be extremely instructive for everyone—some members of the Wehrmacht were already able to do so—to inspect such a concentration camp. Once they have seen it, they are convinced of the fact that no one had been sent there unjustly; that it is the offal of criminals and freaks. No better demonstration of the laws of inheritance and race, as set forth by Doctor Guett, exists than such a concentration camp. There you can find people with hydrocephalus, people who are cross-eyed, deformed, half-Jewish, and a number of racially inferior products. All that is assembled there. Of course we distinguish between those inmates who are only there for a few months for the purpose of education, and those who are to stay for a very long time. On the whole, education consists of discipline, never of any kind of instruction on an ideological basis, for the prisoners have, for the most part, slave-like souls; and only very few people of real character can be found there. They would pretend to do all that would be asked of them, repeat all that is said in the “Voelkischer Beobachter” but in reality, stay the same. The discipline thus preens order. The order begins with these people living in clean barracks. Such a thing can really only be accomplished by us Germans, hardly another nation would be as humane as we are. The laundry is frequently changed. The people are taught to wash themselves twice daily, and the use of a toothbrush with which most of them have been unfamiliar. * * *

The concentration camps are guarded by these Death Head Units. It is impossible to use exclusively married people for guard duty as has been suggested once, for no state can afford to do so. It is further necessary to keep the number of such guards for concentration camps—there are 3,500 men in Germany—at a relatively high level, for no form of service is as exacting and strenuous for troops as the guarding of crooks and criminals. * * *

In case of war, it must become clear to us that a considerable number of unreliable persons will have to be put here if we are to assure ourselves of the absence of highly disagreeable developments in case of war.

The prisoner guards were formerly members of the general SS. We gradually collected them into the so-called Death Head Units. They are not arranged in companies, but in centuries (groups of 100) and have naturally also machine guns. In such camps there are two or three control towers, manned day and night with fully loaded machine guns, so that any attempt of a general uprising—a possibility for which we must always be prepared—can be immediately suppressed. The entire camp can be strafed from three towers.

* * * *

I now come to the Security Service [SD]; it is the great ideological intelligence service of the party and, in the long run, also that of the state. During the time of struggle for power it was only the intelligence service of the SS. At that time we had, for quite natural reasons, an intelligence service with the regiments, battalions and companies. We had to know what was going on on the opponent’s side, whether the Communists intended to hold a meeting today or not, whether our people were to be suddenly attacked or not and similar things. I separated this service already in 1941 from the troops, from the units of the general SS, because I considered it to be wrong. For one thing, the secrecy is endangered, then the individual men or even the companies are too likely to discuss every day problems.

That was indeed the principle of the SS from the beginning. Every day problems do not interest us; every leader appointed by the Fuehrer will be backed by us, every leader dismissed by the Fuehrer will be removed by us, if necessary by force, because only the command of the Fuehrer counts. Besides that we are only interested in ideological questions of importance for decades or centuries, so that the man is really above the concern of every day and knows that he is working for a great task, which occurs but once in 2000 years.

* * * *

. . . The spheres which it handles are above all Communism, Judaism, Freemasonry, ultra mundane activities, the activity of political religion, and reaction. . . . The security service is only interested in the great ideological problems.

* * * *

What economic influence do the Jews exercise—again considered on a large scale—to suffocate business, to commit sabotage and to transfer foreign currency illegally? These are things which are being studied there scientifically and—in this case the word really fits—by a general staff, which may sometimes last for years, tasks which in many or in most cases are only in the beginning stage.

After the Security Service follows the last pillar, the race-and settlement organization. We thus have the general SS, which represents the majority of the SS, of the order, the Verfuengungs troops with a certain task in the country for the protection of the interior, the Death Head Units, also for the protection of the interior, the Security Service, the intelligence service of the party and the state, and finally the race-and settlement organization whose task of ideological training is of a positive nature, as contracted with the Security Service which has the negative task to seek information about the opponent. In this race-and settlement office the marriage applications are being handled. In the last 4 or 5 years we have the order concerning marriages: No SS men can get married without the approval of the SS Reich leader. A physical examination of the bride and guarantees for the bride's ideological and human character are required. We are not interested whether the woman has a fortune or not. We request only a statement whether or not she has defects. We prefer it if the rich girls take along only what they have earned themselves, or their dowry. In addition, the genealogical table up to 1750 is required, the hereditary physical report of both, and several police and other reports. This results in tremendous work, especially now that people are getting married in an unusually great number; because it is our concern, that our men get married. We desire that they get married at 26 years, if possible, so that there will be really young marriages which are also able to have children. * * *

* * * *

We must clearly recognize that an opponent in war is an opponent not only in a military but also in an ideological sense. When I speak here of opponents, I obviously mean our natural opponent, international Bolshevism, under Jewish-Masonic leadership. This Bolshevism, of course, has its supreme citadel in Russia. But this does not mean that there is danger of Bolshevist attack from Russia only. One must always reckon with this danger from wherever this Jewish Bolshevism has gained decisive influence for itself. The states or people under Jewish-Masonic-Bolshevist leadership, or at least strong influence, will of necessity be unfriendly toward Germany and will constitute a danger.

Thus we must constantly ask ourselves, "Who is, or would be an opponent in case of war? Who is an ideological opponent, that is, who is under Jewish-Masonic-Bolshevist influence"? We must clearly realize, that Bolshevism is the organization of the subhumans, it is the absolute foundation of Jewish sovereignty, it is the exact contrary of all that is dear to an Aryan people. It is a diabolical teaching, for it appeals to the meanest and lowest instincts of mankind and makes a religion of this. Do not be deceived: Bolshevism, with its Lenin entombed in the Kremlin, will take only a few decades to become the diabolical religion of destruction, a religion native to Asia for the destruction of the whole world.

(Furthermore, remember that this Bolshevism is working according to plan for the Bolshevization of other peoples, and the destruction is aimed at the white race. One of the first institutions founded under Jewish leadership, as early as 1918, was an Asiatic university as I shall call it. It has a kind of department for each Asiatic population, whether numerous or not. The functionaries for these populations are instructed not only in their language, but also as to the customs, as to the religious and class quarrels, and the economic circumstances, etc. They are instructed whether these people are mostly rich or poor, whether the poorer class is particularly oppressed, etc. All of this is studied down to the smallest sects. The people who have finished their education there, then go out in a constant stream to all of these people and exploit their wishes and longings as their religious differences and their fanaticism, taking advantage of social misery, to draw them into a whirlpool and thus gradually convince them that the only ones who can really help them are the people in Moscow.

This general movement is also directed against the white race, and is today directed primarily against resurrected Germany, which was generally considered to have been ruined, because of having been subdued. If we wish to be immune to the poison of destruction in our people, our lives must again be founded on social well-being, order and cleanliness. We are in the process of creating both. The first four years have passed; unemployment has almost vanished, much has been accomplished, much more remains to be done by us. But the most important thing is the thorough ideological permeation of all our people with the profound realization that our people, a minority of 70 million in the heart of Europe, could stand only because we are qualitatively more valuable than the others.

And this brings me back to what I said about the race question at the beginning.

We are more valuable than the others who do now and always will surpass us in numbers. We are more valuable because our blood enables us to invent more than others, to lead our people better than the others; because it enables us to have better soldiers, better statesmen, higher culture, better characters. We also have better quality, speaking of your profession, because the German soldier is more devoted to duty, more decent, and more intelligent than the soldiers of other countries. And we shall maintain this quality as long as we keep our blood and people healthy, so long as this people recognizes and obeys the ancient laws for preservation of a people which National Socialism, thanks to Adolf Hitler, restored to it. We shall remain healthy and immune as long as we do not slide back into democracy, into a hereditary or legitimate imperialism which did not develop from the people. Let us realize clearly that we shall weather the next decades only if we are a people that has a profound conviction of itself, believes in its own strength, and proves this strength.

I spoke of the ideological permeation of the whole people in case of war. If this war should come sooner than any of us believe or wish, that is, if war will come at all, we must clearly realize that there will always be a residue among the German people who will form a nucleus for the Comintern. The Comintern have an easy time of it, for they have a political agitator and at the same time a military spy who sells. Every communist is also a military spy who reveals any military and industrial secret out of loyalty to his imaginary fatherland, Moscow, the native land of the proletarians. Because of his conviction, he engages in political agitation and sedition in exactly the same way in order to start the revolution. The sooner war would come, the greater would be the danger. The later it comes, the more generations of youth have grown up, year after year, the less is the danger. The danger would arise again only if the German people would deviate from today's path. In any case, we must prepare for this danger, for this internal theater of war, and always realize clearly that any war brought about by neglect of this internal theater of war would lead to damage.

* * * *

Let us all clearly realize, the next decades do not signify any foreign political argument which Germany either can or cannot overcome, but they signify a fight of extermination of the abovementioned subhuman opponents in the whole world who fight Germany, as the nuclear people of the Northern race, Germany as nucleus of the German people, Germany as bearer of the culture of mankind; they signify the existence or nonexistence of the white race of which we are the leading people. We have, of course, one conviction: we are lucky enough to be alive just at the time when once in 2,000 years an Adolf Hitler has been born, and we are convinced that we shall survive every danger in both good and bad times because we all hold together and because each one approaches his work with his conviction.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 616–634, Doc. 1992-A-PS.

113. EXCERPT FROM A SPEECH BY HITLER TO THE REICHSTAG, JANUARY 30, 1939

On the sixth anniversary of his rise to power, Adolf Hitler delivered a speech to the Reichstag that ran some 64 type-set single-spaced pages. It was primarily concerned with the economic, political, military, and diplomatic recovery of Germany in the aftermath of the devastating Versailles Treaty of 1919 after World War I. Although there were numerous instances of Hitler's virulent antisemitism, it is the following excerpt from his speech that is most often noted. It reflects his worldview (Weltanschauung) about the role "international Jewish financiers" play in global actions. More specifically, it is a warning that if there should be a new world war, it will result in "the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe." The speech was given just seven months before Hitler would begin World War II by invading Poland on September 1, 1939.

VOELKISCHER BEOBACHTER, Munich Edition,
1 February 1939
Hitler speech to Reichstag of 30 January 1939

Once more I will assume the part of a prophet:

If the international Jewish financiers within and without Europe, succeeded in plunging the nations once more into a world war, then the result will be not the Bolshevisation of the world and thereby the victory of Jewry—but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe. * * *

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, p. 367, Doc. 2663-PS.

114. COMMISSAR ORDER, JUNE 6, 1941

This high-level order, known as the Commissar's Order (Kommissarbefehl)—to be read only by commanders in chief of armies or of air commands—effectively gave license to German soldiers who would be invading the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941 (as part of Operation Barbarossa), to summarily shoot and kill all "political commissars" that they encounter. Issued by the German High Command, the rationale given for this order—which the Nazis knew was in contravention of international law—was that in the upcoming fight against Bolshevism, all captured German soldiers would no doubt be treated in a "cruel, inhuman" manner that would be "dictated by hate." The one exception—and this was only temporary—were "political commissars who are not guilty of any hostile act or are not suspected of such." While the order specifically speaks of "political commissars," it should be remembered that communists and Bolsheviks had long been tied by Hitler to the Jews (e.g., the term "Judeo-Bolsheviks"). In response to opposition to the order by some military commanders, the order was rescinded on March 6, 1942, not, however, before thousands of so-called political commissars were killed, and not before setting the tone for Germany's treatment of communists and Jews going forward.

High Command of the Armed Forces
WFSt. (Armed Forces Operational Staff) Department L (IV Q) Fuehrer Headquarters,
6 June 1941

("Intelligence")
No 44822/41 Top Secret for general officers only

In addition to the Fuehrer's decree of 14 May regarding Military jurisdiction in the "Barbarossa" zone (Supreme Command of the Armed Forces/Armed Forces Operational Staff/Department L (IV Q) (Intelligence) No 44718/41, (Top Secret, for General Officers only), the enclosed "directives for the treatment of political commissars" are being transmitted herewith:

You are requested to limit the distribution to Commanders in Chief of Armies or of Air Commands, respectively, and to inform the Junior commanders by word of mouth.

The Chief of the Supreme Command
Of the Armed Forces
By Order.

Signed: Warlimont

Enclosure to Supreme Command of the Armed Forces/
Department L IV Q (Intelligence)
No. 44822/41 Top Secret
For General Officers only.

Directives for the treatment of political commissars.

When fighting Bolshevism one can not count on the enemy acting in accordance with the principles of humanity or International Law. In particular it must be expected that the treatment of our prisoners by the political commissars of all types who are the true pillars of resistance, will be cruel, inhuman and dictated by hate.

The troops must realize:

- 1.) That in this fight it is wrong to trust such elements with clemency and consideration in accordance with International Law. They are a menace to our own safety and to the rapid pacification of the conquered territories.
- 2.) That the originators of the asiatic-barbaric methods of fighting are the political commissars. They must be dealt with promptly and with the utmost severity.

Therefore, if taken while fighting or offering resistance they must, on principle, be shot immediately.

For the rest, the following instructions will apply:

I. Theatre of Operations.

- 1) Political commissars who oppose our troops will be dealt with in accordance with the "decree concerning jurisdiction in the "Barbarossa" area". This applies to commissars of any type and position, even if they are only suspected of resistance, sabotage or instigation thereto.
Reference is made to "Directives on the behavior of troops in Russia."
- 2) Political commissars in their capacity of officials attached to the enemy troops are recognizable by their special insignia—red star with an inwoven golden hammer and sickle on the sleeves—[. . .]. They are to be segregated at once, i.e. while still on the battlefield, from the prisoners of war. This is necessary in order to deprive them of any possibility of influencing the captured soldiers. Those commissars will not be recognized as soldiers; the protection granted to prisoners of war in accordance with International Law will not apply to them. After having been segregated they are to be dealt with.
- 3) Political commissars who are not guilty of any hostile act or are not suspected of such will remain unmolested for the time being. Only in the course of a deeper penetration into the country will it be possible to decide whether they are, or should be handed over to the "Sonderkommandos". The latter should preferably scrutinize these cases themselves.

1230 Goering's Order to Heydrich to Make Preparations for a General Solution of the Jewish Problem

As a matter of principle, when deliberating the question of "guilty or not guilty", the personal impression received of the commissar's outlook and attitude should be considered of greater importance than the facts of the case which may not be decisive.

- 4) In cases 1) and 2) a brief report (report form) on the incident is to be submitted:
 - a) to the Division (Ic) (Field Intelligence Officer) by troops subordinated to a Division.
 - b) to the Corps Command or other respective Commands, as follows (Ic) by troops directly subordinated to a Corps Command, an Army High Command or the Command or an Army group, or Armored Group.
- 5) None of the above mentioned measures must delay the progress of operations. Combat troops should therefore refrain from systematic rounding-up and cleansing measures.

II. In the Rear Areas.

Commissars arrested in the rear area on account of doubtful behavior are to be handed over to the "Einsatzgruppe" or the "Einsatzkommandos" of the SS Security Service (SD) respectively.

III. Restriction with regard to Court Martials and Summary Courts.

The Court Martials and Summary Courts of regimental and other commanders must not be entrusted with the carrying out of the measures as under I and II.

Distribution:

Sector Staff Silesia	1st copy
Army Group B	2nd copy
Sector Staff East Prussia	3rd copy
High Command 16th Army	4th copy
Sub-sector East Prussia I	5th copy
Fortress Staff Blaurock	6th copy
High Command 4th Army	7th copy
Sector Staff Staufen	8th copy
Labor Staff Gotzmann	9th copy
High Command 11th Army	10th copy
High Command 2nd Army	11th copy
Chief Construction Group South	12th copy
Fortress Staff 49	13th copy
Fortress Staff Wegener	14th copy
Armoured Group 4	15th copy
High Command of Army in Norway	16th copy

Army High Command/ Adjutants Office Army C.i.C.	17th copy
Army High Command/ Adjutants Office Army General Staff	18th copy
Army High Command/ Department: Foreign Armies East	19th copy
Army High Command/ Operational Section (without OKW decree)	20th copy
Army High Command/ Quartermaster- General (without OKW decree)	21st copy
In reserve	copy 22–30

Source: U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, College Park, MD, Nuremberg Trial, National Archives Record Group 238m, Entry 175, Box 27, NOKW-1076.

115. GOERING'S ORDER TO HEYDRICH TO MAKE PREPARATIONS FOR A GENERAL SOLUTION OF THE JEWISH PROBLEM, JULY 31, 1941

In this letter by Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring (1893–1946) to the chief of the Security Police, Reinhard Heydrich (1904–1942), the latter is tasked with "bringing about a complete solution of the Jewish question in the German sphere of influence in Europe." This letter was cited by Heydrich as proof of his authority when, on January 20, 1942, he held a conference at a mansion in Wannsee, a suburb of Berlin, to discuss the implementation of Hitler's order to exterminate the Jews.

LETTER FROM GOERING TO HEYDRICH CONCERNING SOLUTION OF JEWISH QUESTION, 31 JULY 1941

The Reich Marshal of the Greater German Reich
Plenipotentiary for the Four Year Plan
Chairman of the Ministerial Council for National Defense
Berlin, 31 July 1941
To The Chief of the Security Police and the Security Service
SS Gruppenfuehrer Heydrich

Complementing the task that was assigned to you on 24 January 1939, which dealt with arriving at—through furtherance of emigration and evacuation—a solution of the Jewish problem, as advantageously as possible, I hereby charge you with making all necessary preparations in regard to organizational and financial matters for bringing about a complete solution of the Jewish question in the German sphere of influence in Europe.

Whenever other governmental agencies are involved, these are to cooperate with you.

I charge you furthermore to send me, before long, an over-all plan concerning the organizational, factual, and material measures necessary for the accomplishment of the desired solution of the Jewish question.

[Signed] GOERING

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. IV, pp. 132–133, Doc. 710-PS.

116. OPERATION BARBAROSSA: ORDER REGARDING CONDUCT IN THE EASTERN TERRITORIES, OCTOBER 10, 1941

Sometimes referred to as the "Severity Order" or the "Reichenau Order," this document represents one of the clearest statements of German intent in Russia. Issued by Field Marshal Walther von Reichenau, in command of the German Sixth Army that went into Russia as part of Operation Barbarossa, it is nothing less than a reprimand for any acts of kindness that may have been offered by German soldiers to Russians. It demands absolute commitment to the "complete annihilation of the false bolshevistic doctrine of the Soviet State and its armed forces," as well as "pitiless extermination of foreign treachery and cruelty." To ensure this, German soldiers must fully understand the "necessity of a severe but just revenge on subhuman Jewry."

Appendix to 12 Inf.Div. I.c/Adj. No. 607/41 Secret date 17.11. 1941.

Copy of a Copy
High Command of the Army Gen. Staff of the Army/Quarter Master

General Branch Admin.
(Qu.4/B) II. 7498/41 g.

H.Qu. Nigh Command of the Army
28.10.41.

SECRET!

Subject: Conduct of Troops in the Eastern Territories

By order of the C.in.C. Army, an enclosed copy of an order by GOC 6th Army on the conduct of the Troops in eastern territories which has been described by the Fuehrer as excellent, is being forwarded with the request to issue corresponding instructions on the same lines if this has not already been done.

By order.

(Signed) Wagner

SECRET!

Army H.Q., 10.10.41

Army Command 6., Sec. Ia-A.7

Subject: Conduct of Troops in Eastern Territories.

Regarding the conduct of troops towards the bolshevistic system, vague ideas are still prevalent in many cases. The most essential aim of war against the Jewish-bolshevistic system is a complete destruction of their means of power and the elimination of asiatic influence from the European culture. In this connection the troops are facing tasks which exceed the onesided routine of soldiering. The soldier in the eastern territories is not merely a fighter according to the rules of the art of war but also a bearer of ruthless national ideology and the avenger of bestialities which have been inflicted upon German and racially related nations.

Therefore the soldier must have full understanding for the necessity of a severe but just revenge on subhuman Jewry. The Army has to aim at another purpose, i.e., the annihilation of revolts in hinterland which, as experience proves, have always been caused by Jews.

The combating of the enemy behind the front line is still not being taken seriously enough. Treacherous, cruel partisans and unnatural women are still being made prisoners of war and guerilla fighters dressed partly in uniforms or plain clothes and vagabonds are still being treated as proper soldiers, and sent to prisoner of war camps. In fact, captured Russian officers talk even mockingly about Soviet agents moving openly about the roads and very often eating at German field kitchens. Such an attitude of the troops can only be explained by complete thoughtlessness, so it is now high time for the commanders to clarify the meaning of the present struggle.

The feeding of the natives and of prisoners of war who are not working for the Armed Forces from Army kitchens is an equally misunderstood humanitarian act as is the giving of cigarettes and bread. Things which the people at home can spare under great sacrifices and things which are being brought by the Command to the front under great difficulties, should not be given to the enemy by the soldier not even if they originate from booty. It is an important part of our supply.

When retreating the Soviets have often set buildings on fire. The troops should be interested in extinguishing of fires only as far as it is necessary to secure sufficient numbers of billets. Otherwise the disappearance of symbols of the former bolshevistic rule even in the form of buildings is part of the struggle of destruction. Neither historic nor artistic considerations are of any importance in the eastern territories. The command issues the necessary directives for the securing of raw materials and plants, essential for war economy. The complete disarming of the civil population in the rear of the fighting troops is imperative considering the long and vulnerable lines of communications. Where possible, captured weapons and ammunition should be stored and guarded. Should this be impossible because of the situation of the battle so the weapons and ammunition will be rendered useless. If isolated partisans are found using firearms in the rear of the army drastic measures are to be taken. These measures will be extended to that part of the male population who were in a position to hinder or report the attacks. The indifference of numerous apparently anti-soviet elements which originates from a "wait and see" attitude, must give way to a clear decision for active collaboration. If not, no one can complain about being judged and treated a member of the Soviet System.

The fear of the German counter-measures must be stronger than the threats of the wandering bolshevistic remnants. Being far from all political considerations of the future the soldier has to fulfill two tasks:

1. Complete annihilation of the false bolshevistic doctrine of the Soviet State and its armed forces.
2. The pitiless extermination of foreign treachery and cruelty and thus the protection of the lives of military personnel in Russia.

This is the only way to fulfil our historic task to liberate the German people once forever from the Asiatic-Jewish danger.

Commander in Chief
(Signed) von Reichenau
Field Marshal.

Certified Copy:
[signature illegible]
Captain.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VIII, pp. 585-587, Doc. UK-81.

117. EINSATZGRUPPEN: EXTRACTS FROM THE OPERATIONAL SITUATION REPORT, U.S.S.R. NO. 94, SEPTEMBER 25, 1941

The ordinary tone of this report of the killing activities of several of the Einsatzgruppen (four mobile killing units of about 750 men each that followed the German armies into Russia with orders to kill all communists and Jews) reflects the Einsatzgruppen leaders' total absence of concern for the hundreds of thousands of innocent Jewish men, women, and children they have killed. Noting that the total number of kills per Einsatzkommando (a subunit of an Einsatzgruppe) differ only because of the number of Jews found in a particular location, this report tells of various actions, including the establishment of ghettos to confine Jews until they have been exterminated. Difficulties are noted in achieving the correct balance between the goal of extermination of the Jews and the need to avoid eliminating Jews whose special skills are needed to ensure that productivity important to the German military is not interrupted.

EXTRACTS FROM OPERATIONAL SITUATION REPORT U.S.S.R. NO 94, 25 SEPTEMBER 1941, CONCERNING ACTIVITIES OF THE EINSATZGRUPPEN

The Chief of the Security Police and Security Service (SD)
IVA 1/Journal No. 1/B41, Top Secret

Berlin, 25 September 1941
48 copies-36th copy

Operational Situation Report U.S.S.R., No. 94

Top Secret

I. Political survey

* * * * *

II. Reports from the Einsatzgruppen and Einsatzkommandos
Einsatzgruppe A.
Location Kikerino

I. Partisans

* * * * *

Within the area of the civil administration, Einsatzkommandos 2 and 3 found at various places an intensified propaganda activity of the Jewish population for the Bolshevist cause. Wherever such propaganda activity appears the most severe measures are being taken and the places entirely purged of Jews as far as possible. This Jewish propaganda activity having been particularly intensive in Lithuania, the number of persons liquidated within the area of Einsatzkommando 3 has increased to approximately 75,000.

For specific tasks special Kommandos had repeatedly to be sent into the rural districts and were assigned to certain places for several days. Thus, for example, one Kommando had to be sent to Pljussa, since reports about large-scale looting had been received from there. Forty-seven persons were arrested and questioned. Seven persons were shot for looting, two more were publicly escorted through the streets of the place, while the inhabitants were told that these persons had been looting food to the detriment of the population. Another Sonderkommando had to be sent to Mugotova where 87 insane persons had armed themselves and roamed the countryside looting. It could be ascertained that these insane had been incited by 11 Communists, part of whom presumably belonged to a partisan group. The 11 agitators, among them 6 Jews, and the insane were liquidated.

In the vicinity of the headquarters of group staff Pesje, Ikerine and Neshne, the whole male population was regularly screened immediately on arrival of the units, resulting repeatedly in the arrest of partisans, Jewish and Communist agitators, looters, etc. Since the locations of the Einsatzgruppe are always near the headquarters of the 4th Armored Group, appreciation for this systematic and successful screening of the neighborhood area was repeatedly voiced by the 4th Armored Group.

II. The Jewish problem in the Eastland Territory

[Gebiet Ostland]

The first actions against the Jews in the Reich Commissariat Eastland, also in the field of the administrative police, were undertaken by the Security Police. After the civil administration had taken over, the Einsatzkommandos transferred all anti-Jewish actions in the administrative police field whether completed or only initiated, to the civil administration agencies. The establishment of ghettos had already been prepared everywhere and is being continued by the civil administration. Only at Wilno [Vylna] which was taken over by Einsatzgruppe A at a later date, preparations for the confinement in a ghetto of the 60,000 Jews living there had not yet been made. Einsatzkommando 3 has now suggested the establishment of a ghetto and will at the same time initiate the necessary pacification actions against the political activity of the Jews.

At Riga, the so-called Moscow quarter of the town had been provided as a ghetto, even before the civil administration took over and a council of Jewish elders had been nominated. The removal of the Jews into the ghetto is being continued.

The Jews in the cities are being employed by all German agencies as unpaid manpower. Difficulties with such employing agencies are everyday occurrences, if and when the Security Police must take steps against working Jews. Economic agencies have repeatedly even filed applications for exempting Jews from the obligation to wear the Star of David and for authorizing them to patronize public inns. This concerns mostly Jews who are designated as key personnel for certain economic enterprises. Such efforts are of course suppressed by the agencies of the Security Police.

In the old Soviet Russian territory, Jews were found only sporadically, even in the cities. Most of the Jews who had been living there had fled. At present, and since old Soviet Russian territories have been occupied, the Wehrmacht itself usually issues orders for the marking of the Jews. Thus, the commander in chief of the 18th Army has ordered, for example, that Jews must be distinguished by white brassards to be worn on both arms and showing the Star of David.

* * * * *

IV. Situation in occupied area of Old Soviet Russia

* * * * *

No reports from Einsatzgruppe B.
Einsatzgruppe C.
Location Smolensk.

* * * * *

II. Measures taken and observations made by the Security Police

During the preparation period for the military offensive now under way, the operations of the Einsatzkommandos could be continued intensively and on a broad basis.

In the southern region of the operational area, because of the sparseness of the Jewish population, the main effort had to be directed toward individual investigations and search actions, while particularly in the region of Zhitomir and Berdichev there was an opportunity for actions on a larger scale.

This explains also the difference in the number of executions reported by the individual Kommandos.

Sonderkommando 4a has now surpassed the number of 15,000 executions. Einsatzkommando 5, for the period between 31 August and 6 September 1941, reports the liquidation of 90 political officials, 72 saboteurs and looters, and 161 Jews. Sonderkommando 4b, in the period between 6–12 September 1941, shot 13 political officials and 290 Jews, primarily of the intelligentsia, whereas Einsatzkommando 6, in the period between 1–13 September 1941, executed 60 persons. Group staff was able to liquidate during the last days four political officials and informers of the NKVD, six asocial elements (gypsies) and 55 Jews. The units of the Higher SS and Police Leader during the month of August shot a total of 44,125 persons, mostly Jews.

* * * * *

As already mentioned, the procedure against the Jews is necessarily different in the individual sectors, according to the density of their settlement. Especially in the northern sector of Einsatzgruppe C, a great many Jewish refugees have returned to the villages and, present now a heavy burden in regard to the food situation. The population neither houses nor feeds them. They live partly in caverns, partly in overcrowded old huts. The danger of epidemics has thus increased considerably, so that for that reason alone a thorough cleanup of the respective places became necessary.

The insolence of the Jews has not yet diminished even now. Apart from the fact that, on the occasion of raids, they like to pass themselves off for Russians, Ukrainians, even ethnic Germans, they often are in the possession of passports which, though showing their names correctly, give a false nationality. Concealment of their Jewish descent has been made easier for them by the Russianization of the names which has taken place to an ever-increasing degree during the last years.

At Kirovograd it became known that Jews tried to obtain all the register's office identity papers with a false nationality. Several Jews, on the basis of forged papers, even succeeded in obtaining various posts with the administration where they performed such acts of "re-baptism" in a system of patronage as practiced already previously. The Ukrainian population, for fear of revenge by the Jews, often does not dare to report this situation to the authorities. The most severe measures are taken here in dealing with such cases.

Difficulties have arisen insofar as Jews are often the only skilled workers in certain trades. Thus, the only harness-makers and the only good tailors at Novo-Ukrainia are Jews. At other places also only Jews can be employed for carpentry and locksmith work. The cause of this shortage of skilled workers is to a large extent to be found in the unlimited compulsory evacuation of skilled Ukrainians by the Soviets. In order not to endanger reconstruction and the repair work also for the benefit of transient troop units, it has become necessary to exclude provisionally especially the older Jewish skilled workers from the executions.

* * * * *

No reports from Einsatzgruppe D.

* * * * *

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. X, pp. 1220–1224, Doc. NO-3146.

118. REPORT ON THE EXECUTION OF JEWS IN BORRISOW, OCTOBER 24, 1941

This is an extensive report on the mass murder of some 8,000 Jews in the city of Borrisow, in Belarus, three months into Germany's invasion of Russia (Operation Barbarossa). It was sent by Oberwachtmeister Soenneken to General Erwin von Lauhausen of the Abwehr, a German intelligence unit. Of particular interest is the belief among the Jews—when they became aware of the pending action—that Hitler could not possibly know of these killings, thinking that if he did he would have ordered them stopped. It is also interesting to learn of the response of the non-Jewish neighbors of the victims. Initially they said of the Jews, "Let them perish; they did us a lot of harm," but when they actually saw the Jews being taken out to large pits and to their death, they seemed incredulous that such a thing could be happening to innocent, hardworking people, and they expressed concern for their own safety after the killing of the Jews was complete. Note that von Lauhausen was part of the resistance and involved in efforts to kill Hitler.

[Report received by General [editor's note: Erwin von] Lahousen in his official capacity as a German intelligence officer.]

Copy

24 October 1941

Report on the execution of Jews in Borrisow.

From Friday 17 October to Monday 20 October I had official business in Borrisow. Upon arrival there on Friday I was informed by the head of the Russian security police there, Ehof, who had been installed in this post some time ago by the SD, that on the night from Sunday to Monday all Jews of Borrisow were to be shot. To my astounded question, that it would be impossible to dispatch 8000 persons into Eternity in the course of a single night in a fairly orderly manner, he replied that it was not the first time that he did this and he would be able to finish the job with his men; he was no longer a layman at this. On this occasion I also learned, that about 1500 Jews were to be spared temporarily, since they were specialists, such as cobblers, tailors, blacksmiths, locksmiths, in other words artisans who were urgently needed for building up the country. The said Ehof at this time presented me with an invitation, signed by him, to the "Celebration of the German Police" which was to take place in a Borrisow restaurant on Sunday 19 October at two o'clock.

I had known Ehof in my Borrisow days. He was at one time made Komm. [Communist?] mayor of Zemin, a town about 25 kilometers from Borrisow, by some army high command. Before the outbreak of the war he was, as a Volga German, employed as a teacher for the German language in the Russian School in Zemin.

Although the shootings of Jews were to be kept secret, they were already known in the Ghetto early on Saturday. I gave my own boots for repair to a Jewish cobbler who lived on the street leading to the airport. There I learned that a delegation was on its way to the mayor, Dr. Stankewitsch, and the Chief of the Russian Security Police, Ehof, in order to obtain a temporary reprieve of these executions so that they might present a petition to the general. However, the cobbler could not tell me which general was meant.

He only told me that the Jews consider it altogether impossible that Adolf Hitler or the general could have given the order to shoot these 6500 Jews. I learned further that the mayor, Dr. Stankewitsch, had promised them to speak to the general about it and that he added that he himself could only say that the conduct of the Jews residing in his official district had been exemplary in every respect. By "conduct" he meant the order in the Ghetto, the performing of the work imposed on the Jews, the raising of 300,000 Rubles in taxes imposed on them a few weeks ago, the turning in of gold, silver, etc., which they fulfilled completely.

On Saturday I visited the already mentioned "Celebration of the German Police", not so much in order to drink beer or liquor there, but because I know beforehand to what an unworthy extent this celebration would develop, in other words, to look the affair over.

Of the so-called prominent citizens there were present: a commissioner of the SD—a squire [Ordensjunker] Burg Vogelsang—with his wife, a lieutenant of the GFP, the mayor, Dr. Stankewitsch, the Chief of the Russian Security Police, Ehof.

In addition there were present the assistant chief of the Russian Security Police, Kowalewski, a large number of Security Policemen and their wives, fiancées, or girl friends, a number of German non-coms, and men, and a lot of people.

There was a lot of talk and still more drinking. I started a conversation with the above mentioned Russian—Kowalewski—an old policeman of the time of the Czars. He is a very sympathetic, quiet, and discreet man of 62, and he informed me among other things that this celebration was to be ended by 9 o'clock because a "welikoje deld", a big affair, was scheduled for tomorrow. K asked me to go home with him after the celebration because he had the urge to speak his mind. After reprimanding a few members of our Wehrmacht for disorderly conduct and because no one could expect me to witness these disgusting excesses any longer, I left this place at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon and returned about 8 o'clock in order to pick up K and to accompany him to his home. I spent two hours with K in lively conversation, we exchanged reminiscences of Czarist days, of the time of the White Russian battles against Bolshevism, and then we also talked of present conditions. The point of view of K, who is a great admirer of everything German, especially of Adolf Hitler and the German Wehrmacht, coincided wholly with mine; a man who really has his heart in it.

After leaving K, I returned to my quarters and talked to my Russian landlord until bedtime. Here I learned among other things that a few days previously "Buessing Hall" had burned down and the next night "Opel Hall", and in addition another hall in which the kitchen, etc., of a German Wehrmacht unit was stationed. Of course we also talked of the impending shooting of Jews, for this was also known to the civilian population. My hosts said verbatim, and this was probably the attitude of all non-Jews living in Borrisow on that evening: “Pustj oni pogibajut: oni mnogo plochogo nam nadelali!” In German: “Let them perish; they did us a lot of harm!”

This is what happened on the following morning: The shootings were begun at 3 am. First the men were brought out. They were driven to the place of execution in Russian cars, escorted by men of the Russian Security police of Borrisow who were detailed for this purpose. Because there were not enough of these men, however, reinforcements were brought from the neighboring Russian Security Police offices, such as Zernbin, etc. They were provided with the well-known red and white armband and armed with rifles or automatic pistols. On the Polotzkaja Uliza road leading to the airport I saw these cars, at considerable intervals, loaded with women and children. These cars were guarded by men of the Russian Security Police. On the roof sat among others a Russian policeman with an automatic pistol in readiness. The women and children of all ages in these cars cried and whimpered and screamed for help as soon as they saw a German Wehrmacht member. In this manner one car followed the other during the whole day in the direction of the place of execution, which was located in the woods near the former staff headquarters of the army group “Center”. Besides, since there were apparently not sufficient cars and the time was drawing short, groups of women and children were constantly being herded down the already mentioned road, partly with iron rods. On the periphery of the Ghetto, that is on this same street, groups of Jewish women and children, even babies in their mother’s arms, were standing ready to be picked up. In the distance the noise of rifles could be heard all day, the women and children cried and screamed, cars raced through the streets and the Ghetto and kept bringing new victims—all before the eyes of the civilian population and the German military personnel that happened to come along.

A blockade may have been intended but could not be carried out because the other side of the street as well as the side streets were inhabited by non-Jews. The eyes of the latter expressed either complete apathy or horror, because the scenes which took place in the streets were ghastly! The non-Jews may have believed on the evening preceding the executions that the Jews deserved their fate, but on the following morning their sentiment was: “Who ordered such a thing? How is it possible to kill off 6500 Jews all at once? Now it is the Jews’ turn, when will it be ours? What did these poor Jews do? All they did was work! The really guilty ones are surely in safely!” The executions continued all day Monday! Late in the evening the shooting could not only be heard from the woods but also spread to the Ghetto and nearly all the streets of the city since, in order to escape their fate, many Jews had broken out of the Ghetto and tried somehow to save themselves. On that evening and during that night it was not advisable even for a member of the Wehrmacht to venture on the streets, in order to avoid the danger of being killed or at least wounded by the Russian policemen, due to a generally prevalent nervousness. About 10 o’clock in the evening a fire was raging in the city and mild shooting was going on. A few houses were burning in the Ghetto and in the vicinity of the Ghetto—the cause is not known to me.

It must be added that German soldiers were summoned toward evening to blockade the Ghetto and to prevent the Jew’s escaping. As I learned from a noncommissioned officer, a few Jews were said to have been caught and turned over to the Russian Security Police for execution. The shooting continued throughout the night. On Tuesday, about 8 o’clock in the morning, I was again a witness of the same occurrences as on the previous day. By no means all the Jews had been shot. Many escorted Russian cars returned from the woods. Piled high on these cars was the clothing of the victims. Thus everybody could see what was going on. The clothing was brought to city warehouses. At many places in the Ghetto and along the street already described groups of Jews cowered, awaiting their executing.

As I heard, some Jews are said to have committed suicide in the nearby Beresina. The most gruesome scenes are said to have taken place in the Ghetto during this operation. According to report all specialists were shot, at least the majority of them. That may be so, for, escorted by two Russian policemen, I entered the homes of a tailor and a cobbler on the main street; the barbed wire had been torn down and I found the house abandoned. It is hard to describe the appearance of these homes! In order to obtain details of the executions, I struck up a conversation with these two Russian Security men, and I was told the following:

A few days earlier Russian prisoners of war had dug in the woods some huge mass graves about 100 meters long, 5 meters wide, and 3 meters deep. According to the reports of these eye-witnesses, the executions were performed as follows:

The first delinquents, about 20 men, were made to jump into the pits after taking off all but their underwear. They were then shot from above! Of course these dead and half-dead people were lying pell-mell. The next victims had to line them up so as to gain as much space as possible. Then it continued as above. When the bottom row of the mass grave was full, the Jews had to put a layer of sand over the bodies and had to trample upon both sand and bodies. The most horrible scenes are said to have taken place in these two mass graves! Shortly before my departure for the front I met two German soldiers, a private first class and a corporal, who, for curiosity's sake, had witnessed these executions from very close by. They fully confirmed the information sought by me. They added that the Russian policemen were given a great deal of liquor, otherwise they would hardly have been able to perform their difficult task! The population of Borrisow is of the opinion that the Russian Security men would enrich themselves with the valuables left behind by the Jews, such as gold, silver, furs, cloth, leather, etc., as they were said to have done during previous executions. These security men, moreover, are said to consist largely of old Communists, but nobody dares to report them because they are feared. The population generally desires the occupation of all important posts by German nationals !

Signed : Soennecken
Master sergeant and interpreter for the Russian language with Intelligence Command B

Postscript: There is a rumor in Borrisow that the now vacant houses of the Jews shall be prepared for Jews from Germany, who in turn shall be liquidated in the same manner as were the Jews of Borrisow.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 772-776, Doc. 3047-PS.

119. MURDER OF JEWS IN BELORUSSIA: POLICE BATTALION REPORT, OCTOBER 30, 1941

The Nazi commissioner of the territory of Sluzk in Latvia wrote a report to the commissioner general of Minsk, Jerzy Osmolowski, complaining of the treatment of the Jews of Sluzk by an Einsatzkommando that was assigned responsibility for their liquidation. The commissioner was assured that the action against the Jews would not include certain tradesmen who were vital for maintaining the economic life of the city. Those assurances proved false, as all of the Jews were taken from the city to be executed. Although some were saved, the commissioner expressed in this report his anger and frustration that his wishes were ignored. The concern seems to be twofold: the commissioner was ignored, his entreaties apparently worth little; and the loss of skilled Jews made it impossible for factories in Sluzk to continue to function.

Copy/T of the copy

The Commissioner of the Territory of Sluzk

Sluzk, 30 October 1941

SECRET

To the Commissioner General Minsk

Subject: Action against Jews

Referring to the report made by phone on 27 October 1941 I now beg to inform you in writing of the following:

On 27 October in the morning at about 8 o'clock a first lieutenant of the police battalion No 11 from Kauen (Lithuania) appeared and introduced himself as the adjutant of the battalion commander of the security police. The first lieutenant explained that the police battalion had received the assignment to effect the liquidation of all Jews here in the town of Sluzk, within two days. The battalion commander with his battalion in strength of four companies, two of which were made up of Lithuanian partisans, was on the march here and the action would have to begin instantly. I replied to the first lieutenant that I had to discuss the action in any case first with the commander. About half an hour later the police battalion arrived in Sluzk. Immediately after the arrival the conference with the battalion commander took place according to my request. I first explained to the commander that it would not very well be possible to effect the action without previous preparation, because everybody had been sent to work and that it would lead to terrible confusion. At least it would have been his duty to inform me a day ahead of time. Then I requested him to postpone the action one day. However, he rejected this with the remark that he had to carry out this action everywhere and in all towns and that only two days were allotted for Sluzk. Within these two days, the town of Sluzk had to be cleared of Jews by all means. I immediately protested violently against it, pointing out that a liquidation of Jews must not be allowed to take place in an arbitrary manner. I explained that a large part of the Jews still living in the towns were tradesmen and families of tradesmen respectively. But these Jewish tradesmen were not simply expendable because they were indispensable for maintaining the economic life. Furthermore, I pointed out that White Ruthenian tradesmen are so to say non-existent, that therefore all vital plants had to be shut down all at once, if all Jews would be liquidated. At the end of our conference, I mentioned that all tradesmen and specialists, inasmuch as they were indispensable, had papers of identification and that these should not be pulled out of the factories. Furthermore, it was agreed that all Jews still living in the town should first be brought into the ghetto in order to segregate them, especially with regard to the families of tradesmen which I did not want to have liquidated either. Two of my officials should be assigned to segregate them. The commander did not in any way contradict my idea and I had therefore the firm belief that the action would be carried out accordingly. However, a few hours after the beginning of the action the greatest difficulties already developed. I noticed that the commander had not at all abided by our agreement. All Jews without exception were taken out of the factories and shops and deported in spite of our agreement. It is true that part of the Jews was moved by way of the ghetto where many of them were processed and still segregated by me, but a large part was loaded directly on trucks and liquidated without further delay outside of the town. Shortly after noon complaints came already from all sides that the factories could not function any more because all Jewish tradesmen had been removed. As the commander had proceeded on his way to Baranowitschi I got in touch with the deputy commander, a captain, after searching a long time, and demanded to stop the action immediately because my instructions had been disregarded and the damage done so far with respect to the economic life could not be repaired any more. The captain was greatly surprised at my idea and stated that he had received orders from the commander to clear the whole town of Jews without exception in the same manner as they had done in other towns. This mopping up had to be executed on political considerations and economic reasons had never played a role anywhere. However, due to my energetic intervention, he finally halted the action toward evening.

For the rest, as regards the execution of the action, I must point out to my deepest regret that the latter bordered already on sadism. The town itself offered a picture of horror during the action. With indescribable brutality on the part of both the German police officers and particularly the Lithuanian partisans, the Jewish people, but also among them White Ruthenians, were taken out of their dwellings and herded together. Everywhere in the town shots were to be heard and in different streets the corpses of shot Jews accumulated. The White Ruthenians were in greatest distress to free themselves from the encirclement. Regardless of the fact that the Jewish people, among whom were also tradesmen, were mistreated in a terribly barbarous way in the face of the White Ruthenian people, the White Ruthenians themselves were also worked over with rubber clubs and rifle butts. There was no question of an action against the Jews any more. It rather looked like a revolution. I myself with all my officials have been in it without interruption all day long in order to save what could yet be saved. In several instances I literally had to expel with drawn pistol the German police officials as well as the Lithuanian partisans from the shops. My own police was employed for the same mission but had often to leave the streets on account of the wild shooting in order to avoid being shot themselves. The whole picture was generally more than ghastly. In the afternoon a great number of abandoned Panje carriages with horses were standing in the streets so that I had to instruct the municipal administration to take care of the vehicles immediately. Afterwards it was ascertained that they were Jewish vehicles ordered by the armed forces to move ammunition. The drivers had simply been taken off the carriages and led away, and nobody had worried in the least about the vehicles.

I was not present at the shooting before the town. Therefore I cannot make a statement on its brutality. But it should suffice, if I point out that persons shot have worked themselves out of their graves some time after they had been covered. Regarding the economic damage I want to state that the tannery has been affected worst of all. 26 experts worked there. Of them, fifteen of the best specialists alone have been shot. Four more jumped from the truck during the transport and escaped, while seven others were not apprehended after they fled. The plant barely continues to operate today. Five wheelwrights worked in the wheelwright shop. Four of them have been shot and the shop has to keep going now with one wheelwright. Additional tradesmen such as carpenters, blacksmiths, etc. are still missing. Up till now it was impossible for me to obtain an exact survey. I have mentioned already in the beginning, that the families of tradesmen should be spared too. But now it seems that almost in all families some persons are missing. Reports come in from all over, making it clear that in one family the tradesman himself, in another family the wife and in the next one again the children are missing. In that way, almost all families have been broken up. It seems to be very doubtful whether under these circumstances the remaining tradesmen will show any interest in their work and produce accordingly, particularly as even today they are running around with bloody and bruised faces due to the brutality. The White Ruthenian people who had full confidence in us, are dumbfounded.

Though they are intimidated and don't dare to utter their free opinion, one has already heard that they take the viewpoint that this day does not add to the glory of Germany and that it will not be forgotten. I am of the opinion that much has been destroyed through this action which we have achieved during the last months and that it will take a long time until we shall regain the confidence of the population which we have lost.

In conclusion I find myself obliged to point out that the police battalion has looted in an unheard of manner during the action, and that not only in Jewish houses but just the same in those of the White Ruthenians. Anything of use such as boots, leather, cloth, gold and other valuables, has been taken away. On the basis of statements of members of the armed forces, watches were torn off the arms of Jews in public, on the street, and rings were pulled off the fingers in the most brutal manner. A major of the finance department reported that a Jewish girl was asked by the police to obtain immediately 5,000 rubles to have her father released. This girl is said to have actually gone everywhere in order to obtain the money.

Also within the ghetto, the different barracks which had been nailed up by the civil administration and were furnished with Jewish furniture, have been broken open and robbed. Even from the barracks in which the unit was quartered, window frames and doors have been forcibly removed and used for campfires. Although I had a discussion with the adjutant of the commander on Tuesday morning concerning the looting and he promised in the course of the discussion that none of the policemen would enter the town any more, yet I was forced several hours later to arrest two fully armed Lithuanian partisans because they were apprehended looting. During the night from Tuesday to Wednesday the battalion left the town in the direction of Baranowitschi. Evidently, the people were only too glad when this report circulated in the town.

So far the report. I shall come to Minsk in the immediate future, in order to discuss the affair personally once again. At the present time, I am not in a position to continue with the action against the Jews. First, order has to be established again. I hope that I shall be able to restore order as soon as possible and also to revive the economic life despite the difficulties. Only, I beg you to grant me one request: "In the future, keep this police battalion away from me by all means."

signed: CARL

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 785–789, Doc. 1104-PS.

120. GERMAN ARMY REPORT ON SHOOTINGS OF JEWS AND GYPSIES IN YUGOSLAVIA, OCTOBER 27–30, 1941, NOVEMBER 1, 1941

Pancevo, a city in the Vojvodina region of Serbia, was the site of a mass murder of Jews on or about November 1, 1941. The document that follows is a report of the shooting, including several important insights. First, the Nazis were intent on keeping the action secret from the surrounding population. Second, care was given, at least at this shooting, as to the shooting site itself. Third, according to this report, the Jews were much more docile and unemotional than the Gypsies who were shot at the same time. While this might play into the stereotype that the Jews were incapable of resistance, it is much more likely that this was attributable to the importance of keeping family members calm, and the determination of the Jews to deprive their Nazi killers of seeing them panic and beg for mercy. Finally, the German shooters found it difficult to continue their task after having spent a night thinking about what they did.

Secret

REPORT FROM 734TH INFANTRY REGIMENT TO 704TH
INFANTRY DIVISION, 4 NOVEMBER 1941, ENCLOSING REPORT OF THE SHOOTING OF JEWS AND GYPSIES

[Stamp] Secret

734th Infantry Regiment
Diary No. 437/41 Secret la

4 November 1941
704th Infantry Division Iva

[Stamp]
704th Infantry Division
Received 10 November 1941
Branch Ia 598/41 Secret -1-

Received 8 November 1941 Ivb
Ivc
Diary No. Ivd
C.O. Iia I Ib Ia Ib Ic III
[Handwritten]

Diary 1351/41 Secret 470a
[Illegible initials]
Ia

To 704th Infantry Division
Subject: Reprisal measures
1 Enclosure

For information, the regiment encloses the report of First Lieutenant Walther, 9th Company, 433d Infantry Regiment, concerning the shooting of Jews and gypsies on 27 and 30 October 1941.

[Illegible signature]

[Stamp] Secret

1st Lt. Walther
C.O. 9th Company, 433d Infantry Regiment

Local Headquarters, 1 November 1941

Report concerning the shooting to death of Jews and gypsies

By agreement with the SS office, I picked up the selected Jews and gypsies from the prisoner camp Belgrade. The trucks of 599th Administrative Area Headquarters available to me for this purpose were impracticable for two reasons:

1. They have civilian drivers. Hence, secrecy is not assured.

2. All of them were without cover or tarpaulins so that the population of the city saw whom we had put in the vehicles and where we went. Wives of the Jews had assembled in front of the camp; they cried and screamed when we drove off.

The location where the shooting to death was carried out is very favorable. It is situated north of Pancevo immediately on the road of Pancevo-Jabuka where there is a grade high enough to make it difficult to climb. Opposite this grade is swamp terrain; behind it a river. When the water is high, as on 29 October, it almost comes up to the grade. Thus, an escape of the prisoners can be prevented with few troops. The sandy ground also is favorable which facilitates digging of the ditches and consequently shortens the time of labor.

After arrival, approximately 1 1/2 to 2 kilometers before the selected site, the prisoners got off, marched to the selected site, while the trucks with their civilian drivers were sent back immediately in order to afford them as little grounds for suspicion as possible. Then, I had the road blocked for all traffic for reasons of security and secrecy.

Place of execution was secured by three light machine guns and twelve riflemen—(1) against attempts to escape by the prisoners, and (2) to protect ourselves against possible attacks by Serbian bands.

The largest part of the time was consumed by the digging of the ditches, while the actual execution by shooting (100 men in 40 minutes) went very rapidly.

Luggage and valuables had been collected previously and taken along in my truck in order to turn them over later to the National Socialist Peoples' Welfare.

The shooting to death of Jews is simpler than that of gypsies. It must be admitted that the Jews accept death very calmly, they stand very quietly, while the gypsies cry, scream, and move continuously when they are already on the spot where they are to be shot to death. Some of them even jumped into the ditch before the firing and attempted to feign death.

In the beginning, my soldiers were not impressed. The second day, however, it had become noticeable that one or the other did not have the nerve to carry out shooting to death for a longer period of time. My personal impression is that one does not develop any psychological inhibitions during the shooting to death. However, these appear if one contemplates it quietly in the evening, after a few days.

[Signed] WALTHER
First Lieutenant

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XI, pp. 995–997, Doc. NOKW-905.

121. EINSATZGRUPPEN: EXTRACTS FROM THE OPERATIONAL SITUATION
REPORT U.S.S.R. NO. 128,
NOVEMBER 3, 1941

This Operational Situation Report of the actions of Einsatzgruppe C in Kiev reflects the ease with which sentences were written that included words such as "approximately 80,000 persons were liquidated until now by the Kommandos of the Einsatzgruppe." Of that number, the report continues, 8,000 were killed because of "anti-German or Bolshevistic activities" and the remaining 72,000 as a retaliatory measure. No mention is made of what the victims—exclusively "Jews and their entire families"—did to warrant retaliation. Of note in this report is the observation that the Nazis in Kiev were able to lure the Jews to their death by requesting them to move from their current quarters. It took nothing more than wall posters to result in more than 30,000 Jews responding (five to six times the expected response), an indication of the desperation of the Jews and their hope—ill-placed as it was—that a change, any change, might lead to their freedom.

EXTRACTS FROM OPERATIONAL SITUATION
REPORT U.S.S.R. NO. 128
3 NOVEMBER 1941

Berlin, 3 Nov. 1941

To the Chief of the Security Police and the SD
B. No. IV A 1-1 B/41—Top Secret

[rubber stamp] Top Secret

55 copies
51st copy

Operational Situation Report U.S.S.R. No. 128

II. Reports of the Einsatzgruppen and Kommandos
Reports of the Einsatzgruppen A and B were not received.
Einsatzgruppen C
Station Kiev

A. Agriculture

B. Executive Activities

As to purely executive matters, approximately 80,000 persons were liquidated until now by the Kommandos of the Einsatzgruppe.

Among these are approximately 8,000 persons who through investigations, were convicted of anti-German or Bolshevistic activities.

The remainder was liquidated as a retaliatory measure.

Several retaliatory measures were carried out as large scale actions. The largest of these actions took place immediately after the occupation of Kiev, it was carried out exclusively against Jews with their entire families.

The difficulties resulting from such large scale action—in particular concerning the seizure—were overcome in Kiev by requesting the Jewish population through wall posters to move. Although only a participation of approximately 5–6,000 Jews had been expected at first, more than 30,000 Jews arrived who until the very moment of their execution still believed in their resettlement, thanks to an extremely clever organization.

Even though approximately 75,000 Jews have been liquidated in this manner, it is already at this time evident, that this can not be a possible solution of the Jewish problem. Although we succeeded, in particular in smaller towns and also in villages in accomplishing a complete liquidation of the Jewish problem, again and again it is however observed in larger cities that after such an execution all Jews have indeed disappeared. But when after a certain period of time a Kommando returns again, the number of Jews still found in the city always considerably surpasses the number of the executed Jews.

Besides, the Kommandos have also carried out in numerous cases military actions. Separate platoons of the Kommandos have repeatedly combed the woods searching for partisans, on request of the army, and have there accomplished quite successful work.

Besides, prisoners of war moving on the highways were systematically overtaken and all these elements liquidated who did not possess identification papers and who were suspected of committing, when liberated, acts of sabotage against the German Army, the German authorities, or the population. In numerous cases there were also carried out systematic searches of parachutists with the result that approximately a total of 20 parachutists was captured, among them one Russian who at his interrogations also gave information extremely important to the army.

Finally is to be mentioned the taking charge of prisoners of war from the prisoner collecting point and the prisoner of war transit camps although on these occasions considerable disagreements with the camp commander occurred at times.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. IV, pp. 151–152, Doc. NO-3157.

122. “NIGHT AND FOG” DECREE, DECEMBER 7, 1941

Wilhelm Keitel, the chief of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces, signed this decree that was issued by Hitler on the same day that the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor and approximately five and a half months after Germany’s invasion of Russia in Operation Barbarossa. The code name of the decree was Night and Fog (Nacht und Nebel), a phrase used by a German poet for secretive actions. The decree calls for the killing of anyone in the German-occupied territories of Europe whose actions endanger "the German State or the occupying power." Under certain circumstances the offender was to be brought to Germany, where most would be dispatched by a court there, with only a few given the protection of military procedure. This secret order also required that if anyone inquired of the whereabouts of the offenders, no information was to be provided, a measure intended to increase fear and terror by the disappearance of loved ones.

SECRET
Copy of Copy

The Fuehrer and Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces
[stamp] SECRET

Directives for the prosecution of offences committed within the occupied territories against the German State or the occupying power, of December 7th, 1941.

Within the occupied territories communistic elements and other circles hostile to Germany have increased their efforts against the German State and the occupying power since the Russian campaign started. The amount and the danger of these machinations oblige us to take severe measures as a deterrent. First of all the following directives are to be applied:

I. Within the occupied territories, the adequate punishment for offences committed against the German State or the occupying power which endanger their security or state of readiness is on principle the death penalty.

II. The offences listed in paragraph I as a rule are to be dealt with in the occupied countries only if it is probable that sentence of death will be passed upon the offender, at least the principal offender, and if the trial and the execution can be completed in a very short time. Otherwise the offenders, at least the principal offenders, are to be taken to Germany.

III. Prisoners taken to Germany are subjected to military procedure only if particular military interests require this. In case German or foreign authorities inquire about such prisoners, they are to be told that they were arrested, but that the proceedings do not allow any further information.

IV. The Commanders in the occupied territories and the Court authorities within the framework of their jurisdiction, are personally responsible for the observance of this decree.

V. The Chief of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces determines in which occupied territories this decree is to be applied. He is authorized to explain and to issue executive orders and supplements. The Reich Minister of Justice will issue executive orders within his own jurisdiction.

By Order

The Chief of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces
[signed] Keitel

A true copy.

[signature illegible] Major

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VII, pp. 873-874, Doc. L-90.

123. EINSATZGRUPPEN: EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY JANUARY 3, 1946, OF OTTO OHLENDORF REGARDING THE EINSATZGRUPPEN, JUNE 1941- JUNE 1942

Einsatzgruppen were mobile killing units that followed the German armies into Russia, tasked with the job of killing Jews and communists. There were four such units (A through D), each with approximately 750 men. The commander of Einsatzgruppe D was Otto Ohlendorf. It was in that capacity that he and his unit were responsible for the murder of 90,000 Jews in the course of a single year, from June 1941 to June 1942, and it was in that capacity that he was tried in the "Einsatzgruppen Trial" held in Nuremberg from September 1947 through February 1948. Ohlendorf was the lead defendant. The following excerpts are from Ohlendorf's trial testimony. One of the areas of examination in this document is the close role that the Wehrmacht, the professional German military, played in support of the Einsatzgruppen, something the Wehrmacht long denied. Ohlendorf provides a detailed description of the manner by which the Jews were executed, including the use and construction of gas vans used to kill women and children.

COLONEL JOHN HARLAN AMEN (Associate Trial Counsel for the United States): May it please the Tribunal, I wish to call as a witness for the Prosecution, Mr. Otto Ohlendorf.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: When did you become a member of the SA?

OHLENDORF: In the year 1925.

COL. AMEN: When, if ever, did you join the SD?

OHLENDORF: In 1936.

COL. AMEN: What was your last position in the SD?

OHLENDORF: Chief of Amt III in the RSHA.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: Did you tell us for what period of time you continued to serve as Chief of Amt III?

OHLENDORF: I was part-time Chief of Amt III from 1939 to 1945.

COL. AMEN: Turning now to the designation "Mobile Units" with the Army shown in the lower right hand corner of the chart, please explain to the Tribunal the significance of the terms "Einsatzgruppe" and "Einsatzkommando."

OHLENDORF: The concept "Einsatzgruppe" was established after an agreement between the Chiefs of the RSHA, OKW, and OKH, on the separate use of Sipo units in the operational areas. The concept "Einsatzgruppe" first appeared during the Polish campaign.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: To the best of your knowledge and recollection, please explain to the Tribunal the entire substance of this written agreement.

* * * * *

OHLENDORF: I said, this was the relationship between the Army and the Einsatzgruppen and the Einsatzkommandos. The agreement specified that the army groups or armies would be responsible for the movement and the supply of Einsatzgruppen, but that instructions for their activities would come from the Chief of the Sipo and SD.

COL. AMEN: Let us understand. Is it correct that an Einsatzgruppe was to be attached to each army group or army?

OHLENDORF: Every army group was to have an Einsatzgruppe attached to it. The army group in its turn would then attach the Einsatzkommandos to the armies of the army group.

COL. AMEN: And was the army command to determine the area within which the Einsatzgruppe was to operate?

OHLENDORF: The operational area of the Einsatzgruppe was already determined by the fact that it was attached to a specific army group and therefore moved with it, whereas the operational areas of the Einsatzkommandos were then fixed by the army group or army.

COL. AMEN: Did the agreement also provide that the army command was to direct the time during which they were to operate?

OHLENDORF: That was included under the heading "movement."

COL. AMEN: And also to direct any additional tasks they were to perform?

OHLENDORF: Yes. Even though the Chiefs of the Sipo and SD had the right to issue instructions to them on their work, there existed a general agreement that the army was also entitled to issue orders to the Einsatzgruppen, if the operational situation made it necessary.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: What position did you occupy with respect to this agreement?

OHLENDORF: From June 1941 to the death of Heydrich in June 1942, I led Einsatzgruppe D, and was the representative of the Chief of the Sipo and the SD with the 11th Army.

COL. AMEN: And when was Heydrich's death?

OHLENDORF: Heydrich was wounded at the end of May 1942, and died on 4 June 1942.

COL. AMEN: How much advance notice, if any, did you have of the campaign against Soviet Russia?

OHLENDORF: About 4 weeks.

COL. AMEN: How many Einsatzgruppen were there, and who were their respective leaders?

OHLENDORF: There were four Einsatzgruppen, Group A, B, C, and D. Chief of Einsatzgruppe A was Stahlecker; Chief of Einsatzgruppe B was Nebe; Chief of Einsatzgruppe C, Dr. Rasche, and later, Dr. Thomas; Chief of Einsatzgruppe D, I myself, and later Bierkamp.

COL. AMEN: To which army was Group D attached?

OHLENDORF: Group D was not attached to any army group, but was attached directly to the 11th Army.

COL. AMEN: Where did Group D operate?

OHLENDORF: Group D operated in the Southern Ukraine.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: When did Group D commence its move into Soviet Russia?

OHLENDORF: Group D left Duegen on 21 June and reached Pietra Namsk in Romania in 3 days, There the first Einsatzkommandos were already being demanded by the Army, and they immediately set off for the destinations named by the Army. The entire Einsatzgruppe was put into operation at the beginning of July.

COL. AMEN: You are referring to the 11th Army?

OHLENDORF: Yes.

COL. AMEN: In what respects, if any, were the official duties of the Einsatz groups concerned with Jews and Communist commissars?

OHLENDORF: On the question of Jews and Communists, the Einsatzgruppen and the commanders of the Einsatzkommandos were orally instructed before their mission.

COL. AMEN: What were their instructions with respect to the Jews and the Communist functionaries?

OHLENDORF: The instructions were that in the Russian operational areas of the Einsatzgruppen the Jews, as well as the Soviet political commissars, were to be liquidated.

COL. AMEN: And when you say "liquidated" do you mean "killed?"

OHLENDORF: Yes, I mean "killed."

COL. AMEN: Prior to the opening of the Soviet campaign, did you attend a conference at Pretz?

OHLENDORF: Yes, it was a conference at which the Einsatzgruppen and the Einsatzkommandos were informed of their tasks and were given the necessary orders.

COL. AMEN: Who was present at that conference?

OHLENDORF: The chiefs of the Einsatzgruppen and the commanders of the Einsatzkommandos and Streckenbach of the RSHA who transmitted the orders of Heydrich and Hirnmler.

COL. AMEN: What were those orders?

OHLENDORF: Those were the general orders on the normal work of the Sipo and the SD, and in addition the liquidation order which I have already mentioned.

COL. AMEN: And that conference took place on approximately what date?

OHLENDORF: About 3 or 4 days before the mission.

COL. AMEN: So that before you commenced to march into Soviet Russia, you received orders at this conference to exterminate the Jews and Communist functionaries in addition to the regular professional work of the Security Police and SD; is that correct?

OHLENDORF: Yes.

COL. AMEN: Did you, personally, have any conversation with Himmler respecting any communication from Himmler to the chiefs of army groups and armies concerning this mission?

OHLENDORF: Yes. Himmler told me that before the beginning of the Russian campaign Hitler had spoken of this mission to a conference of the army groups and the army chiefs—no, not the army chiefs but the commanding generals—and had instructed the commanding generals to provide the necessary support.

COL. AMEN: So that you can testify that the chiefs of the army groups and the armies had been similarly informed of these orders for the liquidation of the Jews and Soviet functionaries?

OHLENDORF: I don't think it is quite correct to put it in that form. They had no orders for liquidation; the order for the liquidation was given to Himmler to carry out, but since this liquidation took place in the operational area of the army group or the armies, they had to be ordered to provide support. Moreover, without such instructions to the army, the activities of the Einsatzgruppen would not have been possible.

COL. AMEN: Did you have any other conversation with Himmler concerning this order?

OHLENDORF: Yes, in the late summer of 1941 Himmler was in Nikolaiev. He assembled the leaders and men of the Einsatzkommandos, repeated to them the liquidation order, and pointed out that the leaders and men who were taking part in the liquidation bore no personal responsibility for the execution of this order. The responsibility was his, alone, and the Führer's.

COL. AMEN: And you yourself heard that said?

OHLENDORF: Yes.

COL. AMEN: Do you know whether this mission of the Einsatz group was known to the army group commanders?

OHLENDORF: This order and the execution of these orders were known to the commanding general of the army.

COL. AMEN: How do you know that?

OHLENDORF: Through conferences with the army and through instructions which were given by the army on the execution of the order.

COL. AMEN: Was the mission of the Einsatz groups and the agreement between OKW, OKH, and RSHA known to the other leaders in the RSHA?

OHLENDORF: At least some of them knew of it, since some of the leaders were also active in the Einsatzgruppen and Einsatzkommandos in the course of time. Furthermore, the leaders who were dealing with the organization and the legal aspect of the Einsatzgruppen also knew of it.

COL. AMEN: Most of the leaders came from the RSHA, did they not?
OHLENDORF: Which leaders?
COL. AMEN: Of the Einsatz groups.
OHLENDORF: No, one can't say that. The leaders in the Einsatzgruppen and Einsatzkommandos came from all over the Reich.

COL. AMEN: Who was the commanding officer of the 11th Army?
OHLENDORF: At first, Ritter von Schober; later, Von Manstein.
COL. AMEN: Will you tell the Tribunal in what way or ways the commanding officer of the 11th Army directed or supervised Einsatz Group D in carrying out its liquidation activities?
OHLENDORF: An order from the 11th Army was sent to Nikolaiev stating that liquidations were to take place only at a distance of not less than 200 kilometers from the headquarters of the commanding general.
COL. AMEN: Do you recall any other occasion?
OHLENDORF: In Simferopol the army command requested the Einsatzkommandos in its area to hasten the liquidations, because famine was threatening and there was a great housing shortage.
COL. AMEN: Do you know how many persons were liquidated by Einsatz Group D under your direction?
OHLENDORF: In the year between June 1941 to June 1942 the Einsatzkommandos reported 90,000 people liquidated.
COL. AMEN: Did that include men, women, and children?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: On what do you base those figures?
OHLENDORF: On reports sent by the Einsatzkommandos to the Einsatzgruppen.
COL. AMEN: Were those reports submitted to you?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: And you saw them and read them?
OHLENDORF: I beg your pardon?
COL. AMEN: And you saw and read those reports, personally?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: And it is on those reports that you base the figures you have given the Tribunal?

OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: Do you know how those figures compare with the number of persons liquidated by other Einsatz groups?
OHLENDORF: The figures which I saw of other Einsatzgruppen are considerably larger.
COL. AMEN: That was due to what factor?
OHLENDORF: I believe that to a large extent the figures submitted by the other Einsatzgruppen were exaggerated.
COL. AMEN: Did you see reports of liquidations from the other Einsatz groups from time to time?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: And those reports showed liquidations exceeding those of Group D; is that correct?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: Did you personally supervise mass executions of these individuals?
OHLENDORF: I was present at two mass executions for purposes of inspection.
COL. AMEN: Will you explain to the Tribunal in detail how an individual mass execution was carried out?
OHLENDORF: A local Einsatzkommando attempted to collect all the Jews in its area by registering them. This registration was performed by the Jews themselves.
COL. AMEN: On what pretext, if any, were they rounded up?
OHLENDORF: On the pretext that they were to be resettled.
COL. AMEN: Will you continue?
OHLENDORF: After the registration the Jews were collected at one place; and from there they were later transported to the place of execution, which was, as a rule an antitank ditch or a natural excavation. The executions were carried out in a military manner, by firing squads under command.
COL. AMEN: In what way were they transported to the place of execution?
OHLENDORF: They were transported to the place of execution in trucks, always only as many as could be executed immediately. In this way it was attempted to keep the span of time from the moment in which the victims knew what was about to happen to them until the time of their actual execution as short as possible.
COL. AMEN: Was that your idea?
OHLENDORF: Yes.
COL. AMEN: And after they were shot what was done with the bodies?

OHLENDORF: The bodies were buried in the antitank ditch or excavation.

COL. AMEN: What determination, if any, was made as to whether the persons were actually dead?

OHLENDORF: The unit leaders or the firing-squad commanders had orders to see to this and, if need be, finish them off themselves.

COL. AMEN: And who would do that?

OHLENDORF: Either the unit leader himself or somebody designated by him.

COL. AMEN: In what positions were the victims shot?

OHLENDORF: Standing or kneeling.

COL. AMEN: What was done with the personal property and clothing of the persons executed?

OHLENDORF: All valuables were confiscated at the time of the registration or the rounding up and handed over to the Finance Ministry, either through the RSHA or directly. At first the clothing was given to the population, but in the winter of 1941–42 it was collected and disposed of by the NSV.

COL. AMEN: All their personal property was registered at the time?

OHLENDORF: No, not all of it, only valuables were registered.

COL. AMEN: What happened to the garments which the victims were wearing when they went to the place of execution?

OHLENDORF: They were obliged to take off their outer garments immediately before the execution.

COL. AMEN: All of them?

OHLENDORF: The outer garments, yes.

COL. AMEN: How about the rest of the garments they were wearing?

OHLENDORF: The other garments remained on the bodies.

COL. AMEN: Was that true of not only your group but of the other Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: That was the order in my Einsatzgruppe. I don't know how it was done in other Einsatzgruppen.

COL. AMEN: In what way did they handle it?

OHLENDORF: Some of the unit leaders did not carry out the liquidation in the military manner, but killed the victims singly by shooting them in the back of the neck.

COL. AMEN: And you objected to that procedure?

OHLENDORF: I was against that procedure, yes.

COL. AMEN: For what reason?

OHLENDORF: Because both for the victims and for those who carried out the executions, it was, psychologically, an immense burden to bear.

COL. AMEN: Now, what was done with the property collected by the Einsatzkommandos from these victims?

OHLENDORF: All valuables were sent to Berlin, to the RSHA or to the Reich Ministry of Finance. The articles which could be used in the operational area, were disposed of there.

COL. AMEN: For example, what happened to gold and silver taken from the victims?

OHLENDORF: That was, as I have just said, turned over to Berlin, to the Reich Ministry of Finance.

COL. AMEN: How do you know that?

OHLENDORF: I can remember that it was actually handled in that way from Simferopol.

COL. AMEN: How about watches, for example, taken from the victims?

OHLENDORF: At the request of the Army, watches were made available to the forces at the front.

COL. AMEN: Were all victims, including the men, women, and children, executed in the same manner?

OHLENDORF: Until the spring of 1942, yes. Then an order came from Himmler that in the future women and children were to be killed only in gas vans.

COL. AMEN: How had the women and children been killed previously?

OHLENDORF: In the same way as the men—by shooting.

COL. AMEN: What, if anything, was done about burying the victims after they had been executed?

OHLENDORF: The Kommandos filled the graves to efface the signs of the execution, and then labor units of the population leveled them.

COL. AMEN: Referring to the gas vans which you said you received in the spring of 1942, what order did you receive with respect to the use of these vans?

OHLENDORF: These gas vans were in future to be used for the killing of women and children.

COL. AMEN: Will you explain to the Tribunal the construction of these vans and their appearance?

OHLENDORF: The actual purpose of these vans could not be seen from the outside. They looked like closed trucks, and were so constructed that at the start of the motor, gas was conducted into the van causing death in 10 to 15 minutes.

COL. AMEN: Explain in detail just how one of these vans was used for an execution.

OHLENDORF: The vans were loaded with the victims and driven to the place of burial, which was usually the same as that used for the mass executions. The time needed for transportation was sufficient to insure the death of the victims.

COL. AMEN: How were the victims induced to enter the vans?

OHLENDORF: They were told that they were to be transported to another locality.

COL. AMEN: How was the gas turned on?

OHLENDORF: I am not familiar with the technical details.

COL. AMEN: How long did it take to kill the victims ordinarily?

OHLENDORF: About 10 to 15 minutes; the victims were not conscious of what was happening to them.

COL. AMEN: How many persons could be killed simultaneously in one such van?

OHLENDORF: About 15 to 25 persons. The vans varied in size.

COL. AMEN: Did you receive reports from those persons operating these vans from time to time?

OHLENDORF: I didn't understand the question.

COL. AMEN: Did you receive reports from those who were working on the vans?

OHLENDORF: I received the report that the Einsatzkommandos did not willingly use the vans.

COL. AMEN: Why not?

OHLENDORF: Because the burial of the victims was a great ordeal for the members of the Einsatzkommandos.

COL. AMEN: Now, will you tell the Tribunal who furnished these vans to the Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: The gas vans did not belong to the motor pool of the Einsatzgruppen but were assigned to the Einsatzgruppe as a special unit, headed by the man who had constructed the vans. The vans were assigned to the Einsatzgruppen by the RSHA.

COL. AMEN: Were the vans supplied to all of the different Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: I am not certain of that. I know only in the case of Einsatzgruppe D, and indirectly that Einsatzgruppe C also made use of these vans.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: . . . will you explain to the Tribunal why you believe that the type of execution ordered by you, namely, military, was preferable to the shooting-in-the-neck procedure adopted by the other Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: On the one hand, the aim was that the individual leaders and men should be able to carry out the executions in a military manner acting on orders and should not have to make a decision of their own; it was, to all intents and purposes, an order which they were to carry out. On the other hand, it was known to me that through the emotional excitement of the executions ill-treatment could not be avoided, since the victims discovered too soon that they were to be executed and could not therefore endure prolonged nervous strain. And it seemed intolerable to me that individual leaders and men should in consequence be forced to kill a large number of people on their own decision.

COL. AMEN: In what manner did you determine which were the Jews to be executed?

OHLENDORF: That was not part of my task; but the identification of the Jews was carried out by the Jews themselves, since the registration was handled by a Jewish Council of Elders.

COL. AMEN: Did the amount of Jewish blood have anything to do with it?

OHLENDORF: I can't remember the details, but I believe that half-Jews were also considered as Jews.

COL. AMEN: What organizations furnished most of the officer personnel of the Einsatz groups and Einsatzkommandos?

OHLENDORF: I did not understand the question.

COL. AMEN: What organizations furnished most of the officer personnel of the Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: The officer personnel was furnished by the State Police, the Kripo, and, to a lesser extent, by the SD.

COL. AMEN: Kripo?

OHLENDORF: Yes, the State Police, the Criminal Police and, to a lesser extent, the SD.

COL. AMEN: Were there any other sources of personnel?

OHLENDORF: Yes, most of the men employed were furnished by the Waffen-SS and the Ordnungspolizei. The State Police and the Kripo furnished most of the experts, and the troops were furnished by the Waffen-SS and the Ordnungspolizei.

COL. AMEN: How about the Waffen-SS?

OHLENDORF: The Waffen-SS and the Ordnungspolizei were each supposed to supply the Einsatzgruppen with one company.

COL. AMEN: How about the Order Police?

OHLENDORF: The Ordnungspolizei also furnished the Einsatzgruppen with one company.

COL. AMEN: What was the size of Einsatz Group D and its operating area as compared with the other Einsatz groups?

OHLENDORF: I estimate that Einsatzgruppe D was one-half or two-thirds as large as the other Einsatzgruppen. That changed in the course of time, since some of the Einsatzgruppen were greatly enlarged.

* * * * *

COL. AMEN: [To the witness.] Can you state whether the liquidation practices which you have described continued after 1942 and, if so, for how long a period of time thereafter?

OHLENDORF: I don't think that the basic order was ever revoked. But I cannot remember the details—at least not with regard to Russia—which would enable me to make concrete statements on this subject. The retreat began very shortly thereafter, so that the operational region of the Einsatzgruppen became ever smaller. I do know, however, that other Einsatzgruppen with similar orders had been envisaged for other areas.

COL. AMEN: Your personal knowledge extends up to what date?

OHLENDORF: I know that the liquidation of Jews was prohibited about six months before the end of the war. I also saw a document terminating the liquidation of Soviet commissars, but I cannot recall a specific date.

COL. AMEN: Do you know whether in fact it was so terminated?

OHLENDORF: Yes, I believe so.

THE PRESIDENT: The Tribunal would like to know the number of men in your Einsatz group.

OHLENDORF: There were about 500 men in my Einsatzgruppe, excluding those who were added to the group as assistants from the country itself.

THE PRESIDENT: Including them, did you say?

OHLENDORF: Excluding those who were added to the group from the country itself.

THE PRESIDENT: Do you know how many there would be in other groups?

OHLENDORF: I estimate that at the beginning there were seven to eight hundred men; but, as I said, this number changed rapidly in the course of time, since the Einsatzgruppen themselves acquired new people or succeeded in getting additional personnel from the RSHA.

THE PRESIDENT: The numbers increased, did they?

OHLENDORF: Yes, the numbers increased.

* * * * *

COLONEL Y. V. POKROVSKY (Deputy Chief Prosecutor for the U.S.S.R.): . . . Witness, you said that you were present twice at the mass executions. On whose orders were you an inspector at the executions?

OHLENDORF: I was present at the executions on my own initiative.

COL. POKROVSKY: But you said that you attended as inspector.

OHLENDORF: I said that I attended for inspection purposes.

COL. POKROVSKY: On your initiative?

OHLENDORF: Yes.

COL. POKROVSKY: Did one of your chiefs always attend the executions for purposes of inspection?

OHLENDORF: Whenever possible I sent a member of the staff of the Einsatzgruppe to witness the executions, but this was not always feasible since the Einsatzgruppen had to operate over great distances.

COL. POKROVSKY: Why was some person sent for purposes of inspection?

OHLENDORF: Would you please repeat the question?

COL. POKROVSKY: For what purpose was an inspector sent?

OHLENDORF: To determine whether or not my instructions regarding the manner of the execution were actually being carried out.

COL. POKROVSKY: Am I to understand that the inspector was to make certain that the execution had actually been carried out?

OHLENDORF: No, it would not be correct to say that. He was to ascertain whether the conditions which I had set for the execution were actually being carried out.

COL. POKROVSKY: What manner of conditions had you in mind?

OHLENDORF: 1. Exclusion of the public; 2. Military execution by a firing-squad; 3. Arrival of the transports and carrying out of the liquidation in a smooth manner to avoid unnecessary excitement; 4. Supervision of the property to prevent looting. There may have been other details which I no longer remember. At any rate, all ill-treatment, whether physical or mental, was to be prevented through these measures.

* * * * *

COL. POKROVSKY: You spoke of ill-treatment. What did you mean by ill-treatment at the executions?

OHLENDORF: If, for instance, the manner in which the executions were carried out caused excitement and disobedience among the victims, so that the Kommandos were forced to restore order by means of violence.

COL. POKROVSKY: What do you mean by “restore order by means of violence”? What do you mean by suppression of the excitement amongst the victims by means of violence?

OHLENDORF: If, as I have already said, in order to carry out the liquidation in an orderly fashion it was necessary, for example, to resort to beating.

COL. POKROVSKY: Was it absolutely necessary to beat the victims?

OHLENDORF: I myself never witnessed it, but I heard of it.

COL. POKROVSKY: From whom?

OHLENDORF: In conversations with members of other Kommandos.

COL. POKROVSKY: You said that cars, autocars, were used for the executions?

OHLENDORF: Yes.

COL. POKROVSKY: Do you know where, and with whose assistance, the inventor, Becker, was able to put his invention into practice?

OHLENDORF: I remember only that it was done through Amt II of the RSHA; but I can no longer say that with certainty.

COL. POKROVSKY: How many were executed in these cars?

OHLENDORF: I did not understand the question.

COL. POKROVSKY: How many persons were executed by means of these cars?

OHLENDORF: I cannot give precise figures, but the number was comparatively very small—perhaps a few hundred.

COL. POKROVSKY: You said that mostly women and children were executed in these vans. For what reason?

OHLENDORF: That was a special order from Himmler to the effect that women and children were not to be exposed to the mental strain of the executions; and thus the men of the Kommandos, mostly married men, should not be compelled to aim at women and children.

COL. POKROVSKY: Did anybody observe the behavior of the persons executed in these vans?

OHLENDORF: Yes, the doctor.

COL. POKROVSKY: Did you know that Becker had reported that death in these vans was particularly agonizing?

OHLENDORF: No. I learned of Becker’s reports for the first time from the letter to Rauff, which was shown to me here. On the contrary, I know from the doctor’s reports that the victims were not conscious of their impending death.

COL. POKROVSKY: Did any military units—I mean, Army units—take part in these mass executions?

OHLENDORF: As a rule, no.

COL. POKROVSKY: And as an exception?

OHLENDORF: I think I remember that in Nikolaiev and in Simferopol a spectator from the Army High Command was present for a short time.

COL. POKROVSKY: For what purpose?

OHLENDORF: I don’t know, probably to obtain information personally.

COL. POKROVSKY: Were military units assigned to carry out the executions in these towns?

OHLENDORF: Officially, the Army did not assign any units for this purpose; the Army as such was actually opposed to the liquidation.

COL. POKROVSKY: But in practice?

OHLENDORF: Individual units occasionally volunteered. However, at the moment I know of no such case among the Army itself, but only among the units attached to the Army (Heeresgefølge).

COL. POKROVSKY: You were the man by whose orders people were sent to their death. Were Jews only handed over for the execution by the Einsatzgruppe or were Communists—“Communist officials” you call them in your instructions—handed over for execution along with the Jews?

OHLENDORF: Yes, activists and political commissars. Mere membership in the Communist Party was not sufficient to persecute or kill a man.

COL. POKROVSKY: Were any special investigations made concerning the part played by persons in the Communist Party?

OHLENDORF: No, I said on the contrary that mere membership of the Communist Party was not, in itself, a determining factor in persecuting or executing a man; he had to have a special political function.

COL. POKROVSKY: Did you have any discussions on the murder vans sent from Berlin and on their use?

OHLENDORF: I did not understand the question.

COL. POKROVSKY: Had you occasion to discuss, with your chiefs and your colleagues, the fact that motor vans had been sent to your own particular Einsatzgruppe from Berlin for carrying out the executions? Do you remember any such discussions?

OHLENDORF: I do not remember any specific discussion.

COL. POKROVSKY: Had you any information concerning the fact that members of the execution squad in charge of the executions were unwilling to use the vans?

OHLENDORF: I knew that the Einsatzkommandos were using these vans.

COL. POKROVSKY: No, I had something else in mind. I wanted to know whether you received reports that members of the execution squads were unwilling to use the vans and preferred other means of execution?

OHLENDORF: That they would rather kill by means of the gas vans than by shooting?

COL. POKROVSKY: On the contrary, that they preferred execution by shooting to killing by means of the gas vans.

OHLENDORF: Yes, I have already said that the gas van . . .

COL. POKROVSKY: And why did they prefer execution by shooting to killing in the gas vans?

OHLENDORF: Because, as I have already said, in the opinion of the leader of the Einsatzkommandos, the unloading of the corpses was an unnecessary mental strain.

COL. POKROVSKY: What do you mean by “an unnecessary mental strain”?

OHLENDORF: As far as I can remember the conditions at that time—the picture presented by the corpses and probably because certain functions of the body had taken place leaving the corpses lying in filth.

COL. POKROVSKY: You mean to say that the sufferings endured prior to death were clearly visible on the victims? Did I understand you correctly?

OHLENDORF: I don’t understand the question; do you mean during the killing in the van?

COL. POKROVSKY: Yes.

OHLENDORF: I can only repeat what the doctor told me, that the victims were not conscious of their death in the van.

COL. POKROVSKY: In that case your reply to my previous question, that the unloading of the bodies made a very terrible impression on the members of the execution squad, becomes entirely incomprehensible.

OHLENDORF: And, as I said, the terrible impression created by the position of corpses themselves, and by the state of the vans which had probably been dirtied and so on.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. IV, pp. 311–334.

124. EINSATZGRUPPEN: EXCERPTS FROM AFFIDAVIT JUNE 6, 1947, OF PAUL BLOBEL REGARDING ACTIVITIES ON SONDERKOMMANDO 4 A, JUNE 1941–JANUARY 1942

Paul Blobel was in command of an Einsatzkommando (called in this affidavit a Sonderkommando) that was part of Einsatzgruppe C. Einsatzgruppen were mobile killing units that followed the German armies into Russia, tasked with the job of killing Jews and communists. There were four such units (A through D), each with approximately 750 men. An Einsatzkommando was a subunit of men within the larger Einsatzgruppe. In the affidavit that follows, Blobel estimates that his Einsatzkommando, namely, 4A, was responsible for the killing of 10,000 to 15,000 men, women, and children, most of whom were Jewish. In addition to describing the procedure by which the killings took place, Blobel states that in September 1941 his Einsatzkommando, along with others from Einsatzgruppe C, carried out the infamous execution that took place at Babi Yar, a huge natural ravine in the outskirts of Kiev that became the killing ground for 33,771 Jewish men, women, and children, executed over a two-day period.

5. During the period of my service as chief of the Sonderkommando 4 A, from the time of its organization in June 1941 until January 1942, I was assigned, at various occasions, with the execution of Communists, saboteurs, Jews, and other undesirable persons. I can no longer remember the exact number of the executed persons. According to a superficial estimate—the correctness of which I cannot guarantee—I presume that the number of executions in which the Sonderkommando 4 A took a part lies somewhere between 10,000 and 15,000.

6. I witnessed several mass executions, and in two cases I was ordered to direct the execution. In August or September 1941 an execution took place near Korosten. 700 to 1,000 men were shot, and Dr. Dr. RASCH was present at the execution. I had divided my unit into a number of execution squads of 30 men each. First, the subordinated police of the Ukrainian militia, the population and the members of the Sonderkommando seized the people, and mass graves were prepared. Out of the total number of the persons designated for the execution, 15 men were led in each case to the brink of the mass grave, where they had to kneel down, their faces turned toward the grave. At that time, clothes and valuables were not yet collected. Later on this was changed. The execution squads were composed of men of the Sonderkommando 4 A, the militia and the police. When the men were ready for the execution one of my leaders who was in charge of this execution squad gave the order to shoot. Since they were kneeling on the brink of the mass grave, the victims fell, as a rule, at once into the mass grave. I have always used rather large execution squads, since I declined to use men who were specialists for shots in the neck (Genickschusspezialisten). Each squad shot for about one hour, and was then replaced. The persons which still had to be shot, were assembled near the place of the execution, and were guarded by members of those squads, which at that moment did not take part in the executions. I supervised personally the execution which I have described here, and I saw to it that no encroachments took place.

7. The Sonderkommando 4 A has killed women and children, too. In September or October 1941 the Einsatzgruppe C under Dr. Dr. RASCH placed a gas van at my disposal, and one execution was carried out by means of that van. This was a 3 ton truck which could be sealed hermetically, and held about 30 to 40 people. After about 7 or 8 minutes all persons in this truck who were exposed to the poisonous gases, were dead. I personally saw the corpses, when they were unloaded from the gas van.

8. During the last days of September 1941 the Sonderkommando 4 A in cooperation with the group staff of the Einsatzgruppe C and two units of the police regiments stationed in Kiew, carried out the mass execution of Jews in Kiew. I think that the figure of 33771, mentioned to me as the number of persons executed in Kiew is too high. In my opinion not more than half of the mentioned figure were shot.

* * * * *

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. IV, pp. 211–213, Doc. NO-3824.

125. EINSATZGRUPPEN: AFFIDAVIT JULY 2, 1947, OF ERNST BIBERSTEIN REGARDING EINSATZKOMMANDO 6, SEPTEMBER 1942–JUNE 1943

Ernst Biberstein was in command of an Einsatzkommando that was part of Einsatzgruppe C. Einsatzgruppen were mobile killing units that followed the German armies into Russia, tasked with the job of killing Jews and communists. There were four such units (A through D), each with approximately 750 men. An Einsatzkommando was a subunit of men within the larger Einsatzgruppe. In the affidavit that follows, Biberstein attests to the killing actions of his unit, Einsatzkommando 6. The affidavit begins with a review of his earlier years, including his study in theology, and his rise through the military ranks. Then comes a statement that 2,000 to 3,000 people were killed by him and his men. Most of the executions took place in a specially configured truck that contained a sealed compartment which held 50 to 60 people. The exhaust from the truck was directed into the compartment. While the truck made its way to a large grave that had been dug by members of Biberstein's Einsatzkommando, the victims died of carbon monoxide asphyxiation. He also describes executions by firearms. Biberstein notes that at neither type of execution was a physician present to confirm that all victims were dead.

AFFIDAVIT OF ERNST BIBERSTEIN, 2 JULY 1947

I, Ernst Emil Heinrich Biberstein, swear, state, and declare—

1. I was born on 15 February 1899 in Hilchenbach in the district of Siegen-Westphalia. Originally my surname was Szymanowski. I attended the elementary school in Muehlheim on the Ruhr and in Neumuenster-Holstein, and afterwards a classical high school where I passed my final examination in 1917. From 1917 until March 1919 I served with the army as a private in the infantry. From March 1919 to 1921 I studied protestant theology. I passed my first theological examination in April 1921 and then went for 6 months to a preachers' seminary; after that I was a curate for 12 months. My first post as a pastor I got on 28 December 1924 in Kating Schleswig-Holstein, which I held until November 1927. From then on until November 1933 I was a pastor in Kaltenkirchen Schleswig-Holstein, in the district of Begeberg. From November 1933 until August 1935, I was "Kirchenprobst" or "Superintendent" [presiding minister of the Provincial Protestant Church] in Bad Segeberg, Holstein. In August 1935 I was called to the Reich Ministry of Church Affairs in Berlin as a theological expert where I functioned until I was drafted in the army on 10 March 1940. In the army I took part in the Holland and France campaigns as a corporal. On 22 October 1940 I was draft deferred by the Reich Plenipotentiary of Internal Administration and was assigned to the Chief of the Security Police and of the SD. Taking effect 1 June 1941 and up to June 1942, I was head of the state police station of Oppeln. In June 1942 I was sent to Russia as leader of the Einsatzkommando 6 under Einsatzgruppe C in Kiev. However, my departure for Russia was delayed until September 1942. Between June 1943 and early 1944 I was unattached. From February 1944 until April 1945, I was working in the Economic Department of the Supreme Commissioner in Trieste. From there I returned to Neumuenster where I was arrested on 1 July 1945.

2. I have been a member of the NSDAP since 1926, my Party number being 40,718. I have been a member of the SS since 13 September 1936 with an SS member's number 272, 692. From 1934 until 1935 I was "Kreisschulungsleiter" [Party indoctrination director] in Bad Segeberg.

3. During my time of office as commander of Einsatzkommando 6, between September 1942 and June 1943 about 2,000 to 3,000 executions were performed in the area of my Einsatzkommando. I personally superintended an execution in Rostov which was performed by means of a gas truck. The persons destined for death—after their money and valuables, sometimes the clothes also, had been taken from them—were loaded into the gas truck which held between 50 and 60 people. The truck was then driven to a place outside the town where members of the Kommando had already dug a mass grave. I myself saw the unloading of the dead bodies, their faces were in no way distorted, death came to these people without any outward signs of spasms. There was no physician present at unloading to certify that the people were really dead. The gas truck was driven by the driver Sackenreuter of Nuernberg who had been most carefully instructed about the handling of the gas truck, having been through special training courses.

4. During my time of office as chief of Einsatzkommando 6, I had two officers for the administration, first, 1st Lieutenant Niegbur and afterwards 2d Lieutenant Homann. The latter told me one day that the Einsatzkommando had a surplus of 100,000 marks derived from people to be executed who had to hand over their money and valuables.

5. Since my Einsatzkommando was operating in various towns where there were sometimes only few persons up for execution at a time, the gas truck was not used always. I also witnessed an execution carried out with firearms. The persons to be executed had to kneel down on the edge of a grave and members of my Kommando shot them in the back of the neck with an automatic pistol. The persons thus killed mostly dropped straight into the pit. I had no special expert for these shots in the neck. No physician was present either at this form of execution.

6. From my time of office as chief of the state police station in Oppeln I know that "top secret" orders had been issued to the effect that we had to detach men for searching for Bolshevik agitators in prisoner-of-war camps. These men selected by these Kommandos were sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp. I do not know what happened to them in Auschwitz.

I have made the foregoing deposition consisting of three (3) pages in the German language and declare that it is the full truth to the best of my knowledge and belief. I have had the opportunity to make alterations and corrections in the above statement, and I made this declaration voluntarily without any promise of reward and I was not subjected to any duress or threat whatever.

Nuernberg, 2 July 1947 [Signed] ERNST BIBERSTEIN

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. IV, pp. 209–211, Doc. NO-4314.

126. EINSATZGRUPPEN: AFFIDAVIT OF NOVEMBER 10, 1945, OF HERMANN GRAEBE REGARDING EINSATZGRUPPEN KILLINGS, OCTOBER 5, 1942

This affidavit given by Hermann Friedrich Graebe, an engineer in the Ukraine, is a detailed eyewitness account of the mass murder of Jews by an Einsatzgruppe unit. Einsatzgruppen were mobile killing units that followed the German armies into Russia, tasked with the job of killing Jews and communists. His account of the shooting of victims in a large pit, with layers of bodies stacked up one over another, compares with all such other accounts by eyewitnesses, perpetrators, and survivors. However, Graebe's description of the Jews while they waited—stripped of all clothing and valuables—for their execution provides an insight that few other accounts offer. It confirms that for the most part the Jews went quietly to their death and also confirms the explanation given by the few survivors of these mass killings that the calm was a matter of maintaining dignity and providing comfort and support for family members facing the same fate.

Before me, Homer B. Crawford, being authorized to administer oaths, personally appeared Hermann Friedrich Graebe, who, being by me duly sworn through the interpreter Elisabeth Radziejewska, made and subscribed the following statement:

I, Hermann Friedrich Graebe, declare under oath:

From September 1941 until January 1944 I was manager and engineer-in-charge of a branch office in Sdolbunow, Ukraine, of the Solingen building firm of Josef Jung. In this capacity it was my job to visit the building sites of the firm. Under contract to an Army Construction Office, the firm had orders to erect grain storage buildings on the former airport of Dubno, Ukraine.

On 5 October 1942, when I visited the building office at Dubno, my foreman Hubert Moennikes of 21 Aussemuehlenweg, Hamburg-Haarburg, told me that in the vicinity of the site, Jews from Dubno had been shot in three large pits, each about 30 meters long and 3 meters deep. About 1500 persons had been killed daily. All of the 5000 Jews who had still been living in Dubno before the pogrom were to be liquidated. As the shootings had taken place in his presence he was still much upset.

Thereupon I drove to the site, accompanied by Moennikes and saw near it great mounds of earth, about 30 meters long and 2 meters high. Several trucks stood in front of the mounds. Armed Ukrainian militia drove the people off the trucks under the supervision of an SS-man. The militia men acted as guards on the trucks and drove them to and from the pit. All these people had the regulation yellow patches on the front and back of their clothes, and thus could be recognized as Jews.

