

THE HOLOCAUST

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA
AND DOCUMENT COLLECTION

PAUL R. BARTROP AND MICHAEL DICKERMAN, EDITORS

About the pagination of this eBook

This eBook contains a multi-volume set.

To navigate the front matter of this eBook by page number, you will need to use the volume number and the page number, separated by a hyphen.

For example, to go to page v of volume 1, type "1-v" in the Go box at the bottom of the screen and click "Go."

To go to page v of volume 2, type "2-v"... and so forth.

THE HOLOCAUST

THE HOLOCAUST

An Encyclopedia and Document Collection

VOLUME 1: A-K

Paul R. Bartrop and
Michael Dickerman,
Editors

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC
Santa Barbara, California • Denver, Colorado

Copyright © 2017 by ABC-CLIO, LLC

Every reasonable effort has been made to trace the owners of copyright materials in this book, but in some instances this has proven impossible. The editors and publishers will be glad to receive information leading to more complete acknowledgments in subsequent printings of the book and in the meantime extend their apologies for any omissions.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except for the inclusion of brief quotations in a review, without prior permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Bartrop, Paul R. (Paul Robert), 1955- editor. | Dickerman, Michael, editor.

Title: The Holocaust : an encyclopedia and document collection / Paul R. Bartrop and Michael Dickerman, editors.

Description: Santa Barbara, California : ABC-CLIO, [2017] | Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2016059758 (print) | LCCN 2016059898 (ebook) | ISBN 9781440840838 (set : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848322 (volume 1 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848339 (volume 2 : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848346 (volume 3 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848353 (volume 4 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440840845 (ebook)

Subjects: LCSH: Holocaust, Jewish (1939-1945)—Encyclopedias.

Classification: LCC D804.25 .H655 2017 (print) | LCC D804.25 (ebook) | DDC 940.53/1803—dc23

LC record available at <https://lccn.loc.gov/2016059758>

ISBN: 978-1-4408-4083-8 (set)

978-1-4408-4832-2 (vol. 1)

978-1-4408-4833-9 (vol. 2)

978-1-4408-4834-6 (vol. 3)

978-1-4408-4835-3 (vol. 4)

EISBN: 978-1-4408-4084-5

21 20 19 18 17 1 2 3 4 5

This book is also available as an eBook.

ABC-CLIO

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC

ABC-CLIO, LLC

130 Cremona Drive, P.O. Box 1911

Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

www.abc-clio.com

This book is printed on acid-free paper ☺

Manufactured in the United States of America

To Our Grandchildren
The next generation to carry a sacred tradition,
and the memory that accompanies it

Paul R. Bartrop
Jacob, Madeline, Mila, Asher, Max, Xavier

Michael Dickerman
Ethan, Holden

Grandchildren are the crown of the aged (Proverbs 17:6)

Contents

Volume 1

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

Preface xix

Historical Introduction xxi

Essays 1

- What Caused the Holocaust? 1
 - Who Were the Perpetrators of the Holocaust? 3
 - Who Were the Victims of the Holocaust? 4
 - What Was the Response of Bystanders to the Holocaust? 5
 - How Did the International Community React to the Holocaust? 6
 - What Were the Consequences of the Holocaust? 8
- A–K Entries 11

Volume 2

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

L–Z Entries 383

Chronology 745

Glossary 751

Bibliography 759

Contributors List 765

About the Editors 769

Volume 3: Holocaust Testimonies

Testimonies List vii

Topical Guide to Testimonies ix

Preface xi

Introduction xiii

Holocaust Testimonies 771

Volume 4: Documents on the Holocaust

List of Documents vii

Introduction xiii

Documents 1051

I. The Othering of the Jews 1051

Antisemitism and Nazi Ideology

Anti-Jewish Legislation

Nazi Propaganda

German and Occupied Jewry

II. The Nazi Assault 1138

III. Genocide 1191

IV. Responses and Other Victims 1321

V. Post-Holocaust Developments 1353

Index 1397

List of Entries

A Crime without a Name
Abetz, Otto
Action Française
Aktion
Aktion Reinhard
Albania
Algeria
Al-Husseini, Haj Amin
Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece
Altman, Tova (Tosia)
André, Joseph
Anielewicz, Mordecai
Anne Frank House
Anschluss
Antisemitism
Antonescu, Ion
Antwerp Pogrom
April Boycott
Arbeit Macht Frei
Arendt, Hannah
Armée Juive
Armenians, Hitler Statement
Arouch, Salamo
Arrow Cross
Art and the Holocaust
Aryan
Aryan Paragraph
Aryanism
Aryanization
Asocials
Auschwitz
The Auschwitz Album
Auschwitz Protocols
Austria

Babi Yar Massacre
Baeck, Leo
Banality of Evil
Barbie, Klaus
Barmen Declaration
Bartali, Gino
Barth, Karl
Battel, Albert
Bauer, Yehuda
Baum, Herbert
Beck, Gad
Becker-Freyseng, Hermann
Beitz, Berthold
Belarus
Belgium
Belzec
Bergen-Belsen
Bergson Group
Berlin Jewish Hospital
Bermuda Conference
Best, Werner
Bettelheim, Bruno
Białystok Ghetto

x List of Entries

- Biebow, Hans
Bielecki, Jerzy
Bielski Partisans
Bilecki, Julian
Bingham, Harry
Birkenau
Bloch, Marc
Blome, Kurt
Blood and Soil
Blood for Goods
Blood Libel
Bogaard, Johannes
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich
Borkowska, Anna
Bormann, Martin
Borromeo, Giovanni
Boss, Hugo
Bousquet, René
Brack, Viktor
Brand, Joel
Brandt, Karl
Bretholz, Leo
British Response to the Holocaust
Browning, Christopher
Brunner, Alois
Buchenwald
Bulgaria
Bunel, Lucien-Louis
Bureaucracy
Büro Grüber
- Calmeyer, Hans
Cargas, Harry James
Catholic Church
Central Office for Jewish Emigration
Channel Islands
Chełmno
Children during the Holocaust
Children's Literature of the Holocaust
Christian X, King of Denmark
Churban
Cohn, Marianne
Collaboration
Comité de Défense des Juifs
Communists in the Holocaust
Concentration Camps
Confiscation of Jewish Property
Conspiracy
- Coughlin, Charles
Credit Suisse
Crimes against Humanity
Croatia
Csatary, Lazlo
Czechoslovakia
Czerniakow, Adam
- Dachau
Dahlem Declaration
Damaskinos of Athens, Archbishop
Dannecker, Theodor
Dawidowicz, Lucy S.
Death Camps
Death Marches
Death Marches, Austrian
Degrelle, Léon
Degussa
Dehumanization
Delbo, Charlotte
Denazification
Denial of the Holocaust
Denmark
Denunciation
The Deputy
Der Stürmer
De Sousa Mendes, Aristides
Desk Killers
Deutsche Bank
The Diary of a Young Girl
The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak
Dinur, Yehiel
Displaced Persons
Doctors' Trial
Dora-Mittelbau
Drancy
Duckwitz, Georg
- Eckart, Johann Dietrich
Edelman, Marek
Edmonds, Roddie
Eichmann, Adolf
Eichmann in Jerusalem
Eichmann Trial
Eicke, Theodor
Einsatzgruppen
Enabling Act, 1933
Estonia

- Ethnic Cleansing
 Eugenics
 Euthanasia Program
 Evian Conference
Exodus 1947

 Fabrikaktion
 Facing History and Ourselves
 Fackenheim, Emil
 Fascism
 February Strike
 Ferencz, Benjamin
 Film and the Holocaust
 Final Solution
 Finland
 Fischer, Eugen
 Fleischmann, Gisi
 Flick Case
 Flossenbürg
 Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies
 Fossoli di Carpi
 France
 Frank, Anne
 Frank, Hans
 Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial
 Franz, Kurt
 Freisler, Roland
 Frick, Wilhelm
 Friedländer, Saul
 Fry, Varian
 Fugu Plan
 Führerprinzip
 “Functionalists”
 Funktionshäftling

 Galen, Clemens August Graf von
 Gas Chambers
 Gas Vans
 Gebhardt, Karl
 Generalgouvernement
 Genocide
 Gens, Jakob
 German Army, Role in the Holocaust
 German Census, 1933
 Gerstein, Kurt
 Gestapo
 Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée
 Ghettos

 Gibraltar Camp, Jamaica
 Gies, Miep
Gleichschaltung
 Globke Trial
 Globocnik, Odilo
 Glücks, Richard
 Goebbels, Joseph
Good
 Göring, Albert
 Göring, Hermann
 Graziani, Rodolfo
The Great Dictator
 Greece
 Grese, Irma
The Grey Zone
 Gross-Rosen
 Grüninger, Paul
 Grynszpan, Herschel
 Gunden, Lois
 Gürtner, Franz
 Gutman, Yisrael

 Haas, Leo
 Haavara Agreement
 Hadamar
 Hadamar Insane Asylum Case
 Harster, Wilhelm
 Hautval, Adelaide
 Heim, Aribert
Helga’s Diary
 Helmy, Mohammed
 Herz-Sommer, Alice
 Hess, Rudolf
 Hesselblad, Maria Elisabetta
 Heydrich, Reinhard
 Hilberg, Raul
 Himmler, Heinrich
 Hinzert
 Hippler, Fritz
Historikerstreit
 Hitler, Adolf
 Hitler Youth
Hitler’s Willing Executioners
 Hlinka Guard
 HMT Dunera
 Ho Feng-Shan
 Hoess, Rudolf
 Hollerith Machine

xii List of Entries

- Holocaust
Holocaust
Holocaust and Genocide Studies
Holocaust by Bullets
Homosexuals
Höppner, Rolf-Heinz
Horthy, Miklós
Hudal, Alois
Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions
Hungary
- Iceland
I.G. Farben
I.G. Farben Case
“Intentionalists”
International Committee of the Red Cross
International Holocaust Remembrance Day
Iron Guard
Italian Jews and Fascism
Italy
- J.A. Topf and Sons
Jackson, Robert H.
Jagendorf, Siegfried
Jasenovac
Jedwabne Massacre
Jehovah’s Witnesses
Jewish Fighting Organization
Jewish Ghetto Police
Jewish Honor Courts
Jewish Military Union
Jewish Partisans
Jewish Question
Jewish Resistance
Jewish Women and the Holocaust
Joint Distribution Committee
Jonas, Regina
Jud Süß
Judenrat
Judges’ Trial
Judgment at Nuremberg
- Kaiser Wilhelm Institute
Kalina, Antonin
Kaltenbrunner, Ernst
Kaplan, Chaim A.
Kapos
Kappler, Herbert
- Karski, Jan
Kasztner, Reszó
Katzenberger Trial
Katzenelson, Itzhak
Keitel, Wilhelm
Kempner, Vitka
Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph
Kharkov Trial
Kielce Pogrom
Kindertransport
Koch Trial
Kolbe, Raymond
Kommissarbefehl
Korczak, Janusz
Korczak, Rozka
Kovner, Abba
Krajugevac Massacre
Kraków-Plaszow
Kramer, Josef
Kraus, Gilbert and Eleanor
Kreyszig, Lothar
Kristallnacht
Krupp Case
Krützfeld, Wilhelm
Kuper, Leo
- Landmesser, August
Lange, Herbert
Lange, Rudolf
Lantos, Tom
Latvia
Laval, Pierre
Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor
Lawrence, Geoffrey
Le Chambon-sur-Lignon
League of German Girls
Lebensborn
Lebensraum
Leitz, Ernst, II
Lemkin, Raphael
Levi, Primo
Liberation, Concentration Camps
Lichtenberg, Bernhard
Life Is Beautiful
“Life Unworthy of Life”
Lipke, Janis and Johanna
Literature and the Holocaust
Lithuania

- Łódź Ghetto
 London Charter Agreement
 Lubetkin, Zivia
 Lubny Massacre
 Lutz, Carl
 Luxembourg

 Madagascar Plan
 Majdanek
 Mann, Franczeska
 Manstein, Erich von
 Manstein Trial
 Marian, Ferdinand
 Marie-Benoît, Père
Maus and Maus II
 Mauthausen Trial
 Mauthausen-Gusen
 Mechelen
 Medical Experimentation
 Meed, Vladka
Mein Kampf
 Mengele, Josef
 Microstates during the Holocaust
 Milchberg, Irving
 Mischling
 Mommsen, Hans
 Monowitz
The Mortal Storm
 Moscow Declaration
 Müller, Heinrich
 Münch, Hans
 Munich Agreement
 Museum of Tolerance
 Museums and Memorials
 Music and the Holocaust
 Mussert, Anton Adriaan

 Nacht und Nebel
 Names under the Nazis, Legislation
 National Socialism
 National Socialist German Workers' Party
 National Socialist Program
 Natzweiler-Struthof
 Nazi Book Burning
 Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941
 Nazism and Germany
Neighbors
 Netherlands

 Netherlands Tribunals
 Neuengamme
Night
Night and Fog
 Nisko Plan
 Norrman, Sven
 Norway
 Nuremberg Code
 Nuremberg Defense
 Nuremberg Laws
 Nuremberg Principles
 Nuremberg Trials

 Oberheuser, Herta
 Oberländer, Theodor
 Ochota Massacre
 Odessa Massacre
 Ogilvie, Albert
 Ohlendorf, Otto
 Olympic Games, 1936
 Oneg Shabbat
 Opdyke, Irene Gut
 Operation Barbarossa
 Operation Harvest Festival
 Operation Spring Wind
 "Ordinary Men"
 Osako, Tatsuo

Paper Clips
 Papon, Maurice
 Paulavicius, Jonas
 Pavelić, Ante
 Pechersky, Alexander
 Perlasca, Giorgio
 Peshev, Dimitar
 Pétain, Philippe
The Pianist
 Pilecki, Witold
 Pius XI
 Pius XII
 Pivnik, Sam
 Ploetz, Alfred
 Pohl, Oswald
 Poland
 Ponary Forest
 Popovici, Traian
 Priebke, Erich
 Priest Block, Dachau

xiv List of Entries

Project Paperclip
Propaganda in the Holocaust
Protestant Churches, German
Protocols of the Elders of Zion

Quisling, Vidkun

Rabe, John
“Racial Hygiene”
Rademacher, Franz
Ratlines
Ravensbrück
Refoulement
Reich Citizenship Law
Reich Flight Tax
Reichssicherheitshauptamt
Rescuers of Jews
Reserve Police Battalion 101
Resistance Movements
Rhineland Bastards
Riefenstahl, Leni
Riegner Telegram
Riga
Righteous among the Nations
Ringelblum, Emanuel
Ringelblum Archive
Ritter, Robert
Robota, Roza
Röhm, Ernst
Roma and Sinti
Romania
Rosé, Alma
Rosenbaum, Pinchas
Rosenberg, Alfred
Rosenstrasse Protest
Rothaug, Oswald
Rotta, Angelo
Rubenstein, Richard L.
Rufeisen, Oswald
Rumbula Massacre

Sachsenhausen
Salaspils
Salkaházi, Sára
Salomon, Charlotte
Salonika
Sauckel, Fritz
Schacter, Herschel
Schindler, Oskar

Schindler’s Jews
Schindler’s List
Schlegelberger, Franz
Schmeling, Max
Schmid, Anton
Scholl, Hans and Sophie
Scholtz-Klink, Gertrud
Schönerer, Georg Ritter von
Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard
Schutzhaft
Schutzstaffel
Second Generation
Segerstedt, Torgny
Serbia
Seyss-Inquart, Arthur
Shanghai Ghetto
Sharp, Waitstill and Martha
Sheptytsky, Andrey
Shirer, William L.
Shoah
Shoah
Sicherheitsdienst
Sippenhaft
Slachta, Margit
Slave Labor
Slavs
Slovakia
Sobibór
Social Darwinism
Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français
Sondergericht
Sonderkommando
Soos, Géza
Soviet Union
Spain
Speer, Albert
SS St. Louis
SS-Totenkopfverbände
St. Hedwig’s Cathedral
Stangl, Franz
Stein, Edith
Sterilization
Streicher, Julius
Strobos, Tina
Stroop, Jürgen
Struma Disaster
Stuckart, Wilhelm
Sturmabteilung
Stutthof

- Sugihara, Chiune
 Survivor Testimony
 Süskind, Walter
 Sweden
 Switzerland
 Szálasi, Ferenc
 Szenes, Hannah
 Szeptycki, Andreas Alexander

 Taylor, Telford
 Ten Boom, Corrie
 Teudt, Wilhelm
 Theological Responses to the Holocaust
 Theresienstadt
 Thierack, Otto
 Third Reich
 Tiso, Jozef
 Topography of Terror
 Total War and the Holocaust
 Touvier Case
 Trawniki Men
 Treblinka
Triumph of the Spirit
 Trocmé, André and Magda
The Truce
 Turkey

 Ukraine
 UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide
 United Partisan Organization
 United States Holocaust Memorial Museum
 United States Response to the Holocaust
 Universities, Complicity in the Holocaust
Uprising
 Upstander
 USC Shoah Foundation
 Ustashe

 Vaivara
 Vel' d'Hiv Roundup
 Venezia, Shlomo
 Vichy France
 Vilna Ghetto
 Vittel
 Volk
 Volksgemeinschaft
 Volksgerichtshof
 Von Faulhaber, Michael

 Von Moltke, Helmuth James
 Vrba, Rudolf
 Vught

 Waffen-SS
 Wagner, Richard
 Waldheim Affair
 Wallenberg, Raoul
 Wannsee Conference
 War Crimes
 War Refugee Board
 Warsaw Ghetto
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising
 Warsaw Rising
 Wegner, Armin T.
 Weidt, Otto
 Weimar Republic
 Weiss, Helga
 Weltsch, Robert
 Westerbork
 White Buses
 White Rose
 Wiedergutmachung
 Wiesel, Elie
 Wiesenthal, Simon
 Wilde-KZ
 Winton, Nicholas
 Wirth, Christian
 Wise, Stephen S.
 Wolff, Karl
 World War II
 World War II, Outbreak of Wrobel, Eta

 Yad Vashem
 Yellow Star
 Yom Hashoah
 Yoran, Shalom
 Yugoslavia

 Żabiński, Jan
 Zegota
 Zimetbaum, Mala
 Zuckerman, Yitzhak
 Zuehlke Trial
 Zygielbojm, Shmuel
 Zyklon-B
 Zyklon-B Case, 1946

List of Maps

- The Holocaust, 1939–1945: xxv
Jews in Europe, 1937–1941: xxvi
Holocaust Deaths, 1941–1945: xxvii
Anne Frank, 1929–1945: 26
Auschwitz Environs, Summer 1944: 50
The Liberation of Major Nazi Camps, 1944–1945: 133
Rescue of Danish Jews, Fall 1943: 163
Holocaust: Einsatzgruppen Aktions in Eastern Europe: 187
“Euthanasia” Centers in Germany, 1940–1945: 193
Ghettos in Occupied Europe, 1939–1944: 245
Deportations from Hungarian Ghettos, 1944: 309
Jewish Partisan Activity in Eastern Europe, 1942–1944: 336
Romanian Camps and Ghettos, 1942: 548
Voyage of the SS St. Louis, May 13–June 17, 1939: 610
Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943: 699

Preface

Alongside World War I, World War II, and the convulsions of the Cold War, the Holocaust, it could be said, has defined the character of the past one hundred years. It is one of the most written-about and discussed topics in all of modern history.

In view of this, a question arises: Why have we produced yet another encyclopedia of the Holocaust when so many already exist, in addition to vast numbers of other studies, reflections, and memoirs from survivors, perpetrators, and witnesses? While there are by now dozens of encyclopedias on the Holocaust, hundreds of reference works, and many thousands of monographs, new material on this mammoth event is surfacing every day. It is our contention that, despite this immense output, there is still room for one more work that can provide a window to understanding; indeed, given the complexity of the Holocaust and the enormous amount of history that took place then, anything that can help to generate such understanding is, in our view, to be welcomed.

The current work, consisting of two volumes of reference entries, one volume of personal accounts, and one volume of primary source documents, provides what we consider to be an appealing mix for educators and students looking for fresh content on the Holocaust. We have developed a very wide range of reference entries (which in many cases go well beyond the “standard” topics covered in encyclopedias of this kind), while a majority of the personal testimonies have rarely been seen before. The comprehensive documents volume, furthermore, provides a wealth of original sources rarely seen outside of archival collections.

For all that, given the magnitude of the Holocaust, it would have been an impossible task for us to have included here every possible leader, idea, movement, event, upstander, rescuer, witness, or perpetrator—though we have attempted to provide as complete a collection, of sufficient breadth, to satisfy the needs of most users as a first step to further research. In this endeavor, we hope we have been successful.

A few general notes are in order here by way of explanation and clarification. Certain terms have been rendered in such a way as to conform to the most appropriate contemporary usage. “Gypsy,” for instance, has been replaced throughout by the less disparaging term “Roma,” and, in line with an increasing number of scholars, “anti-Semitism” has given way to the unhyphenated “antisemitism.” A great deal of effort has gone into the task of standardizing spellings, though this has often proven difficult where issues of transliteration have been present. Moreover, it should be borne in mind that the reference entries have been written by a wide variety of authors, and that, as a result, styles of expression will differ. Where possible, we have attempted to rectify major deviations in style through our editors’ prerogative.

A list of further readings accompanies every reference entry. For the most part, we have elected to utilize the first edition of a work, on the understanding that users can employ this as their “base camp” for any subsequent editions they might encounter. We have also adopted this approach in the bibliography. In addition, given the anticipated readership that will comprise the majority of those using the encyclopedia, we have usually chosen to restrict our lists to English-language literature. Works in other languages can be found, more often than not, by reference to the specialist bibliographies in many of the works we have listed.

In the multitude of tasks accompanying the editorial process, we have accumulated a number of debts, which we would like to recognize. Two outstanding graduate students in history at Florida Gulf Coast University, Danielle Jean Drew and Elizabeth Snyder, gave of themselves unstintingly in much of the “heavy lifting” such as photocopying, hunting down obscure references, and the like. Danielle, in particular, undertook these tasks while also engaging in her own thesis research, and, at the same time, writing several of the reference entries in the encyclopedia itself.

Compiling volume 3, the testimonies volume, presented us with a problem in that one of the largest subgenres in Holocaust literature, broadly defined, comprises survivor accounts. The challenge we set ourselves was to locate testimonies that were largely new to the widest readership. In this respect, we were indeed fortunate to secure the very willing cooperation of three remarkable initiatives across three countries: the “Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program” (through the Azrieli Foundation, Toronto, Canada); the “Writing as Witness” project (through the Sara & Sam Schaffer Holocaust Resource Center at Stockton University, Galloway, New Jersey); and the “Write Your Story” project (Lamm Library, formerly the Makor Jewish Community Library, Melbourne, Australia). Quite clearly, the volume would not have appeared without the assistance of these three superb establishments, and we would like to thank, most sincerely, Elin Beaumont at Azrieli, Maryann McLoughlin at Stockton, and Adele Hulse and Leonie Fleiszig at Lamm, for all their help as our project unfolded.

Thanks are also due to the library staff at Temple University, Philadelphia, for providing a text that was critical to locating documents on specific topics among the hundreds of thousands of documents constituting evidence accumulated and, in many cases, submitted to the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg as part of the post–World War II trial of major war criminals.

As with previous projects, our editor at ABC-CLIO, Padraic (Pat) Carlin, has been an exceptional guide and leader through the production process, from his initial contact with us right through to the work you see before you. It is a pleasure to work with such a caring professional.

Eve Grimm, who has written several of the reference entries, provided stalwart service on volume 3. Not only did she manually input everything into a readable format; she actually did it twice, after there was a major hitch involving our original selections. Were it not for her yeoman and uncomplaining service, there would not be a volume 3 in this encyclopedia at all.

A very large and lengthy project such as this requires support of a different kind beyond that offered at a professional level. We are delighted, therefore, to express our appreciation to our life partners at home, who have lived through the many distracting moments the project has imposed upon their otherwise happy domestic lives.

Michael Dickerman would like to thank Ruth for all she has had to put up with these many months, perhaps not realizing back in 2014 that this project would keep her husband away from her for such long periods. Paul Bartrop would like to thank Eve for her constant inspiration, knowing only too well that a project of this nature is as much a family affair as it is an academic undertaking. To both Ruth and Eve we direct our love and our heartfelt thanks.

The study of the Holocaust can be a lifelong task. Teaching about it is simultaneously an enormous challenge and an enormous responsibility. We hope that the current work will be of benefit in addressing both of these, because, when all is said and done, as educators we see the need to make the Holocaust as approachable as possible for generations to come.

It is with this in mind that we have dedicated this work to our grandchildren, with the earnest desire that it might assist them in the awful undertaking of trying to understand what happened in those dark years of 1933 to 1945—and why it must always be remembered if their own future is to be free of such terrible events.

Historical Introduction

The Holocaust is the term in English most closely identified with the attempt by Germany's National Socialist regime, together with its European allies and collaborators, to exterminate the Jews of Europe during the period of World War II—particularly during its most destructive phase between 1941 and 1944. While an exact number of those murdered is impossible to determine, the best estimates settle at a figure approximating around 6 million Jews, one million of whom were children under the age of 12 and half a million of whom were aged between 12 and 18.

While the term “Holocaust” has more and more entered common parlance in order to describe the event, two other terms are also employed, particularly within the Jewish world. The Hebrew word Churban, or “catastrophe,” which historically has been employed to describe the destruction of the two temples in Jerusalem, is one of these; the other, utilized increasingly today, is the Hebrew term Shoah (“calamity,” or, sometimes, “destruction”).

The first step on the road to the Holocaust can be said to have taken place on the night of February 27, 1933, when the Reichstag building in Berlin, the home of the German parliament, was set on fire. The day after the fire, on the pretext that it had been set by communists and that a left-wing revolution was imminent, newly appointed chancellor Adolf Hitler persuaded President Paul von Hindenburg to sign a Decree for the Protection of the People and the State, suspending all the basic civil and individual liberties guaranteed under the constitution. It empowered the government to take such steps as were necessary to ensure that the current threat to German society was removed. In a mass crack-down, hundreds were detained in the first few days, and tens of thousands in succeeding weeks.

Then, on March 20, 1933, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler announced the establishment of the first compound for political prisoners, about fifteen kilometers north-west of Munich, on the outskirts of the town of Dachau. Other camps soon followed, among them Oranienburg, Papenburg, Esterwegen, Kemna, Lichtenburg, and Börgermoor.

These camps were originally places of political imprisonment. In their most basic sense they removed political opposition from the midst of the community and intimidated the population into accepting the Nazi regime.

Jews had often previously been arrested for transgressing within the framework of the existing political classifications, but from 1935 onward, due largely to the effects of the so-called Nuremberg Laws on Citizenship and Race, they were frequently victimized for their Jewishness alone. According to these laws, the formal status of Jews in the Nazi state was defined and enacted. Jewish businesses were boycotted, Jewish doctors were excluded from public hospitals and only permitted to practice on other Jews, Jewish judicial figures were dismissed and disbarred, and Jewish students were expelled from universities. Jews were excluded increasingly from participation in all forms of German life. The Nuremberg Laws also withdrew from Jews the privilege of German citizenship. It became illegal for a Jew and a non-Jew to marry or engage in sexual relationships. Life was to be made so intolerable for Jews that they would seek to emigrate; those who did not often found themselves arbitrarily arrested and sent to concentration camps. These arrests did not become widespread until 1938, and in most cases the victims were only held for a short time. The emphasis was to terrorize them into leaving the country.

The first large-scale arrests of Jews were made after November 9, 1938, as “reprisals” for the assassination of consular official Ernst vom Rath by Jewish student Herschel Grynszpan in Paris. The event precipitating these arrests has gone down in history as Kristallnacht, the “Night of Broken Glass.” The resultant pogrom was thus portrayed as a righteous and spontaneous outpouring of anger by ordinary German people against all Jews, even though for the most part it was Nazis in plainclothes who whipped up most of the action in the streets. The pogrom resulted in greater concentrated destruction than any previous anti-Jewish measure under the Nazis and spelled out to those Jews who had up to now thought the regime was a passing phenomenon that this was not the case.

Henceforth, Jews were targeted for the sole reason of their Jewishness. Prior to the Kristallnacht, Nazi persecution of Jews was not premised on acts of wanton destruction or murder; the November pogrom, however, had the effect of transforming earlier legislative measures against Jews into physical harassment on a broader and more indiscriminate scale. From now on, physical acts of an antisemitic nature became state policy. At the same time that Germany’s Jews began frantically seeking havens to which they could emigrate in order to save their lives, however, the free world began to close its doors to Jewish immigration. And, with Hitler’s foreign policy appetite growing and new areas becoming annexed to the Third Reich, the number of Jews coming under Nazi control increased to less manageable proportions.

The outbreak of war on September 1, 1939, saw the establishment of a system of ghettos in occupied Poland from October 1939 onward, in order to confine Poland’s Jewish population. Here, they were persecuted and terrorized, starved and deprived of all medical care. From the summer of 1942 onward the ghettos began to be liquidated, with the Jews sent to one of six death camps located throughout Poland.

Prior to this, mobile killing squads known as Einsatzgruppen (“Special Action Groups”), accompanying the German military during the Nazi assault on the Soviet Union beginning in June 1941, had been at work murdering all Jews found within their areas of domination and control. The initial means by which they operated was to round up their captive Jewish populations—men, women, and children—take them outside of village and town areas, force the victims themselves to dig their own mass graves, and then shoot them to death. When the repetition of that activity proved psychologically troublesome, mobile gas vans using carbon monoxide poisoning were brought in, both to remove the intimacy of contact and to sanitize the process. While technologically at times quite inefficient, from an economic perspective it was cost-effective regarding the use of both men and material.

It is estimated that between 1941 and 1943 the Einsatzgruppen were responsible for the deaths of more than one million Jews. It is not known precisely when the decision to exterminate the Jews of Europe was made, though best estimates settle on sometime in the early fall of 1941. At a conference held at Wannsee, Berlin, on January 20, 1942, the process was systematized and coordinated among Nazi Germany’s relevant government departments, and in the months following a number of camps were established in Poland by the Nazis for the express purpose of killing large numbers of Jews. These six camps—Auschwitz-Birkenau, Belzec, Chełmno, Majdanek, Sobibór, and Treblinka—were a departure from anything previously visualized, in both their design and character. With the exception only of Auschwitz, these camps were different from all others in that they did not perform any of the functions—political, industrial, agricultural, or penal—attributed to those farther west or north. These were the Vernichtungslager, the death (or extermination) camps.

The death camps were institutions designed to methodically and efficiently murder millions of people, specifically Jews. These mass murders took place in specially designed gas chambers, employing carbon monoxide from diesel engines (either in fixed installations or from mobile vans), or crystallized hydrogen cyanide, which on contact with air oxidized to become hydrocyanic (or prussic) acid gas. The commercial name of this gas was Zyklon-B.

As the Nazi armies on the Eastern Front began to retreat before the advancing Soviet forces (and later from American and British troops in the west), renewed efforts were made at annihilating Jews while there was still time. Then, in March 1944, a shock of cataclysmic proportions fell upon the Jews of Hungary, the last great center of Jewish population still untouched by the Holocaust. Four hundred thousand Jews were murdered in the space of four months, with the killing facilities working nonstop, day and night. This was the fastest killing operation of any of the Nazi campaigns against Jewish populations in occupied Europe.

When viewing this campaign and the means employed to attain it, one reservation must be made: Belzec, Treblinka, Sobibór, and Chełmno had by this time already been evacuated. Only Auschwitz remained to carry out the massive undertaking of spring 1944, as April had already seen the start of the evacuation of Majdanek. With the Soviet armies continuing their advance toward Germany throughout the latter half of 1944, the position of Auschwitz itself seemed uncertain, and the complete evacuation of the complex was ordered for January 17, 1945. The earliest date of free contact with Soviet forces was January 22, 1945; when the site was formally occupied on January 27, there were only 2,819 survivors left.

Any prisoners still alive in the eastern camps at the end of the war were evacuated by the Nazis so as not to fall into the hands of the advancing Russians. These evacuations have properly been called death marches, as vast numbers of prisoners died or were killed while en route. Evidence that the Nazis tried to keep their prisoners alive is scant; any prisoners who did not make it to their final destination were treated with the same contempt as they would have been had they remained in the camp. Evacuated in the winter and early spring of 1944–1945, they had to contend with bitter cold, fatigue, hunger, and the SS guards themselves, as well as their own debilitated condition, and for those who had already reached the limit of their endurance the death marches could have only one result. For others, the experience represented yet another challenge that had to be overcome. Often, the Russians were so close while the prisoners were marching away that the sounds of battle could be clearly distinguished, further adding to their distress. When they arrived at their new destination their trials were hardly eased, as they faced massive overcrowding in the camps to which they had been evacuated.

The prisoners, dropped into places like Bergen-Belsen to await liberation through death or an Allied victory, had little time to wait in real terms, though each day dragged by unendingly. Painfully slowly, as German units both west and east surrendered, the camps were liberated. On April 12, 1945, Westerbork was set free. The day before, Buchenwald's inmates rose against their SS guards and took over the camp, handing it to the Americans on April 13. Belsen was liberated by the British army on April 15, and on April 23 the SS transferred Mauthausen to the International Committee of the Red Cross. The next day, Dachau was overrun by the U.S. Army. Five days later, on April 29, Ravensbrück was liberated. Theresienstadt was handed over to the Red Cross by the Nazis on May 2, and on May 8 American troops occupied Mauthausen—the last major camp to be liberated in the west.

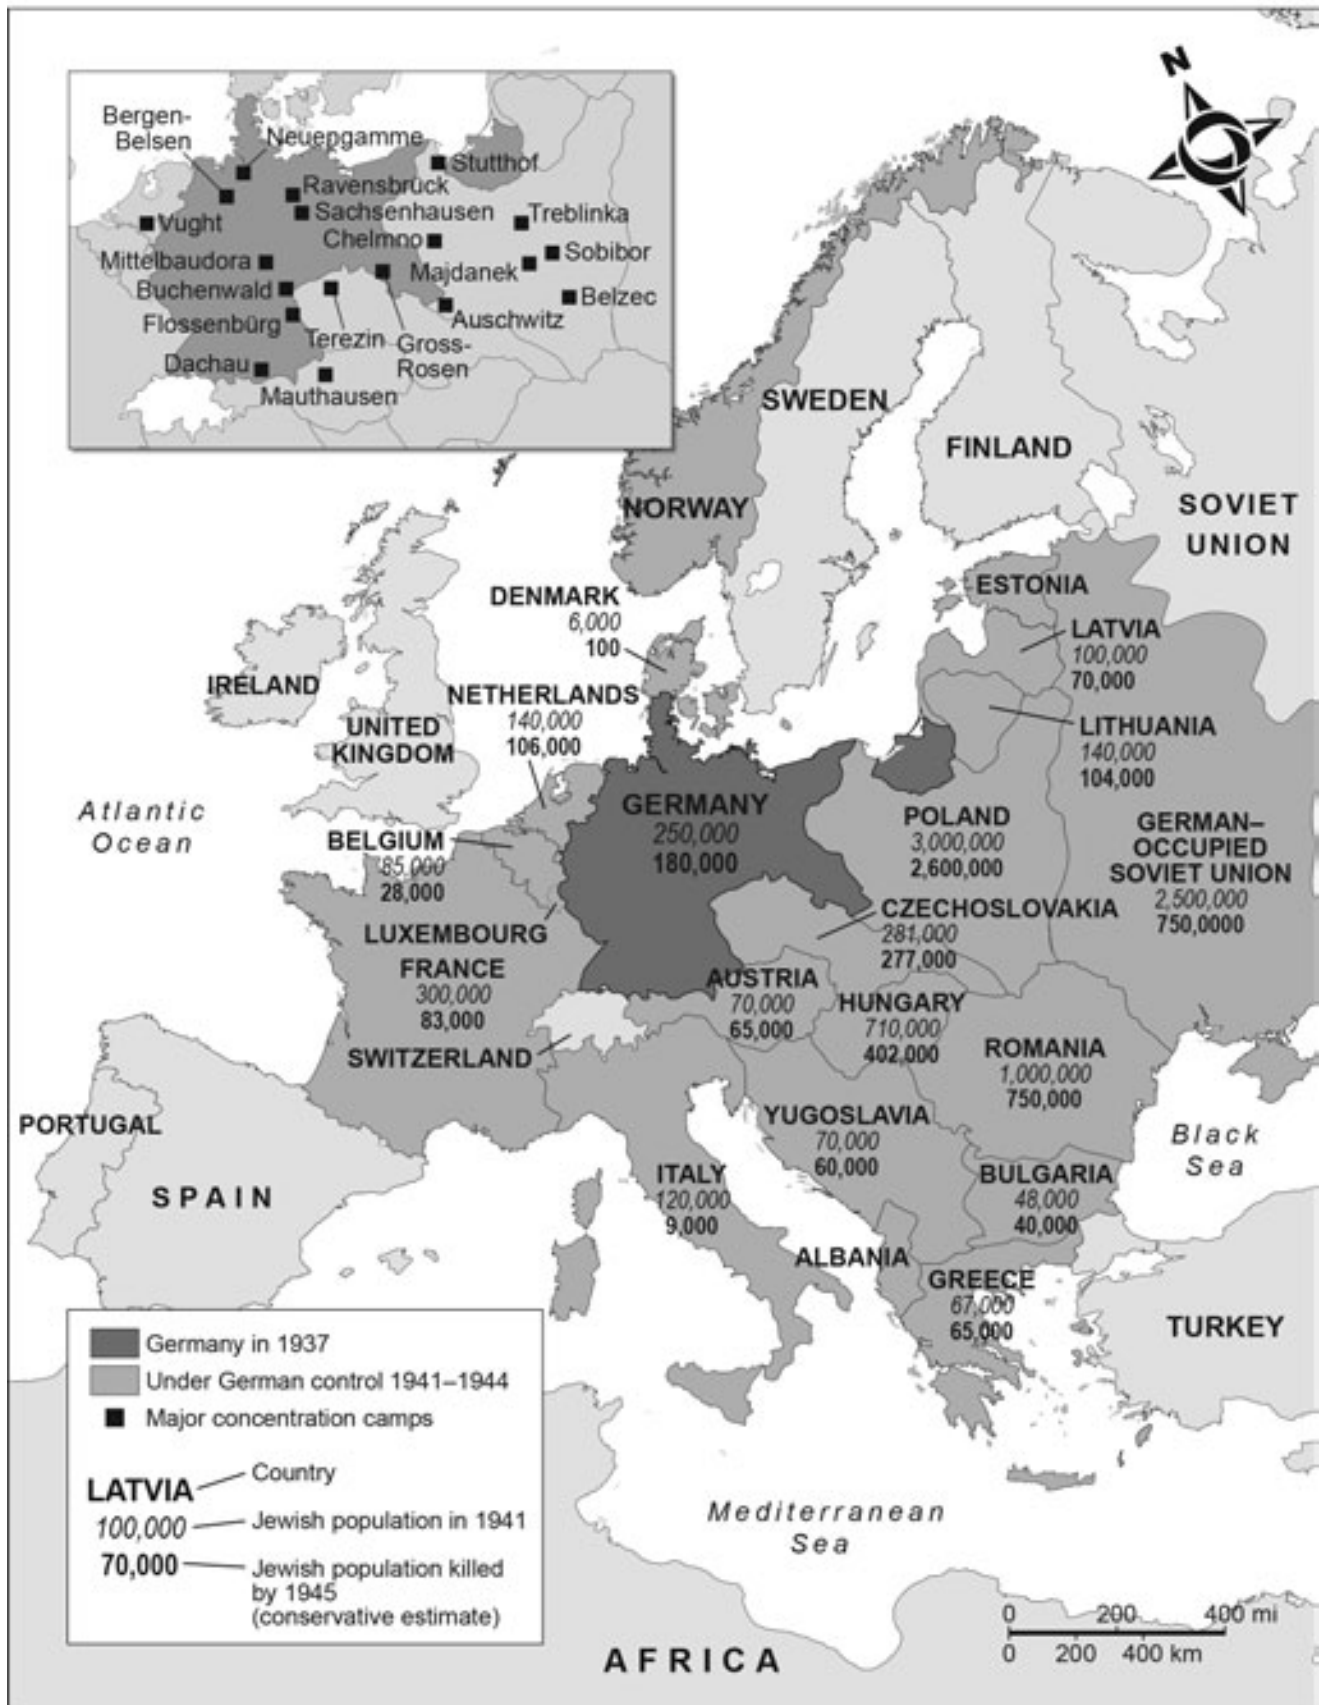

THE HOLOCAUST, 1939–1945

JEW IN EUROPE, 1937-1941

HOLOCAUST DEATHS, 1941–1945

Essays

What Caused the Holocaust?

The factors leading to the Holocaust usually cited by historians are multifaceted. For many years scholars of the Holocaust were roughly grouped as being either “intentionalists” or “functionalists.” The former grouping includes those who see the Holocaust as an event primarily centered in the person of Adolf Hitler, his antisemitism, and his commitment to bringing to realization a world “cleansed of Jews” (Judenrein). Functionalists, on the other hand, argue that the Holocaust was not the result of a planned, carefully organized, or orchestrated agenda of Adolf Hitler because of his overwhelming antisemitism, but was, instead, an evolving and sometimes even chaotic program of death and destruction that really began to assert itself only after the invasion of Soviet Russia in June 1941—prior to which it was done by low-level bureaucrats in a somewhat haphazard and inefficient manner. (A third strand of historians falls somewhere in the middle of the two camps, acknowledging and building their own interpretations on the strengths of each of the other groups’ perspectives.)

Beyond these interpretations, it can certainly be said that the roots of the Holocaust were actually very long. Nazi antisemitism built on a much longer-lasting hatred of the Jews as a people and/or Judaism as the religious/cultural/social traditions of the Jewish people, but with an important variation. The origins of anti-Jewish antipathy can be traced back to the Hebrew Bible, but with the birth and success of Christianity and the New Testament’s orientation of the Jews as being primarily responsible for the murder of Jesus, antisemitism took on a religious or theological expression. By the Middle Ages, the violence of religious antisemitism saw Crusades, pogroms, and persecutions based on the false charge that Jews murdered innocent Christian children to drain their blood for the preparation of unleavened bread during Passover, as well as the added accusation that Jews poisoned the wells, resulting in the Black Death (bubonic plague), which ravaged Europe during the middle of the 14th century. While throughout much of European Christendom Jews were demonized for their religion, however, this in itself does not explain the Holocaust. Conversion to Christianity, in most cases, spared the convert from any further harassment.

Along with being forbidden from owning and farming land, the rise of mercantilism and capitalism in Europe left unconverted Jews, who could not join guilds, as economic (as well as religious) outsiders. The secularization of civil society accompanying the European Enlightenment, which saw the waning of the church’s power, brought new forms of social and political antisemitism to the fore. The ultimate expression of antisemitism, which saw Jews as a biological category and Jewish identity as innate, created the preconditions for the most virulent and violent expression of antisemitism: that of the racial antisemitism of the Nazis.

Much discussion regarding the roots of the Holocaust lay in the impact of the Versailles Peace Conference of 1919 on the radicalization of German nationalism. The Treaty of Versailles was signed by a defeated Germany and the victorious

2 Essays

Allies of France, Britain, and the United States on June 28, 1919. According to the terms of the treaty, Germany was to surrender Alsace-Lorraine, Eupen and Malmedy, Northern Schleswig, Holstein, West Prussia, Posen, Upper Silesia, the Saar, Danzig, and Memel; reduce its standing army to only 100,000 men; admit to full responsibility and guilt for World War I; and pay massive reparations, among many other clauses.

Adolf Hitler referred to Versailles as a “Diktat” and was motivated to utilize the document as one of the primary arguments for revenge against Jews, communists, socialists, and others who, he said, not only contributed to Germany’s defeat in 1918 but were also primarily responsible for the country’s continuing social, political, economic, and military devastation during the years before he became German chancellor in January 1933. In large part, Hitler looked at Versailles as an instrument of “world Jewry’s” attempt to reduce Germany to a vassal state. This, added to the general antisemitism that certainly preceded Hitler’s ascent to office, provided an important outlet for his racial conception of how the world operated.

In this context, Nazi ideology must be considered. The following essential features of Nazism, in particular, stand out: racial antisemitism; social Darwinism and eugenics, in which civilization could be understood as an ongoing struggle for the survival of the fittest and most adaptable, coupled with a process of selective breeding of the human species; a mythical understanding of the German people (the Volk) and its inherent right to integrate into those populations that were truly Germanic (i.e., “Aryan”); and the necessity of the Volk to occupy by right the land required for its expansion. The granite foundation upon which these ideas rested was racism, which viewed the world in terms of superior and inferior human groups. Most of the latter had only one function—to serve the former. The exception was the Jews, who had no place whatsoever in the Nazi new order.

The Jews’ presence was seen as a racial problem of the first magnitude. The only way to resolve it was to arrange for their total disappearance from Germany. Different solutions were tried: voluntary emigration, forced emigration, and a variety of plans for deportation—to “the East,” to Poland, to Siberia, to the island of Madagascar. All these plans had to be dropped, however, owing to the outbreak of war in 1939 (even though all continued, in one form or another, through 1940).

The Nazis had already gained experience with systematic mass murder in the form of the so-called Euthanasia (or “T-4”) Program. According to this, Germans with physical and psychological disabilities were murdered by the state in the name of “selective breeding” for biological “purity.” Later, during World War II, this quest would be translated into outright extermination.

Finally, the suffering of the German people during the Depression, which led to massive hardship and poverty throughout much of society, permitted the transference of blame by the Nazis onto the Jews, as a minority who were disproportionately represented in the professions and thereby possessed greater wealth and access to privilege.

Taking the Holocaust to mean the mass extermination of the Jews by the Nazis and their allies, it can be said that the process really began only after Operation Barbarossa, the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. The invasion was accompanied by a Führerbefehl (“Führer-order”) from Hitler in which he reinforced his often proclaimed role of Savior of Europe against Bolshevism. Prior to Barbarossa, on June 6, 1941, Hitler issued his Kommissarbefehl (“Commissar Order”), in which he directed that any Soviet cadres and political leaders captured would be summarily executed. By extension, within the Nazi conception of communism, this included all Jews, as they were viewed as the chief disseminators of Bolshevik ideology.

Accordingly, special mobile killing squads, the Einsatzgruppen (“Special Action Groups”), were ordered to accompany the combat troops of the German army, following close behind in the weeks following Barbarossa. These squads were tasked with the total annihilation of all Jews in the areas to which they had been allocated responsibility. It is estimated that more than one million Jews were murdered between 1941 and 1943. While this was not in itself one of the causes of the Holocaust, it nonetheless precipitated the massive murderous actions that were to have their greatest expression in the death camps established by the Nazis in Poland during 1942.

Overall, it can be said that some of the more important causes of the Holocaust can be found in the following: the long, sordid history of Christian antisemitism; the advent of political and racial antisemitism; social Darwinism; extreme nationalism; totalitarianism; industrialism; and the nature of modern war. The simplest answer, of course, lay with Adolf Hitler and the Nazis, but this raises more questions than it answers. Hitler was the driving force behind the obsessive and fanatical Nazi persecution of the Jews and their mass slaughter that followed, but he could not achieve his ambitions alone. In order to learn what allowed Hitler and his party to implement their ideas, deeper causes must be considered.

Who Were the Perpetrators of the Holocaust?

The National Socialist German Workers' Party controlled Germany from 1933 to 1945, and during that time the Nazis persecuted and murdered political opponents, Jews, homosexuals, Roma, Slavs, and German citizens with mental and physical disabilities. Despite a recent trend to include all those killed by the Nazis as victims of the Holocaust—thus leading some to refer, erroneously, to “11 million Holocaust victims”—the clearest definition of the Nazi terror lay in the deliberate attempt to annihilate every Jew who fell into the Nazi net. No other group was targeted in this way.

The Holocaust was thus a time in which the most revolting mass atrocities were committed by humans against other humans. Who were the perpetrators of these crimes? For the mother forced to choose between two children on the ramp at Auschwitz, it was the Nazi doctor forcing the choice; for the adolescent girl torn from the embrace of her little sister because she was old enough to work while the younger girl was not, it was an SS officer; for the old man beaten to death by the side of the road by a Nazi soldier because he couldn't move fast enough when ordered to, it was that soldier; and for the newlyweds who were forced into the squalor of the ghetto where the bride watched her husband die of starvation and disease, only to die herself immediately afterward, the Holocaust was represented by the soldiers who brought them to this condition.

Moreover, one did not have to be a German in order to be a Nazi. This was made clear through the experiences Jews had with the Arrow Cross Party in Hungary, the Hlinka Guard in Slovakia, antisemitic Poles who denounced Jews to their German occupiers, Vichy French officials and police, Ukrainian collaborators, and so on. For many people who never saw a Nazi German, the Holocaust was visited upon them by a wide variety of messengers.

While an immediate response to the question of who the perpetrators of the Holocaust were might settle on the person of Adolf Hitler, it must always be borne in mind that Hitler could not have achieved the destruction of the European Jews unaided. Within Nazi Germany all sectors of society played their role in planning, facilitating, and executing what was euphemistically termed the “Final Solution.” They ranged from the major leaders of the Nazi Party—Hitler, Heinrich Himmler, Hermann Göring, Josef Goebbels, Reinhard Heydrich, and many others—through bankers, senior officers of the German Army, police, civil servants, university academics, railway workers, chemists, doctors, journalists, engineers, and the judiciary. Not all were necessarily aware of the full extent of the role they were playing, but all fit into the bigger picture, and few questioned what the logical outcome of their actions could be.

Perhaps the most important agent of death was the SS (Schutzstaffel), an arm of the Nazi Party formed in 1923 as a specialized unit of fifty men to act as Hitler's personal bodyguard. After Hitler's failed putsch of November 11, 1923, the SS was banned, though it was reconstituted under the leadership of Heinrich Himmler as a racially elitist unit in 1929. Suggestions have been made that he was inspired by his Roman Catholic upbringing and his admiration for the strength and obedience of the Jesuit order. In its creation, Himmler conceived of a paramilitary organization consisting of members of high moral caliber, honesty, and decency, who would be committed to the Nazi vision and agenda and thoroughly antisemitic in their personal orientation. Its infamous black uniform and Totenkopf for “Death's Head” insignias were introduced in 1932. By 1933 it was a force of more than 200,000 men. Under Himmler's guidance, the SS not only developed the Nazi concentration camp system but also took responsibility for staffing the camps, instituting the discipline policies within them, and planning how best to exploit the prisoners as slave labor.

From the summer of 1941 onward, the SS took control of the annihilation of Europe's Jews, first through the Einsatzgruppen and then, after 1942, through the extermination camps located in Poland. Thus, those primarily responsible for the murder of European Jewry in the various slave labor, concentration, and death camps came from the ranks of the SS. After the war, at Nuremberg, the SS was formally declared a criminal organization and compulsorily disbanded. Himmler committed suicide, but the overwhelming majority of SS members were never brought to trial.

Many Nazis of high rank (though not Hitler or Göring), as well as many members of the SS, were well educated. Josef Goebbels held a PhD from the University of Heidelberg; Heinrich Himmler studied agronomy at the Munich Technische Hochschule (now the University of Technology, Munich); Hans Frank, appointed governor-general of occupied Poland, was a lawyer, as were a majority of the fifteen attendees at the Wannsee Conference in January 1942. Alfred Rosenberg, the Nazi Party's leading race ideologue, possessed a PhD in engineering from a university in prerevolutionary Russia. Three out of the four commanders of the Einsatzgruppen operating in the Soviet Union had earned doctorates. The list goes on. These were all part of a genocidal project that formed a central platform of the Nazi state.

After the war it was recognized that many people involved in the process of murder had volunteered eagerly to be part of the process. Others, however, always saw themselves as simply obeying orders, such as several members of Reserve Police Battalion 101, a unit of 500 middle-aged, lower- and lower-middle-class family men from Hamburg, who were drafted into the so-called “Order Police” and were active in murdering up to 38,000 men, women, and children in 1942 and 1943. A variety of hypotheses can be proffered regarding their behavior: wartime brutalization, racism, segmentation and routinization of their tasks, careerism, obedience to authority and orders, ideological indoctrination, conformity, quasi-military status, and a sense of elitism. No single explanation, however, provides an all-embracing explanation, and this can be extrapolated beyond this single unit.

Throughout Nazi-occupied Europe there were many ordinary people who enjoyed the power Nazi authority gave them, while others employed the situation for personal gain. Perpetrators and collaborators were to be found in every country, and the Nazis relied upon them in order to carry out their terrible acts against individuals and communities across Europe.

Who Were the Victims of the Holocaust?

The Nazi regime is responsible for the deaths of up to 11 million civilians from all parts of occupied Europe. About two out of every three Jews living in Europe before the war were killed in the Holocaust. By 1945 nearly 6 million Jewish women, men, and children (1 million younger than 12 years of age, and half a million between the ages of 12 and 18) had been murdered as a deliberate policy intended to completely destroy what the Nazis saw as the “Jewish race.” All of Europe’s Jews were targeted for destruction: the sick and the healthy, the aged and the young, the rich and the poor, the religiously observant as well as converts to Christianity.

While two-thirds of all Jews living in Europe before the war were killed in the Holocaust, the destruction was not spread evenly. Despite the Nazi ambition to wipe out all of Europe’s Jews, most of those who survived lived in areas not occupied by Germany: Allied states such as Britain and the eastern areas of the Soviet Union, or neutral states like Spain, Turkey, Portugal, Switzerland, and Sweden. Most of Denmark’s Jews were rescued en masse through being smuggled to Sweden, while the Jews of Bulgaria were saved owing to a refusal on the part of the Bulgarian government to allow their deportation. Tens of thousands of Jews also survived in German-occupied Europe. Some survived in the forests, fighting the Nazis as partisans (though this was extremely hazardous, and many were killed by non-Nazi and non-German antisemites); others lived in hiding, or managed to hold on as prisoners in concentration camps until liberation.

Millions of others, including Roma, German and Austrian homosexuals, political dissidents, Russian prisoners, and Germans with physical or mental disabilities, also lost their lives, though the fundamental difference between their fate and that of the Jews is that the latter were targeted on account of their very birth, a fact embedded into the core of Nazi ideology.

Starting with the Nuremberg Racial Laws of 1935 and aided by theories of eugenics, social Darwinism, and post-Enlightenment thinking regarding the progress and scientific perfectibility of human beings, the Nazis turned to the physical sciences for solutions to their question of how to improve society. The Nazi conception saw that all human life constituted an ongoing confrontation for supremacy between competing races of people, a Rassenkampf, or “racial struggle,” and that this struggle was both typified by and expressed at its most extreme through an abiding conflict between the Aryan “race” and the Jewish “race”—a conflict forced by the Jews for the purpose of subverting the perfect world order in which the Aryans should, by virtue of their superiority, rightly predominate. The Rassenkampf was relentless and had to be fought until the death of one of the two parties would see either an ideal future for the world under the unchallenged rule of the Aryans or a hopeless future dominated by the forces of darkness unleashed by the “satanic Jew.” The racial struggle, of necessity, had to be genocidal in scope; neither compromise nor mercy would ever be possible if the required victory was to be achieved.

From early experiments in the mass killing of Hitler’s own people (the so-called “T-4” or euthanasia program), such efforts were incorporated into all Nazi actions by the Nazis (and their allies), thereby transforming beliefs into concrete actions. These actions took place through the Jews’ ghettoization, the onset of the Einsatzgruppen on the Eastern Front, and the introduction of death camps throughout Poland. From 1941 onward, the killing of Jews was conducted systematically in virtually all areas of Nazi-occupied territory, frequently with the active cooperation of local collaborators.

On January 20, 1942, a meeting of 15 high-ranking Nazis, representing the leading departments and agencies responsible for Jewish affairs in the Nazi empire, met at a villa in Wannsee, Berlin, to coordinate the actions required for the mass murder of the Jews. The minutes of the meeting made it clear that the Nazis intended to carry their “final solution of the Jewish question” beyond the occupied areas of Europe and into Britain and all the neutral states, such as Ireland, Switzerland, Turkey, Sweden, Portugal, and Spain.

Once in train, the killing was at its most severe in Eastern Europe (and Hungary, in Central Europe, from March 1944 onward). About five million Jews were killed there, including three million in occupied Poland and more than one million in the Soviet Union. Hundreds of thousands of Jews from the Netherlands, France, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Greece were also murdered, for the most part deported to the Nazi killing centers in Poland. The Jews of Romania were also slaughtered between 1941 and 1944, with at least 270,000 Romanian Jews killed at the hands of Romanians and German Nazis.

Given this, it must be at all times remembered that the Holocaust was a deliberate and explicit attempt by the Nazis to destroy completely and permanently a Jewish presence in Europe. While others—the disabled, Roma, Poles and other Slavs, Jehovah’s Witnesses, homosexuals, dissenting clergy, communists, socialists, “asocials,” and political opponents of all sorts—were also persecuted and in many cases murdered in huge numbers, it was the campaign against the Jews that was the ideological “ground zero” for Nazi racial ideology. That others were murdered, often on a genocidal scale, should be remembered and acknowledged; but it was only the Jews who were murdered as part of a calculated policy of genocide.

Some scholars have argued that the Roma should also fall into this category. In late 1942 SS chief Heinrich Himmler ordered that all Roma would be deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau, where they were set aside in a special “Gypsy camp” (Zigeunerlager). Most sent there did not live to see the liberation, killed by gassing, through disease, debility, or hard labor. Overall, the number of Sinti, Roma, and Lalleri whose lives were lost during what Roma refer to as the Porrajmos (“The Devouring”)—that is, the whole period of the anti-Roma persecution by the Third Reich—is difficult to determine. So far as scholars can estimate, the number lies anywhere between a quarter and a half a million, representing a percentage higher than that of most victims of the Nazis.

The fundamental difference between the experience of the Jews and the Roma, however, is that the Jews formed for the Nazis a cosmic force that had to be destroyed for the good of all civilization, whereas the Roma were victimized and murdered on grounds of behaving in unsettled ways that did not fit ordered German social norms, of having perceived inferior or mixed heredity, or being of “innate criminality.”

What Was the Response of Bystanders to the Holocaust?

Even though the perpetrators of the Holocaust saw themselves as noble servants undertaking a necessary racial struggle for the future of all humankind, their victims obviously did not agree. Nor, for the most part, did the vast majority of bystanders, though all too often they were either frozen into immobility by the sheer horror of what they witnessed, or silently acquiesced to the Nazis’ actions. While in occupied Europe many agreed that the deeds being carried out were vicious, violent, inhumane, and morally wrong, it took exceptional courage and commitment to stand against them.

During the Holocaust, a bystander was one who was at least aware of the perpetration of the Nazis’ crimes but could do nothing to halt them. In that regard, bystanders were neither perpetrators, collaborators, nor victims. Individuals and organizations (for example, the churches) became bystanders for various reasons. Some, for example, were hostile toward the Jews though not sufficiently so as to want to carry out harmful actions against them, for whatever reason. As in any society, some were simply apathetic with regard to what was happening to “the other.” Others—often a majority—genuinely feared for their lives or those of their loved ones should there be repercussions for speaking out against the Nazi measures (and, even more so, for attempting to halt them). Further, the benefits that some people received through the dispossession and murder of the Jews added to the mix of why a person might stand by and not wish to get involved. There are, of course, many other reasons as to why bystanders did not speak out or act on behalf of the persecuted Jews of Europe. None of this, of course, is to excuse their behavior, though it does help to explain their motives, decisions, and lack of action.

Another category of bystander was those who knew what was happening, tried to inform the world of what they knew, but were helpless in their efforts. Take, for example, Gerhard Riegner, the Swiss representative of the World Jewish Congress and author of the now-famous Riegner Telegram of August 29, 1942. Acting upon information received from a German industrialist who knew firsthand of Nazi plans for the extermination of the Jews, Riegner sent a cable to a number of Allied governments alerting Western leaders of Nazi plans—which, by that stage, were already well underway. The communication was sent to Rabbi Stephen S. Wise in the United States and Samuel Silverman, MP in Britain. Wise forwarded the cable to the U.S. State Department, after which months of delay ensured that no action was taken to save the lives of millions of Jews at that time being murdered in what was the most intensive period of sustained Nazi killing. Riegner, from Switzerland, had to watch helplessly while this was being played out, in what was for him a time of immense and depressing frustration.

While the Holocaust did not introduce the phenomenon of the bystander, it nonetheless illustrated the consequences of indifference and passivity toward the persecution of others. There could be little doubt that the vast majority of people in Germany and occupied Europe were aware, to at least some extent, of how the Nazi regime was treating the Jews. The largest of the groups involved in the Holocaust were the bystanders.

One of the many factors militating against action was bystander ignorance. Nazi actions, though coordinated throughout the Reich, were not conveyed to the peoples over whom the Nazis ruled, and besides, the Nazis had effectively taken over all news outlets in Germany by the mid-1930s. Within Germany, people could only act on the information they had available to them—and no one, outside of a very few at the highest levels of the government, had any idea of the “big picture.” Once war broke out in 1939, control over information became even tighter and spread throughout all of occupied Europe. The Nazi regime used tactics of fear and terror to suppress any possibility of resistance or rescue, and for the most part (with a few important exceptions) any efforts to do so were only localized and not national in scale. All too often, moreover, there were no means to resist, and some bystanders were literally paralyzed with fear or helplessness.

A major concern in studies of bystander behavior relates to the question of why bystanders remain passive, of why they do not help when a fellow human being is facing a dangerous situation. By way of response, some have considered the question of apathy as being an important indicator of behavior: genocide thereby became possible through an unquestioning obedience to evil leaders. Yet bystanders were often more than just cooperative citizens of Nazi Germany, Austria, or the German-speaking areas of the Reich; they all too often were also to be found in Nazi-occupied countries, encouraged not to get involved by collaborationist governments and their church leaders.

Nevertheless, the pressures of being and remaining a bystander were too much for some people. The pressures of wartime—and, frequently, the intimacy of occupation—sometimes led those who had stood back to eventually become resisters or rescuers. At other times, through their actions in standing by, many became victims themselves, as in the case of those caught in reprisal roundups by Nazis. By trying to live their lives beyond the fray, adopting a life of “business as usual,” and not appearing to be conspicuous, some bystanders in fact made targets of themselves through their very anonymity—another tragic dimension of inaction in the face of Nazi terror.

Individuals, groups, and entire nations were forced to make choices as to whether or not to resist the Nazis and rescue Jews and other victims, and knowing about their persecution but deciding to remain silent often became a daily torment. The issues raised by such situations provoked profound moral and civic questions, though often people were under too much stress to consider them at the time: Under what circumstances could injustice and Nazi violence be confronted? Further, knowing of this, was it possible to do anything so long as the injustice was sustained? As with all such moral questions, the answers were not—and are not—easy of resolution and had to be considered on a case-by-case and individual-by-individual basis.

How Did the International Community React to the Holocaust?

The role of the international community (including international organizations) is highly complex and detailed, and cannot be summarized easily. Before 1939 the major international responses to the Nazi persecution of the Jews in Germany and Austria ranged between avowed horror on one hand and indifference on the other. Rarely was any serious action taken against the Nazi regime, though in the early days several Nazis were concerned that internal antisemitic measures might have a negative impact on Germany’s economy should other countries respond to defend the Jews’ human rights. Such action, however, never materialized.

The major response to Nazi measures against the Jews during the 1930s took the form of restrictive refugee immigration policies. Just as the Nazis were keen for Jews to leave Germany, most countries of the world sought to deny them entry. The Evian Conference, called by U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt in March 1938 and convening in July that year, saw delegates from 32 countries meet to consider the resettlement of Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria. By the end of the nine-day meeting, no resolution for the alleviation of Jewish distress had been reached, affirming for Hitler and the Nazis the unwillingness of the Western democracies to extend themselves on behalf of the Jews.

Once the war broke out in September 1939, however, the Allies were keen to find ways to paint their enemy in the worst possible light and used the Jewish question as a means to do this. Still, they did not extend their own efforts to helping rescue Jews. The preference was always to assert that the best way to help the persecuted Jews of Europe was to win the war, and no other distraction could be allowed to stand in the way of achieving that objective.

On December 17, 1942, by which time Nazi Germany had deported more than two million Jews to death camps (and up to a million more had been murdered by Einsatzgruppen and police battalions), a joint statement was made simultaneously in London, Washington, and Moscow condemning the Nazi mass murder of the Jews. The statement identified specifically that the crimes being described were targeting Jews—not Allied nationals or citizens, but, explicitly, Jews. Second, the Allies promised to punish those perpetrating the crimes identified. And third, they had no hesitation in employing the word “extermination” to describe what they had by that stage categorized.

Such condemnation, the most damning indictment issued against Nazi mass murder to date, was in fact to be the only multilateral denunciation of German actions toward the Jews throughout the duration of the Holocaust. Before this time and subsequently, no other inter-Allied declaration mentioned the Nazi extermination of the Jews in this manner.

Jewish hopes were buoyed by the announcement, however, and at another conference, convened by Britain and the United States and held in Bermuda on April 19, 1943, some anticipated that definite action on behalf of the Jews would follow. The supposed purpose of the conference was to discuss the Jewish plight, but, held at this remote site in order to control the flow of information by the news media, no official representatives of Jewish organizations were permitted to attend, and the agenda was severely curtailed. The particularity of specifically Jewish sufferings was masked by use of the term “political refugees.” The conference placed more attention on prisoners of war than on refugees; the possibility of Palestine as a site for refugees, then under British control, was not discussed; there was no debate entered into regarding any direct negotiations between the Allies and Germany; and even discussions of sending food parcels to those already incarcerated in the concentration camps was curtailed. At its conclusion, on May 1, 1943, the Bermuda Conference was viewed as more of a public relations exercise than a serious attempt to address the issue.

On another level, alternative approaches to assisting Europe’s Jews saw requests to bomb the rail lines leading to Auschwitz (and even the camp itself), and the refusal of the United States to enter into negotiations with the “Architect of the Final Solution,” SS Obersturmbannführer Adolf

Eichmann, to “sell” the Jews of Hungary late in the war in what became known later as the “Blood for Goods” scheme. Only in 1944, under pressure both inside and outside his government, did President Roosevelt call into being the War Refugee Board, which, ultimately, was responsible for the saving of 200,000 lives.

While the record of Allied governments in saving Jews was, on the whole, poor, those of international bodies such as the Roman Catholic Church and the International Committee of the Red Cross were hardly better—though both organizations have worked hard since 1945 to rehabilitate their reputations. At the Vatican, Pope Pius XII, who was intensely opposed to communism, theologically conservative, and a Germanophile, repeatedly refused to offer any public condemnation of the Nazi assault against the Jews. Some have argued that his public silence and failure to speak out, given his position as the acknowledged moral voice of the Western world’s conscience, possibly increased the tragedy. His supporters, on the other hand, hold that the actions of the Vatican to give comfort and succor to Jews, much of it in secret, were all done with the pope’s knowledge and support.

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which also had a huge role to play internationally as the world’s premier humanitarian organization, did not issue a public appeal on behalf of the Jews, claiming that its policies of neutrality, impartiality, and confidentiality had to be measured against whatever good it was capable of doing—and what the effect would be if it was denied access to prisons, detention centers, concentration camps, and the like during the war. The ICRC’s ability to see to its core tasks—monitoring of prisoner conditions, carrying messages between prisoners and their families, advocating more humane conditions, providing food for prisoners, delivering emergency aid to victims of armed conflicts, among others—was put under immense strain during the Holocaust, when the ICRC’s mandate did not extend to civilian prisoners. Many critics, however, have argued that the ICRC failed to live up to its core mandate of serving populations in danger. In an official statement made on January 27, 2005, the ICRC stated that Auschwitz represented the greatest failure in its history.

Overall, one of the key questions coming from the Holocaust has to be whether or not Allied actions—beyond winning the war—could have prevented the Holocaust or reduced the number of those murdered by the Nazis and those supporting them throughout occupied Europe. While there is no easy answer to this in view of the fact that things did not work out that way, there can be little doubt that the silence and inaction of the world community, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary, resulted in the avoidable loss of countless lives.

What Were the Consequences of the Holocaust?

The period of National Socialist rule in Europe was a time of immense upheaval and dislocation, accompanied by deliberate political violence that, to a large degree, characterized the entire regime. It was at first confined to Germany, then spread to Austria, and then Czechoslovakia; its brutality was, until 1938, directed largely against political opponents. The aim of the SS was the elimination of every trace of actual or potential opposition to Nazi rule, even from those “enemies” who posed a threat through their very existence, in a situation where any traditional concept of justice was put aside. The Nazis intended that all opposition would be crushed. The regime’s totalitarian style of control thus served the purpose not only of intimidating all those under Nazi control so that they accepted the authority of the government without question, it also enabled the wholesale removal of entire populations standing in its way.

Clearly, when considering the consequences of the Holocaust we must first consider the enormous loss of life generated by Nazi rule. Owing to the industrialized and impersonal nature of Nazi mass murder, historians have found it difficult to provide a single, definitive figure of Jewish losses, though most estimates have settled at around 5.7 million (78%) of the 7.3 million Jews who inhabited the countries and regions of what became German-occupied Europe. These losses included the Jews of Poland (up to 3 million lost from a prewar population of 3.3 million), Hungary (at least 550,000 from a prewar population of 825,000), Lithuania (at least 140,000 from a prewar population of 168,000), the Netherlands (at least 100,000 from a prewar population of 140,000), Romania (up to 275,000 from a prewar population of 609,000), and the Soviet Union (at least over 1 million from a prewar population of 3,020,000).

Owing to the fact that the Nazis transported the majority of their victims from one place to another in order to murder them, the names of some localities will forever be associated with mass annihilation and human destruction. The six death camps established by the Nazis in Poland—Auschwitz-Birkenau, Treblinka, Sobibór, Belzec, Chełmno and Majdanek—became the site of the most horrific, purposeful, and sustained killing in the twentieth century. At least three million people, it is estimated, were killed in these and other murderous locations. In the Soviet Union, more than one million Jews were murdered by the Einsatzgruppen, while in the ghettos established throughout Eastern Europe perhaps up to 700,000 were killed through various means.

The loss of two-thirds of European Jewry—representing more than one-third of world Jewry in 1939—led to devastating results from which the global Jewish population has not yet recovered. In 1939 there were 17 million Jews in the world, and by 1945 only 11 million. The loss of so many lives deprived the world of generations unborn, talent that did not see realization, and contributions to civilization that were never made. Most of the survivors, particularly in Eastern European countries, found they did not have homes to which they could return. Not only had their countries been devastated by the war but in many cases they were not even welcomed back into their original communities.

As a result, the Holocaust impacted the European Jewish community long after the killing stopped, as it ended communal life that in some cases stretched back beyond a thousand years. The war left 250,000 displaced Jews languishing in camps awaiting a new home. While a new dispersal out of Europe took place, the Holocaust also served to hasten the return of Jewish populations to the Jews’ ancestral homeland in Palestine, which by 1948 had become the independent Jewish state of Israel. An important consequence of the Holocaust thus saw an end—in part—of the Jewish Diaspora. (The majority of the world’s Jews continue to live outside of Israel, but this is in most cases by preference rather than by any sort of official dictate forbidding them from doing so.) The distribution of the Jewish population now is completely different from what it was before World War II. Europe, where the Jewish presence was thoroughly devastated, gave way to Israel and the United States as the new major Jewish population centers.

Beyond the killing, the Holocaust had other consequences affecting the way in which people thought about the very nature of the world’s population. Prior to the Holocaust, the Nazi belief in eugenics—the science (or, rather, pseudoscience) advocating the use of practices aimed at improving the genetic composition of a population—was a given in racial conceptions of the world. Rassenhygiene (as it was termed in German) was understood to mean the improvement of the human species through selective breeding and the elimination of those hereditary factors that “weakened” the species. By the time Nazis assumed power in 1933, they were able to apply such ideas to so-called “racial” categories, specifically Jews and Roma. Nazi scientists and propagandists were thereafter able to “prove” the inferiority of non-Aryan peoples, and thus lay the groundwork for the latter’s ultimate extermination.

After the Holocaust, notions of eugenics and racial superiority were thoroughly discredited. Ideas of racial antisemitism were exposed as thoroughly fallacious, and the thought that a “superior” race could be bred artificially was brought to an absolute end (other than in the view of those who refused to see the political dimensions of where their thinking could lead, namely, to the Nazis’ agenda of annihilation).

Another important consequence of the Holocaust came as a result of the very destruction itself. After six years of total war—and its accompanying massive loss of life—the Holocaust awakened the conscience of humanity. In 1945 there seemed to be no difficulty in people identifying the horror for what it was. People knew instinctively what the carnage represented for the future of the world, and in Allied capital cities reports through both official channels and the media had already been conveying for some time the realities of the Nazi Holocaust as evidence of one of the worst expressions of inhumanity. From this, the cry of “Never Again!” was raised, resulting in two important initiatives: the quest for post-Holocaust justice, and a search for ways to ensure that it could never recur.

Already in 1944 the term “genocide” had been coined by Polish-Jewish legal scholar Raphael Lemkin; now, at the end of the war and in response to the revelations exposed with the liberation of the concentration camps, the Allies conducted the Nuremberg Trials between October 18, 1945, and October 1, 1946—prosecutions of 22 leaders of Nazi Germany by the International Military Tribunal. Nuremberg was more than simply a trial sitting in judgment on the Holocaust, as nothing was seen in the first instance as being more criminal than the Nazis having foisted a war of aggression upon a world that had previously been clearly committed to avoiding it. In the popular awareness, however, the Nuremberg Trials were seen as a judgment on the Holocaust, owing to the shocking revelations and film footage that came to light in evidence. The Charter of the International Military Tribunal was unprecedented in international law and a vital step on the road to a universal antigenocide, anti-crimes against humanity, and anti-war crimes regime that would be binding upon all. This would see its crowning moment in 2002 with the institution of the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

In this sense, an important consequence of the Holocaust was the emergence of a worldwide civil rights movement after 1945. While the Nuremberg Trials came to an end in 1946, enshrining the principle of individual responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity, two other crucial legacies were instituted by the United Nations two days apart across December 9–10, 1948: the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. With these, it seemed as though the world’s conscience had learned an important lesson from the ashes of the Holocaust, namely, that a repetition of the horrors of the Holocaust would not be tolerated again. Sadly, although an awakening such as this was long overdue, the message did not penetrate to all sectors of society, as the genocides of the second half of the 20th century were to testify.

A

A Crime without a Name

On August 24, 1941, British prime minister Winston Churchill delivered a live broadcast from London in which he described the barbarity of the German occupation in Russia. His speech was made just over two months after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union in Operation Barbarossa and the introduction of brutally repressive measures against the civilian population.

Among his comments was the statement that the Nazis were instituting “frightful cruelties,” in which “whole districts are being exterminated.” He declared that “Scores of thousands . . . of executions in cold blood are being perpetrated by the German Police-troops,” and that nothing since “the Mongol invasions of Europe in the Sixteenth Century” had there been “methodical, merciless butchery” on or approaching such a scale. Further, he said, “this is but the beginning,” as famine and pestilence would be likely to follow. In short, he concluded, “We are in the presence of a crime without a name.”

What Churchill could not say, at the time, was that the world was witnessing genocide. The term itself was yet to be coined; this would only happen when it was introduced by Raphael Lemkin in 1944 in a book he published in the United States titled Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress. With this, Lemkin gave a name to the crime identified by Churchill: genocide.

PAUL R. BARTROP

An oven at Auschwitz, a symbol of what British prime minister Winston Churchill referred to as “a crime without a name.” Soon, the term “genocide” would be developed by Raphael Lemkin in order to provide the crime with a name. (Gabriel Hackett/Getty Images)

See also: Genocide; Lemkin, Raphael; UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

Further Reading

Cooper, John. Raphael Lemkin and the Struggle for the Genocide Convention. Houndmills, Basingstoke (UK): Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.

Fournet, Caroline. The Crime of Destruction and the Law of Genocide: Their Impact on Collective Memory. London: Routledge, 2016.

Gilbert, Martin. Churchill and the Jews: A Lifelong Friendship. New York: Henry Holt, 2008.

Abetz, Otto

Otto Abetz was the German ambassador to Vichy France during World War II. He was born on March 26, 1903, in Schwetzingen, Germany, and worked as a teacher in Karlsruhe where he taught art and biology at a school for girls. He held an interest in French culture from an early age, and while in his twenties he founded the Sohlberg Circle, a youth group focused on French and German culture.

Abetz pledged his support for the Nazi Party in 1931 and in 1932 married his secretary, a Frenchwoman, Susanne de Bruyker; later, in 1934, he transformed his Sohlberg Circle into the Franco-German Committee. In 1935 Abetz joined the German Foreign Office as a French expert. He formally joined the Nazi Party in 1937 and attended the Munich Conference as a staff member in September 1938. While he spent the majority of his time in France, Abetz was forced to leave the country in June 1939 by the French fascist association known as the Cagoulaards (the secret Committee of Revolutionary Action) for apparently bribing two French newspaper editors to publish pro-German articles.

After the successful German invasion of France in May 1940, Abetz returned to France with the first German troops in June. He gained control of the German Embassy in Paris and assumed the role of German minister, where he shared his power with the military commander of the Wehrmacht. In August 1940 Abetz was named ambassador to the Vichy government under Philippe Pétain, a position he held for four years. His official residence and office was located in Paris, the capital of Nazi-occupied France, and not in Vichy. Abetz chose the Palais Rothschild in the Rue Saint-Honoré as his headquarters; today this building is home to the U.S. embassy. Under the terms of the Armistice, Pétain and his representatives were not authorized to come to Paris, so Abetz made occasional trips to Vichy when there was a need to deal with the collaborationist government in person. His duties included the handling of political matters in both the occupied and unoccupied zones of France, providing counsel to the German military, and the administration of the Paris police. In 1942 he was appointed SS brigade commander.

Abetz presented a German cultural face to the French by establishing the German Institute in late 1940. The institute offered German-language courses and cultural events to more than 30,000 individuals. Prior to Abetz's position as ambassador to Vichy, Germany's foreign minister, Joachim von Ribbentrop, instructed him to seize various pieces of art in Paris. His position provided Abetz with substantial influence over the direction of art, culture, and propaganda in occupied France, and from this point on he was largely involved with the collection of art looted by the Nazis. Shortly after his arrival in the French capital he began to organize a number of raids on museums and from private collectors. The collections thereby gathered, including valuable tapestries, were housed in a number of rented outbuildings organized by the embassy prior to being transported by train to Berlin. Abetz attempted to outsource 1,500 pieces of art from the castle of Chambord, but at the last minute he received opposition from the Wehrmacht leadership in Berlin, concerned that French resistance would see this as a predatory act and retaliate against the German occupiers. However, Abetz did not receive any resistance from the military leaders regarding the seizure of Jewish property. Many of the stolen Jewish-owned pieces were hung in Abetz's residence, as well as inside Ribbentrop's Foreign Office.

During his four years as ambassador, Abetz strongly attempted to convince the French to cooperate with Nazism. He also aimed to uphold his main responsibility by making sure the French collaborated with the Nazis in furthering their antisemitic goals. Abetz himself held antisemitic beliefs, which was one of the reasons he was recruited, personally, by Adolf Hitler. He proposed to deport stateless Jews to France's unoccupied zone, and then arranged for them to continue on to extermination camps in the east. He played a large role in the deportation of both foreign Jewish refugees and French-born Jews, especially after Germany occupied southern France in the fall of 1942. On July 2, 1942, Abetz advocated in a telegram for the deportation of 40,000 Jews from France to Auschwitz, claiming that all measures should be taken to remove them within both the occupied and unoccupied zones.

In November 1942 Germany occupied southern France and Abetz was ordered back to Germany for a year owing to power struggles in the Foreign Ministry, where rivals were displeased with the degree of power Abetz had managed to accrue. In 1943 he returned to France and was reinstated as ambassador in Paris. Upon the advance of the Allies in France following the Normandy landings of June 6, 1944, and the retreat of German troops, Abetz fled with Philippe Pétain to Sigmaringen, Germany. Dismissed as German ambassador, he then retired to his villa in Baden-Baden along with his collection of stolen art, gold, and money. Abetz attempted to go into hiding, but on October 25, 1945, he was arrested in Todtmoos in a clinic and sent to Paris for trial by a military tribunal. In July 1949 Abetz was convicted by a French court to twenty years' imprisonment and forced labor for war crimes, including involvement in the deportation of Jews. However, he was released in April 1954, having served only five years of his sentence. He denied that he participated in the murder of French Jews, despite his awareness of the "Final Solution" while it was in progress.

Otto Abetz and his wife died on May 5, 1958, in a car accident in Langenfeld on the Cologne-Dortmund motorway. His car, moving at a very high speed, ran off the road and was engulfed in flames. Speculation has since been raised that his death was possibly due to revenge against Abetz by a Frenchman who gave Abetz the car, which had steering damage, shortly before his death.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Confiscation of Jewish Property; France; Pétain, Philippe; Vichy France

Further Reading

Mauthner, Martin. Otto Abetz and His Paris Acolytes: French Writers Who Flirted with Fascism, 1930–1945. Brighton: Sussex Academic Press, 2016.

Petropoulos, Jonathan. Art as Politics in the Third Reich. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Action Française

Action française (French Action) was an influential radical French right-wing antisemitic and antirepublican movement during the first 40 years of the 20th century. Charles Maurras, a writer and political theorist, founded the movement during the Dreyfus Affair in 1894 in order to oppose the liberal intellectuals who supported Alfred Dreyfus, the Jewish army captain fraudulently accused of treason. The Dreyfus Affair polarized French political opinion on the right and left, and prompted Maurras to become a monarchist, devoting his movement to an old-new form of radical nationalism, which

Charles Maurras, the organizer and leading thinker behind the French movement Action Française. His ideas were monarchist, anti-parliamentarist, and counter-revolutionary, and in several ways anticipated and, later, developed fascism. (Keystone-France/Gamma-Keystone via Getty Images) focused on the supremacy of the state, the national interests of France, and the notion of a national security.

Those supporting the movement included Roman Catholics, small businessmen, and professional men, all of whom advocated the overthrow (in some circles, the violent overthrow) of the parliamentary Third Republic (1870–1940). The disruptive tactics of Action Française and its youth group, the Camelots du Roi (“Hucksters of the King”), brought prominence to the movement among the right-wing groups prior to World War I.

The name Action française was also given to a daily newspaper founded by Maurras and Léon Daudet, a journalist and novelist known for his satirical, polemical writing. The newspaper was published from March 21, 1908, to August 24, 1944, and expressed the movement’s ideologies. As a newspaper Action française had a relatively small readership, but it was still able to have an influence in France intellectually, and this spread to other European countries as well.

As a political movement, Action Française regarded France as a superior motherland and advocated for the destruction of the republic and the return to the monarchy.

14 Aktion

It held beliefs that Jews, foreigners, Protestants, and Freemasons were enemies who were attempting to destroy France. Members of Action Française were opposed to a democratic society and modernity, preferring instead traditional values and aiming to return to a preindustrial society. The goal was to remove all so-called enemies from France and to clamp down on the growth of democracy. Maurras claimed that democracy suppressed the liberties of individuals and ended in tyrannical rule.

Maurras was the movement's inspiration with regard to antisemitism, and he remained so for the next 50 years. By the time of World War II, he considered himself the basis for the Vichy government's "national revolution," fully supporting its anti-Jewish laws (Statut des Juifs) that were passed in October 1940 and again in 1941. These anti-Jewish laws were created at the initiative of the French government, and not as the result of pressure from the invading and occupying Nazis. The first Jewish law called for the drastic reduction of all aspects of Jewish involvement in French life, which is what Action Française had been calling for since 1894—nothing less than the exclusion of Jews, and Jewish influence, from society.

Action Française was highly admired by the Italian fascist leader Benito Mussolini. However, the ultraconservatives of Action Française had little support from the French people, and even the movement's newspaper was not widely circulated. Believing they could achieve a unified and exalted France, members of Action Française favored the recognition of France as a Catholic nation. By the early 1920s the movement consisted of 200,000 supporters, many of them schoolteachers, white-collar workers, and civil servants, who felt they were at a disadvantage due to their support for monarchism and the church. Membership was largely Catholic and strongly antisemitic. As 20–30% of the members were in the lower middle class, they blamed their status on the competition from big business and Jewish merchants. Maurras was able to appeal to these lower middle-class individuals due to his ideology concerning the well-being of rural France. In his view, rural poverty drove peasants into the city in search of jobs. This concern for the peasantry led to little support from those working in or owning factories in the city, but even small farmers were reluctant to give much to Maurras, as they saw little to no benefit in returning to a preindustrialized society.

Members of Action Française followed the direction of Maurras as an intellectual and as a critic, but the movement was also active in protest demonstrations and occasional street brawls. Individuals who participated in these brawls were often veterans of World War I or, occasionally, priests. However, Maurras did not intend to gain power for his movement through street violence. Instead, he hoped that military leaders would eventually accept his ideas, overthrow those supporting the republic, and arrest the individuals he considered to be subversive. Maurras believed that if he could convince the leaders of the elite to support his cause, the majority of the French people would follow suit. He was, however, incorrect. The French people did not want to return to the monarchy, including the younger priests belonging to the church. As the leaders of the movement began to attack their opponents within the church, they were met by rapid denunciations from the Vatican, and in 1926 Pope Pius XI condemned the actions and publications of Action Française, leading to the group's isolation. The movement also found itself competing with the small organization called the Young Patriots, which was recruiting young men interested in fascism.

This public condemnation by the papacy caused a setback for Action Française. However, between the wars, the movement still influenced some sectors of French public opinion, including Catholics. The group held enough power in 1934 to direct a serious attack against the Third Republic and lead the way for the new state established by Philippe Pétain in 1940. Xavier Vallat, the coordinator of Jewish Affairs in France's Vichy government during 1941 and 1942 under Pétain, was strongly influenced by Action Française ideology, often attacking Jews in Parliament.

When the war ended, Maurras was sentenced to life in jail for collaboration. Action Française was discredited and ceased to exist after World War II owing to its antisemitic and collaborationist past.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Antisemitism; France; Pius XI; Vichy France

Further Reading

Mazgaj, Paul. The Action Française and Revolutionary Syndicalism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2012.

Weber, Eugen. Action Française: Royalism and Reaction in Twentieth-Century France. Stanford (CA): Stanford University Press, 1962.

Aktion

The German term Aktion was employed predominantly by the SS to describe the nonmilitary campaign of roundups and deportations of Jews and other so-called "undesirables" in the eastern territories under German occupation. While there were thousands of Aktionen (plural) during the Holocaust, two stand out. The first, Aktion Reinhard, was named in honor of the head of the RSHA, Reinhard Heydrich, after his assassination in Prague on May 27, 1942. Its purpose was to murder all the situated Jews in the five districts of the Generalgouvernement (General Government) encompassing Krakow, Warsaw, Radom, Lublin, and Galicia; it was later expanded to include all Jews deported to occupied Poland. The second of the best-known Aktionen was Aktion 1005, which was developed in the summer of 1942 to obliterate all traces of the Nazis' "Final Solution" by the use of slave laborers, including Jews who were subsequently murdered, to both exhume and burn the bodies of the Nazis' victims.

While nearly 400 named anti-Jewish Aktionen took place between November 1939 and October 1944, any such measure, named or not, could be classed as an Aktion.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Operation Harvest Festival

Further Reading

Browning, Christopher. Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. New York: Harper, 1998.

Desbois, Patrick. The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest's Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.

Aktion Reinhard

Aktion Reinhard was the code name given to the Nazi implementation of the deadliest phase of the Holocaust, embracing the so-called "Final Solution of the Jewish Question" (Endlösung der Judenfrage) from 1942 onward. The name was conferred on the operation as a memorial to the head of the Reich Security Main Office and the Gestapo, Reinhard Heydrich, who was assassinated by Czech partisans in June 1942.

Initially, the plan was to inaugurate measures that would lead to the eradication of the Jewish population of the area of occupied Poland known as the Generalgouvernement, but the scope of the plan broadened to include Jews transferred to Poland from throughout Nazi-occupied Europe. Aktion Reinhard was thus an undertaking embracing the resettlement and mass murder of millions of Jews, accompanied by the plunder and transmission of Jewish property back to the Reich.

The operation, which also became known as Einsatz Reinhard, eventually saw the establishment of three purpose-built extermination camps in eastern Poland: Sobibór, Belzec, and Treblinka. These were established solely for the purpose of realizing the Nazis' murderous aims and were subsequently known as the Aktion Reinhard camps, a term that has gone down in the history of the Holocaust. By the time of their termination at various times during 1943, the three camps had resulted in the murder of nearly 2 million Jews: 250,000 at Sobibór, 600,000 at Belzec, and 900,000 at Treblinka (making that camp second only to Auschwitz as the greatest single killing site of Jews during the Holocaust).

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aktion; Belzec; Concentration Camps; Death Camps; Final Solution; Heydrich, Reinhard; Medical Experimentation; Operation Harvest Festival; Poland; Sobibór; Trawniki Men; Treblinka; Wirth, Christian

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

Friedländer, Saul. The Years of Extermination: Nazi Germany and the Jews, 1939–1945. New York: HarperCollins, 2007.

Albania

During the Holocaust, the small Balkan state of Albania was the only country in which the Jewish community actually grew. The circumstances by which this took place were both remarkable and unexpected.

Albania was a country with little in the way of an antisemitic history. A small Jewish presence had been in the country since as far back as 70 CE, but by 1930 the census listed just 24 Jews living in Albania. By 1937, however, owing to antisemitism in Nazi Germany, the Jewish community had risen to nearly 300. Indeed, the Albanian embassy in Berlin was one of the last to continue issuing visas to Jews, right up until the end of 1938.

On April 7, 1939, the Italian fascist regime of Benito Mussolini invaded Albania and installed a collaborationist regime that soon sought full annexation with Italy. As Italy had instituted anti-Jewish laws in 1938, the new situation in Albania led to a change of status for the country's Jews. The Italian administration implemented laws prohibiting further Jewish immigration to Albania, and all foreign Jews were ordered to be deported. In addition, Jews were expelled from the coasts and sent to live in the interior, and at the same time were excluded from the professions.

Owing to these measures, Jews from Germany and Austria were able to use Albania as a country through which they could transit on their way to other havens, and many passed through Albania on their way to Palestine.

When war came in 1939, there was a measure of sympathy extended to the Jewish refugees, who were, on the whole, treated well by the Italian occupiers and the local population. Particularly among the Albanians, a code of conduct known as Besa, which means “keeping a promise,” helped the Jews in innumerable cases. In accordance with this code, people will keep their word and protect each other. This was an Albanian way of life, with Besa having been invoked on numerous occasions in the past: over time, Albanians had, for example, provided comfort to other neighboring peoples in need such as Italians, Greeks, Croats, and Hungarians. Now, as Jewish refugee families began to scatter throughout Albania, they were able to assimilate into society in accordance with the code. Jewish children continued to attend school, but under false names and religions, while adults were often helped to hide “in plain sight.” In the spring of 1941, Nazi Germany invaded Albania’s immediate neighbor, Yugoslavia. With this, the Jewish community in Albania grew, with more refugees seeking entry into the Italian-controlled country. This was enhanced by Italy’s annexation of the Serbian province of Kosovo, which had a majority ethnic Albanian population.

During the Italian occupation, many Jews were harassed at the official level, with the Italian authorities prevailed upon by their German allies to either hand them over or incarcerate them in local prisons and concentration camps. After the surrender of Italy in September 1943 and that country’s occupation by Germany, the situation intensified. German forces began to target all Jews living in Albania and Kosovo, demanding that Albanian authorities provide them with lists of Jews to be deported. The local Albanian population, in turn, sought to protect all Jews, both locals and refugees (of whom perhaps as many as 2,000 arrived in the country during the war). Under the code of Besa, many were hidden in remote mountain villages, while others were spirited off to Albanian ports, where they boarded boats and braved the crossing to Italy.

In 1944 Kosovo Albanians began to be recruited for an Albanian Waffen-SS division, and on May 1, 1944, the Waffen-SS Skanderbeg Division was formed. Members took a religious oath, swearing jihad against unbelievers on the Qur’an. Accordingly, on May 14, it raided Jewish homes in Pristina, where 281 local and foreign Jews were arrested and handed over to the Germans. On June 23, 249 were subsequently deported to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where many were killed.

With the fortunes of war going against them, German forces were driven out of Albania in late 1944 due to the efforts of Yugoslav partisans with Allied assistance. During the war approximately 600 Jews from Albania, Kosovo, and western Macedonia had been killed, though up to 1,800 Jews were living, hidden, in Albania at the end of the war, making Albania the only Nazi-occupied territory to experience an increase in Jewish population during the Holocaust.

In 1995, after extensive research, Israel’s Yad Vashem decided to recognize Albanian citizens Vesel and Fatima Veseli, and their children Refik, Hamid, and Xhemal, as Righteous among the Nations. With this status, they became the first Albanians to be so distinguished, starting a process that has since led to almost 70 such recognitions—a remarkable number for such a small country with little tradition of religious plurality, where the majority of the people were Muslim, and in which the Jewish population began as a tiny number.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Upstander; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Resisting the Holocaust: Upstanders, Partisans, and Survivors. Santa Barbara (CA): ABC-CLIO, 2016.
Gershman, Norman. Besa: Muslims Who Saved Jews in World War II. Syracuse (NY): Syracuse University Press, 2008.

Algeria

In 1932 Algeria was a colony of French North Africa, along with Morocco and Tunisia. The largest population of the three colonies consisted of Arabs, along with settlers from France and other southern European countries, especially in Algeria. Jews made up the smallest percentage of the population in French North Africa at approximately 400,000. Around 1% of this Jewish population perished in the Holocaust.

The status of Algeria differed from that of the other two colonies in that it was considered part of metropolitan France; Tunisia and Morocco, on the other hand, were French protectorates. Algeria became a French colony during the 19th century when French troops invaded in 1830 and established power over the territory across the next 30 years, turning it into a region for colonial settlement.

Antisemitism was widespread in Algeria. In 1934 Muslim antisemitism reached its peak with a pogrom and the murder of 25 Jews in Constantine. Antisemitism was whipped up by agents from Nazi Germany in Algeria who directed propaganda at Muslims in Arabic newspapers calling for pogroms against the Jews. As a result of this, and for other reasons as well, there was a significant rise in Muslim anti-Jewish sentiment and violence during the 1930s.

On the eve of World War II there were approximately 120,000 Jews in Algeria. The western Algerian department of Oran had significant numbers of Spanish- and Ladino-speaking Sephardic Jews. Algeria was also home to Jews with roots in the Italian trading center of Livorno. These Jews spoke Judeo-Arabic, although French had largely overtaken their language. Prior to being placed under Vichy rule, Algerian Jews were French citizens under legislation from 1870 known as the Crémieux Decree, which meant they could participate equally in French social and educational institutions. However, the majority of Jewish families in Algeria were considered poor and made their living as blue-collar workers or artisans. The Jews in Algeria had been largely assimilated into French society and culture.

When France fell to the Nazis in 1940, Vichy rule was consolidated in Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia. The armistice with Germany signed by Marshal Philippe Pétain granted the Vichy regime power over the southern third of metropolitan France and the colonies; under these terms, the colonial administration, under the control of the French armed forces, remained largely intact. Most Europeans in North Africa supported the Vichy regime.

One of Pétain's first acts was to deprive Algerian Jews of their French citizenship by revoking the Crémieux Decree of 1870, which set up the Algerian Jews to suffer the same fate as the German Jews under the Nuremberg Laws of 1935. Admiral François Darlan and General Henri Giraud then imposed the antisemitic legislation in Algeria more severely than in France itself. Algerian Jews, now socially and economically alienated, were stripped of their French nationality and were subject to quotas and restrictions in most areas of daily discourse. These developments, of course, posed a huge threat to the well-being of the Mizrahi and Sephardic Jews who formed the majority of those ancient Jewish communities. Fascist Italian control of Libya also posed a danger to the Jews who lived in French North Africa.

On October 3, 1940, Vichy passed its first domestic anti-Jewish law (Statut des Juifs). This deprived Jews of the right to hold public office, confiscated property, and imposed strict quotas on the number of Jews who could work in the professions. While the anti-Jewish laws were copied from Nazi ordinances, they were more rigorous in their classification of race. This legislation was subsequently applied to Algeria on October 7, 1940. Algerian Jews who had migrated to France and developed small communities within Paris, Marseille, and Lyon also lost their citizenship.

Under Vichy, the Jews of Algeria were stripped of all their civil rights, required to wear an identifying mark, and suffered limited access to education. Vichy authorities established committees for Aryanization to seize Jewish businesses and looked for conservators of confiscated Jewish property. Jews were restricted regarding where and on what they could work, rendering their ability to make a living even harder than it had been prior to the war. There were no death camps in Algeria; however, approximately 60 labor camps were set up in Morocco and Algeria, where the stateless Jews were forced to work in the extreme African heat. The Bedeau camp located near the town of Sidi Bel Abbès acted as a concentration camp for Algerian Jewish soldiers, where the men were assigned to a Jewish work group to perform extensive forced labor.

The anti-Jewish measures put in place by the Vichy regime aimed to gain the favor of the North African Muslim population, though Arab reactions to the persecution of the Jews varied. Most Arabs were indifferent to the fate of the Jews, while many participated in their persecution. However, there were also some instances when a few Arab officials and private individuals went out of their way to save Jews. The level of Arab support varied depending on the location and the circumstances.

Algerian Jews were very active through participation in the resistance. They believed that the Germans pressured the French authorities into instituting the anti-Jewish laws. Many joined the Algerian underground after it was formed by a group of young Jews. Their initiative and resistance activities aided in averting the total destruction of Jews in Algeria and helped neutralize Algiers while the Americans and British, through Operation Torch, invaded on November 8, 1942.

The Algerian Jewish community survived due to this early Allied liberation. The Americans negotiated a cease-fire and allowed François Darlan, the Vichy high commissioner of North Africa, to remain in power. Amazingly, under a compromise agreed to by the Americans and Darlan, the Jews of Algeria did not receive a reinstatement of their citizenship until General Charles de Gaulle took control of Algeria in May 1943, after Darlan's assassination.

Between 4,000 and 5,000 North African Jews were murdered during the Holocaust, including an additional 1,200 North African Jews held in France who were sent east to the Nazi death camps. Those who survived did so because the Allies drove the Germans out of Africa before they had time to carry out their full intentions against the Jews.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Aryanization; France; Jewish Resistance; Pétain, Philippe; Vichy France

Further Reading

Guénoun, Denis. A Semite: A Memoir of Algeria. New York: Columbia University Press, 2013.

Nossiter, Adam. The Algeria Hotel: France, Memory, and the Second World War. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.

Satloff, Robert. Among the Righteous: Lost Stories from the Holocaust's Long Reach into Arab Lands. New York: PublicAffairs, 2006.

Al-Husseini, Haj Amin

Mohammed Amin al-Husseini was a Palestinian Arab nationalist and Muslim leader in what was to become Mandated Palestine. He was born in Jerusalem in 1895, the son of Mufti Tahir al-Husseini and scion of a family of wealthy landowners claiming direct descent from the grandson of the Prophet. He received an education in an Islamic school, an Ottoman school (where he learned Turkish), and a Catholic school (where he learned French). Sent to Cairo for his higher education, he studied Islamic jurisprudence at Al-Azhar University and then at the Cairo Institute for Propagation and Guidance. He went on to the College of Literature at Cairo University and then the Ottoman School for Administrators in Istanbul, which trained future leaders of the Ottoman Empire. In 1913 he made a pilgrimage to Mecca, earning his honorific “Haj.”

At the outbreak of World War I in 1914 he joined the Ottoman Army as an artillery officer assigned to Izmir. After the war he moved to Damascus as a supporter of the Arab kingdom of Syria, but with the collapse of Hashemite rule in Damascus he moved back to Jerusalem.

On the death of the then mufti of Jerusalem on March 21, 1921, elections were held to choose a new grand mufti. Although al-Husseini only came fourth in the votes, the British governor, Sir Herbert Samuel, in an attempt to maintain the balance of power between the rival elite Husseini and Nashashibi clans, appointed al-Husseini as the new grand mufti.

Al-Husseini’s preaching of anti-Jewish hatred led to a speech on August 23, 1929, which generated riots that killed 133 Jews and wounded 339 more. As a demonstration of his authority, al-Husseini later played a role in pacifying rioters and reestablishing order.

On March 31, 1933, al-Husseini met with the German consul general in Jerusalem, who advised Berlin that the mufti was an excellent ally in Palestine. He stated that the mufti aimed to terminate Jewish settlement in Palestine and saw that a holy war of Islam in alliance with Nazi Germany would remove the Jewish problem everywhere.

In 1936 the Peel Commission arrived in Palestine to investigate the establishment of a two-state solution for the mandate. Arab anger against the proposal resulted in riots against Jews breaking out in Jaffa on April 19, 1936. Before and after these riots, which continued to 1939, al-Husseini was establishing Nazi connections and later indicated that without funding from Germany the riots could never have been engineered.

By 1937 al-Husseini was in charge of a youth group, the Holy Jihad, inspired by the Hitler Youth. British police were sent to arrest al-Husseini in July 1937 for his part in the Arab rebellion, but he managed to escape to the sanctuary in the Muslim area on top of the Wailing Wall.

Al-Husseini’s lobbying in response to the 1936–1939 Arab Revolt resulted in the British White Paper of May 17, 1939, approved by the House of Commons on May 23, 1939. It called for the establishment of a Jewish national home in an independent Palestinian state within 10 years, rejecting the creation of a Jewish state and the partitioning of Palestine. It also limited Jewish immigration to 75,000 for five years. Additional immigration was to be determined by the Arab majority. This created huge problems for Jews because of their increasing suffering in Europe under the Nazis since 1933 and the failure of the Evian Conference to find any resolution to the settlement of Jewish refugees.

In a letter of June 21, 1939, to Hitler, he wrote of Arab readiness to rise against the common enemy, Anglo-Jewry, and once war broke out, al-Husseini went to Iraq and set up his base of operations there on October 13, 1939. On April 3, 1941, he attempted a takeover of the Iraqi government with Nazi support. In the resultant pogrom 600 Bagdadi Jews were killed, 911 Jewish houses were destroyed, and 586 Jewish businesses ransacked. When Britain suppressed the takeover, al-Husseini blamed the failure of the Nazi takeover on the Jews.

On July 22, 1941, al-Husseini fled to Tehran. After the Allied occupation of Iran on October 8, 1941, and the new Persian government of Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi severed diplomatic relations with the Axis powers, al-Husseini was taken under Italian protection and smuggled through Turkey to Italy in an operation organized by Italian military intelligence. He arrived in Rome on October 10, 1941.

He then began serious discussions with the fascist regime of Benito Mussolini. In discussions with Mussolini, he secured an agreement with the Italians that in return for Axis recognition of a fascist Arab state that would encompass Iraq, Syria, Palestine, and Transjordan, he would agree to support the war against Britain. The Italian foreign ministry also urged Mussolini to grant al-Husseini 1 million lire.

Over the next few days, al-Husseini drafted a proposed statement of an Arab-Axis cooperative effort by which the Axis powers would recognize the right of the Arabs to deal with Jewish elements in Palestine and approve the elimination of the Jewish National Homeland in Palestine. Mussolini approved the declaration and sent it to the German embassy in Rome. Al-Husseini was invited to Berlin as a guest of the Nazi regime, which gave him a luxurious home on a fashionable street, a full staff of servants, a chauffeured Mercedes, and a monthly stipend of $10,000. He remained headquartered in Berlin until May 1945. Then, on November 28, 1941, he met with Adolf Hitler, concluding afterward that Nazis and Arabs were engaged in the same struggle to exterminate the Jews.

From the mid-1930s al-Husseini had been friends with SS officer Adolf Eichmann. When he visited Eichmann's office at the end of 1941 or the beginning of 1942, he was briefed on the Nazis' final solution to the Jewish question in Europe. His involvement with the Holocaust saw him allegedly visit Auschwitz and Majdanek; he was on close terms with Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Hoess, and the commandants of Mauthausen, Theresienstadt, and Bergen-Belsen. He also organized antisemitic Arab radio propaganda, espionage in the Middle East, and the establishment of the Arab Legion and the Arab Brigade, Muslim military units that fought for the Nazis. He had at his disposal six freedom stations for his radio broadcasts (Berlin, Zeissen, Bari, Rome, Tokyo and Athens), from which he urged Muslims to kill Jews everywhere.

As early as January 1941 the mufti had traveled to Bosnia to convince Islamic leaders that a Muslim Waffen SS Division would bring honor and glory to Muslims (on the ground that they shared four principles: family, order, the leader, and faith). As many as 100,000 Muslim fighters were thereby recruited and fought for the Nazis. The mufti assured Bosnian Muslims that Islamic and National Socialist principles were compatible, with the largest Bosnian killing unit the celebrated 13th Handschar Division of 21,065 men.

In January 1942 Haj Amin discussed with German leaders the formation of a German-Arab military unit, and on May 3, 1942, sought from the Italian and German governments another declaration supporting, among other matters, the liquidation of the Jewish national home in Palestine. In consultation with the mufti, Eichmann had created an Einsatzgruppen Egypt ready to disembark for Palestine.

In July 1942 Haj Amin and the Iraqi Rashid Ali broadcast that it was the duty of Egyptian Muslims to kill the Jews before the Jews killed them, as the Jews were preparing to violate their women, kill their children, and destroy them completely. On December 11, 1942, the mufti urged Arab Muslims to "martyrdom" as allies with the Nazis, as "the spilled blood of martyrs is the water of life."

In late 1942 Heinrich Himmler gave his permission for 10,000 Jewish children to be transferred from Poland to the concentration camp at Theresienstadt, with the eventual aim of allowing them to go to Palestine in exchange for German civilian prisoners. The plan was abandoned, however, because of the protests from al-Husseini, and in all likelihood these children were murdered subsequently in Auschwitz.

In a speech delivered to the SS on January 11, 1944, SS leader Heinrich Himmler argued that the bond between Nazism and Islam was built on enduring common values. Inspired by his words, the Waffen-SS Handschar Division went into action in February 1944 and played a major role in rendering the Balkans Judenrein ("free of Jews") in the winter of 1943-1944, cutting a path of destruction across the Balkans that encompassed a large number of Catholic parishes, churches, and shrines and resulted in the deaths of thousands of Catholics as well as all Jews they could find. By the end of the war, al-Husseini's fanatical soldiers had killed more than 90% of the Jews in Bosnia.

In the spring of 1943 al-Husseini learned of negotiations between Germany's Axis partners with Britain, Switzerland, and the International Red Cross to transport 4,000 Jewish children to safety in Palestine. Al-Husseini sought to prevent the rescue operations with protests directed at the Germans and Italians, as well as at the governments of Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria. Demanding that the operations be scuttled, he suggested that the children be sent to Poland where they would be subject to "stricter control" (exterminated). They were duly sent to a concentration camp, meeting al-Husseini's demand that they be killed in Poland rather than transported to Palestine. In September 1943 intense negotiations to rescue another 500 Jewish children from the Arde concentration camp in Italy collapsed due to an objection from al-Husseini, who blocked their departure to Turkey because they would end up in Palestine.

In 1943 al-Husseini organized a chemical attack on Tel Aviv, but the five parachutists sent to complete the mission were captured near Jericho before they could complete their task. Their equipment, found by the British, consisted of submachine guns, dynamite, radio equipment, £5,000 cash, a duplicating machine, a German-Arabic dictionary, and enough toxin to kill 250,000 people by poisoning water for the towns.

The mufti also tried to convince the Nazis to bomb Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Concerned over the turning of the tide of war, the mufti wrote to Himmler on June 5, 1944, and July 27, 1944, asking him to do all he could to complete the extermination of the Jews.

After the war, Britain, France, and the United States refused to prosecute the mufti as a war criminal, although Yugoslavia had placed him on the list of war criminals for organizing SS Muslim divisions in the Balkans. He attempted to obtain asylum in Switzerland, but his request was refused. Taken into custody at Konstanz on May 5, 1945, by French occupying troops, he was transferred to the Paris region on May 19 and put under house arrest. French authorities hoped that his presence could lead to an improvement in France's status in the Arab world, and thus accorded him special detention conditions and other benefits. As a result, satisfied with his situation in France, Al-Husseini stayed for a full year.

He arrived in Egypt on June 20, 1946, where King Farouk provided him with sanctuary. Even with the fall of Farouk and the rise of Gamal Abdel-Nasser as head of Egypt in 1952, al-Husseini remained safe. His last public appearance came in 1962 when he delivered a speech to the World Islamic Congress. He used his final opportunity to speak to the world to call for the ethnic cleansing of the Jews. The Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin Al-Husseini, died in Beirut, Lebanon in 1974.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Eichmann, Adolf; Himmler, Heinrich; Hoess, Rudolf

Further Reading

Dalin, David, and John Rothman. Icon of Evil: Hitler's Mufti and the Rise of Radical Islam. New York: Random House, 2008.

Litvak, Meir, and Esther Webman. Empathy to Denial: Arab Response to the Holocaust. New York: Columbia University Press, 2009.

Patterson, David. A Genealogy of Evil: Antisemitism from Nazism to Islamic Jihad. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2011.

Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece

Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece and Denmark, born Princess Alice of Battenberg in 1885, was a great-granddaughter of Queen Victoria. Congenitally deaf, she used this disability to her advantage on a number of occasions when, for example, she did not want to accept unwelcome news. A deeply spiritual person, Alice visited Russia in 1908, during which time she talked with her aunt, Grand Duchess Elizabeth Fyodorovna, regarding a new religious order Elizabeth was planning to establish. This would have a profound impact on Alice's life in later years; she herself became increasingly religious, entering the Greek Orthodox Church in 1928.

Upon her marriage in 1903 to Prince Andrew of Greece and Denmark, she moved to Athens. Fluctuations in Greek political life saw the royal family exiled and reinstated a number of times, until the situation stabilized in 1935.

Princess Alice of Battenberg, later Princess Andrew of Greece and Denmark, was a great-granddaughter of Queen Victoria. She married Prince Andrew of Greece and Denmark in 1903. She remained in Athens during World War II, sheltering Jewish refugees. For this she was later recognized as one of the "Righteous among the Nations" by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. (Hulton-Deutsch Collection/Corbis/Corbis via Getty Images)

In the meantime, Alice was diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia and spent a number of years undergoing treatment. This eventually led to her estrangement from her husband, who had received sanctuary in France after having been among those blamed for Greece's military defeat in Asia Minor in 1922.

Princess Alice returned to Athens in 1938 and dedicated her life to working with the poor, a cause that had been one of her core interests from a young age. She did not resume her life in the palace, preferring to live in a tiny apartment in downtown Athens. At this time she sent her daughters to live with their relatives in Germany and her son, Philip, to England, where he stayed with his uncles Lord Louis Mountbatten and George Mountbatten.

When war came to Greece in 1940–1941 the royal family left Athens, first going to Egypt and then Cape Town. Alice, however, decided to remain in Athens with her sister-in-law, Princess Nicholas of Greece. She devoted herself to helping the local population, as Greece suffered increasing cycles of starvation; she worked for the Red Cross, organized soup kitchens, and traveled to Sweden to help facilitate that country's aid program—the same program that saw the efforts of Sture Linnér bring succor to Greece's starving people. Princess Alice also organized shelters for orphaned children.

At first, the Nazi authorities anticipated that Princess Alice would be pro-German, given that her four daughters were married to German princes. One of her sons-in-law, Prince Christoph of Hesse, was an SS officer, and another, Berthold, Margrave of Baden, was a German army officer. She did not, however, evince any support for the Nazi occupiers, and she became an object of suspicion when it was learned that her son, Prince Philip, was serving as an officer in Britain's Royal Navy.

Although torn, Princess Alice continued working to undermine the German occupation of Greece, and her efforts extended to aiding Jews, who were hit hard by the Holocaust. During 1943 well over 50,000 Jews were deported from Salonika to Auschwitz, and these measures were accompanied by unanticipated brutality. In September 1943 the Germans occupied Athens, until then under Italian control, and the search for Jews began.

One member of the Greek Jewish community, Haimaki Cohen, a former member of Parliament who had died before the occupation, was known to the royal family prior to the war. Now his widow, Rachel, and her five children were in danger. When Alice heard of their plight, she immediately offered them shelter, and so, on October 15, 1943, Rachel Cohen and two of her children, Michel and Tilda, found refuge in Alice's apartment.

During the occupation, Princess Alice's behavior inevitably attracted the attention of the Nazi authorities. At one point she was even interviewed by the Gestapo, who demanded to know who was living in her apartment. She feigned ignorance and hid behind her deafness, pretending not to follow their line of questioning; with this, the Cohens were thus able to stay in Princess Alice's residence at the royal palace until Athens was liberated in October 1944.

By this time, her own living conditions had deteriorated. The famine and Nazi occupation had cut deep into Greek society, and Alice had little on which to live. Still, she did her best to ensure that her guests did not go without, despite her own straitened circumstances.

After the war Princess Alice remained in Greece, and in January 1949 she established a nursing order of Greek Orthodox nuns, the Christian Sisterhood of Martha and Mary. This was a tribute to her aunt, Grand Duchess Elizabeth Fyodorovna of Russia, and their spiritual discussions way back in 1909.

Princess Alice left Greece in 1967. Her daughter-in-law, Britain's Queen Elizabeth II, invited her to live permanently at Buckingham Palace, London, where she died on December 5, 1969. One of her last wishes was to be buried at the Convent of St. Mary Magdalene in Jerusalem, and on August 3, 1988, her remains were accordingly transferred to a crypt below the convent.

In 1993 Yad Vashem acknowledged the wartime actions of Princess Alice by recognizing her as one of the Righteous among the Nations. On October 31, 1994, her surviving children, Prince Philip and Princess Sophie of Greece and Denmark, traveled to Jerusalem and planted a tree in her honor at Yad Vashem. In accepting the award, Prince Philip said that his mother was a person "with deep religious faith" who would have considered the need to help the Cohen family as "a totally human action to fellow human beings in distress." This was endorsed by Jacques Cohen, one of Rachel's sons. When he had earlier tried to thank Princess Alice, her response was that she was only doing what she believed to be her duty as a human being.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Greece; Upstander

Further Reading

Mazower, Mark. Inside Hitler's Greece. The Experience of Occupation 1941–1944. New Haven and New York: Yale University Press, 1993.

Vickers, Hugo. Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece. London: Hamish Hamilton, 2000.

Altman, Tova (Tosia)

Tova (Tosia) Altman was an underground leader in the Warsaw Ghetto. She was a member of the Hashomer Hatzair youth group working alongside Mordecai Anielewicz in the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, or ŻOB) during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of 1943.

Born on August 24, 1918, to Anka (Manya) and Gustav (Gutkind) Altman in Lipno, Poland, she was raised in Włocławek, where her father was a watchmaker. At the age of 11, Tosia joined the local chapter of Hashomer Hatzair; at 16, she was chosen to represent the movement at its Fourth World Convention, and eventually she became a member of the organization's central leadership in Warsaw. On August 30, 1939, she was appointed to the Bet (i.e., Secondary) Leadership, a core group of young women who would serve as a substitute governance cohort in an emergency. In 1938 she joined the hachshara (training) kibbutz at Czestochowa but was soon placed in charge of youth education for the central leadership of Hashomer Hatzair in Warsaw, postponing her aliyah, or migration to Palestine.

With the outbreak of war in September 1939 Tosia and several others left for eastern Poland, and she made her way to Rovno. With the entry of the Soviet army into Poland in the middle of the month, the leadership of Hashomer Hatzair decided to relocate to Vilna (Vilnius), where they were able to set up a central headquarters.

The German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941 caused communication opportunities between Warsaw and Vilna to be reduced considerably. With this, the Warsaw leadership of Hashomer Hatzair became responsible for the movement across Poland. As reports of the systematic slaughter of Jews throughout Poland began to arrive, Tosia, then in Warsaw, returned to Vilna, arriving on December 24, 1941. Discussing the situation with local members of Hashomer Hatzair, she reported on the depressing conditions in the Warsaw Ghetto and then sought permission to return to Warsaw in order to work with those remaining.

She thus became the first senior member of the central leadership to return to occupied Warsaw, and upon her arrival she began shaping the movement's different branches for resistance activities. She traveled to many different cities encouraging young people to become involved in a range of activities, her travels made easier by her blonde hair and fluent Polish. To ease her travel and stay ahead of antisemitic Polish informers, she used forged and outdated identity papers.

She then returned once again to Vilna, where she confirmed the rumors of mass killings of Jews in the east, and visited several cities in eastern Poland before returning to Warsaw. Here, she reiterated the message that Jews all over Poland were being methodically murdered and that the storm would soon reach Warsaw. The warning was difficult to accept, but it was reinforced by continual reports gathered independently about the death camps.

In July 1942, following the first wave of mass deportations of Jews to Treblinka, the ŻOB was formed. Tosia was sent outside the ghetto to consult with members of the Polish underground. The two main organizations contacted, the Armia Krajowa (Home Army, or AK) and the communist Armia Ludowa (People's Army, or AL), provided minimal direct support for the ghetto, though Tosia and others managed to bring in crucial armaments such as hand grenades and small arms.

Tosia continued her travels to other ghettos as an emissary of the ŻOB, and she was sometimes able to save young men and women from the deportations. In Kraków, for example, she met with two underground groups, Hechalutz Halochem, led by Aharon Liebeskind, and Iskra, led by Zvi Hersch Bauminger, both of which were effective contributors to the Jewish fighting effort in the Kraków ghetto.

Back in Warsaw, Tosia was involved in the first armed resistance in the ghetto after the Germans recommenced deportations on January 18, 1943. A party of fighters attacked the Nazis; in the chaos, several Jews were killed and others, including Tosia, were captured and taken to the Umschlagplatz (collection point for deportation). She managed to escape with the aid of a Jewish ghetto policeman acting on behalf of Hashomer Hatzair.

Placed in charge of maintaining contact with ŻOB members outside the ghetto, she spent a large part of her time on the Aryan side. But, always prepared to fight, she returned whenever she heard of an impending roundup.

On April 18, 1943, the final Nazi deportation was launched, and the revolt erupted. Tosia relayed messages and information to the ŻOB leaders, reporting by phone to Yitzhak Zuckerman. When Anielewicz moved his command structure to a bunker at Miła 18, Tosia served as liaison between him and the other leaders scattered elsewhere. The ghetto was by this stage in flames, so she went out on missions each night to rescue those who were known to be wounded or burned.

As the fighting continued, the struggle was made more difficult by the fires. When the Nazi forces closed in on Miła 18 and the Germans located the bunker, they pumped in gas to try to compel the fighters to surrender. On May 8, 1943, Anielewicz and most of those with him took their own lives rather than capitulate. Tosia was among the tiny group of survivors who managed to get out just before the final moments.

Suffering head and leg wounds, she left the ghetto on May 10, 1943, traveling via the sewers to the Lomianki Forest. She was found by Zivia Lubetkin and Marek Edelman, who took her to the Aryan side where she was hidden in the attic of a celluloid factory. On May 24, 1943, a fire broke out; Tosia, badly burned, was picked up by the Polish police and handed over to the Germans. They, in turn, transferred her to a hospital, where she was cruelly interrogated. She died, untreated, on May 26, 1943—one of the first to see the need to resist the Nazis, and one of the last to leave the Warsaw Ghetto.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Fighting Organization; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising

Further Reading

Henry, Patrick (Ed.). Jewish Resistance against the Nazis. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2014.