Moennikes and I went directly to the pits. Nobody bothered us. Now I heard rifle shots in quick succession, from behind one of the earth mounds. The people who had got off the trucks—men, women, and children of all ages—had to undress upon the order of an SS-man, who carried a riding or dog whip. They had to put down their clothes in fixed places, sorted according to shoes, top clothing and underclothing. I saw a heap of shoes of about 800 to 1000 pairs, great piles of under-linen and clothing. Without screaming or weeping these people undressed, stood around in family groups, kissed each other, said farewells and waited for a sign from another SS-man, who stood near the pit, also with a whip in his hand. During the 15 minutes that I stood near the pit I heard no complaint or plea for mercy. I watched a family of about 8 persons, a man and woman, both about 50 with their children of about 1, 8 and 10, and two grown-up daughters of about 20 to 24. An old woman with snow-white hair was holding the one-year old child in her arms and singing to it, and tickling it. The child was cooing with delight. The couple were looking on with tears in their eyes. The father was holding the hand of a boy about 10 years old and speaking to him softly; the boy was fighting his tears. The father pointed toward the sky, stroked his head, and seemed to explain something to him. At that moment the SS-man at the pit shouted something to his comrade. The latter counted off about 20 persons and instructed them to go behind the earth mound. Among them was the family, which I have mentioned. I well remember a girl, slim and with black hair, who, as she passed close to me, pointed to herself and said, "23". I walked around the mound, and found myself confronted by a tremendous grave. People were closely wedged together and lying on top of each other so that only their heads were visible. Nearly all had blood running over their shoulders from their heads. Some of the people shot were still moving. Some were lifting their arms and turning their heads to show that they were still alive. The pit was already 2/3 full. I estimated that it already contained about 1000 people. I looked for the man who did the shooting. He was an SS-man, who sat at the edge of the narrow end of the pit, his feet dangling into the pit. He had a tommy gun on his knees and was smoking a cigarette. The people, completely naked, went down some steps which were cut in the clay wall of the pit and clambered over the heads of the people lying there, to the place to which the SS-man directed them. They lay down in front of the dead or injured people; some caressed those who were still alive and spoke to them in a low voice. Then I heard a series of shots. I looked into the pit and saw that the bodies were twitching or the heads lying already motionless on top of the bodies that lay before them. Blood was running from their necks. I was surprised that I was not ordered away, but I saw that there were two or three postmen in uniform nearby. The next batch was approaching already. They went down into the pit, lined themselves up against the previous victims and were shot. When I walked back, round the mound I noticed another truckload of people which had just arrived. This time it included sick and infirm people. An old, very thin woman with terribly thin legs was undressed by others who were already naked, while two people held her up. The woman appeared to be paralyzed. The naked people carried the woman around the mound. I left with Moennikes and drove in my car back to Dubno.

On the morning of the next day, when I again visited the site, I saw about 30 naked people lying near the pit—about 30 to 50 meters away from it. Some of them were still alive; they looked straight in front of them with a fixed stare and seemed to notice neither the chilliness of the morning nor the workers of my firm who stood around. A girl of about 20 spoke to me and asked me to give her clothes, and help her escape. At that moment we heard a fast car approach and I noticed that it was an SS-detail. I moved away to my site. 10 minutes later we hear shots from the vicinity of the pit. The Jews still alive had been ordered to throw the corpses into the pit—then they had themselves to lie down in this to be shot in the neck.

I make the above statement at Wiesbaden, Germany, on 10th November 1945. I swear before God that this is the absolute truth.

Hermann Friedrich Graebe

Subscribed and sworn to before me at Wiesbaden, Germany, this 10 day of November 1945.

Homer B. Crawford
Major, AC
Investigator Examiner, War Crimes Branch

I, Elisabeth Radziejewska, being first duly sworn, state: That I truly translated the oath administered by Major Homer B. Crawford to Hermann Friedrich Graebe and that thereupon he made and subscribed the foregoing statement in my presence.

Elisabeth Radziejewska
Interpreter

Subscribed and sworn to before me at Wiesbaden, Germany, this 10 day of November 1945.

Homer B. Crawford, Major, AC
Investigator Examiner, War Crimes Branch

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 696–699, Doc. 2992-PS.

127. SPEECH BY HANS FRANK TO HIS CABINET, KRAKOW, DECEMBER 16, 1941

Hans Frank was the governor-general of the Generalgouvernement, that portion of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into the Reich. Its Jewish population, as Frank observes in this excerpt from a speech he made, was in excess of 2.5 million Jews. This speech is particularly significant because it represents one of the first times the extermination—not just relocation or ghettoization—of the Jews is discussed in such straightforward language, making it absolutely clear that annihilation of the Jews is now the policy of the Reich. An interesting reference is made by Frank to an upcoming conference that will take place in Berlin to discuss the extermination process. That conference is the Wannsee Conference, which would be held in Wannsee, a suburb of Berlin, on January 20, 1942. This is made clear by Frank's statements that Dr. Bühler would attend and Reinhard Heydrich would chair the conference: both are true of the Wannsee Conference.

FRANK DIARY, 1941 Oct-Dec.

CABINET SESSION

Tuesday 16 December 1941 in the Government

Building at Krakow

Speech of the Governor General

Closing the Session

[page 76, line 10 to page 77 line 33]

As far as the Jews are concerned, I want to tell you quite frankly that they must be done away with in one way or another. The Führer said once: should united Jewry again succeed in provoking a world war, the blood of not only the nations, which have been forced into the war by them, will be shed, but the Jew will have found his end in Europe. I know that many of the measures carried out against the Jews in the Reich at present are being criticized. It is being tried intentionally, as is obvious from the reports on morale, to talk about cruelty, harshness, etc. Before I continue, I want to beg you to agree with me on the following formula: We will principally have pity on the German people only, and nobody else in the whole world. The others, too, had no pity on us. As an old National Socialist, I must say: This war would only be a partial success if the whole lot of Jewry should survive it, while we would have shed our best blood in order to save Europe. My attitude towards the Jews will, therefore, be based only on the expectation that they must disappear.

They must be done away with. I have entered negotiations to have them deported to the East. A great discussion concerning that question will take place in Berlin in January to which I am going to delegate the State-Secretary Dr. Bühler. That discussion is to take place in the Reich-Security Main-Office with SS-Lt. General Heydrich. A great Jewish migration will begin in any case.

But what should be done with the Jews? Do you think they will be settled down in the "Ostland," in villages? [Siedlungdoerfer]? This is what we were told in Berlin: Why all the bother? We can do nothing with them either in the "Ostland" nor in the "Reichkommissariat." So, liquidate them yourself.

Gentlemen, I must ask you to rid yourself of all feeling of pity. We must annihilate the Jews, wherever we find them and wherever it is possible, in order to maintain there the structure of the Reich as a whole. This will, naturally, be achieved by other methods, than those pointed out by Bureau Chief Dr. Hummel. Nor can the judges of the Special Courts be made responsible for it, because of the limitations of the framework of the legal procedure. Such outdated views cannot be applied to such gigantic and unique events. We must find at any rate a way which leads to the goal, and my thoughts are working in that direction.

The Jews represent for us also extra-ordinarily malignant gluttons. We have now approximately 2,500,000 of them in the General Government, perhaps with the Jewish mixtures and everything that goes with it, 3,500,000 Jews. We cannot shoot or poison those 3,500,000 Jews, but we shall nevertheless be able to take measures which will lead, somehow, to their annihilation, and this in connection with the gigantic measures to be determined in discussions in the Reich. The General Government must become free of Jews, the same as the Reich. Where and how this is to be achieved is a matter for the offices which we must appoint and create here. Their activities will be brought to your attention in due course.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. IV, pp. 891–892, Doc. 2233-D-PS.

128. THE WANNSEE PROTOCOL, JANUARY 20, 1942

This record of the meeting held at the Wannsee House in January 1942 after the July 1941 invasion of Soviet Russia (Operation Barbarossa) is actually a summary of events already in place. Convened by SS-Obergruppenführer and Chief of the Security Police Reinhard Heydrich, the actual minute taker was SS Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, with 13 other lesser-level functionaries in attendance. Basing itself upon a presumption of 11,000,000 Jews still alive in Europe, discussion was focused on "preparations for the final solution of the Jewish question" regarding emigration and evacuation as well as "the problem of mixed marriages and persons of mixed blood" [sic] including sterilization. While discussions of murder were not specifically held (i.e., recorded) nor were any references made to the various extermination camps (Vernichtungslager) and death camps (Todeslager) already active, these is no doubt that these were also on the minds of the participants. The only copy extant of the 30 copies that were made of this record was found during preparation for the Nuremberg Trials.

Stamp: Top Secret
30 copies / 16th copy
Minutes of discussion.

I. The following persons took part in the discussion about the final solution of the Jewish question which took place in Berlin, am Grossen Wannsee No. 56/58 on 20 January 1942:

Gauleiter Dr. MEYER and Reichsamtsleiter Dr. LEIBBRANDT Under Secretary of State Dr. STUCKART Under Secretary of State NEUMANN Under Secretary of State Dr. FREISLER Under Secretary of State Dr. BUEHLER Unterstaatssakretaer LUTHER SS-Oberfuehrer KLOPFER Minsterialdirektor KRITZINGER	Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories Reich Ministry for the Interior Plenipotentiary for the Four Year Plan Reich Ministry of Justice Office of the General Government Foreign Office Party Chancellery Reich Chancellery
--	---

(handwritten note):
D III. 29 Top Secret.

SS-Gruppenfuehrer HOFMANN SS-Gruppenführer MUELLER	Race and Settlement Main Office Reich Main Security Office
---	---

SS-Obersturmbannführer
EICHMANN

SS-Oberführer Security Police and SD
Dr. SCHOENGARTH

Chief of the Security Police and the

SD in the Government General

SS-Sturmbannführer Security Police and SD
Dr. LANGE

Commander of the Security
Police

and the SD for the General-District Latvia,

Latvia, as deputy of the Commander of the Security Police and the SD for the Reich Commissariat “Eastland”.

II. At the beginning of the discussion SS-Obergruppenführer HEYDRICH gave information that the Reich Marshal had appointed him delegate for the preparations for the final solution of the Jewish problem in Europe and pointed out that this discussion had been called for the purpose of clarifying fundamental questions. The wish of the Reich Marshal to have a draft sent to him concerning organisational, factual and material interests in relation to the final solution of the Jewish problem in Europe, makes necessary an initial common action of all central offices immediately concerned with these questions in order to bring their general activities into line.

He said that the Reichs Führer-SS and the Chief of the German Police (Chief of the Security Police and the SD) was entrusted with the official central handling of the final solution of the Jewish problem without regard to geographic borders.

The Chief of the Security Police and the SD then gave a short report of the struggle which has been carried on against this enemy, the essential points being the following:

- a) the expulsion of the Jews from every sphere of life of the German people,
- b) the expulsion of the Jews from the Lebensraum of the German people.

In carrying out these efforts, an increased and planned acceleration of the emigration of Jews from the Reich territory was started, as the only possible present solution.

By order of the Reich Marshal, a Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration was set up in January 1939 and the Chief of the Security Police and SD was entrusted with the management. Its most important tasks were

- a) to make all necessary arrangements for the preparation for an increased emigration of the Jews,
- b) to direct the flow of immigration,
- c) to hurry up the procedure of emigration in each individual case.

The aim of all this being that of clearing the German Lebensraum of Jews in a legal way.

All the Offices realized the drawbacks of such enforced accelerated emigration. For the time being they had, however, tolerated it on account of the lack of other possible solutions of the problem.

The work concerned with emigration was, later on, not only a German problem, but also a problem with which the authorities of the countries to which the flow of emigrants was being directed would have to deal. Financial difficulties, such as the demand for increasing sums of money to be presented at the time of the landing on the part of various foreign governments, the lack of shipping space, increasing restriction of entry permits, or the cancelling of such, extraordinarily increased the difficulties of emigration. In spite of these difficulties 53, 000 Jews were sent out of the country between the day of the seizure of power and the deadline of 31 October 1941. Of these as from 30 January from

Germany proper approx.	360,000
from 15 March 1938 from Austria (Ostmark)	147,000
appr.
from 15 1939 from the Protectorate, Bohemia and Moravia	appr. 30,000

The Jews themselves, or rather their Jewish political organizations financed the emigration. In order to avoid the possibility of the impoverished Jews staying behind, action was taken to make the wealthy Jews finance the evacuation of the needy Jews, this was arranged by imposing a suitable tax, i.e. an emigration-tax which was used for the financial arrangements in connection with the emigration of poor Jews, and was imposed according to a ladder system.

Apart from the necessary Reichmark-exchange, foreign currency had to be presented at the time of landing. In order to save foreign exchange held by Germany, the Jewish financial establishments in foreign countries were—with the help of Jewish organizations in Germany—made responsible for arranging an adequate amount of foreign currency. Up to 30 October 1941, these foreign Jews donated approx. $9,500,000 dollars.

In the meantime the Reich Fuehrer-SS and Chief of the German Police had prohibited emigration of Jews for reasons of the dangers of an emigration during war-time and consideration of the possibilities in the East.

III. Another possible solution of the problem has now taken the place of emigration, i.e. the evacuation of the Jews to the East, provided the Fuehrer agrees to this plan.

Such activities are, however, to be considered as provisional actions, but practical experience is already being collected which is of greatest importance in relation to the future final solution of the Jewish problem.

Approx. 11,000,000 Jews will be involved in the final solution of the European problem, they are distributed as follows among the individual countries:

Country	Number
A. Germany proper	131,800
Austria	43,700
Eastern territories	420,000
Government General	2,284,000
Bialystok	400,000
Protectorate Bohemia & Moravia	74,200
Estonia - no Jews -
Latvia	3,500
Lithuania	34,000
Belgium	43,000
Denmark	5,600
France / Occupied France	165,000
Unoccupied France	700,000
Greece	69,600
Netherlands	160,800
Norway	1,300
B. Bulgaria	48,000
England	330,000
Finland	2,300
Ireland	4,000
Italy, incl. Sardinia	58,000
Albania	200
Croatia	40,000
Portugal	43,000
Roumania, incl. Bessarabia	342,000
Sweden	8,000

Switzerland	18,000
Serbia	10,000
Slovakia	88,000
Spain	6,000
Turkey (European Turkey)	55,500
Hungary	742,800
USSR	5,000,000
Ukraine	2,994,684
White Russia, with exception of Bialystok	446,484
Total over	11,000,000

The number of Jews given here for foreign countries includes, however, only those Jews who still adhere to the Jewish faith as the definition of the term “Jew” according to racial principles is still partially missing there. The handling of the problem in the individual countries will meet with difficulties due to the attitude and conception of the people there, especially in Hungary and Roumania. Thus, even today the Jew can buy documents in Hungary which will officially prove his foreign citizenship.

The influence of the Jews in all walks of life in the USSR is well known. Approximately 5 million Jews are living in the European Russia, and in Asiatic Russia scarcely 1/4 million.

The breakdown of Jews residing in the European part of the USSR, according to trades, was approximately as follows;

in agriculture	9.1%
communal workers	14.8%
in trade	20.0%
employed by the state	23.4%
in private occupations
such as medical profession, newspapers, theater, etc.	32.7%

Under proper guidance the Jews are now to be allocated for labor to the East in the course of the final solution. Able-bodied Jews will be taken in large labor columns to these districts for work on roads, separated according to sexes, in the course of which action a great part will undoubtedly be eliminated by natural causes.

The possible final remnant will, as it must undoubtedly consist of the toughest, have to be treated accordingly, as it is the product of natural selection and would, if liberated, act as a bud cell of a new Jewish reconstruction (see historical experience.)

In the course of the practical execution of this final settlement of the problem, Europe will be cleaned up from West to East. Germany proper, including the protectorate Bohemia and Moravia, will have to be handled first because of reasons of housing and other social-political necessities.

The evacuated Jews will first be sent, group by group, to so-called transit-ghettos from which they will be taken to the East.

SS-Obergruppenfuehrer HEYDRICH went on to say that an important provision for the evacuation as such is the exact definition of the group of persons concerned in the matter.

It is intended not to evacuate Jews of more than 65 years of age but to send them to an old-age-ghetto—Theresienstadt is being considered for this purpose.

Next to these age-groups—of the 280,000 Jews still in Germany proper and Austria on 31 October 1941, approximately 30% are over 65; Jews disabled on active duty and Jews with war-decorations (Iron Cross I) will be accepted in Jewish old-age-ghettos.

Through such expedient solution the numerous interventions will be eliminated with one blow.

The carrying out of each single evacuation project of a larger extent will start at a time to be determined chiefly by the military development. Regarding the handling of the final solution in the European countries occupied and influenced by us it was suggested that the competent officials of the Foreign Office working on these questions confer with the competent “Referenten” from the Security Police and SD.

In Slovakia and Croatia the difficulties arising from this question have been considerably reduced, as the most essential problems in this field have already been brought to a near solution. In Roumania the Government in the meantime has also appointed a commissioner for Jewish questions. In order to settle the question in Hungary it is imperative that an adviser in Jewish questions be press upon the Hungarian government without too much delay.

As regards the taking of preparatory steps to settle the question in Italy SS-Obergruppenfuehrer HEYDRICH considers it opportune to contact the chief of the police with a view to these problems.

In the occupied and unoccupied parts of France the registration of the Jews for evacuation can in all probability be expected to take place without great difficulties.

Assistant Under Secretary of State LUTHER in this connection calls attention to the fact that in some countries, such as the Scandinavian states, difficulties will arise if these problems are dealt with thoroughly and that it will be therefore advisable to defer actions in these countries.

Besides, considering the small numbers of Jews to be evacuated from these countries this deferment means no essential limitation.

On the other hand, the Foreign Office anticipates no great difficulties as far as the South-East and West of Europe are concerned.

SS-Gruppenfuehrer HOFMANN plans to send an official from the Race and Settlement Main Office to Hungary for general orientation at the time when the first active steps to bring up the question in this country will be taken by the Chief of the Security Police and SD. It was determined to detail this official, who is not supposed to work actively, temporarily from the Main Race and Settlement Office as assistant to the police attaché.

IV. The implementation of the final solution-problem is supposed to a certain extent to be based on the Nuremberg Laws, in which connection also the solution of the problems presented by the mixed-marriages and the persons of mixed blood is seen to be conditional to an absolutely final clarification of the question.

The Chief of the Security Police and the SD first discussed, with reference to a letter from the Chief of the Reich Chancellery, the following points theoretically:

1) Treatment of Persons of Mixed Blood of the first Degree.

Persons of mixed blood of the first degree will, as regards the final solution of the Jewish question, be treated as Jews. From this treatment the following persons will be exempt:

- a) Persons of mixed blood of the first degree married to persons of German blood if their marriage has resulted in children (persons of mixed blood of the second degree). Such persons of mixed blood of the second degree are to be treated essentially as Germans.
- b) Persons of mixed blood of the first degree to whom up till now in any sphere of life whatsoever exemption licenses have been issued by the highest Party or State authorities.

Each individual case must be examined, in which process it will still be possible that a decision unfavorable to the persons of mixed blood can be passed.

In any such case only personal essential merit of the person of mixed blood must be deemed a ground justifying the granting of an exemption. (Not merits of the parent or of the partner of German blood.)

Any person of mixed blood of the first degree to whom exemption from the evacuation is granted will be sterilized—in order to eliminate the possibility of offspring and to secure a final solution of the problem presented by the persons of mixed blood. The sterilization will take place on a voluntary basis. But it will be conditional to a permission to stay in the Reich. Following the sterilizations the “person of mixed blood” liberated from all restrictive regulations which have so far been imposed upon him.

2) Treatment of Persons of Mixed Blood of the Second Degree

Persons of mixed blood of the second degree will fundamentally be treated as persons of German blood, with the exception of the following cases in which persons of mixed blood of the second degree will be treated as Jews:

- a) The person of mixed blood of the second degree is the result of a marriage where both parents are persons of mixed blood.
- b) The general appearance of the person of mixed blood of the second degree is racially particularly objectionable so that he already outwardly must be included among the Jews.
- c) The person of mixed blood of the second degree has a particularly bad police and political record sufficient to reveal that he feels and behaves like a Jew.

But also in these cases exceptions are not to be made if the person of mixed blood of the second degree is married to a person of German blood.

3) Marriages between Full Jews and Persons of German Blood.

Here it must be decided from one individual case to another whether the Jewish partner is to be evacuated, or whether in consideration of the effects produced by such measure upon the German relatives of the mixed marriage he is to be committed to a ghetto for aged Jews.

4) Marriages between Persons of Mixed Blood of the First Degree and Persons of German Blood.

a) Without Children.

If no children have resulted from the marriage the parents of mixed blood of the first degree will be evacuated or committed to a ghetto for old Jews. (The same treatment as in the case of marriages between full Jews and persons of German blood, Point 3.)

b) With Children.

If the marriage has resulted in children (persons of mixed blood of the second degree) these children will be evacuated or committed to a ghetto together with the parents of mixed blood of the first degree, if they are to be treated as Jews. If the children are to be treated as Germans (regular cases) they will be exempt from evacuation and in that case the same applies to the parent of mixed blood of the first degree.

5) Marriages between Persons of Mixed Blood of the First Degree and Persons of Mixed Blood of the First Degree or Jews.

In the case of these marriages (including the children) all members of the family will be treated as Jews, therefore evacuated or committed to a ghetto for old Jews.

6) Marriages between Persons of Mixed Blood of the First Degree and Persons of Mixed Blood of the Second Degree.

Both partners will be evacuated, regardless of whether or not they have children, or committed to a ghetto for old Jews, since as a rule these children will racially reveal the ad-mixture of Jewish blood more strongly than person of mixed blood of the second degree.

SS-Gruppenfuehrer HOFMANN advocates the opinion that sterilization must be applied on a large scale; in particular as the person of mixed blood Placed before the alternative as whether to be evacuated or to be sterilized would rather submit to the sterilization.

Under Secretary of State Dr. STUCKART maintains that the possible solutions enumerated above for a clarification of the problems presented by mixed marriages and by persons of mixed blood when translated into practice in this form would involve endless administrative work. In the second place, as the biological facts cannot be disregarded in any case, it was suggested by Dr. STUCKART to proceed to forced sterilization.

Further, for the purpose of simplifying the problem of mixed marriages it would be required to consider how it would be possible to attain the object that the legislator can declare: “This marriage has been dissolved.”

Regarding the question of the effects produced by the evacuation of the Jews on the economic life, Under Secretary of State NEUMANN declared that the Jews assigned to work in plants of importance for the war could not be evacuated as long as no replacement was available.

SS-Obergruppenfuehrer HEYDRICH pointed out that besides, according to the directives approved by him governing the carrying out of the evacuation program in operation at that time, these Jews would not be evacuated.

(page 14a of original)

Under Secretary of State Dr. BUEHLER stated that it would be welcomed by the General Government if the implementation of the final solution of this question could start in the General Government, because the transportation problem there was of no predominant importance and the progress of this action would not be hampered by considerations connected with the supply of labor. The Jews had to be removed as quickly as possible from the territory of the Government General because especially there the Jews represented an immense danger as a carrier of epidemics, and on the other hand were permanently contribution to the disorganization of the economic system of the country through black market operations. Moreover, out of the two and a half million to be affected, the majority of cases was unfit for work.

Under Secretary of State BUEHLER further stated that the solution of the Jewish question in the General Government as far as the issuing of orders was concerned was dependent upon the chief of the Security Police and the SD, his work being supported by the administrative authorities of the General Government. He had this one request only, namely that the Jewish question in this territory be solved as quickly as possible.

Towards the end of the conference the various types of possible solutions were discussed; in the course of this discussion Gauleiter Dr. MEYER as well as Under Secretary of State Dr. BUEHLER advocated the view that certain preparatory measures incidental to the carrying out of the final solution ought to be initiated immediately in the very territories under discussion, in which process, however, alarming the population must be avoided.

With the request to the persons present from the Chief of the Security Police and the SD that they lend him appropriate assistance in the carrying out of the tasks involved in the solution, the conference was adjourned.

Source: Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office), vol. VIII, pp. 210–217, Doc. NG-2586.

129. DACHAU: AFFIDAVIT OF NOVEMBER 24, 1945, OF FRANZ BLAHA REGARDING MEDICAL EXPERIMENTS AND MASS MURDERS AT DACHAU, APRIL 1941–APRIL 1945

Franz Blaha was a physician born and practicing in Czechoslovakia until he was sent to the concentration camp at Dachau in April 1941. This affidavit focuses on Blaha's experiences beginning in June 1942, when he was brought on as a surgeon at the hospital in the camp. Required to perform autopsies—some 7,000 of them—Blaha was intimately aware of the medical experiments that were performed at Dachau. These experiments were done in certain areas of inquiry, including malaria; the effects of changing air pressure; the effects of cold water; diseases of the stomach; and the effects of drinking large amounts of saltwater. Blaha confirms that the skin of dead prisoners was used to make various things, such as gloves and handbags. He also saw evidence of cannibalism and confirms executions by injection, gas, and shootings occurring in the camp. Finally, he comments on the horrible conditions in which the prisoners were forced to live. Blaha survived in Dachau until it was liberated in April 1945.

This affidavit is substantially the same as the testimony given by Blaha on direct examination before the International Military Tribunal at Nurnberg, 13–14 January 1946.

Dachau, Germany
24 November, 1945

Affidavit of FRANZ BLAHA

I, Franz Blaha, being duly sworn, depose and state as follows:

1. I studied medicine in Prague, Vienna, Strassburg and Paris and received my diploma in 1920. From 1920 to 1926 I was a clinical assistant. In 1926 I became chief physician of the IgIau Hospital in Moravia, Czechoslovakia. I held this position until 1939 when the Germans entered Czechoslovakia and I was seized as a hostage and held a prisoner for cooperating with the Czech government. I was sent as a prisoner to the Dachau Concentration Camp in April 1941 and remained there until the liberation of the camp in April 1945. Until July 1941 I worked in a Punishment Company. After that I was sent to the hospital and subjected to the experiments in typhoid being conducted by Dr. Muermelstadt. After that I was to be made the subject of an experimental operation and only succeeded in avoiding this by admitting that I was a physician. If this had been known before I would have suffered because intellectuals were treated very harshly in the Punishment Company. In October 1941 I was sent to work in the herb plantation and later in the laboratory for processing herbs. In June 1942 I was taken into the hospital as a surgeon. Shortly afterwards I was directed to conduct a stomach operation on 20 healthy prisoners. Because I would not do this I was put in the autopsy room where I stayed until April 1945. While there I performed approximately 7,000 autopsies. In all 12,000 autopsies were performed under my direction.

2. From mid 1941 to the end of 1942 some 500 operations on healthy prisoners were performed. These were for the instruction of the SS medical students and doctors and included operations on the stomach, gall bladder, spleen and throat. These were performed by students and doctors of only two years training although they were very dangerous and difficult. Ordinarily they would not have been done except by surgeons with at least four years surgical practice. Many prisoners died on the operating table and many others from later complications. I autopsied all these bodies. The doctors who supervised these operations were Lang, Muermelstadt, Wolter, Ramsauer and Nahr. Standartenfuehrer Dr. Lolling frequently witnessed these operations.

3. During my time at Dachau I was familiar with the many kinds of medical experiments carried on there with human victims. These persons were never volunteers but were forced to submit to such acts. Malaria experiments on about 1,200 people were conducted by Dr. Klaus Schilling between 1941 and 1945. Schilling was personally asked by Himmler to conduct these experiments. The victims were either bitten by mosquitoes or given injections of malaria Sporozoits taken from mosquitoes. Different kinds of treatment were applied including quinine, pyrififer, neosalvarsan, antipyrimin, pyramidon and a drug called 2516 Bohring. I autopsied bodies of people who died from these malaria experiments. 30 to 40 died from the malaria itself. 300 to 400 died later from diseases which were fatal because of the physical condition resulting from the malaria attacks. In addition there were deaths resulting from poisoning due to overdoses of neosalvarsan and pyramidon. Dr. Schilling was present at the time of my autopsies on the bodies of his patients.

4. In 1942 and 1943 experiments on human beings were conducted by Dr. Sigismund Rascher to determine the effects of changing air pressure. As many as 25 persons were put at one time into a specially constructed van in which pressure could be increased or decreased as required. The purpose was to find out the effects of high altitude and of rapid descents by parachutists. I have seen the people lying unconscious on the floor of the van through a window in the van. Most of the prisoners used died from these experiments from internal hemorrhages of the lungs or brain. The rest coughed blood when taken out. It was my job to take the bodies out and to send the internal organs to Munich for study as soon as they were found to be dead. About 400 to 500 prisoners were experimented on. Those not dead were sent to invalid blocks and liquidated shortly afterwards. Only a few escaped.

5. Rascher also conducted experiments on the effect of cold water on humans. This was done to find a way for reviving aviators who had fallen into the ocean. The subject was placed in ice cold water and kept there until he was unconscious. Blood was taken from his neck and tested each time his body temperature dropped one degree. This drop was determined by a rectal thermometer. Urine was also periodically tested. Some men lasted as long as 24 to 38 hours. The lowest body temperature reached was 19 degrees C, but most men died at 25 degrees C or 26 degrees C. When the men were removed from the ice water attempts were made to revive them by artificial warmth from the sun, from hot water, from electro-therapy or by animal warmth. For this last experiment prostitutes were used and the body of the unconscious man was placed between the bodies of two women. Himmler was present at one such experiment. I could see him from one of the windows in the street between the blocks. I have personally been present at some of these cold water experiments when Rascher was absent and I have seen notes and diagrams on them in Rascher's laboratory. About 300 persons were used in these experiments. The majority died. Of those who lived many were mentally deranged. Those not killed were sent to invalid blocks and were killed just like the victims of the air pressure experiments. I only know two who survived—a Yugoslav and a Pole, both of whom are mental cases.

6. Liver puncture experiments were performed by Dr. Brachtl on healthy people and on people who had diseases of the stomach and gall bladder. For this purpose a needle was jabbed into the liver of a person and a small piece of the liver was extracted. No anaesthetic was used. The experiment is very painful and often had serious results as the stomach or large blood vessels were often punctured resulting in hemorrhage. Many persons died of these tests for which Polish, Russian, Czech and German prisoners were employed. Altogether these experiments were conducted on about 175 people.

7. Phlegmone experiments were conducted by Dr. Schuetz, Dr. Babor, Dr. Nieselwetter and Professor Lauer. 40 healthy men were used at a time of which 20 were given intra-muscular and 20 intravenous injections of pus from diseased persons. All treatment was forbidden for three days by which time serious inflammation and in many cases general blood poisoning had occurred. Then each group was divided again into groups of 10. Half were given chemical treatment with liquid and special pills every 10 minutes for 24 hours. The rest were treated with sulfanamide and surgery. In some cases all of the limbs were amputated. My autopsy also showed that the chemical treatment had been harmful and had even caused perforations of the stomach wall. For these experiments Polish, Czech and Dutch priests were ordinarily used. Pain was intense in such experiments. Most of the 600 to 800 persons who were used finally died. Most of the others became permanent invalids and were later killed.

8. In the fall of 1944 there were 60 to 80 persons who were subjected to salt water experiments. They were locked in a room and for five days were given nothing to eat but salt water. During this time their urine, blood and excrements were tested. None of these prisoners died, possibly because they received smuggled food from other prisoners. Hungarians and Gypsies were used for these experiments.

9. It was common practice to remove the skin from dead prisoners. I was directed to do this on many occasions. Dr. Rascher and Dr. Wolter in particular asked for this human skin from human backs and chests. It was chemically treated and placed in the sun to dry. After that it was cut into shapes for use as saddles, riding breeches, gloves, house slippers and ladies' handbags. Tattooed skin was especially valued by SS men. Russians, Poles and other inmates were used in this way, but it was forbidden to cut out the skin of a German. This skin had to be from healthy prisoners and free from defects. Sometimes we did not have enough bodies with good skin and Rascher would say, "All right, you will get the bodies." The next day we would receive 20 or 30 bodies of young people. They would have been shot in the neck or struck on the head so that the skin would be uninjured. Also we frequently got requests for the skulls or skeletons of prisoners. In those cases we boiled the skull or the body. Then the soft parts were removed and the bones were bleached and dried and reassembled. In the case of skulls it was important to have a good set of teeth. When we got an order for skulls from Oranienburg the SS men would say, "We will try to get you some with good teeth." So it was dangerous to have a good skin or good teeth.

10. Transports arrived frequently in Dachau from Studthof, Belsen, Auschwitz, Mauthausen and other camps. Many of these were 10 to 14 days on the way without water or food. On one transport which arrived in November 1942 I found evidence of cannibalism. The living persons had eaten the flesh from the dead bodies. Another transport arrived from Compiègne in France. Professor Limousin of Clermont Ferrand who was later my assistant told me that there had been 2,000 persons on this transport when it started. There was food available but no water. 800 died on the way and were thrown out. When it arrived after 12 days more than 500 persons were dead on the train. Of the remainder most died shortly after arrival. I investigated this transport because the International Red Cross complained and the SS men wanted a report that the deaths had been caused by fighting and rioting on the way. I dissected a number of bodies and found that they had died from suffocation and lack of water. It was mid summer and 120 people had been packed into each car.

11. In 1941 and 1942 we had in the camp what we called invalid transports. These were made up of people who were sick or for some reason incapable of working. We called them Himmelfahrt Commandos. About 100 or 120 were ordered each week to go to the shower baths. There four people gave injections of phenol evipan or benzine which soon caused death. After 1943 these invalids were sent to other camps for liquidation. I know that they were killed because I saw the records and they were marked with a cross and the date that they left which was the way that deaths were ordinarily recorded. This was shown on both the card index of the Camp Dachau and the records in the town of Dachau. 1,000 to 3,000 went away every three months so there were about 5,000 sent to death in 1945 and the same in 1944. In April 1945 a Jewish transport was loaded at Dachau and was left standing on the railroad siding. The railroad was destroyed by bombing and they could not leave. So they were just left there to die from starvation. They were not allowed to get off. When the camp was liberated they were all dead.

12. Many executions by gas or shooting or injections took place right in the camp. The gas chamber was completed in 1944 and I was called by Dr. Rascher to examine the first victims. Of the 8 or 9 persons in the chamber there were three still alive and the remainder appeared to be dead. Their eyes were red and their faces swollen. Many prisoners were later killed in this way. Afterwards they were removed to the crematorium where I had to examine their teeth for gold. Teeth containing gold were extracted. Many prisoners who were sick were killed by injections while in hospital. Some prisoners killed in the hospital came through to the autopsy room with no name or number on the tag which was usually tied to their big toe. Instead the tag said "Do not dissect". I autopsied some of these and found that they were perfectly healthy but had died from injections. Sometimes prisoners were killed only because they had dysentery or vomited and gave the nurses too much trouble. Mental patients were liquidated by being led to the gas chamber and injected there or shot. Shooting was a common method of execution. Prisoners could be shot just outside the crematorium and carried in. I have seen people pushed into the ovens while they were still breathing and making sounds although if they were too much alive they were usually hit on the head first.

13. The principal executions about which I know from having examined the victims or supervised such examinations are as follows:

In 1942 there were 5,000 to 6,000 Russians held in a separate camp inside Dachau. They were taken on foot to the Military Rifle Range near the camp in groups of 500 or 600 and shot. These groups left the camp about three times a week. At night they would bring them back in carts drawn by prisoners and we would examine them.—In February 1944 about 40 Russian students arrived from Moosburg. I knew a few of the boys in the hospital. I examined them after they were shot outside the crematory.—In September 1944 a group of 94 high ranking Russians were shot including two military doctors who had been working with me in the hospital. I examined their bodies.—In April 1945 a number of prominent people were shot who had been kept in the bunker. They included two French generals whose names I cannot remember. But I recognized them from their uniform. I examined them after they were shot.—In 1944 and 1945 a number of women were killed by hanging, shooting and injections. I examined them and found that in certain cases they were pregnant.—In 1945 just before the camp was liberated all "Nacht und Nebel" prisoners were executed. These were prisoners who were forbidden to have any contact with the outside world. They were kept in a special inclosure and were allowed no mail. There were 30 or 40, some of whom were sick. These were carried to the crematory on stretchers. I examined them and found they had all been shot in the neck.

14. The rooms could not be cleaned because they were too crowded and there was no cleaning material. No baths were available for months at a time. Latrine facilities were completely inadequate. Medicine was almost non-existent. But I found after the camp was liberated that there was plenty of medicine in the SS hospital for all the camp if it had been given to us for use. New arrivals at the camp were lined up out of doors entirely naked for hours at a time. Sometimes they stood there from morning until night. It did not matter whether this was in the winter or in the summer. This occurred all through 1943, 1944 and the first quarter of 1945. I could see these formations from the window of the autopsy room. Many of the people who had to stand in the cold in this way became ill from pneumonia and died. I had several acquaintances who were killed in this manner during 1944 and 1946. In October 1944 a transport of Hungarians brought spotted fever into the camp and an epidemic began. I examined many of the corpses from this transport and reported the situation to Dr. Hintermayer but was forbidden on penalty of being shot to mention that there was an epidemic in the camp. No preventive measures were taken at all. New healthy arrivals were put into blocks where an epidemic was already present. Also infected persons were put into these blocks. So the 30th Block for instance died out completely three times. Only at Christmas when the epidemic spread into the SS camp was a quarantine established. Nevertheless transports continued to arrive. We had 200 to 300 new typhus cases a day and 100 deaths caused by typhus a day. In all we had 28,000 cases and 15,000 deaths. In addition to those that died from the disease my autopsies showed that many deaths were caused solely by malnutrition. Such deaths occurred in all the years from 1941 to 1943. They were mostly Italians, Russians and Frenchmen. These people were just starved to death. At the time of death they weighed 50 to 60 pounds. Autopsies showed that their internal organs had often shrunk to one third of their normal size.

15. Visits from prominent people were common at Dachau. Among those who came I remember Himmler who came three times to see air pressure and cold water experiments, Dr. Grawitz who was Reichsarzt SS, Wilhelm Frick who came once in 1943 and visited the malaria station and Rascher's experimental station and Walter Funk who also came in 1943 and made a general tour of the camp.

The facts stated above are true: this declaration is made by me voluntarily and without compulsion: after reading over the statement I have signed and executed the same at Dachau Germany this 24th day of November 1945.

[signed] Dr. Blaha Franz*

DR. BLAHA FRANZ

*Note:

My first name is Franz.

My usual signature is as above.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of November 1945 at Dachau Germany.

s/ John B. Martin
JOHN B. MARTIN.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 949–955, Doc. 3249-PS.

130. BUCHENWALD: AFFIDAVIT OCTOBER 24, 1946, OF WALDEMAR HOVEN REGARDING MEDICAL EXPERIMENTS AT BUCHENWALD, LATE 1941–SEPTEMBER 1943

This affidavit provides details on a number of medical experiments performed at the Buchenwald concentration camp. It was given by Waldemar Hoven, a doctor and SS officer who held many medical positions in Buchenwald, including chief physician responsible for inmate patients in the camp hospital, from July 1942 until September 1943. The medical experiments described by Hoven include spotted fever and virus experiments; euthanasia program for “mentally and physically deficient” inmates at the camp; and methods of killing, including injections of phenol. Hoven was arrested by the SS Police Court in connection with a corruption investigation and remained under arrest until March 1945, at which time he resumed his position as chief physician.

AFFIDAVIT

I, Waldemar Hoven, being duly sworn, depose and state:

1. I was born in Freiburg, in Breisgau on the 10th of February 1903. I attended high school but did not complete my education until many years later. Between the years 1919 and 1933 I visited Denmark, Sweden, United States, and France. In 1939 I concluded my medical studies and joined the Waffen SS as a physician. The last rank I held in the Waffen SS was Hauptsturmfuehrer (Captain). In 1934 I had joined the Allgemeine SS.

2. In October 1939 I was assigned as an assistant medical officer in the SS Hospital in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp and held that position until 1941 when I was appointed the Medical Officer in charge of the SS troops stationed in the Camp. At the end of 1941 I was transferred to the Camp Hospital and became the Assistant Medical Officer therein. This Hospital was for the inmates of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp—In July 1942 I was elevated to the position of Chief Physician and thereby had the full responsibility for the inmate patients in the hospital. I held this position until September 1943, when I was arrested by the SS Police Court of Kassel and remained under arrest until [typed date is crossed out and the following date was handwritten; editor’s note] 15th of March 1945.
3. Due to my various positions in Buchenwald Concentration Camp during this period of nearly four years I became acquainted with all phases of the medical activities therein and am hereby able to make the following statement:

SPOTTED FEVER AND VIRUS EXPERIMENTS

4. In the latter part of 1941 an experimental station was established in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp in order to determine the effectiveness of various Spotted Fever vaccines. This department was called the “Spotted Fever Experimental Station” (Fleckfieber Versuchsstation—Abt. Fuer Fleckfieber und Virus Forschung) and was under the direct supervision of Dr. DING, alias SCHULER. This experimental station was set up in Block 46 of the Camp. The Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS in Berlin, under the command of Dr. Joachim MRUGOWSKY, received all the reports of these activities and Dr. DING took orders from MRUGOWSKY. In the early days, that is, between 1941 and the Summer of 1943, Dr. Ding had many meetings in Berlin with Dr. Karl Genzken concerning his work at Buchenwald in connection with the Spotted Fever experiments. Dr. Ding told me that Dr. Genzken had a special interest in these matters and that he sent him reports at various times. Dr. Ding also said that Dr. Karl Genzken was one of his superiors. From my association with Dr. Ding I understood that the chain of command in the supervision of the “Spotted Fever Experimental Station” was as follows: Reichsarzt SS Grawitz, Genzken, Mrugowsky, and Ding.
5. I can recollect that Dr. Genzken gave order to Dr. Ding in January 1943 to enlarge the experimental station. At this time Block 50 was cleaned out and made into a station for the production of the various vaccines to be used in the experiments at Block 46. From this time on the experimental station was known as "Department for Spotted Fever and Virus Research of the Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS" (Hygiene Institut der Waffen SS—Abteilung fuer Fleckfieber und Virus Forschung). Then in the summer of 1943 Dr. Genzken turned all his duties over to Dr. Mrugowsky and that time on Genzken no long actively participated in these matters. I can recall meeting Dr. Mrugowsky, in the home of Dr. Ding, on one of his [illegible word crossed out; editor's note] visits to Buchenwald.

6. Inasmuch as I was constantly associated with Dr. Ding at Buchenwald we became very friendly. I frequently discussed matters with Ding and visited his experimental station from time to time. As a matter of fact, Dr. Ding had to go to Berlin for discussions with Dr. Murgowsky and others, nearly 3 days out of every two weeks, and on such occasions I was in charge of the Spotted Fever Institute. However, when Ding went to Berlin the experiments were discontinued until he returned.
7. The experiments at Block 46 in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp were conducted as follows: One group of victims were first vaccinated with the spotted fever vaccine and then infected with the spotted fever virus. In order to contrast the effectiveness of the vaccine another group of inmates were merely infected with the spotted fever virus without any previous vaccination. Between the Autumn of 1942 and the Summer of 1943 about 500 inmates of the Buchenwald Concentration were used in these experiments. During my time about 10% of the total number of the inmates used died as a result. I heard that a larger number of the victims died after my time, that is about 20%.
8. The selection of inmates to be used for the purposes of medical experiments in Block 46 by the "Institute for Spotted Fever and Virus Research" was as follows: Whenever Dr. DING needed human being for his work a request was made to the office of the Camp Commandant and referred to me for action. Usually a man named SCHOBER, an SS Hauptsturnfuehrer, notified me to select the necessary number of prisoners for these purposes. In accordance with this request I selected various inmates, at random, from the roster of the camp. They were placed on a list over my signature and returned to SCHOBER, who often removed certain names from the list for political reasons. In the event that particular prisoners were removed from the list I was requested to select substitutes in order to provide Dr. Ding with the desired number of victims. After I returned the completed list to Schober it was given to Dr. Ding for approval. He made a final check to ascertain, from a medical point of view, the physical condition of the selected inmates and to determine whether or not they met with his requirements.

TRANSFER OF INMATES TO THE BERBURG EUTHANASIA STATION FOR EXTERMINATION

9. I became aware of the so-called "euthanasia" program for the extermination of the mentally and physically deficient was being carried out in Germany. At that time the Camp Commander, Koch, called all the important SS officials of the camp together and informed them that he had received a secret order from Himmler to the effect that all mentally and physically deficient inmates of the Camp should be killed. The Camp Commander stated that Higher Authorities from Berlin ordered that all the Jewish inmates of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp should be included in this extermination program. In accordance with these orders, 300 to 400 Jewish prisoners of different nationalities were sent to "Euthanasia Station" at Bernburg for extermination. A few days later I receive a list of the names of those Jews who were exterminated at Bernburg from the Camp Commander and was ordered to issue falsified statements of death. I obeyed this order. This particular action was executed under the code name "14 f 13". I visited Bernburg on one occasion to arrange for the cremation of two inmates who died in the Wernigerode Branch (Ausenkommando Wernigerode) of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp.

THE KILLING OF INMATES BY PHENOL AND OTHER MEANS

10. In the Camp we had a great many prisoners who were jealous of the positions held by a certain few of the inmates, that is, some of the political prisoners held key-positions and were able to get better living conditions than the average. Hence, many of the prisoners envied these positions and made every effort to discredit the men who held the key-positions. Such traitorous actions became known through the "grapevine" to the men in the key-positons and then such traitors were immediately killed. In each case I was later notified in order to make the death statements of the prisoners killed. These statements did not indicate the actual cause of death, but were made out to indicate that the prisoner died of natural causes.

11. In some instances I supervised the killing of these unworthy inmates by injections of phenol [editor's note: hand-written language added as follows] at the request of the inmates. These killings took place in the camp hospital and I was assisted by several inmates. On one occasion Dr. Ding came to the hospital to witness such killings with phenol and said that I was not doing it correctly, therefore he performed some of the injections himself. At that time three inmates were killed with phenol injections and they died within a minute.
12. The total number of traitors killed was about 150, of whom 60 were killed by Phenol injections, either by myself or under my supervision in the camp hospital, and the rest were killed by various means, such as beatings, by the inmates

The above affidavit written in the English language, consisting of five (5) pages, is true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief. This affidavit was given by me freely and voluntarily, without promise of reward and I was subjected to no duress or threat of any kind.

[signed]

Dr. Waldemar Hoven

Before me, IWAN DEVRIES, A 442938, U. S. Civilian, appeared Dr. Waldemar HOVEN, to me known, who in my presence signed the foregoing affidavit written in the English language consisting of five (5) pages and swore that the same was true and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief. On the 24th day of October, 1946

[signed]

IWAN DEVRIES

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office), Green Series, vol. I, pp. 685–686, Doc. NO-429.

131. USE OF GAS VANS IN THE UKRAINE, MAY 16, 1942

This report from August Becker to Walter Rauff, both involved in the creation and development of gas vans used by various groups to exterminate Jews, people with mental and physical disabilities, and others, describes some problems that were encountered with the gas vans in use. For example, a certain type of gas van could not move in wet weather, and it proved impossible to prevent the civilian populations from recognizing the vans for what they were: "death vans." Becker observes the difficulty incurred by the men of several commands making use of the gas vans when they unloaded the bodies from the vans after the death of the victims. He was concerned with the psychological impact of the task as well as physical complaints arising from the men's exposure to any of the carbon monoxide still left in the vans after the procedure. Finally, Becker recommends that the gas pedal of the van should not be pushed to the floor and instead should be slowly applied. The former method results in agonizing asphyxiation, while the latter produces a slow and painless death.

Field Post Office
No 32704
B Nr 40/42

Kiev, 16 May 1942

TOP SECRET

To: SS-~bersturmbannfuehrer Rauff
Berlin, Prinz-Albrecht-Str. 8

[Handwritten:]
pers.
R/29/5 Pradel n.R
b/R

[Handwritten:] Sinkkel [?] b.R, p 16/6

The overhauling of vans by groups D and C is finished. While the vans of the first series can also be put into action if the weather is not too bad, the vans of the second series (Saurer) stop completely in rainy weather. If it has rained for instance for only one half hour, the van cannot be used because it simply skids away. It can only be used in absolutely dry weather. It is only a question now whether the van can only be used standing at the place of execution. First the van has to be brought to that place, which is possible only in good weather. The place of execution is usually 10–15 km away from the highways and is difficult to access because of its location; in damp or wet weather it is not accessible at all. If the persons to be executed are driven or led to that place, then they realize immediately what is going on and get restless, which is to be avoided as far as possible. There is only one way left; to load them at the collecting point and to drive them to the spot.

I ordered the vans of group D to be camouflaged as house-trailers by putting one set of window shutters on each side of the small van and two on each side of the larger vans, such as one often sees on farm-houses in the country. The vans became so well-known, that not only the authorities, but also the civilian population called the van “death van”, as soon as one of these vehicles appeared. It is my opinion, the van cannot be kept secret for any length of time, not even camouflaged.

The Saurer-van which I transported from Simferopol to Taganrog suffered damage to the brakes on the way. The Security Command [SK] in Mariupol found the cuff of the combined oil-air brake broken at several points. By persuading and bribing the H.K.P. [?] we managed to have a form machined, on which the cuffs were cast. When I came to Stalino and Gorlowka a few days later, the drivers of the vans complained about the same faults. After having talked to the commandants of those commands I went once more to Mariupol to have some more cuffs made for those cars too. As agreed two cuffs will be made for each car, six cuffs will stay in Mariupol as replacements for group D and six cuffs will be sent to SS-Untersturmfuehrer Ernst in Kiev for the cars of group C. The cuffs for the groups B and A could be made available from Berlin, because transport from Mariupol to the north would be too complicated and would take too long. Smaller damages on the cars will be repaired by experts of the commands, that is of the groups in their own shops.

Because of the rough terrain and the indescribable road and highway conditions the caulking and rivets loosen in the course of time. I was asked if in such cases the vans should be brought to Berlin for repair. Transportation to Berlin would be much too expensive and would demand too much fuel. In order to save those expenses I ordered them to have smaller leaks soldered and if that should no longer be possible, to notify Berlin immediately by radio, that Pol. Nr. is out of order. Besides that I ordered that during application of gas all the men were to be kept as far away from the vans as possible, so they should not suffer damage to their health by the gas which eventually would escape. I should like to take this opportunity to bring the following to your attention: several commands have had the unloading after the application of gas done by their own men. I brought to the attention of the commanders of those S.K. concerned the immense psychological injuries and damages to their health which that work can have for those men, even if not immediately, at least later on. The men complained to me about head-aches which appeared after each unloading. Nevertheless they don't want to change the orders, because they are afraid prisoners called for that work, could use an opportune moment to flee. To protect the men from these damages, I request orders be issued accordingly.

The application of gas usually is not undertaken correctly. In order to come to an end as fast as possible, the driver presses the accelerator to the fullest extent. By doing that the persons to be executed suffer death from suffocation and not death by dozing off as was planned. My directions now have proved that by correct adjustment of the levers death comes faster and the prisoners fall asleep peacefully. Distorted faces and excretions, such as could be seen before, are no longer noticed.

Today I shall continue my journey to group B, where I can be reached with further news.

Signed: Dr. Becker
SS Untersturmfuehrer

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 418–419, Doc. 501-PS.

132. PROPOSAL REGARDING STERILIZATION OF JEWS, JUNE 23, 1942

In June 1943 Vikton Brack, SS-Oberfuehrer, involved in the creation and development of gas vans used to exterminate victims, wrote to Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader SS and chief of the German police, to present a suggestion regarding the treatment of the millions of Jews expected to be exterminated throughout Europe. Brack agrees that the extermination process should proceed as quickly as possible, but he argues that the estimated 2 to 3 million who are capable of work should not be killed and instead should be used for forced labor. Brack acknowledges that these Jews cannot remain alive if they possess the ability to procreate. Accordingly, Brack recommends mass sterilization by X-ray of those Jews not immediately killed.

LETTER FROM BRACK TO HIMMLER, 23 JUNE 1942, PROPOSING STERILIZATION OF TWO TO THREE MILLION JEWS

Viktor Brack
SS Oberfuehrer

Berlin, W 8, Voss-Strasse 4, 23 June 1942
[Initial] HH

Top Secret

To the Reich Leader SS and Chief of the German Police
Heinrich Himmler,
Berlin SW 11, Prinz Albrecht Str. 8

Dear Reich Leader,

On the instructions of Reich Leader [Reichsleiter] Bouhler I placed some of my men—already some time ago—at the disposal of Brigadefuehrer Globocnik to execute his special mission. On his renewed request I have now transferred additional personnel. On this occasion Brigadefuehrer Globocnik stated his opinion that the whole Jewish action should be completed as quickly as possible so that one would not get caught in the middle of it one day if some difficulties should make a stoppage of the action necessary. You, yourself, Reich Leader, have already expressed your view, that work should progress quickly for reasons of camouflage alone. Both points which in principle arrive at the same result are more than justified as far as my own experience goes; nevertheless would you kindly allow me to submit the following argument:

Among 10 millions of Jews in Europe there are, I figure, at least 2–3 millions of men and women who are fit enough to work. Considering the extraordinary difficulties the labor problem presents us with, I hold the view that those 2–3 millions should be specially selected and preserved. This can, however, only be done if at the same time they are rendered incapable to propagate. About a year ago I reported to you that agents of mine had completed the experiments necessary for this purpose. I would like to recall these facts once more. Sterilization, as normally performed on persons with hereditary diseases, is here out of the question, because it takes too long and is too expensive. Castration by X-ray however is not only relatively cheap, but can also be performed on many thousands in the shortest time. I think, that at this time it is already irrelevant whether the people in question become aware of having been castrated after some weeks or months once they feel the effects.

Should you, Reich Fuehrer, decide to choose this way in the interest of the preservation of labor, then Reichsleiter Bouhler would be prepared to place all physicians and other personnel needed for this work at your disposal. Likewise he requested me to inform you that then I would have to order the apparatus so urgently needed with the .greatest speed.

Heil Hitler!

Yours,

[Signed] VIKTOR BRACK

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. I, pp. 721–722, Doc. NO-205.

133. CORRESPONDENCE REGARDING TRANSPORT OF JEWS TO AUSCHWITZ FROM FRANCE, THE NETHERLANDS, AND BELGIUM, JUNE 28–JULY 27, 1942

Set forth in this document is an exchange of telegrams and a letter in draft form. The subject is the requirement that for purposes of forced labor the occupied French territory, the Netherlands, and Belgium must make ready 40,000 Jews, 40,000 Jews, and 10,000 Jews, respectively, for deportation to Auschwitz. The first telegram, dated June 28, 1942, comes from Martin Luther, undersecretary of state, German Foreign Office, and Franz Rademacher, head of the Jewish Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Judenreferat, or Referat D III), ordering the deportations. It triggers a response from Otto Abetz, German ambassador to Vichy (that part of France not occupied by the Germans), agreeing to the deportation of 40,000 Jews from France but suggesting that foreign Jews in France be deported before French Jews to inflame French antisemitism. This is rejected by Luther in a return telegram dated July 10, 1942. The draft letter sent in late July 1942 addresses the same issue.

CORRESPONDENCE AND DRAFT CORRESPONDENCE OF THE GERMAN FOREIGN OFFICE, JUNE AND JULY 1942, CONCERNING THE TRANSPORT OF JEWS FROM FRANCE,
THE NETHERLANDS. AND BELGIUM TO AUSCHWITZ

I. Telegram of 28 June 1942, with notes and initials

Berlin, 28 June 1942
[Stamp] Diplogerma
Consugerma

File reference: D III 516 g

[Stamp] Secret

[Stamp] Telegram (Secret Code)

1. To the Diplogerma—

a. German Embassy in Paris. [Handwritten] No. 2709.

b. Branch of the Foreign Office at Brussels. [Handwritten]
No. 788 Foreign Office.

c. The Representative of the Foreign Office to the staff of the Reich Commissioner for the Occupied Netherland Territories at The Hague, Plein 23 [Handwritten] Zc IIV 601 g

—each separately. [Handwritten] No. 207 [illegible initial].
State Secretary [initial] W [WEIZSAECKER] 28 [June]
Under State Secretary

Referent: Under State Secretary Luther Legation Councillor Rademacher

2. Before Dispatch—
To Section Pol. II Ref. 1, with the request to take note and to cosign.

[Handwritten on margin] Resubmit at once after dispatch with respect to Hague (no code material, no secret teletype!)
30/6 [Illegible initials] 28/6 to: a and b.

The Chief of the Security Police and the SD issues the following information:

“Provisions have been made to run daily special trains with a capacity of 1,000 persons each, from the middle of July and beginning of August on, respectively, by means of which the deportation to the Auschwitz camp for labor service of at first approx[imately]
40,000 Jews from Occupied French territory, 40,000 Jews from the Netherlands, and 10,000 Jews from Belgium will be carried out.

“Persons at present coming within the scope of these measures are able-bodied Jews, insofar as they do not live in a mixed marriage and do not possess a citizenship of the British Empire, the United States, Mexico, or of the enemy states of Central and South America, or of the neutral and allied states.” An early reply is requested.

[Signed] LUTHER 25 June
[Initial] R [RADEMACHER] 25 June

2 Telegram from Ambassador Abetz in Paris, 2 July 1942, with initials and distribution

[Stamp] Work-copy
Telegram, (by secret teletypewriter)
[Stamp] Foreign Office
D III 539 0
In: 3 July 1942

Paris, 2 July 1942, 2245 hours.
Arrival: 3 July 1942, 0200 hours.
No. 2784 dated 2 July

To decree by cable No. 2709 dated 28 June and in reply to cable report No. 2783 dated 2 July

[Marginal note]
*D III 516 g.
* DIII.

[Distribution Stamp]

Fifteen copies of the above were produced, which were distributed as follows:

- No. 1-D III (Working Staff).
- 2-Reich Foreign Minister
- 3-State Secretary [defendant von Weizsaecker].
- 5-Office of the Reich Foreign Minister.
- 6-Chief of the Political Division [defendant Woermann].
- 7-Chief of the Legal Division.
- 8-Chief of the Personnel Division.
- 9-Chief of the Trade Policy Division.
- 10-Chief of the Cultural Division.
- 11-Chief of the Press Division.
- 12-Chief of the Protocol Division.
- 13-Chief of the Division Germany.
- 14-Chief of the Radio Division.
- 15-Deputy Chief of the Political Division.

This is copy No. 1

The Embassy has no objections on principle against the deportation of 40,000 Jews from France to be allocated for labor to the Auschwitz camp. In carrying out these measures, however, the following points should be taken into consideration:

Whenever anti-Jewish measures were taken, the Embassy took the view that they should be carried out in such a form as to continuously add further to the anti-Semitic sentiment, which has increased of late. Just as former influx of eastern and other foreign Jews into Germany lent a special zest to the anti-Semitic trend among the German people, so it can also be observed in France that the increase of anti-Semitism is to a large degree caused by the immigration of Jews of foreign nationalities in the last few years. It will therefore have a psychological effect on the broad masses of French people, if the evacuation measures are at first applied to such foreign Jews, and French Jews are at first only drawn upon to the extent which foreign Jews do not fill the above mentioned quota.

Such a procedure would by no means establish a privileged position for the French Jew, as in any case he must 1270 Letter to Himmler Regarding Sterilization

likewise disappear in the process of liberation of the European countries from Jewry. This already finds its expression in the fact that in any case a certain number of French Jews will be included in the stipulated quota.

ABETZ

3. Teletype from Luther to the German Embassy in Paris, 10 July 1942

Berlin, 10 July 1942 File reference: D III 539 g
[Stamp] Diplogerma

Consugerma Teletype, by secret teletypewriter No. 2964

To the German Embassy Paris

[Stamp] Dispatched 11 July, [Illegible number] hours

Concerning telegram 2 July, No. 2783 and No. 2784.

After dispatch—To Section Pol II for information. [Illegible initial].

At the time not yet possible to give priority in deportation to Jews of foreign nationality.

Further orders pending concerning the extension of expulsion measures to foreign Jews.

Evacuation now to be carried out without delay.

[Signed] LUTHER

[Stamp]

Leave Space for Telegram Control

4. Draft express letter from the Foreign Office to the Reich Main Security Office, with various initials, dated in late July 1942

Draft Regarding D III 558 g.

Express letter

1. To Reich Security Main Office—IV B 4—

Attention: SS Lieutenant Colonel Eichmann

Berlin W 62

Kurfuerstenstr. 116.

Concerning Express letter of 22 of last month

IV B 4a—3233/41 Secret (1085).

State Secretary [initial] W [WEIZSAECKER] 29

Under State Secretary [initial] W [WOERMANN]

Chief Political Division

Under State Secretary

Germany Div. [Illegible initials]

27 July

Ref.: Legation Counsellor Klingenfuss

In principle the Foreign Office has no objection to the planned deportation of the given number of Jews from the occupied territory in France, the Netherlands, and Belgium for labor at the Auschwitz camp. In view of the psychological effect, I should like to request that first of all the stateless Jews be deported, thus including to a large extent the number of foreign Jews who had emigrated to the West. There are nearly 25,000 of these Jews in the Netherlands alone. For the same reason the Military Administration in Brussels [crossed out: “intends”] select first only Polish, Czech, Russian, and other Jews [crossed out: “while it (the Brussels Military Administration) has doubts as to include Belgian Jews, the Foreign Office does not share these doubts”].

[Handwritten marginal note] Will, as far as known here.

Jews of Hungarian and Rumanian nationality can be deported; however, it is requested that care be taken to secure all property in each case.

By ORDER:

[Signed] LUTHER 26 July

2. WV.

[Initial] R [RADEMACHER] 27 July

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 233–236, Doc. NG-183.

134. LETTER TO HIMMLER REGARDING STERILIZATION, AUGUST 24, 1942

The issue of sterilizing millions of Jews and others considered of inferior races was seen as critical in the planning by the Nazis for the Final Solution. This letter, sent by SS-Oberführer Gund to Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader (Reichsführer) of the SS (the Schutzstaffel), suggests a means of sterilization that Gund thinks could prove to be far more effective and easier to administer than previously considered methods. His recommendation is injection of caladium extract. Gund makes two observations of note. First, the efficacy of this method of sterilization has been successful in animals but has not been proven in humans. To that end, Gund requests that human experiments be performed. Second, Gund observes that “old cults and . . . their priests . . . of primitive, primeval populations," may have extensive knowledge about this subject and suggests that this be researched as part of the ongoing effort to identify the best method of sterilization.

LETTER FROM GUND TO HIMMLER, CONCERNING RESEARCH IN MEDICAL STERILIZATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF STERILIZATION DRUGS, 24 AUGUST 1942

Secret

The Deputy Gauleiter of Lower Danube [Lower Austria]

Vienna, 9, Wasagasse 10, 24 August 1942
Ge/Schd-310/42 g

To: The Reich Leader SS Pg. Heinrich Himmler
Berlin SW, Prinz Albrecht Strasse 8

Sir,

At the orders of Gauleiter Dr. Jury, his staff have hitherto busied themselves especially with the problems of population, racial policy, and antisocial elements. Since the prevention of reproduction by the congenitally unfit and racially inferior belongs to the duties of our National Socialist racial and demographic policy, the present Director of the District Office for Racial Policy, Gauhauptstellenleiter Dr. Fehringer, has examined the question of sterilization and found that the methods so far available, castration and sterilization, are not sufficient in themselves to meet expectations. Consequently, the obvious question occurred to him whether impotence and sterility could not be produced in both men and women by the administration of medicine or injections. So he came to the studies of the Biological Institute of Dr. Madaus, in Dresden-Radebeul, on animal experiments for medical sterilization, which became accessible to him through the Madaus Annual Report, IVth year, 1940, and are of the greatest interest for our demographic policy. Madaus and Koch found that caladium sequinum used in homeopathic doses, that is, administered in infinitesimal quantities, favorably affects impotence, sterility, and frigidity (sexual indifference), so that clinical and medical research should not proceed without regard to this fact. It was established by an extensive series of experiments on rats, rabbits, and dogs that, as the result of the administration or injection of caladium extract, male animals became impotent and females barren, and the differences in effect of the various methods of applying the drug could be seen. From the animal experiments, it seems that a permanent sterility is liable to result in male animals and a more temporary one in females.

It is clear that these observations could be of tremendous importance if alterations of potency or fecundity could also be successfully brought about in human beings by the administration of a caladium extract. Research on human beings themselves would, of course, be necessary for this. The director of my race policy office points out that the necessary research and human experiments could be undertaken by an appropriately selected medical staff, basing their work on the Madaus animal experiments in cooperation with the pharmacological institute of the Faculty of Medicine of Vienna, on the persons of the inmates of the gypsy camp of Lackenbach in Lower Danube.

It is quite clear that such research must be handled as a nationally important secret matter of the most dangerous character, because enemy propaganda could work tremendous harm all over the world by the knowledge of such research, should it come by such knowledge.

Since these considerations are only a theory, the fundamental accuracy of which has already been established by animal experiments and the possibility of the application of which to human beings is highly probable, a mere indication only can be given of the prospects of the possibility of the sterilization of practically unlimited numbers of people in the shortest time and in the simplest way conceivable.

In this connection, I may perhaps point out that it would surely be worth while to study the old cults and the knowledge of their priests concerning the promotion and prevention of human potency and fecundity. Primitive, primeval populations which are close to nature had, and still have, a very extensive knowledge of this subject without these things being known to science. It is known, for instance, that the natives of South America attempted to destroy the potency of their enemies by administering caladium sequinum to them.

I should be particularly grateful to you if you would give me your opinion in this respect when the occasion arises, or even order a concrete working plan to be submitted to you. Gauleiter Dr. Jury would personally have approached you with this plan were he not at present away on a vacation.

Heil Hitler !
Yours faithfully,
[Signed] K. GUND
SS Oberfuehrer

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. I, pp. 717–719, Doc. NO-039.

135. DEPORTATIONS: AFFIDAVIT OF JULY 24, 1946, OF DR. DAVID WAJNAPEL DESCRIBING THE ROLE OF THE SS IN DEPORTATIONS AND EXTERMINATION CAMPS, AUGUST 1942–JULY 1944

Radom, in central Poland, was located in the General Government (Generalgouvernement), that portion of German-occupied Poland that was not incorporated into Germany. David Wajnapel, a Jewish doctor in Radom, gave this affidavit describing what happened when the Germans—specifically, the police and SS authorities—entered and occupied the city. He describes the beatings that he and other Jews suffered simply as a result of walking down a street. All Jewish children up to age 12, the elderly, the sick, and the hospitalized were shot. Wajnapel speaks of the deportations to Treblinka from two ghettos that were established in Radom and describes what happened to him and how he was able to escape from Auschwitz during a death march near the end of the war. However, the main theme that runs throughout Wajnapel's affidavit is the role of the SS (Schutzstaffel), the elite of the German security forces. That role was one of unremitting beatings, shootings, and the organization of the vicious roundups associated with various deportations. More than anything else, this affidavit is an indictment of the SS and their role in the Final Solution in Radom.

RECORD OF A STATEMENT OF THE WITNESS

Dr David Wajnapel taken down on the 24.7.1946 in Nurnburg by the Public Prosecutor and member of the Central Committee for the Examination of German Crimes in Poland, Dr Stanislaw Piotrowski

By virtue of the regulations of Polish Law, the witness was informed about the responsibility for untrue statements and was sworn in.

Christian name and Surname:	David Wajnapel
Age:	39 years.
Place of birth:	Radom (Poland)
Profession:	Physician
Religion:	Jewish
Address:	Stuttgart, Reinsburgstr. 193
Relationship to parties:	None

The witness states as follows:

A few weeks after the entry of the German troops into Radom, police and SS authorities arrived. At the very moment of their arrival, the conditions became immediately worse. The house in the Heromskist where their headquarters was, became a menace to the entire population. People who were walking in this street were dragged into the gateway, and illtreated by merciless beatings and by the staging of sadistic games. All members of the SS, officers as well as other ranks, took part in this. Being a physician, I often had the opportunity to give medical help to seriously injured victims of the SS.

After a short time, the SS uniform became a menace to the population. I myself was beaten up till I bled by four SS other ranks in the street in spite of my doctor's armet. Later on two ghettos were established in Radom. In August 1942 the so-called "deportation" took place. The ghettos were surrounded by many SS units who occupied all the street exits. People were driven out to the streets and those who ran were fired at. Sick people at home or in hospitals were shot on the spot, among others also the sick people who were in the hospital where I was working as a doctor. The total number of people killed amounted to about 4,000. About 3,000 people were spared and the rest—about 20,000 people—were sent to Treblinka. The whole action was directed and executed by the SS. I myself saw that the SS staff were on the spot forming a group and issuing orders. In the streets and in the houses SS men illtreated and killed people without waiting for orders. After the "deportation," the remaining group of people were massed in a few narrow lanes and we came under the exclusive rule of the SS and became the private property of the SS who used to hire us out for payment to various firms. I know that these payments were credited to a special SS account at the Radom Bank Emisyjny. We were visited by SS men only. Executions carried out by the SS in the Ghetto itself were a frequent occurrence. On 14 January 1943 another "deportation" to Treblinka took place. On 21 March 1943 in the whole district there took place the so-called action against the intelligentsia which action, as I know, was decided upon in an SS and Police Fuehrer's meeting in Radom. In Radom alone about 200 people were shot at that time; among others my parents, my brother and his 9 months old child met their death. On 9 November of the same year all Jewish children up to 12 years of age as well as the old and sick were gathered from Radom and from camps situated near Radom and shot in the Biala Street in Radom. Both SS officers and other ranks participated in this. From March 1943 I stayed 18 months in Blizyn camp. The camp was entirely under the SS and the Radom Police Chief's control. Its commandant was Untersturmfuehrer Paul Nell, the guards were composed of SS privates and NCOs. The foremen were Waffen SS men who had been wounded at the front. Both behaved in an inhuman manner by beating and illtreating us. Shootings of people were frequent occurrences. Originally sentences were passed by the SS and Police Fuehrer, later on by the camp commandant. The SS other ranks knew very well about the bloody deeds which were committed by the SS in Poland, in particular they told me personally about mass murders of Jews on Maidanek (Nov. 1943). This fact was no secret; it was common knowledge among the civil population as well as among the lowest ranking SS men. When the camp was taken over by the Maidanek concentration camp, new guards were sent to our camp, but there was no difference between them and the previous ones. In July 1944 the whole camp including myself was sent to Auschwitz camp, which could be entered only by SS men. The conditions of this camp are well known. I escaped during the evacuation of this camp into Germany. On the way the SS escort machinegunned exhausted prisoners and later on the rest of the marching column (near Rybnik). Several hundred people were killed at that time. When I saw that the situation was hopeless, I fled under fire into a wood, where shortly I was liberated by the Soviet Army.

I emphasize that during the few years of war, being a Jew and a doctor, I met a great number of SS men from Waffen SS as well as other formations and of various ranks, but I must state that I noticed no difference between them as far as their inhuman attitude towards the civilian population was concerned.

Read to me.

[signed] Dr. David Wajnapel

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. Supp. A, pp. 1145–1147, Doc. D-953.

136. MINUTES OF CONFERENCE CONCERNING FURTHER HANDLING OF THE JEWS, OCTOBER 27, 1942

A conference was held in October 1942 to discuss the treatment of Mischlinge, meaning people with one or two Jewish grandparents (those with three or four were considered to be full Jews). It was agreed that persons with two Jewish grandparents (Mischlinge of the first degree) are to be given a choice between deportation or sterilization. (Mischlinge of the second degree—with one Jewish grandparent—“are to be taken as of German blood.”) The way in which the choice was to be framed—that deportation is the more severe option; that sterilization should be viewed as a favor—is discussed, as is the advantage to the government of offering a choice. The second topic is that of the role of divorce in the case of mixed marriages, meaning, in this case, (1) marriages between full Jews and Mischlinge of the first degree; and (2) marriages between pure Germans and pure Jews. In the former, no divorce is to be mandated (they are both considered to be Jewish). As to the latter, divorce is to be made mandatory in the event the pure German does not voluntarily initiate divorce proceedings.

2. Extracts from the minutes of a conference at the Reich Security Main Office on 27 October 1942

To IV B 4—B No. 1456/41 Top Secret (1344)

Top Secret!
First copy

Minutes of Conference

The following persons attended the conference held on 27 October 1942 at the Reich Security Main Office, Referat IV B 4, at which the Final Solution of the Jewish problem was discussed:

Oberregierungsrat Dr. Boley	Reich Chancellery
SS Captain Preusch	Race and Settlement Main Office SS
SS First Lieutenant Harders	Race and Settlement Main Office SS
Referent Dr. Schmid-Burgh	Reich Ministry for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda
Oberlandesgerichtsrat Massfelder	Reich Ministry of Justice
Reichsamtsleiter Kap	Party Chancellery
Regierungsrat Raudies	Party Chancellery
Bereichsleiter Leuschner	Office for Racial Politics of the NSDAP
Oberreg. Rat Dr. Wetzel	Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories

Legation Counsellor Dr. Klingenfuss	Foreign Office
Amtsgerichtsrat Liegener	Plenipotentiary for the Four Year Plan
Reg. Rat Dr. Feldscher	Department I of Reich Ministry of the Interior
Landesoberverwaltungsrat Weirauch	Government of Government General
SS Major Dr. Stier	Reich Commissioner for the Strengthening of Germanism
SS Lieutenant Colonel OR. Dr. Bilfinger	Reich Security Main Office II A
SS Major Reg. Rat Neifeind	Reich Security Main Office II A 2
SS Major Dr. Rodemberg	Reich Security Main Office III A
SS Lieutenant Colonel Eichmann	Reich Security Main Office IV B 4
SS Major Guenther	Reich Security Main Office IV B 4
SS Major Reg. Rat. Suhr	Reich Security Main Office IV B 4
Reg. Rat Hunsche	Reich Security Main Office IV B 4

The discussion showed the following results:

I. Persons of Mixed Blood

a. Persons of mixed blood of the first degree.—At the beginning of the discussion it was said that owing to new knowledge and experience gained in the field of sterilization, it would probably be possible to carry out sterilizations, already during the war, in simpler form and with shorter procedure. In view of that, the suggestion to sterilize all reproductive persons of mixed blood of the first degree, was agreed upon. The sterilization should be on a voluntary basis. But it is the prerequisite for their remaining in the Reich territory, and therefore constitutes a voluntary return service of the person of mixed blood of the first degree for allowing him graciously to remain [gnadenweise Belassung] in Reich territory. Consequently, the person of mixed blood (first degree) is to be given the option to decide either to be deported which, should the occasion arise, would also mean the taking to a “person of mixed blood settlement,” according to results of discussion held on 6 March 1942, or to be sterilized. When giving this choice, it serves a better purpose to depict deportation as the more severe measure in comparison to sterilization. Thus, the aim should be that in the few cases where an exception—generally not provided for—has to be made, the possibility of compulsory sterilization should still exist. For this reason, sterilization is to be considered a gracious favor [gnadenweise Verguenstigung] which will be recognized as such and will lead to the results that the number of applications for exemption from these prescribed measures is likely not be very large. As it can be assumed that almost all persons of mixed blood of the first degree will decide on the lesser evil of sterilization, the endeavored sterilization stands out clearly as the primary choice. Would, on the other hand, on giving the choice, sterilization be depicted as the greater evil, the person of mixed blood of the first degree, to whom the possibility of an exception must be left open after all, despite the directives, would not be subjected to any restrictions apart from those already in existence which, under no circumstances, can be tolerated because the intended sterilization would then be made impossible. Giving the possibility of choice also takes away to a certain degree the semblance of compulsion for the intended measures and, above all, offers the advantage that the creation of a legislative basis for the carrying out of sterilization can perhaps be abandoned, because the person of mixed blood of the first degree has voluntarily consented to be sterilized. In order to prevent serious psychological repercussions, sterilization measures should be carried out without much ado wherever possible and under application of a simplified procedure and code-mark [Tarnungsbezeichnung]. The persons of mixed blood of the first degree are subject with few modifications to restrictions in the Reich territory as before and as laid down previously. Should in single cases persons of mixed blood of the first degree decide on deportation, measures are to be taken to separate them from the opposite sex and to prevent any possibility of procreation.

b. Persons of mixed blood of the second degree.—As the persons of mixed blood of the second degree are to be taken as of German blood without exception, no particular measures are to be taken against them. Certain existing restrictions, in connection with their legal status, will still remain in force.

II. Mixed Marriages

For marriages between persons of mixed blood of the first degree or Jews, no additional divorce possibilities, except those already existing, will be created, because there is no interest for it.

1. Divorce by compulsion.—a. In the case of mixed marriages between pure Germans and pure Jews, a compulsory divorce is to be effected as laid down previously, in case the German blooded marriage partner cannot make up his or her mind, within a given time, to apply for divorce. Compulsory divorce seems appropriate because in view of the Jew being deported a clear legal situation within this field must be created. Exceptions are also forbidden, contrary to the regulation intended up to now, in the case of persons considered as Jews who only possess two racially pure Jewish grandparents on either side or less, because to check such cases would entail too many difficulties and there is no reason to deviate from the legal classification as pure Jew in accordance with Articles 2 and 5 of the First Decree to the Reich Citizen Law dated 14 November 1935 (Reich Legal Gazette I, p. 1333). Unless there is no other decision within the meaning of Article 7 of the mentioned decree, no pure Jew can be exempted from this regulation, even if their legitimate children have already been recognized as equals to persons of German blood or if their recognition can be expected on account of being soldiers as members of the Wehrmacht.

b. At the same time, the possibility must exist for compulsory divorce, as laid down, between persons of mixed blood in the second degree and Jews.

2. Simplified divorce on application.

* * * * *

The above results of this discussion shall, as agreed upon, be forwarded to the appropriate offices for their final attitude which is to be given within 4 weeks at the latest.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 222–225, Doc. NG-2586.

137. AUSCHWITZ MONOWITZ: AFFIDAVIT OF JUNE 3, 1947, OF NORBERT WOLLHEIM CONCERNING AUSCHWITZ MONOWITZ, MARCH 1943–SEPTEMBER 1944

This affidavit, given by Norbert Wollheim, a Jew deported from Berlin to Auschwitz, provides insight into the workings of Auschwitz III, also called Auschwitz Monowitz, the factory camp built by I.G. Farben. There, as a new inmate of the camp, Wollheim was assigned to heavy labor but soon began work as a welder. He observed that “the German IG foremen tried to surpass the SS in brutalities.” Wollheim describes his interaction with approximately 1,200 British prisoners of war who were brought to “I. G. Auschwitz to a special camp next to ours.” He recounts his efforts to make contact with the POWs, and how he and they exchanged information: the English POWs conveyed news from the BBC that came to them by way of a secret receiver; Wollheim translated German Army news bulletins. It was through the English prisoners that he was able to convey information to Switzerland about the conditions that the Jews faced in Auschwitz Monowitz. Finally, Wollheim notes the presence of the plant manager—a man named Duerrfeld—who knew, without a doubt, of the terrible conditions in the plant for the Jews but did nothing to alleviate them.

AFFIDAVIT

I, Norbert Wollheim, presently living at Wakenitzerstrasse 34 b, Luebeck, having been informed that I shall be subject to punishment if I make a false statement, herewith testify under oath voluntarily and without duress:

1. On 8 March 1943, my wife, myself, and my son, age 3, were arrested by the SS in Berlin during the last big anti-Jewish drive. After spending several days in the collecting camp Grasse Hamburgerstrasse I was transported to the concentration camp Auschwitz, together with my family. On arriving at the station at Auschwitz, I was separated from my wife and child and have not seen them since.

The whole transport from Berlin consisted of about 1,000 people; about 220 men, mostly young men capable of working, were sorted out and sent to concentration camp Monowitz in trucks from the station in Auschwitz.

2. In camp Monowitz we were met by the SS, the camp elder [Lageraelteste] and several block elders, and taken to a washing hut. In front of the washing hut we were lined up in fives and then allowed to enter in groups. On entering the hut, all valuables had to be thrown into a suitcase standing there and guarded by the SS. After that we were forced to hand in all our civilian clothes, except the shoes, and our personal papers. Our heads were shaved then. After that we were taken to the collective bath and disinfected. Only during that process did we hear from other inmates who had been there longer that we were in the concentration camp Auschwitz, which was part of an IG plant. If we wanted to survive we would have to be prepared to do the heavy work required from us by the I.G. Farben.

3. Concentration camp Monowitz consisted of approximately 20 barracks at the time when I arrived there in March 1943. As I found later, they were all quite full. Hardly any inmate had a bed of his own. The total of inmates at that time was about 3,000 prisoners. We went to work for the first time in the IG plant already the day after we arrived, having all been registered and tattooed. My own prison number is 107,984.

The plant, at that time, was still in the stage of construction. There were scarcely any streets. The building, except for those in which the directors and senior foremen worked, were mostly unfinished. As initiation, as was the general rule, we were given only the hardest and most strenuous work, such as transportation and excavating work. I came to the dreaded "murder detail 4," whose task it was to unload cement bags or constructional steel. We had to unload the cement from the arriving freight cars all day long at a running pace. Prisoners who broke down were beaten by the German IG foremen as well as by the kapos until they either resumed their work or were left there dead. I saw such cases myself. I also remember seeing a Dutch prisoner commit suicide by throwing himself in front of a moving train before the eyes of the German IG foremen during the first day there.

I also noticed repeatedly, particularly during the time when the SS accompanied our labor unit themselves, that the German IG foremen tried to surpass the SS in brutalities. It also happened that German IG foremen incited the kapos to take the good shoes from the new arrivals and keep them for themselves. It was also a rule that the inmates had no working safeguards, for example iron had to be moved without the proper leather for the purpose, bricks had to be loaded without any suitable protection for the hands, et cetera.

I also remember well that German IG foremen, even on days when it froze, made the kapos order the prisoners to take off their coats (if they had any) in order to speed up the work.

I myself was sent to a skilled labor unit as a welder in the summer, 1943. It was a common practice to give the prisoners the dirtiest and most dangerous tasks, although all the time we worked there we had hardly any protective equipment.

Examples: As welder I had to work for months without any welding goggles, until I finally managed to "organize" a pair for myself. The prisoners who were E-welders did not get any milk while the German E-welders were given milk. The German IG foremen who were the immediate supervisors knew perfectly well about all these things. The IG inspectors, who made regular inspections of the entire site of the I. G. Farben, knew these things. We were particularly afraid of these inspectors because we knew them to be fanatical Nazis who used every occasion of unsatisfactory work to make a report to the office of the SS command post (SS Scharfuhrer [Staff Sergeant] Rackers).

4. In September 1943, after the armistice was signed between Badoglio and the Allies, approximately 1,200 British PWs, who had been (in captivity) in Italy before, were brought to the I. G. Auschwitz to a special camp next to ours via the Stalag [base camp] Lambsdorff and were assigned to work in the buna plant. The prisoners had taken part in the African campaign and most of them had been captured at the capitulation of Tobruk. During the days of Italy's capitulation, a few had managed to get through to the Allies: the rest was taken to Germany by the German Wehrmacht. We were strictly forbidden to have any contact with the English PWs. At the beginning of October 1943, I managed for the first time to contact a group of English PWs, thanks to my knowledge of the English language. In spite of the strict regulations against it, this was possible—with the exercise of sufficient caution—because at that time the SS guards were only stationed around the plant itself. The PWs openly confessed their sympathy for us. I later found from the conversation that most of them were skilled workers by trade and had been assigned to the armament plant buna against their will and therefore in violation of the Geneva Convention. They worked on assembly, production of methanol, et cetera. The contact between the PWs and myself became closer in time and towards the end it was a personal friendship. When for technical reasons, it became necessary for the PWs and concentration-camp prisoners to work together in technical departments, it was possible to exchange news and information regularly. That way the PWs were able to keep me informed daily of the BBC news from London, for they had a secret receiving set in their barracks, and I, on my part, translated for them the German Army news bulletins [Wehrmacht communiques] I heard. I received newspapers from several German foremen of the Mannesmann tube factory in Berlin, who were favorably disposed toward me. Their views leaned mostly towards socialism and democracy, as I noticed when working with them. With these foremen and the English PWs I also constantly exchanged all the news which I myself was able to report about the life in the camp, such as our poor living conditions, our poor clothes, selections which had been made, or individual executions.

I knew from my relations with the English PWs that illegal connections existed between their main camp Lambsdorff and Switzerland, and it was the objective of my circle of friends, which included, for example, the chief of the political department in Monowitz, the present Oberlandespraesident

Unikower, to report all news to other countries which might inform them about our position. One of the main reasons for this was because most of us did not expect to survive the end of the war.

The English PWs purposely showed passive resistance in their work, although the German foremen often tried to drive them to work faster. They offered such resistance, although they knew that nearly all German foremen carried weapons. I know that during an argument between a German foreman and a PW, the prisoner was shot after a short argument.

5. The name Duerrfeld was well known to the concentration camp prisoners as the name of the plant manager. He was seen occasionally during inspection visits in the IG plant, sometimes also when we marched into the camp. I myself saw him at least three times next to SS 1st Lieutenant [Obersturmfuehrer] Schoettl at the block leader's house watching the marching. On such occasions, he had the best opportunity to see the state of health in which we were and the obviously dilapidated condition of our clothing. On almost every occasion when we marched in, people who had fallen ill and those who had broken down during work, as well as people who had died, were carried into the camp on primitive stretchers, so he must have become aware of this situation.

Duerrfeld is the man who caused orders to be given to the German foremen to drive the concentration camp prisoners to the greatest possible work output. Through my friend Paul Simon from Bruenn [Brno] (prisoner's number 135,322) who, as manager of the chemical works camp had connections with Duerrfeld's secretariate (central building 820) through a woman of German race [Volksdeutsche] from Czechoslovakia, I learned that such orders were issued in two cases. The first time was in the summer 1943; the second time was at the beginning of September 1944 in connection with the psychological results of military operations in the Vistula River area. In these orders, the German foremen were directly asked to make a report at once to the SS headquarters if they observed any case of idleness, or negligence of work. Duerrfeld knew that such reports would mean the severest punishment, even death, for the prisoner concerned.

I have carefully read every one of the four pages of this affidavit and signed them myself. I have made the necessary corrections in my own handwriting and signed them with my initials and herewith testify under oath that I have told the full truth in this affidavit to the best of my knowledge and belief.

[Signed] NORBERT WOLLHEIM

Sworn to and signed before me this 3d day of June 1947 at Hamburg by Norbert Wollheim, Luebeck, Wakenitzerstr. 34 b, known to me to be the person making the above affidavit.

[Signed] BENVENUTO VON HALLE

U.S. Civilian AGO No. 432532

Office of Chief of Counsel for War Crimes, U.S. War Department.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. VIII, pp. 589–592, Doc. NI-9807.

138. EXCERPTS FROM HIMMLER'S SUMMATION, OCTOBER 4, 1943

In October 1943, Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader (Reichsfuehrer) of the SS (the Schutzstaffel), delivered a three-hour speech to SS officers. The excerpts below include Himmler's comments on the situation in the fifth year of the war, the Russian leadership, foreigners in the Reich, the evacuation of the Jews, the principle of selection, and the future. While each section provides insights, a common theme throughout Himmler's words is that the only people who matter are Germans. He says that the SS men must be honest, decent, and loyal, but only "to members of our own blood." Elsewhere: "it is a crime against our own blood to worry about" others. Himmler also speaks of "the extermination of the Jewish race" without resort to euphemisms to hide Nazi intent. He affirms the law of social Darwinism, explaining that "whatever wins through in the battle of life . . . that is what is good." The speech ends with these words: "We want to be worthy of being permitted to be the first SS men of the Fuehrer Adolf Hitler. . . . Now let us remember the Fuehrer Adolf Hitler who will create the Germanic Reich and will lead us into the Germanic future."

EXTRACTS FROM THE SPEECH OF HIMMLER AT A POZNAN MEETING OF SS MAJOR GENERALS, 4 OCTOBER 1943, CONCERNING THE ROLE OF GERMANY AND GERMAN BLOOD IN HISTORY, UTILIZATION OF OTHER NATIONALITIES FOR GERMANY'S PURPOSES, EXTERMINATION OF THE JEWISH RACE, ROLE OF THE SS, AND RELATED MATTER

Speech of the Reich Leader SS at the meeting of the SS Major Generals at Poznan, 4 October 1943

The Situation in the Fifth Year of War

I have considered it necessary, now at the beginning of the fifth year of war, to call you, the high leader corps of the SS and Police together. Sober as we always were, truthful toward ourselves, we will discuss several matters in this troop leader meeting [Truppenfuehrerbesprechung]. Just as I was accustomed to do during long years of peace, I will give you my opinion of the situation, as I see it, about our tasks, about what we have done and achieved, as well as about what the future holds for us, as briefly as possible.

The Russian Leadership

The 1941 attack.—In 1941 the Fuehrer attacked Russia. That was, as we can well see now, shortly—perhaps 3 to 6 months—before Stalin prepared to embark on his great penetration into central and western Europe. I can give a picture of this first year in a few words. The attacking forces cut their way through. The Russian Army was herded together in great pockets, ground down, taken prisoner. At that time we did not value the mass of humanity as we value it today, as raw material, as labor. What after all, thinking in terms of generations, is not to be regretted but is now deplorable by reason of the loss of labor, is that the prisoners died, in tens and hundreds of thousands, of exhaustion and hunger.

One basic principle must be the absolute rule for the SS men—we must be honest, decent, loyal, and comradely to members of our own blood and, to nobody else. What happens to a Russian, or to a Czech does not interest me in the slightest. What the nations can offer in the way of good blood of our type we will take, if necessary by kidnapping their children and raising them here with us. Whether nations live in prosperity or starve to death interests me only so far as we need them as slaves for our culture; otherwise, it is of no interest to me. Whether 10,000 Russian females fall down from exhaustion while digging an antitank ditch interests me only so far as the antitank ditch for Germany is finished. We shall never be rough and heartless when it is not necessary, that is clear. We Germans, who are the only people in the world who have a decent attitude toward animals, will also assume a decent attitude toward these human animals. But it is a crime against our own blood to worry about them and give them ideals, thus causing our sons and grandsons to have a more difficult time with them. When somebody comes to me and says: “I cannot dig the antitank ditch with women and children, it is inhuman, for it would kill them,” then I have to say, “You are a murderer of your own blood because if the antitank ditch is not dug, German soldiers will die, and they are sons of German mothers. They are our own blood.” That is what I want to instill into this SS—and what I believe have instilled into them—as one of the most sacred laws of the future. Our concern, our duty is our people and our blood. It is for them that we must provide and plan, work and fight, nothing else. We can be indifferent to everything else. I wish the SS to adopt this attitude to the problem of all foreign, non-Germanic peoples, especially Russians. All else is vain, fraud against our own nation, and an obstacle to the early winning of the war.

Foreigners in the Reich

We must also realize that we have 6 to 7 million foreigners in Germany. Perhaps it is even 8 million now. We have prisoners in Germany. None of them are dangerous so long as we take severe measures at the merest trifles. It is a mere nothing today to shoot 10 Poles, compared with the fact that we might later have to shoot tens of thousands in their place and compared to the fact that the shooting of these tens of thousands would then be carried out even at the cost of German blood. Every little fire will immediately be stamped out and quenched, and extinguished—otherwise—as in the case of a real fire—a political and psychological surface fire may spring up among the people.

The Evacuation of the Jews

I also want to talk to you, quite frankly, on a very grave matter. Among ourselves it should be mentioned quite frankly, and yet we will never speak of it publicly. Just as we did not hesitate on 30 June 1934 to do the duty we were bidden and stand comrades who had lapsed up against the wall and shoot them, so we have never spoken about it and will never speak of it. It was that tact which is a matter of course and which I am glad to say, is inherent in us, that made us never discuss it among ourselves, never speak of it. It appalled everyone, and yet everyone was certain that he would do it the next time if such orders are issued and if it is necessary.

I mean the evacuation of the Jews, the extermination of the Jewish race. It's one of those things it is easy to talk about, "The Jewish race is being exterminated," says one Party Member, "that's quite clear, it's in our program—elimination of the Jews and we're doing it, exterminating them." And then they come, 80 million worthy Germans, and each one has his decent Jew. Of course the others are vermin, but this one is an A-1 Jew. Not one of all those who talk this way has watched it, not one of them has gone through it. Most of you must know what it means when 100 corpses are lying side by side, or 500, or 1,000. To have stuck it out and at the same time—apart from exceptions caused by human weakness—to have remained decent fellows, that is what has made us hard. This is a page of glory in our history which has never been written and is never to be written, for we know how difficult we should have made it for ourselves, if with the bombing raids, the burdens and the deprivations of war we still had Jews today in every town as secret saboteurs, agitators, and troublemongers. We would now probably have reached the 1916–1917 stage when the Jews were still in the German national body.

We have taken from them what wealth they had. I have issued a strict order, which SS Lieutenant General Pohl has carried out, that this wealth should, as a matter of course, be handed over to the Reich without reserve. We have taken none of it for ourselves. Individual men who have lapsed will be punished in accordance with an order I issued at the beginning which gave this warning; whoever takes so much as a mark of it is a dead man. A number of SS men—there are not very many of them—have fallen short, and they will die without mercy. We had the moral right, we had the duty to our people, to destroy this people which wanted to destroy us. But we have not the right to enrich ourselves with so much as a fur, a watch, a mark, or a cigarette, or anything else. Because we have exterminated a germ, we do not want in the end to be infected by the germ and die of it. I will not see so much as a small area of sepsis appear here or gain a hold. Wherever it may form, we will cauterize it. Altogether however, we can say that we have fulfilled this most difficult duty for the love of our people. And our spirit, our soul, our character has not suffered injury from it.

The Principle of Selection

We are a product of the law of selection. We have made our choice from a cross-section of our people. This people came into being aeons ago, through generations, and centuries, by the throw of the dice of fate and of history. Alien peoples have swept over this people and left their heritage behind them. Alien blood streams have flowed into this people, but it has, nevertheless in spite of horrible hardships and terrible blows of fate, still had strength in the very essence of its blood to win through. Thus, this whole people is saturated with and held together by Nordic—Phalial—Germanic blood, so that after all one could and can still speak of a German people. From this people of such varied hereditary tendencies as it emerged from the collapse after the years of the battle of liberation, we have now consciously tried to select the Nordo-Germanic blood, for we could best expect this section of our blood to contain the creative, heroic, and life preserving qualities of our people. We have gone partly by outward appearances and for the rest have kept these outward appearances in review by making constantly new demands, and by repeated tests both physical and mental, both of the character and the soul. Again and again we have sifted out and cast aside what was worthless, what did not suit us. Just as long as we have strength to do, thus will this organization [Orden] remain healthy. The moment we forget the law which is the foundation of our race and the law of selection and austerity toward ourselves, we shall have the germ of death in us and will perish, just as every human organization, every blossom in this world, does some time perish. It must be our endeavor, our inner law, to make this blossoming and fructifying last for our people as long as possible, bringing as much prosperity as possible and—don't be alarmed—if possible for thousands of years. That is why, wherever we meet and whatever we do, we must be mindful of our principle—blood, selection, and austerity. The law of nature is just this—What is hard is good, what is vigorous is good; whatever wins through in the battle of life, physically, purposefully, and spiritually, that is what is good—always taking the long view. Of course sometime—and this has happened often in history—someone can get to the top by deceit and cheating. That makes no difference to nature, to the fate of the earth, or to the fate of the world. Really, that is nature. Fate removes the impostor after a time—time not reckoned in generations of man but in historical periods. It must be our endeavor never to deceive ourselves but always to remain genuine, that is what we must continually preach and instill into ourselves, and into every boy and each one of our subordinates.

The Future

When the war is won—then, as I have already told you, our work will start. We do not know when the war will end. It may be sudden, or it may be long delayed. We shall see. But I say to you now, if an armistice and peace comes suddenly, let no one think that he can then sleep the sleep of the just. Get all your commanders, chiefs, and SS Fuehrers attuned to this; only then, gentlemen, shall we be awake, for then, so many others will fall into this sleep. I am going so to rouse the whole SS, and keep it so wide awake that we can tackle reconstruction in Germany immediately. Then Germanic work will be begun immediately in the General SS, for then the harvest will be ripe to be taken into the granary. We shall then call up age groups there by law. We shall then immediately put all our Waffen SS units into excellent form, both as regards equipment and training. We shall go on working in this first 6 months after the war, as though the big offensive were starting on the next day. It will make all the difference, if Germany has an operative reserve, an operative backing, at the peace or armistice negotiations, of 20, 25, or 30 SS divisions intact.

If the peace is a final one, we shall be able to tackle our great work of the future. We shall colonize. We shall indoctrinate our boys with the laws of the SS organization. I consider it to be absolutely necessary to the life of our peoples, that we should not only impart the meaning of ancestry, grandchildren, and future, but feel these to be a part of our being. Without there being any talk about it, without our needing to make use of rewards and similar material things, it must be a matter of course that we have children. It must be a matter of course that the most copious breeding should be from this racial superstratum of the Germanic people. In 20 to 30 years we must really be able to present the whole of Europe with its leading class. If the SS, together with the farmers—we together with our friend Backe, then run the colony in the East on a grand scale, without any restraint, without any question about any kind of tradition, but with nerve and revolutionary impetus, we shall in 20 years push the national boundary [Volkstumsgrenze] 500 kilometers eastward.

I requested of the Fuehrer already today, that the SS—if we have fulfilled our task and our duty by the end of the war—should have the privilege of holding Germany's eastern-most frontier as a defense frontier. I believe this is the only privilege for which we have no competitors. I believe not one person will dispute our claim to this privilege. We shall be in a position there to train every young age group in the use of arms. We shall impose our laws on the East. We will charge ahead and push our way forward little by little to the Urals. I hope that our generation will successfully bring it about that every age group has fought in the East, and that every one of our divisions spends a winter in the East every second or third year. Then we shall never grow soft, then we shall never get SS members who only come to us because it is distinguished or because the black coat will naturally be very attractive in peacetime. Everyone will know that “if I join the SS, there is the possibility that I might be killed.” He has contracted in writing that every second year he will not dance in Berlin, attend the carnival in Munich, but that he will be posted to the Eastern Frontier in an ice-cold winter. Then we will have a healthy elite for all time. Thus, we will create the necessary conditions for the whole Germanic people and the whole of Europe: controlled, ordered, and led by us, the Germanic people, to be able in generations to stand the test in her battles of destiny against Asia which will certainly break out again. We do not know when that will be.

Then, when the mass of humanity of one to one and one-half billions line up against us, the Germanic people numbering, I hope, 250 to 300 millions and the other European peoples making a total of 600 to 700 millions (and with an outpost area stretching as far as the Urals or a hundred miles beyond the Urals) must stand the test in its vital struggle against Asia. It would be an evil day if the Germanic people did not survive it. It would be the end of beauty and culture, of the creative power of this earth. That is the distant future. It is for that we are fighting, pledged to hand down the heritage of our ancestors.

We see into the distant future because we know what it will be. That is why we are doing our duty more fanatically than ever, more devoutly than ever, more bravely, more obediently, and more thoroughly than ever. We want to be worthy of being permitted to be the first SS men of the Fuehrer Adolf Hitler in the long history of the Germanic people which stretches before us.

Now let us remember the Fuehrer Adolf Hitler who will create the Germanic Reich and will lead us into the Germanic future.

Our Fuehrer, Adolf Hitler, Sieg Heil, Sieg Heil, Sieg Heil.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 318–327, Doc. 1919-PS.

139. AUSCHWITZ: AFFIDAVIT OF JULY 24, 1947, OF CHARLES J. COWARD REGARDING TREATMENT OF BRITISH PRISONERS OF WAR, TREATMENT OF INMATES, AND I.G. FARBEN AT AUSCHWITZ, DECEMBER 1943

The affidavit given here by Charles J. Coward, a British prisoner of war, provides insights into British POWs, Auschwitz III, also called Auschwitz Monowitz, the factory camp built by I.G. Farben, and the treatment of Jews in that camp. Learning of a British ship's doctor who was Jewish and being held in the Monowitz camp with other Jews, not with the British POWs, Coward snuck into the Jewish camp, where he saw the terrible conditions that prevailed there. He recognized that the conditions under which the British POWs lived "could not be considered even in the same class with the treatment of the other groups, particularly the concentration camp inmates and the Russians." He learned that gas chambers were killing thousands of Jews a day and soon realized that the civilian population at Auschwitz as well as I.G. Farben employees knew of the gassing. Admitting that "British prisoners of war were treated better than any other nationality working at IG Auschwitz," Coward notes several instances where even they were subject to abuse and shootings. Not just the Nazis but "civilian employees of the Farben firm beat six inmates while they were working in the factory while three or four other civilians looked on."

a. AFFIDAVIT

I, Charles Joseph Coward, 133 Chichester Road, Lower Edmonton, London, herewith declare under oath the following facts:

1. I entered the British Army on 16 June 1937. I was captured on 25 May 1940, serving at that time with the 8th Reserve Regimental Royal Artillery. My rank was that of Battery Sergeant. After having gone through different Stalag camps, I arrived in Auschwitz in December 1943. Auschwitz was under the supervision of Stalag No. VIII B. The camp at Auschwitz at which we lived was E 715. It was one of the camps grouped around the I. G. Farben plant at Auschwitz.

At the time when I came to Auschwitz, about 1,200 British prisoners of war were working for I. G. Farben. Toward the end of 1943, our camp held 1,400 British prisoners of war. At the beginning of 1944, British prisoners were sent to Heydebreck and Blochhammer and about 600 British prisoners of war remained at Auschwitz.

2. The concentration camp was on IG grounds just across the road from us—not 320 yards. I could look into the camp; I could hear screams as I walked past. However, although I could see the camp, I very rarely saw anybody walking around in it. We could hear shootings taking place, sometimes 5 or 6 a week. The shots coming from the camp sounded as close as if they had come from our own camp and would wake us up.

Often the British lads would throw cigarettes or other things over to the inmates. The inmates knew that if they attempted to leave their work and pick up what was thrown, they would get at the very least a good hiding. On one occasion I recall seeing one of our boys toss something over to one of the inmates and as the inmates stooped to pick it up, a big, stout foreman pulled his revolver and shot him.

3. Having been selected by the Chief Red Cross Trustee, Regimental Major Lowe, for the position of Red Cross Trustee for our group, I was able to move about without too much difficulty. My functions as trustee included all matters relating to the welfare of the British prisoners of war such as the issue of clothing for the International Red Cross, British and American Red Cross, and the distribution of food parcels.

One day one of the inmates told me that there was a British ship's doctor among the inmates in the IG concentration camp. He said that the ship on which the doctor had been was torpedoed and the doctor, being a Jew, was separated from the others who were captured by the Germans and brought to the concentration camp. The doctor was not permitted out on work details, but he had managed through this inmate to get a note to me, asking me to write to his sister or daughter in Sunderland, England, and to notify the authorities. I wanted to get in touch with this ship's doctor and arranged with one of the guards, for some cigarettes, to let me swap clothing with one of the inmates and to march into the camp with the inmates. At 6: 00 in the evening I dirtied myself and fell in with the inmates and marched into the concentration camp itself. We went straight away to a sort of a wash room and from there into the barracks. We were not allowed to walk around. There I found wooden beds, three tiers high. These beds, which would not have been comfortable even for one person, had to accommodate two or three inmates. As a result, it was practically impossible to sleep since, if one man was in a reclining position, the others would have to sit up or lie over him. I remained in a sitting position the whole night and was dead tired. Each one could get a little sleep if they changed positions; but if the slightest noise was made, the guards would come in. The tiers of beds were lined up and down the whole room. In the middle there were about three tables where they would fight to get their bit of soup. They got their soup in the evening and nothing else. This particular night it was potato soup. We had been counted when we marched out of the factory but were also counted when we came into the camp. When the inmates were counted, the other chaps would hold up the dead for counting purposes. Some were held up the night I was there. One of the reasons they stood the dead men up for roll call was to draw their rations. In the morning the kapos would come around to see that everybody was up and would kick or beat anybody who had not gotten up. Those who could not get up were just carted away.

When we got back to the factory, I swapped back the clothing with the chap whom I had made the exchange and gave him a few cigarettes. I had not succeeded in contacting the ship's doctor who was in a different part of the camp.

4. On the pretext of writing to my father (who was dead), in care of William Orange, I could get out about a half dozen letters a week to let the people in England know what was going on. I figured that I could pass the censors that way, and at the same time get the information to the War Office. In my letters I sent information that I thought had military value and I also wrote about the conditions of work for the civilians and the inmates, as well as the British prisoners of war. I wrote giving the particular dates on which I had witnessed thousands arriving and marched to the concentration camp, I used to inquire of the people in Auschwitz where the next batch was coming from. In my letters I would say that 600 arrived from Czechoslovakia, so many from Poland, et cetera. The turnover was in the hundreds of thousands. You could not count them. The majority of them went into the camp next to us.

5. My work as liaison man and trustee gave me access to surrounding towns, including Auschwitz. Also I came into contact with Farben officials. For example, during the first 10 days I was there, I received complaints from our men about the food and conditions of work. The majority of them were laying cables and their clothing was not really good enough for the work they were doing. Particularly since this was the middle of the winter. I investigated the complaints myself and saw they were justified. I got back to the camp and explained to my chief the necessity for extra supplies, and I also spoke to the Germans and asked to see the directors of I. G. Farben regarding clothing. I was always put off, saying I should see the contractors, and the contractors would say that material had already been ordered.

6. Of course the treatment of the British prisoners could not be considered even in the same class with the treatment of the other groups, particularly the concentration camp inmates and the Russians. With respect to clothing, for example, the concentration camp inmates wore a striped pair of pajamas and wooden shoes; that was all the clothing they had. They would sleep in it, work in it, eat in it; there was no change of clothing. Whatever clothing of value they had when they came to the camp was taken away from them in exchange for the striped pajamas. Although I had heard that conditions were bad, I at first did not believe it. I made it a point to get one of the guards to take me to town under the pretence of buying new razor blades and stuff for our boys. For a few cigarettes he pointed out to me the various places where they had the gas chambers and the places where they took them down to be cremated. Everyone to whom I spoke gave the same story—the people in the city of Auschwitz, the SS men, concentration camp inmates, foreign workers—everyone said that thousands of people were being gassed and cremated at Auschwitz, and that the inmates who worked with us and who were unable to continue working because of their physical condition and were suddenly missing, had been sent to the gas chambers. The inmates who were selected to be gassed went through the procedure of preparing for a bath, they stripped their clothes off, and walked into the bathing room. Instead of showers, there was gas. All the camp knew it. All the civilian population knew it. I mixed with the civilian population at Auschwitz. I was at Auschwitz nearly every day. The population at Auschwitz was fully aware that people were being gassed and burned. On one occasion they complained about the stench of the burning bodies. Of course all of the Farben people knew what was going on. Nobody could live in Auschwitz and work in the plant, or even come down to the plant without knowing what was common knowledge to everybody.

Even among the Farben employees to whom I spoke, a lot of them would admit they knew about the gassing. Others who were pretty scared to say anything would admit that they heard about the gassing but then would say it was all propaganda. I am sure that Duerrfeld who was always walking around the factory knew about the gassings and the burnings. It would be utterly impossible not to know. Everybody knew from the civilians to the top dogs. It was common talk. Even while still at Auschwitz we got radio broadcasts from the outside speaking about the gassings and burnings at Auschwitz. I recall one of these broadcasts was by Anthony Eden himself. Also, there were pamphlets dropped in Auschwitz and the surrounding territory, one of which I personally read, which related what was going on in the camp at Auschwitz. These leaflets were scattered all over the countryside and must have been dropped from planes. They were in Polish and German. Under those circumstances, nobody could be at or near Auschwitz without knowing what was going on.

7. The British prisoners of war were treated better than any other nationality working at IG Auschwitz. Still many incidents occurred which cost the lives of our prisoners of war. One German noncommissioned officer used to threaten to shoot all of us. He would beat British prisoners of war at the I. G. Farben plant or at the camp. At times it happened that IG civilian workers used to beat some of our prisoners.

In the winter of 1943–44, a civilian foreman of I. G. Farben ordered five prisoners of war to climb an ice-covered iron girder. Under the circumstances it was almost impossible to climb the girder, especially since the men did not have the proper boots. The men refused to obey the order. Thereupon the German guard shot and killed one of the five British prisoners of war. Even though, as I mentioned before, the British prisoners of war were treated far better than any of the other groups, nevertheless even the British boys did not have too easy a time. A number of our lads were sent to Sosnovitz to the Straflager [penal camp] for not working hard enough or for refusing to do the work ordered. One British prisoner of war dropped dead from exhaustion while working in the IG factory. On one occasion one of our boys was beaten by a civilian. I went out to work with that group in order to see how they were treated. It was then that I witnessed how the civilians were treating the other inmates. Unlike the British prisoners who were mistreated only occasionally, the inmates were mistreated all the time. They were beaten on the slightest provocation and often without any provocation at all. One time I saw several civilian employees of the Farben firm beat six inmates while they were working in the factory while three or four other civilians looked on. They beat them with pieces of iron and wood for not doing their work properly. They were beaten badly and left to lay on the ground. I complained to the German officer who visited the camp and told him that it was upsetting the morale of the British prisoners of war. He said that the inmates deserved it and that if they did not get beaten, they would be hard to control.

The food distributed to the British prisoners of war at IG Auschwitz would not have been sufficient if it were not for the fact that we consistently received British and American Red Cross parcels.

Another thing I want to mention is that the British prisoners of war were not permitted to use the air raid shelters in the IG plant. I complained to Duerrfeld about this. He was very abrupt and said that a place was being allotted. The place we could use instead of an air-raid shelter was locked so that we would have to get the guard to get us a key before we could get even that protection. The inmates had no air-raid shelters of any kind, and the foreign workers were marched out into the fields.

8. The inmates had to work at everything—refinery, loading railway trucks, acetylene welding, bricklaying and concrete work. I saw them carry 100 wt. cement sacks. The men were in very poor condition but nevertheless they tried to do the work even though it required more strength than they had. They could not slow down because the foreman and the kapo were always around. I saw dozens of occasions on which a civilian foreman kept hitting and hitting an inmate until he just fell down and could not get up. On many, many occasions I saw civilians and kapos strike an inmate down with a piece of wood and then kick him. They would just let him lie there—sometimes all day. At night some other inmate would pick him up and carry him. On a bad winter day, it was not unusual to see 5 or 6 inmates being carried in on the shoulders of other inmates, or being supported under their arms. I saw one inmate knocked out in the morning, and when I came back in the afternoon he was still lying there. I should say he was dead.

9. Farben was responsible for its inmates and could not help knowing what was happening to them. One day I asked the Farben people if it were possible for me to make a collection of castoff clothing such as socks and old boots and send them into the camp. They said “No. The IG people are looking after the inmates. They are our responsibility.” I tried to explain that it would not involve any contact, that I would give the things to their man who, in turn, could distribute them among the other inmates. My suggestion was turned down flatly with the answer that it would look bad if Farben could not supply the necessities.

I have carefully read each of the five pages of this statement and have placed my initials at the bottom of each page thereof. I have made all corrections in my own handwriting and have initialed each such correction. I do hereby declare under oath that the foregoing statement is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God.

[Signed] C. J. COWARD

1284 War Refugee Board Estimate of Jews Gassed in Auschwitz and Birkenau

Sworn to and signed before me this 24th day of July 1947 at London, England

[Signed] Benvenuto von Halle
U.S. Civilian AGO 432532
Interrogator

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. VIII, pp. 603–608, Doc. NI-11696.

140. WAR REFUGEE BOARD ESTIMATE OF JEWS GASSED IN AUSCHWITZ AND BIRKENAU FROM APRIL 1942 TO APRIL 1944, DATED NOVEMBER 1944

The War Refugee Board, tasked with helping victims of Nazi terror, was not established until January 1944. It was created in response to a scathing report sent to President Franklin D. Roosevelt by the U.S. Treasury Department that showed incontrovertibly that the U.S. State Department had intentionally slowed down the rate at which Jewish refugees from Europe were allowed into the United States. In this report, an estimate is given by the board that 1.765 million Jews had been gassed in Auschwitz Birkenau from April 1942 through April 1944. Auschwitz Birkenau, sometimes called Auschwitz II, was the extermination camp within the Auschwitz system of camps and subcamps. Of the total number of people killed, fully 51% (900,000) were from Poland.

EXCERPT FROM A REPORT OF THE WAR REFUGEE BOARD, WASHINGTON, D. C., NOVEMBER 1944, ON GERMAN EXTERMINATION CAMPS—AUSCHWITZ AND BIRKENAU—GIVING AN ESTIMATE OF THE NUMBER OF JEWS GASSED IN BIRKENAU BETWEEN APRIL 1942 AND APRIL 1944

Executive Office of the President
War Refugee Board
Washington, D. C.

German Extermination Camps—
Auschwitz and Birkenau.
(page 33)

Careful estimate of the number of Jews gassed in BIRKENAU between April, 1942 and April, 1944 (according to countries of origin).

Poland (transported by truck)	approximately	300,000
“ “ “ train)	“	600,000
Holland	“	100,000
Greece	“	45,000
France	“	150,000
Belgium	“	50,000
Germany	“	60,000
Yugoslavia, Italy and Norway	“	50,000
Lithuania	“	50,000
Bohemia, Moravia and Austria	“	30,000
Slovakia	“	30,000
Various camps for foreign Jews in Poland	—	300,000
		approximately 1,765,000

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. XXXVII, p. 433, Doc. 022-L.

141. ORDER BY HIMMLER FOR THE COMPLETION OF THE FINAL SOLUTION, JULY 19, 1942

By this single order, Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader SS and chief of the German police, mandated the “resettlement of the entire Jewish population of the Government-General [that portion of German-occupied Poland not incorporated into the Reich] to be carried out and completed by December 31, 1942.” Specifically, this called for the Jews to be gathered in “collections camps in Warsaw, Cracow, Czestochowa, Radom, and Lublin.” Referring to the need for a “total cleansing,” Himmler explains that this is necessary to achieve “ethnic division of races,” which if not attained threatens the “entire sphere of German interest” to exposure to “a source of moral and physical pestilence.”

I herewith order that the resettlement of the entire Jewish population of the Government-General be carried out and completed by December 31, 1942.

From December 31, 1942, no persons of Jewish origin may remain within the Government-General, unless they are in collection camps in Warsaw, Cracow, Czestochowa, Radom, and Lublin. All other work on which Jewish labor is employed must be finished by that date, or, in the event that this is not possible, it must be transferred to one of the collection camps.

These measures are required with a view to the necessary ethnic division of races and peoples for the New Order in Europe, and also in the interests of the security and cleanliness of the German Reich and its sphere of interest. Every breach of this regulation spells a danger to quiet and order in the entire German sphere of interest, a point of application for the resistance movement and a source of moral and physical pestilence.

For all these reasons a total cleansing is necessary and therefore to be carried out. Cases in which the date set can not be observed will be reported to me in time, so that I can see to corrective action at an early date. All requests by other offices for changes or permits for exceptions to be made must be presented to me personally.

Heil Hitler!
H. Himmler

Source: Yitzhak Arad, Yisrael Gutman, Abraham Margalio, eds., Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland and the Soviet Union (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1981), Document no. 124, pp. 275–276. Reproduced by permission of Yad Vashem Publications.

142. AUSCHWITZ: LETTER REGARDING CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS, INCLUDING CREMATORIA, JUNE, 13, 1943

In dealing with the horrors that took place in Auschwitz, it is easy to forget that the camp consisted of buildings that, like all other buildings, require architects' blueprints, general management, subcontractors, delivery of materials, and so forth. This letter from the construction management at Auschwitz to one of the companies working on the structures required for the camp to fulfill its task is like any other demand for work to be done on schedule, lest the winter require the suspension of construction. Although the letter focuses on the contractor's failure to finish carpentry work, the delivery of greatest concern is "the doors . . . for the crematorium I in the prisoner of war camp, which is urgently needed for the execution of the special measures." Companies, knowing full well how and for what purpose their materials and work would be used, nonetheless participated in the process.

LETTER FROM CENTRAL SS CONSTRUCTION MANAGEMENT AUSCHWITZ TO GERMAN EQUIPMENT WORKS (DAW), 13 JUNE 1943, URGING COMPLETION OF CREMATORIUMS I, II, III, IV AND OTHER CARPENTRY WORK

Copy

13 June 1943

21242/43/Er/L.

To the Deutsche Ausruestungswerke G.m.b.H. [DAW German Equipment Works, Ltd.] Auschwitz

Subject: Carrying out of carpentry work for local construction projects.

Reference: Letter of the Central Construction Management of 4

November 1942, Bftgb., 17450/42/Er/L, and repeated personal meetings with SS Ostuf. Wagner and Z. A. Lochner

In our above-quoted letter (copy forwarded to the office W IV) we asked you, following a meeting with SS Obersturmfuehrer Wagner, to complete the carpentry work for the below-mentioned construction as soon as possible, as otherwise the building operations would have to be suspended in winter; in particular—

1. 15 new constructions for prisoners quarters.
2. 4 build-up constructions for prisoners quarters by adding storeys.
3. Temporary Kommandantur [Headquarters].
4. Laundry bunding with reception, delousing plant, and bath for prisoners.
5. Laboratory at Raisko.
6. Grass drying plant at Raisko.
7. Greenhouse plant at Raisko.
8. Crematoriums I and II, prisoner of war camp Auschwitz.
9. Crematoriums III and IV, prisoner of war camp Auschwitz.

The carpentry work, however, had in no case been done proportionate to the completion of the other parts of the construction despite the repeated verbal promises by the management of the Deutsche Ausruestungswerke, Auschwitz plant. In the first place, delivery without delay is requested for the doors (ordered by letter of 26 October 1942 Bftgb. Nr.: 17010/42/Ky/ Pa.) for the crematorium I in the prisoner of war camp, which is urgently needed for the execution of the special measures; otherwise the progress of the construction work would be jeopardized.

Likewise, the completion of windows for the reception building and the doors for 5 huts for the accommodation of prisoners is urgently required for the same reasons. Due to the lack of windows and doors in some of the constructions in progress the building operations had, on account of the now prevailing severe frost, to be suspended thereby causing a delay in the completion of the urgently needed construction for considerable time. Since the central construction management, having transferred its own shop to the Deutsche Ausruestungswerke G.m.b.H., Auschwitz Plant, is no longer in a position to have carpentry work done of their own accord, the Auschwitz plant of the DAW must on its own part, do its best in order to assist the progress of the construction work being done in this place by delivering the carpentry work in time.

Thus, we renew our request to complete and deliver in the first place the carpentry work mentioned above without delay.

Furthermore, the supplementary terms of the agreement for the tender for the prisoners quarters and the laundry building asked for by letter of the Central Construction Department of 9 December 1942, Bftgb. No.: 19708/42/Tei/Lm, are still missing.

The Chief of the Central Construction Management of the Waffen SS and Police Auschwitz
SS Hauptsturmfuehrer

Distribution:

- 1—SS Ustuf. Ertl
- 1—SS Ustuf. Jarisch
- 1—SS Ustuf. Kirschneck
- 1—SS Ustuf. Kywitz
- 1—Filing department (shop orders DAW)

Certified true copy.

[Signed] F. A. TUCHMANN

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. V, pp. 624–625, Doc. NO-4466.

143. AUSCHWITZ: TELEGRAM ON TRANSPORTING JEWS FROM GHETTOS TO AUSCHWITZ, APRIL 23, 1944, 1:30 A.M.

In this telegram to the German Foreign Office, Edmund Veesenmayer, the Reich plenipotentiary in Hungary, reports on the progress made in concentrating Jews from the Romanian/Hungarian areas in ghettos for purposes of their ultimate deportation to Auschwitz. The telegram is dated just one month after Germany's invasion and occupation of Hungary, where the last major Jewish community in Europe not yet deported to extermination camps could be found. Apart from noting the number of Jews being assembled in various locations, Veesenmayer expresses concern about the availability and adequacy of transportation services to complete the movement of the Jews to their death. Of interest is Veesenmayer's assurance that this action will be executed with sensitivity to "war economy requirements."

TELEGRAM FROM DEFENDANT VEESENMAYER TO FOREIGN OFFICE, 23 APRIL 1944, CONCERNING THE CONFINEMENT OF HUNGARIAN JEWS IN GHETTOS AND PREPARATIONS FOR THE DEPORTATION TO AUSCHWITZ OF 3,000 JEWS DAILY

[Stamp] Foreign Office
INL II 764 g
Received 24 April 1944

Telegram
(Teletype, Secret)

Budapest, 23 April 1944, 0130 hours

Received: 23 April 1944, 0800 hours

No. 1022 of 23 April. Secret!

Also for Ambassador Ritter

Reference: Telegraphic report No. (X) 117, of 19 April.

[Handwritten] (X) Inl II 220 top secret

In connection with telegraphic report No. 117, and after having spoken with the competent specialists, I inform you of the following:

The work of putting Jews into ghettos began in the Carpathian area on 16 April. Thus far 150,000 Jews have been affected. The action will probably be completed by the end of next week, approximately 300,000 Jews. The same is already in preparation and is planned to follow immediately in Transylvania and in a number of counties bordering on Rumania. An additional 250,000 to 300,000 Jews are to be dealt with. Subsequently it will be the turn of the counties bordering on Serbia and Croatia, with the final ghetto work to be done in the interior of the country, and its conclusion in Budapest.

Negotiations about transportation have been started. They call for a daily shipment of 3,000 Jews, mainly from the Carpathian area, beginning on 15 May. If transportation facilities permit, there will be later on also simultaneous shipments from other ghettos. Auschwitz is designated as receiving station. Provisions have been made that far reaching consideration will be taken for war economy requirements in the execution of this action. In order not to jeopardize the execution of this action, it appears advisable to delay somewhat the transport of the 50,000 Jewish workers from the Budapest area, whose shipment has been demanded by me and has been agreed on by the government; this will be necessary anyway in view of the existing transportation difficulties. Transport by marching is not practicable, since it entails great difficulties in the questions of feeding, shoes, and guarding. Since the Jewish action is an entity, I deem the above sketched plan correct, and I request wired orders if you have any doubts or special requests.

VEESENMAYER

[Distribution Form]

State Secretary Keppler
 Under State Secretary Political Division
 Ambassador Ritter
 Ambassador Gaus
 Chief Personnel
 Chief Trade Policy Division
 Chief Legal Division
 Chief Cultural Policy Division
 Chief Press Division
 Chief Radio Division
 Chief Protocol
 Dirigent Political Division
 Chief Inland I
 Chief Inland II
 Work copy to Minister Schnurre
 Minister Benzler
 Minister Frohwein
 Minister v. Grundherr
 Senior Legation Counsellor Melcher
 Dr. Megerle

[Stamp]

Work copy!

Register with Inland II

[Handwritten] S. Hungary

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 348–349, Doc. NG-2233.

144. AUSCHWITZ: AFFIDAVIT OF APRIL 5, 1946, OF RUDOLF HOESS REGARDING EXTERMINATION AT AUSCHWITZ, MAY 1940–DECEMBER 1943

Rudolf Hoess (or Höss), who gave this affidavit, was the longest-serving commander of Auschwitz. He is easily confused with Rudolf Hess, who was deputy führer to Adolf Hitler. Hoess is candid beyond all expectations in this affidavit, admitting his role and estimating that approximately 3 million people, mostly Jews, were killed at Auschwitz during his three and a half years of command. He boasted of the improvements he made when constructing and running Auschwitz as compared to the way things were done at Treblinka, another extermination camp. The objective and nonchalant manner of his statement is startling considering that he discusses here, among other things, the selection process, the way the victims were kept unaware that they were headed for a gas chamber, and the fact that medical experiments were performed on prisoners who, as he explained, “had been already condemned to death by the Gestapo.” Hoess was tried for murder by the Supreme National Tribunal in Poland, where a sentence of death was executed on April 16, 1947.

AFFIDAVIT OF RUDOLF FRANZ FERDINAND HOESS, 5 APRIL 1946: HE WAS COMMANDANT OF AUSCHWITZ CONCENTRATION CAMP FROM 1 MAY 1940 TO 1 DECEMBER 1943, DURING WHICH TIME 3,000,000 PERSONS PERISHED THERE; METHODS OF KILLINGS DESCRIBED; NAMES OF SOME PERSONS RESPONSIBLE; “FINAL SOLUTION” MEANT EXTERMINATION OF ALL JEWS IN EUROPE; POPULATION IN AREA SURROUNDING AUSCHWITZ AWARE OF KILLINGS (EXHIBIT USA-819)

 OFFICE OF US CHIEF OF COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION OF AXIS CRIMINALITY
 APO 124A, US ARMY
 INTERROGATION DIVISION
AFFIDAVIT

I, RUDOLF FRANZ FERDINAND HOESS, being first duly sworn, depose and say as follows:

1. I am forty-six years old, and have been a member of the NSDAP since 1922; a member of the SS since 1934; a member of the Waffen-SS since 1939. I was a member from 1 December 1934 of the SS Guard Unit, the so-called Deathhead Formation (Totenkopf Verband)

2. I have been constantly associated with the administration of concentration camps since 1934, serving at Dachau until 1938; then as Adjutant in Sachsenhausen from 1938 to May 1, 1940, when I was appointed Commandant of Auschwitz. I commanded Auschwitz until 1 December, 1943, and estimate that at least 2,500,000 victims were executed and exterminated there by gassing and burning, and at least another half million succumbed to starvation and disease, making a total dead of about 3,000,000. This figure represents about 70% or 80% of all persons sent to Auschwitz as prisoners, the remainder having been selected and used for slave labor in the concentration camp industries. Included among the executed and burnt were approximately 20,000 Russian prisoners of war (previously screened out of Prisoner of War cages by the Gestapo) who were delivered at Auschwitz in Wehrmacht transports operated by regular Wehrmacht officers and men. The remainder of the total number of victims included about 100,000 German Jews, and great numbers of citizens, mostly Jewish) from Holland, France, Belgium, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Greece, or other countries. We executed about 400,000 Hungarian Jews alone at Auschwitz in the summer of 1944.

3. WVHA (Main Economic and Administration Office), headed by Obergruppenfuehrer Oswald Pohl, was responsible for all administrative matters such as billeting, feeding and medical care, in the concentration camps. Prior to establishment of the RSHA, Secret State Police Office (Gestapo) and the Reich Office of Criminal Police were responsible for arrests, commitments to concentration camps, punishments and executions therein. After organization of the RSHA, all of these functions were carried on as before, but, pursuant to orders signed by Heydrich as Chief of the RSHA. While Kaltenbrunner was Chief of RSHA, orders for protective custody, commitments, punishment and, individual executions were signed by Kaltenbrunner or by Mueller, Chief of the Gestapo, as Kaltenbrunner's deputy.

4. Mass executions by gassing commenced during the summer 1941 and continued until Fall 1944. I personally supervised executions at Auschwitz until the first of December 1943 and know by reason of my continued duties in the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps WVHA that these mass executions continued as stated above. All mass executions by gassing took place under the direct order, supervision and responsibility of RSHA. I received all orders for carrying out these mass executions directly from RSHA.

5. On 1 December 1943 I became Chief of AMT I in AMT Group D of the WVHA and in that office was responsible for coordinating all matters arising between RSHA and concentration camps under the administration of WVHA. I held this position until the end of the war. Pohl, as Chief of WVHA, and Kaltenbrunner, as Chief of RSHA, often conferred personally and frequently communicated orally and in writing concerning concentration camps. On 5 October 1944, I brought a lengthy report regarding Mauthausen Concentration Camp to Kaltenbrunner at his office at RSHA, Berlin. Kaltenbrunner asked me to give him a short oral digest of this report and said he would reserve any decision until he had had an opportunity to study it in complete detail. This report dealt with the assignment to labor of several hundred prisoners who had been condemned to death—so-called "nameless prisoners".

- Page 2 -

Affidavit of Rudolf Franz Ferdinand Hoess, cont'd.

6. The "final solution" of the Jewish question meant the complete extermination of all Jews in Europe. I was ordered to establish extermination facilities at Auschwitz in June 1941. At that time there were already in the general government three other extermination camps; BELZEK, TREBLINKA and WOLZEK. These camps were under the Einsatzkommando of the Security Police and SD. I visited Treblinka to find out how they carried out their exterminations. The Camp Commandant at Treblinka told me that he had liquidated 80,000 in the course of one-half year. He was principally concerned with liquidating all the Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto. He used monoxide gas and I did not think that his methods were very efficient. So when I set up the extermination building at Auschwitz, I used Cyclon B, which was a crystallized Prussic Acid which we dropped into the death chamber from a small opening. It took from 3 to 15 minutes to kill the people in the death chamber depending upon climatic conditions. We knew when the people were dead because their screaming stopped. We usually waited about one-half hour before we opened the doors and removed the bodies. After the bodies were removed our special commandos took off the rings and extracted the gold from the teeth of the corpses.

7. Another improvement we made over Treblinka was that we built our gas chambers to accommodate 2,000 people at one time, whereas at Treblinka their 10 gas chambers only accommodated 200 people each. The way we selected our victims was as follows: we had two SS doctors on duty at Auschwitz to examine the incoming transports of prisoners. The prisoners would be marched by one of the doctors who would make spot decisions as they walked by. Those who were fit for work were sent into the Camp. Others were sent immediately to the extermination plants. Children of tender years were invariably exterminated since by reason of their youth they were unable to work. Still another improvement we made over Treblinka was that at Treblinka the victims almost always knew that they were to be exterminated and at Auschwitz we endeavored to fool the victims into thinking that they were to go through a delousing process. Of course, frequently they realized our true intentions and we sometimes had riots and difficulties due to that fact. Very frequently women would hide their children under the clothes but of course when we found them we would send the children in to be exterminated. We were required to carry out these exterminations in secrecy but of course the foul and nauseating stench from the continuous burning of bodies permeated the entire area and all of the people living in the surrounding communities knew that exterminations were going on at Auschwitz.

8. We received from time to time special prisoners from the local Gestapo office. The SS doctors killed such prisoners by injections of benzine. Doctors had orders to write ordinary death certificates and could put down any reason at all for the cause of death.

9. From time to time we conducted medical experiments on women inmates, including sterilization and experiments relating to cancer. Most of the people who died under these experiments had been already condemned to death by the Gestapo.

10. Rudolf Mildner was the chief of the Gestapo at Kattowicz and as such was head of the political department at Auschwitz which conducted third degree methods of interrogation from approximately March 1941 until September 1943. As such, he frequently sent prisoners to Auschwitz for incarceration or execution. He visited Auschwitz on several occasions. The Gestapo Court, the SS Standgericht, which tried persons accused of various crimes, such as escaping Prisoners of War, etc., frequently met within Auschwitz, and Mildner often attended the trial of such persons, who usually were executed in Auschwitz following their sentence. I showed Mildner throughout the extermination plant at Auschwitz and he was directly interested in it since he had to send the Jews from his territory for execution at Auschwitz.)

- Page 3 -

Affidavit of Rodulf Franz Ferdinand Hoess, continued

I understand English as it is written above. The above statements are true; this declaration is made by me voluntarily and without compulsion; after reading over the statement, I have signed and executed the same at Nurnberg, Germany on the fifth day of April 1946.

Rudolf Hoess

RUDOLF FRANZ FERDINAND HOESS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of April, 1946, at Nurnberg,
Germany.
Smith W. Brookhardt, Jr.

SMITH W. BROOKHARDT, JR.,
LT COLONEL. IGD.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. XXXIII, pp. 275–279, Doc. 3868-PS.

145. THE AUSCHWITZ PROTOCOL: THE VRBA–WETZLER REPORT

Originally from Slovakia, Rudolf Vrba was a Jewish prisoner in Auschwitz who, with fellow prisoner Alfred Wetzler, managed to escape from the camp on April 10, 1944. Eventually making it back to Slovakia, they produced a report on conditions in the camp that provided some of the most detailed information about the Nazi annihilation of the Jews there. Much of what was exposed related to the destruction of the Jews of Hungary, but the detail in the report uncovered atrocities beyond this one huge case. The lengthy report, part of which is produced here, was passed to Slovakia's Jewish community, who held onto the information they received and did not circulate it through the general Jewish community. Over time, the account became known as the Vrba–Wetzler report.

OFFICE OF STRATEGIC SERVICES
 Research and Analysis Branch

FIELD MEMORANDUM 257 (FR-425) 10 May 1945
 Bari, 20 April 1945

TESTIMONY OF TWO ESCAPEES FROM
 AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU
 EXTERMINATION CAMPS AT OSWIECIM, POLAND

The accompanying text is the translation of a document brought to Italy by Dr. G. Soos, secretary of the Hungarian underground movement MFM, in microfilm form. The film is a reproduction of the original document hidden by Dr. Soos with other papers deposited with trustees of the Hungarian underground and remains in his possession at Rome. The original, written in Hungarian, was transmitted to him by Dr. Jozsef Elias, a protestant pastor of Jewish ancestry who is the head of “Jo’Pasztor Bizettsag and an organizer of Jewish resistance in Hungary.

Two young Slovak Jews escaped from the Birkenau-Auschwitz concentration camps at Oswiecim, Poland, on 7 April 1944 and reached Hungary, Dr. Soos believes, at the end of June or July. They were interrogated by Dr. Elias and this document is the result of the interrogation. The identity of the two men was not revealed to Dr. Soos, in order not to endanger their personal security. He heard, however, that the Jewish underground made arrangements to send them to a neutral country, presumably to Switzerland, in order to preserve them for ultimate testimony. Dr. Soos believes that the first escapee originates from Sered u/V., Slovakia, while the second escapee comes from Nagyszombat, Slovakia.

[Each page in the original English translation of this document is marked “SECRET”. Editor’s note.]

[This memorandum contains information forwarded by R&A personnel in the field. Because of its timely interest it is distributed prior to analysis and processing.]

The first escapee was sent from the collecting camp of Sered u/V. to the Auschwitz camp on 13 April 1942 and from there to the adjoining Birkenau camp the same day; the other was sent from the camp at Novaky on 14 June 1942 to the Maidanek concentration camp at Lublin; then to Auschwitz camp on 27 June 1942; and finally to the Birkenau camp in September or October 1942, where he joined his fellow escapee.

The original report, translated without alteration here, is compiled in three parts; the first describes the experiences of the first escapee from the time of his deportation from Sered until January 1943, mostly spent at Birkenau. Part II describes chiefly the experiences of the first escapee but also contains testimony and data given by the second escapee, who arrived at Auschwitz 30 June 1942 but did not meet his companion at Birkenau until September or October 1942. This part covers the period from early 1942 until their escape in April 1942. The third part describes the experiences of the second escapee from the time he left Novaky on 14 June 1942 until he was transferred from Auschwitz to Birkenau in September or October 1942.

Within each part the story is told in rough chronological order; owing to the disorganization of the text, titles have been added by the editors to facilitate reading.

TESTIMONY OF TWO ESCAPEES FROM AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU EXTERMINATION CAMPS,
 OSWIECIM, POLAND

Part I. Testimony of the First Escapee.

1. Arrival of 640 Slovak Jews at Auschwitz Camp (Oswiecim, Poland), mid-April 1942.
2. Description of Auschwitz Camp.
3. Arrival at Birkenau Camp, mid-April 1942.
4. Description of Birkenau Camp.
5. Arrival of 12,000 Russian POWs and 1300 French Jews previous to April 1942.
6. Experiences at Birkenau April–May 1942
7. Experiences at Birkenau May 1942–January 1943

Part II. Testimony of Both the First and Second Escapees.

8. Transport arrivals at Auschwitz-Birkenau, early 1942–December 1942.
9. Description of the extermination crew.
10. Transport arrivals at Auschwitz-Birkenau, January–February 1943.
11. Description of the new Birkenau crematoria and gas chambers, February 1943.
12. Transport arrivals at Auschwitz-Birkenau, March–September 1943.
13. Treatment of the Theresienstadt Czechs, September 1943–March 1944.
14. Transport arrivals, September 1943–April 1944

15. Organization and population of the Birkenau camp, April 1944.

Part III. Testimony of the Second Escapee.

16. Internment at Maidenek camp at Lublin, June 1942.
17. Internment at Auschwitz, 30 June 1942–September or October 1942.

Part IV. Estimate of Jews Exterminated at Birkenau, April 1942–1944.

TESTIMONY OF THE FIRST ESCAPEE

1. Arrival at Auschwitz Camp (Oswiecim, Poland)

On 13 April 1942, some one thousand of us were loaded into closed freight cars at the reception center at Sered. The doors of the car were sealed so that we could not learn the route taken. When the doors were opened after a long journey, we were astonished to see that we had left Slovakia and were at the railway station of Zward, in Poland. The guard, which heretofore had consisted of members of the Slovak Hlinka Guard, was replaced by German Waffen-SS personnel. After some cars were left behind, we proceeded to Auschwitz, where we arrived at night and were shunted onto a siding. The cars left behind had supposedly been dropped because of difficulties in billeting; they followed us in a few days. When we arrived, we were lined up in rows of five and counted. The number of arrivals was 640. We reached the Auschwitz camp after 20 minutes' march, carrying our heavy luggage—we had left Slovakia well equipped.

In Auschwitz we were brought at once into a large barracks. We had to deposit our parcels on one side of the building; on the other side we had to strip naked and to hand in our clothes and valuables. We went naked into a neighboring barracks where our heads and bodies were shaved and disinfected with Lysol. As we left this barracks everyone was given a number. The numbers began at 28,600¹. Holding our numbers in our hands, we were driven into a third barracks where the admission proper was made. This consisted of our numbers being tattooed on the left breast in an extremely brutal manner. Many of us passed out during the process. Our personal data were also taken. We were sent from here to a cellar in groups of 100, then into a barracks where we were issued prison uniforms and wooden shoes. The whole procedure lasted until about 10 a.m. That same afternoon our uniforms were taken away and in their place we received second-hand Russian uniforms, or rather rags. Thus equipped, we were led to Birkenau.

2. Description of the Auschwitz Camp

Auschwitz is actually a reception center for political prisoners, for those “in protective custody.”² In April, 1942, at the time of my assignment there, there were about 15,000 prisoners, mostly Poles, German nationals³, and Russian civilians.⁴ A few of the inmates were criminals or hoboes.

The Birkenau labor camp, as well as the agricultural settlement at Harmansee, are subordinate to the Auschwitz camp command. All prisoners come first to Auschwitz, where they are provided with appropriate numbers; they are either kept there or are sent to Birkenau; only a few go to Harmansee. Prisoners are allotted numbers in the order of their admittance. Numbers are used only once, so that the last number shows the total number of prisoners admitted up to that date. At the time of our escape from Birkenau at the beginning of April 1944, this highest number was about 180,000. Numbers were at first tattooed on the left breast, but later, as these numbers became illegible, on the left arm above the wrist.

All categories of prisoners receive the same treatment, regardless of nationality. But for ease of control they are distinguished by different-colored triangles located on the left side of the upper garment, under the prison number. The nationality of the prisoner is indicated by initial letter (i.e., P for Pole, etc.) placed inside the triangle. The colors of the triangle indicating the various categories are:

- red — political protective custody
- green — incorrigible criminal
- black — work derelict (mostly Russians)
- pink — homosexuals
- purple — member of the sect of Bible Researchers

1 Note the statement on page 9 that women were designated by a separate numbering system. The summary of 1942 transport arrivals is given on page 13ff. Some prisoners were exterminated on arrival, without being numbered.

2 Schutzhaeftlinge

3 Reichsdeutsche

4 Schutzrussen

The markings of Jewish prisoners differ from the insignia described above only in that the triangle, which is red in most cases, is converted into a Star of David by the addition of a small yellow triangle.

There are several factories and workshops in the vicinity of the Auschwitz camp, among others a DAW⁵, one Krupp, one Siemens plant, and a complex called “Buna,” several kilometers long, in process of construction, which is outside the camp area proper. These plants are manned by prisoners.

The dwelling-area of the camp, that is, the actual concentration camp, covers an area approximately 500 by 500 meters in size. This zone is fenced off by two rows of concrete columns about 3 meters high. The columns are connected with each other by high-tension wires supported by insulators. Between these two fences, about 150 meters apart, there are watch towers about 5 meters high, equipped with machine guns and searchlights. In front of the inner row of high-tension columns there is a barbed-wire fence. Touching this ordinary fence is answered by machine gun fire from the watch towers.

The camp itself consists of 3 rows of buildings. The camp road runs between the first and second row of buildings. There was previously a wall between the second and third rows of buildings, and until August 1942 Jewish girls from Slovakia, who had been deported in March and April 1942, were billeted in the structures behind this wall. There were about 7,000 of these girls. After they were taken to Birkenau, the wall was pulled down. At the entrance of the camp was the following sign in big letters: “Arbeit macht frei.”⁶

Within a radius of about 2,000 meters the whole camp is surrounded by watch towers at a distance of 150 meters from each other. In contrast to the guard installations called Kleine Postenkette, which are described above, this system is called the Grosse Postenkette.⁷ The various factories and shops are located between these two guard belts.

* * * * *

Watch towers of the small (inner) belt are manned only at night, at which time the double fence is also charged with electric current. Sentries of the small belt are relieved in the morning and the towers of the large belt are manned. Escape through these two sentry belts is nearly impossible. To get through the inner belt during the night is out of the question, since the towers of the large belt are so close to one another (only 150 m., with each tower guarding a radius of 75 meters) that one cannot approach the belt without being observed. Anyone approaching is shot without warning. Relief of the guards in the big belt takes place at night only after the roster has been checked in the small belt zone, and it is ascertained that all prisoners are within that area. If, at the roll call, any prisoner is found missing, an alarm is given by sirens.

When a prisoner is missing, the guards of the outer belt remain in their towers and the guards of the inner belt also take up their posts. Hundreds of SS men with bloodhounds search the area between the two guard belts. The sirens alert the whole region, so that even after miraculously breaking through the two guard belts the escaping prisoner faces the danger of falling into the hands of numerous German police and SS patrols. Escaping prisoners are greatly handicapped by their shaved heads and marked clothes (rags painted red). The population of the area is so intimidated that, at best, it is passive to escaping prisoners. Death is immediately meted out to all those giving any aid to an escaped prisoner, even to those who fail to report instantly the location of such a person.

If a prisoner is not caught after three days, the guards of the outer belt leave their post, since it is assumed that the prisoner was successful in breaking through both guard belts. If the escaped prisoner is caught alive, he is hanged in the presence of the entire camp. If he is found dead, his body is exposed at the gates of the camp. In its hands is placed a sign which reads: “Hier bin ich.”⁸

During our two years imprisonment many attempted to escape, but with the exception of two or three all were brought back dead or alive. We do not know if those not brought back succeeded in escaping, but we do know that we are the only Jews brought from Slovakia to Auschwitz or Birkenau who did escape.

3. Arrival of the First Escapee at Birkenau

As I said before, we were sent to Birkenau on the first day of our arrival in Auschwitz mid-April 1947. There is in reality

5 Deutsche Aufrüstungswerke, or German Armament Works

6 “Work liberates.”

7 Respectively, small and large guard belts.

8 “Here I am.”

no community called Birkenau; this is a new name probably originating from the near-by beechwood “Birke.” The area known as Birkenau is called “Rajska” by the local population. The center of the Birkenau camp is four kilometers from Auschwitz, the outer guard belts of the two camps being separated by a railroad track only. At that time we knew nothing about Neuberau, a town about 30 to 40 kilometers from Birkenau which for unknown reasons was given as our mailing address.

4. Description of Birkenau Camp

When we arrived at Birkenau, one large kitchen, capable of handling 15,000 people, and two other buildings had already been completed and one additional house was under construction. All these buildings were enclosed by ordinary wire fence. The last-mentioned buildings were used for the reception of prisoners and were built according to the same plan. Each was about thirty meters long and eight to ten meters wide. The walls were scarcely more than two meters high, the roof reaching the disproportionate height of five meters. Such a building resembles a stable with a hayloft perched on top. Since there is no ceiling, the inside height is about seven meters. An inside wall, with a door in the center, divides each house lengthwise into two parts. The house-walls and the dividing wall support balconies running lengthwise at a height of 80 centimeters above each other. These balconies are divided into small cells with three persons to each cell. There are layers of cells on each wall. The dimensions given sic. show that the cell is not long enough to permit a person to lie down stretched out and is just high enough to enable him to sit up. Since the height of a cell is 80 centimeters, it is impossible to stand up in it. Approximately 400 to 500 persons are billeted in each house or, as they call it, block.

The Birkenau camp at this time covered an area of 850x1600 meters. Like Auschwitz, a small or inner guard belt surrounds it. Beyond this inner belt a new, much larger camp was under construction. Upon completion, it was to be incorporated in the camp already functioning. We do not know the purpose of these large-scale preparations. As at Auschwitz, the Birkenau camp is surrounded at a distance of 2 kilometers by an outer belt of guard-posts. The guard system is similar to that of Auschwitz.

5. Arrival of 12,000 Russian POWs and 1300 French Jews Previous to April 1942.

The building that we found in Birkenau upon our arrival had been built by 12,000 Russian POWs who were brought there in December 1941. They worked under such inhuman conditions during the extraordinarily cold weather that nearly all had died by the time we arrived. They had been given numbers from 1–12,000, but this was outside the numbering system for other inmates. When additional Russian POWs arrived, they did not receive subsequent numbers like other prisoners, but were allotted numbers between 1 and 12,000 vacated by deceased Russian POWs. It was impossible, therefore, to estimate by means of this numbering system the total number of Russian POWs received at the camp. Russian POWs were assigned to Auschwitz and Birkenau for punishment only.

We found the surviving Russians in a terrible state of degradation and neglect. They were billeted in the unfinished buildings, were exposed to the weather, and died in great numbers. Their corpses were superficially buried by hundreds and thousands. Later we had to dig up these corpses and bury [burns] them.

The first French male transport also reached Auschwitz before ourselves. It contained 1,300 naturalized French Jews. The numbering of these French Jews began at about 27,500. As I mentioned before, our numbers⁹ began with 28,600, therefore, no male transport had arrived in Auschwitz between the French and ourselves. (Women were processed separately and were numbered parallel with men; the girls from Slovakia who arrived before us were given numbers 1000–8000). We found the survivors of the French Jewish transport in Birkenau, about 700 men in a state of total exhaustion. The remainder died within one week.

6. Experiences at Birkenau April–May 1942

The following were billeted in the 3 blocks:

- (a) The so-called ‘prominents,’ i.e., professional criminals and older Polish political prisoners who were entrusted with the leadership of the camp;
- (b) Survivors of the French Jew (about 700);
- (c) Jews from Slovakia, 634 at first,¹⁰ to which were added a few days later those who had stayed in Zward;

9 See page 13 for list of transport arrivals from early 1942 to December 1942.

10 640? See description of the author’s own transport on page 1.

(d) Surviving Russians who were living in the half-completed houses or had no shelter at all, and whose numbers diminished so rapidly that they did not constitute a group to accounted for.

We Jews from Slovakia had to work with the Russian survivors. French Jews worked separately. After three days I was sent with 200 Slovak Jews to work in the Auschwitz Deutsche Aufrüstungswerke. We were billeted a Birkenau and went out to work early in the morning. Food was given us twice daily, one liter of carrot soup at noon and thirty dekagrams of bad bread in the evening. Working conditions were hard beyond imagination, so that most of us could not stand it. Weakened as we were from starvation and the inedible food, the death-rate took on frightening proportions; in our working group of 200, from 30–35 died each day. Many were simply beaten to death by the work supervisors and the so-called “capos.” The daily shortage caused by deaths was made good from the groups staying in Birkenau.

Returning from work at night was difficult and dangerous for us. We had to carry home, a distance of 5 kilometers, our tools, firewood, heavy cooking bowls, and the corpses of our comrades who had died or had been beaten to death during the day. We had to march in military formation with this heavy load. The capo punished what he considered unmilitary marching with cruel beatings or even by beating the culprits to death. By the time the second transport arrived, 14 days later, only about 150 of us were alive. We were counted off every night. Corpses were loaded on small carts and taken to the near-by birchwood, where they were burned in holes several meters deep and 15 meters long.

Every morning on our way to work we met 300 Jewish girls from Slovakia who were in a labor gang known as a Kommando, and worked in the vicinity at some kind of digging. These girls were dressed in old rags of Russian uniforms and wore wooden clogs. Their heads were shaven. Unfortunately we could never talk to them.

7. Experiences at Birkenau May 1942–January 1943.

By the middle of May 1942 a total of four Jewish male transports had reached Birkenau from Slovakia. All received the same treatment as ourselves. From the first and second transports, 120 of were sent to Auschwitz on orders of the Auschwitz camp command, which had asked for doctors, dentists, university students, and professional administrators and clerks. After one week at Auschwitz 18 doctors and nurses, as well as three clerks, were selected from the 120 professionals. The doctors were assigned to the Auschwitz hospital and the three clerks, including myself, were sent back to Birkenau. Two of my companions, Laszlo Braun from Nagyszombat and Grosz from Verbo, both of whom have since died, went to the Slovak block. I went to the French block, where we were given administrative work. The remaining 99 persons were sent to work in the Auschwitz quarry where they perished within a short time.

Shortly afterwards a so-called hospital (Krankenbau) was established in one of the buildings. This was the notorious Block No. 7. I was assigned there as head-nurse at first; later I became the manager. The head of the hospital was Victor Mordarki, No. 3550, a Polish political. The hospital was nothing other than an assembly point for those awaiting death. All prisoners unable to work were sent here. Naturally, there could be no question of medical treatment or nursing. Every day about 150 people died and their corpses were sent to the Auschwitz crematorium.

At the same time, the so-called “selection” was started. The number of prisoners who were to be gassed and their bodies burned was determined twice weekly, on Monday and Thursday, by the camp doctor (Standortarzt). Selectees were loaded on a truck and taken to the birchwood. Those who reached there alive were gassed in the big barrack built for the purpose and located next to the hole for burning bodies, and they were cremated in that hole. Approximately 2000 from Block No. 7 died each week, of which about 1200 deaths resulted from “natural causes” and about 800 from “selection.” Death reports on those dying from natural causes were made out and sent to camp HQ at Oranienburg. Selectees were marked up in a book labelled SB.¹¹ I was manager of Block No. 7 until 15 January 1943, during which time I could observe what was going on. About 50,000 prisoners were destroyed during that period, either from “natural causes” or through “selections.”

II. TESTIMONY OF BOTH THE FIRST AND SECOND ESCAPEES

8. Transport Arrivals at Auschwitz-Birkenau, Early 1942–December 1942.

In view of the fact that prisoners were given consecutive numbers, as we said before, we are in a position to determine with considerable exactness the order of arrival and fate of the various transports. The order of arrival ran as follows:

¹¹ Sonderbehandlung, or “special treatment.”

Numbers	Transports
c. 27,400–28,600	First transport of naturalized French Jews.
c. 28,600–29,600	First Jews from Slovakia, our own transport. [arrived mid-April 1942 – ed.]
c. 29,600–29,700	100 Gentile men from various transit camps.
c. 29,700–32,700	Three complete Slovak Jewish transport, 3000 men.
c. 32,700–33,100	400 habitual criminals (Gentiles) from Warsaw.
c. 33,100–35,000	Approximately 2000 Jews from Cracow.
c. 35,000–36,000	Gentile Poles, political prisoners in protective custody.
c. 36,000–37,300	1330 Slovak Jews arriving from Lublin-Maidenek in May 1942
c. 37,300–37,900	600 Gentile Poles, with few Jews, coming from Radom.
c. 37,900–38,000	100 Gentile Poles arriving from the Dachau reception center.
c. 38,000–38,400	400 naturalized French Jews with their families, the entire transport numbering about 1600 people. Of these, only about 400 men and 200 women were assigned to the camp. The remaining thousand, including women and older men, were sent directly to the birchwood, where they were gassed and cremated without being entered on the records and assigned numbers.

After this time, all incoming Jewish transports were handled like the French transport. About ten percent of the men and five percent of the women were assigned to the camp, the remaining being immediately exterminated. Polish Jews had been handled this way even earlier. Trucks from the various Polish ghettos arrived continually for months, going directly to the birchwood, where these Jews were gassed and cremated by the thousands.

c. 38,400–39,200	800 naturalized French Jews, a great many of whom were destroyed in the way described above.
c. 39,200–40,000	800 Gentile Poles, political prisoners in protective custody.
c. 40,000–40,150	150 Slovak Jews with their families. With the exception of 50 women, who were sent to the women’s camp, the majority of the transport was gassed in the birchwood. Among the 150 men were Zucker and Vilmos Sonnenschein, both from Eastern Slovakia.
c. 40,150–43,800	Almost 4000 naturalized French Jews, mostly intellectuals. About 1000 women of this transport went to the camp and 3000 persons were gassed in the birchwood.
c. 43,800–44,200	400 Slovak Jews from the Lublin camp, including Matyas Klein and Meilech Laüfer, both from Eastern Slovakia. ¹² This transport arrived on 30 June 1942.
c. 44,200–45,000	This transport contained 1000 persons. A few women were sent to the women’s camp and all others went to the birchwood. Among the men sent to the camp were Jozsef Zelmanovics, from Snina; Adolf Kahan, from Bratislava; Walter Reichmann, from Sucany; and Eszter Kahan from Bratislava. I had occasion to speak with the latter on 1 April 1944. She is block-inspector in the women’s camp.
c. 45,000–47,000	2000 French Gentiles, including communists and other political prisoners, among them the brothers of Thorez and Leon Blum. The latter were specially tortured, and then gassed and cremated.

¹² This is evidently the transport of the second escapee, see page 38.

c. 47,000–47,500	500 Dutch Jews, among them many German emigres. About 250 persons from this transport went to the birchwood.	c. 65,000–68,000	Naturalized French, Belgian, and Dutch Jews. About 1000 women were sent to the women’s camp and a minimum of 3000 persons were gassed.
c. 47,500–47,800	About 300 Russian civilians (Schutzrussen).	c. 68,000–70,500	2500 German Jews from the Sachsenhaus reception-center.
c. 48,300 (sic) –48,620	320 Slovak Jews. About 70 women went to the camp and the remainder of the transport of 650 persons were sent to the birchwood. This transport contained 80 persons who were deported to Sered n/V. by the Hungarian police. In this group were: Dr. Zoltan Mandel of Presov, who later died; Holz (first name unknown), a butcher from Pistany who was later sent to Warsaw; Miklos Engel of Zilina; Chaim Katz of Snina, whose wife and six children have been gassed, and who at the present time works in the morgue.	c. 71,000–80,000	Naturalized French, Belgian and Dutch Jews. Not more than ten percent of those arriving were sent to the camp. The number exterminated is conservatively estimated at 65,000–70,000.
c. 49,000–64,800	15,000 naturalized French, Belgian, and Dutch Jews. This number accounts for no more than ten percent of the transports arriving between 1 June and 15 September 1942. Most of these were large family transports, many of their members being sent directly to the birchwood. The Sonderkommando ¹³ which did the gassing and cremating worked day and night shifts. At this time Jews were gassed and burned by hundreds of thousands.	9. Description of the Extermination Camp On 17 December 1942, 200 young Slovak Jews were executed in Birkenau. They had been engaged as Sonderkommandos in the gassing and cremating crews. Their plan to revolt and escape was betrayed and the executions followed. Among those executed were: Sandor Weisz Oszkar Steiner Aladar Spitzer Ferenc Wagner Dezso Wetzler Bela Weisz All these men came from Nagyzombat. Two hundred Polish Jews, who had just arrived from Makow, replaced the executed Sonderkommandos. We lost our direct contact with this “working place” after the elimination of the Slovak Jewish Sonderkommandos, and this brought a deterioration in our supply situation. Transports arriving at the birchwood brought with them, although they had to leave their luggage in Auschwitz, large amounts of foreign currency, mostly dollars in banknotes or gold, tremendous quantities of gold and precious stones, and even foodstuffs. Although these valuables had to be handed in, it was unavoidable that a great deal, especially gold dollars, went into the pockets of the boys who were working in the extermination crews and had to go through the clothes of those who had been gassed. In this way a considerable amount of wealth and foodstuffs got into the camp. One could buy nothing for money in the camp officially, of course. But one could make a deal with the SS men and with civilian workers who were employed in
c. 64,800–65,000	About 200 Slovak Jews. Some 100 women were sent to the women’s camp, the others going to the birchwoods. Among those coming to the camp were: Lajos Katz from Zilina; Avri Burger (his wife died) from Bratislava-Poprad; Miklos Steiner, from Bystrica n/V.; Gyorgy Fried, from Trencin; Buchwald (?); Jozsef Rosenwasser, from Eastern Slovia; Gyula Neumann, from Bardejov; Sandor and Mihaly Wertheimer, from Verbo; and Bela Blau, from Zilina.

¹³ Labor gangs with special assignments. See below.

the camp at various skilled jobs and so could smuggle in some food and cigarettes. Prices were naturally abnormal; a few hundred cigarettes cost twenty dollars in gold. Barter also flourished. But the high prices did not disturb us since we had more than enough money. We obtained clothing from the Sonderkommandos and so were able to change our rags for good clothes which had belonged to those gassed. For instance, the coat I am now wearing belonged to a Dutch Jew.¹⁴

The Sonderkommandos were segregated. We did not associate with them because of the horrid smell they spread. They were always filthy, in rags, totally brutalized, and became violent savages. It was no rarity for one to club another to death. Such an occurrence was nothing sensational among other prisoners as well, since the murder of a prisoner is not considered a crime. It is simply recorded that the prisoner number so and so died; the cause of death is immaterial. I was present when a young Polish Jew named Jossel explained the fine art of “expert murder” to an SS man and, to demonstrate his point, killed another Jew with his bare hands, without using any weapon.

10. Transport Arrival at Auschwitz-Bireknau, January–February 1943.

At about the number 80,000 the systematic extermination of those from the Polish ghettos began.

Numbers	Transports
c. 80,000–85,000	About 5000 Jews from various Polish ghettos, including Mljawa, Makow, Zichenow, Lomzsa, Grodno, Byalistok. Tranports arrived continuously for thirty days. Only 5000 persons were assigned to the camp; the remainder was gassed immediately. The Sonderkommandos worked feverishly in two shifts twenty-four hours a day, but they could hardly cope with the task of gassing and burning. It can be estimated without exaggeration that between 80,000 and 90,000 persons were exterminated. These transports brought with them particularly large sums of Polish? money, foreign currency, and precious stones.

c. 85,000–92,000	6000 Jews from Grodno, Byalistok, and Cracow, and an additional 1000 Gentile Poles. The large majority of the Jews went to the birchwood directly. An average of 4000 Jews were driven into the gas chamber daily. In the middle of January 1943, three transports of 2000 persons each arrived from Teresin Theresienstadt Czechoslovakia. The markings of these transports were “CU”, “CR”, and “R”, which were incomprehensible to us. All parcels belonging to these transports were similarly marked. Of these 6000 persons, only 600 men and 300 women were sent to the camp, the remainder being gassed.
c. 99,000 (sic) –100,000	Large Dutch and French Jewish transports arrived at the end of January 1943. Only a fraction went to the camp, the remainder being gassed.
c. 100,000–102,000	2000 Gentile Poles, mostly intellectuals, arrived in February 1943.
c. 102,000–103,000	700 Gentile Czechs, the survivors of whom were later sent to Buchenwald.
c. 103,000–108,000	3000 French and Dutch Jews and 2000 Gentile Poles.

An average of two transports of Polish, French, and Dutch Jews arrived daily during February 1943. In most cases entire transports were gassed. The number of those gassed in this month alone can be estimated at 90,000.

11. The New Birkenau Crematoria and Gas Chambers.

At the end of February 1943 the newly-built crematoria and gas chambers were opened in Birkenau.¹⁵ The practice of gassing and burning corpses in the birchwood was stopped and bodies were taken to the four new crematoria built for the purpose. Ashes had been utilized as fertilizer previously on the Harmansee Estate, so that it is difficult to find traces of the mass murders.

14 Apparently the interrogator examined the coat at this point, since the original text notes that the coat carried the trade-mark of an Amsterdam tailor.

15 This confirms information as to the date the Birkenau crematorium and gas chamber complex went into operation, obtained in POW interrogation, PWB Report No. _____.

There are four crematoria at work in Birkenau at the present time, two larger ones (models I and II) and two smaller (models III and IV). Models I and II consist of a waiting hall, which is equipped to resemble the hall of a bath, can accommodate 2000 persons. There is reported to be another waiting hall, equally large, below this one. A few steps lead from the big hall (on the ground level) into a very long and narrow gas chamber. False showers are built into the walls of the gas chamber so as to give the impression of a very large washroom. Three skylights in the ceiling of the chamber can be hermetically sealed by valves. A narrow-gauge track runs from the gas chambers through the waiting hall to the incinerators.

There is a high smoke-stack in the center of the hall where the incinerators are located. Nine incinerators are built around it, each having four doors. Each door will admit three average corpses at one time. Each incinerator will burn twelve bodies in one and a half hours, giving a total capacity of approximately 2000 corpses each twenty-four hours.

The victims are first led to the waiting hall, where they are told they will go to the bathhouse. They undress and, in order to support their delusion that they are going to bathe, two attendants clad in white distribute a towel and a piece of soap to each. Then they are squeezed into the gas chamber. Two thousand persons will pack the chamber to such an extent that all must stand up. The attendants often fire into the chamber to force those inside to make room for others. When everybody is in the chamber, the doors are sealed from the outside. There is a short wait, presumably to allow the temperature to rise to a certain degree. Then SS men with gasmasks go up on the roof, open the valves on the windows, and pour a powderlike substance into the chamber. The cans containing this substance carry the inscription: “Cyklon zur Schaedlingsbekaempfung”¹⁶ and the trademark of a Hamburg factory. These cans evidently contain a cyanide preparation that gassifies when the temperature rises to a certain degree. Everyone in the chamber dies within three minutes. Up to the present, there has been no case of anyone showing signs of life when the chamber was opened—a phenomenon not so rare in birchwood, where the procedure was more primitive. The chamber is ventilated after being opened and the Sonderkommandos move the corpses to the incinerators on flat cars. The crematoria designated models III and IV operate in about the same manner, but their turnover is only half as large. The total capacity of the four crematoria, therefore, is 6000 corpses a day.

In principle only Jews are gassed. Gentiles are usually shot, being gassed on in exceptional cases. Before the establishment of the crematoria, Gentiles were executed in the birchwood and their bodies burned there. Later, however, such executions were carried out in the hall of the crematoria, which was especially equipped for the purpose, by shooting in the nape of the neck.

Inauguration of the first crematorium occurred in March 1943 and was celebrated by the gassing and cremation of 8000 Jews from Cracow. Prominent guests from Berlin, including high-ranking officers and civilian personalities, attended and expressed their highest satisfaction with the performance of the gas chamber. They diligently used the spyhole in the door of the gas chamber.

12. Transport Arrival March–September 1943.

Numbers	Transport
c. 109,000 (sic) –119,000	Early in March 1943, 45,000 Jews arrived from Salonika. Ten thousand men and a much smaller number of women were sent to the camp. The remainder, at least 30,000 people, were sent to the crematoria. Of the 10,000 men in camp, nearly everyone, perhaps all, died shortly afterwards. Most of them fell victims to an epidemic disease similar to malaria, many died of typhus, and others could not stand the hard conditions in the camp.

In view of the great mortality rate among the Greek Jews, resulting from malaria and typhus, selections were temporarily halted. Sick Greek Jews were told to report. We warned them not to do so, but many reported nevertheless. All were killed by intercardial injections of phenol. Such injections were administered by a medical noncommissioned officer who was assisted by two Czech doctors, Cespira Honza and Zdenek Stich, both of Prague. These doctors are at present in the Buchenwald reception center. Both doctors did everything they could to help the unfortunates, and when they could do nothing else, eased their pain.

¹⁶ Cyclon for exterminating criminals.

Approximately 1000 survivors of the 10,000 Greek Jews were sent with another 500 Jews to build fortifications in Warsaw. A few hundred of these returned several weeks later in a hopeless condition and were immediately gassed. Four hundred Greeks suffering from malaria were sent to Lublin for “further treatment,” following the suppression of the phenol injections. We received news of their arrival in Lublin, but we know nothing about their fate. It is certain that not one of the 10,000 remains in the camp.

Following suppression of the “selection” system, the murder of prisoners was also forbidden. The following Reichs-germans were flogged for multiple murder:

- Alexander Neumaann, professional criminal
- Zimmer, professional criminal
- Albert Haemmerle, “ “ “
- Rudolf Osteringer, “ “ “
- Alfred Klein, political prisoner
- Alois Stahler, “ “ “

These notorious murderers also had to sign a statement admitting the killing of a certain number of their fellow-prisoners.

Early in 1943, 50,000 discharge forms were received by the Auschwitz political department. This news caused great joy among us, as we hoped that some of us at least might be released. But these forms were filled in with the personal data of those gassed and were placed in the archives.

Numbers	Transports
c. 119,000–120,000	1000 Gentile Poles from the Pawiak prison in Warsaw
c. 120,000–123,000	3000 Greek Jews, part of whom were sent to Warsaw to replace their dead compatriots. Those who stayed behind died off quickly.
c. 123,000–124,000	1000 Gentile Poles from Radom and Tarnow.
c. 124,000–126,000	2000 men from various Gentile transports

In the meantime, Polish, Belgian, and French Jewish transports arrived continually, and their members were gassed without even a fraction going to the camp. One of these consisted on 1000 Polish Jews coming from Lublin-Maidenek. Among them were three Slovaks, including one name Spira from Stropok or Varanno.

At the end of July 1943, transports abruptly stopped coming. There was a short respite while the crematoria were thoroughly cleaned and prepared for further activities. The work started again on 3 August. Transports of Jews from Benzburg and Sosnowitz came first, and were followed by others without interruption during the whole month of August.

c. 132,000 (sic) –136,000	Jews from Benzburg and Sosnowitz. Only 4000 men and few women went to the camp. Over 35,000 were taken to the crematoria directly. Most of these died in the so-called quarantine camp from exceptionally inhuman treatment, starvation, various diseases, and last but not least, murders in their own ranks. Those chiefly responsible for the crimes committed against them are Tlyn, a professional criminal of German nationality who came here from the Sachsenhausen reception center, and Mieczyslaw Katerzinski, a Polish political prisoner from Warsaw.
------------------------------	--

At this time, “selections” were started again on a particularly large scale in the women’s camp. The camp doctor, an SS Sturmfuehrer and son or nephew of the Berlin police director, acted with a brutality which stood out even in this camp. The practice of “selection” was carried out without respite from this time until our escape.

c. 137,000 (sic) –138,000	1000 Gentile Poles from the Pawiak prison in Warsaw and about 80 Greek Jews arrived at the end of August.
c. 138,000–142,000	3000 Gentiles from various transports.
c. 142,000–145,000	3000 Jews from various Polish labor camps and a group of Russian POWs arrived at the beginning of September 1943.
c. 148,000 (sic) –152,000	Family transports from Teresin (Theresienstadt), which arrived during the week following 7 September 1943.

13. Treatment of the Theresienstadt

Czechs, September 1943–March 1944.

For some reason unknown to us, the Theresienstadt transport enjoyed exceptional treatment. Nobody was gassed or even shaved, members kept their belongings and were billeted by families in a separate section of the camp. The men did not have to work, members were allowed to send mail to relatives, and a special school for the children was permitted under the leadership of Fredy Hirsch, at one time youth leader of the Makabi of Prague.¹⁷

However, members of these transports had to endure the sadistic tortures of a “camp inspector” named Arno Boehm, a professional criminal of German nationality who was, by the way, one of the abject individuals in the entire camp. Our astonishment increased when we had an occasion to see the official roster of the transport. This roster bore the peculiar title, “Specially treated Czech Jews for six months’ quarantine.”¹⁸ We knew very well what the “SB” marking meant, but we could not find an explanation for the exceptional treatment and the extraordinarily long quarantine. According to our experience up to that time, the quarantine never lasted longer than three weeks. We became suspicious as the end of the six months’ quarantine period approached, and were convinced that these Jews would also end up in the gas chamber. Looking for an opportunity to make contact with the leaders of the group, we explained their situation and did not leave them in any doubt as to their fate. A few of them, especially Fredy Hirsch, who obviously enjoyed the full confidence of his companions, told us that they would resist if our suspicions should materialize. Men of the Sonderkommandos promised that they would join immediately if the Czech Jews put up active resistance. Many hoped that a general uprising could be instigated in the camp.

We learned on 6 March 1944 that the crematoria had been put into condition for the Czech Jews. I went to see Fredy Hirsch without delay to inform him, and appealed to him to act immediately. He replied, “I know what my duty is.” I sneaked to the Czech camp again before dawn and heard that Fredy Hirsch was dying. He had poisoned himself with luminol. The following day, 7 March 1944, he was transferred in state of a coma, with 3791 of his companions with whom he arrived in Birkenau after 7 September 1943, to the crematorium, on trucks where all were gassed.¹⁹ The youths went to their death singing. The resistance did not come off. Determined men of the Sonderkommando had waited in vain.

About 500 elderly Czechs died during the six months’ quarantine period. Of the whole group, the only ones left alive were eleven sets of twins taken to Auschwitz for biological experiments. When we left Birkenau these children were still alive. Rozsi Fuerst, a girl from Sered n/V., was among those executed. All were forced to inform their relatives that they were all right one week before their execution, that is, during the first days of March. The letters had to be dated 23 or 25 March. They were also told to ask for parcels from relatives abroad.

14. Transport Arrivals, September 1943–April 1944.

c. 153,000 (sic) – 154,000	100 Gentile Poles from the Warsaw Pawiak prison.
c. 155,000 (sic) – 159,000	4000 men from various prisons, Jews who had been in hiding and were captured around Benzburg, and a group of Russians (Schutzrussen) arrived in October 1943. At the same time, Russian POWs also came in and received numbers 1–12,000.
c. 160,000 (sic) – 165,000	About 5000 men, mostly Dutch and Belgian Jews, and the first transport of Italian Jews came from Fiume, Tiesto, and Rome. Not less than 30,000 persons from these transports were taken directly to the gas chamber.

Mortality among the Jews assigned to the camp was particularly high. The method of selection took its toll at an increased rate. Selection reached its peak between 10–24 January 1944, when the strongest and healthiest Jews were taken regardless of their labor assignment or profession. Only doctors were spared. Everyone had to line up for the “selection,” and a close check was made by the camp doctor 17 The largest Jewish sports club in Czechoslovakia.

18 “Sondere Behandlung—Transport tschechische Juden mit 6-monatlicher Quarantaene.”

19 March 7, the day chosen by the Germans for this execution, is an outstanding Czechoslovak national holiday, the birthday of President Masaryk.

(the son or nephew of the police chief of Berlin) and by the Birkenau camp commandant, SS Untersturmfuehrer Schwarzhuber. All Jews transferred from Block No. 7 to the “hospital” (Krankenbau), which was located in another part of the camp, were gassed without exception. In addition to these, another 2500 men and 6000 women were sent to the gas chamber through “selection.”

c. 165,000–168,000	3000 Jews arrived from Teresin on 20 December 1943. This roster had the same title as the one which had come in September. ²⁰ They were billeted with the September arrivals and enjoyed the same privileges. Twenty-four hours before the extermination of the first group the later arrivals were segregated in an adjoining part of the camp which happened to be empty. They are still living in this quarter. In view of their knowledge of the fate of the first group, they are already preparing to resist. Resistance has been organized by Ruzenka Laufer and Hugo Langsfeld, both of Prague. They are collecting easily inflammable material and want to set their blocks on fire. Their quarantine will be over on 20 June 1944.
c. 169,000 (sic) – 170,000	1000 persons, including Poles, Russians, and Jews in smaller groups.
c. 170,000–171,000	1000 Gentile Poles and Russians, and a smaller number of Yugoslavs.
c. 171,000–174,000	3000 Dutch, Belgian, and native French Jews arrived in late February and early March 1944. This was the first shipment of native as distinguished from naturalized French Jews. They came from the unoccupied zone. An overwhelming majority of these were immediately gassed.

In the middle of March 1944 a smaller group of Benzburg Jews, who had been found in hiding, arrived. We learned from them that many Polish Jews had escaped to Slovakia and from there to Hungary, and that these had been helped by Jews still living in Slovakia.

After the extermination of the Teresin Jews, no reinforcements arrived until 15 March. As a consequence, the number at the camp was substantially reduced, for which reason all men arriving in later transports, mostly Dutch Jews, were assigned to the camp. We had just learned of the arrival of large Greek Jewish transports when we left the camp on 7 April 1944.²¹

15. Organization and Population of the Birkenau Camp, April 1944.

The Birkenau camp consists of three sections (see plan no. 3). At the present time, only sections I and II are surrounded by the inner guard belt, as section III is still in the process of building and is not inhabited.

When we left Birkenau at the beginning of April 1944, the number of inmates of the camp was as follows:

Place	Slovak Jews	Other Jews	Gentiles	Remarks
I Section Women’s reception centers Ia and Ib	c. 300	c. 7000	c. 6000	In addition to 300 Slovak girls, 100 girls are caption employed in the staff building.
II Section a. Quarantine camp	2	c. 200	c. 800	Dr. Endre Mueller from Podolinec, one of the two Slovak Jews, is block-inspector.
b. Camp of the	c. 3500			With six months quarantine.
c. Not occupied at present
d. Staff camp	c. 58	c. 4000	c. 6000

20 See footnote 18.

21 A Reuter’s dispatch of 20 March 1945, date-lined Athens, tell of the return from the Oswiecim camp of a Greek Jew, Leon Vatis, whose story and prison number tallies with the information given herein.

Place	Slovak Jews	Other Jews	Gentiles	Remarks
e. Gypsie camp			c. 4500	Remnant of 16,000 Gypsies. They are not performing labor and are dying out quickly.
f. Hospital	6	c. 1000	c. 500	The six Slovak Jews are engaged in hospital administration.
g. Shown on plan, but not accounted for.

* Number	Name	Place of Origin	Duties
36,832	Walter Spitzer	Nemsova	Block inspector
29,867	Josef Neumann	Snina	“Capo” of corpses
44,989	Josef Zelmanovics	Snina	Personnel
32,407	Lajos Eisenstaedter	Korompa	Tattooer
30,049	Lajos Solmann	Kezmarok	Clerk
	Chaim Katz	Snina	Personnel

* * * * *

The internal administration of the Birkenau camp is carried out by prisoner assigned to that work. Prisoners are not billeted by nationality, but by their labor assignment, that is, by Kommandos. Each block has five functionaries:

- 1 Block Inspector (Blockaeltester)
- 1 Block Clerk (Blockschreiber)
- 1 Block Nurse
- 2 Block Handymen

The block inspector wears on his left arm a white band showing the number of the block. He is responsible for order in his block, where he is, so to speak, master of life and death. Up to February 1944 almost half of all block inspectors were Jews. At that time an order from Berlin prohibited filling this office with Jews, following which the Jews were relieved from duty. Three Slovak Jews, however, are carrying on to this day. They are:

Name	Place of Origin	Duties
Ernest Rosim	Zilina	Inspector, Block No. 25, (cleaning crews, plus artisans from Benzburg)
Dr. Endre Mueller	Podolinec	Inspector, Block No. 15, quarantine camp
Walter Spitzer	Nemsova	Inspector, Block No. 14, hospital area

The block clerk is the executive assistant of the block inspector. He does all clerical work, keeps the roster up to date, and is in charge of a large file. His work is loaded with great responsibility since the roster has to be kept in order in a painstaking manner. Prisoners are recorded by their numbers only, not by their names, and consequently an error is easily made. Mistakes of this kind may be fatal. If by mistake the clerk reports an individual number dead by mistake, which can easily occur in view of the high mortality rate—and has in fact happened—such a mistake is simply corrected by executing the wearer of the number later. Once a report is forwarded, it cannot be corrected, and the reported roll must agree with the actual roster. The post of clerk confers great power within the block. Unfortunately there are often abuses.

The nurse and handymen perform manual work around the block. Naturally there can be no question of any nursing.

The camp inspector (Lageraeltester) is over the whole camp. He is also a prisoner. The present camp inspector is Franz Danisch, No. 11,182, a political prisoner from Koenigshuette, Upper Silesia. The camp inspector is absolute master of the entire camp. He is entitled to appoint and remove block inspectors and clerks, and can also assign men to labor crews, etc. Banisch is fair even to Jews; he is objective and incorruptible.

The camp clerk, who actually has the greatest power in the camp, is assigned to the camp inspector. He is the only man in direct contact with the camp command, receiving orders and handing in reports. As a result, he has a certain amount of influence with the camp command. Block clerks are his direct subordinates and make their reports to him. The present camp clerk is Casimir Gork, No. 30,029, a Polish political prisoner who was formerly a bank clerk. Although Gork has anti-semitic views, he does not molest the Jews.

Principal supervision of the blocks is exercised by six to eight SS block leaders. They call the roll nightly and report to the commander, Untersturmfuehrer Schwarzhuber, a Tyrolean whose title is camp leader (Lagerfuehrer). Schwarzhuber is a drunkard and a sadist.

The camp commandant is the superior of camp leaders of the Birkenau and Auschwitz camps, as well as the leader of the Auschwitz reception center. The name of the present camp commandant is Hoess.

The capo heads each labor detachment (Arbeitskommando); larger detachments have several capos. A capo can dispose of the prisoners at will during working hours, and he often beats them to death. In the past, Jews were often capos, but this was forbidden by the order from Berlin already mentioned (February 1944). One Jew, a mechanic named Roth from Nagymihaly, still holds such an office.

Supreme control of the work is entrusted to German experts.

III. TESTIMONY OF THE SECOND ESCAPEE

16. Interment at Maidenek camp at Lublin, June 1942.

We left Novaky on 14 June 1942, passed through Zilina, and arrived at Zwardon at 5 p.m. Here we detrained and were counted. The transport was taken over by SS men, who expressed loudly their indignation at the fact that we were travelling without water. “Those Slovak barbarians would not even furnish water,” they said. We continued and arrived at Lublin in two days. As soon as the train stopped, the following order was given. “Those between 15–50 years old who are fit for work will leave the train; children and old people will stay in the cars.” We got out. The station was surrounded by Lithuanian SS men armed with machine pistols. The railroad cars containing the children and old people were sealed and the train started off. We do not know where the train went or what happened to the passengers.

An SS Scharfuehrer took command at the station and told us that we have a long trip ahead. Those who wished to take their parcels with them could do so; those who thought they could not carry them might load their parcels on a truck ready for the purpose. This truck would arrive without fail. Some of my companions took their luggage with them while others loaded theirs on the truck. We found a factory which bore the sign “Bekleidungswerke”²² just behind the town. There were about a thousand persons, dressed in dirty striped prisoners’ uniforms, lined up in the factory court. They were obviously waiting for dinner. This spectacle was not very encouraging, as we recognized the people as Jews. When we reached the hill, we suddenly saw the very large camp of Maidenek, surrounded by a barbed wire fence three meters high.

As soon as I entered the gate of the camp, I saw Maco Winkler, who is from Nagyszombat (Trnava). He warned me that all my parcels and clothes would be taken away. Slovak Jews who had arrived earlier surrounded us. They were dressed in rags of prisoners’ uniforms, had shaven heads, were barefoot or in wooden clogs, and many had swollen legs. They begged for food or other small items. We distributed almost anything we had, since we knew that anything we kept would be taken away anyhow. We were then led to the warehouse where we had to hand in all our belongings. Then we were driven on the double to another barracks where we stripped, had our heads shaved, were put under shower, and finally received our underwear and prisoners’ uniforms, a pair of wooden shoes, and a cap.

I was attached to the so-called Labor Section II. The whole camp consisted of three such labor sections, separated from each other by wire fences. Slovak and Czech Jews billeted in Labor Section II. We were trained for two days how to lift our cam when we met a German, and were drilled for hours in the soaking rain. Barracks installations were very popular; our furniture consisted of three very long tables on top of another. Prisoners had to sleep under and on the tables.

We received soup in the morning. It was so thick that we had to eat it with our hands. A similar soup was served at noon, and in the evening we had so-called “tea” with 30 dekagrams of indigestible bread and two or three dekagrams of marmalade or synthetic fat, both of the worst quality.

In the early days we were taught to sing the camp hymn in an excellent manner, and had to stand around for hours and practice. The hymn is as follows:

Aus ganz Europa kamen	From all of Europe came
Wir Juden nach Lublin	We Jews to Lublin.
Viel Arbeit gibt’s zu leisten	There is much work to do,
Und dies ist der Beginn.	And this is only the beginning.
Um diese Pflicht zu	In order to master this duty meistern
Vergiss Vergangenheit	Forget the past,
Denn in der
Pflichterfuellung	For in the fulfillment of duty
Liegt die Gemeinsamkeit.	Lies community feeling.

²² Clothing factory.

Drum ruestig an die Arbeit	So actively at work,
Ein jeder halt emit	Let each one hold his own,
Gemeinsam wollen wir schaffen	Together we want to labor
Im gleichen Arbeitsschritt.	At the same work-pace.
Nicht alle wollen begreifen	Not all want to understand
Wozu in Reihen wir stehen.	Why we stand in ranks.
Die muessen wir dann zwingen	We must then force them
Dies alles zu verstehen.	To understand all this.
Die neue Zeit muss alle	The new era must teach us –
Uns alle stets belehren	All of us—forever.
Dass wir schon nur die Arbeit	That we now only to labor,
Der Arbeit angehoren.	Only to labor belong.
Drum ruestig an die Arbeit	So actively at work,
Ein jeder halt emit	Let each one hold his own,
Gemeinsam wollen wir schaffen	Together we want to labor
Im gleichen Arbeitsschritt.	At the same work-pace.

Billeting was as follows: Labor Section I, Slovak Jews; Labor Section II, Slovak and Czech Jews; Labor Section III, partisans. Sections IV and V were being constructed by those billeted in sections I and II. Partisans billeted in section III were shut up in their barracks. They did not work and were not allowed to leave their quarters; their food was thrown down in front of the door and taken inside from there. The guards shot at them whenever possible.

The capos were Reichsgermans and Czechs. The former treated prisoners brutally, while the Czechs tried to assist them whenever possible. A gypsy named Galbavy from Holics, was camp inspector, and his substitute was a Jew named Mittler from Sereď n/V. Mittler evidently obtained his position as a result of his brutality, since he used his power to torture his fellow-Jews, who were already suffering enough indignities. He never missed an opportunity to commit some mean act.

We were mistreated by SS men every night when the Order of the Day was read. After the day's hard work, we had to stand for hours and sing the camp hymn. This singing was led by an old Jewish conductor from the roof of a near-by building, while the SS men had their fun using their sticks and whips. Rabbi Eckstein of Sereď n/V. died in tragic circumstances. On one occasion he arrived a little late for the reading of the Order of the Day, as he was ill in the latrine. The Schaarfuehrer thereupon had him dipped into the latrine twice suspended by his feet, drenched him with cold water, and finally shot him.

The crematorium was located between the first and second labor section. Corpses were burned here. The mortality rate per section of 6000 to 8000 was about 30 daily, but this number increased five and sixfold shortly afterwards. Later ten to twelve sickmen were taken daily to the crematorium, from when they never returned. The crematorium had electric heating installations which were handled by Russian prisoners.

Bad nourishment and unbearable conditions caused various diseases among us. Grave stomach ailments were the most wide-spread, and an incurable disease that resulted in swollen feet also took its toll. People's legs were so swollen that they not move them at all. More and more of these were taken to the crematorium, where they were murdered by methods unknown to me. When on 26 June 1942 the number of these unfortunates had been reduced to 70, I decided to take the first opportunity and to volunteer for transfer to Auschwitz.

17. Internment at Auschwitz, 30 June 1942–September or October 1942.

I handed in my prisoner's uniform on 27 June 1942, received civilian clothes, and travelled in a transport to Auschwitz. We travelled forty-eight hours in sealed boxcars, without water or food, and arrived at Auschwitz half dead. There we were greeted by the sign over the gate, "Arbeit macht frei."²³ The court was clean and neat, and the brick buildings and the lawns made a good impression on us after the primitive and dirty barracks at Lublin-Maidenek. We thought that we had made a good change. First we were led to a cellar where we received tea and bread. Next day they took away our clothes, shaved us, tattooed our number on the left arm over the wrist and issued prisoners' uniforms similar to those we had had at Lublin. After our personal data were taken, we became regular political prisoners of the Auschwitz reception center.

We were billeted in Block No. 17, where we slept on the ground. Slovak girls were quartered in the next row of buildings, separated from us by a wall. They had been deported from Slovakia in March and April 1942. We were put to work on the construction of the enormous “Buna” plant. Work began at 3 a.m. Food consisted of potato or carrot soup at noon and 30 dekagrams of bread in the evening. We were cruelly beaten during work. Since our place of work was situated outside the outer guard belt, the area was divided into squared 10 meter by ten meters. Each square was guarded by one SS man, and anyone crossing the borders of his square during work was instantly shot as “attempting to escape.” It often happened that an SS man ordered a prisoner to fetch some object from outside his square. If the prisoner obeyed and stepped over the line, he was shot. The work was very hard. We were scarcely permitted to rest and had to march back to the camp in military order. Whoever did not keep in step or broke ranks was cruelly beaten or sometimes shot. When I joined this labor crew, about 3000 men were working, of whom 2000 were Slovak Jews. Very few of us could stand the hard work because of the poor food. Many attempted to escape, although they had no hope to success. We witnessed several hangings each week.

²³ See footnote No. 6.

After a few weeks of painful labor, a typhus epidemic broke out in camp. The weak prisoners died off by the hundreds. Construction on the “Buna” plant stopped and the camp was closed. Those who remained alive at their place of work were sent to the quarry at the end of July 1942. Work here was even more difficult, if that was possible, than at the “Buna” plant. We could never accomplish as much as was wanted by our supervisors since we were too weak. Most of us had swollen legs. Our labor gang was reported for laziness and negligence, and a commission came to examine each one of us thoroughly. All those with swollen legs or whom the commission found to be unfit were segregated. Although my legs hurt badly, I mastered my pain and stepped out smartly when called before the commission. I was found fit. About 200 of the 300 persons were declared ill. They were immediately sent to Birkenau where they were gassed.

After this I was detailed to work at the DAW.²⁴ My job was painting ski boards. We had to finish a minimum of 110 pieces per day; anyone who could not complete that amount was flogged in the evening. We had to work very hard to avoid the evening punishment. Another group manufactured boxes for shells. One one occasion 15,000 such boxes were finished and were found to be a few centimeters shorter than ordered. Thereupon several Jewish prisoners, among them one Erdelyi (who was said to have relatives in Trencin-Ban), were shot for sabotage.

The Jewish girls from Slovakia who lived beyond our wall had been transferred to Birkenau in August 1942. I had occasion to talk to them briefly. They were starved, dressed in old rags of Russian uniforms, and were barefoot or wore wooden shoes. Their hair was shorn and they were completely neglected.

We underwent a very severe physical examination on the same day (sic). All those suspected of typhus were sent to the birchwood, while we who had been declared fit were sent stark naked into the evacuated and disinfected barracks. We were again shaved, bathed, and given new clothes. I learned by accident that there was a vacancy in the cleaning squad (Aufraumungskommando), volunteered, and received the assignment.

A hundred prisoners, all Jews, worked in this cleaning squad. We worked in a completely isolated part of the camp where mountains of luggage, consisting of rucksacks, suitcases, and other such pieces were stacked in warehouses. Our job was to open this luggage and to sort the objects found. We filled suitcases with combs, mirrors, sugar, cans of food, chocolate, drugs, and so forth. The suitcases were stored according to their contents. Clothes and underwear were taken to a large barrack where they were sorted and packed by the Slovak Jewish girls. These good were then loaded into railroad cars and shipped out. Unusable clothing was sent to a Berlin welfare association. Valuables, such as money, gold, foreign currency, and precious stones, were supposed to be handed in to the political division. SS supervisors stole a substantial part of these valuables, and much was also taken by the prisoners working there. The boss of this assortment detail, who is recognized as an expert in the field, is Albert Davidovics, Iglo (Jihlava?) He occupies the same post to this day.

SS Sturmfuehrer Wickleff, commander of this detachment, was a brute who often beat the girls. These girls came daily from Birkenau to work. They told us unbelievable stories about conditions prevailing there. They were beaten and tortured. Mortality was higher among them than it was among the men. “Selections” were made twice weekly, and there were new girls daily to replace those who had been “selected” or who had died in some other way.

On my first nightshift I had occasion to see how transports coming to Auschwitz were treated. A transport consisting of Polish Jews arrived. They had travelled without water and about a hundred were dead on their arrival. When the doors of the cars were opened, the Jews, completely weakened by the long journey and privations, were driven out wailing. Quick beating by SS men speeded up the unloading. Then the unfortunates were lined up in rows of five. Our task was to remove the corpses, those half dead, and parcels from the railroad cars. We placed the bodies at a collecting point. All those unable to stand on their feet were declared dead. Parcels were thrown into one stack. The cars had to be thoroughly cleaned so that no trace of the transport remained. A commission of the political division then selected ten percent of the men and five percent of the women, who were assigned to camp. The remainder was loaded on trucks and taken to the birchwood, where they were gassed. Corpses and those half dead were also loaded on trucks. These were burned in the birchwood without being gassed first. Small children were often thrown on the truck with the corpses. Parcels were moved by truck to the warehouses, where they were sorted as described above.

²⁴ See footnote No. 5.

Typhus raged during July and September 1942 in the Birkenau and Auschwitz camps, especially among the women. Those who were ill were not treated at all. At first typhus suspects were killed by means of phenol injections, later they were gassed in large numbers. Within two months 15–20,000 prisoners perished, most of them Jew. The women's camp suffered particularly. They had no sanitary installations at all and the girls were full of lice. Big "selections" were held weekly. Regardless of the weather, the girls were forced to line up naked for these "selections," and to wait in deadly fear to see whether they would be "selected" on that occasion or would have a week's grace.

Many men and women committed suicide. They simply touched the high-tension wire of the inner guard belt. So many women perished that not more than five percent [sic] of the original number survived. There are 400 girls at Auschwitz and Birkenau at this time, the remainder of the original 7000. The majority of these have secured camp administration jobs for themselves. One of them named Kata (I do not know her family name), from Bystrica n/V., fills the high position of camp clerk. About a hundred Slovak girls are employed in the Auschwitz staff building. They do clerical work for both camps and interpret for interrogators who interview prisoners. Some of the girls work in the kitchen and laundry of the staff building. Lately the Slovak girls are better dressed, as they have been able to complete their wardrobe from the stocks of the Aufraumungskommando. Many even wear silk stockings. They are now letting their hair grow and altogether are much better off than in the past. This does not apply, of course, to the several thousand other prisoners in the women's camp. The Slovak Jewish girls are the oldest inmates of the women's camp and thus have a somewhat privileged position.

I soon lost my comparatively comfortable job [October 1942?] with the Aufraumungskommando, and as punishment was transferred to Birkenau, where I spent one and a half years. On 7 April 1944 I succeeded in escaping with my companion.

A CONSERVATIVE ESTIMATE OF THE NUMBER OF JEWS EXTERMINATED AT BIRKENAU FROM APRIL 1942 TO APRIL 1944, ACCORDING TO COUNTRIES OF ORIGIN (by the two escapees):

Poland (shipped by trucks)	c. 300,000
Poland (shipped by trains)	600,000
Holland	100,000
Greece	45,000
France	150,000
Belgium	50,000
Germany	60,000
Yugoslavia, Italy, Norway	50,000
Lithuania	50,000
Bohemia, Moravia, Austria	30,000
Slovakia	30,000
Various camps of foreign Jews in Poland	300,000
TOTAL	c. 1,765,000

Source: OSS Field Memo 257 (FR-425). Report by the Office of Strategic Services, National Archive Record Group 226.