Vitis-Shomron, Aliza. Youth in Flames: A Teenager's Resistance and Her Fight for Survival in the Warsaw Ghetto. Omaha (NE): Tell the Story Publishing, 2015.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

André, Joseph

Father Joseph André was a Belgian Roman Catholic priest who helped save hundreds of Jews—mainly children—from deportation and likely death during World War II.

Joseph André was born in Belgium on March 14, 1908, and in 1926 joined a Jesuit order as a postulant. Plagued by poor health, however, he was compelled to leave the Jesuits two years later. Still committed to a religious calling, he entered seminary and was ordained a priest in 1936.

For several years thereafter, Father André taught at a Catholic high school in Floreffe before being named curate (assistant pastor) of St. Jean-Baptiste Church in Namur, Belgium.

Father André was particularly committed to helping the poor and marginalized, and was especially drawn to aiding Jews. Indeed, he had an abiding respect for Jewish religious and cultural traditions and was a strong advocate of religious freedom. Unlike some other Christian clergymen, Father André did not attempt to proselytize or convert Jews to Christianity. In the months leading up to the war, he had been operating a parish youth center, which would later provide him with a perfect cover behind which he would build a significant child aid network designed to shelter and hide Jewish children after the Germans occupied Belgium in May 1940.

By early 1941 Father André had cobbled together a significant network designed to hide Jewish children from German occupation officials. He did so at great risk to his own safety, as aiding Jews could have resulted in his own arrest and deportation. Even more striking was the fact that Father André operated this network across the street from the local Nazi military commander's office. Although the Gestapo periodically suspected that something was amiss, Father André managed to elude serious scrutiny. He temporarily housed and fed Jewish children at his parish, sometimes going into the countryside to solicit food for them from Belgian civilians. When one young boy under his care became seriously ill, he personally took him to the hospital under a false name. The boy was treated and released without being detected.

Father André was in touch with many other parishes as well as convents and monasteries, where he would help transport Jewish children. He probably never had more than 20 children at his parish at any one time to avoid suspicion. He also placed children in the care of Belgian families that were willing to take them in on a temporary basis. It is not possible to say for certain how many children Father André helped, but it was certainly in the many hundreds.

Father André continued to administer to indigent Jews after the war, and from 1957 until his death in 1970 he served as the chaplain of the Namur jail. In 1967 Israel's Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. In 1968 he traveled to New York City at the invitation of the United Jewish Appeal, where he was lavishly praised for his efforts during the Holocaust. Father André died in Namur on June 1, 1970.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Belgium; Catholic Church; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Moore, Bob. Survivors: Jewish Self-Help and Rescue in Nazi-Occupied Western Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Vromen, Suzanne. Hidden Children of the Holocaust: Belgian Nuns and Their Daring Rescues of Young Jews from the Nazis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Anielewicz, Mordecai

Mordecai Anielewicz was a resistance leader in the Warsaw Ghetto in January 1943 (when Jews attacked Nazi soldiers to avoid imminent deportation to the Treblinka death camp), and then, most notably, the leader of the Jewish fighters during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in April–May of that year. Although the Nazis defeated the uprising, it served as a rallying force for further Jewish rebellions against the Nazis during World War II, and Anielewicz became the preeminent symbol of Jewish resistance.

Anielewicz was born into a Jewish working-class family in Wyszki, Poland, in 1919. He attended a Hebrew high school in Warsaw and was briefly a member of Betar, a Zionist youth organization advocating self-defense for Jews. At the time of the German invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Anielewicz was a leading member of the Warsaw branch of Hashomer Hatzair, a Zionist youth organization.

On September 7, 1939, Anielewicz fled Warsaw with some fellow members of Hashomer Hatzair and headed east to stay ahead of the German advance. He attempted to escape to Palestine in order to establish an escape route for other Zionist youths. However, he was caught by the Soviet Army at the Romanian border and jailed. After release, he went to Vilnius, Lithuania, which had recently been absorbed by the Soviet Union. Vilnius was a refuge for many Zionist youth groups and Jewish refugees.

By the time Anielewicz returned to Warsaw with his girlfriend, Mira Fuchrer, in January 1940, the Nazis had sealed off the ghetto and appointed a 24-member Jewish Council, or Judenrat, to administer what was now a closed community. As conditions in the ghetto worsened, many Jews began to die of starvation and disease, and in response Anielewicz became active in the underground and set out to organize a resistance movement. He requested that other Hashomer Hatzair members return to Warsaw to continue their activities. Anielewicz established Neged Hazerem (Against the Stream), an underground newspaper, and began to transform Hashomer Hatzair into an armed resistance group. In addition, he studied Hebrew, sociology, economics, and history and began to write and give lectures to other Zionist groups.

By October 1940 the SS was deporting Jews to concentration camps, and Anielewicz stepped up his efforts against the Nazi occupiers. He established contact with the Polish government-in-exile in London, which ordered him to ally with Polish forces outside of the ghetto. This was a task fraught with difficulty, and he was unable to carry out his orders successfully. During the spring of 1942, however, he helped establish a short-lived antifascist group, which was dispersed by the arrest of its communist members.

On July 22, 1942, the Nazis began mass deportation of Warsaw Jews to the extermination camp at Treblinka, 50 miles northeast of Warsaw. More than 5,000 Jews were deported each day until September. During that time, Anielewicz had escaped to southwest Poland on an underground mission to organize other branches of his movement; returning to Warsaw to try to organize an armed resistance, he found the ghetto devastated by the deportation of approximately 265,000 of the ghetto's 330,000 Jews.

Most of the Jewish elders disapproved of armed resistance out of fear of provoking a devastating German retaliation. However, Anielewicz and another Zionist leader, Yitzhak Zuckerman, established what became known as the Jewish Fighting Organization. There were also some other small, unarmed resistance groups. Anielewicz garnered support for an armed resistance to block deportation, and he reorganized his group. The members elected him chief commander of the Jewish Fighting Organization that November. The group was able to contact the Polish government in London and procure a few weapons, with difficulty, in Warsaw.

In early January 1943 Heinrich Himmler visited the Warsaw Ghetto and ordered another deportation. The deportation began unannounced on January 18. In response, the Jewish Fighting Organization and several other small fighting groups began uncoordinated guerrilla warfare against the Nazis. Anielewicz developed a plan in which his fighters obeyed the deportation orders until they reached a certain part of town, where they received a signal to attack. Despite the death of all of the Hashomer Hatzair fighters except Anielewicz, many Jews escaped. The Nazis stopped the deportation four days later, after they had lost about 50 soldiers. Anielewicz and his fellow resisters thought this was a victory.

With the deception of peace, the Nazis then tried to coax the remaining Jews to board boxcars to Treblinka. Anielewicz continued to command underground operations, as the groups planned and prepared for further combat by procuring arms and building bunkers. In April, Himmler ordered the Warsaw Ghetto cleared of all Jews before Adolf Hitler's birthday on April 20. On April 19, the first day of Passover, more than 2,000 Nazi soldiers and Polish police began the final deportation. Approximately 1,500 Jews armed with two machine guns, 15 rifles, 500 handguns, hand grenades, and Molotov cocktails began to attack the Nazi invaders of the ghetto. The resistance achieved a remarkable victory on the first day, forcing the Nazis to retreat after attacking their tanks and artillery. The Nazis suffered heavy losses and left behind weapons.

The second day, the Nazis returned to drive the Jewish fighters from their hideouts by using gas, smoke bombs, and flame throwers. On the third day of battle, the Nazis used small patrols for street-to-street fighting. The Jewish resistance was outnumbered and outgunned. The Jewish fighters refused to surrender and often hid in sewers. The Nazis began to burn every house in the ghetto and flood the sewers in order to force them out. After the first few days of battle, Anielewicz moved from the streets to the headquarters of the Jewish Fighting Organization.

After a four-week battle in which the Nazis shelled and bombed the ghetto and killed 60,000 Jews, the Nazis captured and gassed the Jewish Fighting Organization's headquarters at Miła 18 on May 8. There, they found Anielewicz and most of the remaining ghetto fighters dead. Many had committed suicide to avoid capture. On May 16, 1943, General Jürgen Stroop, the Nazi commander, reported that "the former Jewish quarter of Warsaw [is] no longer in existence." The Nazis executed and deported the remaining Jews. Only about 100 survived. However, the uprising rallied other Jews to resist Nazi occupation.

Anielewicz's last communication was a letter to Zuckerman, who was stationed outside the ghetto. He wrote: "The main thing is that the dream of my life has come true. I have had the fortune to set my eyes upon Jewish defense in the ghetto in all its greatness." In Israel, Kibbutz Yad Mordecai was named after him, and a monument was built there in his honor.

PHILIP J. MACFARLANE

See also: Edelman, Marek; Jewish Fighting Organization; Lubetkin, Zivia; Stroop, Jürgen; Uprising; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Zuckerman, Yitzhak

Further Reading

Gilbert, Martin. The Holocaust: The History of the Jews of Europe during the Second World War. New York: Henry Holt, 1987.

Wigoder, Geoffrey (Ed.). New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Cranbury (NJ): Associated University Presses, 1994.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Anne Frank House

Over a million people each year visit an unassuming canal house in Amsterdam to pay respects to Anne Frank, a young girl who has become a symbol of the Holocaust. During the German occupation of the Netherlands, Anne, a young Jewish girl, and her family hid in a secret apartment in Amsterdam. The Franks had fled Nazi Germany in 1933, after Adolf Hitler came to power, but the occupation of the Netherlands in 1940 left them no further refuge. The apartment was their last hope. Anne Frank was 13 when the family went into hiding in 1942, and she was only 15 when she died.

The Anne Frank House is the headquarters of the Anne Frank Foundation. It contains a museum dedicated to commemorating the life of the young Jewish diarist Anne Frank, who was killed during the Holocaust. (AP Photo)

The canal house was built in 1635 and remodeled several times through the years. During one of these remodels, a small extension was built on the back, shielded from view by buildings in a quadrangle. The rest of the building housed Otto Frank's spice business and its offices. As the arrests of Jews intensified under the Nazi occupation, the family went into the annex with the connivance of several of his employees.

On August 4, 1944, acting on a tip from a collaborator, the Nazi police broke into the secret annex and captured the two Jewish families that had been in hiding there, including the Franks. After terrorizing the employees and vandalizing the hidden apartment, they left. Shortly after the raid, Miep Gies, one of those who had smuggled food to the families, snuck into the apartment and gathered up the scattered pages of a diary that Anne had been keeping. Fearful that the Gestapo would find it and hunt down those mentioned in it, she kept it in her home in an open drawer, which she guessed would cause the least suspicion.

The Franks and their companions, the Van Pels family and Fritz Pfeffer (whose names Anne changed to Van Daan and Albert Dussell in her diaries), were sent to concentration camps on the last transport to leave Holland, full of Jews bound for their deaths. Only Anne's father, Otto, lived to be liberated from Auschwitz. All the others perished within a few days of one another. Anne and her sister died of typhus at Bergen-Belsen.

Anne Frank's story is only one among thousands of similar stories during World War II. What set it apart and made Anne Frank a symbol of Jewish suffering during the Holocaust was her diary. After Miep Gies returned the papers to Otto after the war, the diary was published in an edited edition and became an immediate international bestseller. It appeared in 50 languages and was made into both a play and a film. In 1995 the complete edition was published. Personal and touching, the diary records the family's life and Anne's own maturing. It also relates the horrors of the Nazi occupation reflected in the lives of a small group of people who take on personality as the diary unfolds.

The diary is surprisingly well written for a young person, detailing Anne's emergence from childhood to early womanhood. She explores her developing romantic feelings and her adolescent tensions with her mother. She speaks of her fear and the atmosphere of oppression that lay upon them in the annex. Prophetically, she wrote, "The perfect round spot on which we're standing is still safe, but the clouds are moving in on us, and the ring between us and the approaching danger is being pulled tighter and tighter."

The Anne Frank House was established in 1960, after a public outcry prevented the building's demolition. Many of the ongoing streams of visitors are merely curious when they enter but fall silent as they move through the annex. The apartment has been left as it was at the end of the war, stripped of furniture but with many little reminders of the family. Anne's movie-star posters are still pasted on the wall, along with a few mementos. The feeling of the place, above all, is claustrophobic. But somehow, what rings through is Anne's triumphant testimony: "In spite of everything I still believe that people are really good at heart." The Anne Frank Foundation, which owns the building, also engages in antiracist education programs and organizes traveling exhibits.

NORBERT C. BROCKMAN

See also: Children during the Holocaust; Denial of the Holocaust; Frank, Anne; Gies, Miep; Museums and Memorials; Netherlands; Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Frank, Anne. The Diary of a Young Girl. New York: Doubleday, 2003.

Gies, Miep. Anne Frank Remembered. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Lee, Carol Ann. The Hidden Life of Otto Frank. New York: Harper Collins, 2003.

Anschluss

The Anschluss was the annexation of Austria by Germany in March 1938, representing the first effort by Hitler and the Nazis to expand the Reich. Although clearly prohibited, Hitler's expansion into Austria drew no intervention from the Western powers that wrote the prohibition into the Treaty of Versailles following the defeat of Germany at the end of World War I.

Documentaries about this time period accurately show the Austrian people greeting Nazi soldiers with wild enthusiasm as they marched into Austria, treating the Germans as liberators, clearly happy to be reunited with Germany, and excited by the prospect of joining in Germany's economic recovery. While it is true that millions of Austrians identified as Germans-living-in-Austria, and for whom the unification of these two countries was a logical and compelling correction of a too-long separation, the annexation itself was the result of a far more complex and violent evolution than the enthusiasm of Hitler's reception reveals.

This was not the first time Germany had sought the annexation of Austria. Twenty years earlier, in 1918, with the demise of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the "Anschluss movement" tried to unite Germany and Austria as "The Republic of German-Austria" (Deutsch-Österreich). This newly declared republic was short lived, given its gross violation of the terms of the World War I peace treaties. There were those, however, in Austria who continued to push for Anschluss with Germany, among them and most ardently the Austrian Nazi Party (the Austrian National Socialist Party). When Hitler, who was born in Austria, came to power in Germany he was in a position to bring to fruition his long-standing goal to unite the two countries. To that end, he ordered the Austrian Nazi Party to continue its violent opposition to the Austrian government of Engelbert Dollfuss (1892–1934), the chancellor of Austria from 1932 to 1934 who was staunchly against annexation. It was Hitler's plan that the violent tactics of the Austrian Nazis would create a need for Germany's intervention to restore law and order. The plan backfired, however, as many Austrians grew increasingly concerned about the actions of the Nazi Party and became even more intent on maintaining Austria's independence. After repeated failed attempts to overthrow the Dollfuss government, the Austrian Nazi Party assassinated Dollfuss in 1934.

Kurt von Schuschnigg (1897–1977) succeeded Dollfuss, continuing his predecessor's policy of opposing Anschluss and also banning the Austrian Nazi Party and imprisoning thousands of its supporters. With the hope of appeasing Hitler, Schuschnigg entered into an agreement with him in 1936 that assured Austria's independence, but later in that year, when Hitler and Mussolini formalized their alliance, Schuschnigg recognized that those assurances were meaningless. On February 12, 1938, Schuschnigg and Hitler met, with Schuschnigg hoping to convince Hitler to abandon his efforts to annex Austria, and Hitler demanding that Schuschnigg lift the ban on the Austrian Nazis; release those who had been arrested from the internment camps in which they were held; and appoint Arthur Seyss-Inquart (1892–1946), a supporter of the Austrian Nazi Party, as minister of the Interior. Schuschnigg, still believing he might be able to avoid annexation by giving Hitler what he wanted, reluctantly agreed.

On March 9, in a final effort to forestall union with Germany, Schuschnigg scheduled a plebiscite to be held on March 11, assuming that it would result in overwhelming rejection of Anschluss and debunk Hitler's argument that Austria was seeking Germany's help to maintain order. The plebiscite was cancelled, however, when Hitler claimed it was fraudulent. This claim was not without some basis, as Schuschnigg disenfranchised voters not yet age 24 in order to eliminate a demographic that was generally pro-Nazi. Recognizing there was nothing more he could do, Schuschnigg resigned on March 11 and was replaced as chancellor by Seyss-Inquart, who, as had been prearranged, then appealed immediately to Hitler for help. The result was that Hitler's Eighth Army marched into Austria without resistance on March 12. On March 13, with the annexation of Austria by Germany a fact, Seyss-Inquart—having now completed his job of providing Hitler with an excuse to enter Austria and having welcomed him into the country—resigned his two-day role as chancellor.

Although it is likely the percentage of Austrians supporting the Anschluss was considerably less than the 99.73% the Nazis claimed in an after-the-fact plebiscite held on April 10, for most Austrians this was a union very much hoped for. But for millions of other Austrians, and for the pre-Seyss-Inquart Austrian government, this was a forced annexation, meaning, from their perspective, an occupation.

Austria had always been rife with virulent antisemitism—according to his book, Mein Kampf, it was in Vienna that Hitler first saw Jews as “others”—but after the Anschluss, the antisemitism became far more severe. It has been suggested that antisemitism played a more significant role in Austria than in Germany, and that one reason for the reception Hitler received in Vienna was that it now appeared possible that the so-called Jewish Question would be addressed. Following Germany's lead, Austria imposed harsh anti-Jewish laws resulting in legal separation of the Jews from all aspects of Austrian society, instituting measures designed to “encourage” mass deportation, including beating and arresting Jews, and humiliating them publicly by, for example, requiring Jewish men and women to clean streets using a toothbrush while being subjected to venomous taunts by onlookers. In 1938 the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna, established by Adolf Eichmann, achieved a level of efficiency in persecuting and deporting Jews that made it a model for Germany and other countries in the Reich. Its success can be seen by the dramatic reduction in the number of Jews in Austria—due to emigration and forced deportation—from 192,000 in 1938 to 57,000 in late 1939.

Kristallnacht, often thought of as a phenomenon unique to Germany, also played out in Austria in November 1938, some eight months after the Anschluss, and in some respects it was more violent than in Germany itself. Thousands of Jewish businesses were destroyed and looted. Synagogues were burned and Jewish homes destroyed. As in Germany, thousands of Jews were arrested and sent to Dachau, and a staggering fine was imposed on the Jewish community for the destruction done during the pogrom.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Austria; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Globocnik, Odilo; Lebensraum; Nazism and Germany; Refoulement; Shirer, William L.

Further Reading

Bukey, Evan Burr. Hitler's Austria: Popular Sentiment in the Nazi Era, 1938–1945. Durham (NC): University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Low, Albert D. The Anschluss Movement, 1931–1938, and the Great Powers. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.

Wagner, Dietrich, and Gerhard Tomkowitz. Anschluss: The Week Hitler Seized Vienna. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1971.

Antisemitism

Antisemitism is an umbrella term for what is a variety of negative beliefs or actions held or taken against Jews for the sole reason that they are Jewish. Its history is long, earning it the designation “the oldest hatred.” Although there have been many causes, philosophies, and manifestations of antisemitism over the millennia, they all share in some level of hatred, contempt, or disdain for individual Jews, Judaism, or the Jewish people.

The term “antisemitism” is complex. Although, as noted, the animus of antisemitism has been long held, the term itself is relatively new. The German writer Friedrich Wilhelm Adolph Marr coined it as antisemitismus in 1879 to mean what in German is Judenhass, or Jew hatred. It is a compound noun, where “anti” is “against” and “semitismus” or “semitism” is, at least according to its common usage, “Jew” or “Jewish.” In fact, “semitism” has nothing to do with Jews per se. It is, instead, a philological term representing a particular linguistic group. More specifically, it is a branch of the larger Afro-Asian language group, and it includes ancient languages such as ancient Hebrew (which itself is a language in the larger group of Canaanite languages), as well as languages in current use, including Modern Hebrew, Arabic, Maltese, and some languages from Ethiopia.

Marr's use of the term reflected a belief that language was related to race. In this case, the term “Semite” was used in reference to a single component of the Semitic language group, namely, the Jews. As with “Semitic,” so too “Aryan” is a linguistic group, currently a reference to Indo-Aryan languages, part of the Indo-European language group, but is used to refer to the Germanic and Nordic “race.” Thus, the fallacious confluence of linguistic groups and race led to what would become a deadly distinction between the “Aryan race” and the “Jewish race.”

There is no single type of antisemitism. Throughout its history, antisemitism has morphed from one type of Jew-hatred to another, and from one type of anti-Jewish action to another.

Since the first and second centuries of the Common Era, antisemitism has been expressed primarily on religious grounds. Perhaps the most persistent of all forms of religious antisemitism is the belief that the Jews not only rejected Jesus as the Messiah but they also killed him—which, from the Christian perspective, constitutes a charge of deicide. The charge has been leveled against the Jews who were alive at the time of Jesus’s death, as well as all Jews of all time. It became a basic tenet of Christianity, integral to the Gospels and other sections of the New Testament, and thus Christians were reminded throughout the year—especially during Easter—of the unforgivable sin of the Jews.

A related theological component of Christianity is supersessionism, a Christian belief that, among other things, Christianity has superseded Judaism; that Christians have replaced the Jews as the Chosen People in covenant with God; that Judaism is obsolete; and that the New Testament fulfills the Old Testament. Thus, Judaism’s purpose is relegated to that of a precursor of Christianity, and, having fulfilled that role, no longer has value.

Once Christianity was adopted by the Roman Empire, its charge of deicide and its theology of supersessionism were spread wherever the church was, and they remained in place and unchanged over the centuries. For example, in the middle of the 16th century, pronouncements by Roman Catholic and Protestant leadership reflected a level of religious antisemitism that shows how embedded it was in the Christian worldview. In 1555 Pope Paul IV issued a papal bull that spoke of the Jews’ guilt, perpetual servitude to Christians, and arrogance. He consigned them to limited living areas, prohibited them from eating with Christians or owning land, and sought some kind of outer marking—a hat perhaps of a certain color—that would identify Jews everywhere. Just 12 years earlier, Martin Luther had issued his scurrilous tract On the Jews and Their Lies, wherein he characterized the Jews in some of the most inflammatory language found in any antisemitic tirade, telling fellow Christians to deal with these “rejected and condemned people, the Jews” by burning their synagogues and schools, razing their houses, taking their holy books, restricting rabbis from teaching Judaism, and so forth. The Catholic Church disavowed its position on the guilt of Jews as perpetrators of deicide only in the mid-20th century, as did Protestant denominations in or about the same time.

Religious antisemitism is only one manifestation of “the oldest hatred.” Jewish culture was also seen as separating Jews from Christians. The Jews’ style of dress, rules regarding food, their holidays, the language of their prayers, and religious rituals all distinguished Jews from Christian society. These distinctions, rather than being at least tolerated, became infused with a fantastical mythology, including what is called “blood libel,” a belief that as part of the Jewish Passover holiday the blood of Christian children was used to make matzo, the unleavened bread eaten by Jews during the holiday. Although this was a preposterous charge, it served as a trigger for actions ranging from suspicion to pogroms (local violent outbreaks against Jews, often encouraged by those in authority) whenever a Christian child went missing or was killed, especially near or during the Passover holiday. This charge of blood libel first surfaced in the 12th century in England and remained an ongoing source of antisemitism even into the 20th century.

Another manifestation of cultural antisemitism was the association of the Jews with modernity, many aspects of which the citizens of Germany and other countries in Europe found frightening and destabilizing. The Enlightenment and the French Revolution introduced a new way of thinking, emphasizing the power of rational thought and the importance of individual rights, both of which were seen as undermining the traditional authority of the church that formed the foundation of most European societies. The Jews, with a higher level of literacy and education than most other groups, were closely identified by conservatives and the general populace with these changes, including the profoundly disorienting movement from a rural, agrarian society to an urban, industrial one.

The Enlightenment’s call for individual rights and its recognition of a universal family of man spurred a wave of emancipation of the Jews throughout Europe, primarily in the 19th century. This meant that countries chose to expunge their anti-Jewish laws and treat the Jews as equals, giving them the same opportunities as any other citizens. There were strings attached, however: Jews were to assimilate into the dominant culture and pledge loyalty to the state. Assimilation became widespread, especially in Germany, where many Jews intermarried, abandoning their faith for that of their spouse, converted to Christianity, or retained their Jewish identity but did so in a far less visible way, dressing in the same clothes, eating the same food, and otherwise appearing and acting the same as Christians. In fact, it has been said of a large number of German Jews during the late 19th and early 20th centuries that they saw themselves as “Germans of the Mosaic persuasion.”

Despite the prospect that emancipation and its resulting assimilation would reduce, if not eliminate antisemitism, such was not the case. The effect, instead, was twofold. First, assimilated Jews were now viewed with suspicion, seen as Jews hiding behind a Christian appearance but still capable of delivering all of the dangers that had always been attributed to them. This led to an increase in antisemitism, seen, as it was, as a means of defense by Christian society against the duplicitous Jews. Second, as Jews already in-country assimilated, Jews who were new to Western Europe—especially those from Poland and Russia—generated new rounds of antisemitism because of their strange dress, their beards and long, uncut sideburns, their language (often Yiddish, a Germanic language that was widespread in the shtetls from which these new Jews came), their food, their large families, often their poverty, and their insistence on the study of holy books that were foreign and impenetrable to non-Jews. Not just the Christians of Germany saw these Eastern European Jews as foreign and outside of German society, but so too did the assimilated Jews who had been trying so hard to be seen as no different than any other Germans. Emancipation and assimilation only served to highlight the strangeness of these Jews that exacerbated antisemitism wherever they came to settle.

The combination of religious and cultural antisemitism are two factors that led to an element of Nazi antisemitism that called for the Jews—and only the Jews of all the Nazis’ victim groups—to be exterminated, every Jewish man, woman, and child from the face of the earth. Jews uniquely were viewed as the devil incarnate, as evil itself. This was a belief going back to the Middle Ages. Because of their purported role in the death of Jesus and because of the strangeness of their culture, Jews had long been accused of having satanic powers. The Nazis took this one step further by viewing the Jews as an existential threat to all of Western civilization, and especially the Aryan race. Thus, Nazi antisemitism included a cosmic element that posited a battle between the superior Aryan race and the inferior Jewish race for nothing less than the future of Western civilization.

In addition to religious and cultural antisemitism, economic antisemitism was a well-established component of Jew-hatred by the time the Nazis came to power in Germany. Having long been restricted by Christian society from owning property, Jews were unable to earn a living off the land, forcing them to look to urban centers for opportunities. By dint of education, hard work, and determination, a disproportionate number of the Jews of Europe were able to achieve a higher standard of living than their under- or uneducated neighbors by entering professions such as medicine, law, and journalism, as well as the arts, all of which generally were not only financially sound but also very visible, increasing resentment among the non-Jewish citizenry and exaggerating the perceived presence of Jews in the national population. This was exacerbated by the Jews fulfilling a role that was critical for any market-based economy to operate—the lending of money at interest—but a role that Christianity forbade of its adherents. Thus was borne the charge of usurious money lending by Jews, generating distrust by Christians of the Jews’ role in the marketplace.

The Jews that were most visible to Christians were those who were economically successful, spreading the inaccurate impression that all Jews were wealthy. This impression not only generated widespread resentment among non-Jews, it soon became part of a larger and widespread belief: that Jews controlled the world economy through the machinations of an international cabal. Given the amount of supposed power this myth vested in the Jews, it is not surprising that whenever financial difficulty befell an individual, a community, or a nation, it was seen as caused by the Jews and their international conspiracy.

Yet another form of antisemitism emerged, this time based on political concerns. Jews were rarely considered loyal citizens by the countries in which they lived. Because Jews lived all over the world, and because of the supposed Jewish financial conspiracy, they were regarded as seditious internationalists, a fifth column in any country in which they lived, trying to manipulate governments and policies to their own advantage at the expense of ordinary Christians and Christianity itself, all in the service of Jewish world dominance.

One of the most effective and ultimately deadly examples of this belief in an international Jewish plot intent on controlling the world is The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Supposedly the record of a meeting of the leaders of the Jewish international conspiracy, The Protocols was presented in 1903 as proof positive of the Jews’ commitment to world domination. Completely debunked and exposed for the fraud that it was, The Protocols nonetheless was seen as providing credence to what antisemites had been declaring for so long. It continues to this day to be published and circulated all over the world.

Jews’ political leanings were assumed to be liberal in the sense of upholding the principles of the French Revolution and the Enlightenment. When that perception was added to the Jews' association with the perils of modernity, including the concept of democracy, they, as a group, were reduced still further in the eyes of German non-Jews. Germans viewed the failed attempt at democracy known as the Weimar Republic, with its libertine ways so destructive of conservative bastions of governance and morality, as the fault of the Jews. That short-lived form of government, in place for the 14 years between the end of World War I and the ascension to power of Hitler, was, like communism, closely associated with the Jews.

Despite the inherent contradictions, Jews were accused of being cowards unable or unwilling to serve in the military or work with their hands, and, at the same time, powerful enough to cause countries in which they lived to lose wars, even a world war. Germany attributed its military loss in the Great War and the harsh terms of the Treaty of Versailles to the Jews' influence. Unwilling to acknowledge that it was defeated in the war due to its own weakness and errors, Germany blamed its loss on having been "stabbed in the back" by the Jews who were living in Germany during the war. Further, unwilling to accept the terms of the Treaty of Versailles as proportionate to what they had done, Germany blamed the Jews for advancing and then assuring the inclusion of the onerous terms imposed by the Allies.

This reflects a broad role that the Jews were forced to play in countries throughout Europe and throughout the millennia: the role of scapegoat. They were blamed specifically for the death of Jesus, for Christian children who went missing, for economic downturns, for the loss of World War I, for the resulting Treaty of Versailles, for the communist revolution in Russia, for all things modern and threatening, and generally for all evil in the world. In many European countries the Jews were the ultimate scapegoat on which were heaped any and all individual, communal, and national failures, generating vast waves of death and destruction.

At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century, it was France, not Germany, that seemed most likely to erupt in antisemitic violence. The Dreyfus Affair of the 1890s revealed a deep-seated antisemitism as a Jewish French officer was wrongly accused of treason. But certain concepts key to understanding the German mindset help explain why Germany was the most volatile. The term Volk (people, nation) conveyed more than its literal meaning. It evoked a common past of Germanic glory, a sense of transcendent purpose and cultural superiority, and it served to differentiate a closed group from those outside that group. When combined with other concepts such as Blut (blood) and Reich (empire, kingdom), which also conveyed elements of mytho-historical Germanic greatness, the underlying beliefs that supported strong feelings of superiority and distinction from others were well defined.

The results of antisemitism have been profound. Whether it was the Crusades, the charge that the Jews were the source of the bubonic plague, the Spanish Inquisition, the pogroms that swept many countries, especially Russia, the mass expulsions, or numerous other explosions of violence—much of it government driven—the Jews suffered dearly due to the power of antisemitism.

But as much as the Jews suffered during the first 19 centuries of the Common Era, the Nazis deemed it insufficient because the Jewish people as a collective was still alive. The Nazis' goal was to effectuate the Final Solution to the Jewish Problem (Endlösung der Judenfrage). To do so they adopted racial theories advocated by Arthur de Gobineau and Houston Stewart Chamberlain, among others, as well as the pseudoscience of eugenics and, taking them to their extremes, developed the most deadly iteration of antisemitism: racial antisemitism.

Racial antisemitism is premised on the belief that all aspects of an individual and a group—their strengths and weaknesses, intellect, creativity, athleticism, moral composition, and, ultimately, right to survival—are dependent on the person's or group's race, or more specifically, on blood: a person's blood was the source of all these things. Thus, all of these aspects of a person or a group were inherited and immutable. No matter conversion, assimilation, way of life, or beliefs, individual and group superiority and inferiority were predetermined by biology.

By applying Darwin's law of the survival of the fittest to individuals and groups (social Darwinism), the role of the strong—those with the right blood—was to dominate, and the role of the weak—those with inferior blood—was to serve the dominant group. The Jews, as the ultimate "inferior race," in fact, a race of sub- or nonhumans (Untermenschen), were seen by the Nazis as a race that had no value, who brought nothing but parasitic destruction to host nations and therefore, because of their blood, were a threat that had to be eliminated. By contrast, the Aryan race—that is, the Germanic and Nordic race—possessed the blood of supermen (Übermenschen) and therefore had the right and obligation to prevail over all other races. Hitler's book, Mein Kampf, written in 1923—fully 10 years before his role as leader of the German people began—is rife with such theories.

Thus, by focusing on the concepts of blood, race, and racial superiority, Hitler and the Nazis established a biologically based antisemitism that confirmed the supremacy of the Aryan race and that presented an ultimatum to civilization: either eliminate the Jewish race from the face of the earth or forever be subject to the pernicious and ruinous contamination they would inevitably—by dint of their racial characteristics—foist on the Aryan race and all humanity.

Antisemitism has for millennia been a multifaceted hatred, one that has presented itself in numerous and varied ways, all of which share an underlying enmity toward the Jews because they were Jews. As limiting, humiliating, and deadly as other forms of antisemitism were, the form of antisemitism that prevailed during the Holocaust was uniquely lethal: it was based on immutable characteristics of blood and therefore offered no alternative for the Jews other than flight or death. As it turned out, the opportunity for flight was sorely limited while the hatred and mass murder driven by the Nazis' racial antisemitism swept across Europe with seemingly unlimited abandon.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Action Française; Aryan; Aryanism; Blood Libel; Coughlin, Charles; Der Stürmer; Facing History and Ourselves; German Census, 1933; Hitler's Willing Executioners; Jud Süss; Mein Kampf; National Socialism; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nazism and Germany; Oberlaender, Theodor; Olympic Games, 1936; Propaganda in the Holocaust; Protocols of the Elders of Zion; Schönerer, Georg Ritter von; Streicher, Julius

Further Reading

Connelly, John. From Enemy to Brother: The Revolution in Catholic Teaching on the Jews, 1933–1965. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2012.

Nirenberg, David. Anti-Judaism: The Western Tradition. New York: Norton, 2014.

Wistrich, Robert. Antisemitism: The Longest Hatred. New York: Pantheon, 1992.

Wistrich, Robert. A Lethal Obsession: Anti-Semitism from Antiquity to the Global Jihad. New York: Random House, 2010.

Antonescu, Ion

Romanian marshal and dictator Ion Antonescu was born into an aristocratic military family in Pitesti on June 14, 1882. He graduated from Romanian military schools in Craiova (1902) and Iasi (1904). A cavalry lieutenant during the 1907 Peasant Revolt, he fought in the Second Balkan War and was an operations officer during World War I. From 1922 to 1927 he was Romanian military attaché in Paris, Brussels, and London, and was chief of the Army General Staff in 1933 and 1934.

As with most others among the nationalistic Romanian military elite, Antonescu favored British and French political influence. However, he closely monitored both the Third Reich's ascendancy and the looming Soviet Union in his vigilance regarding Romanian territorial integrity, pragmatically preparing for a German accommodation should such a choice become necessary. As minister of defense, Antonescu became embroiled in and frustrated by the corrupt governing vicissitudes of King Carol II, especially after 1937. Protesting Carol's February 1938 establishment of the Royal Dictatorship and his suppression of the fascistic Legion of Saint Michael (the Iron Guard), Antonescu defended the Iron Guard's leaders in court and was briefly jailed and outposted to Chisinau (Kishinev) near the Soviet border.

Following the Soviet Union's occupation of Bessarabia and the ceding of Transylvania to Hungary in the summer of 1940, in September Carol was coerced into naming Antonescu head of the troubled government before abdicating under pressure in favor of his son, Michael, age 19. Antonescu's title, Conducator, was the Romanian equivalent of Duce or Führer, and he used his broad powers to oust the Iron Guard from government in January 1941. That June he assigned 14 Romanian divisions to Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, Operation Barbarossa. For reclaiming Romanian lands from the Soviets, Antonescu was proclaimed marshal by the young King Michael on August 23, 1941. Antonescu continued to supply the German war effort with troops (ultimately, Romania lost substantially more men than Italy) in exchange for German military favor, but on the home front he sought to temper his ally's overbearing appetite for Romania's oil and agricultural bounty.

In coming to terms with Romania's "Jewish question," Antonescu—like Benito Mussolini in Italy—preferred his own solution to anything dictated by Berlin, employing policies that (officially) allowed Jews to emigrate in exchange for payment or to face deportation to Romanian-administered work camps in the Ukrainian region of Transnistria. Nonetheless, Antonescu's regime was responsible for the deaths of more than 250,000 Romanian and Ukrainian Jews and Roma as a result of its "Romanization" policies during 1940–1944, despite its refusal to join formally with Germany in pursuing the latter's "Final Solution."

Antonescu was deposed by King Michael on August 23, 1944, and turned over to the occupying Soviet forces. His war crimes show trial, held in Bucharest during May 4–17, 1946, led to the death sentence, and he was executed there on June 1, 1946.

GORDON E. HOGG

See also: Iron Guard; Jagendorf, Siegfried; Popovici, Traian; Romania

Further Reading

Hitchins, Keith. Romania: 1866–1947. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Temple, Mark. “The Politicization of History: Marshal Antonescu and Romania.” East European Politics and Societies 10, no. 3 (1996): 457–503.

Treptow, Kurt. Historical Dictionary of Romania. Lanham (MD): Scarecrow Press, 1996.

Antwerp Pogrom

Antwerp, a city in northern Belgium, had a Jewish population of about 50,000 on the eve of the German invasion in May 1940. Of those, only some 20% were actually Belgian citizens; the rest were either recent immigrants from Eastern Europe or refugees from Nazi Germany and Austria. With the Nazi attack on Belgium, about 20,000 of Antwerp’s Jews fled before the advance of the Nazis, the vast majority moving south through Belgium and into France.

At first, despite the Nazi occupation, daily life in the city continued more or less as it had before, but as time progressed things began to deteriorate for Antwerp’s Jewish population. Within days of the occupation the Germans had already begun instituting anti-Jewish measures across Belgium and, from these first days, Jews were subject to a curfew from dusk to dawn, and Jewish-owned businesses had to carry special markings. In December 1940 a German decree was issued opening the possibility for foreigners to be removed from certain areas of Belgium. Pursuant to this, the German military administration in Antwerp began expelling foreign Jews who had arrived in Belgium after 1938, and eventually some 3,334 Jews were deported in this way during the winter of 1940–1941, mostly into rural regions.

Moreover, the Germans were supported in their anti-Jewish measures by local pro-Nazi and antisemitic parties and groups. In Antwerp these collaborationist sectors were both more numerous and radical than in other Belgian cities, especially the Vlaams Nationaal Verbond (Flemish National Union, or VNV), De Vlag (the Flag), and the Algemeene-SS Vlaanderen (Germanic SS in Flanders).

Easter Monday on April 14, 1941, saw Flemish antisemitic attitudes boil over into what became a wartime pogrom against Antwerp’s Jewish quarter. A screening of the viciously antisemitic German propaganda film Der Ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew) saw the various Flemish paramilitary groups (including also the Volksverwering [“People’s Defense”] and the Anti-Jewish League) launch an offensive directed solely at the Jewish population. In scenes reminiscent of the Kristallnacht in Germany just two-and-a-half years earlier, some 200 rioters, armed with iron bars, sticks, and other weapons, and spurred on by the German occupation authorities, marched their way down the Oostenstraat, the main street in the Jewish district, where they set fire to the Van den Nestlei and the Oostenstraat synagogues, burned a number of their Torah scrolls, smashed the windows of Jewish-owned shops, and harassed the Jewish population. They then turned their attention toward the home of Rabbi Marcus Rottenburg, Chief Rabbi of Flanders.

As had happened during the November Pogrom in Germany on Kristallnacht in 1938, the police (unarmed) and fire brigade were called, but were forbidden to intervene by the German authorities. Encouraged by their accomplishments, the rioters made another attack three days later.

Appalled, the Antwerp city council, following the lead of a horrified population, assumed responsibility for the attacks and offered compensation to the Jews who had suffered damage. The Germans, however, refused to allow this to be put into place.

Having shown the Jews of Antwerp what they could expect from the Nazi administration and the local Nazis in the vicinity, a few months later the Germans began a process of “Aryanization” of Jewish property. Soon, all of Belgium’s Jews were required to wear a yellow star. Then, during 1942, deportations of Jews began. On August 28, 1942, the first mass arrests of Jews took place: first, foreigners—specifically, Romanian Jews—were picked up and taken to a transit camp in Mechelen (known to French-speaking Belgians as Malines), but soon others were also rounded up. In September 1942 Jews were arrested on the streets, and only those who could prove that they held Belgian citizenship were released. It was only a short step from there to arresting all Jews, regardless of nationality. A year later, in September 1943, the Nazis began arresting and deporting Belgian Jews as well.

The Jews of Antwerp proactively tried to save themselves and others, and local Zionist youth groups, in particular, became active in helping to smuggle Jews to secure hiding places. It has been estimated that perhaps as many as 3,000 Jews managed to hide in the Antwerp area during the war, including some eight hundred who actually remained in the city.

Antwerp was finally liberated on September 4, 1944. During the war, 65% of the city’s Jews perished as a result of the Holocaust. This was a staggering loss, and it stands in stark contrast to the Jewish losses in Brussels, where “only” 35% of Jews were deported and murdered. When reasons are called for to explain the difference, three stand out: the fact that a large proportion of the Jewish population was foreign and not of Belgian nationality; that there were very distinct Jewish districts, making it easier for the Nazis to target their victims; and, above all—as demonstrated during the Antwerp Pogrom of April 1941—there was a willingness on the part of some in the Antwerp populace to eagerly assist the Nazis in their murderous aims.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aryanization; Belgium; Collaboration; Propaganda

Further Reading

Michman, Dan. Belgium and the Holocaust: Jews, Belgians, Germans. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1998.

Szarota, Tomasz. On the Threshold of the Holocaust: Anti-Jewish Riots and Pogroms in Occupied Europe. Warsaw-Paris-The Hague-Amsterdam-Antwerp-Kaunas. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 2015.

April Boycott

An economic boycott against the Jews of Germany directed by the newly installed Nazi government took place on April 1, 1933. Given the years of antisemitic rhetoric flowing from the Nazis before they assumed power on January 30, 1933, there were intense fears throughout the Jewish world that it was only a matter of time before the Jews of Germany would be hit badly should the Nazis put their statements into practice. Driven by this anxiety on behalf of their German co-religionists, a series of anti-Nazi protest rallies organized by American Jewish organizations took place on March 27, 1933, in New York, Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and 70 other locations across the country. The New York rally, which took place before a packed house at Madison Square Garden, was broadcast around the world. The result saw a number of Jewish organizations, among them the American Jewish Congress, American League for Defense of Jewish Rights, B'nai B'rith, the Jewish Labor Committee, and Jewish War Veterans, join together in a call for a boycott of German goods in the hope that it would make the Nazis realize that they could be hurt economically should they decide to introduce any antisemitic measures. In the United Kingdom and other European countries, also, a Jewish boycott of German goods was implemented as a symbol of resistance against the Nazis' policies.

In response, the Nazi leadership decided to stage an economic boycott of their own, against the Jews of Germany.

The avowed reason was to exact revenge against the so-called “atrocities” (Gruehpropaganda) that, the Nazis maintained, were being spread about Germany overseas. It was the first avowed government action against Germany's Jews, built on earlier expressions of the same type of behavior. In the 1920s, for example, Nazi newspapers frequently called for a boycott of Jewish businesses, and this theme was often repeated even before the Nazis assumed power.

In March 1933 the Nazis, after conducting a manipulated election that saw them returned with a large majority, took control of the Reichstag. On March 23 they passed the Enabling Act, which confirmed Hitler's complete control of the country. An SA presence now increased throughout Germany, and harassment and violence against Jews was stepped up.

In response to the overseas boycott of Germany by Jewish businesses, Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels announced that a one-day boycott would take place against Jewish businesses in Germany. This would commence on April 1, 1933. In announcing the boycott, he stated that it would only be lifted once anti-Nazi protests overseas were suspended. In a statement threatening the Jewish community in Germany, he declared that if the protests did not then cease, “the boycott will be resumed . . . until German Jewry has been annihilated.” Julius Streicher, the viciously antisemitic editor and publisher of the newspaper Der Stürmer, was placed in charge of organizing the boycott, and he began planning on March 29. He then issued a series of orders calling for a nonviolent boycott to begin at 10:00 a.m. on Saturday, April 1.

That morning, many Jewish shop owners woke to find the windows of their businesses painted with Stars of David, the word “Jude” (Jew), and antisemitic phrases. SA Stormtroopers stood menacingly in front of Jewish-owned department stores and retail establishments and the offices of professionals such as doctors and lawyers, intimidating anyone who dared to walk in. Signs were posted throughout Germany saying “Don't Buy from Jews” (Kauf nicht bei Juden!) and “The Jews Are Our Misfortune” (Die Juden sind unser Unglück!). In addition, acts of violence were perpetrated against Jews throughout Germany.

Despite this, many Germans did not pay attention to the boycott, preferring to shop in the Jewish-owned stores with which they were familiar. Those customers who defiantly tried to enter Jewish shops were taunted and often verbally abused by Nazis and their supporters outside. Furthermore, numerous Jewish veterans of the First World War stood outside their businesses wearing their medals from 1914, eliciting more sympathy from non-Jewish Germans. Perhaps realizing that their measure was called too early to be obeyed by an unprepared public unaccustomed to Nazi methods, the boycott was called off after only one day, ending officially at midnight.

The boycott, though quickly abandoned, at least demonstrated, from the earliest days of the Nazi regime, their intent to undermine the viability of a Jewish presence in Germany. Moreover, it marked the beginning of a nationwide campaign by the Nazi Party against the entire German Jewish population. One week after the boycott, on April 7, 1933, the government passed the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, a measure that dismissed all Jews from employment in government service; this meant that Jews could no longer be civil servants or employed in education or, given that lawyers were also employed by the state, practice law. Doctors and hospital employees soon followed.

There were three exceptions: Jews who were veterans of World War I; those who had been in the civil service continuously since August 1, 1914; and those who had lost a father or son in combat in the war. Although they were excluded from the measures introduced by the law, this, too, would change over time.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aryanization; Lichtenberg, Bernhard; Sturmabteilung; Weltsch, Robert

Further Reading

Burleigh, Michael, and Wolfgang Wippermann. The Racial State: Germany 1933–1945. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews, volume 1: The Years of Persecution 1933–1939. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1997.

Arbeit Macht Frei

“Arbeit Macht Frei,” generally translated as “Work makes you free,” or “Work will set you free,” was the aphorism shown at the entrance to several Nazi concentration and extermination camps, usually at the top of the gates to the camp, during the Holocaust. It was SS General Theodor Eicke, inspector general of concentration camps, who ordered the sign to be posted. First used at the entrance to the Dachau concentration camp, where Eicke was commandant, the slogan was also posted at the entrance to the Sachsenhausen, Gross-Rosen, Theresienstadt, and Flossenbürg camps, among others, and, most infamously, at Auschwitz. The iconic lettering was created by a communist prisoner at the order of the SS.

Arbeit macht frei is a German phrase meaning “work sets you free.” The slogan is known for appearing on the entrance of Auschwitz and other Nazi concentration camps. This image shows the entrance gate to Auschwitz. (Corel)

Given that work in these camps almost always led to death, and not freedom in the literal sense, the question is, what did the phrase mean? Otto Friedrich, who survived Auschwitz, and who attributes the wording of the sign to Rudolf Höss, observes that Höss did not mean it to be a mockery or a false promise, but as something that speaks of the almost mystical relationship between labor and freedom. Most other characterizations of the sign, however, employ words such as cynical, ironic, and cruel. It has also been suggested that the Nazis' stereotype of the Jews as being unable or unwilling to engage in physical labor was another source of the wording.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Auschwitz; Concentration Camps; Death Camps; Museums and Memorials

Further Reading

Friedrich, Otto. The Kingdom of Auschwitz. New York: Harper Perennial, 1982.

Arendt, Hannah

Political philosopher and German-Jewish refugee, Hannah Arendt was one of the most important and controversial Jewish thinkers of the 20th century. While she was a prolific author, her fame rests primarily on three major works: The Origins of Totalitarianism (1951); The Human Condition (1958); and, especially, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (1963).

Arendt was born on October 14, 1906, in Linden, Germany, and spent her formative years in Königsberg and Berlin. Her parents were middle-class secular Jews, and she was raised with little knowledge of Jewish religious traditions and observances. Her father died when she was only seven years old, and it was her mother who encouraged her to pursue an academic career and make good use of her intellectual gifts. From 1924 to 1929 she studied at the University of Marburg, the University of Freiburg, and the University of Heidelberg.

Arrested by the Gestapo in 1933 for her work documenting German antisemitism and briefly interned, she fled to France where she remained until 1940. After the Nazi invasion and occupation of France in 1940, she escaped with her mother and her second husband, Heinrich Blücher, a Marxist philosopher and former Communist Party member. Her safety was facilitated through an American Righteous Gentile, Varian Fry, who managed to rescue a considerable number of intellectuals from the Nazis through his underground activities in Marseille. Arendt arrived in New York in 1941.

During the remaining years of World War II she worked as a journalist for the German-Jewish newspaper Aufbau, and after the war for the Commission on European Jewish Cultural Reconstruction, under whose auspices she returned to Germany on many occasions. In addition, she worked as an editor at Schocken Books and with Youth Aliyah, which arranged for surviving Jewish young people to emigrate from Europe to pre-state Palestine. She later held academic appointments at the University of California, Princeton University, Northwestern University, Yale University, Wesleyan University, the University of Chicago, and the New School for Social Research in New York. She died on December 4, 1975.

The Origins of Totalitarianism, written in the aftermath of World War II, is divided into three parts: first, an analysis of antisemitism; second, an analysis of imperialism; and third, an analysis of totalitarianism. Arendt understood that the roots of imperialism and totalitarianism lie not only in their making common cause with antisemitism (and racism) but in the fact that both Marxism and National Socialism are linked by their use of terror in the service of an ideology that is used to control the masses—and that both were thus radically new forms of government.

Arendt was far more publicly controversial as a result of the conclusions she drew when covering the trial in Jerusalem of Nazi SS Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, in particular her analysis of his “ordinariness” and his seeming inability to think through the consequences of his actions in relation to other human beings. At the same time, she also offered a critique of the members of the various Judenräte (Jewish councils), which showed them to be tragically complicit in their own destruction.

Arendt argued that Eichmann was, at most, a reasonably intelligent, though hardly introspective, person, a bureaucrat who saw the SS and his role in it as one that provided career advancement. By all accounts, he was not an antisemite in the classic Nazi mold; he had studied Jewish history, visited Palestine, and even attempted unsuccessfully to learn Hebrew. Physically, there was nothing distinguishing about either his size or his features. He was, in the final analysis, just an ordinary man, but one who found himself in a situation and role that evidently suited him, regardless of its ultimate consequences. For Arendt, the question was how he could justify his behavior. Observing him almost daily in the courtroom and responding to the judges, his defense attorneys, and the prosecutors, she came to perceive no insight on his part regarding his behavior toward other human beings and adopted the term “banal” to describe the ordinariness of the man. For Arendt, the term “banality” tended to characterize too much of the contemporary human condition. The overwhelming majority of human beings, for her, lack the ability to think about their behavior, and their lack of self-insight (introspection) thus allows some to engage in horrific behaviors without the necessity of either rationalizations or justifications. Eichmann was thus emblematic of too many in too many societies and, by extension, what continues to be wrong with much of the world.

Beyond her comments on Eichmann, Arendt’s remarks on the Judenräte produced a storm of controversy for which she was somewhat unprepared. However, she wrote that her examination of the data presented at the trial had led her to conclude that those Jews tragically tasked with leadership responsibilities under the Nazis had, for the most part, at least initially unknowingly, participated in their own destruction and the destruction of their fellow Jews.

To sum up the main threads of Hannah Arendt’s thinking concerning the Holocaust is no easy task. For most of her adult life she remained something of a marginal figure on the periphery of the organized Jewish community and, ultimately, far more welcomed within the larger academic and intellectual communities wherein she found a home to think and write. She remains, however, one of the seminal thinkers and writers on antisemitism, communism, Nazism, and the Holocaust, whose insights cannot be cavalierly dismissed but must be addressed directly. Her insights were astute and highly influential (as well as controversial) in their time; how relevant they will remain for future generations of scholars and thinkers will await further determination.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Banality of Evil; Bingham, Harry; Bureaucracy; Desk Killers; Eichmann in Jerusalem; Eichmann Trial; Judenrat

Further Reading

- Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Viking Press, 1963.
- Arendt, Hannah. The Origins of Totalitarianism. New York: Schocken Books, 1951.
- Aschheim, Steven E. Scholem, Arendt, Klemperer: Intimate Chronicles in Turbulent Times. Bloomington (IN): Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Kristeva, Julia. Hannah Arendt. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2001.
- Villa, Dana (Ed.). The Cambridge Companion to Hannah Arendt. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Armée Juive

The French Armée Juive (Jewish Army) was founded in January 1942 by Jewish partisans who were active in various already-established resistance groups. A number of these by this time held leadership roles; for example, Jews made up 90% of the first detachment of the communist FTP-MOI (Francs-Tireurs et Partisans—Main-d’Oeuvre Immigrée), a subgroup of the FTP organization (Francs-Tireurs et Partisans), an armed resistance organization created by leaders of the French Communist Party (PCF). The second detachment of the FTP-MOI was nearly 100% comprised of Yiddish-speaking, foreign-born Jews. The FTP-MOI, despite having a severe weapons shortage, increased its attacks over time. By 1943 it was able to conduct more daring and frequent attacks against the Germans, at the rate of fifteen per month. The Armée Juive assisted the FTP-MOI by attacking German military trucks and trains and by carrying out sabotage missions. Hundreds of these French Jewish resistance fighters joined the ranks of the Armée Juive, France’s all-Jewish partisan force.

The Armée Juive managed to smuggle thousands of Jews to Spain and Switzerland, and launched a number of attacks against the German army in both the northern and southern parts of France. Other forms of resistance included attacking informants and Gestapo agents, and smuggling funds from Switzerland to rescue organizations in France. The majority of Armée Juive fighters were dedicated Zionists, but it also accepted all Jews, regardless of whether or not they were Zionists. The Armée Juive military chief, Jacque Lazarus, inspired the group by coupling the act of resistance to Jewish heritage.

In August 1940 Dovid and Ariane Knout, along with Abraham Polonski and his wife Eugenie, all revisionist Zionists, established a secret organization in Toulouse known as the “strong hand.” Dovid Knout based the goals of the organization on the creation of a Jewish state, while also defending the right of Jews to live outside Palestine and to fight against the Nazis. The recruitment of Aron Lucien Lublin, a socialist Zionist, expanded the organization. Polonski and Lublin began recruiting activists in Toulouse, Montpellier, Nice, Grenoble, Lyon, and Limoges. The first members were recruited with participants in a circle of Jewish studies led by Rabbi Paul Roitman. Initially, members assisted with supplying the inmates of internment camps attempting to escape in the Toulouse region.

On January 10, 1942, the Armée Juive was officially created by an agreement between Polonski and Lublin. Their agreement formulated the objectives of the group, which included the forms of action and organizational structure. The recruitment process of the Jewish Army was by the “friend brings a friend” method, thus reducing their risk of exposure. Each member of the Armée Juive was required to swear on the Bible, before the blue and white Zionist flag, and recite an oath swearing loyalty to the Jewish Army and obedience to its leaders. Individuals who joined the Jewish Army were subject to severe, secret, and obedient recruitment standards. The Armée Juive reinforced its ranks with the MJS (Mouvement des Jeunesses Sionistes) and the Zionist Youth Movement that was created in May 1942 by Simon Levitte and Dika Jefroykin. In 1943 the Jewish Army was able to widen the circles of its members and activities through cooperation agreements with the MJS and the Jewish Scouts of France (EIF).

The Jewish Army signed an agreement in 1943 with the Zionist Organization of France, which provided them the assistance of the organization’s president, Marc Jarblum, while he was seeking refuge in Switzerland. Through this agreement, the Jewish Army received money from Switzerland in order to assist with rescue activities and the ongoing armed struggle. In addition to assisting with the rescue of French Jews and their difficult passage to Switzerland, the Armée Juive simultaneously assisted in illegal crossings across the Spanish border under the cover of their false “Aryan” papers; these were intended to help young people to join the Allied forces or flee to Palestine. The evacuation and regrouping service to Spain was hit hard in May 1944 when a Jewish Army leader, Jacques Roitman, was arrested by the Gestapo at the station near Toulouse, along with Rabbi Leo Cohen and five other resistance fighters. However, despite this setback, the Jewish Army still managed to send several hundred people across the Spanish border. Through their evacuation and child reunion service, the Armée Juive successfully smuggled thousands of children by September 1944 to both Switzerland and through Spain to Palestine.

During the French uprising of 1944, the Armée Juive consolidated the Jewish partisan force into one coordinating body as a joint effort of the leaders of the Jewish organizations in order to strengthen and contribute to the general French Resistance movement. The new organization became known as the Jewish Fighting Organization (Organization Juive de Combat), or OJC. The OJC cooperated in the campaign against the retreating German army, and thus participated in the liberation of Paris, Lyon, Toulouse, Grenoble, and Nice. The OJC successfully captured a German train that held soldiers, food, weapons, and ammunitions. The soldiers of the OJC all wore Star of David armbands and proudly declared to the German prisoners that they were Jewish. Because of its contributions to the war effort, the Jewish Fighting Organization was officially recognized as a unit of the French Forces of the Interior.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: France; Jewish Partisans; Jewish Resistance; Resistance Movements

Further Reading

Henry, Patrick. Jewish Resistance against the Nazis. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2004.

Latour, Anny. The Jewish Resistance in France, 1940–1944. New York: Holocaust Library, 1970.

Lazare, Lucien. Rescue as Resistance: How Jewish Organization Fought the Holocaust in France. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.

Poznanski, Renée. Jews in France during World War II. Hanover (NH): University Press of New England, 2001.

Armenians, Hitler Statement

This statement is attributed to German Nazi leader Adolf Hitler. In all probability it was made on August 22, 1939, in a speech to his military chiefs and commanding field generals at his mountain retreat, the Berghof, at Berchtesgaden.

Exhorting his officers of the need to be brutal and merciless in the campaign against Poland that was about to begin, Hitler is reported as having said: “I have issued the command—I’ll have anybody who utters one word of criticism executed by a firing squad—that our war aim does not consist in reaching certain lines, but in the physical destruction of the enemy. Accordingly, I have placed my death’s head formations in readiness—for the present only in the East—with orders to exterminate without mercy, men, women and children of the Polish-speaking race. Only thus shall we gain the living space [Lebensraum] that we need. Who, after all, today speaks of the annihilation of the Armenians?" (Wer redet heute noch von der Vernichtung der Armenier?).

Recognizing that a new Turkish state had been constructed after World War I, in large part owing to an ethnic resurrection and the accompanying destruction of the Armenians, Hitler noted that Germany could do the same because "the world believes only in success" (Die Welt glaubt nur an den Erfolg). A much-quoted statement, its veracity has for several decades been rigorously challenged by anti-Armenian Turks and their supporters, who claim that it is a forgery prepared by a Pulitzer Prize-winning U.S. journalist, Louis P. Lochner. He, in turn, had asserted that the document in which the statement was made had been obtained through diplomatic sources, and it is known that he transmitted it to the British ambassador in Berlin, Sir Nevile Henderson, on August 25, 1939.

Despite expressions of doubt in some quarters, several Armenian genocide scholars, such as Vahakn N. Dadrian and Kevork B. Bardakjian (among others), have confirmed the veracity of Hitler's statement, showing the circumstances and context in which the statement was made. It is important to recognize that Hitler was speaking about the Poles when addressing his generals; often, well-meaning but erroneous commentators and teachers make the claim that Hitler presaged the Nazi Holocaust of the Jews by reference to the genocide of the Armenians, but a close reading of the document shows this to be incorrect. On the other hand, Hitler's statement is a clear recognition of the understanding on his part that there had been, in fact, an Armenian genocide, even though the word itself had not yet been coined at the time when the speech was made.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Genocide; Lebensraum; Turkey

Further Reading

Ihrig, Stefan. Justifying Genocide: Germany and the Armenians from Bismarck to Hitler. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2016.

Melson, Robert. Revolution and Genocide: On the Origins of the Armenian Genocide and the Holocaust. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Arouch, Salamo

Salamo Arouch was a Greek Jewish boxer who was interned for two years (1943–1945) at Auschwitz-Birkenau. There he agreed to box as an attraction for the Nazi guards and in doing so was probably saved from the gas chambers.

Salamo Arouch was born in Thessaloniki, Greece, in 1923, the son of working-class parents. Despite his small stature (he was only 5' 6" tall), he began fighting when he was 14, quickly becoming a formidable boxer. By the time he was 17 he had become the Balkans light-middleweight champion and was undefeated.

In May 1943 Arouch's life changed forever when German troops marched into Thessaloniki and began rounding up Jews for deportation to Nazi death camps. On May 15, Arouch, his parents, and four siblings arrived by train at Auschwitz. His three sisters and mother were promptly exterminated. Shortly thereafter, camp officials learned that Arouch had been a successful boxer, and they arranged a series of fights with fellow inmates to entertain prison personnel. He fought some 200 bouts, winning all but 2, which were deemed a draw. Arouch was spared hard labor as a result and was given the coveted position of file clerk. His father, meanwhile, was eventually gassed as his health declined, and his brother was shot to death for disobeying guards' orders.

In January 1945 Arouch and the other Auschwitz survivors were liberated by Soviet troops. In April 1945 he met another death camp survivor, Marta Yechiel, and the two soon married. The young couple took up residence in Palestine, and Arouch participated in the 1948 Israeli War of Independence. He remained in Israel thereafter, operating a moving and shipping company based in Tel Aviv. In 1989 Arouch's experiences during World War II were documented in a motion picture, Triumph of the Spirit, with Willem Defoe playing Arouch. Arouch was an adviser to the film crew, which shot the movie on location at Auschwitz.

Salamo Arouch died in Israel on April 26, 2009.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Auschwitz; Triumph of the Spirit

Further Reading

Hevesi, Dennis. "Salamo Arouch, Who Boxed for His Life in Auschwitz, Is Dead at 86." New York Times (May 3, 2009).

Romano, Frederick V. The Boxing Filmography: American Features, 1920–2003. Jefferson (NC): McFarland, 2004.

Arrow Cross

Installed by the Germans after their invasion of Hungary in March 1944, the pro-Nazi Arrow Cross Party (Nyilas in Hungarian) led the Hungarian government from October 1944 to March 1945, during which it was responsible for the deaths of tens of thousands of Jews. The ferocity and breadth of those murders reflects the complex and poisonous environment in which the party came to power.

Under the virtual dictatorship of its regent, Miklós Horthy, Hungary reluctantly allied itself with Germany in November 1940. Even more reluctantly, it followed Germany in declaring war on the Soviet Union in June 1941. The stunning casualties Hungary sustained against the Soviets led the Horthy government to negotiate with the Allies over the possibility of switching sides later in the war. Hitler's response to these efforts, as well as his growing impatience with Horthy's reluctance to commit to the extermination of the Jews, was one of outrage. Horthy chose to back away from his plan of siding with the Allies and, instead, prove his fealty to Germany by instituting limited deportations of Hungary's Jews (something that he did not want to do), but he held firm in rejecting German demands in 1942 to require Jews to wear yellow stars and to further ostracize them from Hungarian society. Of greater significance, he did not begin major deportations of Jews to extermination camps, as the German government ordered. As the Soviet forces advanced on Hungary, Horthy switched sides again and sought an armistice with Moscow, triggering the immediate invasion and occupation of Hungary by Germany on March 19, 1944.

Beginning in April 1944, the Horthy government—with little or no choice to do otherwise—took several steps that began the ruination of Hungary's Jewish community, a process that would fall to the Arrow Cross Party to complete just six months later. The first step was the concentration of some 500,000 Jews who were living outside of Budapest into ghettos established in cities around the country. These ghettos—where conditions were atrocious—were short-lived, as the Nazi plan of extermination unfolded.

In the next step, beginning in May 1944, Adolf Eichmann organized and implemented the deportation of more than 400,000 Jews from Hungary to their ultimate destination of Auschwitz in just two months. In July 1944 Horthy ordered a halt to the deportations even as he sought an agreement with the Soviet Union. On October 15, 1944, in response to Horthy's announcement that Hungary was going to surrender, Hitler removed Horthy from office (the so-called Nyilas coup) and installed Ferenc Szálasi and his Arrow Cross Party to head the government, a leader and a party far more likely to embrace deportation and extermination of Jews than was Horthy and his government. Horthy had ordered Szálasi's arrest in mid-September, but that was thwarted by Hitler's agents in Hungary. Thus it was that the Arrow Cross Party, under Szálasi's leadership, began what would become a shocking six-month reign of terror.

Born in 1897, Szálasi, who had a history of association with extreme right-wing organizations, founded the Party of National Will—the precursor of the Arrow Cross Party—in 1935. Two years later he formed the Arrow Cross Party. Combining elements of Italian fascism and German National Socialism, the party's ideology embraced nationalism, anti-semitism, anticommunism, and the concepts of racial superiority (with Germans and Hungarians as the most superior) and social Darwinism with its central belief in the eternal contest between the strong and the weak. This ideology (sometimes referred to as "Hungarism") along with a central role accorded to agriculture, resulted in the party growing to approximately 500,000 members and garnering 25% of the votes in Hungary's 1939 election. Although fashioned after the thinking of the Nazi Party, the Arrow Cross Party had its differences with Germany. For example, its position on Jews admitted a religious component in addition to the Nazis' purely racial element, and it sought expansion to create a "Greater Hungary." This would require revision of the Treaty of Trianon, the Allied-imposed World War I treaty that greatly reduced Hungary's territory. Despite the fact that the Arrow Cross Party's vision of a growing Hungary was especially incompatible with the Nazi intention to conquer and control all of Europe, in 1944 Hitler reversed a ban on the Arrow Cross Party that Horthy had imposed at the beginning of the war.

On October 15, 1944, Szálasi, now the Nazi-installed "Nation Leader" of Hungary, began the process that would decimate the remaining Jews of Budapest, the only remaining Jewish community extant in Hungary. It started with virulent anti-Jewish propaganda spewed across radios throughout the country, emboldening gangs of Arrow Cross youths to roam the streets and Jewish "yellow-star" houses into which the Jews had been consigned, assaulting Jews at will. Hundreds were killed in the first night of mayhem alone, some being shot into the Danube River.

On October 18 the Arrow Cross government worked to curb the gangs, even as it promised dire actions against the Jews. On the same day, Eichmann and the government finalized their plans for the Jews. Approximately 25,000 Jewish men between the ages of 15 and 60, and 10,000 Jewish women between the ages of 18 and 40, were marched from the city to build fortifications around the city. It was, as expected by Eichmann and the Arrow Cross, a deadly task forced on the Jews, with many tortured and shot along the way and with the survivors facing a horrific sentence of hard labor. The situation only got worse as the Soviet forces came closer to the city.

Beginning in early November, tens of thousands of Jews were forced into a death march toward the Austrian border, with thousands dying along the way due to horrible conditions that included starvation, exhaustion, and execution. A small number of Jews, however, fared better. They were the holders of various types of certificates of exception, for example, those with certificates of protection from the Vatican and neutral countries, or with certificates from the Horthy government that were approved by the Arrow Cross government. The protective policy toward these Jews—some 15,000 in number—was part of a broader effort by the Arrow Cross government to mitigate protests from churches and neutral countries against treatment of the Jews. Even these Jews, though, were living in squalid conditions, remaining subject to ongoing terror by Arrow Cross gangs, and dealing with ever increasing struggles to survive as the Soviets continued their advance.

In late November 1944 most remaining Jews were forced into a ghetto in Budapest that at its peak held almost 70,000 people in an area of one-tenth of a square mile. The conditions in such a situation were as terrible as could be imagined.

With the Soviets now surrounding the city, the terror of the Arrow Cross government against the Jews actually increased, if such was possible. Attacks by Arrow Cross gangs in the ghetto resulted in random murder, executions of Jews marched out to the banks of the Danube, and even the murder of Jewish patients in hospitals.

The Soviets liberated Pest in mid-January 1945 and Buda a month later. Thousands of Arrow Cross members were arrested and brought to trial in Hungarian courts. Among those who were executed was Szálasi, on March 12, 1946.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Horthy, Miklós; Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions; Hungary; Rotta, Angelo; Salkaházi, Sára; Slachta, Margit; Szálasi, Ferenc

Further Reading

Braham, Randolph L. The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary. New York: Columbia University Press, 1981.

Eby, Cecil D. Hungary at War: Civilians and Soldiers in World War II. University Park (PA): Pennsylvania State University Press, 1998.

Lacko, M. Arrow-Cross Men: National Socialists 1935–1944. Budapest: Akademiai Kiado, 1969.

Art and the Holocaust

Art is a very powerful tool. It expresses inner feelings and emotions and translates the mind's view into a type of visual reality. As difficult as it may be to interpret and, in some cases, complete, it is even more so when the art is intended to reflect or represent an event as devastating as the Holocaust. It has been said that there “can be no art after Auschwitz,” but this does not seem to be the case.

Art is a far-reaching term, to be sure. Usually, one thinks about visual art, yet there are many different aspects to the term. Paintings, drawings, prints, and the like represent the artist's foray into the realm of the two-dimensional. Sculptures, installations, and a number of other classifications belong in the three-dimensional category. As the 20th century unfolded, new forms of art evolved that included photography, film, theater, and dance. All types of media have been used to represent the Holocaust. In addition, art was created during and after the Holocaust and is still being created today in more contemporary variations.

The Nazis used art as a means of propaganda and were the early masters of documentation (of atrocities and programs) through the use of film, photos, and even television.

Ideas relating to art shaped the cultural atmosphere and political policies for all of Germany. Many artistic styles from earlier times were denounced and banned as “degenerate,” and artists were encouraged to produce works in conformity with the “Aryan” ideals. The Nazis were also inveterate thieves who looted the galleries of Europe. Here we see an image of such art returned to its rightful owner in 2001. (AP Photo/Tina Fineberg)

Prisoners, survivors and victims alike, also created art in places such as ghettos, camps, displaced persons camps—in short, wherever and whenever they could. Using what materials were at hand, the prisoners engaged in art for a variety of reasons. Art historian Ziva Amishai-Maisels identifies five major themes/reasons: official art, produced at the behest of the perpetrators; spiritual resistance through the assertion of individuality, keeping one’s humanity under the most dire circumstances; the affirmation and commemoration of life—particularly important after the fact, and in order to honor both victims and survivors; catharsis (for the artist) in the release of emotions and experiences; and witnessing, as some works of art were used as evidence at the Nuremberg and subsequent trials of perpetrators.

Some of the artists were amateurs; others involved were already established practitioners. One may ask why this was done and how it was carried out under such appalling circumstances. Possibly the most important reason that artists created during such a time of duress was that they were artists, first and foremost.

Propaganda played an important part in Nazi ideology. During the rise of the party in the 1920s, its acceleration and power in the 1930s, and all throughout both the war and the Holocaust, the party and then the Reich utilized various forms of propaganda to influence people and to consolidate and maintain power. Josef Goebbels, officially the minister of Culture and Enlightenment, was effectively the “propaganda minister.” Antisemitism, anticommunism, and fascism were recurrent themes in all media, especially in film, radio, print, and posters. Goebbels supervised a network of agencies and people whose responsibility was to control every aspect of media and edit and disseminate the party line. In addition, Goebbels supervised the acquisition of works of art that were deemed dangerous and degenerate.

In 1937 Goebbels and the Ministry of Culture staged two gala art exhibitions simultaneously in Munich. One gallery hosted the Great German Art Exhibition, with what was hailed as the “best” of German and Germanic-inspired art; across the street, the Entartete Kunst (Degenerate Art) exhibition was held. The opening ceremonies were preceded by a parade, with most of the top Nazi officials and national dignitaries in attendance. The German exhibition featured classic paintings, drawings, and sculptures. This “Pure German Art” included portraiture, biblical and mythological themes, heroism, landscapes, still lifes, and other approved paintings and sculptures. The Entartete Kunst exhibition, which was better attended, had at its core the works of “degenerate” artists (modernists, cubists, surrealists); it was billed as “degenerate” as it included works by “communists, Jews, Bolsheviks, degenerates, the mentally ill,” and the like. Works by German Expressionists as well as foreigners were exhibited in a hodge-podge milieu, while across the street the museum was set up in a bright, charming, and orderly fashion. It is interesting to note that, while these works were termed “degenerate” and “undesirable,” many of them were later found in the private collections of such notables as Heinrich Himmler, Hermann Göring, and Hitler himself. Others were auctioned off in Switzerland prior to the outbreak of war.

The Nazis were obsessed with art. They confiscated art belonging to Jews and other deportees before and during the Holocaust and ransacked museums, private collections, churches, and synagogues. While many of these works ended up in personal collections, many works were scheduled to be deposited in Hitler’s planned Fuhrermuseum in Linz, Austria.

Artists practiced their craft in ghettos, concentration camps, death camps, and displaced persons camps. In Theresienstadt (Terezín), inmates, especially children, were encouraged to draw, paint and sculpt, write poetry, and perform plays. Many items were salvaged from this camp after the war.

Art was produced for the reasons listed above; artists often had to use whatever materials were available to them. Much of the artwork has been lost, yet a substantial amount survived the devastation. While many of the artist’s names are unknown, some of the more prominent ones were as follows: Yehuda Bacon, a Czech artist/survivor from Auschwitz-Birkenau, who began his artistic career after liberation, painting in a very sophisticated style; Dana Gottliebova (Babbitt), who was instrumental in working with Dr. Josef Mengele at Auschwitz in the primary role of portraying Roma (Gypsy) prisoners in her paintings; Alfred Kantor, whose works portrayed “everyday life” in the concentration camp and are collected in his published work The Book of Alfred Kantor; Jan Komski, a Polish painter who studied painting, anatomy, and art history at the Kraków Academy of Fine Arts and, during World War II, worked in the resistance movement and was interned at Auschwitz; Josef Nassy, a black expatriate artist of Jewish descent, who was living in Belgium when World War II began and was one of about 2,000 civilians holding American passports who were confined in German internment camps during the war;

Felix Nussbaum, a German-Jewish surrealist painter, who gave a rare glimpse into the essence of one individual among the victims of the Holocaust, usually including himself in his paintings in some way; David Olere, a Polish-born French painter and sculptor best known for his explicit drawings and paintings based on his experiences as a Jewish Sonderkommando inmate at Auschwitz; and Simon Wiesenthal, who documented his experiences through drawings that were later used as evidence against the perpetrators.

While much painting, drawing, and sculpture was done by those who experienced it, other artists reacted to the horrific events. Famous artists such as Pablo Picasso and Marc Chagall used the terror of genocide and, in some cases, the Holocaust itself as subject matter. American artist Thomas Hart Benton completed several paintings in the 1940s that attempted to portray the horrors of fascism, war, and the Holocaust. Arthur Szyk was a famous contemporary cartoonist, and Art Spiegelman is famous for his MAUS series—two books of cartoons based upon the experiences of his father, a survivor, and starring mice, cats, and dogs in various “roles.” Many artists were themselves refugees from fascist Europe and the Holocaust, including Paul Klee, Vasily Kandinsky, Jacques Lipschitz, and Chagall.

Like some authors (and Holocaust survivors in general), many artists did not begin to express their feelings and experiences until years after the fact. In addition, second- and third-generation (children and grandchildren) who are practitioners of art have also joined in expressing the emotions and paying tribute to the lives and experiences of their relatives.

There is no dearth of examples of Holocaust art, or those relating in some way to this subject matter. Artists created, and still do to this day, based on experience and feeling. Although the events happened three-quarters of a century ago, the artistic legacies are preserved for the modern critic, scholar, and student. Art continues to dominate the discussion due to renewed interest in stolen art and its return, as well as the powerful nature of the subject matter itself. Memorials, monuments, and museums, in and of themselves works of art, have sprung up throughout the world to honor the memory of those lost and to celebrate survival and return to life. The legacy of the art of the Holocaust will be apparent for a long time to come.

STEVEN MARCUS

See also: Haas, Leo; Maus and Maus II; Music and the Holocaust; Propaganda in the Holocaust; Salomon, Charlotte

Further Reading

- Amishai-Maisels, Ziva. Depictions and Interpretation: The Influence of the Holocaust on Visual Arts. Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1993.
- Blatter, Janet, and Sybil Milton. Art of the Holocaust. New York: Rutledge Press, 1981.
- Feinstein, Stephen C. (Ed.). Absence/Presence: Critical Essays on the Artistic Memory of the Holocaust. Syracuse (NY): Syracuse University Press, 2005.
- Milton, Sybil (Ed.). The Art of Jewish Children, Germany, 1936–1941: Innocence and Persecution. New York: Philosophical Library, 1989.
- Toll, Nelly. When Memory Speaks: The Holocaust in Art. Westport (CT): Praeger, 1998.
- Van Alphen, Ernst. Caught by History: Holocaust Effects in Contemporary Art, Literature, and Theory. Stanford (CA): Stanford University Press, 1997.

Aryan

A term taken originally from Sanskrit, initially referring to a nobleman or gentleman. By the 1920s German Nazis, including Adolf Hitler, began to employ the term when referring to the “master race,” the allegedly pure Germanic/Nordic race of people who were supposed to be racially, physically, and intellectually above “lesser” peoples. This was part of the Nazis’ larger and deeply flawed theories involving “racial hygiene” and race. The Aryan ideal was a Nordic type—tall, with blond hair, high cheekbones, and blue eyes. Ironically, many Nazi leaders, including Hitler, did not fit this set of physical characteristics.

Within the Nazi conception, beneath the “master race” were various Indo-European speaking peoples, who were deemed “partly Aryan” because they had mixed or intermarried with so-called “inferior” races. Jews, along with blacks, Roma, Indians, and other peoples from the subcontinent and Asia were not considered Aryans and were thus undesirable. The concept of the Aryan race helped drive and rationalize the Holocaust against Jews and other minorities.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Antisemitism; Eugenics; Fischer, Eugen; Lebensborn; “Life Unworthy of Life”; Mein Kampf; Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941; “Racial Hygiene”

Further Reading

- Mosse, George L. Toward the Final Solution: A History of European Racism. New York: Howard Fertig, 1978.
- Poliakov, Leon. The Aryan Myth: A History of Racist and Nationalistic Ideas in Europe. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1996.

Aryan Paragraph

The Aryan Paragraph was a provision or clause in a German legal document under the Nazis, excluding so-called “non-Aryans” from participation in a particular activity or membership in a group. First found in the constitutions of political, social, or similar groups in the 19th century, the most consequential and far-reaching use of the Aryan Paragraph was in anti-Jewish legislation promulgated by the Nazis in an effort to remove Jews from all aspects of German society.

On April 1, 1933, just two months into the Hitler regime, one of the earliest anti-Jewish laws, the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, included what would become the norm for all such legislation. Paragraph 1 of Article 3 stated: “Officials, who are of non-aryan descent, are to be retired; insofar as honorary officials are concerned, they are to be removed from official status.” This represented the first time since emancipation of the Jews in 1871 that a government-driven legal exclusion of the Jews was promulgated.

The wording of this exclusion of non-Aryans would be changed over time. At the request of Japan, “non-Aryan” would no longer be used; instead, reference would be made specifically to Jews. Also, the many exceptions to the exclusionary provisions that were allowed in April 1933 were soon greatly minimized or eliminated altogether. Despite these changes, the impact would be the same as the Aryan Paragraph made its way into numerous pieces of subsequent legislation.

For example, the Law Regarding Admission to the Bar, April 7, 1933, applied the Aryan Paragraph to the cancellation of the admission of lawyers of non-Aryan descent, and did so by reference to the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service: persons considered to be non-Aryan under that law would be refused permission to practice under this law. The same reference to the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service was made in the Law against Overcrowding of German Schools and Higher Institutions, April 25, 1933, which limited the number of Jewish students in German schools.

Restrictions on Jews resulting from the application of the Aryan Paragraph can be found in numerous other pieces of anti-Jewish legislation. The paragraph is the basic statement of intent for all such legislation, reaching its apogee in the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, which denied German citizenship to non-Aryans.

Given the impact these anti-Jewish laws had on the lives of Jews throughout Germany, it became crucial to define the meaning of a non-Aryan. Thus, the First Decree for the Implementation of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, April 11, 1933, included this definition of the term “non-Aryan”: “A person is to be regarded as non-Aryan if he is descended from non-Aryan, especially Jewish, parents or grandparents. It is enough for one parent or grandparent to be non-Aryan. This is to be assumed especially if one parent or one grandparent was of the Jewish faith.” As the anti-Jewish laws became more draconian, the need for a more precise definition of a non-Aryan resulted in complicated definitions of the term “Jew” as part of and following the Nuremberg Laws.

The Aryan Paragraph and its resulting restrictions on the Jews met with little or no protest from German society, except for its application to the Protestant Church. The pro-Nazi German National Church, the Reich Church, sought to apply it to all Protestant churches so the churches would not be open to non-Aryans. This meant that Jewish Christians (Jews who had converted to Christianity) and Germans who were brought up and were living as Christians but who had “Jewish blood” in their ancestry—even if they were unaware of it—were no longer able to consider themselves Christians and were therefore to be barred from worship and subject to anti-Jewish legislation. This was seen by some Protestant pastors and other religious leaders as an infringement of the authority of the church to determine who is or is not Christian. This led to the establishment of the Confessing Church, in part in opposition to the application of the Aryan Paragraph to the churches.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Gleichschaltung; Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor; Protestant Churches, German; Stein, Edith

Further Reading

Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews. Vol. 1: The Years of Persecution, 1933–1939. New York: Harper Perennial, 1998.

Majer, Diemut. “Non-Germans” under the Third Reich: The Nazi Judicial and Administrative System in Germany and Occupied Eastern Europe, with Special Regard to Occupied Poland, 1939–1945. Lubbock (TX): Texas Tech University Press, 2014.

Aryanism

Aryanism was one of the most important ideological elements in German National Socialism, and it remains important for many modern neo-Nazi movements in various countries today. Adolf Hitler and the early Nazi ideologues believed in an Aryan master race that had a mission to dominate all other peoples and races. The term Aryan was popularized in the late 19th century by the Anglo-German scholar Max Müller as an alternative to Indo-European. “Indo-European languages” were treated as a particular category of languages that included Sanskrit, Persian, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Teutonic, and Slavonic. Müller used the term Aryan only of language speakers, but others began to apply it to racial groupings, a practice that he himself never considered acceptable.

The story of how so-called Aryanism came to play such an important role in Nazi thinking is complex and goes back to the early modern era. In the 16th century, there developed in German-speaking Europe an aspiration to find ways of expressing the cultural unity of German-speakers, or “Germanness,” which some felt transcended actual territorial political divisions. That gave rise to attempts to “unmix” Germany as a melting-pot of different peoples in favor of a “pure Germanness.” The specifically “German” peoples were pictured as set apart from their neighboring peoples; the Germans were depicted as men who were original, rooted in the soil, free-spirited, and with a developed sense of honor, distinguished from other peoples by their positive qualities. Ulrich von Hutten contrasted the “manliness” of the Germans as a “world-dominating” people with the “womanliness” of the Romans. The development of the notion of a “German special way” in spirit, culture, and race was encouraged by the German Reformation, especially in its sectarian form. That movement soon acquired (as did later the whole Aryan myth) a decidedly anti-Church and anti-Roman tendency, on the basis of theories that claimed that the originally free Germans adhering to a “natural religion” had been weakened in spirit and enslaved by the yoke of the Roman Catholic Church and had become “mixed in” with other culturally inferior peoples. Some humanists saw German as “the language of heroes” and aspired to “purify” it from supposedly later admixtures. Even Leibniz believed that German was closer to the lost “Adamic primitive language” than Hebrew or Arabic. When Aryan studies began in the 18th century, the Germans were portrayed as the leaders of the noble Aryan master race, set apart from other peoples by their “purity.”

Inspired by the discovery of new peoples and continents, and following older medieval theories according to which there were “pre-Adamic peoples” who did not go back to the forefather Adam, some Enlightenment thinkers developed a theory of the distinct origins of the human races. This was intended as a rival to the Christian teaching that saw

Adam and Eve as the original couple of all of humanity. These Enlightenment figures assigned to the blacks, whom they regarded as standing on a low spiritual level, all the lowly and primitive qualities, and to the creative white master races (Aryan and European) all the noble and higher qualities. Carl von Linnæus, the great classifier of nature, called the European “inventive . . . white, full-blooded. He is governed by laws.” At the other end of his scale (below the intermediate stages of Americans and Asiatics) stood the African: “foolish, lazy, apathetic . . . black, phlegmatic . . . ruled by the arbitrary power of his master.” Pupils of Linnæus developed dualistic theories according to which the whites were the original race while the blacks had emerged through a “mixture” of the whites with apes. David Hume called “Negroes and generally all other species of men . . . inferior to whites by nature. . . . There has never been a civilized nation of other than white skin, not even a single one, which distinguished itself in trade and thought.”

Again as part of an anti-Christian propaganda war, Voltaire attributed to the spiritual culture of India temporal precedence over biblical Hebrew culture, tracing “Abraham” back to the Indian “Brahma.” Along with other rather bizarre theoreticians, he inspired the German Romantics in their love affair with India.

In Germany, both Enlightenment and Romantic thinkers aspired to look beyond the Jewish-Christian horizon of the West. They were fascinated by the early Indian thinkers, now seen as the earliest representatives of a spiritual culture of humanity. India was regarded as the source of “the ways of humanity” and the “lawgiver to all peoples” in the words of travel writer Pierre Sonnerat. Johann Gottfried Herder inspired a Romantic cult of “Mother India”; India was for him both the source and place of origin of mankind itself and the source of the “religion of natural revelation,” of which the Hebrew Bible was only a “faithful copy.” For Herder, the Indians were perfect representatives of wisdom, science, nobility, and restraint; he celebrated the common origins of the “Indo-Aryans” and the racial and cultural-linguistic relationship between Indians, Persians, and Germans as representatives of the “high and noble.” Herder’s contemporaries at the German universities now sought to draw the outlines of an Aryan high culture that had developed separately from “Semitic” cultures and languages. In his work Über die Sprache und Weisheit der Indier (On the Language and Wisdom of the Indians, 1808), Friedrich Schlegel claimed that a people of Aryan culture came from north India to the West, which meant that many ideas from ancient India were to be found among the old Germans.

His brother August Wilhelm Schlegel was the first to give the Aryan idea a nationalistic turn, making an association between the root “Ari” and the German word “Ehre” (“honor”). Through E. M. Arndt and F. L. Jahn, “Aryan” or “Indo-German” studies in Germany took on a decidedly antisemitic coloring by the mid-19th century, initially on the basis of the idea that the old Indian wisdom books represented the original revelation of God more perfectly than the Hebraic-biblical texts. This idea was formulated in increasingly dualistic terms: the original pure texts of the Indo-Aryans, a world-dominating master people, were watered down and falsified by the uncreative and ultimately culturally “parasitic” Semites.

The French historian Jules Michelet spoke in his Histoire romaine (1831) of the “long struggle between the Semitic world and the Indogermanic world”; for him, too, India was the “Mother of the Nations.” Other propagandists of Aryan studies, mostly theologians and Sanskrit scholars, constructed an “Aryan Christ” who had taught a master religion of the noble and the subjection of non-Aryan peoples—for example, the French Orientalist Ernest Renan, in his extremely successful work The Life of Jesus (1863–1883). Others accepted that the roots of Christendom were Semitic but argued that it had experienced its high point in the Middle Ages, when it was marked by the culture of the German Reich.

In the course of the 19th century, Aryan theories got mixed with a series of ideas prevalent at the time into an inextricable tangle; thus with race theory, which propagated the “racial pride” of the white races as the “motor of history”; with a crude form of Social Darwinism that started from the struggle of the races with each other; also with “physiological” anthropology, which argued from physical racial characteristics, especially through skull measurements, to the spiritual and ethical superiority of the whites or the inferiority of the blacks. In Germany, Great Britain, and France, antisemitic cultural theories constructed the “cultural genius” of the Aryans against the “cultural sterility” of the Semites. The Genevan linguistics scholar Adolphe Pictet called the Aryans the “civilizers of the world”: “The race of the Aryans, chosen before all others, is the most important tool of the plans of God for the destiny of humanity,” he wrote. For Gobineau, who brought together almost all of these theories and had his greatest influence in Germany, the white Aryan races had arisen in north India and were from the beginning led by “Providence” (later a favorite term of Hitler’s). Gobineau categorized nearly all known races according to the degree of their “mixture” with others, especially with Aryans or Semites. He saw in the “bastardizing of the Aryans” the main reason for the collapse of civilizations and cultures, which were condemned to general “mediocrity” by it. It was Gobineau who gave a history-of-philosophy orientation to the Aryan/Jewish polarity.

The theory of the different origins of the Aryan and Semitic peoples became virtually a religious dogma for all antisemitic currents in Germany. Prescription of the separation of races and depiction of the dangers of a “mixing of races” became a fixed idea, with prophets of doom forever repeating the claim that the “inferior races” damaged the “higher” ones. In the 19th century, race researchers had speculated that an Aryan woman who had been “tainted” even just once by a Jewish man could thenceforth bring into the world only “Jewish bastards.”

In parallel with the cult of the Germans in the second half of the 19th century there developed a no less exaggerated cult of the Aryans with religious-type features, and that also drew many representatives of early National Socialism under its banner. One of the main prophets was the German Orientalist Lagarde, who wanted to set the figure of Jesus Christ free from a Jewish context and outlined a Germanic or Aryan “religion of the future.” His example inspired a whole flood of writings that aimed at “Aryanizing” Jesus. Most of them were rather comical, such as the theory of Ernst von Bunsen, according to which the Bible had originated in an Aryan religion of the sun, and the first man, Adam, was an Aryan; the serpent in Paradise, by contrast, had been “Semitic.” The young Richard Wagner had in 1850 compared Christ to the highest Germanic god, Wotan, while the expatriate Englishman Houston Stewart Chamberlain was a tireless “prophet of Aryanism” who claimed that he had “demonstrated” the “non-Jewish descent” of Jesus Christ. His antisemitic Foundations of the 19th Century (1899) had a direct influence (down to the choice of title) on Rosenberg’s “Myth of the Twentieth Century” and on his Aryan mysticism.

Clearly, then, in many respects the Nazi ideologues with their Aryan mystifications needed only to harvest where others—including some of the leading minds of the 19th and 20th centuries—had already sown. But in Mein Kampf, Hitler gave to the idea of the Aryan as “founder of culture” a peculiarly violent turn, claiming that the Aryan alone was worthy to bear the name “human,” so that all other peoples and races were no more than “subhumans.” This strict dualism between the “racially pure” Aryans and all others—especially Jews and Slavs—led in Nazism to the radical outlawing of all “non-Aryans” and to their enslavement and attempted annihilation. The “Aryan Paragraph” formulated for the first time in the Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums (Law for the Restoration of the Civil Service) of April 7, 1933 (which went back to a demand of Georg von Schonerer in the 19th century), decreed that all civil servants of “non-Aryan descent” be retired. After this, the Aryan Paragraph served for the systematic outlawing of Jews from all areas of public life. The identification of Aryanism and Germanness was recognized by the National Socialist state in a memo from the Reich Ministry of the Interior of November 26, 1935, in which the concept “Aryan” was replaced by “of German blood,” and later by the formula “those belonging to German or related blood.” The accompanying “Aryan proof” obliged Germans, especially applicants for official posts, to show an unbroken “testimony of descent” of “Aryan purity of blood” of their ancestors back to the year 1800. Official Nazi linguistic usage designated the taking of Jewish property into Aryan hands as laid down in the Aryanizing Decrees of April 26 and November 12, 1938, as “Aryanization”: the alienation of Jewish property without compensation in favor of “Aryan members of the nation,” who could acquire alienated Jewish goods. This is a typical example of the way that the “Aryan” idea served the Nazis both as a propaganda tool in their war against the Jews and as a cover for robbery and exploitation.

MARKUS HATTSTEIN (TRANSLATED AND ENLARGED BY CYPRIAN BLAMIRE)

See also: Antisemitism; “Racial Hygiene”; Volksgemeinschaft

Further Reading

Herf, Jeffrey. The Jewish Enemy: Nazi Propaganda during World War II and the Holocaust. Cambridge (MA): Belknap Press, 2006.

Mosse, George L. Toward the Final Solution: A History of European Racism. New York: Howard Fertig, 1978.

Poliakov, Leon. The Aryan Myth: A History of Racist and Nationalistic Ideas in Europe. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1996.

Aryanization

The process known as Aryanization (Arisierung) was the Nazi Party’s initiative to diminish Jewish influence in all aspects of life in Germany. It essentially consisted of two components, one cultural, the other economic.

The cultural dimension of the Aryanization process began in 1933 with the government’s efforts to drive Jews out of the Reich’s cultural life. Jewish intellectuals, actors, journalists, and musicians lost their posts in important cultural institutions, and Jewish enrollment in universities was severely restricted. Literature, music, art, and science created by Jews was described as “degenerate.” So-called degenerate books were banned, removed from schools and libraries, and burned. Degenerate music (created by Jews) was not to be played, nor were Jews permitted to play music in orchestras. Public “degenerate art” was removed from display or otherwise eliminated from German cultural life, along with its creators.

The economic component of Aryanization was implemented by the Nazi policy, adopted in 1933, of establishing a “controlled market economy.” This was to be achieved through the triad of Aryanization, autarky, and rearmament.

Boycotts of Jewish businesses, laws excluding Jews from the public service and the professions, and the program of Aryanization all evidenced strong duress from the lower ranks and legal repression from the leadership that steadily drove Jews out of the German economy. Before 1938, perhaps due to the 1936 staging of the Berlin Olympic Games and the desire not to be seen internationally as repressive, the Nazis stopped short of across the board Aryanization legislation and confiscation of Jewish property. However, from the outset of the Third Reich, many Jews found it prudent to sell their property at a loss and flee the country. Aryanization also included the indirect expropriation of Jewish property in the form of a confiscatory “flight tax” (Reichsfluchtsteuer). Emigrating citizens had to relinquish most of their property to the government before they could leave the country. The aim of this was to punish Jewish or political refugees, deprive them of their property, and thereby reduce the export of German money or goods.

By January 1, 1938, German Jews were prohibited from operating businesses and trades, and from offering goods and services. On April 26, 1938, Hermann Göring announced the “Order Requiring the Declaration of Jewish Property,” and on June 14, 1938, the Interior Ministry ordered the registration of Jewish businesses. All German Jews had to register and declare the value of their economic holdings, both at home and abroad. They had to itemize everything they owned including land, houses, businesses of all kinds, cash, bank deposits, stocks and bonds, jewelry, valuable pictures and carpets, claims against insurance companies, pensions, authors’ rights, patents and annuities, and statements of all debts and mortgages. Their access to bank accounts was restricted. These listings gave the government accurate information that the Nazis needed to implement their policy of Aryanizing the German economy.

Increased pressure forced Jews to sell their businesses at 30–60% of their value, with the state setting the sales value of Jewish firms at a fraction of their market worth. Government economic counsellors within each district organized Aryanization to ensure that the best businesses were given to longstanding Nazi Party members. Sometimes Jewish business owners were jailed until they agreed to give up their ownership. The proceeds from Aryanized firms had to be deposited in savings accounts and were made available to their Jewish depositors only in limited amounts, so that in the final analysis Aryanization amounted to almost compensation-free confiscation. The effects were devastating for Germany's Jews, severely undermining the economic well-being of the Jewish community. By the fall of 1938 only 40,000 of the formerly 100,000 Jewish businesses were still in the hands of their original owners. The pogrom that occurred on November 9–10, 1938, Kristallnacht, further hardened the fate of German Jews.

On November 12, 1938, a new Regulation for the Elimination of Jews from German Economic Life was made. The Jewish community was “fined” one billion Reichsmarks for the damage done to its own property during Kristallnacht. Jewish businesses not yet sold were put into trusteeship, and Jews were forced to register all their property with the Nazis. A confiscatory tax of a billion marks was then imposed upon German Jews whose property exceeded 5,000 marks. The tax rate was 20%, and the tax had to be paid in four installments. Hence, inventory, liquidation, and confiscatory taxes resulted in the economic obliteration of the Jews.

Businesses were transferred to non-Jewish owners with the proceeds taken by the state. Jewelry, stocks, real property, and other valuables had to be sold. Either by direct force, by government interventions such as sudden tax claims, or by the weight of the circumstances, Jewish property changed hands mostly below fair market value. Jewish employees were fired, and self-employed people were prohibited from working in their respective professions.

After November 1938 Jews were forbidden to do business and had to liquidate their properties under the supervision of a governmental trustee (Treuhänder). The trustee would arrange for the Jewish owner to receive a nominal payment for the enterprise that was generally paid into a blocked account, and then sell the very same business to an Aryan for market value—thereby turning a sizeable profit for the Reich. Gradually, all Jewish property came into the possession of the Reich.

On December 3, 1938, the value of Jewish landed property was frozen at the lowest level, and valuables and jewels were permitted to be sold only through state offices. The impoverishment of the Jewish population caused by Aryanization often stood in the way of its goal—of promoting emigration through persecution—because those affected lacked the means to emigrate. Later, they would become victims of the Final Solution. Aryanization combined the racial motives of National Socialism with traditional antisemitic resentments within the middle classes and the expansionist tendencies of big business. The fear of being too late to share in the booty produced a fateful coalition of greed, so that little opposition to Aryanization arose.

With the onset of war from 1939 onward, the treatment of other non-Aryan property as the Reich occupied Europe was essentially the same as what it had been during the 1930s in Germany. The goals were identical—to completely Aryanize the Reich economy, to destroy the Jews economically, and to turn a healthy profit for those able to take advantage of the situation.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Algeria; Antwerp Pogrom; April Boycott; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Degussa; Deutsche Bank; France; Kristallnacht; Krupp Case; Names under the Nazis, Legislation; Reich Citizenship Law; Reich Flight Tax; Schindler, Oskar; Teudt, Wilhelm

Further Reading

Dean, Martin. Robbing the Jews: The Confiscation of Jewish Property in the Holocaust, 1933–1945. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008.

Gordon, Sarah. Hitler, Germans and the “Jewish Question.” Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 1984.

Longerich, Peter. Holocaust: The Nazi Persecution and Murder of the Jews. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Asocials

“Asocial” was a term given by the Nazis to all those deemed to stand outside the “national community” (Volksgemeinschaft). Such people came from a very wide sector of society and included habitual criminals, prostitutes, drug addicts, juvenile delinquents, homosexuals, the chronically unemployed, and vagrants. Owing to their nomadic lifestyle, they also included all members of the Roma community. The Nazi perspective was that those designated as “asocial” were genetically and racially disposed to their condition; as such, they could not be redeemed for the national community and were thus a drain on society whose ongoing existence could not be tolerated. Arrested and incarcerated in concentration camps, most were forced to wear black triangles on their clothing as an identifying symbol. Male homosexuals among the “asocials” wore pink triangles; Roma sometimes, though not always, wore triangles of brown.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Sachsenhausen; Sondergericht; Thierack, Otto; Volksgemeinschaft

Further Reading

Dams, Carsten, and Michael Stolle. The Gestapo: Power and Terror in the Third Reich. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014.

Krausnick, Helmut, Martin Broszat, Hans Buchheim, and Hans-Adolf Jacobson. Anatomy of the SS State. London: Collins, 1968.

Auschwitz

Auschwitz (Oświęcim in Polish) was the name given to a German concentration camp complex in eastern Poland that served as one of the epicenters of the Holocaust. More Jews were killed in Auschwitz during the war than in any other single location. Since the victims came from every part of Europe, and because Auschwitz operated longer than any other death camp, it has come to symbolize the Nazi determination to destroy the Jews.

Understanding the history of Auschwitz is a challenge because of the complexity of its story. Initially, Auschwitz was established as a concentration camp for Polish soldiers and political prisoners. After June 1941, Soviet prisoners of war were added to the prison population. During the first two years of its operation, little distinguished Auschwitz from any other Nazi camp, or indeed could predict the role it would play in the Holocaust. It must also be remembered that there was not a single Auschwitz, but rather three main camps—Auschwitz I, Auschwitz II (Birkenau), and Auschwitz III (Monowitz)—along with approximately 50 satellite camps located over a wide geographical region.

Auschwitz was a network of Nazi concentration and extermination camps built and operated by the Third Reich in Polish areas annexed by Germany during World War II. It consisted of Auschwitz I (the original camp), Auschwitz II-Birkenau (a combination concentration/extermination camp), Auschwitz III-Monowitz (a labor camp complex), and 45 satellite camps. The photograph shows forced laborers working in a locksmith shop at Auschwitz. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum)

AUSCHWITZ ENVIRONS SUMMER 1944

Thus, even at the height of the killings, Auschwitz concentration and work camps continued to exist next to the Auschwitz death camp of Birkenau.

In the winter of 1940–1941 the German industrial conglomerate I.G. Farben, taking advantage of governmental tax breaks for industrialist building in the newly conquered territories, chose the Auschwitz area as the site for the construction of a new plant. The availability of a railroad junction and raw material, along with the chance to utilize cheap concentration camp labor, added to the allure of the area. An arrangement was made between I.G. Farben and the SS, whereby the latter would provide slave labor (drawn from Auschwitz inmates) and I.G. Farben would pay the SS for the use of the workers. At the same time, SS chief Heinrich Himmler ordered the camp system expanded to accommodate over 100,000 inmates, probably in expectation of a massive number of Soviet prisoners.

In the fall of 1941 a local Nazi official, ordered to kill a number of Soviet POWs, decided to experiment with the use of Zyklon-B (a hydrogen cyanide gas compound manufactured by I.G. Farben commercially for delousing). A small farmhouse was sealed off and the first tests involving the gassing of prisoners were carried out.

In accordance with Nazi antisemitic ideology, the character of Auschwitz underwent a change in late 1941. It maintained its original features—political, industrial, agricultural and penal—but now, through the murder installation at Birkenau, it became also an elaborate and gigantic factory of death created for the purpose of methodically and efficiently murdering millions of people, specifically Jews. These mass murders took place in specially designed gas chambers utilizing Zyklon-B gas. Auschwitz seemed a logical place as a site for the implementation of the Holocaust because it was remote from major population centers. Moreover, the presence of the rail lines and junctions referred to earlier ensured that access was not subject to unreliable roads. When high-ranking Nazi officials learned of the effectiveness of Zyklon-B in killing Jews, they adopted it as the method of choice, thereby merging industrial production with mass slaughter.

While the first killings took place at Auschwitz I, Auschwitz II (Birkenau) became the focal point for the gassing of Jews brought from all over Europe. Initially, two converted farmhouses were employed in this task. By the middle of 1942, however, specially built gas chambers and crematoria were in use, enabling the Germans to gas and then incinerate several thousand people per day.

To clean the bodies out of the chamber and sort the clothes and valuables of those who were murdered, the Nazis created several groups of Sonderkommando (special squads) of prisoners, who were in turn murdered every two to three months. The SS (and I.G. Farben) intended that by replacing weak and ailing prisoners with slightly healthier inmates, they would be able to maintain production levels. On October 7, 1944, members of the Sonderkommando revolted, not in any expectation of escape, but in order to destroy as much of the gas chambers and crematoria as possible. They were also hoping to buy time to bury manuscripts, evidence of the horrible work they were forced to carry out. Over 400 Sonderkommando men were killed, along with approximately 15 SS guards. The manuscripts they hid were not discovered for more than a decade.

As the Soviet armies continued their advance towards Germany throughout the latter half of 1944, the position of Auschwitz seemed uncertain. In September Heinrich Himmler ordered the Auschwitz commandant, Rudolf Hoess, to oversee the camp's liquidation. When delay threatened and the Soviets drew nearer, on November 26, 1944, Himmler issued another order concerning the destruction of Auschwitz. On January 6, 1945, four Jewish women who had smuggled gunpowder to the Sonderkommando for their revolt were executed in Auschwitz. They were among the last prisoners murdered in the camp.

After considerable administrative difficulties—and much debate concerning the method of withdrawal—the complete evacuation of the complex was ordered for January 17, 1945. One day later, some 22,000 men and women left the camp; the next day a further 3,500 were evacuated. They were about all that was left of a camp complex which at one time could boast a population of possibly 200,000. The earliest date of free contact with Soviet forces was January 22, 1945. When the camp was formally occupied two days later, there were only 2,819 survivors left in the camp.

Much of the Auschwitz complex has been preserved and serves today as a grim reminder of the Nazi attempt at destroying the Jewish people. It has become the symbol par excellence of the Holocaust, a place where over a million Jews and countless numbers of others were murdered.

FRED KROME

See also: Arbeit Macht Frei; Arouch, Salamo; The Auschwitz Album; Auschwitz Protocols; Bielecki, Jerzy; Birkenau; Concentration Camps; Delbo, Charlotte; Dinur, Yehiel; Final Solution; Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial; Gebhardt, Karl; Glücks, Richard; Grese, Irma; The Grey Zone; Hoess, Rudolf; Holocaust; I.G. Farben; Jewish Resistance; Jonas, Regina; Mann, Franczeska; Mechelen; Mengele, Josef; Monowitz; Münch, Hans; Museums and Memorials; Night; Night and Fog; Robota, Roza; Roma Genocide in the Holocaust; Rosé, Alma; Salonika; Shoah; Slave Labor; Slovakia; Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français; Triumph of the Spirit; The Truce; Venezia, Shlomo; Weiss, Helga; Westerbork; Wiesel, Elie; Zimetbaum, Mala; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Dwork, Debórah, and Robert Jan van Pelt. Auschwitz: 1270 to the Present. New York: Norton, 1996.

Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Van Pelt, Robert Jan. The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.

The Auschwitz Album

The Auschwitz Album is the only extant photographic record of the step-by-step process by which the victims of the Nazi genocide moved from their arrival at “the ramp” at Auschwitz-Birkenau to their ultimate destination, whether that was the gas chambers or the slave labor camp. Intensive efforts by the Nazi regime to prohibit all visual evidence of the actual steps leading to extermination make this album a unique resource. The pictures provide visual evidence and confirmation of the process described by Auschwitz survivors.

The 193 photographs in the album capture the detaining of the Jews, the separation of men and boys from women and young children, and the selection that determined who went immediately to the gas chambers and who to the slave labor camp. In addition, photographs show the individuals condemned to the gas as they walked to and then waited outside the building housing the gas chambers (having been told they were waiting for showers that were required before they could enter the camp). It also shows those assigned to the slave labor camp as they moved from being civilians to prisoners, with their heads shaved and wearing the requisite uniforms: striped pajama-like shirts and pants for the men; plain dresses for the women.

The photographs in the album are thought to be the work of Ernst Hofmann and Bernhard Walter, SS men whose job it was to fingerprint and to take identification photos of those prisoners sent to slave labor (of course, no such efforts were made with regard to those sent to the gas chambers). It has been determined that the photographs were taken in late spring or early summer of 1944 as transports were arriving at Auschwitz-Birkenau from Carpo-Ruthenia, an area that was then a part of Hungary, but it remains unclear why they were taken.

The photographs were taken from different angles, heights, and proximity to the victims. One wide-angle photograph was taken from what appears to be the roof of a train car at the front of the transport train. Because of the angle and height from which it was taken, it captures hundreds—soon to be thousands—of bewildered Jews as they emerged from cattle cars, most carrying a large sack of their belongings. Most of the photographs were taken at ground level, some of them at close proximity to the subjects. Almost all of the photographs are candid, taken as groups of men and women were moving past the camera, with only some of the subjects looking at the camera. However, there are several photographs that appear to be posed, with small groups of men or women lined up and facing the camera. In both cases it is clear that Hofmann and Walter made no efforts to hide what they were doing, supporting the possibility that the pictures were sanctioned, perhaps to be part of an official report on methods of processing victims at Auschwitz-Birkenau.

One of the photographs is important for understanding how the album was found. Taken from a raised height, it shows hundreds of women lined up in rows, all wearing their own dresses but already shorn completely of their hair, awaiting orders. Standing in the first row, almost centered in the picture is Lilly Jacob (Lilly Jacob-Zelmanovic Meier), the woman who would discover the Auschwitz Album after the war. As the Soviet military approached Auschwitz, Jacob and others were marched to several camps, arriving finally at the Dora-Nordhausen camp. After liberation, while recovering from illness in an SS barracks, she discovered a hidden album. Opening it, she saw herself and many others whom she knew, most of them now dead, but captured forever in these photographs. She held onto the album for many years after she left the camp, never hiding the fact that it was in her possession. In 1983 she gave it to Yad Vashem where it was restored for all to see.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Auschwitz; Birkenau; Final Solution

Further Reading

Hellman, Peter. The Auschwitz Album: A Book Based upon an Album Discovered by a Concentration Camp Survivor, Lili Meier. New York: Random House, 1981.

Perez, Javier Gomez. Lost Album of Auschwitz: The 116 Images of Photographic Album of Karl Hocker. CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform, 2014.

Weiss, Ann. The Last Album: Eyes from the Ashes of Auschwitz-Birkenau. New York: Norton, 2000.

Auschwitz Protocols

The Auschwitz Protocols is the name given to a report that provided detailed, firsthand information about the exterminatory actions—including the workings of gas chambers and crematoria—that had been and were contemporaneously being committed by the Nazis against the Jews in Auschwitz. It is based on the written and verbal testimony of five prisoners who escaped from Auschwitz.

The major portion of the report was provided by two prisoners, Rudolf Vrba (born Walther Rosenberg) and Alfred Wetzler, both Slovakian Jews, who escaped in April 1944. Because the information that they provided was the most extensive, the name Auschwitz Protocols is sometimes used to refer to their testimony only (it is sometimes also called the Verba-Wetzler Report). The full report, however, also included the written and verbal testimony of Jerzy Tabeau, a Polish medical student who escaped from Auschwitz in November 1943 (his report is sometimes referred to as the “Polish Major’s Report”), and of Czesław Mordowicz, a Polish Jew, and Arnost Rosin, a Slovakian Jew, both of whom escaped in late May 1944. They, like Vrba and Wetzler before them, reached Slovakia where the information was typed and collated.

Although not the first report to assert that mass murders were occurring in Auschwitz, the Protocols were far more detailed than prior reports, and its authenticity could not be denied. It described the administration of the camp and provided sketches showing its layout. The comprehensive information about the gas chambers and the crematoria reflected a level of detail that could only be known by prisoners. In Vrba’s case, the prisoner who provided that information was Filip Müller, a member of the Sonderkommando, a work unit of Jews who were assigned to the gas chambers, and whose book, Eyewitness Auschwitz, is considered one of the most important sources on the industrial death machine that was Auschwitz.

Another aspect of Vrba's and Wetzler's section of the Protocols was its extensive list of transports that arrived at Auschwitz from 1942 to the time of their escape. The accuracy of the list was confirmed by other sources of information, further solidifying Vrba's and Wetzler's credibility. In addition, they provided a detailed explanation of the system of assigning numbers to transport survivors who were not sent immediately to the gas chambers.

Given the nature of the information contained in the Protocols, where each day of delay meant thousands of lives lost, the way in which the report was circulated, to whom and when, is controversial even today. The haunting question is whether the information was handled with the urgency it deserved.

Despite concerns about its distribution, the Auschwitz Protocols had an impact on the events of the Holocaust beyond documenting the deadly procedures in Auschwitz. First, the time in which the Protocols first surfaced coincided closely with Nazi efforts to exterminate the 725,000 Jews of Hungary, the only major Jewish community not yet decimated by the Nazi juggernaut. Their deportation began shortly after Germany's occupation of the country in March 1944. Vrba, knowing this, pressed the Jewish Council in Slovakia to immediately warn Hungarian Jewish leaders of what awaited the Jews upon their arrival at Auschwitz, but a warning was not received in time. By mid-July, 1944, more than 430,000 of Hungary's Jews had been deported, almost all to Auschwitz. There was already great pressure on the then-regent of Hungary, Miklós Horthy, to end the deportations. That pressure was further increased by the existence of the Auschwitz Protocols, which left no doubt as to the fate of the deportees. Horthy relented and stopped the deportations, although in October, after the pro-Nazi Arrow Cross Party took control of the Hungarian government, an outraged Hitler ordered them to be resumed.

Second, the Protocols raised the question even more acutely than in the past of whether the Allies should bomb Auschwitz, or at least the rail lines into the camp. Although the Allies decided not to divert resources to bomb the camp, the existence of the Protocols made both sides of that debate keenly aware of the stakes, which could no longer be ignored or minimized on the basis of a lack of credible eyewitness testimony.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Auschwitz; Birkenau; British Response to the Holocaust; Fleischmann, Gisi; Soos, Géza; United States Response to the Holocaust; Vrba, Rudolf

Further Reading

- Gilbert, Martin. Auschwitz and the Allies. London: Michael Joseph/Rainbird, 1981.
- Müller, Filip. Eyewitness Auschwitz: Three Years in the Gas Chambers. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1979.
- Vrba, Rudolf, and Alan Bestic. I Cannot Forgive. New York: Grove Press, 1964.
- Wetzler, Alfred. Escape from Hell: The True Story of the Auschwitz Protocol. New York: Berghahn Books, 2007.

Austria

Austria is a landlocked nation in central Europe, which in 1939 had a population of about 7 million. Although most of its citizens were ethnically German, Austria had sizable minority populations that included Italians, Slavs, and Jews of varying ethnicities. Until World War I, Austria had anchored the far-flung Austro-Hungarian Empire; after that conflict, it became a singular sovereign state that had been forbidden from uniting with the much larger and more powerful Germany to its north. Despite its independent status, the interwar years in Austria were not happy ones, and the small nation was wracked by economic crises and political turmoil.

After Adolf Hitler and the Nazis came to power in Germany in 1933, they carefully groomed Austria for eventual unification, a process known as Anschluss. Hitler, himself originally an Austrian, ordered a propaganda campaign to prepare the Austrians accordingly. Meanwhile, the Austrian Nazi Party, which was controlled by Berlin, made steady inroads into the Austrian political scene while Germany placed economic pressures on Austria and aided armed groups within Austria who were resisting left-wing militias.

In 1938 the Anschluss became a reality when German troops invaded and Hitler declared the union a fact on March 13. Many Austrians applauded the move, which was retroactively "vindicated" by a rigged plebiscite that showed that 99% of the voting population approved the union, a figure that was clearly too high. Jews and other minorities had been barred from voting. The incorporation of Austria into Germany proved catastrophic to Austrian Jews. The pogrom known as Kristallnacht ("Night of the Broken Glass"), which occurred in November 1938, burned or destroyed nearly all of Vienna's synagogues and looted or destroyed hundreds of Jewish-owned shops and businesses. Several thousand Jews were rounded up and sent to concentration camps.

These tragic events commenced a huge exodus of Jews from Austria. Jews represented about 4% of the total Austrian population in 1938 and numbered some 192,000; however, the number of Austrian Jews plummeted by the beginning of 1940, when only 75,000 remained. Meanwhile, during the summer of 1938, the Nazis erected the first concentration camp on Austrian soil—the Mauthausen complex—which began as a forced labor camp outside Linz. There, untold thousands would die between 1938 and 1945 from overwork, starvation rations, and illness and disease. Mauthausen actually increased exponentially in size during the war, as it became a major armament-producing center. There were at least 60 subcamps of Mauthausen by late 1944. Austria was also home to the Strassof and Lochau concentration camps.

As World War II progressed, Nazi policies toward Austrian Jews, Roma, and other people deemed “undesirable” gradually changed from emigration and expropriation to mass deportation to concentration camps and ghettos further to the east. Nearly 35,000 Jews who had remained in Vienna were forcibly deported between 1940 and 1942, and a great majority of them died. It is estimated that just 7,000 Jews were left in Austria by late 1942, a stunning 96% reduction of the pre-war population. The human losses involved with the Holocaust in Austria are frightening and incalculable, but the permanent destruction of Jewish culture in Vienna, which had historically been one of the great world centers of Judaism and Zionism, was nearly as complete.

As in almost all of the belligerent nations, Austria suffered heavy damage from the war, first by air raids beginning in 1943. The following two years would see even more destruction in military campaigns waged between the Germans and the Red Army. After Germany’s collapse in the spring of 1945, Allied armies overran Austria; by the late spring, the country had been divided among the Soviets, Americans, French, and British. Austria would remain occupied until 1955 and recovered slowly and fitfully from World War II. The Jewish population, however, would never recover, and the wealth of cultural and educational contributions that had been made by Austrian Jews would likewise never be revived.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Anschluss; Brunner, Alois; Central Office for Jewish Emigration; Globocnik, Odilo; Hitler, Adolf; Ho Feng-Shan; Joint Distribution Committee; Kaltenbrunner, Ernst; Lange, Rudolf; Lebensraum; Mauthausen-Gusen; Mein Kampf; National Socialist Program; Seyss-Inquart, Arthur; Slave Labor; Waldheim Affair

Further Reading

Bukey, Evan Burr. Hitler’s Austria: Popular Sentiment in the Nazi Era, 1938–1945. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Rabinovici, Doron. Eichmann’s Jews: The Jewish Administration of Holocaust Vienna. Cambridge, UK: Polity, 2011.

Weyr, Thomas. The Setting of the Pearl: Vienna under Hitler. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.

B

Babi Yar Massacre

A large massacre of Soviet Jews by German Nazis outside Kiev, Ukraine. Following the German Army's invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, four Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads) entered Soviet territory, their task being the physical annihilation of Communist Party functionaries, Red Army commissars, partisans, and Jews.

As the Wehrmacht drove ever deeper into the Soviet Union, the Einsatzgruppen followed, rounding up and slaughtering their intended victims in mass shootings. Consequently, by the time of their disbanding in 1943, when the war on the Eastern Front swung irreversibly in favor of the Red Army, the Einsatzgruppen—with the assistance of the German Army and a host of enthusiastic collaborators from the Latvian, Lithuanian, and Ukrainian populations—had committed a multitude of unspeakable atrocities and murdered an estimated 1.5 million Soviet Jews and others.

Among the numerous Einsatzgruppen crimes, the slaughter of Jews at Babi Yar in late September 1941—perpetrated by Colonel Paul Blobel's Sonderkommando 4a, a subunit of Otto Rasch's Einsatzgruppe C—was arguably the most notorious. On September 19, 1941, units of the German Army Group South occupied Kiev, the capital of Soviet Ukraine. In the days immediately following, a series of explosions rocked the city, destroying German field headquarters, burning more than one-third of a square mile of the Kiev city center, and leaving some 10,000 residents homeless. Although these explosions were likely the work of the Soviet political police (NKVD), the Germans saw in them a convenient justification to massacre the city's Jews, a task Blobel's Sonderkommando would have carried out regardless.

After discussions between Blobel, Rasch, and Major General Kurt Eberhard, the German field commander in Kiev, the latter ordered the city's Jews to assemble with their possessions—including money, valuables, and warm clothing—near the Jewish cemetery no later than 7:00 a.m. on Monday, September 29. The posted order indicated that the Jews were to be resettled and warned that failure to comply would be punishable by death.

Once assembled, Kiev's Jews were marched to Babi Yar, a partially wooded ravine just outside the city. There, the Germans, following the procedure used by Einsatzgruppen since the mass shootings of Soviet Jews began in late June, forced the Jews to strip, dispossessed them of their belongings, and shot them to death in groups of 30 to 40 people. In the course of two gruesome days, Blobel's men, relying exclusively on automatic weapons, murdered 33,771 innocent men, women, and children. Subsequently, they reported that the Jews had offered no resistance and until the last minute had believed they were to be resettled.

During the months that followed the initial Babi Yar Massacre, the Germans periodically used the ravine as a murder site, killing several thousand more Jews there, plus an untold number of Roma and Soviet prisoners of war. In July 1943, with Soviet forces having seized the military initiative and advancing rapidly, the Germans launched Operation Aktion 1005 to eradicate evidence of their crimes in the Soviet Union. Blobel, who had been released from his duties as commander of Sonderkommando 4a in early 1942 and transferred to Berlin, returned to Kiev, where he oversaw efforts to obliterate traces of the executions at Babi Yar. Throughout August and September, Blobel's men and conscripted concentration camp inmates reopened the mass grave, crushed bones, and cremated the remains of the dead. Despite the Germans' effort to hide their crimes, significant evidence of the massacres remained and was discovered by Soviet forces following the liberation of Kiev in November 1943.

The Babi Yar Massacre of late September 1941 was a precedent for other, similar actions, and another, in October 1941, saw the Germans and their Romanian allies murder an estimated 50,000 Jews at Odessa. Nonetheless, more than any other, Babi Yar has come to symbolize an aspect of the Holocaust—mass shooting—that is invariably overshadowed by the horrors of Auschwitz and the other death camps.

BRUCE J. DEHART

See also: Einsatzgruppen; Holocaust by Bullets; Ukraine

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. The Holocaust in the Soviet Union. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2009.

Dobroszycki, Lucjan, and Jeffrey S. Gurock. The Holocaust in the Soviet Union: Studies and Sources on the Destruction of the Jews in the Nazi-Occupied Territories of the USSR, 1941–1945. New York: Routledge, 1994.

Khiterer, Victoria. "Babi Yar, the Tragedy of Kiev's Jews." Brandeis Graduate Journal 2 (2004), 1–16.

Baeck, Leo

Rabbi Leo Baeck was the undisputed spiritual leader of German Jewry during the years of the Third Reich, providing hope where little was left, and standing up to the Nazis through his efforts at maintaining a Jewish communal existence at the time when it was under greatest threat. He was born on May 23, 1873, in Lissa (Leszno), Prussia, the son of Rabbi Samuel Baeck. After attending the conservative Jewish Theological Seminary in Breslau (Wrocław) from 1894, he moved to Berlin to study at the more liberal Lehranstalt für die Wissenschaft des Judentums (School of Jewish Studies) in Berlin. By 1897 he had secured his first post as rabbi in Oppeln (Opole). Here, in 1905, he published Das Wesen des Judentums (The Essence of Judaism), attracting notice

Leo Baeck was a German rabbi, scholar, and theologian. He served as one of the foremost leaders of German Jewry before and during the Holocaust, representing all German Jews, before being incarcerated at Theresienstadt concentration camp. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Michael Brodnitz) as an up-and-coming rabbi and thinker. The book argued strongly for the continued relevance of Judaism in a changing world and showed Baeck to be a leader for the Jewish people in modern times. In 1912 he went to Berlin, where he worked as a rabbi at the Fasanenstrasse synagogue and taught at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums (Higher Institute for Jewish Studies).

A product of his time and culture, Baeck joined the German army in World War I and served as a Jewish chaplain. In 1918 he returned to Berlin and worked at the Prussian Ministry of Culture as a specialist in Jewish Affairs and Hebrew, while maintaining his pulpit and teaching duties. In 1922 he became president of the Union of German Rabbis (Allgemeiner Deutscher Rabbinerverband) and in 1924 was elected president of the German B'nai B'rith Order.

When the Nazis came to power in 1933 Baeck was elected president of the Reichsvertretung der deutschen Juden

(Reich Representation of German Jews), an umbrella organization of German-Jewish groups established in September 1933 to advance the interests of German Jewry under the new Nazi regime. The organization was forced to change its name to the Reichsverband der Juden in Deutschland (Reich Association of Jews in Germany) in 1935 to reflect the Nazi view that there were no “German Jews” but only “Jews in Germany.” As president, Baeck saw his role as being one of maintaining the morale of German Jews under the ever-tightening restrictions of the Nazi regime, working to mitigate the effects of antisemitic discrimination and persecution.

On the night of November 9–10, this persecution accelerated with the so-called Kristallnacht, or “Night of Broken Glass.” Jewish businesses and synagogues throughout Germany, including Baeck’s Fasanenstrasse synagogue, were burned and looted. While the Reichsverband under Baeck facilitated a good deal of Jewish emigration from Germany, he refused to leave Germany or his community despite a number of offers of help to do so. He famously was reported to have said that he would only leave Germany when he was the last Jew remaining there.

In the aftermath of the pogrom, the Nazis reconfigured Jewish communal arrangements and renamed the organization the Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland (National Association of Jews in Germany). Baeck remained president until it was forcibly disbanded in 1943.

On January 27, 1943, at age 70, he was deported, along with his family, to the Theresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia. At Theresienstadt Baeck became head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), a position that conferred certain privileges such as exemption for himself and his family from deportation to “the East.” He had slightly better accommodation, healthier food, and could even receive mail, and from this position he was able to provide leadership to those around him. He helped others, gave lectures on philosophy and religion, participated in interfaith dialogue between Jews and Christians of Jewish origin, continued teaching among the youth, and refused to lose his sense of self or dignity. All these measures served to provide those around him with hope and an awareness of self-worth. While in the camp he also managed to begin a manuscript that would later become his second book, Dieses Volk: Jüdische Existenz (This People Israel: The Meaning of Jewish Existence).

Although elderly and weakened by his experiences in the concentration camp, Leo Baeck outlasted the Holocaust. Few other members of his family did, with none of his four sisters surviving Theresienstadt by the time the camp was liberated by the Red Army in May 1945.

After the war, Rabbi Baeck moved to London, where he became president of the North Western Reform Synagogue. He was invited to teach at Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, and became chairman of the World Union for Progressive Judaism. In 1955 an institute to preserve the history of German-Jewish culture was established in Jerusalem. Among those behind the initiative were Hannah Arendt, Martin Buber, Robert Weltsch, and Gershom Scholem. The resulting Leo Baeck Institute named him as its first president, and it subsequently became an international organization, with Leo Baeck Institutes in New York and London. Also situated in London is the Reform/Progressive rabbinical seminary, Leo Baeck College. Leo Baeck died in London on November 2, 1956, universally recognized as one of the great Jewish leaders of the twentieth century.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Fackenheim, Emil; Jonas, Regina; Theresienstadt

Further Reading

Baker, Leonard. Days of Sorrow and Pain: Leo Baeck and the Berlin Jews. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Dippel, John H. Bound upon a Wheel of Fire: Why So Many German Jews Made the Tragic Decision to Remain in Nazi Germany. New York: Basic Books, 1996.

Friedlander, Albert H. Leo Baeck: Teacher of Theresienstadt. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1968.

Banality of Evil

“The banality of evil” is a term and concept first coined by the noted political philosopher Hannah Arendt. The phrase is part of the subtitle to her award-winning (and controversial) 1963 book Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, in which she detailed the war-crime trial of the infamous Nazi SS officer Adolf Eichmann. That trial took place in Israel in 1961. Arendt, a Jew who had fled Nazi Germany in 1941, was commissioned by The New Yorker magazine to cover the trial and write a detailed article on it; the book emerged from that article. Arendt’s unorthodox interpretation of Eichmann’s motives and actions upended the more traditional interpretations of Holocaust perpetrators, which at that time tended to portray them unerringly as evil, depraved, and psychopathic individuals.

Arendt concluded that Eichmann was neither inherently evil nor psychopathic. In fact, she asserted, he presented himself as a rather ordinary individual who demonstrated no inherent hatred toward Jews or guilt for the deplorable acts that took place on his watch and as a result of his orders. Eichmann had been primarily responsible for carrying out the Holocaust because he oversaw the deportation of Jews to concentration camps beginning in the early 1940s. She further argued that Eichmann's seeming lack of antisemitism and his relative nonchalance toward Nazi ideology made the evil he unleashed seem "banal" because there appeared to be no psychological or moral explanations for it. And the fact that he felt no responsibility or guilt after the fact compounded that banality.

Arendt also asserted that Eichmann was incapable of independent thinking and was unable to connect and communicate with others outside a military setting. This rendered him more immune to the moral consequences of Nazi policies and made it easier for him to carry out the Final Solution with no lingering guilt. She also ably demonstrated that Eichmann was not a bright man intellectually, which may have predisposed him to participate in activities that most people would have found repugnant. In the end, however, Arendt concluded that even though Eichmann appeared "normal" on the outside, his complete willingness to follow morally repugnant orders indicated his exceptional inclination toward evil, not because it was ingrained in him, but because he chose not to recognize evil acts even as he carried them out.

Not surprisingly, Arendt withstood withering criticism for her "banality of evil" thesis. More recently, her ideas have found much traction among certain Holocaust scholars, most notably Christopher Browning, whose 1992 book, Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland, builds upon the premises of Arendt's "banality of evil" theme. Arendt's ideas regarding the Holocaust were frightening perhaps because she implied that the Holocaust could be repeated and that many people could be complicit in such a cataclysm without consciously choosing to do so. Subsequent genocides in the Balkans, Rwanda, and Darfur have appeared to vindicate Arendt's observations.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Arendt, Hannah; Eichmann, Adolf; Eichmann in Jerusalem; Eichmann Trial; "Ordinary Men"; Shoah

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. Rev. ed. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Roskies, David G., and Naomi Diamant. Holocaust Literature: A History and Guide. Waltham (MA): Brandeis University Press, 2013.

Barbie, Klaus

Klaus Barbie, the infamous "Butcher of Lyon," was the head of the Gestapo in Lyon, France, and earned a reputation for his sadism and brutality during World War II.

Nikolaus Klaus Barbie was born on October 25, 1913, in Bad Godesberg, Germany. In 1923 he moved to Trier. Attracted to Nazism's fierce nationalist ideology, Barbie joined the local Hitler Youth group in April 1933 and rose within its ranks. In September 1935 he joined the SS and was accepted into the Sicherheitsdienst (SD, Intelligence Service).

With the outbreak of war in 1939, Barbie rose quickly within the ranks of the SD. In May 1940 he was dispatched to the SD office in the Netherlands. During his time there, he organized and participated in mass arrests and deportations of Jews. After being promoted to Obersturmführer, Barbie next returned to Germany to receive training in counterinsurgency. In November 1942 he was sent to Lyon and appointed head of the Gestapo.

In Lyon, Barbie became renowned for his brutal policies aimed at accused French resistance fighters and Jews. He personally tortured prisoners, regardless of whether they were men, women, or children. In June 1943 he succeeded in capturing Jean Moulin, a leading member of the French Resistance. Mercilessly tortured, Moulin later died of his wounds.

Barbie also oversaw the deportation of Jews to the death camps in the East. In April 1944 he ordered the residents of the Jewish children's home at Izieu to be transported to Auschwitz. Forty-one children, aged three to eleven, were gassed. As American forces approached Lyon in August 1944, Barbie ordered the execution of 120 prisoners. Fleeing the city, he later returned to Lyon to execute 20 former collaborators.

Following the war, Barbie switched allegiance and provided information to both British and American intelligence. In 1949 France requested that Barbie be turned over to stand trial for his crimes, but stalling and bureaucratic red tape allowed Barbie time to flee to Bolivia with his family in 1951. Assuming the name Klaus Altmann, Barbie remained unidentified for 20 years.

In 1971, Nazi hunters Beate and Serge Klarsfeld succeeded in locating Barbie, but at this time he enjoyed the protection of Bolivia's right-wing government. By the early 1980s, however, the moderate leftist-oriented government that replaced it proved far less hospitable to Barbie. Moreover, a Socialist government in France exerted pressure on the Bolivian authorities, who finally arrested and extradited Barbie to France in 1983.

On May 11, 1987, Barbie's trial began in Lyon. He had already been tried and convicted in absentia by a French court and now faced a sweeping indictment on charges of murder, torture, unlawful arrest, summary execution, and the deportation of dozens of Jewish children. Overall, he was held responsible for some 26,000 killings. His defense attorney, Jacques Verges, attempted to argue that Barbie was no worse than the people who had arrested and placed him on trial and that the charges were therefore hypocritical. Found guilty on July 4, 1987, Barbie was sentenced to life imprisonment. He died in Lyon on September 25, 1991.

ROBERT W. MALICK

See also: Drancy; France; Gestapo; Sicherheitsdienst; Touvier Case

Further Reading

Bower, Tom. Klaus Barbie: The Butcher of Lyons. New York: Pantheon Books, 1984.

Murphy, Brendan. The Butcher of Lyon: The Story of Infamous Nazi Klaus Barbie. New York: Empire Books, 1983.

Barmen Declaration

Issued in May 1934, the Barmen Declaration was a statement of the theological position of the Confessing Church, a federation of German Confessional Churches, in direct response and opposition to the draconian changes to basic Christian theology that the pro-Nazi German Christian movement made in its efforts to "Aryanize" the Protestant churches of Germany.

The Barmen Declaration can be understood only in the context in which it arose. As part of the Nazi government's program of Gleichschaltung ("coordination," whereby all aspects of German society were to be brought under rigid conformity with Nazi ideology), Hitler sought the establishment of a single Reich Church to replace the twenty-eight regional Protestant churches in Germany. To that end, the German Christian movement was established under which Christianity was to be suffused with, and in many respects subordinated to, Nazi ideology. One of the goals of the German Christian movement was to totally remove any reference to Jews or Judaism in Christian worship. Thus, the Old Testament was to be expunged from Christian theology and worship, and the New Testament was to be rewritten without any mention of the Jews, except in their role as perpetrators of deicide. In addition, Jesus was to be portrayed as an Aryan in a cosmic struggle against the Jews for the salvation of humankind.

In April 1933 the new Reich Church was established, with Ludwig Müller, a former naval chaplain and, perhaps far more important, a sycophant of Hitler, as Reich bishop. This church took its authority not from scripture but instead from the Führerprinzip ("leader principle"), a concept that ascribes the ultimate authority in all matters to the Führer and makes it the responsibility of the people to "work up" to that authority. In addition, the Reich Church chose to apply the Aryan Paragraph to the Protestant churches of Germany. This meant that Jewish Christians (Jews who had converted to Christianity) would be considered to be Jewish despite their conversion, confession of faith, and full welcome into the Christian church, on the basis that conversion does not "cure" Jewish blood. Thus, the Nazis defined and identified not only who was Jewish but also who was to be considered Christian.

The theology of the German Christian movement was seen by some Protestant leaders as a corruption of Christianity, one that elevated Hitler to a prophet, if not a savior; that raised nationalism and Nazi racial theory to the level of revelation; and that built its dogma in direct contravention to the Gospels. In response, Martin Niemöller, a Lutheran pastor, formed the Pastors' Emergency League (Pfarrernotbund) in September 1933 in an effort to organize opposition within the church to the Reich Church and its theology. The league grew into the Confessing Church, a federation of the Lutheran, Reformed, and United Protestant denominations in Germany's Confessional churches, to stand against the Reich Church and what it saw as the desecration of traditional Christian theology.

On May 29–31, 1934, the pastors who affiliated themselves with the Confessing Church met in Barmen, in the Ruhr area of Germany, where they adopted the Barmen Declaration as its founding statement. Drafted primarily by Karl Barth, a Swiss theologian in the Reformed tradition, along with Lutheran theologian Hans Asmussen, the declaration set forth six articles that clearly distinguished the Confessing Church from the Nazi-backed German Christian movement.

The articles stated that: "God's revelation" comes exclusively from the "Word of God," and not from "other events and powers, figures and truths"; all areas of life "belong to Jesus Christ, but [not] to other lords"; the church's message will not be affected by "changes in prevailing ideological and political convictions"; the church will not be given over to "special leaders vested with ruling powers"; the state should not become "the single and totalitarian order of human life"; the church will not become "an organ of the State”; and the church will not “place the Word and the work of the Lord in the service of any arbitrarily chosen desires, purposes, and plans.”

There is no doubt as to what or whom the Barmen Declaration meant when it referred to “powers,” “figures,” “other lords,” or “special leaders,” nor is there any doubt as to what it meant when it spoke of “ideological and political convictions,” “totalitarian” states, or arbitrary “desires, purposes and plans.” When the declaration also refused to give the church over as an organ of the state, it was clearly defying the Nazi ideological concept of Gleichschaltung by asserting that it would maintain itself institutionally and theologically free of any Aryan influence.

The Barmen Declaration was a courageous statement that put its adherents in immediate lethal danger, and as such is deserving of the respect accorded it in the record of religious opposition to the Third Reich. It must be noted, however, that it does not speak of antisemitism or the moral issues associated with the Nazis’ treatment of the Jews. Instead, it focuses only on the infringement of the government on its institutions and theology. Although any document must be understood in the context of its time—and May 1934 was a dangerous time, indeed, to protest antisemitism and the treatment of the Jews—many saw the declaration as more concerned with the church itself, and less with the suffering of innocent victims in its midst.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Barth, Karl; Dahlem Declaration; Gleichschaltung; Protestant Churches, German

Further Reading

Barnett, Victoria. For the Soul of the People: Protestant Protest against Hitler. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Bergen, Doris. Twisted Cross: The German Christian Movement in the Third Reich. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Ericksen, Robert P., and Susannah Heschel (Eds.). Betrayal: German Churches and the Holocaust. Minneapolis (MN): Fortress Press, 1999.

Heschel, Susannah. The Aryan Jesus: Christian Theologians and the Bible in Nazi Germany. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 2008.

devout Catholic whose parents were married by Cardinal Elia Angelo Dalla Costa. In 1936 and 1937 Bartali won the Giro d’Italia, and then the Tour de France in 1938. Thus, before the war Bartali was one of Italy’s biggest sports stars and the hero of his nation. Remarkably, he also won the 1946 Giro and his second Tour de France in 1948, ten years after the first.

Following Italy’s capitulation on September 3, 1943, and Germany’s subsequent occupation, the force of the Holocaust came to bear fully against Italy’s Jews. Although the country had a long history of tolerance for its Jews, who formed one of the most assimilated populations in Europe, the Nazi assault built upon Benito Mussolini’s antisemitic laws of 1938. These laws prevented Jews from working in government or the education sector, forbade intermarriage between Jews and other Italians, and removed Jews from positions in the media, among other restrictions. By the end of World War II some 7,680 Italian Jews had lost their lives as a result of the Holocaust, with many of those killed in Auschwitz.

Gino Bartali would come to play an important role in the rescue of Jews during this time. When the Germans began the deportations, Archbishop Dalla Costa recruited Bartali into a secret network he was then establishing with the spiritual leader of Florence’s Jews, Rabbi Nathan Cassuto, who would be deported and killed by the Nazis in November 1943. The system of rescue involved convents, monasteries, and members of the general public hiding Jews. It ultimately was responsible for saving hundreds of Italian and refugee Jews from territories previously under Italian control, mostly in France and Yugoslavia.

Bartali’s role was to act as a courier for the network, hiding forged documents and papers in his bicycle and transporting them between cities. He would do so by concealing them in the seat of his bike, the handlebars, and the bicycle frame. These counterfeit papers, when delivered to their intended recipients, saved many lives. Given an address, Bartali would ride to Jews in hiding and deliver the documents, which often also contained exit visas allowing their recipients to avoid deportation to the death camps. Under the guise of long-distance training, he would ride hundreds of miles across Tuscany and northern Italy to make his deliveries. Italian fascists, knowing who he was, let him pass without further ado; when he encountered Germans, he asked that his bike not be touched owing to sophisticated calibrations designed to assist him in achieving maximum speed. They always left him alone.

While his many adventures led to the salvation of hundreds of Jews, it was inevitable that Bartali would eventually

Bartali, Gino

Gino Bartali was an Italian cycling champion who won two Tour de France titles and helped save more than 800 Jews during the Holocaust. Born in Florence in 1914, Bartali was a be identified and forced to go into hiding. When this happened, he took refuge in a cellar in the town of Città di Castello in Umbria. Here he hid with a Jewish family, the Goldenbergs, with whom he lived until the liberation of Florence in 1944.

After the war, Bartali never spoke about his exploits in resisting the Nazis through the saving of Jewish lives, nor did he ask for any kind of reward for what he had done, preferring to believe that a person should not perform acts of goodness for a reward. His preference was that people would remember him for his performances as a cyclist, rather than for anything he did during the war.

It was, in fact, his son Andrea who was in the forefront of the campaign to have his father recognized. After representations, Yad Vashem began an investigation into this modest hero of the Holocaust. Testimony was sought through the Italian Jewish monthly Pagine Ebraica, and an important contributor came forth in the person of Giorgio Goldenberg, a member of the same family that was hidden by Bartali in the cellar prior to the liberation.

The result saw an emotional acknowledgment of Bartali at a ceremony in Jerusalem on October 10, 2013. The previous month, Yad Vashem had honored him when he was named as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Attending the ceremony were his son, Andrea, and Giorgio Goldenberg, representing his family and the survivors whose lives Bartali had secured seven decades before.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Italy; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Resisting the Holocaust: Upstanders, Partisans, and Survivors. Santa Barbara (CA): ABC-CLIO, 2016.

McConnon, Aili, and Andres McConnon. Road to Valor: A True Story of World War II Italy, the Nazis, and the Cyclist Who Inspired a Nation. New York: Crown, 2012.

Barth, Karl

Karl Barth's role and influence as one of the foremost Protestant theologians of the twentieth century began prior to the Holocaust and extended far beyond it. However, his anti-Nazi position during the Holocaust, a position grounded in his Christian theology, is seen today as a significant contribution to the record of the church's protest against Nazism.

Born in Switzerland in 1886, Barth served as a pastor of the Reformed tradition from 1911 to 1921. He then served as a professor of theology at universities in Germany, including Münster from 1925 to 1930 and Bonn from 1930 to 1935. It was here, especially during his years in Bonn, that Barth was exposed to the rise of National Socialism and its efforts to “Aryanize” Protestant theology by the establishment of a single Reich Church, into which Nazi ideology was integrated, which was intended in many ways to supplant traditional Christian theology. His protest against the Nazi movement resulted in his dismissal in 1935 from the faculty at Bonn.

Karl Barth was a Swiss Reformed theologian, often regarded as the greatest Protestant theologian of the twentieth century. Barth vigorously attempted to prevent the Nazis from taking over the existing church and establishing a state church controlled by the regime, culminating in the Barmen Declaration, a document that criticized Christians who supported the Nazis. (Library of Congress)

Barth considered the national Reich Church, established by the pro-Nazi German Christian movement and led by Ludwig Müller, the apotheosis of Nazi corruption of Christianity, with its near-deification of Hitler and its intent to eliminate Jews and Judaism from Christian theology and worship by removing the Old Testament altogether and limiting any reference to Jews in the New Testament to their alleged perpetration of deicide. By way of sharp contrast, Barth's theology considered the Old Testament and the covenant between God and Israel central to an authentic, scripture-based Christianity, writing that "the Word did not simply become any 'flesh.' . . . It became Jewish flesh." Despite this, Barth remained committed to traditional anti-Jewish supersessionism. Thus, at the same time that Barth condemned antisemitism, he also believed in the tradition of anti-Judaism that has been a part of Christianity since its inception.

The most concrete way by which Barth manifested his Christo-centric theology and its total rejection of the Aryanized Christianity of the Nazis was his central role in the writing of the Barmen Declaration in 1934. This was the founding document of the Confessing Church, a federation of Reform, Liberal, and United Protestant churches that refused to allow the church to become an organ of the state and pushed back on the government's efforts to infringe on the role and authority of the church. As the principal author of the declaration, Barth set forth the distinctions between the role and theology of the national Reich Church and the Confessing Church. However, he was disappointed that the Confessing Church's members at Barmen did not go farther by clearly condemning antisemitism and the treatment of the Jews.

After his expulsion from the faculty in Bonn, Barth returned to Switzerland, where he was a professor of theology in Basel for the next 27 years. He remained a driving force in Christian theology until his death in 1968. He is remembered as much for his unwillingness to acquiesce to Nazism generally, and the Nazis' Aryan theology in particular, as he is for his very significant contributions to Christian theology.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Barmen Declaration; Bonhoeffer, Dietrich; Protestant Churches, German; Theological Responses to the Holocaust

Further Reading

Busch, Eberhard. Karl Barth: His Life from Letters and Autobiographical Texts. Grand Rapids (MI): Eerdmans, 1994.

Sonderegger, Katherine. That Jesus Christ Was Born a Jew: Karl Barth's "Doctrine of Israel." University Park (PA): Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.

Battel, Albert

Albert Battel was a German Army officer during World War II who helped save as many as 100 Jews from deportation and near-certain death in July 1942. In 1981, nearly three decades after his death, he was recognized by Israel's Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Battel was born on January 21, 1891, in Klein-Pramsen, Prussian Silesia (modern-day Prezynka, Poland), that portion of Poland then controlled by Germany. He studied economics at a Berlin university and received a degree in law from a university in Breslau (Wrocław). He served in the Germany Army during World War I and in 1933 joined the Nazi Party.

Well before the outbreak of World War II in 1939, the Nazi Party had reason to suspect the depth of Battel's fidelity to Nazi ideology. He seemed unwilling to participate in anti-Jewish activities and was eventually reprimanded by the party for having arranged a loan for a Jewish friend in the late 1930s. Although he was already 48 years old in 1939, Battel entered the Germany Army with the rank of lieutenant. By 1942 he was stationed in Przemysl, southern Poland, where he served under Major Max Liedtke, the local military commander who also had charge of the Jewish ghetto at Przemysl. While there, Battel was officially reprimanded for having given a warm greeting to Dr. Ignatz Duldig, head of the local Judenrat (Jewish Council) at the Przemysl ghetto.

On July 26, 1942, the SS moved against the ghetto in order to liquidate its inhabitants and deport them to the Belzec death camp. Battel and Liedtke, in an attempt to shield some of the Jews, requested that about 100 Jewish workers be exempted from deportation because they were "valuable" to the Germany Army. When the SS rejected that request, Battel, with Liedtke's backing, barred access to the ghetto by closing a bridge over the River San, effectively blocking the only way into the ghetto. As an armed SS unit prepared to cross the bridge, a sergeant-major under Battel warned that the SS unit would be fired upon if it continued its approach. This showdown between German forces occurred in the morning, surprising many local inhabitants, including those in the ghetto, who witnessed it at firsthand.

Several hours later, Battel and several other German army officers commandeered a small convoy of German army trucks, drove them into the ghetto, and evacuated some 100 Jews to a barracks building at the local military headquarters. The final disposition of the evacuated Jews is somewhat uncertain, but they avoided deportation to Belzec. Within days, the rest of the Jewish ghetto at Przemysl was liquidated.

Battel's action prompted an SS investigation, which reached the top levels of the Nazi hierarchy. Heinrich Himmler, head of the SS, vowed to have Battel arrested after the war ended. In 1944 Battel developed a heart condition and was released from army service; he then returned to Breslau, his hometown. Some months later, he was forced to join a German militia unit and was captured by Soviet troops toward the end of the war.

Battel remained in West Germany until his death in 1952, but a denazification court forbade him from practicing law because of his past Nazi Party membership. At the time, few people knew of Battel's heroic deed. Indeed, Battel's actions were effectively unknown until years after his death, when Dr. Zeev Goshen, an Israeli attorney and researcher, brought them to light. Battel was posthumously honored as one of the Righteous among the Nations on January 22, 1981. Max Liedtke was also given the same honor by Yad Vashem.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Freiwald, Aaron, and Martin Mendelsohn. The Last Nazi. New York: Norton, 1994.

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.

Bauer, Yehuda

Yehuda Bauer is one of the world's foremost scholars of the Holocaust. He was formerly the director of the Institute of Contemporary Jewry and professor of Holocaust Studies, and director of the International Centre for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority. Born in Prague in 1926, he came from a family with a committed Zionist background. During the 1930s his father sought to enter Palestine, then under the British Mandate. He was successful in obtaining entry permits in 1939, and the family arrived on March 15, 1939—the same day the Nazis invaded Czechoslovakia.

He studied at Cardiff University, Wales, returning to Palestine in 1948 in order to fight during Israel's War of Independence. After the war he continued his studies, graduating in history. Upon his return to Israel he commenced advanced work at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and received his doctorate in 1960. In 1961 Bauer commenced his academic teaching life with a position at the Institute for Contemporary Jewry at Hebrew University, and he became one of the early scholars of the new field of what became known as Holocaust Studies. He served as chairman of the Department of Holocaust Studies at Hebrew University and quickly became a leading voice on the Holocaust, antisemitism, and the Jewish resistance movement during the Holocaust years. In 1986 he became the founding editor of the journal Holocaust and Genocide Studies. He acted as the historical adviser to the film Shoah (1985, dir. Claude Lanzmann); served on the editorial board of Yad Vashem's Encyclopaedia of the Holocaust (1990); served as an academic adviser to the International Task Force for Holocaust Education, Remembrance, and Research; and acted as a senior adviser to the Swedish government's International Forum on Genocide Prevention. In 1998 he was the recipient of the Israel Prize, the highest civilian award in Israel, and in 2001 was elected a member of Israel's Academy of Science.

As a historian of the Holocaust, Bauer broke new ground in numerous areas, as well as challenging those with whose approach he has disagreed. Three key areas may be considered here: Jewish resistance during the Holocaust, the issue of Jewish collaboration via the Judenräte (Jewish councils), and the so-called "intentionalist/functionalist" debate over how the Holocaust unfolded.

In the first of these, Bauer made a major reconsideration of the dynamics of Jewish ghetto and partisan resistance against the Nazis, holding that resistance (Amidah) encompassed more than physical opposition, but embraced any activity that reinforced dignity and humanity. Bauer's interest focused on the often referred-to issue of perceived Jewish passivity in the face of the Nazi assault, in which the Jews have sometimes been referred to as having gone to their deaths as "sheep to the slaughter." Bauer disputed the popular view that most Jews went to their deaths passively. Given the options available to Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe, together with the conditions under which they had to try to survive, he held that what is surprising is not the dearth of resistance but, to the contrary, how extensive it actually was.

Where unarmed resistance is concerned, the act of clinging to the trappings of a "normal"—even a "civilized"—life represented a determination that the Nazis would not be successful in their aim to debase Jewish society and thereby gain a moral as well as physical victory over the Jews. Leading a "normal" life in the ghettos through creating libraries, conducting weddings, organizing schools, and the like was often the only resistance option open to the Jews.

In Bauer's work regarding the Judenräte, Bauer asked whether or not the actions of those in charge of the Judenräte could have led to the survival of more Jews, and, while recognizing the appalling dilemma faced by these leaders, concludes that what matters more than casting blame—for no one could have prevented the Nazis from carrying out their murderous plans—was the effort that was put into trying to keep at least some Jews alive despite those plans. No one knows whether more Jews would have survived without Jewish participation in the Judenräte, but Bauer held that with more research on the question of complicity or collaboration in the ghettos, a conclusion based on the balance of probabilities might be reached at some time in the future—based on the vital premise that only the Nazis could have stopped the Holocaust, and that only they could have prevented the deaths of most of the victims.

Finally, consideration can be given to his views on the so-called “intentionalist” and “functionalist” debate. This was primarily a debate among historians, especially during the 1980s, based on two schools of thought over the issue of whether the Nazi annihilation of the Jews was planned by the Nazi Party based on the thinking of Adolf Hitler, or whether it was a policy that evolved slowly over time. Bauer’s view was that Hitler was the key figure in causing the Holocaust, and that at some point in the latter half of 1941 he gave a series of orders for the genocide of the entire Jewish people. This was not, however, a long-held goal of the Nazis or the Führer himself. As Bauer saw it, the perspectives of both the intentionalists and the functionalists are unsatisfactory, and he was more comfortable with a synthesis of the two schools. He did not consider that there was a master plan for genocide going back as far as the time when Hitler wrote Mein Kampf, but he also found it difficult to concede that the decisions for the Holocaust were taken at the initiative of less senior members of Hitler’s government, as though the Führer or his inner circle were unaware of it.

A further issue into which Bauer brought an authoritative voice concerned the passionate debates that ensued after the publication of Hitler’s Willing Executioners, a book published in 1996 by Harvard University political scientist Daniel Goldhagen. His argument was that ordinary Germans permitted themselves to be transformed by the Nazis into genocidal killers of Jews because of cultural characteristics within German society that allowed for a specific type of what Goldhagen termed “eliminationist antisemitism.”

Bauer appreciated Goldhagen’s attempt to provide an answer to the question of why the Holocaust happened (something he considers many scholars have been either unable or unwilling to do), and that in doing so Goldhagen placed antisemitism at center stage of this analysis. Bauer considered the thesis to be simplistic, however, and was critical of Goldhagen for only selecting evidence favorable to his thesis and for tailoring his arguments to fit a preconceived position.

An area to which scholars turned frequently in Bauer’s writing related to his perspective on the so-called “uniqueness” of the Holocaust. Bauer did not refer to the Holocaust as “unique”; indeed, he rejected that word, preferring to use the more defensible term “unprecedented.” As he saw it, the Holocaust was an extreme example of genocide: it was unique in the same way that all historical events are unique unto themselves, though even when comparing it to other events it had specific characteristics that had never happened before. These were, in summary form: (1) the ideological motivation of the killings, unlike other genocides in which ulterior motives based on physical acquisition (of land or loot) can be traced; (2) the totality of the Nazis’ aims, according to which every Jew in the world, without exception, was the intended target; (3) the breadth of the Nazis’ scope, which transcended borders and spread across all lands occupied and yet to be occupied by the Nazis and their allies and/or supporters; and (4) the nature of the Nazi concentration camp system, in which mass imprisonment, ritualized degradation, and, ultimately, purpose-built factories for the killing of huge numbers of people were developed for the first time in human history. In Bauer’s view, none of these four features had ever before been a characteristic of what could be considered genocide. Because of this, he argues, the Holocaust’s “unprecedentedness” renders it of universal importance.

Thus, in Yehuda Bauer’s overall analysis the Holocaust was the most extreme form of genocide on a continuum that ends with the Shoah as its ultimate point. It is the definitive yardstick against which all antihuman activities should be measured, and as a result of it having taken place, society can never again be the same as it was.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: “Functionalists”; Holocaust and Genocide Studies; “Intentionalists”; Jewish Resistance; Judenrat; Yad Vashem

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. From Diplomacy to Resistance: A History of Jewish Palestine. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1970.

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 1982 (rev. ed., 2001).

Bauer, Yehuda. The Holocaust in Historical Perspective. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1978.

Bauer, Yehuda. The Jewish Emergence from Powerlessness. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1979.

Bauer, Yehuda. Rethinking the Holocaust. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.

Baum, Herbert

Herbert Baum and his wife Marianne were the founders, at the end of summer 1937, of an anti-Nazi resistance group in Germany. Baum was born in Moschin, eastern Germany, on February 10, 1912. His family moved to Berlin when he was a baby. Upon leaving school he became an electrician. By 1926 he was an active member of a number of left-wing Jewish youth movements, and in 1931 he joined Germany's Young Communist League. Marianne Cohn, whom he had known since the two of them were young, had joined in 1930. In 1934, after she and Herbert were married, they were directed by the Communist Party to make contact with a number of

Herbert Baum was a German-Jewish anti-Nazi resister and leader of a group that bore his name. On May 18, 1942, the group organized an arson attack on an anticommunist and antisemitic propaganda exhibition in Berlin's Lustgarten. Arrested soon after, Baum and several others were sentenced to death. He died in Berlin's Moabit Prison on June 11, 1942. (Ullstein Bild/Getty Images)

Jewish organizations with which he had worked earlier. A small circle of friends and acquaintances formed and then grew. Most of them were Jewish, and they met frequently to discuss ways to circumvent Nazi antisemitism. Almost immediately they nominated Baum as their chairman.

By the time of the November 9–10 Kristallnacht pogrom, the little group had grown to nearly 100 young Germans, who would attend meetings at various times to discuss their options. After Jewish organizations were banned in 1939 the group grew larger—and, of necessity, more secretive. It retained its leftist and communist identity while recognizing and maintaining its Jewish origin.

In 1940 Baum was drafted into a forced labor unit at the electromotive works of the Siemens-Schuckertwerke, an electrical engineering company based in Berlin. While here, he engaged in party propaganda, leading to many more recruits from among those at the plant. For some who were communist but not Jewish, the idea of resistance proved to be a problem on account of the alliance signed between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany in August 1939. For the Jews, there was little option; they could not afford any political dilemmas.

From 1941 onward, members of Baum's network among the Siemens workers saw that if they were to escape deportation to concentration camps they would have to mount some sort of underground resistance while at the same time making it appear as though they were vital to the war effort. Their underground activities at this time focused on the preparation and distribution of anti-Nazi propaganda leaflets rather than physical confrontation.

At the beginning of May 1942 Nazi Germany's minister of propaganda, Joseph Goebbels (who was also the Gauleiter of Berlin), organized an enormous exhibition at the Lustgarten, right in the heart of Berlin. This exhibition, titled "The Soviet Paradise," was intended to dehumanize the Russian enemy and reinforce an anti-Soviet (and, through this, an anti-Jewish) mindset among the population. Its fundamental goal was to justify the war against the Soviet Union, and well over a million people visited while the exhibition was running.

Baum and his circle, recognizing that their actions could always be only symbolic—they knew that they could not by themselves topple the Nazi regime—decided to let symbolism confront symbolism. On May 18, 1942, a group of seven Baum members—Herbert and Marianne Baum, Hans Joachim, Gerd Meyer, Sala Kochmann, Suzanne Wesse, and Irene Walther—set a number of fires around the exhibition that were timed to ignite simultaneously. Some members had been cautious about such an action, fearing that Nazi retribution could well see the plan backfire against the Jews of Berlin. Others thought the time was ripe for such an act, and that delay would lose the initiative.

Once lit, the fires were quickly extinguished, and within days hundreds of Jewish Berliners, including all seven participants and most of the other members of the Baum group, were arrested by the Gestapo. Marianne and Herbert Baum were arrested on May 22, 1942. He was taken to the Siemens plant and ordered to identify fellow workers who were part of the conspiracy; refusing to reveal anything, he was subsequently tortured mercilessly in Berlin's Moabit Prison and died on June 11, 1942. The Gestapo reported his death as a suicide. Marianne was executed in Plötzensee prison on August 18, 1942, along with Joachim Franke, Hildegard Jadamowitz, Heinz Joachim, Sala Kochmann, Hans-Georg Mannaberg, Gerhard Meyer, Werner Steinbrink, and Irene Walther.

Other resisters in the Baum group were caught and tried in succeeding months. Most were executed at Plötzensee on March 4, 1943: Heinz Rotholz, Heinz Birnbaum, Hella Hirsch, Hanni Meyer, Marianne Joachim, Lothar Salinger, Helmut Neumann, Hildegard Löwy, and Siegbert Rotholz. Overall, the deaths of the Baum group members represent a tragic roll call of lost youth and dashed hopes. The average age of those in the group's inner circle was 22; Charlotte Päch, aged 32, was the oldest in the group, and was nicknamed "Grandma" by the others.

Moreover, not all were Jewish; Franke, Jadamowitz, Mannaberg, and Steinbrink were all non-Jewish communists. Ultimately, of the 32 members of the group who lost their lives, 22 were executed by decapitation, nine died in death camps, and one—Herbert Baum himself—through torture. Only five members of the Baum group survived the war.

As an act of resistance to the Holocaust, the question must be asked: was it worth it? The press was forbidden to report on the fire, and no official news was released regarding the Baum group or the fate of its members. Yet the partial destruction of the exhibit on the Lustgarten must have presented something of a shock to Goebbels and the Berlin Nazis. A small but well-organized resistance circle of Jewish communists had challenged a major Nazi propaganda enterprise, in the heart of the German capital, more than nine years after the Nazis had come to power. Little wonder, it might be argued, that the punishments were so overwhelming and devastating. The Baum group, quite simply, rocked the Nazi establishment as few other resistance movements in Germany had to that time.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Resistance; Kristallnacht

Further Reading

Brothers, Eric. Berlin Ghetto: Herbert Baum and the Anti-Fascist Resistance. Stroud (UK): Spellmount, 2012.

Suhl, Yuri (Ed.). They Fought Back: The Story of the Jewish Resistance in Nazi Europe. New York: Crown, 1967.

Beck, Gad

Gerhard Beck, born in Berlin in 1923, was a German Jewish homosexual living before and during the Third Reich. He is remembered today as the longest living known male homosexual to survive the Holocaust. Under the Nuremberg Laws, he and his twin sister Margot were classified as mischlinge, that is, Jews of mixed descent, in that they were the children of a Jewish father and a Protestant mother who had converted to Judaism. Participating in Jewish youth organizations when young, they changed their names to the Hebrew "Gad" and "Miriam" in order to express themselves in a more Jewish way—a form of symbolic resistance to the Nazis.

Beck suffered greatly in his younger years under the Nazi regime. When antisemitism became a part of public education in Germany he was frequently taunted, and his familiar classroom soon became filled with Hitler Youth uniforms. After the "J" stamp was introduced in October 1938, Beck was forced to display a yellow Star of David with that letter on it, singling him out for ridicule among those who had formerly been his classmates. Soon after, he was obliged to leave his school and attend a wholly Jewish institution. While he ended up preferring this owing to the curriculum (which favored, among other things, foreign languages), he was eventually forced to drop out altogether as his family could no longer afford to send him to what was now a private school with much higher fees.

As Beck entered young adulthood and became aware of his homosexuality, he developed a gay lifestyle despite the potential risks this carried in a Third Reich that had passed harsh antigay laws. Homosexuals were persecuted heavily under the Nazis' extension of Paragraph 175, a provision of the German Criminal Code dating from May 15, 1871. In defiance of this law, Beck's first lover was another Jew, Manfred Lewin; this relationship did not last long, however, as a result of the Nazis capturing Lewin and his family and then deporting them in 1942. In another act of defiance, Beck borrowed a Hitler Youth uniform and gained access to the place where Lewin was being held prior to his deportation, in the hope of saving him. With this ruse, Lewin would in fact have been able to walk out of the holding area with the disguised Beck, but he decided to remain with his family. All were later murdered at Auschwitz.

The act of trying to help Lewin propelled Beck to participate in resistance activities against the Nazi regime. He began this in earnest during 1943, when Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels sought to declare Berlin free of Jews in time for Adolf Hitler's birthday on April 20. Beck and his father were arrested and held in the former Jewish community building on Berlin's Rosenstrasse, where protests by women outside eventually secured the release of all the men being held captive.

After this, Beck went underground with Chug Chaluzi (Clan of Pioneers), a Zionist youth group in Berlin dedicated to the cause of helping Jews and mischlinge escape Germany. This included educating members in Jewish traditions and religion. Beck's most important underground accomplishments came during his time in Chug Chaluzi, where he and his friends were all actively involved in helping others escape. As a result, Beck spent much of the war dodging the Gestapo, as there were times when he took huge risks by smuggling rations, money, and clothes to fellow Jews in hiding.

During 1944 Beck became the leader of Chug Chaluzi. The group itself was very small, comprising only about 40 young Jewish boys and girls, with eight of those, including Beck, comprising the inner circle. Their actions helped many Jews flee to safety in Switzerland through the provision of forged papers. The nature of Beck's resistance activities focused more on teaching culture and providing help than on violent acts of retaliation, such as hiding Jews, enhancing Jewish values, and assisting with escape attempts.

These activities came to an end when Beck and some of those around him were betrayed by a Jewish spy working for the Gestapo and were arrested in the spring of 1945. They were sent to a transit camp in Berlin awaiting transport to an unknown destination. In his cell, he narrowly escaped death, suffering a number of broken bones after he became pinned under debris during an air raid. He was liberated by Soviet troops after the capture of Berlin.

In 1947 Beck moved to Palestine, helping Jews migrate to the new homeland then being established. He lived in Israel for several years, until he began traveling and giving lectures on his life experiences. For a short time Beck participated in youth work through the Jewish community in Vienna. He moved back to Berlin in 1979, served as director of Berlin's Jewish Adult Education Center, and became a prominent gay activist.

He retired after ten years of work at the center, where he taught students about the Jewish culture that had once flourished in their country. During this time he gave many interviews and participated in numerous documentaries, as well as writing his own memoir, An Underground Life: Memoirs of a Gay Jew in Nazi Berlin. Gad Beck died on June 24, 2012, just six days before turning 89. He was survived by his partner of 36 years, Julius Laufer.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Homosexuals; Jewish Resistance; Mischling; Yellow Star

Further Reading

Beck, Gad. An Underground Jew: Memoirs of a Gay Jew in Nazi Berlin. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1999.

Becker-Freyseng, Hermann

Hermann Becker-Freyseng was a German physician who participated in medical experiments on concentration camp internees before and during World War II. He was born in Ludwigshafen, Germany, on July 18, 1910, and received his medical degree from the University of Berlin in 1935. The following year, he was given the rank of captain in the Medical Service and was posted to the Department of Aviation Medicine, where he became an expert on the effects of high-altitude, low-pressure conditions on human beings. In the meantime, he had become a member of the Nazi Party.

Becker-Freyseng's work became well known, if notorious, at Nazi concentration camps, where he both conducted and supervised a number of experiments involving unwilling prisoners. Through the use of various low-pressure chambers designed to mimic the effects of high altitudes on the human body, Becker-Freyseng and his colleagues killed a number of prisoners at Dachau. Other experiments attempted to record the effects of extremely cold temperatures on the human body. One of his more sinister experiments involved forcing 40 internees to drink saltwater to measure their bodies' reactions. Some also had saltwater injected directly into their bloodstreams. The subjects were then subjected to liver biopsies—without the benefit of anesthesia—to measure that organ's reaction to the saltwater. All of the people involved ultimately died.

With the end of World War II in 1945, Becker-Freyseng was taken into custody by U.S. occupation authorities and put on trial for his medical experiments, along with other Nazi doctors. In 1946 he was found guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity and sentenced to 20 years in prison. Shortly thereafter, however, American officials took the German doctor to the United States, where he was put to work in the fledgling U.S. space program. He was in fact one of a number of German scientists taken to the United States as part of Operation Paperclip, which was designed chiefly to prevent such individuals from going to work for the Soviets during the early Cold War period. Becker-Freyseng died on August 27, 1961, in Heidelberg.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Medical Experimentation

Further Reading

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1988.

Beitz, Berthold

Berthold Beitz was a German industrialist who saved hundreds of Jewish workers during the Holocaust by declaring them to be essential workers at the Beskidian Oil Company (later renamed the Carpathian Oil Company) at Boryslaw (Boryslav), in Poland's eastern Galicia region. Born on September 26, 1913, in the German city of Zemmin, Beitz trained to become a banker like his father. In April 1938 he was employed by the Royal Dutch Shell Oil Company in Hamburg, which led to a military deferment when war broke out in September 1939. He remained an employee of Shell during the first years of the war.

In 1939 Boryslaw was annexed by the Soviet Union, but in the summer of 1941, with Operation Barbarossa, it came under German control and was attached to the newly formed Generalgouvernement. Because of Beitz's expertise in the oil industry, he received a wartime commission as manager of oil supplies in the Boryslaw oilfields.

This gave him the opportunity to identify which residents would be employed as "essential to the war effort." As the area around Boryslaw had a large Jewish population with many Jews employed in the oil industry, it was inevitable that Beitz would employ Jews as local workers, and he used his office to create superfluous positions, which saved hundreds of Jews and Poles from being deported to death camps. While he certainly engaged professionals able to assist in oil production, there were also a large number of Jews who were unqualified, in poor physical condition, and unable to make any contribution to the oil industry. He would later say that while he should have employed more professionals, he instead chose "tailors, hairdressers and Talmudic scholars," issuing work cards classifying them as "vital petroleum technicians."

In his managerial capacity Beitz was part of a regional network of senior Nazis, and through his connections could learn of impending anti-Jewish actions. Soon after arriving in Boryslaw, for example, he began witnessing atrocities perpetrated by the Einsatzgruppen (special action squads), whose sole task was the murder of Jews and other racial and ideological enemies of the Reich. He was notified in advance when any anti-Jewish measures were being planned, and so took it upon himself to choose which Jews were to be saved once they had all been assembled for transport. In this way, in August 1942, he took 250 Jewish men and women off a train heading for the Belzec extermination camp; for him, they were needed for the oil industry, and thus were "vital war workers."

Earlier that same month, on August 7, 1942, he witnessed an SS action in which they viciously "evacuated" the Jewish orphanage of Boryslaw; babies and toddlers were thrown out of windows, and children driven barefoot to the train station in the middle of the night. Seeing this, he decided to act, so from this point on, whenever he could, he issued false work papers and hid Jews in his home. He also tipped off local Jews whenever he learned of an impending anti-Jewish action.

It helped that the oil industry in Boryslaw was such a focused location for Jews. After the region was taken over by the Nazis, management passed to the Carpathian Oil Company, which stationed its workers and their families in segregated work camps. A special badge was sewn onto their clothes bearing the letter "R," identifying the wearer as a Rüstungsarbeiter, or armaments worker. This provided Beitz with a ready reservoir of employees, and a location he could watch should knowledge of any new pogroms come his way.

In an interview with the New York Times in 1983, Beitz explained his motivations as having nothing to do with politics. He did not act because he was opposed to Nazism or fascism, and did not see himself as being part of any organized resistance movement. "My motives," he said, "were purely humane, moral motives." His main concern was with the saving of endangered lives.

Because of this approach, Berthold Beitz has been credited with saving up to eight hundred Jews. He remained at his post in Boryslaw until March 1944, when he was drafted into the army. While he did not see himself as a resister, the fact was that by going out of his way to deliberately save the lives of Jews he was opposing one of the most sacred principles of National Socialism, for which he could have been denounced and arrested, at the risk of his own life, at any moment.

After the war, Beitz became one of the leading industrialists in postwar Germany, playing a critical role in rebuilding the country into an industrial powerhouse. In the 1950s he became the head of the powerful steel conglomerate ThyssenKrupp and helped in the reindustrialization of the Ruhr Valley. While these were immense achievements, his work on behalf of Jews during the Holocaust was well remembered and garnered him a number of important awards of recognition. These included the Leo Baeck Award, the highest honor bestowed by the Central Council of Jews in Germany, awarded to him and his wife Else in 2000. He also received awards from Poland.

On October 3, 1973, however, the highest recognition came to Beitz when Yad Vashem named him as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his work in saving Jewish lives. His original nomination for this award received strong support from most of the survivors from Boryslaw. Upon further research and deliberation, on February 5, 2006, Else Beitz was also recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations. On July 30, 2013, at the age of 99, Berthold Beitz died at his holiday home on the island of Sylt, off Germany's northern coast.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Operation Barbarossa; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Käppner, Joachim. Berthold Beitz: Die Biographie. Berlin: BV Berlin Verlag GmbH, 2010.

Schmalhausen, Bernd. Berthold Beitz im Dritten Reich: Mensch in unmenschlicher Zeit. Bochum: Verlag P. Pomp, 1991.

Belarus

A landlocked country situated in Eastern Europe, Belarus (known historically as Belorussia) was occupied both by Poland and the Soviet Union prior to the beginning of World War II in 1939. Between 1922 and 1939, the western portion of Belarus was controlled by Poland; the eastern part was controlled by the Soviets as the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Even before the outbreak of war, Belarus was no stranger to antisemitism and atrocities against Jews. Forming part of the Pale of Settlement established by Russian empress Catherine the Great in 1791, the region of Belarus was home to a sizable Jewish population. However, beginning in the second half of the 19th century, pogroms aimed at Jews forced many to flee and resulted in severe persecution (and even death) to those who remained. Antisemitism waned a bit after Belarus became part of the Soviet Union, but by the early 1930s Joseph Stalin's government had adopted a harder line against Belarusian Jews.

When Germany attacked Poland in September 1939, a move that sparked World War II, part of western Belarus came under Nazi control. In June 1941 Germany invaded the Soviet Union, and Nazi troops overran all of Belarus by the end of August. Within weeks, the Germans began implementing the systematic eradication of Belarusian Jews in the region. Minsk, the historic capital of Belarus, became one of the largest Jewish ghettos in the east. As many as 150,000 Jews were concentrated there, and most were killed on site or died after deportation. Over a period of just three days in June 1942, the Germans killed some 30,000 Jews in Minsk alone. Thousands of others were sent to labor or death camps, where the vast majority perished.

Mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen) were primarily responsible for rounding up Jews and other “undesirables” during the early stages of the German occupation. They were frequently aided by non-Jewish locals, who were exhorted by the Germans to establish pogroms against Jews. As the occupation progressed, the mobile killing squads and German occupation officials supervised the mass murder of at least 1 million Jews in the occupied region, which included Belarus; some estimates place the total killed as high as 2 million. Many were killed in their own cities or towns, or in the Minsk ghetto—others died after being deported to concentration camps.

The brutal German occupation ended in the summer of 1944, as Soviet troops pushed the Germans west toward Germany. Minsk was retaken that July. The German invasion and occupation of Belarus decimated that region and its inhabitants. One-quarter of the total population died between 1941 and 1944, and perhaps as much as 90% of the Jewish population perished. Indeed, Belarus suffered more than any other Soviet republic during the war. The Germans completely destroyed 209 cities and towns, more than one million homes and other structures, and eradicated 85% of the region's industrial capacity. The damage was so catastrophic that Belarus's population remained below the pre-1939 level until 1971.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Collaboration; Einsatzgruppen; Ghettos

Further Reading

Beorn, Waitman Wade. Marching into Darkness: The Wehrmacht and the Holocaust in Belarus. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2014.

Rhodes, Richard. Masters of Death: The SS-Einsatzgruppen and the Invention of the Holocaust. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Snyder, Timothy. Bloodlands: Europe between Hitler and Stalin. New York: Basic Books, 2012.

Belgium

Belgium is a small nation located in northwestern Europe. Broadly speaking, it is divided culturally and linguistically between Flemish-speaking Belgians in the north and French-speaking Walloons in the south. There were an estimated 90,000–100,000 Jews living in Belgium in 1939, many of whom were foreign nationals from Poland and other Eastern European countries. A liberal and independent constitutional republic since 1830, Belgium largely avoided the widespread antisemitism that had swept other nations in the 20th century.

Despite Belgium's declared neutrality, German forces invaded the country in May 1940 and quickly established a military occupation there. The country was administered by German occupation officials and the Belgian civil service, although most policies were set by the Germans. Although the Belgian government reestablished itself in exile in London, King Leopold III refused to leave Belgium, where he remained under a loose form of house arrest.

The Germans wasted no time in implementing anti-Jewish measures once Belgium had been secured. Various religious ceremonies were banned, and Jews were forbidden to practice certain professions, including education, medicine, and law. The occupiers also expropriated Jewish property and businesses, confined Jews to inner cities, established curfews, and, beginning in 1942, required all Jews to wear identifying yellow badges in public.

Even worse, by late 1943, German occupation officials began rounding up Jews and forcibly deporting them to concentration and death camps in the east. As many as 25,000

Belgian Jews were sent to Auschwitz, where nearly all were murdered. Other Jews were compelled to work at forced labor both within Belgium and beyond, and several thousand are estimated to have died from overwork or squalid living conditions.

Compared to other nations under Nazi occupation, many Belgian Jews managed to survive the Holocaust and the Nazi occupations, thanks in part to a robust resistance movement that developed soon after the German conquest. Jews and non-Jews alike participated in this movement, which was aided by the Catholic Church and the government-in-exile. Most Belgians refused to aid the Nazis in their attempts to identify, round up, and label Jews, and many actively helped Jews elude the Germans' clutches, chiefly by hiding them or helping them to remain hidden. In all, perhaps 25,000–30,000 Jews from Belgium died during the war, most of them having been deported to concentration camps. The German occupation of Belgium ended when Allied forces liberated it in September 1944.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: André, Joseph; Antwerp Pogrom; Collaboration; Comité de Défense des Juifs; Degrelle, Léon; Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée; Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph; Mechelen; Resistance Movements

Further Reading

Bond, Brian. France and Belgium, 1939–1940. London: Davis-Poynter, 1975.

Snyder, Timothy. Bloodlands: Europe between Hitler and Stalin. New York: Basic Books, 2012.

Belzec

In early 1940 German officials built a number of forced labor camps along the Bug River. Just outside the village of Belzec, in southeastern Poland, the Germans erected a labor camp, which also served as the headquarters for all of the regional labor camps. Administered by the SS, the camp at Belzec interned Jews from the Lublin district, where they were compelled to build various military facilities on the Bug River. By year's end, the labor camp was deactivated; its laborers were either shot or deported to other detention facilities. In November 1941 the SS and local police officials began erecting an extermination camp at the site of the old labor camp. It was to be the Nazis' first dedicated extermination facility. The new camp commenced operations in March 1942, when Jews deported from Lublin, Lvov, and Kraków began arriving by rail cars. Belzec quickly became a death camp, where several hundred thousand people were murdered.

Belzec was ideally suited as an extermination camp because it was situated less than one-quarter of a mile from a major rail line. The camp, which measured 886 feet per side, was supervised by 20–30 SS and police officers along with an auxiliary police unit of 90–120 men. This group was multiethnic, constituting Ukrainian and Polish civilians as well as former Soviet prisoners of war. Commanding the facility were SS major Christian Wirth (March–June 1942) and SS first lieutenant Gottlieb Hering (June 1942–June 1943). The Nazis went to considerable trouble to conceal the activities inside the facility in an effort to keep the local population in the dark about the mass killings there.

The Germans had the deportations and killing down to a science: trains of 40–60 boxcars, with 80–100 people per car, arrived at the Belzec station. The prisoners were brought into the facility, stripped of their possessions, and usually separated by gender (men were kept separate from women and children). Deportees were then forced to disrobe and told to walk through the “tube,” a narrow, concealed walkway that led to the gas chambers. The unsuspecting prisoners were told they were going to communal showers. Once a chamber was full, the doors were sealed and carbon monoxide gas was pumped into the room via a large machine. This process was repeated until all deportees were killed (a few, however, were temporarily spared to work as slave laborers in the camp). These prisoners were compelled to work in the killing areas, separating newly arrived prisoners’ possessions, removing bodies from the gas chambers, and burying them in mass graves adjacent to the facility.

Fearful that their nefarious activities might be discovered, German officials ordered the mass graves exhumed in October 1942. The remains were incinerated in open-air furnaces, while machines were employed to crush any surviving bone fragments. Meanwhile, between March and December 1942 alone, at least 435,500 Jews, Poles, and Roma were murdered at Belzec. Most had come from southern Poland, but there were also Jews from Austria, Germany, and Czechoslovakia. Meanwhile, by June 1943 conscript laborers had finished the task of exhuming bodies and burning them. The workers were subsequently shot or deported to other facilities. To mask their activities, German officials bulldozed the entire site, constructed a large home, and planted crops and trees. The Soviets uncovered the horrors of Belzec when they occupied the area in July 1944.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Death Camps; Final Solution; Franz, Kurt; Gas Chambers; Gerstein, Kurt; J.A. Topf and Sons; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Majdanek; Nisko Plan; Wirth, Christian

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.

Bergen-Belsen

Bergen-Belsen was a German concentration camp during World War II, situated near the village of Bergen in north-western Germany. It was originally designated a camp for political prisoners and was not equipped with gas chambers or crematoria. Prisoners were subjected to a very limited diet, and most deaths at the camp resulted from starvation, malnutrition, or diseases like typhus and dysentery resulting from unsanitary water. The guards at Bergen-Belsen were notoriously brutal, especially the female contingent, and the camp was considered an especially tough place to be imprisoned.

In December 1944 Josef Kramer was transferred to Bergen-Belsen from Birkenau as camp commander, and the regime of brutalization intensified dramatically. Kramer, whom the British called “The Beast of Belsen,” created at Bergen-Belsen perhaps the most brutal of the concentration camps. Beatings, torture, random shootings, and senseless cruelty were the order of the day. The incompetence of Kramer’s administration was magnified as prisoners from other camps were sent to Bergen-Belsen beginning in the late winter of 1945.

Bergen-Belsen’s regular prisoner muster was about 10,000. As Allied armies threatened to capture various concentration camps on the Eastern and Western fronts, however, prisoners were moved to camps deeper in Germany, and by April 1945 Belsen held almost 80,000 prisoners in a space designed to hold barely one-tenth that number. The acute shortage of food, together with the poor water quality and next to no medical care, saw prisoner welfare transformed into a catastrophe, and Kramer lost control of the situation. The camp guards stopped keeping track of prisoners and decided to refrain from contact with them because they were afraid of catching typhus. Any semblance of order simply disappeared. No one disposed of the growing number of dead, and some prisoners reportedly resorted to cannibalism.

Bergen-Belsen was a Nazi concentration camp. Originally established as a prisoner of war camp, it was converted into a concentration camp in 1943. Toward the end of World War II, massive overcrowding, lack of food, and poor sanitary conditions led to outbreaks of disease and the deaths of tens of thousands of people prior to, and after, the liberation. (Popperfoto/Getty Images)

The British captured Bergen-Belsen in April 1945, and Kramer was taken into immediate custody. Upon touring the camp, British soldiers found about 30,000 starving and diseased survivors, and about 35,000 corpses lying in various parts of the camp, including entire barracks blocks. It was one of the most horrifying scenes of the entire war, and film footage from the time became an iconic testament to the brutality of the Nazi regime. Kramer, for his part, was sentenced to death by a British military court on November 17, 1945, and hanged a few days later.

LEE BAKER

See also: Concentration Camps; Grese, Irma; Kramer, Josef; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Mann, Franczeska; Westerbork

Further Reading

Herzberg, Abel Jacob. Between Two Streams: A Diary from Bergen-Belsen. London: Tauris Parke, 2009.

Reilly, Joanne. Belsen: The Liberation of a Concentration Camp. New York: Routledge, 1998.

Bergson Group

The Bergson Group took its name from the alias used by Hillel Kook—Peter H. Bergson—a Palestinian Jewish activist, right-wing Revisionist Zionist, and follower of Vladimir Ze'ev Jabotinsky. Kook was also a founding member of the Irgun Zeva'i Le'umi, the underground military organization in Palestine created by Jabotinsky modeled on the Jewish Self-Defense League he had founded earlier in Odessa, Russia, and which Kook took to Poland in 1937 to help organize Jewish immigration to Palestine.

In 1940, the year of Jabotinsky's death, Kook was sent to the United States, along with a small group of others—Aryeh Ben-Eliezer, Yitzhak Ben-Ami, Alexander Rafaeli, Samuel Merlin, and Ari Jabotinsky—to organize political action and fundraising as, increasingly, news of the fate of the Jews of Europe was becoming more and more well known. Their first activity was the creation of an organization called the Committee for a Jewish Army of Stateless and Palestinian Jews, an initial attempt to organize Jews to fight the Nazis under the British. (The British were the mandated authorities in Palestine, and the United States had not yet entered the war.) In addition, Kook, now Bergson, and his colleagues staged rallies—the most famous of which was that of 400 Orthodox rabbis in Washington, D.C., on October 6, 1943, three days before the holy day of Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement)—lobbied Congress; recruited celebrities, Jewish and non-Jewish, to the cause of Jewish survival, including screenwriter and playwright Ben Hecht; and placed dramatic advertisements in major newspapers including the New York Times (e.g., “For Sale to Humanity 70,000 Rumanian Jews,” February 18, 1942; “Four Million Jews Waiting for Death,” September 14, 1943). Their constant political pressure resulted in a congressional resolution and, with the support of Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr., convinced then-President Franklin Delano Roosevelt to create the War Refugee Board in January 1944, which ultimately saved more than 200,000 Jews. One of the group’s most successful events was staged at Madison Square Garden, New York, with a script written by Hecht titled “We Will Never Die.” It has been estimated that more than 40,000 people saw this elaborate dramatic production the first night and before it went to five other cities including Washington, D.C., where it was seen by then-First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt and members of both the Congress and Supreme Court.

In 1943–1944 the Bergson Group created three additional groups: the Emergency Committee for the Rescue of European Jewry, American League for Free Palestine, and the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation, the latter two campaigning heavily for a future Jewish state. The group’s efforts, and their brashness and determination, caused a rift vis-à-vis other American Jewish organizations such as the American Jewish Committee and the American Jewish Congress (AJC), especially their president, Rabbi Stephen Wise of New York, a close friend of President Roosevelt and, perhaps, the leading spokesperson of the American Jewish community at that time, who regarded them as unrepresentative and unwanted intruders. Significantly, the AJC and several American Jewish Zionist groups also tried unsuccessfully to have Bergson either deported back to Palestine or drafted into the U.S. Army.

At war’s end, the Bergson Group disbanded. Bergson returned to Israel in 1948 (the year of the state’s founding) and served one term in the Israeli Knesset as a representative of the Herut (Freedom) Party. He resigned a year later after serious disagreements with the party’s leader, Menachem Begin, who would later serve as prime minister of Israel. In 1951 Kook and his wife, Betty, and daughter, Astra, left Israel and returned to the United States where he worked as a stockbroker in New York. He returned to Israel in 1968 with Astra and her younger sister Rebecca, after Betty’s death. He later remarried and lived outside of Tel Aviv until his death in 2001. Until he died, he continued to grant interviews, published, and spoke out, seriously critiquing successive governments for what he regarded as their failures of Zionist philosophy.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

- Baumel, Judith. The “Bergson Boys” and the Origins of Contemporary Zionist Militancy. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 2005.
- Medoff, Rafael. Militant Zionism in America: The Rise and Impact of the Jabotinsky Movement in the United States, 1926–1948. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2006.
- Rapoport, Louis. Shake Heaven & Earth: Peter Bergson and the Struggle to Rescue the Jews of Europe. Jerusalem: Gefen Publishing House, 1999.
- Wyman, David S. “The Bergson Group, America, and the Holocaust: A Previously Unpublished Interview with Hillel Kook/Peter Bergson.” American Jewish History 89, no. 1 (2001): 3–34.
- Wyman, David S., and Rafael Medoff. A Race Against Death: Peter Bergson, America, and the Holocaust. New York: New Press, 2002.

Berlin Jewish Hospital

The Berlin Jewish hospital was originally built on Oranienburger Strasse in 1756, not far from the Jewish cemetery. In 1760 a Sephardi Jew, Benjamin Lemos, became medical director; he, in turn, was succeeded by his son-in-law Marcus Herz in 1779. In 1857 the Jewish community bought new premises on August Strasse and built a new Jewish Hospital there. From its inception in 1861, it was regarded as one of the most modern hospitals in Europe with much of the most advanced equipment of that time. Finally, in 1914, a new (and final) location for the hospital was found in Berlin’s Wedding district, and the hospital moved there.

By the time the Nazis came into office in 1933, therefore, Berlin’s Jewish Hospital was already well over two centuries old. After the advent of the Nuremberg Laws on Race in 1935, however, the hospital saw major changes to the way it operated. Henceforth, the treatment of “Aryans” at the hospital was forbidden, and non-Jewish employees were forced to look elsewhere for work. It truly became a Jewish hospital in more than just name.

In the years that followed, the hospital was repeatedly threatened with closure. Looting of hospital stores was frequent, and medical supplies were increasingly difficult to obtain. In December 1941 the Nazis began pressuring hospital administrators to keep detailed lists of everyone inside the walls: medical staff, auxiliary staff, and patients. With this, they would have a ready-made pool of possible Jewish deportees should the order ever come through to close down the hospital and move the Jews out.

The medical director and chief administrator of the hospital during the Nazi period was Dr. Walter Lustig, who was obliged by the Nazis throughout the war to compile lists of patients and hospital personnel for deportation—to Theresienstadt at first, and then, ultimately, to Auschwitz. While doing so was reprehensible and a crass betrayal of those around him, by doing so he was nonetheless able to placate the Nazis (who saw him as a pliable tool bending to their will) and thereby keep the doors of the hospital open. This provided some measure of relative safety to those who had not yet been deported. By the time of the liberation, the Berlin Jewish Hospital had remained an island in which some 600 Jews had survived, deep in the Nazi capital.

Born in 1891, the son of a Jewish merchant, Lustig converted from Judaism to Christianity while young. At the outset of World War I, before he had finished his medical studies at the University of Breslau, he volunteered for the German army in the medical corps and served throughout the war.

In 1920 he became a medical officer in Koblenz. In 1927 he moved to Berlin, and by early February of that year had joined the Berlin police as an administrator. He moved through a number of offices in the police department, essentially with responsibility for health care in schools and homes—a kind of police medical welfare officer.

This lasted only until the Nazi seizure of power in 1933. The Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, passed on April 7, 1933, was intended to restructure the civil service in such a way that tenured civil servants could be dismissed if they were not of “Aryan descent.” As a World War I veteran Lustig was at first exempt from the ban, but by October 1933 he was dismissed. His exemption was rejected on the ground that he had not seen front-line service during the war but had stayed as a military doctor in Breslau. With little alternative but to work in Jewish enterprises, by 1936 he was working in the Jewish community administration in Berlin. In July 1939 he became responsible for health care within the organized community’s Department of Welfare.

On October 20, 1942, Lustig became medical director of the Jewish Hospital, which, over time, became a de facto ghetto for Berlin’s Jews. Lustig worked to keep the hospital viable and aimed to have the medical staff seen to be useful.

The Nazis had a different set of agendas, with the hospital employed for a hodgepodge of purposes during the war, some having little to do with medical treatment. In order to potentially weaken the bonds of marriage between Jewish husbands and non-Jewish wives, Jewish men were forcibly interned there. Some, thinking that the hospital could serve as a kind of Noah’s Ark, bought their way in. Jews who fell ill or were injured in police stations, prisons, or concentration camps were brought to the hospital by the Nazis, only to be murdered once their health was restored.

Through it all, however, the Nazis demanded that numbers be kept at a constant low. The hospital, which came under the direct supervision of Adolf Eichmann’s office, was watched very carefully. Indeed, Eichmann visited the hospital on many occasions and personally selected patients and staff to be deported.

These deportations were frequent, and actions to clear a certain number of Jews from the hospital were a constant reality. Realizing what the raids held in store for those being deported, the staff sometimes allowed elderly patients to die and helped younger or more robust patients, with a better chance of surviving the camps, instead. Transports, which left Berlin on a weekly basis, always had some patients from the Jewish Hospital on board. Sometimes, in order to avoid deportation, staff performed unnecessary elective surgery; pregnant women and new mothers with babies, however, were never spared. Sometimes, in order to deceive the victims, Jewish doctors and nurses were sent along with the patients. No hospital staff ever returned, their fate the same as that of the patients in their care.

On February 27, 1943, the so-called Fabrikaktion (Factory Action)—the roundup of the last Jews in Berlin still to be deported—began. In order to ensure that the entire hospital was not closed down and the whole population removed, Lustig arranged that some 300 hospital employees (with their families) be selected and sent to concentration camps. Here is possibly the clearest example of his intentionally sacrificing some in order to save a larger number of others. However, as 300 Jewish employees and their families might have totaled up to 900 or even 1,000 people, it is not necessarily clear that by sacrificing that number of Jews a greater good was served, to say nothing of whether or not the sacrifice was ethically justified. Lustig himself was exempt from deportation owing to his being in a mixed marriage; his father, however, was deported to Theresienstadt.

The Fabrikaktion was just the beginning. In June and November 1943 patients were again deported, and from early March 1944 the hospital's pathology building was used as a collection point for Jews—no longer patients—who were deported from there to Theresienstadt, then Auschwitz. All the while, Lustig was expected by the Nazis to be the person to make up the deportation lists.

When the Red Army fought its way into Berlin in 1945 it found the Jewish Hospital intact, with some 370 patients, nearly 1,000 internees, 93 children, and 76 prisoners held in police custody. It seemed impossible to believe—and, at first, the only explanation was that Lustig, in collaborating with the Nazis, was a Nazi himself.

Looked at more carefully, however, it soon became apparent that there was more here than first met the eye. Lustig was far from being a Nazi. An ambitious, assimilated Jew in Berlin's professional class, baptized and married to an Aryan, Lustig nonetheless had his medical license revoked under the Nuremberg racial laws and had few options open to him other than working within the Jewish community as permitted by the regime.

Given this, some of those around him vilified Lustig as an unscrupulous sociopath bent only on his own self-preservation. There is no doubt that by choosing some Jews for deportation he proved his (temporary) indispensability to the Nazis by doing their work for them. And herein lay a major dilemma when assessing Lustig's actions, as he found himself drawn more and more into the Nazi scheme of manipulating Jews through deception.

Walter Lustig was appointed by the Gestapo to preside over the hospital in the last years of the war. His personal characteristics made him a suitable candidate for both hero and villain. He showed his courage in standing up to the SS on a number of occasions, and he was aware of the byzantine internal dynamics of the German bureaucracy, which gave him the opportunity to exploit the system. The hospital's status as an exclusively Jewish institution thereby held fast throughout the war almost until the very end, and it was not until the last days of the war that wounded non-Jewish patients were treated at the hospital.

For his part, Lustig remained director. The Soviet occupying forces were hardly convinced that he had acted honorably, and he was last seen leaving the hospital with two Soviet officers at the end of June 1945. Opinions differ as to his fate. The most common account was that he was murdered by the Soviets. Another possibility was that he might even have staged his own disappearance. The bottom line must be that the fate of Walter Lustig remains as much a mystery as why he acted as he did during the war. On October 19, 1954, the District Court of Berlin-Wedding gave his official death date as December 31, 1945.

The story—and the enigma—of Walter Lustig still stirs heated debate today among families of those deported to the camps at his order and those who were saved in the hospital through his negotiations. It is truly a “gray area” of upstanding against (or connivance with) the Nazis, and determining how it should be assessed is likely to be one of the last areas for discussion and resolution coming out of the Holocaust.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Eichmann, Adolf; Fabrikaktion

Further Reading

Meyer, Beate, Hermann Simon, and Chana Schütz (Eds.). Jews in Nazi Berlin, from Kristallnacht to Liberation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2009.

Nachama, Andreas, Julius H. Schoeps, and Hermann Simon (Eds.). Jews in Berlin. A Comprehensive History of Jewish Life and Jewish Culture in the German Capital up to 2013. Berlin: Henschel Verlag, 2002.

Silver, Daniel B. Refuge in Hell: How Berlin's Jewish Hospital Outlasted the Nazis. New York: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 2003.

Bermuda Conference

The Bermuda Conference, held in Hamilton, Bermuda, from April 19 to April 30, 1943, was a joint Anglo-American wartime meeting convened ostensibly to discuss the plight of European Jewry. By the latter half of 1942, grisly news of the Nazis' plan to exterminate the European Jews had been made public. Although the American press tended to downplay these reports, the British press paid more attention to them. Before long, Anglican Church leaders and some political leaders in Parliament began lobbying Winston Churchill's government to do something to alleviate the mounting humanitarian catastrophe in Europe. On March 23 William Temple, the archbishop of Canterbury, gave an impassioned speech to the House of Lords imploring the British government to address the as-yet unnamed Holocaust. His remarks received wide press coverage and prompted the British Foreign Office to propose an Anglo-American conference to address the issue.

From the start, however, the Foreign Office warned others in the British government, as well as the U.S. State Department, that if a comprehensive plan to rescue European Jews did come to fruition, it might force the Germans and their satellite collaborators to abandon their policy of extermination in favor of mass deportation. That would create a flood of several million Jews into areas and nations controlled by the Allies, which would quickly overwhelm Allied logistics, destabilize governments, and possibly further imperil Jewish refugees.

The Americans took several weeks to respond to the British proposal, and the Bermuda Conference did not begin until April 19. Both the British and American governments tried to lower expectations of the meeting and opted to keep its deliberations secret. Indeed, Bermuda was chosen as the venue largely because of its isolation and the lack of a large media presence. Although a number of Jewish organizations asked to participate in the meeting, the conference was limited strictly to government officials, and no reporters were permitted to attend the sessions. To further lower expectations, the conferees referred to the Jews only as “political refugees,” a vague and general term that could be applied to a large number of people, including non-Jewish prisoners.

The general topics of what to do with Jewish refugees who had been liberated by the Allies and what to do for Jews who remained under Nazi control were discussed, but no solutions were forthcoming. Furthermore, neither the Americans nor the British offered to raise their restrictive immigration quotas, and the British made it clear that they would continue the ban on Jewish immigration to Palestine, an area they controlled as a League of Nations Mandate. The conferees did not even discuss sending food and other supplies to Jews interned in concentration camps. In the end, the only substantive agreements to emerge from the talks were policies dealing with prisoners of war, and the establishment of a small Jewish refugee camp to be located in northern Africa.

The Bermuda Conference was a major disappointment to British and American Jews and those who sought to aid Jews under the Nazi yoke. The conferees even failed to mention or acknowledge the start of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, which had commenced the same day the talks began, on April 19. A week after the conference ended, a U.S. Jewish-Zionist organization placed an advertisement in the New York Times sharply critical of the Bermuda Conference, claiming that the American government had broken promises made to the Jewish people and had all but ignored the suffering of European Jews.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; United States Response to the Holocaust

Further Reading

Penkower, Monty Noam. The Jews Were Expendable: Free World Diplomacy and the Holocaust. Champaign (IL): University of Illinois Press, 1983.

Wyman, David S. The Abandonment of the Jews: America and the Holocaust, 1941–1945. New York: Pantheon, 1984.

Best, Werner

Dr. Karl Rudolf Werner Best was a German Nazi, jurist, police chief, SS-Obergruppenführer, and Nazi Party leader from Darmstadt, Hesse. As a leading constitutional theoretician and Nazi jurist in the Third Reich, Best gave respectability and legitimacy to the political police and the concentration camps. He considered that as long as the Gestapo was carrying out the will of the Führer, it was acting legally.

Best was born on July 10, 1903, in Darmstadt. In 1912 his parents moved to Dortmund and then to Mainz, where he completed his education. His father, a senior postmaster, was killed during the first few days of World War I. After the war Best founded the first local group of the German National Youth League and became active in the Mainz group of the German National People's Party. In his involvement with the German youth movement Best was inspired by its return to nature, its Germanic legends, and its völkisch worldview.

From 1921 to 1925 he studied law at Frankfurt am Main, Freiburg, Giessen, and Heidelberg, where he received his doctorate in 1927. In 1929 he was appointed a judge in Hesse but was forced to resign when the so-called “Boxheim” documents were found in his possession. The documents, bearing Best's signature, set out a blueprint for a Nazi putsch and the subsequent execution of political opponents. The disclosure of the Boxheim documents embarrassed Adolf Hitler at a time when he was seeking power by legal means. Despite this, Best was made police commissioner in Hessen in March 1933, and by July 1933 he was appointed governor.

Over the next six years Best advanced rapidly, becoming chief legal adviser to the Gestapo and chief of the Bureau of the Secret State Police at the Reich Ministry of the Interior. Best helped the Gestapo destroy much of the old Weimar legal system and showed the Gestapo how to use orders for preventive detention without judicial checks.

In 1934 Hitler decided that Ernst Röhm had to be eliminated as an independent political force. On June 30, 1934, the SS and Gestapo acted in coordinated mass arrests against Röhm and the Sturmabteilung (SA) in a purge that became known as the Night of the Long Knives. Best was sent to Munich to arrest SA members in the southern part of Germany, during which up to 200 people were killed.

By 1935 Best was the closest collaborator of Reinhard Heydrich in building up the Gestapo and the Security Services (SD). Then, in April 1936, he assumed a leading role in ideological training for the Gestapo. Using biological metaphors, he described the role of the Gestapo and the political police as being to fight “disease” in the national body; among the implied sicknesses were communists, Freemasons, and the churches—and above and behind all these stood the Jews.

On September 27, 1939, the security agencies of the Reich were folded into the new Reich Main Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, or RSHA), which was placed under Heydrich’s control. Best was made head of Department I: Administration and Legal, with legal and personnel issues relating to the SS and security police. Heydrich and Heinrich Himmler relied on Best to develop and explain legally the activities against enemies of the state and in relation to the Nazi Jewish policy. In this capacity he was charged after the war with complicity in the murder of thousands of Jews and Polish intellectuals.

As a Himmler favorite, Best was being groomed for the very top of the SS, but an internal power struggle saw him dismissed by Reinhard Heydrich in 1939. He left the RSHA on June 12, 1940. He then served for two years as civil administrator in occupied France, involved in fighting the French Resistance and in the deportation of Jews, during which he was nicknamed “The Butcher of Paris.”

In November 1942 Best was appointed the Third Reich’s supreme power in Denmark. In this role he supervised civilian affairs. He kept this position until the end of the war in May 1945, even after the German military had assumed direct control over the administration of the country on August 29, 1943.

With an increase in sabotage attacks in 1943, Best was instructed by Berlin to deliver a statement to the Danish resistance by making Denmark completely reduce the country’s Jewish population. With limited German troops at his disposal, and fearing a civil uprising if he deported 8,000 Danish Jews to certain death, he went about fulfilling Hitler’s order to the letter, although not in the spirit the Führer intended.

Best’s urgent and repeated requests for additional SS battalions were not met. During the time in question, from September through early October 1943, all available SS troops had been deployed by Heinrich Himmler to Italy (where they were needed to shore up Mussolini’s puppet regime) and thus could not be spared for Denmark.

Best knew that unless he could mount a swift roundup with surgical precision, requiring ruthless and massive SS involvement, his future career would be in jeopardy. He therefore sent his naval attaché, Georg Duckwitz, to Sweden to arrange safe passage and accommodation for Denmark’s Jews, and then himself walked into a Jewish tailor’s shop in Copenhagen and warned the tailor and his family that a roundup of the Jews was imminent, telling them to flee. The word was then spread quickly through the Jewish community.

Almost all Danish Jews survived the “Final Solution” by escaping to Sweden, ferried over at night on the boats of their non-Jewish Danish neighbors. Only 477 out of more than 7,000 Danish Jews were finally rounded up by German troops, who were forbidden by Best to break into Jewish apartments. Half-Jews were let go, and patrols were not especially vigilant.

Arguably Best undermined the “Final Solution” outcome not out of an altruistic desire to save human life, but out of a pragmatic need to maintain a stable status quo in occupied Denmark and preserve the Reich’s influence. His success depended on the willingness of the Danish people to save their Jewish neighbors—to refuse to see them as anything but fellow Danes. That, in the end, is perhaps the true miracle of the Danish rescue.

To avoid deportation of Danes to German concentration camps, the permanent secretary of the ministry of foreign affairs, Nils Svenningsen, in January 1944 proposed establishment of an internment camp within Denmark. Best accepted this proposal, but on condition that the camp should be built close to the German border. Frøslev prison camp was opened in August 1944. In deliberations on May 3, 1945, when preparing for the impending German defeat, Best fought to avoid implementation of a scorched earth policy in Denmark.

After the war, Best testified as a witness at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg and was later extradited to Denmark. In 1948 he was sentenced to death by a Danish court, but his sentence was reduced to five years in prison (of which four years had already been served). This created outrage among the Danish public, and the Supreme Court changed the sentence to 12 years. Best was granted a clemency release in August 1951.

He then returned to West Germany, working for a time in a solicitor’s office and then as a lawyer for Stinnes & Co., one of the largest German trading concerns. In 1958 he was fined 70,000 marks by a German denazification court for his past actions as a leading SS officer, and in March 1969 he was held in detention for new investigation concerning responsibility for mass murder. He was released in August 1969 on medical grounds, though the accusations were not withdrawn.

In 1972 he was charged again when further war crimes allegations arose, but he was found medically unfit to stand trial and was released. After that, he became part of a network that helped former Nazis. He died on June 23, 1989, in Mülheim.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Christian X, King of Denmark; Denmark; Duckwitz, Georg; Gestapo

Further Reading

Gellately, Robert. The Gestapo and German Society: Enforcing Racial Policy, 1933–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Lampe, David. Hitler's Savage Canary: A History of the Danish Resistance in World War II. Barnsley (UK): Pen and Sword, 2014.

Lidegaard, Bo. Countrymen: The Untold Story of How Denmark's Jews Escaped the Nazis, of the Courage of Their Fellow Danes, and of the Extraordinary Role of the SS. New York: Knopf, 2013.

Wildt, Michael. An Uncompromising Generation: The Nazi Leadership of the Reich Security Main Office. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2009.

Bettelheim, Bruno

Bruno Bettelheim was a professor of psychoanalysis who was incarcerated in Nazi concentration camps during 1938 and 1939. Prior to the Nazi invasion of Poland in September 1939 he managed to leave the Third Reich and migrate to the United States, where he became best known for his educational methods in addressing the needs of emotionally disturbed children. In another context, he also became an authority on prisoner behavior in Nazi concentration camps; in this regard the principal theory he advanced and developed over four decades was pioneering, though in later years it was challenged owing to its oversimplification of highly complex issues.

Bettelheim was born in Vienna, Austria, on August 28, 1903. He pursued a degree in psychology at the University of Vienna, which awarded him a PhD in 1938. With the Austrian Anschluss in March 1938, Bettelheim, as a Jew, became subject to Nazi antisemitic policies, and in May of that year he was arrested. First incarcerated in Dachau in September 1938, he was transferred to Buchenwald but through good fortune and friends on the outside managed to be released in April 1939.

Bettelheim arrived in the United States on May 11, 1939, where he began a new life during which he became one of the world's leading psychotherapists. In October 1943 he published his first study of prisoner behavior in the Nazi concentration camps, based largely on his own experiences in Dachau and Buchenwald. Arguing that the Nazis had instituted a highly complex camp regime designed to break the prisoners' will to resist the Nazis' directives, Bettelheim noted that the major effect of this was to produce changes in the prisoners' own psychological perceptions of themselves, such that the longer they remained incarcerated the more they came to identify with the goals of their persecutors, along the way regressing to a state of childlike helplessness and dependence. It was a highly controversial position, which he would be required to defend increasingly throughout succeeding decades. But as the first major attempt to analyze and explain the behavior of individuals living under the stresses imposed by life in the Nazi concentration camps, Bettelheim's work was influential on a generation of younger scholars. Other Bettelheim theories were less so, such as his views on Jews who went passively to their deaths in the concentration camps, in ghettos, or at the hands of the Einsatzgruppen in which he argued that the Jews were suicidal, or his suggestion that Anne Frank's family cooperated with the Nazi war machine by not resisting it.

Never one to shy away from a fight, Bettelheim took on his critics vigorously, especially (though not exclusively) Colgate University English professor Terrence Des Pres, primarily over the nature of survivorship. Despite his success, influence, and authority, throughout his life Bettelheim fell into deep depressions; during one such bout, on March 13, 1990, he committed suicide.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Buchenwald; Dachau

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Bettelheim, Bruno. The Informed Heart: Autonomy in a Mass Age. Glencoe (IL): Free Press, 1960.

Des Pres, Terrence. The Survivor: An Anatomy of Life in the Death Camps. New York: Oxford University Press.

Białystok Ghetto

Located in northeastern Poland, the city of Białystok, with a Jewish population prior to 1939 of approximately 50,000 Jews, was the site of a ghetto established in mid-1941 and liquidated in late 1943. It is estimated that fewer than 1,000 Jews survived of the 60,000 Jews in the ghetto at the peak of its density. It was also here, in August 1943, that the second largest ghetto uprising took place, behind only that in the Warsaw Ghetto.

On September 15, 1939, just two weeks after Germany invaded Poland, Białystok was occupied by the German Army. One week later, on September 22, the Soviets took control as agreed to in the nonaggression pact signed by Germany and Russia just prior to the start of World War II. Soviet control ended about two years later—in June 1941—when Germany took all of Poland as part of its ill-fated assault on Russia code named Operation Barbarossa.

June 27, 1941, shortly after Germany's reoccupation of the city, is referred to as "Red Friday" in the history of Białystok. On that day troops from Einsatzgruppen B murdered 2,000 Jews, beginning an onslaught of murder that resulted in another 4,000 Jews killed in the next two weeks. Shortly thereafter, on August 1, 1941, some 50,000 Jews were confined in the Białystok ghetto, established in the center of the city, divided into two sections by the Biała River.

Much like the Łódź ghetto, the Białystok ghetto hoped to fend off liquidation by becoming a source of industrial value to the Nazis, with thousands of Jews working in the many textile and weapons factories established there. The ghetto was required by the Nazis to establish a Judenrat, a Jewish leadership council to administer the ghetto and facilitate Nazi orders. Efraim Barasz was appointed its chairman.

As conditions in the ghetto worsened, a resistance movement grew, one that found itself more unified as it appeared that liquidation of the ghetto was imminent. It was not long after the slaughter of 2,000 Jews in February 1943 and the deportation of 10,000 Jews to Treblinka that the Nazis ordered the liquidation of the ghetto. At that time, there were less than 30,000 Jews still in the ghetto. When, on August 15, 1943, the ghetto was surrounded by German SS, supplemented by Ukrainian, Estonian, and other Eastern European auxiliary forces, and all Jews were ordered to report on the next day for evacuation, the revolt began. For the next five days the poorly armed and undermanned Jews fought the Nazis and stalled the onset of the liquidation transports. On August 20 the inevitable happened, and with the death of the last of the Jewish resisters, the Białystok ghetto uprising came to an end.

For three days, the deportations robbed the ghetto of virtually its entire population, with most of the Jews deported to several camps, including Treblinka and Auschwitz. Some 1,200 children were deported to Theresienstadt and then to Auschwitz, their final destination.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Ghettos; Globocnik, Odilo; Jewish Resistance; Operation Harvest Festival

Further Reading

Bender, Sara. The Jews of Białystok during World War II and the Holocaust. Boston: Brandeis University Press, 2008.

Kobrin, Rebecca. Jewish Białystok and Its Diaspora. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2010.

Biebow, Hans

Hans Biebow, the Nazi chief administrator of the Łódź ghetto in Poland, reflected in his actions the extraordinary cupidity and ruthlessness of the Nazi regime. While he personally profited from the labor of the Jews that he oversaw in the ghetto, the Jewish population declined due to death or deportation to extermination camps from more than 200,000 to less than 1,000.

Biebow was born in 1902 in Bremen, Germany. He initially sought to join his father in his insurance business, but when that did not work out, and after several years of moving through various jobs in the food industry, he began a small business in the coffee trade that over the years proved to be very successful. He was educated—he completed secondary school—was brought up with little or no want, and was a successful businessman, so there was little reason in those early years to think that he would develop into the malevolent ghetto administrator that he became.

When the Łódź ghetto was established in April 1940, Biebow was put in charge of the food stock and its distribution and was soon made the chief of the ghetto government (Ghettoverwaltung). It was in the exercise of his authority in this capacity that Biebow's commitment to greed, and his willingness to transport tens of thousands of Jews from Łódź to Nazi extermination camps, became clear.

Biebow, perhaps because of his successful business career, saw the ghetto as an opportunity to create and profit from the establishment of more than 100 factories and workshops manned by Jewish slave labor for the purpose of producing goods for the German war effort. Establishing and leading a German staff in the ghetto of some 250 people, Biebow's transformation of the ghetto into something more akin to a slave labor camp managed to forestall the liquidation of the ghetto until the summer of 1944.

Biebow was not alone in his conviction that producing goods needed by the German army was the best way for the ghetto to avoid liquidation. Mordecai Chaim Rumkowski, the head of the Łódź ghetto Judenrat (Jewish Council), was also convinced that producing needed goods was the only way for the Jews entrapped in the ghetto to survive. Thus, Biebow and Rumkowski had similar goals of a high level of productivity from the ghetto and seemed to have a good working relationship as a result, even though Biebow's policy of food distribution was the direct cause of widespread starvation in the ghetto. Their strategy was successful in that Łódź was the last ghetto in Poland to be liquidated.

Biebow's significant wealth derived from his unfettered exploitation of slave labor and expropriation of Jewish valuables and property, but his enthusiasm was not limited to self-aggrandizement; he brought that same enthusiasm to his task of arranging and transporting thousands of Jews from the ghetto to the Chełmno and Auschwitz extermination camps even as he was trying to keep ghetto production going as long as possible. It was with ruthless efficiency that Biebow saw that his orders to transport Jews to their death were carried out without delay or the interference of moral concerns. He also organized the collection of personal possessions and clothing of Jewish victims at Chełmno to be warehoused and eventually sent to Germany.

Biebow's cruelty was also seen in the ghetto's conditions. Tens of thousands of Jews died of some combination of mass starvation, overcrowding, exposure to the elements, arbitrary shootings and beatings, and disease that was the inevitable result of horrid sanitary conditions.

When it became clear that Germany was going to lose the war, Hitler made a last-ditch effort by calling up any German men capable of fighting. This increased the need for trained workers, even if Jewish, and so the factories in the Łódź ghetto continued turning out needed goods and equipment. Deportations continued, and the ghetto was completely liquidated by August 1944.

As the war was ending, Biebow went into hiding, only to be recognized by a ghetto survivor and arrested. At his trial in April 1947 he, like most Nazi war criminals, claimed that all he did was follow orders. However, after a seven-day trial from April 23 to April 30, 1947, he was found guilty, convicted, and sentenced to death. He was executed by hanging, in Łódź, on June 23, 1947.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Chełmno; Łódź Ghetto

Further Reading

Adelson, Alan, and Robert Lapides (Eds.). Lodz Ghetto: Inside a Community under Siege. New York: Viking, 1989.

Dobroszycki, Lucjan (Ed.). The Chronicle of the Łódź Ghetto, 1941–1944. New York: Vail-Ballou Press, 1984.

Bielecki, Jerzy

Jerzy Bielecki was a Polish social worker best remembered as a prisoner who escaped from Auschwitz in 1944 with his German Jewish girlfriend, Cyla Cybulska. Born on March 28, 1921, in the town of Słaboszowie, near Kielce, he was finishing school in Kraków just at the time war broke out in September 1939. With the rapid Polish defeat, he decided to join the Polish army then being reestablished in France. While crossing into Hungary on May 7, 1940, with five friends, however, he was arrested by the Gestapo. At first he was incarcerated in prisons in Nowy Sacz and Tarnow, but on June 14, 1940, he was sent in the first transport of 728 Polish political prisoners to the newly created concentration camp at Auschwitz, registered as prisoner number 243. For the next 18 months he worked on ausse narbeit (work outside the camp), in particular at a mill in Babice, where his excellent German language skills enabled him to move freely among the other workers. It was under these circumstances that he came into contact with members of the Polish resistance.

In the fall of 1943, while working at a grain warehouse, he met a Jewish prisoner named Cyla Cybulska. She came from Łomża, a town about 50 miles from Białystok, and had been a prisoner at Auschwitz since January 19, 1943. Her family had been murdered upon arrival. Despite the strict separation of the sexes in Auschwitz, the two fell in love and began to meet in secret. Bielecki promised her that he would find a way to survive Auschwitz by escaping.

On July 21, 1944, wearing a stolen SS uniform, he masqueraded as a guard and “ordered” Cyla to come with him. Armed with forged documents “authorizing” him to take the prisoner away, he marched her out of the camp through the front gate. The daring escape went undetected, and they managed to get away.

They then walked, mostly by night, for the next ten days. Exhausted, they reached the village of Przemęczany, where Cyla was hidden in the home of Bielecki's uncle. After a short while, she was placed with the Czernik family, friends of Bielecki's living in the village of Gruszów. She remained here until the end of the war. Bielecki joined the Armia Krajowa (Home Army) and fought as a partisan. They promised each other that they would meet again after the war, but sadly their separation became permanent. Cyla was told that Jerzy (known by the familiar Jurek) had been killed in guerrilla fighting, while he heard that Cyla had gone to Sweden and died there.

After the war Cyla moved to the United States, settling in New York. In May 1983 she learned from a Polish woman who cleaned her family's apartment that Jurek was alive, having seen a television documentary in which he had told his story. Cyla followed this up and obtained Jurek's phone number in Poland. They spoke, and on June 8, 1983, she traveled to meet him. He greeted her with a bouquet of 39 roses, one for each year of their separation.

In the meantime, since the end of the war, Bielecki had co-founded and become honorary president of the Christian Association of Auschwitz Families, an organization bringing together former prisoners, their families, and those interested in the history of Auschwitz. In 1985, for his work in helping Jews during the Nazi occupation, he was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations and accorded a further tribute by being awarded Honorary Citizenship of the State of Israel. In 2006 he was one of 32 former prisoners who met with Pope Benedict XVI at the so-called Black Wall in the courtyard of Block 11 at Auschwitz.

Jerzy Bielecki's escape from Auschwitz with Cyla Cybulska has been the subject of a number of documentaries and books, including Bielecki's own autobiography, Kto ratuje jedno życie . . . (He who saves one life . . .), published in 1990. In 2011 the story of Jurek and Cyla was made into a feature-length movie in Germany, Die verlorene Zeit (The Lost Time), directed by Anna Justice and starring Alice Dwyer and Mateusz Damięcki. The movie was released in English as Remembrance. Jerzy Bielecki died in Nowy Targ on October 20, 2011, at the age of 90.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Yad Vashem. "The Stories of Six Righteous Among the Nations in Auschwitz: Flickers of Light." At <http://www.yadvashem.org/yv/en/exhibitions/righteous-auschwitz/bielecki.asp>.

Bielski Partisans

Jewish partisans fighting the Nazis in the forests of Belarus, Ukraine, and Poland (among other places) faced considerable obstacles to both survival and success. One celebrated case among many is that of Tuvia Bielski and his brothers Asael, Alexander (known as Zus), and Aron.

The children of David and Beila Bielski from a family of twelve (ten boys and two girls), this was the only Jewish family in Stankiewiczze, a small village then situated in eastern Poland, between the towns of Lida and Navahrudak. Born in 1906, Tuvia Bielski could speak Polish, Yiddish, and German. Recruited into the Polish army in 1927, after demobilization he married and became a store owner in the small town of Subotniki, which was occupied by the Soviets in September 1939. Here, after the Nazis invaded in June 1941, Tuvia, Zus, and Asael were called up for home defense against the invaders. In early July 1941 the Nazis moved Jews from across the region into a ghetto in Nowogródek, but the Bielski brothers hid instead; after they learned that the rest of the family had been killed in the ghetto in late 1941, they fled into the forest.

Together with 13 neighbors who had also survived the initial Nazi assault, they established the nucleus of a partisan combat group in the spring of 1942. Originally this consisted of some 40 people, but it grew quickly once word got around that the group refused to turn away Jews.

In the forest, however, there was a great deal of uncertainty. Should they fight back through joining a partisan unit, or create one of their own? And what form would such fighting take? Further, what would be the objectives of such a unit? Eventually the Bielskis established a community of fighters, which also cared for nonmilitary combatants, women and children, those too young, too old, or too sick to fight.

As commander of what became known as the "Bielski otriad" (partisan detachment), Tuvia's priority was to save Jews rather than kill Germans, and in pursuit of this he sent emissaries to infiltrate ghettos in the area and recruit new members to join the group in the Naliboki Forest. Hundreds of men, women, and children, individually or in small groups, eventually found their way to the Bielski camp. At its peak 1,236 people belonged to the otriad, with up to 70% of its membership consisting of women, children, and the elderly. Fewer than 200 actually engaged in armed operations.

The partisan community was housed in underground dugouts (zemlyankas) or bunkers. In addition, several utility structures were built: a kitchen, a mill, a bakery, a bathhouse,

The Bielski partisans were a Jewish partisan group operating in the vicinity of Nowogrodek and Lida in German-occupied Poland and Belarus. They are named after the four Bielski brothers, who led the group. Under their protection, 1,236 Jews survived the war. This image is a group portrait of former Bielski partisans taken in the Föhrenwald displaced persons camp on April 3, 1948. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Jack Kagan) a medical clinic for the sick and wounded, and a quarantine hut for those who suffered from infectious diseases such as typhus. A small herd of cows supplied milk. Artisans made goods and carried out repairs, providing the combatants with logistical support that later served Soviet partisan units in the vicinity as well. More than 125 workers toiled in the workshops, which became famous among partisans far beyond the Bielski base: tailors patched up old clothing and stitched together new garments; shoemakers attended to footwear; and leather workers labored on belts, bridles, and saddles. A metalworking shop repaired damaged weapons and constructed new ones from spare parts. A tannery, constructed to produce the hide for cobblers and leather workers, became a makeshift synagogue owing to the fact that several of the tanners were observant Jews. Carpenters, hat-makers, barbers, and watchmakers served the community, nicknamed “Bielsk” in honor of the leadership. The camp’s many children attended class in a zemlyanka set up as a school. The camp even had its own jail and rudimentary court of law.

The Bielski group’s partisan activities were aimed at the Nazis and their collaborators, such as Belorussian volunteer policemen or local inhabitants who had betrayed or killed Jews. They also conducted sabotage missions.

In 1943 the Nazis led major clearing operations against all partisan groups in the area, and some suffered major casualties. The Bielski partisans, however, fled safely to a more remote and impenetrable part of the forest and continued to offer protection to noncombatants. They raided nearby villages to seize food (much like most other partisan groups), and on occasion locals who refused to share were subjected to violence, generating hostility toward the partisans from peasants in the villages.

The Bielski partisans eventually became affiliated with Soviet organizations in the Naliboki Forest. Several attempts by Soviet partisan commanders to absorb Bielski fighters into their own units were resisted, and under Tuvia's command the Bielski otriad retained its separate identity. This allowed him to continue protecting Jewish lives as well as engaging in combat. According to partisan documentation, Bielski fighters overall killed a total of 381 enemy troops, sometimes during joint actions with Soviet groups. Only 50 members who sought protection with the Bielski otriad did not survive.

Immediately after the war, Tuvia Bielski returned to Poland; later he moved to Palestine, which became the State of Israel in 1948. Eventually, he and Zus settled with their families in New York, where they built and maintained a successful trucking business over the next 30 years. In 2008 a major motion picture focusing on the Bielskis, Defiance (dir. Edward Zwick), was released to critical acclaim around the world. It starred Daniel Craig as Tuvia, Liev Schreiber as Zus, Jamie Bell as Asael, and George MacKay as Aron.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Partisans; Rufeisen, Oswald

Further Reading

Duffy, Peter. Bielski Brothers: The True Story of Three Men Who Defied the Nazis, Saved 1,200 Jews, and Built a Village in the Forest. New York: HarperCollins, 2003.

Tec, Nechama. Defiance: The Bielski Partisans. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Bilecki, Julian

Julian Bilecki is a Pole who, along with his family, shielded 23 Jews on a farm near Podhajce (Eastern Galicia, Poland) during the Holocaust in 1943 and 1944.

He was born on the outskirts of Podhajce in 1928 to a poor farming family. Prior to World War II, Podhajce had been home to some 3,000 Jews, a number of whom the Bileckis had befriended. By the spring of 1943, however, the Nazis had either killed or deported the vast majority of the Jewish population in the area. In June 1943 several of the Bilecki family's Jewish friends arrived at their farm, along with a number of others the Bileckis had not known. Fearing for their lives, they asked the Bileckis for help. Without hesitation, the family took them in and vowed to keep them hidden from the Germans.

The logistics of hiding, feeding, and clothing 23 people were daunting, but a plan was quickly hatched. Julian Bilecki, just 15 years old at the time, helped prepare a hidden bunker in some nearby woods. Fearing that they would be caught harboring Jews, the Bileckis painstakingly rationed what little food they had so that they could feed themselves as well as their charges without raising suspicions. When the bunker was nearly discovered by a passerby, Julian Bilecki helped construct another one, this time completely underground, and very near to the Bilecki farmhouse. In the winter, to avoid leaving telltale tracks in the snow, Julian would jump from tree to tree while delivering food and other supplies to the Jews hidden in the bunker.

Several times a week, the Bileckis would gather after dark and sing hymns, read from the Bible, and pray for their Jewish friends; they would also relay to them any local news or developments about the war. Julian Bilecki was involved in every aspect of the subterfuge, which went on for nearly a year. Finally, in March 1944, Soviet troops moved into the area and liberated it; the 23 Jews who had lived in a bunker underground for more than 10 months were freed. The survivors stated categorically that if not for the Bileckis, they would have surely died at the hands of the Nazis.

After the war, the area in which Julian Bilecki had been reared became part of Ukraine, which in turn was under Soviet domination until the early 1990s. Julian became a bus driver, earning a meager living. At the time of his retirement in 1992, he, along with six other Ukrainians, were declared Righteous among the Nations by Israel's Holocaust remembrance authority, Yad Vashem. In 1998 the Jewish Foundation for the Righteous sponsored a reunion, bringing Bilecki to New York to meet with several of the Jews he had helped more than a half century before. The trip, which was the first time Bilecki had ventured out of his country, was widely covered by the American press. Meanwhile, Roman Bilecki, Julian's brother who had migrated to New York after the war, was also honored for his efforts during World War II.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Tec, Nechama. When Light Pierced the Darkness: Christian Rescue of Jews in Nazi-Occupied Poland. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Bingham, Harry

Harry Bingham IV was a U.S. diplomat who helped rescue as many as 2,500 Jews from deportation and possible death in France during World War II.

Hiram Bingham, who went by “Harry,” was born into a wealthy and prominent family on July 17, 1903, in Cambridge, Massachusetts. His father, Hiram Bingham III, had served as governor of Connecticut and as a U.S. senator; his mother was the heiress of Tiffany and Company. Harry Bingham graduated from Yale University in 1925 and then traveled widely. He also taught school and was a civilian secretary in the U.S. consulate in Kobe, Japan. Upon his return to the United States, he earned a law degree from Harvard Law School and then pursued a career in diplomacy.

Upon entering the U.S. Foreign Service, Bingham was first posted to the U.S. embassy in Beijing, China, where he cultivated a lifelong interest in Eastern philosophy and religion. He later served in embassies in Warsaw and London, where he was third secretary beginning in 1934. In 1939, the year World War II began in Europe, Bingham was sent to the U.S. consulate at Marseille, France, to serve as vice consul.

On May 10, 1940, German forces invaded France, resulting in a French defeat in the space of six weeks. France negotiated an armistice agreement with Germany, and the country was divided by the collaborationist Vichy government and German occupation authorities. Many French Jews, as well as several thousand Jewish refugees from other countries, were now herded into squalid internment camps. Their ultimate fate was deportation to forced labor or concentration camps in Eastern Europe. Within weeks of the French defeat, several thousand French and foreign Jews clamored into Marseille to seek travel visas to the United States or other nonbelligerent countries.

In the summer and fall of 1940, the U.S. government, which was not yet involved in the war, instructed its diplomats not to actively aid refugees. The reasoning for this was that the Americans hoped to continue their neutrality and maintain diplomatic relations with Vichy officials. Bingham, however, was deeply moved by the plight of the Jews in France and paid no heed to his orders. He personally visited some of the refugee camps, where hunger and disease were rampant and the general living conditions appalling. What he saw shocked him, and he successfully lobbied American relief organizations to rush food and other aid to the Jewish internees.

Bingham’s greatest contribution to the plight of the Jews in France was his eagerness to help them obtain passports and visas so that they could seek asylum in other nations, including the United States. Many of these documents were provided to “stateless” Jews, foreign nationals who had fled to France before the government fell in June 1940. It is estimated that Bingham personally guaranteed safe passage to as many as 2,500 Jews. Most had no money and only the clothes on their backs. Some, however, were famous—or would become famous—people, including the political philosopher Hannah Arendt, and the artists Max Ernst and Marc Chagall. Bingham went so far as to hide the novelist Leon Feuchtwanger in his home until he could secure passage for him to Spain. Bingham also worked closely with the American journalist Varian Fry, a renowned rescue worker in France.

In 1941, probably because it did not approve of his activities, the U.S. State Department reassigned Bingham to Portugal. He was later posted to Argentina, where he aided in the tracking of Nazi war criminals. He retired in 1945 after failing to receive a promotion. Thereafter, he dabbled in several business ventures and took up painting and playing the cello. He now spoke little about his role in the Holocaust, and it was not until after his death on January 12, 1988, in Salem, Connecticut, that his activities came to full light. In the early 1990s, his children found documents that Bingham had hidden in his home detailing what he had done during the period 1940–1941.

In 2005 Yad Vashem, Israel’s Holocaust remembrance authority, sent Bingham’s heirs a letter of appreciation. The following year, the Anti-Defamation League bestowed its Courage to Care award on Bingham, and the U.S. Episcopal Church declared him an American saint. In 2011 the Simon Wiesenthal Center remembered Bingham with its Medal of Valor Award.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Arendt, Hannah; France; Rescuers of Jews; Yad Vashem

Further Reading

Bingham, Robert Kim. Courageous Dissent: How Harry Bingham Defied His Government to Save Lives. Cincinnati: Triune Books, 2012.

Birkenau

One of three Nazi extermination camps in southern Poland, situated some 37 miles west of Kraków. There were three separate concentration camps at the site—Auschwitz I, Birkenau (Auschwitz II), and Monowitz (Auschwitz III). The largest of the three, Birkenau was built to alleviate overcrowding at Auschwitz I; construction commenced in October 1941. Birkenau’s “provisional” gas chamber, in which prisoners were herded and killed, was operational by early 1942. It was known as the “little red house” because the

The concentration and death camp complex at Auschwitz-Birkenau was the largest killing center in the entire Nazi universe; the very heart of their system. Birkenau, or Auschwitz II, was by far the largest of the many subcamps affiliated with Auschwitz. Most of the mass extermination apparatus was located in Birkenau, and the majority of the Holocaust's Jewish victims were murdered there. This picture shows child survivors after Birkenau's liberation in 1945. (Votava/Imagno/Getty Images)

Germans had converted a small brick house into a makeshift gas chamber. A second, larger gas chamber was constructed and became operational by June 1943; it remained Birkenau's primary killing facility and was nicknamed the "little white house" because it was a converted brick house painted white. Prisoners were killed with a gas derived from prussic acid, known by its brand name Zyklon-B. It was far faster and more efficient than carbon monoxide, which had initially been used to murder detainees in Nazi death camps. It is believed that as many as 1 million people were exterminated at Birkenau between 1942 and late 1944, when the Germans suspended operations there.

The process of mass killing at Birkenau was virtually identical to that in other extermination facilities. Prisoners typically arrived by rail—in overcrowded boxcars—and were separated by gender upon arrival. They were then ordered to surrender all personal possessions, disrobe, and move toward "communal showers," a cruel euphemism for the gas chamber. After the detainees were killed by the poison gas, prison workers emptied the chamber of bodies and deposited them in large crematoria. By June 1943 Birkenau had four large crematoria, which operated almost around the clock. The vast majority of prisoners were Jews from Central and Eastern Europe, although there were also a large number of Roma as well.

Like most of the Nazi death camps, Birkenau was staffed by SS officials along with locally recruited police forces. Prisoners also helped run the facility. Prisoner functionaries known as kapos helped maintain order and discipline in the barracks, while crematoria personnel Sonderkommandos were drafted to process newly arrived prisoners and readied them for the gas chambers. They also gathered detainees' personal possessions, removed any gold that murdered victims might have had in their teeth, and moved the corpses into the crematoria. Including prisoners, Birkenau may have had as many as 2,000–3,000 slave workers. For security reasons, to ensure the truth about Birkenau would not be disclosed to the outside world, these prisoners were also killed on a regular basis, to be replaced by newly arrived Jewish slave laborers.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Auschwitz; The Auschwitz Album; Auschwitz Protocols; Death Camps; Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial; Gas Chambers; Greece; Hautval, Adelaide; Hoess, Rudolf; J.A. Topf and Sons; Łódź Ghetto; Monowitz; Pivnik, Sam; Robotka, Roza; Salonika; Shoah; Sonderkommando; Stein, Edith; Süskind, Walter; Vel' d'Hiv Roundup; Zimetbaum, Mala

Further Reading

Dwork, Deborah, and Robert Jan van Pelt. Auschwitz: 1270 to the Present. New York: Norton, 1996.

Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Levi, Primo. Survival in Auschwitz: The Nazi Assault on Humanity. Austin, TX: Touchstone, 1995.

Bloch, Marc

Marc Leopold Benjamin Bloch was born in 1886 in Lyon in a secularized Jewish family. When he was two years old, his father, Gustave, was appointed as maître de conférences of Ancient History at the Ecole Normale Supérieure. He remained there until 1904 when he received a professorship at the Sorbonne.

Bloch was raised in a highly intellectual milieu. He was a brilliant student at the Louis le Grand high school before joining the Ecole Normale Supérieure. Thanks to a scholarship, he spent a year studying in Germany before joining the Fondation Thiers. He prepared his thesis on rural population under serfdom in the area of Île-de-France. At the end of 1913 he began teaching history at a high school in Montpellier.

In August 1914 he was mobilized a sergeant in the 272nd infantry, eventually becoming a captain at the head of his regiment, the 72nd RI. He was first sent to the Meuse on the Franco-Belgian border but saw action in some of the major battles of the war: the Marne, the Somme, the Chemin des Dames attack, and the Champagne. He wrote of this wartime period in Souvenirs de guerre (1914–1915). He was in Lorraine when the Armistice was declared, and in May 1919 he was demobilized.

He was then appointed at the newly opened University of Strasbourg. It was here that he met another historian, Lucien Febvre: they were closely linked with a deep friendship and trust that never waned despite their differences during World War II. Strasbourg was as well the cradle of a historical journal, the Annales, which launched a new trend in the way human sciences were perceived. Focusing on interdisciplinary concerns, it has continued to attract the attention of scholars the world over.

In 1936 Bloch occupied the only chair in economic history existing at that time in France. In addition to his teaching at the Sorbonne, he also lectured at the Ecole Normale Supérieure. He was then at the pinnacle of his career, but this would only last three years. Mobilized on August 23, 1939, Bloch began his duty as a recruiting officer in Strasbourg. During the winter of 1939 he was transferred to the Major Command of the French First Army stationed in Bohain (Picardy). Caught up in the Débâcle (the fall of France in mid-1940), he was later evacuated via Dunkirk. He traveled by train through south England until he could embark for passage to Cherbourg a few days later. He was surprised by the arrival of the Germans in Rennes and had to flee with a civilian disguise. After the Armistice, he managed to slip through the line of demarcation and joined his family in Creuse in central France. On July 11, 1940, he was released from military duty. On October 23, 1940, he was compulsorily transferred to the University of Strasbourg to teach at the Faculté de Lettres, relocated since the beginning of the war in Clermont-Ferrand.

The full force of anti-Jewish laws was now brought to bear. As a reaction to state antisemitism, Marc Bloch didn't want to be confined in a kind of ghetto. In Bloch's view, there were two Jewish communities in France: the assimilated community, who should fight to defend forced integration; and the foreigners who should emigrate to survive. Thus he was deeply opposed to the Union Générale des Israélites de France (UGIF), which was established as a directive of the Nazis in November 1941. He considered that accepting this as a fait accompli would lead to the eviction of the Jews from the French community.

Bloch had considered seeking exile with his family in the United States as early as July 1940, and he obtained an appointment as a professor at the New School for Social Research in New York. He managed to secure a visa for himself, his wife, and three underage children, but had difficulty doing so for his aged mother and his eldest children. Then, in April 1941, a new law was passed forbidding all men between the ages of 18 and 40 from leaving French metropolitan borders. His mother died the following month, and in August 1941 his teaching position was cancelled.

Marc Bloch was nevertheless allowed to continue teaching. He was granted an exemption by virtue of Article 8 of the law, which specified that “the Conseil d’Etat may decree on a case-by-case basis, that Jews who have rendered exceptional literary, scientific or artistic contributions to the French State may be absolved from the proscriptions stipulated by this law.” Due to his wife’s poor health, he was transferred to Montpellier during the school year 1941–1942.

In November 1942, after the German invasion of the free zone, the Bloch family had to seek refuge in Creuse. Bloch was allowed to take an early retirement on his own initiative starting January 1, 1944.

Marc Bloch never accepted France’s defeat; as he explained in his book l’Etrange défaite, the battle to free France had never ceased. Strongly patriotic, he was a real pioneer of the Resistance. He also wanted to maintain the link between his Jewish identity and France, his country; through the underground struggle, he could proclaim and reinforce his citizenship. He met the leaders of the organization known as Combat in Clermont-Ferrand, and as a member of the Cercle de Montpellier, a group of Resistance fighters in Montpellier, he probably undertook resistance activities there.

But he led a more active resistance when he went underground in Lyon. He joined the Franc-Tireur movement thanks to a friend from Strasbourg, Dr. Robert Waitz, who introduced him to a young activist student, Maurice Pessis. He was officially recruited at the beginning of April 1943 and given a diverse range of responsibilities. He first worked in the writing of a clandestine newspaper, and in July he was appointed regional delegate of the Franc-Tireur movement at the regional directorate of the Mouvements Unis de la Résistance (Unified Movements of the Resistance, or MUR). With this, he had to lead organizational activities. For his safety, he assumed different names: Arpajon, Chevreuse, and Narbonne. In Lyon he lived under a false identity, Maurice Blanchard. Throughout this time, nonetheless, he managed to stay in touch with members of his wider family.

In February 1944 he established his head office in a sewing workshop in the area of Croix Rousse. That was the place where the main leaders of the MUR were supposed to meet on March 8, 1944. The day before, however, the Gestapo with the help of some collaborators organized a roundup in two cafes. R. Blanc, known as Drac, the leader of Combat, was the first to be seized. The next day, Marc Bloch was trapped next to his dwelling; while his personal secretary, Nina Morguleff, had time to conceal secret documents and flee, Bloch was arrested. He was questioned and tortured, but maintained his silence. He was transferred to Montluc prison in Lyon, but on June 16, 1944, he and 29 comrades were loaded into a truck and led to the edge of an enclosed field near the village of Saint-Didier-de-Formans, where they were murdered.

A monument was erected on the spot where Marc Bloch was executed. His corpse was later transferred to the family vault at Bourg d’Hem. He was later posthumously awarded the French medal of the Resistance and many other military decorations.

CINDY BIESSE

See also: France; Jewish Resistance

Further Reading

Bloch, Marc. Apologie pour l’histoire ou le métier d’historien. Paris: Cahier des Annales, Editions Armand Colin, 1949.

Bloch, Marc. L’Etrange Défaite. Paris: Société des Editions “le Franc-Tireur,” 1946.

Fink, Carole. Marc Bloch: A Life in History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Friedman, Susan W. Marc Bloch, Sociology and Geography: Encountering Changing Disciplines. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Mastrogregori, Massimo. Il Genio dello storico. Le Considerazioni sulla storia di Marc Bloch e Lucien Febvre e la tradizione metodologica francese. Naples: Edizioni Scientifiche Italiane, 1987.

Rauff, Ulrich. Ein Historiker in 20. Jahrhundert: Marc Bloch. Frankfurt: M. S. Fischer, 1995.

Blome, Kurt

Nazi German doctor and medical researcher who conducted or supervised unethical medical experiments on concentration camp internees. Kurt Blome was born in Bielefeld, Germany, on January 31, 1894. After his medical education and training, he was appointed Deputy Reich health leader and head of cancer research in the Reich Research Council. The latter post was, however, a cover for Blome’s far more sinister undertakings. Blome would later confess that beginning in 1943 he had been ordered to conduct experiments with bubonic plague on concentration camp detainees. He also admitted to experimenting with various cancer-causing agents and biological and chemical substances. Among these were typhoid, cholera, anthrax, bubonic plague, malaria, and nerve agents like sarin and tabun. Prisoners were routinely exposed to or infected with these various diseases and agents to test the efficacy of vaccines and antidotes. Many of Blome’s experiments were conducted at the Dachau and Auschwitz camps during the war.