146. EXCERPTS FROM REPORT BY KURT GERSTEIN REGARDING EXTERMINATION CAMPS, MAY 1945

Kurt Gerstein was an SS officer assigned to the Hygiene Institute of the Waffen SS. His duties included assisting in the enactment of the Nazis' Final Solution. He was responsible for the delivery of large quantities of Zyklon B to Auschwitz and other camps, and he witnessed a carbon monoxide gassing of Jews at the Belzec death camp. By April 1945, as defeat loomed for the Third Reich, Gerstein surrendered to French authorities in the town of Reutlingen. In his statement, he declared that he had surrendered to make available his knowledge to punish those responsible for the atrocities. Transferred to Paris, he wrote his final account, now known as the Gerstein Report. Here, he made a full disclosure of what he had witnessed as an SS officer. The following excerpts form part of his otherwise lengthy and detailed report.

TRANSLATION OF DOCUMENT NO. 1553-PS
OFFICE OF CHIEF OF COUNSEL FOR WAR CRIMES

(Page 1 of original.)
SECRET.

CIOS CONSOLIDATED ADVANCE FIELD TEAM (VII)
ASSESSMENT REPORT

Stamp:
Received
22 May 1945

... 5. DESCRIPTION: The assessors met Dr. [Editor's Note: Kurt] Gerstein by a chance encounter in a requisitioned hotel in Rottweil. He stated that we were the first British or Americans he had met and that he wanted to tell us of his experiences in German concentration camp. He informed us that he was a close personal friend of Monseigneur Niemoeller, and that working as a secret agent for him he had obtained a post of responsibility in the Nazi party. In this capacity he attended conferences at which the fate of the inmates of concentration camps was discussed. When asked if he knew of the use of gas chambers for killing the inmates he replied that as he was an engineer he had often been made to advise in the operation of these chambers. He stated that the two gases used were hydrocyanic acid and exhaust gases from internal combustion engines. He could not give any figures for the concentrations employed and implied that no particular attention was paid to this point. He stated, however, that in the case of HCN death was almost instantaneous, while a delay of 15 to 20 minutes occurred when exhaust gases were used.

Dr. Gerstein only escaped from the Nazis about three weeks ago; he is still visibly affected by his experiences and found difficulty in speaking of them. He was most anxious, however that the guilty parties should be brought to trial for their crimes and stated that he was fully prepared to act as a witness in any court. He hoped that his information would be passed as soon as possible to the appropriate authorities in London. ...

S E C R E T

9. DATE OF ASSESSMENT. 5 May 1943 [Editor's Note: the year should be 1945]

10. ASSESSOR'S NAMES. Major D. C. Evans
Mr. J. W. Haight
6th Army Group
CIOS Item 8 of Group 3. ...

SUMMARY

These are papers by and about Dr. Kurt GERSTEIN, certified engineer, an informant who discloses what he knows about concentration camp methods of extermination.

One of the documents is an "Assessment Report" from CIOS, Consolidated Advance Field Team (VII), discussing Dr. GERSTEIN. According to this report, Dr. GERSTEIN gave the impression that he was anxious to see the guilty parties brought to trial for their crimes. He handed over the assessors a note in English and a seven page typewritten statement in French, as well as some invoices from the firm of DEGESCH for the supply of ZYKLON "B" (Prussic Acid) to concentration camp (all attached hereto).

GERSTEIN'S statement in French warrants full-length translation. In it he relates his whole life history up to recently. He entered the Nazi party 2 May 33 but was excluded 2 October 36, for what he terms "activities against party and state". He was persecuted by the Gestapo from then on. In 1941, with the aid of 2 Gestapo members, he entered the SS Army (Waffen SS) because he wanted to "see this machinery and disclose it to the people".

Because of Medico-Technical training, he was ordered to SS Main Administrative Office, Section D-Hygiene. In 1942 he was appointed Chief of "Disinfectants" (prussic acid is one) and as such he was to provide concentration camps with prussic acid, which was used to exterminate people.

He describes in detail one of his visits to Concentration Camp, Lublin, where he was shown around by SS Major General GROBOCNKE, a man who received his orders from Hitler and Himmler directly, and who ordered GERSTEIN to change the extermination from "an ancient Diesel exhaust gas system to a thing of more toxic and faster-working properties—prussic acid".

He goes on to discuss his efforts to make the prussic acid disappear i.e., to have it used as a disinfectant.

To his statement, Dr. GERSTEIN attached a list of Anti-Nazis in Berlin who gathered around him in his apartment, W-35, Buelowstrasse 47. He also calls himself a friend of Pastor Niemoeller.

The other attached papers are invoices for prussic acid which he claims were never paid. There were two ways of making "ZYKLON B" disappear. One way was not to pay for it and blame it on non-delivery by the firm DEGESCH (Frankfurt am Main) and the other way was to tell the officials that the acid had arrived in a dangerous state of decomposition. . . .

[Editor's note: What follows is from Gerstein's report]

. . . Hearing of the massacres of idiots and insane people at Grafeneck, Hadamar, etc., [Editor's note: This is a reference to the Nazi so-called "Euthanasia" Program] shocked and deeply wounded, having such a case in my own family, I had but one desire, to see, to gain an insight of this whole machine and then shout about it to the whole world! With the help of two references written by the two Gestapo employees who had dealt with my case, it was not difficult for me to enter the Waffen SS. March 10 to June 2, 1941, elementary instruction as a soldier at Hamburg-Langenhorn, Arnhem and Oranienburg, together with forty doctors. Because of my twin studies—technology and medicine—I was ordered to enter the medical-technology branch of the SS-Fuehrungshauptamt (SS operation Main Office)—Medical Branch of the Waffen SS—Amtsgruppe D (Division D), Hygiene Department. Within this branch, I chose for myself the job of immediately constructing disinfecting apparati and filters for drinking water for the troops, the prison camps and the concentration camps. My close knowledge of the industry caused me to succeed quickly where my predecessors had failed. Thus, it was possible to decrease considerably the death toll of prisoners.—On account of my successes, I very soon became a Lieutenant. In December 1941, the tribunal which had decreed my exclusion from the NSDAP obtained knowledge of my having entered the Waffen SS. Considerable efforts were made in order to remove and persecute me. But due to my successes. I was declared sincere and indispensable. In January 1942, I was appointed Chief of the Technical Branch of Disinfection, which also included the branch for strong poison gases for disinfection. On 8 June 1942, the SS Stermbahnfuhrer GUENTHER of the RSHA entered my office. He was in plain clothes and I did not know him. He ordered me to get a hundred kilograms of prussic acid and to accompany him to a place which was only known to the driver of the truck. We left for the potassium factory . . . Once the truck was loaded, we left for Lublin (Poland). We took with us Professor PFANNENSTIEL Md. . . . As Lublin, we were received by SS Gruppenfuhrer GLOBOCNIK. He told us: this is one of the most secret matters there are on, even the most secret. Whoever talks of this shall be shot immediately. Yesterday, two talkative ones died. Then he explained to us: at the present moment—August 17, 1942—there are three installations:

- 1.) Belzec, on the Lublin-Lemberg road, in the sector of the Russian demarcation line. Maximum 15,000 persons a day. (Seen!)
- 2.) Sobibor, I do not know exactly where it is located. Not seen. 20,000 persons per day.
- 3.) Treblinka, 120 km NNE of Warsaw. 25,000 persons per day. Seen!
- 4.) Maidanek, near Lublin. Seen in the state of preparation. Globocnik then said: You will have to handle the sterilization of very huge quantities of clothes, 10 or 20 times the result of the clothes and textiles collection (Spinnstoffsammlung) which is only arranged in order to conceal the source of those Jewish, Polish, Czech and other clothes. Your other duties will be to change the method of our gas chambers, (which are run on the present time with the exhaust gases of an old Diesel engine), employing more poisonous material, having a quicker effect, prussic acid. But the Fuehrer and HIMMLER, who were here on August 15—the day before yesterday—ordered that I accompany, personally all those who are to see the installations. Then Professor PFANNENSTIEL asked: "What does the Fuehrer say?" Then GLOBOCNIK, now Chief of Police and SS for the Adriatic Riviera to Trieste, answered: "Quicker, quicker, carry out the whole program!" he said. And then dr. Herbert LINDNER, Ministerialdirektor in the Ministry of the Interior said: "But would it not be better to burn the bodies instead of burying them? A coming generation might think differently of these matters!" .. And the GLOBOCNIK replied: "But, gentlemen, if ever, after us (handwritten notation:). . . . there should be) such a cowardly and rotten generation should arise that they do not understand our so good and necessary work, then, gentlemen, all National Socialism will have been for nothing.—On the contrary, bronze plates should be buried with the inscription that it was we, we who had the courage to achieve this gigantic task".—And Hitler said: "Yes, my good GLOBOCNIK, that is the word, that is my opinion, too."—The next day we left for Belzec. A small special station of two platforms leans against a hill of yellow sand, immediately to the north of the road and railway: Lublin-Lemberg. . . . GLOBOCNIK introduced me to SS-Hauptsturmfuehrer OVERMAYER from Pirmasens, who with great restraint showed me the installations. That day no dead were to be seen, but the smell of the whole region, even from the large road, was pestilential. Next to the small station there was a large barrack marked "Cloakroom" and a door marked "Valuables". Next a chamber with a hundred “barber” chairs. Then came a corridor, 150 meters long, in the open air and with barbed wire on both sides. There was a sign-board: “To the bath and inhalations.” Before us we saw a house like a bath house with concrete troughs to the right and left containing geraniums or other flowers. After climbing a small staircase, 3 garage-like rooms on each side, 4 x 5 meters large and 1.90 meters high. At the back, invisible wooden doors. On the roof a Star of David made out of copper. At the entrance to the building, the inscription: Foundation Fackenholt. That was all I noticed on that particular afternoon. Next morning, a few minutes before 7, I was informed: In 10 minutes the first train will arrive.—And indeed, a few minutes later the first train came in from Lemberg. 45 cars, containing 6,700 persons; 1450 of whom were already dead on their arrival. Behind the little barbed-wire opening, children, yellow, scared half to death, women, men. The train arrives: 200 Ukrainians, forced to do this work, open the doors, and drive all the people out of the coaches with leather whips. Then, through a huge loudspeaker instructions are given: To undress completely, also to give up false teeth and glasses—some in the barracks, others right in the open air,—To tie one’s shoes together with a little piece of string handed everyone by a small Jewish boy of 4 years of age, hand in all valuables and money at the window marked “Valuables”, without bond, without receipt. Then the women and girls go to the hairdresser, who cuts off their hair in one or two strokes, after which it vanished into huge potato bags “to be used for special submarine equipment, door mats, etc.”, as the SS-Unterscharfuhrer on duty told me. Then, the march begins: Right and left, barbed wire, behind, two dozen Ukrainians with guns. Led by a young girl of striking beauty they approach. With police-Captain Wirth, I stand right before the death chambers. Completely naked by march by, men women, girls, babies, even one-legged person, all of them naked. In one corner, a strong SS-man tells the poor devils, in a strong deep voice: “Nothing whatever will happen to you. All you have to do is to breathe Deeply, it strengthens the lungs; this inhalation is a necessary measure against contagious diseases, it is very good disinfectant!” Asked what was to become of them, he answered: “Well, of course the men will have to work, building streets and houses. But the women do not have to. If they wish to, they can help in house or kitchen.” Once more, a little bit of hope for some of these poor people, enough to make them march on without resistance to the death chambers. Most of them, though, know everything, the odor has given them a clear indication of their fate. And then they walk up the little staircase—and see the truth!

Mothers, nurse-maids, with babies at their breasts, naked, lots of children of all ages, naked too; they hesitate, but they enter the gas chambers, most of them without a word, pushed by the other behind them, chased by the whips of the SS men. A Jewess of about 40 years of age, with eyes like torches, calls down the blood of her children on the heads of their murderers. Five lashes into her face, dealt by the whip of Police Captain Wirth himself, chase her into the gas chamber. Many of them say their prayers, others ask: who will give us the water for our death? (Jewish rite?). Within the chamber, the SS press the people closely together, Captain Wirth had ordered: “Fill them up full.” Naked men stand on the feet of the others. 7–800 crushed together on 25 square meters, in 45 cubic meters! The doors are closed. Meanwhile the rest of the transport, all naked wait. Somebody says to me: Naked, in winter! But they can die that way!” The answer was: “Well, that’s just what they are here for!” And at that moment I understood why it was called “Foundation Hockenholt”. Hockenholt was the man in charge of the Diesel engine, the exhaust gasses of which were to kill those poor devils. SS-Unterscharfuhrer Hockenholt tries to set the Diesel engine moving. But it does not start! Captain Wirth comes along. It is plain that he is afraid because I am a witness to this breakdown. Yes, indeed, I see everything and wait. Everything is registered by my stopwatch. 50 minutes 70 minutes—the Diesel engine does not start! The people wait in their gas chambers. In vain. One can hear them cry. “Same as in a synagogue”, says SS-Sturmfuhrer Professor Dr. Pfannenstiel, Professor for Public Health at the university of Marburg/Lahn, holding his car close to the wooden door. Captin Wirth, furious deals the Ukrainian who is helping Heckenholt 11 or 12 lashes in the face with his whip.—After 2 hours and 49 minutes.—as registered by my stopwatch—the Diesel engine starts. Up to that moment the people in the four already filled chambers were alive, 4 time 750 persons in 4 times 45 cubic meters. Another 25 minutes go by. Many of the people it is true are dead at that point. One can see this through the little window through which the electric lamp reveals, for a moment, the inside of the chamber. After 28 minutes only a few are living. After 32 minutes, finally all are dead! From the other side, Jewish workers open the wooden doors. In return for their terrible job, they have been promised their freedom and a small percentage of the valuables and the money found. Like stone statues, the dead are still standing, there having been no room to fall or bend over. Though dead, the families can still be recognized; their hands still clasped. It is difficult to separate them in order to clear the chamber for the next load. The bodies are thrown out, blue, wet with sweat and urine, the legs covered with excrement and menstrual blood. Everywhere among the others, the bodies of babies and children. But there is not time! Two dozen workers are engaged in checking the mouths, opening them by means of iron hooks. "Gold to the left without gold to the right!"—Others check anus and genitals to look for money, diamonds, gold etc. Dentists with chisels tear out the gold teeth bridges or caps. In the center of everything, Captain Wirth. He is on familiar ground here. He hands me a large tin full of teeth and says: "Estimate for yourself the weight of gold. This is only from yesterday and the day before yesterday! And you would not believe what we find here every day! dollars, diamonds, gold! But look for yourself!" . . . The bodies were then thrown into large ditches of about 100 x 20 x 12 meters, located near the gas chambers. After a few days the bodies would swell up and the whole contents of the ditch would rise 2–3 meters high because of the gases that developed in the bodies. After a few more days swelling would stop and the bodies would collapse. The next day the ditches were filled again, and covered with 10 centimeters of sand. A little later, I heard, they constructed grills out of rails and burned the bodies on them with Diesel oil and gasoline in order to make them disappear. At Belcek and Treblinka nobody bothered to take anything approaching an exact count of the persons killed. The figures announced by the BBC are inaccurate. Actually, about 25.000.000 persons were killed; not only Jews, however, but especially Poles and Czechoslovakians, too, who were, in the opinion of the Nazis, of bad stock. Most of them died anonymously. Commissions of so-called doctors, actually nothing but young SS-men in white coats, rode in limousines through the towns and villages of Poland and Czechoslovakia to select the old, tubercular and sick people and to cause them to disappear, shortly afterwards, in the gas chambers. They were the Poles and Czechs (category) NO. III, who did not deserve to live because they were unable to work. The Police-Captain, Wirth, asked me not to propose any other kind of gas chamber in Berlin, to leave everything the way it was. I lied—as I did in each case all the time—that the prussic acid had already deteriorated in shipping and had become very dangerous, that I was therefore obliged to bury it. This was done right away. The next day, Captain Wirth's car took us to Treblinka, about 75 miles NNE of Warsaw. The installations of this death center differed scarcely from those at Belcek, but they were still larger. There were 8 gas chambers and whole mountains of clothes and underwear about 35–40 meters high. Then, in our "Honor" a banquet was given, attended by all of the employees of the institution. The Obersturmbannfuhrer, Professor Pfanzenstiel MD., Professor Hygiene at the University of Marburg/Lahn, made a speech: "Your task is a great duty, a duty so useful and so necessary." To me alone he talked of this institution in terms of "beauty of the task, humane cause", and to all of them: "Looking at the bodies of these Jews one understands the greatness of your good work!" . . . We left for Warsaw by car. While I waited in vain for a vacant berth I met Baron von Otter, Secretary of the Swedish Legation. As all the beds were occupied we spent the night in the corridor of the sleeper. There, with the facts still fresh in my memory, I told him everything, asking him to report it to his government and to all the Allies. . . . Some weeks later I met Baron von Otter twice again. He told me that he had sent a report to the Swedish Government, a report which, according to him, had a strong influence on the relations between Sweden and Germany. I was not very successful in my attempt to report everything to the chief of the Vatican Legation. I was asked whether I was a soldier, and then was refused an interview. I then sent a detailed report to Dr. Winter, secretary of the Berlin Episcopate, in order to have him pass it on to the bishop of Berlin and through him to the Vatican Legation. When I came out of the Vatican Legation in the Rauchstrasse in Berlin I had a very dangerous encounter with a police agent who followed me; however, after some very unpleasant moments I succeeded in giving him the slip. I have to add, furthermore, that in the beginning of 1944, SS-Sturmbannfuhrer Guenther of the RSHA asked me for very large supplies of prussic acid for obscure use. The acid was to be delivered to his business office in Berlin, Kurfuerstenstrasse. I succeeded in making him believe that this was impossible because there was too much danger involved. It was a question of several car-loads of poisonous acid, enough to kill a large number of persons, actually millions! He had told me he was not sure whether, when, for what kind of persons, how and where this poison was needed. I do not know exactly what were the intentions of the RSHA and the SD. But later on, I thought of the words of Goebbels of "slamming the door behind them" should Nazism never succeed. Maybe they wanted to kill a large part of the German people, maybe the foreign workers, maybe the prisoners of war—I do not know! Anyhow, I caused the poison to disappear for disinfection purposes, as soon as it came in. There was some danger for me in this, but if I had been asked where the poisonous acid was, I would have answered that it was already in a state of dangerous deterioration and that therefore I had to use up as disinfectant! I am sure that Guenther, the son of the Guenther of the Racial Theory, had, according to his own words, orders to secure the acid for the—eventual—extermination of millions of human beings, perhaps also concentration camps. I have here bills for 2,175 kgs, but, actually about 8,500 kgs are involved; enough to kill 8 million people. I had the bills sent to me in my name; I said this was for reasons of secrecy; however, I did this in order to be somewhat free in my decisions and to have a better possibility of making the poisonous acid disappear. I never paid for these shipments in order to avoid refunding which would have reminded the SD of these stocks. The director of Logosch, who had made those shipments, told me that he had shipped prussic acid in ampules for the purpose of killing human beings. On another occasion Guenther consulted me about the possibility of killing a large number of Jews in the open air in the fortification trenches of Maria-Theresienstadt. In order to prevent the execution of this diabolic proposal, I declared that this method was impracticable. Some time later I heard that the SD had secured, through other channels, the prussic acid to kill these unfortunate people at Theresienstadt. The most disgusting camps were not Oranienburg, Dachau, or Belson, but Auschwitz (Oswice) and Mauthausen-Gusen near Linz/Danube. Those are the places in which millions of people disappeared in gas chambers or gas-chamber-like cars. The method of killing the children was to hold a tampon with prussic acid under their nose.

I myself witnessed experiments on living persons in concentration camps being continued until the victim died. Thus, in the concentration camp for women, Ravensbrueck near Fuerstenberg-Mecklenburg, SS-Hautsturmfuehrer Grundlach MD. made such experiments. In my office, I read many reports of experiments made at Buchenwald, such as the administration of up to 100 tablets of Pervitino per day. Other experiments—every time on about 100–200 persons—were made with serums and lymph, etc., till the death of the person. Himmler personally had reserved for himself the granting of permission to conduct these experiments.

At Oranienburg, I saw how all the prisoners who were there for being perverts (homosexuals) disappeared in one single day.

I avoided frequent visits to the concentration camps because it was customary—especially at Mauthausen-Gusen near Linz-Danube—to hang one or two prisoners in honor of the visitors. An Mauthausen it was customary to make Jewish workers work in a quarry at great altitude. After a while the SS on duty would say: "Pay attention, in a couple of minutes there will be an accident." And, indeed, one or two minutes later, some Jews were thrown from the cliff and fell dead at our feet. "Work accident" was written in the files of the dead.—Dr. Fritz Krantz, an anti-Nazi SS-Hauptsturmfuehrer, often told me of such events. He condemned them severely and often published facts about them. The crimes discovered at Belson, Oranienburg, etc., are not considerable in comparison with the other committed at Auschwitz and Mauthausen.

I plan to write a book about my adventures with the Nazis. I am ready to swear to the absolute truth of all my statements.

(signed in handwritten:) Kurt GERSTEIN

[Editor's Note: Gerstein's report continues with a list of anti-Nazis, and correspondence regarding, and copies of bills for Zyklon B.]

Source: Office of Chief Counsel for War Crimes, Document No. 1553-PS.

147. AFFIDAVIT OF NOVEMBER 26, 1945, OF WILHELM HÖTTL REGARDING EICHMANN'S ESTIMATE OF THE NUMBER OF JEWS KILLED DURING THE HOLOCAUST, LATE 1944

Wilhelm Höttl, SS-Sturmbannfuehrer and part of the German Intelligence Service, gave this affidavit in which he recounts a conversation with Adolf Eichmann, SS-Obersturmbannfuehrer. During that conversation, Eichmann stated that approximately 6 million Jews had been killed: 4 million in the extermination camps and the remainder through other means, especially the actions of the Einsatzgruppen, mobile killing units that followed behind the German armies as they made their way into Russia, tasked with killing all Jews and communists who were still alive. Of interest here is that Himmler, to whom Eichmann had reported the total number of 6 million, rejected that number as being too low.

1312 Affidavit of November 26, 1945, of Wilhelm Höttl Regarding Eichmann's Estimate

AFFIDAVIT OF DR. WILHELM HOETTL
26 November 1945

I, Wilhelm Hoettl, state herewith under oath:

My name is Dr. Wilhelm Hoettl, SS-Sturmbannführer (Major of the SS). My occupation until the German collapse was that of a reporter and deputy Gruppenleiter in Amt VI (Office VI) of the Reichs Security Office [Reichssicherheitshauptamt].

Amt VI of the RSHA was the so-called Foreign Section of the Security Service and it was engaged in the Intelligence Service in all countries in the world. It corresponded somewhat to the English Intelligence Service. The group to which I belonged was occupied in the Intelligence Service of South-eastern Europe (the Balkans).

At the end of August 1944 I was talking to SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, whom I had known since 1938. The conversation took place in my home in Budapest.

According to my knowledge Eichmann was, at that time, Abteilungsleiter in Amt IV (the Gestapo) of the Reich Security Office [Reichssicherheitshauptamt] and in addition to that he had been ordered by Himmler to get a hold of the Jews in all the European countries and to transport them to Germany. Eichmann was then very much impressed with the fact that Rumania had withdrawn from the war in those days. Therefore, he had come to me to get information about the military situation which I received daily from the Hungarian Ministry of War and from the Commander of the Waffen-SS in Hungary. He expressed his conviction that Germany had now lost the war and that he, personally, had no further chance. He knew that he would be considered one of the main war criminals by the United Nations since he had millions of Jewish lives on his conscience. I asked him how many that was, to which he answered that although the number was a great Reich secret, he would tell me since I, a historian, would be interested and that he would probably not return anyhow from his command in Rumania. He had, shortly before that, made a report to Himmler, as the latter wanted to know the exact number of Jews who had been killed. On the basis of his information he had obtained the following result:

Approximately four million Jews had been killed in the various extermination camps while an additional two million met death in other ways, the major part of which were shot by operational squads of the Security Police during the campaign against Russia.

Himmler was not satisfied with the report since, in his opinion, the number of Jews, who had been killed, must have been more than six million. Himmler had stated, that he would send a man from his Office of Statistics to Eichmann, so that he could make a new report on the basis of Eichmann's material, in which exact figures should be worked out.

I have to believe that this information, given to me by Eichmann, was correct, as he, among all the persons in question, certainly had the best survey of the figures of the Jews who had been murdered. In the first place, he "delivered" so to speak the Jews to the extermination camps through his special squads and knew, therefore, the exact figure and, in the second place, as Abteilungsleiter in Amt IV (the Gestapo) of the RSHA, who was also responsible for Jewish matters, he knew indeed better than anyone else the number of Jews who had died in other ways.

In addition to that, Eichmann was at that moment in such a state of mind as a result of the events, that he certainly had no intention of telling me something that was not true.

I, myself, know the details of this conversation so well because I was, naturally, very much affected and I had already, prior to the German collapse, given detailed data about it to American Quarters in a neutral foreign country with which I was in touch at that time.

I hereby swear, that the above statements have been made by me voluntarily and without duress or compulsion, and that the above statements are true according to my best knowledge and belief.

[signed]

Dr. Wilhelm Hoettl

Signed and sworn to before me in Nurnberg, Germany this 26th day of November 1945.

[signed]

Frederick L. Felton
Lieutenant USNR
#253345

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 380–382, Doc. 2738-PS.

148. AFFIDAVIT OF SEPTEMBER 13, 1945, OF DR. REZSOE (RUDOLF) KASTNER, ESPECIALLY REGARDING THE HUNGARIAN JEWISH COMMUNITY IN 1944

Rezsoe (Rudolf) Kastner was a controversial figure. A Jew, he entered into negotiations with Adolf Eichmann (referred to as "Aichmann" in this document) in an effort to save Hungarian Jews. Although some saw any kind of negotiations with the Germans as collaboration, Kastner continued talks with Eichmann, who proposed that the Nazis would exchange Jewish lives for supplies for the German war effort, a program called Blood for Goods (Blut für Ware). The proposal was not carried out, although Kastner was able to save some 1,368 Jews (including his family and a number of rich and prominent Jews, thus increasing the controversy surrounding him) on what became known as the "Kastner Train." The affidavit shown here is a detailed report on the fate of the Hungarian Jewish community before and after Germany invaded Hungary in March 1944. After settling in Israel after the war, Kastner sued the author of a pamphlet who accused him of collaboration. Although Kastner was eventually exonerated by the Supreme Court of Israel, he became a hated man in his adopted land, and he was assassinated in Tel Aviv in 1957.

Dr. Rezsoe (Rudolph) Kastner, being duly sworn deposes and says:

I was born in 1906 at Kolozsvár, (now Cluj, Rumania), solicitor and journalist, residing at Chemin Krieg, 16, Pension Sergey, Geneva, now temporarily at 109, Clarence Gate Gardens, London.

I was in Budapest until November 28, 1944; as one of the leaders of the Hungarian Zionist organization I not only witnessed closely the Jewish persecution, dealt with officials of the Hungarian puppet government and the Gestapo but also gained insight into the operation of the Gestapo, their organization and witnessed the various phases of Jewish persecution. The following biographical data of mine might be of interest:

Between 1925–1940: Political Editor of "Uj Kelet" Jewish daily newspaper published in Koloszvar; Secretary-General of the Parliamentary Group of the Jewish Party in Rumania.

Between 1929–1931: Worked in Bucharest; member of the Executive of the Palestine Office of the Jewish Agency.

In Dec. 1940: Being a Jew I was excluded from the Chamber of Lawyers; "Uj Kelet" the daily, was closed down by the Hungarian authorities: I moved to Budapest.

Between 1943–1945: Associate President of the Hungarian Zionist Organization.

July 1942: I have been called up for Labor Service: together with 440 other Jewish intellectuals and citizens we worked in South-Eastern Transylvania on fortifications along the Hungarian-Rumanian border.

In Dec. 1942: I was demobilized. Returned to Budapest. Some time before being drafted I have begun to organize relief work for refugee Slovakian Jews. After my demobilization I succeeded in establishing—through diplomatic couriers—contact with the Relief Committee of the Jewish Agency, working in Istanbul. On their instructions I have taken over the leadership of the Relief Committee in Budapest. Our task was—

1. To help to smuggle Jews from Slovakia and Poland into Hungary to save them from the threat of the gas chamber.

2. To feed and clothe them and to assist in their emigration to Palestine.

3. To forward the minutes based on the declaration of the refugees on the question of deportation and annihilation of Jews to Istanbul, later to Switzerland, to the hands of the representatives of the Jewish Agency and the Joint Distribution Committee.

4. To cooperate with the Relief Committee of Bratislava in matters concerning saving, hiding of refugee Jews and exchange of information. After German occupation of Hungary, on the 19th March 1944, the Relief Committee concentrated its efforts on the saving of Hungarian Jewry.

5. The Relief Committee of the Jewish agency of which I was a president was engaged in helping Allied prisoners of war. Moreover we sent confidential reports to the Allies through Istanbul and Switzerland about our connections with officials of the German government. We helped to hide and supported leaders of the Hungarian underground and gave a wealth of information to those Hungarian authorities which were working against the Germans. During the siege of Budapest, when I was already out of the country, other members of the Relief Committee participated in street fights against the Germans.

On 15 May 1944: One of my collaborators, Eugen Brand was sent by the Germans to Istanbul to pass on certain business proposals in connection with saving of the Hungarian Jews.

On 21 August 1944: I traveled from Budapest under German escort to the Swiss frontier and acted as intermediary for the first conversation between Kurt Becher and Saly

Mayer, Swiss representative of the Joint D. C. to discuss the price of abandoning the gassing. The conversation took place between St. Margareten and Hoechst on the bridge. From there I returned to Budapest.

On 14 October 1944: I traveled for the second time to St. Margarethen.

On 30 October 1944: I traveled to St. Gallen, accompanied by Kurt Becher and Kr. Wilhelm Billitz, director of the Manfred Weiss Works. On this occasion an interview took place between Becher and McClelland, Swiss representative of the War Refugee Board in the Savoy Hotel, at Zurich. I returned to Budapest.

On 28 November 1944: I left on German instructions to the Swiss border.

On 20 December 1944: I entered Switzerland.

On 27 December 1944: I started out to travel back to Budapest, but could only get to Vienna. The Red Army encircled Budapest.

On 29 December 44–28 March 1945: I remained in Vienna. Afterwards toured Bratislava-Spitz an der Donau—Berlin—Bergen Belsen Hamburg—Berlin—Theresianstadt.

On 19 April 1945 I crossed the Swiss border.

The Germans entered into discussion with leaders of the Jewish community for reasons of administrative efficiency. We conducted the discussion in the hope that we might be able to save some human lives. By holding the ax over our heads they made us responsible for financial contributions and other exactions imposed on the Jewish community. Ultimately the leaders of the “Jewish council” and other intermediaries were also scheduled for extermination. The SS and the Gestapo was particularly intent on liquidating those who had direct knowledge of their operations. I escaped the fate of the other Jewish leaders because the complete liquidation of the Hungarian Jews was a failure and also because SS Sturmbannführer Becher took me under his wings in order to establish an eventual alibi for himself. He was anxious to demonstrate after the fall of 1944 that he disapproved the deportations and exterminations and endeavored consistently to furnish me with evidence that he tried to save the Jews. SS Hauptsturmführer Wisliczeny repeatedly assured me that according to him Germany cannot win the war. He believed that by keeping me alive and by making some concessions in the campaign against the Jews he might have a defense witness when he and his organization will have to account for their atrocities. Strangely he came to Hungarian Jews with the letter of recommendation from leading Slovak Jews. The latter were not deported in 1942 and were saved over until the end of 1944.

Major phases in the persecution of Hungarian Jewry

Before the German occupation.

1. 17,000 Jews—mainly from Ruthenia—were deported to Poland in August 1941. There they were transferred to the German military authorities. These were executed during the succeeding 3 months. In Kamenetz-Podolsk alone 4,500 Hungarian Jews were shot dead. Responsible: Prime Minister Bordossy.

2. Between 23 and 25 January 1942 Hungarian military units “cleaned up” the southern region captured from the Yugoslavs. In Novisad they shot dead 1,500 Jews found at home or in the streets, or taken to the Serbian cemetery or to the beach. A further 2,000 Jews were only saved by an order from Admiral Horthy. Commanders of the Military force were General Feketealmi-Zeisler, General Bajor-Bayer and Captain Zoeldi.

3. The so-called Jewish Labor companies created within the framework of military pioneer services, were in fact concentration camps organized on the German model. Of the 130,000 Hungarian Jews recruited by this means, about 50,000 died from starvation, typhus and shooting, 30,000 were taken prisoners by the Russians, 20,000 were deported to Germany; about 30,000 remained in Hungary.

Organizers of the “Labor Service” were Bartha, Minister for War, Werth, Chief of the Military Staff.

After the German occupation.

19 March 1944: Together with the German military occupation arrived in Budapest “Special Section Commando” of the German Secret Police with the sole object of liquidating the Hungarian Jews. It was headed by Adolf Eichmann, SS Obersturmbannführer, Chief of Section IV.B of the Reich Security Head Office. His immediate collaborators were: SS Obersturmbannführer Hermann Krumej, Hauptsturmführer Wisliczeny, Hunsche, Novak, Dr. Seidl, later Danegger, Wrtok. They arrested, and later deported to Mauthausen, all the leaders of Jewish political and business life and journalists, together with the Hungarian democratic and anti-Fascist politicians; taking advantage of the “interregnum” following upon the German occupation lasting 4 days they have placed their Quislings into the Ministry of the Interior. These were Ladislav Endre and Ladislav Baky. Utilizing the Hungarian administrative organs they have:

- a. Arrested all Jews arriving or leaving Budapest (about 2,500 persons, who were interned at Kistarcsa).

- b. Excluded the Jews from using postal and telephone facilities.
- c. Took over for SS and German military purposes all Jewish public buildings, schools, and hospitals.

On 23 March 1944 the Quisling Cabinet was formed, the purpose of which was—according to the statement made by Wisliczeny (to use in June 1944 in Budapest)—solely the solution of the Jewish problem. During the deliberations preceding the formation of the Cabinet, Prime Minister Sztojaj undertook in the presence of SS Obergruppenfuehrer Winckelmann, Hungary's SS Commander, SS Standartenfuehrer Wesenmayer, new German Minister and Aichmann, that the Hungarian Government will do everything possible to help in the liquidation of the Hungarian Jewry. One anti-Jewish decree followed another after the Sztojaj Cabinet took over. At the same time Krumey and Wisliczeny appeared in the building of the Budapest Jewish Committee and informed Samuel Stern, President, that the matters concerning the Hungarian Jewish problem would be henceforth "dealt with" within the competence of the SS. They warned the Jews against creating panic and obliged the Jewish leaders to form a "Jewish Council." A gigantic levy was imposed (money and goods worth about 11,000,000 pengoes had to be handed over). When President Stern made an inquiry at the Hungarian Ministry of the Interior he was told: "You must fulfill the German demands"

On the 26 March 1944 the whole of Ruthenia, Upper Hungary and Northern Transylvania were declared operational territory at the request of the German General Staff. During the next days that followed Aichmann, Wisliczeny, and Hunsche had daily conferences with Ladislas Endre who received full authority from the Cabinet in matters concerning the Jews.

On 9 April 1944 the military authorities, with headquarters at Munkacs began the rounding-up of 320,000 Jews into Ghettos within the operational area. In order to prevent any armed resistance by the Jews, they were concentrated in brick factories (as at Kassa, Ungvar, Kolozsvar) or under the open sky (as at Nagybanyam, Marosvasarhely, Des), in a few cases they were allowed to retire into some sections of the cities (as in Nagyvarad, Maramorossziget), Food allocations: daily 1/5th of a pound of bread and two cups of soup. From the Jews sent into the Ghettos even matches were taken away.

While an agreement was arrived at between Wesenmayer, German Minister and a representative of Sauckel on the one hand, and Prime Minister Sztojaj, on the other, that Hungary would place 300,000 Jewish workers at the disposal of the Reich (who were to be selected by a mixed Hungarian-German committee), total deportation of all Jews was decided by Endre, Baky and Aichmann at a meeting in the Ministry of the Interior on the 14 April 1944.

Novak and Lullay left on the next day for Vienna to discuss the question of transport facilities with the management of the German railways.

A levy of 2,000,000 pengoes each was imposed by the Gestapo on the Jews of Novisad and Ungvar. Jewish shops were looted by Germans. Despite a German protest, the Hungarian Government ordered the closing down of all Jewish shops. The Jews resisted in the Ghetto of Munkacs. The Gestapo shot 27 of them, including the entire executive of the Jewish Community.

On 28 April 1944 the first deportation takes place; 1,500 persons suitable as laborers were taken from the Kistarcsa internment camp to Oswiecim. There, they were compelled to write encouraging notes to their relatives with datelines from "Waldsee." The notes were brought by an SS Courier to Budapest and were distributed by the Jewish Council.

In the meantime the Budapest Relief Committee received two messages from the Bratislava Committee. One message said that there was feverish work going on in Oswiecim to restore the gas chambers and crematoriums there, which were not working for months and a remark made by a SS-NCO that "soon we will get fine Hungarian sausages" was reported. The other message was to the effect that an agreement was reached, between the Hungarian, Slovakian, and German railway managements that, for the time being, 120 trains would be directed, via Presov, towards Oswiecim. This information was passed on to the Bratislava Relief Committee by an anti-Nazi Slovakian railway official. It was obvious that it concerned deportation trains.

The delegate of the International Red Cross, to whom I have appealed for intervention, stated that in view of the Geneva Convention this was impossible for him. The Swedish and Swiss Legations promised that they would report to their Governments and ask for instructions. After repeated appeals the Primate of the Catholic Church promised an intervention on behalf of the converted Jews. But Sztojaj refused to listen.

After consulting with all Jewish leaders we turned to the Germans. At first Grumey, Wisliczeny, and Hunsche negotiated with us; later Aichmann took over the negotiations. Aichmann arrived at Budapest on the first day of the German occupation, 19 March, 1944. Wisliczeny arrived there on March 22. The first time we negotiated was 3 April. At first the Germans demanded a compensation of 2,000,000 dollars and promised that in return for this sum they would not deport anyone. Later Aichmann declared: "I can only sell the Hungarian Jews as from Germany. Brand should leave at once for Istanbul and inform the Jews there and the Allies that I am prepared to sell 1,000,000 Hungarian Jews, for goods, primarily vehicles. I would transport them to Oswiecim and 'put them on ice.' If my generous offer is accepted I will release all of them. If not, they will all be gassed."

In the meantime the organization of the Ghettos had been directed by Wisliczeny, who had been traveling from town to town. The Hungarian police and gendarmerie was at his disposal everywhere. Officially he only acted as an "Advisor" to the Hungarian authorities; in reality everything took place on German orders.

15 May 1944 General and total deportation begins. One day before the evacuation all hospital cases, newly born babies, blind and deaf, all mental cases and prison inmates of Jewish origin were transferred to the Ghettos. About 80–100 Jews were placed in each cattle-car with one bucket of water; the car was then sealed down. At Kassa the deportation trains were taken over from the escorting Hungarian gendarmerie by the SS. While searching for "hidden valuables" the gendarmerie squads tortured the inmates with electric current and beat them mercilessly. Hundreds committed suicide. Those who protested or resisted were shot at once (as for instance Dr. Rosenfeld, solicitor of Marosvasarhely).

The Hungarian press and radio kept quiet about the deportations. The Hungarian government denied in the foreign press that Jews were tortured.

Between 5 June and 8 June 1944 Aichmann told me: "We accepted the obligation toward the Hungarians that not a single deported Jew will return alive!"

Up to 27 June 1944 475,000 Jews were deported.

The Pope and the King of Sweden intervened with Horthy. Then followed the ultimatum like appeal of President Roosevelt to stop the brutal anti-Jewish persecutions. Thereupon Horthy has forbidden the deportation of the Jews from the capital which was already fixed to take place on July 5.

Endre, Baky, and the Germans protested against this decision and a further 30,000 Jews were deported from Transdanubia; the outer suburbs of Budapest were also emptied. Horthy dismissed Endre. But Aichmann, Endre, and Baky continued to try to liquidate the Jews of the capital with the collaboration of the gendarmerie. Liberators bombed Budapest and the railway junctions which were to be used by the deportation trains. Horthy has ordered the mobilization of the Army against an attempted coup d'etat (8 July). The gendarmerie thereupon went over to Horthy's side. But Aichmann emptied the camp of Kistarcsa by secretly collaborating with the Camp Commander and another 1,700 Jews were transported off in the direction of Oswiecim. On Horthy's orders the train was stopped at the frontier and the people were brought back. But Aichmann repeated his coup after 3 days and prevented any information reaching Horthy in time.

On 15 July 1944 an ultimatum was handed over by Wesenmayer, German Minister to the Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs demanding the deportation of the Budapest Jews. The Hungarian Government replied in a note to the effect that it was prepared to transfer the Budapest Jews to satisfy demands of military security, but only within the borders of the country. (27 July).

Allied successes have strengthened the position of the Hungarian Government against the Germans. Lakatos, new Hungarian Prime Minister sent a note to the German Government demanding the recall of Aichmann and his staff from Hungary, the transfer of the German-controlled internment camps to Hungarian authorities and the handing over of Hungarian politicians and high-ranking officers in German captivity to the Hungarians.

On 25 August 1944 the following instructions received from Himmler, Wesenmayer informed the Hungarian Government that its demands would be fulfilled by the Germans.

But on 15 October 1944 a German coup ended the Horthy regime and Szalasy took over power. On 17 October Aichmann returns to Budapest by air. On his order the Arrow-Cross Party and the police began the deportation of all Jews locked into the houses marked by yellow stars; 25,000 Jewish people, mostly women were made to walk over 100 miles in rain and snow without food to the Austrian border; hundreds died on the way, more died in Austria through exhaustion and dysentery. On the border the transports were taken over by Wisliczeny; 20,000 Labor Service men shared the same fate.

The German authorities were the same as before; the most active Hungarian collaborators were: Minister Emil Kovarcz, Solymosi, Under-Secretary of State, and Ladislas Ferenczi, Lt. Col. of the gendarmerie.

On 8 December the deportations from Budapest stopped. According to Wisliczeny Aichmann refused to carry out Himmler's order to stop deportations until he received written instructions from Himmler himself. Until 11 February 1945 the Arrow-Cross party-men did not stop to hunt down Jews in hiding, living on false papers; 10–15,000 Jews were shot on the shores of the Danube or in the streets during these 2 months. Thousands have died in the Ghettos, as well as in the “protected houses” of the Swedish and Swiss Legations, as a result of enemy action, sickness or starvation.

The losses of Hungarian Jewry

The 1940–41 census found 762,000 persons of Jewish persuasion within what was then Hungarian territory. But the persecution was extended to the Converted Jews, as well as to mixed marriages, of whom there were no official figures. Their numbers were estimated generally at 60,000.

According to figures estimated in August 1945:

There are at present in Budapest	150,000 Jews
In the provinces	40,000 Jews
In Transylvania (returned to Rumania), in Ruthenia (attached to Russia), in Upper Hungary (attached to Slovakia), and in the Backa (returned to Yugoslavia), there are estimated to be	50,000 Jews -----
Total	240,000 Jews
In territory occupied by the Allies and in Russia, Sweden and Switzerland approx.	50,000 Jews -----
Total	290,000 Jews

Of the 10,000 or so Slovakian, Polish, Yugoslav, and German Jews who were in Hungary at the time of the German occupation only about 750 are still alive, according to a reliable estimate.

Therefore, a total of 540,000 Hungarians and 10,000 refugee Jews perished, of them—

The Germans were responsible for the death of.....	450,000
The Hungarians were responsible for the death of....	80,000
Suicides, sickness, enemy (allied) action	20,000 -----

The figures concerning the deported Jews originate from Wisliczeny, who directed the deportations and was fully competent to give these figures

It may be added that the objective of the new wave of deportations which started at the end of October 1944 was no longer Oswiecim. On this occasion older people, children, and the sick were not deported. Those who remained alive after the long journey on foot were—in the majority—employed on fortifications works along the Austro-Hungarian border; a lesser number were sent to Oranienburg, Dachau, and Bergen-Belsen.

General History of the Annihilation of the Jews Section
IV.B. and the Annihilation of the Jews

Pogroms and the creation of the Ghettos organized in various centers in Poland during 1939–40 represented a period of hesitation. At that time the extinction of all European Jews was planned, but it was not finally decided upon. The Lublin “reservation,” the playing of the Nazis with the idea of a Jewish center were expressions of this period of hesitation. The decision to exterminate the Jews was probably reached in 1941. In the occupied Baltic countries and in the Ukraine the SS formation working jointly with the Wehrmacht annihilated nearly all Jews (in the Baltic countries they were helped by the Latvians and Lithuanians). The mass-murder was carried out with the aid of bullets. The victims often dug their own tombs. Frequently they were buried alive. Then began the use of gas. The victims were killed by gas bursting out inside hermetically sealed lorries.

In the fall of 1941—according to a statement of Wisliczeny—made to me in January 1945 in Vienna—Kaltenbrunner commissioned SS Standartenfuehrer Blobl to work out the plan of the gas chambers. In the opinion of Wisliczeny the initiative came from Aichmann. Hitler approved of the plan at once. The execution was entrusted to the Aichmann-Himmler-Kaltenbrunner trio.

In December 1941 the first tests were carried out in Belzec. According to a statement of Wisliczeny made to me in Vienna in February '45 it was a complete success. Thereupon three more death-camps were set up in Treblinka, Majdanek and Oswiecim. (Later a smaller camp was set up in Kalkini.)

According to statements of Krumej and Wisliczeny in February or March 1945 a conference of the officers of IV.B. was called to Berlin by Aichmann in the spring of 1942. He then informed them that the Government decided in favor of the complete annihilation of the European Jews and that this will be carried out silently in the gas chambers. “Victory is ours” declared Aichmann. “The end of the war is near. We must hurry as this is the last chance to free Europe of the Jews. After the war it will not be possible to utilize such methods.”

Wisliczeny claims that he interjected the following remark to Aichmann's statement: "God help us that this method should never be possible against us."

Krumey confirmed this statement of Wisliczeny. He maintained that until the secret—which had to be kept strictly—was revealed by Aichmann, none of the officers of iV.B. knew anything about it.

The entire machinery of the German State supported Section IV.B. in this work. In occupied countries the Commanders of the Wehrmacht and the Gauleiters (Seyss-Inquart, Frank, Heydrich, etc), in countries allied to Germany the German diplomats (Killinger in Bucharest, Wesenmayer in Zagreb, later in Budapest) supported the work.

The plan of operation was almost identical in all countries; at first Jews were marked, then separated, divested of all property, deported and gassed.

The Officers of IV.B. traveled from country to country. Wisliczeny—according to his own admission—directed the deportation in Slovakia and Greece.

Brunner II, in Poland and Slovakia.

Krumey, Seidl directed the work in Hungary, Austria, and Poland.

Seidl was the first commander of Theresienstadt.

Guenther directed deportations in Austria and Czechoslovakia.

Danegger, Brunner in France.

Almost everywhere the local Quisling authorities and even part of the civilian populations assisted them.

Commanders of the death-camps gassed only on direct or indirect instructions of Aichmann. The particular Officer of IV.B. who directed the deportations from some particular country had the authority to indicate whether the train should go to a death camp or not, and what should happen to the passengers. The instructions were usually carried by the SS-NCO escorting the train. The letters "A" or "M" on the escorting instruction documents indicated Auschwitz (Oswiecim) or Majdanek; it meant that the passengers were to be gassed.

In case of doubt instructions by wire were asked from Aichmann in Berlin.

Regarding Hungarian Jews the following general ruling was laid down in Oswiecim: children up to the age of 12 or 14, older people above 50, as well as the sick, or people with criminal records (who were transported in specially marked wagons) were taken immediately on their arrival to the gas chambers.

The others passed before an SS doctor who, on sight, indicated who was fit for work, and who was not. Those unfit were sent to the gas chambers, while the others were distributed in various labor camps.

In September 1944 Slovakian partisans engineered the revolt in Banska-Bystricza. The Jewish youth joined the revolution enthusiastically. Aichmann thereupon sent SS Hauptsturmfuehrer Brunner to Bratislava with instructions to deport all the 17,000-odd Jews still left behind after the deportations of 1942. They were to go to Oswiecim.

SS and Hlinka-Guards arrested the Jews. They were transported from Sered. About 13,500 Jews were caught, the rest were in hiding. Following my appeal the A.D.C. of Becher Capt. Grueson journeyed to Bratislava and tried to intervene with SS Obersturmbannfuehrer Vitezka, Slovakian Gestapo Chief to stop the deportations. Vitezka's reply was: "As far as I am concerned I will agree readily if I get telegraphic authority from Kaltenbrunner to this effect." Becher said on 2 November 1944, in the Hotel Walhalla, St. Gallen, Switzerland, in the presence of the representative of the Joint D.C.: "We have militarily annihilated the Slovakian Jews."

In the first half of November 1944 about 20,000 Jews were taken from Theresienstadt to Oswiecim and were gassed, on instructions from Aichmann. As far as I could ascertain this was the last gassing process.

According to Becher, Himmler issued instructions—on his advice—on 25 November 1944 to dynamite all the gas-chambers and crematoria of Oswiecim. He also issued a ban on further murdering of Jews.

Wisliczeny confirmed the existence of such an order. But he maintained that Aichmann sabotaged this order and was supported in this by Mueller and Kaltenbrunner.

Following the advance of the Russian Army it was necessary to evacuate the Polish and Silesian camps. Some of the Jewish prisoners were sent to Bergen-Belsen or other camps. Most of the Jews found in these camps by the Allies arrived there either at the end of 1944 or at the beginning of 1945. Other Jews in the extermination camps were shot, or were frozen dead on the way.

There were no mass-murders in the months preceding the German surrender but owing to starvation—due partly to the collapse of the German transport system and the general lack of food—the sick and weakened Jews died by the thousands.

After the fall of 1944 Himmler granted several concessions. Thus he permitted the departure for Switzerland of 1,700 Hungarian Jews deported to Bergen-Belsen and also agreed to suspend the annihilation of the Jews of the Budapest Ghetto. Himmler permitted the handing over to the Allies the Jews of Bergen-Belsen and Theresienstadt without a shot being fired, which in his eyes and eyes of his colleagues was such a generous and colossal concession that he certainly hoped some political concession in return. In the hope of establishing contact with the Allies Himmler made some concessions even without expecting economic returns. To this desire of Himmler may be ascribed the general prohibition dated 25 November 1944, concerning the further killing of Jews. On 27 November 1944 Becher showed me a copy of Himmler's order on this subject. Aichmann at first did not obey this order.

In accordance with my above described activities I had dealings among others with the following individuals:

Germans: Special Section Commando (for the Liquidation of Jews):

Adolf Aichmann, SS-Obersturmbannfuehrer, head of section IV.B. in the Reich Security

Head Office and the following officers of his staff:

SS Obersturmbannfuehrer Guenther; Danegger; Hermann Krumey.

SS Hauptsturmfuehrer Dieter Wisliczeny; Dr. Seidl; Novak; Hunsche; Schmiedsieffen.

Several NCO's, among them:

Hauptsturmfuehrer Richter
Oberscharfuehrer Nuemann.

Special Staff (Economic Staff):

SS Standartenfuehrer Kurt Becher, and some officers of his staff.

SS Standartenfuehrer Wesenmayer, German Minister in Budapest (after 19 March 1945).

Hungarians:

Nicholas Mester, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Education.

Ladislav Vitez Ferenczy, Lt. Col. of the Gendarmerie.

Leo Lullay, Captain of the Gendarmerie.

Dr. Stephen Olah, Counselor of the Ministry.

Ladislav Baký, Under-Secretary in the Ministry of Interior.

Hungarian Resistance Workers:

Henry Lazar, present Hungarian Under-Secretary of State to the Ministry of Agriculture.

Nicholas Kertesz, former Social-democratic member of Parliament.

Bela Zsolt, journalist.

A. Bereczky, Trustee of the Calvinist Church.

Neutrals:

Prof. Waldemar Langlet, Cultural Counselor of the Swedish Legation.

Count Tolstov Representatives of the Swedish Red Cross;

Paul Wallenberg Head of the protection of foreign interests

Consul Lutz Section of the Swiss Legation.

Freidrich Born, delegate of the International Red Cross.

The Charge d'Affaires of the Swiss Legation.

The Charge d'Affaires of the Spanish Legation.

Jews:

All members of the Jewish Council, especially Samuel Stern (Court Counselor), Chairman of the Pest Jewish Community.

Dr. Charles Wilhelm; Dr. Ernest Petoe, Dr. Boda (Chief Government Counselor), Vice-chairman.

Philip Freudiger, President of the Orthodox Jewish Community and members of the council of that Community.

Otto Komoly, President of the Zionist Organization.

Nicholas Krausz, head of the Palestine Office of the Jewish Agency.

[signed] DR. KASTNER REZSOE
DR. REZSOE (RUDOLF) KASTNER

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of September 1945 at the Office of the United States Chief of Counsel, 49 Mount Street, London W.1, England.

[signed] WARREN F. FARR
WARREN F. FARR
Major, Judge Advocate General's Dept.,
Office U. S. Chief of Counsel

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. V, pp. 313-326, Doc. 2605-PS.

149. AFFIDAVIT OF JULY 16, 1947, OF DOUGLAS TILBROOK FROST CONCERNING I.G. FARBEN'S AUSCHWITZ PLANT

This affidavit given by Douglas Tilbrook Frost, a British POW working at the I.G. Farben Auschwitz factory camp (Auschwitz III), focuses entirely on the treatment of Jews also working there. The description he gives of the conditions in which the Jews worked makes clear that the intent of the Nazis was to work the Jews to death. Frost comments on the inadequate clothing and diet given to the Jewish prisoners. He notes that they could not declare themselves sick or ill lest they be sent to the gas chambers as a result. He observed Jews falling down from exhaustion and starvation and being beaten for the slightest infraction. Frost concludes with the statement that he has no doubt that it would be impossible for executives or other employees of Farben who came to the camp on business not to know that the Jews were being worked to death in their factory.

AFFIDAVIT, 16 JULY 1947, OF DOUGLAS TILBROOK FROST, BRITISH PRISONER OF WAR IN GERMANY, CONCERNING THE TREATMENT OF CONCENTRATION CAMP INMATES AT FARBEN'S AUSCHWITZ PLANT, AND RELATED MATTERS

I, Douglas Tilbrook Frost, 43, Ash Grove, Stapleford, Nr. Nottingham, England, do hereby declare under oath the following facts:

1. I was born 15 April 1912 at Nr. Nottingham, England. I entered the Army in November 1939, and was captured on 9 April 1941 near Tobruk. At the time I was signaller in the 5th Battalion Tanks. I was brought first to Italy, then to Germany and finally to Auschwitz. After about a week I, together with about 30 or 40 others, was assigned to swamp work gathering reeds. Shortly thereafter, I started working in the I. G. Farben factory at Auschwitz. I continued working there until I was injured, in January 1944, and was sent to Lamsdorf. I was later freed by the Americans.

2. The IG plant at Auschwitz covered approximately 6 sq. kilometers and was built entirely by slave labor. The Germans who were there were in a supervisory capacity. There were 10,000 to 15,000 Jews, about 22,000 others of all nationalities, particularly Russians and Poles.

3. Of all the persons working at IG Auschwitz, the Jewish inmates had the worst time of it. I was very friendly with them and often spoke to them. The impression I got was that at least half of the inmates would never again be fit to go back to civilization because of the deteriorated mental and physical condition they had reached. Their clothing consisted of striped pajamas and for shoes they had wooden clogs. The food was very poor. They would ask us for our soup. This soup which we gave them was so bad that we couldn't drink it ourselves.

In spite of their poor condition, which was obvious from just looking at them since their skin was a dirty gray and body was purely skin and bones, they nevertheless were given hard jobs to do, such as carrying rails around and pieces of machinery.

4. No inmate was allowed in the camp who was sick. The weak and the sick would be destroyed. The inmates in the camp always told us about this and personally I recall many cases where inmates whom I had known just disappeared and didn't show up again. As a matter of fact, the inmates were so frightened of being sent to the gas chambers because of illness or injury that they would often come to work hiding their cuts and sores rather than report sick.

The German civilians often threatened the inmates that they would be gassed and made into soap. We were told that quite a few times by the inmates and I personally heard the German civilians make those threats many times. Also I heard the Germans joking among themselves about the same thing. I didn't take it seriously at first but later I wondered whether it might not be true after all. Though I have no personal knowledge, I got the impression that the manufacture of soap from inmates was being done at Auschwitz by rendering the fat from the gassed bodies.

5. As a result of the starvation diet of the inmates, their living conditions and the hard work they had to do, I often saw them collapse and fall down while working in the factory. On other occasions I would see two or three inmates being carried by. They looked very bad. My impression was that their chances of recovery would be pretty thin. Apart from the work, the Jews received various forms of corporal punishment. I recall one case where one was hit over the head with a pick by a kapo. One of the usual punishments was to make the inmates carry bricks wherever they went, for each slight infraction. Sometimes an inmate would carry as many as 5 or 6 bricks. These he would have to take wherever he went, to eat, to sleep, everywhere. Also, just to amuse themselves, the Germans would ride their bicycles and have inmates trot behind them wherever they went, as dogs.

6. In addition to the I. G. Farben foremen and other officials at Auschwitz, every once in a while big-shots from the main firm would come down to the plant. In my opinion nobody who worked at the plant or who came into the plant on business or inspections, could avoid discovering the fact that the inmates were literally being worked to death. They had no color in their faces whatsoever. They were practically living corpses, covered with skin and bone, and completely broken in spirit. Everyone who was there knew that the inmates were kept there as long as they turn out work and that when they were physically unable to continue, they were disposed of.

I have carefully read each of the two pages of this statement and have placed my initials at the bottom of each page thereof. I have made all corrections in my own handwriting and have initialed each such correction. I do hereby declare under oath that the foregoing statement is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God.

[Signed] D. T. FROST

Sworn to and signed before me this 16th day of July 1947 at Nottingham, England.

[signed] Benvenuto von Halle
U. S. Civilian, AGO 532432
Interrogator

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. VIII, pp. 623–625, Doc. NI-11692.

IV. Responses and Other Victims

150. REPRISAL ACTION AGAINST JEWISH RESISTANCE IN BELGRADE, JULY 29, 1941

This excerpt from the report of the Einsatzgruppe (one of four groups—each with approximately 750 men—that followed behind the German armies, tasked with killing Jews and others) that was in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, reflects one of the Nazis' most effective means of controlling large groups of people: in the event of any effort to harm Germans or damage their equipment, a significant number of innocent people having no connection to the action would be killed in reprisal. The method of reprisal was used in ghettos and camps to great effect. The knowledge that tens or hundreds of innocent people would be killed if one person tried to escape or if one German soldier was killed or wounded forestalled many an escape attempt or act of violence against a Nazi guard.

EXTRACT FROM SITUATION REPORT U.S.S.R. NO. 37, 29 JULY 1941, CONCERNING REPRISAL ACTION AGAINST JEWS IN BELGRADE

Berlin, 29 July 1941

The Chief of the Security Police and SD-IV A 1 - B. No.1 B/41

Top Secret

45 copies—23d copy

Situation Report U.S.S.R. No. 37

I. Political Review—

Yugoslavia—

The Chief of the Einsatzgruppe of the Security Police and SD in Belgrade reports—

On 25 July [19] 41 at 1520 hours in Belgrade an unidentified Jew, wearing the yellow brassard, threw a bottle of gasoline at a German motor vehicle in an attempt to set fire to the automobile. He was prevented from doing so and escaped. On the same day in three more incidents unidentified culprits threw bottles of gasoline at German motor vehicles. In an identical incident a 16-year-old Serbian girl was arrested. She admitted that she was incited to the deed by a Jew. In reprisal 100 Jews were shot to death in Belgrade on 29 July 1941.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XI, p. 938, Doc. NO-2952.

151. “THE WARSAW GHETTO IS NO MORE”: REPORT OF GENERAL JÜRGEN STROOP, MAY 16, 1943

SS general Jürgen Stroop had an impressive record of service on behalf of Germany in both world wars, but it was his role in suppressing the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and his book-length account of that operation that make him one of the better-known Nazi officers. The uprising began in January 1943 when, for the first time, Germans who entered the Warsaw Ghetto to continue the many deportations from the ghetto that had reduced the population to some 55,000 Jews were met with small-arms fire. They were forced to withdraw, but on April 19, 1943, they returned in force, this time under Stroop’s command. Although outmanned and outgunned, the Jewish fighters were able to repel Stroop’s forces. It was not until May 16, 1943, that the uprising was completely ended, an extraordinary feat of resistance. Stroop’s report, excerpted here, is the best description of the fighting from the perspective of the Nazis. It also includes an overview of the establishment of the ghetto.

THE WARSAW GHETTO IS NO MORE

For the Fuehrer and their country the following fell in the battle for the destruction of Jews and bandits in the former Ghetto of Warsaw:

[follow 15 names]

Furthermore, the Polish Police Sergeant Julian Zielinski, born 13 November 1891, 8th Commissariat * * * fell on 19 April 1943 while fulfilling his duty. * * * They gave their utmost, their life. We shall never forget them. The following were wounded

[follow the names of—

- 60 Waffen SS personnel.
 - 11 “Watchmen” from Training Camps, probably Lithuanians, to judge by their names.
 - 12 Security Police Officers in SS Units.
 - 5 men of the Polish Police
 - 2 regular Army personnel engineers]
- Average number of personnel used per day*

Units used in the action

SS Staff & Police Leader 6/5

Waffen SS:

SS Panzer Grenadier Training and Reserve Battalion
3, Warsaw 4/440

SS Cav. Training and Res Bat. Warsaw 5/381

Police:

SS Police Regiment 22 I. Bat. 3/94

III. Bat. 3/134

Engineering Emergency Service 1/6

Polish Police 4/363

Polish Fire Brigade 166

Security Police:

Wehrmacht

Light AA Alarm Battery III/8 Warsaw 2/22

Engineers Det. of Railway Armored Trains Res. Bat.
Rembertow 2/42

Res. Eng. 14 Gora-Kalwaria 1/34

Foreign Racial Watchmen:

1 Bat. “Trawniki” men 2/335

Total: 36/2054

[Translator’s note: This obviously means; 36 officers, 2054 men]

The creation of special areas to be inhabited by Jews, and the restriction of the Jews with regard to residence and trading is nothing new in the history of the East. Such measures were first taken far back in the Middle Ages; they could be observed as recently as during the last few centuries. These restrictions were imposed with the intention of protecting the aryan population against the Jews.

Identical considerations led us as early as February, 1940 to conceive the project of creating a Jewish residential district in Warsaw. The initial intention was to establish as the Ghetto that part of the City of Warsaw which has the Vistula as its Eastern frontier. The particular situation on prevailing in Warsaw seemed at first to frustrate this plan. It was moreover opposed by several authorities particularly by the City Administration. They pointed in particular that disturbances in industry and trade would ensue if a Ghetto were founded in Warsaw, and that it would be impossible to provide the Jews with food if they were assembled in a closed area.

At a conference held in March 1940, it was decided to postpone the plan of creating a Ghetto for the time being, owing to the above objections. At the same time a plan was considered to declare the District of Lublin the collecting area for all Jews within the Government General, especially for the evacuated or fugitive Jews arriving from the Reich. But as early as April 1940, the Higher SS and Police Leader, East, Cracow, issued a declaration that there was no intention of assembling the Jews within the Lubin District. In the meantime, the Jews had increasingly taken to crossing the frontiers without permission and illegally. This noted especially at the limits of the Districts of Lowicz and Skierniewice. Conditions in the town of Lowicz became dangerous from the point of view of hygiene as well as from that of the Security Police, owing to these illegal migrations of Jews. The District President of Lowicz therefore, began to install Ghettos in his district in order to avoid these dangers.

The experiences in the district of Lowicz, after Ghettos had been installed, showed that this method is the only one suitable for dispelling the dangers which emanate repeatedly from the Jews.

The necessity of erecting a Ghetto in the City of Warsaw as well became more and more urgent in the summer of 1940, since more and more troops were being assembled in the district of Warsaw after termination of the French campaign. At that time the Department for Hygiene urged the speedy erection of a Ghetto in the interest of preserving the health of the German Forces and of the native population as well. The original plan of establishing the Ghetto in the suburb of Praga as intended in February 1940, would have taken at least 4 to 5 months, since almost 600,000 persons had to be moved. But since experience showed that greater outbreaks of epidemics might be expected in the winter months and since for this reason the District Medical Officer urged that the resettling action ought to be completed by 15 November 1940 at the latest, the plan of establishing a suburban ghetto in Praga was dropped; and instead, the area which hitherto had been used as a quarantine area for epidemics was selected for use as a Jewish residential area. In October 1940, the Governor ordered the Commissioner of the District, President for the City of Warsaw, to complete the resettlement necessary for establishing the Ghetto within the City of Warsaw by 15 November 1940.

The Ghetto thus established in Warsaw was inhabited by about 400,000 Jews. It contained 27,000 apartments with an average of 2½ rooms each. It was separated from the rest of the city by partition and other walls and by walling-up of thoroughfares, windows, doors, open spaces, etc.

It was administered by the Jewish Board of Elders, who received their instructions from the Commissioner for the Ghetto, who was immediately subordinated to the Governor. The Jews were granted self-administration in which the German supervising authorities intervened only where German interests were touched. In order to enable the Jewish Board of Elders to execute its orders, a Jewish Police force was set up, identified by special armbands and a special beret and armed with rubber truncheons. This Jewish Police force was charged with maintaining order and security within the Ghetto and was subordinated to the German and Polish Police.

II

It soon became clear, however, that not all dangers had been removed by this confining the Jews to one place. Security considerations required removing the Jews from the city of Warsaw altogether. The first large resettlement action took place in the period from 22 July to 3 October 1942. In this action 310,322 Jews were removed. In January 1943 a second resettlement action was carried out by which altogether 6,500 Jews were affected.

When the Reichsfuehrer SS visited Warsaw in January 1943 he ordered the SS and Police Leader for the District of Warsaw to transfer to Lublin the armament factories and other enterprises of military importance which were installed within the Ghetto including their personnel and machines. The execution of this transfer order proved to be very difficult, since the managers as well as the Jews resisted in every possible way. The SS and Police Leader thereupon decided to enforce the transfer of the enterprises in a large-scale action which he intended to carry out in three days. The necessary preparations had been taken by my predecessor, who also had given the order to start the large-scale action. I myself arrived in Warsaw on 17 April 1943 and took over the command of the action on 19 April 1943, 0800 hours, the action itself having started the same day at 0600 hours.

Before the large-scale action began, the limits of the former Ghetto had been blocked by an external barricade in order to prevent the Jews from breaking out. This barricade was maintained from the start to the end of the action and was especially reinforced at night.

When we invaded the Ghetto for the first time, the Jews and the Polish bandits succeeded in repelling the participating units, including tanks and armored cars, by a well-prepared concentration of fire. When I ordered a second attack, about 0800 hours, I distributed the units, separated from each other by indicated lines, and charged them with combing out the whole of the Ghetto, each unit for a certain part. Although firing commenced again, we now succeeded in combing out the blocks according to plan. The enemy was forced to retire from the roofs and elevated bases to the basements, dug-outs, and sewers. In order to prevent their escaping into the sewers, the sewerage system was dammed up below the Ghetto and filled with water, but the Jews frustrated this plan to a great extent by blowing up the turning off valves. Late the first day we encountered rather heavy resistance, but it was quickly broken by a special raiding party. In the course of further operations we succeeded in expelling the Jews from their prepared resistance bases, sniper holes, and the like, and in occupying during the 20 and 21 April the greater part of the so-called remainder of the Ghetto to such a degree that the resistance continued within these blocks could no longer be called considerable.

The main Jewish battle group, mixed with Polish bandits, had already retired during the first and second day to the so-called Muranowski Square. There, it was reinforced by a considerable number of Polish bandits. Its plan was to hold the Ghetto by every means in order to prevent us from invading it. The Jewish and Polish standards were hoisted at the top of a concrete building as a challenge to us. These two standards, however, were captured on the second day of the action by a special raiding party. SS Untersturmfuehrer Dehmke fell in this skirmish with the bandits; he was holding in his hand a hand-grenade which was hit by the enemy and exploded, injuring him fatally. After only a few days I realized that the original plan had no prospect of success, unless the armament factories and other enterprises of military importance distributed throughout the Ghetto were dissolved. It was therefore necessary to approach these firms and to give them appropriate time for being evacuated and immediately transferred. Thus one of these firms after the other was dealt with, and we very soon deprived the Jews and bandits of their chance to take refuge time and again in these enterprises, which were under the supervision of the Armed Forces. In order to decide how much time was necessary to evacuate these enterprises thorough inspections were necessary. The conditions discovered there are indescribable. I cannot imagine a greater chaos than in the Ghetto of Warsaw. The Jews had control of everything, from the chemical substances used in manufacturing explosives to clothing and equipment for the Armed Forces. The managers knew so little of their own shops that the Jews were in a position to produce inside these shops arms of every kind, especially hand grenades, Molotov cocktails, and the like.

Moreover, the Jews had succeeded in fortifying some of these factories as centers of resistance. Such a center of resistance in an Army accommodation office had to be attacked as early as the second day of the action by an Engineer's Unit equipped with flame throwers and by artillery. The Jews were so firmly established in this shop that it proved to be impossible to induce them to leave it voluntarily; I therefore resolved to destroy this shop the next day by fire.

The managers of these enterprises, which were generally also supervised by an officer of the Armed Forces, could in most cases make no specified statements on their stocks and the whereabouts of these stocks. The statements which they made on the number of Jews employed by them were in every case incorrect. Over and over again we discovered that these labyrinths of edifices belonging to the armament concerns as residential blocks, contained rich Jews who had succeeded in finding accommodations for themselves and their families under the name of "armament workers" and were leading marvelous lives there. Despite all our orders to the managers to make the Jews leave those enterprises, we found out in several cases that managers simply concealed the Jews by shutting them in, because they expected that the action would be finished within a few days and that they then would be able to continue working with the remaining Jews. According to the statements of arrested Jews, women also seem to have played a prominent part. The Jews are said to have endeavored to keep up good relations with officers and men of the armed forces. Carousing is said to have been frequent, during the course of which business deals are said to have been concluded between Jews and Germans.

The number of Jews forcibly taken out of the buildings and arrested was relatively small during the first few days. It transpired that the Jews had taken to hiding in the sewers and in specially erected dug-outs. Whereas we had assumed during the first days that there were only scattered dug-outs, we learned in the course of the large-scale action that the whole Ghetto was systematically equipped with cellars, dug-outs, and passages. In every case these passages and dug-outs were connected with the sewer system. Thus, the Jews were able to maintain undisturbed subterranean traffic. They also used this sewer network for escaping subterraneously into the Aryan part of the city of Warsaw. Continuously, we received reports of attempts of Jews to escape through the sewer holes. While pretending to build air-raid shelters they had been erecting dug-outs within the former Ghetto ever since the autumn of 1942. These were intended to conceal every Jew during the new evacuation action, which they had expected for quite a time, and to enable them to resist the invaders in a concerted action. Through posters, handbills, and whisper propaganda, the communistic resistance movement actually brought it about that the Jews entered the dug-outs as soon as the new large-scale operation started. How far their precautions went can be seen from the fact that many of the dug-outs had been skilfully equipped with furnishings sufficient for entire families, washing and bathing facilities, toilets, arms and munition supplies, and food supplies sufficient for several months. There were differently equipped dug-outs for rich and for poor Jews. To discover the individual dug-outs was difficult for the units, as they had been efficiently camouflaged. In many cases, it was possible only through betrayal on the part of the Jews.

When only a few days had passed, it became apparent that the Jews no longer had any intention to resettle voluntarily, but were determined to resist evacuation with all their force and by using all the weapons at their disposal. So-called battle groups had been formed, led by Polish-Bolshevists; they were armed and paid any price asked for available arms.

During the large-scale action we succeeded in catching some Jews who had already been evacuated and resettled in Lublin or Troolinka, but had broken out from there and returned to the Ghetto, equipped with arms and ammunition. Time and again Polish bandits found refuge in the Ghetto and remained there undisturbed, since we had no forces at our disposal to comb out this maze. Whereas it had been possible during the first days to catch considerable numbers of Jews, who are cowards by nature, it became more and more difficult during the second half of the action to capture the bandits and Jews. Over and over again new battle groups consisting of 20 to 30 or more Jewish fellows, 18 to 25 years of age, accompanied by a corresponding number of women kindled new resistance. These battle groups were under orders to put up armed resistance to the last and if necessary to escape arrest by committing suicide. One such battle group succeeded in mounting a truck by ascending from a sewer in the so-called Prosta, and in escaping with it (about 30 to 35 bandits). One bandit who had arrived with this truck exploded 2 hand grenades, which was the agreed signal for the bandits waiting in the sewer to climb out of it. The bandits and Jews—there were Polish bandits among these gangs armed with carbines, small arms, and in one case a light machine gun, mounted the truck and drove away in an unknown direction. The last member of this gang, who was on guard in the sewer and was detailed to close the lid of the sewer hole, was captured. It was he who gave the above information. The search for the truck was unfortunately without result.

During this armed resistance the women belonging to the battle groups were equipped the same as the men; some were members of the Chaluzim movement. Not infrequently, these women fired pistols with both hands. It happened time and again that these women had pistols or hand grenades (Polish “pineapple” hand grenades) concealed in their bloomers up to the last moment to use against the men of the Waffen SS, Police, or Wehrmacht.

The resistance put up by the Jews and bandits could be broken only by relentlessly using all our force and energy by day and night. On 23 April 1943 the Reichs Fuehrer SS issued through the higher SS and Police Fuehrer East at Cracow his order to complete the combing out of the Warsaw Ghetto with the greatest severity and relentless tenacity. I therefore decided to destroy the entire Jewish residential area by setting every block on fire, including the blocks of residential buildings near the armament works. One concern after the other was systematically evacuated and subsequently destroyed by fire. The Jews then emerged from their hiding places and dug-outs in almost every case. Not infrequently, the Jews stayed in the burning buildings until, because of the heat and the fear of being burned alive they preferred to jump down from the upper stories after having thrown mattresses and other upholstered articles into the street from the burning buildings. With their bones broken, they still tried to crawl across the street into blocks of buildings which had not yet been set on fire or were only partly in flames. Often Jews changed their hiding places during the night, by moving into the ruins of burnt-out buildings, taking refuge there until they were found by our patrols. Their stay in the sewers also ceased to be pleasant after the first week. Frequently from the street, we could hear loud voices coming through the sewer shafts. Then the men of the Waffen SS, the Police or the Wehrmacht Engineers courageously climbed down the shafts to bring out the Jews and not infrequently they then stumbled over Jews already dead, or were shot at. It was always necessary to use smoke candles to drive out the Jews. Thus one day we opened 183 sewer entrance holes and at a fixed time lowered smoke candles into them, with the result that the bandits fled from what they believed to be gas to the center of the former Ghetto, where they could then be pulled out of the sewer holes there. A great number of Jews, who could not be counted, were exterminated by blowing up sewers and dug-outs.

The longer the resistance lasted, the tougher the men of the Waffen SS, Police, and Wehrmacht became; they fulfilled their duty indefatigably in faithful comradeship and stood together as models and examples of soldiers. Their duty hours often lasted from early morning until late at night. At night, search patrols with rags wound round their feet remained at the heels of the Jews and gave them no respite. Not infrequently they caught and killed Jews who used the night hours for supplementing their stores from abandoned dug-outs and for contacting neighboring groups or exchanging news with them.

Considering that the greater part of the men of the Waffen-SS had only been trained for three to four weeks before being assigned to this action, high credit should be given for the pluck, courage, and devotion to duty which they showed. It must be stated that the Wehrmacht Engineers, too, executed the blowing up of dug-outs, sewers, and concrete buildings with indefatigability and great devotion to duty. Officers and men of the Police, a large part of whom had already been at the front, again excelled by their dashing spirit.

Only through the continuous and untiring work of all involved did we succeed in catching a total of 56,065 Jews whose extermination can be proved. To this should be added the number of Jews who lost their lives in explosions or fires but whose numbers could not be ascertained.

During the large-scale operation the Aryan population was informed by posters that it was strictly forbidden to enter the former Jewish Ghetto and that anybody caught within the former Ghetto without valid pass would be shot. At the same time these posters informed the Aryan population again that the death penalty would be imposed in anybody who intentionally gave refuge to a Jew, especially lodged, supported, or concealed a Jew outside the Jewish residential area.

Permission was granted to the Polish police to pay to any Polish policeman who arrested a Jew within the Aryan part of Warsaw one third of the cash in the Jew's possession. This measure has already produced results.

The Polish population for the most part approved the measures taken against the Jews. Shortly before the end of the large-scale operation, the Governor issued a special proclamation which he submitted to the undersigned for approval before publication, to the Polish population; in it he informed them of the reasons for destroying the former Jewish Ghetto by mentioning the assassinations carried out lately in the Warsaw area and the mass graves found in Catyn; at the same time they were asked to assist us in our fight against Communist agents and Jews (see enclosed poster).

The large-scale action was terminated on 16 May 1943 with the blowing up of the Warsaw synagogue at 2015 hours.

Now, there are no more factories in the former Ghetto. All the goods, raw materials, and machines there have been moved and stored somewhere else. All buildings etc., have been destroyed. The only exception is the so-called Dzielna Prison of the Security Police, which was exempted from destruction.

III

Although the large-scale operation has been completed, we have to reckon with the possibility that a few Jews are still living in the ruins of the former Ghetto; therefore, this area must be firmly shut off from the Aryan residential area and be guarded. Police Battalion III/23 has been charged with this duty. This Police Battalion has instructions to watch the former Ghetto, particularly to prevent anybody from entering the former Ghetto, and to shoot immediately anybody found inside the Ghetto without authority. The Commander of the Police Battalion will continue to receive further direct orders from the SS and Police Fuehrer. In this way, it should be possible to keep the small remainder of Jews there, if any, under constant pressure and to exterminate them eventually. The remaining Jews and bandits must be deprived of any chance of survival by destroying all remaining buildings and refuges and cutting off the water supply.

It is proposed to change the Dzielna Prison into a concentration camp and to use the inmates to remove, collect and hand over for reuse the millions of bricks, the scrap-iron, and other materials.

IV

Of the total of 56,065 Jews caught, about 7,000 were exterminated within the former Ghetto in the course of the large-scale action, and 6,929 by transporting them to T.II, which means 14,000 Jews were exterminated altogether. Beyond the number of 56,065 Jews an estimated number of 5,000 to 6,000 were killed by explosions or in fires.

The number of destroyed dug-outs amounts to 631.

Booty:

7 Polish rifles, 1 Russian rifle, 1 German rifle
59 pistols of various calibers

Several hundred hand grenades, including Polish and home-made ones

Several hundred incendiary bottles
 Home-made explosives
 Infernal machines with fuses
 A large amount of explosives, ammunition for weapons of all calibers, including some machine-gun ammunition.

Regarding the booty of arms, it must be taken into consideration that the arms themselves could in most cases not be captured, as the bandits and Jews would, before being arrested, throw them into hiding places or holes which could not be ascertained or discovered. The smoking out of the dug-out by our men, also often made the search for arms impossible. As the dug-outs had to be blown up at once, a search later on was out of the question.

The captured hand grenades, ammunition, and incendiary bottles were at once reused by us against the bandits.

Further booty:

1,240 used military tunics (part of them with medal ribbons—Iron Cross and East Medal)
 600 pairs of used trousers
 Other equipment and German steel helmets
 108 horses, 4 of them still in the former Ghetto (hearse)

Up to 23 May 1943 we had counted

4.4 million Zloty; furthermore about 5 to 6 million Zloty not yet counted, a great amount of foreign currency, e.g. $14,300 in paper and $9,200 in gold, moreover valuables (rings, chains, watches, etc.) in great quantities.

State of the Ghetto at the termination of the large-scale operation:

Apart from 8 buildings (Police Barracks, hospital, and accommodations for housing working-parties) the former Ghetto is completely destroyed. Only the dividing walls are left standing where no explosions were carried out. But the ruins still contain a vast amount of stones and scrap material which could be used.

Warsaw, 16 May, 1943.

The SS and Police Fuehrer in the District of Warsaw.
 SS Brigadefuehrer and Majorgeneral of Police.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. III, pp. 718–728, Doc. 1061-PS.

152. TREBLINKA: REVOLT ON AUGUST 2, 1943

Shalom (Stanislaw) Kohn (also spelled Kon), the author of this description of a revolt of prisoners at the Treblinka extermination camp on August 2, 1943, was an organizer and participant in the revolt and a survivor of the camp. Here he describes the preparation for the revolt and the battle itself. It is a straightforward account, ending as was expected from the start, but the very fact that a small group of undernourished and poorly armed men were able to rise up, for however long, and do significant damage to the killing apparatus of Treblinka, where approximately 900,000 Jews were killed, and whose defeat came only after an overwhelming number of reinforcements came to the camp's rescue is a significant accomplishment in the records of Jewish resistance.

Even before I arrived at Treblinka, i.e., before October 1, 1942, cases of individual revenge on the part of Jews had been reported. Thus, for example, a Jewish man from Warsaw who worked in one of the death details and had seen his wife and child taken away to the gas chambers, attacked the SS man Max Biel[as] with a knife and killed him on the spot. From that day on, the SS barracks bore the name of this Hitlerite “martyr.” But neither the plaque on the wall of the barracks nor the massacre of Jews that followed this attack deterred us. On the contrary: this episode encouraged us to fight and take our revenge. The young man from Warsaw became our ideal.

As we witnessed Hitler’s horrible methods of extermination, a desire for revenge burned within us and grew each day, starting to concretize into something precise, particularly from the moment when the 50-year-old doctor, Chorzycycki of Warsaw, began to be active. This doctor worked in the camp as a “medical counsellor,” a position invented by the Germans to mock the hapless victims even more cruelly before dispatching them to the gas chamber. He was a calm, prudent man who on the surface, appeared rather cold. He went around in his white apron with the Red Cross emblem on his arm as he had in the old days at his Warsaw office, and he seemed completely detached from what was going on around him. But beneath his apron beat a warm Jewish heart, aflame with a desire for revenge.

After the gruesome experiences of the day, the four plotters of the revolt met by night around his plank bed and discussed the plans. Their first problem was how to get hold of the weapons and explosives which were needed. These four men were the above-mentioned Dr. Chorazycki, the Czech army officer Zelo—a Jew, of course—Kurland from Warsaw and Lubling from Silesia. After a short time, when it was considered necessary to enlarge the organization committee, we were joined by Leon Haberman, an artisan from Warsaw; Salzberg, a furrier from Kielce; a 22-year-old youth from Warsaw named Marcus, and the Warsaw agronomist Sudowicz. We could procure arms either from the outside or else we could steal them from the Germans and Ukrainians inside the camp itself. We tried both ways. We began to make a study of the camp arsenal and the headquarters barrack. But they were guarded by Germans and there was no way for us to get in. At first, we thought of digging a subterranean passage, but we felt this would be difficult, because of the constant danger of discovery. Then we decided at all costs to manufacture a duplicate key to the arsenal. This could only be done, however, if one of us could somehow gain access to the iron door of the arsenal. We had no alternative but to wait for a propitious moment.

An opportunity soon presented itself. Somehow the lock of the arsenal got jammed and the Germans had to call in one of the Jewish mechanics to fix it.

The Germans were extremely cautious. They had the door taken off its hinges and taken to the workshop. However, the mechanic managed to distract the attention of the German guard for just one moment, and managed to make an impression of the key in cobbler's wax. A few days later, our group received a key to the arsenal. We guarded it like a precious relic, waiting for the proper opportunity to use it. Dr. Chorazycki himself assumed the task of acquiring weapons from outside the camp. He managed to get in touch with a Ukrainian guard who agreed, for a large sum of money, of course, to buy some light weapons for us. A few of our purchases were safely smuggled in, but then something happened which put an end to our equipment and cost the life of Dr. Chorazycki. One day, while the doctor had with him a large amount of money intended for the guard, the camp's vice-commandant, SS Untersturmführer Franz, a bloody murderer notorious for his sadist methods, entered the room, accompanied by his dog, Barry. By pure chance, Franz spotted the packet of banknotes peeping out of the doctor's apron pocket.

"Give me that money!" the SS man roared. He suspected that the doctor was planning to escape from the camp. Chorazycki attacked him with a surgical lancet, stabbing him in the neck. Franz was able to jump out of the window and call for help. Well aware of the tortures which would await him, and realizing the threat to the entire conspiracy, Chorazycki swiftly swallowed a large dose of poison which the conspirators always carried on their persons. The SS men rushed up and tried to revive him in order to take their revenge, but to no avail.

In this way the initiator of the revolt died, but his death did not put an end to the matter. On the contrary, it encouraged the others to continue.

If Dr. Chorazycki was the initiator and the leader of the Treblinka revolt, then the title of chief of staff must be given to Captain Zelo. The participation of this military expert greatly facilitated the fulfilment of a mission which was both difficult and complicated. At difficult moments, when many of us fell prey to resignation and abandoned all hope of a revolt, Captain Zelo continued to encourage us to carry on. When he was transferred to another part of the camp, all the plans and decisions were submitted to him for his approval despite the danger involved in such contacts.

The engineer Galewski of Lodz was chosen to replace Dr. Chorazycki. He, too, dedicated himself to the cause with all his heart. He was a very cautious, reserved man, and this proved useful to our cause.

The date of the revolt was postponed several times for various reasons. The first date was fixed in April, 1943, while Dr. Chorazycki was still alive. And then the last transports of Jews from the Warsaw ghetto were brought to Treblinka. From them we first learned about the Warsaw ghetto revolt. The Germans treated them with particular savagery; most of the railroad cars were full of the corpses of ghetto fighters who had refused to leave the ghetto alive. Those who now arrived were no longer resigned and indifferent creatures like those who had come before them.

The leaders decided that the hour for the revolt had arrived. In the camp there were a number of so-called "Court Jews," boys who rendered personal services to the Germans, like cleaning their quarters, etc. These individuals enjoyed a certain freedom of movement within the camp. At times they even able to get close to the arsenal. The leadership decided to entrust to these boys the task of expropriating 100 hand grenades from the arsenal on the day of the revolt.

They proved to be equal to the task. Haberman, who worked in the German laundry, the shoemaker Marcus, and Jacek, a Hungarian boy of 17, managed to get his hands on a certain number of hand grenades. Exceptionally lithe and skillful, the boy Salzberg, age 14, son of the leader we have already mentioned, took a huge pile of SS uniforms as though he were taking them to the tailor's for pressing, but in fact the pockets of these uniforms were filled with hand grenades. Unfortunately these hand grenades lacked detonators, and for this reason the revolt had to be postponed at the very last moment.

Meanwhile, we were joined by other activists. Dr. Leichert, of Wengrow, whom the Nazis had selected from a new transport to replace Dr. Chorazycki, soon became a member of the committee. We were also joined by a Czech, Rudolf Masaryk, a relative of the late President of Czechoslovakia. He had refused to leave his Jewish wife and had accompanied her to Treblinka. Here, he became one of the privileged characters and was attached to a labor detail. With his own eyes he had seen his pregnant wife being taken to the gas chamber. Masaryk became one of the most active members of the committee. We must also mention Rudek, the driver-mechanic from Plotzk, who worked in the garage. His job was very important for our operation because it was there that we stored our weapons.

Months of waiting and tension passed in this way. Every day we looked death in the face and witnessed German atrocities. Every day hundreds of thousands of men and women, stark naked, arrived in long lines at the "Jewish State"—this was the name the Germans had cynically given to the building that housed 12 gas chambers. Untersturmführer Franz kept giving us speeches: "The gas chambers will continue to operate as long as so much as one Jew is left in the world."

The desire for revenge increased all the time. The terror-stricken eyes of the Jews who were led to their death and were thrust into the gas chambers cried out for revenge.

At last the leader, Galewski, gave the signal for the revolt. The date had been set for Monday, August 2, 1943, at 5 p.m. This was the plan of action: to lay an ambush for the chief murderers and to liquidate them: to disarm the guards; to cut the telephone wires; to burn and destroy all the extermination plants so that they would never function again; to free the Poles from the Treblinka detention camp a mile away, and, together with them, flee into the woods to organize a partisan unit.

An atmosphere of great tension lay upon the camp that Monday morning. The leaders needed all their energies to calm the people down. Finally, special inspectors came to see that the normal quota of work was carried out as usual in order not to arouse suspicion. All the details of the plan were known only to the 60 people who constituted the nucleus of the fighting organization. The activists were divided into three groups and, as soon as the signal would be given, each group was to occupy the position assigned to it.

At one o'clock in the afternoon we lined up as we had been doing every day, for the roll call, the last roll call in this camp because there was never to be another. But when Galewski, the head of a group of workers, told us that work that day would end an hour earlier than usual because Scharführer Rotner was going to Malkinia to bathe in the river Bug, he gave us a little wink as though alluding to the "bath" we had prepared for the Nazis.

At two o'clock in the afternoon the distribution of weapons began. Young Salzberg and the other looked for weapons in their masters' barracks. They managed to steal about a score of rifles and one machine gun and took them to the garage. It was very difficult to steal the hand grenades from the arsenal. That day a pile of garbage was being removed from near the arsenal. This was very convenient but it disturbed the camp administrator, SS man Miller, who had just arrived and wanted to sleep. The agronomist, Sudowicz, who was in charge of the garden, called on him with the excuse of wanting to talk over some problems relating to the plants. At the same time Marcus and Salzberg picked up the rugs and beat them in front of the arsenal, so that the guards had to move out of the way for a while. At that moment the door of the arsenal was opened with our key and Jacek, the Hungarian boy, slipped inside, climbed onto the window sill at the end of the room, used a diamond to cut a small square in the glass and handed the bombs and other weapons to Jacob Miller from Wlodzimierz-Wolynski, who was waiting outside and put them on his garbage cart. The arms were taken to the garage. This time the hand grenades had their detonators all right and acted as a spur to flagging spirits.

Spirits grew agitated and it seemed that no one would be able to keep the secret. The leaders therefore decided to start the revolt an hour before the time originally agreed upon.

At four o'clock sharp that afternoon, messages were sent to all the groups with orders to assemble immediately at the garage to pick up their weapons. Rudek from Plotzk was responsible for the distribution. Anyone who came to fetch weapons had to give the password "Death!" to which the proper reply was "Life!" "Death! Life! Death! Life!" Cries of enthusiasm arose as the long-awaited rifles, revolvers and hand grenades were handed out. At the same time the chief murderers of the camp were attacked. Telephone wires were cut and the watchtowers were set on fire with gasoline. Captain Zelo attacked two SS guards with an ax and joined us to take over the command.

Near the garage stood a German armored car, but Rudek swiftly put the motor out of commission. Now the car served as an ambush from which to fire at the Germans. Our gunfire felled Sturmführer Kurt Seidler and other Nazi dogs. The arsenal was taken by assault and the captured weapons handed out to the insurgents. We already had 200 armed men. The others attacked the Germans with axes and spades.

We set fire to the gas chambers, to the “bathhouse,” burned the simulated railroad station with all the fake signs: “Białystok-Wolkowysk,” “Office,” “Tickets,” “Waiting Room,” etc. The barracks who bore the name of the Nazi hangman Max Biel[as] were ablaze too.

Captain Zelo gave commands and encouraged the men to fight. Nobody cared about his own life. A fiery spirit of revenge had taken hold of us. We had acquired more weapons; we even had a machine gun now. Rudolf Masaryk took care of it. He stationed himself on the roof of the pigeon coop and poured fire on the confused Germans. Through the exchange of fire we can hear his voice shouting, “Take that for my wife, and take that for my child who did not even have a chance to come into the world! And take that, you murderers, for the humanity which you have insulted and degraded!”

Roused to action by the flames and the firing, the Germans began to arrive from all sides. SS and police arrived from Kosów soldiers from the nearby airfield and finally a special squad of the Warsaw SS. A full-scale battle developed. Captain Zelo was darting in and out among the flames, giving us courage and urging us to fight on. He gave orders, concise, warlike—until a Nazi bullet put an end to his life.

Night fell. The battle had already been going on for six hours. The Germans were getting reinforcements, and our ranks had become thinner. Our ammunition was running out.

We had been ordered to make for the nearby woods. Most of our fighters fell but there were many German casualties. Very few of us survived.

[Shalom Kohn]

Source: Steve Hochstadt, ed., Sources of the Holocaust (Houndsmill, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004), pp. 235–240. Used by permission of Palgrave Macmillan.

153. ALEXANDER PECHERSKY ON THE SOBIBÓR REVOLT OF OCTOBER 14, 1943

Alexander (Sasha) Pechersky, a Russian Jew who was conscripted into the Russian army and captured by the Germans, found himself in the Sobibór extermination camp in September 1943. His military experience made him an obvious leader of a planned revolt and escape. In this document, Pechersky gives a detailed account of the preparation for and execution of the plan to kill the guards of the camp, obtain arms, and flee into the forest. He also relates how the group that survived the revolt sought help from locals and managed to join a partisan group. This revolt, despite the many prisoners who lost their lives in the initial battle to overwhelm the guards and in the mine fields that surrounded the camp, was the most successful revolt of prisoners in any of the extermination camps.

I was born in Kremenchug in 1919, but spent my childhood in Rostov. After I finished my secondary studies I entered a music school. Music and theatre were the most important things in my life. I directed amateur dramatic circles and took a great interest in the arts.

In 1941 I joined the army with the rank of second lieutenant, and was soon promoted to first lieutenant. Taken prisoner in October 1941, I caught typhus, but concealed the disease, fearing to be killed.

In May 1942, I tried to escape with four other prisoners, but we were caught and were sent first to the disciplinary camp of Borysov and then to Minsk. During a medical examination it was discovered that I was Jewish. I was locked up with other Jews in a place nicknamed “the Jewish cellar,” where we spent ten days in complete darkness.

We were allowed 100 grams of bread a day and a jug of water. Then on September 20 1942 we were transferred to the labour camp of Sheroka Street in Minsk, where I lived until my deportation to Sobibor.

In September 1943 we were told that Jews would be transferred to Germany, but that families would not be separated. At 4 am a silent crowd left Minsk, the men on foot, women and children in trucks.

We gathered at the railway station where a freight train awaited us. Seventy people were crowded into a box-car, and after four days we reached Sobibor. We stopped during the night and were given water. The doors opened, and facing us, was a poster Sonderkommando Sobibor.

Tired and hungry, we left the car. Armed SS officers stood there and Oberscharfuhrer Gomerski shouted “Cabinet makers and carpenters with no families forward.”

Eighty men were led into the camp and locked in a barrack. Older prisoners informed us about Sobibor. We had all fought in the war and suffered in labour camps but we were so horrified about Sobibor that we could not sleep that night.

Shlomo Leitman, a Polish Jew from Sheroka, was lying at my side. "What will become of us?" he asked. I didn't answer pretending to sleep. I couldn't get over my reaction and was thinking of Nelly, a little girl who travelled in my boxcar and who was, no doubt, dead already. I thought of my own daughter Elochka.

On September 24, I wrote in my diary: "We are in the camp of Sobibor, we rise at 5.00 am, get a litre of warm water, but no bread, at 5.30 we are counted, at 6.00 we leave for work, in columns of threes, Russian Jews are in front, then Poles, Czech and Dutch."

I remember when the SS man Frenzel ordered us to sing, Cybulski was walking at my side, "What shall we sing?" he asked and I answered, "We only know one song: Yesli Zavtra Voyna." It was a patriotic Russian song and it gave us hope for freedom.

Soldiers led us to the Nordlager, a new section of the camp. Nine barracks were already built there and others were under construction. Our group was split in two, one part was sent to build, the other to cut wood. On our first day of work, fifteen people got twenty-five lashes each for incompetence.

On September 25, we unloaded coal all day and were given only twenty minutes for lunch. The cook was unable to feed us all in such a short time. Frenzel was furious and ordered the cook to sit down. Then he whipped him while whistling a marching tune. The soup tasted as though it had been mixed with blood and although we were very hungry, many of us were unable to eat.

Our arrival at the camp made a great impression on the older prisoners: they knew well that the war was going on, but had never seen the men who fought in it. And these newcomers could handle arms!

We were approached by men and women who made us understand that their wish was to get out of hell. I couldn't speak Yiddish so Shlomo Leitman who was born in Warsaw, acted as interpreter. We could understand some Polish as it resembles Russian.

I wanted to know the topography of Sobibor. Camp Number 1 where we lived, included workshops and kitchens. Camp Number 2 the reception centre of the new arrivals, had storage for the belongings stolen from the prisoners, a corridor led to Camp Number 3 and its gas chambers.

On September 26, twenty-five prisoners were whipped, a young Dutchman tall and lean, was chopping wood, but was not strong enough for the task. The SS guard hit him on the head. Astonished I stopped working. Furious, the guard shouted, "I give you five minutes to chop this wood, if you fail, you will get twenty-five lashes."

I hit the wood as though it were his head. "You did it in four and a half minutes," said the Nazi looking at his watch. He offered me a cigarette. "Thanks, I don't smoke," I replied.

27 September. We were still working at the Nordlager. At 9 a.m. Kali-Mali, from Sheroka, whose real name was Shubayev, told me, "All the Germans have left, only the Kapo is here, why?"

I answered, "I don't know, but let us see where we are." A prisoner informed us, "If they are not here, it means that a convoy has just arrived, look over there at the Camp Number 3." We heard a terrible scream from a woman, followed by children wailing, "Mother, mother." And, as if to add to the horror, the bawling of geese joined the human wailing.

A farmyard was established in the camp to enrich the menus of the SS men, and the bawling of the geese covered the shrieks of the victims.

My helplessness at these crimes horrified me, Shlomo Leitman and Boris Cybulski were livid, "Sasha, let us escape, we are only 200 metres from the forest, we can cut the barbed wire with our axes and run," said Boris. "We must escape all together and soon: winter is near and snow is not our friend," he added.

On September 28, one week after I arrived at the camp, I knew everything about the hell of Sobibor. Camp Number 4 was on a hill: each section was surrounded with barbed wire and was mined. I was informed of the exact place occupied by the personnel, the guards and the arsenal.

Next day, the 600 prisoners, men and women were taken to the station to unload eight cars of bricks. Each of us was forced to run and fetch eight bricks; the one who failed was whipped twenty-five times. We finished our work in less than an hour and we returned to our commandos. The reason for the haste, a new convoy was just entering the station.

Our group of eighty men was finally led to Camp Number 4, I was working near Shlomo; another prisoner from Sheroka approached me and whispered, "We have decided to escape; there are only five SS officers, and we can wipe them out. The forest is near."

I replied, "Easier said than done, the five guards are not together. When you finish with one, the second shoots at us; and how shall we cross the minefields? Wait the time is near."

At night, Baruch (Leon Feldhendler) told me, "It is not the first time that we have planned to finish with Sobibor, but very few of us know how to use arms. Lead us, and we shall follow you." His intelligent face inspired trust and gave me courage. I asked him to form a group of the most reliable prisoners.

On October 7, I gave to Baruch (Feldhendler) my first instructions on how to dig a tunnel. "The carpenters' workshop is at the end of the camp, five metres from the barbed wire; the net of three rows of barbed wire occupies four metres to fifteen metres; let us add seven metres, the length of the barrack.

We shall start digging under the stove and the tunnel will be no more than thirty-five metres long and eighty centimetres deep, because of the danger of mines. We shall have at least twenty cubic metres of earth to hide, and shall leave that earth under the floorboards. The job must be done only at night."

We all agreed to start working: the digging of the tunnel would take us fifteen to twenty days. But the plan presented weak spots: between 11 pm and 5 am six hundred persons had to pass in Indian file the thirty-five meters of the tunnel and run a good distance from the camp in order to avoid the posse of the SS.

I said, "I also have other ideas, meanwhile, let us prepare our first arms: seventy well whetted knives or razor blades." Baruch (Feldhendler) said that the Kapos were interested in our plans and could be very helpful, since they walked freely in the camp. I thought that their help was vital, "All right, I accept," I said.

October 8 1943. A new transport arrived. Janek, the carpenters' supervisor, needed three prisoners to help him. Shlomo, another prisoner and I were chosen and sent to Camp Number 1. That same evening, Baruch (Feldhendler) brought Shlomo seventy well whetted knives.

October 9: Grisha, who was caught sitting while cleaning wood, got twenty-five lashes. It was a bad day, thirty of our people had been flogged for various transgressions and we were exhausted. In the evening Kali-Mali came to the barracks, out of breath.

He informed me that Grisha and seven of our men were ready to escape and asked us to join them. "Come with us, the site near the barbed wire is badly lit, we will kill the guard with an axe and then we will run to the forest." We went to find Grisha, and I explained to him that reprisals would be terrible even if his plan succeeded. I had to use threats before I persuaded him to plan only a collective escape.

October 10: I saw an SS officer with his arm in a sling. I was told that it was Greischutz back from his leave. He had been wounded in a Russian air raid. Later, Shlomo and I met the Kapo Brzecki who knew that we were preparing something. "Take me with you; together we shall accomplish more. I know the end awaits us all," he said, and he also asked us to include the Kapo Geniek. I answered, "Could you kill a Nazi?" He thought for a moment, and replied, "Yes, if it is necessary for our cause."

October 11: That morning, we heard screams followed by shots. We were locked up in the barracks and guards stood around us. The shooting lasted a long time and seemed to be coming from the Nordlager. We feared the prisoners had tried to escape before we were ready. Soon we learned the cause of the fusillade, a group of new prisoners already undressed, had revolted and had tried to run in the direction of the barbed wire.

The guards began to shoot and killed many of them instantly. The others were dragged to Camp Number 3. That day, the crematorium burned longer than usual. Huge flames rose up in the grey autumn sky and the camp was lit with strange colours. Helpless and distressed, we looked at the bodies of our brothers and sisters.

October 12: It was a terrible day: eighteen of our friends, many from Sheroka, were sick. Several SS men, under the direction of Frenzel, entered our barrack and asked the patients to follow them. Among them was a young Dutch prisoner with his wife, and the unfortunate man could hardly walk. The woman was running after the group screaming, "Murderers, I know where you are taking my husband. I can't live without him! Assassins, murderers." She died with the group.

Shlomo and I ordered a meeting for 9.00 pm, at the carpenters' workshop. Baruch (Feldhendler), Shlomo, Janek, the tailors Joseph and Jacob, Moniek and others were present. We posted a sentry at the entrance. Moniek went to fetch Brzecki and, when both returned, I asked Brzecki again if he had thought over the consequences of his decision; if the plan failed, he would be the first to die.

He said, "I know it, but we must get rid of the SS officers and this should take one hour, if we could do it in less time, so much the better. For that purpose, we need efficient and determined men, since one moment's hesitation would be fatal, and I know some capable people, who can do the job."

At 3.00 pm Brzecki was to lead three of his men to Camp Number 2 under any pretext that he would find himself. Their task would consist of liquidating the four officers present. Baruch (Feldhendler) would lead the SS men to a place where the prisoners would be waiting, and would prevent anyone from leaving Camp Number 2 once the action had begun.

At exactly 4 o'clock, another team would cut the telephone wires from Camp Number 2 to the guards' quarters. The same team would hide those wires in such a way as to make it impossible to reconnect the telephone on the same day. At the same time, we were to start killing SS officers, they would be invited, one by one, into the workshops where two of our men would execute them. At 4.30 pm everything would be finished.

At the same time Brzecki and Geniek would assemble the prisoners for the usual evening roll call. In front would be the Soviet prisoners who were to take over the arsenal and the rest of us would cover them. Once the arsenal was open, armed men would head the group and kill the guards at the gate. If they resisted we would fight with the arms taken from the officers.

Near the workshops and the officers' villas was a mesh of barbed wire. There the ground was mined, but less dangerous. Stones were to be thrown in order to destroy the mines.

These were the details of the plan: I added that I had long discussions with Shlomo and I couldn't think of anything better. I asked everybody to think it over again, and a new meeting was planned for the next day, under the strictest secrecy.

Just before the revolt, an idea occurred to me and I wanted to check if it was right. Having observed the behaviour of the guards for a long time, I knew that every morning each of them got five bullets for his rifle. I also noticed that, with the changing of each guard, the bullets were handed over to the next guard. This meant that the guards who were not on duty had no bullets.

In order to check my findings, I asked Brzecki to find an excuse to send me to the guards' barracks. On October 13 at 10.00 am, the carpentry workshop got an order to send a man to the barracks in order to repair the doors. Janek sent me there and, while I was visiting the rooms, I was glad to see that my idea was correct.

October 14: "On the night of October 13 we distributed knives and hatchets, as well as warm clothes." I was to remain in the carpentry workshop where, from the window, I could watch what was happening in Camp Number 3. In the next barrack, Shlomo and a team of twenty men were repairing our wooden beds.

According to our plan, at 4.00 and at 4.15 pm, two SS men were to appear at the tailors' workshop. At the same time, two officers, Greischutz and Getzinger, were in another workshop. Frenzel was supervising the building of some cupboards.

Rosenfeld's job was to kill him. Friedrich Gaulstich would enter the carpentry workshop where Shlomo would be waiting. Other SS officers of Camp Number 2 were to be enticed into different workshops.

Each of us had his task: Shubayev, aged twenty-five, a railway engineer from Rostov, a good and simple buddy, would go to the tailors' workshop with Moniek. Cybulski, a thirty-five year old driver, a former truck driver from Donbass, and accompanied by Michael and Bunio. Guided by Brzecki, they were to go to Camp Number 2 to meet Baruch (Feldhendler).

At 2 pm, SS Unterscharfuhrer Walter Ryba came to Brzecki, he had a machine gun, and that worried me. That morning Frenzel noticed that Janek was better dressed than usual, but Geniek reassured us. Brzecki had to go to Camp Number 4 with other prisoners in order to stack wood. The guard took his machine gun only because he was the sole supervisor.

Geniek was to lead the four men to Camp Number 2. At first he asked us to postpone it to the next day, but that was impossible. Although the details of our plan were known only to the committee and a small group, the other prisoners felt that something was going to happen and kept asking: "Well, when will it be?"

On the eve of October 14th, the older people said prayers, it was Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Some inmates told them, "Better pray for Sasha to help you." They answered, "We are praying to God to help Sasha."

We had another reason for not postponing our plan: On October 14 Gomerski was on vacation. The Lagerfuhrer Frenzel was a bastard but, compared to Gomerski, he seemed a choirboy. "Tomorrow may be too late," I said to Geniek, "we have to do what we decided, and you must obey."

At 3.20 pm Geniek came to Cybulski's barrack with Shlomo and the two others. Two officers were killed by Wajspapier in the shoemakers' barrack while Jacob was giving them their boots. At 4.15 I heard that Cybulski, Michael and Baruch (Feldhendler) had accomplished their mission at Camp Number 2. At 4pm I had met Luka, the Dutch girl and told her, "The officers will soon be dead, be ready to escape." As she trembled, I added, "What we are doing is the only way to survive, we have no right to give up living, we must avenge ourselves."

At 4.30pm, Brzecki returned from Camp Number 4 with the commando and Unterscharfuhrer Gaulstich arrived soon afterwards. Shlomo told him, "We have done the repairs in the barracks, now the workers do not know what to do." The SS man went in: Shlomo's hatchet awaited him.

Frenzel didn't come, and later we learned that SS officer Ryba had been killed in the garage. Now it was vital to leave, Brzecki whistled and prisoners were directed to Camp Number 1 in a disorderly way. This infuriated the guard, a Volksdeutsch from the Volga region, he was killed with an axe.

A new group coming from Camp Number 2, entered Camp Number 1 where prisoners were just learning what was happening. A Ukrainian guard began to shoot, a mighty “Hurrah” was heard. “Forward, Forward” shouted the prisoners.

They were running towards the gate, shooting with rifles, cutting barbed wire with pliers. We crossed a minefield and many lost their lives. My group marched towards the quarter where the SS lived, and several of us were killed. Between the camp and the forest there was an immense clearing and here, too, many fell.

At last, we got to the forest, but Shlomo and Luka were missing. We walked all night in a column, one by one. I was up front, followed by Cybulski, while Arkady brought up the rear. We were all silent, from time to time, a light was visible in the sky.

After walking three kilometres we reached a canal, that was five or six metres wide and quite deep. Suddenly we saw a group of men. Arkady went crawling off to investigate. He found Shubayev and many other friends. Together we built a bridge with tree trunks, and then I learned that Shlomo had been wounded while escaping. Unable to run, he asked to be put to death. Of course nobody listened to him and he stayed behind with other prisoners.

Our group numbered fifty-seven people. After walking another five kilometres, we heard the noise of a train. We were on the edge of a wood, an area of bushes in front of us. Dawn was approaching and we needed a safe place to hide. I knew the Nazis were after us and we thought that a group of trees near a railway wouldn’t attract the attention of our enemy. We decided to remain there during the day, camouflaged by branches.

At dawn, it was raining. Arkady and Cybulski left to explore the terrain on one side, Shubayev and I on the other. We found an abandoned site near the forest. Cybulski and Arkady reached the railway line. Poles were working there, but without a guard. We hid and posted two sentries nearby; these sentries were to be changed every three hours. All day, planes were flying over our heads. We heard the voices of the Polish workers.

At night, we saw two men looking for something, we understood that they were fugitives who had returned from the direction of Bug, “Why haven’t you crossed the river?” I asked. They told us that they had been near a village where they learned that soldiers were sent along the Bug River to check all points.

I asked if they had met Luka, and they assured me that they had seen her in the forest, leaving for Chelm with Polish Jews. We formed a new column, Cybulski and I leading, Arkady and Shubayev in the rear. After five kilometres we reached the forest, but we couldn’t find enough food so we decided to split into small groups, each taking a different direction. My unit included, Shubayev, Cybulski, Arkady, Michael Itzkovich and Simon Mazurkewich.

We set off eastwards, guided by the stars. We walked at night, and hid during the day. Our objective was to cross the Bug River. We approached little villages to beg for food and to ask our way. We were often told, “Prisoners escaped from Sobibor where people are being burned, they are looking for fugitives.”

We reached the village of Stawki, a kilometre and a half from the Bug River. We had spent the day in the forest and, at sunset, three of us entered a hut. A thirty-year old peasant was cutting and gathering tobacco leaves, an old man was near a stove. In a corner, a baby’s cradle was hanging from the ceiling, and a young woman was rocking it. “Good evening, may we come in?”

“Come in, come in,” answered the young man. “Draw the curtains,” said Cybulski. We sat down, everyone was quiet. “Could you tell us where to cross the Bug?” asked Shubayev. “I don’t know,” said the young man. “You must know, you have been living here long enough. We know that there are places where the water is low, and the crossing easy,” I said. “If you are so sure, then go. We know nothing, and we have no right to go near rivers.”

We talked a little longer, and told them that we were escaped war prisoners and wished to return home. At last the young man said, “I shall show you the direction, but I won’t go to the river. Find it yourselves, be careful, it is guarded everywhere since prisoners escaped from a camp where soap is made with human fat. The fugitives are being chased everywhere, even underground. If you are lucky, you will get to the other side. I wish you luck.”

“Let’s go before the moon rises.” “Wait,” said the young woman, “take some bread for the way.” We thanked them and the old man blessed us with the sign of the cross. The same night, October 19 we crossed the Bug. On the 22nd, eight days after the uprising, we met a unit of partisans of the Voroshilov detachment.

A new chapter began.

Source: “Alexander Pechersky, Leader of the Sobibor Revolt: Testimony,” Holocaust Education and Archive Research Team, <http://www.holocaustresearchproject.org/revolt/pechersky.html>. Used by permission.

154. JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES’ DECLARATION OF RENUNCIATION OF RELIGIOUS BELIEFS, 1936

The Jews were not the only victim group of the Nazis targeted because of religion (although according to Nazi ideology, the Jews were targeted because of their race). Jehovah’s Witnesses were long considered outside of mainstream Christianity. Among their tenets are refusal of military service; insistence that the only oath of allegiance they will swear is to Jehovah, their name for God; and refusal to salute any flag, including the Nazi swastika, or to give the Nazi salute. These doctrines made them highly suspect in Nazi Germany society, leading to an increase in arrests and incarceration in camps. This document is a form presented to Jehovah’s Witnesses in the camps. If it was signed, the person was released. Very few, if any, Jehovah’s Witnesses, however, signed the form; they would not violate their own beliefs even if it meant the possibility of dying in a Nazi camp. Their courage and willingness to offer comfort to others earned them a position of respect among other camp prisoners.

Concentration camp _____

Department II

Declaration

I, _____

born on _____ in _____ herewith make the following declaration:

1. I have recognized that the International Bible Students Association is spreading erroneous teachings and under the cloak of religious activity follows subversive purposes.
2. I therefore turned away from this organization entirely and also made myself mentally free from this sect.
3. I herewith give assurance that I will never again take any part in the activity of the International Bible Students Association. Any persons approaching me with the teaching of the Bible Students, or who in any manner reveal their connections with them, I will denounce immediately. All literature from the Bible Students that should be sent to my address I will deliver at once to the nearest police station.

4. I will in the future respect the laws of the State, especially in the event of war, will defend my fatherland with weapon in hand, and fully join the community of the people.
5. I have been notified that I can expect renewed arrest if I should act against the Declaration given today.

_____, Dated _____

Signature _____

KL/47/4.43 5000

Source: Steve Hochstadt, ed., Sources of the Holocaust (Houndsmill, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004), p. 47. Used by permission of Palgrave Macmillan.

155. “REFLECTIONS ON THE TREATMENT OF PEOPLES OF ALIEN RACES IN THE EAST”: A SECRET MEMORANDUM HANDED TO HITLER BY HIMMLER, MAY 25, 1940

In this secret memorandum from Heinrich Himmler, Reich leader SS, to Adolf Hitler, Himmler discusses how small, individual ethnic groups in or near Poland should be treated by the Nazi regime. His overall recommendation regarding these groups is that they should be split “into as many parts and fragments as possible.” The ethnic groups he references are generally found in parts of Poland, Ukraine, and the Carpathian Mountains. The goal is to extinguish these peoples as separate groups with their own culture. By way of diminishing their uniqueness, Himmler suggests that their children be provided with a very limited level of education but one that includes inculcating in them the belief in the “divine law to obey the Germans.” Those children who are “racially perfect and conforming to our conditions” can be considered for additional schooling in Germany. Himmler also proposes an “annual sifting of all children in the General Government between the ages of 6 to 10 years in order to separate the racially valuable and nonvaluable ones.” By moving the racially valuable children to Germany, the General Government will be composed of an “inferior population.”

[Handwritten] Dr. Gross of the Racial Policy Office has been informed 28 November 40

Wolff

For the files
[stamp] Top Secret

Reflections on the Treatment of Peoples of Alien Races in the East

Concerning the treatment of peoples of alien races in the East we have to see to it that we acknowledge and cultivate as many individual ethnic groups as possible, that is, outside of the Poles and the Jews, also the Ukrainians, the White Russians, the Gorals [Goralen], the Lemcos [Lemken] and the Cashubos [Kaschuben]. If other small and isolated national groups can be found in other places, they should be treated the same way.

What I want to say is that we are not only most interested in not unifying the population of the East, but, on the contrary, in splitting them up into as many parts and fragments as possible.

But even within the ethnic groups themselves we have one interest in leading these to unity and greatness, or perhaps arouse in them gradually a national consciousness and national culture, but we want to dissolve them into innumerable small fragments and particles.

We naturally want to use the members of all these ethnic groups, especially of the small ones, in positions of police officials and mayors. Only the mayors and local police authorities will be allowed to head those ethnic groups. As far as the Gorals are concerned the individual chieftains and elders of the tribes, who live in continuous feud with each other anyhow, should fill these positions. There must be no centralization toward the top, because only by dissolving this whole conglomeration of peoples of the Government General, amounting to 15 million, and of the 8 million of the eastern provinces, will it be possible for us to carry out the racial sifting which must be the basis for our considerations: namely selecting out of this conglomeration the racially valuable and bringing them to Germany and assimilating them there.

Within a very few years—I should think about 4 to 5 years—the name of the Cashubes, for instance, must be unknown, because at that time there won't be a Cashubian people any more (this also goes especially for the West Prussians). I hope that the concepts of Jews will be completely extinguished through the possibility of a large emigration of all Jews to Africa or some other colony. Within a somewhat longer period, it should also be possible to make the ethnic concepts of Ukrainians, Gorals and Lemcos disappear in our area. What has been said for those fragments of peoples is also meant on a correspondingly larger scale for the Poles.

A basic issue in the solution of all these problems is the question of schooling and thus the question of sifting and selecting the young. For the non-German population of the East there must be no higher school than the four-grade elementary school. The sole goal of this school is to be—

Simple arithmetic up to 500 at the most; writing of one's name; the doctrine that it is a divine law to obey the Germans and to be honest, industrious, and good. I don't think that reading is necessary.

Apart from this school there are to be no schools at all in the East. Parents, who from the beginning want to give their children better schooling in the elementary school as well as later on in a higher school, must take an application to the Higher SS and Police Leaders. The first consideration in dealing with this application will be whether the child is racially perfect and conforming to our conditions. If we acknowledge such a child to be as of our blood, the parents will be notified that the child will be sent to a school in Germany and that it will permanently remain in Germany.

Cruel and tragic as every individual case may be, this method is still the mildest and best one if, out of inner conviction, one rejects as unGerman and impossible the Bolshevik method of physical extermination of a people.

The parents of such children of good blood will be given the choice to either give away their child; they will then probably produce no more children so that the danger of this subhuman people of the East [Untermenschenvolk des Ostens] obtaining a class of leaders which, since it would be equal to us, would also be dangerous for us, will disappear—or else the parents pledge themselves to go to Germany and to become loyal citizens there. The love toward their child, whose future and education depends on the loyalty of the parents, will be a strong weapon in dealing with them.

Apart from examining the applications made by parents for better schooling of their children, there will be an annual sifting of all children of the Government General between the ages of 6 to 10 years in order to separate the racially valuable and nonvaluable ones. The ones considered racially valuable will be treated in the same way as the children who are admitted on the basis of the approved application of their parents.

I consider it as a matter of course from an emotional as well as from a rational viewpoint that the moment children and parents come to Germany they are not treated like lepers in the schools and in everyday life, but, after having changed their names, they should, in full confidence, be incorporated into the German life, although attention and vigilance must be exercised with regard to them. It must not happen that the children be made to feel as outcasts, because, after all, we believe in this, our own blood, which, through the errors of German history has flowed into an alien nationality and we are convinced that our ideology and our ideals will strike a chord of resonance in the racially equal soul of these children. Here teachers and Hitler Youth leaders especially must do an out-and-out job, and the mistake that has been made in the past with the people from Alsace Lorraine must never be repeated; namely, that on one side one wants to win the people as Germans, and on the other side one constantly hurts and repudiates their human value, their pride and honor through distrust and insults. Insults like "Polack" and "Ukrainian" or something like that must be made impossible.

The children will have to be educated in an elementary school and after those four grades it can be decided whether the children should continue to go to the German grammar school or should be transferred to a national political institution of education.

The population of the Government General during the next 10 years, by necessity and after a consistent carrying out of these measures, will be composed of the remaining inferior population supplemented by the population of the eastern provinces deported there, and of all those parts of the German Reich which have the same racial and human qualities for instance, parts of the Sorbs [Sorben] and Wends [Wenden].

This population will, as a people of laborers without leaders, be at our disposal and will furnish Germany annually with migrant workers and with workers for special tasks (roads, quarries, buildings): they themselves will have more to eat and more to live on than under the Polish regime; and, though they have no culture of their own, they will, under the strict, consistent, and just leadership of the German people, be called upon to help work on its everlasting cultural tasks and its buildings and perhaps, as far as the amount of heavy work is concerned, will be the ones who make the realization of these tasks possible.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. XIII, pp. 147–150, Doc. NO-1880.

156. LETTER TO BORMANN ON "ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE AGAINST POLES, RUSSIANS, JEWS, AND GYPSIES," OCTOBER 13, 1942

This letter was sent by Otto Georg Thierack, the Reich minister of justice, to Martin Bormann, head of the Nazi Party Chancellery and private secretary to Adolf Hitler. In it, Thierack proposes "to turn over criminal proceedings against Poles, Russians, Jews, and Gypsies to the Reich Leader SS," Heinrich Himmler. By allowing these people to be dealt with outside of the German legal system, their extermination will proceed faster than the legal system would otherwise allow. Thierack recommends that they be surrendered to the police, "who can then take the necessary measures unhampered by any legal criminal evidence," and asserts that this procedure is "entirely justified in wartime." He suggests certain exemptions to this for Poles and Russians but not for Jews and gypsies. Finally, Thierack asks Bormann to submit this proposal to Hitler for his approval. There are two matters of particular note revealed in this document. First, the Reich legal system was completely co-opted by the Nazi regime. Second, it was not just Jews who were subjected to extralegal proceedings.

LETTER FROM REICH MINISTER OF JUSTICE THIERACK TO BORMANN, 13 OCTOBER 1942, CONCERNING THE "ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE AGAINST POLES, RUSSIANS, JEWS, AND GYPSIES"

T 459

The Reich Minister of Justice

Berlin, 13 October 1942

[Handwritten] Dispatched 13/10.

[Initials] KUE [Kuemmerlein]

To Reichsleiter Bormann
Fuehrer Headquarters

Subject: Administration of criminal justice against Poles, Russians, Jews, and gypsies Dear Reichsleiter:

With a view to freeing the German people of Poles, Russians, Jews, and gypsies, and with a view to making the eastern territories incorporated into the Reich available for settlements of German nationals, I intend to turn over criminal proceedings against Poles, Russians, Jews, and gypsies to the Reich Leader SS. In so doing I work on the principle that the administration of justice can only make a small contribution to the extermination of members of these peoples [Angehörige dieses Volkstums auszurotten]. Undoubtedly the administration of justice pronounces very severe sentences on such persons, but that is not enough to constitute a material contribution toward the realization of the above-mentioned aim. Nor is any useful purpose served by keeping such persons in German prisons and penitentiaries for years, even if they are utilized as labor for war purposes as is done today on a large scale.

I am, on the other hand, of the opinion that considerably better results can be accomplished by surrendering such persons to the police, who can then take the necessary measures unhampered by any legal criminal evidence. I start from the principle that such measures seem entirely justified in wartime, and that certain conditions which I consider essential are fulfilled. These conditions consist in the prosecution of Poles and Russians by the police only if they resided until 1 September 1939 in the former state territory of Poland or the Soviet Union; and secondly, that Poles who were registered as being of German descent will continue to be subjected to prosecution by the administration of justice as before.

On the other hand, the police may prosecute Jews and gypsies irrespective of these conditions.

But no changes whatsoever are to be made in regard to the prosecution of other foreign nationals by the administration of justice.

The Reich Leader SS, with whom I discussed these views, agrees with them. I also informed Dr. Lammers.

I submit this matter to you, dear Reichsleiter, with the request to let me know whether the Fuehrer approves this view. If so, I would then make my official recommendations through Reich Minister Dr. Lammers.

[Handwritten] After one week.

[Initial] Kue [Kuemmerlein] 10/19, 10/26

Heil Hitler!
yours

[Initial] TH [Thierack]

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 674–675, Doc. NG-558.

157. CRIMINAL PROCEDURES AGAINST POLES AND MEMBERS OF THE EASTERN PEOPLES, NOVEMBER 5, 1942

By letter dated October 13, 1942, from Otto Georg Thierack, the Reich minister of justice, to Martin Bormann, head of the Nazi Party Chancellery and private secretary to Adolf Hitler, Thierack requested that Bormann attain Hitler's approval of a plan that would move the consideration of criminal proceedings against Poles, Russians, Jews, and Gypsies from the court system to the police "who can then take the necessary measures unhampered by any legal criminal evidence." In the letter that follows it is announced to appropriate chiefs of various criminal justice departments that Hitler has approved the plan and it is now being instituted. This letter refers to Jews, gypsies, "Poles and members of Eastern peoples," categorized collectively as "members of the Eastern peoples." It emphasizes that these people must be treated "under a criminal law different from the one concerning people of German-blood" and explains that this is required because offenses committed by them endanger "the order of the German community and that therefore measures must be taken to prevent further dangers."

Reichs Security Main Office [RSHA]

II A 2 No. 567/42-176

Berlin, 5 November 1942

EXPRESS LETTER

To:

- a. The Higher SS and Police Fuehrer
- b. The Commanders and Inspectors of the Security Police and Security Service SD
- c. The Chiefs of the State Police (chief offices)
- d. The Supreme Commanders of the Security Police and the SD
- e. The Chiefs of the Criminal Police (Chief offices)
- f. The Chiefs of the SD-Sections (Chief Detachments)

Information to (Sections I, III, IV and V—5. copies each)

Subject: Criminal procedure against Poles and members of the Eastern peoples.

I. The Reichsfuehrer-SS has come to an agreement with the Reich Minister of Justice Thierack that the courts will forego the carrying out of regular criminal procedures against Poles and members of the Eastern peoples. These people of foreign extraction henceforth shall be turned over to the police. Jews and gypsies are to be treated likewise. This agreement was approved by the Fuehrer.

In pursuance of this agreement regulations are at present being worked out by the RSHA and the Reich Ministry of Justice to take effect possibly by 1 January 1943.

II. This agreement is based on the following considerations:

Poles and members of the Eastern peoples are persons of foreign extraction and racially of a lower value, residing in German Reich territory. This situation creates serious dangers for the German community which by necessity result in placing persons of foreign extraction under a criminal law different from the one concerning people of German-blood.

This necessity has not been fully taken into account so far. Only for Poles has there been a special regulation in the sphere of criminal law through the Ordinance concerning the Criminal Procedure against Poles and Jews in the incorporated Eastern territories of 4 December 1941 (Reich Law Gazette, "RGL."—I page 759). But this special regulation also contains no basic solution of the questions which arise from the co-habitation of Germans with persons of foreign extraction. It only creates more severe penal regulations and a partly simplified criminal procedure for Poles. But the real question that persons of foreign extraction for reasons of national policy are to be treated entirely different from people of German blood is disregarded because basically, in spite of all aggravations, it applies to Poles the characteristics of the German criminal procedure.

In principle, therefore, the punishment of an offense committed by a Pole is still based on the same considerations which apply to the punishment of a German; this means the judge considers the personality of the offender and tries to find through a far-reaching appraisal of the personal motives of the offender a retribution for the crime which would do justice to the interests of the national community.

These considerations which may be right for the punishment of an offense committed by a German, are wrong with regard to the punishment of an offense committed by a person of foreign extraction. With regard to offenses committed by a person of foreign extraction the personal motives of the offender are to be disregarded entirely. Important is only that this offense endangers the order of the German community and that therefore measures must be taken to prevent further dangers. In other words the offense committed by a person of foreign extraction is not to be judged from the point of view of legal retribution by way of Justice, but from the point of view of preventing danger through police-action.

From this follows that the criminal procedure against persons of foreign extraction must be transferred from the courts to the Police.

III. The preceding statement serves for personal information. However, there are no objections to inform the Gauleiters accordingly should the need arise.

The Deputy

Signed : Streckenbach

Stamp of the Reich Fuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police in the Reich Ministry of Interior.

Certified: [signed] Kausch Clerk.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. VII, pp. 976-977, Doc. L-179.

158. CIRCULAR LETTER REGARDING DECREE AGAINST JEWS AND GYPSIES NO LONGER NEEDED, MARCH 10, 1944

This letter from Heinrich Himmler, Reich SS leader, is dated deep into the war, just nine days before Germany's invasion and occupation of Hungary, where the last large Jewish community was still intact. It is, in effect, an administrative order about the publication of future rules and decrees applicable to Poles, Jews, and Gypsies. It states that there will be no change going forward regarding Poles. However, for Jews and Gypsies, directives prohibiting members of those groups to participate in certain livelihoods are no longer necessary and will be discontinued. The reason is that those two groups have been subjected to such an effective degree to evacuation and isolation that issuing decrees prohibiting certain livelihoods would be superfluous.

CIRCULAR LETTER OF HIMMLER TO THE SUPREME REICH AUTHORITIES, 10 MARCH 1944, NOTING THAT

1340 Evian Conference: Decisions on Jewish Refugees

“THE ACCOMPLISHED EVACUATION AND ISOLATION” OF JEWS AND GYPSIES HAD MADE MEANINGLESS THE PREVIOUS MANNER OF PUBLISHING SPECIAL DIREC-TIVES CONCERNING THEM

Berlin, 10 March 1944

The Reich Leader SS
Minister of Interior Affairs
S. Pol. IV D 2 c—927/44 g—24

[Initial] TH [Thierack]
[Stamp] Reich Ministry of Justice
17 March 1944
Dept. VII

SECRET

To the Supreme Reich Authorities

Subject: Posted prohibitions concerning Poles, Jews, and gypsies

The separately published decrees and rules governing the livelihood of Poles, Jews, and gypsies within the jurisdiction of the Reich, have frequently led to a summary equalization of these groups in the public eye as far as sale-and-utilization prohibitions, public announcements in the press, etc., are concerned. This attitude does not correspond with the differentiated political position to be granted to these groups now, and in the future.

As far as Jews and gypsies are concerned the accomplished evacuation and isolation of these groups by the Chief of the Security Police and the SD has made the publication of special directives (concerning the all inclusive prohibition of participation in many livelihoods) in the previous manner meaningless. Therefore, corresponding public directives may be eliminated.

The decrees and regulations which have been decided upon to govern the livelihood of the Poles will remain as before. For political practical reasons it is hereby recommended to maintain a certain amount of restraint in the public directives of these regulations, be it in posters, signboards, on press releases, etc.

I wish that the subordinate officers be informed of the necessary directives.

[Typed] Signed: H. HIMMLER
Certified : [Illegible signature]
SS Sturmbannführer

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, p. 713, Doc. 664-PS.

159. EVIAN CONFERENCE: DECISIONS ON JEWISH REFUGEES, JULY 14, 1938

*In March 1938, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt of the United States invited 30 European and Latin American nations as well as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa to meet and consider the resettlement of Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria. Some nations refused; others sent low-level bureaucrats with little or no authority to act. In July 1938, the representatives of these nations met in Evian, France, to discuss the issue. Attitudes were mixed, though almost all of those present went to great lengths to explain why their governments could not assist the refugees. At the end of the 90-day meeting, no resolution was reached. With the exception of the Dominican Republic, no country agreed to accept refugees. Thus, the conference itself has been viewed, with hindsight, as little more than a public relations ploy for the United States in its own relationship with a concerned Jewish constituency with a modicum of non-Jewish support.
More perversely, it affirmed for Hitler and the Nazis the unwillingness of Western democracies to extend themselves on behalf of the Jews.*

Having met at Evian, France, from July 6th to July 13th, 1938:

1. Considering that the question of involuntary emigration has assumed major proportions and that the fate of the unfortunate people affected has become a problem for intergovernmental deliberation;
2. Aware that the involuntary emigration of large numbers of people, of different creeds, economic conditions, professions and trades, from the country or countries where they have been established, is disturbing to the general economy, since these persons are obliged to seek refuge, either temporarily or permanently, in other countries at a time when there is serious unemployment; that, in consequence, countries of refuge and settlement are faced with problems, not only of an economic and social nature, but also of public order, and that there is a severe strain on the administrative facilities and absorptive capacities of the receiving countries;

3. Aware, moreover, that the involuntary emigration of people in large numbers has become so great that it renders racial and religious problems more acute, increases international unrest, and may hinder seriously the processes of appeasement in international relations;
4. Believing that it is essential that a long-range program should be envisaged, whereby assistance to involuntary emigrants, actual and potential, may be coordinated within the framework of existing migration laws and practices of Governments;
5. Considering that if countries of refuge or settlement are to cooperate in finding an orderly solution of the problem before the Committee they should have the collaboration of the country of origin and are therefore persuaded that it will make its contribution by enabling involuntary emigrants to take with them their property and possessions and emigrate in an orderly manner;
6. Welcoming heartily the initiative taken by the President of the United States of America in calling the Intergovernmental Meeting at Evian for the primary purpose of facilitating involuntary emigration from Germany (including Austria), and expressing profound appreciation to the French Government for its courtesy in receiving the Intergovernmental Meeting at Evian;
7. Bearing in mind the resolution adopted by the Council of the League of Nations on May 14th, 1938, concerning international assistance to refugees:
8. Recommends:
 - a. That the persons coming within the scope of the activity of the Intergovernmental Committee shall be 1) persons who have not already left their country of origin (Germany, including Austria), but who must emigrate on account of their political opinion, religious beliefs or racial origin, and 2) persons as defined in 1) who have already left their country of origin and who have not yet established themselves permanently elsewhere;
 - b. That the Governments participating in the Intergovernmental Committee shall continue to furnish the Committee for its strictly confidential information, with 1) details regarding such immigrants as each Government may be prepared to receive under its existing laws and practices and 2) details of these laws and practices;
 - c. That in view of the fact that the countries of refuge and settlement are entitled to take into account the economic and social adaptability of immigrants, these should in many cases be required to accept, at least for a time, changed conditions of living in the countries of settlement;
 - d. That the Governments of the countries of refuge and settlement should not assume any obligations for the financing of involuntary emigration;
 - e. That, with regard to the documents required by the countries of refuge and settlement, the Governments represented on the Intergovernmental Committee should consider the adoption of the following provision:

In those individual immigration cases in which the usually required documents emanating from foreign official sources are found not to be available, there should be accepted such other documents serving the purpose of the requirements of law as maybe available to the immigrant, and that, as regards the document which may be issued to an involuntary emigrant by the country of his foreign residence to serve the purpose of a passport, note be taken of the several international agreements providing for the issue of a travel document serving the purpose of a passport and of the advantage of their wide application;
 - f. That there should meet at London an Intergovernmental Committee consisting of such representatives as the Governments participating in the Evian Meeting may desire to designate. This Committee shall continue and develop the work of the Intergovernmental Meeting at Evian and shall be constituted and shall function in the following manner: There shall be a Chairman of this Committee and four Vice-Chairmen; there shall be a director of authority, appointed by the Intergovernmental Committee, who shall be guided by it in his actions. He shall undertake negotiations to improve the present conditions of exodus and to replace them by conditions of orderly emigration. He shall approach the Governments of the countries of refuge and settlement with a view to developing opportunities for permanent settlement. The Intergovernmental Committee, recognizing the value of the work of the existing refugee services of the League of Nations and of the studies of migration made by the International Labor Office, shall cooperate fully with these organizations, and the Intergovernmental Committee at London shall consider the means by which the cooperation of the Committee and the director with these organizations shall be established. The Intergovernmental Committee, at its forthcoming meeting at London, will consider the scale on which its expenses shall be apportioned among the participating Governments;

1342 Letter from Rabbi Stephen Wise to President Roosevelt Regarding the Plight of the Jews of Europe

9. That the Intergovernmental Committee in its continued form shall hold a first meeting at London on August 3rd, 1938.

Source: Proceedings of the Intergovernmental Committee, Evian, July 6th to 15th, 1938 . . . , Record of the Plenary Meetings of the Committee, Resolutions and Reports, London, July 1938.

160. LETTER FROM RABBI STEPHEN WISE TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT REGARDING THE PLIGHT OF THE JEWS OF EUROPE, DECEMBER 2, 1942

Stephen Samuel Wise, an American Reform rabbi, was one of the best-known leaders of the U.S. Jewish community during the Holocaust. He was a founder and leader of the American Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Congress and, as this letter indicates, had the ear of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Wise refers to the mass murder of Jews occurring in Europe—some 2 million to date—and asks two things of the president. First, that he publicly deliver a message of support to the Jews around the world who are mourning these deaths. Second, that he might do so when he receives a small delegation of representatives of several Jewish organizations. Wise’s reference to Roosevelt as “boss” and to himself as Roosevelt’s “old friend” suggests a comfortable relationship between the two men.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS
330 WEST 42nd STREET NEW YORK CITY

Office of Dr. Wise
40 West 68th Street
December 2, 1942

The President
The White House
Washington, D.C.

Dear Boss:

I do not wish to add an atom to the awful burden which you are bearing with magic and, as I believe, heaven-inspired strength at this time. But you do know that the most overwhelming disaster of Jewish history has befallen Jews in the form of the Hitler mass-massacres. Hitler’s decision was to exterminate the Jewish people in all Hitler-ruled lands, and it is indisputable that as many as two million civilian Jews have been slain.

I have had cables and underground advices for some months, telling of these things. I succeeded, together with the heads of other Jewish organizations, in keeping these out of the press and have been in constant communication with the State Department, particularly Under Secretary Wells. The State Department has now received what it believes to be confirmation of these unspeakable horrors and has approved of my giving the facts to the press. The organizations banded together in the Conference of which I am Chairman, feel that they wish to present to you a memorandum on this situation, so terrible that this day is being observed as a day of mourning and fasting throughout the Jewish world. We hope above all that you will speak a word which may bring solace and hope to millions of Jews who mourn, and be an expression of the conscience of the American people

I had gathered from the State Department that you were prepared to receive a small delegation, which would include representatives of the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the B’nai B’rith. It would be gravely misunderstood if, despite your overwhelming pre-occupation, you did not make it possible to receive our delegation and to utter what I am sure will be your heartening and consoling reply.

As your old friend, I beg you will somehow arrange to do this.

Ever yours,
[signed] Stephen Wise
President

Source: Collection FDR-FDRPOF: President’s Official Files (Roosevelt Administration), National Archive Identifier: 7694130.

161. “TO THE 5,000,000 JEWS IN THE NAZI DEATH CAMPS BERMUDA WAS A CRUEL MOCKERY,” MAY 4, 1943

This full-page advertisement by an American Palestinian revisionist right-wing group—the “Bergson Group”—was an attempt to stir the conscience of the American people regarding the plight of the Jews under the Nazis and the insincere attempt by Western nations, including the United States and Great Britain, regarding the plight of the refugees. They met and expressed their concern, but other than smaller nations (i.e., the Dominican Republic), no nation of any size was willing to provide a home for Jews fleeing Nazi persecution and under threat of death. It should also be noted that the leadership of the major American Jewish organizations was not in favor of such a tactic, preferring to work through so-called normal channels (i.e., meeting with governmental officials and representatives), fearing that such an approach would falsely indicate to Americans that World War II was a “Jewish war,” given the already high number of Americans disposed toward antisemitism.

When Will The United Nations Establish An Agency To Deal With The Problem of Hitler’s Extermination of a Whole People? Somehow, through invisible, underground channels, one ray of shining hope might have penetrated the ghettos of Europe. A rumor might have spread and grown into a whisper among the agonized Jews of Hitler’s hell. A whisper of telling of deliverance from torture, death, starvation, and agony in slaughter-houses. This ray of hope and this whisper were expressed in one word: Bermuda!

The rumor told of representatives of the United States and Great Britain, the leading champions of the United Nations, the protagonists of the Four Freedoms, assembling to save the hunted and tortured Jews of Europe. On the deliberations of this small convention on an Island in the Atlantic were focused all the hopes of the doomed Jews of Europe; those, too, of the free well-meaning people the world over. Men and women of good will everywhere at last believed that the United Nations had decided to do something about the unprecedented disaster of a people put to death.

Wretched, doomed victims of Hitler’s tyranny! Poor men and women of good faith the world over! You have cherished an illusion. Your hopes have been in vain. Bermuda was not the dawn of a new era, of an era of humanity and compassion, of translating pity into deed. Bermuda was a mockery, and a cruel jest.

This is not our definition. It is the definition of the London Sunday “Observer”—one of the most influential and important newspapers in Great Britain.

Not only were ways and means to save the remaining four million Jews in Europe not devised, but their problem was not even touched upon, put on the agenda, or discussed. More than that—the name “Jews” was banished from the vocabulary of this convention, as PM’s foreign editor, Alexander Uhl, reports: “It was regarded as almost improper to mention even the word Jew.”

But not only the attention of the victims of Nazi atrocities and of their friends the world over was concentrated on the meeting at Bermuda: Hitler, too, was concerned with the United Nations’ reply to his challenge to the extermination of the Jewish population in Europe. Alas! To him Bermuda was again convincing proof that the United Nations were neither ready nor willing to answer his threat with action. They were continuing to give him “carte blanche” in his extermination process, exactly as in the pre-war days they permitted him to deal with Jews in Germany, with Austria and Czechoslovakia, thus paving the way for aggression, invasion, and war.

Can it be possible that the United Nations do not understand that should Hitler succeed in exterminating the Jews as a people, they by their silence will pave the way to the extermination of the Czechoslovak, Polish, Greek, or even the French peoples?

Now we are witnessing a variety of attempts to justify the Bermuda failure, to wrap it in secret formulae, such as “no dealing with Hitler,” or “not to interfere with the prosecution of the war,” or “not to undertake anything which should prolong the war,” etc. All this is just throwing sand into the eyes of public opinion. All this has nothing to do with the real facts and the harrowing truth.

The facts, plain and simple, are the following:

- a. This is a specific problem of Jewish disaster. Hitler did not (as yet) decree the extermination of all the peoples of Europe, he decreed the extermination of the Jewish people in Europe and this process of extermination is unabated and steady. Two million or more have been put to death already!
- b. Five million Jews in Europe still live. The governments of Roumania, Hungary and Bulgaria, all satellites of Germany, are willing to release their Jews any time the United Nations are willing to take part in the deliverance. By doing so, they hope to find grace and pardon in the eyes of the United Nations whom they consider as the inevitable victors in this world struggle.
- c. The United Nations have taken no advantage of these offers. They have not done so for one reason: the British government has prevented them, fearing that public opinion will demand that those refugees be admitted into Palestine—a practical place of salvation only a few days away from the Axis countries by short water route, train, or even bus, where the new Hebrew Nation awaits them with open arms.

The Jewish Problem Is Not a Refugee Problem

With the Bermuda Conference a thing of the past, not having even discussed the problem of the extermination of the Jewish people in Europe, now, more than ever, it is clear that we are dealing not only with a refugee problem, but with the Jewish problem of Europe. These two problems should not be confused. They are entirely distinct. Democracy cannot connive with the slaughter of millions of innocent civilian people—the Jews in Europe. There are ways and means to stop Hitler's wholesale murder and to evacuate those who can be evacuated. But no one has been assigned to deal with this tremendous problem. What is necessary is that the machinery for action be created. The United Nations, which have uttered so many words of pity must now do something if the words of pity are to be more than empty lies. They must create a United Nations Agency composed of military and diplomatic experts which should have full authority to define and effectuate a realistic and stern policy of action, to save the remaining millions of Jewish people. This Agency or Commission will deal, not with refugees outside Hitler's reach, but with the Jewish people under his yoke today.

A Program of Action (. . . Not Pity!)

There are two broad areas in which this Agency can begin to operate without delay or procrastination.

1. Immediate utilization of all existing possibilities of transfer of Jews from Hitler-dominated countries to Palestine or to any temporary refuge and the initiation of all further possibilities in this program.
2. The immediate creation of a Jewish army of stateless and Palestinian Jews, including "suicide" Commando squads, and Air Squadrons for retaliatory bombing, which will raid deep into Germany, thus participating as an entity in the war and bringing their message of hope to Hitler's victims.

Join the Crusade for Decency

The crime of Europe calls for the mobilization of every shred of righteousness and spiritual power left in the world. On the field of battle soldiers die. On the field of massacre civilization dies. The thunder of civilization against the swamp-like armies of the German government is alone capable of stopping the German crime against life. Such a thunder unleashed by our own representatives and by all the notions that serve the cause of God would strike terror into the souls of the German people.

Therefore we dedicate ourselves to this fight and we call upon every American to join hands with us in this crusade for humanity and decency.

Source: "To 5,000,000 Jews in the Nazi Death-Trap Bermuda was a Cruel Mockery," New York Times, May 4, 1943, p. 17.

162. REPORT TO THE SECRETARY ON THE ACQUIESCENCE OF THIS GOVERNMENT IN THE MURDER OF THE JEWS, JANUARY 13, 1944

This extraordinary document was written by U.S. Treasury officials John Pehle, Randolph Paul, and Josiah DuBois, and submitted to Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau Jr. on January 13, 1944. It is a scathing attack on the State Department's efforts to obstruct Jewish immigration to the United States when it was well known that to do so was to allow the continuing extermination of the Jews of Europe. Of those the report accused, Breckinridge Long, assistant secretary in charge of the Visa Division, was cited most often. No better sentence can capture the focus and explosive nature of the report than this: "I am convinced on the basis of the information which is available to me that certain officials in our State Department, which is charged with carrying out this policy [of rescue of Jews], have been guilty not only of gross procrastination and willful failure to act, but even of willful attempts to prevent action from being taken to rescue Jews from Hitler." On January 16, 1944, Morgenthal, Pehle, and Paul presented the report to Roosevelt. On January 22, 1944, he established the War Refugee Board to effectuate the "immediate rescue and relief of the Jews of Europe."

One of the greatest crimes in history, the slaughter of the Jewish people in Europe, is continuing unabated.

This Government has for a long time maintained that its policy is to work out programs to save those Jews of Europe who could be saved.

I am convinced on the basis of the information which is available to me that certain officials in our State Department, which is charged with carrying out this policy, have been guilty not only of gross procrastination and willful failure to act, but even of willful attempts to prevent action from being taken to rescue Jews from Hitler.

I fully recognize the graveness of this statement and I make it only after having most carefully weighed the shocking facts which have come to my attention during the last several months.

Unless remedial steps of a drastic nature are taken, and taken immediately, I am certain that no effective action will be taken by this Government to prevent the complete extermination of the Jews in German controlled Europe, and that this Government will have to share for all time responsibility for this extermination.

The tragic history of this Government's handling of this matter reveals that certain State Department officials are guilty of the following:

1. They have not only failed to use the Governmental machinery at their disposal to rescue Jews from Hitler, but have even gone so far as to use this Government machinery to prevent the rescue of these Jews.
2. They have not only failed to cooperate with private organizations in the efforts of those organizations to work out individual programs of their own, but have taken steps designed to prevent these programs from being put into effect.
3. They not only have failed to facilitate the obtaining of information concerning Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe but in their official capacity have gone so far as to surreptitiously attempt to stop the obtaining of information concerning the murder of the Jewish population of Europe.
4. They have tried to cover up their guilt by:
 - (a) concealment and misrepresentation;
 - (b) the giving of false and misleading explanations for their failures to act and their attempts to prevent action; and
 - (c) the issuance of false and misleading statements concerning the "action" which they have taken to date.

Although only part of the facts relating to the activities of the State Department in this field are available to us, sufficient facts have come to my attention from various sources during the last several months to fully support the conclusions at which I have arrived.

1. State Department officials have not only failed to use the Governmental machinery at their disposal to rescue the Jews from Hitler, but have even gone so far as to use this Governmental machinery to prevent the rescue of these Jews.

The public record, let alone the facts which have not as yet been made public, reveals the gross procrastination and willful failure to act of those officials actively representing this Government in this field.

- (a) A long time has passed since it became clear that Hitler was determined to carry out a policy of exterminating the Jews in Europe.
- (b) Over a year has elapsed since this Government and other members of the United Nations publicly acknowledged and denounced this policy of extermination; and since the President gave assurances that the United States would make every effort together with the United Nations to save those who could be saved.
- (c) Despite the fact that time is most precious in this matter, State Department officials have been kicking the matter around for over a year without producing results; giving all sorts of excuses for delays upon delays; advancing no specific proposals designed to rescue Jews, at the same time proposing that the whole refugee problem be "explored" by this Government and Intergovernmental Committees. While the State Department has been thus "exploring" the whole refugee problem, without distinguishing between those who are in imminent danger of death and those who are not, hundreds of thousands of Jews have been allowed to perish.

As early as August 1942 a message from the Secretary of the World Jewish Congress in Switzerland (Riegner), transmitted through the British Foreign Office, reported that Hitler had under consideration a plan to exterminate all Jews in German controlled Europe. By November 1942 sufficient evidence had been received, including substantial documentary evidence transmitted through our Legation in Switzerland, to confirm that Hitler had actually adopted and was carrying out his plan to exterminate the Jews. Sumner Welles accordingly authorized the Jewish organizations to make the facts public.

Thereupon, the Jewish organizations took the necessary steps to bring the shocking facts to the attention of the public through mass meetings, etc., and to elicit public support for governmental action. On December 17, 1942, a joint statement of the United States and the European members of the United Nations was issued calling attention to and denouncing the fact that Hitler was carrying into effect his oft-repeated intention to exterminate the Jewish people in Europe.

Since the time when this Government knew that the Jews were being murdered, our State Department has failed to take any positive steps reasonably calculated to save any of these people. Although State has used the devices of setting up intergovernmental organizations to survey the whole refugee problem, and calling conferences such as the Bermuda Conference to explore the whole refugee problem, making it appear that positive action could be expected, in fact nothing has been accomplished.

Before the outcome of the Bermuda conference, which was held in April 1943, was made public, Senator Langer prophetically stated in an address in the Senate on October 6, 1943:

“As yet we have had no report from the Bermuda Refugee Conference. With the best good will in the world and with all latitude that could and should be accorded to diplomatic negotiations in time of war, I may be permitted to voice the bitter suspicion that the absence of a report indicates only one thing—the lack of action.

“Probably in all 5703 years, Jews have hardly had a time as tragic and hopeless as the one which they are undergoing now. One of the most tragic factors about the situation is that while singled out for suffering and martyrdom by their enemies, they seem to have been forgotten by the nations which claim to fight for the cause of humanity. We should remember the Jewish slaughterhouse of Europe and ask what is being done—and I emphasize the word ‘done’—to get some of these suffering human beings out of the slaughter while yet alive.

“ * * * Perhaps it would be necessary to introduce a formal resolution to ask the Secretary of State to report to an appropriate congressional committee on the steps being taken in this connection. Normally it would have been the job of the Government to show itself alert to this tragedy; but when a government neglects a duty it is the job of the legislature in a democracy to remind it of that duty. * * * It is not important who voices a call for action, and it is not important what procedure is being used in order to get action. It is important that action be undertaken.”

Similar fears were voiced by Representatives Celler, Dickstein, and Klein, Senator Wagner and Representative Sadowski also issued calls for action.

The widespread fears concerning the failure of the Bermuda Conference were fully confirmed when Breckinridge Long finally revealed some of the things that had happened at that Conference in his statement before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House on November 26, 1943.

After Long’s “disclosure” Representative Celler stated in the House on December 20, 1943:

“He discloses some of the things that happened at the so-called Bermuda Conference. He thought he was telling us something heretofore unknown and secret. What happened at the Bermuda Conference could not be kept executive. All the recommendations and findings of the Bermuda Conference were made known to the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees in existence since the Evian Conference on Refugees in 1938 and which has been functioning all this time in London. How much has that committee accomplished in the years of its being. It will be remembered that the Intergovernmental Committee functions through an executive committee composed of six countries, the United States, the United Kingdoms, the Netherlands, France, Brazil, and Argentina. True, no report of the Bermuda Conference was made public. But a strangely ironical fact will be noted in the presence of Argentina on this most trusted of committees, Argentina that provoked the official reprimand of President Roosevelt by its banning of the Jewish Press, and within whose borders Nazi propagandists and falangists now enjoy a Roman holiday. I contend that by the very nature of its composition the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees cannot function successfully as the instrumentality to rescue the Jewish people of Europe. The benefits to be d[e]rived from the Bermuda Conference like those of the previous Evian Conference can fit into a tiny capsule.”

One of the best summaries of the whole situation is contained in one sentence of a report submitted on December 30, 1943, by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, recommending the passage of a Resolution (S.R.203) favoring the appointment of a commission to formulate plans to save the Jews of Europe from extinction by Nazi Germany. The Committee stated:

“We have talked: we have sympathized: we have expressed our horror: the time to act is long past due.”

The Senate Resolution had been introduced by Senator Guy M. Gillette in behalf of himself and eleven colleagues. Senators Taft, Thomas, Radcliffe, Murray, Johnson, Guffey, Ferguson, Clark, Van Nuys, Downey, and Ellender.

The House Resolutions (H.R.’s 350 and 352), identical with the Senate Resolution, were introduced by Representatives Baldwin and Rogers.

The most glaring example of the use of the machinery of this Government to actually prevent the rescue of Jews is the administrative restrictions which have been placed upon the granting of visas to the United States. In the note which the State Department sent to the British on February 26, 1943 it was stated:

“Since the entry of the United States into the war there have been no new restrictions placed by the Government of the United States upon the number of aliens of any nationality permitted to proceed to this country under existing laws, except for the more intensive examination of aliens required for security reasons.” (Underscoring supplied)

The exception for “security reasons” mentioned in this note is the joker. Under the pretext of security reasons so many difficulties have been placed in the way of refugees obtaining visas that it is no wonder that the admission of refugees to this country does not come anywhere near the quota, despite Long’s statement designed to create the impression to the contrary. The following administrative restrictions which have been applied to the issuance of visas since the beginning of the war are typical.

- (a) Many applications for visas have been denied on the grounds that the applicants have close relatives in Axis controlled Europe. The theory of this is that the enemy would be able to put pressure on the applicant as a result of the fact that the enemy has the power of life or death over his immediate family.
- (b) Another restriction greatly increases the red tape and delay involved in getting the visa furnished with each application for a visa. To each affidavit of support and sponsorship there must be attached two letters of reference from two reputable American citizens.

If anyone were to attempt to work out a set of restrictions specifically designed to prevent Jewish refugees from entering this country it is difficult to conceive of how more effective restrictions could have been imposed than have already been imposed on grounds of “security”.

It is obvious of course that these restrictions are not essential for security reasons. Thus refugees upon arriving in this country could be placed in internment camps similar to those used for the Japanese on the West Coast and released only after a satisfactory investigation. Furthermore, even if we took these refugees and treated them as prisoners of war it would be better than letting them die.

Representative Dickstein stated in the House on December 15:

“If we consider the fact that the average admission would then be at the rate of less than 58,000 per year, it is clear that the organs of our Government have not done their duty. The existing quotas call for the admission of more than 150,000 every year, so that if the quotas themselves had been filled there would have been a total of one-half million and not 580,000 during the period mentioned.

“But that is not the whole story. There was no effort of any kind made to save from death many of the refugees who could have been saved during the time that transportation lines were available and there was no obstacle to their admission to the United States. But the obstructive policy of our organs of Government, particularly the State Department, which saw fit to hedge itself about with rules and regulations, instead of lifting rules and regulations, brought about a condition so that not even the existing immigration quotas are filled.”

Representative Celler stated in the House on June 30:

“Mr. Speaker, nations have declared war on Germany, and their high-ranking officials have issued pious protestations against the Nazi massacre of Jewish victims, but not one of those countries thus far has said they would be willing to accept these refugees either permanently or as visitors, or any of the minority peoples trying to escape the Hitler prison and slaughterhouse.

“Goebbels says: ‘The United Nations won’t take any Jews. We don’t want them. Let’s kill them.’ And so he and Hitler are making Europe Judentun.

“Without any change in our immigration statutes we could receive a reasonable number of those who are fortunate enough to escape the Nazi hellhole, receive them as visitors, the immigration quotas notwithstanding. They could be placed in camps or cantonments and held there in such havens until after the war. Private charitable agencies would be willing to pay the entire cost thereof. They would be no expense to the Government whatsoever. These agencies would even pay for transportation by ships to and from this country.

“We house and maintain Nazi prisoners, many of them undoubtedly responsible for Nazi atrocities. We should do no less for the victims of the rage of the Huns.”

Again, on December 20, he stated:

“According to Earl G. Harrison, Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, not since 1862 have there been fewer aliens entering the country.

“Frankly, Breckinridge Long, in my humble opinion, is least sympathetic to refugees in all the State Department. I attribute to him the tragic bottleneck in the granting of visas.

“The Interdepartmental Review Committees which review the applications for visas are composed of one official, respectively, from each of the following Departments: War, Navy, F.B.I., State, and Immigration. That committee has been glacierlike in its slowness and coldbloodedness. It take[s] months and months to grant the visas and then it usually applies to a corpse.

“I brought this difficulty to the attention of the President. He asked Long to investigate at once. No, there has been no change in conditions. The gruesome bottleneck still exists.”

2. State Department officials have not only failed to cooperate with private organizations in the efforts of these organizations to work out individual programs of their own, but have taken steps designed to prevent these programs from being put into effect.

The best evidence in support of this charge are the facts relating to the proposal of the World Jewish Congress to evacuate thousands of Jews from Rumania and France. The highlights relating to the efforts of State Department officials to prevent this proposal from being put into effect are the following:

- (a) On March 13, 1943, a cable was received from the World Jewish Congress representative in London stating that information reaching London indicated the possibility of rescuing Jews provided funds were put at the disposal of the World Jewish Congress representation in Switzerland.
- (b) On April 10, 1943, Sumner Welles cabled our Legation in Bern and requested them to get in touch with the World Jewish Congress representative in Switzerland, whom Welles had been informed was in possession of important information regarding the situation of the Jews.
- (c) On April 20, 1943, a cable was received from Bern relating to the proposed financial arrangements in connection with the evacuation of the Jews from Rumania and France.
- (d) On May 25, 1943, State Department cabled for a clarification of these proposed financial arrangements. This matter was not called to the attention of the Treasury Department at this time.
- (e) This whole question of financing the evacuation of the Jews from Rumania and France was first called to the attention of the Treasury Department on June 25, 1943.
- (f) A conference was held with the State Department relating to this matter on July 15, 1943.
- (g) One day after this conference, on July 16, 1943, the Treasury Department advised the State Department that it was prepared to issue a license in this matter.
- (h) The license was not issued until December 18, 1943.

During this five months period between the time that the Treasury stated that it was prepared to issue a license and the time when the license was actually issued delays and objections of all sorts were forthcoming from officials in the State Department, our Legation in Bern, and finally the British. The real significance of these delays and objections was brought home to the State Department in letters which you sent to Secretary Hull on November 24, 1943, and December 17, 1943, which completely devastated the “excuses” which State Department officials had been advancing. On December 10 you made an appointment to discuss the matter with Secretary Hull on December 20. And then an amazing but understandable thing happened. On December 13, the day after you sent your letter and the day on which you requested an appointment with Secretary Hull, the State Department sent a telegram to the British Foreign Office expressing astonishment with the British point of view and stating that the Department was unable to agree with that point of view (in simple terms, the British point of view referred to by the State Department is that they are apparently prepared to accept the possible—even probable—death of thousands of Jews in enemy territory because of “the difficulties of disposing of any considerable number of Jews should they be rescued”). On the same day, the State Department issued a license notwithstanding the fact that the objections of our Legation in Bern were still outstanding and that British disapproval had already been expressed. State Department officials were in such a hurry to issue this license that they not only did not ask the Treasury to draft the license (which would have been the normal procedure) but they drafted the license themselves and issued it without even consulting the Treasury as to its terms. Informal discussions with certain State Department officials have confirmed what is obvious from the above mentioned facts.

Breckinridge Long knew that his position was so indefensible that he was unwilling to even try to defend it at your pending conference with Secretary Hull on December 20. Accordingly, he took such action as he felt was necessary to “cover up” his previous position in this matter. It is, of course, clear that if we had not made the record against the State Department followed by your request to see Secretary Hull, the action which the State Department officials took on December 10 would either never have been taken at all or would have been delayed so long that any benefits which it might have had would have been lost.

(3) State Department officials not only have failed to facilitate the obtaining of information concerning Hitler’s plans to exterminate the Jews of Europe but in their official capacity have gone so far as to surreptitiously attempt to stop the obtaining of information concerning the murder of the Jewish population in Europe.

The evidence supporting this conclusion is so shocking and so tragic that it is difficult to believe.

The facts are as follows:

- (a) Sumner Welles as Acting Secretary of State requests confirmation of Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews. Having already received various reports on the plight of the Jews, on October 5, 1942 Sumner Welles as Acting Secretary of State sent a cable (2314) for the personal attention of Minister Harrison in Bern stating that leaders of the Jewish Congress had received reports from their representatives in Geneva and London to the effect that many thousands of Jews in Eastern Europe were being slaughtered pursuant to a policy embarked upon by the German Government for the complete extermination of the Jews in Europe. Welles added that he was trying to obtain further information from the Vatican but that other than this he was unable to secure confirmation of these stories. We stated that Rabbi Wise believed that information was available to his representatives in Switzerland but that they were in all likelihood fearful of dispatching any such reports through open cables or mail. He then stated that Riegner and Lichtheim were being requested by Wise to call upon Minister Harrison; and Welles requested Minister Harrison to advise him by telegram of all the evidence and facts which he might secure as a result of conferences with Riegner and Lichtheim.
- (b) State Department receives confirmation and shocking evidence that extermination was being rapidly and effectively carried out. Pursuant to Welles' cable of October 5 Minister Harrison forwarded documents from Riegner confirming the fact of extermination of the Jews (in November 1942), and in a cable of January 21, 1943 (482) relayed a message from Riegner and Lichtheim which Harrison stated was for the information of the Under Secretary of State (and was to be transmitted to Rabbi Stephen Wise if the Under Secretary should so determine). This message described a horrible situation concerning the plight of the Jews in Europe. It reported mass executions of Jews in Poland; according to one source 6,000 Jews were being killed daily; the Jews were required before execution to strip themselves of all their clothing which was then sent to Germany; the remaining Jews in Poland were confined to ghettos, etc.; in Germany deportations were continuing; many Jews were in hiding and there had been many cases of suicide; Jews were being deprived of rationed foodstuffs; no Jews would be left in Prague or Berlin by the end of March, etc.; and in Rumania 130,000 Jews were deported to Transnistria; about 60,000 had already died and the remaining 70,000 were starving; living conditions were indescribable; Jews were deprived of all their money, foodstuffs and possessions; they were housed in deserted cellars, and occasionally twenty to thirty people slept on the floor of one unheated room; disease was prevalent, particularly fever; urgent assistance was needed.

- (c) Sumner Welles furnishes this information to the Jewish organizations. Sumner Welles furnished the documents received in November to the Jewish organizations in the United States and authorized them to make the facts public. On February 9, 1943 Welles forwarded the horrible message contained in cable 432 of January 21 to Rabbi Stephen Wise. In his letter of February 9 Welles stated that he was pleased to be of assistance in this matter.

Immediately upon the receipt of this message, the Jewish organizations arranged for a public mass meeting in Madison Square Garden in a further effort to obtain effective action.

- (d) Certain State Department officials surreptitiously attempt to stop this Government from obtaining further information from the very source from which the above evidence was received. On February 10, the day after Welles forwarded the message contained in cable 482 of January 21 to Rabbi Wise, and in direct response to this cable, a most highly significant cable was dispatched. This cable, 354 of February 10, read as follows:
 "Your 482, January 21

"In the future we would suggest that you do not accept reports submitted to you to be transmitted to private persons in the United States unless such action is advisable because of extraordinary circumstances. Such private messages circumvent neutral countries' censorship and it is felt that by sending them we risk the possibility that steps would necessarily be taken by the neutral countries to curtail or forbid our means of communication for confidential official matter.

Hull (SW)"

1350 Report to the Secretary on the Acquiescence of This Government in the Murder of the Jews

Although this cable on its face is most innocent and innocuous, when read together with the previous cables I am forced to conclude it is nothing less than an attempted suppression of information requested by this Government concerning the murder of Jews by Hitler.

Although this cable was signed for Hull by "SW" (Sumner Welles) it is significant that there is not a word in the cable that would even suggest to the person signing it that it was designed to countermand the Department's specific requests for information on Hitler's plans to exterminate the Jews. The cable appeared to be a normal routine message which a busy official would sign without question.

I have been informed that the initialled file copy of the cable bears the initials of Atherton and Dunn as well as of Durbrow and Hickerson.

(e) Thereafter Sumner Welles again requested our legation on April 19, 1943 (cable 877) for information, apparently not realizing that in cable 354 (to which he did not refer) Harrison had been instructed to cease forwarding reports of this character. Harrison replied on April 20 (cable 2460) and indicated that he was in a most confused state of mind as a result of the conflicting instructions he had received. Among other things he stated: "May I suggest that messages of this character should not (repeat not) be subjected to the restriction imposed by your 354, February 10, and that I be permitted to transmit messages from R more particularly in view of the helpful information which they may frequently contain?"

The fact that cable 354 is not the innocent and routine cable that it appears to be on its face is further highlighted by the efforts of State Department officials to prevent this Department from obtaining the cable and learning its true significance.

The facts relating to this attempted concealment are as follows:

i. Several men in our Department had requested State Department officials for a copy of the cable of February 10 (354). We had been advised that it was a Department communication; a strictly political communication, which had nothing to do with economic matters; that it had only had a very limited distribution within the Department, the only ones having anything to do with it being the European Division, the Political Adviser and Sumner Welles; and that a copy could not be furnished to the Treasury.

- ii. At the conference in Secretary Hull's office on December 20 in the presence of Breckinridge Long, you asked Secretary Hull for a copy of cable 354, which you were told would be furnished to you.
- iii. By note to you of December 20, Breckinridge Long enclosed a paraphrase of cable 354. This paraphrase of cable 354 specifically omitted any reference to cable 482 of January 21—thus destroying the only tangible clue to the true meaning of the message.
- iv. You would never have learned the true meaning of cable 354 had it not been for the fact that one of the men in my office whom I had asked to obtain all the facts on this matter for me had previously called one of the men in another Division of the State Department and requested permission to see the cable. In view of the Treasury interest in this matter this State Department representative obtained cable 354 and the cable of January 21 to which it referred and showed these cables to my man.

(4) The State Department officials have tried to cover up their guilt by:

a. concealment and misrepresentation

In addition to concealing the true facts from and misrepresenting these facts to the public, State Department officials have even attempted concealment and misrepresentation within the Government. The most striking example of this is the above mentioned action taken by State Department officials to prevent this Department from obtaining a copy of cable 354 of February 10 (which stopped the obtaining of information concerning the murder of Jews); and the fact that after you had requested a copy of this cable, State Department officials forwarded the cable to us with its most significant part omitted, thus destroying the whole meaning of the cable.

b. the giving of false and misleading explanations for their failures to act and their attempts to prevent action.

The outstanding explanation of a false and misleading nature which the State Department officials have given for their failures to work out programs to rescue Jews, and their attempts to prevent action, are the following:

- i. The nice sounding but vicious theory that the whole refugee problem must be explored and consideration given to working out programs for the relief of all refugees whose lives are in imminent danger and those whose lives are not in imminent danger.
- ii. The argument that various proposals cannot be acted upon promptly by this Government but must be submitted to the Executive Committee of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. This Committee has taken no effective action to actually evacuate refugees from enemy territory and it is at least open to doubt whether it has the necessary authority to deal with the matter.

- iii. The argument that the extreme restrictions which the State Department has placed on the granting of visas to refugees is necessary for "security reasons." The falsity of this argument has already been dealt with in this memorandum.

The false and misleading explanations, which the State Department officials gave for delaying for over six months the program of the World Jewish Congress for the evacuation of thousands of Jews from Rumania and France, are dealt with in your letter to Secretary Hull of December 17, 1943.

A striking example is the argument of the State Department officials that the proposed financial arrangement might benefit the enemy. It is of course not surprising that the same State Department officials who usually argue that economic warfare considerations are not important should in this particular case attempt to rely on economic warfare considerations to kill the proposed program.

In this particular case, the State Department officials attempted to argue that the relief plan might benefit the enemy by facilitating the acquisition of funds by the enemy. In addition to the fact that this contention had no merit whatsoever by virtue of the conditions under which the local funds were to be acquired, it is significant that this consideration had not been regarded as controlling in the past by the State Department officials, even where no such conditions had been imposed.

Thus, in cases involving the purchase, by branches of United States' concerns in Switzerland, of substantial amounts of material in enemy territory, State Department officials have argued that in view of the generous credit supplied by the Swiss to the Germans "transactions of this type cannot be regarded as actually increasing the enemy's purchasing power in Switzerland which is already believed to be at a maximum". It is only when these State Department officials really desire to prevent a transaction that they advance economic warfare considerations as a bar.

c. the issuance of false and misleading statements concerning the "action" which they have taken to date.

It is unnecessary to go beyond Long's testimony to find many examples of misstatements. His general pious remarks concerning what this Government has done for the Jews of Europe; his statement concerning the powers and functions of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees; his reference to the "screening process" set up to insure wartime security, etc., have already been publicly criticized as misrepresentations.

A statement which is typical of the way Long twists facts is his remarks concerning the plan of a Jewish agency to send money to Switzerland to be used through the International Red Cross to buy food to take care of Jews in parts of Czechoslovakia and Poland. Long indicates that the Jewish agency requested that the money be sent through the instrumentality of the Intergovernmental Committee. I am informed that the Jewish agency wished to send the money immediately to the International Red Cross and it was Long who took the position that the matter would have to go through the Intergovernmental Committee, thereby delaying the matter indefinitely. Long speaks of an application having been filed with the Treasury to send some of this money and that the State Department was supporting this application to the Treasury. The facts are that no application has ever been filed with the Treasury and the State Department has at no time indicated to the Treasury that it would support any such application.

The most patent instance of a false and misleading statement is that part of Breckinridge Long's testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House (November 26, 1943) relating to the admittance of refugees into this country. Thus, he stated:

"* * * We have taken into this country since the beginning of the Hitler regime and the persecution of the Jews, until today, approximately 580,000 refugees. The whole thing has been under the quota, during the period of 10 years—all under the quota—except the generous gesture we made with visitors' and transit visas during an awful period."

Congressman Emanuel Celler in commenting upon Long's statement in the House on December 20, 1943, stated:

"* * * In the first place these 580,000 refugees were in the main ordinary quota immigrants coming in from all countries. The majority were not Jews. His statement drips with sympathy for the persecuted Jews, but the tears he sheds are crocodile. I would like to ask him how many Jews were admitted during the last 3 years in comparison with the number seeking entrance to preserve life and dignity. . . . One gets the impression from Long's statement that the United States has gone out of its way to help refugees fleeing death at the hands of the Nazis. I deny this. On the contrary, the State Department has turned its back on the time-honored principle of granting havens to refugees. The tempest-tossed get little comfort from men like Breckinridge Long. . . . Long says that the door to the oppressed is open but that it 'has been carefully screened.' What he should have said is 'bar-locked and bolted.' By the act of 1924, we are permitted to admit approximately 150,000 immigrants each year. During the last fiscal year only 23,725 came as immigrants. Of these only 4,705 were Jews fleeing Nazi persecution.

* * *

"If men of the temperament and philosophy of Long continue in control of immigration administration, we may as well take down that plaque from the Statue of Liberty and black out the 'lamp beside the golden door.'"

RP

Source: Franklin D. Roosevelt Presidential Library and Museum, Diaries of Henry Morgenthau Jr., April 27, 1933–July 27, 1945, Vol. 693, January 11–January 13, 1944, pp. 212–229.

163. TO THEATER COMMANDERS ON RESCUE AND RELIEF TO JEWS AND OTHER VICTIMS, JANUARY 28, 1944

Twelve days after Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau Jr. met with President Franklin D. Roosevelt to share a report that showed the U.S. State Department had obstructed efforts to rescue the Jews of Europe and six days after the establishment of the War Refugee Board (WRB) to correct that obstruction, this memorandum was sent by Morgenthau to John J. McCloy, assistant secretary of war, asking that he issue instructions to the theater commanders. Those instructions reference Roosevelt's executive order that established the WRB to fulfill the government's policy "to take all measures within its power to rescue the victims of enemy oppression who are in imminent danger of death and otherwise to afford such victims all possible relief." Theater commanders were then told to do as much as possible to effectuate the government's policy. The new sense of urgency was a critical change in the policy that had been operating for the prior several years during which millions of Jews throughout Europe were killed.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY WASHINGTON

January 28, 1944

TO: Assistant Secretary McCloy

FROM: Secretary Morgenthau

In accordance with your timely suggestion it would be very helpful if instructions along the following lines were sent to the appropriate Theater Commanders:

"The President has instructed the Secretaries of State, Treasury and War to take action for the immediate rescue and relief of the Jews of Europe and other victims of enemy persecution. In an Executive Order issued January 22, 1944, the President declared 'it is the policy of the Government to take all measures within its power to rescue the victims of enemy oppression who are in imminent danger of death and otherwise to afford such victims all possible relief and assistance consistent with the successful prosecution of the war.' The order establishes special governmental machinery for executing this policy. It creates a War Refugee Board consisting of the Secretaries of State, Treasury and War. The Board is charged with direct responsibility to the President in seeing that the announced policy is carried out. The President indicated that while he would look directly to the Board for the execution of this policy, the Board would cooperate with the Inter-governmental Committee, UNRRA, and other interested international organizations. The President stated that he expected the cooperation of all members of the United Nations and other governments in carrying out this difficult but important task. He stated that the existing facilities of the State, Treasury and War Departments would be employed to furnish aid to Axis Victims to the fullest extent possible. He stressed that it was urgent that action be taken to forestall the plot of the Nazis to exterminate the Jews and other persecuted minorities in Europe.

You should do everything possible, consistent with the successful prosecution of the war in your theater, to effectuate this policy of this Government. You should cooperate as closely as possible with all public and established private agencies who are active in your theater in this field in this matter. Consistent with your needs and military security considerations, you should make communication facilities available to these private agencies for appropriate messages for carrying out the policy of this Government herein stated, keeping the War Refugee Board advised through the Department. You should report to the Department any recommendations which you may have as to what you feel this Department can do to effectuate with possible speed the rescue and relief of the victims of enemy oppression.

Foreign representatives of the Department of State and of other Government Departments are being similarly instructed and you should give them any possible assistance.”

I would appreciate your bringing this to the attention of Secretary Stimson.

/s/

Henry Morgenthau, Jr.

January 28, 1944

Source: Records of the Assistant Secretary of War, Record Group 107, ASW 400.38 Jews.

V. Post-Holocaust Developments

164. EXCERPTS FROM THE REPORT ON THE LIBERATION OF DACHAU, PREPARED BY THE OFFICE OF STRATEGIC SERVICES SECTION, SEVENTH ARMY, MAY 1945

The U.S. Seventh Army entered the Dachau concentration camp on April 29, 1945. The Office of Strategic Services, Seventh Army, prepared a report of the Americans' experience: "There our troops found sights, sounds and stenches horrible beyond belief, cruelties so enormous as to be incomprehensible to the normal mind. DACHAU and death were synonymous." This excerpt from that report begins with a sociological view of the camp, focusing on organization, power groups, and the like. The description of the terrible scene the Americans faced began: "There are no words in English which can adequately describe the Konzentrations-Lager at Dachau." Then follows an account of the leadup to the day and the moment when the word spread throughout the camp, now without its German overlords, "Americans!"

FOREWORD

DACHAU, 1933–1945, will stand for all time as one of history's most gruesome symbols of inhumanity. There our troops found sights, sounds and stenches horrible beyond belief, cruelties so enormous as to be incomprehensible to the normal mind. DACHAU and death were synonymous.

No words or pictures can carry the full impact of these unbelievable scenes but this report presents some of the outstanding facts and photographs in order to emphasize the type of crime which elements of the SS committed thousands of times a day, to remind us of the ghastly capabilities of certain classes of men, to strengthen our determination that they and their works shall vanish from the earth.

The sections comprising this report were prepared by the agencies indicated. They remain substantially as they were originally submitted in the belief that to consolidate this material in a single literary style would seriously weaken its realism.

[signed] William W. Quinn
Colonel, G.S.C.
A C of S, G-2
7th U.S. Army

OSS Section, Seventh Army

SUMMARY

At Dachau the only objective of the inmates was to survive under the most primitive and cruel conditions which constantly threatened their sanity and physical existence. Little more than this was humanly possible. As a result of these abnormal conditions, this camp of 30,000 men cannot be compared to the structure of any normal society differentiated by social classes, political, religious, or professional affiliations. Hence, neither normal moral standards nor normal political or sociological criteria are applicable to the Dachau situation.

The inmates of the camp did not act as members of their former social class or as representatives of political or religious groups—whether they were professional men, workers, intellectuals, Communists, nationalists, Catholics or Protestants—, but only as human beings in a struggle for survival against starvation and mass murders. This was true as much of the minority of those who took charge of the internal organization of the camp under the SS as of the majority of those who did not.

Living under these abnormal conditions, the inmates, especially those who had gained a position of some power and security, were frequently degraded and degenerated to a criminal level copying the methods and practices of the SS for their own protection and benefit. Because so many of the administrative positions were held by German prisoners, rather strong anti-German sentiments developed among the non-German inmates of the camp.

The only form of self-organization among the prisoners took place within the framework of the internal organization of the camp. The "Labor Allocation Office" (Arbeitseinsatz) and its subsidiary branches was the key agency which was successively in the hands of different cliques who frequently abuse their position of power for the sake of personal advantages. These groups were composed largely of Germans until the last six months.

Otherwise, the level of existence in the camp together with the insidious system of internal controls, whereby prisoners themselves were placed in the service of the SS, did not permit the emergence of any organizational form. There was no underground organization or political activity in the accepted sense of the word. Even expressions of mutual help and solidarity among members of the same national group never transcended the level of personal relations between people bound by friendships, common background, and language. They never took the form of organized action.

Only during the last phase of the camp, an organizational network was set up between leading representatives of various nationalities which led to the formation of the "International Prisoners Committee"—today the highest authority in the camp. This Committee was concerned entirely with matters of self-help in preparation of the eventual liberation of the camp. It has never been dominated by any political program or orientation.

This report is based on two days' investigation of conditions in the Dachau Concentration Camp. It does not intend to give either an exhaustive history of the camp or a comprehensive survey of all aspects of camp life. Numerous reports are in the process of being written which, when completed, will give a full picture of the Dachau Concentration Camp. This report is concerned primarily with one aspect of life in Dachau: the internal organization of the camp, the evidence of self-administration among the prisoners and the emergence of special control and pressure groups, as well as the position of the various social, political, and national groups within this organizational framework.

HISTORY

* * * * *

Shortly before the camp was liberated, the Nazis sent out a large transport of special prisoners, consisting chiefly of Russians, Poles, Germans, and Jews. The Nazis also evacuated the so-called "honorary prisoners" (Ehrenhaeftlinge), i.e., the famous political and religious hostages they held in Dachau (Niemoeller, Schauschnigg, Daladier, Blum, etc.). Plans to destroy the entire camp were apparently foiled at the last moment. At the time of liberation there were about 32,000 prisoners left in Dachau. The daily rate of people dying of exhaustion, starvation, and typhus was about 200. It is now between 50 to 80.

COMPOSITION

* * * * *

As far as the prisoners themselves are concerned, the camp was divided sharply only between two groups: the "reds" or political prisoners and the "greens" or criminal prisoners. The SS tried to break down this distinction by an ingenious system of creating a "prisoners' elite", composed of both the "reds" and "greens", which assumed power over the internal organization of Dachau, controlled and frequently terrorized the camp in the name of the SS, but formally independent of the SS. This system of internal organization will be discussed in the following section. However, despite this organization of internal corruption and terror, by which the SS exercised its control indirectly, the mass of political prisoners continued to live in sharp separation from and opposition to the "criminals" and most of the prisoner bosses whom they despised, feared and hated.

* * * * *

DACHAU, CONCENTRATION CAMP AND TOWN PWB Section, Seventh Army

INTRODUCTION

There are no words in English which can adequately describe the Konzentrations-Lager at Dachau.

In spite of the fact that one had known of its existence for years, has even spoken to people who had spent some time there, the first impression comes as a complete, stunning shock. One had always had—in the back of one's mind—the reservation "But surely it is impossible for human beings to do this to other people."

The first thing that was seen outside of the Camp was a train of some forty railway cars of all types—mostly flat cars, a few box cars and two or three ancient third class railway carriages. In each of the cars horribly thin corpses were lying in all postures, each clad in the pyjama-like uniform of the concentration camps. They lay in their own refuse. Some corpses lay on the gravel road-bed, exactly where they fell when they were ordered out of the cars. There were two or three in almost every car door or gate. These were the few who were left alive when this weird train with its ghastly cargo arrived outside the gate to the camp in the afternoon of 28 April; for these unfortunates were alive when they were loaded on. They were expected to be dead by the time they reached Dachau, so that their corpses could be done away with in the famous crematory.

On the spur going directly into the Camp was another train that had recently been unloaded. Human refuse was still caked on the floors of the boxcars that had been the death chambers of unknown human beings.

American troops had arrived before the unloading of the train on the main line had been completed. At this writing proof positive of one of the greatest crimes against humanity still lies in the rickety cars and along the road bed leading into the Camp at Dachau. It lies in the shape of the broken, starved-out corpses of what once had been strong men. Men consigned to a horrible death with a cynicism brutal beyond words or belief.

* * * * *

DACHAU, CONCENTRATION CAMP
CIC Detachment, Seventh Army

MEMORANDUM

On 29 April 1945, the liberation of the Dachau Concentration Camp, Dachau Germany, presented to the Allied Armies a gruesome spectacle of wholesaled bestiality and barbarism. . . .

LIBERATION

The Americans came Sunday, 29th of April. The arrival of the Americans was preceded by several days of frenzy. Wednesday was the last day of work and there was no more going out of the compound. Scattered labor details living outside of camp returned suddenly. Radios were taken away and there was no more communication with the outside.

On Thursday, orders to evacuate the entire camp were given. Transports began to be organized on large scales, but the organization was poor and uncoordinated. The prisoners having jobs in the administrative department mislaid orders, suddenly did not understand commands, and generally seemed quite indifferent to the mounting nervousness of the few camp officials that were left. Only one transport got under way. It consisted of about 4,000 men, and they hiked with heavy guard in the direction of the Tyrol.

Then began the time of tense waiting. Rumors swept through the barracks of regiments and tanks just over the hill, of plans of mass annihilation of the prisoners by the remaining SS men, of parachutists, and of armistice. The prisoners organized a secret police force to keep order after the liberation they knew was coming. They build barricades to keep their own comrades from getting in the way of jumpy guards. And all time was at a standstill for three days while the prisoners waited and the guards paced nervously, furiously, in their towers.

Sunday, just after the noon meal, the air was unusually still. The big field outside the compound was deserted. Suddenly someone began running toward the gate at the other side of the field. Others followed. The word was shouted through the mass of gray, tired prisoners. Americans! That word repeated, yelled over the shoulders in throaty Polish, in Italian, in Russian, and in Dutch and in the familiar ring of French. The first internee was shot down as he rushed toward the gate by the guard. Yet they kept running and shouting through eager lips and unbelieving eyes. Americans! And at the gate in front of the hysterical mob of men were not the regiments or the tanks they had expected, but one dark-complexioned, calm American soldier, an American Pole, pistol in hand, looking casually about him; up at the towers where the SS guards watched apparently frozen; behind him two or three other American boys about a hundred yards away; and into the flushed wet faces of those thousands surging about in front of him.

A few shots were fired from behind the wall, the guards in the first tower came down, hands over their heads. A white blanket was hung out from another tower, and they came down, but one of them had a pistol in his hand which he held behind his back, and the dark-complexioned soldier shot him down. At the far side of the compound, the guards were taken care of from the outside.

Then a jeep arrived. Where were the regiments and the tanks? The first American was hoisted into the air and two others, a 19-year old farmer from the West, and a 19-year old university student, were dragged out of the jeep and carried around the grounds on the internees' shoulders. A blond journalist in uniform was also in the jeep, and she climbed the tower by the gate with a young officer.

Suddenly, the prisoners produced flags and colors which had been buried under the barracks or hidden in rafters. These flags and colors were improvised from sheets and scraps of colored cloth. It was a mardi-gras. Over the loud speaker system the blond journalist said “We are just as glad to see you as you are to see us.” And then a chaplain in broken German asked them to join him in the Lord’s Prayer. And for a few minutes in power earnest unison and with bowed reverent heads and clasped hands, they prayed. The words echoed through the compound and through the hearts of the thousands still incredulous at the dark-complexioned American Pole, the 19-year old farm boy from the West, and the student, and at the regiments and tanks that never came.

Source: Report, “Dachau,” prepared by the Office of Strategic Services Section, Seventh Army, World War II Participants and Contemporaries Papers, Hoffman Steve: Dachau, and Porter Harold: Dachau; NAID #12009126. Dwight D. Eisenhower Presidential Library.

165. REPORT BY EARL G. HARRISON TO PRESIDENT TRUMAN ON LIVING CONDITIONS AND NEEDS OF DISPLACED PERSONS, AUGUST 1945

Earl G. Harrison, dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School and commissioner for immigration and naturalization under President Franklin Roosevelt, was asked by the U.S. government to report on the conditions facing displaced persons, especially Jews, in camps run by the Allies in Europe. This document was prepared by Harrison and submitted to President Harry S. Truman in August 1945. It presents a scene so disturbing that it prompted Truman to issue orders to General Eisenhower to immediately correct the situation. What Harrison reported was that Jews in liberated camps were being treated in many ways as they had been when under Nazi rule. Although no longer subject to execution, of course, Harrison reported that the Jews “are living under guard behind barbed-wire fences in camps . . . amid crowded, frequently unsanitary and generally grim conditions,” with little effort being made to determine if loved ones were alive and if they could be reunited. He continued in detail to describe the terrible conditions these people were facing in the hands of the Allied liberators.

Text of Report by Earl G. Harrison

London, England
The White House,
Washington.

Dear Mr. President:

Pursuant to your letter of June 22, 1945, I have the honor to present to you a partial report upon my recent mission to Europe to inquire into (1) the conditions under which displaced persons, and particularly those who may be stateless or non-repatriable, are at present living, especially in Germany and Austria, (2) the needs of such persons, (3) how those needs are being met at present by the military authorities, the governments of residence, and international and private relief bodies, and (4) the views of the possibly non-repatriable persons as to their future destinations.

My instructions were to give particular attention to the problems, needs and views of the Jewish refugees among the displaced people, especially in Germany and Austria. The report, particularly this partial report, accordingly deals in the main with that group.

On numerous occasions appreciation was expressed by the victims of Nazi persecution for the interest of the United States government in them. As my report shows, they are in need of attention and help. Up to this point, they have been “liberated” more in a military sense than actually.

For the reasons explained in the report their particular problems to this time have not been given attention to any appreciable extent; consequently, they feel that they, who were in so many ways the first and worst victims of Nazism, are being neglected by their liberators.

Upon my request the Department of State authorized Dr. Joseph J. Schwartz to join me in the mission. Dr. Schwartz, European director of the American Joint Distribution Committee, was granted a leave of absence from that organization for the purpose of accompanying me. His long and varied experience in refugee problems, as well as his familiarity with the Continent and the people, made Dr. Schwartz a most valuable associate: this report represents our joint views, conclusions and recommendations.

During various portions of the trip I had, also, the assistance of Mr. Patrick M. Malin, vice-director of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees and Mr. Herbert Katzski of the War Refugee Board. These gentlemen, likewise, have had considerable experience in refugee matters. Their assistance and cooperation were most helpful in the course of the survey.

I. GERMANY AND AUSTRIA Conditions

1. Generally speaking, three months after V-E Day, and even longer after the liberation of individual groups, many Jewish displaced persons and other possibly non-repatriables are living under guard behind barbed-wire fences in camps of several descriptions (built by the Germans for slave laborers and Jews), including some of the most notorious of the concentration camps, amid crowded, frequently unsanitary and generally grim conditions, in complete idleness, with no opportunity, except surreptitiously, to communicate with the outside world, waiting, hoping, for some word of encouragement and action on their behalf.

2. While there has been marked improvement in the health of survivors of the Nazi starvation and persecution program, there are many pathetic malnutrition cases both among the hospitalized and in the general population of the camps. The death rate has been high since liberation, as was to be expected. One army chaplain, a rabbi, personally attended, since liberation, twenty-three thousand burials at Bergen-Belsen alone, one of the largest and most vicious of the concentration camps, where, incidentally, despite persistent reports to the contrary, fourteen thousand displaced persons are still living, including over seven thousand Jews. At many of the camps and centers, including those where serious starvation cases are, there is a marked and serious lack of needed medical supplies.
3. Although some camp commandants have managed, in spite of the many obvious difficulties, to find clothing of one kind or another for their charges, many of the Jewish displaced persons, late in July, had no clothing other than their concentration camp garb—a rather hideous striped pajama effect—while others, to their chagrin, were obliged to wear German SS uniforms. It is questionable which clothing they hate the more.
4. With a few notable exceptions, nothing in the way of a program of activity or organized effort toward rehabilitation has been inaugurated, and the internees, for they are literally such, have little to do except to dwell upon their plight, the uncertainty of their future and, what is more unfortunate, to draw comparisons between their treatment “under the Germans” and “in liberation.”

Beyond knowing that they are no longer in danger of the gas chambers, torture and other forms of violent death, they see—and there is—little change; the morale of those who are either stateless or who do not wish to return to their countries of nationality is very low. They have witnessed great activity and efficiency in returning people to their homes, but they hear or see nothing in the way of plans for them and consequently they wonder and frequently ask what “liberation” means.

This situation is considerably accentuated where, as in so many cases, they are able to look from their crowded and bare quarters and see the German civilian population, particularly in the rural areas, to all appearances living normal lives in their own homes.

5. The most absorbing worry of these Nazi and war victims concerns relatives, wives, husbands, parents, children. Most of them have been separated for three, four or five years and they cannot understand why the liberators should not have undertaken immediately the organized effort to reunite family groups. Most of the very little which has been done in this direction has been informal action by the displaced persons themselves with the aid of devoted army chaplains, frequently rabbis, and the American Joint Distribution Committee.

Broadcasts of names and locations by the Psychological Warfare Division at Luxembourg have been helpful, although the lack of receiving sets has handicapped the effectiveness of the program. Even where, as has been happening, information has been received as to relatives living in other camps in Germany, it depends on the personal attitude and disposition of the camp commandant whether permission can be obtained or assistance received to follow up on the information. Some camp commandants are quite rigid in this particular while others lend every effort to join family groups.

6. It is difficult to evaluate the food situation fairly because one must be mindful of the fact that quite generally food is scarce and is likely to be more so during the winter ahead. On the other hand, in presenting the factual situation, one must raise the question as to how much longer many of these people, particularly those who have over such a long period felt persecution and near starvation, can survive on a diet composed principally of bread and coffee, irrespective of the caloric content.

In many camps, the 2,000 calories included 1,250 calories of a black, wet and extremely unappetizing bread. I received the distinct impression and considerable substantiating information that large numbers of the German population—again principally in the rural areas—have a more varied and palatable diet in their requisitions with the German burgomaster, and many seemed to accept whatever he turned over as being the best that was available.

7. Many of the buildings in which displaced persons are housed are clearly unfit for winter use and everywhere there is great concern about the prospect of a complete lack of fuel. There is every likelihood that close to a million displaced persons will be in Germany and Austria when winter sets in. The outlook in many areas so far as shelter, food and fuel are concerned is anything but bright.

II. NEEDS OF THE JEWS

While it is impossible to state accurately the number of Jews now in that part of Germany not under Russian occupation, all indications point to the fact that the number is small, with one hundred thousand probably the top figure; some informed persons contend the number is considerably smaller. The principal nationality groups are Poles, Hungarians, Romanians, Germans and Austrians.