In May 1945, after the defeat of Germany, American military intelligence operatives arrested Blome in Munich. When his sordid past came to light, other U.S. intelligence agents interrogated him as well. They were chiefly interested in his knowledge of chemical and biological warfare. In 1947 Blome was acquitted during the so-called Doctors' Trial, and it remains unclear if American officials intervened in the judiciary process because they saw Blome as a potentially valuable scientist for U.S. weapons projects. Just two months after his acquittal, U.S. chemical weapons experts interviewed him at great length. In 1951 he was asked to join the U.S. Army Chemical Corps but was denied a visa to work in the United States. He was later arrested by French officials and was tried and convicted of war crimes. Imprisoned, Blome died in Dortmund, Germany, on October 10, 1969.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Medical Experimentation

Further Reading

Deichmann, Ute. Biologists under Hitler. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1999.
Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Blood and Soil

“Blood and Soil,” or Blut und Boden, refers to the ideology focused specifically on the relationship between blood—a person’s ethnicity—and soil—one’s sense of place. Such thinking celebrates the relationship held by a certain ethnic group to the land they inhabit and places an emphasis on a rural way of life. The concept of “Blood and Soil” became especially popular before and during the Nazi period.

The German application of “Blood and Soil” was first devised in the 19th century, accompanying a rise in national romanticism following the unification of the German states. This continued after World War I. The concept was widespread before the rise of the Nazi Party in the early 20th century. In 1930 Richard Walther Darré popularized the phrase “Blood and Soil” in his book Neuadel aus Blut und Boden (A New Nobility Based on Blood and Soil). In this book, Darré suggested an efficient eugenics platform for the people of Germany and argued that breeding was a remedy for the troubles that Germany faced.

Nazi “Blood and Soil” thinking called for an agricultural, rural approach to German living. It also held that German land was tied directly to German blood, contributing to the Nazi ideal of the German peasant woman, seen as a strong female able to work the land and produce healthy Aryan children. Nazi-era German art often portrayed women as well muscled, strong, and tanned, all signs of living a wholesome rural life. The “Blood and Soil” belief system placed the peasant farmer—tough, rugged, and tied to the land—above those who worked in cities. Nazi folklore glorified peasant rebellions against unjust landowners and applied this thinking to their enemies of the 20th century.

The Nazis blamed the decline of rural life in Germany on the Jewish population, and during the Nazi regime schools were obliged to teach German youth that land in the countryside had not only been bought up by Jews, but that, as a result, German rural families had been removed from their inheritance and forced into the cities to find work. “Blood and Soil” thinking was thus exploited by the Nazis as another means to blame the Jews for the decline in what they believed to be the true German way of life.

“Blood and Soil” thinking was also the basis for the concept of Lebensraum, or “living space,” with the Nazis utilizing the concept to advocate for German expansion into Eastern Europe. Such expansion was a bolster to the agricultural living that “Blood and Soil” ideas maintained. During World War II, Generalplan Ost, or “Master Plan East,” permitted the murder, deportation, and enslavement of the Polish, Ukrainian, Russian, and other Slavic populations in Eastern Europe by the German troops because they were considered racially inferior or “non-Aryan.” It was then the Nazi expectation that the Germans would repopulate Eastern Europe with Germanic people to complete the lebensraum ideal.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Himmler, Heinrich; Lebensraum; Nazism and Germany; Volk; Volksgemeinschaft

Further Reading

Bramwell, Anna. Blood and Soil: Richard Walther Darré and Hitler's "Green Party". Buckinghamshire: Kensal Press, 1985.
Cecil, Robert. The Myth of the Master Race: Alfred Rosenberg and Nazi Ideology. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
Kiernan, Ben. Blood and Soil: A World History of Genocide and Extermination from Sparta to Darfur. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2007.

Blood for Goods

On June 25, 1944, SS Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, who had arrived in Hungary at the end of April to oversee the deportation of the Jews, “invited” Joel Brand of the Hungarian Aid and Rescue Committee to make him an offer to save Jews with the following words: “I have carried out the Aktionen [actions] in the Reich—in Poland—in Czechoslovakia. Now it’s Hungary’s turn. I let you come here to talk business with you.” He continued that certain Jewish aid agencies, such as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency for Palestine, had drawn the same conclusion as he had done, namely, that Brand’s organization had the resources to be able to make a deal with the Nazis. As a result, Eichmann said, “I am ready to sell you—a million Jews.” His bizarre offer was a simple one: “Goods for blood—blood for goods. You can gather up the million in countries in which [they] still have Jews . . . from Hungary, from Poland, from Austria, from Theresienstadt, from Auschwitz, from wherever you want.” He concluded with the chilling words, “Sit down and talk.”

In exchange for Jewish lives, Eichmann wanted 10,000 trucks for the Waffen-SS, 200 tons of tea, 200 tons of cocoa, 800 tons of coffee, and 2,000,000,000 cakes of soap. In return, Eichmann would arrange for Brand to travel to Turkey and present this proposal to Jewish representatives from Palestine as well as both American and British Jewish delegates. Brand was also to be accompanied by one Andor (Bandi) Grosz, who he did not know was a double agent with his own agenda. With the approval of SS Reichsführer Heinrich Himmler, Grosz was to transmit an invitation to the Americans and the British (but not the Soviets) to negotiate an end to hostilities with Himmler as the as-yet-unacknowledged leader of Germany in the event that Adolf Hitler did not survive.

Brand, a complicated man who died believing not only that he failed but that others did not do all they could, truly believed the offer was genuine, and he agreed to be transported to Istanbul, after first traveling to Vienna, where he was given a false passport with the name Eugen Band. Upon arriving in Turkey he was initially incarcerated by the authorities due to the lack of a visa. Finally, after much pressure, he was able to meet with Palestinian Jewish Agency representative Moshe Shertok, who would later become Israel’s second prime minister after changing his last name to Sharett. Brand told him of the crisis that existed back in Hungary, though he did not himself yet know that his fellow Jewish countrymen and women were already being taken to Auschwitz. Brand did, however, urge all those around him to do whatever was possible, including bombing of the railways, gas chambers, and crematoria at Auschwitz. His information was in all probability based on that supplied by Auschwitz escapees Rudolf Vrba and Alfred Wetzler. Shertok, too, believed the offer was genuine and sought out both British and American contacts. After Brand was released from prison, he went to Cairo to enlist British support, where he was again incarcerated and prevented from returning to Budapest. Later, he went on to Palestine.

The British and Americans quickly rejected the offer of exchange for the following reasons: (1) they did not wish to sever their connection to the Russians, whom they needed in order to fully vanquish the Nazis; (2) they did not believe the offer of “blood for goods” was a serious and genuine one; (3) they were not willing to supply the Nazis with any material aid that would prolong the war; and (4) both countries were unwilling to address what they saw as an influx of 1,000,000 Jewish refugees to their countries.

Equally, the Allies did not accept the real offer of negotiation with Himmler, who would later be captured trying to escape, but would cheat the hangman’s noose at Nuremberg by swallowing cyanide on April 29, 1945. More than 550,000 Hungarian Jews were murdered in the Holocaust; how many were sacrificed due to Allied reluctance to save them, and how many could have thus been saved, remain open and debatable questions.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Brand, Joel; British Response to the Holocaust; Kasztner, Resz ; United States Response to the Holocaust

Further Reading

- Bauer, Yehuda. Jews for Sale? Nazi-Jewish Negotiations, 1933–1945. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Breitman, Richard, and Shlomo Aronson. “The End of the ‘Final Solution’? Nazi Plans to Ransom Jews in 1944.” Central European History 25 (2), 1992: 177–203.
- Halász, Dorottya Sziszkoszn . “The United States and the Joel Brand Mission: Help or Hindrance?” Hungarian Journal of English and American Studies 6 (2), 2000: 259–266.
- L b, Ladislaus. Reszo Kasztner: The Daring Rescue of Hungarian Jews: A Survivor’s Account. London: Random House, 2011.
- Rose, Paul Lawrence. “Joel Brand’s ‘Interim Agreement’ and the Course of Nazi-Jewish Negotiations 1944–1945.” Historical Journal 34 (4), 1991: 909–929.
- Weisberg, Alex. Desperate Mission: Joel Brand’s Story. Vancouver: Criterion Books, 1958.

Blood Libel

The accusation that Jews engaged in ritual murder of Christians for religiously prescribed reasons seems to have first emerged in England during the 12th century. The story of the events in 1144, in which William, a 12-year-old Christian boy from Norwich, was allegedly tortured, crucified, and murdered during Passover week, was the first of many in which Christian children were said to have been ritually murdered by Jews at the time of Easter or Passover. The core of the accusation was that Jews murdered Christian children at Easter in emulation of the crucifixion of Jesus. Over many centuries, widely spread folktales throughout Europe added that Jews also used the blood of these murdered children for their Passover rituals, most often through mixing the blood into matzo dough so that the Jews would literally devour the Christian life force throughout the Passover festival.

The libel of a Jewish quest for Christian blood—often focusing on infants or small children, at other times on virgin girls—became a central charge motivating peasant reprisals in the form of pogroms and other acts of persecution. Given the proximity of Easter and Passover, March and April became months in which anti-Jewish violence often peaked in European countries. As Christians observed the death of Jesus (at the hands of the Jews, as the Church taught) and his resurrection, stories that Jews were “still” engaging in horrific practices against the innocent stirred up intense antagonism toward them. (A practice emerged in some Jewish communities, as a result of these apocryphal stories, to abstain from drinking red wine at their Passover meals so as to avoid the impression that they were actually drinking blood.)

In the modern era, blood libels took on an added dimension; although the influence of the religious struggle between Christians and Jews had begun to recede, racial antisemites built on the blood libel tradition in Europe in order to harass, kill, and uproot a Jewish presence in lands developing modern forms of national identity and expression. The Austro-Hungarian, Russian, and Ottoman empires saw the most frequent expressions of the blood libel. Well-known examples of these included the Damascus blood libel of 1840, in which the murders of a Capuchin friar and his servant were blamed on Jews; and the Beilis affair in Russia in 1911, in which Mendel Beilis, the Jewish manager of a brick factory in Kiev, Ukraine, was accused of murdering a boy for ritual purposes. (After a trial and appeal process lasting two years, Beilis was acquitted.) Even into the 20th century, successor states of the old Central and East European empires experienced violence “justified” on account of ritual murder accusations.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Antisemitism; Kielce Pogrom

Further Reading

- Dundes, Alan (Ed.). The Blood Libel Legend: A Casebook in Anti-Semitic Folklore. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991.
- Israeli, Raphael. Blood Libel and Its Derivatives: The Scourge of Anti-Semitism. New Brunswick (NJ): Transaction, 2012.
- Johnson, Hannah. Blood Libel: The Ritual Murder Accusation at the Limit of Jewish History. Ann Arbor (MI): University of Michigan Press, 2012.

Bogaard, Johannes

Johannes Bogaard was a Dutch farmer who rescued 300 Jews during the Holocaust. Coming from a devout Christian family and taught by his father to respect the Jews as the people of the Bible, Bogaard—with only a poor formal education—nonetheless felt a responsibility toward helping Jews fleeing from the Nazis.

Born in 1881 in the small farming community of Nieuw Vennepe, not far from Amsterdam, Johannes Bogaard, known as Hannes, was raised in a Calvinist family where the Jews were known as God’s “chosen people.” In view of that, he had little difficulty in recognizing his duty when the Nazis began deporting Jews from the Netherlands in July 1942. Unhesitatingly, Bogaard and his family decided to try to find a way to help Jews escape deportation. He would do this by hiding Jews on his farm and prevailing upon his relatives and neighbors to do likewise.

Before the war, Bogaard had had only a very limited experience of Jews. He was acquainted with only one Jewish family, the Mogendorffs, who lived in Amsterdam. Knowing them to be in danger, he took a train—for the first time in his life—and visited them in Amsterdam. He offered them a refuge, initiating a series of actions that saw him contact other Jews to whom he made the same offer. He began making the trip to Amsterdam more frequently, once or twice a week, and shuttled the Jews back to Nieuw Vennepe. He also visited Rotterdam and other cities, and repeated the process. So keen was he to collect as many people as possible that at one time he was harboring as many as 100 Jews.

The help he provided extended beyond simply hiding Jews. He also organized ration cards, money, and false identity papers, and arranged for most of the Jews to be moved to safer locations afterward. Two of Bogaard’s brothers, Antheunius and Willem, were responsible for ensuring a supply of rye, wheat, and other food to the refugees.

The rescue network Bogaard created operated for a year and a half, quite independent of any institutional support from the organized Dutch resistance movement. This came to an end in November 1942, however, when the farm was raided by Dutch Nazis, and 11 Jews were found and deported. Over the next few months the farm was raided twice more, with other Jews captured.

What the raids pointed to was the extent to which the rescuing of Jews was a Bogaard family affair. The hidden Jews were to a large degree cared for by Bogaard's daughter, Metje, and his sister, Aagje. Most of the Jews were concealed at the farm of Hannes Bogaard's father, the 77-year-old Johannes "Grandpa" Bogaard Sr.

On October 6, 1943, the farm was again raided, with 34 people found and deported. During the raid, Willem Bogaard managed to save a large group of Jewish children, who were hidden elsewhere by Antheunius once the SS men had left. All of them save one subsequently survived the war. Bogaard's daughter Metje managed to save another group during the raid. However, the Jews who were hidden with another of Bogaard's brothers, Pieter, were caught.

Grandpa Bogaard was arrested and detained for ten weeks at the Amstelveenseweg prison in south Amsterdam. He was offered his freedom by the Gestapo only if he undertook not to repeat his offense, but this he refused to do. It would cost him his life; sent to Sachsenhausen, he was murdered there on February 15, 1945. Pieter Bogaard died at his home on September 15, 1944, after months of imprisonment at Holland's Vught concentration camp.

After this, Hannes Bogaard went into hiding, but this did not see an end to the family's efforts on behalf of Jews. His wife Klaasje continued the work of her husband, hiding four Jews on the farm. She was, however, denounced, forcing her to flee and join Johannes. The Jews she was shielding were killed, along with other members of her family.

Although Hannes and Klaasje Bogaard survived the war, their family had been devastated. On the positive side of the ledger, however, estimates placed the lives of some 300 Jews directly at their feet. The number of their descendants by now can be measured in the thousands.

Johannes Bogaard died on May 31, 1963, at the age of 83. On October 22, 1963, Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his selfless actions in saving the lives of Jews during the Holocaust. Several years later, on August 15, 1974, Antheunius and Willem Bogaard were similarly recognized. The example set by this family, who refused to acquiesce to the Nazi horror, is both inspirational and an outstanding witness to their religious faith during the darkest of times.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Netherlands; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Nelson, Alice. After This: Survivors of the Holocaust Speak.

Fremantle (Western Australia): Fremantle Press, 2015.

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. Hoboken (NJ): KTAV, 1993.

Stein, Andre. Quiet Heroes: True Stories of the Rescue of the Jews by Christians in Nazi-Occupied Holland. New York: New York University Press, 1989.

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich

Dietrich Bonhoeffer, a German Lutheran pastor and theologian, was one of the leaders of the relatively small group of German clergymen to advocate against the Nazi regime and

Dietrich Bonhoeffer was a German pastor, theologian, anti-Nazi dissident, and key founding member of the Confessing Church. Bonhoeffer was a staunch resister of the Nazi dictatorship and voiced his opposition to the Nazi euthanasia program and persecution of the Jews. He was arrested in April 1943 by the Gestapo and was ultimately executed by hanging on April 9, 1945, just days before the Nazi surrender. (Walter Sanders/The LIFE Images Collection/Getty Images) its efforts to integrate Christian theology with Nazi ideology. His writings continue to influence Christianity to this day.

Born in 1906 in Breslau, Bonhoeffer was ordained a priest at age 25. Though on two occasions he left Germany to teach elsewhere, he insisted on returning to his homeland despite the growing evidence that to do so would be dangerous.

Bonhoeffer immediately opposed Hitler's ideology when the Nazis rose to power. Just two days after Hitler became Führer, Bonhoeffer made a radio address that spoke of his opposition and introduced a concern that would be integral to his actions and writings in the years ahead: that Nazi ideology must not elevate Hitler as a substitute for Jesus, and nationalism a substitute for Christianity.

None of his writings so perfectly reveals the complexity of the man and the difficulty of his times than Bonhoeffer's April 1933 essay, "The Church and the Jewish Question." It is a courageous and deeply felt reminder to the church that its obligations include questioning the state about the legitimacy of its actions, helping the state's victims whether or not they are part of the church, and even going beyond that by "seizing the wheel [of government] itself" by direct political action if the state has failed to take legitimate steps in its pursuit to create law and order.

This is not the only way in which Bonhoeffer professed his strong anti-Nazi position. He also rejected as injurious to the church's authority the Nazi position that Judaism is a racial/biological construct, not a religious one, arguing that "a Jewish Christian [a Jew who has converted to Christianity] is a religious and not a racial concept." Here Bonhoeffer did nothing less than strike at the very foundation of Nazi ideology in which Jews constitute a race, and on that basis are not just biologically inferior but are also unable to change that inferior status.

But Bonhoeffer's essay also includes attitudes and teachings of another sort, reflecting, as they do, the environment in which he lived. First, it could be argued that his concern for the status of Jewish Christians trumped his concern for Jews. In his 1933 essay, Bonhoeffer argued against the application of the Aryan Paragraph to the church, under which Jews who had converted and been welcomed into the church on the basis of their baptism and profession of faith were still considered by the state to be Jewish if they otherwise met the Nazi racial definition of a Jew, even if in the extreme but very real situation where they were priests or nuns. This represents a key concern of Bonhoeffer's: that the Nazi government not infringe on the legitimate role of the church, a role that must include the exclusive authority to determine who is Christian and who is not. Arguing in support of Jewish Christians, as Bonhoeffer does, is not synonymous with arguing in support of Jews.

Second, and most significant, is the inclusion in his essay of a paragraph containing the traditional Christian supersessionist tirade against Jews and Judaism, where Judaism was seen only as a precursor to Christianity; where the suffering of the Jews was because of their refusal to accept Jesus as the messiah; and where the charge of deicide was once again leveled at the Jews. Note should be made, however, that recent scholarship reveals that the offensive paragraph was not in any of Bonhoeffer's three drafts of the essay; it appeared only in the published version. It is not known if the inclusion of the paragraph was a reflection of Bonhoeffer's theology or the publisher's. Given the times in which he was raised, the former would be more likely, but that does not mean that Bonhoeffer did not seek to overcome that in some of his later writings.

Moving beyond this essay, Bonhoeffer refused to accept the nazification of Christianity that was enthusiastically espoused by members of the German Christian (Deutsche Christen) movement, a group that sought to blend Christianity and Nazism. This group advocated that the New Testament be rewritten to eliminate any references to the Jewish roots of Jesus and his disciples, and that Jesus should be seen as an Aryan fighting a cosmic battle with the Jews.

In response to his fear of the German Christian movement as an existential threat to the life of the church and true Christianity, Bonhoeffer undertook a number of efforts to combat it, most of them at great personal risk. First, he joined Martin Niemöller in founding the Confessing Church, whose members stood against the German Christians' distortion of Christianity. The position of the Confessing Church was best expressed in the Barmen Declaration of 1934, which made it clear that Hitler and nationalism do not supersede in supremacy Jesus and the church.

Second, he did all that he could to maintain a Confessing Church seminary, even though Himmler declared in August 1937 that educating Confessing Church ministry students was illegal. Third, through the efforts of his brother-in-law, Hans von Dohnányi, Bonhoeffer worked in the Abwehr, the German military intelligence unit, where he began making contact with others who also saw a desperate need to remove Hitler from power. It was in his capacity as an Abwehr agent that Bonhoeffer began his involvement with the German resistance, which included, among other things, helping German Jews cross into Switzerland.

On April 5, 1943, Bonhoeffer was arrested and sent to Tegel military prison, from which he wrote his now well-known

Letters and Papers from Prison. When his connection to the conspirators in the failed July 20 plot to kill Hitler was discovered, Bonhoeffer was moved to a different prison and then to Buchenwald, and finally to the Flossenbürg concentration camp. On April 9, 1943, Bonhoeffer was executed.

Bonhoeffer's theology and related writings continue to provide inspiration and provoke thought. He was a man in conflict, subject to the theological traditions of his time and yet recognizing that the Nazis' treatment of the Jews represented not just a civil liberties issue but also a moral and theological challenge to the Christian church and its role of serving and protecting the suffering.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Barth, Karl; Protestant Churches, German; Resistance Movements; Theological Responses to the Holocaust; Upstander

Further Reading

Barnett, Victoria. For the Soul of the People: Protestant Protest against Hitler. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Haynes, Stephen R. The Bonhoeffer Legacy: Post Holocaust Perspectives. Minneapolis (MN): Fortress Press, 2006.

Metaxas, Eric. Bonhoeffer: Pastor, Martyr, Prophet, Spy. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2010.

Borkowska, Anna

Anna Borkowska was a Polish-born Roman Catholic nun and upstander who sheltered 17 Jews in her monastery during the Holocaust. She also helped supply the Jewish ghetto in Vilna, Poland (now Vilnius, Lithuania), with arms and supplies in order to stage an uprising.

She was born in Poland in 1900, graduated from the University of Kraków, and then entered the Dominican monastery near Vilna as a novice. She eventually took her vows and became known as Sister Bertranda. By the time World War II had begun in 1939, she was the mother superior of the monastery.

In June 1941, after the Nazis invaded eastern Poland and the Soviet Union, they began murdering Jews en masse and rounding up others, placing them into ghettos or sending them to death camps. Vilna soon housed a huge Jewish ghetto. Sister Bertranda immediately commenced efforts to shield Jews in the area and even asked the local Catholic hierarchy for help in doing so, but she was rebuffed. The Catholic leadership feared that the church and Christians in general might be targeted if the Catholic Church aided the Jews, but Sister Bertranda was undeterred.

Acting on her own initiative, she permitted 17 male Jews to take refuge in the monastery. The men were members of a local Zionist organization, Hashomer Hatzair, and were determined to lead an insurgency against the German occupiers. The leader of the group, Abba Kovner, began plotting an underground resistance movement at the monastery and wrote a manifesto in late 1941 that was widely distributed to Jews being held in the nearby ghetto. In early 1942 Sister Bertranda traveled to the ghetto to offer her help, but Kovner feared that she would be harmed or killed if the Germans discovered her there. Instead, he asked her and the other nuns to help secure supplies to the underground movement. Sister Bertranda readily agreed.

Between the winter of 1942 and the late summer of 1943, Sister Bertranda and the other nuns in the monastery regularly provided the ghetto with supplies. Among these were guns, ammunition, hand grenades, and other weapons that would be employed in the planned ghetto uprising. In August 1943 the Nazis began deporting large number of Jews from the ghetto to concentration and death camps in Estonia. Kovner and others began their uprising on September 1, 1943, which was promptly crushed by German forces. By December the entire ghetto had been liquidated, and that same month Nazi occupation officials arrested Sister Bertranda and several other nuns; they also ordered the monastery closed. The mother superior was deported to a labor camp near Kovno (Kaunas), where she remained until the Soviets liberated the camp many months later.

After the war, Sister Bertranda secured a dispensation from her vows and left her religious order. She once again became known simply as Anna Borkowska and lived a simple, quiet life in Warsaw. She remained a devout Catholic, however. In 1984 Israel's Yad Vashem honored Borkowska as one of the Righteous among the Nations, a recognition it also extended to several other nuns in Borkowska's old order. Abba Kovner traveled to Warsaw to bestow the award upon her personally. When Borkowska asked why she deserved the honor, Kovner explained that: "When angels hid their faces from us, this woman [Anna] was for us Anna of the Angels." Anna Borkowska died in Warsaw in 1988.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Kovner, Abba; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews During the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.

Tomaszewski, Irene, and Tacia Werbowksi. Code Name: Zegota: Rescuing Jews in Occupied Poland, 1942–1945: The Most Dangerous Conspiracy in Wartime Europe. Westport (CT): Praeger, 2010.

Bormann, Martin

Martin Bormann was a close friend of Adolf Hitler. From May 1941 he was head of the Nazi Party chancellery and from April 1943 “secretary to the Führer.”

Bormann was born on June 17, 1900, in Wegelben. After World War I, he was involved with different radical Right organizations and associations, and in 1924 he took part in a lynching and was condemned to a year’s imprisonment. After he entered the National Socialist Party in 1927 his career in the party began to take off. In 1928 he was active in the party head office in Munich. After the rise to power of Hitler and the Nazis, he advanced in July 1933 to the position of chief of staff with Hitler’s deputy in the party, Rudolf Hess. In October 1933 he was promoted to the rank of a Reich leader. With the “Adolf-Hitler-Contribution to the German Economy” organized by Bormann in 1933, which brought money from employers into the party coffers, he demonstrated (not for the first time) his skills with financial affairs. In 1933 Hitler entrusted him with the administration of his own finances, and that brought him access to Hitler himself and to the close circle around him.

The powers of Hess’s staff, and later those of the party chancellery, were never clearly set out and were constantly extended. Its principal task was to implement the will of the party over the state apparatus. This meant participation in legislative activity, a deliberate assertion of influence over appointments, and frequent interventions on the state and party political levels. After Hess’s flight to England in May 1941, Bormann was appointed to succeed him. His department had the title of Party Chancellery and he was given the authority of a Reich minister; his actual power, however, went beyond his formal positions in the party and state apparatus. He has often been ascribed the role of actual deputy to Hitler—though that must be nuanced—and he was certainly one of the most influential individuals in the regime. This found expression in his subsequent appointment in April 1943 as “secretary to the Führer.” Factors that assisted him in his rise to the position of grey eminence of the National Socialist state and confidant of Hitler were his administrative and financial abilities, his unscrupulousness, and his intriguing and unconditional loyalty to Hitler. He remained at Hitler’s side right up to the latter’s suicide, and he pursued to the end—though with decreasing success—the implementation of Hitler’s lunatic orders, including the destruction of Germany’s remaining infrastructure.

Bormann pursued the aims and the ideology of the Nazis with the utmost brutality. He pushed through the exclusion of the Christian churches from public life, favored extremely harsh treatment of the Slav population in the territories occupied by German troops, and an intensification of the antisemitic measures of the Nazi state. Bormann’s ultimate fate remained unclear for a long time. In October 1946 the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg condemned him to death in absentia. In spite of frequent reports that Bormann had survived, the search for him proved fruitless. In 1972 the state prosecutor at Frankfurt came to the conclusion that a body found that year in Berlin was unquestionably his. It is likely that at the beginning of May 1945 Bormann was killed in an attempt to escape the encirclement of Berlin. Doubts, however, have been repeatedly expressed as to this version, and a shadow of uncertainty over his final end still lingers.

MICHAEL SCHÄBITZ

(TRANSLATED BY CYPRIAN BLAMIRE)

See also: National Socialist German Workers’ Party; Nuremberg Trials; Rosenstrasse Protest; Sauckel, Fritz; Speer, Albert; Wegner, Armin T.

Further Reading

Lang, Jochen von. Der Sekretär: Martin Bormann—Der Mann, der Hitler beherrschte. Stuttgart, Germany: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1977.

McGovern, James. Martin Bormann. New York: William Morrow, 1968.

Schmier, Louis E. “Martin Bormann and the Nazi Party, 1941–1945.” PhD diss., University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1969.

Trevor-Roper, Hugh R. (Ed.). Hitler’s politisches Testament: Die Bormann-Diktate vom February–April 1945. Hamburg (Germany): Knaus, 1981.

Borromeo, Giovanni

Giovanni Borromeo was an Italian medical doctor responsible for hiding hundreds of Jews after fabricating a so-called “deadly” disease that kept the Nazis away from the hospital in which he was working. Born in Rome on December 15, 1898, he came from a line of distinguished physicians. When Italy joined World War I in 1915 he was already enrolled in the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Rome, and at the age of 18 joined the Italian army. During the war he won a Bronze Medal for bravery. With peace he returned to his studies and at the age of 22 graduated with honors. When he turned 30 he became chief physician of the United Hospitals of Rome.

Refusing to join the Fascist Party during the 1920s—a move that reduced his career possibilities—in 1934 he was appointed to the Fatebenefratelli hospital, located in the San Giovanni Calibita church complex on Rome’s Tiber Island. With the help of the prior, Father Maurizio Bialek, he worked to transform the hospital (then being used as a hospice) into the most modern and efficient hospital in Rome.

Under Borromeo’s direction, the Fatebenefratelli hospital became a safe haven for Jews after the introduction of Italy’s antisemitic laws in 1938. At first, this was on a small scale. One of those protected was Dr. Vittorio Emanuele Sacerdoti, who was able to work in the hospital on false papers. By late September 1943, after Nazi Germany had occupied Italy and initiated severe antisemitic measures against Rome’s Jews, Sacerdoti, with the approval of Borromeo and Father Maurizio, arranged for Jews to be brought into the hospital and admitted as “patients.” Many of these were from the Jewish hospital, not far from the Fatebenefratelli, which also became a haven for others: police, partisans, and antifascists.

On October 16, 1943, the Nazis raided the Jewish ghetto in Rome, and a major razzia, or roundup, took place. Desperately seeking to escape, many Jews managed to get to the hospital, where they were admitted. From this point on, Borromeo began announcing that they were being diagnosed with a new strain of fatal disease, which he called “Il Morbo di K.” Just what this might be was open to interpretation, but for the most part the German occupiers decided to play it safe and refused to intervene. Not only did the fake disease scare the Nazis off, it also prevented them from entering and searching the hospital. In this way, Borromeo saved many people—by some accounts, at least 100, but perhaps more.

The deception meant that the Jews inside the hospital had to play their part too. The “patients” were instructed to cough and appear sick so that any inspectors would be terrified by what they saw. Coughing, in particular, was an important device: it made it seem that Il Morbo di K might have some relationship to tuberculosis, which was particularly frightening.

Throughout this time the hospital also served as a place for genuine patients. It has been suggested that Borromeo’s designation of “K” for the Jewish refugees was a way of marking them off from those who were actually sick—“K” being an inside joke relating to German General Albert Kesselring, who commanded the German troops in Rome.

Borromeo did not restrict his efforts only to sheltering Jews. He and Father Maurizio also resisted the Nazis through the installation of an illegal radio transmitter and receiver in the basement of the Fatebenefratelli, placing them in continuous contact with local partisans—particularly one of Borromeo’s personal friends, Italian air force General Roberto Lordi.

Borromeo (with Father Maurizio’s help) did not act alone. Many of the young doctors who served on the staff of the hospital volunteered to assist in the deception, and all knew that one slip-up could cost them dearly. Given that, a shuttle service was created ferrying certain of the “patients” to safe houses when it was possible, where they remained for a few days. The hope was that places would be found to enable them to move on quickly, the better to ensure that they would not be vulnerable targets should the Nazis decide to raid the hospital—which actually happened at the beginning of May 1944. On that occasion, however, such was the care with which the ruse was carried out, only five Jews, all refugees from Poland, were taken.

After the war, some among those who knew of Borromeo’s work questioned his motives, arguing that his chief concern was to protect partisans, not Jews, and that his protection of them was unintended. This does not, however, sit well with his earlier care for Jews facing fascist persecution before the war. Moreover, the fact that he did not turn Jews away—which he could well have done in order not to jeopardize his partisan activity—was something that never seemed to occur to him.

After the war, Borromeo received a number of honors from the Italian government, including the Order of Merit and the Silver Medal of Valor. He was also made a Knight of the Order of Malta. On August 24, 1961, at age 62, he died at his own Fatebenefratelli hospital in Rome.

He was not, however, forgotten by those he had helped during the Holocaust. Several of those whose lives he had saved kept his memory alive, and two in particular, Claudio and Luciana Tedesco, alerted Yad Vashem as to how their family had been sheltered at the hospital. Other families also furnished proof of their own salvation owing to Borromeo’s efforts. As a result, on October 13, 2004, Yad Vashem posthumously recognized Giovanni Borromeo as one of the Righteous among the Nations for resisting the Holocaust and saving Jewish lives.

See also: Italy; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Borromeo, Pietro. Il Giusto che inventò il Morbo di K. Rome: Fermento Editore, 2007.

Yad Vashem. "Giovanni Borromeo," at <http://db.yadvashem.org/righteous/family.html?language=en&itemId=5221268>.

Boss, Hugo

Hugo Boss was a German clothing manufacturer whose enterprise embraced the Nazi period and, in more recent times, has become a global fashion house. Born in the small Württemberg town of Metzingen on July 8, 1885, Boss was the youngest of five children in the family of Heinrich and Luise (née Münzenmayer) Boss, owners of a lingerie and linen shop. After a routine upbringing for a young middle-class German of the time, he assumed control of the store in 1908, the same year he was married. After serving in World War I, Boss established his own clothing company in Metzingen in 1923, followed by a clothes factory the following year. This produced shirts, jackets, workwear, sportswear, and raincoats.

One of Boss's earliest clients was Rudolf Born, a textiles distributor. He contracted with Boss to produce some brown shirts for a small but growing political group known as the National Socialist Party; this was, of course, the nascent Nazi Party, which would assume office in January 1933. Boss himself at this time was relatively apolitical; he produced clothes for a variety of clients, including other political parties, the police, and the postal service.

With the onset of the Depression, Germany's economic climate deteriorated and then collapsed, and Boss was forced into bankruptcy. In 1931 he reached an agreement with his creditors that enabled him to start his business over, and he found that he had an ally in the Nazis. On April 1, 1931, he joined the Nazi Party as membership number 508,889 and became a sponsor of the SS. Over time, his economic situation improved.

Boss's reasons for becoming a Nazi, it appears, were two-fold; as a businessman it made good commercial sense to align himself with a growing political power that seemed likely to take power at some time in the future. And, given the economic and social turmoil in which Germany found itself, Boss saw Hitler as the only man able to regenerate Germany from the situation in which the country found itself.

The design of Nazi uniforms eventually saw the involvement of the Hugo Boss company, and the all-black uniform of the SS, introduced in the fall of 1932, was designed by artist and SS-Oberführer Professor Karl Diebitsch, and a graphic designer, Walter Heck. It has often been asserted that the black SS uniform was designed by Boss himself, but this was not the case. However, the Hugo Boss company did produce the uniforms, together with the brown shirts of the SA and the uniforms of the Hitler Youth. In 1934 Boss claimed that he had been supplying the Nazis with uniforms since 1924, but it is more likely that he became entrenched in this role in 1928 when he received the status of official supplier to the Nazi movement.

In 1938 Boss had his best year to date and became a supplier of army uniforms to the German army. Yet by 1940 Boss was employing only 250 workers; he was successful, but not yet a major provider to the Nazi state. This changed as a result of the outbreak of war in September 1939.

By 1941 his sales and profits had skyrocketed, but this came at a price; like most private manufacturers in Germany, Boss found it hard to find employees during the war, and, unable to fill his factories with workers, he was obliged to use prisoners of war and forced laborers from countries occupied by the Nazis, such as from the Baltic States, Belgium, France, Italy, Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union. During the course of the war Boss used 140 such workers, swelled by 40 French prisoners of war from 1940 onward. Conditions in Boss's factory were considered by all to be appalling; the barracks were pestilential, food was inadequate and of poor quality, and medical facilities for the workers were practically nonexistent. Evidence exists to the effect that managers and foremen were enthusiastic Nazis.

With the end of the war in 1945, Boss was subjected to the process of denazification, whereby he was tried for his complicity in the Nazi state. His early Nazi Party membership now counted against him, as was his financial support of the SS and his supplying of uniforms for both the various Nazi Party organizations and the German army. He was denounced as a war profiteer and classified as an activist member of the party and "beneficiary of National Socialism." In 1946 he was fined and forbidden to vote as a German citizen or to run a business. Upon appeal, Boss was retried and reclassified; he now became a "follower of National Socialism" rather than an activist, and his penalties were reduced.

Hugo Boss died on the night of August 8–9, 1948. While his company survived to become one of the leading fashion houses in the world today, there still remains a stigma attached to the company owing to its association with the Third Reich.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: SS-Totenkopfverbände

Further Reading

Broschell, Christopher. Hitler's Money Machine: How Great Companies Stopped Worrying and Learned to Love the Reichsmark. USA: CreateSpace, 2014.

Köster, Roman. Hugo Boss, 1924–1945. A Clothing Factory during the Weimar Republic and Third Reich, at http://group.hugoboss.com/files/Study_on_the_Companys_History_Abridged_Verson_en_final.pdf.

Bousquet, René

René Bousquet, secretary-general of the Vichy French police during World War II, was largely responsible for mass deportations of Jews from France.

Born in Montauban in the department of Tarn-et-Garonne on May 11, 1909, he studied in Toulouse and received a bachelor's degree in law. During the early 1930s he served as chief of staff for several governmental ministers. In May 1936 Bousquet was named assistant bureau chief of the Interior Ministry.

Prior to the outbreak of World War II, Bousquet became secretary-general of the Marne Department. In May 1940 Nazi Germany invaded France. Following the armistice, Marshal Philippe Pétain, head of state for the collaborationist Vichy regime, named Bousquet prefect of the Marne. The following August, he became regional prefect of Champagne. Finally, on April 18, 1942, Prime Minister Pierre Laval named Bousquet secretary-general for police in the Ministry of the Interior.

Along with Laval and Louis Darquier, commissioner for Jewish Affairs, Bousquet entered discussions with his Nazi counterparts concerning the status of Jews in France. He held talks with SS leader Reinhard Heydrich, Karl Oberg, head of the SS in France, and Heinrich Himmler, head of the SS. Bousquet soon expanded the function of the French police and agreed to have his personnel participate in the roundup of Jews throughout France.

On July 17, 1942, Bousquet ordered the mass arrest of all foreign Jews in Paris, in what became known as the Vel' d'Hiv Roundup. Consequently, approximately 13,000 Jews were arrested and deported. The Jews were sent to the Drancy internment camp in Paris and then taken to Auschwitz, where the vast majority were killed. During Bousquet's term as secretary-general, the majority of the approximately 76,000 Jews to be deported from France were arrested.

In December 1943, under pressure from the Germans, Bousquet resigned his position. In June 1944 he was detained and sent with his family to a villa in Germany. After the end of the war in Europe, in May 1945, Bousquet returned to France and was arrested. He stood trial for treason in June 1949 before the High Court of Justice and was found guilty of national indignity, but his five-year sentence was commuted.

After his trial, Bousquet launched a successful career in business and finance. However, in October 1978, Darquier gave an interview in L'Express revealing the extent of Bousquet's involvement in the mass deportation of Jews. After a lengthy investigation, on March 1, 1991, Bousquet was indicted for crimes against humanity. On June 8, 1993, Christian Didier, a deranged writer, entered Bousquet's Paris apartment, shooting and killing him. Consequently, Bousquet never stood trial for his wartime actions.

MARK CELINSKAK

See also: Dannecker, Theodor; Operation Spring Wind; Vel' d'Hiv Roundup; Vichy France

Further Reading

Froment, Pascale. René Bousquet. Paris: Stock, 1994.

Golsan, Richard J. Memory, the Holocaust, and French Justice: The Bousquet and Touvier Affairs. Hanover (NH): University Press of New England, 1996.

Golsan, Richard J. Vichy's Afterlife: History and Counterhistory in Postwar France. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2000.

Brack, Viktor

Nazi war criminal and German government official, Viktor Hermann Brack was born on November 9, 1904, in Haaren (modern-day Aachen), Germany, and studied economics at a Munich university. He was soon befriended by Heinrich Himmler, for whom he worked for a time as a personal aide. In 1929 Brack joined the Nazi Party and subsequently became a member of the SS. In 1932 he took a staff position at Nazi Party headquarters in Munich. In 1936, despite the fact that he had little medical or scientific experience, Brack, now a colonel, was appointed chief liaison officer with the health ministry in Berlin.

Beginning in late 1939, Brack was tasked with implementing the Nazi euthanasia program, known as Action T-4. This effort resulted in the murder of tens of thousands of Germans and Austrians with physical or mental disabilities.

In 1941 Brack's benefactor, Heinrich Himmler, sought ways to reduce the population of "enfeebled" individuals at concentration camps while at the same time retaining prisoners who were able to provide forced labor. Brack advocated a two-part system; the first part simply referred to the mass gassing of internees who were unable to work. The second part, aimed at "useful" laborers, would introduce forced sterilization to prisoners, so they would not be able to reproduce. Forced sterilization was carried out mainly through the use of massive doses of radiation aimed at prisoners' reproductive organs. In some cases, male prisoners were physically castrated. This program saw widespread use at Auschwitz and Birkenau in particular. As many as 4,000 prisoners per day were sterilized between late 1943 and early 1945.

After the defeat of Germany, on May 20, 1945, Brack was taken into custody by U.S. counterintelligence officers. He was tried in the so-called Doctors' Trial that began in late 1946, charged with various crimes against humanity. Found guilty in 1947, he was sentenced to death. Brack died by hanging on June 2, 1948, in Landsberg Prison.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Euthanasia Program; Sterilization

Further Reading

Friedlander, Henry. The Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 1986.

Spitz, Vivien. Doctors from Hell: The Horrific Account of Nazi Experiments on Humans. Boulder (CO): Sentient, 2005.

Brand, Joel

Joel Brand was a Hungarian-born Jew and Zionist leader best known for his abortive effort to rescue Hungarian Jews from deportation to Nazi concentration camps in 1944. Brand was born on April 25, 1906, in Naszod, Transylvania, Hungary (now part of Romania) and moved to Germany with his family in 1910. At age 19 he traveled to the United States, holding a variety of odd jobs and joining the Communist Party. He subsequently traveled widely in Asia and South America, often as a sailor on merchant vessels. He did not return to Germany until 1930, when he secured a job with a telephone company and served as a Communist Party functionary. In late February 1933, only weeks after Adolf Hitler's rise to power, he was arrested, along with hundreds of other communists and socialists. After his release from jail the following year, he settled in Budapest.

In Budapest Brand became an ardent Zionist and a member of a Marxist-Zionist political organization. He was also on the governing board of the Jewish National Fund. During the early 1940s, as the Nazis implemented their plans to exterminate European Jews, Brand also became heavily involved with the Hungarian Aid and Rescue Committee, a group that helped Jews in Nazi-occupied areas to seek refuge in Hungary. Brand's world changed forever when the Germans invaded Hungary in March 1944. The invasion now imperiled all of the Jews living in Hungary.

Only weeks after the German occupation began, Brand was informed that Nazi SS official Adolf Eichmann, who had arrived in the city to oversee the mass deportation of Hungarian Jews, wished to meet with him. Brand was stunned to discover that Eichmann was offering to release as many as a million Jews in exchange for 10,000 trucks and vast quantities of coffee, tea, and soap to be delivered by the Allies. Brand and Eichmann met several times between March and May, at which time Brand, who would be sent to the Allies to act as an intermediary for high-ranking SS officials, including Heinrich Himmler, was sent to Vienna. There he allegedly met with U.S. intelligence operatives to set up a meeting between Allied and German officials in Istanbul, Turkey. At that meeting, the particulars of the Hungarian rescue mission (which the Germans called "Blood for Goods") would be ironed out. Some historians believe that Himmler and other German officials were using Brand to negotiate a larger deal in which Germany would secure a peace deal with the Allies.

Brand, however, was denied entry to Turkey because he had an invalid passport. In the meantime, Allied officials were wary of these machinations, believing Eichmann's offer to be insincere, perhaps even a ruse to distract and divide the Allies. British Foreign Minister Anthony Eden flatly refused to investigate the offer, declaring that his government did not negotiate with the enemy. Even the Jewish Agency for Israel was suspicious of the offer and worked to prevent Brand from carrying out his mission. Brand pleaded with the Agency and the British government to permit him to return to Budapest, but his entreaties were denied. In June 1944 British officials arrested Brand in Aleppo (Syria) and detained him in Egypt. Later that summer, British intelligence leaked news of the German offer, which derailed Brand's mission for good.

Released from British detention, Brand went to Palestine and tried—unsuccessfully—to enlist the help of the World

Zionist Organization. His quest to ransom the Hungarian Jews failed, and for the rest of his life he harbored deep resentment and guilt over the affair. It is not known whether the Germans were serious about their offer, but the Allies, along with leading Jewish groups, refused to even entertain it, believing that it was a ruse and/or a propaganda ploy. Brand became an Israeli citizen in the early 1950s and died there on July 13, 1964.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Blood for Goods; Hungary; Kasztner, Resz

Further Reading

Szabolcs, Szita. Trading in Lives? Operations of the Jewish Relief and Rescue Committee in Budapest, 1944–1945. Budapest: Central European University Press, 2005.

Weissberg, Alex. Desperate Mission: Joel Brand's Story. New York: Grove Press, 1958.

Brandt, Karl

Karl Brandt was a German war criminal who served as Adolf Hitler's personal physician and participated in the Nazi T-4 "Euthanasia" program, which systematically murdered handicapped and mentally challenged individuals and others deemed "unworthy of life."

He was born in Muhlhausen, Alsace-Lorraine on January 8, 1904, and received his degree in medicine from the University of Freiburg in 1929. Brandt became an adherent of "racial hygiene" policies, which were based on a pseudo-science contending that medical professionals could treat a nation or racial group in the same way that they treated an individual, by removing hereditary and other defects. In 1934 Hitler appointed him as his personal physician, and from that point on Brandt became a member of Hitler's inner circle. He appears to have been both a believer in eugenics and a career-minded opportunist.

In 1939 a request from a German family for the mercy killing of their handicapped child served as the pretext for the initiation of the Nazi "euthanasia" program. Brandt, along with Philipp Bouhler, head of Hitler's Chancellery, were placed in charge of its planning and execution. They received a rare explicit authorization from Hitler, allowing them to "grant mercy deaths" to "incurable" patients, as of September 1, 1939. Brandt and Bouhler then organized what became known as Aktion T-4, which referred to the mass murder of mentally ill and handicapped German adults and children. This program eventually expanded into the gassing of patients at six euthanasia centers throughout Germany.

Dr. Karl Brandt was a German physician and (SS) officer. He joined the Nazi Party in 1932 and became a member of Hitler's inner circle, from where he was appointed to organize and run the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program. Accused of involvement in human experimentation and other war crimes, Brandt was sentenced to death and hanged by order of the Americans on June 2, 1948. This image is of Brandt standing trial at Nuremberg in 1945. (Corbis via Getty Images)

Patients were also murdered by starvation and lethal injection at other institutions. Public concern forced the program underground, but Brandt soon expanded it in 1941 to include other nationalities. As euthanasia slowed, its specialists brought their expertise in killing to the extermination of the Jews.

By 1942 the ambitious and idealistic Brandt became chief of medicine and health for the Third Reich and was certainly the most powerful medical doctor in Germany. As such, he now presided over not just the "euthanasia" program, but also other Nazi criminal enterprises, including a wide variety of human experimentation projects carried out on concentration camp prisoners. Brandt sought increasingly greater control over the medical establishment and health-related industries before falling out of favor with Hitler in 1944. He was then arrested for allegedly planning to surrender to the Allies. Although Brandt escaped his Nazi death sentence, he was arrested by the Allies on May 23, 1945.

As the leading Nazi doctor, and because of his involvement in a large number of medical criminal enterprises, Brandt was a main focus of prosecutors at the Nuremberg Doctors' Trial, which began in December 1946. Karl Brandt was found guilty of crimes against humanity and membership in a criminal organization and was executed on June 2, 1948.

WAITMAN W. BEORN

See also: Doctors' Trial; Euthanasia Program; Nuremberg Code

Further Reading

Burleigh, Michael. Death and Deliverance: Euthanasia in Germany, 1900–1945. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

Schmidt, Ulf. Karl Brandt: The Nazi Doctor, Medicine, and Power in the Third Reich. London: Hambledon Continuum, 2007.

Bretholz, Leo

Leo Bretholz was an Austrian-born Holocaust survivor who managed to elude capture and deportation numerous times between 1938 and 1945.

He was born in Vienna, Austria, on March 6, 1921, the son of Polish immigrants. In the spring of 1938, when Germany annexed Austria, he fled by train to Germany, and with the help of a smuggler swam across the Sauer River to Luxembourg. He spent several nights at a monastery but was arrested soon thereafter and deported to Belgium. Arriving in Antwerp in November 1938, Bretholz took up temporary residence there. For some 18 months he lived in the city, but in May 1940 he was hospitalized and scheduled to have surgery to repair a hernia. The very next day, however, the Germans began bombing Antwerp, and Bretholz was forced to leave the hospital. He was then promptly arrested as an enemy alien.

Bretholz was deported to an internment camp in St. Cyprien, France, near the Spanish border. He soon managed to escape and found refuge with relatives before going to Cauterets, France, where he was hidden. Remaining there until late August 1941, when the Germans began to deport all the Jews from the area, he fled, ultimately making his way—largely on foot—to Switzerland. When he presented forged identification papers to a Swiss Mountain Patrol officer in October 1942, however, he was escorted back to France.

Promptly arrested, Bretholz was eventually sent to Drancy, a sprawling concentration camp near Paris. Most internees there were deported to death camps in the East. On November 5, 1942, Bretholz and some 1,000 other internees were herded onto a train bound for Auschwitz. During the night, as the train rumbled eastward, Bretholz and an accomplice pried open bars covering a window, pushed it open, and jumped into the dark night as the train rounded a sharp curve. They chose this moment because they knew it would be harder for guards to detect their escape while the train was negotiating a curve.

Using falsified papers, Bretholz tried to enter Vichy France, but he was arrested yet again. After nine months in prison, he was released in September 1943. The next month he was sent to the Atlantic coast to help build defensive fortifications. En route, he again managed to escape when the train stopped in Toulouse. Attaining new falsified papers, he joined the Jewish resistance group known as La Sixième (The “Sixth”). On May 8, 1944, while in Limoges, Bretholz’s hernia ruptured and he underwent emergency surgery. After a few weeks of convalescence he rejoined the resistance movement, remaining in Limoges under an assumed name. He stayed there after the war as well, until, in January 1947, he left France for a new life in the United States.

Later that same month, Bretholz arrived in Baltimore, Maryland, where he stayed with relatives. In 1952 he married Florine Cohen, and the couple had three children. Bretholz worked as a textile salesman, a co-owner of a liquor store, and owner of a bookstore in Pikesville, a Baltimore suburb. In 1962 Bretholz learned what he had already surmised—his mother and two sisters had been deported to Poland in 1942, where they were murdered. This confirmation made Bretholz far more determined to tell his story, and so he began addressing local audiences, especially schoolchildren, about his experiences during the Holocaust. In 1998 he published a memoir, Leap into Darkness, which tells his harrowing tale in much detail. Beginning in 2000 Bretholz became involved in a class-action lawsuit against SNCF, France’s national railway company. The suit sought monetary reparations from the company for its involvement in the Holocaust. Bretholz was a star witness, as he had been herded onto several SNCF trains during World War II. That case was finally dismissed in 2010, however.

Bretholz then helped mobilize an effort to prevent a SNCF-affiliated company from receiving a multi-billion-dollar contract to construct and manage a new light-rail line in Maryland. He testified numerous times in front of the Maryland legislature, which finally agreed that unless SNCF were to acknowledge its complicity in the Holocaust and pay its surviving American victims reparations, it would be unable to bid on the lucrative project. Bretholz died on March 8, 2014, only weeks before the legislature's decision.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Jewish Resistance; Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français

Further Reading

Bretholz, Leo, with Michael Olseker. Leap into Darkness: Seven Years on the Run in Wartime Europe. New York: Anchor, 1999.

Kedward, Roderick. Vichy France and the Resistance: Culture and Ideology. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 1985.

British Response to the Holocaust

Following the end of the Great War, both the British people and its leaders were terrified of another worldwide war with massive casualties. The German National Socialist Party began to gain traction in Germany in the 1920s, but both then and following Adolf Hitler's appointment as chancellor in 1933, Britain did very little to combat the spread of Nazism in Europe.

Britain's prime minister between 1937 and 1940, Neville Chamberlain, knew that Britain had not yet recovered from the aftereffects of World War I, providing his premiership with the distinction of adopting a policy of appeasement in its relationship with the European dictatorships. In order to keep his word and keep Britain from war, Chamberlain and Britain did nothing when Hitler and the German army marched into Austria in March 1938; then, in late September 1938, Chamberlain signed the Munich Agreement, awarding the Sudetenland regions of Czechoslovakia to Germany. Sensing Chamberlain's weaknesses, Germany then invaded what remained of Czechoslovakia on March 19, 1939.

During this time of political appeasement, most British citizens supported Chamberlain's efforts to keep the nation out of war. However, due to Chamberlain's desperate attempts to keep Britain at peace, Hitler soon understood that the prime minister would not interfere in German affairs, despite the fact the British press reported and printed the news of what took place in Germany and discussed the motives of Hitler and the Nazis against the Jews of Europe, right up to the outbreak of war.

Chamberlain's appeasement policy was not enough when the German army invaded Poland on September 1, 1939. Despite its previous appeasement efforts, Britain chose to honor its defensive guarantee with Poland on this occasion. Chamberlain regrettably declared war on Germany on September 3, 1939. At 11:15 in the morning he took to the radio and informed Britain that his appeasement policies had failed: "You can imagine what a bitter blow it is to me that all my long struggle to win peace has failed. Yet I cannot believe that there is anything more or anything different that I could have done and that would have been more successful."

Chamberlain's failed policies caused his support and his health to plummet, and upon resigning from his position as prime minister on May 10, 1940, he was replaced by Winston Churchill. From this time onward, Britain's efforts were devoted to surviving Germany's assault and then to defeating Germany.

As early as the 1930s Winston Churchill had opposed Chamberlain's appeasement policies and was disgusted by way that Germany treated its Jews. In 1937 Churchill wrote that the Jewish boycott of German goods in Britain was "a perfectly legitimate use of their influence throughout the world to bring pressure, economic and financial, to bear upon the governments which persecute them." Given that Churchill's premiership coincided with the war, his government was of necessity obliged to drastically limit European immigration for security reasons—particularly from Nazi-occupied territories. This did not assist Jews who were trying to escape the atrocities of war-torn Europe. Moreover, Churchill was opposed to the prevention of European Jews trying to reach Palestine.

Churchill, who was aware of, and horrified by, Germany's extreme violence committed against the Jewish community from as early as 1941, chose to focus most of his energy on defeating Germany rather than helping those who were in immediate need. However, when the German army invaded the Soviet Union in June 1941 in Operation Barbarossa, addressing the treatment of Europe's Jews became unavoidable. Churchill was informed of the hundreds of thousands of Jews being killed in the Soviet Union, and during a radio broadcast to the British people in November 1941 he stated of the Jewish people: "None has suffered more cruelly than the Jew the unspeakable evils wrought upon the bodies and spirits of men by Hitler and his vile regime." As he saw it, "The Jew bore the brunt of the Nazis' first onslaught upon the citadels of freedom and human dignity. He has borne and continued to bear a burden that might have seemed beyond endurance. He has not allowed it to break his spirit; he has never lost the will to resist. Assuredly in the day of victory the Jew's suffering and his part in the struggle will not be forgotten."

Britain and the Allies had evidence of what the Germans termed the Final Solution in 1942, but the overall consensus was that a quicker victory against Germany would end the war and ultimately end the violence against the Jews of Europe. Churchill argued that concentration camps such as Auschwitz and railway lines to the concentration camps should be bombed by Allied planes in order to put a stop to Nazi activities. Other members of the Allied Powers argued that they did not have enough information in order to bomb the camps and rail lines accurately, and such efforts would ultimately be a waste of time and resources.

Churchill did his best to help Jews who were able to escape Europe. In March 1944, for example, he circumvented the previous restrictions that Britain had made against immigrants fleeing to Palestine. Jews who made it to Istanbul were taken by train to Palestine, a measure that helped thousands of European Jews fleeing Nazi Europe.

In 1945 the Allied Powers were finally able to invade the Nazi Reich, and in doing so to liberate the concentration camps. As the reality of the Nazis' horrific regime was revealed, Churchill reached out to Britain's government to describe "the proofs of these frightful crimes now coming into view." Churchill was and is often described as a "bulldog" for his abrasive and forward leadership during World War II, but he did much in his power to help the Jews of Europe—even though the position of Britain and its response to the Holocaust is often the subject of alternating opinions. Many critical historians and Jewish organizations hold that Britain could have done more not only to avoid a war with Germany but also to help the Jews of Europe by allowing more immigration, reporting on the state of concentration camps and the Jewish communities instead of keeping them hidden, or bombing concentration camps or the rail lines to the camps in order to halt Germany's Final Solution.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Al-Husseini, Haj Amin; Auschwitz Protocols; Bermuda Conference; Blood for Goods; Displaced Persons; Evian Conference; Gibraltar Camp, Jamaica; Hess, Rudolf; HMT Dunera; Kindertransport; Munich Agreement; Riegner Telegram; Struma Disaster; Winton, Nicholas; World War II, Outbreak of

Further Reading

Gilbert, Martin. Churchill and the Jews: A Lifelong Friendship. New York: Henry Holt, 2007.
London, Louise. Whitehall and the Jews, 1933–1948: British Immigration Policy, Jewish Refugees, and the Holocaust. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Sherman, A. J. Island Refuge: Britain and Refugees from the Third Reich, 1933–1939. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Wasserstein, Bernard. Britain and the Jews of Europe 1939–1945. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Browning, Christopher

Christopher Browning is an American historian of the Holocaust. Born in 1944 and educated at Oberlin College, Ohio and the University of Wisconsin–Madison, he taught at Pacific Lutheran University, Tacoma, Washington, from 1974 to 1999 before moving to the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill as Frank Porter Graham Professor of History.

Browning's primary early interest in the Holocaust led him to investigate the role played by the German civil service in the formation of policies leading to or carrying out the Holocaust. His first book was The Final Solution and the German Foreign Office (1978), in which he considered the relationship between antisemitic ideology and the implementation of Nazi foreign policy. Most of his research took place in the political archives of the German Foreign Office located in Bonn, after which he began examining other records in German hands for insights into how Nazi bureaucrats and others had carried out the Final Solution. This led Browning into a series of intellectual confrontations known as the Historikerstreit then taking place among historians of the Third Reich. Scholars who became known as "functionalists" were led by the German historians Hans Mommsen and Martin Broszat, who argued that the Holocaust was not the result of a planned, carefully organized, or orchestrated agenda of Adolf Hitler, but was, rather, an evolving and sometimes even chaotic program of death and destruction that really began to assert itself after the invasion of Soviet Russia in June 1941, prior to which it was done by low-level bureaucrats in a somewhat haphazard and inefficient manner. The functionalists viewed the Nazi hierarchy as one of competing vested interests and power centers, with Hitler not in supreme control.

Pitted against them were those known as "intentionalists," who included authors such as Lucy S. Dawidowicz and Eberhard Jäckel. They argued that the Holocaust was primarily centred in the person of Adolf Hitler, his antisemitism, and his commitment to bringing to realization a world free of Jews. Critical to their understanding are Hitler's many public speeches vilifying the Jews and promising them harm, as well as his own masterwork Mein Kampf. The intentionalists also argued that with the invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, and the Wannsee Conference of January 1942, Hitler was able to mobilize the Nazi effort to carry out his long-sought agenda.

Browning stood somewhere between these two poles. While he agreed that there was a good deal of improvisation in the formation of Nazi policy toward the Jews, he could not accept the arguments of Broszat, Mommsen, and others in their totality regarding Hitler. This designated Browning as what might be called a “moderate functionalist.” As a result, he published a short article in 1981, for which he attracted considerable notice within the academy. Notably, he was contacted by Yad Vashem, Israel’s Holocaust museum and research center, with a view to taking part in a projected multivolume comprehensive history of the Holocaust. Browning’s area of responsibility would involve researching and writing on the origins of the Final Solution.

In 1992 he published a book entitled Ordinary Men, a study of German Reserve Police Battalion 101. This unit was used by the Nazis to round up Polish Jews in 1942, either for massacre or deportation to the death camps. Browning employed the postwar court records of 210 former members of the unit in order to ascertain what drove them to murder up to 38,000 men, women, and children in cold blood, while arranging the deportation of 45,000 more; this, from a unit of about 500 men in a period of just 16 months. Browning’s chilling conclusion was that these men—ordinary, middle-aged men of working-class background from Hamburg, who had been drafted but found unfit for combat duty—were neither Nazi fanatics nor sociopathic misfits. Within their cohort, Browning argued, the men of Reserve Police Battalion 101 killed as a result of peer pressure and a fundamental obedience to authority. The broader implication of his study was that people do not have to be maladjusted individuals or political fanatics in order to commit mass murder, but that, rather, group pressure and comradeship plays an important role when it comes to obeying even the most horrific orders.

The release of Ordinary Men caused considerable consternation among those who had preferred to believe that there was something demonic in the Nazis that led them to committing atrocities during the Holocaust; it also received substantial praise from among a majority of Holocaust experts. Browning was, however, castigated by Harvard University scholar Daniel Goldhagen, whose alternative argument was that an innate German antisemitic culture caused the Holocaust. Goldhagen’s own contribution to the discussion—a controversial book produced in 1996 titled Hitler’s Willing Executioners—was seen as the most logical response to Ordinary Men, though many scholars of the Holocaust thought it was a poor attempt at a rebuttal that did little to shake Browning’s essential position.

As a result of his rapidly escalating image as a leading scholar of the Shoah, Browning was engaged in a number of high-profile legal cases in Australia, Canada, and the United Kingdom during the 1990s as an expert witness advocating the veracity of the Holocaust. In addition, he served as an expert witness in the cases of Crown v. Ernst Zündel in Toronto in 1988 and David Irving v. Penguin Books and Deborah Lipstadt in London in 2000.

Browning’s work in Holocaust studies culminated in 2004 with the appearance of his long-awaited study, The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942. Insofar as a comprehensive study can ever be written about such a topic, it was definitive. Here, he again asked whether the Nazis always meant to kill the Jews, or whether their actions simply evolved gradually, radicalizing over time when other solutions to the “Jewish question” became unworkable. Browning’s response was a much more detailed study than anything he had produced before, and in a systematic analysis he worked through a number of issues that had hitherto thrown up a variety of responses. These included the argument that prior to 1939 Hitler’s intention had been to drive the Reich’s Jews out of the country through emigration, but that the conquest of Poland in September of that year forced a shift in tactics from emigration to expulsion—whether to Madagascar, or the Generalgouvernement, or, later, through forced removal into the territories that would be conquered in the Soviet Union.

A second key argument was that the Nazi “Final Solution” evolved slowly as the bureaucrats sought ways to respond to the policy challenge laid before them by their political leaders. The notion of expulsion developed into one in which the Jewish population could be reduced, as they would be worked and starved to death after having been removed from lands coveted for ethnic German resettlement. As Browning showed, however, the Nazi Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads) moved in brutally as the German combat soldiers conquered newer and newer territories within the Soviet Union, their intention being to wage war on the communist government and all those perceived to be its supporters (including, principally, the Jews). With this aim in mind, the Jews were now transformed into an enemy that was both racial and political, and that had to be eradicated completely. The “solutions” of emigration and expulsion were in fact no solutions at all; only the Jews’ utter destruction, for all time, could be countenanced if the glorious future mapped out by National Socialism could be realized.

Browning's third major argument was that the timing of the decision to completely annihilate the Jews of Europe thus took place sometime in the summer of 1941, as the Nazis saw the ease with which they were destroying the Jewish population of the Soviet Union and concluded that the process that had now started could—and should—be extended Europe-wide. The Wannsee Conference of January 1942 therefore played very little role in Browning's conception; the crucial decisions had already been taken, in an improvised manner, back in the summer of 1941. All that remained was the rationalization and, if possible, simplification of the policy already decided.

Browning's study concluded in March 1942. At that point, the majority of Europe's Jews were still alive, and the Final Solution had not yet reached its apogee in the six death camps that the Nazis established in Poland.

After the publication of The Origins of the Final Solution, Browning's research continued along the lines established earlier in his career, and early 2010 saw the appearance of Remembering Survival: Inside a Nazi Slave-Labor Camp, a case study of the Jewish factory slave labor camps in Stara-chowice in central Poland. As he did in his work on Reserve Police Battalion 101, he based his research on a wide range of testimonial literature, in this case, some 265 accounts by survivors of the camps. It was a remarkable story of survival for those who lived to recount the brutalities of the Nazi work camps there. Drawing on the rich testimony of survivors, Browning examined the experiences and survival strategies of the Jewish prisoners alongside the policies and personnel of the Nazi guards. Through asking "how," "when," and "why," and then painstakingly working through vast amounts of documentary material in order to find answers, Christopher Browning established himself as one of the leading Holocaust scholars of the later 20th century.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Historikerstreit; Hitler's Willing Executioners; "Ordinary Men"; Reserve Police Battalion 101

Further Reading

Browning, Christopher. Fateful Months: Essays on the Emergence of the Final Solution. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.

Browning, Christopher. Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. New York: Harper-Collins, 1992.

Browning, Christopher (with contributions by Jürgen Matthäus). The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2004.

Browning, Christopher. The Path to Genocide: Essays on Launching the Final Solution. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Browning, Christopher. Remembering Survival: Inside a Nazi Slave-Labor Camp. New York: Norton, 2010.

Brunner, Alois

Alois Brunner was an Austrian war criminal who was instrumental in the implementation of the Holocaust.

Born in Nádkút Vas, Austria-Hungary (modern-day Austria) on April 8, 1912, Brunner rose to the rank of Hauptsturmführer-SS and served as Adolf Eichmann's personnel secretary in the Zentralstelle (Central Bureau for Jewish Emigration, Vienna). He joined the Austrian Nazi Party in May 1931 at the age of 16. In 1933 Brunner relocated to Germany and served five years in the Austrian Legion. With the Nazi annexation of Austria in 1938, Brunner served in a number of minor posts prior to volunteering for the SS. In November 1938 he was reassigned to the Zentralstelle. There he helped Eichmann in the development of the "Vienna Model," which oversaw the robbing and forced emigration of Jews from Austria.

In April 1939 Brunner was dispatched to the newly acquired Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia (formerly Czechoslovakia) in order to hasten the deportation of Czech Jews. With the outbreak of war in September 1939, the decision to transport Jews east to concentration camps under the newly established Generalgouvernement (formerly Poland) was undertaken. Brunner, now heading the Zentralstelle, organized the transport of over 1,500 Viennese Jews to Nisko in October 1939. In total, Brunner oversaw the removal of 56,000 Austrian Jews, and his success in Vienna earned him a promotion. In October 1942 he was transferred to Berlin to implement the "Vienna Model."

As the war continued, Brunner emerged as Eichmann's favorite troubleshooter. In Salonika, Brunner was responsible for sending the entire Jewish population of 43,000 to death camps in the east in less than two months. In July 1943 Brunner was appointed commandant of the Drancy internment camp outside Paris. There he oversaw the transport of 25,500 Jews to Auschwitz. Brunner took special delight in the arrest and deportation of children. In September 1944 Brunner participated in the arrest and transport of 14,000 Slovakian Jews.

Sought by the Allies following the end of the war in 1945, Brunner escaped arrest and took up residence in West Germany. Discovered in 1950, he fled to the Middle East, where he was recruited by former Nazi Otto Skorzeny into a U.S. CIA program designed to train the Egyptian secret service. He relocated to Syria in the 1960s, where he remained under the protection of the Syrian government. Condemned to death in absentia by a French High Court in 1954, all attempts at extradition have been denied by the Syrian government. Although reportedly injured by a letter bomb, Brunner is believed to still be in Syria, although it is highly unlikely that he remains alive. On November 30, 2014, information was received by the Simon Wiesenthal Center that Brunner had died in Syria in 2010, but the exact date of his death and place of burial are unknown.

ROBERT W. MALICK

See also: Austria; Drancy; Ratlines; Salonika

Further Reading

Cesarani, David. Becoming Eichmann. New York: Da Capo Press, 2006.

Safrain, Hans. Eichmann's Men. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2010.

Wildt, Michael. An Uncompromising Generation: The Nazi Leadership of the Reich Security Office. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2009.

Buchenwald

Buchenwald, located outside Weimar, south of Berlin, was the largest Nazi concentration camp on German soil. The irony of the location is that the city of Weimar was long the center of German democratic thought.

Buchenwald was established in 1937, and from then until the end of World War II in 1945 it held 239,000 Jews, Roma, homosexuals, and political prisoners. By 1938 the majority were Jews, although at first German policy was to pressure Jewish prisoners into leaving Germany by 15-hour days of forced labor in Buchenwald's quarries. In such circumstances, about 10,000 Jews were freed when their families arranged emigration. After 1942, when the Nazis had decided on the "Final Solution"—the total destruction of Europe's Jews—all Jewish prisoners were either shipped to their deaths in the east or placed in permanent slave labor, often worked to death. Some 1,000 children were also kept at Buchenwald in special barracks, and most of them survived the war. As the war progressed, several hundred captured British, Canadian, and American prisoners of war were also kept at Buchenwald. They were deemed spies by the Nazis because they had crashed their planes in France and tried to return to the Allied lines aided by the French Resistance.

Buchenwald was not an extermination camp like Auschwitz. It was a concentration and forced labor camp, where the slave laborers were exploited as thoroughly as possible. Most worked in stone quarries or at an armaments factory operated by the camp; some were shipped out from Buchenwald to 130 "factory camps" to aid the German war effort. Arrivals were greeted by an iron sign, Jedem das Seine—"To each his own,"—or, more accurately, "You get what you deserve."

Prisoners at camps such as Buchenwald were often beaten to death, and many died from malnutrition and exhaustion. Ten thousand died at Buchenwald of neglect and disease; they are remembered with a simple memorial. Thousands of Soviet prisoners of war were summarily executed. More than 1,000 women prisoners were brought to Buchenwald to serve in the camp brothel for staff members.

Some prisoners were subjected to gruesome medical experiments aimed at improving Nazi medical treatment for its own troops. Prisoners were subjected to poison experiments, burned with phosphorus, and infected with diseases. The evil of Buchenwald has often been symbolized by the camp commandant's wife, Ilse Koch, who made lampshades from the skin of Jewish victims, particularly those with tattoos. In April 1945, as the Allied armies advanced toward Weimar, the Nazis began evacuating Jewish prisoners. In the forced march to the west that followed, one-third of the prisoners died.

In 1945 Buchenwald became the first Nazi concentration camp to be liberated by American troops, a day after the prisoners rose up against their captors and killed most of the guards. At liberation, Buchenwald still held 25,000 prisoners, of whom 4,000 were Jews. A total of about 56,000 people perished at Buchenwald. Most died from being worked to death under harsh conditions and inadequate food, but gallows were built at the very start of the camp, and arbitrary executions were common. More than 1,000 victims died by hanging.

From 1945 to 1950, occupying Soviet forces ran an internment camp at Buchenwald for 32,000 Germans; at first it was for suspected war criminals, but it soon turned into a prison for opponents of the communists. More than 7,000 prisoners died during this period.

As at the site of every former Nazi concentration camp, debate rages over the meaning of the site and how it should be presented. One position considers all Holocaust sites hallowed ground to be left untouched as memorials to those who died there. Others see the moral and educational value of showing the details of the Holocaust to future generations; they want the camps preserved and restored to the state they were in as part of the Nazi attempt to destroy the Jewish people. Both sides agree that as the remaining survivors age and die, the camps are the most important tangible reminder of the Holocaust.

Buchenwald was a German Nazi concentration camp established in July 1937. Between April 1938 and April 1945 some 238,380 people of various nationalities were incarcerated at Buchenwald, with up to 56,000 deaths recorded during the camp's existence. This image shows survivors at Buchenwald immediately after their liberation by members of the U.S. 3rd Army in April 1945. (National Archives)

At Buchenwald this conflict is especially acute. For 40 years, Buchenwald was part of communist East Germany. The communists denied any responsibility for the Holocaust, blaming it on the Nazis, whom they identified with the West Germans. With the unification of Germany in 1990, Buchenwald generated furious argument until communist administrators were removed from their jobs. The site is gradually being restored.

The present-day camp reflects the ambiguities of modern German attitudes toward the Holocaust. Most of the original buildings were destroyed shortly after 1945. The current administration uses the former SS officers' rooms, and a backpackers' youth hostel has been placed in the camp guards' barracks. A museum recounts in pictures and artifacts the stark realities of camp life and shows a documentary film. The film, a relic of the communist past, tells more about communist political prisoners than about Jewish victims. In a recent about-face that still manages to avoid the full horror of Buchenwald's place in the Holocaust, the present German authorities have focused on Buchenwald's history after the liberation. There is a memorial at the site of the children's barracks.

NORBERT C. BROCKMAN

See also: Bettelheim, Bruno; Concentration Camps; Franz, Kurt; Hinzert; J.A. Topf and Sons; Kalina, Antonin; Koch Trial; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Medical Experimentation; Roma Genocide in the Holocaust; Schacter, Herschel; Wiesel, Elie

Further Reading

Gedenkstätte Buchenwald (Ed.). Buchenwald Concentration Camp 1937–1945 (A Guide to the Permanent Historical Exhibition). Göttingen: Wallstein Verlag, 2005.

Hackett, David A. The Buchenwald Report. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 1997.

Young, James. The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1994.

Bulgaria

While many people know how Denmark rescued 8,000 Jews from the Nazis, the story about the 50,000 Bulgarian Jews saved through the organized effort of Bulgarian civil society during World War II was hidden for decades. All relevant records were sealed by the Bulgarian communists who did not want the world to know that the czar, the church, and the noncommunist parliamentarians resisted the German plans to exterminate the Bulgarian Jews. After all, those were the same people who were declared fascists and killed by the communist regime. Until the communist downfall in 1989, the story remained one of the last great secrets of the Holocaust era.

Bulgaria is a small country in southeastern Europe, which at the beginning of World War II had a population of 7 million people, among them a small Jewish community of approximately 50,000 people. Most of them had been living in the territory of present-day Bulgaria since the second century CE. There were also some Sephardic Jews who were allowed to settle in the Ottoman Empire after being expelled by Spain in the 14th century.

Despite being an ally of Germany during World War I, Bulgaria resisted the pressure to join the Axis until circumstances beyond its control forced the government to take sides. The Italian debacle in Greece and the anti-German coup in Belgrade meant that the German armies sent to crush the resistance of the two countries had to go through Bulgaria either as allies or occupiers. In order to spare his country the devastation of possible German occupation, Czar

Boris III reluctantly agreed to join the Tripartite Pact on March, 1, 1941. This alliance allowed Bulgaria to recapture Macedonia from Yugoslavia and Thrace from Greece, territories that the country lost after World War I.

Under German pressure, Bulgaria enacted antisemitic laws even before the country officially became an ally of Germany. On January 23, 1941, the so-called Law for Protection of the Nation, which copied the Nuremberg system of anti-Jewish legislation, came into effect. This law, along with additional anti-Jewish measures voted in the summer of 1942, placed restrictions on the economic and professional activities of Bulgaria's Jews, excluded them from public service, and among other things forced them to pay a one-time 20% tax on their net worth. In 1942 the government set up a special Commissariat for Jewish Affairs. The law also suppressed Freemasonry and all other secret organizations. If the Bulgarian government and the czar thought that by enacting these anti-Jewish laws they could preempt possible German attempts to force on Bulgaria their views on the so-called "Final Solution" of the Jewish problem, they were wrong.

On January 21, 1943, Theodor Dannecker, Adolf Eichmann's former representative for the "Jewish Question" in France, arrived in Sofia with the mission of forcing Bulgaria to deport its Jewish population. On February 22, 1943, he reached a secret agreement with the head of the Bulgarian Commissariat for Jewish Affairs, Alexander Belev, for the deportation of 20,000 Jews from the newly acquired Bulgarian territories in Thrace and Macedonia to the German eastern regions by April 15. The Jews in these territories numbered around 13,000 but the Germans were also hoping to deport some 8,000 Bulgarian citizens of Jewish ancestry living in "old" Bulgaria.

While the first arrests began as early as March 3, the public opposition became more vocal after 1,000 Jews were arrested in the town of Kyustendil near Sofia on March 7. The following day a delegation from Kyustendil met with Dimiter Peshev, the deputy speaker of the Parliament and former justice minister, who was close to the Bulgarian Jewish community.

While all this was happening, the deportation of the Jews from Macedonia and Thrace began. On March 18–19, 1943, Jews in Thrace were taken to Lom in Bulgaria; from there they were shipped to Vienna, and then transferred to trains going to Auschwitz and Katowice. All Macedonian Jews were interned by March 11. On March 22 and 25 some were deported by train to Auschwitz; on March 29 the rest were deported to Treblinka.

The protests in Kyustendil reverberated in the Parliament, where a letter, initiated by Peshev and signed by 43 members of the majority party, was delivered to Prime Minister Filov. The representatives opposed all attempts to hand over Bulgarian citizens to a foreign power. In order to quash the rebellion the prime minister removed Peshev from his position as deputy speaker. Nevertheless, the organized efforts of the public, the church, and the parliamentary opposition led by Peshev succeeded in stopping the deportation of the Bulgarian Jews.

The popular resistance temporarily derailed the German efforts, but in May 1943 Belev submitted new plans to Minister of the Interior Poitor Gabrovski to deport all 50,000 Jews in Bulgaria by September 30. Nissim Levy, a leader in the Bulgarian Jewish community, learned of these plans and quickly spread the word. Once again ordinary Bulgarians mobilized to save their compatriots. On May 24, thousands of people participated in a demonstration in the Jewish quarter and later marched to the palace.

It is important to mention the role of the influential Bulgarian Orthodox Church, which firmly objected to the government plans. One of its leaders, Metropolitan Kiril, went as far as to enter the holding area where the Jews were kept and stated, "Wherever you go, I go." Another church leader stated that he would lie on the tracks in order to stop the trains bound for Germany. Nevertheless it looked as if the government would carry on with the deportations.

Ultimately Czar Boris ordered the Jews to be interned in Bulgaria but not deported to Germany. The role of the czar in saving the Bulgarian Jews is hotly debated, but it is an undisputed fact that Boris had the final word in all matters of state, and he refused to authorize the deportation of Bulgaria's Jewish subjects. He justified his actions before the Germans with the need to use Jewish labor for important infrastructure projects in Bulgaria.

While Bulgaria saved the Jews within its pre-1941 borders from extermination, 11,343 Jews from the so-called "new territories" were deported to the Nazi death camps and killed there. From the distance of time it is easy to blame the government for not doing more to save them, but it should not be forgotten that small and militarily insignificant Bulgaria was playing with fire when it defied the Third Reich on an issue that was of extreme importance to the Führer.

Hitler could have ordered the occupation of the country or forced the czar to abdicate, which could have brought a pro-German puppet government to power in Sofia. Faced with extremely difficult choices, the czar did what he could to protect his subjects while preserving his throne, but there were limits to his resistance. At the time many other countries in Europe willingly deported their citizens of Jewish origin to Germany. Boris III died on August 28, 1943, under suspicious circumstances shortly after a stormy meeting with Hitler where he again refused to deport the Bulgarian Jews and send troops to fight the Russians alongside Germany.

SAMOUIL PANAYOTOV

See also: Dannecker, Theodor; Greece; Peshev, Dimitar; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Bar-Zohar, Michael. Beyond Hitler's Grasp: The Heroic Rescue of Bulgaria's Jews. Holbrook (MA): Adams Media, 1998.

Groueff, Stéphane. Crown of Thorns. Lanham (MD): Madison Books, 1987.

Todorov, Tzvetan. The Fragility of Goodness: Why Bulgaria's Jews Survived the Holocaust: A Collection of Texts with Commentary. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Bunel, Lucien-Louis

Lucien-Louis Bunel, better known as Père Jacques de Jésus, OCD, was a Carmelite friar and teacher responsible for accepting several Jewish children into his school for refuge, and for his efforts he was arrested and imprisoned in a number of Nazi concentration camps. The combined effect of these experiences was to cost him his life.

Born in 1900, he was the third of seven children from a hard-working family in Normandy. Inspired by his father's deep piety, strong sense of social justice, and commitment to work, he decided to become a priest. In 1925 he was ordained in the diocese of Rouen and served in the St. Joseph seminary in Le Havre. He combined prayer and seclusion with social activism and was noted for his sermons and preaching. As a teacher of religion and English, he employed modern approaches to classroom management and was renowned for his intellect and sense of humor.

His longing for solitude and a life of contemplation, mixed with service to the poor, saw him consider joining a monastery. In 1930, upon deeper reflection, he entered the novitiate of the Carmelite Order and took his vows as Père Jacques three years later. In 1934, at the suggestion of his superiors, he opened a new Carmelite boarding school for boys, the Petit Collège Sainte-Thérèse de l'Enfant-Jésus in Avon, Seine-et-Marne.

Père Jacques remained at the school as principal until 1939, when he was called up for military service. When France surrendered to Germany in June 1940, however, he had little intention of resuming a quiet life. Returning to the school, he became an active member of the French Resistance.

He decided to resist in a novel way—not through physical confrontation, but through the act of rescue. He made the school a refuge for Jews and opened its doors to young Frenchmen seeking to avoid conscription for forced labor in Germany. In January 1943 he enrolled three Jewish boys—Hans-Helmut Michel, Jacques-France Halpern, and Maurice Schlosser—as students. A fourth, Maurice Bas, was hidden in plain sight as a worker at the school, while Maurice Schlosser’s father was protected by a local villager. When Lucien Weil, a distinguished botanist from the National Museum of Natural History in Paris, sought sanctuary, Père Jacques placed him on the faculty. In addition, he sought every opportunity to place Jewish children with Catholic families so their lives might be spared.

On January 15, 1944, however, these initiatives came to an end. A former member of the school had been captured and tortured by the Gestapo into revealing what Père Jacques had been up to, and they learned of the hidden Jews’ whereabouts. On February 3, 1944, the three students—Michel, Halpern, and Schlosser—together with Lucien Weil, his mother, and his sister, were taken to Auschwitz and gassed. Père Jacques was also arrested and the school immediately shut down. One of the students in the school was Louis Malle, who grew up to become an Academy Award-winning film director. He later remembered that as Père Jacques was being led away he turned to the watching students and said: “Au revoir et à bientôt” (“goodbye and see you soon”). This farewell was to be the inspiration for Malle’s celebrated autobiographical film from 1987, Au Revoir les Enfants.

At first Père Jacques was interned in the prison at Fontainebleau but was moved to a brutal German “reprisal camp” at Neue-Bremm, where he remained for three horrendous weeks during which 44 of the 51 prisoners who arrived with him perished. On April 22, 1944, he was transferred to Mauthausen and immediately set about the task of trying to help others, sharing his rations, hearing confession, and bringing whatever comfort he could. On May 18, however, he was sent to Gusen, a subcamp of Mauthausen. When the priests imprisoned there were transferred to the “priest block” at Dachau, Père Jacques hid his identity in order to remain at Gusen so he could continue ministering to the prisoners.

The eighteen months of his captivity left him sick and exhausted. When American troops arrived to liberate the camp on May 5, 1945, Père Jacques, suffering from tuberculosis and weighing only 75 pounds, tried to restore order among the prisoners and helped organize the relief effort. On May 20 he was moved to a hospital near the Carmelite Friars in Linz, but he succumbed several days later and died on June 2, 1945, aged just 45. His body was returned to France and buried in the cemetery of Avon.

On January 17, 1985, Yad Vashem recognized Père Jacques as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his efforts in hiding Jewish students and saving their lives in his school during the Holocaust. Within the Catholic Church he was honored further, when the cause for his canonization was opened in 1990.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: France; Priest Block, Dachau; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Murphy, Francis J. Père Jacques: Resplendent in Victory.

Washington, DC: ICS Publications, 1998.

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.

Bureaucracy

National Socialist bureaucracy stands at the center of Holocaust scholarship. Asking how the mass murder of the Jews was possible, some historians have concluded that the Nazi administrative system was the key to organizing genocide. Bureaucratic structures, it has been argued, radicalized policies of mass murder and made the implementation of the Final Solution possible. The Holocaust was organized by enormous administrative machinery that played a crucial role in every step of the mass murder process. Defining who was considered to be a “racial” enemy, German bureaucracy compiled information about Jews, Sinti and Roma, and so-called “genetically diseased” persons. The regime employed thousands of people to record data. Segregating Jews from the rest of the population and restricting their private lives, state administrators issued antisemitic decrees and regulations by the hundreds. Bureaucrats on all levels of government planned, adopted, and enforced anti-Jewish legislation. Stealing their victim’s property, moreover, the Nazis required the help of administrators to register and manage Jewish assets. Finally, the deportation and annihilation of Jews relied on the bureaucratic apparatus. Transportation to the killing centers as well as systematic mass murder involved the assistance of administrators who rarely participated in the killings themselves. The bureaucratic organization of the Holocaust consisted of impersonal paperwork that combined hierarchical structures with informal chains of command. Constituting the backbone of the Third Reich's genocidal policies, Nazi bureaucracy merged modern administrative structures with ideological convictions and individual agency.

After National Socialism's seizure of power at the end of January 1933, the Nazis transformed the apparatus of state into an instrument of terror. Even though the legal system of the Weimar Republic remained largely in effect, National Socialism incorporated the party into existing administrative and legal structures, thus creating a parallel bureaucracy that stood above the law. The Nazis placed the SS and German police at the center of the new order. The Decree for the Protection of the People and the State, dated February 28, 1933, provided the Gestapo and SA with the authority to arrest people at will, a move which laid the foundation for a dual administration that simultaneously preserved and undermined existing laws. Although the planning and organization of the Holocaust was driven primarily by the core group of perpetrators within Heinrich Himmler's SS, its implementation required the cooperation of larger networks that reached deep into industry, military, party, and state institutions. Bureaucracy, in other words, bound the Nazi regime together.

With the merger of party and state, bureaucratic structures became increasingly intertwined. Legal scholar Franz Neumann depicted the Third Reich as a vast network of conflicting agencies with overlapping responsibilities, comparing it to a monster that transformed justice into chaos. Disagreement was a frequent occurrence in the Nazi administrative system. For example, scholars noted frictions between economic calculations and the rationale of genocide. Some agencies involved in war production tried to prevent killings of skilled Jewish laborers as general shortages of qualified workers slowed down the war effort. Skirmishes within the administrative system dissolved when the stronger party held sway. Mass murder prevailed in the case of the decision to kill the Jews or exploit their labor. Both generating and regulating conflict, moreover, the Führer stood on top of the bureaucracy. Adolf Hitler provided his underlings with ideological guidelines and practical goals that were to drive Nazi policy. At the same time, he promoted rivalry. Endorsing the most extremist faction, Hitler navigated the state toward genocide.

"Functionalist" historians such as Raul Hilberg, Martin Broszat, and Hans Mommsen explained the Holocaust by referring to the radicalizing effects of Nazi bureaucracy. They argued that, rather than ideological convictions, the structure of the National Socialist state drove the German system of mass murder. Downplaying the role of National Socialist beliefs as a motivating factor for genocide, functionalism left no room for individual agency. Political theorist Hannah Arendt, for example, explored perpetrators through a functionalist lens in her reports on the Eichmann Trial. Regarding the Holocaust as a crime of desk murderers who killed Jews out of careerism, sense of duty, and perfectionism, she depicted Nazi bureaucrats as cogs in a system of terror that had developed a life on its own. Completely removed from their victims, she claimed, Nazi administrators just did what they were told to do. Studies of SS bureaucrats, however, have shown that antisemitic convictions loomed large in the minds of the desk murderers. Ideology and bureaucracy cannot be separated.

While functionalists argued that the competition between different agencies of the Nazi regime generated radicalization, empirical studies have demonstrated that consensus usually overrode interagency conflicts. The argument that cooperation, not friction, constituted a main feature of National Socialist bureaucracy brought individual agency back to the forefront of scholarship. Genocide, most historians of Nazi Germany now concur, was not embedded into structures that delegated orders from top to bottom but unfolded in the cooperation of center and periphery. National Socialist bureaucracy, historian Michael Thad Allen argues, emphasized low-level autonomy and individual agency. Far from following orders, bureaucrats played an active role in crafting antisemitic and racist policies on their own volition. The Final Solution relied heavily on local and regional administrators who developed their own exclusionary measures, provided the impetus for the regime's policies, and modeled the system of mass murder. Processes for identifying and segregating the victims, confiscating their property, and deporting them to annihilation camps were assigned to a proliferation of agencies.

To unite the various agencies of Nazi bureaucracy, the Third Reich created both visible and invisible means of coordination. On the one hand, National Socialism generated organizational mechanisms to synchronize the process of destruction. The office of Adolf Eichmann, for example, was in charge of orchestrating deportations to the death camps and ensured that local authorities, transportation, and killing centers functioned seamlessly. On the other hand, shared beliefs and common goals underpinned Nazi administration. The antisemitic consensus permeating the Third Reich guaranteed that most Germans raised few objections to Hitler's genocidal plans. Backed by a committed bureaucracy, eager to fulfill Hitler's wishes, the perpetrators prepared and carried out the Holocaust. Nazi ideology eased tensions within the bureaucratic apparatus and fostered partnership between competing factions within the regime.

MICHAEL NOLTE

See also: Arendt, Hannah; Desk Killers; "Functionalists"; Hilberg, Raul; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Third Reich

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. Rev. ed. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Feldman, Gerald D., and Wolfgang Seibel (Eds.). Networks of Nazi Persecution: Bureaucracy, Business and the Organization of the Holocaust. New York: Berghahn Books, 2006.

Fraenkel, Ernst. The Dual State. A Contribution to the Theory of Dictatorship. New York: Oxford University Press, 1941.

Neumann, Franz. Behemoth: The Structure and Practice of National Socialism, 1933–1944. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2009.

Büro Grüber

Heinrich Grüber was a German Protestant theologian and anti-Nazi opposed to National Socialist antisemitic racial hatred, risking his life to offer active assistance to the Jews of Germany. Born on June 24, 1891, in Stolberg, Germany, he was the eldest son of a teacher, Dr. Ernst Grüber, and his wife, Alwine Clevén. His mother, who came from Limburg, gave her son an early knowledge of the Dutch language and culture, while he learned French from his father, who had been raised in France. After initially studying philosophy, history, and Protestant theology, at Easter 1914 he undertook his first theological exam before seeing front-line service as a volunteer in the German artillery in World War I. After the war, in 1920, he was ordained as a pastor in Berlin and obtained his first pulpit in Dortmund-Brackel before moving in 1926 to Brandenburg as director of a home for retarded boys at Templin.

In early 1933 he joined the Nazi Party, though his membership was short lived as Grüber soon became a dissident. He joined the Pfarrernotbund (the Emergency Association for Protestant Pastors), formed in September 1933 by Pastor Martin Niemöller as a protest against the introduction of Nazi antisemitic legislation into the church.

As a result, he was dismissed by the Nazis from his position at Templin, and he was only able to find employment again in February 1934. As a member of the Confessing

Church, Grüber now found himself in constant conflict with his parish council, which was for the most part dominated by conforming "German Christians" who fell in behind the regime. He was given responsibility for the Dutch community in Berlin, but in May 1938 he assumed a new role: establishing an "auxiliary body for non-Aryan Christians," looking after Christian families of Jewish background as determined by the Nazi racial laws. This became known as the Büro Grüber (Grüber Bureau) and opened in central Berlin just three weeks after the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938. Its core function, as Grüber saw it, was to help organize the emigration of Jews facing imprisonment in concentration camps. It would soon become one of the more important rescue offices for racially persecuted Jews.

Grüber ran his office without any formal church authorization, but his work was supported by the Nazi authorities on the ground that by facilitating Jewish emigration he was actually helping the Third Reich remove Jews from Germany. Further, over time the line between "non-Aryan Christians" and Jews became indistinct, and Büro Grüber found itself working more and more closely with the representative body of German Jewry, the Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland (Reich Association of Jews in Germany), established by the Nazis on July 4, 1939, under the presidency of Rabbi Leo Baeck.

Overall, until its dissolution in December 1940, Büro Grüber helped to facilitate the emigration of between 1,700 and 2,000 Jews. Pastor Grüber was able to achieve this remarkable feat through exploiting his status as an Aryan minister with connections to government departments that had the same objective as he did, albeit for different reasons. It was those reasons, however, that made all the difference for Grüber's eventual fate. He did not simply attempt to expedite the emigration of Jews from Germany; he also tried to make the lives of those remaining as sustainable as possible. This, in the government's view, only acted as an incentive for Jews to stay. Moreover, with each successive antisemitic move from the regime, Grüber became more and more vociferous in his protests.

Finally, on December 19, 1940, he was arrested by the Gestapo and taken to Sachsenhausen. From there, in 1941 he was transferred to Dachau and incarcerated in the so-called "Pfarrerblock" ("priest barracks"). The next two years saw him having to endure severe beatings from Nazi guards together with psychological torments. He witnessed the suffering of his former assistant (and protégé), Werner Sylten, who was deported to the "euthanasia" plant at Hartheim Castle in Austria and murdered in August 1942. The Büro Grüber was dissolved, and most of its staff were deported to death camps.

Grüber was released from Dachau on June 23, 1943, after suffering a series of heart attacks. Later, with the war over, he became dean of St. Mary's Church in Berlin. He spent much of his remaining energy trying to bring about a meaningful and lasting dialogue between the government of West Germany and the State of Israel, in whose cause he remained a constant advocate. He was a witness for the prosecution at the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann in Israel, which necessitated him traveling to the Jewish state.

For his wartime work in opposing the Nazis and rescuing Jews he was honored widely in the years that followed. Just a few of his awards included the establishment of a Heinrich Grüber forest in Jerusalem on October 18, 1961; a knighthood of the Order of Oranje-Nassau bestowed by Queen

Juliana of the Netherlands on June 21, 1966; and, also in 1966, election to the position of honorary president of the German-Israeli Society. Of greatest significance, perhaps, was his recognition by Yad Vashem on July 28, 1964, as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Heinrich Grüber died of a heart attack in Berlin on November 29, 1975, aged 84.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Priest Block, Dachau; Protestant Churches, German; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Sylten, Walter, Joachim-Dieter Schwäbl, and Michael Kreutzer.

Büro Pfarrer Grüber: Evangelische Hilfsstelle für ehemals Rasseverfolgte. Geschichte und Wirken heute. Berlin: Evangelische Hilfsstelle für ehemals Rasseverfolgte, 1988.

Yad Vashem. Grüber, Propst (Dean) Heinrich: <http://db.yadvashem.org/righteous/family.html?language=en&itemId=4043003>.

C

Calmeyer, Hans

From the moment Hans Calmeyer started work for the Nazi administration in occupied Holland on March 3, 1941, he realized that doing so would afford him the opportunity to help persecuted Jews. Utilizing his position, he later became known in some circles as the “Dutch Schindler.” So far as can be ascertained, he had no ulterior motive for saving Jews, only his own moral code of doing the right thing. From this, and working within the Nazi system, he was able to save thousands of Jews during the Holocaust.

Calmeyer was born on June 23, 1903, in the German city of Osnabrück, Saxony. His father was a judge. Relatively little is known of his childhood, though it is recorded that because of his father’s profession the concepts of law and justice, as well as notions of morality, were instilled in him at an early age. Inevitably, Calmeyer studied law, and after qualifying as an attorney he opened his own practice in Osnabrück.

After the Nazis came to power in 1933, Calmeyer’s straightforward and contented life began to change. His legal practice took on many cases concerning communists, resulting in the regime questioning and closely monitoring his work.

Soon after the passage of the Nuremberg Laws in 1935, one of the many restrictions against Jews in public life saw a rule banning Aryans from employing Jewish assistants. Calmeyer’s small practice had only two employees, one of whom was Jewish. When he refused to dismiss her, he attracted the attention of the Nazi regime and his license was revoked for a year.

Called up for the army in May 1940, Calmeyer took part in the invasion of the Netherlands, after which a friend offered him a job with the occupation authorities in the General Commissariat for Administration and Justice in The Hague. This would involve examining and adjudicating “doubtful” racial cases, ruling on the appropriate classification of each person in question, and declaring the person either fully Jewish, partly Jewish, or Aryan. It was here that he saw his opportunity to aid Jews, though he knew he would have to avoid arousing any suspicion that he was acting outside of the rules.

The team he built around him was comprised of several dependable local lawyers, who worked with him in helping to draw up false credentials. Contrary to the Nuremberg Laws, Calmeyer argued that the legitimacy of Jewish heritage should not be based on a person’s membership in the Jewish community but rather should be determined from other forms of evidence such as birth and baptismal certificates. The distinction made all the difference in the world for the Jews whose cases he was to adjudicate. It created a legal loophole, leading to a deception allowing Calmeyer to save thousands from deportation. Of the 4,787 cases brought before him, he decided that 42% were to be considered half-Jews (mischlinge first degree) and another 18% one-quarter Jews (mischlinge second degree), creating a total of 60% who were thereby exempt from immediate deportation.

He referred to his work as “building a lifeboat,” not only to help Jewish families remain together but also to provide them with a sense of hope. With the help of only his closest and most trusted friends, he turned a blind eye to fabricated baptismal certificates and falsified documents so he could save Jews, or at the very least stall their deportation to Auschwitz.

Given that he had to be seen as incorruptible, Calmeyer was not personally involved in any of the forgeries. In fact, he sidestepped any personal contact with lawyers who approached his department on behalf of Jewish clients so that he would not be suspected of being overly sympathetic. Further, he did not attempt to intervene personally on behalf of Jews in any official capacity.

The SS leadership was highly suspicious of Calmeyer's work and constantly urged the higher authorities to close down his operation. He knew this, and, playing for time whenever possible, continually added more names to his special list while trying always to find ways to extend his field of operations.

In June 1943 Calmeyer's team was put under close inspection after SS Police Chief Hanns Albin Rauter asked for a complete reexamination of the "Calmeyer Jews." While Rauter had been suspicious of Calmeyer's work for some time, there had been a series of internal power struggles in the Nazi establishment that had delayed Calmeyer's evaluation. The committee appointed to investigate him included a Dutch SS member, Ludo Ten Cate, who had been appointed in early 1942 to the position of official representative for genealogical certificates. Eventually, however, Ten Cate became involved in a vehement quarrel with other Nazi experts, leading to his dismissal in August 1944 and his transfer to the Eastern Front. After Ten Cate's removal, the SS continued to investigate Calmeyer's practice and kept a close eye on every document that passed through his hands. The following year Calmeyer was openly confronted about trying to save Jewish lives through swindling and deception. He persevered to the end, however, and through his efforts at least 3,000 Jewish lives were saved, the majority as a clear result of his judicious manipulation of the rules.

Hans Calmeyer died in 1972 at the age of 69. On March 4, 1992, Israel's Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Hans Georg Calmeyer had both the moral determination and a position in the Nazi apparatus that enabled him to bring about real change. His is an example of a humanitarian leader during a dangerous period, and his moral leadership saved the lives of thousands of Jews in an act of resistance all too rarely replicated during the period of the Third Reich.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Netherlands; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Niebaum, Peter, Rolf Düsterberg, Siegfried Hummel, and Tilman Westphalen. Ein Gerechter unter den Völkern: Hans Calmeyer in seiner Zeit (1903–1972). Osnabrück: Edition Rasch, 2001.

Paldiel, Mordecai. Saving the Jews. Amazing Stories of Men and Women Who Defied the Final Solution. Rockville (MD): Schreiber, 2000.

Cargas, Harry James

Harry James Cargas was a professor of literature at Webster University in St. Louis, Missouri, and one of the leading Catholic voices examining Christian-Jewish relations in light of the Holocaust. His work transcended the world of the classroom and the lecture circuit. Through the pen, through radio and television, and through interfaith dialogue, Cargas spread his message widely. In 35 books, 2,600 printed articles of all kinds (ranging from commentaries on religion, to the Holocaust, to baseball, and innumerable other topics in between), through speaking appearances at more than 200 universities around the world, and across the airwaves via a radio talk show he ran on Missouri Public Radio for 24 years, Cargas reached an audience that was simultaneously diverse, discerning, and receptive.

Born in 1932 to an American mother of Polish descent and a Greek immigrant father, and raised in a tough neighborhood in Detroit, he began (and quit) his university studies four times, working instead at various jobs around the United States. He rarely thought about Jews, and even less about the Christian-Jewish relationship. It took almost until the onset of early middle age before he even encountered the word "Holocaust," and that by accident, in a magazine excerpt of Elie Wiesel's Night that he read one evening in his living room.

Turning his attention to the Holocaust was at first no easy matter. With practically no background in the history of the topic, Cargas read as much as he could find on the Nazi persecution of the Jews. It was whilst doing this that he had, as he put it, a surprising illumination: the realization that probably every Jew killed in the Holocaust was murdered by a baptized Christian. Cargas henceforth found it increasingly difficult to reconcile his Catholic Christianity with the reality of the Holocaust and those who were its perpetrators. He would now begin a sincere questioning of what had become a vital part of his very existence.

It was his search for an answer that led him to make the statement that would define all of his subsequent work: “To call myself a Roman Catholic is to describe my spiritual development incompletely. It is more honest for me to say at this time in my life that I am a post-Auschwitz Catholic.” He stated further: “to identify myself as a Roman Catholic, in the shadow of recent history, is inaccurate, incomplete, even misleading.”

Such enlightenment led Cargas on a quest that reconsidered what Christianity meant now that its fundamentals had been challenged so radically. For Cargas, Christianity failed during the Shoah; by its ongoing refusal to come to terms with that failure, the church was demonstrating that it did not recognize a need for repentance. But there was more to it than that. One of the features of Cargas’s writing that made him such a commanding voice was an ability to offer practical suggestions for the future alongside criticism about past and present. His most important contribution, first put as early as 1979 and repeated many times after that, was a list of 16 proposals that, if adopted, would establish a proper foundation for Christian-Jewish reconciliation:

1. The Catholic Church should excommunicate Adolf Hitler;
2. The Christian liturgical calendar should include an annual memorial service for the Jewish victims of the Holocaust;
3. We Christians must publicly and officially admit the errors of our teachers where they were wrong concerning Jews;
4. The Christian Church must insist on the essential Jewishness of Christianity;
5. Jesus should be recognised as a link between Jews and Christians;
6. The Church’s teachings on the subject of evil need to be re-evaluated;
7. Traditional Christian theologies of history must be re-examined;
8. The Vatican’s historical archives for the twentieth century need to be opened to historians;
9. Chairs of Judaic Studies ought to be established at more Christian colleges and universities;
10. We might look to see if a redefinition of the notion of inspiration in Christian scripture is appropriate;
11. Christians must find new terminology to what we now designate as Old Testament and New Testament;
12. The Christian Sabbath should be changed to Saturday;
13. Catholics must demand an encyclical letter which deals specifically with the sins of antisemitism and with the sins of Christians in their actions toward Jews;
14. The heavy Christian emphasis on missionising should be re-directed toward perfecting individual Christian lives;
15. We Christians need to get on our knees and repent our sins against the Jewish people;
16. The Vatican should recognise Israel.

These 16 points would remain intact until Cargas’s death in 1998.

Being a “post-Auschwitz Catholic” meant, in the first place, that one acknowledged the inadequacies of the church during the Shoah and faced up to the responsibility of individual Catholics who participated in it. Second, it meant that one would henceforth seek atonement for the church’s past sins toward God’s first covenant people. And finally, it meant that one undertook to work, in a practical sense, for reconciliation between Catholics and Jews in the future. Then, and only then, could one address the question of how best to serve God through the medium of the church. Cargas’s hope was that every professing Catholic would achieve this realization, and that, because of it, the doctrinal foundation of the church would itself undergo change.

Cargas also sought to learn where others stood, and he engaged in a series of dialogues with scholars, clergy, and laity for the purpose of opening up discussion. In 1992 he republished (and expanded) an earlier discourse with one of the Shoah’s leading voices in Conversations with Elie Wiesel. A year later came the highly acclaimed Voices from the Holocaust (1993), a series of conversations conducted between Cargas and a number of leading thinkers in the area. These included such notables as Simon Wiesenthal, Jan Karski, Leo Eitingor, Emil Fackenheim, and, again, Elie Wiesel.

Even after his death his influence was felt in the area of dialogue: first, through the completion of a project that had been dear to his heart for some time, Holocaust Scholars Write to the Vatican (1998); and second, through the appearance of his 35th (and last) book, another edited volume titled Problems Unique to the Holocaust (1999)—problems not qualitative or quantitative, but rather of a theological and moral nature, problems still yet to be resolved despite the considerable distance the church had traveled since Cargas first began his quest nearly three decades earlier.

Harry James Cargas was, in short, one of the most important lay Catholic voices in Christian-Jewish relations in the second half of the 20th century. In general terms, we may evaluate his work in the following ways. First, he was a scholar of Christian thought who found it extremely difficult to reconcile the church's past with his own spiritual present; he managed to do so by a rigorous and emotionally painful confrontation with that past and an acknowledgment that only through full repentance could a meaningful future be established. Second, he taught that others should imitate him in this quest if the religion overall was to have any credibility as a faith system. Third, he was an activist who strongly believed in letting his behavior speak with the same degree of exertion as his pen. Harry James Cargas was a man who could do his theology as well as write it, and who took a genuine Christian interest in his fellow human beings.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Catholic Church; Theological Responses to the Holocaust

Further Reading

- Cargas, Harry James. A Christian Response to the Holocaust. Denver: Stonehenge Books, 1981.
- Cargas, Harry James (Ed.). Holocaust Scholars Write to the Vatican. Westport (CT): Greenwood Press, 1998.
- Cargas, Harry James (Ed.). Problems Unique to the Holocaust. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1999.
- Cargas, Harry James. Reflections of a Post-Auschwitz Christian. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989.
- Cargas, Harry James. Shadows of Auschwitz: A Christian Response to the Holocaust. New York: Crossroad, 1990.
- Cargas, Harry James. When God and Man Failed: Non Jewish Views of the Holocaust. New York: Macmillan, 1981.
- Garber, Zev, and Richard Libowicz (Eds.). Peace, in Deed: Essays in Honor of Harry James Cargas. Tampa: University of South Florida Press, 1998.
- Jacobs, Steven Leonard. "Harry James Cargas: Appreciation and Response." Journal of Reform Judaism 32, 2 (Spring 1985), 33–43.

Catholic Church

The role the Catholic Church played in the Holocaust remains a murky and divisive issue. Scholars simply remain in the dark on many issues, while others disagree sharply regarding what the church knew, when it knew it, and what it did about the systematic persecution and murder of European Jews during the 1930s and 1940s. The study of the church's stance toward the Holocaust may be divided into two periods: the first begins in 1922, upon the ascension of Pope Pius XI to the papacy and ends with his death in 1939;

the second begins with the papacy of Pius XII in 1939 and ends with the defeat of Nazi Germany in 1945.

On February 6, 1922, Achille Ratti became Pope Pius XI; coincidentally, later that same year Benito Mussolini instigated the world's first fascist dictatorship in Italy. Although the new pope fundamentally distrusted Mussolini and the fascists, in 1929 the pragmatic Pius negotiated the Lateran Treaty with Mussolini's government, which formed an uneasy understanding between church and state and permitted the Vatican to operate independently. At the time, Italian fascists had not yet made antisemitism a major part of their ideology. By the early 1930s, however, Pius began to criticize Mussolini's regime as well as the activities of Germany's up-and-coming Nazi Party. In 1931 Pius proclaimed that one could not be a Catholic and a fascist at the same time; this soured relations with the Mussolini government. Nevertheless, just two years later, the pope signed a concordat with the new German government under Adolf Hitler.

Pius XI entered into this agreement for several reasons. First, he hoped to protect the considerable number of clergy then operating in Germany from state repression. Second, he desired to keep the Catholic Church a viable institution in Germany to ensure the faithful that they would have churches in which to worship. Finally, and perhaps most important, Pius hoped that Germany would continue to act as a bulwark against "Godless communism," which he feared more than fascism and Nazism. The pope negotiated the concordat with Hitler even though Hitler had made no secret of his hatred of Jews and Nazi ideology that specifically called for the oppression of Jews. In Pius's mind, however, the agreement was better than permitting Hitler to repress or even outlaw the church. Despite this, during the late 1930s Pius spoke out against Nazi ideology—including antisemitism—and also openly criticized Mussolini's move toward antisemitism, which began in 1938.

When Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli became Pope Pius XII in March 1939 the clouds of war were gathering on the horizon, and the Nazis had already begun their program of brutality against the Jews. In Italy, Mussolini, now allied with Hitler, had begun his own campaign of oppression against Italian Jews. Pius XII, who had served as the papal nuncio to Germany during the period 1917–1929, was well aware of Nazi ideology and the position of German Jews. But the new pope was above all a diplomat schooled in realpolitik, and he worked hard to maintain civil relations with the fascist regimes. Perhaps even more so than his predecessor, Pius XII viewed communism as a larger existential threat to the church than fascism. Finally, after Mussolini was ousted in 1943 and the Germans began fighting the Allies in Italy, the pope feared that the Vatican itself might come under attack, thereby destroying the Holy See and destroying priceless art and artifacts. Thus, from Pius's perspective, avoiding overt hostility with the Nazi regime seemed to be the only palatable alternative.

This stance, of course, opened him up to considerable criticism. Some argued that he turned a blind eye toward the Holocaust. In fairness, he did make public statements condemning racial laws, deportations, and the plight of Italian Jews. On the other hand, he never openly challenged the Nazi regime and did not speak in public about the Holocaust. He was reportedly deeply torn and troubled about this, but believed that challenging Hitler directly would result in serious negative consequences for the church. Research in recent years has revealed that Pius XII quite likely knew about the extent of the Holocaust. After World War II ended, the pope came under more criticism because the Vatican apparently issued passports to suspected war criminals that allowed them to escape to other parts of the world, where they would not be prosecuted.

Clearly, the Catholic Church as an institution could have done more to protect Jews, publicize the horrors of the Holocaust, and perhaps even stop the killing. But the price of such action was deemed dangerously high, and Pius XII chose the safer of two options. Outside the hierarchy of the church, however, are countless stories of priests, nuns, and Catholic lay people who aided Jews throughout Europe. The church began a systematic reappraisal of its relationship to world Jewry beginning with the papacy of Pope John XXIII and that began a long-term trend that continues today. In 1986 Pope John Paul II became the first pontiff in history to visit a synagogue.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: André, Joseph; Cargas, Harry James; Coughlin, Charles; Croatia; Degrelle, Léon; The Deputy; Friedländer, Saul; Galen, Clemens August Graf von; Gerstein, Kurt; Hesselblad, Maria Elizabeth; Hudal, Alois; Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph; Kolbe, Raymond; Lichtenberg, Bernhard; Marie-Benoît, Père; Microstates during the Holocaust; Pius XI; Pius XII; Priest Block, Dachau; Ratlines; Rotta, Angelo; Salkaházi, Sara; Schönerer, Georg Ritter von; Slachta, Margit; St. Hedwig's Cathedral; Stein, Edith; Tiso, Jozef; Touvier Case; Von Faulhaber, Michael

Further Reading

Cornwell, John. Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII. New York: Viking, 1999.
Phayer, Michael. The Catholic Church and the Holocaust, 1930–1965. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.

Central Office for Jewish Emigration

The Central Office for Jewish Emigration (Zentralstelle für jüdische Auswanderung) was a German government office established to facilitate and expedite the emigration of Jews from Nazi-controlled areas. Eventually there was a network of these Nazi Zentralstelle institutions in Vienna, Prague, Berlin, and Amsterdam

In March 1938 Germany occupied Austria, and a reign of terror broke over the Austrian Jews. In July 1938 SS-Obersturmführer (first lieutenant) Adolf Eichmann was given the task of accelerating Jewish emigration and easing the numerous bureaucratic bottlenecks through which aspiring emigrants had to pass. Eichmann used business practices to create order. He surveyed the relevant agencies and ordered them to locate their offices in one place. He ordered the creation of a central Jewish organization so that he would have leaders with whom to negotiate, and he allowed Zionist organizations to operate within them. Money was extracted from well-off Jews to fund the emigration of the mass of poor Jews.

The Vienna office was founded in August 20, 1938, via a notice headed "Jews in Nazi-Occupied Austria" to all offices of the Nazi Party and State of Austria. It stated that the Zentralstelle was being established to overcome undesirable interruptions and delays occurring in the emigration of Jews, and inefficiencies between offices when dealing with the question of Jewish emigration.

The Central Office was to deal with the following matters, in cooperation with other related government agencies: creating opportunities for emigration through negotiations for entry permits with the competent German and other emigration organizations; obtaining the foreign currency required for emigration; establishing and supervising professional retraining centers; cooperating with travel agencies and shipping companies to ensure the technical arrangements for emigration; supervising Jewish political and other emigration associations with regard to their attitude concerning emigration; and issuing guidelines and continuous contacts with all offices connected with the emigration of Jews from Austria.

All party offices and other authorities were instructed to pass on all applications for emigration to the Central Office for Jewish Emigration immediately upon receipt without taking action of their own, and sending to the office all Jews desirous of emigrating. Jews who wished to emigrate were in future to apply only to the Central Office for Jewish Emigration. The Zentralstelle was to control further procedures and, in particular, obtain the permits required for emigration from the competent office and supervise the final emigration.

Every organization, public or private, associated with emigration was required to have a representative at the office. The office answered to the inspector of the security police, SS Standartenführer Dr. Franz Stahlecker, later notorious as the commander of Einsatzgruppe A, the most murderous of the four Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads during the Holocaust).

The inception of the Zentralstelle resulted from Adolf Eichmann seeking an effective and efficient way of getting around the red tape faced by Austrian Jews trying to leave Austria. His view was that because of the red tape of the various authorities, and particularly their lack of coordination, Jews who were prepared to emigrate found it extremely difficult to leave the country. For example, when the Revenue Office had issued the requisite certificate of lack of impediment, the exit visa from the passport police would, in the meanwhile, have expired, or it was no longer possible to obtain passage by sea. It was because of such experiences that the Central Office for Jewish Emigration was set up.

Eichmann had effectively established an “assembly line” system whereby a Jew could show up at the Central Emigration Office with his papers and proceed from desk to desk until he arrived at the end, with a passport and an exit visa but stripped of his property, cash, and rights, only a passport in which was written: “You must leave this country within two weeks; if you fail to do so, you will go to a concentration camp.” Within a few months, the office had processed the emigration of 150,000 Jews.

The methods introduced by Eichmann in the Zentralstelle in Vienna were later used as models for the expulsion of European Jewry. He moved all of the Jews of Austria into Vienna and established quotas for the number who had to emigrate. He then made the Jewish community responsible for filling those quotas and for paying for the expulsion themselves. Jews with more money were made to pay for Jews who could not finance themselves.

Following the success of the Vienna Zentralstelle, Eichmann opened another branch in Prague on July 29, 1939, after the Nazis occupied Bohemia and Moravia. This office was headed by Adolf Eichmann himself, and it ultimately dealt with the expulsion of the Jews of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia to Theresienstadt.

After the Germans occupied Poland in September 1939, Eichmann was put in charge of banishing the Jews who lived in those parts of western Poland that had been annexed to Germany. On December 21, 1939, he was placed in charge of all security police affairs relating to the clearance of the eastern areas. He moved to Berlin to run the Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration and consolidated the Vienna and Berlin offices into one. The office soon became a department of the Reich Security Main Office and later helped supervise the deportation of European Jews to the extermination camps.

Eventually, Eichmann set up a Central Office so that all arrangements for emigration could be made in one location. On January 24, 1939, the Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration was established with Reinhard Heydrich at the head. It was charged with the task of using all available means to prompt Jews to emigrate, as well as establishing a Jewish organization that would incorporate all of German Jewry and coordinate emigration from the Jewish side.

Between 1938 and 1941 expenditures of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee for swift Austrian Jewish emigration amounted to close to $2 million. The funds, administered via the official Israelitische Kultusgemeinde Wien (IKG)—the only Jewish organization allowed to function following the Anschluss (under the leadership of Dr. Joseph Loewenberg)—benefited more than 130,000 persons. Other organizations, such as the Council for German Jewry (Britain) and Hebrew Immigrant Aid Service (United States) also contributed funds until the Americans’ entry into the war on December 7, 1941. At this point, U.S. relations with Austria were completely severed.

For those lucky enough to escape, the price was heavy; special taxes of all sorts were imposed on them (for visas, passports, health certificates, and the like). Some had to renounce their nationality, and pledge never to return to their homeland. Most left everything behind.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Austria; Eichmann, Adolf

Further Reading

Kaplan, Marion A. Between Dignity and Despair: Jewish Life in Nazi Germany. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
Nicosia, Francis R., and David Scrase (Eds.). Jewish Life in Nazi Germany: Dilemmas and Responses. New York: Berghahn, 2010.

Channel Islands

The British Channel Islands, occupied by Nazi Germany on June 30–July 1, 1940, were subordinated to the authority of the military governor in France (Militärbefehlshaber in Frankreich) for the purposes of civilian administration. The Holocaust in the islands therefore followed the pattern in occupied France, though with some important idiosyncrasies, such as the absence of political and ideological projects on par with Vichy's Révolution Nationale and official antisemitism.

Anti-Jewish measures in the islands comprised a dozen orders originating with the military governor. Most of these were registered into the laws of the islands. This gave them a legal seal of approval that made them more likely to be complied with by the population than unilateral German measures. The first order, requiring all islanders with more than two Jewish grandparents to register as Jews, was passed in October 1940. If the authorities in both bailiwicks conformed, they seem to have taken a casual approach to the fact that not all Jews had left the islands during the British evacuation of June 1940; and they did not want to antagonize the occupiers, especially in the early stages of the occupation, when the well-being of the community seemed to depend on German goodwill. When the whole dossier was investigated by the returning British in summer 1945, Bailiff Alexander Coutanche, the highest civilian authority in Jersey, justified the stance of his administration with the reasoning that the number of people concerned by the measures was small, that moderation was shown in the execution, and that undue harshness was avoided due to the intervention of the island authorities. Of these claims only the first was entirely correct.

The order that stands out most is the eighth order of 1942, the requirement for Jews to wear the six-pointed star. It is to the credit of Coutanche to have opposed its registration in Jersey. The reasons are unknown, but it is likely that Coutanche's political (and moral) instincts told him that this measure constituted an important threshold that should not be crossed. By contrast, in Guernsey, the eighth order passed unopposed on June 30, 1942, but was never enforced. Here the only principled intervention seems to have occurred before, when Abraham Lainé, a member of the Guernsey governing entity, the Controlling Committee, refused to give his consent to the first order.

Of the 18 individuals registered as Jews in both bailiwicks, four died in Jersey during the war and three were deported to Auschwitz in 1942. The remainder survived the war. In most of these cases survival was owed to holding British nationality (in the widest sense) or to being married to a non-Jew. In February 1943 five of the remaining Jews were deported to civilian internment camps with their families in a transport that also included other categories of islanders.

The fate of the British Jews is cast into relief by the fate of Jews of other nationalities. One of the Channel Islands Jews interned in Germany was John Finkelstein, a retired British colonial employee. Being a Romanian national, Finkelstein was removed from Laufen internment camp in late 1943, when Romanian Jews in Nazi-controlled Europe were rounded up and sent to concentration camps. Finkelstein survived Buchenwald and returned to Jersey after the war. A particularly tragic case is that of three single women with German and Polish nationality who, after having fled Central Europe in the late 1930s, became trapped in Guernsey in 1940 due to British Aliens legislation. Therese Steiner, Auguste Spitz, and Marianne Grünfeld were deported to France in April 1942 and then, three months later, to Auschwitz, where they perished.