The first and plainest need of these people is a recognition of their actual status and by this I mean their status as Jews. Most of them have spent years in the worst of the concentration camps. In many cases, although the full extent is not yet known, they are the sole survivors of their families and many have been through the agony of witnessing the destruction of their loved ones. Understandably, therefore, their present condition, physical and mental, is far worse than that of other groups.

While SHAEF (now Combined Displaced Persons Executive) policy directives have recognized formerly persecuted persons, including enemy and ex-enemy nationals, as one of the special categories of displaced persons, the general practice thus far has been to follow only nationality lines. While admittedly it is not normally desirable to set aside particular racial or religious groups from their nationality categories, the plain truth is that this was done for so long by the Nazis that a group has been created which has special needs. Jews as Jews (not members of their nationality groups) have been more severely victimized than the non-Jewish members of the same or other nationalities.

When they are now considered only as members of nationality groups, the result is that special attention cannot be given to their admittedly greater needs because, it is contended, doing so would constitute preferential treatment and lead to trouble with the non-Jewish portion of the particular nationality group.

Thus there is a distinctly unrealistic approach to the problem. Refusal to recognize the Jews as such has the effect, in this situation, of closing one's eyes to their former and more barbaric persecution, which has already made them a separate group with greater needs.

Their second great need can be presented only by discussing what I found to be their wishes as to future destinations.

1. For reasons that are obvious and need not be labored, most Jews want to leave Germany and Austria as soon as possible. That is their first and great expressed wish, and while this report necessarily deals with other needs present in the situation, many of the people themselves fear other suggestions or plans for their benefit because of the possibility that attention might thereby be diverted from the all-important matter of evacuation from Germany.

Their desire to leave Germany is an urgent one. The life which they have led for the past ten years, a life of fear and wandering and physical torture, has made them impatient of delay. They want to be evacuated to Palestine now, just as other national groups are being repatriated to their homes. They do not look kindly on the idea of waiting around in idleness and in discomfort in a German camp for many months until a leisurely solution is found for them.

2. Some wish to return to their countries of nationality, but as to this there is considerable nationality variation. Very few Polish or Baltic Jews wish to return to their countries; higher percentages of the Hungarian and Romanian groups want to return, although some hasten to add that it may be only temporarily, in order to look for relatives. Some of the German Jews, especially those who have intermarried, prefer to stay in Germany.
3. With respect to possible place of resettlement for those who may be stateless or who do not wish to return to their homes, Palestine is definitely and preeminently the first choice. Many now have relatives there while others, having experienced intolerance and persecution in their homelands for years, feel that only in Palestine will they be welcomed and find peace and quiet and be given an opportunity to live and work. In the case of the Polish and Baltic Jews, the desire to go to Palestine is based in a great majority of the cases on a love for the country and devotion to the Zionist ideal. It is also true, however, that there are many who wish to go to Palestine because they realize that their opportunity to be admitted into the United States or into other countries in the western hemisphere is limited, if not impossible. Whatever the motive which causes them to turn to Palestine, it is undoubtedly true that the great majority of the Jews now in Germany do not wish to return to those countries from which they came.

4. Palestine, while clearly the choice of most, is not the only named place of possible emigration. Some, but the number is not large, wish to emigrate to the United States, where they have relatives, others to England, the British Dominions, or to South America.

Thus, the second great need is the prompt development of a plan to get out of Germany and Austria as many as possible of those who wish it.

Otherwise the needs and wishes of the Jewish groups among the displaced persons can be simply stated: among their physical needs are clothing and shoes (most sorely needed), more varied and palatable diet, medicine, beds and mattresses, reading materials. The clothing for the camps, too, is requisitioned from the German population, and whether there is not sufficient quantity to be had or the German population has not been willing or has not been compelled to give up sufficient quantity, the internees feel particularly bitter about the state of their clothing when they see how well the German population is still dressed. The German population today is still the best dressed population in all of Europe.

III. MANNER IN WHICH NEEDS ARE BEING MET

Aside from having brought relief from the fear of extermination, hospitalization for the serious starvation cases and some general improvement in conditions under which the remaining displaced persons are compelled to live, relatively little beyond the planning stage has been done, during the period of mass repatriation, to meet the special needs of the formerly persecuted groups.

UNRRA, being neither sufficiently organized or equipped or authorized to operate displaced persons camps or centers on any large scale, has not been in a position to make any substantial contribution to the situation. Regrettably there has been a disinclination on the part of many camp commandants to utilize UNRRA personnel even to the extent available, though it must be admitted that in many situations this resulted from unfortunate experiences army officers had with UNRRA personnel who were unqualified and inadequate for the responsibility involved. Then, too, in the American and British Zones, it too frequently occurred that UNRRA personnel did not include English-speaking members and this hampered proper working relationships.

Under these circumstances UNRRA, to which has been assigned the responsibility for coordinating activities of private social welfare agencies, has been in an awkward position when it came to considering and acting upon proposals of one kind or another submitted by well-qualified agencies which would aid and supplement military and UNRRA responsibilities. The result has been that, up to this point, very few private social agencies are working with displaced persons, including the Jews, although the situation cries out for their services in many different ways.

It must be said, too, that because of their preoccupation with mass repatriation and because of housing, personnel and transport difficulties, the military authorities have shown considerable resistance to the entrance of voluntary agency representatives, no matter how qualified they might be to help meet existing needs of displaced persons.

IV. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

- I. Now that the worst of the pressure of mass repatriation is over, it is not unreasonable to suggest that in the next and perhaps more difficult period those who have suffered most and longest be given first and last attention.

Specifically, in the days immediately ahead, the Jews in Germany and Austria should have the first claim upon the conscience of the people of the United States and Great Britain and the military and other personnel who represent them in work being done in Germany and Austria.

- II. Evacuation from Germany should be the emphasized theme, policy and practice.

A. Recognizing that repatriation is most desirable from the standpoint of all concerned, the Jews who wish to return to their own countries, should be aided to do so without further delay. Whatever special action is needed to accomplish this, with respect to countries of reception or consent of military or other authorities, should be undertaken with energy and determination. Unless this and other action, about to be suggested, is taken, substantial unofficial and unauthorized movements of people must be expected, and these will require considerable force to prevent, for the patience of many of the persons involved is, and in my opinion with justification, nearing the breaking point. It cannot be overemphasized that many of these people are now desperate, that they have become accustomed under German rule to employ every possible means to reach their end, and that the fear of death does not restrain them.

B. With respect to those who do not, for good reason, wish to return to their homes, prompt planning should likewise be undertaken. In this connection, the issue of Palestine must be faced. Now that such, large numbers are no longer involved and if there is any genuine sympathy for what these survivors have endured, some reasonable extension or modification of the British White Paper of 1939 ought to be possible without too serious repercussions. For some of the European Jews, there is no acceptable or even decent solution for their future other than Palestine. This is said on a purely humanitarian basis with no reference to ideological or political considerations so far as Palestine is concerned.

It is my understanding, based upon reliable information, that certificates for immigration to Palestine will be practically exhausted by the end of the current month (August, 1945). What is the future to be? To anyone who has visited the concentration camps and who has talked with the despairing survivors, it is nothing short of calamitous to contemplate that the gates of Palestine should be soon closed.

The Jewish Agency of Palestine has submitted to the British government a petition that one hundred thousand additional immigration certificates be made available. A memorandum accompanying the petition makes a persuasive showing with respect to the immediate absorptive capacity of Palestine and the current, actual manpower shortages there.

While there may be room for difference of opinion as to the precise number of such certificates which might under the circumstances be considered reasonable, there is no question but that the request thus made would, if granted, contribute much to the sound solution for the future of Jews still in Germany and Austria and even other displaced Jews, who do not wish either to remain there or to return to their countries of nationality.

No other single matter is, therefore, so important from the viewpoint of Jews in Germany and Austria and those elsewhere, who have known the horrors of the concentration camps, as is the disposition of the Palestine question.

Dr. Hugh Dalton, a prominent member of the new British government, is reported as having said at the Labour Party conference in May, 1945:

This party has laid it down and repeated it so recently as last April . . . that this time, having regard to the unspeakable horrors that have been perpetrated upon the Jews of Germany and other occupied countries in Europe, it is morally wrong and politically indefensible to impose obstacles to the entry into Palestine now of any Jews who desire to go there. . . .

We have also stated clearly that this is not a matter which should be regarded as one for which the British government alone should take responsibility, but as it comes, as do many others, in the international field, it is indispensable that there should be close agreement and cooperation among the British, American and Soviet governments, particularly if we are going to get a sure settlement in Palestine and the surrounding countries. . . .

If this can be said to represent the viewpoint of the new government in Great Britain, it certainly would not be inappropriate for the United States government to express its interest in and support of some equitable solution of the question, which would make it possible for some reasonable number of Europe's persecuted Jews, now homeless under any fair view, to resettle in Palestine. That is their wish and it is rendered desirable by the generally accepted policy of permitting family groups to unite or reunite.

C. The United States should, under existing immigration laws, permit reasonable numbers of such persons to come here, again particularly those who have family ties in this country. As indicated earlier, the number who desire emigration to the United States is not large.

If Great Britain and the United States were to take the actions recited, it might the more readily be that other countries would likewise be willing to keep their doors reasonably open for such humanitarian considerations and to demonstrate in a practical manner their disapproval of Nazi policy which unfortunately has poisoned so much of Europe.

III. To the extent that such emigration from Germany and Austria is delayed, some immediate temporary solution must be found. In any event there will be a substantial number of persecuted persons who are not physically fit or otherwise presently prepared for emigration.

Here I feel strongly that greater and more extensive effort should be made to get them out of camps, for they are sick of living in camps. In the first place, there is real need for such specialized places as (a) tuberculosis sanatoria and (b) rest homes for those who are mentally ill or who need a period of readjustment before living again in the world at large—anywhere. Some will require at least short periods of training or retraining before they can be really useful citizens.

But speaking more broadly, there is an opportunity here to give some real meaning to the policy agreed upon at Potsdam. If it be true, as seems to be widely conceded, that the German people at large do not have any sense of guilt with respect to the war and its causes and results, and if the policy is to be “to convince the German people that they have suffered a total military defeat and that they cannot escape responsibility for what they have brought upon themselves,” it is difficult to understand why so many displaced persons, particularly those who have so long been persecuted and whose repatriation or resettlement is likely to be delayed, should be compelled to live in crude, overcrowded camps while the German people, in rural areas, continue undisturbed in their homes.

As matters now stand, we appear to be treating the Jews as the Nazis treated them, except that we do not exterminate them. They are in concentration camps in large numbers under our military guard instead of SS troops. One is led to wonder whether the German people, seeing this, are not supposing that we are following or at least condoning Nazi policy.

It seems much more equitable, and as it should be, to witness the very few places where fearless and uncompromising military officers have either requisitioned an entire village for the benefit of displaced persons, compelling the German population to find housing where they can, or have required the local population to billet a reasonable number of them.

Thus the displaced persons, including the persecuted, live more like normal people and less like prisoners or criminals or herded sheep. They are in Germany, most of them and certainly the Jews, through no fault or wish of their own. This fact is, in this fashion, being brought home to the German people, but it is being done on too small a scale.

At many places, however, the military government officers manifest the utmost reluctance or indisposition, if not timidity, about inconveniencing the German population. They even say that their job is to get communities working properly and soundly again, that they must “live with the Germans while the DPs (displaced persons) are a more temporary problem.”

Thus (and I am ready to cite the example) if a group of Jews are ordered to vacate their temporary quarters, needed for military purposes, and there are two possible sites, one a block of flats (model apartments) with conveniences and the other a series of shabby buildings with outside toilet and washing facilities, the Burgomaster readily succeeds in persuading the town mayor to allot the latter to the displaced persons and to save the former for returning German civilians.

This tendency reflects itself in other ways, namely, in the employment of German civilians in the offices of Military Government when equally qualified personnel could easily be found among the displaced persons whose repatriation is not imminent. Actually, there have been situations where displaced persons, especially Jews, have found it difficult to obtain audiences with military government authorities because ironically they have been obliged to go through German employers who have not facilitated matters.

Quite generally, insufficient use is made of the services of displaced persons. Many of them are able and eager to work, but apparently they are not considered in this regard. While appreciating that language difficulties are sometimes involved, I am convinced that, both within and outside camps, greater use those displaced persons who in all likelihood will be on hand for some time. Happily, in some camps every effort is made to utilize the services of the displaced persons and these are apt to be the best camps in all respects.

- IV. To the extent that (a) evacuation from Germany and Austria is not immediately possible and (b) the formerly persecuted groups cannot be housed in villages or billeted with the German population, I recommend urgently that separate camps be set up for Jews, or at least for those who wish, in the absence of a better solution, to be in such camps. There are several reasons for this; (1) A great majority want it; (2) it is the only way in which administratively their special needs and problems can be met without charges of preferential treatment or (oddly enough) charges of “discrimination” with respect to Jewish agencies now prepared and ready to give them assistance.

In this connection, I wish to emphasize that it is not a case of singling out a particular group for special privileges. It is a matter of raising to a more normal level the position of a group which has been depressed to the lowest depths conceivable by years of organized and inhuman oppression. The measures necessary for their restitution do not come within any reasonable interpretation of privileged treatment and are required by considerations of justice and humanity.

There has been some tendency at spots in the direction of separate camps for those who might be found to be stateless or non-repatriable or whose repatriation is likely to be deferred some time. Actually, too, this was announced some time ago as SHAEF policy, but in practice it has not been taken to mean much, for there is (understandably if not carried too far) a refusal to contemplate possible statelessness and an insistence, in the interests of the large repatriation program, to consider all as repatriable. This results in a resistance to anything in the way of special planning for the “hard core,” although all admit it is there and will inevitably appear.

While speaking of camps, this should be pointed out: While it may be that conditions in Germany and Austria are still such that certain control measures are required, there seems little justification for the continuance of barbed-wire fences, armed guards and prohibition against leaving camp except by passes, which at some places are illiberally granted. Prevention of looting is given as the reason for these stern measures, but it is interesting that in portions of the Seventh Army area, where greater liberty of movement in and out of camps is given, there is actually much less plundering than in other areas where people, wishing to leave camp temporarily, do so by stealth.

- V. As quickly as possible the actual operation of such camps should be turned over to a civilian agency—UNRRA. That organization is aware of weaknesses in its present structure and is pressing to remedy them. In that connection, it is believed that greater assistance could be given by the military authorities, upon whom any civilian agency in Germany and Austria today is necessarily dependent, so far as housing, transport and other items are concerned. While it is true the military have been urging UNRRA to get ready to assume responsibility, it is also the fact that insufficient cooperation of an active nature has been given to accomplish the desired end.

- VI. Since, in any event, the military authorities must necessarily continue to participate in the program for all displaced persons, especially with respect to housing, transport, security and certain supplies, it is recommended that there be a review of the military personnel elected for camp commandant positions. Some serving at present, while perhaps adequate for the mass repatriation job, are manifestly unsuited for the longer-term job of working in a camp composed of people whose repatriation or resettlement is likely to be delayed. Officers who have had some background or experience in social welfare work are to be preferred, and it is believed there are some who are available. It is most important that the officers selected be sympathetic with the program and that they be temperamentally able to work and to cooperate with UNRRA and other relief and welfare agencies.
- VII. Pending the assumption of responsibility for operations by UNRRA, it would be desirable if a more extensive plan of field visitation by appropriate army group headquarters be instituted. It is believed that many of the conditions now existing in the camps would not be tolerated if more intimately known by supervisory officers through inspection tours.
- VIII. It is urgently recommended that plans for tracing services, if on open postal card only, be made available to displaced persons within Germany and Austria as soon as possible. The difficulties are appreciated but it is believed that, if the anxiety of the people, so long abused and harassed, were fully understood, ways and means could be found within the near future to make such communication and tracing of relatives possible. I believe also that some of the private agencies could be helpful in this direction if given an opportunity to function.

V. “THE MAIN SOLUTION—PALESTINE”

While I was instructed to report conditions as I found them, the following should be added to make the picture complete:

1. A gigantic task confronted the occupying armies in Germany and Austria in getting back to their homes as many as possible of the more than six million displaced persons found in those countries. Less than three months after V-E Day, more than four million of such persons have been repatriated—a phenomenal performance. One’s first impression, in surveying the situation, is that of complete admiration for what has been accomplished by the military authorities in so materially reducing the time as predicted to be required for this stupendous task. Praise of the highest order is due all military units with respect to this phase of post-fighting jobs. In directing attention to existing conditions which unquestionably require remedying, there is no intention or wish to detract one particle from the preceding statements.

2. While I did not actually see conditions as they existed immediately after liberation, I had them described in detail sufficient to make entirely clear that there had been, during the intervening period, some improvement in the conditions under which most of the remaining displaced persons are living. Reports which have come out of Germany informally from refugees themselves and from persons interested in refugee groups indicate something of a tendency not to take into account the full scope of the overwhelming tasks and responsibilities facing the military authorities. While it is understandable that those who have been persecuted and otherwise mistreated over such a long period should be impatient at what appears to them to be undue delay in meeting their special needs, fairness dictates that, in evaluating the progress made, the entire problem and all its ramifications be kept in mind. My effort has been, therefore, to weigh quite carefully the many complaints made to me in the course of my survey, both by displaced persons themselves and in their behalf, in the light of the many responsibilities which confronted the military authorities.
3. While for the sake of brevity this report necessarily consisted largely of general statements, it should be recognized that exceptions exist with respect to practically all such generalizations. One high-ranking military authority predicted, in advance of my trip through Germany and Austria, that I would find, with respect to camps containing displaced persons, "some that are quite good, some that are very bad, with the average something under satisfactory." My subsequent trip confirmed that prediction in all respects.

In order to file this report promptly so that possibly some remedial steps might be considered at as early a date as possible, I have not taken time to analyze all of the notes made in the course of the trip or to comment on the situation in France, Belgium, Holland or Switzerland, also visited. Accordingly, I respectfully request that this report be considered as partial in nature. The problems present in Germany and Austria are much more serious and difficult than in any of the other countries named and this fact, too, seemed to make desirable the filing of a partial report immediately upon completion of the mission.

In conclusion, I wish to repeat that the main solution, in many ways the only real solution, of the problem lies in the quick evacuation of all non-repatriable Jews in Germany and Austria, who wish it, to Palestine. In order to be effective, this plan must not be long delayed. The urgency of the situation should be recognized. It is inhuman to ask people to continue to live for any length of time under their present conditions. The evacuation of the Jews of Germany and Austria to Palestine will solve the problem of the individuals involved and will also remove a problem from the military authorities who have had to deal with it.

The army's ability to move millions of people quickly and efficiently has been amply demonstrated. The evacuation of a relatively small number of Jews from Germany and Austria will present no great problem to the military. With the end of the Japanese war, the shipping situation should also become sufficiently improved to make such a move feasible.

The civilized world owes it to this handful of survivors to provide them with a home where they can again settle down and begin to live as human beings.

Source: Report, Earl G. Harrison's "Mission to Europe to inquire into the condition and needs of those among the displaced persons in the liberated countries of Western Europe and in the SHAEF area of Germany—with particular reference to the Jewish refugees—who may possibly be stateless or non-repatriable," undated [ca. August 1945], Dwight D. Eisenhower's Pre-Presidential Papers, Box 116, Truman Harry S. (4); NAID #12007695. Dwight D. Eisenhower Presidential Library.

166. LETTER FROM PRESIDENT TRUMAN TO GENERAL EISENHOWER IN RESPONSE TO THE HARRISON REPORT, AUGUST 31, 1945

Shortly after receipt of a report prepared by Earl G. Harrison, commissioner for immigration and naturalization under President Franklin Roosevelt on the conditions facing displaced persons (DPs), especially Jews, in camps run by the Allies in Europe, President Harry S. Truman wrote this letter to General Dwight D. Eisenhower, supreme Allied commander, Europe, telling him of Harrison's findings. Truman notes that it seems to "have been taken for granted that all displaced persons, irrespective of their former persecution or the likelihood that their repatriation or resettlement will be delayed, must remain in camps—many of which are overcrowded and heavily guarded. Some of these camps are the very ones where these people were herded together, starved, tortured and made to witness the death of their fellow-inmates and friends and relatives." Truman states that efforts must be intensified to move these DPs from the camps and into "decent houses until they can be repatriated or evacuated." Truman writes to Eisenhower: "I know you will agree with me that we have a particular responsibility toward these victims of persecution and tyranny who are in our zone."

My dear General Eisenhower:

I have received and considered the report of Mr. Earl G. Harrison, our representative on the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees, upon his mission to inquire into the condition and needs of displaced persons in Germany who may be stateless or non-repatriable, particularly Jews. I am sending you a copy of that report. I have also had a long conference with him on the same subject.

While Mr. Harrison makes due allowance for the fact that during the early days of liberation the huge task of mass repatriation required main attention, he reports conditions which now exist and which require prompt remedy. Those conditions, I know, are not in conformity with policies promulgated by SHARF, now Combined Displaced Persons Executive. But they are what actually exists in the field. In other words, the policies are not being carried out by some of your subordinate officers.

For example, military government officers have been authorized and even directed to requisition billeting facilities from the German population for the benefit of displaced persons. Yet, from this report, this has not been done on any wide scale. Apparently it is being taken for granted that all displaced persons, irrespective of their former persecution or the likelihood that their repatriation or resettlement will be delayed, must remain in camps—many of which are overcrowded and heavily guarded. Some of these camps are the very ones where these people were herded together, starved, tortured and made to witness the death of their fellow-inmates and friends and relatives. The announced policy has been to give such persons preference over the German civilian population in housing. But the practice seems to be quite another thing.

We must intensify our efforts to get these people out of camps and into decent houses until they can be repatriated or evacuated. These houses should be requisitioned from the German civilian population. That is one way to implement the Potsdam policy that the German people "cannot escape responsibility for what they have brought upon themselves."

I quote this paragraph with particular reference to the Jews among the displaced persons:

"As matters now stand, we appear to be treating the Jews as the Nazis treated them except that we do not exterminate them. They are in concentration camps in large numbers under our military guard instead of S.S. troops. One is led to wonder whether the German people, seeing this, are not supposing that we are following or at least condoning Nazi policy."

You will find in the report other illustrations of what I mean.

I hope you will adopt the suggestion that a more extensive plan of field visitation by appropriate Army Group Headquarters be instituted, so that the humane policies which have been enunciated are not permitted to be ignored in the field. Most of the conditions now existing in displaced persons camps would quickly be remedied if through inspection tours they came to your attention or to the attention of your supervisory officers.

I know you will agree with me that we have a particular responsibility toward these victims of persecution and tyranny who are in our zone. We must make clear to the German people that we thoroughly abhor the Nazi policies of hatred and persecution. We have no better opportunity to demonstrate this than by the manner in which we ourselves actually treat the survivors remaining in Germany.

I hope you will report to me as soon as possible the steps you have been able to take to clean up the conditions mentioned in the report.

I am communicating directly with the British Government in an effort to have the doors of Palestine opened to such of these displaced persons as wish to go there.

Very sincerely yours,
(Sgd) Harry S. Truman

General of the Army D. D. Eisenhower
G.Hq. USFET

Source: Collection HST-OFF: Official Files (Truman Administration), National Archive Identifier: 201125.

167. LONDON AGREEMENT AMONG ALLIES TO ESTABLISH AN INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL, AUGUST 8, 1945

In October 1943 at a conference that was held in Moscow, a declaration of atrocities was signed by the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union, "speaking in the interest of the thirty-two United Nations." It pledged that Germans "responsible for or [who] have taken a consenting part" in Nazi atrocities will be brought to justice. That declaration became a reality with the London Agreement of August 8, 1945, signed on behalf of the Government of the United States, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the Government of the Soviet Union. The agreement established an International Military Tribunal for "war criminals whose offenses have no particular geographical location," and set forth the Charter of the International Military Tribunal that would provide the tribunal's constitution and define its jurisdiction and functions. The London Agreement also pledged cooperation among the four signatories to make available to the tribunal any of the major war criminals who are to be tried by the tribunal.

AGREEMENT BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS FOR THE PROSECUTION AND PUNISHMENT OF THE MAJOR WAR CRIMINALS OF THE EUROPEAN AXIS.

WHEREAS the United Nations have from time to time made declarations of their intention that War Criminals shall be brought to justice;

AND WHEREAS the Moscow Declaration of the 30th October 1943 on German atrocities in Occupied Europe stated that those German Officers and men and members of the Nazi Party who have been responsible for or have taken a consenting part in atrocities and crimes will be sent back to the countries in which their abominable deeds were done in order that they may be judged and punished according to the laws of these liberated countries and of the free Governments that will be created therein;

AND WHEREAS this Declaration was stated to be without prejudice to the case of major criminals whose offenses have no particular geographic location and who will be punished by the joint decision of the Governments of the Allies;

NOW THEREFORE the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (hereinafter called "the Signatories") acting in the interests of all the United Nations and by their representatives duly authorized thereto have concluded this Agreement.

Article 1. There shall be established after consultation with the Control Council for Germany an International Military Tribunal for the trial of war criminals whose offenses have no particular geographical location whether they be accused individually or in their capacity as members of organizations or groups or in both capacities.

Article 2. The constitution, jurisdiction and functions of the International Military Tribunal shall be those set out in the Charter annexed to this Agreement, which Charter shall form an integral part of this Agreement.

Article 3. Each of the Signatories shall take the necessary steps to make available for the investigation of the charges and trial the major war criminals detained by them who are to be tried by the International Military Tribunal. The Signatories shall also use their best endeavors to make available for investigation of the charges against and the trial before the International Military Tribunal such of the major war criminals as are not in the territories of any of the Signatories.

Article 4. Nothing in this Agreement shall prejudice the provisions established by the Moscow Declaration concerning the return of war criminals to the countries where they committed their crimes.

Article 5. Any Government of the United Nations may adhere to this Agreement by notice given through the diplomatic channel to the Government of the United Kingdom, who shall inform the other signatory and adhering Governments of each such adherence.

Article 6. Nothing in this Agreement shall prejudice the jurisdiction or the powers of any national or occupation court established or to be established in any allied territory or in Germany for the trial of war criminals.

Article 7. This Agreement shall come into force on the day of signature and shall remain in force for the period of one year and shall continue thereafter, subject to the right of any Signatory to give, through the diplomatic channel, one month's notice of intention to terminate it. Such termination shall not prejudice any proceedings already taken or any findings already made in pursuance of this Agreement.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the Undersigned have signed the present Agreement.

DONE in quadruplicate in London this 8th day of August 1945 each in English, French and Russian, and each text to have equal authenticity.

For the Government of the United States of America

[signed] ROBERT H. JACKSON

For the Provisional Government of the French Republic

[signed] ROBERT FALCO

For the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

[signed] JOWITT C.

For the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic

[signed] I. T. NIKITCHENKO

[signed] A. N. TRAININ

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. I, pp. 1–3.

168. CHARTER OF THE INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL, AUGUST 8, 1945

The 30 articles of the International Military Tribunal charter laid out the prosecutorial agenda for the trial of major war criminals and, if convicted, the punishments of the leadership of Nazi Germany, responsible for the death and destruction of World War II. It is divided into the following sections: I. Constitution of the International Military Tribunal (1–5), II. Jurisdiction and General Principles (6–13), III. Committee for the Investigation and Prosecution of Major War Criminals (14–15), IV. Fair Trial for Defendants (16), V. Powers of the Tribunal and Conduct of the Trial (17–25), VI. Judgment and Sentence (26–29), and VII. Expenses (30). Signatories to the charter were the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Soviet Union. The “heart” of the charter was found in Article 6 and addressed the crimes with which the Nazi leadership was charged: crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity (Jews, as such, not specifically mentioned). The charter provided the foundation for the later International Criminal Court, the International Criminal Tribunal for (the former) Yugoslavia, and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda.

CHARTER OF THE INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL

I. CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL

Article 1. In pursuance of the Agreement signed on the 8th day of August 1945 by the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, there shall be established an International Military Tribunal (hereinafter called “the Tribunal”) for the just and prompt trial and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis.

Article 2. The Tribunal shall consist of four members, each with an alternate. One member and one alternate shall be appointed by each of the Signatories. The alternates shall, so far as they are able, be present at all sessions of the Tribunal. In case of illness of any member of the Tribunal or his incapacity for some other reason to fulfill his functions, his alternate shall take his place.

Article 3. Neither the Tribunal, its members nor their alternates can be challenged by the prosecution, or by the Defendants or their Counsel. Each Signatory may replace its member of the Tribunal or his alternate for reasons of health or for other good reasons, except that no replacement may take place during a Trial, other than by an alternate.

Article 4.

- (a) The presence of all four members of the Tribunal or the alternate for any absent member shall be necessary to constitute the quorum.

- (b) The members of the Tribunal shall, before any trial begins, agree among themselves upon the selection from their number of a President, and the President shall hold office during that trial, or as may otherwise be agreed by a vote of not less than three members. The principle of rotation of presidency for successive trials is agreed. If, however, a session of the Tribunal takes place on the territory of one of the four Signatories, the representative of that Signatory on the Tribunal shall preside.
- (c) Save as aforesaid the Tribunal shall take decisions by a majority vote and in case the votes are evenly divided, the vote of the President shall be decisive: provided always that convictions and sentences shall only be imposed by affirmative votes of at least three members of the Tribunal.

Article 5. In case of need and depending on the number of the matters to be tried, other Tribunals may be set up; and the establishment, functions, and procedure of each Tribunal shall be identical, and shall be governed by this Charter.

II. JURISDICTION AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 6. The Tribunal established by the Agreement referred to in Article 1 hereof for the trial and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis countries shall have the power to try and punish persons who, acting in the interests of the European Axis countries, whether as individuals or as members of organizations, committed any of the following crimes.

The following acts, or any of them, are crimes coming within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal for which there shall be individual responsibility:

- (a) CRIMES AGAINST PEACE: namely, planning, preparation, initiation, or waging of war of aggression, or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances, or participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the foregoing;
- (b) WAR CRIMES: namely, violations of the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to, murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave labor or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war or persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity;
- (c) CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY: namely, murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war; or persecution on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of domestic law of the country where perpetrated.

Leaders, organizers, instigators and accomplices participating in the formulation or execution of a common plan or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing crimes are responsible for all acts performed by any persons in execution of such plan.

Article 7. The official position of defendants, whether as Heads of State or responsible officials in Government Departments, shall not be considered as freeing them from responsibility or mitigating punishment.

Article 8. The fact that the Defendant acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior shall not free him from responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Tribunal determine that justice so requires.

Article 9. At the trial of any individual member of any group or organization the Tribunal may declare (in connection with any act of which the individual may be convicted) that the group or organization of which the individual was a member was a criminal organization.

After receipt of the Indictment the Tribunal shall give such notice as it thinks fit that the prosecution intends to ask the Tribunal to make such declaration and any member of the organization will be entitled to apply to the Tribunal for leave to be heard by the Tribunal upon the question of the criminal character of the organization. The Tribunal shall have power to allow or reject the application. If the application is allowed, the Tribunal may direct in what manner the applicants shall be represented and heard.

Article 10. In cases where a group or organization is declared criminal by the Tribunal, the competent national authority of any Signatory shall have the right to bring individuals to trial for membership therein before national, military or occupation courts. In any such case the criminal nature of the group or organization is considered proved and shall not be questioned.

1368 Charter of the International Military Tribunal

Article 11. Any person convicted by the Tribunal may be charged before a national, military or occupation court, referred to in Article 10 of this Charter, with a crime other than of membership in a criminal group or organization and such court may, after convicting him, impose upon him punishment independent of and additional to the punishment imposed by the Tribunal for participation in the criminal activities of such group or organization.

Article 12. The Tribunal shall have the right to take proceedings against a person charged with crimes set out in Article 6 of this Charter in his absence, if he has not been found or if the Tribunal, for any reason, finds it necessary, in the interests of justice, to conduct the hearing in his absence.

Article 13. The Tribunal shall draw up rules for its procedure. These rules shall not be inconsistent with the provisions of this Charter.

III. COMMITTEE FOR THE INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION OF MAJOR WAR CRIMINALS

Article 14. Each Signatory shall appoint a Chief Prosecutor for the investigation of the charges against and the prosecution of major war criminals. The Chief Prosecutors shall act as a committee for the following purposes:

- (a) to agree upon a plan of the individual work of each of the Chief Prosecutors and his staff,
- (b) to settle the final designation of major war criminals to be tried by the Tribunal,
- (c) to approve the Indictment and the documents to be submitted therewith,
- (d) to lodge the Indictment and the accompanying documents with the Tribunal,
- (e) to draw up and recommend to the Tribunal for its approval draft rules of procedure, contemplated by Article 13 of this Charter. The Tribunal shall have power to accept, with or without amendments, or to reject, the rules so recommended.

The Committee shall act in all the above matters by a majority vote and shall appoint a Chairman as may be convenient and in accordance with the principle of rotation: provided that if there is an equal division of vote concerning the designation of a Defendant to be tried by the Tribunal, or the crimes with which he shall be charged, that proposal will be adopted which was made by the party which proposed that the particular Defendant be tried, or the particular charges be preferred against him.

Article 15. The Chief Prosecutors shall individually, and acting in collaboration with one another, also undertake the following duties:

- (a) investigation, collection and production before or at the Trial of all necessary evidence,
- (b) the preparation of the Indictment for approval by the Committee in accordance with paragraph (c) of Article 14 hereof,
- (c) the preliminary examination of all necessary witnesses and of the Defendants,
- (d) to act as prosecutor at the Trial,
- (e) to appoint representatives to carry out such duties as may be assigned to them,
- (f) to undertake such other matters as may appear necessary to them for the purposes of the preparation for and conduct of the Trial.

It is understood that no witness or Defendant detained by any Signatory shall be taken out of the possession of that Signatory without its assent.

IV. FAIR TRIAL FOR DEFENDANTS

Article 16. In order to ensure fair trial for the Defendants, the following procedure shall be followed:

- (a) The Indictment shall include full particulars specifying in detail the charges against the Defendants. A copy of the Indictment and of all the documents lodged with the Indictment, translated into a language which he understands, shall be furnished to the Defendant at a reasonable time before the Trial.
- (b) During any preliminary examination or trial of a Defendant he shall have the right to give any explanation relevant to the charges made against him.
- (c) A preliminary examination of a defendant and his Trial shall be conducted in or translated into, a language which the Defendant understands.
- (d) A defendant shall have the right to conduct his own defense before the Tribunal or to have the assistance of Counsel.
- (e) A defendant shall have the right through himself or through his counsel to present evidence at the Trial in support of his defense, and to cross-examine any witness called by the Prosecution.

V. POWERS OF THE TRIBUNAL AND CONDUCT OF THE TRIAL

Article 17. The Tribunal shall have the power

- (a) to summon witnesses to the Trial and to require their attendance and testimony and to put questions to them,
- (b) to interrogate any Defendant,
- (c) to require the production of documents and other evidentiary material,
- (d) to administer oaths to witnesses,
- (e) to appoint officers for the carrying out of any task designated by the Tribunal including the power to have evidence taken on commission.

Article 18. The Tribunal shall

- (a) confine the Trial strictly to an expeditious hearing of the issues raised by the charges,
- (b) take strict measures to prevent any action which will cause unreasonable delay, and rule out irrelevant issues and statements of any kind whatsoever,
- (c) deal summarily with any contumacy, imposing appropriate punishment, including exclusion of any Defendant or his Counsel from some or all further proceedings, but without prejudice to the determination of the charges.

Article 19. The Tribunal shall not be bound by technical rules of evidence. It shall adopt and apply to the greatest possible extent expeditious and non-technical procedure, and shall admit any evidence which it deems to have probative value.

Article 20. The Tribunal may require to be informed of the nature of any evidence before it is offered so that it may rule upon the relevance thereof.

Article 21. The Tribunal shall not require proof of facts of common knowledge but shall take judicial notice thereof. It shall also take judicial notice of official governmental documents and reports of the United Nations, including the acts and documents of the committees set up in the various allied countries for the investigation of war crimes, and the records and findings of military or other Tribunals of any of the United Nations.

Article 22. The permanent seat of the Tribunal shall be in Berlin. The first meetings of the members of the Tribunal and of the Chief Prosecutors shall be held at Berlin in a place to be designated by the Control Council for Germany. The first trial shall be held at Nurnberg, and any subsequent trials shall be held at such places as the Tribunal may decide.

Article 23. One or more of the Chief Prosecutors may take part in the prosecution at each Trial. The function of any Chief Prosecutor may be discharged by him personally, or by any person or persons authorized by him.

The function of Counsel for a Defendant may be discharged at the Defendant's request by any Counsel professionally qualified to conduct cases before the Courts of his own country, or by any other person who may be specially authorized thereto by the Tribunal.

Article 24. The proceedings at the Trial shall take the following course:

- (a) The Indictment shall be read in court.
- (b) The Tribunal shall ask each Defendant whether he pleads "guilty" or "not guilty".
- (c) The prosecution shall make an opening statement.
- (d) The Tribunal shall ask the prosecution and the defense what evidence (if any) they wish to submit to the Tribunal, and the Tribunal shall rule upon the admissibility of any such evidence.
- (e) The witnesses for the Prosecution shall be examined and after that the witnesses for the Defense. Thereafter such rebutting evidence as may be held by the Tribunal to be admissible shall be called by either the Prosecution or the Defense.
- (f) The Tribunal may put any question to any witness and to any Defendant, at any time.
- (g) The Prosecution and the Defense shall interrogate and may cross-examine any witnesses and any Defendant who gives testimony.
- (h) The Defense shall address the court.
- (i) The Prosecution shall address the court.
- (j) Each Defendant may make a statement to the Tribunal.
- (k) The Tribunal shall deliver judgment and pronounce sentence.

Article 25. All official documents shall be produced, and all court proceedings conducted, in English, French, and Russian, and in the language of the Defendant. So much of the record and of the proceedings may also be translated into the language of any country in which the Tribunal is sitting, as the Tribunal considers desirable in the interests of justice and public opinion.

VI. JUDGMENT AND SENTENCE

Article 26. The judgment of the Tribunal as to the guilt or the innocence of any Defendant shall give the reasons on which it is based, and shall be final and not subject to review.

Article 27. The Tribunal shall have the right to impose upon a Defendant on conviction, death or such other punishment as shall be determined by it to be just.

Article 28. In addition to any punishment imposed by it, the Tribunal shall have the right to deprive the convicted person of any stolen property and order its delivery to the Control Council for Germany.

Article 29. In case of guilt, sentences shall be carried out in accordance with the orders of the Control Council for Germany, which may at any time reduce or otherwise alter the sentences, but may not increase the severity thereof. If the Control Council for Germany, after any Defendant has been convicted and sentenced, discovers fresh evidence which, in its opinion, would found a fresh charge against him, the Council shall report accordingly to the Committee established under Article 14 hereof, for such action as they may consider proper, having regard to the interests of justice.

VII. EXPENSES

Article 30. The expenses of the Tribunal and of the Trials, shall be charged by the Signatories against the funds allotted for maintenance of the Control Council for Germany.

Source: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, Office of the United States Chief of Counsel for the Prosecution of Axis Criminality (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Red Series, vol. I, pp. 4–11.

169. OPENING STATEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL, NOVEMBER 20, 1945

Four judges presided at the International Military Tribunal's trial of major war criminals in Nuremberg, Germany. They represented the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union. The British judge, Geoffrey Lawrence, was elected president of the judges. It was he who opened the proceedings with the statement set forth in this document. He lays out the establishment of the tribunal in the London Agreement of August 8, 1945, and references its charter that was a part of the agreement. Confirming that each of the defendants of the trial was given a copy of the indictment brought against him and had same for more than 30 days, Lawrence emphasized the importance of conducting the trial "in accordance with the sacred principles of law and justice" and admonished the public attending the trial to conduct themselves with "order and decorum." He explains that the responsibility for all parties to act pursuant to "those principles and traditions which alone give justice its authority" derives from the fact that the "Trial which is now about to begin is unique in the history of jurisprudence of the world and is of supreme importance to millions of people around the globe."

FIRST DAY

Tuesday, 20 November 1945

THE PRESIDENT: Before the defendants in this case are called upon to make their pleas to the Indictment which has been lodged against them, and in which they are charged with Crimes against Peace, War Crimes, and Crimes against Humanity, and with a Common Plan or Conspiracy to commit those crimes, it is the wish of the Tribunal that I should make a very brief statement on behalf of the Tribunal.

This International Military Tribunal has been established pursuant to the Agreement of London, dated the 8th of August 1945, and the Charter of the Tribunal as annexed thereto, and the purpose for which the Tribunal has been established is stated in Article 1 of the Charter to be the just and prompt trial and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis.

The Signatories to the Agreement and Charter are the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The Committee of the Chief Prosecutors, appointed by the four Signatories, have settled the final designation of the war criminals to be tried by the Tribunal, and have approved the Indictment on which the present defendants stand charged here today.

On Thursday, the 18th of October 1945, in Berlin, the Indictment was lodged with the Tribunal and a copy of that Indictment in the German language has been furnished to each defendant, and has been in his possession for more than 30 days.

All the defendants are represented by counsel. In almost all cases the counsel appearing for the defendants have been chosen by the defendants themselves, but in cases where counsel could not be obtained the Tribunal has itself selected suitable counsel agreeable to the defendant.

The Tribunal has heard with great satisfaction of the steps which have been taken by the Chief Prosecutors to make available to defending counsel the numerous documents upon which the Prosecution rely, with the aim of giving to the defendants every possibility for a just defense.

The Trial which is now about to begin is unique in the history of the jurisprudence of the world and it is of supreme importance to millions of people all over the globe. For these reasons, there is laid upon everybody who takes any part in this Trial a solemn responsibility to discharge their duties without fear or favor, in accordance with the sacred principles of law and justice.

The four Signatories having invoked the judicial process, it is the duty of all concerned to see that the Trial in no way departs from those principles and traditions which alone give justice its authority and the place it ought to occupy in the affairs of all civilized states.

This Trial is a public Trial in the fullest sense of those words, and I must, therefore, remind the public that the Tribunal will insist upon the complete maintenance of order and decorum, and will take the strictest measures to enforce it. It only remains for me to direct, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, that the Indictment shall now be read.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. II, pp. 29–30.

170. NUREMBERG TRIAL: EXCERPTS FROM THE OPENING STATEMENT OF MR. JUSTICE ROBERT H. JACKSON, NOVEMBER 21, 1945

In what is considered to be one of the finest opening statements in modern jurisprudence, Robert H. Jackson, associate justice of the U. S. Supreme Court and chief counsel for the United States at the International Military Tribunal trial of major war criminals held in Nuremberg, Germany, stood before the presiding judges at this international trial and implored them to “put the forces of international law, its precepts, its prohibitions and, most of all, its sanctions on the side of peace.” In words now well known, Jackson stated: “The wrongs which we seek to condemn and punish have been so calculated, so malignant, and so devastating, that civilization cannot tolerate their being ignored, because it cannot survive their being repeated.” Elsewhere: “We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow.” In extending a hand to the vanquished: “We would also make clear that we have no purpose to incriminate the whole German people.” Jackson also warns: “The refuge of the defendants can be only their hope that international law will lag so far behind the moral sense of mankind that conduct which is crime in the moral sense must be regarded as innocent in law.”

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON: May it please Your Honors:

The privilege of opening the first trial in history for crimes against the peace of the world imposes a grave responsibility. The wrongs which we seek to condemn and punish have been so calculated, so malignant, and so devastating, that civilization cannot tolerate their being ignored, because it cannot survive their being repeated. That four great nations, flushed with victory and stung with injury stay the hand of vengeance and voluntarily submit their captive enemies to the judgment of the law is one of the most significant tributes that Power has ever paid to Reason.

This Tribunal, while it is novel and experimental, is not the product of abstract speculations nor is it created to vindicate legalistic theories. This inquest represents the practical effort of four of the most mighty of nations, with the support of 17 more, to utilize international law to meet the greatest menace of our times—aggressive war. The common sense of mankind demands that law shall not stop with the punishment of petty crimes by little people. It must also reach men who possess themselves of great power and make deliberate and concerted use of it to set in motion evils which leave no home in the world untouched. It is a cause of that magnitude that the United Nations will lay before Your Honors.

In the prisoners' dock sit twenty-odd broken men. Reproached by the humiliation of those they have led almost as bitterly as by the desolation of those they have attacked, their personal capacity for evil is forever past. It is hard now to perceive in these men as captives the power by which as Nazi leaders they once dominated much of the world and terrified most of it. Merely as individuals their fate is of little consequence to the world.

What makes this inquest significant is that these prisoners represent sinister influences that will lurk in the world long after their bodies have returned to dust. We will show them to be living symbols of racial hatreds, of terrorism and violence, and of the arrogance and cruelty of power. They are symbols of fierce nationalisms and of militarism, of intrigue and war-making which have embroiled Europe generation after generation, crushing its manhood, destroying its homes, and impoverishing its life. They have so identified themselves with the philosophies they conceived and with the forces they directed that any tenderness to them is a victory and an encouragement to all the evils which are attached to their names. Civilization can afford no compromise with the social forces which would gain renewed strength if we deal ambiguously or indecisively with the men in whom those forces now precariously survive.

What these men stand for we will patiently and temperately disclose. We will give you undeniable proofs of incredible events. The catalog of crimes will omit nothing that could be conceived by a pathological pride, cruelty, and lust for power. These men created in Germany, under the "Führerprinzip", a National Socialist despotism equalled only by the dynasties of the ancient East. They took from the German people all those dignities and freedoms that we hold natural and inalienable rights in every human being. The people were compensated by inflaming and gratifying hatreds towards those who were marked as "scapegoats". Against their opponents, including Jews, Catholics, and free labor, the Nazis directed such a campaign of arrogance, brutality, and annihilation as the world has not witnessed since the pre-Christian ages. They excited the German ambition to be a "master race", which of course implies serfdom for others. They led their people on a mad gamble for domination. They diverted social energies and resources to the creation of what they thought to be an invincible war machine. They overran their neighbors. To sustain the "master race" in its war-making, they enslaved millions of human beings and brought them into Germany, where these hapless creatures now wander as "displaced persons". At length bestiality and bad faith reached such excess that they aroused the sleeping strength of imperiled Civilization. Its united efforts have ground the German war machine to fragments. But the struggle has left Europe a liberated yet prostrate land where a demoralized society struggles to survive. These are the fruits of the sinister forces that sit with these defendants in the prisoners' dock.

* * * * *

Before I discuss particulars of evidence, some general considerations which may affect the credit of this trial in the eyes of the world should be candidly faced. There is a dramatic disparity between the circumstances of the accusers and of the accused that might discredit our work if we should falter, in even minor matters, in being fair and temperate.

Unfortunately, the nature of these crimes is such that both prosecution and judgment must be by victor nations over vanquished foes. The worldwide scope of the aggressions carried out by these men has left but few real neutrals. Either the victors must judge the vanquished or we must leave the defeated to judge themselves. After the first World War, we learned the futility of the latter course. The former high station of these defendants, the notoriety of their acts, and the adaptability of their conduct to provoke retaliation make it hard to distinguish between the demand for a just and measured retribution, and the unthinking cry for vengeance which arises from the anguish of war. It is our task, so far as humanly possible, to draw the line between the two. We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well. We must summon such detachment and intellectual integrity to our task that this Trial will commend itself to posterity as fulfilling humanity's aspirations to do justice.

At the very outset, let us dispose of the contention that to put these men to trial is to do them an injustice entitling them to some special consideration. These defendants may be hard pressed but they are not ill used. Let us see what alternative they would have to being tried.

More than a majority of these prisoners surrendered to or were tracked down by the forces of the United States. Could they expect us to make American custody a shelter for our enemies against the just wrath of our Allies? Did we spend American lives to capture them only to save them from punishment? Under the principles of the Moscow Declaration, those suspected war criminals who are not to be tried internationally must be turned over to individual governments for trial at the scene of their outrages. Many less responsible and less culpable American-held prisoners have been and will continue to be turned over to other United Nations for local trial. If these defendants should succeed, for any reason, in escaping the condemnation of this Tribunal, or if they obstruct or abort this trial, those who are American-held prisoners will be delivered up to our continental Allies. For these defendants, however, we have set up an International Tribunal and have undertaken the burden of participating in a complicated effort to give them fair and dispassionate hearings. That is the best-known protection to any man with a defense worthy of being heard.

If these men are the first war leaders of a defeated nation to be prosecuted in the name of the law, they are also the first to be given a chance to plead for their lives in the name of the law. Realistically, the Charter of this Tribunal, which gives them a hearing, is also the source of their only hope. It may be that these men of troubled conscience, whose only wish is that the world forget them, do not regard a trial as a favor. But they do have a fair opportunity to defend themselves—a favor which these men, when in power, rarely extended to their fellow countrymen. Despite the fact that public opinion already condemns their acts, we agree that here they must be given a presumption of innocence, and we accept the burden of proving criminal acts and the responsibility of these defendants for their commission.

When I say that we do not ask for convictions unless we prove crime, I do not mean mere technical or incidental transgression of international conventions. We charge guilt on planned and intended conduct that involves moral as well as legal wrong. And we do not mean conduct that is a natural and human, even if illegal, cutting of corners, such as many of us might well have committed had we been in the defendants' positions. It is not because they yielded to the normal frailties of human beings that we accuse them. It is their abnormal and inhuman conduct which brings them to this bar.

We will not ask you to convict these men on the testimony of their foes. There is no count in the Indictment that cannot be proved by books and records. The Germans were always meticulous record keepers, and these defendants had their share of the Teutonic passion for thoroughness in putting things on paper. Nor were they without vanity. They arranged frequently to be photographed in action. We will show you their own films. You will see their own conduct and hear their own voices as these defendants re-enact for you, from the screen, some of the events in the course of the conspiracy.

We would also make clear that we have no purpose to incriminate the whole German people. We know that the Nazi Party was not put in power by a majority of the German vote. We know it came to power by an evil alliance between the most extreme of the Nazi revolutionists, the most unrestrained of the German reactionaries, and the most aggressive of the German militarists. If the German populace had willingly accepted the Nazi program, no Storm-troopers would have been needed in the early days of the Party and there would have been no need for concentration camps or the Gestapo, both of which institutions were inaugurated as soon as the Nazis gained control of the German State. Only after these lawless innovations proved successful at home were they taken abroad.

The German people should know by now that the people of the United States hold them in no fear, and in no hate. It is true that the Germans have taught us the horrors of modern warfare, but the ruin that lies from the Rhine to the Danube shows that we, like our Allies, have not been dull pupils. If we are not awed by German fortitude and proficiency in war, and if we are not persuaded of their political maturity, we do respect their skill in the arts of peace, their technical competence, and the sober, industrious, and self-disciplined character of the masses of the German people. In 1933 we saw the German people recovering prestige in the commercial, industrial, and artistic world after the set-back of the last war. We beheld their progress neither with envy nor malice. The Nazi regime interrupted this advance. The recoil of the Nazi aggression has left Germany in ruins. The Nazi readiness to pledge the German word without hesitation and to break it without shame has fastened upon German diplomacy a reputation for duplicity that will handicap it for years. Nazi arrogance has made the boast of the "master race" a taunt that will be thrown at Germans the world over for generations. The Nazi nightmare has given the German name a new and sinister significance throughout the world which will retard Germany a century. The German, no less than the non-German world, has accounts to settle with these defendants.

The fact of the war and the course of the war, which is the central theme of our case, is history. From September 1st, 1939, when the German armies crossed the Polish frontier, until September 1942, when they met epic resistance at Stalingrad, German arms seemed invincible. Denmark and Norway, the Netherlands and France, Belgium and Luxembourg, the Balkans and Africa, Poland and the Baltic States, and parts of Russia, all had been overrun and conquered by swift, powerful, well-aimed blows. That attack on the peace of the world is the crime against international society which brings into international cognizance crimes in its aid and preparation which otherwise might be only internal concerns. It was aggressive war, which the nations of the world had renounced. It was war in violation of treaties, by which the peace of the world was sought to be safe-guarded.

This war did not just happen—it was planned and prepared for over a long period of time and with no small skill and cunning. The world has perhaps never seen such a concentration and stimulation of the energies of any people as that which enabled Germany 20 years after it was defeated, disarmed, and dismembered to come so near carrying out its plan to dominate Europe. Whatever else we may say of those who were the authors of this war, they did achieve a stupendous work in organization, and our first task is to examine the means by which these defendants and their fellow conspirators prepared and incited Germany to go to war.

In general, our case will disclose these defendants all uniting at some time with the Nazi Party in a plan which they well knew could be accomplished only by an outbreak of war in Europe. Their seizure of the German State, their subjugation of the German people, their terrorism and extermination of dissident elements, their planning and waging of war, their calculated and planned ruthlessness in the conduct of warfare, their deliberate and planned criminality toward conquered peoples,—all these are ends for which they acted in concert; and all these are phases of the conspiracy, a conspiracy which reached one goal only to set out for another and more ambitious one. We shall also trace for you the intricate web of organizations which these men formed and utilized to accomplish these ends. We will show how the entire structure of offices and officials was dedicated to the criminal purposes and committed to the use of the criminal methods planned by these defendants and their co-conspirators, many of whom war and suicide have put beyond reach.

* * * * *

No greater mistake could be made than to think of the Nazi Party in terms of the loose organizations which we of the western world call “political parties”. In discipline, structure, and method the Nazi Party was not adapted to the democratic process of persuasion. It was an instrument of conspiracy and of coercion. The Party was not organized to take over power in the German State by winning support of a majority of the German people; it was organized to seize power in defiance of the will of the people.

The Nazi Party, under the “Führerprinzip,” was bound by an iron discipline into a pyramid, with the Führer, Adolf Hitler, at the top and broadening into a numerous Leadership Corps, composed of overlords of a very extensive Party membership at the base. By no means all of those who may have supported the movement in one way or another were actual Party members. The membership took the Party oath which in effect amounted to an abdication of personal intelligence and moral responsibility. This was the oath: “I vow inviolable fidelity to Adolf Hitler; I vow absolute obedience to him and to the leaders he designates for me.” The membership in daily practice followed its leaders with an idolatry and self-surrender more Oriental than Western.

* * * * *

A glance at a chart of the Party organization is enough to show how completely it differed from the political parties we know. It had its own source of law in the Führer and sub-Führer. It had its own courts and its own police. The conspirators set up a government within the Party to exercise outside the law every sanction that any legitimate state could exercise and many that it could not. Its chain of command was military, and its formations were martial in name as well as in function. They were composed of battalions set up to bear arms under military discipline, motorized corps, flying corps, and the infamous “Death Head Corps”, which was not misnamed. The Party had its own secret police, its security units, its intelligence and espionage division, its raiding forces, and its youth forces. It established elaborate administrative mechanisms to identify and liquidate spies and informers, to manage concentration camps, to operate death vans, and to finance the whole movement. Through concentric circles of authority, the Nazi Party, as its leadership later boasted, eventually organized and dominated every phase of German life—but not until they had waged a bitter internal struggle characterized by brutal criminality we charge here. In preparation for this phase of their struggle, they created a Party police system. This became the pattern and the instrument of the police state, which was the first goal in their plan.

* * * * *

On January 30, 1933 Adolf Hitler became Chancellor of the German Republic. An evil combination, represented in the prisoners’ dock by its most eminent survivors, had succeeded in possessing itself of the machinery of the German Government, a facade behind which they thenceforth would operate to make a reality of the war of conquest they so long had plotted. The conspiracy had passed into its second phase.

* * * * *

3. Crimes against the Jews:

The most savage and numerous crimes planned and committed by the Nazis were those against the Jews. Those in Germany in 1933 numbered about 500,000. In the aggregate, they had made for themselves positions which excited envy, and had accumulated properties which excited the avarice of the Nazis. They were few enough to be helpless and numerous enough to be held up as a menace.

Let there be no misunderstanding about the charge of persecuting Jews. What we charge against these defendants is not those arrogances and pretensions which frequently accompany the intermingling of different peoples and which are likely, despite the honest efforts of government, to produce regrettable crimes and convulsions. It is my purpose to show a plan and design, to which all Nazis were fanatically committed, to annihilate all Jewish people. These crimes were organized and promoted by the Party leadership, executed and protected by the Nazi officials, as we shall convince you by written orders of the Secret State Police itself.

The persecution of the Jews was a continuous and deliberate policy. It was a policy directed against other nations as well as against the Jews themselves. Anti-Semitism was promoted to divide and embitter the democratic peoples and to soften their resistance to the Nazi aggression. As Robert Ley declared in Der Angriff on 14 May 1944: "The second German secret weapon is Anti-Semitism because if it is constantly pursued by Germany, it will become a universal problem which all nations will be forced to consider."

Anti-Semitism also has been aptly credited with being a "spearhead of terror." The ghetto was the laboratory for testing repressive measures. Jewish property was the first to be expropriated, but the custom grew and included similar measures against anti-Nazi Germans, Poles, Czechs, Frenchmen, and Belgians. Extermination of the Jews enabled the Nazis to bring a practiced hand to similar measures against Poles, Serbs, and Greeks. The plight of the Jew was a constant threat to opposition or discontent among other elements of Europe's population—pacifists, conservatives, Communists, Catholics, Protestants, Socialists. It was in fact, a threat to every dissenting opinion and to every non-Nazi's life.

The persecution policy against the Jews commenced with nonviolent measures, such as disfranchisement and discriminations against their religion, and the placing of impediments in the way of success in economic life. It moved rapidly to organized mass violence against them, physical isolation in ghettos, deportation, forced labor, mass starvation, and extermination. The Government, the Party formations indicted before you as criminal organizations, the Secret State Police, the Army, private and semi-public associations, and "spontaneous" mobs that were carefully inspired from official sources, were all agencies that were concerned in this persecution. Nor was it directed against individual Jews for personal bad citizenship or unpopularity. The avowed purpose was the destruction of the Jewish people as a whole, as an end in itself, as a measure of preparation for war, and as a discipline of conquered peoples.

The conspiracy or common plan to exterminate the Jew was so methodically and thoroughly pursued, that despite the German defeat and Nazi prostration this Nazi aim largely has succeeded. Only remnants of the European Jewish population remain in Germany, in the countries which Germany occupied, and in those which were her satellites or collaborators. Of the 9,600,000 Jews who lived in Nazi-dominated Europe, 60 percent are authoritatively estimated to have perished. Five million seven hundred thousand Jews are missing from the countries in which they formerly lived, and over 4,500,000 cannot be accounted for by the normal death rate nor by immigration; nor are they included among displaced persons. History does not record a crime ever perpetrated against so many victims or one ever carried out with such calculated cruelty.

You will have difficulty, as I have, to look into the faces of these defendants and believe that in this twentieth century human beings could inflict such sufferings as will be proved here on their own countrymen as well as upon their so-called "inferior" enemies. Particular crimes, and the responsibility of defendants for them, are to be dealt with by the Soviet Government's counsel, when committed in the East, and by counsel for the Republic of France when committed in the West. I advert to them only to show their magnitude as evidence of a purpose and a knowledge common to all defendants, of an official plan rather than of a capricious policy of some individual commander, and to show such a continuity of Jewish persecution from the rise of Nazi conspiracy to its collapse as forbids us to believe that any person could be identified with any part of Nazi action without approving this most conspicuous item in their program.

* * * * *

The most serious of the actions against Jews were outside of any law, but the law itself was employed to some extent. There were the infamous Nuremberg decrees of September 15, 1935 (Reichsgesetzblatt 1935, Part. I, P. 1146). The Jews were segregated into ghettos and put into forced labor; they were expelled from their professions; their property was expropriated; all cultural life, the press, the theater, and schools were prohibited them; and the SD was made responsible for them (212-PS, 069-PS). This was an ominous guardianship. . . .

* * * * *

As the German frontiers were expanded by war, so the campaign against the Jews expanded. The Nazi plan never was limited to extermination in Germany; always it contemplated extinguishing the Jew in Europe and often in the world. In the West, the Jews were killed and their property taken over. But the campaign achieved its zenith of savagery in the East. The eastern Jew has suffered as no people ever suffered. Their sufferings were carefully reported to the Nazi authorities to show faithful adherence to the Nazi design. I shall refer only to enough of the evidence of these to show the extent of the Nazi design for killing Jews.

* * * * *

Determination to destroy the Jews was a binding force which at all times cemented the elements of this conspiracy. On many internal policies there were differences among the defendants. But there is not one of them who has not echoed the rallying cry of nazism: "Deutschland erwache, Juda verrecke!" (Germany awake, Jewry perish!).

* * * * *

Germany became one vast torture chamber. Cries of its victims were heard round the world and brought shudders to civilized people everywhere. I am one who received during this war most atrocity tales with suspicion and scepticism. But the proof here will be so overwhelming that I venture to predict not one word I have spoken will be denied. These defendants will only deny personal responsibility or knowledge.

Under the clutch of the most intricate web of espionage and intrigue that any modern state has endured, and persecution and torture of a kind that has not been visited upon the world in many centuries, the elements of the German population which were both decent and courageous were annihilated. Those which were decent but weak were intimidated. Open resistance, which had never been more than feeble and irresolute, disappeared. But resistance, I am happy to say, always remained, although it was manifest in only such events as the abortive effort to assassinate Hitler on July 20, 1944. With resistance driven underground, the Nazi had the German State in his own hands.

But the Nazis not only silenced discordant voices. They created positive controls as effective as their negative ones. Propaganda organs, on a scale never before known, stimulated the Party and Party formations with a permanent enthusiasm and abandon such as we, democratic people, can work up only for a few days before a general election. They inculcated and practiced the Führerprinzip which centralized control of the Party and of the Party-controlled State over the lives and thought of the German people, who are accustomed to look upon the German State, by whomever controlled, with a mysticism that is incomprehensible to my people.

* * * * *

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON: May it please you Honor, I will now take up the subject of "Crimes in the Conduct of War".

Even the most warlike of peoples have recognized in the name of humanity some limitations on the savagery of warfare. Rules to that end have been embodied in international conventions to which Germany became a party. This code had prescribed certain restraints as to the treatment of belligerents. The enemy was entitled to surrender and to receive quarter and good treatment as a prisoner of war. We will show by German documents that these rights were denied, that prisoners of war were given brutal treatment and often murdered.

* * * * *

Civilized usage and conventions to which Germany was a party had prescribed certain immunities for civilian populations unfortunate enough to dwell in lands overrun by hostile armies. The German occupation forces, controlled or commanded by men on trial before you, committed a long series of outrages against the inhabitants of occupied territory that would be incredible except for captured orders and captured reports which show the fidelity with which those orders were executed.

* * * * *

The Law of the Case:

The end of the war and capture of these prisoners presented the victorious Allies with the question whether there is any legal responsibility on high-ranking men for acts which I have described. Must such wrongs either be ignored or redressed in hot blood? Is there no standard in the law for a deliberate and reasoned judgment on such conduct?

* * * * *

The Charter by which this Tribunal has its being, embodies certain legal concepts which are inseparable from its jurisdiction and which must govern its decision. These, as I have said, also are conditions attached to the grant of any hearing to defendants. The validity of the provisions of the Charter is conclusive upon us all, whether we have accepted the duty of judging or of prosecuting under it, as well as upon the defendants, who can point to no other law which gives them a right to be heard at all. My able and experienced colleagues believe, as do I, that it will contribute to the expedition and clarity of this Trial if I expound briefly the application of the legal philosophy of the Charter to the facts I have recited.

While this declaration of the law by the Charter is final, it may be contended that the prisoners on trial are entitled to have it applied to their conduct only most charitably if at all. It may be said that this is new law, not authoritatively declared at the time they did the acts it condemns, and that this declaration of the law has taken them by surprise.

I cannot, of course, deny that these men are surprised that this is the law; they really are surprised that there is any such thing as law. These defendants did not rely on any law at all. Their program ignored and defied all law.

* * * * *

Any resort to war—to any kind of a war—is a resort to means that are inherently criminal. War inevitably is a course of killings, assaults, deprivations of liberty, and destruction of property. An honestly defensive war is, of course, legal and saves those lawfully conducting it from criminality. But inherently criminal acts cannot be defended by showing that those who committed them were engaged in a war, when war itself is illegal. The very minimum legal consequence of the treaties making aggressive wars illegal is to strip those who incite or wage them of every defense the law ever gave, and to leave war-makers subject to judgment by the usually accepted principles of the law of crimes.

But if it be thought that the Charter, whose declarations concededly bind us all, does contain new law I still do not shrink from demanding its strict application by this Tribunal. The rule of law in the world, flouted by the lawlessness incited by these defendants, had to be restored at the cost to my country of over a million casualties, not to mention those of other nations. I cannot subscribe to the perverted reasoning that society may advance and strengthen the rule of law by the expenditure of morally innocent lives but that progress in the law may never be made at the price of morally guilty lives.

It is true of course, that we have no judicial precedent for the Charter. But international law is more than a scholarly collection of abstract and immutable principles. It is an outgrowth of treaties and agreements between nations and of accepted customs. Yet every custom has its origin in some single act, and every agreement has to be initiated by the action of some state. Unless we are prepared to abandon every principle of growth for international law, we cannot deny that our own day has the right to institute customs and to conclude agreements that will themselves become sources of a newer and strengthened international law. International law is not capable of development by the normal processes of legislation, for there is no continuing international legislative authority. Innovations and revisions in international law are brought about by the action of governments such as those I have cited, designed to meet a change in circumstances. It grows, as did the common law, through decisions reached from time to time in adapting settled principles to new situations. The fact is that when the law evolves by the case method, as did the common law and as international law must do if it is to advance at all, it advances at the expense of those who wrongly guessed the law and learned too late their error. The law, so far as international law can be decreed, had been clearly pronounced when these acts took place. Hence, I am not disturbed by the lack of judicial precedent for the inquiry it is proposed to conduct.

The events I have earlier recited clearly fall within the standards of crimes, set out in the Charter, whose perpetrators this Tribunal is convened to judge and punish fittingly. The standards for War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity are too familiar to need comment.

* * * * *

The Charter recognizes that one who has committed criminal acts may not take refuge in superior orders nor in the doctrine that his crimes were acts of states. These twin principles working together have heretofore resulted in immunity for practically everyone concerned in the really great crimes against peace and mankind. Those in lower ranks were protected against liability by the orders of their superiors. The superiors were protected because their orders were called acts of state. Under the Charter, no defense based on either of these doctrines can be entertained. Modern civilization puts unlimited weapons of destruction in the hands of men. It cannot tolerate so vast an area of legal irresponsibility.

* * * * *

The responsibility of this Tribunal:

To apply the sanctions of the law to those whose conduct is found criminal by the standards I have outlined, is the responsibility committed to this Tribunal. It is the first court ever to undertake the difficult task of overcoming the confusion of many tongues and the conflicting concepts of just procedure among diverse systems of law, so as to reach a common judgment. The tasks of all of us are such as to make heavy demands on patience and good will. Although the need for prompt action has admittedly resulted in imperfect work on the part of the Prosecution, four great nations bring you their hurriedly assembled contributions of evidence. What remains undiscovered we can only guess. We could, with witnesses' testimony, prolong the recitals of crime for years—but to what avail. We shall rest the case when we have offered what seems convincing and adequate proof of the crimes charged without unnecessary cumulation of evidence. We doubt very much whether it will be seriously denied that the crimes I have outlined took place. The effort will undoubtedly be to mitigate or escape personal responsibility.

Among the nations which unite in accusing these defendants the United States is perhaps in a position to be the most dispassionate, for, having sustained the least injury, it is perhaps the least animated by vengeance. Our American cities have not been bombed by day and by night, by humans, and by robots. It is not our temples that had been laid in ruins. Our countrymen have not had their homes destroyed over their heads. The menace of Nazi aggression, except to those in actual service, has seemed less personal and immediate to us than to European peoples. But while the United States is not first in rancor, it is not second in determination that the forces of law and order be made equal to the task of dealing with such international lawlessness as I have recited here.

* * * * *

I am too well aware of the weaknesses of juridical action alone to contend that in itself your decision under this Charter can prevent future wars. Judicial action always comes after the event. Wars are started only on the theory and in the confidence that they can be won. Personal punishment, to be suffered only in the event the war is lost, will probably not be a sufficient deterrent to prevent a war where the warmakers feel the chances of defeat to be negligible.

But the ultimate step in avoiding periodic wars, which are inevitable in a system of international lawlessness, is to make statesmen responsible to law. And let me make clear that while this law is first applied against German aggressors, the law includes, and if it is to serve a useful purpose it must condemn aggression by any other nations, including those which sit here now in judgment. We are able to do away with domestic tyranny and violence and aggression by those in power against the rights of their own people only when we make all men answerable to the law. This trial represents mankind's desperate effort to apply the discipline of the law to statesmen who have used their powers of state to attack the foundations of the world's peace and to commit aggressions against the rights of their neighbors.

The usefulness of this effort to do justice is not to be measured by considering the law or your judgment in isolation. This trial is part of the great effort to make the peace more secure. One step in this direction is the United Nations organization, which may take joint political action to prevent war if possible, and joint military action to insure that any nation which starts a war will lose it. This Charter and this Trial, implementing the Kellogg-Briand Pact, constitute another step in the same direction—juridical action of a kind to ensure that those who start a war will pay for it personally.

While the defendants and the prosecutors stand before you as individuals, it is not the triumph of either group alone that is committed to your judgment. Above all personalities there are anonymous and impersonal forces whose conflict makes up much of human history. It is yours to throw the strength of the law back of either the one or the other of these forces for at least another generation. What are the real forces that are contending before you?

No charity can disguise the fact that the forces which these defendants represent, the forces that would advantage and delight in their acquittal, are the darkest and most sinister forces in society—dictatorship and oppression, malevolence and passion, militarism and lawlessness. By their fruits we best know them. Their acts have bathed the world in blood and set civilization back a century. They have subjected their European neighbors to every outrage and torture, every spoliation and deprivation that insolence, cruelty, and greed could inflict. They have brought the German people to the lowest pitch of wretchedness, from which they can entertain no hope of early deliverance. They have stirred hatreds and incited domestic violence on every continent. These are the things that stand in the dock shoulder to shoulder with these prisoners.

The real complaining party at your bar is Civilization. In all our countries it is still a struggling and imperfect thing. It does not plead that the United States, or any other country, has been blameless of the conditions which made the German people easy victims to the blandishments and intimidations of the Nazi conspirators.

But it points to the dreadful sequence of aggressions and crimes I have recited, it points to the weariness of flesh, the exhaustion of resources, and the destruction of all that was beautiful or useful in so much of the world, and to greater potentialities for destruction in the day to come. It is not necessary among the ruins of this ancient and beautiful city with untold members of its civilian inhabitants still buried in its rubble, to argue the proposition that to start or wage an aggressive war has the moral qualities of the worst of crimes. The refuge of the defendants can be only their hope that international law will lag so far behind the moral sense of mankind that conduct which is crime in the moral sense must be regarded as innocent in law.

Civilization asks whether law is so laggard as to be utterly helpless to deal with crimes of this magnitude by criminals of this order of importance. It does not expect that you can make war impossible. It does expect that your juridical action will put the forces of international law, its precepts, its prohibitions and, most of all, its sanctions, on the side of peace, so that men and women of good will, in all countries, may have “leave to live by no man’s leave, underneath the law.”

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. II, pp. 98–155.

171. NUREMBERG TRIAL: EXCERPT FROM TESTIMONY BY FRANZ VON PAPEN, JUNE 19, 1946

Franz von Papen, who was instrumental in the decision by Paul von Hindenburg to make Adolf Hitler chancellor of Germany, served as Hitler’s vice chancellor when he came to power in 1933. Although Papen was not in Hitler’s inner circle from 1934 to the end of the war, he makes an argument in this document that was and would be made by many Nazis when asked why they went along with what they knew was morally reprehensible. Here this question is asked of him by Sir David Maxwell-Fyfe, deputy prosecutor for the United Kingdom at the International Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals held in Nuremberg, Germany. Papen explains his actions as those of a patriot, one who like many on the Allied side knew what was happening but continued on in whatever task was asked of them in the service of their country. He makes the argument that “even up to the Polish campaign, even the major powers tried, although they knew everything that was going on in Germany, to work with Germany. Why do you wish to reproach a patriotic German with acting likewise . . . ?”

SIR DAVID MAXWELL-FYFE: . . . Why didn’t you after this series of murders which had gone on over a period of 4 years, why didn’t you break with these people and stand up like General Yorck or any other people that you may think of from history, stand up for your own views and oppose these murderers? Why didn’t you do it?

Now you can give your explanation.

VON PAPEN: Very well. You can see that I submitted Von Tschirschsky’s report on these murders to Hitler, in all its details, but what you do not know is the fact that I myself frequently told Hitler that such a regime could not possibly last; and if you ask me, Sir David, why despite everything I remained in the service of the Reich, then I can say only that on 30 June I personally broke off the relations into which we had entered on 30 January. From that day onward I did my duty—my duty to Germany, if you wish to know. I can understand very well, Sir David, that after all the things we know today, after the millions of murders which have taken place, you consider the German people a nation of criminals, and that you cannot understand that this nation has its patriots as well. I did these things in order to serve my country, and I should like to add, Sir David, that up to the time of the Munich Agreement, and even up to the time of the Polish campaign, even the major powers tried, although they knew everything that was going on in Germany, to work with this Germany. Why do you wish to reproach a patriotic German with acting likewise, and with hoping likewise, for the same thing for which all the major powers hoped?

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. XVI, pp. 415–416.

172. NUREMBERG TRIAL: EXCERPTS FROM THE CLOSING STATEMENT OF JUSTICE ROBERT H. JACKSON, JULY 26, 1946

Robert H. Jackson, associate justice of the U. S. Supreme Court and chief counsel for the United States at the International Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals held in Nuremberg, Germany, presented his closing statement on July 26, 1946. He observes that the defendants were given every opportunity to say anything in their own favor. He traces the movement from discriminatory laws that separated Jews from German society, to the camps that had as their only purpose their extermination. He condemns the Nazi regime: "Everything of consequence that took place in this regimented society was but a manifestation of a premeditated and unfolding purpose to secure the Nazi State a place in the sun by casting all others into darkness." On a broader level, Jackson places the twentieth century in historical perspective: "It is common to think of our own time as standing at the apex of civilization, from which the deficiencies of preceding ages may patronizingly be viewed in the light of what is assumed to be 'progress.' The reality is that in the long perspective of history the present century will not hold an admirable position, unless its second half is to redeem its first."

MR. JUSTICE ROBERT H. JACKSON (Chief of Counsel for the United States): Mr. President and Members of the Tribunal: An advocate can be confronted with few more formidable tasks than to select his closing arguments where there is great disparity between his appropriate time and his available material. In 8 months—a short time as state trials go—we have introduced evidence which embraces as vast and varied a panorama of events as has ever been compressed within the framework of a litigation. It is impossible in summation to do more than outline with bold strokes the vitals of this Trial's mad and melancholy record, which will live as the historical text of the twentieth century's shame and depravity.

It is common to think of our own time as standing at the apex of civilization, from which the deficiencies of preceding ages may patronizingly be viewed in the light of what is assumed to be "progress." The reality is that in the long perspective of history the present century will not hold an admirable position, unless its second half is to redeem its first. These two-score years in the twentieth century will be recorded in the book of years as one of the most bloody in all annals. Two World Wars have left a legacy of dead which number more than all the armies engaged in any way that made ancient or medieval history. No half-century ever witnessed slaughter on such a scale, such cruelties and inhumanities, such wholesale deportations of peoples into slavery, such annihilations of minorities. The terror of Torquemada pales before the Nazi Inquisition. These deeds are the overshadowing historical facts by which generations to come will remember this decade. If we cannot eliminate the causes and prevent the repetition of these barbaric events, it is not an irresponsible prophecy to say that this twentieth century may yet succeed in bringing the doom of civilization.

Goaded by these facts, we were moved to redress the blight on the record of our era. The defendants complain that our pace is too fast. In drawing the Charter of this Tribunal, we thought we were recording an accomplished advance in international law. But they say we have outrun our times, that we have anticipated an advance that should be, but has not yet been made. The Agreement of London, whether it originates or merely records, at all events marks a transition in international law which roughly corresponds to that in the evolution of local law when men ceased to punish crime by "hue and cry" and began to let reason and inquiry govern punishment. The society of nations has emerged from the primitive "hue and cry," the law of "catch and kill." It seeks to apply sanctions to enforce international law, but to guide their application by evidence, law, and reason instead of outcry. The defendants denounce the law under which their accounting is asked. Their dislike for the law which condemns them is not original. It has been remarked before that: "No thief e'er felt the halter draw with good opinion of the law."

* * * * *

Of one thing we may be sure. The future will never have to ask, with misgiving, what could the Nazis have said in their favor. History will know that whatever could be said, they were allowed to say. They have been given the kind of a Trial which they, in the days of their pomp and power, never gave to any man.

But fairness is not weakness. The extraordinary fairness of these hearings is an attribute of our strength. The Prosecution's case, at its close, seemed inherently unassailable because it rested so heavily on German documents of unquestioned authenticity. But it was the weeks upon weeks of pecking at this case, by one after another of the defendants, that has demonstrated its true strength. The fact is that the testimony of the defendants has removed any doubt of guilt which, because of the extraordinary nature and magnitude of these crimes, may have existed before they spoke. They have helped write their own judgment of condemnation.

But justice in this case has nothing to do with some of the arguments put forth by the defendants or their counsel. We have not previously and we need not now discuss the merits of all their obscure and tortuous philosophy. We are not trying them for the possession of obnoxious ideas. It is their right, if they choose, to renounce the Hebraic heritage in the civilization of which Germany was once a part. Nor is it our affair that they repudiated the Hellenic influence as well. The intellectual bankruptcy and moral perversion of the Nazi regime might have been no concern of international law had it not been utilized to gosestep the Herrenvolk across international frontiers. It is not their thoughts, it is their overt acts which we charge to be crimes. Their creed and teachings are important only as evidence of motive, purpose, knowledge, and intent.

We charge unlawful aggression but we are not trying the motives, hopes, or frustrations which may have led Germany to resort to aggressive war as an instrument of policy. The law, unlike politics, does not concern itself with the good or evil in the status quo, nor with the merits of the grievances against it. It merely requires that the status quo be not attacked by violent means and that policies be not advanced by war. We may admit that overlapping ethnological and cultural groups, economic barriers, and conflicting national ambitions created in the 1930's, as they will continue to create, grave problems for Germany as well as for the other peoples of Europe. We may admit too that the world had failed to provide political or legal remedies which would be honorable and acceptable alternatives to war. We do not underwrite either the ethics or the wisdom of any country, including my own, in the face of these problems. But we do say that it is now, as it was for sometime prior to 1939, illegal and criminal for Germany or any other nation to redress grievances or seek expansion by resort to aggressive war.

Let me emphasize one cardinal point. The United States has no interest which would be advanced by the conviction of any defendant if we have not proved him guilty on at least one of the Counts charged against him in the Indictment. Any result that the calm and critical judgment of posterity would pronounce unjust would not be a victory for any of the countries associated in this Prosecution. But in summation we now have before us the tested evidences of criminality and have heard the flimsy excuses and paltry evasions of the defendants. The suspended judgment with which we opened this case is no longer appropriate. The time has come for final judgment and if the case I present seems hard and uncompromising, it is because the evidence makes it so.

* * * * *

The Nazi movement will be of evil memory in history because of its persecution of the Jews, the most far-flung and terrible racial persecution of all time. Although the Nazi Party neither invented nor monopolized anti-Semitism, its leaders from the very beginning embraced it, incited it, and exploited it. They used it as "the psychological spark that ignites the mob." After the seizure of power, it became an official state policy. The persecution began in a series of discriminatory laws eliminating the Jews from the civil service, the professions, and economic life. As it became more intense it included segregation of Jews in ghettos, and exile. Riots were organized by Party leaders to loot Jewish business places and to burn synagogues. Jewish property was confiscated and a collective fine of a billion marks was imposed upon German Jewry. The program progressed in fury and irresponsibility to the "final solution." This consisted of sending all Jews who were fit to work to concentration camps as slave laborers, and all who were not fit, which included children under 12 and people over 50, as well as any others judged unfit by an SS doctor, to concentration camps for extermination (2605-PS).

Adolf Eichmann, the sinister figure who had charge of the extermination program, has estimated that the anti-Jewish activities resulted in the killing of 6 million Jews. Of these, 4 million were killed in extermination institutions, and 2 million were killed by Einsatzgruppen, mobile units of the Security Police and SD which pursued Jews in the ghettos and in their homes and slaughtered them by gas wagons, by mass shooting in antitank ditches and by every device which Nazi ingenuity could conceive. So thorough and uncompromising was this program that the Jews of Europe as a race no longer exist, thus fulfilling the diabolic "prophecy" of Adolf Hitler at the beginning of the war (2738-PS).

* * * * *

The dominant fact which stands out from all the thousands of pages of the record of this Trial is that the central crime of the whole group of Nazi crimes—the attack on the peace of the world—was clearly and deliberately planned. The beginning of these wars of aggression was not an unprepared and spontaneous springing to arms by a population excited by some current indignation.

* * * * *

Nor were the war crimes and the crimes against humanity unplanned, isolated, or spontaneous offenses. Aside from our undeniable evidence of their plotting, it is sufficient to ask whether 6 million people could be separated from the population of several nations on the basis of their blood and birth, could be destroyed and their bodies disposed of, except that the operation fitted into the general scheme of government. Could the enslavement of 5 millions of laborers, their impressment into service, their transportation to Germany, their allocation to work where they would be most useful, their maintenance, if slow starvation can be called maintenance, and their guarding have been accomplished if it did not fit into the common plan? Could hundreds of concentration camps located throughout Germany, built to accommodate hundreds of thousands of victims, and each requiring labor and materials for construction, manpower to operate and supervise, and close gearing into the economy—could such efforts have been expended under German autocracy if they had not suited the plan? Has the Teutonic passion for organization suddenly become famous for its toleration of nonconforming activity? Each part of the plan fitted into every other. The slave-labor program meshed with the needs of industry and agriculture, and these in turn synchronized with the military machine. The elaborate propaganda apparatus geared with the program to dominate the people and incite them to a war their sons would have to fight. The armament industries were fed by the concentration camps. The concentration camps were fed by the Gestapo. The Gestapo was fed by the spy system of the Nazi Party. Nothing was permitted under the Nazi iron rule that was not in accordance with the program. Everything of consequence that took place in this regimented society was but a manifestation of a premeditated and unfolding purpose to secure the Nazi State a place in the sun by casting all others into darkness.

* * * * *

In opening this case I ventured to predict that there would be no serious denial that the crimes charged were committed, and that the issue would concern the responsibility of particular defendants. The defendants have fulfilled that prophecy. Generally, they do not deny that these things happened, but it is contended that they “just happened,” and that they were not the result of a common plan or conspiracy.

One of the chief reasons the defendants say there was no conspiracy is the argument that conspiracy was impossible with a dictator. The argument runs that they all had to obey Hitler’s orders, which had the force of law in the German State, and hence obedience could not be made the basis of an original charge. In this way it is explained that while there have been wholesale killings, there have been no murderers.

This argument is an effort to evade Article 8 of the Charter, which provides that the order of the Government or of a superior shall not free a defendant from responsibility but can only be considered in mitigation.

* * * * *

. . . the defendants are almost unanimous in one defense. The refrain is heard time and again: These men were without authority, without knowledge, without influence, without importance. Funk summed up the general self-abasement of the dock in his plaintive lament that: “I always, so to speak, came up to the door, but I was not permitted to enter.”

In the testimony of each defendant, at some point there was reached the familiar blank wall: Nobody knew anything about what was going on. Time after time we have heard the chorus from the dock: “I only heard about these things here for the first time.”

These men saw no evil, spoke none, and none was uttered in their presence. This claim might sound very plausible if made by one defendant. But when we put all their stories together, the impression which emerges of the Third Reich, which was to last a thousand years, is ludicrous.

* * * * *

The chief villain on whom blame is placed—some of the defendants vie with each other in producing appropriate epithets—is Hitler. He is the man at whom nearly every defendant has pointed an accusing finger.

I shall not dissent from this consensus, nor do I deny that all these dead and missing men shared the guilt. In crimes so reprehensible that degrees of guilt have lost their significance they may have played the most evil parts. But their guilt cannot exculpate the defendants. Hitler did not carry all responsibility to the grave with him. All the guilt is not wrapped in Himmler's shroud. It was these dead men whom these living chose to be their partners in this great conspiratorial brotherhood, and the crimes that they did together they must pay for one by one.

* * * * *

But let me for a moment turn devil's advocate. I admit that Hitler was the chief villain. But for the defendants to put all blame on him is neither manly nor true. We know that even the head of the state has the same limits to his senses and to the hours of his days as do lesser men. He must rely on others to be his eyes and ears as to most that goes on in a great empire. Other legs must run his errands; other hands must execute his plans. On whom did Hitler rely for such things more than upon these men in the dock?

* * * * *

It is against such a background that these defendants now ask this Tribunal to say that they are not guilty of planning, executing, or conspiring to commit this long list of crimes and wrongs. They stand before the record of this Trial as bloodstained Gloucester stood by the body of his slain king. He begged of the widow, as they beg of you: "Say I slew them not." And the Queen replied, "Then say they were not slain. But dead they are . . ." If you were to say of these men that they are not guilty, it would be as true to say that there has been no war, there are no slain, there has been no crime.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. XIX, pp. 397–432.

173. NUREMBERG TRIAL: EXCERPTS FROM JUDGMENT, "THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS," SEPTEMBER 30–OCTOBER 1, 1946

The judgment that was handed down at the International Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals, held in Nuremberg, Germany, included a section on the persecution of the Jews. The judgment begins that section with "The persecution of the Jews at the hands of the Nazi Government has been proved in the greatest detail before the Tribunal. It is a record of consistent and systematic inhumanity on the greatest scale." After noting the early treatment of the Jews, the judgment continues: "The Nazi persecution of Jews in Germany before the war, severe and repressive as it was, cannot compare, however, with the policy pursued during the war in the occupied territories." That policy was called the Final Solution: the extermination of the Jews. Einsatzgruppen killings were not enough. Extermination camps were created and became all too efficient in their work. The judgment describes the selection made at the camps of who would go immediately to their death and who would die more slowly through the oppression of slave labor. It speaks of the medical experiments conducted on the Jews, their deaths in the gas chambers, and the total number of Jews killed by the Nazis.

Persecution of the Jews

The persecution of the Jews at the hands of the Nazi Government has been proved in the greatest detail before the Tribunal. It is a record of consistent and systematic inhumanity on the greatest scale. Ohlendorf, Chief of Amt III in the RSHA from 1939 to 1943, and, who was in command of one of the Einsatz groups in the campaign against the Soviet Union testified as to the methods employed in the extermination of the Jews. He said that he employed firing squads to shoot the victims in order to lessen the sense of individual guilt on the part of his men; and the 90,000 men, women, and children who were murdered in one year by his particular group were mostly Jews.

When the witness Bach Zelewski was asked how Ohlendorf could admit the murder of 90,000 people, he replied: "I am of the opinion that when, for years, for decades, the doctrine is preached that the Slav race is an inferior race, and Jews not even human, then such an outcome is inevitable."

* * * * *

The anti-Jewish policy was formulated in Point 4 of the Party Program which declared "Only a member of the race can be a citizen. A member of the race can only be one who is of German blood, without consideration of creed. Consequently, no Jew can be a member of the race." Other points of the program declared that Jews should be treated as foreigners, that they should not be permitted to hold public office, that they should be expelled from the Reich if it were impossible to nourish the entire population of the State, that they should be denied any further immigration into Germany, and that they should be prohibited from publishing German newspapers. The Nazi Party preached these doctrines throughout its history. Der Stürmer and other publications were allowed to disseminate hatred of the Jews, and in the speeches and public declarations of the Nazi leaders, the Jews were held up to public ridicule and contempt.

With the seizure of power, the persecution of the Jews was intensified. A series of discriminatory laws was passed, which limited the offices and professions permitted to Jews; and restrictions were placed on their family life and their rights of citizenship. By the autumn of 1938, the Nazi policy towards the Jews had reached the stage where it was directed towards the complete exclusion of Jews from German life. Pogroms were organized, which included the burning and demolishing of synagogues, the looting of Jewish businesses, and the arrest of prominent Jewish business men. A collective fine of 1 billion marks was imposed on the Jews, the seizure of Jewish assets was authorized, and the movement of Jews was restricted by regulations to certain specified districts and hours. The creation of ghettos was carried out on an extensive scale, and by an order of the Security Police Jews were compelled to wear a yellow star to be worn on the breast and back.

* * * * *

The Nazi persecution of Jews in Germany before the war, severe and repressive as it was, cannot compare, however, with the policy pursued during the war in the occupied territories. Originally the policy was similar to that which had been in force inside Germany. Jews were required to register, were forced to live in ghettos, to wear the yellow star, and were used as slave laborers. In the summer of 1941, however, plans were made for the “final solution” of the Jewish question in Europe. This “final solution” meant the extermination of the Jews, which early in 1939 Hitler had threatened would be one of the consequences of an outbreak of war, and a special section in the Gestapo under Adolf Eichmann, as head of Section B 4 of the Gestapo, was formed to carry out the policy.

The plan for exterminating the Jews was developed shortly after the attack on the Soviet Union. Einsatzgruppen of the Security Police and SD, formed for the purpose of breaking the resistance of the population of the areas lying behind the German armies in the East, were given the duty of exterminating the Jews in those areas. The effectiveness of the work of the Einsatzgruppen is shown by the fact that in February 1942 Heydrich was able to report that Estonia had already been cleared of Jews and that in Riga the number of Jews had been reduced from 29,500 to 2,500. Altogether the Einsatzgruppen operating in the occupied Baltic States killed over 135,000 Jews in three months.

Nor did these special units operate completely independently of the German Armed Forces. There is clear evidence that leaders of the Einsatzgruppen obtained the co-operation of Army commanders.

* * * * *

. . . Part of the “final Solution” was the gathering of Jews from all German-occupied Europe in concentration camps. Their physical condition was the test of life or death. All who were fit to work were used as slave laborers in the concentration camps; all who were not fit to work were destroyed in gas chambers and their bodies burnt. Certain concentration camps such as Treblinka and Auschwitz were set aside for this main purpose. With regard to Auschwitz, the Tribunal heard the evidence of Höss, the commandant of the camp from 1 May 1940 to 1 December 1943. He estimated that in the camp of Auschwitz alone in that time 2,500,000 persons were exterminated, and that a further 500,000 died from disease and starvation. Höss described the screening for extermination by stating in evidence:

“We had two SS doctors on duty at Auschwitz to examine the incoming transports of prisoners. The prisoners would be marched by one of the doctors who would make spot decisions as they walked by. Those who were fit for work were sent into the camp. Others were sent immediately to the extermination plants. Children of tender years were invariably exterminated since by reason of their youth they were unable to work. Still another improvement we made over Treblinka was that at Treblinka the victims almost always knew that they were to be exterminated and at Auschwitz we endeavored to fool the victims into thinking that they were to go through a delousing process. Of course, frequently they realized our true intentions and we sometimes had riots and difficulties due to that fact. Very frequently women would hide their children under their clothes, but of course ‘when we found them- we would’ send the children in to be exterminated.”

He described the actual killing by stating:

“It took from three to fifteen minutes to kill the people in the death chamber, depending upon climatic conditions. We knew when the people were dead because their screaming stopped. We usually waited about one half-hour before we opened the doors and removed the bodies. After the bodies were removed our special commandos took off the rings and extracted the gold from the teeth of the corpses.”

Beating, starvation, torture, and killing were general. The inmates were subjected to cruel experiments at Dachau in August 1942, victims were immersed in cold water until their body temperature was reduced to 28° Centigrade, when they died immediately. Other experiments included high altitude experiments in pressure chambers, experiments to determine how long human beings could survive in freezing water, experiments with poison bullets, experiments with contagious diseases, and experiments dealing with sterilization of men and women by X-rays and other methods.

Evidence was given of the treatment of the inmates before and after their extermination. There was testimony that the hair of women victims was cut off before they were killed, and shipped to Germany, there to be used in the manufacture of mattresses. The clothes, money, and valuables of the inmates were also salvaged and sent to the appropriate agencies for disposition. After the extermination the gold teeth and fillings were taken from the heads of the corpses and sent to the Reichsbank.

After cremation the ashes were used for fertilizer, and in some instances attempts were made to utilize the fat from the bodies of the victims in the commercial manufacture of soap. Special groups traveled through Europe to find Jews and subject them to the “final solution”. German missions were sent to such satellite countries as Hungary and Bulgaria, to arrange for the shipment of Jews to extermination camps and it is known that by the end of 1944, 400,000 Jews from Hungary had been murdered at Auschwitz. Evidence has also been given of the evacuation of 110,000 Jews from part of Rumania for “liquidation”. Adolf Eichmann, who had been put in charge of this program by Hitler, has estimated that the policy pursued resulted in the killing of 6 million Jews, of which 4 million were killed in the extermination institutions.

Source: Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Blue Series, vol. I, pp. 247–253.

174. FROM “THE JUSTICE CASE”: DIRECT EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT [DR. FRANZ] SCHLEGELBERGER

Franz Schlegelberger was the Reich justice minister. In this document he is being examined by his defense lawyer in the so-called Judges’ Trial (more formally, The United States of America v. Josef Altstötter, et al.). It was among 12 trials held in Nuremberg, all conducted by the United States, subsequent to the Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals. Schlegelberger strongly argued that he tried as best he could under the circumstances to be fair to Jews in judicial proceedings, and he positions himself in this part of his testimony as undertaking unpopular positions (i.e., positions in support of the Jews) at great personal risk. Despite his efforts, Schlegelberger was convicted of war crimes and crimes against humanity on the grounds of “instituting and supporting procedures for the wholesale persecution of Jews and Poles.” He was sentenced to life in prison in 1947 but was released in 1950 due to ill health.

DIRECT EXAMINATION

* * * * *

DR. KUBUSCHOK (counsel for defendant Schlegelberger): Since the Jewish question is of particular importance for several points in the indictment, I would ask you first of all to tell us what your personal attitude to the Jewish question was.

DEFENDANTSCHLEGELBERGER: As far as I am concerned, there is and there was no Jewish question. This is my attitude: all races were created by God. It is arrogant for one race to place itself above another race and try to have that race exterminated. If a state deems it necessary to defend itself against being inundated and does so within the frame of a social problem, then it can and must be done by applying normal, decent means.

During the Goebbels campaign in 1938 I was abroad. When I heard about those events I said to my family: “We must be ashamed of being Germans.” That was my view at that time and that is my view today. The only person with whom I am united in faithful friendship until today because we went to school together is a full Jew. I succeeded in saving his life all through that era. He again holds his former office as a judge. My physician too is half-Jewish. That attitude of mine naturally meant that on many occasions I was faced with inner conflicts. I ask you to consider that the Jewish problem was regarded as the central problem of the National Socialist State and the entire life in Germany was to be placed in line with that. Concerning that question Hitler and his followers worked in an entirely uncompromising manner; that an expert administrator could not bypass that basic attitude is a matter of fact. I shall have an opportunity to demonstrate what my personal attitude was toward those questions and how it always evidenced itself in an effort to put a check on the wishes of party policy, to make improvements and to exercise as far as possible a moderating influence on the practical application of those matters.

Q. What were the manifestations of your attitude to the Jewish question in your office?

A. The prosecution charges me with having cooperated in taking measures against the Jews. That the ordinance of 4 December 1941 against Jews in the eastern territories must be evaluated under particular points of view, I shall show in connection with the Polish question. For the rest, I ask you to consider that in view of the strength of the powers with which I was engaged in a struggle, a hundred percent victory of the Ministry of Justice was entirely out of the question. In that sphere, too, faithful to my basic attitude, I did work to make justice prevail; but frequently I had to content myself with making a compromise and I had to be pleased when at least I had achieved some amelioration. To use a customary phrase, if I had drawn the consequences from every defeat, I would have deprived myself of all possibility to aid the Jews. Quite apart from the fact that the resignation from office, before the war would have been a factual impossibility, and during the war a legal impossibility until a new minister was appointed.

With the permission of the Tribunal I will prove how difficult it was by citing an example. When the Party started a campaign against Jewish lawyers, I went to see Hitler and told him that it was untenable to remove from their profession Jewish lawyers among whom research people of repute were included, and with whom I myself had worked. I was pleased when I succeeded in persuading Hitler that that was correct and in achieving his agreement that he would reject the wishes of the Party. To inform the agencies concerned, I called a meeting of Ministers of Justice of the Laender who were still in office in those days and informed them about Hitler's decision. The result was surprising. I encountered bitter resistance, and the meeting bore no result. Hitler asked for Guertner to come to see him and asked him for information as to whether I was not perhaps a Jew myself. Then the Party began to exercise pressure on Hitler. He abandoned his decision, and the Jewish lawyers were removed from office. So as to make it possible at least for the Jews to preserve their rights, I proposed to set up the institute of the so-called Jewish consultants where former lawyers worked as consultants.

As to my own attitude toward these problems, that I could show properly only where I, myself, had to make the decisions. In this connection, I attach importance to the fact in saying here that nothing is more removed from me than here to play the part of the friend of the Jews. I am not a friend of the Jews; I am not a friend of the Aryans as such; but I am a friend of justice. And anybody who saw me at work and wishes to give a just opinion can confirm that with regard to all those who in my opinion were unjustly persecuted; no matter what their race or what their class, I tried to help them with all my strength.

Roosevelt, the former President of the United States of America, in 1944, in an address to the United Nations said, "Hitler asserts that he had committed the crimes against the Jews in the name of the German people. May every German show that his own heart is free of such crimes by protecting the persecuted with all his might." I can claim for myself that I acted accordingly. Concerning the members of the Ministry who were not fully Aryan, I kept them in office; and as has been established at this trial concerning judges who were not fully Aryan, I left large numbers of them in their offices irrespective of the Party purge. I looked after those who had been dismissed from their posts, and who were non-Aryans, and who had Jewish relatives. As far as possible, I protected them against being driven out of their homes and being deported.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 717-719.

175. EXCERPTS FROM THE CROSS-EXAMINATION OF DEFENSE WITNESS [HERMANN] JAHREISS, JUNE 24/25, 1947

Professor Hermann Jahrreiss, who was associate defense counsel for Alfred Jodl at the Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals in Nuremberg, Germany, is here serving as an expert defense witness on a number of legal issues at the so-called Judges' Trial (more formally The United States of America v. Josef Altstötter, et al.). It was among 12 trials held in Nuremberg, all conducted by the United States, subsequent to the Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals. Jahrreiss, in response to questioning by Charles M. LaFollette, U.S. deputy chief of counsel, observes that the crimes committed by the Nazis did not have "anything to do anymore with legal considerations," because they exceeded "normal conditions." When questioned by the presiding judge of the trial, James T. Brand, Jahrreiss agreed with the judge's statement that "judges [in Nazi Germany] were obliged to obey the law of their State of Germany even though in doing so they violated a principle of international law." Further, he stated that he "never heard that a German court did not apply a Reich law because in the opinion of the court it was contrary to international law."

Expert Opinion by Defense Witness Professor [Hermann] Jahrreiss concerning the Development of German Law

Cross Examination [by Charles M. LaFollette, United States Deputy Chief of Counsel; [editor's note]

MR. LAFOLLETTE: * * * I do want to ask you, Dr. Jahrreiss, a hypothetical question. You may not agree with the hypothesis which I hypothesize or the implications perhaps inherent in them, but just for my own purpose and for orderly procedure I ask you to consider my question and answer it on the basis of the facts which I hypothesize, purely. Let us assume that I was subject to the complete power of an individual we will call "A" to force me to obey his orders implicitly; and, under those circumstances, I saw "A" procuring a strong rope, strong enough to bind a man completely and securely. Secondly, that I saw him preparing a strong wooden frame upon the ground, with iron rings through which he could pass the rope; and, so placed, that they could bind the legs and arms of a man securely. Third—a wooden block so shaped that a man's neck could be placed on it with his head extended beyond it. And four, that I saw this man "A" sharpening an axe large enough and strong enough to cut through the neck of a man. And suppose at this same time I also saw, standing always in view, from one to six men, each of whom I know that this man "A" has a violent hatred for and has threatened to kill; and each of whom I know that this man "A" has the power to capture if he chooses. Now then, let us assume that this man "A" captures one or more of these men that he hates, and that I know he hates; and binds this man with the rope that I saw him prepare, upon the frame that I saw him build; and places his neck on the block that I saw him prepare; and that then "A" hands me the axe which I saw him sharpen and orders me to cut off the head of this captured, bound man. Would you say that under those circumstances I would be guilty or not guilty of killing the man whose head I severed at the direct order of "A" who had the full power to order me to do so.

DR. JAHREISS: I understand it this way—that guilty or not guilty is to be considered as guilt under criminal laws.

Q. On the assumed facts, yes.

A. I just want to ask you a question. Do you mean it as a legal question or as a question of morality?

Q. As a question of law.

A. Of law, yes. And according to what criminal law, and in what state?

Q. You can name the state; I don't care.

A. Well, is that supposed to be a question in Utopia?

Q. Let's put it in Germany.

A. In Germany?

Q. In Germany, yes, after 1933.

A. Yes, all right. Here then, we would be faced with terrible problems with which all of us since last year have been torturing ourselves so terribly, and I confess that in spite of having thought about it a great deal, that I have not yet found my way out of the dilemma into which we have been brought. Perhaps I can answer this hypothetical question by saying, by stating first, the points of view which in a conflicting manner make the answer more difficult. Perhaps first of all I should say, so that this should be clear, Mr. Prosecutor, how I, myself would behave.—I don't know. No matter how horrible the whole thing is, I don't believe that I—well, the Charter of the International Military Tribunal anticipates that an appeal to higher orders should not be admissible. It is not my task to criticize those regulations. However, perhaps I may be allowed to say that this regulation, if it should really be valid law in any state whatsoever, would have very dangerous consequences for order in general. One of the four judges of the IMT, the French judge, Donnedieu De Vabres, in a lecture which he gave this last April expressly stated that this regulation brings with it many difficulties for the idea of the discipline imposed by the state. I have the text of his lecture here. It is a lecture which Professor Donnedieu De Vabres gave before the Association des etudes, Internationales Criminologiques. May I quote a short passage from it? May I read it in French?

THE INTERPRETER: Yes, you may.

WITNESS JAHREISS: "Since the statute was interpreted this way under the rules imposed by the IMT, it has in a sense of individualism gone beyond regulations of international law and domestic law, this regulation is open to the objection that it will endanger the necessary discipline for the preservation of the state. Such a regulation can be applied in the future only with prudence and circumspection.” I am quoting this here only in order to demonstrate that if any rules exist at all, a certain harshness is absolutely necessary, unavoidably necessary. I always told my young students who started out on a study of law that they would have to devote themselves to perhaps the most bitter fact in life of man, and that is the rule, because by nature man hates the rulership, at least if he is subjected to it, but if this is the case every state basically has to require that its laws are executed, even if the person concerned, for moral or religious reasons, or other reasons, is of a different opinion. On the other hand, Mr. LaFollette, every state knows that there is some limitation somewhere. For example, the German Reich had a military penal law. In it there was the quoted article 47. In the jurisdiction of the Reich court, however, this paragraph was applied more and more in a restricting sense because discipline had to be above all.

Now, Mr. Prosecutor, before the IMT, I, in the expert opinion which I gave, which you were kind enough to quote here, stated expressly and emphatically, I believe, what the limit of humaneness or humanity is, but at the same time I pointed out that this limit is frequently not sharply drawn; and I believe, and this comes closer to your question, that perhaps after all the problem with which we are concerned here cannot quite be done justice to, if a case is described quite as drastic as you just said.

Last year during the first 4 months of the trial I experienced it, and those were the most difficult times of my entire life. I experienced and saw what terrible things happened under Hitler’s regime, and I have no way to express my horror and to describe this sufficiently in any language, but I believe that you will agree with me if I say that those are occurrences which are outside of legal discussion entirely, for, Mr. Prosecutor, even about injustice one can, if one is exact, speak with legal reasons only in cases where—excuse me—the injustice is within normal limits.

I myself was a criminal judge. One single murder frequently, in the court of assize, occupied our time for 2 to 3 weeks, and it was a terrible thing. Two murders by one person—that was horrifying. If someone had eight to ten murders on his conscience, then he was described as a mass murderer in the press of Europe, and people asked themselves whether this was something that could be handled by means of the penal code at all.

When, last year, in the courtroom of the big trial I listened to the witness, Hoess, of Auschwitz, when he answered the question of the prosecutor as to how many people he had killed, if I remember correctly, he answered he didn’t remember exactly whether two and a half or three million. At that time it was quite obvious to me that neither positively nor negatively this had anything to do anymore with legal considerations because, Mr. Prosecutor, no matter what a state regulates concerning the question of review of a law the state has to think of normal conditions. These occurrences and matters cannot be measured by any order of the world at all. Therefore, I believe that these things that happened in Germany behind a complicated system of secrecy, a system of mutual delimitation, and if then one adds the pressure of conscience of millions of people who felt themselves hemmed in between patriotism and hatred of the system, then the question which you put to me attains a very bitter human weight, and I can only say I don’t know any way out.

* * * * *

PRESIDING JUDGE BRAND: In order to better understand your views which you have ably expressed, I would like to ask you a few questions. I understand your view to be that judges were obliged to obey the law of their State of Germany even though in doing so they violated a principle of international law. That is a fair brief statement, is it not, of the matter?

WITNESS JAHRRRIESS: Yes. During the Weimar republic this was already uncontestedly applicable, and with the permission of the Tribunal, I read the commentary of Anschuetz to article 102.

Q. And you would apply the same principle after 1933, would you not?

A. After 1933? There was much less the question whether this was different than before.

Q. What court or tribunal ordinarily enforced the rule that judges must obey the law of their State under such circumstances? I assume the answer is obvious.

A. Excuse me. I didn’t understand your question, sir.

Q. What tribunal ordinarily enforced against the judges or upon the judges this obligation to obey the law of the State even though they in doing so, violated international law?

A. I never heard that a court violated this principle so that there was no need to force the judges to conform to it. Mr. President, I never heard that a German court did not apply a Reich law because in the opinion of the court it was contrary to international law. I never heard of such a case.

You see, it was entirely uncontested. The court, just in such a case, couldn't do anything but through official channels call the attention of the government to this contradiction so that the government, in accordance with its obligation under international law, would see to it that the laws were changed. Let us assume the case that the Reich Supreme Court, for example, in deciding a case had come to the conclusion that a German Reich law was contrary to an obligation of the Reich under international law. Then the Reich Supreme Court was not able to say—the indictment is refused because the Reich law which supports the indictment is contrary to international law. The Reich Supreme Court could do nothing but either to postpone the trial and to report to the government so that perhaps changes would be made in time, but it was not even obliged to do that. It was obliged only if it did make a decision to decide in accordance with national law if it was contrary to the international law. That was the legal situation during the Weimar republic.

Q. That answers my question. * * * The Reich Supreme Court would in proper cases lay down the rule that the lower court judge should enforce the German law even though it violated some principle of international law for which Germany as a state might be diplomatically held responsible, is that true?

A. No, that is not quite correct. I said that the Reich Supreme Court, just the same as the other German courts, in regard to this question, did not have any doubts at all, and therefore, it did not make any rules with which the lower courts had to comply. That was not necessary at all.

Q. Then the lower courts themselves recognized this rule of which you speak that they must enforce the law of the State even though it violates a principle of international law?

A. Yes, and they only had to look at the Anschuetz commentary; that said so expressly.

Q. Well, at least prior to 1918, was there any tribunal other than the court of the state which could punish the public officer or a judge, for making a decision which was contrary to international law, if it was made in compliance with the law of the state?

A. No.

Q. If the principle enunciated among other bodies by the first tribunal, the IMT Tribunal, namely, the principle of the penal responsibility of an individual officer for violations of international law, should be applied, then you have, do you not, a modification of your principle which you have stated with reference to the necessity that judges must obey the law of the state. In other words, if that principle of penal responsibility of the individual has become a part of international law, then the anomalous situation would arise where the officer, perhaps the judge, may have been required by his state law to make a decision, but may, nevertheless, be responsible if any tribunal has jurisdiction to try him, for a decision contrary to international law. Isn't that true?

A. If I understood your question correctly, Your Honor, the general validity of the principles of the charter as international law could, in regard to judges of those states which require that their officials apply the law of the state as the final will, bring about tragic conflicts of conscience, for which, in my opinion, there is no indubitable legal solution at all. But, Mr. President, I do not know whether I quite understand your question correctly.

Q. I do not think I will attempt to repeat it further. I understood your position. It is true, is it not, that there was no tribunal in Germany, perhaps anywhere else, which had statutory jurisdiction to apply international law in a penal proceeding against a public officer of the state who had complied with the state law?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Then, if there were a tribunal that had jurisdiction to apply that law, might it not perhaps, arrive at a different decision, legally, from the decision which this court of the state itself, would arrive at; might not an international tribunal, having jurisdiction to pass upon the question, arrive at a different answer as to criminality of an individual officer who had violated international law, but had not violated the law of the state?

A. Yes, that would be so, but, Mr. President, if I may say so, that is the very thing which I call the tragic situation of the official concerned.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. III, pp. 279–284.

176. NUREMBERG CODE, AUGUST 19, 1947

The Nuremberg Code is an internationally applied convention of medical ethics that controls medical experimentation. The code was the result of the so-called Doctors' Trial (more formally The United States of America v. Karl Brandt, et al.). It was among 12 trials held in Nuremberg, all conducted by the United States, subsequent to the Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals. Twenty-three defendants—most of them medical doctors—were charged with Nazi human experimentation, euthanasia, and mass murder. A set of six principles to govern future medical experimentation was drawn up during the trial by Dr. Leo Alexander, an American physician who was an adviser to the prosecution. The judges of the trial added four principles to the list and incorporated them into their verdict. The Nuremberg Code has since been adopted by various states and, of international significance, was the basis for the Helsinki Declaration of 1964.

1. The voluntary consent of the human subject is absolutely essential.

This means that the person involved should have legal capacity to give consent; should be so situated as to be able to exercise free power of choice, without the intervention of any element of force, fraud, deceit, duress, over-reaching, or other ulterior form of constraint or coercion; and should have sufficient knowledge and comprehension of the elements of the subject matter involved, as to enable him to make an understanding and enlightened decision. This latter element requires that, before the acceptance of an affirmative decision by the experimental subject, there should be made known to him the nature, duration, and purpose of the experiment; the method and means by which it is to be conducted; all inconveniences and hazards reasonably to be expected; and the effects upon his health or person, which may possibly come from his participation in the experiment.

The duty and responsibility for ascertaining the quality of the consent rests upon each individual who initiates, directs or engages in the experiment. It is a personal duty and responsibility which may not be delegated to another with impunity.

2. The experiment should be such as to yield fruitful results for the good of society, unprocurable by other methods or means of study, and not random and unnecessary in nature.

3. The experiment should be so designed and based on the results of animal experimentation and a knowledge of the natural history of the disease or other problem under study, that the anticipated results will justify the performance of the experiment.

4. The experiment should be so conducted as to avoid all unnecessary physical and mental suffering and injury.

5. No experiment should be conducted, where there is an a priori reason to believe that death or disabling injury will occur; except, perhaps, in those experiments where the experimental physicians also serve as subjects.

6. The degree of risk to be taken should never exceed that determined by the humanitarian importance of the problem to be solved by the experiment.

7. Proper preparations should be made and adequate facilities provided to protect the experimental subject against even remote possibilities of injury, disability, or death.

8. The experiment should be conducted only by scientifically qualified persons. The highest degree of skill and care should be required through all stages of the experiment of those who conduct or engage in the experiment.

9. During the course of the experiment, the human subject should be at liberty to bring the experiment to an end, if he has reached the physical or mental state, where continuation of the experiment seemed to him to be impossible.

10. During the course of the experiment, the scientist in charge must be prepared to terminate the experiment at any stage, if he has probable cause to believe, in the exercise of the good faith, superior skill and careful judgement required of him, that a continuation of the experiment is likely to result in injury, disability, or death to the experimental subject.

Source: Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council No. 10 (Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1946), Green Series, vol. II, pp. 181–182.

177. NUREMBERG PRINCIPLES AND UNITED NATIONS COMMENTARY PER GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 177, NOVEMBER 21, 1947

The Nuremberg Principles are the result of the Military Tribunal Trial of Major War Criminals in Nuremberg, Germany. The United Nations International Law Commission drafted the Nuremberg Principles and made them part of international law in 1946. The document that follows sets forth the seven principles in the context of commentary by the United Nations. For example, Principle I (“Any person who commits an act which constitutes a crime under international law is responsible therefor and liable to punishment”) is immediately followed by commentary regarding the principle’s origins and an analysis of the text. It should be noted that Principle VI defines what is meant by the terms “crimes against peace,” “war crimes,” and “crimes against humanity,” each with its own set of United Nations commentary. The Nuremberg Principles have been incorporated into a number of international treaties and form the basis for criminal tribunals established to prosecute crimes in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, as well as the International Criminal Court.

Part III. FORMULATION OF THE NÜRNBERG PRINCIPLES

95. Under General Assembly resolution 177 (II), paragraph (a), the International Law Commission was directed to “formulate the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal”.

96. In pursuance of this resolution of the General Assembly, the Commission undertook a preliminary consideration of the subject at its first session. In the course of this consideration the question arose as to whether or not the Commission should ascertain to what extent the principles contained in the Charter and judgment constituted principles of international law. The conclusion was that since the Nürnberg principles had been affirmed by the General Assembly, the task entrusted to the Commission by paragraph (a) of resolution 177 (II) was not to express any appreciation of these principles as principles of international law but merely to formulate them. This conclusion was set forth in paragraph 26 of the report of the Commission on its first session, which report was approved by the General Assembly in 1949. Mr. Jean Spiropoulos was appointed special rapporteur to continue the work of the Commission on the subject and to present a report at its second session.

97. At the session under review, Mr. Spiropoulos presented his report (A/CN.4/22) which the Commission considered at its 44th to 49th and 54th meetings. On the basis of this report, the Commission adopted a formulation of the principles of international law which were recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal. The formulation by the Commission, together with comments thereon, is set out below.

PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW RECOGNIZED IN THE CHARTER OF THE NÜRNBERG TRIBUNAL AND IN THE JUDGMENT OF THE TRIBUNAL

PRINCIPLE I

Any person who commits an act which constitutes a crime under international law is responsible therefor and liable to punishment.

98. This principle is based on the first paragraph of article 6 of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal which established the competence of the Tribunal to try and punish persons who, acting in the interests of the European Axis countries, whether as individuals or as members of organizations, committed any of the crimes defined in sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of article 6. The text of the Charter declared punishable only persons “acting in the interests of the European Axis countries” but, as a matter of course, Principle I is now formulated in general terms.

99. The general rule underlying Principle I is that international law may impose duties on individuals directly without any interposition of internal law. The findings of the Tribunal were very definite on the question whether rules of international law may apply to individuals. “That international law imposes duties and liabilities upon individuals as well as upon States”, said the judgment of the Tribunal, “has long been recognized”. It added: “Crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provision of international law be enforced.”

PRINCIPLE II

The fact that internal law does not impose a penalty for an act which constitutes a crime under international law does not relieve the person who committed the act from responsibility under international law.

100. This principle is a corollary to Principle I. Once it is admitted that individuals are responsible for crimes under international law, it is obvious that they are not relieved from their international responsibility by the fact that their acts are not held to be crimes under the law of any particular country.

101. The Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal referred, in express terms, to this relation between international and national responsibility only with respect to crimes against humanity. Sub-paragraph (c) of article 6 of the Charter defined as crimes against humanity certain acts “whether or not [committed] in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated”. The Commission has formulated Principle II in general terms.

102. The principle that a person who has committed an international crime is responsible therefor and liable to punishment under international law, independently of the provisions of internal law, implies what is commonly called the “supremacy” of international law over national law. The Tribunal considered that international law can bind individuals even if national law does not direct them to observe the rules of international law, as shown by the following statement of the judgment: “. . . the very essence of the Charter is that individuals have international duties which transcend the national obligations of obedience imposed by the individual State”.

PRINCIPLE III

The fact that a person who committed an act which constitutes a crime under international law acted as Head of State or responsible Government official does not relieve him from responsibility under international law.

103. This principle is based on article 7 of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal. According to the Charter and the judgment, the fact that an individual acted as Head of State or responsible government official did not relieve him from international responsibility. “The principle of international law which, under certain circumstances, protects the representatives of a State”, said the Tribunal, “cannot be applied to acts which are condemned as criminal by international law. The authors of these acts cannot shelter themselves behind their official position in order to be freed from punishment. . . .” The same idea was also expressed in the following passage of the findings: “He who violates the laws of war cannot obtain immunity while acting in pursuance of the authority of the State if the State in authorizing action moves outside its competence under international law.”

104. The last phrase of article 7 of the Charter, “or mitigating punishment”, has not been retained in the formulation of Principle III. The Commission considers that the question of mitigating punishment is a matter for the competent Court to decide.

PRINCIPLE IV

The fact that a person acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him from responsibility under international law, provided a moral choice was in fact possible to him.

105. This text is based on the principle contained in article 8 of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal as interpreted in the judgment. The idea expressed in Principle IV is that superior orders are not a defence provided a moral choice was possible to the accused. In conformity with this conception, the Tribunal rejected the argument of the defence that there could not be any responsibility since most of the defendants acted under the orders of Hitler. The Tribunal declared: “The provisions of this article [article 8] are in conformity with the law of all nations. That a soldier was ordered to kill or torture in violation of the international law of war has never been recognized as a defence to such acts of brutality, though, as the Charter here provides, the order may be urged in mitigation of the punishment. The true test, which is found in varying degrees in the criminal law of most nations, is not the existence of the order, but whether moral choice was in fact possible.”

106. The last phrase of article 8 of the Charter “but may be considered in mitigation of punishment, if the Tribunal determines that justice so requires”, has not been retained for the reason stated under Principle III, in paragraph 104 above.

PRINCIPLE V

Any person charged with a crime under international law has the right to a fair trial on the facts and law.

107. The principle that a defendant charged with a crime under international law must have the right to a fair trial was expressly recognized and carefully developed by the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal. The Charter contained a chapter entitled: “Fair Trial for Defendants”, which for the purpose of ensuring such fair trial provided the following procedure:

- “a. The indictment shall include full particulars specifying in detail the charges against the defendants. A copy of the indictment and of all the documents lodged with the indictment, translated into a language which he understands, shall be furnished to the defendant at a reasonable time before the trial.
- “b. During any preliminary examination or trial of a defendant he shall have the right to give any explanation relevant to the charges made against him.
- “c. A preliminary examination of a defendant and his trial shall be conducted in, or translated into, a language which the defendant understands.
- “d. A defendant shall have the right to conduct his own defence before the Tribunal or to have the assistance of counsel.
- “e. A defendant shall have the right through himself or through his counsel to present evidence at the trial in support of his defence, and to cross-examine any witness called by the prosecution.”

108. The right to a fair trial was also referred to in the judgment itself. The Tribunal said in this respect: “With regard to the constitution of the Court all that the defendants are entitled to ask is to receive a fair trial on the facts and law.”

109. In the view of the Commission, the expression “fair trial” should be understood in the light of the above-quoted provisions of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal.

PRINCIPLE VI

The crimes hereinafter set out are punishable as crimes under international law:

a. Crimes against peace:

(i) Planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a war of aggression or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances;

(ii) Participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the acts mentioned under (i).

110. Both categories of crimes are characterized by the fact that they are connected with “war of aggression or war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances”.

111. The Tribunal made a general statement to the effect that its Charter was “the expression of international law existing at the time of its creation”. It, in particular, refuted the argument of the defence that aggressive war was not an international crime. For this refutation the Tribunal relied primarily on the General Treaty for the Renunciation of War of 27 August 1928 (Kellogg-Briand Pact) which in 1939 was in force between sixty-three States. “The nations who signed the Pact or adhered to it unconditionally”, said the Tribunal, “condemned recourse to war for the future as an instrument of policy, and expressly renounced it. After the signing of the Pact, any nation resorting to war as an instrument of national policy breaks the Pact. In the opinion of the Tribunal, the solemn renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy necessarily involves the proposition that such a war is illegal in international law; and that those who planned and waged such a war, with its inevitable and terrible consequences, are committing a crime in so doing. War for the solution of international controversies undertaken as an instrument of national policy certainly includes a war of aggression, and such a war is therefore outlawed by the Pact”

112. In support of its interpretation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, the Tribunal cited some other international instruments which condemned war of aggression as an international crime. The draft of a Treaty of Mutual Assistance sponsored by the League of Nations in 1923 declared, in its article 1, “that aggressive war is an international crime”. The Preamble to the League of Nations Protocol for the Pacific Settlement of International disputes (Geneva Protocol), of 1924, “recognizing the solidarity of the members of the International Community”, stated that “a war of aggression constitutes a violation of this solidarity, and is an international crime”, and that the contracting parties were “desirous of facilitating the complete application of the system provided in the Covenant of the League of Nations for the pacific settlement of disputes between the States and of ensuring the repression of international crimes”. The declaration concerning wars of aggression adopted on 24 September 1927 by the Assembly of the League of Nations declared, in its preamble, that war was an “international crime”. The resolution unanimously adopted on 18 February 1928 by twenty-one American Republics at the Sixth (Havana) International Conference of American States, provided that “war of aggression constitutes an international crime against the human species”.

113. The Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal did not contain any definition of “war of aggression”, nor was there any such definition in the judgment of the Tribunal. It was by reviewing the historical events before and during the war that it found that certain of the defendants planned and waged aggressive wars against twelve nations and were therefore guilty of a series of crimes.

114. According to the Tribunal, this made it unnecessary to discuss the subject in further detail, or to consider at any length the extent to which these aggressive wars were also “wars in violation of international treaties, agreements, or assurances”.

115. The term “assurances” is understood by the Commission as including any pledge or guarantee of peace given by a State, even unilaterally.

116. The terms “planning” and “preparation” of a war of aggression were considered by the Tribunal as comprising all the stages in the bringing about of a war of aggression from the planning to the actual initiation of the war. In view of that, the Tribunal did not make any clear distinction between planning and preparation. As stated in the judgment, “planning and preparation are essential to the making of war”.

117. The meaning of the expression “waging of a war of aggression” was discussed in the Commission during the consideration of the definition of “crimes against peace”. Some members of the Commission feared that everyone in uniform who fought in a war of aggression might be charged with the “waging” of such a war. The Commission understands the expression to refer only to high-ranking military personnel and high State officials, and believes that this was also the view of the Tribunal.

118. A legal notion of the Charter to which the defence objected was the one concerning “conspiracy”. The Tribunal recognized that “conspiracy is not defined in the Charter”. However, it stated the meaning of the term, though only in a restricted way. “But in the opinion of the Tribunal”, it was said in the judgment, “the conspiracy must be clearly outlined in its criminal purpose. It must not be too far removed from the time of decision and of action. The planning, to be criminal, must not rest merely on the declarations of a party programme such as are found in the twenty-five points of the Nazi Party, announced in 1920, or the political affirmations expressed in Mein Kampf in later years. The Tribunal must examine whether a concrete plan to wage war existed, and determine the participants in that concrete plan”.

b. War crimes:

Violations of the laws or customs of war which include, but are not limited to, murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave-labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war, of persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns, or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity.

119. The Tribunal emphasized that before the last war the crimes defined by article 6 (b) of its Charter were already recognized as crimes under international law. The Tribunal stated that such crimes were covered by specific provisions of the Regulations annexed to The Hague Convention of 1907 respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and of the Geneva Convention of 1929 on the Treatment of Prisoners of War. After enumerating the said provisions, the Tribunal stated: “That violation of these provisions constituted crimes for which the guilty individuals were punishable is too well settled to admit or argument.”

c. Crimes against humanity:

Murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhuman acts done against any civilian population, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds, when such acts are done or such persecutions are carried on in execution of or in connexion with any crime against peace or any war crime.

120. Article 6 (c) of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal distinguished two categories of punishable acts, to wit: first, murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhuman acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, and second, persecution on political, racial or religious grounds. Acts within these categories, according to the Charter, constituted international crimes only when committed “in execution of or in connexion with any crimes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal”. The crimes referred to as falling within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal were crimes against peace and war crimes.

121. Though it found that “political opponents were murdered in Germany before the war, and that many of them were kept in concentration camps in circumstances of great horror and cruelty”, that “the policy of persecution, repression and murder of civilians in Germany before the war of 1939, who were likely to be hostile to the Government, was most ruthlessly carried out”, and that “the persecution of Jews during the same period is established beyond all doubt”, the Tribunal considered that it had not been satisfactorily proved that before the outbreak of war these acts had been committed in execution of, or in connexion with, any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. For this reason the Tribunal declared itself unable to “make a general declaration that the acts before 1939 were crimes against humanity within the meaning of the Charter”.

122. The Tribunal did not, however, thereby exclude the possibility that crimes against humanity might be committed also before a war.

123. In its definition of crimes against humanity the Commission has omitted the phrase “before or during the war” contained in article 6 (c) of the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal because this phrase referred to a particular war, the war of 1939. The omission of the phrase does not mean that the Commission considers that crimes against humanity can be committed only during a war. On the contrary, the Commission is of the opinion that such crimes may take place also before a war in connexion with crimes against peace.

124. In accordance with article 6 (c) of the Charter, the above formulation characterizes as crimes against humanity murder, extermination, enslavement, etc., committed against “any” civilian population. This means that these acts may be crimes against humanity even if they are committed by the perpetrator against his own population.

PRINCIPLE VII

Complicity in the commission of a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity as set forth in Principle VI is a crime under international law.

125. The only provision in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal regarding responsibility for complicity was that of the last paragraph of article 6 which reads as follows: “Leaders, organizers, instigators and accomplices participating in the formulation or execution of a common plan or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing crimes are responsible for all acts performed by any persons in execution of such a plan.”

126. The Tribunal, commenting on this provision in connexion with its discussion of count one of the indictment, which charged certain defendants with conspiracy to commit aggressive war, war crimes and crimes against humanity, said that, in its opinion, the provision did not “add a new and separate crime to those already listed”. In the view of the Tribunal, the provision was designed to “establish the responsibility of persons participating in a common plan” to prepare, initiate and wage aggressive war. Interpreted literally, this statement would seem to imply that the complicity rule did not apply to crimes perpetrated by individual action.

127. On the other hand, the Tribunal convicted several of the defendants of war crimes and crimes against humanity because they gave orders resulting in atrocious and criminal acts which they did not commit themselves. In practice, therefore, the Tribunal seems to have applied general principles of criminal law regarding complicity. This view is corroborated by expressions used by the Tribunal in assessing the guilt of particular defendants.

Source: “Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, with Commentaries,” United Nations, http://legal.un.org/ilc/texts/instruments/english/commentaries/7_1_1950.pdf. Copyright (c) 1950 United Nations. Reprinted by permission of the United Nations.

Index

Page numbers in bold indicate main entries in the text.

- A Crime without a Name, 11–12
Ralph Lemkin and, 11
Winston Churchill and, 11
- Abetz, Otto, 12–13
marriage, 12
reinstated as ambassador to Paris, 13
- Abdel-Nasser, Gamal, 20
- Abrahams, Harold, 485
- Abrams, Judy, 771–773
- Ackerman, Diane, 737
- Action Française, 13–14
Benito Mussolini and, 13
Charles Maurras and, 13–14
Dreyfus affair and, 13
- Actions to Eliminate Jews from Reich Territory, 551
- Administration of Penal Justice Against Poles and Jews in the Incorporated Eastern Territories, 1118–1120
- After Auschwitz*, 557, 640
- Age of Triage: Fear and Hope in an Overcrowded World, The*, 557
- Ajzner, Hania, 773–776
- Akershus Castle, 522
- Aktion, 14–15
definition of, 14
14f13, 466
purpose, 15
Reinhard, 15, 470, 649–650, 719
T-4 Euthanasia Program, 4, 97–100, 234–235, 268, 303, 384, 718, 1183–1189, 1205–1207
- Aktion Reinhard, 15
Belzec and, 15
Final Solution and, 15, 470, 649–650, 719
Poland and, 15
Sobiór and, 15
Treblinka and, 15
- Aktion T-4 Euthanasia Program, 4, 97–100, 234–235, 268, 303, 384, 718
administration and procedures of the program, 1187–1189
Bishop Clemens August Graf von Galen’s sermon on, 1205–1207
Adolf Hitler’s authorization to “euthanize” the incurably ill, 1186 note describing the method of selection for euthanasia,
1186–1187
“Permitting the Destruction of Life Unworthy,” 1183–1186
- Albania, 15–16
Besa, 16
Italian occupation, 15–16
Jews in, 15–16
- Albert II, 435
- Alexander, Jane, 550
- Algemeene-SS Vlaanderen (Germanic SS in Flanders), 33
- Algeria, 16–18
Jews in, 16–17
- Al-Husseini, Haj Amain, 18–20
chemical attack on Tel-Aviv, 20 meeting with Adolf Hitler, 19

- pilgrimage to Mecca, 18
 World War I, 18
 Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece, 20–21 marriage to Prince Andrew of Greece, 20 move to Athens, 20–21
 World War II, 21
All Quiet on the Western Front, 402
Alldeutsches Tagblatt, 579
 Altenburg, Günther, 566
Alternatives to Hitler: German Resistance Under the Third Reich, 437
 Altman, Kitia, 776–782
 Altman, Tova (Tosia), 22–23, 739
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and, 22–23
 Aly, Götz, 288
 Amateur Athletic Union of the United States, 485
 American Academy of Arts and Letters, 713
 American Friends Service Committee, 173
 American Jewish Committee (AJC), 150
 American Jewish Congress, 34
 American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 150, 173
 American Jews living in Germany and reporting of Jewish Property, 1096–1097
 American League for Defense of Jewish Rights, 34
 American Olympic Committee, 485
 American Righteous Gentiles, 36
 American Unitarian Association, 588–589
 Amorim, Vincente, 254
Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Biography, 637
 Andorfer, Herbert, 235
 Andorra, 435
 Andre, Joseph, 23
 after the war, 23
 smuggling network, 23
 Anger, Per, 631
 Anglo-Palestine Bank, 273
 Anielewicz, Mordecai, 24–25
 escape from Warsaw, 24
 Jewish Fighting Organization, 24–25
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 22, 24, 329, 699
 Anne Frank House, 25–27
 establishment of, 27
 Frank family, 25–27
 location, 25
 Anschluss, 27–28, 100, 104–105, 133, 294, 386, 549, 579, 591, 631
 Austrians and, 28
 Adolf Hitler and, 27–28
 Nazi Party and, 27–28
 Antman, Fred, 782–783
 Anti-Comintern Pact, 320, 606
 Anti-Jewish Congress, 209
 Anti-Jewish League, 33
 Antisemitism, 28–32
 cultural, 29–30 political, 30–31 racial, 31–32 religious, 29
 Antonescu, Ion, 32–33, 319–320, 510, 547–548, 723
 birth, 32
 deposed, 32
 Jewish Question and, 32
 Antwerp Pogrom, 33–34
 Antwerp population and, 34
 Aryanization of property, 33
 Nazi occupation of Antwerp, 33–34
 Apfelbaum, Dawid M., 333
 April Boycott, 34–35
 exceptions, 35
 organization of, 34–35
Approaches to Auschwitz, 557
 Arab Revolt, 621
Arbeit Macht Frei, 35–36
 definition, 35
 location, 36
 use of, 35–36
 Ardeatine Massacre, 512
 Arendt, Hannah, 36–37
 banality of evil, 36–37, 57–58, 183–184, 228
 birth, 36
 on Adolf Eichmann, 36–37, 57–58, 183–184, 228
 Aristotle University, 566
 Arkin, Alan, 497
 Armée Juive, 37–38
 false papers, 38
 French uprising and, 38
 members, 37–38
 Armenian genocide, 38–39, 701–702, 713
 Armenians, Adolf Hitler statement, 38–39 genocide and, 38–39
 Turkey and, 39
 Armstrong, Jonas, 550
 Arouch, Salamo, 39, 653
 Auschwitz and, 39
 Arrow Cross, 3, 39–41, 53, 564, 632, 724
 Budapest ghetto and, 41
 deportation of Hungarian Jews and, 40–41
 Hungarian government and, 40
 Social Darwinism and, 40
 Art and the Holocaust, 41–43
 Holocaust survivors and, 43

- prisoners and, 42
 propaganda and, 41–43
- Aryan, 43, 209, 404, 574 master race and, 43 word origin, 43
- Aryan Paragraph, 44, 250, 662
 definition, 44
 Reich Church and, 59, 92
 restrictions on Jews, 44
- Aryanism, 44–47
 Christianity and, 45
 Adolf Hitler and, 44–45
 propaganda and, 45
- Aryanization, 33, 47–48, 136
 Bible and, 639–640
 book burning and, 457–459
 Conference on “the Jewish Question,” 1165–1177
 Jewish property and, 135–137, 170, 211–212, 530 names, 454
 Protestant churches and, 59, 62
- Asocials, 48–49, 174 arrests and, 48–49
 definition of, 48
- Associaiton des Juifs de Belgique* (AJB), 131
- Atlantic Monthly*, 228
- Au Revoir les Enfants*, 109
- Auerbacher, Inge, 124
- Aufbau*, 36
- Auerbach, Rachel, 542
- Auschwitz, 19, 36, 49–51, 67, 102, 104, 107, 109, 131, 171, 215, 230, 234, 276, 318, 454, 553, 556–558, 565, 604, 653, 674, 681, 738, 743, 1157–1158
 I, 49, 51, 440
 II (Birkenau), 49, 51, 84–86, 134, 151, 175–176, 234, 440, 508, 565, 603
 III (Monowitz), 49, 439–440, 1275–1277 affidavit regarding exterminations at, 1287–1289 affidavit regarding treatment of prisoners at 1281–1284 films made in, 454, 469, 592
 I.G. Farben and, 315–316, 439–440, 1281–1284, 1320–1321 letter regarding construction of buildings, including crematoria, 1285–1286
 liberation, 51, 318
 medical experiments at, 429–431, 434 music at, 449, 549–550
 slave labor, 315–316, 439–440, 597, 1281–1284, 1320–1321
 survivor testimony, 827–831, 841–844, 859–861, 867–869, 880–883, 891–892, 937–942, 944–948, 972–974, 1038–1041 telegram on transporting Jews from ghettos to, 1286–1287
 Vrba-Wetzler Report on, 1289–1306
 War Refugee Board estimation of prisoners gassed at, 1284
- The Auschwitz Album*, 51–52
 contents, 51–52
 photographer, 52
- Auschwitz Protocols, 52–53, 1289–1306
 definition, 52
 distribution of, 53
 testimony, 52–53
- Australia, 481–482
- Austria, 53–54
 annexation by Germany, 27–28, 53–54, 100, 104–105, 133, 294, 386, 549, 579, 591, 631
 death marches, 153–154
 Frankfort Auschwitz Trial, 220–222
 Nazi Party, 27
 World War II and, 54
- Avengers, the, 372
- Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress*, 11
- Babi Yar Massacre, 55–56
 Operation Aktion 1005 and, 56
 Soviet Jews and, 55–56
- Badoglio, Pietro, 257–258
- Baeck, Leo, 56–57
 Kristallnacht and, 57
 teaching career, 56
 World War I and,
- Baeck, Samuel, 56
- Banality of Evil, 57–58
Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, 57–58
 Hannah Arendt and, 57–58
- Banality of Goodness, The* (La banalità del bene), 498
- Barbarossa Decree, 460
- Barbie, Klaus, 58–59, 176, 648–649 escape to Bolivia, 58–59 in the Netherlands, 58
- Barclay, Henry, 783–787
- Barmen Declaration, 59–60, 62, 92
 Catholicism and, 60
 Confessing Church and, 59
 Adolf Hitler and, 59
- Bartali, Gino, 60–61
 as a courier for the Resistance, 60–61
 Florence’s Jews and, 60–61
- Barth, Karl, 61–62
 Barmen Declaration and, 62
 Reich Church and, 61–62
 rejection of Aryanized Christianity, 62
- Barzilai, Elias, 148
- Bas, Maurice, 109

1400 Index

- Battel, Albert, 62–63
 arrest, 62–63
 at Przemseyl, 62–63
 death, 63
- Battle of Otranto, 304
- Battle of Solferino, 317
- Battle of Satlingrad, 421
- Bauer, Armin, 358
- Bauer, Bruno, 335
- Bauer, Yehuda, 63–64
 Encyclopaedia of the Holocaust, 63
 Holocaust and Genocide Studies, 63
 “intentionalist” v. “functionalist” debate, 64
- Baum, Herbert, 65–66
 arrest, 66
 death, 66
 German resistance, 65–66
 press and, 66
 Siemens network, 65
- Baum, Marianne, 65–66
- Baumhardt, Ernst, 274
- BBC, 485
- Beatrix (Netherlands), 683
- Beck, Gad, 66–67
 Chug Chaluzi, membership in, 67
 homosexuality and, 66–67
 Mischlinge status, 66,
 youth, 66
- Beck, Margot, 66
- Becker, August, 1266–1267
- Becker, Kurt, 357
- Becker-Freyseng, Hermann, 67–68
 death, 68
 medical experiments, 67–68
 Operation Paperclip, 68
 trial, 68
- Bedeau camp, 17
- Beer Hall Putsch, 180, 256, 284, 705
- Beitz, Berthold, 68–69
 death, 69
 employment of Jewish workers, 68–69
 Royal Dutch Shell Oil Company, employment at, 68
- Beker, Bronia, 787–789
- Belarus, 69–70
 occupation of, 69–70,
 survivor testimony, 999–1001
- Belev, Alexander, 107
- Belgium, 33–34, 70
 neutrality, 70
 occupation of, 33–34, 70, 130–131, 742, 897–899, 923–925, 932–935, 957–960
 survivor testimony, 897–899, 923–925, 932–935, 957–960
- Bellenger, Frederick, 421
- Belzec, 68, 70–71, 134, 151, 234, 304, 508, 650 forced labor camps, 70–71
 survivor testimony, 718–719
- Benedict XVI, 234, 505, 564
- Ben-Gurion, David, 173
- Benigni, Roberto, 403
- Benno and the Night of Broken Glass*, 124
- Bergen-Belsen, 16, 71–72, 214–215, 419
 brutalization at, 71–72 cannibalism at, 71
 Joseph Kramer and, 71–72
 survivor testimony, 863–864, 871–872, 927–932
- Berger, Gottlub, 1220
- Berglind, Nils, 471
- Bergson Group, 72–73
 “To the 5,000,000 Jews in the Nazi Death Camps Bermuda was a Cruel Mockery,” 1342–1344
- Berkman, Donald (Chipkin), 789–791
- Berlin Court of Appeals, 571
- Berlin Diary: The Journal of a Foreign Correspondent, 1934–1941*
- Berlin International Film Festival, 423
- Berlin Jewish Hospital, 73–75
 Fabrikaktion and, 75
 founding, 73
 The Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, 74
- Berlinski, Dawid, 333
- Bermuda Conference, 75–76
 “To the 5,000,000 in the Nazi Death Camps Bermuda was a Cruel Mockery,” 1342–1344
- Bernadotte, Folke, 467
- Bernard, Tristan, 176
- Berner, Friedrich, 274
- Bernovits, Vilma, 564
- Bertelsmann, Carl, 177
- Bertram, Adolf Cardinal, 402
- Beskidian Oil Company, 68
- Best, Werner, 76–78, 177 appointments in Hessen, 76
 arrest, 77–78
 education, 76
 SS and, 77
- Bestic, Alan, 681
- Betar Zionist Youth Movement, 332, 333, 371
- Bettelheim, Bruno, 78 critics, 78
 incarceration, 78 move to the United States, 78
- Bevin, Ernest, 421

- Bialek, Maurizio, 95
- Białystok Ghetto, 79
survivor testimony, 826–827
- Biberstein, Ernst, 1251–1252
- Biddle, Francis, 391
- Biebow, Hans, 79–80
- Bielecki, Jerzy, 80–81
Christian Association of Auschwitz Families, 81
Escape from Auschwitz, 80–81
- Bielski, Asael, 81
- Bielski, Alexander “Zus,” 81
- Bielski, Aron, 81
- Bielski, Tuvia, 81, 83
- Bielski Partisans, 81–83
Resistance activities, 81–83
survivor testimony, 864–865
- Bilecki, Julian, 83
family, 83
refugees and, 83
trip to New York, 83
- Binding, Karl, 404
- Bingham, Harry, 83–84
birth, 84
obtaining passports for Jews, 84
U.S. Foreign Service and, 84
U.S. State Department and, 84
- Binnenlandse Strykrachten* (Forces of the Interior), 465
- Birgy, Rolande, 128
- Birkenau, 49, 51, 84–86, 134, 151, 175–176, 234, 321, 410, 508, 565
films made in, 454, 469, 592
Sonderkommando, 603
survivor testimonies, 867–869, 1038–1041
War Refugee Board estimation of prisoners gassed at, 1284
- Birkett, Norman, 391
- Black Book of Poland, The*, 1207–1210
- Blaha, Franz, 1260–1264
- Blake, Martin, 717
- Blobel, Paul, 55–56
affidavit regarding Sonderkommando activities, 1250–1251
- Bloch, Ferdinand (Felix), 271
- Bloch, Marc, 86–87
birth, 86
Franc-Tireur movement and, 87
teaching and, 86–87
Union Generale des Israelites de France (UGIF) and, 86
- Blohm & Voss shipyard, 383–384
- Blome, Kurt, 87–88
arrest and, 88
medical experiments, 87–88
- Blood and Soil, 88, 676 ideology of, 88
Lebensraum and, 88
- “Blood for Goods,” 7, 88–89
Allies and, 89
Adolf Eichmann and, 88–89, 662
Hungarian Aid and Rescue Committee and, 89
- Blood Libel, 89–90
definition of, 89–90 historical references, 89–90 modern usage of, 90
- Blokzijl, Max, 466
- Blum, Léon, 176
- Blum, Philipp, 274
- Blum, René, 176
- B’nai B’rith Order, 56
- Böekel, Otto, 335
- Boer War, 423
- Bogaard, Aagje, 91
- Bogaard, Hannes, 91
- Bogaard, Johannes, 90–91
family, 91
imprisonment, 91
occupation of Netherlands and, 90–91 rescue network, 90–91
- Bogaard, Metje, 91
- Bogaard, Pieter, 91
- Bogaard, Willem, 91
- Bohr, Niels, 618
- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 91–93
Confessing Church and, 91–93
execution, 93
imprisonment, 92–93
plot to kill Adolf Hitler, 92–93 writings, 92–93
- Borenstein, Henry, 791–792
- Börgermoor, 716
- Boris III, 107–108
- Borkowska, Anna, 93, 371
Catholic Church and, 93
supply runs, 93
- Bormann, Martin, 94, 256, 553, 702
“Administration of Justice Against Poles, Russians, Jews, and Gypsies,” 1337–1338
“Criminal Procedures Against Poles and Members of the Eastern People,” 1338–1339
- Born, Friedrich, 498
- Bornstein, Max, 792–794
- Borowska, Chyena, 371
- Borrisow, 1234–1237
- Borromeo, Giovanni, 94–95
after the War, 95

1402 Index

- Fatebenefratelli hospital and, 95
Nazis and, 95
partisan activities, 95
- Boryslaw, 68
- Bosnian War, 713
- Boss, Hugo, 96–97
death, 96
Nazi uniforms and, 96
World War II and sales, 96
- Bothmann, Hans, 385
- Bousquet, René, 97, 150 deportations, 97
occupation of France, 97
Vichy government and, 97
- Boxheim documents, 76
- Boycott Declaration, 1073–1075
- Boys from Brazil, The*, 715
- Bracher, Karl Dietrich, 288
- Brack, Viktor, 97–98
describing administration and procedures of the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program, 1187–1189
proposal regarding sterilization of Jews, 1267–1268
- Brand, Joel, 98–99, 356
Hungarian Jews and, 98–99 meeting with Adolf Eichmann, 98 trip to Palestine, 98–99
Zionism and, 98–99
- Brandt, Karl, 99–100
Doctors' Trial and, 100
T-4 Euthanasia Program, 99–100
- Braschi, Nicoletta, 403
- Bratislava Working Group, 210
- Braun, Eva, 290, 722
- Bresler, Shmuer, 739
- Bretholz, Leo, 100–101
Leap into Darkness, 100
marriage, 100
SNCF and, 100–101
- Bricha* (flight), 372
- British Committee for Refugees from Czechoslovakia, 717
- British Relief Service, 173
- British response to the Holocaust, 101–102
Final Solution and, 102
Neville Chamberlain and, 101
Winston Churchill and, 101–102
- British Rhine Army, 422
- Broszat, Martin, 102–103, 230, 288
- Browning, Christopher, 58, 102–104, 230
- Brundage, Avery, 485–486
- Brunner, Alois, 104–105, 176, 211, 527, 565
deportation of Czech Jews, 104
- Drancy internment camp, 104 escape to Middle East, 105
- Buber, Martin, 57, 713
- Buchenwald, 105–107, 133, 174, 215, 429 affidavit of Waldemar Hoven regarding medical experiments at, 1264–1266
liberation, 105–107, 567–568
- Bücher, Heinrich, 36
- Budget and Building Department of the Reichsführer-SS, 507
- Buff, Fred, 794–799
- Buhl, Vilhelm, 126
- Bulgaria, 107–108
arrests, 107–108
Bulgarian Jews saved in World War II, 107–108 protests to occupation, 107–108
- Buna/Monowitz, 49, 439–440, 1275–1277
- Bunel, Lucien-Louis, 108–109
Au Revoir les Enfants, 109
Catholic Church and, 108–109
Jewish children and, 108–109
resistance activities, 109
- Bureaucracy, 109–111, 169
Final Solution and, 109
functionalism and, 110
Hannah Arendt and, 110
National Socialism and, 109–111
- Büro Grüber, 111–112
arrest, 111–112
emigration of Jews, 111–112
Protestantism and, 111–112
Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland and, 111
- Buzlau, 963–965
- Caggiano, Antonio, 526
- Cahn, Ernst, 202
- Calinescu, Armand, 319
- Calmeyer, Hans, 113–114
forgeries, 113–114
invasion of the Netherlands and, 113
Nazi administration and, 113–114
- Camelots du Roi (“Hucksters of the King”), 13
- Canaris, Wilhelm, 680
- Cannes Film Festival, 469
- Carbon monoxide, 234, 303–304, 651–652
- Cargas, Harry James, 114–116, 641
Holocaust Scholars Write to the Vatican, 115 post-Auschwitz Catholicism and, 114–116 Problems Unique to the Holocaust, 115 proposal for Christian-Jewish reconciliation, 115
- Carol (Romania), 319
- Carol II, 32, 319

- Carpathian Oil Company, 68
- Casals, Pablo, 228
- Catherine the Great, 69
- Catholic Church, 114–115, 116–117, 233–234, 648–649, 653–654, 679 concordant with Adolf Hitler, 116
 Holocaust and, 116–117
 Pope Pius XII and, 116–117
- Cayrol, Jean, 469
- CBS radio, 591
- Censor, Maria, 799–802
- Central Committee of the Jews in Poland, 332
- Central National Socialist University, 551
- Central Office for Jewish Emigration, 101, 117–118, 136, 149
 establishment of, 1143–1144
- Central Resettlement Office, 303
- Chagall, Marc, 228
- Chamberlain, Neville, 621
- Champion of the Children: The story of Janusz Korczak*, 124
- Channel Islands, 118–120
 Jewish registry on, 119–120
 Nazi occupation of, 118–120
 patronage of Jews on, 119–120
- Charter of the International Military Tribunal, 9, 410
- Chaplan, Charlie, 258–259, 403
- Chelmno, 120–121, 134, 234, 304, 385, 410, 508, 542 filming in, 592 gassings at, 120–121
 location, 120–121
- Chetwynd, Lionel, 228
- Chicago Tribune*, 591
- Child of the Salon, A*, 368
- Children during the Holocaust, 16, 19, 23, 42, 51, 59, 68, 82, 91, 99, 103–105, 107, 121–123, 128–129, 142–143, 148, 193–194, 209, 216–219, 222, 235–239, 244–245, 261, 266–267, 342, 364–365, 374, 413, 466–467, 490, 515, 532, 555, 629–630, 632, 641, 667, 682, 697, 717, 729
 France and, 109, 149–150, 167–168, 175–176
 Poland and, 78–79, 149–150, 735–737
 survivor testimony, 844–848, 851–859, 889–897, 909–910, 951–953, 957–960, 1002–1004, 1013–1015, 1023–1025, 1026–1029, 1034–1036
- Children of the Streets*, 369
- Children's literature of the Holocaust, 123–125
Daniel's Story, 124
Don't Forget, 124
I Am a Star: Child of the Holocaust, 124
Little Boy Star: An Allegory of the Holocaust, The, 125
One Yellow Daffodil: A Hanukkah Story, 124
Secret Seder, The, 124
Terrible Things: An Allegory of the Holocaust, 125
- China, 523–524, 822–826, 861–863
- Chirac, Jacques, 176, 669
- Christian Science, 679
- Christian Socialist Party of Czechoslovakia, 563
- Christian X, King of Denmark, 125–127
 Adolf Hitler and, 126
 invasion of Denmark, 125–126
 resistance activities, 125–127 yellow star and, 126–127
- Christie, Doug, 682
- Chronology, 745–751
- Chudson, Walter A., 618
- Chug Chaluzi (Clan of Pioneers)*, 67
- Churban*, 127
 definition of, 127
- Churchill, Winston, 11, 101–102, 422, 421
- Claussat, Eugenie, 389
- Clay, Lucius D., 421
- Clinton, Bill, 713
- Clooney, George, 713
- Codreanu, Corneliu Zelea, 318
- Code College, 590
- Coehlo de Sousa, Maria Angelina, 167
- Cohen, Florine, 100
- Cohen, Haimaki, 21
- Cohen, Jacques, 21
- Cohn, Alfred, 128
- Cohn, Grete, 128
- Cohn, Marianne, 128–129
 French-Jewish resistance and, 128–129
 “I Shall Betray Tomorrow,” 128
 rescue of Jewish children, 128–129
- Collaboration, 129–130 cooperation versus, 129
 evaluating, 129
- Comité de Défense des Juifs (Jewish Defense Committee, CDJ), 130–131
 Belgian resistance, 130–131
 Jewish children and, 131
 sabotage activities, 131
- Commentary on German Racial Legislation, 622
- Commissar Order, 459–460, 1228–1230
- Commissariat for Jewish Affairs, 107
- Commission on European Jewish Cultural Reconstruction, 36
- Communists in the Holocaust, 65, 131–132 overlap with resistance groups, 132 partisan groups and, 132
 resistance activities, 131–132
- Comyns-Carr, Arthur, 422
- Concentration camps, 132–135
 Inspectorate of, 134 liberation of, 133

1404 Index

- role of, 133–135
survivor testimony, 778–780, 827–833, 835–837, 871–872, 908–909, 910–913, 927–932, 936–937, 957–960, 963–965, 971–972, 1008–1013, 1029–1031, 1034–1036, 1041–1044
“Wilde–KZ,” 132–133, 716
- Confederation General du Travail, 389
- Conference Minutes on Deportation of Poles, Jews, and Gypsies, 1148–1151
- Confession of Conscience*, 511
- Confessing Church, 51, 59, 62, 92, 147, 268
- Confiscation of Jewish property, 135–137, 170, 211–212
Aryanization, 135–136
Austria and, 136
Bulgaria and, 136
deportations and, 136
- Conspiracy*, 137 awards for, 137
plot, 137
- Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 9
- Cooper, Fanny, 802–804
- Coughlin, Charles, 137–139
Christian Front movement, 137–139
Kristallnacht and, 138
radio show, 138–139
- Courier from Poland: The Story of a Secret State*, 355
- Coward, Charles J., 1281–1284
- Credit Suisse, 139–140
Holocaust and, 140
Swiss monetary system and, 139
World War I and, 139
- Crémieux Decree, 17
- Crimes against humanity, 140–141
case-law precedents and, 140–141 international law and, 140
- Croatia, 141–142, 733
Catholicism and, 141
Independent State of, 141–142 integration into Yugoslavia, 142
- Croome, Bill, 422
- Crown v. Ernst Zündel*, 103
- Czajkowska, Zofia, 549
- Csatary, Lazlo, 142 conviction, 142
war crimes, 142
- “Cum nimis absurdum” papal bull, 1053–1054
- Cunning of History, The*, 557
- Cymbalist, Susie, 804–806
- Czech Skoa Works, 255
- Czechoslovakia, 142–143
occupation of, 591, 598–599, 681–682
survivor testimony, 833–834, 837–839, 869–871, 992–994, 1001–1002, 1021–1023
- Czerniakow, Adam, 143–144, 739
suicide, 144
Warsaw Ghetto, 143–144, 739
- Dachau, 36, 78, 133, 145–147, 213, 402–403, 429, 716 affidavit of Franz Blaha regarding medical experiments and mass murders at, 1260–1264 Priest Block, 512–513 report on the liberation of, 1353–1356
- Dahlem Declaration, 147–148
Confessing Church and, 147
German Protestant Church and, 147–148
Reich Church and, 148
- Dahme, Maud Peper, 806–808
- Daily Herald*, 681
- Dalla Costa, Elia Angelo, 60
- Damaskinos of Athens, Archbishop, 148–149
Greece, Jews in, 148–149
Resistance activities, 148–149
- Dannecker, Theodor, 107, 149–150
deportation of Jews, 149
extremism, 150
Jewish Affairs Department in Paris, 149
- Danova, Ekaterina, 808–811
- Darlan, François, 17
- Darquier, Louis, 97
- Das Wesen des Judentums (The Essence of Judaism)*, 56
- Daudet, Léon, 13
- Dauman, Anatole, 469
- Davenport, Miriam, 228
- David Irving v. Penguin Books and Deborah Lipstadt*, 103
- Dawidowicz, Lucy, S., 102, 150–151, 316
From That Place and Time, 151
The Holocaust and the Historians, 151
The War against the Jews, 150–151
- Dawidowicz, Szymon, 150
- De Bruyker, Susanne, 12
- De Flag (the Flag), 33
- De Galle, Charles, 17, 216–217
- De Haan, Jozeph, 811–815
- Deaglio, Enrico, 498
- Death camps, 151–152, 299, 725
“Counteracting Rumors Regarding Treatment of Jews,” 1216–1217 report by Kurt Gerstein Regarding Extermination Camps, 1306–1311
survivor testimony, 776–778, 859–861, 867–869, 880–883, 891–892, 913–915, 938–942, 944–948, 972–974, 980–983, 1036–1038

- Death marches, 152–153
 survivor testimony, 1031–1034
- Death marches, Austrian, 153–154
 Austrian People's Court, 154
 Reich Defense Line and, 154
 SS and, 154
- Declaration of Atrocities, 1365
- Decree Excluding Jewish Doctors from Practice, 1099–1101
- Decree for the Protection of the People and the State, 1071–1072
- Decree for the Reporting of Jewish Owned Property, 1095–1096
- Decree on Identification of Jewish Men and Women in the General Government, 1112–1113
- Deffaugt, Jean, 128
- Defiance*, 83
- Degesch, 743
- Degrelle, Léon, 154–155
 Catholic Church and, 154–155
 Christus Rex, 154
 Walloon Legion, 154
- Degussa, 155–157
 Jewish staff, 155
 slave labor at, 155–157
 Zyklon-B and, 156–157
- Dehumanization, 157–158
 definition, 157
 purpose of, 157
- Delbo, Charlotte, 158–159
 Auschwitz and, 158
 French Resistance activities, 158
- Denazification, 159–160
 Allies and, 159–160
 American Zone questionnaire, 159–160
 German society, 159–160
- Denial of the Holocaust, 160–162, 170, 682
 Deborah Lipstadt and, 161–162
 Henri Roques and, 161
 Robert Faurisson and, 161
- Denmark, 162–163
 Jews, rescue of Jews from, 162–163
 occupation of, 77, 125–127, 162–163, 177–178
- Denunciation, 163–165
 definition, 163
 Germany and, 164–165
 Nazis and, 164–165
- The Deputy*, 165–166
 Catholic Church in, 165–166 performances, 166
- Der Angriff*, 402
- Der Ewige Jude*, 287
- Der Kampf um Berlin (The Struggle for Berlin)*, 253
- Der Ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew)*, 33
- Der SA-Mann*, 1089–1091
- Der Schrei von Ararat (The Scream from Ararat)*, 701
- Dering, Wladislas, 276
- Der Stürmer*, 166–167, 515, 1182 article on ritual murder, 1129–1130 article on the Hebrew Bible, 1127 regarding Adolf Hitler's promise to free the world of Jews, 1218–1219
 "The Jewish Question and School Instruction," 1091–1093
 "Two Little Talmud Jews," 130
- De Sousa Mendes, Aristides, 167–168 issuance of visas, 167–168 public dishonor, 168
 resistance activities, 167–168
- Der Angriff*, 253
- Desk killers, 169
 Adolf Eichmann and, 169
 definition, 169
- Des Pres, Terrence, 78
- Destruction of the European Jews, The*, 282–284
- Deutsche Bank, 169–170
 founding, 169
 German industrialism and, 169
 Nazis and, 170
- Deutschkron, Inge, 703
- Deutsche Bank Disconto-Gesellschaft*, 169–170
- Diary of a Young Girl, The*, 170 plot summary, 170
 translations, 170
- The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak*, 170–171 ghetto life in, 170–171 hardships detailed in, 170–171
 Nazi-occupied Poland in, 170–171
- Dick, Tommy, 815–817
- Didier, Christian, 97
- Die Ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew)*, 516
- Die Frau im Dritten Reich (The Women in the Third Reich)*, 578
- Die Wiener Walzermädeln (The Waltz Girls of Vienna)*, 549
- Die Vormuntschaftsakte 1935–1958*, 384
- Die Weisse Rose*, 577
- Die Zeit*, 287, 384
- Diebitsch, Karl, 96
- Dieckmann, Christoph, 129
- Dieses Volk: Jüdische Existenz (This People Israel: The Meaning of Jewish Existence)*, 57
- Dietrich, Josef "Sepp," 685
- Dietsche Bond*, 450
- Difesa della Razza*, 320
- Dinur, Yehiel, 171–172
House of Dolls, 171
 pen name, 171

- Salamandra (Sunrise over Hell)*, 171
Shiviti: A Vision, 171
Star of Ashes, 171
Disconto-Gesellschaft, 169
 Displaced persons, 172–173
 definition, 172–173
 report on living conditions and needs of, 1356–1363 Doctors' Trial, 173–174 dates of, 173 defendants, 174
 sentences, 174
 Dolfuss, Engelbert, 27
 Dom Sierot, 369
 Domanski, Marian, 817–819
 Donaldson, Sam, 512
 Donati, Angelo, 424
 Dönitz, Karl, 608, 722
 Donovan, William, 679
 Dorea-Mittelbau, 174–175
 population at, 175 resistance activities at, 175
 slave labor at, 174–175
 Dora-Nordhausen camp. See Dora-Mittelbau
 DP Camps, 172–173
 Draganovic, Krunoslav, 527
 Drancy, 97, 104, 175–177, 527, 565, 674
 Conditions at, 176
 La Cite de la Muette, 175
 location of, 175
 railway transports leaving, 176
 Drefus, Alfred, 13
 Drexler, Anton, 179
 Dreyfus Affair, The, 13
 Drosign, Joachim, 743
 DuBois, Josiah, 1344–1352
 Duckwitz, Georg, 177–178
 Danish resistance movement and, 177–178
 German Foreign Service and, 177–178
 Jews of Denmark and, 177
 Duldig, Ignatz, 62
 Dullenhuser Damm School, 466–467
 Dunkelman, Nathan, 819–822

 Eagleburger, Lawrence, 713
 Ebert, Friedrich, 703
 Ebert, Irmfried, 650
 Ebert, Roger, 593
 Eckart, Johann Dietrich, 179–180
 birth, 179
 Dolchstosslegende, 179
 “genius superman” and, 179
 Nazi ideology and, 179–180
 Eckhardt, Karl August, 1158–1159
 Eckler, Irene, 384
 Eckstein, Ze'ev, 357
Eclaireurs Israelites de France (the Jewish Scouts), 128
 Edelman, Marek, 180–181
 resistance activities, 180–181
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and, 180–181
 Edelsheim-Gyulai, Ilona, 604
 Editorial Law, 1081–1086
 Edmonds, Roddie, 181–182
 Battle of the Bulge, 181 defense of Jewish American soldiers, 181–182
 Ehrlich, Max, 449
 Eichmann, Adolf, 19, 36–37, 57–58, 104, 107, 136, 149–150, 169, 176, 182–183, 211, 254, 272, 303, 356, 469, 527, 565, 633, 715 affidavit regarding estimate of Jews killed during the Holocaust, 1311–1312 Blood for Goods, 7, 88–89, 662
 pseudonym, 184
 trial, 184–185, 637–638, 681–682
Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, 36, 57–58, 183–184
 bureaucracy in, 183–184
 Nazi ideology in, 183–184
 Eichmann trial, 184–185, 637–638, 681–682 charges against Adolf Eichmann, 185 complications with, 184
 witnesses, 185
 Eicke, Theodor, 36, 133, 185–186, 685
 death, 186
 Operation Barbarossa, 185
 SS-Totenkopf, 185
Einsatzgruppen (Special Action Groups), 2, 7, 55, 69, 103, 121–122, 186–187, 234–235, 285, 388, 407, 605, 680 affidavit of Ernst Biberstein regarding Einsatzkommando, 1251–1252 affidavit of Hermann Graebe regarding killings, 1252–1254 affidavit of Paul Blobel regarding Sonderkommando activities, 1250–1251 Egypt, 19
 operational situation reports, 1232–1234, 1240–1241
 reprisal action against Jewish resistance in Belgrade, 1321 testimony of Otto Ohlendorf regarding, 1242–1250
 Einstein, Albert, 618
 Eisele, Walter, 466
 Eisenhower, Dwight D., 1363–1364
 Eisfelder, Horst Peter, 822–826
 Ekstein, Elka, 826–827
 El-Mukhtar, Omar, 257
 Éliás, József, 604

- Emergency Rescue Committee, 227–228
- Enabling Act, 1933, 34, 187–189, 249, 1073
 adoption of, 188–189
 aftermath, 189
 Weimar Constitution and, 188
- Encyclopaedia of the Holocaust*, 63
- Épuration*, 648
- Erlanger, Arnold, 827–831
- Erlich, Hanna Granek, 831–833
- Errázuriz, María, 532
- Ernst, Max, 228
- Escape from Auschwitz: I Cannot Forgive*, 681
- Escape from Sobibor*, 497
- Esterwegen, 716
- Estonia, 189–190, 407
 labor camps in, 189
 occupation of, 189
- Ethnic cleansing, 190–191
 definition of, 190
 Rwanda and, 191
 Soviet Union and, 190
 Yugoslavia and, 191
- Ethiopia, 320
- Eugenics, 4, 9, 191–193, 208–209, 543–544
 Aryan race and, 192
 definition of, 191
 Adolf Hitler and, 191–192
 Nazis and, 191–193
- Eugenic and Population Biological Research Station, 544
- Europa Plan, 210
- Euthanasia program, 4, 97–100, 193–194, 234–235, 268, 273–274, 303–304, 384, 404, 718
 administration and procedures of the program, 1187–1189
 Bishop Clemens August Graf von Galen's sermon on, 1205–1207
 Adolf Hitler's authorization to "ethanize" the incurably ill, 1186
 note describing the method of selection for euthanasia, 1186–1187
 "Permitting the Destruction of Life Unworthy," 1183–1186
- Evian Conference, 6, 194–196
 decisions on Jewish refugees, 1340–1342
- Exodus 1947, 196–197
 British policies regarding, 196–197
 Palestine and, 197
- Eyewitness Auschwitz, 52
- Fabian, Gary, 833–835
- Fabrikaktion, 199–200, 551, 703
 Berlin and, 199–200 context of, 200
 definition, 199
- Facing History and Ourselves, 200
Choosing to Participate: A Critical Examination of Citizenship in American History, 200
Elements of Time: Holocaust Testimonies, 200 Facing History and Ourselves: Holocaust and Human Behavior, 200
 founding, 200
- Fackenheim, Emil, 201, 640–641
God's Presence in History, 201 ordination as rabbi, 201
To Mend the World: Foundations of Future Jewish Thought, 201
- Falco, Roberts, 410
- Farouk, 20
- Fascism, 202, 320–321
 definition, 202
 goal, 202
- Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatsie (United Partisan Organization, FPO), 370–371
- Fatebenegratelli hospital, 95
- February Strike, 202–203
 Communist Party of the Netherlands (CPN), 202
 Piet Nak and, 202–203
 reprisals for, 203
 Willem Kraan and, 202
- Feder, Gottfried, 179
- Federbusz, Heniek, 333
- Feinberg, Ida Weisbaum, 835–837
- Feldhender, Leon, 496–497
- Fénelon, Fania, 549–550
- Ferencz, Benjamin, 203–205
 Einsatzgruppen Trial and, 205
 Nuremberg Trials and, 204–205 war crimes investigations, 203–204
- Feuchtwanger, Lion, 228
- Film and the Holocaust, 205–207 filmmakers and, 205–206 films, list of, 206
 poetic license and, 205
 "Final Roundup," 551
- Final Solution, 15, 32, 102, 103–105, 107, 169, 207, 231, 254, 256, 317, 356, 438, 527, 566, 605, 635, 676, 725
 definition, 207
 Heinrich Himmler order for the completion of, 1284–1285
Final Solution and the German Foreign Office, The, 102
- Finland, 207–208
 Jewish population, 208
 Moscow Peace Treaty and, 207
 Winter War, 207

- Fireflies in the Dark: The Story of Friedl Dicker-Brandeis and the Children of Terezin*, 124–125
- Fischer, Elizabeth, 356
- Fischer, Eugen, 208–210
Aryans and, 209
genocide and, 208–209
- Fischer, Józef, 356
- Five Chimneys*, 261
- Five Fingers Over You*, 701
- Five Ministers' Conference, 229
- Fleischmann, Gisi, 210–211, 681
Bratislava Working Group and, 210
Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), 210
Jewish Colonization Association (ICA), 210
- Flick, Friedrich, 211
- Flick Case, 211–212
"Circle of Friends," 211–212
International Military Tribunal, 211–212
- Flick Concern, 211–212
- Flossenbürg, 36, 212–214, 321
liberation, 213
location, 213
- Föhrenwald, 173
- Folkszeitung (People's Newspaper)*, 741
- Foll, Hattil Spencer, 482
- Fortis, Alessandro, 320
- Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies, 214
survivor testimony, 214
- Fossoli di Carpi, 214–215
Benito Mussolini and, 214
German takeover of, 214–215
- Four-Year Plan, 136, 1165–1177
- Franco, Francisco, 497, 606–607, 724
- Franco-German Committee, 12
- France, 215–217
occupation of, 12–13, 36, 77, 84, 108–109, 149–150, 167–168, 175–176, 227–228, 321, 334, 389–390, 424–425, 648–649, 668–672, 724, 844–848, 851–855, 948–951, 994–999, 1190–1191
Statut des Juifs, 14
Vichy government, 14, 17, 97, 128, 150, 321, 389, 648–649, 670–672
- Francs-Tireurs et Partisans—Main d'Oeuvre Immigrée (FTP-MOI)*, 37
- Frank, Anne, 25–27, 78, 121, 170, 217–219, 247–248, 275, 541, 715
deportation, 218–219
diary, 217–219
family, 219
- Frank, Hans, 3, 219–220, 508
speech to Cabinet, 1254–1255
- Frank, Otto, 26, 170, 217–219, 247–249
- Franke, Joachim, 66
- Frankfort Health Office, 544
- Frankfort Auschwitz Trial, 220–222
charges in, 220–222 lead prosecutor, 221
sentences, 221
- Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung*, 287
- Franz, Kurt, 222–223, 650
Buchenwald and, 222
- Freed, James Ingo, 660
- Freiberg University, 209
- Freisler, Roland, 223–225, 268, 577, 678 files, 224
People's Court and, 223–224
Reichstag and, 223
- French Communist Party, 37
- French-Jewish Resistance, 128–129
- French Resistance, 58, 77, 109, 175–176, 424, 532, 649, 675
- Freund, John, 837–839
- Frick, Wilhelm, 225, 268
order Concerning Utilization of Jewish Property, 1105–1107
- Friedländer, Saul, 225–227
Catholic Church and, 226
Kurt Gerstein: the Ambiguity of Good, 226
Memory, History, and the Extermination of the Jews of Europe, 226
Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Extermination, 1939–1945, 227
Pius XII and the Third Reich: A Documentation, 226
Probing the Limits of Representation: Nazism and the "Final Solution," 226
- Friedman, Jeanette, 726
- Friend, Hans, 839–841
- Fritta, Bedrich, 271–272
- From That Place and Time: A Memoir, 1938–1947*, 151
- Frost, Douglas Tilbrook, 1320–1321
- Fry, Varian, 36, 227–228
marriage, 228
resistance work and, 227–228
- Fugo Plan, 229
German protests to, 229
Japan and, 229
- Fuhrerprinzip ("leader principle"), 59, 229–230
definition of, 229
structure of, 230
- "Functionalists," 230–231, 288, 438 concentration camps and, 231
definition of, 230–231
Holocaust and, 230–231
- Funk, Walther, 1105–1107

- Funktionshaftling, 231 classes, 231
 definition of, 231
- Gaha, John Francis “Stymie,” 482
- Gaddagi, Muammar, 321
- Galen, Clemens August Graf von, 233–234 sermon on Aktion T-4 program, 1205–1207
- Galiński, Edward, 738
- Gas chambers, 234, 303
 carbon monoxide and, 49, 234–235, 439–440
 Zyklon-B and, 50–51, 85, 234, 742–743
- Gas vans, 49, 234–235, 439–440
 Documentation regarding, 1275–1277
 in Ukraine, 1266–1267
 use of, 234–235
- “Gates of Hell, The,” 176
- Gebhardt, Karl, 236
 Medical experiments, 236
- Geist, Raymond H., affidavit describing Nazi activities in Germany, 1191–1201
- Gelner, Julius, 423
- Generalgouvernement, 236
 regulation banning Jewish emigration from, 1158–1159 regulation of the definition of the term “Jew” in, 1117–1118
- Geneva Conventions, 237, 317
- Genocide, 9, 64, 236–238, 317, 396–399, 421, 631, 647, 715
 definition of, 236–237
 Armenian, 38–39, 701–702, 713
- Gens, Jacob, 238–239, 371, 673
Judenrat and, 239
 Vilna ghetto, 238–239
- George II, 149
- Gepner, Abraham, 742
- Gerge, Einar, 471
- German Anthropological Society, 209
- German Army Report on Shootings of Jews and Gypsies in Yugoslavia, 1239–1240
- German Army, role in the Holocaust, 240–241
 gas vans and, 241
 North Africa and, 240
 Wehrmacht and, 240
- German Army Group South, 55
- German Census, 1933, 241
 Jews and, 241
 purpose of, 241
- German Christian Movement, 92, 517, 662
- German Criminal Code, 66
- German Economics Ministry, 272
- German Equipment Company, 507
- German Excavating and Quarrying Company, 507
- German Experimental Establishment for Foodstuff and Nutrition, 507
- German Labor Front, Women’s Bureau, 578
- German Olympic Committee, 484
- German Protestant Church, 147
- German Resistance Memorial Center, 703
- German Security Police, 175
- German-Soviet Nonaggression Pact, 387, 551, 605, 721, 723
- German Workers’ Party, 179
- German Zionist Federation, 272
- Gerstein, Kurt, 226, 241–243 report regarding extermination camps, 1306–1311
- Gestapo, 243–244
 concentration camps and, 244
 purpose of, 243–244
- Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée, 244–245
 Belgian occupation and, 244–245 resistance works, 244–245
- Ghettos, 245–246
 Lodz, 246
 occupied Europe and, 245
 Warsaw Ghetto, 246
- Gibraltar Camp, Jamaica, 246–247
 Compulsory Residence, 246
 Operation Barbarossa and, 246
- Gies, Miep, 247–249, 532, 541
 Anne Frank family and, 247–249
Anne Frank Remembered: The Story of the Woman Who Helped to Hide the Frank Family, 249
 deportation, 248
- Ginzburg, George, 841–844
- Giro d’Italia, 60
- “Glass House,” 550
- Glazman, Josef, 371
- Gleichschaltung*, 59, 249–250
 definition of, 249
 scope, 249–250
- Glickman, Marty, 485
- Glik, Hirsch, 449
- Globke Trial, 251
 Charges, 251
 Sentencing, 251
- Globocnik, Odilo, 251–252, 650
 Final Solution and, 252
 suicide, 252
 trial, 251
- Glücks, Richard, 252
 Auschwitz and, 252
- Goebbels, Joseph, 3, 34, 65, 67, 252–253, 287, 423, 515, 551–553, 722 diary excerpts, 1075–1076 speech on propaganda, 1123–1127

- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 453
Goethe and Ghetto, 450
- Gold, Jack, 497
- Goldberg-Szabason, Paulette, 844–848
Golden Tradition: Jewish Life and Thought in Eastern Europe, The, 150
- Goldenberg, Giorgio, 61
- Goldfarb, Julius, 848–851
- Goldfayl, Marika, 851–855
- Goldhagen, Daniel, 64, 103, 292, 316
- Goldstein, Peretz, 634
- Good*, 254
 actors in, 254
 director, 254
 plot, 254
- Good Shepherd Committee of the Reformed Church, 604
- Goodkin, Vera Herman, 855–859
- Gorgass, Hans-Bobo, 274
- Göring, Albert, 254–255
 Anschluss and, 255
 family, 254–255
 Nazis and, 255
- Göring, Franziska “Fanny” Tiefenbrunn, 254
- Göring, Heinrich, 254
- Göring, Hermann, 3, 136, 229–230, 254–255, 256–257, 391, 546
 conference on “the Jewish Question,” 1165–1177 order to make preparations for a general solution of the Jewish problem, 1230–1231
 payment of fines by Jews of German nationality, 1165 regarding confiscation of French cultural goods, 1190–1191
 World War I, 256
- Goshen, Zeev, 63
- Gottesman, Shirley Berger, 859–861
- Graebe, Hermann
 affidavit regarding Einsatzgruppen killings, 1252–1254 affidavit regarding liquidation of the Rowno ghetto, 1213–1215
- Graf, Willi, 577, 678
- Graziani, Rodolfo, 257–258
 Fascists and, 257–258
 Italian America and, 258
 Libya and, 257
- Great Dictator, The*, 258–259, 403 critics and, 259 dialogue, 258–259
 plot, 258–259
 U.S. audiences and, 259
- Great Depression, 96, 170
- “Great Raid of the vel’ d’Hiv, The,” 176
- Grebenschikoff, I. Betty, 861–863
- Greece, 259–260
 occupation of, 20–21, 148–149, 565–566
- Green, Gerald, 299–300
- Greenbaum, Jadzia (Jeanette) Altman, 863–864
- Greenman, Miriam Yonish, 864–865
- “Greenshirts,” 318–319
- Grese, Irma, 260–261
 accusations against, 260
 Auschwitz, 260–261
 Ravensbrück, 260–261
 trial, 261
- Grey Zone, The*, 261–262
Auschwitz: A Doctor’s Eyewitness Account, 261
The Drowned and the Saved, 261
 plot, 261–261
- Grönberg, Reinhold, 471
- Gross, Jan, 130, 463–464
- Gross-Rosen, 36, 262–263, 454
 survivor testimony, 910–913, 963–965
- Grossaktion Warschau* (Great Action Warsaw), 739
- Gruenwald, Malchiel, 357
- Grüniger, Paul, 263–264
 Anschluss and, 263
 refugees and, 263–264
- Grynszpan, Herschel, 264–266, 663
 documentation regarding, 1159–1160, 1163
 Kristallnacht and, 264–266, 1159–1160, 1163
- Guidelines on the Use of Given Names, 454
- Guidi, Guido Buffarini, 321
- Guisan, Henri, 632
- Gunden, Lois, 266–267
 Mennonite Church and, 266–267 rescue of French children, 266–267
- Gurland, Zina, 865–867
- Gurs, 176
- Gürtner, Franz, 267–268
 birth, 267
 as Adolf Hitler’s lawyer, 267
 Reich minister of justice, 268
- Gusen, 109
- Gustav V, 471
- Gutman, Yisrael, 269
 appointments, 269
 deportation, 269
- Guzik, David, 739
- Gypsy camps (Zigeunerlager), 5, 174, 543–544, 546–547
- Haas, Leo, 271–272
 artwork, 271–272
 deportation, 271
 Kristallnacht and, 271

- Haavara Agreement, 272–273
 Circular 54/1933, 273
 Jewish Agency for Palestine and, 272
- Haberfeld, Lusia, 867–869
- Hadamar, 273–274
 killings and, 274
 purpose of, 273–274
- Hadamar Insane Asylum Case, 274–275
 charges, 274
 killings, 274
- Hafter, Magda Keleman, 869–871
- Hägberg, Sigfrid, 471
- Halder, John, 254
- Halfon, Samy, 469
- Halpern, Jacques-France, 109
- Hanoar Hazioni*, 371
- Hardman, Leslie, 871–872
- Harlan, Veit, 422
- Harrison, Earl G., 1356–1363
- Harslow, 471
- Harster, Wilhelm, 275
 Dutch Auschwitz Committee, 275
Gruppenfuhrer, 275
- Hart, Basil Liddell, 422
- Hartman, Geoffrey, 214
- Harvard University, 64, 316, 637
- Hashomer Hatzair (The Young Guard), 22, 24, 93, 370–371
- Hass, Karl, 321
- Hasse, Elizabeth, 261
- HaTzohar, 333
- Hauer, Rutger, 497
- Hautval, Adelaide, 276
 imprisonment, 276
 resistance activities, 276
- Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), 210
- Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 63, 269
- Heck, Lutz, 735
- Heck, Walter, 96
- Hedtoft, Hans, 177
- Hegedűs, Anna Molnár, 872–876
- Heiden, Konrad, 228
- Heim, Aribert, 276–277
 medical experiments, 276–277
 transfer to Finland, 277
- Heim, Rudiger, 277
- Helga's Diary*, 277–278
 deportation of Helga Hoskova-Weissova's family, 277 writing of, 277
- Hellinger, Elsa, 876–877
- Helmy, Mohammed, 278
 as the "Arab Schindler," 278
 resistance activities, 278
- Hennecke, Guenther, 274
- Hering, Gottlieb, 71
- Herero Revolt, 209
- Hermann, Sophie, 271
- Herskovitz, Terry Goldstein, 877–880
- Hertford Royal Field Artillery, 391
- Herz-Sommer, Alice, 279
 deportation, 279
 music, 279
- Hess, Rudolf, 94, 279–280, 391 amnesia, 280
 military position, 280
 Operation Barbarossa and, 280
- Hesselblad, Maria Elisabetta, 281
 Catholic Church and, 281
 death, 281
 sheltering of Jewish children, 281
- Heydrich, Reinhard, 15, 77, 97, 256, 281–282, 507, 593, 650, 729, 1093, Conference Minutes on Deportation of Poles, Jews, and Gypsies, 1148–1151 establishing Jewish councils, 1210–1211 instructions for Jews in occupied territories, including ghettoization, 1203–1205 instructions regarding Kristallnacht, 1161–1162 order to make preparations for a general solution of the Jewish problem, 1230–1231
- Hiding Place, The*, 639
- Hiemer, Ernst, 1130–1131
- High Command (OKW) Trial, 421
- High School, 551
- Hilberg, Raul, 135, 282–284, 592
The Destruction of the European Jews, 282–283
Perpetrators, Victims, Bystanders: The Jewish Catastrophe, 1933–1945, 284
The Politics of Memory: The Journey of a Holocaust Historian, 284
Sources of Holocaust Research: An Analysis, 283–284
- Hildebrand, Klaus, 288
- Hillgruber, Andreas, 288
- Himmelfarb, Milton, 316
- Himmler, Heinrich, 3, 5, 19, 24, 62–63, 77, 97, 284–285, 410, 453, 466, 469, 481, 507, 509, 546, 551, 553, 579, 593, 620, 673, 700
 "Circle of Friends," 211–212, 686, 720
 circular letter regarding decrees against Jews and Gypsies no longer needed, 1339–1340
 "Jews, What's Next?" article, 1132–1134 letter regarding sterilization, 1270–1271 memorandum regarding conditions of deportation marches, 1151–1152

- order for completion of Final Solution, 1284–1285
 order for destruction of ghettos of Ostland, 1221 order for destruction of Warsaw Ghetto, 1219–1220
 “Reflections on the Treatment of Peoples of Alien Races in the East,” 1335–1337 speech during political indoctrination course for Wehrmacht soldiers, 1221–1228 speech on the responsibility to beget children, 1066–1068
 SS and, 581–582, 589, 685–687 summation, 1277–1280
- Hinzert, 285–286
 Allied bombing of, 286
 Inspectorate of Concentration Camps, 285
 location, 285
- Hippler, Fritz, 286–287, 516
Der Ewige Jude, 287
 Propaganda Ministry of the Third Reich, 286–287
 trial, 287
- Historikerstreit*, 287–288, 438
- Hitler, Adolf, 1–4, 126, 254, 288–290, 551 administration and procedures of the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program, 1187–1189 alliance with Benito Mussolini, 320, 723 antisemitism and, 31–32, 102–103, 150–151, 191–193, 335, 432–433, 551–553, 564, 576–577, 677, 1108–1109, 1218–1219
 Arabs and, 18
 Armenians, statement on, 38–39
 Aryans and, 43, 404
 assassination attempts, 385, 620
 Auschwitz Protocols, 53
 Austria and, 27–28
 authorization to “euthanize” the incurably ill, 1186
 Barmen Declaration and, 59–60 birthday, 67
 Boxheim documents and, 76
 British response to, 101–102
 Christianity and, 59–61, 114–117, 147–148, 233–234, 516–518, 551, 577, 611–613, 639–642
 Enabling Act, 34
 eugenics and, 191–193, 289–290
 euthanasia program, 193–194, 287–288, 303–304, 404
 Final Solution, 15, 32, 102, 103–105, 107, 169, 207 friends, 178–180, 253, 256, 545–546, 578–579, 686 functionalists and, 230–231, 438 intentionalists and, 316–317, 438
leibstandarte, 685, 686
 loyalty oaths, 618
 master plan, 64, 432–433
 “My Political Testament,” 1068–1071
Nacht und Nebel (Night and Fog Decree), 453–454, 1241–1242
 Nazism and Germany, 460–463
 1936 Olympic Games, 484–486
 Nisko Plan, 271, 469–470
 promise to free the world of Jews, 1218–1219 report on confiscated Jewish art collections, 1154–1155 prison, 289
 “Reflections on the Treatment of Peoples of Alien Races in the East,” 1335–1337
 Spanish Civil War and, 606–607
 speech to the Reichstag, 1228
 Sturmabteilung, creation of, 77, 623–625
 suicide, 608, 623
 World War II, 721–725
- Hitler Youth, 18, 58, 290–292, 457–459 dissolution of, 292 membership, 291
 purpose of, 290–291
Hitler’s Willing Executioners, 64, 103, 292, 316
 critics of, 292
 Holocaust scholarship and, 292
- Hlinka, Andrej, 292
- Hlinka Guard, 292–293
 founding of, 292–293
 Slovak National Uprising and, 293
- HMT Dunera, 293–294
 Australia and, 294
 Dunera Boys, 294
 purpose of, 293
- Ho Feng-Shan, 294–295, 532
 American relief organizations and, 295
 Anschluss and, 294
 issuing visas, 294–295
- Hoche, Alfred, 404
- Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums* (Higher Institute for Jewish Studies), 56
- Hoess, Rudolf, 19, 51, 295–297, 419
 affidavit regarding extermination at Auschwitz, 1287–1289
- Höfle, Hermann, 649–650
- Hofmann, Ernst, 52
- Holland, Françoise, 176
- Hollerith Machine, 297
 Nazi racial policies and, 297
 purpose of, 297
- Holocaust, 297–299
 art and, 41–43
 British response to, 101–102
 by bullets, 300–302 bystanders, response of, 5–6 causes of, 1–4
 children during, 16, 19, 23, 42, 51, 59, 68, 78–79, 82, 91, 99, 103–105, 107, 109, 121–123, 128–129, 142–143, 148–150,

- 166–167, 175–176, 193–194, 209, 216–219, 222, 235–239, 244–245, 261, 266–267, 342, 364–365, 374, 413, 466–467, 490, 515, 532, 555, 629–630, 632, 641, 667, 682, 697, 717, 729, 737,
- children’s literature of, 123–125
- communists in, 65, 131–132
- consequences of, 8–9
- cumulative death toll, 8–9
- denial of, 160–162, 682
- education, 124–125, 370, 432, 713
- film and, 205–206
- German Army, role in, 240–241
- museums and memorials, 447–448
- music and, 448–450
- Jewish women and, 338–339
- literature and, 405–407
- microstates during, 435
- perpetrators of, 3–4
- propaganda, 8–9, 65–66, 252–253, 286–287, 376–377, 422–424, 514–516, 536–538, 551, 574
- survivor testimonies, 214, 627–629, 728–729, 771
- theological responses to, 640–642
- total war and, 647–648
- United States response to, 661–662
- universities, complicity in, 662–663
- word, origin of, 297–298
- Holocaust*, 299–300
- airing, 300
- awards, 300
- plot, 299–300
- Holocaust and Genocide Studies*, 63, 300
- articles in, 300
- indexed and abstracted by, 300
- publication of, 300
- Holocaust and Human Rights Education Center, 619
- Holocaust and the Historians, The*, 151
- Holocaust by bullets, 300–302
- definition of, 300
- Final Solution and, 301
- The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest’s Journey to Uncover the Truth Behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews*, 301–302
- Holocaust Reader, A*, 150
- Holocaust Survivors Film Project (HSFP), 214
- Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memory*, 214
- Holy Jihad, 18
- Homosexuals, 66–67, 174, 302–303
- German Constitution and, 302
- imprisonment for, 302–303
- Nazis and, 302–303
- Honaker, Samuel W., 1164
- Höppner, Rolf-Heinz, 303–304
- arrest, 304
- death camps and, 303–304
- RSHA work, 303–304
- trial, 304
- Horthy, Bela, 304
- Horthy, Miklós, 304–306, 308–309, 550, 604, 632
- Hungary and, 304–306
- “White Terror” and, 304–305
- World War II and, 306
- Hotel Polski, 419
- Höttl, Wilhelm, 1311–1312
- Hound & Horn*, 228
- House of Dolls*, 171
- Hoven, Walemar, 1264–1266
- How to Love a Child*, 368
- Hüber, Kurt, 577, 678
- Hudal, Alois, 306–307, 527
- The Foundations of National Socialism*, 307
- Pope Pius XII and, 307
- Ustashe and, 307
- Hughes, Eileen Avery, 228
- Hull, Cordell, 1093–1095, 1128–1129
- telegram regarding the death penalty for Jews leaving ghettos, 1212
- telegram to United States Secretary of State announcing outbreak of destruction, 1162
- Human Condition, The*, 36
- Hungarian Soviet Republic, 304
- Hungarian war crimes prosecutions, 307–309
- Allies and, 308
- collaboration with Third Reich and, 309
- legal irregularities with, 308
- Hungarian Catholic Working Women’s Movement, 564
- Hungarian Foreign Ministry, 604
- Hungary, 309–310
- affidavit regarding the Jewish community, 1313–1319
- civil war, 304–305
- occupation of, 306, 317, 356–357, 386–387, 497–499, 550, 555–556, 604–605, 632–634, 662, 681–682, 855–859, 872–880, 903–905, 913–915, 929–932, 969–971, 983–991, 1004–1005, 1013–1015, 1157–1158
- Hurt, William, 228
- I Am a Star: Child of the Holocaust*, 124
- Iceland, 311–312
- Jewish refugees and, 311–312
- nationalism, 311
- I.G. Farben, 312–314, 552
- affidavit concerning Auschwitz plant, 1320–1321
- Auschwitz and, 313–314, 439–440, 1281–1284, 1320–1321

1414 Index

- I.G. Farben case, 314–316, 744
charges, 316
medical experimentation and, 315–316
trial, 314–316
- Ikeda, Shigeaki, 229
- Il Giornale d'Italia*, 321
- In My Hands: Memories of a Holocaust Rescuer*, 487
- Indoctrination of Indigenous Security Units, 1220
- Inside the Third Reich and Spandau: The Secret Diaries*, 608
- Inspectorate of Concentration Camps, 133–134, 285
- Institute for Research on the Jewish Question, 209
- Institute of Contemporary Jewry, 63
- “Intentionalists,” 316–317, 438
definition of, 316
Lucy S. Dawidowicz and, 316
Milton Himmelfarb and, 316
Nazis and, 316–317
- Inter-Denominational Working Group for Peace, 402
- International Auschwitz Council (Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation), 269
- International College of the Capuchins, 424
- International Committee of the Red Cross, 7, 19, 173, 272, 317–318, 467, 498, 577, 631 concentration camp visits, 318 failures, 317–318
Hungarian efforts in, 317
- International Criminal Tribunal at Nuremberg, 230, 324–325
- International Forum on Genocide Protection, 63
- International Holocaust Remembrance Day, 318 observation of, 318
- International Lutheran World Federation, 173
- International Military Tribunal, 77, 94, 173, 211–212, 255, 257, 410, 453, 593, 608. See Nuremberg Trials
establishment of, 1356–1363
Opening Statement, 1370–1371
- International Task Force for Holocaust Education, Remembrance, and Research, 63
- Iorga, Nicolae, 319
- Iron Guard, 318–320
assassinations, 319
Axis Powers and, 319
fascism and, 318–320
- “I Shall Betray Tomorrow,” 128
- Israel Prize, 63
- Itagaki, Seishiro, 229
- Italian Jews and fascism, 320–321
Difesa della Razza, 320
historical roots, 320
Il Giornale d'Italia, 321
Manifesto of Racial Scientists, 320–321
Benito Mussolini, 320–321
- Italian Racial Laws, 320
- Italo-Turkish War, 257
- Italy, 321–322
Ardeatine Caves, 512
fascism and, 95, 320–321
Jews in, 60–61, 320–321
- J.A. Topf and Sons, 323
crematoria manufacturing, 323
typhus outbreak and, 323
- Jackson, Robert H., 324–325, 410, 637
closing statement at the Nuremberg Trials, 1380–1383 opening statement at the Nuremberg Trials, 1371–1379
- Jackson, William H., 410
- Jacob, Lilly, 52
- Jacob, Max, 176
- Jadamowitz, Hildegard, 66
- J.A. Topf and Sons, 234
- Jacobs, Joe, 573
- Jagendorf, Hilda, 325–326
- Jagendorf, Siegfried, 325–327
efforts for Jews, 326 employment of Jews, 325–326
- Jahrreiss, Hermann, 1386–1389
- Jancwska, 715
- Jasenovac, 327
establishment, 327
Ustashe and, 327
- Jedwabne Massacre, 327–328
motivations for, 327–328
Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland, 328
- Jefroykin, Dika, 38
- Jehovah’s Witnesses, 328
Declaration of Renunciation of Religious Beliefs, 1335
- Jenkins, Douglas, 1128–1129
- Jew Bill of 1753, 335
- Jew Suss: Rise and Fall*, 423–424
- Jewish Agency for Palestine, 173, 272–273
- Jewish Adult Education Center, 67
- Jewish Army, 38, 334
- Jewish Brigade, 173
- Jewish Colonization Association (ICA), 210
- Jewish Fighting Organization, (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, ŻOB), 328–330
members, 328–330
tactics, 329–330
Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and, 22, 25, 180–181, 246, 328–330, 334, 411, 535, 698–700, 739–740
- Jewish Ghetto Police, 330–332
death camps and, 330