The issue that has continued to intrigue historians is why the civilian authorities put up no administrative resistance to the exposure of this small group of people when the price for noncompliance would have been negligible (chances are the Germans wouldn't have even noticed). As is attested by several cases, the Germans demonstrated more elasticity on the issue than the civilian authorities. Appealing the decision to send her to an internment camp, Esther Lloyd, one of the Jews deported in February 1943, managed the extraordinary feat of being released and sent back to Jersey in 1944. The attitude of the Feldkommandantur 515—the German civil affairs outfit in the islands—had a similar laissez-faire attitude with regard to Annie Wranowksy, a Czech citizen registered as a Jew in Guernsey and trying to prove her "Aryan" status in 1942. By contrast, the implementation of anti-Jewish measures on the part of the authorities of the islands displayed an unsettling proactivity. This applies in particular to the Jersey aliens officer, Clifford Orange, who registered a number of individuals as Jews although they did not correspond to the legal definition stipulated in the first order.

In a book that first appeared in 2000, David Fraser portrays the administrations of the two bailiwicks as mindless and inhuman bureaucracies, obsessed by legal positivism and staffed with closet antisemites. He underpins this argument by contrasting the surrender of the Jews with the protection accorded by the authorities in both islands to certain in-groups, most prominently the Freemasons. This interpretation misses a number of important points. One is the fact that the Jews remaining in the islands—of modest or no wealth, foreign, often advanced in age or ill—were the part of the community least suited to influence this environment. By contrast, the wealthier and more influential members of the community, who had evacuated to England in June 1940, benefited from asset cloaking on the part of islanders who stayed behind. The importance of patronage also appears in the case of the Jewish wife of the Jersey artist Edmund Blampied, who was altogether exempted from the February 1943 internment order. In addition, Jews were not the only out-group in the islands that could not rely on the civilian authorities for cover. This also applies to the large group of islanders tried by German courts for various offenses and sent to prisons and concentration camps as a result. Moreover, Fraser's focus on antisemitism clouds over the incidence of xenophobia; non-British outsiders, especially those arriving as labor migrants, always were at the bottom of the social hierarchy in the islands. Taking into account that two-thirds of the registered Jews (12 of 18) were foreign or naturalized British, the conduct of a Clifford Orange echoes instances of arbitrary use of power and anticipatory zeal that are also known from other bureaucratic contexts during the Holocaust. Orange acted "in character," treating this group entrusted to his authority with the same mix of parsimoniousness and suspicion as other groups of foreigners before the war. The sacrifice of this small group mirrored the general utilitarian attitude: this was one bureaucratic battle—among a certain number of others—that the authorities did not elect to fight; the objective being to create a debt that could be invoked in situations where "more important" issues or numbers were at stake.

On the upside, despite the official imprimatur given to the orders against the Jews, the creation of an atmosphere conducive to reporting of Jews and Jewish assets seems to have had only limited effect. That the local populations were not prepared to turn on Jewish islanders is attested by the fact that only two documented denunciations of Jews (or residents believed to have been Jewish) exist for the entire period of the occupation. In addition, an unspecified number of Jews (or people with Jewish names), among them three Guernsey spinsters by the name of Cohen, chose not to register and successfully hid their origin. The pinnacle of civilian resilience is the case of Albert Bedane, who sheltered Mary Richardson, a nonregistered Jewish woman, from 1943 to 1945. In 2003 Bedane was the first Channel Islander to have been recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem. A second nomination, of Jersey-woman Dorothea Weber, is pending at the time of writing.

This entry would be incomplete without a mention of the 590 French Jewish men married to non-Jews and deported to the island of Alderney for forced labor from the summer and fall of 1943 to May 1944. Initially scheduled to have been distributed to worksites across the islands, this idea had been dropped due to German concerns over potential fraternization with the local populations—a problem that could not occur in Alderney, where the entire civilian population had been evacuated to England in June 1940.

PAUL SANDERS

See also: France; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Benoît, L. Les déportés de France vers Aurigny. Marigny: Eurocibles, 2010.

Cohen, F. The Jews in the Channel Islands during the German Occupation 1940–1945. Jersey: Jersey Heritage Trust, 2000.

Coutanche, A. The Memoirs of Lord Coutanche: A Jerseyman Looks Back. Chichester: Phillimore, 1975.

Fraser, David. The Jews of the Channel Islands and the Rule of Law, 1940–1945. Brighton: Sussex Academic Press, 2000.

Sanders, Paul. The British Channel Islands under German Occupation, 1940–1945. Jersey: Jersey Heritage Trust, 2005.

Chelmno

Chelmno (Kulmhof in German) was a Nazi death camp administered by the SS, established on December 8, 1941. It was situated 30 miles to the northwest of the Polish city of Łódź, along the Ner River, in modern-day west-central Poland. The camp was located in the Wartheland administrative district, which the Germans established after they began their occupation of Poland. Chelmno has the dubious distinction of being the first dedicated death camp built by the Germans and was the first stationary camp that employed poison gas to kill its internees. Most of the victims at Chelmno were Polish Jews, although there were also Roma interned there, as well as Polish political prisoners and Soviet prisoners of war. Many of Chelmno's Jewish victims—especially during the early stages of the camp's operations—came from the large ghetto in Łódź, which the SS and local police began to liquidate on January 16, 1942. Chelmno operated as a killing center from December 8, 1941, until March 1943, and again during June–July 1944.

The SS perfected the system of mass killing at Chelmno, which operated with factory-like precision. Most of the exterminations occurred at the Schloss (castle), where internees were sent a short distance from the main camp, usually by truck or rail. They were told that they were being transported to a forced labor camp. Once the prisoners entered the Schloss, they were stripped of their clothing and any personal possessions. They were then led into a cellar and through a short ramp, which emptied into a large truck-like van with no windows. Once the van had reached capacity

(which was 50–70 people), the doors were closed and locked and camp personnel attached a tube to the truck's exhaust pipe and directed it into the truck's interior. The engine was started, and usually within 10 minutes all of the internees had died from carbon monoxide poisoning. Any prisoners still found alive were shot dead.

The van full of corpses was then driven to an outlying series of mass graves, where the bodies were dumped and buried. Later, several crematoria were constructed adjacent to the mass graves, and most of the victims' bodies were thereafter incinerated. In the latter stage of the camp's operations, Jews from Austria, Bohemia, Germany, Hungary, Luxembourg, and Moravia were also deported to Chełmno and killed.

It is estimated that at least 152,000 people were killed at Chełmno, including at least 5,000 Roma from the surrounding areas in Poland. After July 1944 SS officials deported the remaining prisoners at Chełmno; most were sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau. In September 1944, fearing that the Allies would uncover their despicable deeds at the camp, German authorities ordered Chełmno's mass graves to be exhumed. The remains were then incinerated in crematoria. By the end of the year, the extermination vans were sent to Berlin. The camp was permanently decommissioned on January 17, 1945, as Soviet forces approached the area. Thirteen individuals were tried and convicted of war crimes in connection with Chełmno. Nine were tried at Łódź in 1945, right after World War II ended; the remaining four were tried between 1962 and 1965 in Germany.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Biebow, Hans; Death Camps; Final Solution; Gas Vans; Lange, Herbert; Łódź Ghetto; Roma Genocide in the Holocaust; Shoah

Further Reading

Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1962.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

accounts that evoke images that speak to us across generations and age groups; indeed, both are studied, at various levels, in most schools across the world today.

During the Holocaust the Nazis murdered more than one and a half million children under the age of 12, and teenage youths up to the age of 18. In addition, tens of thousands of Roma children, German children with physical and mental disabilities, Polish children, and many thousands of others were also murdered. Untold numbers of children from all over occupied Europe were deported to their deaths in the extermination camps situated in Poland.

In Germany from 1933 onward, Jewish children were subjected to a bewildering array of new rules and regulations that must have been incomprehensible—and, to their young sensibilities, deeply hurtful. At school, they were separated from their non-Jewish friends and classmates, prior to being expelled altogether if the schools they attended were state institutions. They would then be denied membership in the sports clubs to which they had belonged prior to the ascent to office of the Nazis. Inevitably, name-calling and bullying of Jewish children by other children became acceptable forms of behavior. At home, Jewish children saw their parents descend into a welter of despair, as adult worries penetrated the fabric of family life.

Once the war broke out and Germany began to expand its territory, Jewish children became especially vulnerable to murder. Not only were they considered nonproductive, but they also symbolized the very Jewish future that the Nazis were determined to destroy. On the principle that “nits make lice,” children were frequently among the first victims sent to their deaths—or were killed outright—when a Nazi unit entered a Jewish area, or when deportations to death camps arrived. Babies, infants, and small children were, for obvious reasons, exceptionally vulnerable; not only were they themselves incapable of self-defense, but their parents, in trying to shield them from harm, often inadvertently took them into harm's way. Older children and adolescents might have more of a chance of survival if they could convince the Nazis of their ability to work as slave labor.

After the Nazis established ghettos throughout Poland, Jewish children were especially susceptible to starvation, disease, and the ravages of climate—particularly when winter came and there was a lack of housing or other accommodation. When the ghettos were liquidated from 1942 onward, children were first among the elderly and the sick to be “selected” for deportation to the death camps. With their mothers, they were also in the forefront of those murdered “by bullets” when the Einsatzgruppen came

Children during the Holocaust

Among the best-known names associated with the Holocaust are two people who were children during that horrible time: Anne Frank, who did not survive, and Elie Wiesel, who did. Through Anne's diary and Elie's book Night, we have

The vulnerability of children during the Holocaust was caused in large part by the Nazi obsession to destroy the next generation of Jews, with the killing of children viewed as a necessary part of the “racial” struggle. Overall, during the Holocaust up to 1.5 million children were murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators throughout Europe. This picture shows children and other prisoners liberated by the 3rd U.S. Army at Buchenwald concentration camp in April 1945. (AP Photo/Byron H. Rollins) rampaging through the Soviet Union. On other occasions, children were selected to fill the deportation trains as a result of decisions made by the Jewish Council (Judenrat) leaders, working from the awful premise that by holding back stronger and more robust sections of the population, the ghetto might be spared on account of its labor productivity.

Jewish children were killed when they arrived at the death camps, or, if babies, murdered at birth. They were worked to death; they were abused and tormented by local Nazis or collaborators; they were murdered during reprisal raids and antipartisan operations. The Nazis murdered Jewish children on the grounds of racial ideology or because they possessed (or were perceived to possess) physical or psychological disabilities.

Although children were among the first to be murdered, at Auschwitz some were deliberately spared—to be exposed to pseudoscientific medical experimentation. Here, SS doctor Josef Mengele ran a laboratory for such purposes. Mengele’s research subjects were better fed and housed than other prisoners, and temporarily safe from the gas chambers. But he was personally responsible for the deaths of an unknown number of victims, whom he killed via lethal injection, shootings, beatings, and through selections and deadly experiments. Mengele was especially renowned for his experiments on twins, and in his pseudoscientific endeavors he amputated limbs or infected one twin with typhus or other diseases to see how it would impact the other. He experimented with trying to artificially change a child's eye color by injecting chemicals into his or her eyes and engaged in blood transfusions from one twin to the other to see what would happen. Many of the victims died while undergoing these procedures, or they were killed once an experiment was over. Frequently, he would then dissect their bodies.

Some children managed to find ways to survive, despite everything ranged against them. Before the war, some children were saved through emigration programs, such as the Kindertransport initiative that saw thousands of Jewish children from Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia taken to Britain. Other children were hidden in boarding schools or religious establishments such as convents and monasteries, forced to change their identity with the resultant danger that they could lose contact with their families and religious heritage. Others were not so fortunate and were forced to roam on the run through forests and villages, relying entirely on their wits in order to stay alive.

Where it was impossible to save a child's life, some courageous adults would seek to alleviate the distress generated by sharing the child's experience. Not only parental love, but also other forms of love and care made a child's final moments a little easier to bear. Thus, for example, Dr. Janusz Korczak (born Henryk Goldszmit), the head of Warsaw's Jewish Orphanage, accompanied the children in his care to the gas chambers of Treblinka, singing songs and keeping up their spirits, even as the doors were slammed shut behind them.

In other contexts, children's morale was maintained through keeping diaries, or creating artwork and poetry. At the Theresienstadt (Terezí) concentration camp in Czechoslovakia, the staging of a famous children's opera by Hans Krása, Brundibár, is still remembered by survivors to this day as something that gave them hope when they were in the camp.

From time to time, particularly in occupied Poland and parts of the Soviet Union, SS "race experts" would scour regions looking for children who fit the "Aryan" stereotype: blond(e), with blue eyes, fair skin, high cheekbones, and a strong physique. Such children could be simply kidnapped and transferred to the Reich, where they would be adopted by racially acceptable German families. This was far less likely for Jewish children, though hundreds—perhaps thousands—of Polish, Ukrainian, and Russian children were taken in this way. If, however, a racially unacceptable sexual liaison were to occur resulting in a pregnancy, it was frequently decided by these same "race experts" that the child would have to be aborted for the good of the Aryan race.

The aftermath of the Holocaust brought forth its own tragedies for the Jewish children who managed to survive. Tens of thousands of orphans now roamed the highways and byways of Europe, all too often just as vulnerable as before, but this time susceptible to rape and murder. In time, Jewish care agencies managed to locate such children, or to retrieve them from possible death in the pestilential remnants of what remained of the concentration camps. Often, they would be placed in displaced persons' (DP) camps, there to await an uncertain (though safer) future. From here, many were uplifted to Palestine (and then, after 1948, independent Israel). Others would receive sponsorship from countries such as the United States, Canada, Australia, Argentina, and Brazil. Only in these places, at last, could there be any possibility of starting a new life—in many cases, for the first time.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Anne Frank House; Children's Literature of the Holocaust; Cohn, Marianne; Comité de Défense des Juifs; The Diary of a Young Girl; The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak; Frank, Anne; Gunden, Lois; Kindertransport; Korczak, Janusz; Kraus, Gilbert and Eleanor; Life Is Beautiful; Mengele, Josef; Night; Sheptytsky, Andrey; Süskind, Walter

Further Reading

- Heberer, Patricia. Children during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2011.
- Holliday, Laurel. Children in the Holocaust and World War II: Their Secret Diaries. New York: Washington Square, 1996.
- Lagnado, Lucette Matalon, and Sheila Cohn Dekel. Children of the Flames: Dr. Josef Mengele and the Untold Story of the Twins of Auschwitz. New York: William Morrow, 1991.
- Nicholas, Lynn H. Cruel World: The Children of Europe in the Nazi Web. New York: Random House, 2005.
- Rosen, R. D. Such Good Girls: The Journey of the Holocaust's Hidden Child Survivors. New York: HarperCollins, 2014.
- Stargardt, Nicholas. Witnesses of War: Children's Lives under the Nazis. New York: Random House, 2005.

Children's Literature of the Holocaust

Over the past few decades, the library of Holocaust-related children's literature has grown significantly. There are children's books about the Holocaust for every age level, from picture books to novels. Yet the Holocaust, as a topic, does not fit nicely into the basic model of children's literature. The "happy ending" that is a hallmark of children's books does not exist in the stories of the Holocaust. The topic itself can be frightening or even traumatizing to a young audience while most children's books seek to provide comfort.

At the foundation of Holocaust education is the understanding that there are some things that can never be understood, which presents significant problems for children's literature as a genre. Then too, the events of the Holocaust require a historical context to be fully appreciated. The Holocaust existed as part of a larger landscape of legalized discrimination and hate. Addressing the culture of a society that fosters such an environment goes beyond the scope of most children's literature. Finally, essential to every literary work related to Holocaust education is the need to teach, and while it is not unusual for a children's book to have a moral or teach a lesson, a successful children's book cannot feel preachy. The lesson must be second to the literary merit of the book. Within the message of Holocaust education lives an inherent morality of right versus wrong, but there is a labyrinth of worthy lessons presented in current Holocaust literature that is based on this common theme, all intertwined yet uniquely their own: respect and appreciation for diversity, the role of a bystander, empathy for others and the need to champion the oppressed, the importance of one person's actions and how one person can make a difference, the role of God in the midst of evil, the importance of remembrance, and the list goes on. Finding the balance between story and message is essential for successful children's literature on the Holocaust.

Children's literature on the Holocaust falls into three main categories: fiction, nonfiction, and allegory. There are positive aspects to each of these styles, and also potential pitfalls. Fictional tales of the Holocaust have the ability to soften its reality. This is often a positive for young audiences. However, since it is important that the softened message not diminish the atrocities, this style works best for children's books that address a theme of the Holocaust instead of being a historical account. There are many books that do this well. For example, The Secret Seder addresses the role of God and faith in the Holocaust; Don't Forget addresses the importance of remembrance; and One Yellow Daffodil: A Hanukkah Story addresses empathy for others. Fictional accounts can relate more information to a young audience by blending multiple stories into a single character's experiences. This was masterfully done by Daniel's Story, a blended account of a child's life used as an exhibit for children who visit the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. The potential pitfall of this style is in making the story so big that no one individual could possibly have experienced all of it.

Fictional accounts can also tailor the story to elicit the most emotion or to be more relatable to a child audience. Again, even in fiction, there needs to be truth in the storyline. An author who creates fictional events or unbelievable occurrences does readers a disservice as inaccurate information can emerge. Benno and the Night of Broken Glass balances this well, by relating the events of Kristallnacht through the eyes of a cat. It is relatable and story-like in presentation, while still being true to the details of the event. Finally, all fictional literature has to be mindful of the pitfalls of happy endings. There were, in fact, real stories of survival and reunion after the Holocaust, but none of them can truly be considered a happy ending. The literature must, in some way, tell the wonder of the survivor's tale without minimizing the horror of the survival. The Number on My Grandfather's Arm is a children's book that does this beautifully. It is a story of a young girl who asks her grandfather about the tattooed number on his arm, and he finally shares with her his story as a Holocaust survivor. Although fictional, there is a sense of authenticity to the basis of the book; such a conversation could easily have occurred many times in the aftermath of the Holocaust. The story is told with the voice of a grandparent trying to be honest and open, while still providing comfort.

Nonfiction literature on the Holocaust can take many forms. Memoirs are the most powerful form of literature for audiences studying the Holocaust, but they can be a difficult and even traumatizing medium for children. One memoir that does work well is the memoir of Inge Auerbacher titled I Am a Star: Child of the Holocaust. The book's honest presentation is tempered with a softened language. The book also uses an approach that puts the story into a broader context and provides the audience with tools to learn more without putting all of the details of the experience front and center. Nonfiction that tells about a specific experience or event is another literary approach. These books have a responsibility to be factually accurate with no embellishments, while still appealing to and being sensitive to the needs of a young audience. The Champion of the Children: The Story of Janusz Korczak accomplishes this well. It speaks to both the importance of one person's actions while providing a glimpse of the ghetto experience. Fireflies in the Dark: The Story of Friedl Dicker-Brandeis and the Children of Terezin, a book that tells the story of the children of Terezin, is also successful in this model. Even in factually based children's books, it is easy to slip into the fairy tale model when describing the events of the Holocaust, but this does the subject a disservice. Viewing Hitler as a "monster" or a “bad guy” has the potential to make the events feel make-believe, while simultaneously diminishing the reality that ordinary people perpetrated this evil. In the nonfiction category, there are also several children’s books that display the events of the Holocaust through artifacts including photographs, children’s drawings, and poetry. Books like I Never Saw Another Butterfly: Children’s Drawings and Poems from the Terezin Concentration Camp, 1942–1944 and The Children We Remember can be very powerful visual representations of the Holocaust that can be used to cultivate a conversation. A Camera in the Ghetto has a similar approach, although it is probably better suited for older children due to some graphic visuals.

Allegory is a powerful form of Holocaust-based literature for the youngest audiences and can be revisited for older children to be examined at a deeper level. The most well-known, and probably most successful, allegory of the Holocaust is Terrible Things: An Allegory of the Holocaust. This book can be read on many levels, by the very young to older adolescents. The message of the book speaks to the role of a bystander, but it can be read within the context of several backdrops: a forest full of animals that are learning the need to protect each other, standing up for fellow classmates or teammates who are being picked on, or on the deeper allegorical level of the events of the Holocaust. This multi-leveled approach makes this one of the most successful children’s books on the Holocaust. Sneetches and Other Stories, although there is debate about whether this was strictly written as an allegory of the Holocaust, is certainly successful as an allegory relating the message of Holocaust education to a young audience—respect for people who are different from you. This story is used throughout schools in antibullying campaigns and can be read to a much younger audience than most books of its kind. The potential pitfall of metaphor and allegorical works of literature is that they can trivialize the events. There is also the potential to get so lost in the allegory that the message of the Holocaust becomes obscured or belabored. Most allegories need a guide, someone who can help children make the connections to the events of the Holocaust in an age-appropriate way. This is certainly true of The Little Boy Star: An Allegory of the Holocaust, a charming allegory but one that requires a directed audience. The success of an allegory is often in the hands of the adult who helps the child make the necessary connections.

Holocaust education is an important and timely topic. The resources for teaching this topic to children are plentiful, but there is a need to understand how and when it should be taught. The value of children’s literature on the Holocaust is clearly tied to the ability of the adult to use the tool well. Whether we are using these books in a classroom or in the home, the conversation that these tools evoke is as important as the books themselves.

JUDITH A. VOGEL

See also: Art and the Holocaust; Children during the Holocaust; The Diary of a Young Girl; Korczak, Janusz; Kristallnacht; Rescuers of Jews; Survivor Testimony; Upstanders

Further Reading

Greenbaum, Beth Aviv. Bearing Witness: Teaching about the Holocaust. New York: Heinemann, 2001.

Stephens, Elaine C., Jean E. Brown, and Janet E. Rubin. Learning about the Holocaust: Literature and Other Resources for Young People. Hamden (CT): Library Professional Publications, 1995.

Supple, Carrie. From Prejudice to Genocide: Learning about the Holocaust. London: Trentham Books, 2007.

Christian X, King of Denmark

Christian X was the king of Denmark from 1912 to 1947. Born on September 26, 1870, he became the symbol of Danish resistance to Nazism during the German occupation between 1940 and 1945.

On April 9, 1940, Nazi Germany invaded Denmark without declaring war, quickly overwhelming the Danish military. Within hours, the government, supported by the king, surrendered in exchange for the country being permitted to retain its political independence. This began a relatively gentle form of military occupation. Germany controlled Denmark’s external relations, but there was no interference in Denmark’s internal affairs. Parliament was still permitted to sit; the Danish government continued to run most aspects of the country; and the small Danish army and navy was able to preserve its freedom of action.

At the outset of the occupation, Denmark had a 1939 population of approximately 5 million people. It is estimated that there were about 7,500 Jews living there at the time, mostly in Copenhagen. There was no tradition of antisemitism; the small Jewish population did not suffer persecution, and Jews practiced their religion in the open and were not restricted from full participation in all elements of national activity. This did not change after the arrival of the Germans. Jews were not required to register with the government, live in Jewish-only areas, or wear a yellow star or a badge in public. Initially, German occupation officials did not interfere with these liberal policies. As a result, the Danish Jews lived in relative peace.

This changed dramatically in 1943. That year the Danish resistance movement began to gain traction, emboldening many among the Danish population to fight the occupation. By the summer of 1943 sabotage and labor strikes clearly threatened the German occupation, a situation made worse for the Germans by military reverses elsewhere. As a result, the Germans declared a state of emergency on August 29 and initiated a crackdown against suspected saboteurs and troublemakers. Hundreds of Danes—Jews and non-Jews—were arrested and detained, and King Christian was forced to leave his throne.

In the years leading up to this, he provided inspiration for his people at this difficult time. In contrast to many other leaders from across occupied Europe, Christian refused to leave his capital or his country after the Nazis arrived. Beloved by his people before the war, he was renowned for taking a ride on his horse through Copenhagen streets each day, unguarded and confident that he was safe from harm. These unaccompanied daily rides made him popular to the point of being a beloved national symbol, as the people stood and waved to him. Over time, a number of apocryphal stories emerged surrounding the king, one of which concerned a German soldier's expression of surprise that the king would ride with no bodyguard. A young Dane was reputed to have responded that "all of Denmark is his bodyguard." For the king, it was important that he did this for reasons beyond simply the maintenance of morale; he had to show the Nazis that he still saw himself as the sovereign ruler of his nation, despite the occupation. A fall from his horse on October 19, 1942, brought these rides to an end, however, as the injuries he sustained as a result rendered him an invalid for the rest of his life.

Just prior to that event, however, came one of greater significance for international relations—and signaled the continued determination of King Christian not to be intimidated by Denmark's situation. On the occasion of the king's 72nd birthday, Adolf Hitler sent him a long telegram congratulating him. In response, on September 26, 1942, Christian sent a curt message back to Berlin: "Spreche Meinen besten Dank aus. Chr. Rex" ("Giving my best thanks, King Christian"). Hitler was reportedly outraged as this perceived slight, triggering what became known as the Telegram Crisis. He not only recalled his ambassador from Copenhagen and expelled the Danish ambassador from Germany; he also arranged for the Danish government of Vilhelm Buhl to be dismissed and replaced by the more pliant Erik Scavenius, who, as it turned out, was in the king's confidence. In early November 1942 a new German high representative, Werner Best, was sent to Denmark, indicating a change of direction on the part of the Nazis. The Danish resistance movement was beginning to be more restive, and Best had a long record of suppressing dissent in occupied countries. While he was in France, for example, he was nicknamed "The Butcher of Paris."

The king's attitude at this time had been noticed by the Germans, but it was also recognized by the Danish people that he was, indeed, the country's First Patriot. Although his official position was one of cooperation with the occupiers, he was seen by the Danish people as a psychological resister who, through maintenance of morale, refused to be cowed by the Nazis.

This was no more apparent than where the country's Jews were concerned. When the Jews of Denmark were finally targeted for deportation by the Nazis in the fall of 1943, King Christian gave encouragement and support to those who sought to protect them. Danes of all backgrounds now rallied to the cause; when the Nazi roundup started on October 1, the Germans were able to locate and arrest only a handful of members of the Jewish community. Although threatened by the Germans, Danish law enforcement refused to take part in the roundup. Soon, Danish civilians had hatched a plan to move Danish Jews to the coast. For several days they were smuggled onto fishing boats and other vessels, and ferried across the narrow straits to freedom in Sweden, which in turn readily accepted the influx of émigrés. In all, at least 7,500 Jews made it to safety in Sweden. Since that time, it has been widely held that Christian served as the inspiration in this heroic rescue effort.

His overall attitude, moreover, led to the emergence of one of the most lasting legends concerning his response to the anti-Jewish measures imposed by the Nazis. According to this, the king chose to wear a yellow star when riding in the streets of Copenhagen, in support of the Danish Jews. It never happened; if it did take place, he would have been the only one in the country to do so, as the yellow star was never introduced into Denmark. Another version of the story has it that when he wore the star all the people of Denmark came out and did, too.

In 1958 the story received wide coverage when it was related in Exodus, a novel by American author Leon Uris; it was then popularized even further when a film version of the book, directed by Otto Preminger and starring Paul Newman, was released in 1960. Although completely fictitious, the story of the king and the star accurately reflects his opposition to any persecution of the Jews during the Nazi occupation.

King Christian X of Denmark died at the Amalienborg Palace in Copenhagen on April 20, 1947. He was buried at the traditional resting place for Danish monarchs, Roskilde Cathedral.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also:

Best, Werner; Denmark; Resistance Movements

Further Reading

Lampe, David. Hitler's Savage Canary: A History of the Danish Resistance in World War II. Barnsley (UK): Pen and Sword, 2014.

Lidegaard, Bo. Countrymen: The Untold Story of How Denmark's Jews Escaped the Nazis, of the Courage of Their Fellow Danes, and of the Extraordinary Role of the SS. New York: Knopf, 2013.

Petrow, Richard. The Bitter Years: The Invasion and Occupation of Denmark and Norway, April 1940–May 1945. New York: Morrow Quill, 1979.

Thomas, John Oram. The Giant Killers: The Story of the Danish Resistance Movement, 1940–1945. New York: Taplinger, 1976.

Werner, Emmy E. A Conspiracy of Decency: The Rescue of the Danish Jews during World War II. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 2002.

Churban

Churban is one of several terms used to refer to the Nazi genocide of the Jews during the Third Reich. It is a Yiddish word that is sometimes represented in English as churbn, churb'n or khurbn. The term is generally translated as “catastrophe” or “destruction.” Because the word is also used to refer to two catastrophes that befell the Jewish people thousands of years ago, it is sometimes referred to as Churban Europe to make clear that it is being applied to the Nazi genocide of the Jews.

Each of the two earlier events that are referred to by the term churban involves the destruction of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem. The Temple was the center of Jewish worship, and its destruction was seen at the time as a truly catastrophic event that threatened the very existence of the Jews as a distinct religious and cultural group. It was first destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE, resulting in the first Jewish diaspora (i.e., dispersion outside of the land of Israel). In 538 BCE the Persians allowed the Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple.

The rebuilt Temple (the “Second Temple”) was destroyed in 70 CE, this time by the Romans, and the Jews were dispersed again, although there was always a Jewish community—albeit, sometimes small—extant in the land. This is the diaspora that continued until the Jews returned to what was then called Palestine and created the modern state of Israel, declared officially in 1948. The loss of the Temple forced the Jews to create another place and way of worship, one that was not tied to one particular locale, nor made use of animal sacrifice as a means of approaching God. That resulted in the creation of the synagogue and in the use of prayer as a form of worship.

Each of these events constituted an existential threat that was—and still is to this day—referred to as a churban. What links the two events is not just that each resulted from the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. They each represent dramatic markers in Jewish history, separating what was before the event from what came after. What is most often referred to as the Holocaust is also viewed as both a catastrophe and a marker after which the very nature of Jewish existence became fundamentally different from its nature before the event.

Those who refer to the Holocaust by the term Churban do so for two very different reasons. Some use it as the “third churban,” linking the catastrophe of the Nazis with the history of the two churbanim (plural of churban) that preceded it, thereby seeing it as a part of—and not apart from—Jewish history. Others use it in the opposite sense, trying to separate it from all of Jewish history that preceded it, and emphasizing its uniqueness within the Jewish experience.

The terms Holocaust and Churban share a characteristic that has made some use another phrase altogether: Shoah. The characteristic is that each term—“Holocaust” and Churban—has a connotation that may be seen as investing the Nazi genocide of the Jews with the character of a religious sacrifice or punishment. “Holocaust” is derived from the Greek translation of a Hebrew word meaning the complete burning of a sacrificial animal, while churban, as noted above, relates to the destruction of the holiest of temples, often characterized as a punishment by God for the straying of the Jewish people from their covenant. The term Shoah has no such religious connotations and, therefore, for some—including all in Israel—that term is considered the one that conveys catastrophe and destruction in the most appropriate way.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Final Solution; Holocaust; Shoah

Further Reading

Maybaum, Ignaz. The Face of God after Auschwitz. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1965.

Young, James E. Writing and Rewriting the Holocaust: Narrative and the Consequences of Interpretation. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988.

Cohn, Marianne

Marianne Cohn saved Jewish children during World War II as a member of the French-Jewish resistance, and she lost her life doing so. Born on September 17, 1922, in Mannheim, Germany, she was the eldest child of Dr. Alfred and Grete (known as Radt) Cohn. The family was Jewish but not religiously observant. In 1929 they moved from Mannheim to Berlin, and in 1934, after the Nazi seizure of power the previous year, to Spain. With the onset of the Spanish Civil War in 1936, they moved again in 1938, this time settling in France.

When World War II started, Marianne's parents, as German nationals, were detained at the Gurs internment camp, and she and her sister were sent to a farm. In 1940, after the fall of France, she became subjected to Nazi-imposed antisemitic legislation and took refuge in a home for Jewish children in Moissac. She was informally taken under the care of the Eclaireurs Israelites de France (the Jewish Scouts), and in 1941 she joined the Mouvement de la Jeunesse Sioniste (Young Zionist Movement, or MJS). It was through this that she was brought into resistance activities.

In 1942 Marianne was active in producing forged passports for the MJS, and she began to smuggle Jewish children out of France. This led inevitably to her arrest, though after three months' detention in a Vichy prison in Nice she was released. It was during this period of imprisonment that, in early 1943, she wrote her famous poem "I Shall Betray Tomorrow." This has become an immortal statement of defiance in the face of the Holocaust:

*I shall betray tomorrow, not today.
Today, pull out my fingernails,
I shall not betray.
You do not know the limits of my courage,
I, I do.
You are five hands, harsh and full of rings,
Wearing hob-nailed boots.
I shall betray tomorrow, not today.
I need the night to make up my mind.*

*I need at least one night,
To disown, to abjure, to betray.
To disown my friends,
To abjure bread and wine,
To betray life,
To die.
I shall betray tomorrow, not today.
The file is under the window-pane.
The file is not for the window-bars,
The file is not for the executioner,
The file is for my own wrists.
Today, I have nothing to say,
I shall betray tomorrow.*

At the end of the war one of the children saved by Marianne Cohn passed the poem to the head of MJS. It is a testimony of courage, and one of the great poems of the Resistance.

In 1943 Marianne was living in Grenoble. Volunteers known as "passeurs," who escorted Jewish children to Switzerland, undertook hazardous missions under constant risk of detection by Nazis or French collaborators. When one of the passeurs, Mila Racine, was captured on October 21, 1943, Marianne was sent by the MJS to replace her. Using the false identity of Marie Colin, she then undertook nine further transfers of children, taking groups of about 30 into Switzerland on each occasion.

In January 1944 Marianne began working with another resister, Rolande Birgy, with whom she ferried groups of up to 20 children across the southern border into Switzerland. Rolande, who had earlier teamed with Mila Racine, was known as the "Blue Beret" in resistance circles. In 1984 she was recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

By the start of 1944 Marianne had taken hundreds of children to Switzerland, but on the evening of May 31, 1944, a German patrol arrested her near Annemasse, just 200 meters from the border. She was at this time escorting a group of 28 children ranging in age from 4 to 15, and she was held at the local Gestapo jail, known as the Prison de Pax. The Vichy-appointed mayor of Annemasse, Jean Deffaugt, who sympathized with the Resistance (and was later also recognized as one of the Righteous), intervened on behalf of the children. The younger ones were sent to local orphanages, while Marianne and the older children were paroled to work in Annemasse during the day provided they returned to the prison at night.

This worked for a short time, but the Resistance knew that Marianne was in extreme danger; not only this, but the whole escape operation was in jeopardy. A plan was arranged to rescue her, but she refused to leave the children, fearing reprisals.

The underground then sent a message to the Gestapo, threatening to kill its members if the detainees were harmed, but the Gestapo began their interrogation nevertheless. On July 3, 1944, a special squad was sent to Annemasse from Lyon with the assignment of removing six of the prisoners, including Marianne. In her defiance, she refused to hide behind her alias, and revealed her true identity; for her rebelliousness, she was tortured horribly. She did not, however, speak—other than to say that she had no regrets for her actions.

On the night of July 7–8, 1944, only three weeks before the liberation of Annemasse, she was taken to the nearby Ville-la-Grand and murdered along with two other prisoners; it is recorded that the Gestapo continually hit them with shovels and kicked them until they were dead. They were buried hastily, and their mutilated bodies were discovered after the war. The 28 children imprisoned with Marianne were all saved and released as a result of the liberation in August. When Marianne Cohn was murdered, she was just 22 years old.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Children during the Holocaust; France; Jewish Resistance

Further Reading

Latour, Anny. The Jewish Resistance in France, 1940–1945. New York: Holocaust Library, 1981.

Lazare, Lucien. Rescue as Resistance: How Jewish Organization Fought the Holocaust in France. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.

Lefenfeld, Nancy. The Fate of Others: Rescuing Jewish Children on the French-Swiss Border. Clarksville (MD): Timbrel Press, 2013.

Rappaport, Doreen. Beyond Courage: The Untold Story of Jewish Resistance During the Holocaust. Somerville (MA): Candlewick Press, 2012.

Collaboration

For many years the topic of collaboration in the Holocaust remained largely taboo. Only in the years after 1990 did historians in a number of countries begin to examine the dark side of their countries' wartime histories more closely. They reflected on local collaboration with Nazi Germany and complicity in Nazi crimes, including the Holocaust. Collaboration of course took on various forms, partly in accordance with the degree of independence respective states retained.

While some countries such as France, Italy, or Hungary undertook a policy of state collaboration, in others, such as Poland, Czechoslovakia, or Ukraine, the idea of an independent state was largely excluded by the German authorities. Nevertheless, individuals and groups throughout Europe cooperated with the Germans in different ways for a variety of reasons, especially when their own goals to some extent overlapped with those of Nazi Germany.

Some historians, such as Christoph Dieckmann, prefer to use cooperation rather than collaboration to describe the broader phenomenon of working with the Germans during World War II, due to the heavily tainted nature of the term collaboration in the eyes of the public after the war. However, with regard to assistance given to the Germans in implementing the Holocaust, the more pejorative term may be appropriate, especially for those who willingly assisted without direct coercion.

One of the arguments often used in their defense by government officials, such as those in Belgium, who decided to work with the Germans, was that of the lesser evil. It was better to remain in place and implement German demands preemptively, with the aim of limiting the damage, to prevent more brutal actions being taken by the Germans on their own. In Belgium, bitter lessons learned during World War I encouraged both sides to make some compromises; and the pragmatic approach of the German military administration permitted the Belgian authorities to retain some freedom of action. In France, the Vichy administration implemented much of the German antisemitic legislation itself, with the aim of demonstrating its retention of sovereignty. However, the subordinate role of the Quisling government in Norway became the symbol for a mere puppet regime.

An important consideration in evaluating cooperation and collaboration in World War II is to view it as operating on a sliding scale that was susceptible to constant changes in the power balance of the relationship. For individuals, organizations, and governments, it was common to adopt a wait and see attitude, not to commit too strongly for or against the Germans, until the outcome of the war seemed clear. In this sense the relationships between the Germans and their collaborators were constantly being renegotiated, as new information changed the picture. Some states allied to Nazi Germany, such as Romania and Bulgaria, backed away from plans to deport Jews from their home territories by 1943, once they began to sense the increasing likelihood of a German military defeat.

As the above examples demonstrate, many of the states collaborating with Nazi Germany retained a considerable degree of independence and even initiative. Most introduced their own economic measures against the Jews, based on the German model, but often aiming also to limit the extent of German penetration of their economies. While collaborationist leaders knew that ultimately they could expect little mercy from the Allies, it was possible for states such as Italy or Romania to switch sides as the tide of war turned.

An important form of collaboration was armed participation in Nazi German forces. As Adolf Hitler initially was opposed to Slavs and even “Baltic peoples” participating at the front, the first auxiliary units to be raised after the invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941 were local police squads and battalions, intended to maintain security in the rear areas. Once Germany became increasingly hard-pressed militarily, hundreds of thousands of auxiliaries served with the Germans, mainly on the Eastern Front, assisting the Wehrmacht as “Hiwis” (voluntary helpers) or serving in the Waffen-SS. These forces included units of various ethnic groups, such as Kalmuks, Cossacks, and Tartars, as well as Russians, Ukrainians, Belorussians, Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians. However, these forces all remained firmly under German command and the Germans exploited figures such as General Andrey Vlasov, the nominal head of the Russian Liberation Army, mainly for propaganda purposes. There were even voluntary Waffen-SS units composed of western nationalities such as Danes, Dutch, French, and Belgians.

The collaborationist units that assisted with the hands-on implementation of the Holocaust in the east were auxiliary police detachments manned by thousands of mostly voluntary collaborators, subordinated to the SS Einsatzgruppen or the Order Police. These units were especially diligent in tracking down Jews in hiding after the ghetto-liquidation Aktionen. In much of German-occupied Poland, the infamous Trawniki guards, who manned the extermination camps and assisted with ghetto clearance Aktionen, also played a prominent role. This force consisted of more than 5,000 men recruited mainly from among Soviet POWs, who were unlikely to have survived if they had turned down the offer to collaborate. Once in service, however, these men enriched themselves from stolen Jewish property, and many deserted once assigned to more arduous and less lucrative posts.

In countries such as France and Hungary, indigenous police forces took part in the roundups of Jews for deportation to Auschwitz and other camps. But it remains difficult to prove how much these police officers knew about the actual fate of the Jews following their deportation. Recent research in Poland, inspired by the work of Jan Gross and the national debates that followed the publication of his book Neighbors (2002), is now also unveiling the active role played by the so-called indigenous “Blue Police” in hunting for escaped Jews and murdering them, sometimes to prevent the Germans from conducting reprisals against other Poles who had been hiding them.

MARTIN DEAN

See also: Antwerp Pogrom; Belarus; France; Hlinka Guard; Holocaust by Bullets; Jedwabne Massacre; Jewish Honor Courts; Kapos; Kasztner, Resz ; Laval, Pierre; Lithuania; Mussert, Anton Adriaan; Neighbors; Netherlands Tribunals; Ochota Massacre; Operation Spring Wind; Papon, Maurice; P tain, Philippe; Ponary Forest; Quisling, Vidkun; Riga; Rumbula Massacre; Salonika; Sobib r; Trawniki Men; Vichy France

Further Reading

Dean, Martin. Collaboration in the Holocaust: Crimes of the Local Police in Belorussia and Ukraine, 1941–44. London: Macmillan in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 1999.

Marrus, Michael R., and Robert O. Paxton. Vichy France and the Jews. New York: Basic Books, 1981.

Stauber, Roni (Ed.). Collaboration with the Nazis: Public Discourse after the Holocaust. New York: Routledge, 2010.

Comit  de D fense des Juifs

The Comit  de D fense des Juifs (Jewish Defense Committee, or CDJ) was a Belgian resistance organization during World War II affiliated with the larger Front de l’Ind pendance (Independence Front). The Jewish communist Hertz Jospa and his wife Yvonne, members of the Jewish revolutionary organization Solidarit  juive, founded the CDJ in September 1942. Jospa and his wife, along with Zionist groups and the Front de l’Ind pendance, established the Comit  de D fense des Juifs as part of the Belgian underground in order to aid and rescue Belgium’s Jews. It not only physically defended Jews but also provided them with opportunities to defend themselves. The CDJ was recognized by the Belgian government-in-exile in London as the representative body of the Belgian Jewish community. Although the majority of the leaders of the CDJ were Jews, there were also a few cases where non-Jews were given a higher rank within the leadership echelon.

Many thousands of Jews participated and played an active role in Belgian resistance groups during the German occupation, though their exact numbers and roles are unclear. Belgium’s Jewish partisans formed an active and armed resistance of their own and were joined by their non-Jewish countrymen. An extensive Nazi nighttime raid on the Jewish quarter of Brussels in September 1942 provided an incentive for many Belgian Jews to join both rescue and armed resistance groups, including the CDJ.

The CDJ contributed to the hiding of thousands of Jewish children with non-Jewish families and religious organizations; published secret anti-Nazi publications such as Unser Worth (Our Worth); and created false identification papers for Jews in hiding. The members of the CDJ came from all political and religious backgrounds and formed an effective committee to unite and save Jewish children. The organization had approximately 30 members in the children's section and developed a vast network for hiding Jews. Their department for forged documents not only provided Jews with false papers, but also supplied the entire resistance movement. The CDJ also provided payment to their protectors to ensure Jews would find a haven while the Nazis controlled Belgium. Overall, it was successful in saving between 3,000 and 4,000 of the 5,000 children who were placed in hiding, as well as saving about 10,000 adults. The CDJ also functioned as a national organization of social services. The section Kinderen was responsible for the hiding and support of individuals who had gone underground. The CDJ was able to rescue more than 3,000 Jews from deportation due to the cooperation and assistance from the non-Jewish sector and unarmed resistance fighters.

The organization was also involved in other aspects of the resistance such as sabotaging the German war machine by setting fire to the factories and derailing trains. They specifically targeted individuals and organizations that provided aid or information to the Nazis. The CDJ also successfully impeded the activities of the Association des Juifs de Belgique (AJB), the local Belgian Judenrat (the Jewish council imposed by the Nazis). The AJB ordered members of the Jewish community to report to the Nazis for forced labor by threatening punishment by the police and placing responsibility at the feet of the entire community (thus opening the door to collective punishment) if they did not comply. Due to this constant fear, several thousand Jews were reporting as ordered until the Committee disabled the AJB's efforts.

The most important act of resistance by the CDJ took place on the evening of April 19–20, 1943, when they derailed a train leaving the Mechelen (Malines) transit camp that was heading for Auschwitz. The CDJ was able to learn the exact date and time of the deportation from Mechelen and smuggled tools from the camp's workshop onto the train cars in order to pry open doors and floorboards to aid escape. Three members of the CDJ unit Group G, under the direction of Georges Livchitz, forced the train to a halt by signaling it with a red lantern. While Livchitz held the engineer at gunpoint with his revolver, the other two members, Robert Maistriau and Jean Franklemon, aided in the escape of several prisoners within the cars. The three members were able to escape under gunfire with some prisoners. The group was able to save 231 Jews out of 1,631 heading for Auschwitz. Many were able to escape due to the tools left behind for them. This is the only instance of a known armed assault anywhere in Europe in order to halt a train transporting Jews en route to their deaths. Georges Livchitz was arrested and executed in February 1944 by a German firing squad.

The Comité de Défense des Juifs is the most important achievement of Belgian Jewry during the German occupation. The organization played a critical role in rescue and resistance from 1942 to 1944. Its campaign was especially risky and dangerous, and the occupying Nazis authorities arrested many members of the organization and their collaborators.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Belgium; Children during the Holocaust; Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée; Jewish Resistance

Further Reading

- Fraser, David. The Fragility of Law: Constitutional Patriotism and the Jews of Belgium, 1940–1945. New York: Routledge, 2009.
- Michman, Dan (Ed.). Belgium and the Holocaust: Jews, Belgian, Germans. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1998.
- Schreiber, Marion. The Twentieth Train: The True Story of the Ambush of the Death Train to Auschwitz. New York: Grove, 2004.
- Veranneman de Watervliet, Jean-Michel. Belgium in the Second World War. Barnsley (UK): Pen & Sword Military, 2014.

Communists in the Holocaust

Communist organizations offered the most prolonged and consistent resistance to the predations of the National Socialist regime—save perhaps for the uncomfortable period from August 1939 to June 1941 when the Soviet Union was allied with Germany. Inside Germany, within the Nazi concentration camps, and in the partisan struggle against the Germans in central and Eastern Europe, communists emerged as the leaders of organized resistance to the wars of annihilation waged by the Nazi regime. Both Jews and communists featured prominently among the many groups targeted by the Nazis. The relationship between communists and the Holocaust, however, is less straightforward.

Officially, communists see the Holocaust only as part of a larger struggle; this means they are often accused of ignoring or—in the worst cases—denying the Holocaust.

Ideological communism had no place for religious identity. Although National Socialism conflated Jewishness and communism, and a significant proportion of communist leaders (in particular) were of Jewish origin, communist officials generally refused to acknowledge Jewishness as a special category of Nazi persecution. During the war, communists organized resistance in accordance with their own political agenda. Sometimes this led them to save Jews, and sometimes it led them to sacrifice Jews. Some partisan groups welcomed Jews, while others shunned them as an unnecessary danger or on other grounds. Soviet partisan units, particularly those sanctioned by the Red Army and the Communist Party, were usually the most receptive.

After the war, many Jewish survivors joined the local Communist Party, seeing it as the only organization that clearly and consistently opposed antisemitism. They were often bitterly disappointed. Antisemitic pogroms broke out under communist-dominated governments in Hungary, Poland, and Romania in 1946; and in keeping with Joseph Stalin's antisemitic-tinged purges of 1948–1953, prominent communist Jews faced show trials in Czechoslovakia and Hungary. Within the Soviet bloc in particular, discussions of the Jewish victims of the Nazi regime thereafter were strictly controlled and often censored completely, now in accordance with the political agenda of the Soviet Union. Both during and after the Holocaust, communist officials spoke of “victims of fascism” without delineating among the millions arrested, tortured, and killed. The fate of Jews is thus elided with that of “Soviet citizens,” partisans, and political prisoners.

To some degree, categories did overlap. Within Germany, Jewish resistance groups—the Schwarze Haufen and the Ring-Bund, for example—often had Marxist connections; a considerable proportion of German communists were of Jewish heritage. Inside the Vilna ghetto, the Jewish-led United Partisan Organization included several communists, including its military commander, Itzak Witenberg. Communist and Zionist resistance organizations also collaborated closely in Kovno and in Slovakia. In the Soviet Union, a significant percentage of the Communist Party hierarchy had Jewish origins; and while some 3 million Soviet Jews perished in the Holocaust, the overall death toll for the Soviet Union was roughly 27 million—which includes 3.5 million soldiers taken prisoner and 18 million civilians. The refusal of communist officials to recognize that the National Socialist program specifically targeted and affected Jews, however, remains problematic.

TIMOTHY C. DOWLING

See also: Delbo, Charlotte; Einsatzgruppen; Fascism; February Strike; Kommissarbefehl; Operation Barbarossa; Pius XI; Soviet Union; Weimar Republic

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. The Holocaust in the Soviet Union. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2009.

Gitelman, Zvi (Ed.). Bitter Legacy: Confronting the Holocaust in the USSR. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Concentration Camps

Concentration camps are most often associated with Nazi Germany, but the modern concentration camp is generally thought to have originated with Spanish general Valeriano Weyler y Nicolau in 1896 during the Cuban insurrection against Spain. Weyler sought to concentrate the civilian population near army installations, isolating these reconcentrados from the guerrillas. In Cuba at that time—and also in the Philippines during the 1899–1902 Philippine-American War and in South Africa under the British during the 1899–1902 Boer War—large numbers of civilians died in such camps as a consequence of overcrowding, disease, and inadequate supplies.

During the period of the Third Reich, Nazi Germany established a number of different types of concentration camps. These began as penal institutions employed for the incarceration of real and perceived opponents of the Nazi regime. Initially, the Nazis held these opponents in “protective custody quarters,” of which the first was a camp established on March 20, 1933, at a compound about nine miles northwest of Munich on the outskirts of the town of Dachau. Other camp establishments soon followed, among them Oranienburg, Papenburg, Esterwegen, Kemna, Lichtenburg, Borgermoor, and Columbiahaus, the SS “special” prison at Berlin.

For the most part, these were rapidly established, highly improvised affairs. Little regard was paid to administration, discipline, or utilization. Some were run by SS officers; many were staffed by SA men, often locals who knew or were known by those they were guarding. Nicknamed “Wilde-KZ” (“wild concentration camps”), they frequently operated without any apparent system or direction and little in the way of planning or procedure. Often, their very location was impromptu. Dachau was a former gunpowder factory; Oranienburg was originally a brewery (and later, a foundry); and Borgermoor and Esterwegen were initially simply rows of barracks set down on open expanses of marshy heathland. Elsewhere, prisoners had to build their own habitations and started their camp life living in tents.

THE LIBERATION OF MAJOR NAZI CAMPS 1944–1945

It is important to emphasize that these camps were originally places of political imprisonment. They had political aims and selected their captives using political criteria, removing political opposition from the midst of the community and in so doing intimidating the population so they would accept the Nazi regime.

In mid-1934 an Inspectorate of Concentration Camps was created to coordinate these diverse camps, with Theodor Eicke as the first inspector. He selected Dachau as the model by which all concentration camps were to be run, resulting in many of the more haphazardly built camps being closed down.

Despite these closures, by the middle of the 1930s the range of those who could be sent to the concentration camps had been broadened considerably. By now the Nazis were arresting not only political prisoners but also Jehovah's Witnesses, those whom they termed "antisocials," homosexuals, and common criminals, some of whom had the added "distinction" of also being Jewish.

Despite this growth, by early 1938 only three camps were operating: Dachau, Buchenwald, and Sachsenhausen. After the Anschluss (union) of Germany with Austria in March 1938, a camp for Austria, Mauthausen, was added, and a camp exclusively for women was established at Ravensbrück in 1939.

The onset of war in September 1939, however, saw the expansion of the concentration camp system to levels hitherto not contemplated. Originally, the Nazis intended their system to be a device to suppress political dissent, but as the Third Reich expanded the rationale was broadened to include religious prisoners of conscience (Roman Catholic priests, Protestant clergy, Jehovah's Witnesses); "racial" prisoners (Jews, Roma and Sinti); "antisocial elements" (vagrants, itinerant merchants, and "work-shy individuals"); prisoners based on sexual preference (male homosexuals); foreign opponents of the Nazis (resistance fighters, political opponents); and prisoners of war (in particular, prisoners from the Soviet Union). In almost all cases, the Nazis exploited the labor of their prisoners, often working them to death in conditions of utmost privation. In many of the camps a separate compound for women was also built, to complement that at Ravensbrück.

More camps were an obvious necessity to accommodate these new prisoners. Accordingly, late in 1939, the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps was authorized to examine the possibility of setting up new camps that could begin operation as soon as possible. One of the first of these, located in southwestern Poland near the confluence of the Vistula and Sola Rivers, was to be built just outside the town of Oswiecim. In German the name was Auschwitz.

Auschwitz was not constructed on the Dachau model. The region in which it was located was a source of raw materials that could be exploited, and accordingly the camp eventually grew to become a vast complex covering 15 square miles. As a result, several subcamps were also established in which prisoner slave-workers would be housed. Few of these subcamps served any other purpose than that of industrial or agricultural production.

In March 1942 concentration camp administration was transferred to the SS Economic and Administrative Department (the SS-Wirtschafts- und Verwaltungshauptamt, or WVHA), which saw a transformation of the camps' original political character to one of economic exploitation as well as political torture. This was paralleled by the development of camps outside the Old Reich. Many new centers were built in the Nazi-occupied countries, as it was not always practicable to transport the prisoners to Germany or Poland. A vast array of new types of camps also evolved, with 43 different categories of camps existing at the height of the Nazis' power. The camp system lost its purely German content and became a continental phenomenon, spreading throughout Europe for the multiple tasks of exploitation of slave labor, extending the network of terror over occupied populations, and conducting mass annihilation of those targeted for this purpose by the SS.

While not all camps fit into the Dachau model, they nonetheless fell under the general jurisdiction of the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps and were thus differentiated from ghettos or military prisoner of war camps. These included Schutzhaftlager (protective custody camps), Aussiedlungslager (resettlement camps), Durchgangslager (transit camps), Straflager (punishment camps), Arbeitslager (labor camps), Judenarbeitslager (Jewish labor camps), Zivilgefangenenlager (camps for civilian prisoners), Sonderlager (special camps), Zwangsarbeitslager (forced labor camps), Arbeitserziehungslager (labor education camps), Juden-durchgangslager (Jewish transit camps), Polizeihaftlager (police detention camps), Umerziehungslager (reeducation camps), and Isolationslager (isolation camps). To all these, of course, could be added the colloquially termed Vernichtungslager, the extermination camps.

The range of the camps, in purpose, method, size, and duration, was thus extremely wide. Together, they blanketed Nazi-occupied Europe in a terror system as comprehensive as it was effective. The concentration camp, regardless of the form it took, came to symbolize the true essence of the Nazi regime.

Six of the Vernichtungslager located in Poland—Auschwitz-Birkenau, Belzec, Chelmno, Majdanek, Sobibór, and Treblinka—altered the nature and course of concentration camp development. They were a departure from anything previously visualized, in both their design and character. Auschwitz has already been referred to. Belzec, near Lvov, was established at the end of 1941, as was Chelmno. Majdanek, located at Lublin, had already been formed by the end of 1940, while Treblinka, near the village of Malkinia Gorna, was set up during the course of 1941. Sobibór, a camp built near Vlodawa, was established in March 1942. With the sole exception of Auschwitz, these camps were different from all the others in that they did not perform any of the functions—political, industrial, agricultural, or penal—attributed to those further west or north.

Because of the existence of these Vernichtungslager, the image of the Nazi concentration camps was irrevocably transformed, such that all are now mainly viewed as elaborate and gigantic factories created for the purpose of destroying human lives en masse. Until the creation of the extermination camps, however, this was not always the case, with the system performing numerous other functions besides killing. The death camps, on the other hand, were institutions designed to methodically and efficiently murder millions of people, specifically Jews.

The nature of the eastern camps is well understood now, but the people of Europe at the time could not even imagine the truth. Prisoners elsewhere, particularly in the transit camps awaiting transportation to the east, certainly had no idea what awaited them in Poland. Once transported, they still had little notion of the true character of the eastern camps, often finding out only after the doors to the gas chambers had slammed shut behind them.

Overall, the concentration camp system underwent huge transformations over the 12-year course of the Third Reich, until the camps were liberated by British, United States, Canadian, and Soviet forces during 1944 and 1945. Literally millions had been incarcerated, with untold numbers murdered as a result of their existence.

By 1943 the concentration camps could be seen to function in the following ways: as the means of removing real or potential opposition from the mainstream of German politics; as penal institutions for German criminals; as unofficial prisoner of war camps, generally for Soviet soldiers; as huge reservoirs of slave labor; as centers of agriculture, mining, and industry; as collection and transit points for so-called racial prisoners; and as extermination installations. The singular political aims originally envisaged for the camps had become almost completely submerged within 10 years.

Throughout the war, the camps remained detention centers for political prisoners, but their essentially political nature had almost disappeared by 1943–1945. The character that replaced it—forced labor and economic exploitation—was reflected not only in the part Auschwitz played in the German war effort but also in the important roles of camps such as Dora (for rocket and missile research), Ravensbrück (for the manufacture of armaments), and Westerbork (for the development of electronic instruments). Thousands of camps and subcamps played their part in producing something of benefit to the German war effort, an activity that intensified with the deteriorating fortunes of the war from 1944 onward.

The concentration camps established in Germany and throughout Europe thus underwent massive changes of role and function during their 12-year existence. From originally being a practical response to the challenges arising from the Nazi accession to power, they moved into other fields of operation and justification, while still containing the political nucleus that gave them birth—a nucleus that contained all the elements of a repressive and antihuman ideology that rejected the most fundamental ideals and freedoms fought for since Europe had emerged from the Dark Ages. From being “wild” institutions, the camps became massive cities housing tens of thousands of people, all of whom the Nazis identified as some sort of political “criminal.” Anybody who fell within the orbit of “enemy” did so because they had committed a “political” offense, even if that was only to have been born into an ethnic or religious group the Nazis had proscribed. The camps’ very raison d’être changed, from being compounds for political prisoners to huge economic concerns comprised of giant industrial plants whose sole design was to exploit the abundant slave labor they possessed for the greater good of the German Reich. That itself changed with the establishment of a third strain of camps that served as extermination centers for those the Nazis deemed racially undesirable.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Arbeit Macht Frei; Auschwitz; Bergen-Belsen; Buchenwald; Dachau; Dehumanization; Dora-Mittelbau; Drancy; Eicke, Theodor; Final Solution; Flossenbürg; Fossoli di Carpi; Funktionshäftling; Good; Gross-Rosen; Hinzert; Homosexuals; Italian Jews and Fascism; Jasenovac; Kapos; Kraków-Plaszów; Lange, Herbert; Levi, Primo; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Majdanek; Mauthausen-Gusen; Mechelen; Müller, Heinrich; Neuengamme; Night and Fog; Pohl, Oswald; Poland; Sachsenhausen; Salaspils; Schutzhaft; Slave Labor; SS-Totenkopfverbände; Theresienstadt; Trawniki Men; Vaivara; Vittel; Vught; Westerbork; Wiedergutmachung; Wilde-KZ

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Kogon, Eugen, The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System Behind Them. New York: Berkley Windhover Books, 1975.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Confiscation of Jewish Property

The seizure, confiscation, and theft of Jewish property during the Holocaust took place throughout Europe on a massive scale. Historian Raul Hilberg included in his analysis the expropriation of Jewish property as one of the main stages that comprised the Holocaust. Nazi Germany introduced a wide variety of confiscation measures from 1933, which were implemented by both the financial bureaucracy and the police. The “Aryanization” of Jewish businesses (that is, their transfer to non-Jewish ownership) during the 1930s saw many companies and private individuals competing to grab the spoils, as the Jews were driven from most branches of the economy. Similar anti-Jewish economic policies were pursued in the territories annexed and occupied by Nazi Germany from the late 1930s. Most states aligned with Nazi Germany (including Vichy France, fascist Italy, and Hungary) also introduced their own extensive legal measures to confiscate Jewish property.

Soon after the Nazi seizure of power in 1933, Jews were excluded from the civil service and other key professions, such as the law. A highly visible boycott of Jewish businesses in April aimed to demonstrate public pressure for action against the Jews. The first new laws specifically authorizing the confiscation of property were directed mainly against the Nazis' political opponents in July 1933. Some Jews were affected immediately by these laws. By the start of World War II, the law for the denaturalization of emigrants, passed in July 1933, was being applied to expropriate the remaining property of thousands of Jewish emigrants.

The Aryanization of businesses gathered pace during the 1930s as successive measures limited the access of "Jewish-owned companies" to state contracts and government-controlled raw materials. Currency exchange and tax laws were applied in a discriminatory way to seize Jewish property and encourage Jewish emigration. Many Jews were dismissed from employment and forced to resign from company boards, even before specific laws made this compulsory. Business ownership was transferred into "Aryan" hands, sometimes directly through blackmail and coercion. In other cases, Jews sold cheaply, anticipating still harsher measures to come. The guiding Nazi principle was that the Jews must leave, but their property should remain behind. Onerous taxes on emigration and property transfer meant that even Jews who successfully fled Germany could export only a fraction of their former wealth.

The annexation of Austria in March 1938 accelerated the process of expropriation. Here, so-called "wild Aryanizations" took place on a massive scale, as Austrian Nazis simply seized hundreds of Jewish businesses. Both the registration of Jewish property and decrees regulating compulsory Aryanization reflected efforts by the Nazi authorities to reassert state control over Aryanization. The Kristallnacht violence (the "Night of Broken Glass") on November 9-10, 1938, which included much looting as well as wanton destruction, was exploited by Reich Marshal Hermann Göring, in charge of the Four-Year Plan, to impose a 1 billion Reichsmark fine on the Jews. This was collected over the following year through the regular tax offices. It took the form of a special wealth tax of 25%. Meanwhile, the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna, supervised by Adolf Eichmann, also sought to tax wealthier Jews to help cover the emigration costs of those lacking sufficient means.

On the outbreak of war in September 1939, the blocking of bank accounts was applied to all propertied Jews to secure what little wealth remained. Largely excluded from employment, Jews faced forced labor for little or no pay. Initial expulsions of Jews into the Generalgouvernement (a part of German-occupied Poland) and also France in 1939-1940 were accompanied by efforts to seize their remaining property for the state. Mass deportations of Jews from Germany to the ghettos and extermination camps then commenced in October 1941. Shortly after this, the infamous Eleventh Decree to the Reich Citizenship Law removed the citizenship of Jews on crossing the Reich border, thereby confiscating all remaining property from that instant. The Gestapo sealed the apartments and collected detailed inventories from the deportees; the financial administration used this documentation to clear out the apartments, sell off the contents, and wind up remaining accounts "legally."

In the occupied east, the Nazis and their collaborators seized Jewish property in each phase of persecution. During ghettoization, sudden relocation forced Jews to leave property behind to be looted. Then Jews in the ghettos had to barter away most of what remained to obtain food to survive. At the mass shooting sites, property was taken directly from Jewish victims, with the most valuable items being sent to Berlin. Considerable efforts were made also to recycle every last item transported by train with the Jews to the extermination centers, such as Auschwitz or Treblinka.

It is important to note that the Axis-aligned and occupied states, including Bulgaria, which did not deport its own Jews to be killed, all implemented extensive confiscation measures, except for occupied Denmark. Bulgaria created a Commissariat for the Jewish Question in imitation of the French model and also imposed a stiff property tax on Jewish wealth. Vichy France introduced its own confiscation legislation in response to German measures, in part to assert French sovereignty in these matters. In Hungary, full-scale confiscation began in May 1944 concurrent with the deportations to Auschwitz; the Hungarian government declared that Jewish assets were now viewed as Hungarian national property. In practice, however, confiscation in Hungary became a competition between private looters, various state agencies, and also the Germans to secure what they could under the chaotic conditions of sudden ghettoization. Meanwhile, the Allied nations and governments-in-exile warned that Axis property seizures, including those implemented against Jews, were regarded as illegal, and would be reversed on the conclusion of the war.

Clearly, the mass confiscation of Jewish property was integral to the Holocaust. However, it would be an exaggeration to imply that the Holocaust was motivated primarily by greed. Nazi racial antisemitism contained various key elements, of which economic opportunism was only one strand. Nevertheless, economic discrimination and plunder acted as a catalyst, facilitating the Nazi process of destruction in several ways. The incentive of Jewish property provided an additional motive for some perpetrators and bought more widespread complicity from large sections of the general population, while the effect on the victims was demoralizing, debilitating, and stigmatizing. Ever-diminishing means reduced the opportunities for Jews to emigrate or flee, and ultimately it also wore down their physical ability to resist.

MARTIN DEAN

See also: Abetz, Otto; Anschluss; Aryanization; Deutsche Bank; France; Ghettos; Haavara Agreement; Hilberg, Raul; Jonas, Regina; Kristallnacht; Wiedergutmachung

Further Reading

Dean, Martin. Robbing the Jews: The Confiscation of Jewish Property in the Holocaust, 1933–1945. New York: Cambridge University Press in association with the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2008.

Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1962.

Conspiracy

A made-for-television film jointly produced by the BBC and HBO in 2001, Conspiracy is a movie that dramatically brings to the screen the Wannsee Conference of January 20, 1942, in which leading Nazi bureaucrats and department heads in the Third Reich met to coordinate the details that put into practice the “Final Solution of the Jewish Question” (Die Endlösung der Judenfrage). Chaired by SS General Reinhard Heydrich, with minutes taken by SS Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann and with many senior Nazis in attendance (such as Dr. Wilhelm Stuckart and Dr. Roland Freisler, among others), the meeting revealed a plan for the complete industrialized mass murder of every Jew in Europe, to the figure of 11 million. Conspiracy, taking as its foundation the sole surviving record of the meeting, is an intimate movie in which nearly every scene takes place in the meeting room itself. The movie provides a psychological, cultural, and ideological profile of the Nazi thinking that could even discuss the mass extermination of millions of people, and this is clearly its greatest strength. The director, Frank Pierson, is positively clinical in permitting as little subjective emotion as possible show through. His preferred strategy is to allow the words of the participants themselves to provoke the audience revulsion he seeks. As a penetrating snapshot into this definitive moment in the Nazi annihilation of the Jews of Europe, Conspiracy is an important work of cinematography. It won numerous media awards, notably an Emmy for Kenneth Branagh as Best Actor for his portrayal of Heydrich, and a Golden Globe for Stanley Tucci as Best Supporting Actor for his portrayal of Eichmann.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Eichmann, Adolf; Final Solution; Heydrich, Reinhard; Wannsee Conference

Further Reading

Baron, Lawrence. Projecting the Holocaust into the Present: The Changing Focus of Contemporary Holocaust Cinema. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.

Insdorf, Annette. Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust.

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Roseman, Mark. The Villa, the Lake, the Meeting: Wannsee and the Final Solution. London: Allen Lane, 2002.

Coughlin, Charles

Father Charles E. Coughlin was an American Roman Catholic priest from Little Flower Parish, Detroit, Michigan, notorious for his antisemitic invective throughout the 1930s and early 1940s. He was born in 1891 in Hamilton, Ontario, to Irish Catholic parents and educated at St. Michael's College, Toronto. He was ordained a priest in 1916 and moved to Detroit in 1923, where he began his work as a parish priest.

He first took to the airwaves in 1926, providing a weekly hour-long local radio program. In 1930 this was picked up by CBS and became nationally syndicated. Dubbed “the radio priest” because of his weekly broadcasts of sermons, he spoke for the most part on religious issues. With the onset of the Depression, however, he began covering political topics. Over time, these became more and more radicalized, as he searched for conspiracies everywhere as a way to explain the tumultuous nature of the world and society as he saw it.

Coughlin was an early and enthusiastic supporter of U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt, but he turned against him when Roosevelt's sweeping reforms during the New Deal seemed to go too far. While Coughlin's major interest during the Depression years was one of economic rehabilitation and the enrichment of the dreadful conditions being experienced by unemployed American workers, increasingly

Father Charles Edward Coughlin was a controversial American Catholic priest based at the National Shrine of the Little Flower church in Detroit, Michigan. In 1934, Coughlin, one of the first political leaders to use radio to reach a mass audience, established a political organization called the National Union for Social Justice. During the 1930s he used his radio program as a vehicle for spreading antisemitic remarks, during which he supported some of the policies of Adolf Hitler. He was forced off the air after the entry of the United States into World War II. (AP Photo) his sermons adopted an antisemitic tone as the 1930s progressed. A populist, he inspired his listeners to feel hatred for Jews by attacking prominent Jewish figures, famously condemning Roosevelt for failing to drive “the money-changers from the temple” and “overstating” the extent to which Jews were being persecuted in Germany.

In 1936 Coughlin began publishing a weekly newspaper, Social Justice, in which he reprinted excerpts from the notorious antisemitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Seeing his following expanding beyond anything he had previously anticipated, in 1938 he created an organization called the Christian Front, which won approving support from Irish Catholic Americans in considerable numbers. With the development of the Christian Front movement, members were soon seen in the forefront of antisemitic activities, and frequently conducted meetings at which American Nazis and fascist sympathizers were also present. Often such meetings would end with the Nazi salute. At such rallies, Christian Fronters were often called upon to “liquidate the Jews in America.”

On the night of November 9–10, 1938, the Kristallnacht pogrom took place across Germany. Two weeks later, on November 20, Coughlin unsympathetically stated that “Jewish persecution only followed after Christians first were persecuted,” referring to the millions of Christians killed by the communists in Russia. For those with ears to hear, he drew a direct parallel between the “Jewish” regime in the Soviet Union and the anti-Jewish measures being adopted in Germany. For some radio stations, this was going too far, and they refused to air his broadcasts without prior vetting of some sort. Others dropped Coughlin altogether, leading to protests from his supporters outside the stations themselves.

With this, Coughlin was lauded by a great many across America as the man of the moment, and he received diocesan support from New York, Boston, Chicago, and many other cities with large Irish or Catholic populations. At no time was he publicly criticized by the archbishops of Brooklyn, New York, or Boston.

At its height, Coughlin's radio program had a weekly listening audience of nearly 16 million, of whom 67%, in a poll, said they agreed strongly with his major claims. With the entry of the United States into World War II from December 1941, Coughlin was ordered by the U.S. attorney general to cease broadcasting, and he returned to his work as a parish priest in Detroit until his retirement and death in 1979.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Antisemitism; Catholic Church; Protocols of the Elders of Zion

Further Reading

Carpenter, Ronald H. Father Charles E. Coughlin. Westport (CT): Greenwood Press, 1998.

Marcus, Sheldon. Father Coughlin: The Tumultuous Life of the Priest of the Little Flower. Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.

Warren, Donald. Radio Priest: Charles Coughlin, the Father of Hate Radio. New York: Free Press, 1996.

Credit Suisse

Credit Suisse is the largest bank in Switzerland and was a significant factor in making Swiss banking a worldwide power. It was one of the first European banks to tap the important North American market for bonds and has imported American ideas and practices into the more conservative European field. The bank has come under fire for its cooperation with Nazi authorities during World War II and for its failure to release money deposited with it by Jews exterminated by the Nazis.

Credit Suisse was founded in 1856. At the time, the Swiss federal constitution was only eight years old. The country was beginning to shift from an agriculture-based economy to one based on industry and manufacturing. Alfred Escher, a young Zurich politician, was interested in building a railroad to service the northeast part of Switzerland. His talks with foreign banks for financing were unsuccessful, so he decided to set up an independent bank in Zurich. He offered shares valued at 3 million Swiss francs to investors. Within three days, he had received offers for 218 million shares. Credit Suisse opened for business on July 16, 1856, and quickly earned a reputation for financing business ventures in Switzerland.

The bank's first years were profitable as industry grew in Switzerland. The American Civil War caused some hardship, since the emerging textile industry in Switzerland depended on cotton imported from the southern United States. The sudden flood of cotton at the end of the war led to the collapse of the cotton market, and as a result Credit Suisse posted its first, and only, loss in 1867. The growth of other industries and the continuing expansion of railroads soon made up for the setback. Credit Suisse contributed to the development of the Swiss monetary system. By the end of the Franco-Prussian War in 1871, Credit Suisse was the largest bank in Switzerland.

Credit Suisse was aided in its growth by the revision of Switzerland's federal constitution in 1874. Proportional representation in state and federal governments supported more stability in the country. Savings increased markedly, enabling Switzerland to become an exporter of capital by the mid-1880s. The continuing industrialization of Switzerland and Europe during the years before World War I led to greater demands for credit. Credit Suisse provided money to pay for the construction of factories, power plants, and phone systems. The founding of the Swiss National Bank in 1907 and the growth in foreign investments by Swiss banks laid the foundation for Switzerland to eventually become the banking capital of the world. By the beginning of World War I in 1914, Credit Suisse had 13 different branches throughout Switzerland.

During the war, foreign investment halted. Credit Suisse helped place Swiss securities returned by foreign investors onto the Swiss market. The company also defended the interests of Swiss investors abroad. Following the war, Credit Suisse played a leading role in the electrification of the country. When a coal shortage occurred, the bank financed the conversion of Swiss railroads to electric power. Foreign investment increased rapidly during the 1920s and came to an end with the Great Depression. The depression caused increased national barriers to investment. As a result, Credit Suisse concentrated on investment with English-speaking countries. By 1939 the bank had established the Swiss-American Corporation to concentrate on the securities business. In 1940 Credit Suisse opened its first foreign branch in New York City.

During World War II, Credit Suisse extended large amounts of credit to the Swiss government, which was in turn owed 1.7 billion Swiss francs by the Germans. Along with other Swiss banks, Credit Suisse had financial dealings with the Nazis that were later criticized. Credit Suisse also was later revealed to have held millions in deposits by Jews who were killed in the Holocaust. When Jewish groups pushed for Credit Suisse to open its records to possible heirs, the bank resisted, citing traditional Swiss banking secrecy. Lists of people who had opened accounts before 1945 and which were inactive were eventually made public in the 1990s. In 1997 Credit Suisse and other major banks set up a $70 million humanitarian fund for victims of the Holocaust.

After the end of World War II, Credit Suisse helped to finance the reconstruction of Europe. It also extended its services, including issuing credit cards and providing consumer credit. By the 1960s Credit Suisse had established a partnership with White Weld, a leading American investment bank, to sell Eurobonds to the American market. In 1968, with the creation of a free gold market, Credit Suisse became a major gold trading house. The bank's growth continued in the 1970s, although a fraudulent scheme at the Chiasso branch caused a scandal in 1977 and eventually cost $1.2 billion.

During the 1980s Credit Suisse eventually expanded to control assets of $46 billion and manage $75 billion to $150 billion. Additional banks were acquired worldwide during that time as well. By 1987 the leading officer of Credit Suisse was Hans-Jeorg Rudloff, an American-trained banker who brought a nontraditional aggressiveness to Credit Suisse. Rudloff helped end the close relationship between Credit Suisse and Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation. The three largest banks in Switzerland had been known as a syndicate, and they worked closely with each other to promote deals. Under Rudloff, Credit Suisse went its own way and often expanded into areas traditionally shunned by the others, including insurance and other financial services. By the end of the 20th century Credit Suisse was one of the most important financial institutions in the world.

TIM WATTS

See also: Switzerland

Further Reading

Aarons, Mark. Unholy Trinity: The Vatican, the Nazis, and the Swiss Banks. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1998.

Orland, Leonard. A Final Accounting: Holocaust Survivors and Swiss Banks. Durham (NC): Carolina Academic Press, 2010.

Schapiro, Jane. Inside a Class Action: The Holocaust and the Swiss Banks. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2013.

Crimes against Humanity

A legal category within international law, “crimes against humanity” identify punishable offenses for gross violations of human rights, atrocities, and mass murder of noncombatant civilians. Such offenses are a relatively new category, largely the product of international human rights legislation enacted during the 20th century.

Certain crimes—war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide—are considered hostis humani generis (“an enemy of all mankind”). In that regard, they are considered crimes of “universal jurisdiction,” a principle in international law whereby states claim criminal jurisdiction over persons whose alleged crimes were committed outside the boundaries of the prosecuting state, regardless of nationality, country of residence, or any other relationship to the prosecuting state. The notion of universal jurisdiction thus means that any state should have the obligation to try a perpetrator of such crimes. The concept is closely linked to the idea that certain international norms are erga omnes, obligations owed by all states toward the community as a whole. Not all states have enacted the principle of universal jurisdiction, as it is viewed in some quarters as compromising the codes pertaining to state sovereignty.

Often, crimes against humanity are bracketed alongside of war crimes, though they differ from these in that they are not, for the most part, violations of the laws of war; indeed, crimes against humanity need not occur in wartime at all. A lengthy list of acts that can be considered as crimes against humanity include, but are not confined to, the following: murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, and persecutions on political, racial, and religious grounds. Other inhumane acts not listed there can also be included, rendering crimes against humanity as an evolutionary category over which international (or, less likely, national) courts have some degree of discretion. There is no generally accepted definition of crimes against humanity, and, to date, no universal international legislation covering such crimes exists.

Despite this, several groundbreaking initiatives have placed the category of crimes against humanity in the forefront of major international humanitarian issues requiring attention. Important case-law precedents were created through the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg in 1946, when the category of crimes against humanity was actually listed as one of the four counts facing the accused Nazi leaders in the aftermath of the Holocaust. Since then, the category has been included in the Articles establishing the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda (ICTY and ICTR, respectively). On July 1, 2002, the International Criminal Court (ICC) was established at The Hague, and it incorporated a lengthy list of acts which were to be included as crimes against humanity. The category is, generally speaking, a useful one for covering acts which are not considered as genocide according to the UN Genocide Convention 1948. Given that there is no universally recognized or binding definition of crimes against humanity, and that the term is therefore legally imprecise, heinous acts that cannot be prosecuted as genocide can be prosecuted as crimes against humanity. But the two categories are not interchangeable, and genocide is now usually considered to be a crime of greater magnitude. While genocide is a single crime, crimes against humanity is a category embracing a number of different, though often related, crimes.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Ferencz, Benjamin; Flick Case; Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial; Gebhardt, Karl; I.G. Farben Case; Judges' Trial; Krupp Case; London Charter Agreement; Majdanek; Moscow Declaration; Nuremberg Principles; Nuremberg Trials; Papon, Maurice; Sauckel, Fritz; Schlegelberger, Franz; Speer, Albert; Touvier Case; UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide; War Crimes; Zuehlke Trial

Further Reading

Bassiouni, M. Cherif. Crimes against Humanity: Historical Evolution and Contemporary Application. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2011.

Robertson, Geoffrey. Crimes against Humanity: The Struggle for Global Justice. New York: Penguin Books, 1999.

Simpson, Gerry J. Law, War, and Crime: War Crimes, Trials and the Reinvention of International Law. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2007.

Croatia

Croatia is a Slavic country located in the mountainous Balkans region of southeastern Europe. During the 1930s many Croats had become highly nationalistic and joined separatist movements, the most extreme of which was the Ustashe (singular, Ustasha), which was strongly fascist in ideology.

Upon the outbreak of World War II in 1939 Croatia was part of western Yugoslavia, a polyglot political entity created after the end of World War I. Croatia had a population of approximately 3.78 million, of whom perhaps 40,000 were Jewish. It also had sizable minority populations of Serbian Muslims and Eastern Orthodox Serbs. Most Croatians, who had sided with the Central Powers during World War I, were Roman Catholic, and unlike the Serbs, they employed the Roman rather than the Cyrillic alphabet. During the interwar years, the Croats sought an independent Croatia; to achieve this, nationalist leaders formed the Ustashe, a right-wing paramilitary political party that was pro-Italian and pro-German in outlook. Before World War II began, Italy had provided material and military aid to the Ustashe group.

When Yugoslavia decided to join the Axis alliance in March 1941, most Croats applauded the move. In early April, when Italian and German troops entered Croatia, they were welcomed by a majority of Croats. After Croatian soldiers serving in the Yugoslav Army defected, Ustashe leaders established the independent state of Croatia on April 10, 1941; the new nation also incorporated Bosnia-Herzegovina. Ustashe leader Ante Pavelić now became president of the upstart country.

This puppet state, the Independent State of Croatia (Nezavisna drzava Hrvatska—NDH), was created by Croat fascists under Italian fascist and Nazi supervision. The NDH governed most of modern Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and parts of Serbia. Its leaders implemented a policy of ethnic cleansing. The Ustashe forced thousands of Serbs to convert from Orthodoxy to Catholicism. Orthodox Serbs and Jews had to wear armbands in public identifying their religion before most were deported to death camps. The Catholic Church was complicit in this murderous scheme, and the Croatian archbishops did nothing to prevent the mass murder of Jews and Serbs. Many Jews, Serbs, and Roma were sent to Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, but a sizable number were deported to death camps within Croatia. Six were set up along the banks of the Sava River, about 60 miles south of Zagreb. The worst was Jasenovac, where over 100,000 civilians were murdered. Other camps were Zemun, Sajmiste, Donja Gradina, a women's camp at Stara Gradiska, and a children's camp at Sisak. Sajmiste was run by the Nazis as an extermination camp for Serbian Jews. It is estimated that between 4,000 and 8,000 were killed there. Others were also killed there as well, including Roma and Serbian opponents of the Nazis and the Ustashe.

Toward the end of the war, as Yugoslav partisans under Josip Broz Tito battled Axis forces in the region, many Ustashe officials fled Croatia and sought refuge in Austria. In May 1945 the remnants of the Ustashe army surrendered to Allied Forces. By the end of the year, partisans had rounded up and summarily executed as many as 250,000 Croats who had fought for or supported the Ustashe and/or Axis powers.

Pavelić, meanwhile, managed to escape justice and died in exile in Spain. At least 32,000 Croatian Jews were killed between 1941 and 1945, along with 26,000 Roma and 350,000–400,000 Serbs. Croatia was reintegrated into a greater Yugoslavia and remained a part of that union until the end of the Cold War in 1991.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Catholic Church; Jasenovac; Pavelić, Ante; Serbia; Ustashe; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Glenny, Misha. The Balkans: Nationalism, War and the Great Powers 1804–1999. New York: Viking Penguin Group, 1999.

Tanner, Marcus. Croatia: A Nation Forged in War. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1998.

Csatory, Lazlo

Lazlo Csatory was a suspected Hungarian war criminal who is thought to have played a role in the Holocaust during World War II.

He was born on March 4, 1915, in the village of Many in central Hungary (then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire). He went into police work, and after the Germans occupied Hungary in early 1944 he became an assistant to the collaborationist police commandant of Kassa, Hungary (now Kosice, Slovakia). It was there that Csatory allegedly committed wholesale war crimes against Hungarian Jews. Among other things, he was accused of having physically brutalized Jews in detention, beating them with his hands and a dog whip. Csatory was also suspected of having helped deport to death camps as many as 15,000 Jews. Most were sent to Auschwitz, where virtually all of them perished.

In 1948, based on the testimony of witnesses and survivors, the Czech government convicted Csatory of war crimes in absentia and sentenced him to death (by then, Csatory was living in Hungary). The following year he sought asylum in Canada, expressing his desire to remove himself from the yoke of Hungarian communism. Csatory became a Canadian citizen in 1955 and eventually settled down in Montreal, where he became an art dealer. He thereafter led a quiet and obscure life until 1997, when allegations of his past activities during the war came to the attention of the Canadian government. Csatory vehemently denied the accusations, claiming that he had been stationed elsewhere in 1944–1945. Nevertheless, the Canadian government began deportation proceedings, and Csatory fled the country by year's end, eventually making a home in Budapest.

By 2012 the Simon Wiesenthal Center had managed to track Csatory down and revealed evidence against him to the Hungarian government. On June 18 of that year, Hungarian authorities questioned Csatory and indicted him for war crimes. On June 20, the Slovaks notified Hungarian officials that they wished to try Csatory in Slovakia, and Hungary suspended its case on July 8, citing Csatory's indictment and conviction in absentia in 1948. Csatory remained in Budapest and died there on August 10, 2013, before proceedings against him could begin.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Hungary; Slovakia; War Crimes

Further Reading

Abbott, Peter, Nigel Thomas, and Martin Windrow. Germany's Eastern Front Allies, 1941–45. London: Osprey, 1982.

Cornelius, Deborah S. Hungary in World War II: Caught in the Cauldron. 3rd ed. New York: Fordham University Press, 2011.

Czechoslovakia

Created from the ashes of World War I in 1918, in 1938 Czechoslovakia, situated in central Europe, was a nation with a population of some 15 million people. It had been carved out of portions of Bohemia and Moravia (historically part of Austria) as well as Hungary (Slovakia) and Ruthenia. This meant that Czechoslovakia was a polyglot nation of multiple ethnicities, including 7 million Czechs, 3 million Germans, 2.5 million Slovaks, and 1 million Hungarians. In addition, there were about a half million Ukrainians living in Ruthenia and also a number of Poles. Jews represented approximately 1.3% of the total population.

Despite this complex mixture of ethnicities, cultures, and religions, Czechoslovakia remained relatively stable politically during the interwar years, with a functioning democratic parliamentary system. Indeed, it was central Europe's only true democracy, and the nation enjoyed the highest standard of living in the region. It also boasted a well-equipped 400,000-man army.

Since the Nazis came to power in Germany in 1933, Adolf Hitler had set his sights on seizing the German-speaking area of Czechoslovakia, known as the Sudetenland. The Western democracies capitulated to Hitler's demand that Germany annex the Sudetenland at the September 1938 Munich Conference, where Hitler pledged not to seek any additional territory or wage war in the future. This precipitated a full-blown political crisis in Czechoslovakia, which resulted in the exodus of Czech democrats and the installation of a right-wing rump regime known as Czecho-Slovakia. Soon, Hungary and Poland took advantage of the situation and also annexed Czech territory.

On March 15, 1939, Hitler completely abrogated his earlier pledges, and German forces swept into what remained of the country and established a puppet regime. Bohemia and Moravia were now made into a German “protectorate” governed by Konstantin von Neurath (and, later, Reinhard Heydrich, Kurt Daluge, and William Frick). Slovak territory was governed by the Slovak People’s Party, under the leadership of Monsignor Jozef Tiso, a Roman Catholic priest. A puppet German state, Slovakia was nominally independent but quickly established a one-party dictatorship along the lines of Germany and Italy. Tiso remained in control until April 1945, when Allied troops liberated Slovakia. By May of that year, much of the rest of Czechoslovakia was liberated, with Prague falling on May 9.

Czechoslovakia was the scene of two notorious massacres perpetrated by German forces in the aftermath of Reinhard Heydrich’s assassination on March 27, 1942, when British-supported Czechoslovak commandos ambushed and killed him. In Lidice, on June 9–10, 1942, German troops murdered 198 civilian men and 76 women in reprisal for the Heydrich attack. In addition, 184 women and 98 children were taken to concentration camps; most of the children were gassed to death. Days later, all of the adults in the village of Lezaky were killed; meanwhile, in October 1942, relatives and friends of those killed at Lidice were rounded up and killed at the Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp. Between 1938 and 1945 at least 275,000 Jews living in Czechoslovakia were killed. Many were deported by the Germans and sent to concentration and death camps, while others died at the hands of right-wing fascists in Slovakia.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Herz-Sommer, Alice; Joint Distribution Committee; Kalina, Antonin; Lebensraum; Munich Agreement; Shirer, William L.; Slavs; Slovakia; Tiso, Jozef; Winton, Nicholas

Further Reading

Mamatey, V., and R. Luza (Eds.). A History of the Czechoslovak Republic, 1918–1948. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 1973.

Mastny, Vojtech. The Czechs under Nazi Rule: The Failure of National Resistance, 1939–1942. New York: Columbia University Press, 1987.

Czerniakow, Adam

Born on November 30, 1880, Adam Czerniakow showed no indication as a young man that he would one day be the head of the Judenrat (Jewish Council) of the Warsaw Ghetto, established by the Nazis in late 1939. Czerniakow received degrees in Warsaw and Dresden, Germany, in engineering. He entered public life in 1927 as a member of the Warsaw Municipal Council, where he continued to serve until 1934. He was elected to the Polish Senate in 1930, but for technical reasons he was unable to take his Senate seat.

It was from his position as a member of the executive committee of the Jewish community that he came to the attention of the Nazis. In 1939, shortly after Germany’s successful invasion of Poland, Czerniakow was ordered to establish a 24-member Judenrat and to take the role of chairman.

Czerniakow’s appointment to be the head of the Jewish Council was not accepted positively by all members of the leadership of Warsaw’s Jewish community. Czerniakow spoke poor Yiddish, the language of the vast majority of Jews in Poland. He was considered to be an “assimilationist,” and he did not seem to be able to engage effectively with the masses of Jews confined in the ghetto. Perhaps it is for this reason that he was unable to assert the level of control in the Warsaw Ghetto that his peers did in the Łódź and Vilna ghettos.

Like leaders in all of the Judenräte (plural of Judenrat) established in Nazi ghettos, Czerniakow and his fellow members of the Warsaw Jewish Council were tasked with two distinct areas of responsibility. The first was the administration of the ghetto, including organization of food distribution, creation of hospitals and an entire network of medical care, establishment of schools, development of a system to deal with sanitation and housing concerns, along with building a Jewish police force to maintain order in an environment that held 400,000 Jews in a space less than one and a half square miles.

The second was the facilitation of the Nazis’ orders, including the responsibility of providing the number of Jews ordered by the Nazis to be assembled for deportation “East,” meaning to their death in extermination camps. In the case of the Warsaw Ghetto, Treblinka was the extermination camp to which hundreds of thousands of Jews would be sent.

It was this role—having to issue lists of Jews to be sent to their death—that was the most difficult for the members of the Warsaw Ghetto Judenrat, and especially for Czerniakow. On July 22, 1942, when Czerniakow was told to round up 6,000 Jews to be transported the next morning, and 6,000 each morning thereafter (referred to as the Gross-Aktion Warsaw), Czerniakow made impassioned efforts to get the Nazis to agree to exemptions to the deportation orders. While he was successful in some respects—certain sanitation workers, or husbands of women working in factories, for example—he was unable to obtain an exemption for Jewish orphans.

On the next day, July 23, Czerniakow committed suicide. He was unable to bring himself to participate in the awful job of choosing every day who would die and who would live until the next day. Some look at Czerniakow's act as one of great courage and moral commitment to the fundamental commandment of not taking another's life, directly or otherwise, while others see it as an act of cowardice, leaving to someone else to do what he himself could not.

Czerniakow kept a diary from September 6, 1939, to the day of his death on July 23, 1942. That diary represents a chilling window into the day-to-day world of the Warsaw Ghetto and the responsibilities of its Judenrat. The diary has been published and serves to this day as one of the most important diaries to survive the Holocaust. The original is housed at Yad Vashem.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Judenrat; Uprising; Warsaw Ghetto; Zuckerman, Yitzhak

Further Reading

Hilberg, Raul (Ed.). The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow: Prelude to Doom. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1999.

Tushnet, Leonard. The Pavement of Hell: 3 Leaders of the Judenrat. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1972.

D

Dachau

In Dachau, a pleasant suburb outside Munich, Germany, the first Nazi concentration camp was built in 1933, just two months after Adolf Hitler and the Nazis took power. Dachau was used as a training camp for SS camp personnel, instilling in them the attitude that prisoners were Untermenschen, or subhumans, and creating a climate of fear through intimidation and violence.

During its 12 years of existence, Dachau was a camp for political prisoners, and its population was largely made up of dissidents and members of groups considered inferior. The former included Socialists, Christian leaders, and some Jehovah's Witnesses; the latter was largely made up of Roma, Jews, homosexuals, criminals, and Polish intellectuals. Dachau was an important camp for religious dissidents. More than 3,000 clergy, mostly Catholic, were imprisoned there, including bishops and one cardinal. The Vatican has since beatified six of these priests as martyrs, while the Orthodox Church recognizes a Serbian bishop as a saint.

Dachau was not an extermination camp, so German Jewish prisoners were often shipped to the death camps in Poland. However, Hungarian and other Jews were brought to Dachau in 1944 to work as slave laborers in munitions factories. By the time of the liberation in April 1945, about 30% of the camp population was Jewish. The "politicals" were made up of prominent leaders from every country invaded by the Nazis. In all camps, the prisoners formed an internal government, but at Dachau the prisoners' experience in leadership made it possible to control the criminal element that preyed upon the weak in many other camps.

Among the 206,206 prisoners registered at Dachau during its existence, 31,591 deaths were recorded, though the number is certainly higher. This figure does not include the mass executions of Soviet and French prisoners of war, who were dispatched by firing squads shortly after arrival. It also does not include invalids shipped away and executed elsewhere. Most of the Dachau prisoners were used as slave labor, with upward of 37,000 working in armament factories in 36 subsidiary camps. Both work and living conditions were harsh, with insufficient food, regular beatings, and unsanitary crowding. Each barracks housed some 1,500 people in unheated wooden buildings built for 200. By the end in 1945 typhus was rampant in the camp, and the Red Cross tried to keep the prisoners from being freed before the American army arrived for fear of spreading the disease through the countryside.

Many prisoners suffered from medical experiments performed on the living. Some were kept in freezing water to see how long they could survive and still be revived. More than a thousand were infected with malaria, including numbers of Polish priests, and some with tuberculosis. Experiments with pressurization left victims permanently deaf and disfigured.

The camp, with more than 30,000 prisoners (almost 10,000 had been marched off three days earlier), was liberated by the American Seventh Army. Some American soldiers were so traumatized by what they saw that a number of Nazi guards were shot even after they had surrendered. The Dachau was the first Nazi concentration camp, established in March 1933. It was intended initially that the camp would house political prisoners. Over time, the camp developed into a complex for imprisoning Jews, German and Austrian criminals, and foreign resisters from German-occupied countries. The complex expanded to include nearly 100 subcamps located throughout southern Germany and Austria. Dachau was liberated by U.S. forces on April 29, 1945. At least 32,000 people died at Dachau during its 12 years in operation. This image shows mounds of clothes belonging to dead slave laborers found at Dachau when the U.S. Seventh Army liberated the camp in April 1945. (National Archives) troops were never prosecuted. The shocked and infuriated American commanding officer ordered the citizens of Dachau to march through the camp to see its devastation so that they could never deny the evil that had existed among them. Forty camp staff members were tried for war crimes, and 36 were sentenced to death.

Dachau is probably the most visited of the Nazi concentration camps. One barracks has been reconstructed to show the living conditions, and an introductory film and display convey the horror of the place. The gas chamber (never used), the gallows, and the crematorium have been maintained. Where the ashes of the dead were thrown is now a park marked with a Star of David and a cross. Three memorials—a Protestant chapel, the Catholic Christ in Agony church, and a Jewish memorial—honor the dead. In the field used for roll call each day is a sculptured memorial to the dead. Behind the camp is a Carmelite convent of nuns who offer prayers for reparation.

A Russian Orthodox chapel commemorates the celebration of the Orthodox Easter that took place a week after the camp fell to the Americans. Using makeshift vestments pinned together from Nazi towels, the Russian, Greek, and Serb prisoners chanted the entire liturgy from memory, including the traditional commentary of Saint John Chrysostom, recited by a monk from Mount Athos. The main feature of the chapel is an icon of Christ leading the prisoners out of the camp gates.

NORBERT C. BROCKMAN

See also: Bettelheim, Bruno; Concentration Camps; Eicke, Theodor; Heydrich, Reinhard; J.A. Topf and Sons; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Medical Experimentation; Münch, Hans; Priest Block, Dachau; Wilde-KZ

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.

Berben, Paul. Dachau, 1933–1945: The Official History. San Francisco (CA): Norfolk Press, 1975.

Marcuse, Harold. Legacies of Dachau. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008.

Ryback, Timothy W. The Last Survivor: In Search of Martin Zaidenstadt. New York: Pantheon, 1999.

Dahlem Declaration

The Dahlem Declaration was the statement issued by the Second Confessing Synod of the German Protestant Church in Berlin-Dahlem, on October 20, 1934. Issued just five months after the founding document of the Confessing Church at its first synod—the Barmen Declaration—it represented a controversial change in the direction of the Confessing Church.

Although Adolf Hitler spoke of preserving and protecting Christianity, especially from the threat of so-called “godless communism,” he in fact sought to coordinate it with Nazi ideology as part of the broader Nazi program of Gleichschaltung, bringing all aspects of German society into conformity with the Nazi vision. This effort at coordination was a step toward Hitler’s true intent, namely, the elimination of Christianity altogether.

Being sensitive to public opinion and mindful of how deeply religious Germany was, Hitler initially sought to mollify any concerns the churches might have with the Nazi Reich. To this end, he entered into an agreement (Concordat) with the Vatican in 1933 promising that the Catholic Church could continue its worship, education, and social programs without interference by the government, in return for which the Catholic Church would withdraw from all aspects of the German political scene. Though this agreement was honored by the government more in the breach than in fact, it nonetheless defined a relationship between the Catholic Church and the Reich.

The relationship the government sought to establish with the Protestant Church—representing two-thirds of the population—was quite different. When the government established the German Christian movement (Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen) and made efforts to unify all of Germany’s Protestant churches in a national German Protestant Church (Deutsche Evangelische Kirche, or Reich Church), some pastors rejected the goal of the Reich Church to create an “Aryanized” form of Christianity. The Confessing Church was formed to protest the changes sought by the Reich Church.

In May 1934 the Confessing Church, at its first synod, released its founding document, the Barmen Declaration, which declared the gospel of Jesus Christ as the sole authority, and focused its protest on the efforts made by the German Christian movement to intervene in church theology and in so doing usurp the traditional authority of the church to determine who is to be considered a Christian. Although some pastors in the Confessing Church saw this protest as not going far enough, it nonetheless garnered great support at the synod, creating the first step toward unification of the Confessing Church’s message.

Five months later, in October 1934, the Confessing Church met for its second synod in Barmen in the church of Martin Niemöller, one of the leaders of the Confessing Church movement. The synod acted under the precept of Church Emergency Law (Kirchliche Notrecht). There, at Dahlem, ruptures within the movement that had been subsumed in efforts at unity at Barmen became all too clear. In fact, two sides emerged regarding the future direction of the Confessing Church. One sought to continue in the spirit of Barmen, that is, asserting the church’s supremacy in theological matters but not otherwise protesting or opposing other aspects of Nazi rule. The other side saw Barmen as only the beginning of a position that had to go further: to protest more strongly the fundamental errors of the German Christian Church and to declare that the Confessing Church—not the Nazi-established and supported German Christian Church—was the one true church of Protestant Christianity in Germany.

The Dahlem synod’s call for complete separation of the Confessing Church from the Reich Church and its directive that “the Christian communities, their pastors and elders” should “accept no directives from the Church Government” was a step that many pastors who had supported the Barmen Declaration could not bring themselves to support. Those pastors saw in the Confessing Church’s proclamation (that it was the only legitimate Protestant Church) a challenge not only to the Reich Church but also indirectly to the legitimacy of the government that established it.

The Dahlem Declaration announced a position that was incompatible with the German Christian movement and its Reich Church. It also created a schism in the Confessing Church. It was supported by a minority of the Confessing Church pastors, which, in turn, was a minority of the Protestant Church pastors in Germany. It created a very difficult question to be answered by each Confessing Church pastor and church: How and to what extent would it support the Confessing Church and oppose the Reich Church? Would the pastor and his church take a moderate position—one that stood more with the limited protests of the Barmen Declaration—or would they take a radical position (whose adherents were called Dahlemites)—one that sought to extend their opposition to the Reich Church and perhaps thereby find themselves in a position of opposition to the state, a position that in those times was seen as being an enemy of the state?

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Barmen Declaration; Protestant Churches, German

Further Reading

Barnett, Victoria. For the Soul of the People: Protestant Protest against Hitler. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Hockenos, Matthew D. "The Church Struggle and the Confessing Church: An Introduction to Bonhoeffer's Context." Studies in Christian-Jewish Relations 2/1 (2007): 1–20.

Damaskinos of Athens, Archbishop

Dimitrios Papandreou, as Father Theophilos Damaskinos, was archbishop of Athens during World War II. Born in Dorvisti, Greece, in 1890, Damaskinos was educated as a lawyer at the University of Athens, and upon graduating he enlisted in the Greek army and served during the Balkan Wars as a private. After this he was ordained as a priest of the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Greek Holy Synod soon thereafter appointed him abbot of the Penteli Monastery in Athens. In 1938 he was elected archbishop of Athens, but due to the opposition of Premier Ioannis (John) Metaxas, his appointment was voided, with Bishop Chrysanthus appointed instead. After the Germans invaded Greece in April 1941 the city of Athens was handed over to the Italians, and Damaskinos was reappointed as archbishop.

On March 23, 1943, when the Nazi deportation of the Greek Jews began, Damaskinos sent an appeal to Prime Minister Constantinos Logothetopoulos to put a halt to the deportations. As these were continually denied, however, Damaskinos was forced to take a different approach and appeal to the Germans directly. Therefore, the next day, March 24, 1943, he published a letter composed by the famous Greek poet Angelos Sikelianos and signed by 29 prominent Greek citizens. He also sent a petition to Günther Altenburg, Reich plenipotentiary for Greece.

The letter protested the treatment of Greek Jews, stating that it was contrary to the Nazis' own rules given that all Greek citizens, without distinction of race or religion, were to be treated equally. Damaskinos appealed to the Germans by explaining the history of the Jews in Greece, praising their citizenship and the integral role they had played in the country's economic and military development. Damaskinos wanted to emphasize the unity between the Jews and the Orthodox Christians, seeing the Jews just as much his people as were the Orthodox Greeks. On this basis, he refused to allow them to be deported without taking a stand.

The letter enraged the German military commandant in Athens, SS General Jürgen Stroop, who threatened Damaskinos with death by firing squad if he persisted with his criticisms. In response, Damaskinos voiced his opposition that "according to the traditions of the Greek Orthodox Church, our prelates are hung and not shot. Please respect our traditions!" His boldness might also have led the way for other resisters to stand up to the Nazi regime. It can even be conjectured that by showing this level of communal leadership, Damaskinos helped initiate a Greek movement to resist the German occupation.

In order to help save as many Jews as he could, Damaskinos also convinced Angelos Evert, the Athens police chief, to resist. Evert, who was later named one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem, ordered that thousands of new identity cards, bearing Christian names and specifying the holder as a Christian, be issued to Jews. Evert later testified that he drew his inspiration from Damaskinos.

As the Nazi measures against the Jews intensified, Grand Rabbi Elias Barzilai was ordered to compile a list naming all the Jews residing in Greece. He sought help from Damaskinos regarding how to proceed, and so, following the archbishop's advice, he destroyed important documents pertaining to the Jewish community and encouraged all Jews to flee Athens.

Damaskinos stalled the Nazis in order to give Jews time to flee the city and find refuge in the countryside. He urged religious leaders and citizens across Greece to aid Jews by providing them with shelter and protection, and he ordered convents and monasteries in Athens to hide Jews within their walls. With his help, more than 250 Jewish children were protected by the Orthodox clergy. Damaskinos also aided Jews through the provision of falsified government documents, and instructed priests to spread the word to their congregations that Greek Jews needed to be helped by other Greeks if they were to survive.

At the end of the war, due to the work and dedication of Archbishop Damaskinos, the remaining Jews in Athens were left to rebuild their community. In the political vacuum that followed the removal of German and Italian control in 1944, fighting broke out between pro-royalist Greek soldiers and communist partisans; in order to bring some semblance of order to the country Damaskinos appointed himself prime minister, and he was then proclaimed regent until the return of King George II from exile. After the monarchy was restored in September 1946, Damaskinos resigned as regent and commenced a quieter lifestyle, focusing less on politics and more on his clerical duties until his death in Athens in 1949. For his role in aiding Jews to escape Nazi rule in Greece, Archbishop Theophilos Damaskinos was recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem on May 27, 1969.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Greece; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. Hoboken (NJ): KTAV, 1993.

Silver, Eric. The Book of the Just: The Unsung Heroes Who Rescued Jews from Hitler. New York: Grove Press, 1992.

Dannecker, Theodor

Theodor Dannecker was an SS officer who helped organize the deportation of Jews from Nazi-occupied Europe. As the head of the Judenreferat (“Jewish Desk”) at the SD post in Paris, Dannecker ordered and oversaw the raid and arrests of Jews by French police during the Vel’ d’Hiv roundup that resulted in the deportations of more than 13,000 Jews to Auschwitz, where the majority of them perished.

Dannecker was born in Tübingen, Germany, on March 27, 1913. He was trained as a lawyer and worked in Munich before joining the Nationalist Socialist German Workers Party (NSDAP) in 1932. He became a permanent member of the party in 1934 and joined the SD (Sicherheitsdienst) headquarters in Berlin three years later. In 1937 Dannecker joined the staff of SS-Obersturmbannführer (lieutenant colonel) Adolf Eichmann, who ran the Jewish Affairs Department of the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA). Dannecker was put in charge of the subdepartment for assimilated Jews. In 1938 he participated in the creation of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna. Following the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Dannecker was sent to set up the Lublin Reservation, a concentration camp complex located near the borders of Lublin and Nisko, developed by the SS and designed to resettle the Jews of Europe. In the spring of 1940 he was sent to Prague to create a system for Jewish emigration similar to the one he established in Vienna.

In September 1940 Eichmann selected Dannecker as his director and representative adviser of the Jewish Affairs Department in Paris, due to his experience with assimilated Jews. Dannecker headed the Jewish Bureau, under the control of Military Command. As one of Eichmann’s personal acquaintances, he remained the most experienced member of the group and held the largest amount of responsibility for the fate of the Jews in France. Dannecker remained in close contact with Eichmann, though he was placed under the authority of Helmut Knochen, a senior commander of the security police and SD in Paris. Knochen was in charge of rounding up French Jews and deporting them to concentration camps. Dannecker, however, claimed credit for being the first to propose continuous Jewish deportations from France to the east.

Between 1940 and 1942 Dannecker had the task of arranging for Jews in France to be deported to Auschwitz and other concentration camps in Eastern Europe. Among other things, this allowed him to oversee the names of the French Jews who were arrested in May and August 1941. He formulated the regulations for the deportations of native-born French Jews and Jewish immigrants, referred to as stateless Jews. Dannecker held extreme antisemitic beliefs and actively encouraged the Vichy authorities to increase their deportations of Jews to the east. He continuously placed pressure on the Vichy authorities to take more antisemitic measures. Xavier Vallat, the coordinator of Jewish Affairs in Vichy, created the Union of French Jews in late 1941 on Dannecker’s initiative. Vallat’s responsibilities included instituting and carrying out France’s anti-Jewish legislation. However, the two men clashed over Dannecker’s extreme antisemitism and Vallat’s unwillingness to be subservient to the Nazis.

On July 10, 1942, Dannecker telexed Eichmann regarding the raid and roundup of French Jews to be held at the Vélodrome d’Hiver stadium in Paris, prior to their deportation to Drancy (and, eventually, Auschwitz). Dannecker stated that the raid would be conducted by the French police from July 16 to 18 and include approximately 4,000 children in the arrests. The French police agreed to collaborate and organize the roundup and placed themselves at the disposal of the Germans during the Aktion. Indeed, it transpired that it was the French police, not the Germans, who undertook the whole operation. Jean Leguay, of the national police in Vichy, and René Bousquet, the Vichy police secretary general, agreed to negotiate with Dannecker.

Dannecker's continuous confrontation with Helmut Knochen and Xavier Vallat with regard to his extreme views on Jewish deportations, together with his unwillingness to collaborate with Vichy authorities, was becoming a problem for the management of the "Final Solution" in France. In early August 1942, following the roundup of Jews in Paris, Dannecker was recalled to Berlin for abusing his power. SS-Obersturmführer Heinz Röthke took over the Paris branch of Jewish Affairs from Dannecker.

In 1943 Eichmann transferred Dannecker to Sofia, Bulgaria, in order for him to continue to supervise the deportation of Jews of Europe and implement the "Final Solution" there. Dannecker was the highest German official in charge of the "Final Solution" in all of the Bulgarian territories, with the rank of SS-Hauptsturmführer (captain). While there, he arranged for the deportation of 11,000 Jews from Macedonia and Thrace to the death camp at Treblinka.

In October 1944 Eichmann transferred Dannecker to Italy as commissioner for Jewish affairs, where he organized the rounding up of Jews in Italy and Hungary. He was responsible for the transport of 1,259 Jews from Rome to Auschwitz, and remained one of "Eichmann's men" until the end of the war. With the conclusion of the war, Dannecker was arrested by Allied troops. While he was in an American prison camp located in Bad Tölz, Germany, he committed suicide on December 10, 1945.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Bousquet, René; Bulgaria; Eichmann, Adolf; Operation Spring Wind; Vel' d'Hiv Roundup

Further Reading

Cesarani, David. Eichmann: His Life and Crimes. London: Heinemann, 2004.

Mitchell, Allan. Nazi Paris: The History of an Occupation, 1940–1944. New York: Berghahn Books, 2008.

Safrian, Hans. Eichmann's Men. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009.

Steur, Claudia. Theodor Dannecker: Ein Funktionär der Endlösung. Essen: Klartext, 1997.

Dawidowicz, Lucy S.

Lucy S. Dawidowicz was a historian of the Holocaust and the originator of the notion that Adolf Hitler and the Nazis waged a war against the Jewish people that was concurrent with the military war against the Allies. Born in 1915 to secular Jewish parents in New York, she received her BA from Hunter College in 1936 but never completed her MA at Columbia University.

Concerned about the fate of the Jews in Europe, she developed an academic interest in Jewish history, and in 1938 she went to Vilna (Vilnius) in Lithuania. This visit would later result in her first important book, The Golden Tradition: Jewish Life and Thought in Eastern Europe (1967), a documentary collection with a lengthy introductory essay written by her as a tribute to the world extinguished by Nazi brutality. From 1940 until 1946 she worked in the New York offices of YIVO, and in 1946 she traveled to Germany where she worked as a refugee aid worker with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, later marrying a Polish Holocaust survivor, Szymon Dawidowicz. Between 1948 and 1960 she worked as a researcher for the American Jewish Committee (AJC), later becoming its director of research. In 1969 she left the AJC to teach Holocaust studies at Yeshiva University, where she remained until her retirement.

Her most important work was The War against the Jews, 1933–1945 (1975), which was later supplemented by a collection of documents titled A Holocaust Reader (1976). In the introductory essay to the book she raised four questions that framed the entire book: How could the Holocaust have happened? How was it possible for a modern state to carry out the systematic murder of a whole people for no reason other than that they were Jews? How was it possible for a whole people to allow itself to be destroyed? And how was it possible for the world to stand by without halting the destruction? Her answer was that the annihilation of the Jews was the centerpiece of the overall Nazi agenda, and for Dawidowicz, as for the Jewish people, the Holocaust was something that would henceforth remain at the very heart of existence.

What set The War against the Jews apart from other histories of the Holocaust were her two appendices: (A) "The Fate of the Jews in Hitler's Europe," and (B) "The Final Solution in Figures." Appendix A was an attempt to put on record the essential facts about the Jewish experience during the Nazi period as it played out in each European country. Her accounting in Appendix B put the total number of Jews killed at 5,933,900. In approximately 50 pages she thus cogently summarized the key elements of her much larger text of more than 350 pages.

Dawidowicz's approach was careful and methodical, as she considered many of the social, political, and economic dimensions of German life before and during the Holocaust. The first part of the book detailed the origins and growth of the phenomenon of Nazi antisemitism, and how the Nazi campaign to destroy the Jews of Europe drew inspiration from deep wells of centuries-old Jew-hatred. The second part of the book, titled "The Holocaust," described how the plight of the Jews—already made untenable owing to confinement in barbaric conditions in Nazi-imposed ghettos—worsened with the acceleration of the war crisis from mid-1941 onward, and how antisemitic violence intensified the longer the war lasted. She described how the nature of existence for those living in camps and ghettos was intended to wear them down, until a vast number succumbed through general hardship, mistreatment, disease, starvation, and exposure. The most telling element of the work, however, related to her argument that the Nazis waged a war against the Jews that was no less real than that against the Allies, only employing different means.

In 1981 she began examining the issue of the centrality of the Holocaust from the perspective of other national groups and non-Jewish historians. The six essays comprising The Holocaust and the Historians (1981) looked at how the event has been treated by British, American, German, Russian, Polish, and, finally, Jewish historians. While recognizing that the "Jewish story" is not at the heart of other national narratives, and that those scholars who choose to address it would not necessarily share the same empathy and moral concern as Jewish historians might, her key question was why so many contemporary historians seem to have neglected the topic, rendering it either a subject of relative neglect (by historians in the English-speaking world), benign denial (in the case of the then-USSR and Poland), or exculpation (as part of a longer German historiographical tradition).

Dawidowicz recounted part of her life's journey in 1989 in From That Place and Time: A Memoir, 1938–1947, an elegant and powerful description of the vibrancy of Jewish life in Eastern Europe, the horrors of the war, and the relations she shared with both survivors and perpetrators afterward. It simultaneously presented the seminal moments in modern Jewish history and the formative moments in the life of its author.

The historical issues with which Lucy Dawidowicz concerned herself—painstakingly constructing the actual record based upon the documentary evidence, letting the accuracy of the record serve as its own memorial and keeping the memory of the victims alive, refuting those on both the political right and left who she truly believed distorted that record for other purposes, contesting what she regarded as the baseless charges of complicity and passivity (potentially to be misinterpreted as "cowardice"), rejecting the idea of impersonal forces in place of human choice, Jewish concerns with antisemitism framed by the full awareness of the Holocaust—remain at the forefront of Holocaust history and historiography, not only within the academy but in the Jewish community as well. In so doing, they mark her as a strong and feisty advocate not only of the Jewish people but of historical truth as well.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: "Intentionalists"

Further Reading

Dawidowicz, Lucy S. From That Place and Time: A Memoir, 1938–1947. New York: W. W. Norton, 1989.

Dawidowicz, Lucy S. The Holocaust and the Historians. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1981.

Dawidowicz, Lucy S. The War against the Jews, 1933–1945. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1975.

Death Camps

Death camps, sometimes referred to as extermination camps, were killing factories established by the Germans in order to carry out the so-called Final Solution, or the eradication of European Jews. Although Jews were the principal victims of the death camps, the Nazis also used the facilities to engage in the mass murder of Roma, Soviet prisoners of war, and other groups deemed to be "subversive" or "undesirable." Historically, Holocaust scholars usually categorize six Nazi-run camps located in Poland as strictly death camps. They included: Chełmno (the first of the dedicated death camps, which began operations on December 8, 1941); Auschwitz-Birkenau; Belzec; Majdanek; Sobibór; and Treblinka. Hundreds of thousands of other Jews and those targeted for persecution died in various concentration and forced labor camps throughout Europe, but the main mission of those camps was not mass extermination as such. In the death camps, immediate extermination was the only reason for their existence.

By 1943 the death camps were engaged in a system of mass killing that resembled a finely tuned and managed factory. Some have termed the system an "assembly line of death.” At places like Auschwitz, where the killing was on a truly frightening scale, as many as 1,000 people at a time could be killed in a single gas chamber using Zyklon-B gas, which led to a slow and agonizing death. Once the victims had been killed, Sonderkommandos, prisoners who worked for the camp administration, removed gold teeth or fillings from the corpses and took them to mass graves or crematoria for disposal. Most of the victims’ bodies were incinerated. At Auschwitz, the crematoria worked virtually 24 hours a day.

In the latter stages of World War II, the death camps were either decommissioned or relocated as Soviet troops advanced from east to west. In some cases, German officials ordered bodies in mass graves exhumed and incinerated so that Allied troops would not find them. They also attempted to disguise or cover up the activities that occurred at some of the camps. In the winter and spring of 1945, as Germany was close to collapse and Allied troops converged on Germany and Poland from both the east and west, the liberators found unmistakable evidence of the atrocities that had been perpetrated there. Among some of the most haunting photos of World War II were the pictures of victims’ corpses stacked like cordwood outside gas chambers and crematoria.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Belzec; Birkenau; Chełmno; Dehumanization; Final Solution; Frank, Hans; Franz, Kurt; Funktionshäftling; Generalgouvernement; Hitler, Adolf; J.A. Topf and Sons; Jewish Women and the Holocaust; Kapos; Lange, Herbert; Levi, Primo; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Lithuania; Majdanek; Müller, Heinrich; Music and the Holocaust; Night and Fog; Poland; Project Paperclip; Sobibór; Sonderkommando; SS-Totenkopfverbände; Trawniki Men; Treblinka; Wirth, Christian; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1962.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

greater Germany. These forced mass retreats with camp prisoners ushered in the final phase of the Holocaust and became known as the “death marches.”

Despite Germany’s undeniable military defeat, Nazi ideology continued to be implemented. Death march guards subjected their prisoners to starvation, psychological torture, physical cruelty, and mass murder. Holocaust survivors have testified that on occasion the death marches surpassed the horror of the concentration camps.

While some concentration camp guards left debilitated prisoners alive in their barracks, other guards slaughtered every prisoner too weak to walk. Those who remained behind were locked in the camps without access to food or water. The chaotic evacuations allowed for inconsistent procedures. Some prisoners were rushed out of the camps and ordered not to take anything, yet other evacuees were able to grab a few items. Taking an extra piece of clothing, a crust of bread, or a small blanket could increase one’s chances of survival.

The majority of marches covered hundreds of miles and the guards had orders to deliver those in their charge to camps deep within Germany. During the marches, guards were often isolated from their superior officers, and they flaunted their sadism. Prisoners who moved too slowly or fell out of line were immediately shot. On some marches, prisoners were locked in barns and deceived into thinking they could rest until morning. But instead of permitting them sleep, guards would set the structure on fire and burn the occupants alive. Other prisoners perished from starvation, exhaustion, or disease.

One death march from the Stutthof camp complex on the Baltic Sea illustrates the gratuitous brutality exhibited by guards. Celina Manielewicz, a Polish Jew, was 23 years old when she was evacuated from Stutthof. After days without food, the column of several thousand Jews, mainly women, arrived near the coastal village of Palmnicken. The group was forced to the edge of a cliff, and machine-guns opened fire. Celina fell off the cliff into the icy sea and landed atop a pile of wounded and dead prisoners; she was one of only 13 people who survived the massacre. Even with Germany’s imminent surrender, guards chose to continue genocidal operations.

Although each death march varied in duration and destination, all prisoners experienced hunger, exhaustion, and constant threat of death. However, even during the extreme suffering, many Jews shared their remaining strength with those who were weaker. Acts of mutual assistance between prisoners have been reported by countless

Death Marches

By the summer of 1944 the Soviets were advancing through German-occupied territory in Eastern Europe, and the Americans and British were invading from the south and west. Fearing capture, guards in Nazi concentration camps ordered their prisoners onto marches and headed into

The term “death march” refers to the forcible movements of prisoners in Nazi Germany. They occurred at various points during the Holocaust, but are frequently associated with movements of prisoners between the fall of 1944 and late April 1945 as Nazi concentration camps in Eastern Europe were evacuated in the face of Soviet military advances. These death marches resulted in a horrific death toll as columns many miles long spread all over Europe, in atrocious conditions. The illustration here is of a memorial plaque placed in March 2010 at the site of a death march. (INTERFOTO/Alamy Stock Photo) survivors. Words of encouragement, a morsel of bread, or a supportive arm were small kindnesses that could help another survive for one more day. The spiritual and material lifelines given to fellow marchers created friendships and family-like bonds, and they also demonstrated a profound resistance to the Nazi crusade to dehumanize their victims.

BETH E. LILACH

See also: Death Marches, Austrian; Pivnik, Sam; Stutthof; War Crimes

Further Reading

Blatman, Daniel. The Death Marches: The Final Phase of Nazi Genocide. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2011.

Freeman, Joseph, and Donald Schwartz. The Road to Hell: Recollections of the Nazi Death March. St. Paul (MN): Paragon House, 1998.

Death Marches, Austrian

Beginning in the summer of 1944, Hungarian Jews were carried off by the Nazis to Austria as forced laborers. Many of them were assigned to the building of the so-called Reich Defense Line on the then German-Hungarian border (also called South East Rampart, or Südostwall). Those laborers, some of whom had already performed forced labor for the Hungarian army, were in very bad health. Hard work, little rest, and meager food rations had caused diseases, especially typhus, which became epidemic. By now, they had lost their “worth” as workers for the Nazis, so many of them were murdered. For example, in March 1945 in the little town of Rechnitz, Nazis killed 180 Jews. The next day, 18 Jews were forced to bury the bodies, after which they too were killed.

Many more crimes were committed when the front lines approached Austria in late March 1945. The work camps were closed, and the Jews were moved to the concentration camp at Mauthausen. Prisoners who were deemed too weak to survive the trip were killed. That happened, for instance, in the camp of Engerau near Bratislava, where nearly one in four prisoners had already died or were murdered before the evacuation of the camp began.

Comparable crimes were committed in other places too. For example, near Persenbeug on the Danube River, 223 Jews were murdered by unknown members of the SS at the beginning of May 1945. The prisoners were not only killed in the vacated camps but also on the way to Mauthausen. They had to walk and were not allowed to take the main roads, which were being used by the German army; these marches on back roads were carried out in a most brutal and exhausting manner. The escorts, in most cases members of the SS or SA, and assisted by local units of the Nazi home guard (Volkssturm) or the local police (Gendarmerie), killed the weak and footsore prisoners, as well as many relatively healthy ones, arbitrarily. Such atrocities took place on numerous transports (“death marches”) in Styria, Lower and Upper Austria, and in many other regions along the Eastern Front of the Third Reich. The cruelest crime was committed on the Prábichl, a pass in the Styrian Alps near Eisenerz. Early in April 1945 members of the local SA fired their guns randomly at the passing prisoners, killing more than 200 of them.

The prosecution of these crimes fell under the jurisdiction of the Austrian People’s Courts (Volksgerichte) as well as special military courts of the Allied occupation powers. During the early postwar years, some Austrian war criminals received severe sentences for their acts. Out of the 43 death sentences handed down by the Austrian People’s Courts between 1945 and 1948, 15 were imposed on perpetrators who had committed crimes in the camps along the “South East Rampart,” or during the death marches after the evacuation of those camps.

MARTIN F. POLASCHEK

See also: Death Marches; War Crimes

Further Reading

Blatman, Daniel. The Death Marches: The Final Phase of Nazi Genocide. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2011.

Degrelle, Léon

Belgian fascist leader and Waffen-SS commander. Born in Bouillon on June 15, 1906, Léon Degrelle attended the University of Louvain, where he became interested in journalism and active in student politics. Invited by Catholic authorities to take over a small Catholic publishing house, Christus Rex (“Christ the King”), in Louvain, Degrelle produced a series of successful mass-circulation magazines combining popular articles with short stories on Catholic themes. Soon, Christus Rex was publishing pamphlets about major news events. In 1933 Degrelle assumed sole control of the firm, and he was soon holding political rallies marked by his own powerful oratory promoting both a populist program and purge of corrupt officials. The Catholic Church disassociated itself from the movement, which became a political party, Rex, by 1934. It remained for several years a dissident movement within the Catholic Party of Belgium.

In 1936 Degrelle broke with the Catholic Party. Rex contested the Belgian elections that year as an independent party and haven for those unhappy with the status quo. Degrelle attempted to appeal to the Belgian middle class and spoke of emphasizing Catholic values of solidarity and community.

Degrelle’s praise of Adolf Hitler brought his arrest and that of other potential fifth columnists by Belgian authorities in May 1940, when the Germans invaded. On his release in France in July, Degrelle promptly proclaimed to German authorities his wish for a greater Belgium to include parts of the Netherlands and northern France. In July 1941, following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, Degrelle founded the Walloon Legion, although few Belgians were attracted to join. Listed on the Waffen-SS order of battle as the 28th SS Division, the legion actually numbered no more than 2,000 men. Degrelle led the Walloon Legion in fighting in the Soviet Union. Awarded the Knight’s Cross with Oak Leaves, he was the highest-decorated foreigner in German service.

Degrelle was in Belgium from December 1942 to January 1943. Although he claimed he and his legionnaires were Belgian patriots fighting to secure a place for their country in Hitler’s New Order, in discussions with SS leaders he expressed a commitment to restoring the Walloons (as opposed to the Flemish) to their “rightful” place as a Germanic people within the Reich.

More than half of the legionnaires were killed in the war. Degrelle abandoned the survivors in the defense of Berlin. In late April 1945 he fled north to Oslo, Norway, which was still under German control and where he commandeered an aircraft. He and five others then flew to San Sebastian in northern Spain, where they crash-landed. Negotiations for Degrelle’s extradition to Belgium foundered on Spanish demands for a quid pro quo.

In 1946 Degrelle vanished from the hospital where he had been recuperating. The Spanish government denied knowledge of his whereabouts, but he was protected by influential Spaniards. A decade later, Degrelle resurfaced in public but did not leave Spain. He remained an unabashed admirer of Hitler until his death in Malaga on April 1, 1993.

SPENCER C. TUCKER

See also: Belgium; Catholic Church

Further Reading

Conway, Martin. Collaboration in Belgium: Leon Degrelle and the Rexist Movement, 1940–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993.

De Bruyne, Eddy, and Marc Rikmenspoel. For Rex and for Belgium: Léon Degrelle and Walloon Political and Military Collaboration 1940–45. London: Helion, 2012.

Degussa

Degussa was a German company in which I.G. Farben had controlling interests and which made accommodation with the Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei (NSDAP) from the 1930s. While initially not being close to the NSDAP, Degussa “swam with the current,” on the basis that if it did not do so, others would.

Degussa “Aryanized” its company, ridding itself first of Jewish directors and then of Jewish staff. It benefited from the transfer of major purchases of Aryanized Jewish property and after 1938 acted ruthlessly to obtain property stolen from Jews. Between 1939 and 1944 Degussa employed civilian workers, prisoners of war, and detainees from ghettos and concentration camps as forced labor. From Kristallnacht on November 9, 1938, pursuant to the Nazis’ “precious metals campaign,” Degussa refined gold, silver, and platinum owned by Jews. During the war years, Degussa’s Berlin refinery received direct shipments of gold from the Łódź ghetto, much of which was refined and processed, but some of which came with teeth attached. Degussa’s wholly owned subsidiary Degesch, which it bought in 1922, held the patent for Zyklon-B gas, which was used after 1939 primarily for pest extermination; from 1942 onward, the SS used 1% of the production, which had its smell removed, to kill approximately 1 million people.

Degussa (Deutsche Gold- und Silber-Scheideanstalt vormals Roessler, or “German Gold and Silver Refinery, formerly Roessler”), was incorporated in January 1873. A gold and silver separation factory, it became successful in precious metals and distributing chemical products, including sodium perborate, used in Persil soap powder. In 1898 Degussa set up a chemical factory to process by-products needed for its cyanide manufacture. In 1922 Degussa took over exclusive ownership in Degesch (Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung mbH, or “German Society for Pest Control, Ltd.”). The same year, in a technological breakthrough, Degesch perfected a process for canning pellets of its principal product, Zyklon, which contained volatile hydrogen cyanide.

With the onset of the Depression, Degussa remained exposed commercially. To head off competition, Degussa was forced to enlist I.G. Farbenindustrie AG, a dominant rival in the chemical business, in some of its projects.

In 1933 the Nazi government introduced a policy of “Aryanization,” leading to the six Jewish members of the Supervisory Board being forced to resign. In addition, members of the Nazi Party now joined the board. To continue to grow, Degussa chose to comply with the Nazi regime. Over the next few years, Degussa also Aryanized 10 of its subsidiary companies, three holdings, four extensive blocks of shares, 10 parcels of real estate in Frankfurt, Cologne, Hamburg, Berlin, Vienna, and Prague, and purchased a confiscated patent in August 1944.

Degussa’s products were useful for armament production in Germany’s attempt at attaining economic self-sufficiency. Sodium metal, for example, was an intermediate product for manufacturing aircraft fuel. Acetone cyanohydrin was required in the production of Plexiglas, which the Darmstadt-based firm of Röhm & Haas had developed and which was used to build aircraft cockpits.

Degussa’s products were vital to the war effort, so Degussa benefited from work orders; but a shortage of German workers owing to conscription saw the introduction of desperate measures in staffing. German women were forbidden to undertake any hazardous work, and so, between 1939 and 1944, Degussa employed civilian workers and prisoners of war, and slave labor from ghettos and concentration camps. Degussa filled out its workforce in its carbon black factory until February 1943 with a compulsory work battalion of elderly German Jews who were given the most unpleasant work. After their unit was “completely dissolved,” these men were replaced by Poles and prisoners of war.

In Degussa’s main factories, forced laborers were employed to the same extent as in most German industrial companies. In 1943 approximately one-quarter of the employees consisted of forced laborers, while in 1944 they accounted for as much as one-third and more. Nevertheless, the number of workers allocated was still too low to meet Degussa’s needs.

The treatment of the forced laborers depended on the ranking their nationality had in Nazi racial thinking, and after Stalingrad, in the winter of 1942–1943, the situation worsened for all such workers. Degussa used forced laborers from ghettos and concentration camps in four factories in the east of the Reich. Those on the Fürstenberg building site came from the Łódź ghetto. In Gleiwitz, Jewish men and women from Auschwitz were used. There were no other workers available and Degussa wanted to meet the demands of the Reich to increase production quantities.

From 1933 foreign exchange controls slowed Degussa's precious metals business, but this changed with the "precious metals campaign" implemented after Kristallnacht in 1938. The Reich confiscated all gold, silver, and platinum owned by Jews as "punishment" for the damage caused.

Jews had to hand in their precious metal at state-run pawnshops. Technically they received compensation, but this was paid into frozen accounts that were soon confiscated by the state. From the pawnshops the precious metal went to the refineries, and as the biggest precious metals refinery in Germany, Degussa received numerous refining contracts. In line with that part of its business that processed dental gold, between 1940 and 1945 Degussa's Berlin refinery received direct shipments of gold from Łódź. For many deliveries the metal arrived in an already molten state in order to prevent theft during transport. However, in some unprocessed deliveries, gold dental fillings, which had been forcefully removed from the mouths of concentration camp inmates, arrived with teeth still attached.

During World War I, TASCH, the Technische Ausschuss für Schädlingsbekämpfung (Technical Committee for Pest Control), was founded by the War Ministry. Degesch developed in 1919 out of TASCH. By 1922 Degussa assumed financial control of Degesch, which developed a process by which the highly poisonous gas Cydon (an acronym for the main ingredients cyanogen and chlorine compounds) was enclosed in tiny cotton wool-like balls. As soon as these came into contact with air, the end product, Zyklon-B, was created. The stabilizer for the gas came from I.G. Farben, while another firm, Schering, supplied a pungent warning ingredient.

Degesch underwent internal restructuring back in 1925. To cut costs, Degesch awarded the distribution and usage rights to Zyklon-B to two companies: Heerdt & Lingler GmbH (Heli) and Tesch & Stabenow GmbH (Testa), Hamburg. Initially Degesch held shares in both companies, but in 1942 it sold its stake in Testa. The two distribution companies divided the market between them, but Testa was the exclusive supplier for the German military and the SS.

To thwart the competition in the pest control market, Degussa had to sell Degesch shares in 1930 and 1931 to I.G. Farben (42.5%). It retained a minority stake of 42.5% of Degesch, and profits from distributing Zyklon-B until 1938 came mainly from abroad.

After the start of the war, the armed forces and the SS grew to become major clients of Testa, as both military accommodation and concentration camps barracks had to be disinfected. Through Testa and Heli, Degesch sold Zyklon-B to both the army and the SS.

At the same time the SS used 1% of the production, which had its warning pungent smell removed, to annihilate approximately 1 million people. When Zyklon-B was being used as a pesticide, it was required by law to contain an indicator odor to warn humans of its lethal presence. The SS demanded that new orders of Zyklon-B omit the indicator. Degesch at first refused to comply—not for humanitarian reasons, but because the request endangered Degesch's monopoly. To remove the indicator was to open up the possibility of unwelcome competition.

During the I.G. Farben trial after the war, the director of Degesch, Dr. Gerhard Friedrich Peters, implicated himself; he received information by SS officer Kurt Gerstein about murdering people using Zyklon-B and was informed that the German army needed the gas without the usual additives that were included to warn people of its poisonous nature. In 1949 Peters was charged with murder in the Frankfurt court, convicted, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. In 1952 the conviction was confirmed in an appeal and set to six years. Peters went to prison but was acquitted in a new appeal in the mid-1950s. The law had changed; he was no longer considered guilty of assisting in murder. Degussa provided him with legal aid and offered to pay bail to keep him from being held in custody during the appeal period.

The chairman of the Degesch board of directors from 1939 to 1945, Hermann Schlosser, was arrested in February 1948 and acquitted in April 1948; later, he once again took over as chairman of the board. The owner and the director of Tesch & Stabenow were convicted and sentenced to death by a British tribunal and executed in Hamelin prison.

Members of the Degussa board were never charged. After the war, they underwent the process of denazification, and at the end of the 1940s they returned to their positions. For a long time, as a result of the Nuremberg trials, the public associated the topics of Degesch and Zyklon-B only with I.G. Farben.

All but two of the enterprises taken over by Degussa as a result of the Aryanization process returned substantial profits during the 1930s and 1940s; most remained in Degussa's possession through the 1950s, and three of them still persisted at the end of the 20th century. Degussa's representatives used every legal possibility to keep, at the lowest achievable cost, what the enterprise had obtained. The buildings of the Frankfurt headquarters of the Degussa complex until recently stood in large part on land acquired from two Jewish families in 1934–1935.

The historical significance of Degussa appeared again in the publicity surrounding their involvement in the construction of the Holocaust Memorial in Berlin, because the plasticizer and the antigraffiti coating were produced by Degussa. Therefore, the work on the memorial was suspended, but in November 2003 the trustees decided to finish the building with the involvement of Degussa.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Aryanization; I.G. Farben; Zyklon-B; Zyklon-B Case, 1946

Further Reading

Borkin, Joseph. The Crime and Punishment of I.G. Farben. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.

Hayes, Peter. From Cooperation to Complicity: Degussa in the Third Reich. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Hayes, Peter. Industry and Ideology: I. G. Farben in the Nazi Era. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Dehumanization

Dehumanization is a psychosocial process in which people are removed from what may be considered acceptable contact with other members of a society owing to a perceived change of their person, whereby their public identity is transformed into something looked at as lower than that of the majority. In its most basic form, dehumanization aims at redefining public perceptions of such people so that society in general will no longer consider them to be deserving of the same degree of decency, sympathy, empathy, or sensitivity as other human beings.

The identity transformation process that takes place as a result of dehumanization can take many forms and was practiced in numerous settings during the Holocaust. In the Nazi concentration camps, for example, the SS systematically applied tactics of personal terror toward their prisoners, ritually degrading them until they no longer felt the dignity required to resist the Nazis' brutal treatment. The nadir of a prisoner's degradation came when he or she ceased resisting it and allowed its effects to swamp them. At that moment, it could be said that a person's self-image had literally become dehumanized. Accounts abound of how victims no longer saw themselves as human beings, but as "animals" or "objects." This can be further reinforced by reference to victims no longer having names, but numbers (as happened in Auschwitz), or of having other trappings of their individual humanity—their clothing or their hair, for example—taken away.

The process of dehumanization in this environment was not restricted only to the victims, however; both the Nazi perpetrators and the general public underwent various forms of psychological or behavioral modification regarding their image of the targeted population. Thus, to take one example, in the Nazi death camps the prisoners were referred to as so many stücke ("pieces"), rather than as human beings, while through constant propaganda the German population were enjoined to see Jews during the Holocaust years as germs, bacilli, a cancer, vermin, parasites, and lice.

Dehumanization is very frequently a necessary process in the preparation of a population that is going to commit genocide, as a person is transformed from being seen as equal in their humanity to one who is less than human. The process does not of itself cause genocide, but it is certainly one of a number of steps on the road to it.

In seeing Jews as a degraded "other," the Nazis were able to both justify their actions and to convince the German people as a whole that Jews were less than human. This was necessary if National Socialist ideology was to convey the added notion that the Jews were dangerous to German society. With this as a motivator, the Nazis were able to communicate the further image of the Jews as "life unworthy of life" (Lebensunwertes Leben).

Of course, the Nazis went far beyond simply referring to Jews in a negative or dehumanizing manner. They also systematically classified who was Jewish, collected them together, transported them as if they were cattle, exploited them for purpose of slave labor, conducted horrific experiments on them as if they were without feelings, killed them in an industrial manner, and then burned their bodies and used their remains as fertilizer. The process of dehumanization, therefore, played a vital role on the road to the Holocaust and was one of the most important constituent parts of the mindset leading to mass murder.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Concentration Camps; Death Camps

Further Reading

- Bain, Paul G., Jeroen Vaes, and Jacques Philippe Leyens (Eds.). Humanness and Dehumanization. New York: Psychology Press, 2014.
- Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.
- Smith, David Livingstone. Less Than Human: Why We Demean, Enslave and Exterminate Others. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2011.

Delbo, Charlotte

Charlotte Delbo, together with her husband Georges Dudach, was a member of the French Resistance. She is best known for the recollections she set down of her experiences in Auschwitz, retold in her three-part collection of prose and poems and translated into English as Auschwitz and After. The collection is really a trilogy of separately published shorter works: "None of Us Will Return" (Aucun de nous ne reviendra); "Useless Knowledge" (La connaissance inutile); and "The Measure of Our Days" (Mesure de nos jours).

Charlotte Delbo was born on August 10, 1913, in Vigneux-sur-Seine, near Paris. She came from a family of Italian immigrants and was the eldest of their four children. Her father, Charles, specialized in ironworks. During her early life, she held an interest in theater and politics, and she joined the French Young Communist Women's League in 1932. This was an organization that focused on spreading the ideas of communism throughout Paris.

Charlotte met and married her husband Georges, also a communist, in 1934. She was in South America traveling as the administrative assistant of the writer Louis Jouvet when France was invaded and occupied by Germany in 1940. Returning to France in 1941, she joined Georges, who was already active in the Resistance, in Paris, where the couple printed and distributed anti-Nazi pamphlets. They became part of the group around the communist philosopher Georges Politzer and took an active role in publishing the underground journal Les Lettres Françaises, a literary publication of the National Front resistance movement. Then they went into hiding and began publishing another underground magazine, Free Thought, with Politzer and Paul Nizan.

The Delbos were arrested by French police on March 2, 1942, for distributing anti-German pamphlets in Paris and were handed over to the Gestapo. Georges was executed in prison on May 23, 1942, after saying goodbye to his wife. Charlotte was transported to a transit camp in Paris and spent almost 11 months in various French camps before being deported to Auschwitz. On January 24, 1943, she, together with 230 other Frenchwomen (the majority of whom were also members of the Resistance) were transported from Compiègne to Auschwitz. This was the only convoy of women, and one of only a few convoys of non-Jewish prisoners from France to Auschwitz, as most political prisoners were sent to Mauthausen or other camps.

The women attempted to keep up their spirits upon their arrival at the camp through the singing of the French national anthem, La Marseillaise. In the first section of Auschwitz and After, Charlotte Delbo begins her journey into Auschwitz as well as her experiences as an inmate, and details the hard labor they were forced to undertake in the swamps. Many of the women died from typhus, and by August 3, 1943, only 57 of them remained alive. They were placed in quarantine.

The following year, on January 7, 1944, Charlotte Delbo was sent to the women's concentration camp at Ravensbrück, located in northern Germany north of Berlin. The majority of the rest of the survivors from her original convoy were transferred to Ravensbrück in the summer of 1944. Due to the assistance of the Red Cross, Delbo was able to leave the camp with a group of women on April 23, 1945. They arrived in Sweden, and after recuperating in Switzerland, Delbo returned to France in 1945. Charlotte Delbo survived as one of only 49 women from the transport of January 24, 1943.

Charlotte Delbo was not detained due to her race or religion but because of her political opinions and her role in the French Resistance. Her experiences at Auschwitz describe the horrors she and the other prisoners lived through, as she struggled to keep count of the days in order to remember the death dates and last words of individuals who perished during their time at the camp. Her memoir provides the stories of all of the individual deportees who arrived with her at Auschwitz, both those who survived and those who perished. The next two volumes of Delbo's memoir, written 20 years after the first, recount her struggle to return to the normal life she had once lived.

After the war, Charlotte Delbo worked at the United Nations and the National Center for Scientific Research (CNRS). She died on March 1, 1985, from lung cancer, never having remarried. She was survived by a son. Her memoir is remembered for her unconventional, experimental, narrative techniques in order to convey her experience of Auschwitz and how she and her fellow survivors coped in the years after their haunting experience.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Auschwitz; Communists in the Holocaust; France; Resistance Movements; Upstander

Further Reading

Delbo, Charlotte. Auschwitz and After. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 2014.

Delbo, Charlotte. Convoy to Auschwitz: Women of the French Resistance. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1997.

Denazification

“Denazification” (Entnazifizierung) is the name of a program instituted by the Allies following the end of World War II. It had two objectives: to purge Germany of all elements of Nazi culture and ideology that had permeated every aspect of German society during the 12 years of the Third Reich, including disbanding the many organizations and eliminating all related physical symbols of the Nazi period; and to remove from positions of authority Germans who were more than “followers” in the Nazi Party.

With regard to the first goal of the program, denazification can be thought of as the antithesis of the concept of Gleichschaltung, a component of Nazi ideology that sought to coordinate all aspects of German society with the Nazi vision, to unify all activities so they fell within the purview of that vision. The Nazi Gleichschaltung effort was successful, affecting every form of social interaction—the large numbers of clubs (shooting, sports, choral, band, drinking, and music), societies (teachers, lawyers, doctors, artisans, and shopkeepers), workers’ groups (unions, civil servants), newspapers, political parties, and any and all other groups—to bring each in line with the Nazi program. All of those organizations and other elements of society that had been “nazified” in accordance with the concept of Gleichschaltung were now to be denazified.

The second goal of denazification—removal of Nazi Party members from public office or from other positions of authority in postwar Germany based on their involvement with the party—was as broad in scope as the cultural component but in many respects more difficult and complex. Its success rested on the ability to accurately categorize the role of Nazi Party members according to a scale ranging from No Involvement (or Exonerated) to Major Offender. As might be expected, the largest number of Nazi Party members fell somewhere between these extremes.

To make the process of denazification more difficult, each of the four major Allies—Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States—occupied one of four zones into which Germany had been divided. Each approached the process of denazification according to its own standards of stringency or leniency, and according to its own interests.

The impetus for the denazification program came first from the Yalta Conference and was confirmed in the Potsdam Conference. Both conferences were meetings of the leaders of the United States (Franklin D. Roosevelt at Yalta; Harry S Truman at Potsdam), Britain (Winston Churchill), and the Soviet Union (Joseph Stalin). At Yalta, held in February 1945 in the Crimea, it was agreed that Germany, upon its defeat, would face demilitarization, of course, as well as denazification. A decision at Potsdam, held in late July through early August 1945, reiterated the intent of the Allies to rid postwar Germany of all traces of Nazi influence and to have “all members of the Nazi Party who have been more than nominal participants” removed from public office and other positions of responsibility in the private sector.

Looking at the American Zone, a German citizen’s participation in the Nazi Party was determined by answers submitted on a lengthy questionnaire (Fragebogen) asking about the person’s activities during the applicable years. A Special Branch of the Office of Public Safety, after making efforts to verify the accuracy of the answers to the questionnaire, assigned the individual to one of the following five categories: No Involvement (or Exonerated); Follower; Lesser Offender; Offender; Major Offender. People in the first category would face no sanctions; those in the last would be arrested and tried. How those in the largest categories—Followers, Lesser Offenders, and Offenders—were treated depended on the zone in which the decision was being made, and when it was made.

For example, the American Zone approached this aspect of denazification diligently, if not zealously. It was reluctant to allow Lesser Offenders and Offenders to go without punishment, resulting in large numbers of people being held for trial. In the initial months of the program, the American Zone moved carefully through the process of reviewing and verifying the questionnaires and was cautious about assigning a person to the category of No Involvement or Follower. The problem with this was the math: the number of individuals who needed to be processed was well into the millions.

It was not just the numbers that made this system of denazification highly inefficient. The United States sought to walk a very fine line: it wanted to remove from office and other positions of responsibility German citizens who had shown a significant degree of involvement with the Nazi Party; at the same time it wanted to leave postwar Germany in a position to create and maintain a stable economy and government, on the assumption that this would lessen the likelihood of future conflict. In many instances those two goals were incompatible. Many of the people who were in public office or were in positions of authority were the very same people who would be critical in the effort to establish a stable economy and government.

These concerns led to a change over time in the American Zone from a strict, intensive examination to a far more flexible one that moved the process along faster. Despite these efforts, in 1946 the entire process (in all of the zones) was turned over to the Germans themselves to determine the appropriate category and treatment of Nazi Party members and to try those individuals who were to be punished. As might be expected, this further accelerated the pace of the process and resulted in more and more citizens being given a determination of “Rehabilitated,” without which employment opportunities were severely curtailed, often limited to physical labor.

As noted, there was no consistency from one zone to the next. For example, the British Zone was run on a more lenient basis, so as to keep Germany economically sound and to lessen the likelihood that impoverished refugees from a struggling Germany would seek help from Britain. The only reason a questionnaire had to be completed in the British Zone was as part of the application process for public office or a job of authority in the private sector. Restrictions on German lawyers were lessened, thereby helping to meet the needs of an overcrowded court system.

The French took a different approach altogether. The denazification program in the French Zone was run so as to weaken Germany—a longtime enemy of France—and to make use of German assets in its zone to help France recover from the destruction caused by the Germans in the war.

The Soviet zone conducted an intensive denazification program with an eye toward creating a communist government, despite a pledge to promote the establishment of a democratic one. It allowed Nazis who committed themselves to communism to avoid punishment and remain in public office or other positions of authority.

The denazification program ended at different times—ranging from 1948 to 1951—in different zones. By most standards of measurement, it was a limited success. The denazification of the cultural aspects of German society was effective, but the combination of the sheer numbers of individuals who would have had to be scrupulously vetted for the other aspect of denazification to be a success, and the lack of coordination among the four occupying powers, resulted in an effort that, although able to process some 3.5 million party members through the program, still left many millions of Nazi supporters actively participating in postwar German society with impunity.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Gleichschaltung

Further Reading

Taylor, Frederick. Exorcising Hitler: The Occupation and Denazification of Germany. New York: Bloomsbury Press, 2011.

Tent, James F. Mission on the Rhine: Reeducation and Denazification in American-Occupied Germany. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.

Vogt, Timothy R. Denazification in Soviet-Occupied Germany: Brandenburg, 1945–1948. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2000.

Denial of the Holocaust

The Nazi genocide of European Jews during World War II that claimed the lives of some 6 million Jews has been fastidiously studied and documented, yet there are some, operating from political motives, who deny the authenticity of the event and rebuke scholarship of it. Such individuals, who prefer to call themselves “revisionists,” are referred to as Holocaust deniers. Holocaust denial is the attempt to invalidate or distort the historical truth of the Nazi genocide of European Jewry.

The brutality of the Holocaust shocked the world and many found pictures of murdered bodies and discoveries of gas chambers too horrible to believe. While historical research and stories from witnesses and survivors helped people accept the truth of the genocide, others aimed to discredit them.

The central and most common arguments Holocaust deniers make are: (1) the notion that 6 million Jews died is a myth; (2) gas chambers were never used to kill Jews; (3) Nazis had no official policy to murder Jews; and (4) Anne Frank’s diary was a forgery.

Austin Joseph App has gained notoriety as one of the first American Holocaust deniers and was the first to list many of the above-mentioned denials. App, a professor of English at La Salle College and the University of Scranton, denied that the Holocaust ever occurred and has been credited with leading the path for many other deniers. By the late 1950s, App had published his claims and had appeared before audiences boasting that the figure of 6 million was nothing more than a hoax made up by Jews.

Robert Faurisson, a former literature professor, helped fuel denial activities in France. He refuted the use of Zyklon-B, the chemical used to murder Jews at Auschwitz and other death camps. He argued that Jews made the whole thing up in order to benefit Israel and international Zionism. Faurisson did not deny that Jews died in German camps; however, he did not believe Germans murdered Jews in gas chambers. Faurisson denied that Zyklon-B could have effectively killed Jews. He pointed to the manufacturer's instructions for using Zyklon-B to exterminate vermin, concluding that as it was safe enough to use as a household pesticide, it could not have been used to murder Jews.

He chose to ignore the fact that gas chambers and home fumigation were two separate things, occurring in drastically different environments. Windows could be left open in a home to expel the gas, for example, but a gas chamber was sealed shut. Faurisson's attempt to discredit the use of Zyklon-B as a killing agent was part of his overall attempt to normalize the mass death of Jews during the Holocaust as a result of maltreatment, a natural occurrence during war.

Faurisson's protégé Henri Roques took up Faurisson's arguments and aimed to discredit proof of Nazi gas chambers for his doctoral dissertation. To this end, Roques attempted to discredit the testimony of former Waffen-SS officer Kurt Gerstein. During the genocide, Gerstein had been charged with the task of visiting German death camps with the goal of improving upon the efficiency of the gas chambers. The experience weighed heavily on Gerstein's conscience and inspired him to submit a detailed report to the Allies on the gas chambers at Belzec and Treblinka. Gerstein's account of the atrocities at those camps has proven an obstacle to deniers. For his dissertation, Roques tried to expose discrepancies in Gerstein's report and even managed to find a professor at the University of Nantes willing to support his research and approve his dissertation. Roques was awarded his doctorate in 1985. Following a public uproar, however, the French minister of higher education revoked Roques's degree the following year and in so doing discredited Roques's erroneous research methods and false conclusions.

David Irving, a British Holocaust denier, is a master of fact manipulation. Like App, Faurisson, and Roque, Irving views the gas chambers as Jewish propaganda and has gone on to write some 30 books denying the Holocaust. Irving started publishing denial histories in the 1960s and by the late 1980s was the face of mainstream denial movements. Irving does not deny that Jews were systematically murdered; instead, he reinterprets the genocide in a way that paints Hitler in a more favorable light. In Hitler's War, for example, Irving claimed Hitler never instituted a policy to kill all of European Jewry. To support his argument, Irving constructed a revisionist history of events. For example, he claims that following Hitler's seizure of power in 1933, he only made antisemitic remarks to maintain popularity and that Hitler played no part in the creation of anti-Jewish policy. To assert these false claims, Irving weaves a historical fantasy using German documents that reflect propaganda of that time.

The Germans did their best to avoid outright declarations of their murderous plans, and when it was clear that Germany would be defeated they went to great lengths to destroy and purge wartime documents that might incriminate them. For this reason, they used opaque terms. They referred to "deportation," for example, as "resettlement" and "evacuation." Instead of saying "killing" or "murder," they called it "special action" and "special measures." The workers at Auschwitz were even instructed to never refer directly to gassing or to gas chambers. Holocaust revisionists and deniers prefer to use the coded language the Germans employed as evidence that gas chambers were never used and that the Germans never outright planned to commit genocide.

Irving's revisionist approach to the Holocaust came under public scrutiny in 1996 when he sued American history professor Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher for libel. Lipstadt published a book in 1993 entitled Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, in which she refutes the false claims of Holocaust deniers, Irving among them. The defense engaged British historian Richard J. Evans as an expert witness in the case. Evans studied Irving's work for two years and meticulously exposed Irving's false claims. Evans proved that Irving had forged documents and made up source material. The judge ruled against Irving's libel claims and in his final remarks called Irving a racist, antisemite, right-wing extremist, and neo-Nazi.

One of the best-known Holocaust deniers is Arthur Butz, a professor in the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering at Northwestern University, Illinois. In 1976 he wrote the key Holocaust-denial text, The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, published by the Holocaust-denial Institute of Historical Review, Torrance, California. This work remains one of the classic works of anti-Holocaust literature. Because of his academic credentials (MS and PhD from the University of Minnesota), his book presents the appearance of a scholarly publication with copious footnotes and an extensive bibliography. Among those involved in Holocaust denial, Butz remains one of the few legitimate academics active in writing and presenting at Holocaust denial conferences. His work is accorded absolutely no scholarly credibility whatsoever—despite its seemingly scholarly apparatus of both copious notes and bibliography.

Many European countries have outlawed Holocaust denial in an attempt to suppress neo-Nazi movements. In the Netherlands, Faurisson's denial claims about the authenticity of Anne Frank's diary helped motivate legislators to make Holocaust denial a punishable public offense. Frank was a young Jewish girl who went into hiding in the Netherlands with her family to escape the Nazis. She received a diary for her 13th birthday and used it to record her and her family's life in the secret attic annex. Frank's family was discovered and she died at Auschwitz. Her father, the family's sole survivor, published Anne's diary after the war. Faurisson, among others, claimed the diary was a forgery and accused Anne's father of making the whole thing up. The Dutch decision to punish Holocaust deniers has helped suppress public efforts to discredit The Diary of Anne Frank.

Despite the Holocaust being one of the most documented events in history, deniers try to rewrite the facts to suit their objectives. Deniers try to minimize the number of Jews murdered, disprove the use of gas chambers, absolve Nazis of responsibility for organized genocide, and discredit Anne Frank's diary. Misrepresentations of the Holocaust serve to undermine the historiography of the genocide and deflate Nazi crimes.

ALEXIS HERR

See also: Anne Frank House; Frank, Anne; Gas Chambers; International Holocaust Remembrance Day; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Evans, Richard. Lying About Hitler: History, Holocaust, and the David Irving Trial. New York: Basic Books, 2001.

Lipstadt, Deborah E. Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. New York: Plume, 1994.

Van Pelt, Robert Jan. The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.

the time, mostly in Copenhagen. Denmark had traditionally prided itself on neutrality in foreign affairs, and indeed had not participated in World War I. Despite the Danish government's dislike of Nazi Germany and its policies, it nevertheless signed a nonaggression pact with the Germans in the spring of 1939. Still, Adolf Hitler ignored that agreement, and in April 1940 German troops occupied Denmark, annexing the country chiefly because it was a rich agricultural region and because they viewed the Danes as fellow "Aryans." The first years of the occupation, until the late summer of 1943, were relatively uneventful. The Germans permitted the Danes to set their own domestic policies, and most Danes reluctantly collaborated with occupation officials to some extent or another. A resistance movement, however, was already afoot, and that effort would gain much traction in the latter stages of the war.

Unlike many other places in Europe, antisemitism had never gained much of a foothold in Denmark. The small Jewish population did not suffer persecution, and Jews practiced their religion in the open and were not restricted from certain professions. This did not change after the Germans moved into Denmark; Jews were not required to register with the government, live in Jewish-only areas, or wear a yellow star or a badge in public. Initially, German occupation officials did not interfere with these liberal policies. Denmark's Jews also benefited from King Christian X's outspoken advocacy for his Jewish subjects. Life for Danish Jews remained relatively unchanged until 1943.

That year the Danish resistance movement began to gain traction, which emboldened even more people to fight the occupation; this was aided by a strong underground press. By the summer of 1943 sabotage and labor strikes clearly threatened the German occupation, a situation made worse for the Germans by military reverses elsewhere. As a result, the Germans declared a state of emergency on August 29 and initiated a crackdown against suspected saboteurs and troublemakers. Hundreds of Danes—Jews and non-Jews—were arrested and detained.

The following month, German occupation authorities decided to take advantage of the crackdown by rounding up and deporting Danish Jews. Non-Jews now rallied to the cause, helping to hide Jews; when the roundup started on October 1, the Germans were able to locate and arrest only a handful. Although threatened by the Germans, Danish law enforcement refused to take part in the roundup. Soon, Danish civilians had hatched a plan to move Danish Jews to the coast, where they would be smuggled aboard fishing

Denmark

Denmark is a small northern European country that had a 1939 population of approximately 5 million people. It is estimated that there were about 7,500 Jews living there at boats to freedom in Sweden, which in turn readily accepted the influx of émigrés. In all, at least 7,500 Jews made it to safety in Sweden. Meanwhile, most Danes cast off their earlier—if reluctant—collaboration with the Germans and intensified their resistance efforts.

RESCUE OF DANISH JEWS, FALL 1943

In the end, only 472 Jews were caught by the Germans. They were deported to Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia. Danes were so insistent that they not be harmed that the Germans did not send them to the death camps. Many Danes also sent foodstuffs and other supplies to the exiled Danish Jews. It is believed that 52 Danish Jews at Theresienstadt died, while another 70 or so died by various means in other locations. The Jewish survival rate in Denmark was among the highest in any nation occupied by Germany. The German occupation of Denmark ended in May 1945.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Best, Werner; Christian X, King of Denmark; Duckwitz, Georg; Iceland; Rescuers of Jews; White Buses

Further Reading

- Haestrup, Jorgen. Secret Alliance: A Study of the Danish Resistance Movement, 1940–45. 3 vols. Odense (Denmark): Odense University Press, 1976–1977.
- Lidegaard, Bo. Countrymen. New York: Knopf, 2013.
- Thomas, John Oram. The Giant Killers: The Story of the Danish Resistance Movement, 1940–1945. New York: Taplinger, 1976.
- Werner, Emmy E. A Conspiracy of Decency: The Rescue of the Danish Jews during World War II. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 2002.

Denunciation

Denunciation—the act of informing those in authority that someone has already committed a perceived criminal act or will do so in the immediate future or is a suspected or (un)wanted person—must be carefully nuanced when referring to the period in which the Nazis exercised control over

Germany. For ease of entry, the 12 years of the Nazis' reign—sometimes referred to as the years of “Nazi terror”—should be divided into two halves: 1933–1939, when Hitler and his minions were building up and implementing their vehicles of domination and control inside the country; and 1939–1945, from the start of World War II on September 1, 1939, to its horrific dénouement, marked somewhat symbolically by Hitler's and his mistress-wife Eva Braun's suicides (April 30–May 1, 1945) and Germany's unconditional surrender on May 7, 1945.

Care must also be taken to distinguish between those who denounced and/or were denounced within Germany's borders, and those who denounced and/or were denounced in those countries under Nazi hegemony, as the reasons for the former might sometimes be significantly different from those outside Germany. In addition, the persons and objects of denunciation—Jews, first and foremost; communists; political dissidents; economic enemies, personal enemies, and their various allegiances—were given wider latitude inside Germany (e.g., a German “Aryan” married to a Jew; someone seen “fraternizing” with a single Jew); less so outside the country (e.g., agents provocateur, saboteurs, spies, resisters, even those chafing under restrictive legislation and/or military control). This must be further contrasted with those who were themselves the denouncers, for example, those motivated by class distinctions; the evil-minded and mean-spirited; those who embraced the Nazi ideology and were “true believers” in the cause and did so for the present and future welfare of their nation-state; those who did so for perceived political or economic advantage (a decided minority); those recruited to do such work (again, a minority); and, in the rarest of cases, fellow Jews (the fewest of all, and usually for their false understandings of their own prolonged survival). Researchers have determined that the primary institutional beneficiaries were (1) the Gestapo (Geheime Staatspolizei, the secret state police), (2) the SS (the paramilitary Schutzstaffel), (3) SiPo (Sicherheitspolizei or security police), (4) the Wehrmacht (the German army), and/or (4) the various local constabularies.

However, it must be noted as well that the common myth regarding Nazi Germany as a nation-state wherein the population was thoroughly controlled in the vice-like grip and under the heel of these various agencies and institutions is not borne out by the research. Throughout the 12 years of its existence, Nazi Germany remained a “porous” nation-state wherein secrecy was of continual concern to Hitler and his inner circle and difficult to maintain; various forms of resistance (both active and passive) continued to function; the Nazi ideology was not 100% embraced by its citizenry, especially its more initial brutal and violent expressions of anti-semitism (though the Nazis were somewhat more successful in their ongoing attempts at “social antisemitism,” that is, distancing the German people from any or limited contacts with Jews, at least early on); and fears of “official” retaliations and consequential horrific punishments, while ever present, did not fully manifest themselves in total impotence on the part of all German citizens.

Between 1933 and 1939, once the Nazis were seemingly fully in control, denunciations of fellow citizens took place relatively quickly, further speeded up by two significant events: (1) the Nuremberg Racial Laws of September 15, 1935, which effectively separated “Aryans” from Jews in marriage, medicine, law, and education; and (2) the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, which gave vent to a carefully organized outbreak of violence against Jewish persons, Jewish-owned businesses, and synagogues. The various media—radio, newspapers, and so on—strongly advocated turning in one's fellow citizens—especially Jews and communists—to the proper authorities “for the good of Germany.” In the major cities (e.g., Berlin, Cologne, Hamburg, Munich), such activities were made somewhat easier as these were locales wherein both populations were clustered. In the countryside and rural areas, however, such activities tended to slow down considerably. Both groups were far fewer in number; Jews were more successfully integrated into the larger populations; and communists were few and far between.

Then, too, Jews and communists were not the only ones denounced by their neighbors. Initially, those who were unsupportive of the new regime and/or opposed to this or that policy, and were brash enough to express themselves in public, would find themselves on the receiving end of a visit from the authorities. Even the threat of being informed upon or being visited by those in power was enough to prompt some to turn in their neighbors, often without foundation, to remain in the good graces of the authorities.

Outside of Germany, to be sure, the successful military incursions into the surrounding nation-states found all-too-willing allies among those now willing to give full vent to their antisemitism by turning in local Jews and exacting retribution for perceived grievances from their neighbors. Every nation-state under Nazi military control found willing collaborationists who thus enabled their “overlords” to maintain control. After the end of the war, many of these same collaborationists were brought to trial, up to and including execution.

Lastly, the tragic instances of the few Jewish denouncers (German: Anklägers) about whom we know of only a few cases—the most well-known being that of Stella Kübler Goldschlag—present an uncompromising moral dilemma: What would one do to prolong one’s own life as well as that of one’s family? That so few Jews either denounced their fellow Jews or covertly attempted to participate or collaborate in the Nazi annihilationist agenda speaks well of a community that was the first and primary focus of extermination.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Gestapo; Gies, Miep; Nuremberg Laws

Further Reading

- Fritzsche, Peter. Germans into Nazis. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Gellately, Robert. Backing Hitler: Consent and Coercion in Nazi Germany. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Kershaw, Ian. Popular Opinion and Political Dissent in the Third Reich: Bavaria, 1933–1945. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Peukert, Detlev J. K. Inside Nazi Germany: Conformity, Opposition, and Racism in Everyday Life. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Stoltzfus, Nathan. Hitler’s Compromises: Coercion and Consensus in Nazi Germany. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2016.

The Deputy

The Deputy, a play written by Rolf Hochhuth that premiered in 1963, explores the long-standing controversy about the role of Pope Pius XII during the Holocaust. Considered one of the most important and controversial plays of the 20th century, The Deputy is still today regarded by some with great admiration and by others with scorn.

Rolf Hochhuth was born on April 1, 1931, in the town of Eschwege in central Germany. A member of the Hitler Youth, Hochhuth spent several years after the war working in various areas of bookselling. His play, the full title of which was The Deputy: A Christian Tragedy (Der Stellvertreter. Ein Christliches Trauerspiel), was published in the United Kingdom under the name The Representative. It also was the subject of a feature film, Amen (dir. Costa-Gavras), released in 2002.

The Deputy tells the story of a young Jesuit priest in the Vatican, Riccardo Fontana, who is deeply moved by the words of warning that Kurt Gerstein, a young SS officer, brings to the papal nuncio of Berlin, Cesare Orsenigo, about the mass gassing of the Jews by the Nazis. Greatly distressed by Orsenigo’s dismissive response to Gerstein, Fontana goes to Gerstein’s apartment where he promises to convince the pope to make a strong statement in condemnation of the Nazi extermination of the Jews. To test the sincerity of Fontana’s promise, Gerstein asks Fontana to give his cassock and passport to Jacobson, a Jew who is hiding in his apartment, so that he may escape from the Nazis. (The ploy does not work; Jacobson is sent to Auschwitz.) Fontana agrees and is left holding Jacobson’s passport—with its mandatory J stamped on it—and his yellow star.

The Pope Pius XII that we meet is someone who seems less concerned about the plight of the Jews than about the protection of Vatican assets and the preservation of a chance to play a significant future role as peacemaker at the end of the war. Fontana implores the pope to speak up, especially when Jews in Rome are being rounded up for deportation “under his very windows.” Pius insists that he can best help the Jews by avoiding a direct confrontation with the Nazi regime, claiming that his most useful work can only be done behind the scenes through diplomatic channels. Fontana is further frustrated by the pope’s position that the Nazi government serves as protection against godless communism and that he has allowed churches and monasteries to hide Jews.

Fontana remains convinced that the Catholic Church must do more, and in a confrontation with Pius urges him to issue an unambiguous condemnation of the government’s treatment of the Jews. Pius’s response is chilling and calculating, insisting that his role and the plight of the Jews are best served by public silence. Further, Pius refuses to abrogate the Vatican Concordat that his predecessor, Pius XI, entered into with the Nazi regime in 1933. This compounds the impression that Pius XII has no intention of making the kind of public pronouncement that alone could rally the 500 million Catholics around the world in resistance against the Nazis. Recognizing that thousands of Jews will continue to die each day as long as Pius remains silent, and convinced that his silence represents a mortal failing of the Catholic church, Fontana affixes the yellow star he got from Jacobson to his cassock and makes the stunning announcement that he is going to join the Jews being deported to Auschwitz.

Fontana enters the camp in a cattle car along with others deported from Rome. His presence there represents a serious problem for the Nazis, who assume, of course, that he was deported by accident and that this could lead to a stern protest by the pope, something that Hitler, we are told often throughout the play, fears more than anything else.

In the camp, Fontana meets “the Doctor” (who is never named but is clearly based on Dr. Josef Mengele, the cruel and pathological “Angel of Death” of Auschwitz), who represents all the evil of the gas chambers, the crematoria, and the Nazi regime as a whole. Gerstein comes to the camp (without orders) to rescue Fontana, who insists he must stay. He once again gives his cassock to Jacobson, the Jew from Gerstein’s apartment, with the hope that Gerstein can walk Jacobson out of the camp as if it were Fontana who was being taken out. The attempt fails, with Fontana killed, Jacobson sent directly to the crematoria, and Gerstein being taken under guard to what, no doubt, will be his death.

The Deputy was first performed in West Berlin in February 1963, followed in the same year by productions in seven countries throughout Europe. Its first production in English was in London in September 1963, with its debut on Broadway six months later, where it enjoyed a run of more than 300 performances and garnered its producer, Herman Shumlin, a Tony Award in 1964 for “Best Producer (Dramatic).” A review of the English translation of the book that appeared in the New York Times in March 1964, by Robert Gorham Davis, gave no accolades “because of originality in thought or form, or . . . [for] any unusual talent on the author’s part,” but it did observe that “the power of ‘The Deputy’ derives from Hochhuth’s ability to bring to bear the full weight of mass suffering caused by the Nazi anti-Christ, and yet keep alive a sense of individual option and responsibility.” The lengthy review ends with the observation that no matter how “brash and cumbersome it may be, ‘The Deputy’ has evoked throughout the West a passionate moral and religious response that is intensely needed at this time.”

Hochhuth based many of the play’s characters on real people. For example, the moral courage of Fontana reflects a combination of the real-life actions of two Catholic clerics. The first was Father Maximilian Kolbe—now St. Maximilian Kolbe—a Franciscan friar who, as a prisoner at Auschwitz (imprisoned for his rescue efforts on behalf of Jews), took the place of a prisoner who was selected for the gas chamber, thus giving that prisoner a chance to survive and return to his family. The second was Cathedral Provost Bernhard Lichtenberg, a Catholic priest who condemned the violence of Kristallnacht, insisted on praying for the Jews from his pulpit, denounced the deportations of the Jews, and chose to accompany the Jews who were condemned to deportation. Hochhuth dedicated his play to these two men.

The impact of Hochhuth’s play cannot be overstated. In many ways it started the debate about the actions of the Catholic Church during the Holocaust, and specifically about the actions of Pope Pius XII. That debate pits the characterization of Pius XII as the morally weak, narcissistic, and cold person that Hochhuth portrayed against the caring and courageous person whom the Vatican is considering for beatification.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Catholic Church; Gerstein, Kurt; Mengele, Josef; Pius XII

Further Reading

Barasch-Rubinstein, Emanuela. The Devil, the Saints, and the Church: Reading Hochhuth’s The Deputy. Bern: Peter Lang, 2003.

Bentley, Eric (Ed.). The Storm over “The Deputy.” New York: Grove Press, 1964.

Hochhuth, Rolf. The Deputy. New York: Grove Press, 1964.

Der Stürmer

A rabidly antisemitic tabloid published weekly between 1923 and 1945 that was an important propaganda tool for the German Nazi Party. Under the direction of Julius Streicher, Der Stürmer (“The Stormer,” but more colloquially, “The Attacker”) was aimed chiefly at Germany’s lower and working classes. Its content was invariably simplistic, one-sided, and overtly antisemitic. The paper took as its motto “Die Juden Sind unser Unglück!” (“The Jews are Our Misfortune!”). Some senior members of the Nazi Party were clearly embarrassed by the tabloid’s content and appeal, and they tried to distance themselves from it. Others, however, including Heinrich Himmler, chief of the SS, endorsed Der Stürmer. Adolf Hitler acknowledged the primitive nature of the publication but nevertheless saw it as an effective propaganda tool aimed at the lower and uneducated classes.

The newspaper emphasized the worst caricatures and stereotypes of Jews, including Jewish men’s alleged sexual depravity, purported Jewish aims to make a fortune at others’ expense, and the alleged Jewish propensity to be anti-capitalistic and pro-communist. Worse still were repeated charges that Jews had been responsible for the death of Jesus and were engaged in rituals that sacrificed the lives of non-Jewish children for the expiation of Jewish sins (the so-called blood libel fallacy).

A major feature of the tabloid involved cartoons and caricatures that portrayed Jews in the worst possible light. Streicher’s stated aim was to “educate” Germans on how to spot a Jew. The cartoons featured grotesque figures of Jews that showed unkempt, overweight characters with overly prominent noses and thick lips.

Streicher supplied plenty of details to “substantiate” his lurid and wildly inaccurate stories, often times printing the names of Jews who had supposedly committed various crimes, including those involving rape, incest, and child abuse. Rarely were such details ever properly investigated, and almost all were likely fabrications. Nevertheless, Der Stürmer’s circulation grew enormously after Hitler came to power—from 25,000 copies per week in 1933 to nearly 500,000 copies per week in 1938. When Germany was defeated in World War II in 1945, Streicher was arrested by Allied authorities and tried at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg; found guilty for crimes against humanity on October 1, 1946, he was executed on October 16.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Antisemitism; Propaganda in the Holocaust; Schmeling, Max; Streicher, Julius

Further Reading

Bytwerk, Randall L. Julius Streicher: Nazi Editor of the Notorious Anti-Semitic Newspaper Der Stürmer. New York: Cooper Square Press, 2001.

Showalter, Dennis E. Little Man What Now? Der Stürmer in the Weimar Republic. Hamden (CT): Archon Books, 1982.

De Sousa Mendes, Aristides

Aristides de Sousa Mendes was the consul-general of Portugal in Bordeaux, France, during World War II, responsible for issuing visas to thousands of refugees (including about 10,000 Jews) fleeing the Nazis during spring and summer 1940. In doing so he deliberately defied the orders of Portuguese dictator António Salazar.

He was born in Cabanas de Viriato on July 19, 1885. His father, José de Sousa Mendes, was a judge. Studying law at the University of Coimbra, he graduated in 1908. The same year, he married Maria Angelina Coelho de Sousa, with whom he was to have 14 children. As a young diplomat he was posted to such assignments as Zanzibar, Brazil, Spain, the United States, and Belgium. In 1938 he was assigned as consul-general in Bordeaux.

With the outbreak of war in 1939, the Portuguese capital of Lisbon became Europe’s refugee capital and principal port of embarkation for sanctuary in the New World. Salazar’s government did not accept many Jews for permanent residence, preferring to act as a temporary haven; Jews could remain only until they could arrange a further passage to somewhere else. Most refugees arrived in Lisbon only on a two-week transit visa, issued in the refugee’s home country by the local Portuguese consul upon presentation of a valid entry permit for a third country. Many of these third-country entry permits were fictitious, elicited through bribes involving vast amounts of money or precious gems. Portuguese consuls throughout Europe were only too aware of the traffic in bogus entry permits but in many cases turned a blind eye to the practice and processed transit visas regardless.

Aristides de Sousa Mendes was a Portuguese consul stationed in Bordeaux, France, during World War II. He defied the orders of his government in order to save Jewish lives through the issuing of visas and passports to refugees fleeing Nazi-controlled France. For his efforts to save Jewish refugees, in 1966 Sousa Mendes was the first diplomat to be recognized by Israel as one of the Righteous among the Nations. In this image, Luisa Pacheco Marques delivers a speech next to a photograph of Sousa Mendes during the inauguration of an Internet-based virtual museum dedicated to Sousa Mendes in February 2008. (AP Photo/Armando Franca)

Following the Nazi invasion of France in May 1940, the population of Bordeaux swelled as refugees from across the country fled the advancing Nazis. Cities all over southern France began to overflow with desperate refugees. On June 17, 1940, France surrendered, and Sousa Mendes told his family: “From now on I’m giving everyone visas. There will be no more nationalities, races or religions.” Announcing that “The only way I can respect my faith as a Christian is to act in accordance with the dictates of my conscience,” and seeing the terrible plight of the refugees, he set up an assembly line process in the consulate. With help from two of his sons and several volunteers, he began issuing entry permits; those who could not pay the visa fees, he said, would receive the documents without charge.

In issuing these visas, Sousa Mendes was deliberately and knowingly disobeying his own government’s decree. As a devout Christian, he saw that his actions were the right thing to do in accordance with his religious obligations.

During the period June 15–22, 1940, Sousa Mendes issued a total of 1,575 visas, working nonstop for days and nights at a stretch—but this was only a beginning. When he left Bordeaux for the far western port city of Hendaye, on the border with Spain, in order to provide visas to those stranded there, he was therefore not at the consulate when two cables arrived from Lisbon ordering him to stop issuing more visas. To add to the ever-increasing numbers, he also directed the honorary vice-consul for Portugal in Toulouse, Emile Gissot, to issue transit visas to any who applied.

Sousa Mendes’s actions were therefore clearly known back in Lisbon; they could hardly have been missed. On June 24, Salazar again ordered his immediate return to Portugal, and this time two detectives were sent to escort him back. Starting the journey, and deliberately moving slowly, he continued issuing Portuguese visas as he went. As they passed the Portuguese consulate in Bayonne, he entered and ordered the local consul to issue visas to hundreds of people lined up outside. He stamped the visas personally, adding in handwriting, “The Government of Portugal asks the Government of Spain kindly to allow the holder of this document to cross Spain freely. The holder of this document is a refugee from the conflict in Europe and is en route to Portugal.” He then personally escorted them to a Spanish border post and made sure they crossed safely.

When the party returned to Hendaye, Sousa Mendes learned that the visas he had previously issued in that town were not being honored. He ordered his driver to slow down and waved those bearing such visas to follow him to a border checkpoint without telephones. The border officials there, unable to phone in for verification, had no alternative but to recognize the diplomatic entourage they now encountered, and Sousa Mendes led the refugees across the border.

The disgraced consul-general arrived back in Portugal to face charges on July 8, 1940. In Lisbon he was brought before a disciplinary panel, and on October 19, 1940, was found guilty of “disobeying higher orders during service.” On October 30, 1940, Salazar decreed that Sousa Mendes would be subjected to “a penalty of one year of inactivity with the right to one half of his rank’s pay, being obliged subsequently to be retired.” His career in tatters, he was stripped of his title and assets, and became an outcast. The public dishonor that followed reduced him to poverty, led to the fracturing of his family, and brought on lasting health problems.

While some scholars have disputed the generally recognized figure of 30,000 people saved as a result of Sousa Mendes’s actions—of whom perhaps 10,000 were Jews—it is clear that the number of refugees granted visas on his watch came to many thousands. Those reducing the number often only consider his efforts in Bordeaux, omitting the actions he took in Hendaye (twice), Bayonne, and Toulouse, among other places.

In 1945 Aristides de Sousa Mendes suffered a stroke that left him partially paralyzed. Clearly, the strain of the previous few years was a contributing factor, as it was also to his early death on April 3, 1954. He died in poverty and obscurity, with one of his nieces the only person present.

The rehabilitation of his reputation only began after his death. On October 18, 1966, Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations, the first diplomat to be so honored. Within Portugal, his children worked to clear his name, but it was only on March 18, 1988, that the Portuguese government gave some measure of recognition when the Parliament dismissed all charges and posthumously restored him to the diplomatic corps. In 1995 President Mário Soares declared Sousa Mendes to be “Portugal’s greatest hero of the twentieth century.”

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: France; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

- Fralon, José-Alain. A Good Man in Evil Times: Aristides de Sousa Mendes—the Unknown Hero Who Saved Countless Lives in World War II. London: Viking, 2000.
- Paldiel, Mordecai. Diplomat Heroes of the Holocaust. New York: Yeshiva University/KTAV, 2007.
- Paldiel, Mordecai. The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. Hoboken (NJ): KTAV, 1993.
- Silver, Eric. The Book of the Just: The Unsung Heroes Who Rescued Jews from Hitler. New York: Grove Press, 1992.

Desk Killers

“Desk murderers” or “desk killers” (in German, Schreib-tisch-ta-ter) is a term sometimes given to the process whereby bureaucrats administer murderous policies devised by politicians or military leaders. Within the context of the Holocaust, the term refers to civil service bureaucrats, primarily in the Berlin offices of the SS, who maintained the paper flow of documents regarding the mass murder of European Jewry. These documents most often related to personnel and resource allocations, contracts, transportation schedules, and other areas requiring specialist input at the government level.

The most infamous desk killer was SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, who was given responsibility by his superior, SS-Obergruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich, for devising the means and coordinating the process of deporting and transporting Jews to ghettos, labor, and concentration camps, and, ultimately, the Nazi death camps situated in Poland. As policy is a response to a perceived administrative challenge, Eichmann threw himself into his work with enthusiasm and efficiency. He saw himself as an effective administrator dealing with a major policy issue that had been entrusted for resolution to his care. That it involved the murder of millions of people was of little concern; the important thing for him, in his bureaucratic capacity, was to deal with the task assigned to him as efficiently and commendably as possible.

At the Wannsee Conference of January 20, 1942—a meeting of senior Nazi officials held in Berlin to put into administrative terms the manner in which the “Final Solution” would be carried out—the minutes reflected the consensus reached by the 16 delegates (who included Eichmann and Heydrich). Of those present, eight had earned doctorates, and a majority possessed legal degrees. Though directly responsible for the mass murder of the Jews of Europe, none were instrumentally involved in the actual extermination process; most never experienced at firsthand the killing practices of the Holocaust, and, more often than not, never even visited the sites of the various killing centers.

Both before and during the Holocaust, desk killers have typically addressed their tasks in a similar vein to that of Eichmann, regardless of their national or ideological background. They have been detached, deliberate, speedy, and highly focused on meeting their objectives without succumbing to the temptation of considering human morality that might deflect their attention. Indeed, if pressed, many would argue that by doing their job as effectively as they are able, humanity is being served with a minimum of harm being done to their own population because of the clarity and precision they bring to their tasks. It is because of their detachment that desk killers often fail to see the criminal nature of their work—but it is that work that facilitates modern genocide, the more so in highly developed states. In fact, it could be said that the more modern a society, the greater the reliance on desk killers in planning and carrying out policies of genocide.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Arendt, Hannah; Bureaucracy; Eichmann, Adolf; Wannsee Conference

Further Reading

- Browning, Christopher R. The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2004.
- Cesarani, David. Eichmann: His Life and Crimes. London: Vintage, 2004.
- Safrian, Hans. Eichmann's Men. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2010.

Deutsche Bank

Founded in 1870 in Berlin, the Deutsche Bank today is the largest bank in the European Union. It operates internationally with 1,500 branches in Germany alone and more than 90,000 employees in more than 60 countries. In 1999 the Deutsche Bank made a profit of 2.6 billion euros.

The financial demands of rapid German industrialization in the 1860s and a developing nationalism led to the establishment of the Deutsche Bank as a competitor to the then-dominant British banks. Branches were established in Bremen, Hamburg, Yokohama, Shanghai, and London during its first three years. The bank supported the development of the internationally successful German electrical industry and in 1903 helped finance the Bagdadbahn, a railroad connecting Istanbul and Baghdad, which served German expansionist interests. It had cooperated with the German foreign ministry, the Auswärtiges Amt, and had established after some prodding the Ueberseeischen Bank (Overseas Bank) in 1886 and the Deutsch-Asiatischen Bank (German-Asiatic Bank) three years later.

World War I, the loss of foreign investment, and the hyperinflation in Germany in the early 1920s hit the bank hard and led to a period of consolidation. However, the Deutsche Bank was soon in business again, financing the creation of Universum Film Aktiengesellschaft, the first German film studio, and the merger of Daimler and Benz into Mercedes-Benz. In 1929 Deutsche Bank merged with its major German competitor, the Disconto-Gesellschaft. The name Deutsche Bank-Disconto-Gesellschaft was used until 1937, when it was changed back to the original shorter name. The Great Depression found the Deutsche Bank unprepared. Short-term foreign loans on the one side and debtors who were unable to pay back credit on the other led to a drastic shortage of liquid assets.

After Adolf Hitler had been made German chancellor and the Nazis took power in 1933, the Deutsche Bank submitted without resistance to the racist policies of removing Jews from among its staff and from high management positions. The last Jewish member of the board had to leave the bank in 1938. When, in the course of the Nazis' economic war against the Jews, Jews were prohibited any kind of enterprise after 1938, the Deutsche Bank facilitated the so-called Aryanization of Jewish businesses (forced transfer of Jewish-owned businesses to German "Aryan" ownership) in more than 350 cases by giving credits to the new owners and as an intermediary. By the end of the war the Deutsche Bank had handed over all Jewish assets to the German government. Between 1942 and 1944 the bank helped in the transfer of a large amount of gold to be sold by the German government to finance the war. More than 1,500 pounds of the gold was from victims of the Holocaust.

In 1948 the Deutsche Bank was broken up into 10 regional banks by the occupying forces, but in 1957 they were recombined in what again was named the Deutsche Bank. Today the Deutsche Bank is the most dominant financial institution in Germany and in Europe.

MICHAEL WALA

See also: Aryanization; Confiscation of Jewish Property

Further Reading

James, Harold. The Deutsche Bank and the Nazi Economic War against the Jews: The Expropriation of Jewish-owned Property. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Steinberg, Jonathan. The Deutsche Bank and Its Gold Transactions during the Second World War. Berlin: Beck, 1999.

The Diary of a Young Girl

Along with Elie Wiesel's Night (1960), Anne Frank's The Diary of a Young Girl is the most internationally well-known and well-received book addressing the reality of the Holocaust from the viewpoint of a young person's trauma.

Born in 1929 in Germany, Anne Frank and her family—mother, father, and sister—went into hiding in a "Secret Annex" in a factory in Amsterdam, Holland, to escape the Nazis. A talented writer, the years encompassed by her diary were 1942 to 1944, when she was aged 13 to 15. In the diary she records not only her thoughts, dreams, and aspirations, but also details of life in hiding, for this Jewish family and the others who would join them, along with the daily tensions among them. Although befriended by non-Jews, she, her family, and the other inhabitants were betrayed by a Dutch police officer and transported to Bergen-Belsen, where she died of typhus three months short of her 16th birthday in 1945. The diary itself was retrieved after the war by her father, Otto Frank, the only member of the family to survive. The diary was edited by him and subsequently published in numerous languages beginning in 1952. In the United States it was turned into a stage version, originally by Meyer Levin, and later into a movie starring Susan Strasberg, daughter of famed director Lee Strassberg. Both versions provoked controversy, particularly over the universalization of her experiences versus the particularity of her Jewish identity.

The Diary of a Young Girl has become a standard in both middle school and high school language arts curricula in many nations around the globe. In the Netherlands itself the diary remains akin to a "book above reproach" (although a critical edition of the original manuscript was published there), and Anne herself has become something of an icon.

International Holocaust deniers continue to attack the authenticity of the diary, but to no avail. Objectively speaking, while acknowledging both its merit and popularity, The Diary of a Young Girl must not be equated with the whole of the Holocaust; it is a window of insight into one small part of the spectrum of the victims' experiences, specifically, those who went into hiding but, tragically, did not survive.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Children during the Holocaust; Children's Literature of the Holocaust; Netherlands; Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Barnouw, David, and Gerrold Van Der Stroom (Eds.). The Diary of Anne Frank: The Critical Edition. New York: Doubleday, 1989.

Enzer, Hyman A., and Sandra Solotaroff-Enzer (Eds.). Anne Frank: Reflections on Her Life and Legacy. Urbana (IL): University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Rittner, Carol (Ed.). Anne Frank in the World: Essays and Reflections. Armonk (NY): M. E. Sharpe, 1997.

The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak

The published diaries of a 15-year-old Polish Jewish boy who endured the horrors of the Łódź ghetto between 1939 and 1943. The ghetto, located in central Poland, was the second-largest of its kind in Nazi-occupied Poland. At its peak it contained more than 200,000 people. Dawid Sierakowski made his first diary entry on June 28, 1939, when he was 15. Writing in seven different notebooks (the last two have yet to be published), Sierakowski created an entry for most days, although their length and detail vary widely. The entries reveal the horrors of being forced to live amid the constant fear of starvation, disease and sickness, paralyzing terror, and the knowledge that one faced an almost certain death. Although the entries are not deeply philosophical, they offer great insight into the day-to-day struggles of Sierakowski and his family (before the diary ended, Dawid lost his father to tuberculosis and his mother to deportation and extermination). Most poignant perhaps is the overall narrative arc in the entries, which describes—many times in heart-breaking detail—the slow and steady deterioration of Sierakowski's health and the slow unraveling of his family.

Notably, Sierakowski also wrote about the underground resistance movement in the ghetto, comprised mainly of youths, and agonized over class divisions therein. A believer in Marxist utopianism, Sierakowski was chagrined that Jews could divide against themselves even when faced with the same terrible circumstances and fate. He also wrote of the growing sense of alienation he and his family experienced because they were not connected to the ghetto's tyrannical leader, Chaim Rumkowski, who played favorites, tried to pit one group against another, and ensured that his family and cronies received more food and supplies than the others.

At the same time, the entries deal with more mundane things, like the author's attempt to secure work and food rations. He also writes of school and sometimes analyzes literature he has read. Despite his hardships, Dawid Sierakowski consistently demonstrates an inquisitive mind that constantly seeks out new knowledge. As a whole the diary offers an unparalleled view of a ghetto during World War II. Dawid's last diary entry was made in April 1943, a time in which his health had begun to deteriorate. He died of tuberculosis on August 8, 1943, and nobody knows for certain what happened to him in the last four months of his life or why he stopped writing in April.

The diaries were discovered when Soviet forces liberated Łódź in January 1945. By then there were perhaps only 10,000 survivors of the more than 200,000 people who had initially resided in the ghetto. It took many years to translate Sierakowski's work; his diary was published in 1998 by Oxford University Press.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Children during the Holocaust; Ghettos; Łódź Ghetto

Further Reading

Adelson, Alan, and Robert Lapides (Eds.). Lodz Ghetto: Inside a Community under Siege. New York: Penguin Books, 1991.

Dobroszycki, Lucjan. The Chronicle of the Lodz Ghetto, 1941–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984.

Sierakowski, David (Ed., Alan Adelson). The Diary of Dawid Sierakowski: Five Notebooks from the Lodz Ghetto. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Dinur, Yehiel

Polish-born Jewish writer whose work graphically portrayed various aspects of the Holocaust, partly based on the two years he spent in a Nazi concentration camp during World War II. Yehiel Dinur, who wrote in Hebrew beginning in 1945 under the pen name Ka-Tzetnik 135633 (Yiddish slang for “concentration camp prisoner”; the 6-digit numeral was Dinur's concentration camp number at Auschwitz), was born on May 16, 1909, in Sosnowiec, Poland. He attended a traditional yeshiva (religious-based Jewish school) in Lublin, Poland, and was an early adherent of Zionism. In 1931 he published his first volume of poetry, which he composed in Yiddish.

Most of Dinur's works were published after 1945, and a great majority of it dealt with his personal experiences as a concentration camp internee or examined the Holocaust from various angles. Dinur downplayed his life prior to World War II and refused to discuss any aspect of his existence before 1943. Indeed, it was as if he had been born in the concentration camp. His first work dealing with the Holocaust was Salamandra (Sunrise over Hell), published in 1946. Other more notable books included House of Dolls (1955), Star of Ashes (1966), and Shiviti: A Vision (1989). Dinur's major works were written in a memoir format, which blended actual events and eyewitness accounts with accounts that seem to be fictional or quasi-fictional. That left him open to criticism by some scholars that his work makes it difficult to sort fact from fantasy. Regardless, Dinur's stories were meticulously detailed and, many times, exceedingly graphic. House of Dolls, for example, is a lurid account of the Nazis' sexual exploitation of women interned in concentration camps. Dinur frequently stated that he believed he had a mission to narrate the Holocaust on behalf of the millions who had not survived it.

Dinur's true identity was a carefully guarded secret until he elected to testify at the war crimes trial of Adolf Eichmann in 1961. During his testimony Dinur became so emotional that he passed out in the courtroom. He revealed that his two years as a prisoner were akin to life on another planet, in an alternate universe. It was clear that Dinur's experiences had radically altered his life and worldview. These experiences also brought about a severe case of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), which plagued Dinur for the remainder of his life.

Dinur stayed engaged in projects that sought to educate people about the Holocaust, and he also became involved in the antinuclear movement. He continued to write until his death in Tel Aviv on July 17, 2001.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Auschwitz; Eichmann Trial

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. Rev. ed. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.

Rudolf, Anthony. "Ka-Tzetnik 135633." In Sorrel Kerbel, Muriel Emanuel, and Laura Phillips (Eds.). Jewish Writers of the Twentieth Century. London: Routledge, 2003.

Displaced Persons

In the aftermath of World War II and the defeat of the Nazis and their allies, it has been estimated that by 1947 more than 8 million persons found themselves displaced from their homes throughout Europe, including more than 250,000 Jews. Some have estimated that the actual numbers were even higher—between 11,000,000 and 20,000,000—the majority of whom were released from the various Nazi concentration, labor, and extermination camps.

Many of these people, now free, fled westward, fearful of finding themselves in the Soviet zone of occupation and subject to repatriation (or worse). For those who either had no homes to which to return, no countries who wished their return, or did not themselves wish to do so, how to house, clothe, and feed them, and provide medical services, both physical and psychological, became an Allied nightmare. Initial assumptions were that both their return and their welcome could be easily achieved within a matter of six months to one year, but such would not prove to be the case. As a way around this, the necessity of so-called "DP Camps" for these people grew at an alarming rate throughout Germany, Austria, Italy, and, to a lesser degree, other countries formerly conquered and occupied by the Nazis.

At their maximum level of operation, approximately 850,000 people were housed in these camps; they included

Armenians, Croats, Czechoslovaks, Estonians, Greeks, Latvians, Lithuanians, Poles, Russians, Serbs, Slovenes, Ukrainians, and Yugoslavs. The plight of the Jewish refugees, however, was somewhat unique: all too often they found themselves in the same camps where the antisemitic proclivities of the others manifested itself, up to and including violence. Ultimately, in many situations, this necessitated their segregation into separate camps. In the main, such segregation was the result of U.S. President Harry S. Truman's strong encouragement in response to the report he requested from University of Pennsylvania vice president and Law School dean Earl G. Harrison, who visited the camps between July and August 1945, found the situation of the camps intolerable, and submitted his written report on August 24. As regards the Jews, he wrote that many were "living under guard behind barbed-wire fences" and "had no clothing other than their concentration camp garb." The camp environments were substandard, with many of the buildings "clearly unfit for winter." Speaking of the Allied administrations, Harrison noted: "We appear to be treating the Jews as the Nazis treated them except that we do not exterminate them. They are in concentration camps in large numbers under our military guard instead of S.S. troops. One is led to wonder whether the German people, seeing this, are not supposing that we are following or at least condoning Nazi policy."

Harrison was equally critical of the military administration under Supreme Allied Commander General Dwight D. Eisenhower, and tension developed between the two as Eisenhower attempted to explain and rationalize to his president the reality of the conditions that existed, though ultimately resolving such concerns positively. Of necessity, as Eisenhower understood it, the Allies found themselves having to make use of whatever facilities were presented: military barracks, hotels, hospitals, castles, and even private homes. Camp conditions ranged from deplorable and harsh to livable. Sometimes foodstuffs were rationed; other times there was enough to feed all. Sometimes curfews were imposed and residents were forbidden to interact with townspeople; other times easy egress and ingress was the norm. It should also be noted that one of the senior members of Eisenhower's command, U.S. Army General George S. Patton Jr., was and remained an avowed antisemite in regard to the fate of the Jewish survivors.

On October 1, 1945, UNRRA (United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration), which had already begun directing such camp efforts, now took responsibility for such work, while still relying on the military for transportation, security, and supply-lines. By the end of the year, more than 6,000,000 refugees had been repatriated. These did not include so-called “ethnic Germans,” between 12,000,000 and 14,000,000 of whom had been expelled from Eastern and Central Europe by 1950, when all but two of the DP camps had been closed—Föhrenwald in 1957 and Wels in 1959.

Relatively quickly, once camp life assumed a reasonable measure of stability and routine, the residents themselves were hard at work, establishing synagogues and churches, newspapers, and cultural and educational endeavors. They were aided in these efforts by various international humanitarian organizations and agencies, including (for example) the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee; American Friends Service Committee (“the Quakers”) and their British counterpart, the British Friends Relief Service; Catholic charities; the International Committee of the Red Cross; the International Lutheran World Federation; and many national and international organizations as well.

Those displaced persons (by far the majority of whom were not Jewish) who could emigrate did so as well: to Argentina (17,000); Australia (182,159); Belgium (22,000); Brazil (29,000); Canada (157,687); France (38,157); French Morocco (1,500); Norway (692); the United Kingdom (213,000); and the United States (400,000). By 1953, however, more than 250,000 refugees still remained throughout Europe with no place to go, largely elderly, crippled, infirm, or disabled as a result of their traumatization.

As noted previously, Jewish refugees posed a separate and distinct set of problems and difficulties. Approximately 185,000 were in camps in Germany, 45,000 in Austria, and 20,000 in Italy. Referring to themselves as the She'erit Hapleitah (“The Saving Remnant”), they very quickly organized themselves out of their overwhelming concern for their own safety and own future. The overwhelming majority of those who survived, whether in hiding or liberated from the camps, did not wish to remain in Europe but preferred to emigrate—primarily to Palestine, which was under British control. The difficulty here was that the British denied Jewish admission so as not to offend the Arab population there, though for Zionists entry to Palestine remained a primary objective. Both the Jewish Agency, representing the Jews of Palestine, and British Jewish soldiers from the Jewish Brigade, continued to encourage such thinking. David Ben-Gurion, who would later become Israel’s first prime minister, visited European DP camps several times between 1945 and 1946 to encourage emigration. Even the British- and American-sponsored Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry encouraged emigration to the tune of 100,000 Jewish refugees (along with other recommendations including maintaining the British mandate, close supervision of all holy sites, and close consultation and cooperation with both the Jewish Agency and the Arab States); still, the British refused the recommendation. Between 1945 and 1948 the illegal underground organized effort known as “Bricha” (escape) accounted for more than 100,000 to 150,000 Jews being smuggled into Palestine, and this may have been a decisive factor in Britain’s decision to abandon its control of the area.

The DP camps were an immediate necessity in the aftermath of the chaotic days following Germany’s defeat and the end of World War II, coupled with both the devastation existing throughout Europe and the tensions already beginning to surface between the West and Soviet Russia. Successful efforts at meeting refugee needs were coupled with limited repatriation efforts and failures as well (for example, overt violence in some camps fueled by antisemitism, or an inability to meet needs in some locales), all of which were heightened by the specific plight of the Jews, the focused enemies of Hitler’s and the Nazis’ annihilationist agenda.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Concentration Camps; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Exodus 1947; International Committee of the Red Cross; Joint Distribution Committee

Further Reading

Dinnerstein, Leonard. America and the Survivors of the Holocaust: The Evolution of a United States Displaced Persons Policy, 1945–1950. New York: Columbia University Press, 1982.

Heymont, Irving. Among the Survivors of the Holocaust, 1945: The Lansberg DP Camp Letters of Major Irving Heymont, United States Army. Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College Press, 1982.

Sachar, Abram Leon. The Redemption of the Unwanted: From the Liberation of the Death Camps to the Founding of Israel. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1983.

Wyman, Mark. DPs: Europe’s Displaced Persons, 1945–51. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1998.

Doctors' Trial

The Doctors’ Trial occurred in Nuremberg, Germany, between December 9, 1946, and August 20, 1947. Known officially as United States of America v. Karl Brandt et al., the Doctors’ Trial is not to be confused with the trials supervised by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. The Doctors’ Trial was conducted strictly by a U.S. military court. The proceedings tried 23 Nazi German defendants, all of whom were charged with Nazi human experimentation, euthanasia, and mass murder. Most of the defendants were medical doctors, although some were scientists or lower-level functionaries who aided in the commission of the crimes. The formal indictments were handed down on October 25, 1946.

The defendants were accused of having engaged in cruel or inhuman medical experiments, many of which were conducted on nonvolunteer subjects who had been internees at concentration camps or prisoners of war. Others were accused of having carried out Nazi euthanasia laws, which were designed to murder individuals who were mentally or physically ill or were disabled. The litany of accusations were truly horrific—they included exposing individuals to dangerous or poisonous chemicals or gas to determine the body's reaction to them; surgical experimentation without the use of anesthetics; unnecessary amputations; exposing people to deadly bacteria such as typhus; and forced sterilization, among other things.

The defendants' defense team argued—unsuccessfully—that the experiments were not illegal because they were designed to save the lives of German soldiers and that their chief intent was not to inflict suffering or death on subjects. The defense also argued that euthanasia was not a war crime because German law had sanctioned the activity and the program had provided mercy to the afflicted. This line of argument was also unsuccessful. All the defendants were found guilty. Seven were given death sentences, five were given life imprisonment, and the remaining men were given sentences ranging from 10 to 20 years imprisonment.

The Doctors' Trial also informed the enactment of the Nuremberg Code, which is an internationally applied convention of medical ethics that control medical experimentation. Informed by the trial, the code mandated that all human subjects be voluntary participants and that experiments be conducted to avoid pain or permanent injury.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Brandt, Karl; Gebhardt, Karl; Medical Experimentation; Nuremberg Code; Oberheuser, Herta

Further Reading

Cefrey, Holly. Doctor Josef Mengele: The Angel of Death. New York: Rosen, 2001.

Schmidt, Ulf. Justice at Nuremberg: Leo Alexander and the Nazi Doctors' Trial. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.

Spitz, Vivien. Doctors from Hell: The Horrific Account of Nazi Experiments on Humans. Boulder (CO): Sentient Publications, 2005.

Dora-Mittelbau

Dora-Mittelbau was a Nazi forced labor and concentration camp situated in central Germany, north of the town of Nordhausen. Known also as Dora-Nordhausen or Nordhausen, the facility was also close to the Harz Mountains. It began as a subcamp of the Buchenwald concentration camp and became an autonomous facility in October 1944. The year before, prisoners from Buchenwald were forced to start construction on a sprawling industrial complex and prison, which eventually became Dora-Mittelbau. Prisoners at Dora-Mittelbau were forced to work in the factories and quarries nearby. Most of the prisoners were Jews, but there were also some Roma, criminals, and “asocials” (mainly homosexuals). Eventually, Dora-Mittelbau would have more

Dora-Mittelbau was a German Nazi concentration camp located near Nordhausen. It was established in late summer 1943 as a subcamp of Buchenwald, supplying for manufacturing the V-2 rocket and the V-1 flying bomb. In the summer of 1944 Dora-Mittelbau became an independent concentration camp with numerous subcamps of its own. In 1945 most of the surviving inmates were evacuated by the SS. On April 11, 1945, the remaining prisoners were liberated by U.S. troops. This photo shows a French slave laborer sitting inside a hangar the day after the liberation. (Galerie Bilderwelt/Getty Images) than 30 subcamps and a permanent prisoner population of 12,000–13,000.

Most prisoners worked and lived underground, where they slaved on weapons development projects and labored in various war-related industries. The Germans had placed much of this activity underground after Allied air raids had destroyed above-ground facilities. The conditions in which the prisoners lived and worked were appalling; they saw no daylight and breathed no fresh air for weeks at a time, which increased sickness and disease. Indeed, the death rate at Dora-Mittelbau was higher than at most other concentration camps because of these circumstances. Food was scarce and bad, and medical care was virtually nonexistent. When prisoners became too ill or exhausted from work, they were shipped out to Mauthausen or Birkenau, where most were killed. Discipline, which was harsh and arbitrary, was meted out under the supervision of the SS, which ran the camp.

As more war production was relocated to the area, prisoners built a vast array of subcamps, linked by tunnels and often built into the sides of mountains. The more important subcamps included Nordhausen, Niedersachswerfen, and Neusollstedt. In addition to working in munitions plants, prisoners also labored at a nearby ammonia works and stone quarry. Dora-Mittelbau had an active underground resistance movement, through which some prisoners purposely sabotaged items or slowed production. Individuals suspected of such activities were summarily killed. It is estimated that at least 200 detainees were put to death because of their resistance activity.

As Allied forces pressed into Germany from the east and west in the spring of 1945, the Germans sought to liquidate Dora-Mittelbau. Many detainees were sent to Bergen-Belsen, but many died on the forced march to northern Germany. When U.S. troops liberated the camp in April 1945, only a few critically ill prisoners remained there. In all, as many as 60,000 prisoners worked at or transited through Dora-Mittelbau. About 9,000 alone died from overwork; several thousand more died from starvation and disease.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Concentration Camps

Further Reading

Arich-Gerz, Bruno. Mittelbau-Dora: American and German Representations of a Nazi Concentration Camp. Literature, Visual Media and the Culture of Memory from 1945 to the Present. New Brunswick (NJ): Transaction Publishers. 2009.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Schaft, Gretchen, and Gerhard Zeidler. Commemorating Hell: The Public Memory of Mittelbau-Dora. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2011.

Drancy

The Drancy internment and transit camp, located just outside of Paris, was used as an assembly center for arrested Jews who were later deported to extermination camps during the German military administration of occupied France during World War II. More than 65,000 French, Polish, and German Jews, including approximately 11,000 children, were exported from Drancy on 64 rail transports from June 1942 to July 1944. The overwhelming majority of the prisoners that passed through the Drancy camp were Jews; however, a small percentage of the prisoners at the camp included members of the French Resistance. The camp at Drancy was liberated on August 17, 1944.

The Drancy camp was located to the northeast of Paris in the suburb of Drancy. Prior to World War II, architects Marcel Lods and Eugène Beaudouin conceived the facility as a modern urban community. The building was noteworthy for its integration of high-rise residential apartments, making it one of the first structures of its kind in France. The complex was named La Cité de la Muette, meaning “The Silent City,” when it was built, as it stood for peaceful ideals. The multistory U-shaped building was confiscated by Nazi authorities shortly after the occupation of France in 1940 and was initially used as police barracks before becoming the primary detention center for Jews (and other individuals labeled as “undesirable”) who were arrested in the Paris region. The facility was designed to accommodate 700 people, yet at the height of its use it housed more than 7,000 prisoners.

In August 1941 the Drancy camp was created by the Vichy government of Philippe Pétain in cooperation with the Nazi occupation authorities. The facility was established as an internment camp for foreign Jews in France after the arrest and roundup of more than 4,000 Jews in Paris in August 1941. Drancy later became the major transit camp for deporting Jews out of France. French police initially staffed the camp under the supervision of the German security police, and several thousand prisoners managed to obtain release in the first year of the camp's existence. Documented testimonies exist of brutality by the French guards, including the execution of 40 Jewish prisoners in retaliation for a French attack on German personnel.

The conditions in the camp were very harsh due to a neglect of basic human needs. The Jews at Drancy suffered from a lack of personal needs, inadequate food, unsanitary conditions, and overcrowding. In addition to the brutal conditions inside the camp, small children, upon arrival, were immediately separated from their parents. Evidence exists that more than 3,000 Jews died in French camps including Drancy; other camps, such as Noe, Gurs, and Rebecedou also saw many deaths due to starvation and lack of medical care.

Beginning in the summer of 1942, Germans began the systematic deportation of Jews from Drancy to killing centers located in occupied Poland. Sixty-four railway transports left Drancy carrying Jews on rail cars designed for cattle. The first was on June 22, 1942; the last on July 31, 1944. In total, more than 65,000 Jews were deported from Drancy to Auschwitz-Birkenau and the Sobibór killing centers. One-third of the Jews who had been deported from Drancy were French citizens; the others were foreign Jews who had immigrated from Poland, Germany, Austria, and elsewhere. A number of distinguished French Jewish intellectuals and artists were held in Drancy, including René Blum, a famous choreographer and younger brother of Prime Minister Léon Blum; Tristan Bernard, a philosopher; and poet Max Jacob, who died while imprisoned at Drancy.

Beginning in the early hours of the morning of July 16, 1942, and lasting through the next day, an event occurred known as "The Great Raid of the Vel' d'Hiv," when nearly 13,000 Jews were arrested in Paris. The adult men were sent directly to Drancy, while many of the women and children were held for five days without food or medical care inside the Vélodrome d'Hiver, an indoor cycling stadium, before being transferred to Drancy. The adults were then transported to Auschwitz and gassed; the children remained in Drancy for weeks without proper care or adequate food. Several babies and young children died due to neglect and the uncaring treatment of the French guards. Eventually all of the children were also transported to Auschwitz, to be gassed upon arrival.

In July 1943 Nazi Germany took direct control of the Drancy camp under the leadership of SS officer Alois Brunner, an Austrian who worked as Adolf Eichmann's assistant.

The Germans taking over the day-to-day operations at Drancy was part of an intensification of all facilities for the mass exterminations of all Jews throughout Nazi-occupied Europe.

On April 6, 1944, SS-Hauptsturmführer and Gestapo member Klaus Barbie, known as the "Butcher of Lyon," captured Jewish children in a raid on a children's home in Izieu, where the children had been hidden. He arrested all 44 children and seven adults. The children were shipped directly to Drancy and then put on the first available train to the death camps in the east. Of the 44 children of Izieu, not a single one survived.

As Allied forces neared Drancy on August 15 and 16, 1944, the German authorities there burned all the camp documents prior to fleeing. On August 17, 1944, the Swedish Consul-General, Raoul Nordling, took control of the camp. He found 1,542 surviving Jews at the camp and asked the French Red Cross to care for them. Of the 65,000 Jews that were exported from the Drancy camp to killing centers between June 22, 1942, and July 31, 1944, fewer than 2,000 survived the Holocaust.

For more than 40 years the government of France did not admit responsibility for the actions of the Vichy government of Philippe Pétain and the French police in the arrest, detainment, and exportation of French Jews during World War II. It was on July 16, 1995, that, in a historic speech, then-President Jacques Chirac recognized the responsibility of the French state in seconding the "criminal folly of the occupying country," and in particular, the role of the French police in organizing the 1942 Vel' d'Hiv Roundup.

In 1973 a memorial sculpture titled "The Gates of Hell" was created by Shelomo Selinger, the French-Israeli sculptor, to commemorate the French Jews who had passed through Drancy. In 2012 French president François Hollande opened a Holocaust memorial museum. The museum provides details about the persecution of the Jews in France and includes many personal mementos of the inmates. Some of the items include personal belongings left by inmates (some of which are inscribed with their owner's name), aluminum drinking mugs, messages written on the walls, and an archive of cards and letters written by prisoners to their relatives prior to deportation.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Barbie, Klaus; Brunner, Alois; Concentration Camps; France; Pétain, Philippe; Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français; Vel' d'Hiv Roundup; Vittel

Further Reading

- Butler, Hubert. The Children of Drancy. Mullingar (Ireland): Lilliput Press, 1988.
- Rajsfus, Maurice. Drancy: Un camp de concentration tres ordinaire, 1941–1944. Paris: Le Cherche Midi, 1996.
- Wellers, Georges. From Drancy to Auschwitz. Boston: M-Graphics Publishing, 2011.

Duckwitz, Georg

Georg Ferdinand Duckwitz was a German maritime attaché stationed in Denmark during World War II who warned the Jews of Denmark of their imminent deportation at the hands of the Nazis in 1943. This action saved almost the entire Jewish community.

He was born on September 29, 1904, in Bremen. After finishing commercial college, he pursued a career in the international coffee trade. He became a member of the Nazi Party in 1932, and in 1939 the Nazi Foreign Ministry assigned him to the German embassy in Copenhagen as an expert in maritime affairs.

When Germany occupied Denmark in April 1940 there were no immediate threats to the Danish Jewish community, but things seemed about to change in 1942 when a new Nazi plenipotentiary, Werner Best, was appointed to Denmark. Best, a former deputy chief of the Gestapo and hard-core Nazi ideologue, had previously been known for his ruthlessness in planning a new Europe on racial lines. After his appointment to Denmark, however, he chose at first to retain a policy of moderation.

In August 1943, after an increase in resistance activity, a state of emergency was declared across Denmark, paving the way for the Nazis to move against the country's Jews. In September Adolf Hitler approved their deportation, with the operation to commence at 10:00 p.m. on October 1, 1943. Two German passenger ships were ready to move approximately 5,000 Jews to Germany, while buses would take the remaining 2,500. The destination of all was to be Theresienstadt.

Duckwitz learned from Best of the deportation plans on September 11, 1943. In a state of shock, he flew to Berlin two days later to try to have them stopped, though he was, predictably, unsuccessful. Two weeks later he flew to Stockholm and contacted Prime Minister Per Albin Hansson with the request that Sweden receive Jewish refugees from Denmark should they be smuggled across the Øresund. Two days later, Hansson responded in the affirmative.

Returning to Denmark on September 29, 1943, Duckwitz leaked news of the deportation order to a leading Danish Social Democrat, Hans Hedtoft, who later recalled that Duckwitz made his announcement in a state of “indignation and shame.” Hedtoft immediately warned Carl Bertelsmann Henriques, the head the Jewish community, and Rabbi Dr. Marcus Melchior, the acting chief rabbi of Denmark. They took immediate action and spread the warning, realizing that the deportation was to begin on the Jewish holy day of Rosh Hashanah. By October 2, when the Gestapo set out to implement their plans, there were practically no Jews left to deport.

In what became a national underground project, both the organized Danish resistance movement and everyday citizens worked to evacuate as many members of the Jewish community as could be located. Phone calls were placed, homes opened as safe houses, and Jews were spirited to hiding places in the countryside while arrangements were made to move them across the Sound. From all walks of life and in all parts of the country, Danes felt that the persecution of minorities was an intolerable breach of Danish culture.

Once the Jews were out of the gaze of the Nazis, a safe passage was arranged across the water to Sweden. While some were transported in large fishing boats, many others—individuals or families—were ferried to freedom in much smaller vessels, even rowboats. A mass escape thereby took place of more than 7,200 Jews and 700 of their non-Jewish relatives. Only 500 Jews, many of whom were elderly and sick, were caught and deported to Theresienstadt. Once in Sweden, the Jewish refugees remained protected by their Danish neighbors back home, who oversaw the protection of their property in their absence.

For those who had been captured and deported, the Danish government arranged for food, medicine, clothes, and other supplies to be delivered, and the government prevailed upon the Nazis to allow the Red Cross to regularly inspect their conditions. Although, tragically, there were some fatalities, by the end of the war most of those who had been captured returned to Denmark.

Once Duckwitz had tipped off the Jewish community and witnessed their rescue, he resumed work as Germany's maritime attaché to Denmark. He kept his head down for the rest of the war, conscious of the possibility of exposure to the Gestapo, and knowing full well that there would be severe consequences for him if he was caught—especially as he was a member of the Nazi Party himself. Certainly, the likelihood of death or a concentration camp, if caught, was ever present.

After the war, Duckwitz remained in the German Foreign Service and became West Germany's ambassador to Denmark between 1955 and 1958. Later he became ambassador to India, and in 1966 he was appointed secretary of state in West Germany's Foreign Office until retirement in 1970. On March 29, 1971, Yad Vashem recognized Georg Ferdinand Duckwitz as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his efforts to assist the Danish Jews in escaping to Sweden. He died on February 16, 1973.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Best, Werner; Denmark; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Lidegaard, Bo. Countrymen: The Untold Story of How Denmark's Jews Escaped the Nazis, of the Courage of their Fellow Danes, and of the Extraordinary Role of the SS. New York: Knopf, 2013.

Werner, Emmy E. A Conspiracy of Decency: The Rescue of the Danish Jews during World War II. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 2002.

Yahil, Leni. The Rescue of Danish Jewry: Test of a Democracy. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1969.

E

Eckart, Johann Dietrich

Referred to by Hitler as his “North Star,” Johann Dietrich Eckart had a tremendous influence both on Hitler and on the Nazi Party during the early years of the movement. One indication of Hitler’s regard for Eckart can be seen in the last two words of Hitler’s book, Mein Kampf (My Struggle). There, following the last sentence and standing alone, are the words “Dietrich Eckart.”

Eckart was born to a wealthy family on March 23, 1868, in Neumarkt, Bavaria. His mother died when he was 10 years old; his father when he was in his late twenties. After squandering much of the inheritance his father left him, and after studying law and later medicine, Eckart abandoned both to pursue a career as a poet, playwright, and journalist. He moved to Berlin in 1899, bringing with him his long-term morphine addiction, and for years he struggled while his plays were poorly received. In 1912, however, Eckart’s adaptation of Ibsen’s Peer Gynt, a play that ran for more than 600 performances in Berlin, restored his coffers and allowed him to make important social contacts that would ultimately work to Hitler’s advantage. Eckart’s version of the play has been called a “racial allegory,” in which Gynt symbolized the German Übermensch (superman) caught up in a heroic battle against the Jews.

Eckart’s concept of a “genius superman” portended what would become the role played by Hitler, first in the Nazi Party and later throughout the Third Reich. Eckart is also responsible for the concept of the Jewish “stab-in-the-back” (Dolchstoßlegende) that became the accepted explanation for Germany’s loss in World War I and served as one of the rationales for the Nazis’ treatment of the Jews.

Perhaps the most concrete of Eckart’s contributions to what we now know as the Nazi party was his co-founding of the German Workers’ Party (Deutsche Arbeiterpartei) in January 1919 with Anton Drexler, Alfred Rosenberg (who earlier worked with Eckart on an antisemitic periodical), Karl Harrer, and Gottfried Feder. It was through this that Eckart met Hitler. Eckart saw in Hitler the “German Messiah” that a group with which he was involved—the Thule Society—believed would lead Germany to its proper place of glory. Eckart and Hitler became close friends, with Eckart writing poems that extolled Hitler as a “super genius” and standing near Hitler when he spoke at rallies. In February 1920 the party changed its name to the National Socialist German Worker’s Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei), which soon became known as the Nazi Party due to the German pronunciation of the first two syllables of Nationalsozialistische.

Other contributions made by Eckart to the Nazi Party include his role as the first publisher of the Völkischer Beobachter (“People’s Observer”), the party paper that provided Hitler a daily platform to espouse the party’s policies and ideology. He also introduced Hitler to prominent people of Eckart’s acquaintance, whom Hitler in his early years would otherwise not have met.

Perhaps Eckart’s most lasting contribution was the discussions the two men had on issues and theories that helped form the ideological foundation on which the Nazi Party was built. Eckart shared his strong sense of nationalism—which was often seen in his poetry—and antisemitism with Hitler. He no doubt also shared his conviction—revealed in a book published soon after his death—that Hitler, alone among all others, saw the Jews' exodus from Egypt for what it really was: an escape after having failed to overthrow the pharaoh and his ruling clique. Thus, it was not only Nazi ideology that Eckart helped shape but also Hitler's self-image as the German savior.

Eckart participated with Hitler in the Beer Hall Putsch of November 1923, the failed attempt to overthrow the government of the Weimar Republic that resulted in the arrest of Hitler and, among others, Eckart. Soon thereafter, Eckart was released from prison due to failing health. He died on December 26, 1923. His memory was perpetuated, however, as, in addition to Hitler's honor to him at the end of Mein Kampf, his name was incorporated into the city name of his birthplace, and a monument was erected in his honor.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Mein Kampf; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Rosenberg, Alfred

Further Reading

Engelman, Ralph Max. Dietrich Eckart and the Genesis of Nazism. PhD dissertation, Ann Arbor (MI): UMI Press, 1971.
 Evens, Richard J. The Coming of the Third Reich. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Edelman, Marek

Marek Edelman was a leader of the Jewish fighters during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of 1943. It is unclear in which year he was born, though September 19, 1919, is the date quoted most often. Born in Homel (now Gomel, Belarus), he was an only son. Both his parents were socialists: his father, Natan, was a member of the Socialist Revolutionary Party, and his mother, Cecylia, was an activist in the Jewish Labor Bund. Orphaned by the time he had turned 14, he had already been thoroughly indoctrinated into socialist ways; as he grew to maturity, he became an active member of the Bund.

After Germany invaded Poland in September 1939, Edelman, barely 20, found himself herded into what became the Warsaw Ghetto. On July 22, 1942, the Nazis began deporting Jews from the ghetto at a rate of 6,000 a day. In response, Edelman and other young Jews—among them Mordecai Anielewicz—formed a resistance group determined to confront the Nazis. Comprised largely of youth groups that anticipated the Nazi intention to liquidate the ghetto entirely, they created what became known as the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB).

The ŻOB was a formation that united three usually incompatible groups: Zionists, communists, and Bundists, and given the ideological gulf separating them it proved difficult for ŻOB to mobilize the inhabitants of the ghetto for the struggle to come. Still, this did not hold Edelman back from trying to develop a viable and effective force. As an employee of the ghetto hospital, he was able each day to visit the Umschlagplatz—the square in Warsaw where the Nazis concentrated Jews for deportation to Treblinka—carrying passes authorizing him to take people who were too ill to travel off the trains. He took advantage of this to save fit younger Jews who could be recruited to fight.

By September 1942, after wholesale deportations had taken place, only 60,000 Jews remained. In advance of the anticipated confrontation, the ŻOB began acquiring whatever weapons it could obtain for a possible revolt—not, as Edelman said later, in order to defeat or destroy the Nazis, but to at least give those who were already doomed the opportunity to choose how they were to die.

On January 18, 1943, ŻOB fighters opened fire, forcing the Nazis to withdraw and suspend the remaining deportations. Then, when it seemed certain that the final liquidation of the ghetto was about to take place on the eve of Passover (April 19, 1943), the ŻOB struck. Firing from every vantage point, they forced the Germans onto the defensive and obliged them to retreat in what became the most extensive act of armed urban resistance in Nazi-occupied Europe.

The ŻOB could only muster 220 men and women as their fighting strength. This was ranged against Nazi units numbering a daily average of more than 2,000 troops, backed by tanks, artillery, and aircraft. The ghetto fighters were largely untrained, woefully underequipped, and lacking in food and clean water. Edelman led the medical teams assisting the wounded in a constant struggle to alleviate pain caused through gunfire, falling masonry, and, above all, burns after the Nazis decided to reduce the ghetto by fire.

When Anielewicz lost his life during the fighting at Miła 18 on May 8, Edelman—who had been one of three subcommanders—took over as leader of the ŻOB. Overall, the resistance struggle with the Germans lasted three weeks. While the fighters took some German lives and wounded many others, the Jewish losses were significantly greater—and this was to say nothing of the remaining civilian population, which was deported in the tens of thousands. As the fighting intensified, the Nazi military, led by General Jürgen Stroop, decided to clean out the ghetto block by block. Instead of fighting for the buildings, Stroop ordered that they be burned, leaving the remaining fighters with nowhere to turn for cover.

The scorched-earth tactics worked. The remnants of the ŻOB—only about 50, by most estimates—fled through Warsaw’s sewers with the help of couriers from the Polish underground outside the ghetto. Edelman then joined the left-wing People’s Army (Armia Ludowa), fighting alongside the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa) in the equally ill-fated Warsaw Uprising that began in August 1944. After the failure of the Warsaw Uprising, Edelman and other ŻOB fighters hid in the ruins of the city before being rescued and evacuated.

After the war Edelman elected to remain in Poland, where he studied at Łódź Medical School. Upon graduation, he specialized in cardiology and became one of Poland’s leading heart specialists. He maintained an active interest in issues relating to social justice and workers’ rights, and in 1976 became an activist with the Workers’ Defense Committee. He was an early member of the Solidarity free labor union movement, and was among those interned when General Wojciech Jaruzelski declared martial law in 1981. Following the fall of communism in Poland in 1989, Edelman became a member of various centrist and liberal parties.

In recognition of his activities as a fighter against Nazism, Edelman was awarded Poland’s highest decoration, the Order of the White Eagle, on April 17, 1998. Before his death in 2009 at age 90, Marek Edelman was recognized by all as the last surviving leader of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and a hero to the memory of those who fought back during the Holocaust.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Anielewicz, Mordecai; Resistance Movements; Stroop, Jürgen; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising

Further Reading

Ainsztein, Reuben. Jewish Resistance in Nazi-Occupied Eastern Europe: With a Historical Survey of the Jew as Fighter and Soldier in the Diaspora. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.
Edelman, Marek. The Ghetto Fights. London: Bookmarks, 2013.

Krall, Hanna. Shielding the Flame: An Intimate Conversation with Dr. Marek Edelman, the Last Surviving Leader of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. New York: Henry Holt, 1986.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Edmonds, Roddie

Roddie Edmonds was an American infantry soldier in World War II who was recognized by Israel’s Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his efforts in rescuing Jewish servicemen at the Stalag IXA POW Camp in Germany. Born in Knoxville, Tennessee, on August 20, 1919, Master Sergeant Roddie Edmonds of the United States 422nd Infantry Regiment participated in the landing of U.S. forces in Europe and was taken prisoner by the Germans during the Battle of the Bulge on December 17, 1944. He was interned at Stalag IXA, a POW camp near Ziegenhain, in Germany’s Rhineland. As the senior noncommissioned officer, the 25-year-old Edmonds was responsible for the camp’s 1,275 American prisoners of war.

In an exchange in January 1945, the camp commandant, a Major Siegmann, ordered Edmonds to tell only the Jews among the American soldiers to attend the next morning’s Appell, or roll call. They would then be separated from the other prisoners, in line with a practice that had been adopted by the German army on the Eastern Front, where many Jewish POWs were sent to extermination camps or murdered. Siegmann gave his order in English, so that there could be no doubt what was required of Edmonds.

Instead, the next morning Edmonds ordered all 1,275 American prisoners, Jews and non-Jews alike, to assemble outside their barracks. When Siegmann saw all the inmates reporting, he exclaimed, “They cannot all be Jews!” Edmonds replied, “We are all Jews,” and, citing the Geneva Convention on the treatment of prisoners of war, which ruled that they were only obliged to provide their name, rank, and serial number, he refused to identify any prisoners by religion.

At this, Siegmann became enraged, and in a fury he pulled out his pistol and placed it against Edmonds’s head, demanding that he identify the Jewish soldiers under his command. Defying the threat of imminent death, Edmonds told Siegmann, “If you shoot, you’ll have to shoot us all,” and that, should any of Edmonds’s men be harmed, the commandant would be prosecuted for war crimes once the war ended. Major Siegmann, realizing he was at an impasse, backed down; turning around, he left the scene.

Roddie Edmonds’s act of defiance on that January day in 1945 spared the lives of as many as 200 American Jewish soldiers under his command. He then survived the next 100 days of captivity and returned home after the war. He never told his family of his actions. Master Sergeant Roddie Edmonds died on August 8, 1985, in his home town of Knoxville, Tennessee.

On February 10, 2015, he was posthumously acknowledged by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his action in January 1945. It was recognized that his choices and behavior set an example for his fellow American soldiers, for, at the risk of his immediate death, he defied the Germans with the unexpected consequences that the Jewish prisoners were saved. He became the first American soldier and one of only five Americans to be recognized by Yad Vashem. He joined Varian Fry, Waitstill and Martha Sharp, and Lois Gunden in the honor. Then, on January 27, 2016, a ceremony was held at the Israeli embassy in Washington, D.C. The Israeli ambassador to the United States, Ron Dermer, and Yad Vashem Council Chairman Rabbi Israel Meir Lau presented the medal of the Righteous and a certificate of honor to Roddie Edmonds's son Chris. The ceremony was attended by the president of the United States, Barack Obama.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.

Yad Vashem. <http://yad-vashem.blogspot.com/2015/12/my-father-kept-cape-in-his-closet.html>.

Eichmann, Adolf

Adolf Eichmann is one of history's most notorious figures. As Nazi Germany's head of the Gestapo's Department IV B4, he planned and carried out the Nazis' so-called Final Solution—the murder of 6 million Jews in what would become known as the Holocaust.

Eichmann was born on March 19, 1906, in Solingen, Germany, near Cologne. His family moved to Austria, and he grew up in Linz, the city of Adolf Hitler's youth. Eichmann failed in his attempt to become an engineer, so he went to work for a mining company his father owned and later took a sales position with an American company, Vacuum Oil. In 1932 Eichmann joined the Austrian Nazi Party but a year later moved to Germany. In 1934 he joined the SS and was assigned to work at Dachau, the first Nazi concentration camp. Later that year he went to work for Reinhard Heydrich in the Security Service (SD) of the SS.

Eichmann first worked on files concerning members of the Freemasons, also persecuted by the Nazis, but quickly became an expert on Jewish matters. He headed the SD's Scientific Museum of Jewish Affairs and in 1937 traveled to Palestine to explore the possibility of transporting Germany's Jews to the Middle East. Following the Austrian Anschluss (union with Germany), Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler appointed Eichmann head of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna. It was there that Eichmann established the process of extortion of Jews who were desperate to escape the Third Reich.

In 1939 he was recalled to Berlin and appointed head of the newly created Gestapo Section IV B4, with responsibility for Jewish policy throughout what would eventually be 16 Nazi-controlled European countries. With the early German successes in Western Europe in the summer of 1940, he first proposed a mass emigration of Jews to the island of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean, but the Madagascar plan was considered impractical. When Hitler attacked the Soviet Union in the summer of 1941, however, Eichmann sent special killing squads of SS (known as Einsatzgruppen) to begin murdering the millions of East European Jews who fell under Nazi control.

Even this was not efficient enough, however, and in January 1942 Eichmann helped organize the Wannsee Conference to coordinate the mass extermination of all 11 million Jews calculated to be living at Europe at that time. The result was a string of death camps, including Auschwitz, Treblinka, and others, that would process, rob, gas, and cremate tens of thousands of human beings every day. Eichmann personally oversaw the massive logistical operation of rounding up, transporting, murdering, and disposing of millions of Jews. He was a very efficient bureaucrat who complained about delays caused by the lack of zeal in some of the occupied zones. Eichmann actually continued the terrible work unabated during the final months of the war, when transport and other military resources were desperately needed for the defense of the Third Reich.

At the end of the war in 1945 Eichmann was arrested and interned by occupying U.S. forces, but he soon escaped. He hid for a time in Germany, but in 1950 escaped to Argentina, which had a sizable population of German expatriates where Eichmann could feel comfortable. In 1952 he even sent money home to allow his family to emigrate. By the mid-1950s he was settled in Buenos Aires and working as a foreman in the Argentine Mercedes-Benz factory.

The revelations of the Nuremberg Trials following the war made Eichmann the most infamous Nazi still at large, and war-criminal hunters—particularly, though not exclusively, from Israel—were determined to bring him to justice. In 1959 the Israeli intelligence service, the Mossad, learned that Eichmann was living in Buenos Aires under the name Ricardo Klement. Following months of observation and planning, in May 1960 Mossad agents kidnapped him and smuggled him back to Israel. Despite the protests (from prominent American newspapers as well as the Argentine government) of the breach of Argentine sovereignty, Eichmann went on trial in Jerusalem as a war criminal.

Eichmann was charged on 15 counts—eight for crimes against the Jewish people, four for crimes against other groups, and one each for membership in the SS, the SD, and the Gestapo, all of which had been declared illegal organizations at Nuremberg. During his four-month televised trial in the summer of 1961, more than 100 witnesses testified against him. Eichmann sat inside a bulletproof glass booth in the courtroom and did not deny the facts. Like the other Nazis who preceded him at Nuremberg, he simply claimed he was following orders. He testified: “It was my misfortune to become entangled in these atrocities. However, these misdeeds did not happen according to my wishes. It was not my wish to slay people. The guilt for the mass murder is solely that of the political leaders.” The court found him guilty on all 15 counts and sentenced him to death on December 15, 1961. Eichmann was hanged at Israel’s Ramleh Prison on May 31, 1962.

CURTIS COLE

See also: Al-Husseini, Haj Amin; Banality of Evil; Central Office for Jewish Emigration; Conspiracy; Dannecker, Theodor; Desk Killers; Eichmann in Jerusalem; Eichmann Trial; Final Solution; Gestapo; Kasztner, Resz6; Lubetkin, Zivia; Müller, Heinrich; Nisko Plan; Nuremberg Trials; Rademacher, Franz; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Szálasi, Ferenc; Vel’ d’Hiv Roundup; Wannsee Conference; Wiesenthal, Simon

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Cesarani, David. Eichmann: His Life and Crimes. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 2004.

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Stangneth, Bettina. Eichmann before Jerusalem: The Unexamined Life of a Mass Murderer. New York: Knopf, 2014.

Yablonka, Hannah. The State of Israel vs. Adolf Eichmann. New York: Schocken Books, 2004.

Arendt and first published in book form in 1963. The work covers the trial for war crimes of the infamous Nazi SS officer Adolf Eichmann, which took place in Israel in 1961. Arendt, a Jew who had fled Nazi-occupied Europe in 1941, was commissioned by The New Yorker magazine to cover the sensational trial and write a detailed article on it; the book emerged from that article. At the time, Arendt’s conclusions about Eichmann and the Holocaust upended the more traditional interpretations of Holocaust perpetrators, which tended to portray them unerringly as evil, depraved, and psychopathic individuals.

Arendt, having viewed all stages of the trial, having listened to hours of Eichmann’s testimony, and having read all pretrial material, including the reports of Eichmann’s mental state by six different psychologists, concludes that Eichmann was neither inherently evil nor psychopathic. In fact, she asserts, he presented himself as a rather ordinary individual who demonstrated no inherent hatred toward Jews or guilt for the deplorable acts that took place on his watch and as a result of his orders. Eichmann had been primarily responsible for carrying out the Holocaust because he oversaw the rounding up and deportation of Jews to concentration camps beginning in the early 1940s.

Eichmann claimed at trial that he was simply doing his job and following orders; Arendt, however, counters that as a human being, Eichmann had a choice—he could have refused to follow orders or left Germany if he believed that doing so would be a threat to his life. Moral decisions, she insists, are always available, even in a totalitarian atmosphere like Nazi Germany. She further argues that Eichmann’s apparent lack of antisemitism and his nonchalance toward Nazi ideology made the evil he unleashed seem “banal” because there appeared to be no psychological or moral explanations for it. And the fact that he felt no responsibility or guilt after the fact compounded that banality.

Arendt also drew her own careful psychological study of Eichmann in her attempt to understand his motivations (or lack thereof). She asserts that he was unable to think for himself and was unable to connect and communicate with others outside a military setting. This rendered him more immune to the moral consequences of Nazi policies and made it easier for him to carry out the Final Solution. Eichmann was also a chronic “joiner,” meaning that he could only define himself within the milieu of the many organizations to which he belonged, including the Nazi Party. She also ably demonstrates that Eichmann was not a bright man intellectually, which may have predisposed him to participate in activities that most people would have found repugnant. In the end,

Eichmann in Jerusalem

Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil is a book written by the celebrated political philosopher Hannah however, Arendt concludes that even though Eichmann appeared “normal” on the exterior, his complete willingness to follow morally repugnant orders indicated his exceptional inclination toward evil, not because it was ingrained in him, but because he chose not to recognize evil acts even as he carried them out. Eichmann was found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed in 1962.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Arendt, Hannah; Banality of Evil; Eichmann, Adolf; Eichmann Trial

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. Rev. ed. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Roskies, David G., and Naomi Diamant. Holocaust Literature: A History and Guide. Waltham (MA): Brandeis University Press, 2013.

Eichmann Trial

The trial for war crimes of Nazi German official Adolf Eichmann, held in Israel from April 11 to December 11, 1961. Before and during World War II, Eichmann had been chiefly responsible for the mass deportation of Jews from Germany as well as other parts of Europe to concentration and extermination camps. He carefully planned each step in the process and was also responsible for the deportation of thousands of Roma, many of whom were also exterminated. In the immediate aftermath of the war, Eichmann eluded capture, eventually settling in Austria under a pseudonym. Later, he fled Europe entirely, taking up residence in Argentina, where he took the name Ricardo Klement. On May 11, 1961, Israeli Security Service agents captured Eichmann and took him to Israel, where he was to stand trial for war crimes and crimes against the Jewish people. He arrived in Israel on May 21.

After World War II, Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi officer instrumental in organizing the Nazi “final solution” of the Jewish people, fled from Austria and made his way to Argentina. In May 1960 Israeli Security Service agents seized Eichmann and took him to Jerusalem for trial in an Israeli court, where he testified from a bulletproof glass booth. The trial brought Nazi atrocities to the forefront of world news for an entirely new generation. (Library of Congress)

Israel's attorney general, Gideon Hausner, drew up a 15-charge indictment against Eichmann, which not only accused him of crimes against humanity and the Jewish people but also membership in criminal organizations, including the Gestapo. The trial, which generated international attention, began in the district court in Jerusalem on April 11, 1961. A three-judge panel headed by Moshe Landau, an Israeli Supreme Court justice, presided. Hausner was the principal prosecutor. Eichmann's defense attorney was Robert Servatius, who had served as a defense counsel during the 1945–1946 war crimes trials held at Nuremberg, Germany.

The trial featured more than 100 witnesses for the prosecution, many of whom were Holocaust survivors. They included the writer Yehiel Dinur, who became so emotional during his testimony that he fainted, and Zivia Lubetkin, a famed Jewish ghetto resister. The prosecution also admitted into evidence some 1,500 documents that substantiated the charges against Eichmann as well as much of the testimony of the witnesses. Practically all of the defense witnesses were former high-ranking Nazi officials who had been granted immunity from prosecution. The trial ended on August 14, at which time the judges secluded themselves to deliberate. On December 11, 1961, the judges found Eichmann guilty on all counts.

The three-judge panel sentenced Eichmann to death on December 15, 1961. Eichmann's defense team immediately filed appeal petitions. Among other things, they asserted that Israel did not have a right to try Eichmann, who was not an Israeli citizen; that the judges were biased; that the charges were based on ex post facto laws; that Eichmann was merely "following orders"; and that Eichmann had been illegally abducted from Argentina. All of the bases for the appeals were rejected. Eichmann also appealed for clemency with Israel's president. That motion was also denied. On June 1, 1962, Eichmann was executed by hanging at an Israeli prison in Ramla, Israel.

The Eichmann trial not only brought to the international forefront the horrors of the Holocaust but also encouraged greater openness among Israelis to discuss the Holocaust and what it meant for Jews and humanity as a whole. Indeed, many Holocaust survivors were more willing to open up about their experiences.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Arendt, Hannah; Banality of Evil; Dinur, Yehiel; Eichmann, Adolf; Eichmann in Jerusalem; Nuremberg Defense

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Brager, Bruce L. The Trial of Adolf Eichmann: The Holocaust on Trial. San Diego (CA): Lucent Books, 1999.

Lipstadt, Deborah E. The Eichmann Trial. New York: Schocken Books, 2011.

Yablonka, Hannah. The State of Israel vs. Adolf Eichmann. New York: Schocken Books, 2004.

Eicke, Theodor

German Waffen-SS general. Born in Hampond in Alsace (then in Germany) on October 17, 1892, Theodor Eicke fought in World War I, rising to sub-paymaster. After the war, he joined the border police and served in the Freikorps before entering the police force in Thuringia in 1920. Active in right-wing politics, Eicke joined the National Socialist Party in December 1928. He initially achieved prominence in Adolf Hitler's Third Reich as a member of the SS, serving as commandant of the Dachau concentration camp in 1933 and 1934 and as inspector of concentration camps and leader of SS guard formations between 1934 and 1939. Eicke played a leading role in the Blood Purge of the party (known colloquially as the Night of the Long Knives), when he and a subordinate shot to death storm troop (SA) leader Ernst Röhm on July 1, 1934.

Eicke set ruthless standards in the concentration camps, warning guards that they would be punished for showing any compassion for the inmates. He centralized SS control over all concentration camps in the Reich, established uniform regulations for the treatment of inmates, and organized the elite guard formations known as the Totenkopfverbände (Death's Head units). He also oversaw their expansion into five battalions, which became the Obeybayern, Brandenburg, and Thuringian regiments. With the beginning of World War II, he formed the SS Death's Head unit for service in Poland.

In November 1939 Eicke took command of the first SS-Totenkopf division, a motorized unit and one of three original Waffen-SS divisions. He personally led it in combat in both France and the Soviet Union. Brutal, fanatical, and violently antisemitic, Eicke molded the Death's Head Division in his own image, a development that helps explain both its military effectiveness and its perpetration of numerous atrocities. His unit committed the first SS atrocity in France—the May 27, 1940, murder of 100 British prisoners of war at Le Paradis. In Operation Barbarossa, the invasion of the Soviet Union, his division served with Army Group North.

Eicke died when an aircraft in which he was flying was shot down behind Soviet lines in Michailovka, Ukraine, on February 26, 1943.

BRUCE J. DEHART

See also: Concentration Camps; Dachau; Glücks, Richard; SS-Totenkopfverbände; Waffen-SS; Wilde-KZ

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Einsatzgruppen

The Einsatzgruppen were special extermination squads that followed the advance of the German Army into areas to be occupied, most notably Poland, beginning in September 1939, and the Soviet Union, beginning in June 1941. Most of these mobile killing squads were composed of Nazi SS, Gestapo, and special police units.