- “gray zone” regarding, 330
size of force, 331
- Jewish Historical Documentation Center, 714–715
- Jewish Historical Institute (Zydowski Instytut Historyczny, ZIH), 542–543
- Jewish Honor Courts, 332
Nazi collaborators and, 332
purpose of, 332
- Jewish Labor Party, 422
- Jewish Military Union (Żydowski Związek Wojskowy, ŻZW), 332–334, 699
members, 332–333
Warsaw Ghetto and, 332–333, 334, 699
- Jewish National Committee (ZKN), 411
- Jewish Nationalisation Act, 335
- Jewish Orphanage (Warsaw), 123
- Jewish Partisans, 334
Belarus, 334
definition of, 334
France, 334
- Jewish Quarter of Warsaw Is No More!, The*, 620
- Jewish Question, 335–336, 438, 470 as a Factor in German foreign policy in the year 1938, 1144–1148 circular on, 1144–1148
conference on “the Jewish Question,” 1165–1177 decisions by Adolf Hitler on, 1108–1109
directions for the handling of the Jewish Question, 1201–1202
- Jewish Question, The*, 335
- Jewish resistance, 336–338 active, 337–338
nonviolent, 337
passive, 336–337
- Jewish women and the Holocaust, 338–340 dignity and, 339 laws regarding, 338 relationships and, 338–339
- Joachim, Hans, 65–66
- Jockel, Helena, 880–883
- John Paul II, 234, 403, 487, 590
- Johns, Stephen Tyrone, 660–661
- Joint Distribution Committee, 340–341
post-World War II efforts, 340–341
World War I and, 340
World War II and, 340–341
- Jonas, Regina, 341–342
deportation, 342
education, 341–342
pastoral work, 342
- Jones, Elwyn, 421
- Joseph, Franz, 304
- Jospa, Hertz, 130
- Jospa, Yvonne, 130
- Jowitt, William Allen, 421
- Joyce, James, 304
- Jud Süß*, 287, 342–343, 422 book, 342 film, 343
plot, 342–343
- Judenreferat*, 149
- Judenrat, 24, 36–37, 57, 79–80, 122, 131, 143, 239, 283, 330–332, 338, 343, 371, 409, 470, 539, 243, 596, 659, 673, 697, 739, 742
establishment of, 1210–1211 issue of collaboration of, 63–64
- Judges’ Trial, 344–345, 571–573
cross examination of Hermann Jahreiss, 1386–1389
“The Justice Case,” 1385–1386
- Judgment at Nuremberg*, 345–346, 357 actors, 345–346
director, 345
plot, 345–346
- July Bomb Plot, 385
- Justice, Not Vengeance*, 715
- Ka-Tzetnik 135633. See Dinur, Yehiel
- Kagan, Khaim, 1211–1212
- Kaiser Wilhelm Institute, 209, 347–350
establishment, 347
euthanasia programs and, 348–349 racial programs of the Third Reich, 347–349
- Kaletsch, Konrad, 211
- Kalina, Antonin, 350
Buchenwald and, 350
death marches and, 350
- Kállay, Miklos, 306, 1157
- Kaltenbrunner, Ernst, 350–352, 593
arrest, 350
death, 351
Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, 351
SS position, 350–351
- Kammergericht Council, 571
- Kannewasser, Max, 449
- Kaplan, Chaim A., 352–353, 883–887
deportation, 353
Scroll of Agony, 352
- Kaplan, Josef, 739
- Kapos, 353
definition, 353
Funktionshaftlinge, 353
- Kappler, Herbert, 353–354
Allies and, 354

- Ardeatine Massacre, 353–354
 Benito Mussolini and, 354
 Karl (Hungary), 305
 Karski, Jan, 354–355, 742
 Courier from Poland: The Story of a Secret State, 355
 honors, 355
 Polish Underground, 354–355
 Kastner, Rezso (Rudolf), 1313–1319
 Kasztner, Rezső, 210, 356–357, 604
 “Blood for Goods, 356–357
 Kasztner Train, 356
 Uj Kelet, 356
 Kasztner, Helen, 356
 Kasztner, Yitzhak, 356
 Katowice, 107
 Katzenberger, Lehmann (Leo), 357–358, 525, 554
 Katzenberger trial, 357–358
 charges, 357–358
 Racial Protection Law (Rassenschutzgesetz), 357
 sentencing, 358
 Katzenelson, Itzhak, 358–360, 675
 Dos Lid funem Oysgehargen Yidishn Folk (“The Song of the Murdered Jewish People”), 358–359
 Ghetto Fighters’ House, 359
 Kaunas Ghetto, 1211–1212
 Keightley, Charles, 422
 Keitel, Wilhelm, 360–361, 367, 453
 arrest, 361
 relationship with Adolf Hitler, 360
 World War II and, 360–361
 Kemp, Edwin C., 1162–1163
 Kempler, Sonia, 887–889
 Kempner, Vitka, 361, 372 passing as non-Jewish, 361 resistance work, 361
 Keneally, Thomas, 569
Keren Hayesod (United Palestine Appeal), 356
 Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph, 362
 Catholic Church and, 362
 work hiding Jews, 362
 Kesselring, Albert, 95
 Kessler, Ruth Fisch, 889–891
 Kharkov trial, 362–363
 Military Tribunal of the 4th Ukrainian Front, 363
 Moscow Declaration and, 362
 Kibart, Leib, 1212
 Kibbutz Aviv, 269
 Kibbutz Ein Hahosh, 372
 Kibbutz Lehavot Habashan, 269
 Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot (Ghetto Fighters Kibbutz), 740
 Kibbutz Sdot Yam, 634
 Kibbutz Yad Mordecai, 25
 Kielce program, 363–364
 blood libel, 363
 occupation of Poland and, 363–364 Kindertransport, 123, 364–365, 717
 survivor testimony, 889–891, 965–969
King Matt the First, 369
 Kingsley, Ben, 715
 Kirstein, Lincoln, 228
 Klarsfeld, Beate, 58
 Klarsfeld, Serge, 58, 648
 Klass, Salomon, 208
 Klein, Alfons, 274
 Klettendorf, 951–953
 Klink, Eugen, 578
 Knight, Shirley, 550
 Knochen, Helmut, 149–150, 731
 Knout, Ariene, 37–38
 Knout, Dovid, 37–38
 Koch, Ilse, 105, 365–366
 Koch Trial, 365–366
 charges, 365–366
 sentencing, 366
 U.S. General Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, 365–366
 Kochmann, Sala, 65–66
 Koehl, Robert, 231
 Kohn, Alfred, 202
 Kohn, Murray, 891–892
 Kohn, Stanislaw, 1327–1330
 Kolbe, Raymond, 366–367
 arrest, 367
 Auschwitz, 366–367
 Catholic Church and, 366–367
 death, 367
 Kolonia Staszica, 480–481
 Kolt, Judy, 892–895
 Kommissarbefehl, 367–368
 definition, 367
 enforcement, 368
 excerpts, 367–368
 Kommando 1005, 509–510
 Königsberg State Court, 571
 Kook, Astra, 73
 Kook, Betty, 73
 Kook, Hillel, 72–73
 Koretz, Tzvi, 565
 Korn, Henri, 895–899
 Korzcak, Janusz, 123, 368–369
 A Child of the Salon, 368
 Children of the Streets, 368

- How to Love a Child*, 368
King Matt the First, 369
- Korzczak, Rozka, 369–370, 372
 Hashomer Hatzair, 370
 Vilna Ghetto, 370
- Kovacs, Laszlo, 255
- Kovner, Abba, 93, 370, 370–372
 arrest, 371
 Avengers (Nakam), 372
 Hashomer Hatzair, 371
 Vilna Ghetto, 370–372
- Kovner, Israel, 371
- Kraan, Willem, 202–203
- Krajugevac Massacre, 372–373
 memorials to, 372
 motivations for, 372–373
 orders for, 372
- Kraków-Plaszow, 373
 survivor testimony, 1008–1013
- Kramer, Josef, 71–72, 373–374, 549
 Auschwitz and, 373–374
 Berger-Belsen, 374
 trial, 374
- Kraus, Gilbert and Eleanor, 374–375
 Brith Sholom, 374
50 Children, 375
 sponsorship of Jewish children, 374–375
- Kreisau Circle, 680
- Kreyssig, Lothar, 268, 375–376
 Action Reconciliation Service for Peace (ARSP), 376
Aktion T-4 euthanasia program, 375–376
 Death, 376
- Kristallnacht (“The Night of Broken Glass”), 28, 33, 53, 57, 65, 124, 271, 364, 376–377, 402, 561, 564, 593, 663, 717, 729, affidavit of Benno Franz T. Martin regarding destruction in Nurnberg, 1182–1183
 anti-Semitic onslaught in Germany as seen from Leipzig, 1180–1182
 conditions in the Stuttgart consular district, 1177–1180
 conference on “the Jewish Question,” 1165–1177
 Heydrich’s instructions regarding, 1161–1162
 payment of fines by Jews of German nationality, 1165
 SA report on destruction, 1163–1164
 survivor testimony, 839–841, 887–891, 976–978 telegram on German press coverage of, 1159–1160 telegram regarding anti-Semitic persecution in the Stuttgart consular district, 1164
 telegram to United States Secretary of State announcing outbreak of destruction, 1162 telegram to United States Secretary of State regarding anti-Jewish demonstrations in Bremen, 1162–1163
- Kruger, Paul, 423
- Krupp, Fredrich, 377–379, 700
- Krupp case, 377–379
 charges, 377–378
 sentences, 379
 slave labor and, 378
- Krützfeld, Wilhelm, 379–380
 Anti-Nazi activity, 379–380
Kristallnacht and, 379
- Kun, Belá, 304
- Küntsllich, Chaim Benjamin, 899–900
- Kuper, Leo, 380–382
International Action against Genocide, 381
Living in Towns, 380
The Pity of It All, 380
The Prevention of Genocide, 381
- Kurt Gerstein: the Ambiguity of Good*, 226
- Kutz, Michael, 900–903
- La Cité de la Muette, 175
- La Sizième* (“The Sixth”), 100
- Lagerberg, Stig, 471
- Lammers, Hans, 1151–1152
- Landau, Alice, 903–905
- Landmesser, August, 383–384
 arrest, 384
 Nuremberg Laws, 383–384
Rassenschande, 383
- Landmesser, Irene, 384
- Landmesser, Ingrid, 384
- Landmesser, Irma, 383–384
- Landsberg Prison, 483
- Lange, Herbert, 384–385
Aktion T-4 euthanasia program, 384–385
 Poznan (Posen), 385
- Lange, Rudolf, 386–387, 562–263
 Wannsee Conference, 385–386
- Langer, Lawrence, 214
- Langlet, Valdemar, 631
- Lantos, Tom, 386–387
 arrest, 386–387
 election to U.S. House of Representatives, 387
 Hillel Foundation academic scholarship, 387
The Last Days, 387 work crew, 387
- Lanzmann, Claude, 63, 592–593
- Lapland War, 208
- Lasker-Wallfisch, Anita, 549
- Last Days, The*, 387
- Lateran treaties, 320
- Latenser, Hans, 422

- Latvia, 387–388
 documentation regarding, 1237–1239
 occupation of, 387–388, 539–540, 562–563
- Lautz, Ernst, 678
- Laub, Dori, 214
- Laufer, Julius, 67
- Laval, Pierre, 97, 388–390
 negotiations over Ethiopia, 389
 Nazi collaboration, 388–390
 occupation of France, 388–390
- Law Against Dangerous and Habitual Criminals, 546
- Law Against Overcrowding in Schools and Universities, 663
 excerpts, 1080–1081
- Law Concerning Jewish Tenants, 1109–1111
- Law Excluding Jews from Military Service, 1086
- Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, 662–663
 documentation, 1076–1077
 First Decree, 1079–1080
- Law for the Prevention of Offspring with Hereditary Diseases, 404
- Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor, 390–391
 documentation, 1087–1088
 letter explaining, 1113–1114
- Law for the Treatment of Community Enemies, 677
- Law of Return, 559
- Law Regarding Admission to the Bar, 1079 elimination of the Jews from, 1102–1103
- Law Regarding Measures of State Self-Defense, 268
- Law Regarding the Change of Family Names and First Names, 454
 Second Decree for the implementation of, 1101–1102
- Lawner, Helen, 905–907
- Lawrence, Geoffrey, 391–392
 death, 392
 Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, 391–392
- Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, 392–393 occupation of France and, 392–393
 the Plateau, 392
 sheltering Jewish refugees, 392–393
- League of German Girls, 393–394 age and membership, 394
 purpose of, 394
- League of the Archangel Michael, 318
- Leap into Darkness*, 100
- Lebensborn, 394
 definition, 394
 Nazi racial ideals and, 394
- Lebensraum, 394–395, 721
 Definition of, 394
 development of, 394
 Treaty of Versailles and, 395
- Lederman, Celia, 908–909
- Lee, Des, 909–910
- Legion of Saint Michael, 32
- Leguay, Jean, 150
- Lehi, 357
- Lehranstalt für die Wissenschaft des Judentums* (School of Jewish Studies), 56
- Leibbrandt, Georg, 1220
- Leibstandarte*, 685, 686
- Leipelt, Hans Conrad, 577
- Leitz, Ernst, II, 395–396
 Leica Freedom Train, 396
- Lemkin, Raphael, 9, 11, 236–238, 396–399
Axis Rule, 398
 Genocide Convention, 399 genocide, works on, 396–399
 World War I, 397
- Lengyel, Olga, 261
- Leo Baeck College, 57
- Leo Baeck Institute, 57
- Leperere, Helen, 910–913
- Lesser, Fanny, 913–915
- Letters and Papers from Prison*, 93
- Leverkuehn, Paul, 422
- Levi, Primo, 399–400
The Drowned and the Saved, 400
Giustizia e Liberta partisan movement, 399
If Not Now When?, 399
La Tregua, 399–400
The Monkey's Wrench, 400
The Periodic Table, 400
- Levin, Alex, 915–917
- Levin, Meyer, 170
- Levitte, Simon, 38
- Lewin, Manfred, 66–67
- Lewkowicz, Berek, 917–919
- Liberation, concentration camps, 400–401
 survivor testimony, 771–773, 780–782, 834–835, 863–864, 877–880, 937–938, 951–953, 985–990, 1031–1034, 1038–1041
- Liberty Studios, 550
- Libya, 257–258, 321
- Lichtenberg, Bernhard, 402–403
 Catholic Church and, 402–403
 Inter-Denominational Working Group for Peace
 (Arbeitsgemeinschaft der Konfessionen für den Frieden), 402
 Kristallnacht and, 403
- Leibstandarte*, 685, 686
- Liebeskind, Adolf, 739

- Lifchitz, Philippe, 469
Life Is Beautiful, 403–404
 actors in, 403
 awards won, 403
 director, 403
Life? or Theatre?, 564–565
 “Life Unworthy of Life,” 404
 definition of, 404
 Linder, Menahem, 542
 Linnér, Sture, 577
 Lipke, Janis and Johanna, 404–405
 Balasta Dambis concentration camp rescues, 405
 Nazi occupation of Latvia, 405
 Soviet occupation of Latvia and, 404
 Literature and the Holocaust, 405–407 concentration camp writing, 405–406 moral lessons found in, 406 post-World War II, 406
 Lithuania, 407
 occupation of, 407, 509–510
 Little, Franklin H., 641–642
Little Boy Star, The, 125
 Livchitz, Georges, 131
 Łódź Ghetto, 79–80, 170–171, 303, 331, 384, 407–410
Judenrat, 80, 409
 survivor testimony, 819–822, 1015–1019, 1026–1029
 London Charter Agreement, 410–411
 documentation, 1365–1370
 Long, Breckinridge, 1344
 Lorant, Stefan, 919–923
 Lotta Svärd, 208
 Louis, Joe, 574
Löwenberger Arbeitgemeinschaften, 679
 Lubetkin, Zivia, 411–412
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 411–412, 739
 Lublin, Aron Lucien, 38
 Lublin Reservation, 149
 Lubny Massacre, 412–413
 Kommissar Order, 412–413
 Lubusch, Edward, 738
 Luków ghetto, 726
 Luther, Martin, 526, 1051–1053
 regarding transport of Jews to Auschwitz, 1268–1270
 Lutz, Carl, 413–414, 541
 death marches, 414
 letter of protection (Schutzbrief), 413
 Luxembourg, 414–415
 occupation of, 414
 resistance movement, 414–415
 Luzzati, Luigi, 320
 Lvov (Lviv), 331
 Maccabea, 634
 Madagascar Plan, 417–418
 documentation, 1152–1154
 presentation of, 417–418
Mädchenorchester von Auschwitz (Girl Orchestra of Auschwitz), 549
 Mahler, Gustav, 549
 Majdanek, 19, 134, 151, 418–419, 454
 films made in, 454, 469
 survivor testimony, 908–909
 Malle, Louis, 109
 Malta, 435
 Mandel, Maria, 549
 Manifesto of Racial Scientists, 320–321
 “Manifesto of the Students of Munich, The,” 577
 Mann, Daniel, 550
 Mann, Franceska, 419–420
 Jewish Question and, 419
 Mann, Fred, 923–925
 Mann, Heinrich, 228
 Mannaberg, Hans-Georg, 66
 Manstein, Erich von, 420–421
 Operation Barbarossa, 421
 Panzer tactics, 420
 trial, 421–422
 Manstein trial, 421–422
 charges, 421–422
 sentencing, 422
 Marian, Ferdinand, 422–424
Jud Suss, 422–423
Ohm Kruger, 423
 Marie-Benoît, Père, 424–425
 Catholic Church and, 424–425
 move to Rome, 424
 resistance activities, 424–425
 Marr, Adolph, 28
 Martin, Benno Franz T., 1182–1183
 Marx, Karl, 335
 Maurer, Peter, 318
 Mauriac, François, 713
 Maurras, Charles, 13
Maus and Maus II, 425–426
 plot, 425–426
 Mauthausen, 54, 109, 133, 175, 272, 426–427, 454, 508, 715
 Mauthausen Trial, 426
 charges, 426
 sentencing, 426
 Mauthausen-Gusen, 426–428
Rückkehr unerwünscht (“return not desired”), 426
 slave labor at, 426–427
Vernichtung durch arbeit (“extermination by work”), 426

1420 Index

- May, Paul Stotsky, 925–927
- Mayer, Hania Harcsztark–Goldfeder, 927–929
- McCarthy, Joseph, 637
- Mechelen, 428–429
“Antechamber of Death,” 429
Comité de Defense des Juifs (CDJ), 428–429
- Medical experimentation, 67–68, 97–100, 105–107, 122–123, 145–147, 174, 208–209, 273–274, 276–277, 347–349, 429–431, 434, 467, 549, 716 affidavit regarding, 1260–1266
survivor testimony, 891, 913–915
- Meed, Vladka, 431–432
On Both Sides of the Wall, 432
Warsaw Ghetto, 431–432
- Mein Kampf*, 28, 64, 102–103, 179–180, 209, 316, 403, 432–434, 515, 551, 579
excerpts, 1063–1066
- Meisels, Leslie, 929–932
- Melchior, Marcus, 177
- Melody Palace nightclub, 419
- Memorandum from the U.S. Embassy in Poland to the U.S.
Secretary of State Regarding the Plight of, and Negotiations Over, Polish Jews Expelled from Germany, 1141–1143
- Memorandum Regarding Food Supply and Shopping Time for Jews, 1137–1138
- Memory, History, and the Extermination of the Jews of Europe*, 226
- Mengele, Josef, 434–435
medical experiments, 122–123, 209, 349, 429, 431, 434, 467, 549, 716, 891, 913–915
survivor testimony, 716, 891, 913–915
- Merle, Adolf, 274
- Merten, Max, 566
- Messersmith, George S.,
Anti-Semitic onslaught in Germany as seen from Leipzig, 1180–1182
conditions in the Stuttgart consular district, 1177–1180
- Meyer, Gerhard, 65–66
- Michael: Ein Deutsches Schicksal (Michael: A German Destiny)*, 253
- Michaelis, Arlette Democeau, 932–935
- Michaelis, Meir, 320
- Michel, Hans-Helmut, 109
- Microstates during the Holocaust, 435–436
Andorra, 435
Liechtenstein, 435
Malta, 435
Monaco, 435
Republic of San Marino, 435
- Milchberg, Irving, 436
Warsaw Ghetto, 436
- Milice*, 648
- Military Commission Court, 274
- Minco, Marga, 935–936
- Mischling, 390–391, 436–437
comments regarding treatments of Jews of mixed blood and their descendants, 1120–1122 conference concerning further handling of, 1273–1275
- Moabit Prison, 66
- Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, 229, 319
- Mommsen, Hans, 102–103, 230, 288, 437–439
Alternatives to Adolf Hitler: German Resistance under the Third Reich, 437
From Weimar to Auschwitz: Essays in German History, 437
The Rise and Fall of Weimar Democracy, 437
- Mommsen, Wilhelm, 437
- Mommsen, Wolfgang, 288
- Monaco, 435
- Monowitz, 49, 439–440
documentation, 1275–1277
- Montbatten, George, 21
- Montbatten, Louis, 21
- Morávek, Jan, 255
- Mordowicz, Czesław, 52
- Mire, Miriem (Gole), 739
- Moretti, Tobias, 423
- Morgenthau, Henry, Jr., 1344–1353
- Morris, Leland B., 1212
- The Mortal Storm*, 440–441
ban, 440–441 movie, 440–441
novel, 440
- Mortensen, Viggo, 254
- Moscow Declaration, 441–442 war crimes and, 441
- Moscow Peace Treaty, 207
- Moskowitz, Janet Zuchter, 936–938
- Mossad, 550
- Moulin, Jean, 58
- Mouvement des Jeunesses Sionistes* (Young Zionist Movement, MJN), 38, 128
- Movement of Polish Jews from Germany to Poland,
Telegram 1, 1138
Telegram 2, 1139
Telegram 3, 1139
Telegram 4, 1140
Telegram 5, 1140
Telegram 6, 1140–1141
Telegram 7, 1141
- Müller, Filip, 52, 419, 681, 938–940
- Müller, Heinrich, 442–443, 531–532
awards received, 442
Final Solution and, 442
- Müller, Ludwig, 59

- Münch, Hans, 443–444
 conflict with Nazi policy, 443
 trial, 443–444
- Munich Agreement, 271, 444–446, 591, 645
 Neville Chamberlain and, 444–446
 Winston Churchill and, 446
 Adolf Hitler and, 445–446
 Violation of, 445
- Munich Conference, 306
- Munich Technische Hochschule, 3
- Murder of Jews in Belorussia: Police Battalion Report, 1237–1239
Murderers Among Us, The, 715
Murderers Among Us: The Simon Wiesenthal Story, 715
- Murrow, Edward R., 591
- Museum Blindenwerkstatt Otto Weidt, 703
- Museum of Tolerance, 446–447
 location of, 446
- Museums and memorials, 447–448
 memorials, 447–448
 museums, 447
- Music and the Holocaust, 448–450
 camps, 449–450
 musical performances, 448 organized performances, 448
 Vilna ghetto and, 449
- Mussert, Anton Adriaan, 450–451, 465
 fascism and, 450–451
 occupation of the Netherlands and, 450–451
- Mussert, Joannes Leonardus, 450
- Mussolini, Benito, 14, 27, 60, 214, 257–255, 389, 435, 450, 497, 723 racial policies, 19, 320–321
 Spanish Civil War and, 606–607
- My Life My Way*, 726
- Myth of the Twentieth Century, The*, 551
- Nacht und Nebel, 453–454 arrests due to, 454
 definition, 453
 documentation, 1241–1242
- Nagler, Alexander, 565
- Nak, Piet, 202–203
- Names under the Nazis, Legislation, 454–455
 “Aryanization” in German society, 454
- Nanking Massacre, 523
- Nanking Safety Zone, 523
- Nasz Dom, 369
- Nathan, Ernesto, 320
- Nationaal-Socialistische Beweging* (Dutch National Socialists, NSB), 450, 465
- Nation, The*, 470
- National Institute of Special Pedagogy, 369
- National Jewish Party, 356
- National Monument Camp Vught, 683
- National Naval Medical Center, 387
- National People’s Party, 76
- National Republican Union, 389
- National Security Resources Board, 589
- National Socialism, 455
 founding, 455
 purpose of, 455
- National Socialist German Students’ League (SA), 457–459
- National Socialist German Workers’ Party, 455–456. See Nazis ideology, publications excerpts, 1056–1058
- National Socialist Program, 456–457
 documentation, 1054–1056
- National Socialist Society for Culture and Learning, 551
- National Socialist Student League, 663
- National Socialist Women’s League (NS-Frauenschaft), 578
- Nationale Jeugdstorm*, 465
- Natzweiler-Struthof, 454, 457
 deaths at, 457
 gas chamber at, 457
- Navon, Yitzhak, 740
- Nazi Book Burning, 457–459
 Josef Goebbels and, 458–459
 National Socialist German Students’ League, 457–459
- Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941, 459–460
 Barbarossa Decree, 459–460
 Commissar Order, 459–460
 Guidelines for the Behavior of the Troops, 459–460 issuance, 459
- Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Extermination, 1939–1945*, 227
- Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Persecution*, 226–227
- Nazi Party/Nazis, 3–4, 179, 455–456 activities in Germany, 1191–1201 book burning, 457–459
 bureaucracy, 109–111
 Christianity and, 91–93, 147–148
 concentration camp system, nature of, 64
 Criminal Orders, 459–460 euthanasia laws, 174, 193–194, 234–235, 273–274
 final solution, 15
 forming, 3
 Four-Year Plan, 136, 1165–1177
 Germany and, 460–463, 576–577
 homosexuality and, 66–67
 ideology, 59–60
 invasion of Soviet Union, 22, 55–56, 230, 246, 316, 368, 404–405, 510–511, 559–560, 605–606, 635, 673, 900–903, 1234–1237

- medical experiments, 67–68, 97–100, 105–107, 122–123, 145–147, 174, 208–209, 273–274, 276–277, 347–349, 429–431
 names under, legislation regarding, 454
 1936 Olympic Games, 484–486
 occupation of Belarus, 69–70, 999–1001
 occupation of Belgium, 33–34, 70, 130–131, 742, 897–899, 923–925, 932–935, 957–960 occupation of Bulgaria, 107–108
 occupation of Czechoslovakia, 142–143, 591, 598–599, 681–682, 833–834, 837–839, 869–871, 992–994, 1001–1002, 1021–1023
 occupation of Denmark, 77, 125–127, 162–163, 177–178
 occupation of France, 12–13, 36, 77, 84, 108–109, 149–150, 167–168, 175–176, 227–228, 321, 334, 389–390, 424–425, 648–649, 668–672, 724, 844–848, 851–855, 948–951, 994–999, 1190–1191
 occupation of Greece, 20–21, 148–149, 259–260, 565–566 occupation of Hungary, 306, 317, 356–357, 386–387, 497–499, 550, 555–556, 604–605, 632–634, 662, 681–682, 855–859, 872–880, 903–905, 913–915, 929–932, 969–971, 983–991, 1004–1005, 1013–1015, 1157–1158
 occupation of Italy, 95
 occupation of Latvia, 388, 539–540, 562–563, 1237–1239
 occupation of Lithuania, 407, 509–510
 occupation of Norway, 521–522
 occupation of Netherlands, 25–27, 91, 202–203, 247–249, 275 450–451, 464–465, 618–619, 682–683, 717–718, 740–741, 827–831, 935–936, 1002–1004 occupation of Poland, 78–79, 84–86, 93, 121, 130, 149–150, 170–171, 328–334, 354–355, 411–412, 470–471, 507–509, 541–542, 558–559, 565, 591, 625–626, 649–650, 700–701, 721, 726, 731–732, 735–737, 739–742, 848–851, 899–900, 910–913, 917–919, 925–927, 951–957, 960–963, 971–972, 1019–1021, 1034–1036, 1044–1049, 1207–1210
 occupation of Romania, 547–548
 occupation of Serbia, Serbia, 585–586
 occupation of Ukraine, 589–590
 propaganda, 8–9, 65–66, 252–253, 286–287, 376–377, 422–424, 514–516, 551, 1081–1086, 1123–1127, 1128–1129
 racial theory, 59
 Schutzstaffel, 581–582
 slogan, 676
Sonderkommando (special squads), 51, 56, 384, 419, 603–604
 SS-Totenkopfverbände, 3, 581–582, 507, 611, 685, 687
 uniforms, 96–97
 Nazi Women's League, 578
 Nazism and Germany, 460–463
 anti-Semitism and, 461–462 ideological shift leading to, 460–461 rightist trends and, 462–463 rise of, 461
 Negrin, Alberto, 498
Neighbors, 130, 463–464
 critics of, 463–464
 Nejman, Mordka, 482
 Netherlands, 464–465
 liberation, 464
 neutrality, 464
 occupation of, 25–27, 91, 202–203, 247–249, 275 450–451, 618–619, 682–683, 717–718, 740–741
 survivor testimony, 827–831, 935–936, 1002–1004
 Netherlands East India Company, 466
 Netherlands National Bank, 466
 Netherlands Tribunals, 465–466
 collaborators, 465
 Nationale Socialistische Beweging der Nederland (NSB)
 members, 465–466
 sentencing, 465
 Neuengamme, 466–468
 establishment of, 466
 medical experiments, 466–467
 White Buses at, 466
 Neusollstedt, 175
 New Legal Status of the Jewish Communities, 1093–1095
New York Times, 68, 566
 Newman, Paul, 126
 Niedersachswerfen, 175
 Niemöller, Martin, 59, 92
Night, 121, 170, 468, 713
 critics of, 468
 plot of, 468
 printing of, 468
Night and Fog, 454, 469 attempted censorship of, 469
 director, 469
 release of, 469
 Night of the Long Knives, 77, 250, 268, 546, 625
 Nikitchenko, Iona, 410
 Nisko Plan, 271, 469–470
 Final Solution and, 469
 implementation of, 469–470
 shutdown of, 469–470
 Noe, 176–288
 Nordhausen, 174–175
 Nordling, Raoul, 176
 Norrman, Sven, 470–471
 atrocities witnessed, 470–471 document smuggling, 471
 “Warsaw Swedes,” 470–471
 North Western Reform Synagogue, 57
 Norway, 471–472, 521–522
 fascism and, 472

- government-in-exile, 472
- occupation of, 472
- Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto*, 542
- Notes on the Refugees in Zbaszyn*, 541
- Number on My Grandfather's Arm, The*, 124
- Nuremberg Code, 174, 472–473
 - definition of, 472
 - documentation, 1389–1390
 - medical experiments and, 472–473
- Nuremberg Defense, 473
 - definition of, 473
 - Nuremberg Trials and, 473
 - use of, 473
- Nuremberg Laws, 4, 17, 66, 250, 268, 325, 357–358, 436–437, 448–449, 454, 473–474, 525, 601
 - Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor, 390–391
 - Reich Citizenship Law, 390–391, 529–530, 622–623
 - women and racial disgrace, letter explaining amendment to, 1113–1114
- Nuremberg Party Rallies, 253
- Nuremberg Principles, 474–475
 - documentation, 1390–1395
 - seven principles of, 475
 - war crimes and crimes against humanity, 474–475
- Nuremberg Special Court, 358–359
- Nuremberg Trials, 475–477, 593
 - closing statement of Robert H. Jackson, 1380–1383
 - Major War Criminals, 304
 - opening statement by Robert H. Jackson, 1371–1379
 - testimony of Franz von Papen, 1379
 - “The Persecution of the Jews,” 1383–1385
- Nyiszli, Miklos, 940–942

- Oakie, Jack, 259
- Oberheuser, Herta, 479–480
 - medical experiments, 479
 - Nuremberg Doctors' Trial, 479
 - Ravensbrück experiments, 479
- Oberländer, Theodor, 480
 - eugenics and, 480
 - Lvov Massacre, 480
 - racial theories, 480
- Ochota Massacre, 480–481
 - destruction of Chota district, 481
 - Heinrich Himmler and, 481
 - Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 480–481
- Odessa Massacre, 481
 - bomb, 481
 - Odessa, Jewish population of, 481
 - survivors, 481

- Ogilvie, Albert, 481–483
 - refugee applications, 482
 - proposal for Jewish settlements in Tasmania, 482–483
 - Tasmanian Parliament, 482
- Ohlendorf, Otto, 483
 - testimony regarding Einsatzgruppen, 1242–1250
- Ohm Krüger*, 423
- Olenski, Luba, 942–943
- Olivier, Laurence, 715
- Olympia*, 537
- Olympic Games, 1936, 403, 484–486, 573–574, 591
 - German Olympic Committee and, 484–485
 - Adolf Hitler and, 484–485
 - Jewish athletes at, 484–485
- On the Jewish Question*, 335
- On Jews and Their Lies*, 1051–1053
- Oneg Shabbat, 486
 - creation of, 486
 - Warsaw Ghetto, 486, 541–543
- Opatowski, Felix, 944–947
- Opdyke, Irene Gut, 486–487
 - arrest, 486
 - In My Hands: Memories of a Holocaust Rescuer*, 487
 - resistance activities, 486–487
 - service to Edward Rugemer, 486–487
- Opdyke, William, 487
- Operation Barbarossa, 2, 32, 79, 101, 230, 246, 316, 368, 472, 487, 509, 547, 605, 673
 - application, 487
 - order regarding conduct in the Eastern territories, 1231–1232
 - report on the execution of Jews in Borrisow, 1234–1237
- Operation Citadel, 421
- Operation Harvest Festival, 488–489
 - Aktion Erntefest*, 489
 - date, 488
 - Heinrich Himmler and, 488–489
 - reason for, 488
- Operation Market Garden, 466
- Operation Paperclip, 68
- Operation Reinhard. See Aktion Reinhard
- Operation Spring Wind, 489–490
 - agreement on, 489
 - collaboration of French police and the Gestapo, 489–490
 - original plan, 490
- Operation Tannenbaum, 632
- Operation Torch, 217
- Operation Winter Storm, 421
- Oranienburg, 716
- Order Banning Jewish Emigration from the Reich, 1160
- Order Concerning Utilization of Jewish Property, 1105–1107
- Order of Slovak National Insurrection, 681

- “Ordinary Men,” 58, 103, 490
 nonmilitary combatants as, 490 phrase origin, 490
- Organization of the Ukrainian Nationalists, 589
- Organization Todt, 440
- Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942, The*, 103–104
- Origins of Totalitarianism, The*, 36
- Ormond, Julia, 228
- Osaka, Tatsuo, 490–491
 as representative of the Japan Tourist Bureau, 490–491 traveling with refugees, 491
- Osmolowski, Jerzy, 1237–1239
- Oster, Hans, 680
- Owens, Jesse, 485
- Pact of Steel, 320
- Pagine Ebraica*, 61
- Pais, Abraham, 618
- Pale of Settlement, 69, 606
- Palestine, Jewish emigration to, 36, 101–102, 210, 269, 272, 369–370, 372, 621–622, 634
- Palgi, Yoel, 634
- Pan-German Nationalist Party, 578
- Paper Clips*, 493
 interviews in, 493
 story behind, 493
- Papon, Maurice, 493–494 conviction for complicity, 493–494 crimes against humanity, 494 prefect of Corsica, 494
- Parczew Partisans, 334
- Parisian Anthropological Society, 209
- Pasha, Mehmed Tallat, 701
- Pastors’ Emergency League (Pfarrernotbund), 59
- Patton, George S., Jr., 172
- Paul, Randolph, 1344–1352
- Paul IV, 1053–1054
- Paulavicius, Jonas, 494–495 murder of, 495
 resistance activities, 494–495
 sheltering Jews, 494–495
- Pauly, Max, 466
- Pavelić, Ante, 495–496, 733 creation of Ustashe, 495 escape to Rome, 495 occupation of Yugoslavia, 495
- Paxton, Robert, 648
- Peace Association of German Catholics, 402
- Pechersky, Alexander, 496–497 report on the Sobibór revolt, 1330–1334
- Sobibór revolt, 496–497
- Peel Commission, 18
- Peel Partition Plan of 1937, 273
- Pehl, John, 1344–1352
- Perl, Gisella, 947–948
- Perlasca, Giorgio, 497–499, 541, 607 appointment to Hungary, 497 epitaph, 499
 honors and awards, 498
La banalita del bene: Storia di Giorgio Perlasca, 498
Perlasca—Un eroe Italiano, 498
 resistance activities, 497–498
Perlasca—Un eroe Italiano, 498
- Perlstein, Leah, 739
- Permission to Destroy Life Unworthy of Life, The*, 404
- Peshev, Dimitar, 499–500
 arrest, 500
 Bulgaria’s deportation plan, 499
 Bulgarian Jews and, 499–500
 resistance activities, 499–500
- Pétain, Henri, 721
- Pétan, Philippe, 12, 17, 97, 175, 389, 500–502, 670–672
 Allies and, 502
 arrest, 502
 fall of Paris and, 501
 Vice President of the War Council, 501
 Vichy government, 12, 17, 97, 175, 389, 500–502, 670–672
- Petit Collège Saint-Thérèse de l’Enfant-Jésus, 108
- Petschek, Julius and Ignatz, 211
- Philip of Greece, 21
- The Pianist*, 449, 502
 actors in, 502
 director, 502
 plot, 449, 502
- Pierrepoint, Albert, 261
- Pika, Jan, 333
- Pilecki, Witold, 502–504
 Auschwitz and, 502
 Polish underground movements, 503–504 rehabilitation, 504 service during the Polish-Soviet War, 502–503
- Pilzer, Oskar, 255
- Piovani, Nicola, 403
- Pius XI, 14, 504, 505, 590
 concordant with Germany, 504
 Lateran Treaty, 504
- Pius XII, 7, 116–117, 165–166, 226, 424, 504–505, 679
 education, 505
 Vatican II, groundwork for, 505
 World War II and, 505
- Pius XII and the Third Reich: A Documentation*, 226

- Pivnik, Sam, 505–506
 Dora-Mittelbau, 506
Survivor: Auschwitz, the Death March, and My Fight for Freedom, 506
Plan for the Construction of the Hungarian State, 632
Playing for Time, 550
- Ploetz, Alfred, 506–507
The Efficiency of Our Race and the Protection of the Weak, 506
 racial theories, 506
 Adolf Hitler and, 506–507
- Plotnicka, Frumke, 739
- Plötzensee prison, 66
- Poale Zion (“Workers of Zion”), 541
- Pohl, Oswald, 507
 order for destruction of ghettos of Ostland, 1221
- Poisonous Mushroom, The*, 1130–1131
- Poland, 507–509
The Black Book of, 1207–1210
 occupation of Poland, 78–79, 84–86, 93, 121, 130, 149–150, 170–171, 328–334, 354–355, 411–412, 470–471, 507–509, 541–542, 558–559, 565, 591, 625–626, 649–650, 700–701, 721, 726, 731–732, 735–737, 739–742, 848–851, 899–900, 910–913, 917–919, 925–927, 951–957, 960–963, 971–972, 1019–1021, 1034–1036, 1044–1049, 1207–1210
- Police Decree Concerning the “Marking” of Jews, 1114–1115
- Police Regulation of the Appearance of Jews in Public, 1103
- Polish Corridor, 389
- Polish Council to Aid Jews, 736–737
- Polish Fortnightly Review*, 1217–1218
- Polish Government in Exile, 333
- Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK), 333, 355, 471, 480–481, 508, 700
- Polish Ministry of Information, 1217–1218
- Polish Zionist Party, 333
- Poljakoff, Dina, 208
- Polonski, Abraham, 37–38
- Polonski, Eugenie, 37–38
- Pompidou, Georges, 649
- Ponary Forest, 509–510
 escapes from Vilna, 510
 massacres at, 509–510
 Operation Barbarossa and, 509
 survivor testimony, 978–983
- Popovici, Traian, 510–511
Confession of Conscience, 511
 mayor of Cernauti, 510
 resistance activities, 510
 Romanian Jews and, 510
- Portugal, 167–168
- Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), 172, 583
- Poznan, 385
- Preminger, Otto, 126
- Priebke, Erich, 321, 511–512
 Ardeatine Caves, 511–512
 arrest, 512
 German occupation of Italy and, 512
- Priest Block, Dachau, 512–513
 Catholic Church and, 512–513
 crucifixion of priests at, 513 isolation of priests, 512 living conditions in, 512–513
- Prhoda, Vása, 549
- Princeton University, 618
- Prison de Pax, 128
- Probst, Christopher, 577, 678
- Project Paperclip, 513–514
 Allied agents and, 514
 Cold War and, 514
 purpose of, 513–514
 wartime accountability and, 514
- Probing the Limits of Representation: Nazism and the “Final Solution,”* 226
- Propaganda in the Holocaust, 514–516 book burnings and, 515
 film and, 515–516
 Final Solution and, 516
 Joseph Goebbels and, 515
 Adolf Hitler and, 514–515
Mein Kampf and, 515
 People’s Receivers and, 515
 Red Cross and, 516
 schoolchildren and, 515
- Protestant churches, Germany, 516–518
 Confessing Church and, 517–518
 German Resistance and, 518
Kirchenkampf, 516
 Ministry of Church Affairs and, 517
 Nazis and, 516–517
 Pastors’ Emergency League, 517 theologians and, 516–517
- Protocols of the Elders of Zion*, 30, 518–519
 excerpts, 1058–1063
 mythology in, 518
 origins of, 518–519
- Provisional Committee for Aid to Jews, 737
- Przemysl ghetto, 62
- Public Broadcasting Service (PBS), 214
- Quddus, Marguerite Élias, 948–951
- Quisling, Vidkun, 521–522, 723 collaboration with Nazis, 521–522
 execution, 522

- invasion of Norway and, 521–522
nazification program for Norway, 521–522
- Rabe, John, 523–524
arrest, 524
denazification, 524
establishment of safety zones, 523 marker erected to, 524
Nanking Massacre, 523–524
Sino-Japanese War, 523
- Race and Population Resettlement Program (Rasse und Siedlungshauptamt, or RuSHA), 685
- “Racial hygiene,” 524–525
definition, 524
Nuremberg Laws, 525
rassenkampf, 4, 524
rassenschande, 268, 357–358, 524–525, 569, 1093
rasseverrat, 524
- Racial Protection Law, 357–358
- Racine, Mila “the Blue Beret,” 128
- Raczkiewicz, Wladyslaw, 508, 742
- Rademacher, Franz, 525–526
arrest, 526
bureaucracy and, 525–526
extermination camps, 525–526
regarding transport of Jews to Auschwitz, 1268–1270
sentence, 526
- Radium Institute, 480–481
- Randel, Izzy, 951–953
- Rape of Nanking, 523
- Rassenhygiene*, 8
- Rassenkampf* (“racial struggle”), 4, 524
- Rassenschande* (racial shame), 268, 357–358, 524–525, 569, 1093
- Ratlines, 526–527
definition of, 526
Nazi war criminals and, 527 routes, 526–527
Spain and, 526
Vatican City and, 526–527
- Rauff, Walter, 1266–1267
- Rausch, Otto, 55–56
- Rauter, Hans Albin, 466
- Ravensbrück, 133, 215, 276, 321, 429, 454, 527–528
medical experiments, 527
purpose of, 527
slave labor at, 527–528
survivor testimony, 936–938
- Reagan, Ronald, 387
- Recebedou, 176
- Redgrave, Vanessa, 550
- Refoulment, 528–529
definition, 528
passport laws, 528–529
Switzerland, 529
- Refugee Children Movement (RCM), 364
- Regulation for the Elimination of Jews from the Economic Life of Germany, 1104
- Reich Church, 59–62, 147–148
Aryan Paragraph and, 59
- Reich Citizenship Law, 529–530, 622–623
documentation, 1086–1087
Eleventh Decree, 136, 1115–1117
First Regulation, 390–391, 1088–1089
Tenth Decree, 1111–1112
Third Regulation, 1097–1099
Thirteenth Regulation, 1122–1123
- Reich Flight Tax, 530–531
extension of, 531
“unpatriotic desertion,” 530
- Reich Ministry of Economics, 273
- Reich Women, 578
- Reichenau, Walther von
order regarding conduct in the Eastern territories, 1231–1232
- Reichssicherheitshauptamt* (Reich Security Main Office, RSHA), 149, 235, 303–304, 356, 385, 531–532, 650 bureaucracy and, 531–532
establishment of, 531
services, 532
- Reichsverband der Juden in Deutschland* (Reich Association of Jews in Germany), 57
- Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland* (National Association of Jews in Germany), 57, 1111–1112
- Reichsvertretung der deutschen Juden* (Reich Representation of German Jews), 57
- Remembering Survival: Inside a Nazi Slave-Labor Camp*, 104
- Report from Alfred Rosenberg to Adolf Hitler on Confiscated Jewish Art Collections, 1154–1155
- Report on the Execution of Jews in Borrisow, 1234–1237
- Report on Anti-Jewish Propaganda, 1128–1129
- Report on the Liberation of Dachau, 1353–1356
- Report on the “Situation in War-Time Germany,” 1134–1136
- Report to the Secretary on the Acquiescence of This Government in the Murder of the Jews, 1344–1352
- Republic of Salo, 321
- Rescuers of Jews, 532–533
Ho Feng-Shan, 532
Maria Errazuriz, 532
Tina Strobos, 532
William L. Shirer, 532
- Reserve Police Battalion 101, 533–534
civilian massacres, 534

- Poland and, 533–534
reorganization, 534
- Resistance Movements, 534–536
concentration camps, 535–536
French, 535–536
German, 534–535
Polish, 534
- Resnais, Alain, 454, 469
- Reznik, Nissan, 371
- Rhineland Bastards, 536
designation, 536
sterilization of, 536
- Rhodes, Cecil, 423
- Rich, Betty, 954–957
- Riecke, Hans-Joachim, 1137–1138
- Riefenstahl, Leni, 536–538
Das Blaue Licht (The Blue Light), 537
Adolf Hitler and, 537
Nazi propaganda and, 537–538
support of Nazi Party, 537
Triumph des Willens (Triumph of the Will), 537
- Riegner, Gerhard Moritz, 5, 538–539
- Riegner Telegram, 5, 538–539
British Foreign Office and, 538 contents of, 538 sending of, 538 treatment of information, 539
United States and, 539
World Jewish Congress and, 538
- Riga, 539–540, 562–563
German Jews in, 539–540 ghetto, 539–540
Latvian Jews in, 539–540
prewar population of Jews, 539
- Righteous among the Nations, 540–541
awarded, 16, 20–21, 23, 61–63, 69, 81, 83, 91, 93, 95, 109, 112, 114, 120, 128, 148–149, 167–168, 178, 181–182, 203,
227–228, 241, 245, 248–249, 264, 266–267, 276, 278, 281,
295, 350, 355, 362, 371, 396, 403, 405–406, 414, 425, 487,
494–495, 498–500, 510–511, 533, 556, 564, 568–569, 575,
588, 590, 595, 613, 619, 627, 635, 639, 654, 664–665, 692– 693, 702–703, 718, 727–728, 736–737 characteristics of, 540 establishment of award, 540
purpose of, 540
- Ring-Bund, 132
- Ringelblum, Emanuel, 486, 541–542, 543, 739
deportation, 542
membership in Poale Zion, 541
Notes on the Refugees in Zbaszyn, 541
Oneg Shabbat, 486, 541–543, 697
Warsaw Uprising, 542
- Ringelblum Archive, 542–543 finding of archive, 543 master report, 543 missing archives, 543
Oneg Shabbat, 486, 541–543, 697
- Ringelblum, Uri, 542
- Ringelblum, Yehudis, 542
- Rips, Paul-Henri, 957–960
- Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, The*, 532, 592
- Rise and Fall of Weimar Democracy*, 437
- Ritter, Gerhard, 288
- Ritter, Karl, 1157–1158
- Ritter, Robert, 543–544
academic position, 544 anti-Roma racial policies, 543–544
death, 544
Eugenic and Population Biological Research Station, 544
- Robin, Moshe, 960–965
- Robota, Roza, 544–545
Birkenau, 544–545
execution, 544–545
smuggling inside camp, 544 revolt of the XII Sonderkommando, 544–545
- Rochler, Oskar, 423
- Röhm, Ernst, 76–77, 545–546, 624
arrest, 546
death, 546
homosexuality, 546
leader of the SA, 545
relationship with Adolf Hitler, 545–546
- Roitman, Jacques, 38
- Roitman, Paul, 38
- Rokossovsky, Konstantin, 700
- Roma and Sinti, 5, 174, 543–544, 546–547
deportation of, 547 history of, 546
Nazi racial policies and, 546–547
- Romania, 318–320, 547–549
concentration camps in, 548
Operation Barbarossa, 547–548
Romanian government, 547 war crimes trials in, 548
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 6–7, 194–196, 604, 661–662
decisions on Jewish refugees, 1340–1342 report on living conditions and needs of displaced persons, 1356–1363
Report to the Secretary on the Acquiescence of This Government in the Murder of the Jews, 1344–1352
“To Theater Commanders on Rescue and Relief to Jews and Other Victims,” 1352–1353

- Roosevelt, Theodore, 387
- Rosé, Alma, 449, 549–550
 death, 550
 deportation to Auschwitz, 549
Madchenorchester von Auschwitz, 549–550
Playing for Time, 550
 written accounts about, 550
- Rosé, Arnold, 449, 549
- Rosen, Willy, 449
- Rosenbaum, Pinchas, 550–551
 Hungarian resistance, 550
 Mossad, 550
Walking with the Enemy, 550
- Rosenberg, Alfred, 3, 179, 551
 directions for the handling of the Jewish Question, 1201–1202 regarding confiscated Jewish art collections, 1154–1155
 regarding confiscation of French cultural goods, 1190–1191
- Rosenberg, Elsie, 965–969
- Rosenberg, Joseph, 969–971
- Rosenbloom, Fela, 971–974
- Rosenstrasse Protest, 551–553
 arrests during, 552
Fabrikaktion, 551
 German resistance, 552–553
 Josef Goebbels and, 552–553
- Rosin, Arnost, 52
- Ross, Rita, 974–976
- Roth, John K., 557
- Roth, Marianne, 976–978
- Rothaug, Oswald, 357–358, 553–555
 arrest, 554
 death, 555
 Katzenberger trial, 554
 member of the NSDAP, 554
 Nuremberg's Special Court, appointment to, 553–554 sentence, 554
- Rothmund, Marc, 577
- Röthke, Heinz, 150
- Rotschild-Galerkin, Steve, 978–980
- Rotta, Angelo, 498, 555–556 establishment of International Ghetto, 555 exile, 556
 protests, 555–556
 rescue activities, 555–556
- Rottenburg, Marcus, 33
- Rowno ghetto, 1213–1215
- Royal Dutch Shell Oil Company, 68
- Royal Warrant, 422
- Rubenstein, Richard L., 556–558, 640
After Auschwitz: Radical Theology and Contemporary Judaism, 556–557
The Age of Triage, 557
The Cunning of History: Mass Death and the American Future, 557
 “death of God” notion and, 557 notion of “surplus people,” 558 post-Holocaust theology, 556–557
- Rufeisen, Oswald, 558–559
 conversion to Catholicism, 558
 Jewish identity and, 559
 Naliboki Forest partisans, 558–559
- Rugemer, Edward, 486–487
- Rumbula Massacre, 559–560
 Latvian collaborators and, 559
 Riga ghetto liquidation, 559–560
 war crimes trials and, 560
- Rumkowski, Mordecai Chaim, 80, 409
- Ruoff, Henrick, 274
- Rupprecht, Philipp, 1130
- Ruhr University, 437
- Russian National Liberation Army, 130, 481
- Saager, Irene, 423
- Sacerdoti, Virrotio Emanuele, 95
- Sachsenhausen, 36, 133, 527, 561–562, 564, 683
 conditions at, 561
 detainees at, range of, 561
 liquidation of, 561
- Sakowicz, Kazimierz, 980–983
- Salamandra (Sunrise Over Hell)*, 171
- Salaspils, 562–563 concentration camp at, 562–563 death rate, 563
 development of, 563
 liberation of, 563
 Rumbala massacre, 562
- Salkaházi, Sára, 563–564
 Catholic Church and, 563–564
 Girls' Homes, 564
 Hungarian Catholic Working Women's Movement, 564
 martyrdom, 564
 Society of the Sisters of Social Service, 563–564
- Salomon, Albert, 564
- Salomon, Charlotte, 564–565
 birth, 564
Life? or Theatre?, 564–565
 occupation of Poland, 565
- Salonika, 565–566
 as the “Jerusalem of the Balkans,” 565
 Babylonian Exile of the Jews from Judea, 565

- Nazi occupation of, 565–566
 newspaper reports on, 566
 slave labor, 566
- San Girolamo degli Illirici Seminary College, 527
- San Marino, 435
- Sandy, Kitty, 983–985
- Sanz Briz, Ángel, 497, 607
- Sarfatti, Margherita, 320
- Sarfatti, Michele, 320
- Sargent, Joseph, 550
- Sartre, Jean-Paul, 713
- Sauckel, Fritz, 566–567
 Nuremberg Trials, 566–567
 execution, 567
 promotions within the Nazi Party, 566–567
 slave labor and, 566–567
 World War I, 566
- Scavenius, Erik, 126
- Schacter, Herschel, 567–568
 accompanying refugees to Israel, 568 as chief rabbi at Mosholu Jewish Center, 568 Buchenwald liberation and, 567
- Schächter, Rafael, 450
- Schaulen ghetto, 1212–1213
- Schillinger, Josef, 419–420
- Schindler, Oskar, 228, 356, 541, 568–570 arrested for Rassenschande, 569 factory in Brunnlitz, 570
 protection of workers, 568–570
Schindler's List, 568–571
Schindlerjuden, 568–569
 slave labor and, 568–569
 survivor testimony, 1008–1013
- Schindler's Ark*, 569
- Schindler's Jews, 570
 factory in Brunnlitz, 570
 protection of workers, 570
- Schindler's List*, 568–569, 570–571, 630
 Academy Awards, 570
 plot, 570–571
 Shoah Visual History Foundation, 571
 Steven Spielberg and, 570–571
- Schlegelberger, Franz, 268, 453, 571–573
 Jewish Question and, 572
 Judges' Trial in Nuremberg, 571
- "The Justice Case," 1385–1386
 Reich Justice Office, 571–572 release from prison, 573
 Wannsee Conference, 572
- Schlosser, Maurice, 109
- Schmeling, Max, 573–575
 birth and childhood, 573
 defeat at Yankee Stadium, 573–574 friendships with other boxers, 574
Ich Boxte mich durchs Leben, 574 induction into the International Boxing Hall of Fame, 574
 Kristallnacht, 574
 Nazi propaganda and, 574
 Olympic Games, 573–574
- Schmid, Anton, 575–576
 arrest, 575
 assignment at Vilna, 575
 resistance activities, 575
- Schmid, Jakob, 577
- Schmitt, Carl, 677
- Schmorell, Alexander, 577, 678
- Scholem, Gershom, 57
- Scholl, Hans and Sophie, 576–578
 execution, 577
 People's Court trial, 577
 University of Munich, 577
Weisse Rose, 576–577, 678, 710
- Scholtz-Klink, Gertrud, 578
 as the Reich Women's Führerin, 578
 National Socialist Women's League (NSFrauenschaft), 578
 "To Be German Is to Be Strong" speech, 578
- Schönerer, Georg Ritter von, 578–579
Alldeutsches Tagblatt, 579
 Catholic Church and, 579
 German Volkstum, 579 leader of the Alldeutsche Bewegung, 579
 racial theories, 578–579
Unverfälschte Worte, 579
- Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard, 579–580
 arrest, 580
 ascension in Generalgouvernement, 579–580
 birth and childhood, 579
 execution, 580
 Final Solution, 580
 Wannsee Conference, 579–580
- Schotte, Marie, 618–619
- Schutzhaft, 580–581, 603, 919–923 arrests under, 580–581
 "concentrated," 581
 definition of, 580
 for Jewish race defilers, 1093
- Schutzstaffel, 581–582
 Allgemeine-SS, 582
 creation of, 581
 Heinrich Himmler and, 581–582
 Adolf Hitler and, 581–582
 "Jews, What's Next?" article, 1132–1134

- Uniforms, 581
- Waffen-SS, 582
- Schwarcz, Ilona Elefánt, 985–990
- Schwartz, Baba, 990–991
- Schwartz Haufen, 132
- Sears, Charles B., 211–212
- Second Generation, 582–583
 - definition, 582
 - post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), 582
 - studies of, 582
 - Third Generation versus, 583
 - “transmitted trauma,” 582
- Segerstedt, Torgny, 584–585
 - advertising sponsors, 584
 - Handelstidningen*, 584
 - Kristallnacht and, 584
 - resistance to Nazism, 584
- Seidel, Norman, 482
- Seiler, Irene, 357–358, 525, 554
- Seiwaltstätter, Brunhilde, 255
- Selinger, Shelomo, 176
- Serbia, 585–586
 - Jews in, 585–586
 - Judenfrei*, 586
 - occupation of, 585–586
 - occupation, impact of, 586
 - Romani in, 585–586
- Sermer, Zuzana, 992–994
- Seyss-Inquart, Arthur, 27, 451, 469, 586–587
 - deputy governor of Poland, 586
 - execution, 587
 - Nuremberg Trials, 587
 - persecution of Dutch Jews, 586–587
- Shaffner, Franklin J., 715
- Shanghai Ghetto, 587–588
 - air raids on, 588
 - conditions in, 588
 - plan for, 587
 - refugee Jews in China, 587–588
- Sharp, Waitsill and Martha, 588–589
 - escape from Prague, 588
 - Hadassah, the Women’s Zionist Organization, 589
 - National Security Resources Board, 589
 - Unitarian Service Committee, 588
- Sharpe, Annita, 994–999
- Shawcross, Hartley, 421
- She’erit Ha-plaitah* (“The Saving Remnant”), 173
- Sheptytsky, Andrey, 589–590
 - Catholic Church and, 590
 - offer of sanctuary to Jews, 589–590
 - response to Nazis, 590
- World War I, 589
- Sheptytsky, Klementiy, 590
- Shirer, Theresa (Stiberitz), 590–591
- Shirer, William L., 532, 590–592
 - Berlin Diary: The Journal of a Foreign Correspondent, 1934–1941*, 591
 - position at Chicago Tribune, 591
 - reportage on Nazi activities, 590–592
 - resistance activities, 591
 - The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich*, 592
- Shiviti: A Vision*, 171
- Shoah, 592, 727
 - definition of, 592
 - origin of term, 592
- Shoah*, 63, 592–593
 - awards, 593
 - director, 592–593
 - interviews, 592
- Shoes on the Danube Promenade, 447
- Sicherheitsdienst (SD, Intelligence Service), 58, 149, 303, 593
 - agents of, 593
 - founding of, 593
 - purpose of, 593
- Sikelianos, Angelos, 148
- Sikorski, Wladyslaw, 508, 742
- Silberbauer, Karl, 715
- Silkin, Samuel C., 422
- Silverman, Samuel, 5
- Silverman, Sidney, 538
- Sima, Horia, 319
- Simens-Schuckertwerke, 65
- Simon, Sidney, 999–1001
- Simon Wiesenthal Center, 105, 715–716
- Simonides, Vasilis, 566
- Sino-Japanese War, 229, 523
- Sippenhaft, 593–594
 - definition of, 593
 - Heinrich Himmler and, 594
 - kin punishment and, 594
 - legal principal of, 593–594
- Skarzysko-Kamienna, 1041–1044
- Skorzeny, Otto, 105
- Skurnik, Leo, 208
- Slatcha, Margit, 563, 594–595
 - education and career, 594
 - Sisters of Social Service, 594–595
 - Society of the Social Mission, 594
 - Voice of the Spirit*, 595
 - work with refugees, 595
- Slave labor, 315–316, 439–440, 595–597
 - children and, 596

- conditions at camps, 596–597
- documentation, 1281–1284, 1320–1321
- survivor testimony, 831–833
- women and, 596
- Slavs, 597–598
 - Eindeutschungsfähige*, 598
 - 19th century German opinion of, 597
 - origin of term, 597
 - Third Reich and, 597–598
- Slovakia, 598–599
 - deportations from, 599
 - “Jewish Code,” 598
 - Jews in, 598–599
 - occupation of, 598–599
- Small Defense Plants Administration, 637
- Smetana, Friedrich, 435
- SNCF, 100
- Sneetches and Other Stories*, 125
- Soares, Mário, 168
- Sobibór, 134, 151, 304, 496–497, 508, 527, 599–600, 650
 - closing of, 600
 - establishment of, 599
 - executions at, 599–600
 - revolt, 600, 1330–1334
- Social Darwinism, 4, 31, 600–601
 - definition of, 600
 - Law on the Prevention of Reproduction by Those with Inherited Disorders, 601
 - Marriage Health Law, 601
 - Nazi adoption of, 600–601
 - Nuremberg Race Laws, 601
 - racism and, 600
- Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français, 601–602
 - Holocaust Rail Justice Act, 601
 - lawsuits against, 601
 - reparations, 601–602
- Society for Exploitation of Textiles and Leatherworks, 507
- Society of the Sisters of Social Service, 563
- Solf Circle, 681
- Sohlberg Circle, 12
- Solan, Gerta, 1001–1002
- Soli Deo Gloria youth movement, 604
- Solidarité juive*, 130
- Sondergericht, 602–603
 - courts and, 602–603
 - executions, 603
 - opposition to Nazis and, 603
 - passage of the Enabling Act, 602
 - Reichstag Fire Decree, 602
- Sonderkommando, 51, 56, 384, 419, 603–604, 620
 - affidavit of Paul Blobel regarding activities, 1250–1251
 - definition of, 603
 - prisoners chosen for, 603
 - revolt, 603–604
 - slave labor, 603
- Sophie Scholl, Die letzten Tage*, 577
- Soos, Géza, 604–605
 - emigration to the U.S., 605
 - escape from Auschwitz of Vrba and Wetzler, 604
 - Good Shepherd Committee of the Reformed Church, 604
 - Hungarian resistance, 604–605
 - testimony, 604
- Soviet Union, 605–606
 - documentation regarding occupation, 1234–1237
 - invasion of, 22, 55–56, 230, 246, 316, 368, 404–405, 510–511, 559–560, 605–606, 635, 673
 - order regarding conduct in the Eastern territories, 1231–1232
 - report on the execution of Jews in Borrisow, 1234–1237
 - Operation Barbarosa, 2, 32, 79, 101, 230, 246, 316, 368, 472, 487, 509, 547, 605, 673
 - survivor testimony, 900–903
- Spain, 606–607, 724
 - Civil War, 320, 497, 606–607
 - history of Jews in, 606
 - immigration regulations, 606
 - Jewish refugees, 607
- Spartakusbund*, 703–704
- Speer, Albert, 391, 607–608, 722
 - birth, 607
 - bureaucracy and, 607–608
 - Inside the Third Reich*, 608
 - International Military Tribunal trial, 608
 - Nuremberg rally, 607–608
 - Spandau Prison sentence, 608
 - Spandau: The Secret Diaries*, 608
- Spiegel, Fred, 1002–1004
- Spiegelman, Art, 424–425
- Spielberg, Steven, 569–571, 630, 665
- SS Patria, 621
- SS St. Louis, 608–611
 - Cuba, 608–610
 - Joint Distribution Committee, 609–610
 - return to Europe, 610
 - survivor testimony, 794–799
 - United States, 609
- SS-Totenkopfverbände, 3, 581–582, 507, 611, 685, 687
 - forced labor camps under, 611
 - Inspectorate of Concentration Camps, 611
 - uniforms, 611
- St. Hedwig’s Cathedral, 611–613
 - Bishop Konrad Graf von Preysing, 611–613

- Catholic Church and, 611–613
 Father Bernard Lichtenberg, 612–613
 Margarete Sommer, 612–613
 resistance activities, 611–613
- Stabenow, Paul, 744
- Stahel, Reiner, 700
- Stahlecker, Franz Walter, 386
- Stalin, Joseph, 69, 132, 287, 306, 497, 605–606, 701
- Stangl, Franz, 527, 613–614, 650, 652
 Anschluss and, 613
 Austrian Nazi Party, 613 escape to Brazil, 613
Into that Darkness: An Examination of Conscience, 613
- Staniewicz, Leizer, 333
- Star of Ashes*, 171
- Starzynski, Stefan, 741
- Stein, Edith, 614–615
 beatification of, 615
 Catholic Church and, 614–615
 deportation to Auschwitz, 615
- Steinberg, Joseph, 1004–1005
- Steinbrinck, Otto, 211
- Steinbrink, Werner, 66
- Steinhoff, Hans, 423
- Sterilization, 209, 431, 615–616
 letter to Heinrich Himmler regarding sterilization, 1270–1271 prisoners chosen for, 616 proposal regarding, 1267–1268
 rationale for, 615–616
- Stern, Itzhak, 569
- Stern, Max, 1006–1008
- Stern Gang, 357
- Sterner, Willie, 1008–1013
- Stille, Alexander, 320
- Stolier, David, 621
- Stoller, Sam, 485
- Stone, Nina, 1013–1015
- Strasberg, Susan, 170
- Strassberg, Lee, 170
- Straus, Adolf, 421
- Streicher, Julius, 515, 617–618
 April 1 boycott, 617
 arrest, 617
 Beer Hall Putsch, 617
Der Stürmer excerpts, 1129–1130, 1182
- Strippel, Arnold, 467
- Strobos, Robert, 618
- Strobos, Tina, 532, 618–619
 awards received, 619
 false identity papers, issuing, 618
 family, 618
 resistance activities, 618
- Stroop, Jürgen, 148, 619–621, 699–700
 birth and childhood, 619
 purge of anti-Nazi Germans, 619
 “The Warsaw Ghetto is No More,” 1322–1327
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 620
- Stroop, Katherine, 619
- Stroop, Konrad, 619
- Struma* disaster, 621–622
 Britain and, 621
 Jewish refugees and, 621–622
 Palestine and, 621
 Turkey and, 621
- Stuckart, Wilhelm, 454, 622–623
 as the chairman of the Reich Committee for the Protection of German Blood, 622–623
 Final Solution and, 623
 Nuremberg race laws, 622–623
 Reporting Obligations of Deformed Newborns, ”623
 Wannsee conference, 623
- Sturmabteilung, 77, 623–625
 creation of, 624
 Adolf Hitler and, 624–625
 Kristallnacht and, 625
 Ernst Roehm and, 624–625
 uniforms, 624
- Stürmer, Michael, 288
- Stutthof, 625–626
 deaths at, 625–626
 liberation, 626
 slave labor at, 625–626
 survivor testimony, 1029–1031
- Subhuman, The*, 1132
- Sugihara, Chiune, 229, 541, 626–627
 at the Japanese embassy in Helsinki, 627
 Jewish refugees and, 627
 recognition for humanitarian work, 627
- Sugihara, Yukiko, 627
- Survivor Testimony, 627–629
 context: before the war, 782–787, 794–799, 839–841, 861–863, 887–891, 895–897, 919–923, 965–969, 976–978
 context: Central Europe, 815–817, 833–834, 837–839, 855–859, 869–876, 903–905, 909–910, 969–971, 983–985, 990–994, 1001–1002, 1004–1008, 1013–1015, 1021–1025
 context: concentration camps and prisons, 778–780, 827–833, 835–837, 871–872, 908–909, 910–913, 927–932, 936–937, 957–960, 963–965, 971–972, 1008–1013, 1029–1031, 1034–1036, 1041–1044

- context: Eastern Europe, 773–776, 791–792, 799–802, 819–822, 848–851, 865–867, 883–887, 899–900, 905–907, 917–919, 954–957, 960–963, 1015–1021, 1046–1049
- context: evading the Nazis, 808–811
- context: evading persecution, 787–794, 817–819, 822–827, 864–865, 876–877, 892–895, 900–903, 915–917, 925–927, 942–943, 974–976, 978–980, 997–1001, 1025–1026, 1044–1046
- context: extermination camps and sites, 776–778, 859–861, 867–869, 880–883, 891–892, 913–915, 938–942, 944–948, 972–974, 980–983, 1036–1038
- context: salvation, 771–773, 780–782, 834–835, 863–864, 877–880, 937–938, 951–953, 985–990, 1031–1034, 1038–1041
- context: Western Europe, 811–815, 841–848, 851–855, 897–899, 923–925, 932–936, 948–951, 994–997, 1002–1004
- Süskind*, 630
- Süskind, Frieda, 629
- Süskind, Johanna, 629
- Süskind, Walter, 629–630
- deportation to Auschwitz, 630
 - managing the Hollandsche Schouwburg (Dutch Theater), 629–630
 - rescue of Jewish children, 629–630
 - Suskind*, 630
- Sweden, 630–631
- Jewish refugees and, 631
 - neutrality, 630–631
 - Red Cross, 467, 577, 631, 692, 708, 409
- Switzerland, 631–632
- border closed to refugees, 631–632
 - Jewish refugees and, 631–632
 - neutrality, 631
- Szálasi, Ferenc, 497, 632–633
- Arrow Cross Party, 632–633
 - occupation of Hungary and, 632–633
 - Plan for the Construction of the Hungarian State*, 632
- Szedlecki, Ann, 1015–1018
- Székely, Mária, 604
- Szenes, Béla, 633
- Szenes, Hannah, 334, 633–634
- “Ashrei Hagafurur” (Blessed Is the Match”), 634
 - diary, 634
 - family, 633
 - Halikha LeKesariya* (A Walk to Caesarea”), 634
 - Palmach and, 634
 - Zionism and, 634
- Szent-Iványi, Domokos, 604
- Szeptycki, Andreas Alexander, 634–635
- Catholic Church and, 634–635
 - German invasion of the Soviet Union, 635
 - sheltering Jews, 635
 - World War I and, 635
- Szpilman, Wladyslaw, 449, 502
- Tasmania, 481–483
- Tauber, Tova, 1018–1019
- Taubman, Rachel (Rose), 371
- Taylor, C. P., 254
- Taylor, Myron, 195–196
- Taylor, Telford, 421, 637–638
- The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Biography*, 637
 - McCarthyism and, 637
 - Nuremberg Trials, 637
- Tec, Nehama, 540
- Tedesco, Claudio, 95
- Tedesco, Luciana, 95
- Tehlirian, Soghomon, 701
- Ten Boom, Corrie, 638–639
- deportation to Ravensbrück, 638
 - Dutch Reformed Church, 638–639
 - The Hiding Place*, 639
 - raid on house, 638
 - resistance activities, 638–639
- Ten Boom, Willem, 638
- Tenebaum, Mordecai, 739
- Terberger, Herman, 211
- Ternopol (Ternopil), 486–487
- Terrible Things: An Allegory of the Holocaust*, 125
- Tesch, Bruno, 743–744
- Tesch & Stabenow, 743–744
- Teudt, Wilhelm, 639–640
- Aryan version of Bible, 639–640
 - Germanic archaeology, 640
 - joining the German National People’s Party, 639
 - Nazification of the Church, 640
- Theological responses to the Holocaust, 640–643
- Catholic Church and, 641–642
 - Emil L. Fackenheim, 640–641
 - Franklin H. Littell, 641–642
 - Harry James Cargas, 641
 - Irving Greenberg, 641
 - Protestant churches and, 642
 - Richard L. Rubenstein, 640
 - United Methodist Church, 642
 - World Conference of Churches (WCC), 642
- Theresienstadt, 36, 57, 272, 318, 643, 703
- liberation of, 834–835
 - literature and, 406
 - music at, 449

- Thierack, Otto, 643–644, 678
 “Administration of Justice Against Poles, Russians, Jews, and Gypsies,” 1337–1338
 “Criminal Procedures Against Poles and Members of the Eastern People,” 1338–1339
- Third Reich, 644–645
 definition of, 644–645
 Adolf Hitler and, 645
 Nazi propagandists and, 645 support for, 645
- Thon, Elsa, 1019–1021
- Tillemann, Annette, 387
- Tillion, Germaine, 527
- Times, The*, 566
- Tiso, Jozef, 598–599, 645–646
 escape to Austria, 646 founding the Slovak People’s Party (SPP), 645
 Hlinka Guards and, 645
 Nazis and, 645
- Tito, Josip Broz, 141, 634, 666
- Todt, Fritz, 440
- Tojo, Hideki, 229
- Tomasov, Agnes, 1021–1023
- Topography of Terror, 646–647 educational facilities, 647 first exhibition, 646
 location of, 646
 permanent exhibitions, 646–647
- Total war and the Holocaust, 647–648
 characteristics of, 647
 definition of, 647
 versus “limited war,” 647
- Tour de France, 60
- Touvier, Paul, 648–649
 occupation of France and, 648–649
 pardon, 649
 trial, 649
- Touvier Case, 648–649
 “crimes against humanity” charge, 648 pardon, 649
 trial, 649
- Trawniki men, 649–650
 Operation Reinhard, 649 stationing at concentration camps, 650 training, 649–650
- Treaty of Trianon, 305
- Treaty of Versailles, 305, 389, 704
- Treblinka, 24, 107, 134, 150–151, 226, 234, 304, 369, 436, 508, 527, 542, 650–653
 I, 650
 II, 650–651
 deportation trains, 651–652 documentation on, 1036–1038, 1327–1330 filming in, 592
 revolt, 535–536, 651, 1036–1038, 1327–1330
- Triumph of the Spirit*, 653 reception of, 653
 subject matter, 653
- Trocme, André and Magda, 541, 653–654
 Ecole Nouvelle Cevenole, 653
 Jewish refugees, 654
 Le Chambon-sur-Lignon rescue efforts, 653–654
- The Truce*, 654–655
 actors, 654
 director, 654
 plot, 654–655
- Truffaut, François, 469
- Truman, Harry S., 172 letter to Eisenhower in response to the Harrison report, 1363–1364
- Tüdös, Ilona, 605
- Turkey, 655–656
 Jews in, 655–656
 neutrality, 655
 World War I, 655
- Twisted Road to Auschwitz: Nazi Policy toward German Jews, 1933–39*, The, 230
- Uj Kelet*, 356
- Ukraine, 657–658
 documentation regarding use of gas vans, 1266–1267
 occupation of, 589–590
 use of gas vans in, 1266–1267
- Ullmann, Viktor, 449–450
- Ulmanis, Karlis, 387–388
- UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 237, 658–659
Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress, 658
 Ralph Lemkin and, 658
 UN definition of genocide, 658
- UN Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (YNNRA), 172
- Underground Life: Memoirs of a Gay Jew in Nazi Berlin*, An, 67
- Ungar, Otto, 271–272
- Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej, or ZWZ), 332–333
- Union of Military Organization (Związek Organizacji Wojskowej, or ZOW), 503
- Union of French Jews, 149
- United Australia Party, 482
- United Partisan Organization, 132, 659–660, 673
 establishment of, 659
 Vilna Jewish Council (Judenrat), 659

- Vilna ghetto, 659–660
 Vilna revolt, 660
 United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 447, 660–661, 713 exhibits, 660–661
 International Holocaust Remembrance Day at, 661 primary function of, 660
 United States Holocaust Memorial Council, 228
 U.S. National Film Registry, 259
 United Palestine Appeal, 356
 United States response to the Holocaust, 661–662
 Blood for Goods and, 662
 Evian Conference, 661
 Roosevelt and, 661–662
 World War I and, 661
United States of America v. Alfred Krupp, et al., 377–379
United States of America v. Josef Alstötter, et. al., 1385–1386
United States of America v. Karl Brandt et al., 173
 Universal Declaration on Human Rights, 9
 Universal News Service, 591
 Universities, complicity in the Holocaust, 662–663
 Aryan paragraph and, 662
 Law against Overcrowding in Schools and Universities, 663
 Nazification, 662
 Reich minister of education and, 663
Universum Film Aktiengesellschaft, 169
Unser Worth (Our Worth), 131
Unverfälschte Worte, 579
Uprising, 664
 actors in, 664 critical acclaim for, 664
 director, 664
 Warsaw Ghetto Revolt in, 664
 Upstander, 664–665
 definition of, 664
 Holocaust, 664–665
 modern context, 664–665
 Uris, Leon, 126
 USC Shoah Foundation, 665–666 archival material, 665
 establishment of, 665
 Holocaust education, 665–666
 Ustashe, 666, 724, 733 ethnic cleansing policy, 666 nationalism and, 666
 partisans and, 666
 Yugoslav resistance to, 666
 Vaivara, 667–668
 death marches, 667
 living conditions at, 667
 slave labor at, 667
 war crimes trials and, 668
 Vallat, Xavier, 149–150
 Vali, Ferenc, 604
 Van der berg, Rudolf, 630
 Van Eupen, Theodor, 650
 Van Geelkerten, Cornelius, 450, 465
 Van Genechten, Robert, 466
 Van Tonningen, Meinoud Marinus Rost, 465–466
 Van Wesel, Arnold, 449
Varian's War, 228
 Veessenmayer, Edmund, 1157–1158, 1286–1287
 Vegh, Claudine, 1023–1025
 Vel d'Hiv Roundup, 97, 668–669
 implementation of, 668–669
 markers commemorating, 669
 occupation of France and, 668
 organization of, 668
 Venezia, Shlomo, 669–670
 Auschwitz-Birkenau, 669
 Inside the Gas Chambers: Eight Months in Sonderkommando at Auschwitz, 670 Sonderkommando duties, 669 public speaking, 670
 Venice Film Festival, 423
 Veress, László (Leslie), 604
Verfuegunstruppe. See Waffen-SS
 Verhoeven, Miichael, 577
 Veseli, Fatima, 16
 Veseli, Hamid, 16
 Veseli, Vesel, 16
 Veseli, Xhemal, 16
 Vichy France, 14, 17, 97, 128, 150, 321, 389, 648–649, 670–672
 D-Day, 671
 Franco-German Armistice, 670
 free zone, ” 670
 Philippe Pétain, 670–671 resistance against, 671–672 war crimes prosecutions, 672
 Victor Emmanuel III, 258
 Victoria, 20
 “Vienna Model,” 104–105
 Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, 549
 Vienna State Opera, 549
 Vilna ghetto, 370–372, 509, 672–674
 liberation, 660, 673
 liquidation of, 673
 Ponary Forest partisans, 673
 Soviet Army and, 673
 survivor testimony, 835–837, 865–867
 Villard, Oswald Garrison, 470
 Vittel, 674–675

- American Joint Distribution Committee, 675 liberation, 674
 19th century, 675
 Red Cross, 675
- Vlaams National Verbond (Flemish National Union), 33
- Vlasov, Andrey, 130
- Vlock, Laurel, 214
- Volk, 675–676
Blut und Boden (“blood and soil”), 676
 definition of, 675
 “Final Solution to the Jewish Problem,” 676
 Nazis and, 676
 popularization of the term, 676
 romanticizing of, 676
- Volk ohne Raum*, 676
- Völkischer Beobachter* (“People’s Observer”), 179, 484
 “Jews Banned from Universities,” 1104–1105
- Volksgemeinschaft, 676–677
 Ferdinand Tonne, 676
 Adolf and, 677
 Nazi racial hierarchy and, 676–677
- Volksgerichtshof (People’s Court), 577, 677–679 death penalty and, 678 forming of, 677 hearings, 678
 “Judges’ Privilege,” 678
 purpose of, 677
 resistance groups and, 678
- Volksverweiring (“People’s Defense”), 33
- Volpi, Giuseppe, 320
- Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei (From Kaiserhof to the Reich Chancellery)*, 253
- Vom Rath, Ernst, 663, 1159–1160
- Von Bismark, Otto, 579
- Von Brauchitsch, Walther, 421
- Von Epenstein, Hermann, 254
- Von Faulhaber, Michael, 679
 Catholic Church and, 679
 sermons on Nazi racial policies, 679
- Von Freudiger, Fülöp, 356
- Von Hindenburg, Paul, 1071–1072
- Von Lauhousen, Erwin, 1128–1129
- Von Lewinski, Fritz Erich, 421
- Von Moltke, Helmuth James, 577, 679–681 criticism of Adolf Hitler, 680
 execution, 680
Lowenberger Arbeitsgemeinschaften, 679
 marriage, 680
 People’s Court hearing, 680–681
- Von Papen, Franz, 1379
- Von Paulus, Friedrich, 421
- Von Preysing, Konrad, 403, 611–613
- Von Ribbentrop, Joachim, 391, 526, 551
 American Jews living in Germany and reporting of Jewish Property, 1096–1097 regarding instruction on speeding up evacuation of Jews from Europe, 1157
- Von Rundstedt, Gerd, 421
- Von Schlabrendorff, Fabian, 679
- Von Schuschnigg, Kurt, 27
- Von Sonnenberg, Max Liebermann, 335
- Von Stauffenberg, Klaus, 385
- Von Thadden, Eberhard, 526
- Voticky, Anka, 1025–1026
- Vrba, Rudolf, 52–53, 681–682, 1289–1306
 escape from Auschwitz, 681–682
Escape from Auschwitz: I Cannot Forgive, 681 meeting with Slovak Jewish Council at Žilina, 681 trial of Adolf Eichmann, 681–682
- Vrba-Wetzler Report, 1289–1306
- Vught, 682–683
 collaborators held at, 683
 deaths at, 682–683
 establishment of, 682
 function of camp, 682
- Waffen-SS, 685–687
 Adolf Hitler, 685, 687
 Heinrich Himmler, 685
 motto, 686
 mystique and symbolism, 686–687
 Race and Population Resettlement program, 685
 SS formations, 687
 SS Inspectorate, 686
Sturmabanne, 685–686
Verfügungstruppe, 685
Wirtschafts und Verwaltungs Hauptamt (WVHA), 685
- Wagner, Richard, 579, 688–690
 anti-Semitism, 690
Art and Revolution, The Art Work of the Future, A Communication to My Friends, 690 association with Adolf Hitler, 690
Das Liebesverbot (The Ban on Love), 688
The Flying Dutchman, 688
Lohengrin, 689
Parsifal, 690–691
Rienzi, 688
The Ring of the Nibelung, 690
Symphony in C Major, 688
Tannhauser, 688
Tristan und Isolde, 690
- Wagowska, Halina, 1026–1031

- Wahlmann, Adolf, 274
- Wajda, Andrzej, 369
- Wajnapel, David
 affidavit describing the role of SS in deportations and extermination camps, 1272–1273
- Wajnryb, Abraham, 1031–1034
- Waldheim, Kurt, 690–691
- Waldheim Affair, 690–691
 Austrian presidential election, 690–691 association with Nazis, 690–691
- Walking with the Enemy*, 550
- Wallenberg, Raoul, 228, 498, 540, 604, 631, 691–693
 arrest, 693
 death, 693
 protective passports issued to Jews, 691–692
 Swedish Red Cross and, 692–693
- Walter, Bernhard, 52
- Walther, Irene, 65–66
- Wannsee Conference, 3, 103–104, 169, 316, 693–695
 attendees, 694
 Final Solution, 694
 purpose of, 693–694
- Wannsee Protocol, 1255–1260
- War Against the Jews, 1933–1945, The*, 150–151
- War crimes, 695
 definition of, 695
 Holocaust and, 695
 legal concept of, 695
- War Refugee Board, 7, 695–696
 estimation of prisoners gassed at Auschwitz and Birkenau, 1284
 “To Theater Commanders on Rescue and Relief to Jews and
 Other Victims,” 1352–1353
- Warsaw Ghetto, 22, 24–25, 246, 328–331, 355, 486, 541–543, 675, 696–698, 739–740
 liquidation, 1219–1220
 “Jewish food situation, 1217–1218
 Oneg Shabbat, 486, 541–543, 697
 survivor testimony, 883–887, 905–907
- Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 24, 269, 333, 436, 449, 619–620, 664, 698–700, 728, 741–742
 cause of, 699–700
 General Jurgen Stroop’s report on, 1322–1327
 Jewish Fighting Organization, 22, 25, 180–181, 246, 328–330, 334, 411, 535, 698–700, 739–740
- Warsaw Rising, 700–701
 deportations after, 701
 German invasion of Poland, 700–701
 Soviet invasion of Poland, 700
- Warsaw Zoo, 735–737
- Wassa, Bluma, 542
- Wasser, Hersh, 542
- Wassermann, Oskar, 402
- Wdowinski, Dawid, 333
- Wegner, Armin T., 701–702
 Armenian genocide and, 701
 arrest, 702
Der Schrei von Ararat (The Scream from Ararat), 701
Five Fingers over You, 701
 Protesting Adolf Hitler’s treatment of the Jews, 701–702
 World War I, 701
- Wehler, Hans-Ulrich, 288
- Weidt, Otto, 702–703
 deliveries to camps, 703
Fabrikaktion, 703
 factory, 702–703
 Museum Blindenwerkstatt Otto Weidt, 703 orphanage for child survivors of the war, 703 workshop for the blind, 702–703
- Weimer Republic, 703–705
 Beer Hall Putsch, 705
 communism and, 704 economic conditions of Germany, 705 elections, 703
 National Assembly and, 703–704 negative reaction to Constitution, 704 proclamation of, 703
- Weinbacher, Karl, 743
- Weiss, Bernhard, 211–212
- Weiss, Helga, 705–706
 deportation to Auschwitz, 705–706
Helga’s Diary: A Young Girl’s Account of Life in a Concentration Camp, 706
- Weiss, Martin, 466
- Weissmandl, Chaim Michael Ber, 210, 681
- Weitzenhof, Arnold, 1034–1036
- Weizsaecker, Ernst von, 1155–1156
- Weltsch, Robert, 706–707
Judische Rundschau, 706
 Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, 1077–1078
 “Wear it with Pride, the Yellow Badge!,” 707
- Werfel, Franz, 228
- Wertheim, Rudolf and Barbara, 716
- Wesse, Suzanne, 65
- Westerbork, 707–708
 conversion to concentration camp, 707–708 demolition of, 708 refugees at, 707
 transports from, 708
- Wetzler, Alfred, 52–53, 1289–1306
- Weyler y Nicolau, Valeriano, 132

- When Memory Comes*, 226
- Whitaker, Josie, 254
- White Buses, 467, 708–709
 Catholic Church and, 709
 Norwegian government and, 708–709
 Swedish Red Cross and, 708–709
- White Paper, 621
- White Rose, 576, 678, 709–710
 arrest of members, 710
 founding of, 710
 pamphlets, 710
 University of Hamburg and, 709–710
- White Rose Foundation, 710
- White Rose International, 710
- Widén, Tore, 471
- Wiedergutmachung, 710–712
 Cold War and 711
 definition, 710
 Israel and, 711
 negotiations for funds, 711–712
 reparations, 710–712
 slave labor and, 712
- Wiernik, Yankiel, 1036–1038
- Wiesel, Elie, 121, 170, 468, 712–714
 awards, 713
 Bosnian War, 713
 death, 714
 deportation to Buchenwald, 712–713
 Nazi invasion of Hungary, 712–713 writing of Night, 713
- Wiesel Foundation, 713
- Wiesenthal, Cyla, 715–716
- Wiesenthal, Simon, 714–716 escape from labor camp, 715 internment, 715
The Murderers among Us, 715
Murderers among Us: The Simon Wiesenthal Story, 715 tracking down escaped Nazi, 714–716
 Yugoslav Wars, 716
- Wilde-KZ, 132–133, 716
 bureaucracy and, 716 establishment of the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps, 716
- Wilhelm II, 703
- Willig, Karl, 274
- Wilner, Izrael Chaim, 739
- Wilson, Hugh R.,
 regarding Decree Excluding Jewish Doctors from Practice, 1099–1100
 regarding New Legal Status of the Jewish Communities, 1093–1095
- telegram on German press coverage of Vom Rath shooting, 1159–1160
- telegram regarding anti-Semitic persecution in the Stuttgart
 consular district, 1164
- Winsztok, Roman, 333
- Winter War, 207–208, 630–631
- Winton, Nicholas, 716–718 awards for humanitarian work, 717–718
 British Committee and, 717
 death, 718
kindertransport (“children’s transport”) program, 717 rescue of Jewish children from Czechoslovakia, 716–718
- Wirth, Christian, 71, 470, 718–719
 at Belzec, 718
 at Brandenburg, 718
 at Sobibor, 718
 at Treblinka, 718
 at Trieste, 719
 Operation Harvest Festival, 719
 Operation Reinhard, 718
- Wirtschafts- und Verwaltungshauptamt* (SS Economic and Administrative Department, WVHA), 507, 685
- Wise, Stephen S., 5, 538, 679, 719 letter to President Roosevelt regarding the plight of the Jews of Europe, 719, 1342
- Wisliceny, Dictor, 565
- Wisnia, David S., 1038–1041
- Witenberg, Itzak, 132
- Wittenberg, Yitzhak, 371
- Witnesses: Voices From the Holocaust*, 214
- Wolff, Karl, 719–720
 as SS-Obersturmbannführer, 719–720 as Supreme Head of the German Police Forces in Italy, 719–720
 Heinrich Himmler and, 720
 trial, 719–720
- Wollheim, Norbert, 1275–1277
- Woliński, Henryk, 737
- Women’s Zionist Organization, 589
- Working Girls’ Homes, 564
- World Jewish Congress, 538
- World Union for Progressive Judaism, 57
- World War I, 18, 32, 62, 391, 620
 France in, 13
 Germany in, 169–170, 179, 389, 701, 703
 Hungary in, 304
 Latvia in, 539
 United States in, 661
- World War II, 721–725
 occupation of Belarus, 69–70, 999–1001
 occupation of Belgium, 33–34, 70, 130–131, 742, 897–899, 923–925, 932–935, 957–960

- occupation of Bulgaria, 107–108
 occupation of Czechoslovakia, 142–143, 591, 598–599, 681–682, 833–834, 837–839, 869–871, 992–994, 1001–1002, 1021–1023
 occupation of Denmark, 77, 125–127, 162–163, 177–178
 occupation of France, 12–13, 36, 77, 84, 108–109, 149–150, 167–168, 175–176, 227–228, 321, 334, 389–390, 424–425, 648–649, 668–672, 724, 844–848, 851–855, 948–951, 994–999, 1190–1191
 occupation of Greece, 20–21, 148–149, 259–260, 565–566 occupation of Hungary, 306, 317, 356–357, 386–387, 497–499, 550, 555–556, 604–605, 632–634, 662, 681–682, 855–859, 872–880, 903–905, 913–915, 929–932, 969–971, 983–991, 1004–1005, 1013–1015, 1157–1158
 occupation of Italy, 95
 occupation of Latvia, 388, 539–540, 562–563, 1237–1239
 occupation of Lithuania, 407, 509–510
 occupation of Norway, 521–522
 occupation of Netherlands, 25–27, 91, 202–203, 247–249, 275 450–451, 464–465, 618–619, 682–683, 717–718, 740–741, 827–831, 935–936, 1002–1004 occupation of Poland, 78–79, 84–86, 93, 121, 130, 149–150, 170–171, 328–334, 354–355, 411–412, 470–471, 507–509, 541–542, 558–559, 565, 591, 625–626, 649–650, 700–701, 721, 726, 731–732, 735–737, 739–742, 848–851, 899–900, 910–913, 917–919, 925–927, 951–957, 960–963, 971–972, 1019–1021, 1034–1036, 1044–1049, 1207–1210
 occupation of Romania, 547–548
 occupation of Serbia, Serbia, 585–586
 occupation of Ukraine, 589–590
 World War II, outbreak of, 725–726
 death camps and, 725
 invasion of Poland, 725
 Jewish Question and, 725
 Wrobel, Eta, 726
 emigration to the United States, 726 imprisonment at Lublin, 726
 My Life My Way, 726
 partisan activity, 726
 Wroby, Godel, 1041–1044
 Yad Vashem, 21, 52, 103, 487, 727–729
 Children's Memorial, 447, 729 commission for the Designation of the Righteous, 590
 establishment of, 540, 727
 Hall of Remembrance, 447, 728
 International Centre for Holocaust Studies, 63, 447 Pages of Testimony, 728–729
 purpose, 727
 Righteous Among the Nations, 16, 20–21, 23, 61–63, 69, 81, 83, 91, 93, 95, 109, 112, 114, 120, 128, 148–149, 167–168, 178, 181–182, 203, 227–228, 241, 245, 248–249, 264, 266–267, 276, 278, 281, 295, 350, 355, 362, 371, 396, 403, 405–406, 414, 425, 487, 494–495, 498–500, 510–511, 533, 556, 564, 568–569, 575, 588, 590, 595, 613, 619, 627, 635, 639, 654, 664–665, 692–693, 702–703, 718, 727–728, 736–737
 Yad Vashem Studies, 727
 Yale University, 214
 Yellow star, 729–731,
 documentation regarding, 1077–1078
 Jewish identity and, 729–731
 purpose of, 729–731
 Yeshiva University, 150
 Yidishe Kultur Organizatsye, 542
 Yom Hashoah, 731
 date, 731
 first celebrated, 731
 Yonai, Mitsumasa, 229
 Yoran, Shalom, 731–732
 Defiant: A True Story of Escape, Survival, and Resistance, 732
 family, 731–732
 Museum of Jewish Heritage, 732
 Polish Army service, 732
 Young Communist League, 65
 Yugoslavia, 732–733
 German Army Report on Shootings of Jews and Gypsies in, 1239–1240
 occupation of, 732–733 reprisal action against Jewish resistance in Belgrade, 1321
 Yugoslav Wars, 716
 Żabiński, Antonina, 736–737
 Żabiński, Jan, 735–737
 code name, 735
 resistance activities, 735–737
 Warsaw Zoo, 735–737
 The Zookeeper's Wife, 737
 Żabiński, Ryszard, 736
 Zbyszynska, Gizela, 470–471
 Zegota, 737–738
 Henryk Wolinski and, 737
 Polish Council to Aid Jews, 737–738
 rescue of Polish Jews, 737
 Zeidenfeld, Zvi (Seidi), 550
 Zieleniak, 480–481
 Zimetbaum, Mala, 738–739
 deportation to Auschwitz, 738
 escape from Auschwitz, 738–739
 execution, 739
 Zingaretti, Luca, 498

1440 Index

- Zionism, 67, 72–73, 132, 173, 210, 356, 370–371, 541, 634
Revisionist, 37–38, 333
Socialist, 38
Zionist Aid and Rescue Committee, 210, 681–682
Zionist Federation of Germany, 273
Zionist Youth Movement, 38, 332
Zookeeper's Wife, The, 737
Zuckerman, Yitzhak, 739–740
Jewish Fighting Organization, 329, 411, 699, 739–740
Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 740
Zuehlke, Willy, 740–741
Zuehlke trial, 740–741 acquittal, 740
charges, 740–741 judgment, 741 occupation of Netherlands and, 740–741
Zukerman, Roni, 412
Zündel, Ernst, 682
Zydowska Samopomoc Społeczna (Jewish Social Aid), 542
Zygielbojm, Shmuel, 741–742
Arbeiter Fragen (Worker's Issues), 741
Folkszeitung (People's Newspaper), 741
invasion of Poland, 741
suicide, 741–742
resistance activities, 742
Socialist International meeting in Brussels, 742
Warsaw Ghetto, 742
Zyklon-B, 50–51, 85, 234, 742–743
I.G. Farben, 743
manufacture of, 742–743
original purpose of, 742
Zyklon-B case, 1946, 743–744 evidence, 744
manufacturers of Zyklon-B, 742–744
Trial of Bruno Tesch and Two Others, 743–744
Zylberman, Halina, 1044–1049