In Poland, between 1939 and 1941, the squads were primarily responsible for rounding up Jews, communists, and Polish dissidents and placing them into ghettos (segregated areas) or concentration camps. However, after the German invasion of the Soviet Union commenced on June 22, 1941, the Einsatzgruppen's activities increased dramatically, and their primary mission became one of mass extermination, chiefly of Soviet Jews, communists, political commissars, and Roma. Although many think of the Holocaust only in terms of the systematized extermination of Jews and others at Nazi death camps, the fact is that many were killed in or near their home towns or villages by the Einsatzgruppen. It is estimated that mobile killing squads murdered as many as 1.3 million people between 1939 and 1945.

Einsatzgruppen were SS paramilitary mobile death squads responsible for mass killings, primarily by shooting, during World War II. They played an integral role in the implementation of the killing phase of the Holocaust in Eastern European territories conquered by Nazi Germany. The Einsatzgruppen also murdered Soviet political commissars and Roma, and engaged in anti-partisan warfare. One of the worst of the many massacres they perpetrated was at Babi Yar in 1941, pictured here. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

HOLOCAUST: EINSATZGRUPPEN AKTIONEN IN EASTERN EUROPE

The killing squads followed close on the heels of advancing German Army troops, moving into towns and villages rapidly and heavily armed to take the civilian population by surprise. Once the victims were identified and rounded up, they were usually stripped of all their possessions, including their clothing, marched into a field, cemetery, or other open area, shot to death, and buried in shallow mass graves. Many of the victims included women and children. In places like Ukraine, Lithuania, and Latvia, the killing squads were aided by non-Jews and others not targeted by the Nazis. Perhaps the worst single atrocity occurred at Babi Yar (Ukraine) during September 29–30, 1941, when some 34,000 Jews were shot to death. By December 1, 1941, one killing squad reported having killed 137,346 Jews in Lithuania alone.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Babi Yar Massacre; Belarus; Communists in the Holocaust; Final Solution; German Army, Role in the Holocaust; Heydrich, Reinhard; Hitler's Willing Executioners; Holocaust by Bullets; Kappler, Herbert; Kommissarbefehl; Lange, Herbert; Latvia; Lithuania; Lubny Massacre; Müller, Heinrich; Nazi

Criminal Orders, 1941; Nisko Plan; Ohlendorf, Otto; Operation Barbarossa; Ponary Forest; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Schmid, Anton; Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard; Sicherheitsdienst; Soviet Union; Ukraine; Vilna Ghetto; Waffen-SS

Further Reading

- Browning, Christopher. Ordinary Men: Reserve Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. New York: Harper Perennial, 1993.
- Desbois, Patrick. The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest's Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.
- Goldhagen, Daniel J. Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust. New York: Vintage, 1997.
- Rhodes, Richard. Masters of Death: The SS-Einsatzgruppen and the Invention of the Holocaust. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Enabling Act, 1933

On March 24, 1933, the German Reichstag passed the Enabling Act, a constitutional amendment that gave the German Cabinet—in effect, Chancellor Adolf Hitler—plenary powers to enact laws. It followed one month after the Reichstag Fire Decree, which abolished most civil liberties and transferred state powers to the Reich government. The combined effect of the two laws was to transform Hitler's government into a de facto legal dictatorship.

The final two years of the Weimar Republic were unstable: political, social, and economic crises were frequent. President Paul von Hindenburg issued many emergency decrees and dissolved the Reichstag twice in 1932, during which period the National Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) transformed from a radical splinter group to a party of government. In the two elections to the Reichstag in 1932 the NSDAP won the largest share of the vote. On January 30, 1933, Hindenburg appointed Hitler chancellor, placing him at the head of a coalition cabinet comprising conservatives, nationalists, members of the NSDAP, and representatives of the German National People's Party (DNVP).

On February 27, 1933, the Reichstag Fire was allegedly started by 24-year-old Dutch communist Marinus van der Lubbe. Hindenburg accepted Hitler's request following the fire for a decree suspending all political and civil liberties as a "temporary" measure for the "protection of the people and state." The subsequent Reichstag Fire Decree, enacted the following day, severely curtailed fundamental rights and subjected the police largely to the control of the national government. This created all manner of opportunities for the persecution and elimination of political opponents, which the police and the so-called auxiliary police forces formed by the SA and SS exploited to the full. Blaming the communists, Hitler had all political opponents rounded up and put into "protective custody" (Schutzhaft). This temporary measure was never revoked.

In March 1933 the last parliamentary elections took place. The SA, using violence and intimidation, silenced all other parties. The Nazis polled 44% of the vote, not enough for a majority but enough to quash any future political resistance.

Hitler then proposed the "Act for the Removal of the Distress of the People and the Reich," more commonly known as the Enabling Act (Ermächtigungsgesetz), ostensibly to allow him greater time to deal with political unrest. This act, consisting of only five articles, vested the government of the Reich with almost unlimited powers to enact laws, even in cases where the legislation encroached on core provisions of the constitution.

Just before the vote, Hitler made a speech to the Reichstag in which he pledged to use restraint and to use those powers only insofar as they were essential for carrying out vitally necessary measures. He also promised an end to unemployment and pledged to promote peace with France, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union. But in order to do all this, Hitler said, he first needed the Enabling Act.

Since the act entailed an amendment to the Weimar Constitution, its adoption required both a two-thirds majority and the presence in the Reichstag of at least two-thirds of all its members. The prospects of achieving the requisite number of votes were good, since the mandates of the 81 deputies from the Communist Party of Germany had been rescinded under the Reichstag Fire Decree. Moreover, many Reichstag members had already fled, been imprisoned, or murdered.

The Reichstag convened in the Kroll Opera House, Berlin. After eliminating the communists, Hitler was still 31 votes short. The support of the German Center Party was particularly important to secure the remaining votes. Hitler and his interior minister, Wilhelm Frick, gave the Center Party far-reaching guarantees on the continuing existence of the supreme organs of the constitution and the states, and promised to respect the rights of the churches, to safeguard fundamental rights, and to establish a parliamentary committee to scrutinize legislative bills. With these promises (most of which were never honored), the government gained the parliamentary support it required.

Only the deputies from the Social Democratic Party voted against the bill as a bloc, in spite of massive intimidation by the SA and SS, whose troops had moved in to surround the Kroll Opera House. The chairman of the SPD parliamentary group, Otto Wels, combined the explanation of his group's rejection of the Enabling Act with a passionate profession of faith in parliamentary democracy. In spite of the clear depiction of the intended consequences of the act, a mere 94 deputies voted against the bill compared with 444 who voted in favor. The Enabling Act passed on March 24, 1933, and was signed by Hindenburg later that day.

The adoption of the act enabled Hitler's government to enact laws without the consent of the Reichstag, which continued to exist, and without the countersignature of the president. These extensive powers also applied, almost without restriction, to constitutional amendments and to treaties with other states.

The act thus marked the final eclipse of the democratic state based on the rule of law and the abolition of parliamentary democracy. There would be neither further elections nor a constitution to keep Hitler in check. The Reichstag had, in effect, voted away its power.

All subsequent legislation of the Nazi state was based on the Enabling Act. It served to centralize the public administration, the judiciary, the security apparatus, and the armed forces in accordance with the “Führer principle,” to standardize political life in accordance with National Socialist principles (Gleichschaltung) by banning political parties and mass organizations, and to abolish freedom of the press. The concentration of power in the hands of the government, and hence in the person of Adolf Hitler, sealed the transition to dictatorship.

Within three months after the passage of the Enabling Act, all parties except the Nazi Party were banned or pressured into dissolving themselves, followed on July 14, 1933, by a law that made the Nazi Party the only legally permitted party in the country.

Within a matter of weeks it had become illegal to criticize the government. A new secret police force was established, the Gestapo, which immediately began arresting “unreliable” persons. Dachau, the first concentration camp, which opened within weeks of the Nazis coming to power, catered for their custody. Trade unions were banned, freedom of the press curtailed, and all other political parties were declared illegal, leaving only the Nazi Party. Germany had become a one-party state with Hitler its dictator.

The Enabling Act was initially adopted for a four-year period but was extended in 1937, 1939, and 1943. It remained the basis of all legislation throughout the Nazi dictatorship and was finally abolished after the capitulation by Law No 1 of the Allied Control Council on September 20, 1945.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Frick, Wilhelm; Führerprinzip; Gleichschaltung; Sondergericht; Sturmabteilung; Volksgerichtshof; Weimar Republic

Further Reading

Broszat, Martin. The Hitler State: The Foundation and Development of the Internal Structure of the Third Reich. London: Longmans, 1981.

Evans, Richard J. The Coming of the Third Reich. New York: Penguin Press, 2003.

Estonia

Estonia is a small Baltic country with a 1939 population of 1.13 million people, of whom about 4,500 were Jewish. Estonia was an independent state from 1920, although it would be continually overshadowed by its much larger neighbor, the Soviet Union, to its immediate east. In August 1939 the Germans and Soviets sealed Estonia’s fate by agreeing in secret that Estonia would fall under the aegis of the Soviet Union in the forthcoming war. When Germany invaded Poland the next month, sparking World War II, the Soviets began to pressure the Estonians into acquiescing to their demands, including a mutual assistance agreement, which Estonian officials grudgingly signed. By June 17, 1940, the Soviets had occupied Estonia, and in August they annexed it completely. The Soviets wasted no time in imposing a repressive occupation regime, arresting thousands and deporting many to rural gulags within the Soviet Union. Estonian Jews did not escape Soviet clutches.

At the time, nearly half of Estonia’s small Jewish population lived in the capital city of Tallinn. This made it easier for Soviet occupation authorities to single them out. Many Jewish organizations and synagogues were disbanded, which compelled at least half the Jewish population to flee the country. When the Germans invaded the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, Estonia was quickly overrun, and a brutal occupation was established. The Nazi authorities compelled Jews to wear identification badges in public, restricted their movements, and confiscated their money and property. By late 1941 virtually all of the remaining Jewish population in Estonia had either been murdered or deported to death camps.

The Germans began establishing forced labor camps in Estonia during 1942; most of these were set aside for thousands of Jews sent from other areas of Europe. There they worked on German military projects, or mined shale oil. The largest of these camps was Vaivara, where untold thousands of Jews died; many more were killed at the Kalevi Liiva camp system. By late 1944, when Soviet forces had begun to push the Germans out of Estonia, the Germans abandoned these camps and transported some of the remaining prisoners to other camps further west. Several thousand Jews died on a ghastly forced march along the Baltic Sea coast. In the meantime, Estonia had become a bloody battleground between Soviet and German forces, which destroyed huge swaths of the small nation.

In the fall of 1944 the Soviets re-annexed Estonia, and the little country would remain under the Soviet yoke until the end of the Cold War. Estonia lost approximately 20% of its prewar population. Sadly, almost no Jews living in Estonia prior to 1941 remained alive in 1945. Some Jews who had managed to flee the country before the German occupation returned after the conflict, but their number was small. Estonia achieved independence for a second time in August 1991.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Soviet Union; Vaivara

Further Reading

Butta, Prit. Between Giants: The Battle for the Baltics in World War II. Oxford: Osprey, 2013.

Raun, Toivo. Estonia and the Estonians. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1987.

Weiss-Wendt, Anton. Murder without Hatred: Estonians and the Holocaust. Syracuse (NY): Syracuse University Press, 2009.

Ethnic Cleansing

Ethnic cleansing is a broad concept that encompasses actions ranging from nonviolent pressure on a specific ethnic group or groups to the deliberate extermination of a people to effect their removal from a particular place; it is distinguished from genocide in that the ultimate goal is not the destruction of its victims but rather their complete removal from a specific area. Ethnic cleansing can be accomplished through genocide, but not all cleansings are genocides.

Like the term “genocide,” the term “ethnic cleansing” is ambiguous and has a number of different meanings ascribed to it; in fact, the term is often misused as a synonym for genocide. Although the term was popularized in the 1990s during the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, antecedents exist in the Nazi use of the phrase “racial cleansing.” Ethnic cleansing lacks a standard legal definition as a war crime. As an activity, elements of it are encompassed within the definition of genocide in the 1948 United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

There is debate over whether or not ethnic cleansing is a strictly modern phenomenon. A number of premodern examples have been suggested: the events of the exodus in the Old Testament, Roman and Greek enslavement of enemy peoples, the devastation of Native Americans, the expulsion of Jews and Moors from Spain, and the English conquest of Ireland. Because the formulation of the term is ethnic cleansing, however, the phenomenon is usually regarded as a result of the spread of the concept of the nation-state in the 19th century. The ethnic character of a state defined it and was synonymous with “nation.” Ethnic minorities were thus seen as potentially disloyal and in need of assimilation. Some states turned to expulsion, such as the expulsion of Muslims from the newly independent Balkan states in 1831 and 1877–1878. European colonial powers also engaged in cleansing in their colonial possessions.

Technological changes allowed for greater organization and execution of ethnic cleansing in the 20th century, which facilitated greater lethality. Events in Anatolia overshadowed incidents of cleansing during the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913.

The Ottoman Empire, and its successor, the Republic of Turkey, feared that resident Armenians and Greeks were potentially disloyal, and that Greece and Russia would use their presence to advance claims on Turkish territory. The Turks thus expelled approximately 1.5 million Armenians in 1915, half of whom died during the expulsion, and 1.5 million Greeks during and after the Greco-Turkish War of 1921–1922. Quixotically, the response of the League of Nations was less to regard ethnic cleansing itself as a crime than to attempt to regulate it as a necessary evil. While creating a system for minority protection, the League of Nations oversaw compulsory population transfers in the 1920s among countries such as Turkey, Greece, and Bulgaria.

Nazi German policies of redrawing both the political and ethnic maps of Europe utilized ethnic cleansing in the 1930s and 1940s. The Nazis, for example, pressured the Jews to leave Germany after 1933; after 1939, there was discussion of deporting all Jews from Europe. Beginning in 1941, Jews were slated for extermination, and some 6 million would be killed in the Holocaust. The Nazis targeted other ethnic groups, slating Roma for extermination as well as Poles, Ukrainians, and Russians for removal from conquered territories; however, the “cleansing” of Jews was unique in its importance to Nazi ideology. Similarly, the German-allied Independent State of Croatia sought to cleanse itself of Serbs, helping to drive the 1941–1945 civil war in Yugoslavia. Other German client states engaged in cleansing on a more limited scale.

The Soviet Union engaged in ethnic cleansing before and during World War II, shifting nearly a dozen groups of non-Russian nationalities perceived to be potentially disloyal away from its borders. Imperial Russia had deported Jews and Germans away from the front during World War I, but Soviet operations were more brutal. The forced resettlement of the Chechens-Ingush in 1944 killed 100,000 out of the 494,000 involved, and half the 189,000 Crimean Tatars resettled in 1944 also died.

The postwar expulsion of the Volksdeutsche, ethnic Germans living outside of Germany, proved to be the largest cleansing in history. Over 10 million were forced to relocate from Eastern Europe in 1944–1947, with perhaps a million killed in the process. The Soviets’ redrawing of borders led to forced resettlements of Poles from Ukraine and Ukrainians from Poland during 1946–1947. Allied leaders regarded such cleansing as necessary to remove future German territorial claims.

Cleansing also accompanied the end of the European colonial empires. Colonial borders had not been drawn along ethnic divisions, and conflict often emerged along ethnic lines in the new states. The worst case was the transfer of Muslim and Hindu populations between India and Pakistan in 1946–1947, with millions forced to relocate. Numerous lesser incidents occurred in both postcolonial civil wars and international conflicts. Claims of ethnic cleansing accompanied the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli Wars, as well as the Turkish intervention in Cyprus in 1974. Iraq relocated or destroyed Kurdish populations in sensitive border areas during the 1980–1988 Iran-Iraq War.

Ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1996 attracted widespread international attention. The wars in Croatia and Bosnia resulted in the deaths of some 250,000 people and a million forced relocations. All sides used cleansing as a deliberate weapon to reinforce claims to specific territories by driving out rival ethnicities. Although attention focused on the Serbian use of cleansing, hundreds of thousands of Serbs also became victims. These actions were repeated in the 1999 Kosovo conflict, during which Serbian security forces cleansed Albanians during the bombing campaign; Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) guerillas cleansed Serbs afterward.

Events in Rwanda in April 1994, which followed similar events in Burundi in 1972, are more complicated because the Hutu and Tutsi are not “ethnicities” in the strict European sense of the term. In its effects, however, the intentions were the same: the Hutus intended to drive Tutsis out of the country. At least 500,000 Tutsis died in the massacres, and the resulting war led to hundreds of thousands of Hutus fleeing to the Congo.

Ethnic cleansing in both Yugoslavia and Rwanda was frequently portrayed as the result of “ancient hatreds.” In each historical case, while ethnic tension did exist, the cleansing operations themselves were the result of deliberate manipulation and organization by political leaders. Ethnic cleansing possesses a political utility that has made it attractive in the past. It remains to be seen if international regulation will change this.

JAMES FRUSETTA

See also: Genocide; Madagascar Plan; Oberlaender, Theodor; Serbia; Ustashe

Further Reading

Bell-Fialkoff, Andrew. Ethnic Cleansing. Sydney: Palgrave Macmillan, 1999.

Lieberman, Benjamin. Terrible Fate: Ethnic Cleansing in the Making of Modern Europe. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2006.

Naimark, Norman M. Fires of Hatred: Ethnic Cleansing in Twentieth-Century Europe. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2002.

Power, Samantha. “A Problem from Hell”: America and the Age of Genocide. New York: Harper Perennial, 2007.

Eugenics

Eugenics is a term coined in the last years of the 19th century, originally referring to the improvement of human beings through selective breeding and the elimination of genetic characteristics deemed to be undesirable. These included—but were not limited to—hereditary diseases, intellectual disabilities, physical handicaps, and the like. At the time, the theories behind eugenics were supported by many scientists and social commentators, although the science that underwrote those theories was suspect and later found to be deeply flawed. In general, eugenics theories were not initially aimed at eliminating entire groups of people; rather, they were designed to minimize the number of persons born with certain “defects.” It was the Nazis who used the pseudoscience of eugenics to categorize “lesser peoples” by race and ethnic background, which was then used to justify the extermination of such people, including Jews and Roma, among others.

Over the years, Nazi adherents developed elaborate hierarchies based on race and ethnicity to fit their flawed theories involving “racial hygiene” and racial supremacy. This they accomplished largely by determinations of one’s ethnic heritage, or by bogus physical and anatomical determinations, including eye and hair color, height, shape of the skull and body, and so on. In Nazi thought, the so-called Aryan race, to which pure Germans belonged, was the “master race.” Beneath the master race were Indo-European-speaking peoples, who were deemed “partly Aryan.” Jews, along with blacks, Roma, Indians, and other peoples from the subcontinent and Asia were not considered Aryans and were thus undesirables. The Aryan ideal was a Nordic type—tall, with blond hair and blue eyes. Ironically, many Nazi leaders, including Adolf Hitler, did not fit this set of physical characteristics.

Hitler had read deeply in books and articles that discussed racial hygiene and eugenics, and so he had come to believe that many of Germany’s modern problems stemmed from the fact that the German people had been weakened by intermarriage between Aryans and non-Aryans and corrupted by the likes of the mentally and physically challenged and other individuals deemed undesirable. The answer to reversing this was to eliminate those who were categorized as non-Aryans, or who otherwise did not mesh with Nazi

Nazi Germany's racial ideology placed the biological improvement of the Aryan race at the center of all its social policies. The pseudo-science of eugenics saw to it that in this way a "master race" could be bred through selective breeding and the destruction of those with so-called "defective genes." An important part of the process was the application of scientific standards for the measuring of human imperfections. In this picture, for instance, Nazi officials use calipers to measure an ethnic German's nose. (Hulton-Deutsch Collection/Corbis via Getty Images) ideology concerning racial purity. Aryans were to be encouraged to mate only with other Aryans; the physically and mentally sound were encouraged to have more children while the racially inferior and weak were to be marginalized or eliminated. The German creation of Jewish ghettos and the ritual extermination of Jews, Roma, and homosexuals during the 1930s and early 1940s were thus logical extensions of the Nazi belief in eugenics.

These beliefs became the basis for government policies in Germany beginning with Hitler's ascent to office in 1933. That same year, the Nazis enacted a law that required all doctors to report all hereditary illnesses of their patients to the government; doctors who failed to comply were fined or prohibited from practicing medicine. Soon "Hereditary Health Courts" were established throughout Germany, and more than 400,000 German citizens were forcibly sterilized to ensure that they would not pass their "defective" genes to others. Some 70,000 others were killed as part of the so-called "euthanasia" program. Strict laws were passed regarding marriage, and all who sought marriage licenses were tested for hereditary and other diseases.

The infamous Nuremberg Laws, enacted in 1935, were based partly on eugenics and were designed to marginalize and ghettoize German Jews. They placed a great many prohibitions on Jews and served as the foundation for the horrors of the Holocaust during World War II.

Many of the eugenics beliefs that suffused Nazi ideology were absurd from both a logical and scientific perspective. Based on pseudoscience, deeply flawed social scientific analyses, and rabid bigotry—particularly antisemitism—eugenics played a major role in German social policies between 1933 and 1945 and most certainly drove policies that gave birth to the Holocaust. In addition to the physically and mentally infirm, Jews, and the Roma, homosexuals were also considered “defective” by the Nazis. As many as 100,000 homosexuals were arrested during 1933–1945, with about 50,000 serving prison sentences. At least 15,000 are thought to have died in Nazi concentration camps. In other parts of Europe, Nazi officials routinely castrated, imprisoned, or killed homosexuals.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Aryan; Euthanasia Program; Fischer, Eugen; Kaiser Wilhelm Institute; Medical Experimentation; Nuremberg Laws; Ploetz, Alfred; “Racial Hygiene”; Ritter, Robert; Roma and Sinti; Social Darwinism; Sterilization

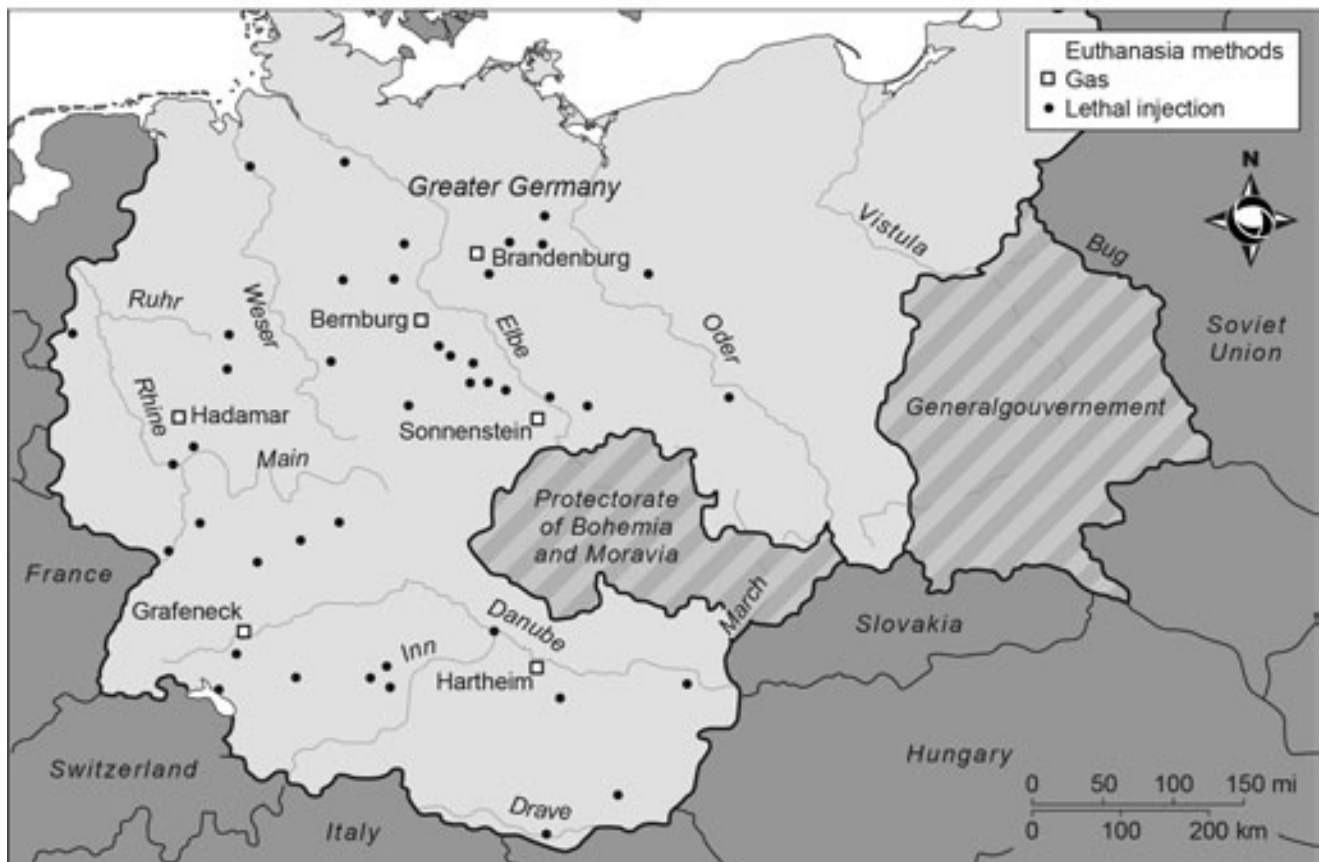

Further Reading

- Back, Les, and John Solomos (Eds.). Theories of Race and Racism: A Reader. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Herf, Jeffrey. The Jewish Enemy: Nazi Propaganda during World War II and the Holocaust. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2006.
- Kühl, Stefan. The Nazi Connection: Eugenics, American Racism, and German National Socialism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Peukert, Detlev. Inside Nazi Germany: Conformity, Opposition and Racism in Everyday Life. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1989.

Euthanasia Program

Hitler’s secret program to euthanize “life unworthy of life”—men, women, and children deemed mentally and physically ill or disabled. Initiated in October 1939 and headed by Reich Chancellery chief Philipp Bouhler and Dr. Karl Brandt, the program's original intention was the euthanization of disabled infants and young children, based on the pretext of the Knauer family's request to have their baby euthanized due to multiple birth defects. Before the program entered into action, however, Hitler authorized its expansion to euthanize disabled adults. The Reich Chancellery established several organizations such as the Reich Committee for the Scientific Registration of Severe Hereditary Ailments and the Reich Cooperative for State Hospitals and Nursing Homes, which provided an outwardly benign façade.

“EUTHANASIA” CENTERS IN GERMANY 1940–1945

Aktion T-4—the “T-4” coming from the address of its administrative headquarters at Tiergartenstrasse 4—was rooted in the larger clinical discussions of eugenics and racial hygiene in Europe and the United States at the turn of the 20th century. The Law for the Prevention of Offspring with Hereditary Diseases, passed in 1933, set a precedent for the T-4 program, requiring compulsory sterilization for Germans suffering from a hereditary disease. Over 300,000 people were sterilized under this law. Hitler's euthanasia program was a natural extension of racial hygiene and the product of increasingly radical Nazi policies.

Aktion T-4 was responsible for the death of approximately 250,000 mentally and physically disabled individuals. Of this, at least 5,000 were children. Questionnaires disseminated by the various front organizations to public and private clinics and institutions gathered information and functioned as the means of finding the program's victims. For children, killing centers were set up as specialized pediatric clinics catering to physically and mentally disabled adolescents. Once there, children received lethal injections or were simply starved to death. The Nazi assault on mentally and physically disabled adults began with those already institutionalized. Victims were transferred to one of the six killing centers—Brandenburg, Bernburg, Hadamar, Sonnenstein, Grafeneck, and Hartheim—where they were herded into fake showers and gassed with carbon monoxide. Their bodies were cremated and their remains sent to their families along with medical documents giving a fictitious cause of death. Although T-4 staff worked meticulously to conceal their actions, the rash of mysterious deaths among the mentally disabled quickly aroused the suspicion of families. Outrage and protest over these extralegal killings—voiced perhaps most famously by Catholic clergyman Clemens August Graf von Galen—gathered tremendous public pressure. In August 1941 Hitler officially halted the euthanasia program. Unofficially, however, the killings continued until the end of the Third Reich, only now executed in a decentralized and even more clandestine fashion with local physicians administering lethal injections.

Just as the sterilization law was a precursor to euthanasia, so too was Aktion T-4 for the “Final Solution,” marking the logical conclusion of Nazi radicalization. The killing centers, gas chambers, and crematoria that became hallmarks of the Holocaust were all developments, first, of Hitler's euthanasia program.

JASON C. ENGLE

See also: Brack, Viktor; Brandt, Karl; Einsatzgruppen; Eugenics; Franz, Kurt; Galen, Clemens August Graf von; Gas Vans; Gerstein, Kurt; Good; Hadamar; Hadamar Insane Asylum Case; Höppner, Rolf-Heinz; Kaiser Wilhelm Institute; Kreyssig, Lothar; Lange, Herbert; Lichtenberg, Bernhard; “Life Unworthy of Life”; Medical Experimentation; Nazism and Germany; Ploetz, Alfred; “Racial Hygiene”; Schlegelberger, Franz; Stangl, Franz; Stuckart, Wilhelm; Thierack, Otto; Wiedergutmachung; Wirth, Christian

Further Reading

- Aly, Götz, Peter Chroust, and Christian Pross. Cleansing the Fatherland: Nazi Medicine and Racial Hygiene. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.
- Freidlander, Henry. The Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution. Durham (NC): University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Peukert, Detlev. Inside Nazi Germany: Conformity, Opposition and Racism in Everyday Life. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Weindling, Paul. Victims and Survivors of Nazi Human Experiments: Science and Suffering in the Holocaust. London: Bloomsbury, 2015.

Evian Conference

The Evian Conference of July 6–15, 1938, was called in response to American president F. D. Roosevelt's invitation to the nations of the world to meet to discuss what had by now become a global refugee crisis. His motives in calling the conference appear to have emanated from his desire to deflect some sectors of American public opinion, which were beginning to lean toward a liberalization of immigration regulations. This deflection would take the form of a new organization to manage refugee resettlement. Inviting the nations of the world to participate in the formation of this organization would also show that the United States was playing a leading role in trying to find a solution to the refugee issue, and that the problem was not to be dumped onto any specific countries.

Roosevelt's initiative was not intended to compromise the existing policy of any country; none would have to make a commitment to receive refugee Jews. Yet the initiative was received cautiously, particularly by Switzerland. Roosevelt had hoped to locate his meeting in a Swiss city, the better to establish it as a legitimate gathering of a genuinely international kind. The Swiss refused to host the meeting, however, and so it was decided that a French city near the Swiss border would have to be chosen as the next best option in order to retain the internationalist spirit as far as possible.

The United States sought to convene a committee comprised of all interested countries for the purpose of “facilitating the emigration from Austria, and presumably from Germany, of political refugees.”

The plenary meeting of the conference took place on the morning of July 6, 1938. The French delegate, Henri Bérenger, took the chair as host in order to welcome representatives of the thirty-two nations who were attending. Speeches of welcome then followed from the American and British representatives (the former of whom, Myron C. Taylor, was elected president of the conference). The public formalities over, the conference then proceeded to hear statements from all the nations present. The representatives quickly got to the point, and it was not long before the gist of the Evian Conference was made clear: all countries understood the need for international cooperation, but in almost every instance it was pointed out that the opportunity for absorbing refugees was limited owing to economic conditions. The countries represented at Evian were unable, or unwilling, to agree to anything like mass migration. Some countries—particularly those from Latin America—indicated a willingness to accept agricultural refugees or those who could bring a degree of wealth with them; others agreed to consider plans for refugee settlement in rural colonies only. The inviting nation, the United States, did nothing more than publicly affirm its already existing annual quota of 27,370 Germans and Austrians, a figure that had to include nonrefugee German immigrants and non-Jewish refugees, as well as Jews.

The British government had misgivings about the whole conference, and much preferred to utilize the already existing League of Nations High Commission for Refugees. It was also wary about drawing too much attention to the refugee problem in case the representatives assembled at Evian began to make disquieting noises about Palestine as a Jewish haven. Indeed, British concern about the possibility of Palestine as a target area for mass Jewish migration led to an insistence on the part of the British delegation that the president of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, not be permitted to address the delegates, even privately. The issue of Palestine was one on which the British preferred to avoid discussion altogether. Consequently, the matter of British refugee policy took something of a back seat at the Evian Conference—though the British delegation head, Lord Winterton, was elected conference vice president.

The representative from Australia, Sir Thomas White, summed up the general tenor of many at the conference with the statement that “as we have no real racial problems, we are not desirous of importing one by encouraging any scheme of large-scale foreign migration.”

Once all the speeches had been made, the conference broke into two subcommittees, designated the Technical Subcommittee and the “Subcommittee for the Reception of Organizations Concerned with the Relief of Political Refugees coming from Germany (including Austria).” This latter subcommittee was established in order to accommodate the numerous refugee organizations, which were registered as participants at the conference but which could not take part in the general sessions. Myron Taylor, the president of the conference, invited the major organizations to amplify their views, if they so wished, and as a result some 39 organizations stepped forward to take advantage of the offer and to put forth their case.

With extreme haste, the subcommittee proceeded to hear the depositions of 25 of these organizations on the single afternoon of July 8. As time was limited, speed was of the essence. When members of the subcommittee began to grow weary, the period of 10 minutes per hearing was reduced to five. The depositions, moreover, had to be translated into French if not presented in that language, and consequently there was little enough time for a deposition to be heard before it was time to make way for the next organization.

The upshot of the subcommittee’s hearings was a distillation of all the memoranda presented into a single, three-page Synopsis, which was presented to the conference but which made no difference to its ultimate outcome.

The conference broke up on July 15, its main outcome being the establishment of a permanent organization in London, the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees. This convened on July 19.

In the long run, the existence of the Inter-Governmental Committee did not change the outcome for the Jews of Europe in the slightest. Attitudes such as those expressed by Australia’s Thomas White at Evian demonstrated to Hitler that the Jews he did not want were also unwanted throughout the rest of the world, an argument that was clearly apparent to perceptive observers at the time. The tragedy is that while all saw the dangers of inaction—and that, after all, was the ostensible reason for Roosevelt's calling of the meeting in the first place—none were prepared to put their words of sympathy into practice. The Evian Conference clearly demonstrated that the nations of the world did not yet fully understand the implications of what was happening in Germany in any terms other than their own.

On one level, it is not surprising that Evian saw no grand commitments to refugee acceptance: that had never been part of Roosevelt's proposal when calling the meeting back in March. It will be recalled, for example, that the original invitation indicated how no country would be expected to receive a greater number of immigrants than was already permitted by its existing legislation, which was an attractive reason for attendance in the eyes of many of the attending countries. It was perhaps an optimistic hope, then, that these countries would have agreed to some great liberalization of their refugee policies. Far from the nations of the world letting down the Jews of Germany, to some extent the opposite was true; the Jews—not only of Germany but also of the Free World—put too much faith in the concept of an international conference the object of which was to only talk about the refugee crisis. Jewish hopes were misplaced, and their expectations too high.

For all that, the gathering at Evian did serve the purpose of concentrating the minds of government leaders, if only for a short time, on the refugee crisis. It could have acted as an occasion for caring administrations to voluntarily make some kind of announcement that they would agree to an increase in their refugee quotas. None, however, with the exception of the tiny Dominican Republic, chose to do so, and in this lay Evian's real tragedy. Few of the nations of the world can claim to have been helpful in receiving Jews or alleviating their plight.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Soos, Géza; United States Response to the Holocaust

Further Reading

Breitman, Richard, and Alan M. Kraut. American Refugee Policy and European Jewry, 1933–1945. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988.

Marrus, Michael. The Unwanted: European Refugees in the Twentieth Century. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Sherman, A. J. Island Refuge. Britain and Refugees from the Third Reich, 1933–1939. London: Frank Cass, 1994.

Exodus 1947

The ill-fated voyage of the ship Exodus 1947 (July 11–August 22, 1947) highlighted the plight of Jewish refugees attempting to immigrate to Palestine after World War II. The British government had from 1939 continued to limit Jewish immigration to Palestine; indeed, during the war Britain had maintained warships off Palestine to intercept ships bound for Palestine carrying Jewish refugees fleeing the Holocaust.

British policies of blocking illegal Jewish immigration to Palestine continued after the war. Jewish leaders responded by encouraging and facilitating illegal immigration (Aliya Bet). From 1945 to 1948 Mossad Le-Aliya Bet, a branch of the Haganah headed by Shaul Avigur, organized 65 voyages transporting in all some 70,000 displaced Jews to Palestine. One of the vessels involved in this effort was the former President Warfield.

The President Warfield was a Chesapeake Bay ferry that had been transferred to the British under Lend-Lease and had participated in ferrying operations to Normandy after the June 6, 1944, D-Day landings. It had been returned to the United States after the war. This worn-out ship was then sold as scrap to the Jewish immigration effort for slightly more than $8,000.

Renamed the Exodus 1947 and packed with 4,515 refugees bound for Palestine, the ship departed Sète, France, on July 11, 1947. Eight British warships—the cruiser Ajax, five destroyers, and two minelayers—eventually trailed the Exodus 1947. On July 18, when only 12 miles beyond Palestinian territorial waters, the British surrounded the ship and boarded it.

Hand-to-hand fighting ensued. In the melée that extended over several hours, the British finally resorted to small arms fire. Two passengers and one crewman were killed, and 32 others were injured. The crewmen surrendered only when the British began a ramming operation, threatening to sink the ship and those in it.

The British towed the Exodus 1947, now listing badly, to Haifa. Ordinarily, the refugees would have been sent to camps in Cyprus, but these were now packed with 26,000 people, and the British sought to make an example. They reembarked the passengers on three troopships and sent them to the port of Marseille, France, in effect returning them to their point of origin. There the deportees rejected orders to go ashore, and French officials, who were willing to see them reenter France, refused to remove them by force. Only 130 passengers, most of them sick or pregnant, disembarked.

The remaining passengers, including many Holocaust survivors and orphaned children, began a hunger strike.

French authorities offered supplies, which the refugees rejected despite desperate sanitary conditions and extreme heat.

After 24 days, and fearing the outbreak of an epidemic, the French ordered the three ships to depart. The British government, reeling from growing adverse worldwide public outrage over what had transpired, ordered the ships on to Hamburg in their zone of Germany. There, British soldiers forcibly removed the refugees, who were then sent on to two displaced persons' (DP) camps near Lübeck. Demonstrations and protests occurred in DP camps throughout Europe over the events.

The British then changed their policy, ending the effort to return illegal immigrants to Palestine to their port of origin. Instead, they sent them to Cyprus. Media coverage of the events also led to a swing in public opinion in favor of the Jews and establishment of a Jewish state in 1948.

Many of the passengers on the Exodus 1947 continued to try to reach Palestine. Although some gained illegal entry, more than half of them were detained again and deported to Cyprus. There they remained until they were allowed to immigrate to Israel after its founding in May 1948. The Exodus 1947 itself burned at Haifa in August 1952 and was scrapped in 1963.

Writer Leon Uris loosely based his novel Exodus (1958) on the Exodus 1947 incident and the lives of David Ben-Gurion and Menachem Begin. Paul Newman received an Academy Award for Best Actor for his portrayal of the fictional Ari Ben Canaan in the film Exodus (1958), directed by Otto Preminger.

RICHARD EDWARDS AND SPENCER C. TUCKER

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Displaced Persons

Further Reading

Gruber, Ruth. Exodus 1947: The Ship That Launched a Nation. New York: Crown, 1999.

Halamish, Aviva. The Exodus Affair: Holocaust Survivors and the Struggle for Palestine. Syracuse (NY): Syracuse University Press, 1998.

Kaniuk, Yoram. Commander of the Exodus. New York: Grove, 2001.
Uris, Leon. Exodus. New York: Doubleday, 1959.

F

Fabrikaktion

The Fabrikaktion (“Factory Action”) was a euphemism given to what was deemed to be the last roundup of Jews remaining in Berlin in February 1943. Despite the large number of Jews who had left Germany through emigration before the war, and subsequently through various Nazi roundups and deportations during the war, by September 1942 there were still more than 75,000 Jews left in Germany. Their names and places of abode were known to the government, and their ongoing presence was tolerated as a cheap labor force.

However, on September 22, 1942, German dictator Adolf Hitler demanded that they be removed and replaced with non-Jewish workers. The result was a planned Aktion that would see the Jews deported out of Germany altogether, presumably to their death in places like Auschwitz. Wartime logistical issues meant that the earliest this could take place was the later winter or early fall of 1943.

Once worked out, the plan was to pick up the 15,000 or so Jewish workers in Berlin and another 5,000 living in other cities. On February 20, 1943, SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, the Jewish “expert” at unit IV B4 of the Reich Security Main Office, announced how the operation would work in a document titled “Technische Durchführung der Evakuierung von Juden nach dem Osten” (“Technical Procedures for the Evacuation of Jews to the East”). According to this, most of the Jews remaining in Berlin and elsewhere would be taken into custody and deported, though with some exceptions. These would be Jewish partners in mixed marriages; married people considered to be Jewish under the Nuremberg laws living with “Aryan” relatives; Jews over the age of 65 unless married to Jews below that age; decorated Jewish veterans of World War I; and a designated list of others listed by name. All these exceptions would not be deported, but they would be removed from their existing places of employment.

On February 26, 1943, Jewish men were notified that they were required to register the next day with the Gestapo for a check of their labor papers, and when they arrived the next morning they were detained by the SS or the Gestapo at the office they attended, in what the authorities called the “Evakuierungsaktion” (Evacuation Action). Jewish men were imprisoned before they were deported to concentration and extermination camps. In most parts of the Reich the Fabrikaktion was completed within two days, but in Berlin, where the biggest Jewish population lived, the situation was slightly different. Here, the action took over a week.

Berlin was different from other cities around the country in that no prior warning was given to the Jewish men the day before. In factories all over the city, Gestapo, police, and SS, in a coordinated action, simply entered and rounded up the Jews at their workplaces. Also different was that because there were so many detainees they had to be concentrated in a variety of different places around the city—a concert hall, two barracks, a synagogue, a Jewish senior center, and the former Jewish Community Center at Rosenstrasse 2–4. In this latter location, the “Aryan” wives and mothers of Jewish men and boys held prisoner protested in front of the building for their release—a protest that was ultimately successful despite the determination of the SS to quell the dissent.

Overall, the Fabrikaktion saw 8,000 Jewish men from Berlin rounded up for deportation. Once collected, they waited in their temporary places of detention until their transport could be arranged. Most were first deported to Theresienstadt before being sent on to their deaths at Auschwitz.

At the time of the roundup, about 4,000 were able to escape the initial assault, but many were later captured, often as a result of denunciations. It is estimated that only 1,500 Jews were able to hide away until the end of the war. Known both to themselves and the authorities as “U-boats,” they, like submarines, lived under the surface; they were not seen until the end of the war.

The context in which the Factory Action took place is an important indicator of how the Nazis viewed both the Holocaust and the wartime situation. Occurring less than a month after the surrender of the German Sixth Army at Stalingrad, it showed that there was no little concern that the objective of making Berlin “Judenrein” (“free of Jews”) had to be speeded up while the opportunity still presented itself.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Rosenstrasse Protest; Weidt, Otto

Further Reading

Gruner, Wolf. Widerstand in der Rosenstrasse: Die Fabrik-Aktion und die Verfolgung der “Mischehen,” 1943. Frankfurt am Main: Fischer Taschenbuch Verlag, 2005.

Meyer, Beate, Hermann Simon, and Chana Schütz (Eds.). Jews in Nazi Berlin: From Kristallnacht to Liberation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2009.

Stoltzfus, Nathan. Resistance of the Heart: Intermarriage and the Rosenstrasse Protest in Nazi Germany. New York: Norton, 1996.

Facing History and Ourselves

Facing History and Ourselves is an international educational and professional development organization for secondary-school teachers focusing on the study of prejudice, racism, antisemitism, and civic and moral responsibility. Facing History, as it is known colloquially, accomplishes its mission through the employment of resource books, curriculum guides, lesson plans, teaching strategies, seminars, online courses, group workshops, and individual instruction sessions. Founded in 1976 by Margot Stern Strom and headquartered in Brookline, Massachusetts, the organization began as a lone course taught in a single school district. It now maintains offices in Chicago, Cleveland, Denver, London, Los Angeles, Memphis, New York, San Francisco, and Toronto, and boasts a staff of more than 150. Facing History has also created partnerships with educators in Northern Ireland, Israel, Rwanda, China, and South Africa. In all, some 29,000 educators instruct almost 2 million students per year.

In its mission to fight bigotry and promote civic responsibility, Facing History has developed in-depth investigations of the Holocaust and other, more recent, genocides. This is accomplished through a variety of online and print resources, including Facing History and Ourselves: Holocaust and Human Behavior, and Elements of Time: Holocaust Testimonies. Printed resources concerning citizenship and democracy include Choosing to Participate: A Critical Examination of Citizenship in American History. The idea is to expose students to the root causes of bigotry and genocide so that they can readily identify intolerance and indifference in an effort to avoid the mistakes and tragedies of the past. By instilling knowledge and the ability to think critically, Facing History and Ourselves seeks to mold and nurture proactive citizens by giving them the tools to recognize intolerance and injustice before they become problematic.

The study of the Holocaust continues to be a central theme for the organization, and it has been reinforced by stories told by Holocaust survivors, both in oral and written formats. Research sponsored by Facing History and Ourselves continues to connect theories with practice through the development of new partnerships and scholarship as well as innovative pilot projects. The group has earned many awards and recognition of its work, including the Courage of Conscience Award from the Peace Abbey.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Antisemitism

Further Reading

Facing History and Ourselves. Elements of Time: Holocaust Testimonies. Brookline (MA): Facing History and Ourselves, 2012.

Facing History and Ourselves. Facing History and Ourselves: Holocaust and Human Behavior. Brookline (MA): Facing History and Ourselves, 2012.

Totten, Samuel, and Stephen Feinberg (Eds.). Teaching and Studying the Holocaust. Charlotte (NC): Information Age Publishing, 2009.

Fackenheim, Emil

Emil Fackenheim was a Jewish philosopher and rabbi, and scholar of the relationship between God and man in the aftermath of the Holocaust. Born in 1916 in Halle, Germany, he studied at Halle University before enrolling in the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin. After studying under Rabbi Leo Baeck, he was ordained a rabbi in 1938. In the aftermath of the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, however, he was interned in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp for three months. In 1939 he and his family escaped to Scotland, but they were transported to Canada and interned as enemy aliens after the outbreak of World War II. In 1945 he received his PhD from the University of Toronto and then joined its faculty in 1948. He remained there until his retirement in 1984. Moving to Israel that same year, he died there in 2003.

The main thrust of Fackenheim's work was rooted in an ongoing attempt to assess the relevant validity of German idealistic philosophy and bring it into conversation with the intellectual richness of the Jewish religious tradition, while reassessing both in the aftermath of the Holocaust. The imperative that drove Fackenheim's thought was the search for an answer to the vexing question, "Where was God at Auschwitz?" While there could be no immediately rational explanation, he felt, at least one fundamental truth stood out as a result of the Jewish people's experience. In the aftermath of the Holocaust an ongoing Jewish commitment to survival would deny Hitler a posthumous victory; accompanying this, only a strong Israel could prevent the Jews from vanishing as a people. Thus, in 1968 Fackenheim introduced what became his most well-known theological notion, the idea of a "614th commandment" stemming from the Holocaust. Here he built on the rabbinic tradition of 613 mitzvot (divine commandments) to be found in the Bible. Developing his notion more fully, he wrote that after Auschwitz Jews must henceforth be commanded to survive as Jews, lest the Jewish people perish, and in so doing deny Hitler a posthumous victory.

A less controversial matter for Fackenheim was the question of the uniqueness of the Holocaust. Because all historical events are at the same time similar and different, Fackenheim preferred the term "unprecedented" (as does historian Yehuda Bauer) and reminded readers in the preface to his new edition of God's Presence in History (1997) that (1) the Holocaust is a novum in history and, within the Jewish faith, is irreducible to evils perpetrated by pharaoh or Amalek, the Spanish Inquisition or the Cossacks' Chmelnitzki, or even the enemies of Jerusalem—Nebukadnezar, Vespasian,

Titus, Hadrian; (2) no meaning, redemptive or other, religious or secular will ever be found in the Holocaust; (3) Hitler's victories did not end with his death; and (4) this prohibition is a "614th commandment."

In all of Fackenheim's writings, the Holocaust was ever-present. He did not limit himself to the event as a Jewish tragedy only, but he saw it as the central crime of the West, the result of centuries of falsely stereotyping the Jewish people. In working through the many issues the Holocaust raised, Fackenheim produced To Mend the World: Foundations of Future Jewish Thought (1982), wherein he confronted such philosophical thinkers as Franz Rosenzweig, Baruch Spinoza, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, and Martin Heidegger, as well as Judaism itself, in an attempt to answer the question "how Jewish (also Christian and philosophical) thought can both expose itself to the Holocaust and survive."

Finally, as almost all who have made an attempt at assessing Fackenheim's writing and thinking have correctly noted, it is the centrality of the historical experience (his own as well as that of the Jewish people collectively) in its relationship to Jewish thought which has been his ultimate philosophical confrontation, thus making the "lived experience" foundational to both present and future, shaping indelibly what is and what will be. It is no accident, therefore, that both To Mend the World and Encounters between Judaism and Modern Philosophy have the word "Future" in their subtitles. For Emil Fackenheim, changed not only by his own experience of the Holocaust but also that of the Jewish people as a whole—and a Western world yet to fully confront it as well—both the present and future have been irrevocably altered.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Baeck, Leo; Rubenstein, Richard; Sachsenhausen; Theological Responses to the Holocaust

Further Reading

- Fackenheim, Emil. Encounters between Judaism and Modern Philosophy: A Preface to Future Jewish Thought. New York: Schocken Books, 1973.
- Fackenheim, Emil. God's Presence in History: Jewish Affirmations and Philosophical Reflections. New York: New York University Press, 1970.
- Fackenheim, Emil. The Human Condition after Auschwitz: A Jewish Testimony a Generation After. Syracuse (NY): Syracuse University Press, 1971.
- Fackenheim, Emil. The Jewish Return into History: Reflections in the Age of Auschwitz and a New Jerusalem. New York: Schocken Books, 1978.
- Fackenheim, Emil. To Mend the World: Foundations of Future Jewish Thought. New York: Schocken Books, 1982.

Fascism

Fascism is a political movement born out of the intellectual ferment following World War I. It was at its strongest in Europe during the 1920s and 1930s but was expressed through numerous variants in other parts of the world.

Although reaching its peak in the two decades prior to 1945, as an ideology it has prevailed as an important force in many countries since then. Fascism can be characterized as a movement that defines itself more by what it stands against rather than what it stands for; hence, during the period between the 1920s and 1940s, it was anticommunist, antiliberal, anti-Marxist, and anti-individualist. Fascism's only goal was the strengthening of the state over the liberalizing forces that could weaken it, and as a result fascists advocated a strong central government (depending on local variants, even a one-party state or a dictatorship), mass obedience, a party army, suppression of trade unions and civil liberties groups, a culture of youth glorification, and a rigorous repression of dissent.

Groups adhering to fascism attained political office in a number of European countries before 1945, notably Italy, Portugal, and Spain. It had an impact (sometimes powerfully) on local politics in France, Austria, Britain, Hungary, Romania, and elsewhere. Fascist movements or parties also appeared in most other Western democratic countries.

While fascism is a right-wing ideology, it is not conservative; in its purest form, it can be socially and economically radical, even revolutionary, while always invoking the ideals of a lost "golden age" as something to which the modern nation should seek to return. Through manipulation of the organs of the mass media, education, and popular culture to the greater glory of the state, fascism offers many people an emotional anchor at a time of increasing social alienation and fragmentation. Its potential as a genocidal force, however, lay in the fascist tendency toward dictatorship, its inclusivity of all members of the nation and utter rejection of those who were perceived not to fit into it, its glorification of the military, and its rejection of individualism and humanitarian values in favor of the sanctification and elevation of the state.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Communists in the Holocaust; Graziani, Rodolfo; The Great Dictator; Italian Jews and Fascism; Mussert, Anton Adriaan; National Socialism

Further Reading

Griffin, Roger (Ed.). Fascism. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Kedward, H. R. Fascism in Western Europe 1900–1945. New York: New York University Press, 1971.

Paxton, Robert O. The Anatomy of Fascism. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.

Payne, Stanley G. A History of Fascism, 1914–1945. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995.

February Strike

In February 1941 a general strike against the Nazis was called throughout Amsterdam in the Netherlands. This strike was called, furthermore, on behalf of Jews and in opposition to the Holocaust.

Willem Kraan, a road worker with the Amsterdam city council, was a member of the Communist Party of the Netherlands (CPN). Along with his friend Piet Nak, a worker in the sanitation department and a fellow CPN member, Kraan made the decision on Sunday, February 23, 1941, to initiate a strike to protest the German treatment of the Dutch Jews.

In early 1941 the persecution of the Jews of Amsterdam had begun to intensify. Already there had been protests against the occupation, and on February 19, 1941, a group led by Ernst Cahn and Alfred Kohn, two German Jewish émigrés, raised their voice against the Nazis. Arrested for fomenting dissent, Cahn became the first resister executed by the Nazis in the Netherlands, and the February strike that followed was a direct outcome of Cahn and Kohn's protest.

On Saturday, February 22, the Germans raided Amsterdam's Jewish Quarter and more than 400 Jews were arrested. A second raid took place the next day. Kraan witnessed at firsthand the Sunday arrests, returning home with tears in his eyes.

Without hesitation he spoke to his friend Piet Nak, and together they decided that strike action was needed to paralyze the city so the arrests and deportations would stop. They began approaching workers on the street and at the docks, pleading with them to go out on strike on behalf of the Jews. They also sought the cooperation of the public transport workers, who, it was anticipated, would strangle the city and stop all movement.

On Monday evening Nak spoke before some 300–500 workers at the Noordermarkt (North Market). Another communist comrade, Dirk van Nimwegen, also made a speech, in which he emphasized that the Dutch people should not be seen to be behaving like the Germans. Strike action was agreed to from those attending, and the strike call then went out. Posters were made and distributed throughout the night, along with thousands of handbills.

By Tuesday, all municipal and government services in Amsterdam and nearby areas were on strike, with tens of thousands not showing up for work. News of the strike spread through the city like wildfire. The only widespread strike against a Nazi antisemitic action thus became reality. It only lasted two days, however, before it was called off on February 25, 1941.

In response, the Germans introduced draconian reprisals: the mayor of Amsterdam was threatened with punishment and dismissal, 4 strikers were executed, 22 were imprisoned (with another 40 taken as temporary hostages), and the city of Amsterdam was fined 15 million guilders.

The Gestapo then sought desperately to find and apprehend the organizers. Piet Nak was arrested and beaten severely, even though the Nazis were unaware of the extent of his involvement. Upon his release he went underground, but in November he was picked up again and interrogated under torture for four months as the Gestapo sought information on the nature and extent of the communist resistance. Eventually he was freed, but in May 1943 he was once more arrested on charges of helping Jews before again being released.

On November 16, 1941, Willem Kraan was also arrested. After a brutal period of imprisonment, he and 32 others were executed at the Soesterberg airport on November 19, 1942.

In 1966 a monument to the strike and the memory of Willem Kraan was unveiled in the newly renamed Willem Kraanstraat. The bronze statue was supposed to be of Kraan but was, instead, of an anonymous dock worker. Its appearance caused consternation among many of the survivors, particularly Piet Nak, who emphasized that the strike was organized by municipal employees, not dock workers. The monument—titled De Dokwerker—was cast in 1952 by Mari Andriessen and based on a 1930s volunteer from the Spanish Civil War. Nonetheless, the monument, located in Jonas Daniel Meier Square, is the focus of an annual commemoration of the February Strike.

On May 31, 1966, Yad Vashem recognized Willem Kraan and Piet Nak as Righteous among the Nations for their remarkable efforts in resisting the Nazis. Their attempt, of course, was ultimately unsuccessful, as the full-scale deportation of Jews from the Netherlands began in the summer of 1942 and over the next two years more than 107,000 were deported to their deaths, mainly to Auschwitz and Sobibór. Only 5,200 of those sent to these places survived.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Communists in the Holocaust; Netherlands; Resistance Movements; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Presser, Jacob. The Destruction of the Dutch Jews. Boston: E. P. Dutton, 1969.

Sijes, Benjamin Aaron. De februaristaking: 25–26 februari 1941. Amsterdam: Becht, 1954.

Warmbrunn, Werner. The Dutch under German Occupation, 1940–1945. Stanford (CA): Stanford University Press, 1963.

Ferencz, Benjamin

Benjamin Ferencz was a field investigator for the War Crimes Branch of the United States Army, Judge Advocate Division, in Germany in 1945, and chief prosecutor of the Einsatzgruppen Trial (September 1947–April 1948). He was born in Soncutta-Mare, Romania, on March 11, 1920. Not long after his birth, his family migrated to the United States. Ferencz grew up in New York City and in 1940 received a bachelor's degree from the City College of New York. He earned a law degree from Harvard University Law School in 1943. After enlisting in the U.S. Army in 1943, he then spent two years in Europe in an anti-aircraft battalion.

Because of his legal training, the Army transferred Ferencz to the Judge Advocate's Section of the Army in February 1945 to help investigate war crimes perpetrated against American servicemen. As the war came to a close and more and more atrocities came to light, much of his work involved traveling to various concentration camps to gather evidence before they were destroyed. Field work of this type was gruesome and had a lasting impact on Ferencz, who thereafter committed his life to working toward lasting peace.

He remained a war crimes investigator with the Judge Advocate Division until December 26, 1945, when the Army gave him an honorable discharge. Not long after returning to the United States, however, he was again recruited for war crimes work; he was now hired to work for the Office of American Military Government, United States (OMGUS) whose chief legal representative, Telford Taylor, was preparing cases against leading Nazi figures in a series of additional war-crime trials to be held in the American zone of occupation.

Taylor's Office of Chief of Counsel for War Crimes was the U.S. organization devoted to the investigation and prosecution of Nazi war criminals subsequent to the Nuremberg Trials of major war criminals; the office had encountered great difficulty recruiting American personnel. Thus, when

Benjamin Ferencz is an American lawyer who served as a key investigator of Nazi war crimes after World War II. He was the chief prosecutor on behalf of the U.S. Army at the Einsatzgruppen Trial, one of the supplementary trials conducted by the United States military authorities at Nuremberg from 1946 onward. In this photo, taken on November 21, 2010, Ferencz addresses the opening ceremony of an exhibition commemorating the Nuremberg war crimes trials. (AP Photo/Armin Weigel)

Ferencz arrived in Germany, as both a lawyer and an experienced field investigator, he was immediately dispatched to Berlin to head up a team of researchers and analysts assigned to sift through the tons of Nazi records housed there.

Perhaps Ferencz's greatest contribution as a war crimes investigator was his recognition of the significance of the Ereignismeldungen, the top-secret daily reports of the SS-Einsatzgruppen or mobile killing units. These papers became the evidentiary basis of a case against 24 leaders and officers of the Einsatzgruppen who were tried in Nuremberg by the Americans in 1947 and 1948. A shortage of staff led Taylor to appoint Ferencz chief prosecutor of the case; it would be his first case.

Ferencz and a team of four lawyers prosecuted the case, in which the defendants were charged with the murder of roughly 1 million civilians, most of whom were Jews, in the occupied area of the Soviet Union between June 1941 and July 1943. While the defendants were charged with crimes against humanity, war crimes, and membership in criminal organizations, the heart of the case was their participation in the Nazi "Final Solution." In spite of its relative inexperience, the American trial team presented a solid case and, on April 8, 1948, a panel of three judges found all but one of the defendants guilty. Fourteen were sentenced to death, and the remainder received sentences of varying prison terms.

The Einsatzgruppen Trial and Ferencz's leading role as prosecutor paved the way for future such high-profile trials, and also prepared him for work as an advocate for the establishment of a permanent international criminal court. To that end, he has lectured and published widely on the subject. Ferencz continues to work closely with organizations devoted to the advocacy of international criminal law. In 2002 he witnessed his lifelong dream come true with the establishment of a permanent International Criminal Court (ICC).

HILARY EARL

See also: Crimes against Humanity; Einsatzgruppen; Taylor, Telford; War Crimes

Further Reading

- Earl, Hilary. "Accidental Justice: The Trial of Otto Ohlendorf and the Einsatzgruppen Leaders in the American Zone of Occupation, Germany, 1945–1958." PhD dissertation, University of Toronto, 2002.
- Ferencz, Benjamin. Less Than Slaves: Jewish Forced Labor and the Quest for Compensation. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Hofmann, Tom. Benjamin Ferencz, Nuremberg Prosecutor and Peace Advocate. Jefferson (NC): McFarland, 2014.

Film and the Holocaust

Holocaust film is a specific genre of motion pictures that has generated an enormous literature, and entire books have been written chronicling the extent to which movies about the Holocaust have been made. As a subject for movies, it presents the broadest range of themes possible, covering nothing less than the entirety of the human experience in extremis—social, political, cultural, economic, military, administrative, religious, gender, age, race, and so on. Film has become one of the largest contemporary topics dealing with the Holocaust, and only a bare introduction can be made in this entry.

Motion pictures were used extensively by the Nazis (and their collaborators in other countries) for the purpose of propaganda, but it was outside the Nazi realm, both before and during World War II, that film was at its most effective in bringing the Holocaust to the viewing public. Further, motion pictures on both Holocaust and World War II themes have formed a significant element of the movie industry's output—and have increased dramatically in number since the 1970s.

The study of film as history is not new; nor, of course, is the study of film as Holocaust history. Filmographies covering the Holocaust are immense in size and growing each year. For each film studied the essential tools can remain the same, however, with examinations proceeding from a subject matter analysis that explores issues such as content, period representation, historical and social construction, character empathy and moral responses, and textual composition. Where the Holocaust is concerned, one must always be wary that the filmmakers do not fall into the trap of maudlin sentimentality, as this can detract from the impact that a movie on the Holocaust can have on an audience—and, in particular, an uninformed or underinformed audience, such as those found among younger viewers today.

For the most part, however, it is simply not possible for filmmakers to recreate with complete accuracy everything that happened in any historical situation, so liberties have to be taken—perhaps not with the truth, so much as with representations of the truth. While filmmakers might have a commitment to telling the general outline of a story, in doing so they are often forced to select specific vignettes, themes, or exchanges in order to best express themselves. The ambiguous caption “based on a true story” can lend credibility to even the most tenuous of movie tie-ins, but filmmakers seem generally content to employ the term if their movie has even the remotest grounding in real-life events.

Of course, there is a danger here; those who would detract or deny the veracity of the history being portrayed could well see that flaws in a movie generated by poetic (or dramatic) license can negate the entire account. Yet it is rare that filmmakers set out to lie or deceive; rather, all too often they are confined by the limits of their medium, conscious of the fact that they cannot “do it all,” and that, as a result, they will seek to create an understanding or interpretation of a particular historical event in accordance with the tools they have to hand. In this regard, the skills of the historian can meet those of the filmmaker in order to produce works that enhance understanding of the Holocaust.

In approaching an issue such as the Holocaust, the study of film can be useful in providing a window to achieving a deeper understanding of why it is that such extraordinary violence took place. This is not to say that all the answers can be found in movies; indeed, the Holocaust was a phenomenon more likely to be inexplicable than understandable. Nonetheless, a few questions—common to all students of film and its relationship to historical phenomena—can be asked in the hope that deeper insight can be achieved: How useful is this film in developing an understanding of the causes and nature of the Holocaust? Do you think you learned more about the Holocaust from this film than from other sources of information? Are you able to personally relate or identify with certain characters in this film? Did this film have any biases? Was the filmmakers' point of view obvious? Could you tell if the director was a man or a woman? How? Do you think the film would have been different if the alternative was the case? Can you identify any specific scenes that best describe this movie?

It goes without saying that the last 30 years have seen a sharp increase in people's interest in the Holocaust. Vast libraries of books, movies, and documentaries have been produced, and these keep coming every week. Interest in learning about the Holocaust seems not, however, to have been translated into an interest in learning from the Holocaust and remembering those who were its victims. Motion pictures are one way in which this trend can be countered. Indeed, it can be argued that helping younger generations to learn about the Holocaust through critical consumption of film might be a way to engage them emotionally as well as intellectually, particularly as audiences today are likely to glean much of their knowledge about the Holocaust through films, both before and after their formal education.

The most fundamental of questions regarding filmic portrayals of historical issues can be addressed through a viewing of such movies: first, is the movie true to the historical reality (so far as it can be understood) upon which it is based? Second, is the movie useful in providing an understanding of, for example, what the death camps looked like? And third, how effective can graphic depictions, say, of prisoner revolts in these same camps be for a new generation of viewers seeing such images for the first time?

Movies stemming from Holocaust themes play an important role in helping to provide a sense of “place” and “period” for viewers. They are not documentaries, nor do they try to be. This is one of the major concerns some people have with regard to any movies that take historical episodes as their theme; namely, that because films employ actors speaking contrived dialogue, on movie sets that are re-creations of what might have been, they have as little validity as if they were fiction. Yet an argument can be made that filmic portrayals of the Holocaust (indeed of any historical event) are often just as much an interpretation of historical realities as other forms of analysis—and in particular, of historical writing. Certainly they evoke images and emotions that have an immediacy rarely found in all but the most outstanding written forms.

While movies on the Holocaust are a window to understanding, however, they are often no more than that. They are not a substitute for solid instruction, even though they can be a wonderful adjunct to it. Like Plato’s shadows on the wall of the cave, they show an image of reality but not reality itself. For this reason, an appreciation of the Holocaust must always proceed from the premise that there is no substitute for solid research, a commitment to the provision of context, and an in-depth knowledge of both the issues and the period in which they were played out. In this regard, while movies can be a start, they are not (and cannot be) the only medium for generating a full grasp of what that awful event signified—or of what it represents for the future of the world and the society in which viewers will be living once they leave the theater or turn off their television set.

The Holocaust as a theme in motion pictures generated a number of important titles between the 1950s and 1980s. These include, but are not restricted to, such movies as The Diary of Anne Frank (George Stevens, 1959), Judgment at Nuremberg (Stanley Kramer, 1961), The Pawnbroker (Sidney Lumet, 1964), The Shop on Main Street (Ján Kadár and Elmar Klos, 1965), The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (Vittorio De Sica, 1970), The Last Metro (François Truffaut, 1980), Playing for Time (Daniel Mann, 1980), Sophie’s Choice (Alan J. Pakula, 1982), Au Revoir Les Enfants (Louis Malle, 1987), The Nasty Girl (Michael Verhoeven, 1990), Europa, Europa (Agnieszka Holland, 1991), and Korczak (Andrzej Wajda, 1991).

Since then, the Holocaust has remained central, and interest in movies on the topic actually intensified after the appearance in 1993 of the multi-award-winning Schindler’s List, directed by Steven Spielberg. Since that time, the genre has seen an escalation of major movies, many of which have won critical and popular acclaim; these include Life Is Beautiful (Roberto Benigni, 1997), Sunshine (István Szabó, 1999), Conspiracy (Frank Pierson 2001), The Grey Zone (Tim Blake Nelson, 2001), Uprising (Jon Avnet, 2001), Amen (Costa-Gavras, 2002), The Pianist (Roman Polanski, 2002), Fateless (Lajos Koltai, 2005), Black Book (Paul Verhoeven, 2006), The Counterfeiters (Stefan Ruzowitzky, 2007), The Reader (Stephen Daldry, 2008), God on Trial (Andy DeEmmony, 2008), The Boy in the Striped Pajamas (Mark Herman, 2008), Defiance (Edward Zwick, 2008), Good (Vicente Amorim, 2008), Sarah’s Key (Gilles Paquet-Brenner, 2010), La Rafle (Rose Bosch, 2010), In Darkness (Agnieszka Holland, 2011), Wunderkinder (Markus Rosenmüller, 2011), The Third Half (Darko Mitrevski, 2012), Ida (Paweł Pawlikowski, 2013), and Son of Saul (László Nemes, 2015).

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Conspiracy; Good; The Great Dictator; The Grey Zone; Hippler, Fritz; Holocaust; Jud Süss; Judgment at Nuremberg; Life Is Beautiful; The Mortal Storm; Night and Fog; Paper Clips; The Pianist; Schindler’s List; Shoah; Triumph of the Spirit; The Truce; Uprising

Further Reading

Baron, Lawrence. Projecting the Holocaust into the Present: The Changing Focus of Contemporary Holocaust Cinema. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.

Gonshak, Henry. Hollywood and the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2015.

Insdorf, Annette. Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust (3rd ed.). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Kerner, Aaron. Film and the Holocaust: New Perspectives on Dramas, Documentaries, and Experimental Films. New York: Continuum, 2011.

Final Solution

Adolf Hitler's euphemistically named "Final Solution of the Jewish Question" (Endlösung der Judenfrage) was the plan settled (though not decided) at the Wannsee Conference in 1942 by Reinhard Heydrich and others (at Hitler's direction) to persecute, deport, and exterminate the Jews of Europe. By the end of World War II in 1945 the Final Solution had resulted in the deaths of approximately 6 million Jews in what became known as the Holocaust.

The Jews of occupied Europe had struggled to stay alive, as individuals and as a people, for more than two horror-filled years before the fateful decision to annihilate them all was put into action. For the rest of the war, from the later summer of 1941 until the defeat of Germany in May 1945, a state-sponsored policy of murder was undertaken throughout Europe in pursuit of the policy.

The Final Solution was unique to history. It was a deliberate, systematic, all-encompassing program of genocide, dictated wholly by state policy. The entire legal system participated—passing laws, decrees, and directives that condemned an entire innocent people group to death.

All branches of the government that were needed to accomplish the task were enlisted. People at every level of German society and from every bureaucratic office participated. Churches and the Interior Ministry supplied birth records and prevented Jews from hiding their identities, even those who had been baptized. The newspapers and post office notified them of each new abuse: the loss of jobs, restrictions on whom Jews could marry or befriend, expulsions from their homes, and deportation to the ghettos and camps. The Finance Ministry confiscated all wealth and property and, ironically, used some of it to finance the Final Solution.

Private firms fired Jewish workers, company officers, and board members. The universities refused entrance to Jewish students, denied degrees to those already enrolled, and fired Jewish professors. Private industries bid on contracts to supply the gas for extermination and to build the ovens for cremation. One company supplied one camp with 46 ovens capable of burning 500 corpses an hour. Pharmaceutical companies used camp inmates to test drugs without having to worry about negative side effects. Doctors performed experimental operations, many simply innovative methods of torture, with no legal repercussions. And the transportation bureau paid the railroad companies' bills for taking the Jews to their death.

Unlike instances of genocide in the past, the Final Solution was not incidental to some other national goal. The Jews did not stand in the way of national expansion, as settlers perceived the Native Americans, for example. Nor was there any way Jews could escape death by moving outside of Germany to some other European nation, or even by converting to Christianity as Jews had done in other countries in earlier times. Nor did the killing stop when Germany began to lose the war and needed the trains and labor to supply the troops.

EVE NUSSBAUM SOUMERAI AND CAROL D. SCHULZ

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Auschwitz; The Auschwitz Album; Belzec; Chelmno; Churban; Conspiracy; Death Camps; Eichmann, Adolf; Einsatzgruppen; Generalgouvernement; Göring, Hermann; Heydrich, Reinhard; Hilberg, Raul; Hitler, Adolf; Hitler's Willing Executioners; Holocaust; Höppner, Rolf-Heinz; Jewish Question; Kaltenbrunner, Ernst; Majdanek; Müller, Heinrich; Neighbors; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Riegner Telegram; Schlegelberger, Franz; Shoah; Sobibór; Third Reich; Treblinka; Wannsee Conference

Further Reading

Breitman, Richard. The Architect of Genocide: Himmler and the Final Solution. New York: Knopf, 1992.

Cesarani, David, ed. The Final Solution: Origins and Implementation. 1994.

Friedlander, Henry. The Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Finland

Finland's involvement with World War II, Nazi Germany, and the Holocaust began on November 30, 1939, when the country was attacked and invaded by the Soviet Union in a conflict that became known as the Winter War. Finnish Jews fought alongside their non-Jewish countrymen to fight off the Russian advances. A total of 204 Finnish Jews fought in the Finnish Army during the Winter War, and of these 27 were killed. The Winter War ended on March 13, 1940, with the Moscow Peace Treaty. This surrendered certain important strategic areas of Finland to the Soviet Union, but it also conserved Finland's independence and ended the Soviet Union's attempt to seize the whole country. Jews were among those made refugees from the surrendered territories.

The nationwide Finnish disgust at the conclusion of the Winter War led to Finland's involvement in the Continuation War, which saw conflict between Finland and the Soviet Union from 1941 to 1944. This aggression between the two countries resumed on June 22, 1941, the day Germany launched its invasion of the Soviet Union, Operation Barbarossa, accompanied with surreptitious Finnish operations. While Nazi Germany launched its invasion of the Soviet Union, Finland concurrently continued operations against the USSR. This ultimately resulted in Finland fighting alongside Nazi Germany against Russia. Roughly 300 Finnish Jews fought in the Continuation War, and eight of them were killed in action. Even though Finland's military had considerable numbers of German forces supporting their operations, the Finnish battle front had a field synagogue functioning in the company of Nazi troops. Jewish soldiers in the Finnish Army were approved for leave on Saturdays, as well as Jewish holidays.

In November 1942 nine Jewish Soviet refugees, along with 19 other exiles, were transported to Nazi Germany when the leader of the Finnish police agreed to hand them over. Seven of the Jews were murdered straightaway. The nine Jews surrendered to the Germans were Georg Kollman, Frans Olof Kollman and his mother, Hans Eduard Szubilski, Henrich Huppert, Kurt Huppert, Hans Robert, Martin Korn, and one unknown individual. As the Finnish media reported the news, it resulted in national outrage, and religious ministers resigned their positions in protest. After objections by Lutheran ministers, the Archbishop of Finland, and the Social Democratic Party, no more foreign Jewish immigrants were extradited from Finland. About 500 Jewish refugees came to Finland during World War II, with about 350 of them moving on to other countries.

In 1942 an exchange of Soviet POWs took place between Finland and Germany. Between 2,600 and 2,800 Soviet prisoners of war, of various nationalities and held by Finland, were traded for 2,100 Soviet POWs from diverse Finnish ethnic groups, including Finns, Karelians, Ingrians, and Estonians, who were held by Germany. About 2,000 of the POWs handed over by Finland joined the Wehrmacht. Later on in the war, Germany's ambassador to Helsinki, Wipert von Blücher, stated in a report to Adolf Hitler that the Finns would not jeopardize their people of Jewish origin in any situation. Yad Vashem recounts that 22 Finnish Jews perished in the Holocaust, all of them fighting for the Finnish Army.

Finnish Jewish soldiers later took part in the Lapland War against Germany. The Lapland War was fought from September 1944 to April 1945 in Finland's northern Lapland Province. In spite of their cooperation in trying to push back the USSR, as early as the summer of 1943 Nazi authorities began making plans for the prospect that Finland might make a separate peace arrangement with the Soviet Union. A revolution in Finnish leadership in early August 1944 led the Germans to consider that Finland would try to achieve such an arrangement. The Germans, therefore, anticipated withdrawing their forces northward, to protect their supplies of nickel near the Pechengsky (Petsamo) District in northwest Finland. On September 2, 1944, after the Finns told the Germans of the ceasefire between Finland and the Soviet Union, the Germans began seizing Finnish shipping in the Baltic Sea.

Three Finnish Jews, Leo Skurnik, Salomon Klass, and Dina Poljakoff, were presented Germany's Iron Cross for their wartime service. Major Skurnik, a district medical officer in the Finnish Army, prepared the clearing of a German field hospital when it fell prey to Soviet shelling. Due to Skurnik's actions, more than 600 patients, including SS soldiers, were evacuated from the hospital. Captain Klass, also from the Finnish Army, led a Finnish unit that saved a German company that had been encircled by the Soviet Army; while Dina Poljakoff, a member of Lotta Svärd, the Finnish women's auxiliary service, was a nursing assistant who assisted in tending to German wounded and came to be greatly venerated by her charges. All three individuals refused the award.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Operation Barbarossa; Soviet Union

Further Reading

Lunde, Henrik O. Finland's War of Choice: The Troubled German-Finnish Coalition in WWII. Havertown (PA): Casemate, 2011.

Muir, Simo, and Hana Worthen. Finland's Holocaust: Silences of History. Basingstoke (UK): Palgrave Macmillan, 2013.

Nenye, Vesa and Peter Munter. Finland at War: The Continuation and Lapland Wars 1941–45. Oxford: Osprey Publishing, 2016.

Fischer, Eugen

It has been held by some authors that the roots of Nazi racism can be traced back to Eugen Fischer, a German anthropologist who conducted experiments on African victims during the Herero Revolt, which is considered by many to be the first genocide of the 20th century.

Fischer was born on July 5, 1874, in Karlsruhe, a city in the Grand Duchy of Baden in southwest Germany. Little is known about his early life, although he was identified in an early 20th-century academic paper as a professor at the University of Freiburg. By 1906 Fischer had made a name for himself as an anthropologist after winning the Parisian Anthropological Society's esteemed Broca Award for a study he conducted on the skull width of Papuans from the island of New Guinea. A short time later he was invited to visit German South-West Africa.

In 1885 Germany had claimed parts of Africa as new colonies. German South-West Africa was home to indigenous Herero and Nama communities. In 1904 the Herero people rebelled against colonial rule; in response, by the time the revolt had been crushed in 1907 German forces had wiped out about 80% of the Herero and 50% of the Nama populations. When Fischer arrived in 1908, he focused his study on a community of mixed race people known as the Basters, who descended from the Nama and white Europeans. He concluded that the Basters were racially inferior because of the traits they had inherited from their Nama ancestors. His research, although deeply flawed and unscientific, was embraced by the German colonial administration, and Fischer's authority in racial ideology was established.

Upon returning to Germany, Fischer became a leader in eugenics, the political and social movement that sought to improve society by preventing births of "inferior" groups while promoting births of "superior" people. In 1921 he and two colleagues published an anthology titled The Principles of Human Heredity. It became a standard in the field of eugenics, and in 1924 a copy was presented to Adolf Hitler in Landsberg Prison during his incarceration for the failed overthrow of the Bavarian government. Hitler embraced Fischer's theories and incorporated them into his own book, Mein Kampf.

Fischer's rise to power was meteoric. In 1927 he secured his career as director of anthropology in the newly created Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Anthropology, Human Heredity, and Eugenics (KWI). After the Nazis came to power in 1933 Fischer began to teach Nazi "racial hygiene" to SS doctors, an elite cadre of Nazi physicians responsible for racial policy and implementation. The KWI became integral to the development of Nazi biological racism.

In the mid-1930s Fischer was informed of racially mixed children living in the Rhineland. These children were the offspring of white German mothers and French colonial soldiers from northern Africa who had been deployed to the Rhineland as a result of the 1919 Versailles Treaty at the end of World War I. Fischer's previous research on biracial children in German South-West Africa was brought to the forefront and he advocated drastic measures to prevent the destruction of the "Aryan" race, which he identified as a superior race of pure-blooded Germans. In 1935 Fischer met with several professors from KWI and the German Ministry of Interior to discuss sterilization of the 500–600 children in the Rhineland. Two years later Fischer's call to action was implemented when the children were brought into custody. Most were involuntarily sterilized, but some were sent for medical experimentation. Many died due to these surgical procedures and subsequent infections.

In June 1939 Fischer was invited to speak to Ruhr coal magnates in secret preparation for the forthcoming war. To promote the goals of Nazism, Fischer emphasized the danger of Jews and Africans, and called for support to protect the purity of the German race. One year later he decided to publish a book on his personal antisemitic philosophy. To supplement the text with images, he sent his assistant to the newly established Łódź ghetto to photograph the Jewish residents there.

As Germany commenced the mass murder of Jews during the invasion of the Soviet Union in the late summer and spring of 1941, Fischer was the guest of honor at the inaugural meeting of the Institute for Research on the Jewish Question. The agenda focused on the annihilation of European Jews. Soon thereafter, Fischer received an enormous grant to study twins and determine the importance of heredity over environment. To undertake this project, Fischer appointed his protégé, Baron Otmar von Verschuer, to lead the study.

In 1942 Fischer retired. Not wishing to leave his new post as director at KWI, Verschuer hired his former graduate student, Josef Mengele, to continue the twin research. Due to its unlimited supply of human subjects, Mengele was sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau in May 1943. There, he conducted pseudoscientific experiments on Jewish and Roma twins and dwarves.

In June 1944, as the Allies invaded France and as the gas chambers operated relentlessly at Birkenau, Fischer chaired the Anti-Jewish Congress in Kraków, Poland. Shortly after the war ended, Fischer was "denazified" (declared free from Nazi beliefs); he returned to Freiberg University, and in 1952 he was appointed honorary president of the German Anthropological Society. He died in Freiburg on July 9, 1967.

See also: Aryan; Eugenics; Kaiser Wilhelm Institute; Mein Kampf; Mengele, Josef; “Racial Hygiene”

Further Reading

Müller-Hill, Benno. Murderous Science: Elimination by Scientific Selection of Jews, Gypsies, and Others, Germany 1933–1945.

Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1988.

Fleischmann, Gisi

Gisi Fleischmann was a leader of Slovak Jewry during the Holocaust and one of the heads of the Bratislava Working Group, an underground organization dedicated to helping Jews through (among other things) the payment of large bribes to German and Slovak officials. The eldest of three children, she was born in Pressburg (Bratislava), Slovakia, in 1897 (her year of birth is also variously given as 1892 and 1895), to Julius Fischer and Jetty Elinger. She only had eight years of schooling, but when she had the chance taught herself German literature, history, and art history.

Slovakia, which was a Hungarian possession, became one half of the new state of Czechoslovakia in 1918, and a Nazi-imposed “Protectorate” in March 1939. When World War II broke out in September of that year, Gisi was away in London. She returned home to her husband and two daughters, sent the girls to Palestine, and then decided to remain in Bratislava where she would be able to assist the Jewish community.

A Zionist possessed of considerable natural leadership abilities, she found herself heading HICEM, a Jewish immigrant aid organization formed in 1927 by the merger of three earlier Jewish migration associations, HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society), ICA (Jewish Colonization Association), and Emigdirect. She was able to function in this capacity through Bratislava’s Ústredňa Židov, or Jewish Council.

In the summer of 1942 Gisi, working with ultra-Orthodox rabbi Chaim Michael Ber Weissmandl, started the so-called “Working Group” as a secret organization for rescuing Jews. The time was long past for emigration; now, sheer survival was the objective. Part of her activities involved liaising with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (known colloquially as the Joint), a task made difficult due to the fact that the United States had been involved in the war against Nazi Germany since December 1941, and that, as a result, financial transfers were next to impossible to arrange. Nonetheless, Gisi made arrangements to conduct a clandestine correspondence, in code, with numerous other Jewish organizations, particularly with Hechalutz (an association of Jewish youth whose aim was to train its members to settle the land in Israel), and with representatives of the Jewish Agency for Palestine stationed in Istanbul. To these and other organizations she provided alarming reports on the Jewish situation in Central and Eastern Europe. In 1943 she also directed rescue operations for Polish ghetto survivors, working to ferry groups of orphans across the borders of Poland, Slovakia, and Hungary.

Arguably the most important initiative of the Working Group was an audacious attempt to save Jewish lives that became known as the Europa Plan—which, though it did not succeed, would have rescued large numbers of Jews from Nazism. In pursuit of the plan, in late 1942 Rabbi Weissmandl and Gisi negotiated an agreement with the Nazis that saw a ransom of up to 2 million dollars being demanded to stop many of the transports heading to “the East”—which signified, in the eyes of those with insider knowledge, certain death. The idea was that Dieter Wisliceny, one of the key Jewish experts working for Adolf Eichmann, would receive the bribe. The promise of an initial payment (with more to come) seemed to work, and the deportation of Slovak Jewry was held back for a considerable period. In the long term, however, the plan failed; the bribe was pitched to Slovak officials rather than the Nazis, and it was they who checked the deportation process—something they could not do indefinitely.

Another ingredient marking the unfeasibility of the Europa Plan was the reluctance of the Joint and Hechalutz to devote money that would, directly or indirectly, go to the Nazis. The representative of the Joint in Switzerland, Saly Mayer, was especially wary about such a scheme, to say nothing of the legalities—of which he was all too aware—of how currency transfers in a time of war transgressed the Trading with the Enemy Act.

There was one area in which the Working Group was, however, successful: its distribution of the “Auschwitz Report” detailing the workings of the Auschwitz killing machinery as revealed by two escapees, Rudolf Vrba and Alfréd Wetzler. Escaping on April 7, 1944, the two had made their way to the Slovak Jewish Council in Žilina and presented their report and evidence. It was then copied and given to Reszó (Rudolf) Kasztner, head of the Zionist Aid and Rescue Committee in Bratislava, who passed it on to Rabbi Weissmandl and Gisi.

Weissmandl forwarded his version to a member of the Hungarian Foreign Ministry; from there, it reached George Mantello, a Jewish diplomat working for the Salvadoran consulate in Geneva. Through her own contacts, Gisi was able to see that the report made the press, and in the spring of 1944 she was therefore responsible for conveying the first eyewitness testimony on the death camps to the wider world.

On October 15, 1944, during the mass deportations of Jews taking place at that time, Gisi Fleischmann was arrested by the SS. At first she was taken to the concentration camp at Sered and offered her freedom if she gave up the names of all the Jews she then knew to be in hiding. When she declined to offer any names she was tortured, but she still refused to divulge any information. On October 17, 1944, she was sent on the last transport from Slovakia to Auschwitz. SS Hauptsturmführer Alois Brunner, assistant to Adolf Eichmann, ordered that the words “return undesirable” be placed on the deportation directive alongside her name. When the train arrived at Auschwitz on October 18, Gisi’s name was called and she was immediately taken away to the gas chambers by two SS officers. She was never seen again.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz Protocols; Rescuers of Jews; Resistance Movements; Slovakia

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. Jews for Sale? Nazi-Jewish Negotiations, 1933–1945. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.

Campion, Joan. In the Lion’s Mouth: Gisi Fleischmann & the Jewish Fight for Survival. Lincoln (NE): iUniverse, 2000.

Yad Vashem. “The Story of the Jewish Community in Bratislava,” at http://www.yadvashem.org/yv/en/exhibitions/communities/bratislava/working_group_activists.asp?WT.mc_id=wiki.

Flick Case

Criminal case involving five members of the Flick Concern, a group of German industrial enterprises that included coal mines and steel plants, who were charged with using slave labor and prisoners of war, deporting persons for forced labor in German-occupied territories, and plundering private property. The Flick Case, tried from April 19 to December 22, 1947, was the first trial of German industrialists after World War II.

On February 8, 1947, the Military Government, United States, tasked with administering the Allied sector of post-war Germany, indicted Friedrich Flick, the largest private German iron and steel manufacturer (and also Germany’s wealthiest man) and four associates, charging them with war crimes and crimes against humanity. Indicted along with Flick were SS Brigadier General Otto Steinbrinck, Flick’s chief deputy until 1939 when he became head of a government-owned company; Konrad Kaletsch, Flick’s cousin and the financial director of the Flick Concern; Bernhard Weiss, Flick’s nephew and one of the three principal executives operating the concern, and Dr. Herman Terberger, a member of the board of directors.

According to the indictment, all five defendants took part in and profited from the slave labor program. They were held to be responsible for the death or suffering of more than 10,000 French, Poles, and Russians, as well as workers of other nationalities, who had been forced to work in terrible conditions where food and shelter were at a bare minimum. Four of the men were charged with taking part in the plunder of occupied territories and of planning such plunder in advance of military operations; Terberger was not charged on this count. Documents captured by the Allies showed that Flick and his associates, along with six other steel companies, tried to coerce the German government into confiscating mills from French owners after the Germans had invaded France in 1940. The company gained possession of the Rombach ore mines in France and a railroad car plant in Riga, Latvia, using this tactic.

Flick, Steinbrinck, and Kaletsch were also charged with profiting from the process of Aryanization of Jewish property, including the acquisition of coal mines belonging to Julius and Ignatz Petschek of Czechoslovakia. The prosecution included this charge as a crime against humanity because the Flick Concern would pressure Jewish owners to sell their property at less than fair-market value. In a maneuver to make the transactions appear more proper, the German government took possession of the property before passing it on to the Flick Concern. In a document obtained by the prosecution, Flick wrote in November 1939, “these transactions could later on become the subject of the inquiry of an international court.”

The fourth count of the indictment charged Flick and Steinbrinck with supporting the criminal activities of the SS by contributing large sums to and being members of Heinrich Himmler’s “Circle of Friends.” Flick and his associates were not charged with crimes against the peace because of the problems gathering evidence across the four zones of occupation in Germany. Steinbrinck was charged alone on the fifth count of being a member of the SS from 1933 until the end of the war.

Judge Charles B. Sears from the Court of Appeals of the State of New York presided over the trial held in Nuremberg, Germany. On December 22, 1947, the tribunal announced its verdict. Flick was convicted of all charges except the charge involving Aryanization of Jewish property; the tribunal dismissed this charge against all defendants on the grounds that it was not a “crime against humanity.” Steinbrinck was pronounced guilty on two of the five counts; he was convicted for being a member of the SS and funding Himmler’s Circle of Friends. Weiss also was convicted on two counts. The other defendants were acquitted.

In delivering the verdicts, the judges made a number of statements about the legality of the trial as well as expressing some compassion for the defendants. Judge Sears stated that “the court was not a tribunal of the United States” or a court-martial or military commission, but instead an international tribunal established by the International Control Council under Control Council Law 10. The verdict also appeared to be critical of the prosecution. The judges noted that Flick knew about the July 1944 attempt on Adolf Hitler’s life and had sheltered one of the conspirators, and that Steinbrinck, as a U-boat commander, had risked his life and his crew to rescue survivors from a ship he had sunk. The tribunal pointed out that Flick and his associates had risked clashes with Nazi leaders to provide better food, shelter, and clothing to the concern’s laborers. The defendants’ most deplorable act, according to the verdict, was that some of the profits gained through the work of slave laborers went to fund Himmler’s SS.

At the reading of the verdict, Flick announced that he had committed no crimes. He explained his relationship with the German government: “After the [Nazi] seizure of power, every industrialist in the long run had to get into some sort of relationship with the new holders of power.” He argued that he had either to work with the Nazis or risk financial ruin or death. Sentenced to seven years in prison, dating from his original capture on June 13, 1945, Flick was released from Landsberg prison in 1950, his sentence reduced for good behavior. After his release, he worked to build another financial empire. At his death in 1972 Flick was again Germany’s richest man.

JOHN DAVID RAUSCH JR.

See also: Crimes against Humanity; I.G. Farben; Krupp Case; War Crimes

Further Reading

Stallboumer, L. M. “Big Business and the Persecution of the Jews: The Flick Concern and the ‘Aryanization’ of Jewish Property before the War.” Holocaust and Genocide Studies 13 (1999): 1–27.

Stokes, Raymond. Divide and Prosper: The Heirs of I.G. Farben under Allied Authority, 1945–1951. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Trials of War Criminals before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law: “The Flick Case.” 6, 10. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1952.

Flossenbürg

Flossenbürg was a Nazi concentration and forced labor camp system first built in the spring of 1938. It was situated outside the village of Flossenbürg in northeastern Bavaria, not far from the Czech border. The area had large deposits of granite, which the Germans hoped they could quarry using forced labor from the camp. Flossenbürg’s main camp received its first prisoners—100 individuals from the Dachau concentration camp—on May 3, 1938. Administered by the SS, the camp was first designed to be a prison for German men who were considered “asocial” as well as for repeat criminal offenders. By the end of the year the prison population had grown to 1,500. Prior to 1944 few Jews were sent to Flossenbürg.

In early 1940 Czech and Polish prisoners began arriving at the camp, including resistance fighters. By the end of 1941 Flossenbürg had 3,150 detainees; an additional 1,750 Soviet prisoners of war were housed in a separate facility within the camp grounds. More political prisoners and resistance operatives arrived during 1942 and 1943, including those from France, Germany, the Soviet Union, and the Netherlands. Detainees worked in the nearby quarries, but as the war progressed, more were put to work in German aircraft factories and an SS-operated weaving shop. Nearly 100 subcamps were erected to accommodate these workers, all under the Flossenbürg umbrella.

Beginning in August 1944, when perhaps only 100 Jews had been imprisoned at Flossenbürg, there was a mass concentration of mainly Polish and Hungarian Jews at the camp, who would number at least 10,000 by January 1945. In the winter of 1945 another 13,000 Jews flooded Flossenbürg and its subcamps. Many had been forcibly moved from camps in the east as Soviet troops pushed German forces toward the west. The camp’s population had now swelled to nearly 40,000, including some 11,000 women, and peaked at 53,000 (with 14,500 in the main camp) in March 1945.

Conditions were horrific. Meager food rations, lack of proper sanitary facilities, and virtually no medical care doomed thousands to death from starvation, disease, or overwork. Beatings and harsh punishments killed hundreds

Flossenbürg was a German concentration camp located in Bavaria near the border with Czechoslovakia. It was built in May 1938 by the SS. More than 96,000 prisoners passed through the camp prior to its liberation in April 1945. At least 30,000 lost their lives at the camp during its existence. This image shows units of the U.S. First Infantry Division at the time of the liberation on May 8, 1945. (Galerie Bilderwelt/Getty Images) of others, and the more senior inmates, most of them habitual criminals who had been locked up for years, preyed on newer detainees. Rape and sexual exploitation were commonplace, and the corrupt camp administration did nothing to stop such activities.

The mortality rate at Flossenbürg, while never reaching the levels seen at death camps, was nonetheless shocking. In 1941 more than 1,000 Soviet prisoners of war were executed there. That same year 500 Poles were shot dead, and in March 1945, 13 Allied prisoners of war were hanged, including one American. These deaths did not include the thousands who died in other ways; the total number who died at Flossenbürg and its subcamps is estimated to be about 30,000 (of whom 3,515 were Jews), out of a total of 97,000 who had been in the camp at one time or another.

In April 1945, as U.S. troops closed in on Flossenbürg, the Nazis ordered an immediate evacuation. All able-bodied prisoners were sent on a forced march toward Dachau; those unable to undertake the journey were shot or left for dead. At least 7,000 detainees died in this process, principally by starvation and exhaustion. When Flossenbürg was finally liberated on April 23, U.S. troops found just 1,500 people—many of them wracked by hunger and disease.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Concentration Camps; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Weiss, Helga

Further Reading

Abzug, Robert. Inside the Vicious Heart: Americans and the Liberation of Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies

An archive housed at Yale University's Sterling Memorial Library, which has catalogued interviews with some 4,500 Holocaust witnesses and survivors since 1979. The Fortunoff Video Archive is officially part of the university's Department of Manuscripts and Archives. The program was among the first to use videotape to conduct interviews with witnesses to a significant historical event. It has also served as a model for other video archives which have documented more recent genocides, including those in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, among others.

The genesis of the archive was the videotaping of four Holocaust survivors in Connecticut in May 1979. Involved in those initial interviews were television journalist Laurel Vlock and Dori Laub, a psychiatrist and child Holocaust survivor. The next month, the Holocaust Survivors Film Project (HSFP) was formed at Yale and was overseen by Geoffrey Hartman, a Yale English professor. More interviews were conducted, and in 1980 HSFP received a New York Emmy Award for its documentary titled Forever Yesterday. By 1981, 183 separate interviews had been catalogued in the Yale library. In 1987 HSFP was renamed for Alan A. Fortunoff, who provided the program with a generous endowment.

In 1991 University of Illinois professor Lawrence Langer wrote a critically acclaimed book, Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memory, which was based on the author's analysis of the archive's interviews. In May 2000 the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) aired Witnesses: Voices from the Holocaust, based on videos from the Fortunoff collection. The Yale library began digitizing its video collection in February 2011, a process that will ensure its preservation in perpetuity.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also

Survivor Testimony; USC Shoah Foundation

Further Reading

Langer, Lawrence. Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memory. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993.

Yale University. <http://web.library.yale.edu/testimonies/about>.

Fossoli di Carpi

During World War II the Italian fascist government of Benito Mussolini constructed a network of camps and prisons to house enemy soldiers captured during warfare in Europe and North Africa. An ally of Nazi Germany, Italian camps held many Allied prisoners of war sent from the North African campaign.

Six kilometers outside the small northern Italian city of Carpi, fascist authorities erected a camp on former farmland in May 1942 to house British soldiers captured in North Africa. From May 1942 to September 1943 Italian fascist forces interned some 5,000 enemy soldiers at Fossoli.

During Fossoli's use as a prisoner of war camp, Italy had operated as an autonomous ally to Germany. However, following the Allied invasion of southern Italy in September 1943 and Mussolini's subsequent overthrow, the Italian government abandoned its German partnership and on September 8, 1943, declared allegiance to the Allies. Germany responded by invading Italy and occupying all of northern Italy as far south as Rome. This included a German takeover of Fossoli. The German arrival heralded the mass deportation of some 5,000 prisoners of war to forced labor camps in Eastern Europe. After deporting all of the POWs, the Germans left Fossoli and instructed local government officials in Carpi to clean and prepare the camp for the arrival of Jewish prisoners.

The first Jews arrived at Fossoli on December 5, 1943. In addition to Jews, Italians arrested for their opposition to fascist and Nazi policies were also sent to Fossoli. The Jews and political prisoners were separated into different sections of the camp. Italian fascist authorities (those still loyal to Mussolini and Nazi causes) monitored and guarded prisoners from December 5, 1944, to March 15, 1945. During this period, four deportations of Jewish prisoners occurred. The first convoy of 83 prisoners departed Fossoli for Bergen-Belsen on January 26, 1944, and was followed by another transport of 69 Jews to Bergen-Belsen on February 19. The first deportation to Auschwitz of 517 Jews left the Carpi train station on February 22, 1944. The final deportation during the Italian-run period of Fossoli departed on March 12 carrying 71 individuals to an unknown destination.

The Germans took over control of Fossoli from the Italians on March 15, 1944. Under German command, an additional 2,032 Jews were deported to the Nazi camps of Auschwitz (1,821), Bergen-Belsen (171), Buchenwald (21), and Ravensbrück (19). German and Italian forces also deported an unknown number of political and civilian prisoners prior to the camp's closure in August 1944. The camp functioned briefly thereafter, from August to November 1944, as a transit camp for forced labor to German occupied territories.

ALEXIS HERR

See also: Concentration Camps; Italy

Further Reading

Lamb, Richard. War in Italy, 1943–1945: A Brutal Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 1996.

Ori, Anna Maria. Il Campo di Fossoli: Da campo di prigionia e deportazione a luogo di memoria 1942–2004. Carpi, Italy: Stampa Nuovagrafica, 2008.

Weinberg, Gerhard L. Germany, Hitler, and World War II. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

France

Prior to the outbreak of World War II, France was a liberal country, especially as an asylum for Jewish immigrants coming from Eastern Europe. Jewish immigrants who entered France after World War I brought a thriving cultural center to Paris. France, however, made the decision to close its doors when the leaders of the Third Republic (1870–1940) stated they could no longer support the refugees fleeing Nazi Germany and the Spanish Civil War. The French authorities set up internment camps for refugees by 1939 and imposed limitations on immigration.

The influx of Jewish immigrants and rising unemployment revived antisemitism in France. Charles Maurras, the leader of the right-wing political group Action Française, distributed an antisemitic newspaper bearing the same name. The newspaper called for the end of Jews as political opponents and demanded the assassination of Léon Blum, the Jewish leader of the Socialist Party. By the late 1930s Action Française was read by 650,000 people, thus illustrating the popularity of antisemitism in France at this time.

The government of Edouard Daladier, the president from April 1938 to March 1940, accelerated the laws of exclusion and discrimination, paving the way for the even harsher anti-Jewish laws put in place by the collaborationist regime at Vichy following the German occupation. Under Daladier, French police were given the power to fine and imprison illegal immigrants. They were ordered to send illegal immigrant Jews back to Germany. Immigrants had restrictions placed on their voting rights; they were placed under surveillance and provided with a centralized identity card. Foreigners who were deemed unworthy of the title of French citizen were stripped of their French nationality. The internment camps set up for refugees and illegal immigrants by the Daladier government were later used by the Vichy regime as transit and deportation camps to send both French and foreign Jews to their deaths in Auschwitz.

The German invasion of France took place on May 10, 1940, and the Third Republic collapsed under the German attack. France's capital city, Paris, fell to the Nazis on June 14, 1940. Adolf Hitler had not expected to conquer France in six weeks, and he had no plans for a relocation of populations as he had in Poland. Thus, the problems of occupation were dealt with as they arrived.

On June 22, 1940, an armistice was signed between the Third Reich and the government of Marshal Philippe Pétain, France's leading military commander during World War I. France was divided into unoccupied and occupied zones, and the eastern provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, which shared borders with Germany, were annexed to the Third Reich. Northern and western France was occupied by the German army and the area was administered in conjunction with occupied Belgium under the leadership of a military commander (Militärbefehlshaber). General Otto von Stülpnagel held this position from October 1940 until March 1942. Later, the region was placed under the control of his cousin, General Karl-Heinrich Stülpnagel, until his arrest for attempting to assassinate Hitler during the infamous Bomb Plot of July 20, 1944.

A government collaborating with the Nazis was set up in southern France with its capital located in the resort town of Vichy, controlled by Marshal Pétain and his prime minister, Pierre Laval. Vichy remained in control of French North Africa, which included Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia. The Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), under the leadership and direction of SS Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann, aimed to bring the Vichy government into line with the regulations as enforced in the Reich, including the "Jewish problem." It was not difficult for Vichy to implement anti-Jewish sentiments, as Pétain's government was able to make use of the Third Republic's existing administration and legal apparatus, utilizing already established antisemitic and xenophobic views regarding Jewish immigrants and refugees that prevailed across many sectors of society.

During the interwar period France had a population of about 150,000 Jews. Due to the influx of Jewish refugees from Germany, the population in France increased, to the point where an estimated 300,000 Jews lived in France just prior to the German invasion—less than half of whom were French citizens. When war was declared on September 3, 1939, French Jews, along with men from the general population, were mobilized into the French military. Many foreign Jews enlisted as volunteers, as they did when France went to war in 1914. However, in 1939 Jewish refugees from Germany were interned as enemy aliens, and while most of them were confident that France would defend them against Nazi Germany, many foreign Jews fled to the unoccupied zone after July 1940.

Jews in the occupied zone were subject to antisemitic measures modeled from Nazi Germany. Beginning in August 1941, Jews were banned from owning a bicycle or a radio; from February 1942 they were subjected to a curfew, only allowed to travel on a designated carriage on the metro, and could shop only between the hours of 3:00 and 4:00 p.m. They were banned from all public places and forced by French police to wear the yellow star; this latter measure was mandatory in the occupied zone for all Jews over the age of six, in a process that was intended to aid with the registration and recording of Jews for future roundups and deportations.

The armistice agreement between Nazi Germany and the newly established Vichy government indicated that the Germans intended to apply their anti-Jewish racial laws to France and its North African territories. The Vichy regime quickly and enthusiastically implemented the first anti-Jewish measures in the fall of 1940, applying the new laws in France's occupied zone. However, the anti-Jewish policy created by the Vichy authorities went beyond what was demanded of them by the Germans, and they implemented their strict laws without German pressure to do so.

Between September 1940 and June 1942 a number of anti-Jewish measures were passed by Vichy, known as the Statut des Juifs. Raphael Alibert, Vichy's minister of justice and a former Action Française sympathizer, drafted the first statute. Alibert was backed by Pétain, who fully supported the exclusion of Jews from public posts.

The statutes included such instruments as expanding the category of who was considered to be a Jew, forbidding free negotiation of Jewish-owned capital, confiscating radios in Jewish possession, deporting or executing Jewish members of the resistance movement, establishment of a curfew for Jews, forbidding Jews to change their place of residence, and prohibiting Jewish access to public areas. In the unoccupied zone, the wearing of the star was not employed due to a fear of a negative public reaction (though a person's Jewish identity was marked on their identification papers). In July 1941 Vichy ordered a census of all the Jews in the unoccupied zone, which provided a foundation for the Germans to keep track of Jews in the unoccupied zone after Germany took over the whole of France in 1943.

In April 1941 the Vichy government established a Commissariat Général aux Questions Juives (Commissariat-General for Jewish Affairs). This organization worked with the German authorities in order to "Aryanize" Jewish businesses in the occupied zone. They also managed the seizure of Jewish assets and organized anti-Jewish propaganda. At the same time, the Germans were collecting registers of Jews throughout the occupied zone. The anti-Jewish laws of 1941 systematized the registration of Jews across the country, including Vichy controlled North Africa.

Vichy's definition of Jewishness differed from that of the Nazis. A person was considered Jewish if he or she had three grandparents, or two Jewish grandparents and were married to a Jew. An individual's religion did not matter; Vichy continued to classify a person as Jewish even if he or she converted to Christianity. Vichy continued to extend its definition of Jewishness in 1941 and again in 1942.

The Jews in France were deported to the East at the height of a two-year process of persecution and aggressive legislation. Beginning in the winter of 1940 and lasting through 1941, French Jews began to be imprisoned in concentration camps. Thousands of Jews were incarcerated in camps in Paris and the surrounding areas and southwestern France. In March 1942 approximately 1,000 Jews were arrested and sent to the Compiègne detention camp, from where they were deported to Auschwitz.

In July 1942 Jews were arrested, imprisoned, and guarded by the French police, who also conducted roundups such as at the Vél' d'Hiv, where French authorities arrested more than 13,000 foreign Jews in Paris in a process that was organized by French authorities and carried out by French police. With the Vél' d'Hiv roundup, the French authorities went above and beyond German demands regarding the deportation of French Jews, especially by including babies and children. Overall, by the end of September 1942 almost 38,000 Jews had been deported to Auschwitz from France, and between 1942 and 1944 about 63,000 Jews were deported from the Drancy internment camp located in the northeast suburb of Paris—a camp that had been established for the specific purpose of holding Jews prior to their deportation to the extermination camps in Poland.

In November 1942 German and Italian forces occupied the Vichy zone. In their area of occupation in southeastern France, the Italians refused to enforce antisemitic legislation or hand Jews over to German officials, and they sought to protect the Jews who fled there seeking refuge. However, in September 1943, after Italy capitulated to the Allies, the German authorities took over the Italian zone and began rounding up the Jews who had found refuge there.

The Germans reinstated transports of Jews from France in January 1943 and continued these deportations until the Allies had begun to liberate France. The last transport left Drancy on August 17, 1944, while the battle for Paris was being fought. During the war nearly 80,000 Jews were deported from France. Of these, 70,000 were sent to Auschwitz. The remainder were sent to Majdanek, Sobibór, and Buchenwald. By the end of the war, just 2,000 of those who were deported had survived.

The Allied landing in Normandy on June 6, 1944, initiated the liberation of France. The French Resistance aided tremendously in this effort. On August 25, 1944, German forces in Paris surrendered, and on the following day General Charles de Gaulle, the leader of the Free French Forces, triumphantly took the French capital.

Following the liberation, de Gaulle's Provisional Government began a series of trials against leading Vichy officials. Pierre Laval was convicted of treason and executed. Marshal Pétain was also condemned to death on treason charges; however, de Gaulle commuted his sentence to life in prison due to his age and service during World War I.

Throughout France there were individuals who refused defeat and collaboration with Nazi Germany. Free France and its Free French Forces (France Libre and Forces Françaises Libres) was organized in exile in the United Kingdom, while various resistance movements emerged in both the occupied and unoccupied zones.

General de Gaulle, who rejected the armistice Pétain had concluded with Nazi Germany in June 1940, escaped to Britain and established Free France in London, from where he established his military arm, the Free French Forces. By the end of the war these forces mustered over 1,300,000, making it the fourth largest military presence in Europe. Free French forces fought against the Axis powers from 1940 onward, as well as organizing and supporting the Resistance in occupied France.

By 1944 there were approximately 100,000 members of various resistance movements in France, including Jewish resistance groups such as the Organisation Juive de Combat (OJC). The resistance organization Armée Juive hid Jews, especially Jewish children, while other members sought to enable their escape from France. The Jewish resistance in France established an organized response to the persecution of Jews in France, an issue that was not on the agenda of the broader French Resistance movement. The Jewish resistance played a very important role in rescuing French Jewry and left a lasting impact on the Jewish response to the Holocaust in France.

Free France led the way for de Gaulle's immense impact on the future of France, as leader of its provisional government and first president of the French Fifth Republic. The Free French Forces assisted with Operation Torch in North Africa in November 1942 and the liberation of France by the Allies in 1944.

JESSICA EVERS

See also: Action Française; Armée Juive; Aryization; Barbie, Klaus; Bingham, Harry; Bloch, Marc; Bunel, Lucien-Louis; Channel Islands; Cohn, Marianne; Collaboration; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Delbo, Charlotte; De Sousa Mendes, Aristides; Drancy; Fry, Varian; Gunden, Lois; Laval, Pierre; Manstein, Erich von; Marie-Benoît, Père; Munich Agreement; Museums and Memorials; Natzweiler-Struthof; Pétain, Philippe; Vichy France; World War II, Outbreak of

Further Reading

- Gildea, Robert. Fighters in the Shadows: A New History of the French Resistance. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2015.
- Gildea, Robert. Marianne in Chains: Everyday Life in the French Heartland under the German Occupation. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2002.
- Kedward, Roderick. Occupied France: Collaboration and Resistance, 1940–1944. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985.
- Laub, Thomas J. After the Fall: German Policy in Occupied France, 1940–1944. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.
- Zuccotti, Susan. The Holocaust, the French, and the Jews. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Frank, Anne

One of the millions of victims of the Nazi Holocaust against the Jews during World War II, Anne Frank kept a diary that has become the most well-known document of human strength in the face of unrestrained oppression, as well as one of the most controversial memoirs from the era.

Anneliese Marie Frank was born on June 12, 1929, in Frankfurt am Main, Germany. Her parents, Otto and Edith

Anne Frank was a German-born diarist of the Holocaust who lived with her family in hiding in Amsterdam. Her diary, in which she related her life from 1942 to 1944, was published after her death in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. One of the best-known victims of the Holocaust, her diary has been studied by countless numbers of young people throughout the world. (Library of Congress)

Frank, already had one other daughter, three-year-old Margot, and soon the Great Depression forced the well-to-do family into tight economic conditions. For the first few years of Anne's life, her parents struggled to maintain themselves financially. In 1933, when the Nazi Party came to power in Germany and Jews began to feel the effects of discrimination under the regime, Otto decided to relocate his family to Amsterdam in the Netherlands, where he had business and personal contacts. By March 1934 the entire Frank family was living in the Dutch capital.

From 1934 until 1940 Anne enjoyed a comfortable life with her family. Her father was making a decent living as the promoter of a food concern, and she enjoyed attending Montessori School. However, in 1940 Germany invaded the Netherlands and quickly occupied the country. With this occupation came the implementation of anti-Jewish legislation and severe repression of the Jewish community. By the fall of 1941 Jewish schoolchildren were removed from their schools and segregated into Jewish-only schools, while Jewish adults were actively forced out of business ownership in Holland. For the Frank family, life became far more restrictive in the country they believed would be a safe haven from Nazi oppression.

The turning point for the Franks came on July 5, 1942, when Margot received a notice that she was to report to a "labor camp" for national service. Realizing that this meant deportation to a concentration camp, Otto decided to place his family into hiding. With the help of a few key friends and neighbors, the Franks hid in a small attic annex at 263 Prinsengracht Street on July 6, 1942. They were soon joined by another Jewish family, Auguste and Hermann van Pels and their son Peter, as well as another Jewish acquaintance, Fritz Pfeffer. Together, these eight people lived in hiding until they were discovered by the police on August 4, 1944.

During their two years underground, Anne kept an elaborate diary that detailed the families' secret life—lived mostly at night—as well as her own adolescent viewpoints of the situation in which she found herself. Tensions between the eight people crammed into two small rooms flared at times, but Anne's diary also relays a sense of urgency and understanding that their precarious situation could only be maintained with mutual cooperation and respect.

Although the diary expresses hope that the Allies would liberate Europe before the families were discovered, the betrayal of the Franks and the others to the police led to their deportations to a variety of concentration and death camps.

On August 8, 1944, the Frank and van Pels families, along with Pfeffer, were deported to Westerbork. One month later that camp was liquidated, and the prisoners were sent to Auschwitz in Poland. In October 1944 Anne and Margot were deported from Auschwitz to Bergen-Belsen in Germany, where they died sometime in February or March 1945. Their mother Edith died in Auschwitz, but their father Otto survived to be liberated from that camp in January 1945.

In June 1945 Otto returned to Amsterdam, where friends gave him his daughter's diary. Overwhelmed by its insight and compelling account of life in hiding, Otto became determined to present it to the world. In this, he was inspired by his daughter's own dreams. In an entry dated March 29, 1944, for example, Anne referred to a call from Radio Oranje that memoirs and diaries from the war be published at its end. Anticipating her own survival, she immediately began to rewrite her diary for public consumption. Otto thus spent the next two years preparing the manuscript for publication, and in the summer of 1947 The Diary of Anne Frank was published in Dutch. By 1952 English, German, and French editions were published. The diary was subsequently translated into more than 50 languages. The Diary of Anne Frank quickly became a sensation, selling out countless editions, and was adapted into a successful play and film as well.

However, controversy has also surrounded the diary. Literary rights were disputed between a variety of publishers, authors, and Otto. Moreover, many historians have been dismayed at the liberties taken by artists over the life of Anne, while others have argued that because she did not write about the most horrific aspects of the war, her diaries should not be the most utilized testament to the Holocaust. In 1986 the Netherlands State Institute for War Documentation published all versions of the diaries in one complete edition, allowing scholars the chance to compare the initial diaries with the revised version that Frank began before her deportation. Since then, attention has turned toward reflections about the impact of Anne's word rather than solely toward reconstructing her life and intentions.

However controversial, the diary of Anneliese Frank is the most well-known document of the Holocaust and continues to inspire many throughout the world. The building where the Franks hid is now the home of the Anne Frank House, an international organization aimed at educating the world's youth to reject racism and discrimination. Although she died in 1945, Anne Frank's words continue to educate, inspire, and provoke millions to remember the tragedies of World War II.

NANCY STOCKDALE

See also: Anne Frank House; Children during the Holocaust; Denial of the Holocaust; Generalgouvernement; Gies, Miep; Harster, Wilhelm; Netherlands; Nuremberg Trials; Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Barnouw, David, and Gerrold Van Der Stroom (Eds.). The Diary of Anne Frank: The Critical Edition. New York: Doubleday, 1989.

Enzer, Hyman A., and Sandra Solotaroff-Enzer (Eds.). Anne Frank: Reflections on Her Life and Legacy. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Rittner, Carol (Ed.). Anne Frank in the World: Essays and Reflections. Armonk (NY): M. E. Sharpe, 1997.

Frank, Hans

Hans Michael Frank, the “Butcher of Poland,” was born on May 23, 1900, in Karlsruhe, the son of a lawyer who encouraged his son to follow in his footsteps. In 1917 he joined the German Army and served briefly in World War I, though he barely experienced combat. Disillusioned by Germany's defeat, at first he joined the mystical Thule Society led by Walter Nauhaus, a wounded veteran and art student, and occultist Rudolf Freiherr von Sebottendorff (the alias of Adam Alfred Rudolf Glauer). He also joined the rightist nationalist Freikorps (“Free Corps”) led by veteran Franz Ritter von Epp, in which he battled communists and others perceived as “enemies of Germany.” By 1919 he was already a member of the Deutsche Arbeiterpartei (“German Workers Party,” or DAP) which would soon mutate into the National Socialist German Workers Party—the Nazi Party—which he formally joined in 1923, becoming a member of the paramilitary Sturmabteilung (SA). In November of that year he participated in the ill-fated Beer Hall Putsch in Munich, only to flee to Austria and return a year later after the Bavarian government decided not to pursue further legal action after sentencing Adolf Hitler to Landsberg Prison. (Sentenced to five years, Hitler would serve less than one year, using the time to hone his political skills and write/dictate his political autobiography Mein Kampf to his secretary, Rudolf Hess.) Because of his legal knowledge and commitment, Frank very quickly rose to prominence in Hitler's inner circle, and later he became the Führer's personal legal adviser as well as the party's lawyer and defense attorney when circumstances warranted it.

In 1930 Frank was elected to the Reichstag (Parliament), and after Hitler's ascent to power on January 30, 1933, he was appointed minister of justice for Bavaria, becoming also the president of the Academy of German Law. In 1928 he had already founded the National Association of German Jurists, with himself as president. His commitment to the power of law and its proper implementation found him initially at odds with Hitler and opposed not only to extrajudicial murders at Dachau but, more significantly, to Hitler's elimination of his rivals, including Ernst Röhm, during the "Night of the Long Knives" from June 30 to July 2, 1934.

Prior to Germany's invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Frank was appointed chief of administration to the German military led by Field Marshal Gerd von Runstedt. With military success came a new assignment: governor-general of the Occupied Polish Territories, approximately 56,000 square miles in an area that became known as the Generalgouvernement; with this came the new rank of SS Obergruppenführer (lieutenant general). Among his primary responsibilities were the segregation of Jews into ghetto and extermination camps (the latter of which he would claim ignorance of at his trial) and the forced labor of Poles; chief among the former was the notorious Warsaw Ghetto and the Belzec, Treblinka, Majdanek, and Sobibór extermination camps. Regarding the fate of the Jews, he would inform his senior staff in a speech on December 16, 1941: "We must annihilate the Jews wherever we find them and whenever it is possible."

Attempting to flee from the Allies at the end of the war, Frank was arrested by American troops on May 3, 1945, at Tegernsee, Bavaria. Initially beaten, he attempted to commit suicide not once but twice. He was then transferred to Nuremberg to await trial before the International Military Tribunal. As an aid to his defense, he willingly turned over the 43 volumes of his diaries and returned to his Roman Catholic roots under the guidance of the priest at Nuremberg, Franciscan father Sixtus O'Connor, OFM. The charges against him were numerous: he held a position of leadership in the Nazi Party and in the German government; he promoted the seizure of power by the Nazis through his maneuvering in the field of law; as governor-general of Poland he committed war crimes and crimes against humanity; he advocated and administered a program of exterminating Jews of Polish nationality; and he imposed upon the population of the Generalgouvernement a reign of terror, oppression, impoverishment, and starvation.

Found guilty of all charges on October 1, 1946, Frank was hanged on October 16. His last recorded words were: "I am thankful for the kind treatment during my captivity and I ask God to accept me with mercy."

The final judgment, however, was that written by the youngest of his five children, Niklas Frank, who would publish his stinging critique and rebuke of his father in Germany in 1987, in a book titled Der Vater: Eine Abrechnung ("The Father: A Settling of Accounts"). This was published in English in 1991 as In the Shadow of the Reich. In this work he described his father as "a slime-hole of a Hitler fanatic."

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Death Camps; Ghettos; Madagascar Plan; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nisko Plan; Nuremberg Trials; Poland; Schutzhaft; Sturmabteilung

Further Reading

Frank, Niklas. In the Shadow of the Reich. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1991.

Housden, Martyn. Hans Frank, Lebensraum and the Holocaust. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.

O'Connor, Garry. The Butcher of Poland: Hitler's Lawyer Hans Frank. Stroud (UK): Spellmount, 2014.

Winstone, Martin. The Dark Heart of Hitler's Europe: Nazi Rule in Poland under the General Government. London: I. B. Tauris, 2014.

Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial

The Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, held in Frankfurt, Germany, between December 1963 and August 1965, brought charges of murder against 20 lower-level Nazi officers and other camp functionaries at Auschwitz-Birkenau. Its result—as a legal decision and an educational opportunity—is controversial and generally considered to have been less than a success.

The term "Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial" can be subject to some confusion because there were trials held earlier that also focused on Auschwitz and are referred to as Auschwitz trials. In March 1947 a trial was held in Warsaw by the Polish Supreme National Tribunal. Among the defendants at that trial was Rudolf Höss, the first and longest serving commandant of Auschwitz. In another trial by the Polish Supreme National Tribunal, this one in Kraków, held during the last months of 1947, some 40 officers and other staff were charged with various offenses. This trial is often referred to as the First Auschwitz Trial. This explains why the trial in Frankfurt in the 1960s is sometimes referred to as the Second Auschwitz Trial.

The Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial of 1963–1965 was the most important trial of Holocaust perpetrators held in West Germany. Twenty-four defendants were indicted, with 20 remaining at the end of the trial (the other four either died or their trials were separated for reasons of health). Although the 20 defendants were low-level functionaries (as compared to the two prior trials held in 1947 in Poland, and certainly as compared to the trial of major war criminals in Nuremberg), the trial generated widespread attention throughout Germany. Coming as it did shortly after the trial of Adolf Eichmann in Israel in 1961, the trial was to produce irrefutable evidence of the horrors of the Holocaust, and perhaps become a cause of self-examination by the millions of Germans who were directly or indirectly involved in the Final Solution.

The lead prosecutor was Fritz Bauer, the Hessian State attorney general. Some 360 witnesses—more than 200 of whom were Auschwitz survivors—testified over 183 days, resulting in seven convictions of murder—six of which resulted in sentences of life in prison (the death penalty was not allowed) and one of 10 years in juvenile detention—and 10 convictions of accessory to murder, with sentences ranging from three-and-a-quarter to 14 years in prison. Three of the defendants were acquitted.

Two controversies surrounding this trial have caused some to consider it a failure, except in the narrowest sense. The first issue dealt with the legal code under which the trial was held. Normally, postwar trials like this would be required to be conducted under Allied Control Council Law No. 10, issued on December 20, 1945, which would have allowed the court to consider charges of “crimes against humanity.” However, on May 5, 1955, German courts were granted autonomy, including the right to determine the legal code under which they would adjudicate cases. This led to the critical decision to conduct this trial under ordinary German criminal law based on the German penal code of 1871. This meant that the law that would apply to the actions of the defendants in the killing factory that was Auschwitz would be the same as would apply to a charge of murder of an individual on the streets of Berlin.

This, in turn, meant that the defendants would be charged with either murder or accessory to murder. Murder, which carried a potential sentence of life in prison, was very difficult to prove under the German penal code because it required that the act be committed on the basis of a limited number of motives. In the absence of proof of intent based on one of the stipulated motives, only the charge of accessory to murder could be considered. According to the German penal code in effect at the time of the trial, mitigating factors were allowed to be taken into account when sentencing a defendant who had been found guilty of accessory to murder, whereas no mitigating factors could be taken into account when sentencing a defendant found guilty of murder. Being convicted of accessory to murder rather than murder resulted in significantly lighter sentences, as seen above.

As a result of these provisions of German criminal law, a common defense presented by defendants who had killed was to try to show that they did so for reasons other than those on the list of motives that attach to the charge of murder. So, defendants admitting to the act of killing but arguing that it was not motivated for any of the reasons necessary to prove murder were shielded, if the defense prevailed, from the possibility of life sentences.

One of the motives that could give rise to an act of murder was that the act was done for “base motives.” Absent an admission by the defendant, base motives could be inferred only if the defendant’s actions were cruel and excessive. As applied to Auschwitz, this meant that only those defendants who killed in an “excessive manner”—that is, with excessive force or cruelty—could be guilty of murder. Further, killing in an excessive manner was deemed to occur only when the killing was done without orders, that is, on the initiative of the defendant.

This gave rise to the bizarre result that a defendant who was not ordered to but nonetheless beat a single person to death could be found guilty of murder, but a defendant involved in the killing of millions of innocent victims—but who was acting in accordance with orders, meaning their behavior was not excessive and, therefore, base motives could not be inferred—could not be found guilty of murder, but only of being an accessory to murder, with its lighter sentences.

The second issue that made this trial so controversial was a conflict between those who saw the Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial strictly as a legal process to determine the guilt or innocence of 20 individuals accused of particular crimes and those who saw an opportunity to educate the German public to the broader systemic nature of the killing apparatus—and the social responsibility that affixes to society as a whole.

In the former group, in addition to the defense attorneys generally, was, most importantly, Presiding Judge Hans Hofmeyer, who viewed this simply as a criminal trial in no need of an examination of the broader picture in which the charged crimes took place. The position of the latter group—that this trial should be used as a national teaching moment—was most clearly espoused by several on the prosecution side of the case. For example, Bauer envisioned a trial that would have a profound effect on the German people, one that would bring an awareness of the full scope of the horror of Auschwitz and the related issues of individual and group responsibility. Given that the presiding judge rejected any expansion of the proceedings beyond the technical legal parameters of a “normal criminal trial,” it is not surprising that this conflict was resolved in accordance with that position.

The combination of applying the German penal code to a crime of the scope of genocide, and limiting the focus of the trial strictly to the charges brought against the defendants and not the larger picture of the Final Solution, resulted in the conclusion by the millions of “ordinary” Germans who were closely following the proceedings that what happened in Auschwitz was done by a handful of monsters—only those sadists who acted excessively—and not by ordinary Germans like themselves. This was a highly inaccurate presentation of the dynamics of the killing factory that was Auschwitz. Thus, the trial satisfied a legal code that was inadequate to the magnitude of the crime, and it relieved the German people of the task of examining their own culpability.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Auschwitz; Birkenau; Crimes against Humanity; War Crimes

Further Reading

Pendas, Devin O. The Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial, 1963–1965: Genocide, History, and the Limits of the Law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Wittmann, Rebecca. Beyond Justice: The Auschwitz Trial. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2005.

Franz, Kurt

Kurt Hubert Franz, born in Düsseldorf on January 17, 1914, became infamous for his cruelty in Nazi extermination camps, especially Treblinka, where he served as the camp’s third commandant. For a German citizen who never joined the National Socialist German Workers’ Party or any of its affiliated organizations, Franz rose quickly after joining the army in 1935, serving initially as a cook, and then volunteering for the Death’s Head Unit (the SS-Totenkopfverbände) in 1937. He served in several capacities during his career. He was a guard at Buchenwald; took part, beginning in 1939, in Aktion T-4, the so-called Nazi euthanasia program; and, in the spring of 1942, served at Belzec as commander of the Ukrainian guard unit. Later in 1942 he was sent to Treblinka.

At Treblinka, as he had at Belzec, he commanded the Ukrainian guard unit. He soon became deputy commandant of the camp, serving under Franz Stangl. On August 2, 1943, a revolt of prisoners at Treblinka proved to be unsuccessful, but it resulted in significant destruction to the camp. When Stangl was transferred after the revolt, Franz replaced him as camp commandant. By that time, his primary responsibility was to dismantle the camp and cover up any signs of the mass murders that were committed there.

Franz displayed a level of day-to-day cruelty that he clearly enjoyed, and he was able to exercise it in Treblinka at will. His methods were varied but they all terrified the prisoners. He beat and shot prisoners without hesitation, often on an arbitrary basis, as if for sport. One of the many ways he made himself the most feared man in the camp was to sic his 150-pound St. Bernard dog, Barry, on any prisoner—for any reason, or for no reason at all. The dog was trained to bite the buttocks and genitals of the selected prisoner. Its strength and viciousness were well known throughout the camp.

The pure evil of his actions was seen in acts like shooting prisoners who had not yet detrained from the cattle car that brought them to Treblinka. He often killed children and babies, sometimes by kicking them to death, and he perfected the use of a whip to maximize the suffering of the victim. His appearance, however, belied his actions. He was nicknamed Lalke, meaning “the doll” in Yiddish, because of his soft baby face.

After leaving Treblinka, Franz spent some time in northern Italy where he continued in his role as a sadistic murderer of Jews. After the war he hid in plain sight in Germany, first working on bridges, and then, for the next decade, working as a cook, the skill that he brought with him when he first joined the German army. In December 1959 Franz was arrested in his home town of Düsseldorf.

He was then brought to trial, along with 10 other camp officials, in what is known as the First Treblinka Trial, held in Düsseldorf between October 1964 and August 1965. He was sentenced to life in prison and served 28 years before being released in 1993 for health reasons. He died in 1998.

There is a coda to Franz’s life. In 1959, upon Franz’s arrest, his home was searched. Discovered there was a private photo album with pictures of Treblinka, despite the fact that cameras and photographs were forbidden in the camp. The original album is now housed at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. The title Franz gave to the album is revelatory. The German “Schöne Zeiten” has been translated as “Good Times,” or “Beautiful Times.”

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Belzec; Buchenwald; Death Camps; Stangl, Franz; Treblinka

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

Klee, Ernst, Willi Dressen, and Volker Riess (Eds.). "The Good Old Days": The Holocaust as Seen by Its Perpetrators and Bystanders. New York: Free Press, 1988.

Freisler, Roland

Roland Freisler was a preeminent lawyer and judge who served as president of the People's Court (Volksgerichtshof) in Nazi Germany from August 20, 1942, until his death on February 3, 1945, in Berlin. In this capacity, Freisler was in charge of the show trials used by the Nazis to deal with opponents of the National Socialist regime and political dissent, acting as judge, jury, and sometimes even as prosecutor, and handing down the death penalty or life imprisonment in 90% of all cases that came before him. While he presided over the First Senate of the People's Court, he was responsible for as many death sentences as all other sessions of the court put together for the entire time it existed.

Freisler contributed to the introduction into German law of racial categories and differential treatment based on race. In addition, he was responsible for the first laws allowing for the execution of juveniles in Germany. He was even more extreme in his adherence to principles of racial purity than Adolf Hitler, arguing for a ban on any sort of mixed-blood intercourse or relationships, no matter how little "foreign blood" might be involved. He represented the Reich Ministry of Justice at the Wannsee Conference in January 1942 when the plans of the Final Solution, the destruction of European Jewry, were outlined.

Freisler was born on October 30, 1893, in Celle, Lower Saxony, and was baptized a Protestant on December 13, 1893. In 1914 he was at law school at the University of Jena when the outbreak of war interrupted his studies. He served as an officer cadet in 1914 and by 1915 was a lieutenant. He won the Iron Cross in both First and Second Class for heroism in action. Wounded on the Eastern Front, in October 1915 he was captured by Russian forces. As a prisoner of war he learned Russian and is reputed to have developed an interest in Marxism following the Russian Revolution. After the war he returned to Germany with the reputation of being a convinced communist, something he always later denied. His subsequent career as a political official in Germany, however, was overshadowed by rumors about his possible communist past.

In 1919 he resumed his law studies and became a doctor of law in 1922. From 1924 he worked as a solicitor in Kassel. He was also elected a city councilor as a member of the Völkisch-Sozialer Block, an extreme nationalist splinter party.

Freisler joined the National Socialist German Workers' Party (NDSAP) in July 1925 as part of the movement's left wing, and he served as defense counsel for party members who were regularly facing prosecutions for acts of political violence. As the Nazis transitioned from a fringe political beer-hall and street-fighting movement into a more formal political entity, Freisler was elected for the party to the Prussian Landtag, and later became a member of the Reichstag.

In February 1933, after the takeover of Germany by Adolf Hitler, Freisler was appointed as the director of the Prussian Ministry of Justice. He served here in 1933–1934, and then in the Reich Ministry of Justice from 1934 to 1942. Known to be interested in the procedures of Andrei Vyshinsky, the chief prosecutor of the Soviet purge trials, Freisler watched Vyshinsky's performances when he had been engaged in Soviet show-trials in Moscow in 1938.

In October 1939 Freisler introduced the concept of "precocious juvenile criminal" in the "Juvenile Felons Decree." This provided the legal basis for imposing the death penalty and penitentiary terms on juveniles for the first time in German legal history. From the period 1933 to 1945 the Reich's courts sentenced at least 72 German juveniles to death.

Despite Freisler's mastery of legal texts, mental agility, dramatic courtroom verbal dexterity and verbal force, in combination with his zealous conversion to National Socialist ideology, Adolf Hitler never appointed him to a government post beyond the legal system. This might have been attributable to the fact of his being politically compromised through family association with his brother Oswald Freisler, who was also a lawyer. Oscar Freisler, who had a habit of wearing his Nazi Party membership badge in court, had appeared as the defense counsel in court against the regime's authority several times in its program of increasingly politically driven trials with which it sought to enforce its control of German society. Propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels reproved Oswald Freisler and reported his actions to Adolf Hitler, who in response ordered the expulsion of Oswald Freisler from the party. Oswald Freisler committed suicide in 1939.

On January 20, 1942, Freisler, representing Reich Minister Franz Schlegelberger, attended the Wannsee Conference of senior governmental officials in a villa on the outskirts of Berlin to provide expert legal advice for the planning of the destruction of European Jewry. Then, on August 20, 1942, Hitler named Freisler as president of the People's Court (Volkgerichtshof). The court had jurisdiction over a broad array of "political offenses," viewed by Freisler as destruction of the defensive capability of the Nazi state. Accused persons brought before him were accordingly punished severely, the death penalty being meted out in numerous cases.

Freisler became infamous for his aggressive manner of presiding over trials, aiming at total humiliation of the defendants. During this period he became notorious for insulting and abusing defendants in a highly personalized fashion from the bench, often shouting and occasionally yelling at the steady stream of defendants passing before him on their way to their deaths—particularly in cases of resistance to the authority of Nazi Germany. His speech would become shrill, though in his rages he ensured that he controlled his voice for dramatic purposes, using his mastery of the art of courtroom performance. This practice earned him the nickname "Raving Roland."

The People's Court almost always agreed with the prosecution. In 90% of all cases the court's verdict was the death penalty or a sentence of life in prison. The number of death sentences rose sharply under Freisler's tenure, and being brought before it was equivalent to a death sentence. Under Freisler's management the Volkgerichtshof sent more than 5,000 Germans to their death without a fair trial.

Some Volkgerichtshof hearings under Freisler moved at an astonishing pace. In February 1943 he presided over the trial of three Munich University students who belonged to the dissident White Rose group. On February 22, 1943, 21-year-old Sophie Scholl, her brother Hans Scholl (aged 22), together with Christof Probst (aged 24), were arrested for distributing antiwar leaflets at the university four days earlier. Brought before Freisler, they were tried and found guilty in less than an hour, without evidence being presented or arguments made by either side. The three were guillotined just six hours after their arrest.

Another of Freisler's victims was a Catholic priest, Joseph Müller, who told a political joke. The joke itself did not bring about Müller's conviction. His work with youth raised Nazi ire, as his teachings contradicted Nazi dogma. Throughout the trial, Freisler ranted and raved blasphemously, even helping witnesses find appropriate words of scorn. He screamed accusations of collusion, hostility, and intentionally undermining the German people's will to carry on the war. Müller was sentenced to death and guillotined on September 11, 1944. His family received a bill for the cost of the execution.

Freisler's most notorious case came in the wake of the failed July 20, 1944, coup attempt against the Nazi regime. The trials began in the People's Court on August 7, 1944, with Freisler presiding. The first eight men accused were Erwin von Witzleben, Erich Hoepfner, Paul von Hase, Peter Yorck von Wartenburg, Helmuth Stieff, Robert Bernardis, Friedrich Klausning, and Albrecht von Hagen. All were condemned to death by hanging, and the sentences were carried out at Berlin's Plötzensee prison within two hours of the verdicts being passed.

The obscene manner in which Freisler humiliated the July 20 coup conspirators in his courtroom—bellowing at them nonstop and denying them the right to wear belts or suspenders so that their trousers fell down—prompted even members of Hitler's entourage to recommend that his authority be curtailed. The accused men were unable to consult their lawyers, who were not seated near them. None of them were allowed to address the court at length, and Freisler interrupted any attempts to do so.

On February 3, 1945, during a Saturday session of the People's Court, American Eighth Air Force bombers attacked Berlin. Government and Nazi Party buildings were hit, including the Reich Chancellery, the Gestapo headquarters, the Party Chancellery, and the People's Court.

According to one report, Freisler adjourned court and ordered that day's prisoners to be taken to a shelter, but he paused to gather that day's files. No one is quite sure how he died. Some witnesses claim that he was crushed to death by falling masonry, while others claim that he bled to death outside of the bombed courthouse. His body was found crushed beneath a fallen masonry column, clutching the files he had retrieved. Among those files was that of Fabian von Schlabrendorff, a July 20 Bomb Plot member who was on trial that day and was facing execution. Freisler's death saved Schlabrendorff, who after the war became a judge of the Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Freisler is interred in the plot of his wife's family at the Waldfriedhof Dahlem cemetery in Berlin. His name is not shown on the gravestone.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Gürtner, Franz; "Racial Hygiene"; Schlegelberger, Franz; Volkgerichtshof; Von Moltke, Helmuth James; Wannsee Conference; White Rose

Further Reading

- Koch, H. W. In the Name of the Volk: Political Justice in Hitler's Germany. London: I. B. Tauris, 1997.
- McKale, Donald M. The Nazi Party Courts: Hitler's Management of Conflict in His Movement, 1921–1945. Lawrence (KS): University Press of Kansas, 1974.
- Miller, Richard M. Nazi Justiz: Law of the Holocaust. Westport (CT): Praeger, 1995.
- Stolleis, Michael. The Law under the Swastika: Studies on Legal History in Nazi Germany. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Sweet, William. "The Volksgerichtshof: 1934–45." Journal of Modern History 46, no. 2 (June 1974), 314–329.

Frick, Wilhelm

Nazi bureaucrat and minister of the interior. Born on March 12, 1877, in Alsenz, Frick studied law from 1896 to 1901 at Göttingen, Munich, Beylin, and Heidelberg (where he received his doctorate). From 1904 to 1924 he worked in the Munich Police Department, heading the political police section after 1919. An early adherent of Adolf Hitler, Frick participated in the 1923 Munich Beer Hall Putsch, Hitler's abortive effort to seize power in Munich, and was arrested, tried, and sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment. He was able to avoid a prison term when the newly renamed National Socialist Freedom Party picked him as one of its representatives to the Reichstag in 1924. He served in the Reichstag from that point forward.

On January 23, 1930, Frick became the first National Socialist minister in a provincial government, responsible for education and the Ministry of the Interior in Thuringia. Under his administration, the Thuringian police force was purged of officers who supported the Weimar Republic; Nazi candidates for office were illegally favored; the anti-war film All Quiet on the Western Front was banned, as was jazz music; and rabidly militaristic, antisemitic propaganda was allowed to flourish unchecked. On Frick's instruction, special German freedom prayers were instituted in Thuringian schools, glorifying the German Volk and German national honor and military power while denouncing "traitors." Frick used his influence as interior minister to grant Hitler German citizenship by implementing a provision of the law that extended citizenship to anyone named to an official post in Germany, and, as such, he managed to have Hitler named a councilor for the state of Braunschweig.

When the Nazis came to power in Germany in January 1933, Frick was appointed German minister of the interior, a key position that he held until August 1943. In this post he was directly responsible for many measures taken against Jews, communists, Social Democrats, dissident churchmen, and other opponents of the regime. He also had charge of drafting and then administering the laws that gradually eliminated the Jews from the German economy and public life, culminating in the Nuremberg Laws on Race that reduced Jews to second-class status in the Reich. It was Frick who framed the extraordinary law that declared all Hitler's actions during the Blood Purge of the SA in June 1934 to be legal and statesmanlike. Although nominally Heinrich Himmler's superior, Frick singularly failed to impose any legal limitations on the power of the Gestapo and the SS, nor seriously interfered with their encroachment on his area of jurisdiction.

On August 24, 1943, Frick was appointed Reichsprotektor of Bohemia and Moravia, a position he held until the end of the war, although real authority was concentrated in the hands of his subordinate Karl-Hermann Frank. At the Nuremberg Trials, Frick was charged with and found guilty of crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity committed in concentration camps in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. Sentenced to death, the dedicated Nazi bureaucrat and loyal implementer of Hitler's ruthless aims was duly hanged at Nuremberg on October 16, 1946.

JOSEPH C. GREANEY

See also: Enabling Act, 1933; Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor; Nuremberg Laws; Nuremberg Trials; Schutzhaft; Stuckart, Wilhelm

Further Reading

- Fischer, Klaus. Nazi Germany: A New History. New York: Continuum, 1995.
- Persico, Joseph E. Nuremberg: Infamy on Trial. New York: Viking Penguin, 1994.

Friedländer, Saul

Saul Friedländer was for many years a professor of Holocaust history at the University of California, Los Angeles, holding a joint position at Tel Aviv University. Born in Prague in 1932, he was raised in France. As a Jewish child during the Nazi occupation, he survived by having been hidden in a Catholic boarding school in Montluçon, near Vichy. In order not to be discovered, he was presented as a Christian child; his parents, meanwhile, attempted to flee to Switzerland. Arrested by Vichy French police, they were deported to Auschwitz while their son, oblivious as to their fate, continued to live in the Catholic school. He only learned of their fate after the war.

In June 1948 Friedländer emigrated from France to Israel; after finishing high school, he served in the Israeli army. Between 1953 and 1955 he studied political science in Paris, and in 1963 he received his PhD from the Graduate Institute of International Studies in Geneva, where he would teach until 1988.

Friedländer's first major studies related to the Catholic Church, in which he had an interest owing to his wartime experience. In Pius XII and the Third Reich: A Documentation (1966), he considered the highly controversial question of the pope's enigmatic posture regarding the Nazi persecution of the Jews. Working through a large number of documents from German Foreign Office sources, and placing this documentary material within its appropriate historical context, he composed a picture of Pius's pro-German bias and near-fanatical anticommunism. While drawing readers' attention to these two features of Pius's reign, he conceded that the creation of a direct link between these and the pope's silence during the Holocaust was not possible until the Vatican began to augment the available documents through opening its own archives.

What Friedländer could do, however, was focus on the efforts of one highly placed Catholic who tried to do something to stop the Holocaust. In Kurt Gerstein: The Ambiguity of Good (1969), Friedländer examined the actions of Kurt Gerstein, an SS officer who witnessed Nazi actions against Jews at the extermination camps of Belzec and Treblinka. Shocked by what he saw, Gerstein tried to inform public opinion about what the Nazis were doing through contacts in the Swedish diplomatic service and through the Roman Catholic Church. Friedländer's book examined the motives that underlay Gerstein's behavior; a devout Catholic, he was also an officer in charge of disinfection techniques, and thus an important cog in the Nazi machinery of death. From the day he first learned of the Nazi gassings, however, he sought to find ways of informing the world of what was happening. At the same time, he was unable to tip his hand by exhibiting any lack of enthusiasm for the Nazi killing processes. Friedländer showed a tortured soul who was ultimately unable to effect any change in a system he detested.

Friedländer's main thinking on the Holocaust developed during the intensely rich period of controversy in the 1980s known in Germany as the Historikerstreit—a time when German historians, in particular, engaged in often heated debates about the way the Holocaust should be interpreted historically.

In 1979 Friedländer wrote a memoir of his childhood years, When Memory Comes. This was a very different kind of history, in which he plumbed the depths of his recollections as a boy between the ages of 7 and 12, interspersed with his reflections on these same times as an adult in 1977. Friedländer's intensity as a historian became apparent in this volume, as he discussed the pain of family separation, being raised in an alien (Catholic) environment, eventually learning the fate of his family, and his emigration to Israel—another alien environment. A close reading of the book showed the extent to which Friedländer saw Nazism as a force dedicated to destruction, a horrific ideology for which normal language is unsuited. The struggle to come to grips with his own history motivated Friedländer to try to find a way to understand the nature of Germany in the Nazi era, and ultimately led him to become one of the most influential scholars on the history of the Holocaust.

By 1992 Friedländer had already established a name for himself as an important thinker and teacher of the Holocaust, but in that year he produced an edited volume that reflected deeply his interest in searching for meaning. In Probing the Limits of Representation: Nazism and the "Final Solution" (1992), he included essays from a number of leading scholars of the Holocaust. He followed this up with another collection a year later. In Memory, History, and the Extermination of the Jews of Europe, he brought together a range of essays he had written between 1985 and 1992, during which time the collapse of communism had shed new light on the nature of totalitarianism and persecution. Here, he was mainly concerned about the relationship between memory and history; how the evolution of attitudes toward the Nazi period and the Holocaust had undergone change over time within German and Jewish memory, and why it was that individual memories and collective recollection of the past appeared to be divergent. These collections set the stage for two major works that would have a profound impact on the nature of Holocaust scholarship.

The first of these, Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Persecution, 1933–1939 (1997), took the form of a definitive history of Nazi policies prior to the Holocaust. Friedländer employed newly available documents in order to draw an intimate picture of German Jewish society before the outbreak of World War II, a period in which some form of "normality" still prevailed—despite the increasingly antisemitic measures imposed by the Nazi regime. He methodically related how each anti-Jewish measure led to the next, and the next, and so on, noting that all the while there was not the slightest hint that any sort of “final solution” was in the offing. He identified Hitler’s main goal in the late 1930s as forcible Jewish emigration rather than annihilation, and he found no evidence of any plan for extermination prior to Germany’s invasion of the Soviet Union in mid-1941. Friedländer also looked at the nature of the Jewish community, seeking to learn why it was that there was so little resistance to the measures adopted by the Nazis. He showed clearly that relatively few Jews saw any reason for panic, and that emigration was consequently very slow in developing a momentum. Moreover, there was little opposition voiced to the regime from any of the sources that might have been expected to raise objections; the Protestant and Catholic churches, universities, the press, and even the labor movement were either muzzled or voluntarily remained silent (when not enthusiastically supporting the regime).

Friedländer followed this with a second volume, which took the story through to the end of the war. The result—an 870-page volume titled Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Extermination, 1939–1945 (2007)—would ultimately win Friedländer the 2008 Pulitzer Prize for General Non-Fiction. His history was in many respects as much a history of everyday life under Nazi persecution as it was of Nazi actions and programs, and skillfully interwove individual testimony into the broader picture. The personal accounts Friedländer employed built a picture of how Jews in Europe viewed their impending fate only by increments—and, for those who were not direct targets of the Nazis, how the events swirling around them were greeted by an attitude of indifference, if not always active cooperation.

Saul Friedländer thereby became a survivor-scholar whose contribution to the field of Holocaust studies was both vast and multifaceted. He mastered the skill of synthesizing considerable amounts of original material, and consistently advocated that any history of the Holocaust must include the human voices of those who experienced it in their flesh—without which, he argued, the story will always be incomplete.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Catholic Church; Gerstein, Kurt; Historikerstreit; Pius XII

Further Reading

Friedländer, Saul. Kurt Gerstein: The Ambiguity of Good. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Persecution, 1933–1939. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.

Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews: The Years of Extermination, 1939–1945. New York: HarperCollins, 2007.

Friedländer, Saul. Pius XII and the Third Reich: A Documentation. New York: Knopf, 1966.

Friedländer, Saul. When Memory Comes. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1979.

Fry, Varian

Varian Mackey Fry was an American rescuer of Jews during the Holocaust. Born in New York on October 15, 1907, Fry attended Harvard University, where he studied classics. He began his working life as a photographer, but in 1940 he went to Marseille, France, as a representative of an American refugee organization called the Emergency Rescue Committee. While there, he worked hard to secure passports and visas enabling refugees to leave Vichy France and reach safety.

Varian Fry was a young American who ran a rescue network for intellectuals, artists, writers, and Jews in Vichy France. It has been estimated that thousands of refugees managed to escape the Nazis as a result of his efforts. He was the first American to be recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. The photograph here shows him walking along a street in Marseille sometime in 1940 or 1941. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Annette Fry)

Fry's background fitted him well to be able to take on the role he assumed in later years. An exceptionally bright student at Harvard, he started a career in journalism while there, establishing a literary journal, Hound & Horn, with fellow student Lincoln Kirstein. On June 2, 1931, Fry married Eileen Avery Hughes, an editor at Atlantic Monthly.

Fry first visited Berlin in 1935. On this visit he saw SA men assaulting Jews in the city's streets, and from then on knew he could not remain indifferent. When he returned to the United States he decided to act. In 1935 he wrote in the New York Times about the Nazi treatment of the Jews and used other venues in order to raise awareness of the issue at a time when American isolationists would have preferred not to know.

After Germany invaded France in June 1940, the Emergency Rescue Committee, a private American relief organization, sent Fry to France to aid anti-Nazi refugees who were in danger of being arrested by the Gestapo. He landed in Marseille with a fighting fund of US $3,000, hoping to use his American citizenship and neutral status as a way to evade French measures designed to refuse exit visas. He had no previous experience with the kind of underground activities he would have to undertake to obtain the necessary papers, but by the end of his mission he had saved upward of 4,000 people from the hands of the Nazis.

Fry and a group of accomplices composed a list and created clandestine escape routes for the refugees under imminent threat of arrest by the Gestapo and Vichy French police. His organization had a very specific focus: the rescue of intellectuals, artists, musicians, and the creative core of European culture. All those opposing the Nazis—whether Jewish or not—were legitimate targets for Fry's efforts. Among those rescued were Marc Chagall, Hannah Arendt, Pablo Casals, Heinrich Mann, Lion Feuchtwanger, Franz Werfel, Konrad Heiden, Max Ernst, and many others.

Fry's strategy was to hide those he was saving at the Villa Air-Bel in Marseille until they could be smuggled across the border to Spain. From there, they would move to Portugal, and then the United States. He did not work alone: his companions at the villa included Miriam Davenport, Mary Jayne Gold, and Hiram Bingham IV, the U.S. vice-consul in Marseille who was sympathetic to the plight of the Jews and helped Fry obtain the necessary visas to enable those on his list to enter the United States.

Fry established contacts with the French underground, hired professional forgers, bribed border guards, and even consorted with Corsican mobsters. His front organization, the American Relief Center, used all manner of illegal means such as black-market funds, forged documents, secret mountain passages, and sea routes in order to move endangered refugees from France.

When Fry's resources for procuring visas dried up, he smuggled the refugees into Spain. For this, and for acting without a valid passport of his own, he was arrested by Vichy police and deported to the United States in September 1941. He had been in France for 13 months, during which time he was under constant surveillance and was, more than once, detained and questioned.

Upon his return to the United States he was reprimanded by the State Department for his illegal activities. No recognition was made of his outstanding humanitarian rescues.

After the war Fry continued his work as a journalist and editor, but he became increasingly distressed by the memory of what he had seen and experienced during the war. He lived the remaining years of his life in obscurity, developed ulcers, and was diagnosed with manic depression. On September 13, 1967, while in the midst of revising his memoirs, he died of a cerebral hemorrhage.

Shortly before his death, the French government recognized his contribution through the award of the Croix de Chevalier de Legion d'Honneur. In 1991 the United States Holocaust Memorial Council posthumously awarded Fry the Eisenhower Liberation Medal, and in 1994 he became the first U.S. citizen to be recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem. Varian Fry's remarkable efforts on behalf of Jews and the cultural elite of Europe was also related in Varian's War (dir. Lionel Chetwynd, 2001), an award-winning movie starring William Hurt in the title role and Julia Ormond as Miriam Davenport.

For his work in saving thousands, Varian Fry is frequently mentioned alongside other major rescuers such as Oskar Schindler and Raoul Wallenberg. Indeed, there are some in the United States who have referred to him as "the Oskar Schindler of America."

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: France; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations; Sharp, Waitstill and Martha

Further Reading

Isenberg, Sheila. A Hero of Our Own: The Story of Varian Fry. New York: Random House, 2001.

Marino, Andy. A Quiet American: The Secret War of Varian Fry. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Fugu Plan

Taking place prior to and during World War II, and corresponding with the Sino-Japanese War, the Fugu Plan refers to Jewish settlement in the Japanese Empire in order to escape Nazi persecution. Tens of thousands of Jewish refugees fled east, many of them resettling in Japanese-occupied China. In the 1930s, documents emerging from Imperial Japan suggested settling Jewish refugees on Japanese-controlled territory. This strategy was termed by the Japanese the “Fugu Plan,” which proposed that displaced Jewish populations resettle in Manchukuo (or Manchuria), located in northeast China, or Japan-occupied Shanghai on the coast of eastern China. Japan implemented the Fugu Plan in order to gain the economic superiority of the Jewish community so the United States, specifically American Jewry, would invest in Japan politically and economically.

The Fugu Plan included how the resettlement would be organized and carried out. In June and July 1939 the memorandum “Concrete Measures to be Employed to Turn Friendly to Japan the Public Opinion Far East Diplomatic Policy Close Circle of President of USA by Manipulating Influential Jews in China,” and “The Study and Analysis of Introducing Jewish Capital” were revised and permitted by Japanese officials, allowing for the settlement of Jewish refugees in Japanese-occupied territory.

In March 1938 General Hideki Tojo approved the admittance of Jews into the Japanese-occupied state of Manchukuo, despite German protests. The “Five Ministers’ Conference,” taking place on December 6, 1938, prohibited the expulsion of Jews from Japan, Manchuria, and China. At the conference, Prime Minister Fumimaro Konoe, Foreign Minister Hachirō Arita, Army Minister Seishirō Itagaki, Naval Minister Mitsumasa Yonai, and Finance Minister Shigeaki Ikeda discussed Japan’s growing alliance with Germany and how Jewish asylum would affect their interwar relationship. Immediately following the Five Ministers’ Conference, 14,000–15,000 Eastern European Jews were given refuge in the Japanese quarter of Shanghai. However, the European quarter of Shanghai admitted almost no Jews. One thousand Polish refugees who had not been able to obtain visas for any country were also granted asylum in Shanghai. The implementation of the Fugu Plan was never made official by Japanese officials due to their relationship with Nazi Germany.

In 1939 the Molotov-Ribbentrop nonaggression pact between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany made transporting Jews from Europe to Japan more difficult. This intensified when the USSR annexed the Baltic States, further isolating European Jews from asylum. On September 27, 1940, the Japanese government signed the Tripartite Pact with Germany and Italy, a defensive military alliance against the United States. This military strategy completely eliminated the possibility of any official aid for the Fugu Plan from Tokyo. However, thousands of European Jews were given visas from the Japanese consul, Chiune Sugihara, working in Kovno (Kaunas), Lithuania. Sugihara began to issue transit visas to fleeing European Jews against official orders from Tokyo. The transit visas allowed escaping Jews to leave Europe and stay briefly in Japan on their way to their final destination, the Dutch colony of Curaçao, which required no entry visa.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Shanghai Ghetto

Further Reading

- Goodman, David G., and Masanori Miyazawa. Jews in the Japanese Mind: The History and Uses of a Cultural Stereotype. New York: Free Press, 1995.
- Krasno, Rena. Strangers Always: A Jewish Family in Wartime Shanghai. Berkeley (CA): Pacific View Press, 1992.
- Tokayer, Marvin, and Mary Swartz. The Fugu Plan: The Untold Story of the Japanese and the Jews during World War II. New York: Paddington Press, 1979.

Führerprinzip

Führerprinzip, literally “leader principle,” was the name given to the primary method of governmental organization in Nazi Germany. Hermann von Keyserling, a German philosopher of the early 20th century, was the first to use the term to describe his fundamental belief that the principle of social Darwinism gave certain “gifted individuals” the right to rule over others.

As applied in Nazi Germany, the key doctrine of the Führerprinzip is simply stated: the word of Adolf Hitler is above the written law and supreme. It was in him that total authority rested, and from him that authority devolved to those below him, and from them to their subordinates. Just as Hitler had total authority over all, senior officers in the next level of command held total authority over those below them, so that within each level of organization the dominant position was one of total authority that was passed down to underlings, and to the holder of the dominant position in the next level.

Hermann Göring, Reichsmarschall, was asked about the operation of the Führerprinzip when he was testifying at the International Criminal Tribunal at Nuremberg in 1945. He responded by describing its structure as being the opposite of democratic governance. A democratic system places the authority in the people, and the responsibility to carry out the people’s wishes rests on the highest officials of the government. A government established according to the Führerprinzip places the authority in the highest levels, with the people being responsible for implementation. Göring went on to say that the job of the people was to acknowledge and agree unquestioningly with the leader.

For a government based on the Führerprinzip to succeed, the ultimate authority must be—or be perceived to be—charismatic. Ultimate authority can be vested only in a person who dominates all others, and in doing so takes on absolute power akin to that of a deity. The leader must be strong, able to withstand and offset the effect of the weak on society, and able to make clear to all strata of society that his decisions are to be followed because they derive from the leader’s absolute power.

The Führerprinzip requires a governmental organization in the form of a series of pyramids. In terms of the Third Reich, the first and most powerful pyramid—the leaders pyramid—had Hitler at the top, with the heads of the Party Chancellery next, then the various department heads (Reichsleiter), followed by the Gauleiter (leader of a region, or Gau), and finally the Blockleiter (block warden or block leader). The next pyramid below the one headed by Hitler was one comprised of the various ancillary organizations, such as the SS, SA, and the Hitler Youth. The final pyramid—subordinate to the pyramid structure of ancillary organizations immediately above, and through it indirectly subordinate to the leadership pyramid—included professional groups.

The organizational structure of the Führerprinzip was applied not only to the government. It also was adopted by corporations that would invest in the chairman, president, or owner an authority that was considered absolute, thereby making it easier to control the entity and to assign responsibility to leaders in various divisions and departments.

The Führerprinzip was claimed by Nazi war criminals as a defense against individual culpability. Its structure of orders being passed downward from sources of absolute authority was used by all levels of perpetrators to explain their actions, ultimately placing the sole responsibility on Hitler as the only one not subject to such orders, and therefore claiming that they had no choice—and should have no accountability—for their actions.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Enabling Act; Göring, Hermann; Hitler, Adolf; Kreyssig, Lothar

Further Reading

Benz, Wolfgang. A Concise History of the Third Reich. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2009.

Koonz, Claudia. The Nazi Conscience. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2005.

“Functionalists”

“Functionalists” are scholars who argue that the Holocaust was not the result of a planned, carefully organized, and orchestrated agenda of Adolf Hitler because of his overwhelming antisemitism, but was, rather, an evolving and sometimes even chaotic program of death and destruction that really began to assert itself after the invasion of Soviet Russia in June 1941 (“Operation Barbarossa”), prior to which it was done by low-level bureaucrats in a somewhat haphazard and inefficient manner.

Given this, functionalists view the Nazi hierarchy as one of competing vested interests and power centers with Hitler not in supreme control. Further, they also hold that the initial premise behind Nazi plans was one that sought the removal of Jews from German society through forced Jewish emigration—an ideal that ultimately proved unsuccessful. Given this, the Nazi intention was to expel all the Jews from Europe; only after this proved to be a failure did they resort to genocide. It is on this basis that functionalists (sometimes also called “structuralists”) came to consider the road to Auschwitz as a “crooked” one, in contrast to their intellectual opponents, known as “intentionalists,” who see a direct route from Adolf Hitler’s vision to the death camps of World War II.

Those who became known as functionalists were led by the German historians Hans Mommsen and Martin Broszat, whose work accompanied that of an American historian, Karl A. Schleunes. In 1970 Schleunes wrote a book whose thesis is embedded in the title: The Twisted Road to Auschwitz: Nazi Policy toward German Jews, 1933–39. This work broke through what had been, until that point, the dominant mode of thinking about the Holocaust directed by intentionalist scholars. Schleunes’s interpretation of the Final Solution as a product of unplanned evolution rather than premeditated “grand design” led a younger generation of scholars, notably another American historian, Christopher Browning, to develop new ways of looking at the genesis of the Holocaust. As a result, the major driving force behind the Holocaust could be found in rivalries within the unstable

Nazi power structure, rather than through some long-term quest held by Adolf Hitler. (It was, in fact, Browning who first coined the term “intentionalists” as a way of distancing his position from those who disagreed with him.) One functionalist scholar, Robert Koehl, compared the essence of the Third Reich to a medieval struggle between feudal oligarchies, in which each competed with others for dominance, advantages, and resources. Other functionalists, such as German historian Götz Aly, go further, insisting that neither Hitler nor the rest of the Nazi hierarchy had anything to do with initiating the Holocaust, but that, instead, the initiative for the mass murder of the Jews came from lower ranks within the German bureaucracy.

One broad functionalist approach has been that the unfolding of events, both setbacks and opportunities, resulted in the decision to establish the death factories in Poland, while another has argued that there was no single decision for the Holocaust as such—rather, it is held, it was a policy evolution over time. Therefore, the Final Solution was a culmination of a multiplicity of historical, economic, social, religious, and military/security factors. Where they differ from the intentionalists, however—although they agree on the importance of Hitler’s public antisemitism and his desire to eliminate the Jews from German life—is in the fact that his own lack of specific and concrete ideas left such work to his underlings, and thus the annihilation of European Jewry was more the result of historical circumstance than directives from the top.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Bauer, Yehuda; Bureaucracy; German Army, Role in the Holocaust; Hilberg, Raul; Historikerstreit; “Intentionalists”; Mommsen, Hans

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. Rethinking the Holocaust. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 2001.

Lawson, Tom. Debates on the Holocaust. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2010.

Stone, Dan. Histories of the Holocaust. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Funktionshäftling

Funktionshäftling is the German word for “prisoner-functionary”; colloquially, a prison “trusty.” These were concentration camp prisoners incarcerated within the German National Socialist state between 1933 and 1945 who were elevated to positions of authority by the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps to counter the lack of Nazi personnel available for administrative purposes. The system was devised in the prewar period. In return for serving as SS administrative agents within the camps, the “prisoner-functionaries” received more food, had better living conditions, and performed less work than other prisoners, this being mainly restricted to a supervisory role. These “administrative prisoners” were called Ältester (Elders, or Seniors), of whom the main figure was the Lagerältester—the most senior prisoner in the camp. In each barracks, there was a Blockältester; in each room, a Stubenältester. These latter were, in turn, assisted by a number of Stubendienst workers, who acted as room orderlies. In each block was a Blockschreiber, a prisoner who acted as a kind of registrar for the barracks and reported to an SS officer in the SS Administrative Department. There were, in addition, other positions of an administrative character, such as the prisoner-doctors (Haftlingärzt), camp barbers (Lagerfriseur), gatekeepers who operated the gates between compounds (Torwächter), and interpreters (Dolmetscher). Prisoner-functionaries were utterly dependent on the SS for everything. They, like any other prisoners, could be punished for the slightest infraction of the rules. They had to do exactly as they were told, nothing more or less. They were sandwiched in the middle of camp society; while enforcing SS structures and discipline on those below them, before the SS they must never forget that they too were prisoners. They could be (and often were) killed by the common prisoners as traitors; they could equally be killed by the SS on a whim. By creating a prisoner elite, the SS established a system that divided the prisoners in order to rule them. In doing so they reaped enormous benefits, as they were hereafter able to control the inmates with a minimum number of guards exercising a relatively high level of control.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Concentration Camps; Death Camps; Kapos

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

G

Galen, Clemens August Graf von

A German-born Catholic prelate who became an outspoken opponent of the Nazi regime in Germany. Clemens August Graft von Galen was born into an old and distinguished family at Dinklage Castle in the southern portion of the Duchy of Oldenburg (now Lower Saxony) on March 16, 1878. Educated mainly by private tutors, he entered the Catholic University of Freiburg in 1896, where he became captivated by the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas. The next year he spent three months in Rome, where he decided to become a priest. He subsequently took up studies at a seminary in Innsbruck before joining a seminary in Münster in 1903. In 1904 he was ordained and became a chaplain for Munster's auxiliary bishop.

In 1906 Galen was transferred to Berlin, where he served as a pastor in several parishes. During World War I, he exhorted his parishioners to support the war effort. He also became fearful that the revolutions that swept Germany in 1918 might lead to anarchy and a rebellion against the church. To stave off more social unrest, he spearheaded major aid programs for the poor and displaced. When the Weimar Republic came into being at the end of the war, he eyed it with considerable distrust, believing that it was unnecessarily liberal. Indeed, from 1919 until 1933 Galen tended to support the political Right in Germany.

In October 1933, the same year in which the Nazis came to power, Galen was consecrated bishop of Münster. He wasted little time in publicly criticizing Adolf Hitler's regime

Clemens August Graf von Galen was the bishop of Münster and a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church during the Nazi period. During World War II, Galen was forthright in leading Catholic protests against the Nazi “euthanasia” campaign. In 1934 he began to criticize Nazism, condemning Nazi racial ideology. His opposition continued throughout the war years, inspiring many Catholics and non-Catholics to action. (Borgas/Ullstein Vild via Getty Images) and the ideology upon which it was based. He urged Catholics to eschew public education in favor of Catholic education, which was relatively free of Nazi doctrine. He also criticized Nazi racial policies and flatly rejected calls to ignore the Old Testament because it had been authored by Jews.

By the early 1940s Galen was preaching sermons lambasting the Nazi regime; he particularly denounced the government's euthanasia program as morally evil. In 1941 he was arrested by Nazi authorities and subjected to house arrest, and in 1944, after the failed July Bomb Plot against Hitler, he was accused of having been involved. As it turned out, he had no involvement in the affair, but it provided the government with a pretext to silence the bishop for good.

Bishop von Galen was freed by Allied forces in April 1945. In February 1946 he was elected a cardinal; a year later, however, on March 22, 1947, he died in Münster of a sudden infection. Pope John Paul II began the beatification process for Cardinal Galen in the 1990s, and on October 9, 2005, he was officially beatified by Pope Benedict XVI.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Catholic Church; Euthanasia Program; Upstander

Further Reading

Griech-Poelle, Beth A. Bishop von Galen: German Catholicism and National Socialism. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002.

Rossi, Lauren Faulkner. Wehrmacht Priests: Catholicism and the Nazi War of Annihilation. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2015.

Gas Chambers

The use of gas chambers to kill large numbers of people in a short period of time was pioneered by the Germans during the Holocaust. It is estimated that at least 1 million Jews, Roma, and Sinti people were executed in gas chambers between roughly 1940 and 1945. The use of gas chambers in concentration and death camps essentially systematized mass killing, turning these facilities into factories of death. Almost all of the gas chambers were made to look like communal showers in order to fool detainees into thinking that they would be engaging in an innocuous activity such as showering or "delousing." Nearly all the victims of Nazi gas chambers were cremated in large, on-site crematoria.

Early on, and especially in camps like Chel̄mno, Bel̄zec, and Treblinka, the Nazis used carbon monoxide to kill prisoners. However, by 1941 the killing facilities at Auschwitz-Birkenau employed Zyklon-B (hydrogen cyanide) as the preferred method of extermination. Gassing people with Zyklon-B was more efficient and required less gas than methods employing carbon monoxide. It also permitted camp personnel to have less contact with the internees as they were gassed, sparing them the ghastly sight of people choking and gasping for air as their bodies leaked fluids and waste.

By 1941 the gas chambers at Auschwitz were using Zyklon-B exclusively. These installations were built by the German firm of J.A. Topf and Sons. The company made a fortune building such horrific devices. By 1942–1943 Auschwitz had become the Nazis' largest death camp, and camp officials used Zyklon-B as the gas of choice while the Nazis engaged in wholesale extermination.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Bel̄zec; Birkenau; Denial of the Holocaust; Hoess, Rudolf; J.A. Topf and Sons; Majdanek; Mauthausen-Gusen; Sobibór; Sonderkommando; Treblinka; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. Rev. ed. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.

Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Gas Vans

Gas vans were used by the Nazis to murder Jews and other prisoners through asphyxiation by carbon monoxide. As such, a gas van was a vehicle equipped as a mobile gas chamber.

The Nazis began experimenting with poison gas for the purpose of mass murder in late 1939 by killing those with physical or psychological handicaps in the T-4 or so-called "euthanasia" campaign. Initially, the murders were carried out in fixed, sealed chambers into which carbon monoxide gas was pumped. Other victims were killed by lethal injections or by shooting. Gas vans were first utilized for the purpose of wholesale murder in 1940, when mentally ill children from Kochanowka, Poland, were locked in a sealed van and killed by carbon monoxide gas, which was piped into the van from the truck's engine.

On June 22, 1941, Nazi Germany invaded the Soviet Union. Following close on the heels of the combat troops were the so-called "special action groups," or Einsatzgruppen. The initial manner of their work was to round up their captive Jewish populations, take them outside of village and town areas, and then shoot them to death. When the repetition of that activity proved to be psychologically taxing for the men involved (and was, moreover, far from secret), the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, or RSHA) ordered that gas vans be employed for expediting mass murder. The vans were thus introduced both to remove the intimacy of contact and to sanitize the killing process.

The method of mass murder developed over time into a process that was repeated with minor variations throughout the area in which the gas vans operated. Victims were ordered to hand over all of their valuables prior to undressing and then climb into the vans. The two doors at the back of the wagons were closed, and a hose was connected to the exhaust. In certain instances a light was switched on in the van in order to settle the frightened victims; this was then turned off once the driver started the motor. While the timing of the next part of the process fluctuated, the engine usually ran from between ten and twenty minutes, during which time the quantity of exhaust gas pumped into the van was enough to poison the victims. After the agonized cries in the van died away, the driver started to drive to the cremation site, where Jewish Sonderkommando workers were forced to unload the corpses prior to their cremation or burial in pre-dug pits. The Jewish workers would then also be murdered.

The first gas vans in the Soviet Union were used in Poltava in November 1941 and in Kharkov that December. That same month, gas vans were also used in the Chelmno extermination camp until fixed gas chambers were developed as a more efficient method for killing large numbers of people. By June 1942 there were 20 gas vans in operation, and another 10 were being prepared; large trucks (the Saurerwagen model) could hold between 50 and 60 victims; the smaller variety (the Opel-Blitz) could only handle up to 30. By June 1942 the main producer of gas vans, Gaubschat Fahrzeugwerke GmbH, had delivered 20 gas vans, though none survived the war.

Fifteen vans operated in Einsatzgruppen Aktionen in the Soviet Union. Vans were also employed in Lublin, where they were used to kill Polish and Jewish prisoners. Once their murderous work was completed, the vans were driven to the death camp at Majdanek, where the corpses were burned in the crematorium.

A gas van operated at a concentration camp outside of Belgrade, Sajmište (Zemun; the Germans referred to it as Judenlager Semlin). In January 1942 German military authorities demanded the camp be cleared of Jews in order to accommodate the growing number of captives taken in battles with the Partisans. In early March the commandant, Herbert Andorfer, was informed that a gas van was being dispatched from Berlin. Gassings thereafter became routine, and the gas van arrived every day except Sunday. Up to 8,000 Jews and Roma, most of them women and children, were murdered this way.

German units occupied the Russian city of Krasnodar between August 12, 1942, and February 12, 1943. During this time, Einsatzgruppen killed thousands of Jews and communists through shooting, hanging, burning, and gassing in vans. Upon recapturing the city in the summer of 1943, the Soviets began a series of trials of Nazis and Nazi collaborators for war crimes, the first of which took place at Krasnodar from July 14 to 17, 1943. It was here that the existence of gas vans first came to light. Evidence was presented of the gassing of 6,700 civilians in Krasnodar, though the total number of those murdered in gas vans could not be calculated with precision. The Krasnodar tribunal pronounced eight death sentences, which were summarily carried out in the city square in front of a crowd of about thirty thousand people.

However, there were several drawbacks to the use of gas vans. The process, for example, was slow, in that it often took victims a long period to die owing to different rates of asphyxiation. There were frequent equipment breakdowns; it was far from cost-effective in terms of the amount of precious gasoline expended in order to murder a relatively small number of victims; drivers could hear the victims' screams as they drove the vans, which they found distracting and disturbing; and those who unloaded the vans suffered mental stress due to their close contact with murder. All in all, for a variety of reasons the gas van method of mass death used by the Nazis ultimately proved unreliable.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Chelmno; Einsatzgruppen; Euthanasia Program; Serbia; Sonderkommando; Treblinka

Further Reading

Browning, Christopher. Fateful Months: Essays on the Emergence of the Final Solution. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.

Klee, Ernst, Willi Dressen, and Volker Riess (Eds.). The Good Old Days: The Holocaust as Seen by Its Perpetrators and Bystanders. Old Saybrook (CT): Konecky and Konecky, 1991.

Montague, Patrick. Chelmno and the Holocaust: The History of Hitler's First Death Camp. Durham (NC): University of North Carolina Press, 2012.

Gebhardt, Karl

A German physician who conducted cruel and unethical medical experiments during the Nazi era and who was convicted and executed for crimes against humanity, Karl Franz Gebhardt was born on November 23, 1897, in Haag (Oberbayern), and received a medical degree in 1922. Two years later, he secured a position as an intern at the University of Munich's surgical clinic. He completed his internship, residency, and postresidency work by 1932 and joined the Nazi Party in 1933. In 1935 he became an associate professor of medicine in Berlin and became a member of the SS. Also in 1935, Gebhardt was named superintendent of the Hohenlychen Sanatorium, which he soon converted from a tuberculosis clinic to an orthopedic medicine facility. There he established the first sports medicine clinic in Germany; the clinic also treated amputees and disabled patients.

Gebhardt became director of the Medical Department at the Academy for Exercise and Physical Training in 1936 and was the chief physician for the 1936 Berlin Olympics. Meanwhile, he published widely and made a significant contribution to the sports medicine field by way of articles and a textbook. Gebhardt was also interested in aspects of physical therapy. Highly regarded in Germany and beyond, he was named personal physician to Heinrich Himmler in 1938, which further cemented his reputation in Germany. He was also appointed president of the German Red Cross.

After World War II began in 1939, Gebhardt became chief surgeon of the Reich Staff. Beginning in 1942 he was involved in a series of bizarre and cruel medical experiments on concentration camp prisoners, chiefly at Ravensbrück and Auschwitz. There he supervised experiments that saw prisoners' legs or arms broken, usually with no anesthesia, to gauge the body's ability to heal itself. Amputations were also carried out, and infections were either introduced into the wounds or allowed to fester in order to test various drugs to ward off sepsis and gangrene. Nearly all of these internees died. One particularly bizarre experiment involved amputating prisoners' limbs and attempting to transplant them onto wounded German soldiers.

After the war Gebhardt was arrested by Allied authorities and placed on trial (the Doctors' Trial of 1946–1947) for crimes against humanity. Found guilty, he was given a death sentence on August 20, 1947, and was hanged on June 2, 1948.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Crimes against Humanity; Doctors' Trial; Himmler, Heinrich; Medical Experimentation; Oberheuser, Herta; Olympic Games, 1936; Ravensbrück

Further Reading

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.
 Wistrich, Robert S. Who's Who in Nazi Germany. London: Routledge, 1995.

Generalgouvernement

The Generalgouvernement, a French term absorbed into German, was the name given to that part of eastern Poland that had not been incorporated by the Nazis directly into Germany after the end of the war with Poland in September 1939 or occupied by the Soviet Union in the same month. The area was comprised of five districts: Kraków, Lublin, Radom, Galicia, and Warsaw. Into these districts were to be found most of Poland's Jews, and over time the Generalgouvernement was utilized as a collection point for Jews deported from all over Europe, often prior to transshipment to the death camps. Given its location and function, the Generalgouvernement was an integral part of the Nazis' "Final Solution of the Jewish Question" (Endlösung der Judenfrage); it not only concentrated Jews in a specific locale, but it was also geographically close to the extermination apparatus—the death camps—set up by the Nazis. Several of the larger and more important ghettos were situated in the Generalgouvernement, notably Warsaw, Kraków, and Lublin; Łódź, Lwów, and Białystok were outside its borders, but nearby. The SS, in particular, anticipated that the Generalgouvernement would serve as a reservoir of Jews for forced labor and extermination, but that over time it (along with the rest of Europe) would be emptied of Jews in the final realization of the Nazis' genocidal ambitions.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Death Camps; Final Solution; Frank, Hans; Globocnik, Odilo; Madagascar Plan; Poland; Schindler, Oskar; Yellow Star

Further Reading

Gross, Jan T. Polish Society under German Occupation: The Generalgouvernement, 1939–1944. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 1979.

Genocide

The term genocide was coined in 1944 by Polish Jewish lawyer and legal scholar Raphael Lemkin. He had earlier sought to introduce some sort of international legal regime against what he called "vandalism and barbarity," but due to the exigencies imposed by World War II, such work would have to come later.

In 1944, however, Lemkin published a massive 674-page book titled Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress, which was published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, D.C. In chapter 9, which addressed the issue of Nazi atrocities against Jews, Lemkin devoted the entire chapter to a discussion of what he called “genocide”—a “new term and new conception for destruction of nations.”

He coined the term by linking the Greek word genos (a tribe, or in modern usage, a nation) with the Latin suffix -cide (killing). As he saw it, the Nazi assault in Europe was cause for a great deal of serious reflection about the state of humanity in the modern world, and on its future. Accordingly, he wrote, “New conceptions require new terms. By ‘genocide’ we mean the destruction of a nation or ethnic group. . . . It is intended . . . to signify a coordinated plan of different actions aiming at the destruction of essential foundations of life of national groups, with the aim of annihilating the groups themselves.”

After the war, Lemkin became obsessed with the cause of seeking recognition for his term from the newly established United Nations, and achieving passage of a bill banning such destruction in international law. He faced considerable difficulties, not the least of which was that he was just one man with a theory, neither acting in an official capacity nor representing any agency or government.

After many bureaucratic and legal battles, on December 9, 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations, with the support of both its Legal Committee and the Security Council, passed the Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. The vote was unanimous.

The initial model of the convention was in large part drafted by Lemkin himself, though considerable redrafting at committee stage saw it changed noticeably from what he had originally envisaged. Article 2 of the final document embodies the definition of genocide, which was contentious both then and now:

In the present Convention, genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

- a) Killing members of the group;
- b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

- c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
- d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
- e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

A few key points can be made by way of a critique of the convention and this definitive article. In the first place, genocide is a criminal act, which the signatories promise to “prevent” and “punish”; second, for a successful charge of genocide to be brought, the notion of intent on the part of the perpetrators must be proven; third, destruction can be “in whole” or “in part,” though just how many individuals constitute “in part” is not spelled out; and fourth, four possible groups are listed as the only acceptable targets for genocide. Thus, if other groups of people are persecuted—for example, as a result of political affiliation, social origin, cultural background, or sexual preference—these are not included within the UN’s definition of genocide. Finally, killing is not the only means to commit genocide, as four other activities, in which lives are not necessarily taken, are also considered.

Genocide covers many actions—though the proven intent to destroy is what really matters. If the ultimate aim is the permanent and deliberate elimination of the targeted group, as such, from the wider population, then it is genocide.

The UN definition is, for many, inadequate. While it includes acts of destruction that are not lethal to a group, many scholars consider that several groups were omitted that certainly should be included. Others have, since 1948, proposed alternative definitions, such as including social and political groups; varying the types of actions that could be included as genocide; and amending or clarifying the meaning of “intent.” The fact is that owing to a series of compromises involving the major powers of the day, none of these proposed changes made their way into the final form the convention reached in 1948, and they are unlikely to be included in any revisions today. Because the convention resulted from compromise, in spite of changing circumstances over more than six decades since it appeared, changing the convention and its definition will probably be more difficult to achieve than it was to originally secure its passage.

The number of events throughout history that have been termed genocide since 1948 has resulted in a multiplicity of theories of what genocide should be; indeed, a full scholarship of genocide has emerged. Invariably, a great deal of genocide theory proceeds from (and all too often, gets bogged down by) discussions relating to definitional matters. Where Lemkin's original conception began with the statement that genocide means "the destruction of a nation or ethnic group," many others have built their discussions around definitions that diverge from this. Other forms of destruction that do not fit comfortably into Article 2 have led scholars to devise even newer terms; in addition to genocide, ideas such as ethnocide, politicide, democide, omnicide, gendercide, and autogenocide, among many others, have been formulated. While these notions are often useful in creating models to help approach specific issues, however, it could be argued that the full scope of genocide has yet to be exhausted.

Genocide, first and foremost, is a crime—a crime of the greatest magnitude, and a major problem afflicting the very definition of modern civilization. Whether or not we would like to admit it, genocide—and the threat of genocide—has become one of the defining features of our time.

Historically, the causes of genocide are difficult to pin down. Only with hindsight is some kind of connection visible between an event and what transpired beforehand. Whether one can ultimately arrive at a common causal denominator for all genocides is doubtful, though some features do stand out. Frequently, genocides take place in times of war. Usually, some sort of ideology is present that demonizes a target group and demands its eradication. Elsewhere, times of extreme economic stress can lead to an outbreak of mass violence, while intercommunal violence can take place when there is a radical imbalance of power between those seeking destruction and their intended victims.

These factors, in themselves, do not automatically lead to genocide. Populations have to be conditioned to accept it, often over a lengthy period of time; otherwise a perpetrator regime is seen to be going too far and the population will reject its actions.

The flashpoint, or trigger, will always vary from case to case. Such incidents cannot always be predicted in advance, and, as with all historical events, there are so many variables that it is impossible to foresee how an event will resolve itself before it actually does.

It is in view of this that we need to consider the root cause behind the establishment of international legislation designed to confront genocide. In the enormous death toll of World War I, the vast majority of those killed were military deaths; our best estimates tell us that on average, 5,600 soldiers were killed per day, every day, for four-and-a-quarter years. Civilians numbered only 5% of all deaths in combat zones during that conflict.

After that, the rate of civilian deaths in wartime increased enormously. By World War II, civilians could be calculated at 66% of all war-related deaths; into the 1970s and 1980s, civilian deaths in war headed toward 80%. The vast majority of such deaths can be put down to an accumulation of massacres (some predetermined, some spontaneous) and genocide (by definition deliberate).

The concept of genocide is not an easy one to understand, though many people are of the view that "they know it when they see it." Because it is locked directly into a legal definition that defines the concept and forms the international legislation that makes it a crime, there is a dissenting view that any definition of genocide should be expanded in order to explain all the horrors and injustices the world has witnessed.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: A Crime without a Name; Armenians, Hitler Statement; Ethnic Cleansing; Holocaust; Kuper, Leo; Lemkin, Raphael; Manstein Trial; Total War and the Holocaust; UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

Further Reading

- Bloxham, Donald, and A. Dirk Moses (Eds.). The Oxford Handbook of Genocide Studies. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.
- Schabas, William A. Genocide in International Law: The Crime of Crimes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009.
- Totten, Samuel, and Paul R. Bartrop (Eds.). The Genocide Studies Reader. New York: Routledge, 2009.
- Valentino, Benjamin A. Final Solutions: Mass Killing and Genocide in the 20th Century. Ithaca (NY): Cornell University Press, 2004.

Gens, Jacob

Jacob Gens, a Lithuanian Jew, was the leader of the ghetto in the city of Vilna (Vilnius), Lithuania, from July 1942 until his death at the hands of the Gestapo on September 14, 1943. His leadership of the ghetto remains highly controversial; some claim he did all he could to keep as many Jews alive as possible, while others claim he acquiesced too quickly and too often to Nazi orders.

Born in 1903, Gens served in the Lithuanian army during its fight for independence, for which he was promoted and decorated. After completing his studies in law and economics in 1935, he became an accountant. Fearful of arrest when Lithuania became a Soviet republic in 1940, he moved to Vilna. At the time the Germans occupied Vilna in June 1941, he had been appointed the director of the Jewish hospital.

Within three months of the Nazi occupation, two ghettos had been established in Vilna, and Gens was appointed head of the police in Ghetto One. It was his actions as Jewish police head that began the controversy that would continue through the rest of his leadership. One of the first actions that touched off the controversy came after Gens had turned the ghetto police into a well-disciplined unit: he oversaw the unit's active role in a Nazi Aktion during the last four months of 1941, resulting in the murder of thousands of Jews at Ponary, a location of mass murder just outside of Vilna. "Active role," in this case, means organizing the victims to facilitate their extermination.

Gens expanded his role in the ghetto and in time began bypassing the Judenrat (Jewish Council) and having direct contact with the Germans. That led, in July 1942, to the dissolution of the Judenrat by the Nazis and the appointment of Gens as official head of the ghetto. It was then that he introduced the strategy that would become the key component of his approach to running the ghetto: "work for life," or "survival through labor." Like leaders in other ghettos, such as Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski in Łódź, Gens was convinced that the ghetto would remain intact—or, at least, its destruction would be delayed—as long as the Nazis saw it as providing a benefit to the war effort. He thus made every effort to have as many Jews as possible working throughout the ghetto in various factories.

Unlike the leaders of most other ghettos, Gens was not the chairman of a 12- or 24-member Judenrat, seeking to one degree or another to obtain a consensus, or at least get input from others before acting. Instead, he made decisions unilaterally. However, as was the case with all other ghetto leaders, he found himself in the very difficult (if not impossible) position of being responsible for carrying out the Nazis' orders—most painfully their demands that he produce a required number of Jews for the many deportations conducted during the life of the ghetto—while, at the same time, trying to preserve as many Jewish lives as possible. It was Gens's efforts to balance these basically incompatible objectives that fueled the disparate opinions of his leadership.

For example, Gens posted Jewish police at the gates of the ghetto to prevent smuggling of food into the compound, even to the point of having the police beat Jews who were caught when Nazis were present, all with the hope that this would reduce the opportunity for the Nazis to impose far worse punishment if they took over that role. He sought to consign the old and the sick to deportations, in order to save as many young and healthy Jews as possible. Thus, in addition to saving some Jews, he was condemning others to their death.

The way by which he ran the ghetto resulted in his being seen as trying to help Jews, even though, at the same time, he was seen as being all too willing to carry out the orders of the Nazis. One survivor, after noting that there were some Jews in the ghetto who felt otherwise, ascribed to Gens a "fatal role" in the tragedy of the Vilna ghetto. Elsewhere the same survivor used words such as "an atmosphere of moral decay" and even "treachery" when describing Gens and his leadership. However, Gens was credited with improving life within the ghetto to the extent possible under the circumstances. His efforts resulted in improved health care, hygiene, and care for children, together with the establishment of schools, orphanages, a theater, and a library. His strict methods of meeting the demands of the Nazis were viewed by some in the ghetto as being the only way available to Gens to save at least a remnant of the Jews in the ghetto.

Another area where Gens's decisions have given rise to debate was his involvement with the ghetto underground. At times supportive of its actions, for the most part Gens was cautious, afraid that resistance activities could jeopardize the safety of hundreds or thousands of Jews upon whom revenge would be taken for the efforts of a handful of resisters. In this same way he did not support efforts by individuals to escape, again fearing that it would only give rise to Nazi revenge. Still, in keeping with the contradictory statements and feelings about Gens, some survivors thought of him as supporting the resistance movement.

As liquidation of the ghetto approached, Gens refused opportunities to escape and join his non-Jewish Lithuanian wife and daughter who were living outside the ghetto, insisting that his escape would result in the murder of many of the Jews still in the ghetto. Although he had been warned of plans to kill him, he nonetheless answered the Gestapo's summons to their headquarters where, on September 14, 1943, he was shot and killed. Nine days later, on September 23, the ghetto was liquidated.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Judenrat; Ponary Forest; United Partisan Organization; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Kruk, Herman. The Last Days of the Jerusalem of Lithuania: Chronicles from the Vilna Ghetto and the Camps, 1939–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002.

German Army, Role in the Holocaust

The precise role of the German Army (Wehrmacht) in the planning and execution of the Holocaust has proven to be a highly controversial topic in the post–World War II period. From 1945 until the late 1960s and early 1970s, the traditional interpretation, particularly in West Germany, held that the army played virtually no direct role in the Holocaust. Since the 1970s, but especially after the end of the Cold War and German reunification, that interpretation has changed considerably. New research and newly discovered documents suggest that the Wehrmacht was certainly complicit in various aspects of the Holocaust, chiefly in the East, including those areas seized from the Soviet Union. While most of the planning for the Final Solution was carried out by the Nazi regime, chiefly the SS and the mobile paramilitary death squads it controlled known as the Einsatzgruppen, the Holocaust could not likely have been carried out without the help and support of the German Army. There continue to be arguments about the extent of the army's involvement and whether it was fully aware of the mass killings, however. These differences tend to split along historiographical lines. Functionalists, who believe that the Holocaust was unleashed in a somewhat ad hoc fashion and was driven largely by bureaucratic imperatives and the changing fortunes of war, tend to argue that the army was not complicit in planning the Holocaust. Intentionalists, who believe that the Holocaust was set in motion according to carefully laid plans and was implemented systematically, typically assign more blame to the Wehrmacht for the unfolding of the Holocaust.

The myth of an unblemished Wehrmacht was carefully laid out in the immediate postwar period. Many former German army generals worked hard to promote the idea that the Holocaust had been unleashed and carried out exclusively by the SS and its agencies. These same officers also asserted that the Wehrmacht had little to no knowledge of the Holocaust. The fact that the postwar Nuremberg trials failed to indict or convict many German army officers seemed to lend credence to this interpretation, as did the Allies' failure to label the Wehrmacht a criminal enterprise. Postwar political circumstances also informed these ideas. The rearmament of West Germany in the early 1950s, a development brought on by the Cold War, necessitated a somewhat whitewashed view of the Wehrmacht. This eased the Germans' discomfort with rearmament and helped reassure Germany's nervous neighbors.

More recent interpretations have demonstrated that the Einsatzgruppen depended extensively on the German Army to implement the mass killing of Jews on the Eastern Front. The traveling exhibit titled War of Extermination: The Crimes of the Wehrmacht, which circulated throughout Germany from 1995 until 1999, provided both documentary and photographic evidence of the army's duplicity in the Holocaust. This exhibit showed that the army's top leaders not only knew about the Holocaust but participated in it, either directly or indirectly. In Poland and western Russia, the Wehrmacht created dozens of regional and local headquarters where it forced Jews to register, provided them with "identification papers," and coordinated their deportation to ghettos. These same headquarters also confiscated Jewish property and money. Documents demonstrated that the Einsatzgruppen frequently praised the Wehrmacht for its cooperation in these matters. Some took exception to the exhibit, however, claiming that its findings were suspect because several items had been listed in the wrong chronological order. Others refused to believe that the Wehrmacht had been so deeply involved in the Holocaust.

During the Nazi offensive in North Africa (1941–1943), Field Marshal Erwin Rommel pledged to give the SS and Einsatzgruppen his complete cooperation in activities designed to round up and murder Jews in Egypt and Palestine. Generals Hermann Hoth, Walther von Riechenau, and Erich von Manstein strongly supported the work of the Einsatzgruppen. It is also a documented reality that elements of the Wehrmacht actively participated in the quelling of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in April–May 1943. Conversely, some army officers who protested the activities of the SS were punished for their noncompliance. General Johannes Blaskowitz lost his field command after complaining to Berlin about the atrocities he had witnessed in Poland.

The idea that the rank and file of the Wehrmacht—the soldiers—did not know about aspects of the Holocaust has been similarly challenged. There were countless instances, some of which have been documented by photographs and documents, in which German soldiers participated in mass shootings of Jews and other civilians behind the front lines. A number of soldiers themselves took pictures of the grisly massacres perpetrated by the Einsatzgruppen, particularly in Poland and in the western portions of the Soviet Union. German troops also routinely destroyed entire villages and shot thousands of rural dwellers and partisans.

By spring of 1945 the Americans and the British alone had taken some 1 million German soldiers and Waffen-SS officers prisoner. In many cases, prison cells were under surveillance and conversations between and among prisoners were recorded. Some of those recordings were later transcribed and showed clearly that many German soldiers and officers certainly knew about aspects of the Holocaust and sometimes participated in wartime atrocities. Several of these conversations were very detailed and spoke of mass shootings, the use of carbon monoxide to kill Jews and others in special mobile killing vans, and other means of mass murder. Other exchanges revealed that even rank-and-file soldiers had witnessed events that were almost certainly linked to the Holocaust. The fact that many German prisoners spoke freely of such things among themselves and did not attempt to cover up atrocities strongly suggests that they were part and parcel of many German soldiers' wartime experiences.

Although the number of such recorded conversations was by no means large, the recordings nevertheless revealed a level of knowledge about the Holocaust that flies in the face of those who suggest that the German Army was largely guiltless in the prosecution of the Holocaust. Even if recorded prisoners were merely repeating what they had heard about atrocities or had only witnessed evidence of the Holocaust, the fact that none of them expressed surprise or moral qualms about such things seems to suggest that the Wehrmacht was complicit in the mass murder of Jews and other minority groups during World War II.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Einsatzgruppen; "Functionalists"; "Intentionalists"; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising

Further Reading

Browning, Christopher. Ordinary Men: Reserve Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. New York: Harper Perennial, 1993.

Goldhagen, Daniel J. Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust. New York: Vintage, 1997.

Heer, Hannes. War of Extermination: The German Military in World War II, 1941–1944. New York: Berghahn Books, 2000.

German Census, 1933

In June 1933 the new Nazi regime under Adolf Hitler announced the results of a national population census that had recently been conducted and tabulated. The census was designed in part to reflect the Nazi Party's ideology concerning race and ethnicity; in particular, it became a basis for antisemitic government policies that were put in place between 1933 and 1945. Indeed, the 1933 census explicitly compiled religious categories. Also identified were the specific areas of Germany in which racial and ethnic minorities, including Jews, resided. The 1933 census would form the basis of the German government's Nuremberg Laws of 1935 and the National Registry of Jews, which was also informed by the 1939 census. Indirectly, it also became the basis for the Holocaust by identifying Jews and their places of residence.

The 1933 census indicated that there were 505,000 Jews living in Germany. That figure represented only Jews who actively practiced their religion. It did not include converted Jews, secular Jews, or Jews who were the product of mixed marriages. The latter would be counted in the 1939 census.

It was estimated that since January 1933, when Hitler assumed power, about 18,000 Jews had fled Germany in anticipation of increased persecution. Of the 505,000 counted, which represented approximately 0.75% of the total German population (67 million), about 70% lived in cities. Berlin had the largest Jewish population, followed by Frankfurt am Main, Breslau, Hamburg, Cologne, Hannover, and Leipzig. In Berlin, Jews made up just 4% of the population (160,000).

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Antisemitism; Nuremberg Laws

Further Reading

Burleigh, Michael, and Wolfgang Wippermann, The Racial State: Germany, 1933–1945. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Burrin, Philippe. Nazi Anti-Semitism: From Prejudice to the Holocaust. New York: New Press, 2005.

Gerstein, Kurt

Kurt Gerstein, born in 1905, was simultaneously a senior SS officer intimately connected to the Nazi mass murder of the Jews at Auschwitz and other death camps, and, paradoxically, a man unremitting in his resistance to the Nazi extermination program, who sought ways both to stop it and publicize it to the outside world.

Recalled through at least two biographies, two plays, a novel, and an award-winning movie, Gerstein's life and efforts prompt key questions even now: How could this man be both a major actor in the murder machinery and a resister of it? Should he be awarded the status of Righteous among the Nations? Were his activities carried out because of his understanding of the plight of the Jews, or did he operate from other motives? And if so, does the difference matter? Did his efforts ultimately save anyone?

Gerstein was a deeply devoted Christian from Westphalia, a low-ranking officer in the SS, and a member of the

Kurt Gerstein was a German SS officer and member of the Institute for Hygiene of the Waffen-SS. In this capacity, he served as head of Technical Disinfection Services. Upon witnessing gassings at the Belzec and Treblinka extermination camps, he attempted to inform the international community of what he had seen, and he passed his observations on to the Swedish diplomat Göran von Otter and members of the Roman Catholic Church with contacts to Pope Pius XII. In 1945 he surrendered to French forces and wrote a lengthy report outlining his first-hand experience of the Holocaust. (AP Photo)

Waffen-SS Institute for Hygiene. In the 1930s he served two periods of detention for defying Nazi authority on the grounds of his Christian principles (one of them in Welzheim concentration camp, near Stuttgart) and was dismissed from membership in the Nazi Party before being reinstated.

In early 1941 he joined the SS, and because of his technical abilities in both chemistry and engineering he rose quickly to become head of Technical Disinfection Services. In this capacity, on August 17, 1942, he went to the Belzec death camp, where he witnessed the gassing of some 3,000 Jews; the next day he went to Treblinka and saw a repetition of the killing process. He was then given responsibility for ordering vast quantities of Zyklon-B gas for use in the mass murder of Jews at Auschwitz.

On the night of August 20–21, 1942, on his way back to Germany, Gerstein traveled by train from Warsaw to Berlin. Deeply disturbed by what he had seen at Belzec and Treblinka, he was desperate to unburden himself; fate intervened in the person of the secretary to the Swedish legation in Berlin, Baron Göran von Otter, who was on the same train. Engaging him in conversation, Gerstein exclaimed: “Yesterday I saw something appalling.” “Is it to do with the Jews?” von Otter asked, and the conversation—more like a monologue—began. In a feverish conversation lasting ten hours, Gerstein poured out the whole story, crying and smoking incessantly. He related all he had just seen and begged von Otter to inform the Swedish government. Von Otter later recalled that Gerstein gave him details, names, and how he had come to be involved. He was determined to act as a witness to the Nazi atrocities, not anticipating that he would himself be drawn inextricably into the murder machinery himself, and he pleaded with von Otter to inform the Allies and the outside world, so that the Allied air forces, acting on Swedish information, would drop millions of leaflets over Germany. The German people, horrified, would then rebel against Hitler.

This was not the only occasion on which Gerstein sought to draw attention to what he had witnessed. He attended the papal nuncio in Berlin, Archbishop Cesare Orsenigo, but was turned away; he also saw numerous members of the Confessing and Lutheran churches, and opponents of the Nazi regime. In fact, he spoke to anyone who would listen and often to those he did not even know in his eagerness to get the message out.

Apart from the Swedish authorities, the Allies, and the Vatican, Gerstein also tried to convey his message via a friend, J. H. Ubbink, in the Netherlands. In February 1943 Ubbink received a message from Gerstein about the gas chambers, which he passed to the Dutch resistance. Skeptical, they decided not to forward the report or circulate it publicly. Another Gerstein attempt to let the world know thus failed.

While attempting to raise consciousness, he also took practical steps to see to it that the devastating effects of his office could be negated, or at least minimized. As the war progressed, a despairing Gerstein ordered that shipments of Zyklon-B gas canisters be buried on the pretext that they had been spoiled in transit and posed a risk to German soldiers and civilians. He tried, unsuccessfully, to have a chemical removed from the gas compound that caused severe irritation, so that death would be less painful for the victims. In addition, he fought with his superior officers who demanded that ever larger consignments of Zyklon-B should be dispatched, arguing that storing large amounts was extremely hazardous; if the shipments were hit by Allied air raids, the result would be a catastrophic loss of life throughout the region where the gas was stored.

His efforts saw only small returns, despite an inner turmoil that aged him prematurely, brought on clinical depression, and saw him attempt suicide on one occasion and discuss it on many others. Finally, on April 22, 1945, he defected to the Allies, making his way to French lines in the occupied town of Reutlingen. He was well received and given the opportunity to write a full report (actually, three) of what he had done and seen. Later, he was transferred to the Cherche-Midi military prison in Paris, where he was treated as a war criminal. On July 25, 1945, while still in French custody, he was found hanged in his cell, an alleged suicide.

Many questions have been asked as to why Gerstein behaved as he did. Moved to join the SS in early 1941 in order “to see things from the inside,” he was shocked and outraged at the death of his sister-in-law as a victim of the so-called T-4 euthanasia campaign; accordingly, he sought both to change the direction of Nazi policies and publicize the crimes being committed. He saw himself as acting the way a committed Christian should. As a covert anti-Nazi, he had a very special mission—nothing less than infiltrating the SS in order to expose the atrocities they were perpetrating.

Gerstein’s actions posed a major dilemma, however. Increasingly drawn into the very system he was trying to overthrow, he realized at every stage what he was doing and found himself incapable of extricating himself from its grasp. In view of this, how can he be recognized for his efforts? Moreover, bearing in mind that he was an SS officer whose name appeared on receipts for orders of large consignments of gas canisters, is it even proper that he should be?

On one hand, Gerstein sought desperately to save Jewish lives, at enormous personal risk, through alerting people to the Nazi measures and also through the destruction of significant quantities of the very gas he found himself compelled to order as a result of his office. On the other hand, a critic must ask: What, ultimately, did he achieve, other than his own sad death, the destitution of his family, and a place in the annals of those who tried to combat the Nazi state from the inside?

On August 17, 1950, a denazification court in Tübingen concluded that Gerstein was a Nazi offender for his assistance in the production and delivery of Zyklon-B. His widow, Elfriede, was denied a pension, though in January 1965, after a long battle, Baron von Otter and others managed to restore Gerstein’s reputation, and he received a posthumous pardon.

His report became perhaps the most horrifying eyewitness account of the Holocaust. After he had witnessed the gassing at Belzec he was told by the commandant, SS Major Christian Wirth: “There are not ten people alive who have seen or will see as much as you.” Gerstein worked to ensure that as many people as possible “saw” what he had seen. Although much of his report is unscientific and exaggerated, the basic facts he recounted were verified by many other Nazis after the war. In its essentials, it gets much right. SS Colonel Dr. Wilhelm Pfannenstiel, who was with Gerstein at Belzec on the fateful day he witnessed the gassing, testified in court on June 6, 1950, that the account given by Gerstein was basically correct.

Gerstein’s self-appointed mission was to expose the horrors of Nazism to the world and mitigate the suffering around him. His is the story of a remarkable and highly complex man who refused to surrender his conscience in the face of mass murder. He realized that he was continuing to commit the very acts he repudiated, albeit legally enforceable orders in accordance with the law of the land as it stood at that time. To disobey those orders would have put him totally beyond the pale and back in the concentration camp—and, thus, completely unable to achieve the results he sought. In the situation in which Kurt Gerstein found himself, therefore, the conflict between legality and morality was one that probably could not have been resolved, and that, perhaps, is the essence of his tragedy.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Belzec; Catholic Church; The Deputy; Euthanasia Program; Friedländer, Saul; Pius XII; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Friedländer, Saul. Kurt Gerstein, the Ambiguity of Good. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Joffroy, Pierre. A Spy for God: The Ordeal of Kurt Gerstein. New York: Harourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.

Gestapo

The Geheime Staatspolizei (Gestapo) was the Nazi regime’s secret state police that existed throughout the German Reich and German-held European territory during the period 1933–1945. The Gestapo was responsible for the elimination of all political opposition to the National Socialist German Workers’ Party (Nazi Party), which entailed the deportation of hundreds of thousands of Jews and other so-called undesirables to concentration camps before and during World War II.

When the Nazis first rose to power in 1933, Hermann Göring (who was then serving as minister of the interior and was one of Adolf Hitler's top lieutenants), reorganized the Prussian police force. He separated the political spy unit from the regular police forces and placed the new grouping, the Gestapo, under his own direct command. In 1934 Heinrich Himmler, who headed the paramilitary units known as the SS, took command of the Gestapo.

Two years later Himmler was appointed chief of all police forces, and he eventually placed the Gestapo under Heinrich Müller. As the Nazis' bureaucratic network expanded, the Gestapo was shuffled under various security organizations, and it operated alongside many other police groupings, all of whose duties overlapped. Concentration camps were technically under the authority of the Gestapo, although in reality it was the SS that kept them running. Nonetheless, it was Adolf Eichmann, the head of Gestapo unit IV B4, who oversaw the transport of millions of European Jews to concentration and death camps.

There were no civil restraints that the Gestapo had to observe in carrying out its duties. Not only could police arrest suspects, but they also could make "preventive" arrests. Anyone who could possibly oppose or be perceived to oppose the Nazis could be arrested, tortured, killed, or released—all without any oversight by a judicial body. Untold thousands of Jews, political intellectuals, clergy, homosexuals, Catholics, Roma, and other "undesirables" simply disappeared. Gestapo units also formed part of the death squads that followed behind the German Army as it invaded Poland and Russia. Those mobile units were responsible for the on-site killing of Jews and other targeted groups.

When Germany surrendered and World War II came to an end, the Gestapo was officially designated a criminal agency and disbanded.

KELLIE SEARLE

See also: Barbie, Klaus; Best, Werner; Denunciation; Eichmann, Adolf; Göring, Hermann; Himmler, Heinrich; Müller, Heinrich; Nacht und Nebel; Nuremberg Trials; Priebke, Erich; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard; Sippenhaft; Slave Labor; Topography of Terror; Waffen-SS; Weidt, Otto; Wrobel, Eta; Zimetbaum, Mala

Further Reading

Kahn, David. Hitler's Spies: German Military Intelligence in World War II. Cambridge (MA): Da Capo, 2000.

Weinberg, Gerhard L. Germany, Hitler, and World War II. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée

Andrée Geulen-Herscovici is a Belgian upstander who helped hide and rescue Jewish children during the Nazi occupation of Belgium between 1942 and 1944.

She was born Andrée Geulen on September 6, 1921, and studied to become a school teacher. In May 1940 German forces invaded Belgium, occupied it, and began implementing anti-Jewish ordinances. At first, Geulen did not pay much attention to the plight of Belgium's Jews. By 1942 she had secured a teaching position at the Gaty de Gamont School in Brussels. That same year, she was first made fully aware of the anti-Jewish laws when several students arrived in her classroom one day with yellow Stars of David affixed to their clothing. The Germans had made this mandatory for all Belgian Jews who went out in public. Horrified, she counseled her Jewish students to wear outerwear that covered up the yellow stars. Not long after, Geulen met Ida Sterno, a Belgian Jew who was involved in hiding Jewish children. Sterno was a member of the clandestine Comité de Défense des Juifs (Jewish Defense Committee). When Sterno asked Geulen for help in hiding and rescuing Jewish children, Geulen readily agreed.

A number of Jewish children were hidden at the school in which Geulen worked, with the help of the school's headmistress, Odile Ovar. German occupation authorities raided the school in May 1943 in the middle of the night, finding the hidden Jewish children and immediately arresting them. The school's personnel, including Geulen, were interrogated, but Geulen refused to be intimidated. When asked if she was ashamed of teaching Jews, she replied: "Aren't you ashamed to make war on Jewish children?" Odile Ovar and her husband, meanwhile, were arrested and deported to a German concentration camp, where they later died.

After this sad turn of events, Geulen became even more involved in the underground Jewish movement. As soon as the Germans had left the school, she visited all the homes of Jewish children in her area, warning their parents not to return them to school because it was now unsafe. Geulen subsequently secured an apartment under an assumed name, sharing it with Sterno, who was now also in hiding. Geulen quickly became a chief liaison for the Jewish Defense Committee, taking dozens—perhaps hundreds—of Jewish children from their homes and placing them with gentile families and in monasteries and churches. She visited almost all of them regularly, providing them with food, clothing, and other essentials.

As she went about her work, she was careful not to write anything down, lest she be arrested by the Germans. Instead, she committed to memory each of the children's names, original addresses, and other details so they could be returned to their families when the war ended. Unfortunately, a number of the children would never see their parents again, because they had been deported and murdered.

In May 1944 the Germans found Sterno, arrested her, and sent her to a detention camp in Malines, Belgium. Using false identification and an assumed name, Geulen visited her numerous times despite the danger to herself. The two women continued their rescue work until Belgium was liberated in September 1944.

Geulen's work was not finished, however, as she spent several more years thereafter rounding up the children in hiding and returning them to their families or relatives. However, some had no families to which they could return.

In the decades since, Geulen has maintained contact with many of the children she helped rescue. In 1989 Israel's Yad Vashem named Geulen-Hersovici as one of the Righteous among the Nations for her wartime work. In 2007, when she returned to Yad Vashem for a special conference on the hidden children of Belgium, she was granted honorary Israeli citizenship.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Belgium; Comité de Défense des Juifs; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.
Yad Vashem. "Geulen's List: Andrée Geulen-Hersovici."

Ghettos

The medieval practice of confining Jews to specific areas of towns ("ghettos") was revived by the Nazis as part of their strategy for dealing with the so-called “Jewish problem.” In September 1939 Reinhard Heydrich gave orders that the Jews of newly conquered Poland were to be forced into ghettos in the larger cities. This effective incarceration of Jews was the prelude to the mass murder of the Jews during the Holocaust and made that project easier, in that it was much simpler to deport to concentration camps whole populations of individuals already clearly identified as Jewish by their address.

GHETTOS IN OCCUPIED EUROPE 1939–1944

The first such ghetto was established in Łódź, and subsequently others were set up in various areas of Eastern Europe. The largest and most famous was the Warsaw Ghetto, which was eventually home to 350,000 persons herded behind a brick wall. Once established, conditions in these areas deteriorated rapidly. The Warsaw Ghetto also became an enduring symbol of Jewish resistance in the first months of 1943, when the Jewish Fighting Organization formed by inmates offered armed resistance to deportation. They managed to hold out until May of that year, when the ghetto was finally destroyed. The ghetto phenomenon was not entirely restricted to the world of German Nazism; for example, in Croatia during World War II, officials of the ruling Ustashe Party similarly drove Serbs (whom they considered racially inferior) into ghettos.

CYPRIAN BLAMIRE

See also: Belarus; Białystok Ghetto; Confiscation of Jewish Property; The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak; Frank, Hans; Generalgouvernement; Greece; Italian Jews and Fascism; Jewish Ghetto Police; Judenrat; Lithuania; Łódź Ghetto; Müller, Heinrich; Netherlands; Odessa Massacre; Paulavicius, Jonas; Poland; Riga; Shanghai Ghetto; Theresienstadt; Trawniki Men; Vilna Ghetto; Warsaw Ghetto; Wiedergutmachung; Yellow Star

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Ghetto in Flames: The Struggle and Destruction of the Jews in Vilna in the Holocaust. New York: Holocaust Library, 1982.

Kurzman, Dan. The Bravest Battle: The Twenty-Eight Days of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. New York: Putnam, 1976.

Gibraltar Camp, Jamaica

With the outbreak of war in 1939, Lisbon became a haven for refugees. Prior to 1941 the Portugal of fascist dictator Antonio Salazar had not accepted many Jews for permanent sanctuary, and Portugal did not see itself as a country of long-term refuge. Most refugees arrived in Lisbon only on a two-week transit visa. Once in Lisbon, this could be extended by the local police for another period of two weeks, on an indefinite basis.

Operation Barbarossa, the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, brought this to an end. In June and July 1941, as German and other Axis troops swept through Russia, Salazar began reading the situation as one that might force Portugal into the Nazi sphere of obligation. Careful not to antagonize the Axis, Salazar instituted a number of measures throughout Portugal designed to show Germany and Italy that their intervention would not be needed to ensure that his fascist ideals remained consistent with theirs.

One of these new measures saw a transformation of administrative jurisdiction over Jewish refugees from the police to the army, and an accompanying imposition of martial law regulations governing their freedom of movement. No longer would the system of renewable two-week transit visas apply, as new regulations were introduced that revised refugee status.

Then, early in November 1941, without warning, all Jewish refugees in Lisbon received a letter ordering them to leave the country within two weeks. Any refugees still in Portugal after that date would be sent for what the letter euphemistically referred to as “Compulsory Residence” (résidence forcée). To the refugee Jews from Poland, Czechoslovakia, and elsewhere, the prospects were ominous. Faced with the imminence of sudden deportation, however, members of Lisbon’s Jewish refugee community decided to take positive action rather than await developments.

One such initiative came in the form of a suggestion by a prominent member of the refugee community that the Jewish community in Lisbon send British prime minister Winston Churchill a birthday telegram, at the same time begging him for refuge in any country in the world under the British flag. All the Jewish refugees in Lisbon contributed to the cost of the telegram to be sent, and it was duly received in London on December 1, 1941. Once sent, the small refugee community sat down to await a reply from the British government.

With one day remaining before “Compulsory Residence” was introduced, all the Jews in the refugee community received a letter from the Polish consul in Lisbon requesting that they present themselves at his office, with passports in hand, the next day. Some two hundred invaded the consul’s office at 10:00 a.m. the next morning, to learn that Britain had decided to give all Polish subjects then in Portugal (which effectively meant all of the refugee community) a permit for emigration to the Caribbean island of Jamaica. From that time onward the Jews were saved: with this guarantee, the Jews would be safe until shipping could be arranged for crossing the Atlantic. This would be undertaken by the British government, presumably at British expense.

The reasons behind this grand gesture are difficult to find. In reality, this action was completely contrary to earlier practice. An explanation for sending the refugees to Jamaica is, perhaps, not as puzzling as it first appears, and centers on the fate of evacuees from another part of the British Empire, Gibraltar. In May 1940 the British government took the step of evacuating the civilian population of Gibraltar in order to transform that colony into a fully operational military base. Some two thousand were sent to Jamaica, where a large camp had been constructed to accommodate them. A second camp was built to house a future influx from Malta. When the anticipated Maltese evacuees failed to appear, Jamaica was left with two large camps, one filled with evacuees from Gibraltar, the other empty. The second camp would admirably fit the bill in housing the refugee Jews from Lisbon, who had finally been taken on board in January 1942. They arrived in Kingston in early February on board a converted Portuguese freighter, the SS Serpa Pinto.

Arriving at Gibraltar Camp II they learned that their internment need not be a negative experience. Books, newspapers, and radios were supplied. Food was plentiful, with abundant quantities of milk and dairy products, white bread and vegetables. For the Jews who kept kosher, fish was issued in lieu of meat. A refugee chef was permitted to do the cooking for the kosher Jews. As the refugees were not considered prisoners, there were in fact few legal impediments to their release from the camp; they were not enemy aliens, but citizens of Allied countries, and refugees from enemy persecution, at that. Consequently, they were allowed a sort of compromise liberty; the camp would remain their home, but they were otherwise free to come and go outside between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 10:00 p.m. without a pass. If the refugees wished to be away overnight or at weekends, a pass would have to be issued, but this rarely presented a problem. The refugees could thus for the most part come and go as they wished, subject only to this gentle surveillance.

While the arrangements concerning freedom of movement and daily activity were on the whole acceptable to all parties, everyone was aware that permanent settlement beyond Jamaica should be the ultimate objective. Over a lengthy period internees found their way to locations in South America, as well as Australia, Canada, and other territories of the British Empire, and toward the end of the war the refugee community thus dispersed to various parts of the world. With the continual farewells of refugees who found more secure lands in which to settle, the camp became more and more of a wasteland for those remaining. Very few of the Jewish refugees remained in Jamaica after the war, and the majority moved to the United States or the United Kingdom.

There is one final aspect of the Lisbon-to-Jamaica episode that needs to be explored further. Of all the Jewish refugees or internees sent under British auspices to other parts of the world, only this single instance was not accompanied by maladministration, insensitivity, or cruelty. The refugees were not considered to be enemy aliens, nor were they locked away on the grounds of their nationality. They did not have to undergo the experience of justifying why they should be permitted to remain at liberty, nor were they treated as criminals and subjected to interrogation, fingerprinting, or punishment drills. Plucked from an uncertain fate, they were treated exactly as many said refugees from the racial war against the Jews should be treated—with compassion, sympathy, and kindness.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: British Response to the Holocaust

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. "From Lisbon to Jamaica: A Study of British Refugee Rescue during the Second World War." Immigrants and Minorities 13, 1 (March 1994), 48–64.

Potworowski, Tomasz. "The Evacuation of Jewish Polish Citizens from Portugal to Jamaica, 1941–1943." Polin: Studies in Polish Jewry 19 (December 2006), 155–182.

Gies, Miep

Miep Gies was an Austrian-born Dutch citizen who hid Anne Frank and her family, along with several other Jews, in Amsterdam between 1942 and 1944. She was born Hermine Santruschitz on February 15, 1909, in Vienna. In 1920 she was sent to Leiden in the Netherlands to escape the unrest and food shortages of post-World War I Austria, and taken in as a foster child by the Nieuwenburg family. As a girl she was given the nickname "Miep."

In 1933 she went to work for Otto Frank, a German Jewish businessman who had fled Germany with his family to escape the Nazis. Soon thereafter, she met Jan Gies, a book-keeper. They grew fond of the Frank family, with whom they developed a close friendship.

In 1941 German occupation officials in the Netherlands insisted that Miep join a Nazi women's association. When Miep Gies was a Dutch citizen who helped to hide from the Nazis, Anne Frank, her family, and four other Jews in an annex above the business premises of Anne's father Otto, who was her employer. She became a close friend of the family during the two years they spent in hiding. She retrieved Anne Frank's diary after the family was arrested and kept the papers safe until Otto Frank returned from Auschwitz in 1945. In 1995 she was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. In this picture, taken in 1987, she holds a copy of her own book, Anne Frank Remembered. (Bettmann/Contributor/Getty)

she refused, her passport was canceled and she was ordered to be deported to her native Austria within 90 days. By way of response and in haste, Jan Gies married her on July 16, 1941, so she could obtain Dutch citizenship and thereby avoid deportation. Then, as German occupation officials and Dutch collaborators began to persecute Jews and deport them to unknown destinations in "the East," Jan and Miep decided to keep the Frank family safe. In July 1942, after some consideration as to method, they hid the Franks, along with several other Jews, in a small second-story apartment above Opekta, Otto Frank's spice company located at Amsterdam's Prinsengracht 263.

At considerable risk to her own safety, Miep supplied the Franks with food and medicine. The hiding place was only a short distance from Miep and Jan's home, and Miep continued to work in the office below the apartment so as to prevent unwanted intrusion from anyone seeking access to the second floor. Throughout the period in which the Franks were in hiding, Opekta had to continue operating in order to protect the family, as any change in routine could have led the Gestapo to investigate. Therefore, Miep and those around her kept things running smoothly to maintain the charade that there was nothing untoward.

On August 4, 1944, as Miep worked at her desk, a police official walked into the office, pointed a gun at her, and demanded that she show him the secret room. Somebody had tipped the police off about the Franks. Within minutes, the Franks and other people hiding in the second-floor apartment were arrested and taken away. Miep escaped only because the police officer had been a native of Vienna and understood her situation. The Franks were eventually sent to death camps.

Miep saved and hid Anne Frank's diary, the whereabouts of which she kept secret until the end of the war. In 1945 Otto Frank, who had survived Auschwitz, returned to Amsterdam and was reunited with Miep and Jan Gies. It was then that he learned of Anne's death at Bergen-Belsen. Determined to let the world know about his family's ordeal, in 1947 he permitted the diary's publication.

Miep hid the Frank family for more than two years. Although devastated by their arrest, she had sufficient presence of mind to ensure that she too was not picked up at the same time, enabling her to continue her work as a resister.

After the war, Miep developed into something of a celebrity, a status she eschewed. She always held that she did not do anything remarkable, and preferred to consider that she did what anyone in the same position should have done. In her view, although risking arrest every day for two years, what she did was simply her human duty. She developed her ideas around this theme in her memoir, Anne Frank Remembered: The Story of the Woman Who Helped to Hide the Frank Family. In 1947, when she and Jan moved to a new home at Jekerstraat 65, they allowed Otto Frank to move in with them.

Miep Gies received many honors recognizing her efforts to save Jewish lives during the Holocaust. In 1994 she was awarded the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany, and in 1995 she was recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem. In 1997 she was knighted in the Order of Orange-Nassau by Queen Beatrix of the Netherlands; on July 30, 2009, she received the Grand Decoration of Honor for Services to the Republic of Austria. On January 11, 2010, just short of her 101st birthday, Miep Gies died after a fall in a nursing home in Hoorn, a town outside of Amsterdam.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Anne Frank House; Denunciation; Frank, Anne; Netherlands; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations; Strobos, Tina

Further Reading

Gies, Miep. Anne Frank Remembered. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Muller, Melissa. Anne Frank: The Biography. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1998.

Gleichschaltung

Gleichschaltung was both a concept and a strategy that played a critical role in the Nazis' establishment and maintenance of a centralized and all-controlling government. Its goal was nothing short of the complete domination of every aspect of German society through the mechanism of "nazification."

Gleichschaltung is a compound noun comprised of gleich, variously translated as "same," "equal," "synchronizing," "alike," or "standardization," but most often as "coordination"; and Schaltung, literally meaning "switch." The concept of the "same switch" might be better thought of as "being on the same page," a phrase, however, that renders Gleichschaltung far more benign than it actually was: its intent was to eliminate any source of influence in Germany other than that of the Nazi Party.

As a concept, Gleichschaltung reflected the Nazi ideology that an "Aryan" society can achieve its ultimate glory only by the subjugation of the individual to the greater good of the Volksgemeinschaft, the "people's community." Anything less than a totally unified populace, committed to the same goals and with absolute fidelity to the leader, would result in a biologically superior race being vulnerable to the insidious but intractable efforts of racially inferior cohorts to degrade society.

As a strategy, Gleichschaltung meant establishing a strong central government and eliminating all that was not in keeping with the Nazi Party, its ideology, and its Weltanschauung (world view). The strategy was first implemented soon after Hitler's ascension to power, with the Enabling Act of March 1933 that vested in Hitler the unilateral power to make laws. By early April 1933 much of the authority of local governments was shifted to the federal government through the placement of a Reichsstatthalter (Reich governor) in states throughout Germany who reported directly to the interior minister (Prussia, however, was placed under the control of Hermann Göring). The Nazi vision of a central government, led by an Übermensch (superman) with absolute control, began to take shape.

The strategy of coordination with the Nazi regime included the enactment of exclusionary legislation and decrees that eliminated Jews from organizations, associations, and institutions of all kinds. Existing organizations and institutions, freed from the threat of "others," became "Nazified" with all decisions and activities sanctioned by the Nazi Party, and all members indoctrinated in Nazi ideology. Some organizations were eliminated altogether, or folded into a like organization that had already been fully coordinated. In addition, new organizations or bureaucracies were established to take the place of those eliminated.

The scope of Gleichschaltung was total. Everything, such as the civil service, the professions, the courts, clubs of all kinds (sporting clubs, bowling clubs, singing clubs, dance clubs, shooting clubs, and the like), political parties, religion, literature, art, movies and theater, the press, school curricula, teachers, trade unions, youth organizations, and so forth, was to be coordinated with the Nazi Party.

The Gleichschaltung of the government included the elimination of all political parties other than the Nazi Party (July 1933), and the removal of all government officials deemed to be less than fully committed to the Nazi Party. The removal of “non-Aryans” (that is, Jews) from the civil service (April 1933) was made pursuant to the “Aryan Paragraph,” under which membership, participation, or work in an institution, organization, or association was dependent on proof of an Aryan background. Ultimately, the power of the local governmental institutions of the Länder (federal states) was eliminated as part of the broader transition to centralization of all governmental power (April 1933).

Coordination of the government with the Nazi Party also resulted in the assassination of Ernst Röhm and other leaders of the SA (Sturmabteilung), also known as the Brownshirts, in what was called “The Night of the Long Knives” in June 1934. This eliminated a potential threat to Hitler and further solidified his hold on power. Later that summer (August 1934) it was determined that upon the death of the president, the office of the president was to be merged with that of the chancellor to centralize all power in the Führer.

The Gleichschaltung of labor meant the elimination in the spring and summer of 1933 of the traditional trade unions—the Free Trade Unions and the Christian Trade Unions—and the establishment in their place of the Deutsche Arbeitsfront (German Workers’ Front), which made membership mandatory and was controlled entirely by the Nazi Party. Industry and agriculture were similarly “coordinated.”

The Gleichschaltung of the professions eliminated Jews from practicing law (and forced non-Jewish lawyers into the Association of National Socialist German Jurists, the Bund Nationalsozialistischer Deutscher Juristen), and from working as university professors (April 1933). Jewish editors and other members of the press were also prevented from practicing their profession (October 1933). In the summer of 1938 Jewish doctors were first prohibited from treating non-Jews, and then their licenses were revoked altogether.

The Gleichschaltung of culture resulted in the establishment of a Reich Chamber of Culture, divided into various subunits for literature, press, radio, theater, film, music, and fine arts, and requiring membership by all who were considered to contribute to German creativity.

Other aspects of the Gleichschaltung effort included complete government control of the nation’s train system, banking system, and, with the establishment of the Hitler Youth and related organizations, its youth, all reflective of the encompassing nature of the efforts made to coordinate all aspects of society with the Nazi Party.

A further example of the comprehensive nature of the Gleichschaltung “nazification” was the creation of what would become the largest organization developed by the Nazi Party, Kraft durch Freude (“Strength through Joy”), or KdF, a leisure organization intended to bring under Nazi control even the ways by which German citizens spent their after-work time.

The efforts at Gleichschaltung of the churches resulted in one of the few instances of resistance. The Catholic Church, refusing to give up its independence regarding worship and its social works, entered into an agreement with the Nazi government in July 1933 in an effort to prevent the “nazification” of the church. The Protestant churches split into two camps: the German Christians, who fully embraced the coordination of Christianity and Nazi ideology; and the Confessing Church, which insisted on retaining the basic elements of Christian theology.

The Nuremberg Laws of 1935 represented the apogee of coordinating the status of Germany’s Jews with the ideology of the Nazi Party. By stripping Jews of their German citizenship and making marriage and sexual intercourse between Jews and non-Jews illegal, the full impact of the concept and strategy of Gleichschaltung was realized. The Nuremberg Laws represented a significant step toward the recognition of the Nazi vision of a society entirely devoid of all elements that were not—and could never be—a part of the Volk, and it was done by legislation that in an instant set adrift hundreds of thousands of German Jews, some with roots in the country going back untold generations.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Aryan Paragraph; Barmen Declaration; Denazification; Enabling Act, 1933; Nuremberg Laws; Protestant Churches, German; Universities, Complicity in the Holocaust

Further Reading

Allen, William Sheridan. The Nazi Seizure of Power: The Experience of a Single German Town, 1922–1945. New York: Franklin Watts, 1984.

Gellately, Robert. Backing Hitler: Consent and Coercion in Nazi Germany. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Globke Trial

The trial (in absentia) of Dr. Hans Globke for World War II-era war crimes that was held in the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) in 1963. Globke was a Nazi jurist who had co-authored a highly influential commentary on the 1935 Nuremberg Laws with Dr. Wilhelm Stuckart. He also drafted the Reich Citizenship Law (1935) and the Law for the Protection of German Blood. After a major propaganda battle during the height of the Cold War, he was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and murder by an East German court in July 1963.

Two high-profile cases of suspected war crimes and crimes against humanity during the Nazi period evolved into long battles between East Germany and the Federal Republic of Germany during the Cold War period. They involved cases against Dr. Theodor Oberländer and Globke. Both were important figures within the West German government, and the debate about their culpability was as much about personal guilt as about the reintegration of former Nazi officials into the West German government. Whereas the case against Oberländer ended with his resignation from his ministerial post, Globke was officially defended and kept in office by West German chancellor Konrad Adenauer until he himself resigned in 1963. In both matters, a trial with a strong case but many legal deficiencies and in the absence of the defendants took place in communist East Germany. The final judgments were not accepted by West German authorities. At the same time, separate investigations into the cases were conducted in West Germany, but no trials ever took place there.

Globke, born on September 10, 1898, was brought up, like Adenauer, in the Catholic milieu of the Rhineland. After studying law he entered the Prussian civil service during the Weimar Republic and quickly rose through the ranks. During this period he was a member of the conservative Catholic Zentrum Party. He stayed in the civil service after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933. In 1936 he co-authored the commentary on the Nuremberg Laws, the basic race laws of Nazi Germany, which provided for the persecution of Jews. Although he participated at a high level in the administration of Nazi Germany, his request to join the Nazi Party was turned down because of his former Zentrum links. His actions during the Nazi period became a major issue in the debate about his guilt. Whereas his friends claimed that he had strong links to the anti-Hitler plot of July 20, 1944, and that his legal explanations of the race laws could be seen as a softened approach to Nazi racial legislation, his enemies accused him of being a leading figure in the persecution of Jews. Allegedly, after the beginning of World War II in 1939, Globke no longer had anything to do with the interpretation of racial legislation, but he was charged with general administrative affairs and the creation of an administration in the newly annexed Alsace-Lorraine.

When the war ended in 1945, American authorities arrested Globke because of his former position. Later he was a witness during the Nuremberg Trials. Nevertheless, he held several administrative posts in West Germany beginning in 1946, and none of the Western Allies protested his nominations. In September 1949 Globke joined the newly created chancellery of the Federal Republic, becoming state secretary there in 1953. He was probably the single most important adviser to Chancellor Adenauer and had a strong influence on staff recruitment. He also played a major role in establishing the security services of West Germany. Globke's activities during the Nazi period were criticized by the Social Democratic opposition in parliament in 1951, 1953, and again in 1955–1956. For that reason, he tried to keep a low profile. It was Adenauer, in fact, who had him promoted and even decorated with a high West German order. In 1960 the East German government, which had access to most of the relevant Nazi files, began a campaign to discredit Globke, even comparing him to Adolf Eichmann. This resulted in his trial in absentia in July 1963. Globke resigned his position in October 1963, when Adenauer also resigned, and because Globke had reached the mandatory age of retirement. Globke died on February 2, 1973.

OLIVER BENJAMIN HEMMERLE

See also: Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor; Oberlaender, Theodor; War Crimes

Further Reading

Teschke, John P. Hitler's Legacy: West Germany Confronts the Aftermath of the Third Reich. New York: Peter Lang, 1999.

Globocnik, Odilo

Odilo Globocnik was a prominent Austrian Nazi official and the primary architect of the Holocaust in German-occupied Poland.

He was born on April 21, 1904, in Trieste, then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, to a Slovene family. As a young man in 1922 he became involved in a proto-Nazi paramilitary group. He joined the Austrian Nazi Party in 1931, and was admitted to the Austrian SS three years later. Between 1933 and 1935 he was arrested four times and spent some 11 months in jail for his ties to the Nazi Party, which was then illegal in Austria.

Nevertheless, he steadily advanced through the ranks of the Austrian Nazi Party after 1935, playing a pivotal role in ousting the Austrian government and paving the way for the Anschluss (political annexation) of Austria by Nazi Germany in 1938. German dictator Adolf Hitler rewarded Globocnik for his efforts by appointing him the local party leader in Vienna in May 1938. Globocnik soon ran afoul of party leaders, including Hermann Göring, however, because of his unscrupulous ways and domineering manner. In January 1939 he was removed as party leader of Vienna, and his career seemed all but ended. He then joined the Waffen-SS as an enlisted man and saw action during the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, where he distinguished himself in combat.

On November 9, 1939, SS head Heinrich Himmler, who had always admired Globocnik's loyalty, rescued him from obscurity by appointing him SS chief of the Lublin District of the General Government of Poland. In this role, Globocnik was well placed to implement the Final Solution—the mass extermination of Jews—between 1941 and 1945. He supervised the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto as well as the Białystok ghetto and oversaw the construction of some of the most notorious concentration camps erected during the Nazi era—Belzec (1941), Sobibór (1942), and Treblinka (1942). In these camps, Jews from all over Europe were murdered in the hundreds of thousands.

Globocnik also created a small army of Jewish slave laborers, who were forced to perform all sorts of manual labor under the most horrific conditions. Overall, it is estimated that Globocnik was responsible for the deaths of as many as 1.5 million Jews.

In September 1943, in the immediate aftermath of Benito Mussolini's exile from Rome, Globocnik was named local SS leader and police commissioner at Trieste, in the portion of Italy still controlled by German forces. Although his primary task was to fight Italian partisans, he also found the time to harass and persecute Italian Jews in northern Italy and along the northern Adriatic coast. At the end of the war he fled into the Alpine highlands, but he was apprehended by British forces on May 31, 1945, near Paternion, Austria. After a brief interrogation, Globocnik committed suicide, allegedly by biting into a hidden cyanide capsule.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Anschluss; Austria; Białystok Ghetto; Generalgouvernement; Italy; Nisko Plan; Trawniki Men; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Poprzeczny, Joseph. Odilo Globocnik: Hitler's Man in the East. Jefferson (NC): McFarland, 2004.
Rieger, Berndt. Creator of Nazi Death Camps: The Life of Odilo Globocnik. London: Vallentine Mitchell, 2007.

Glücks, Richard

Richard Glücks was a senior Nazi police leader and second-in-command to Theodor Eicke as inspector of concentration camps, an office he himself took up in November 1939 upon Eicke's transfer to combat command. Born in Düsseldorf, Glücks joined the Nazi Party after its ascent to office and rose in a relatively quick period to become Eicke's aide. Under Glücks, the Nazi concentration camp network expanded considerably, an expansion necessitated by German conquests during World War II. In February 1940 Glücks reported to the head of the SS, Heinrich Himmler, that a site had been found for a new camp close by the Polish town of Oświęcim, which in German translated as Auschwitz. By May 1940, upon his orders, the first Kommandant of the Auschwitz concentration camp, Rudolf Franz Hoess, commenced building what would become the largest of all the concentration camps and a byword for the Holocaust. Glücks introduced a number of new measures to the concentration camps under his direction, including the use of forced foreign labor and facilities for medical experiments on camp inmates. The full details of his ultimate fate are unclear, though it is believed he committed suicide in Italy in May 1945 to avoid trial at the hands of the Allies.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz; Eicke, Theodor; Medical Experimentation

Further Reading

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.
Wistrich, Robert S. Who's Who in Nazi Germany. London: Routledge, 1995.

Goebbels, Joseph

Paul Joseph Goebbels was the Nazi Party's first and only Minister for Propaganda and Public Enlightenment, serving from 1933 until 1945. He was the architect of Adolf Hitler's propaganda efforts and was a key official within the Nazi Party. He remained a dedicated supporter of the party, even after the tide of war turned against Germany.

Goebbels was born in the city of Rheydt, in the Rhineland region of Germany, on October 29, 1897. His father was a bookkeeper in a lampwick factory. His parents were strict Catholics and hoped that their son would study for the priesthood. When World War I began in 1914, Goebbels was kept out of the German Army because he had a deformed foot. After the war, he disappointed his parents' hopes that he would become a member of the clergy. Instead, he decided to study German literature and attended several universities, including Bonn, Freiburg, Wurzburg, and Munich, before finally earning a doctoral degree from the University of Heidelberg in 1921.

After graduation, Goebbels embarked on a literary career and wrote his first novel, Michael: Ein Deutsches Schicksal (Michael: a German Destiny), shortly after leaving school. The novel was based on his experiences at university and remained unpublished until the Nazi Party's publisher accepted it in 1929. After college, Goebbels tried to find work in journalism but was unable to secure a steady position. He was a rabid antisemite, and in 1922 he joined the fledgling National Socialist Party. His initial assignment was to organize the party's youth.

In 1924 Goebbels abandoned his efforts to find work in journalism and entered politics. Franz von Wieggershaus, a nationalist politician and member of the Prussian Parliament, hired Goebbels as his private secretary, and over the next several years Goebbels remained active in the Nazi Party. He first met Hitler after Hitler's release from prison in 1925. While imprisoned Hitler decided to reorganize the party, and in 1925 he appointed Goebbels to manage the party's affairs in the Rheinland-Nord district. Goebbels was also asked to act as secretary to Gregor Strasser, a prominent Nazi. The following year, Goebbels was promoted to Gauleiter, or district commissioner, for the German capital of Berlin and it was here that he began to distinguish himself. He reorganized the Berlin Nazi Party and built the party's weekly newspaper, Der Angriff (The Attack), into a powerful tool for denouncing the ruling Weimar government and the party's enemies throughout Germany.

In 1928 Goebbels became the party's head of propaganda. Over the next several years, he masterminded its electoral strategy. Once in power, Hitler selected Goebbels to run a new Ministry for Propaganda and Public Enlightenment. It was here that Goebbels exhibited his true genius. Under his control, the ministry employed a variety of modern media—including motion pictures, radio, and the press—to build a cult around Hitler and disseminate the Nazi message abroad.

Among his most striking accomplishments was the organization of several Nazi rallies throughout Germany, including the infamous Nuremberg Party Rallies that began in 1929. He was also the driving force behind the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 1938, during which thousands of Jews were sent to concentration camps while their businesses and synagogues were destroyed. Goebbels provided an account of his role in the Nazi rise to power in two books, Der Kampf um Berlin (The Struggle for Berlin), published in 1932, and Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei (From Kaiserhof to the Reich Chancellery), which appeared in 1934.

Goebbels led a scandalous private life, which jeopardized his position within the party. He married a divorcée, Magda Quandt, in 1934. After the marriage, however, he had several affairs, a practice that irritated Hitler and ultimately undermined Goebbels's relationship with the Nazi leader. After the outbreak of World War II in 1939, Goebbels tried to influence Hitler's war plans. Although Hitler appreciated Goebbels's efforts as propaganda minister, he ignored his military advice and denied him a larger role in the war effort. Despite this snub, Goebbels remained a stalwart supporter of the party, even after the tide of war turned against Germany. During the final years of the regime, he remained the party's main propaganda voice.

In 1945 his loyalty was finally rewarded when Hitler appointed him the Third Reich's trustee for total war. By this stage, however, the Nazi war machine had been destroyed on the Eastern Front, and the Reich was doomed. In the final days of the war, Goebbels moved his wife Magda and their six children into Hitler's bunker in Berlin. Hitler's final act as the German leader, before he killed himself, was to appoint Goebbels to the office of Reich Chancellor. On May 1, 1945, with the soldiers of the Russian Army surrounding Berlin, Goebbels helped his wife to poison their children and then shot her before finally committing suicide. His unpublished diary covering the years 1942–1943 was discovered among his papers after his death and published in 1948.

DANIEL SIEGEL

See also: Grynspan, Herschel; Hippler, Fritz; Kristallnacht; Nazi Book Burning; Propaganda in the Holocaust; Rosenstrasse Protest

Further Reading

Bramsted, Ernst. Goebbels and National Socialist Propaganda, 1925–1945. East Lansing (MI): Michigan State University, 1965.

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Good

Good is a British film from 2008 based on the stage play of the same name by C. P. Taylor. Directed by Vicente Amorim, it is the story of literature professor John Halder, played by American actor Viggo Mortensen. A solid citizen living in Nazi Germany, he is beset by family problems—children, a concert pianist wife who relies on John for domestic peace and quiet so she can practice, and an aged mother with Alzheimer’s. John takes solace from a number of sources: his writing, his teaching, his Jewish best friend Maurice Glückstein (Jason Isaacs), and, increasingly, a student femme fatale named Anne (Jodie Whitaker). Thinking little of the Nazi Party to begin with, John becomes seduced by promises of payment, privileges, and career advancement after his novel—dealing with compassionate euthanasia— attracts attention from the Reich Chancellery. Before he realizes it, he is offered work as a consultant with the SS and granted an honorary position with officer rank. At no time does he ever consider that he is being compromised, even as he is drawn deeper and deeper into moral collaboration with the Nazi movement.

The major arena in which this is played out is through his changing relationship with Maurice, his comrade in arms in the trenches during World War I. John is aware that Nazi rule is increasingly strangling the Jewish community but does not really contemplate what this signifies for Maurice—even though we see the many ways in which the situation leads to the physical and emotional deterioration of his friend. John finds himself torn between an increasing sense of duty (as a “good” man obeying the law) and his relationship with his Jewish friend.

Toward the culmination of the movie, John, now in an SS uniform and with the Final Solution in full swing, is working in the office of Adolf Eichmann. A plot line enables him to visit a concentration camp, improbably seeking the now-incarcerated Maurice. In a moment of illumination, he imagines that he sees his former friend, gaunt and tortured, now just another Jewish concentration camp inmate. Only at the very end of the movie, as John contemplates the Jewish prisoners around him, is he able to question the meaning of what he is seeing. Incredulous, he stands with his arms outstretched, wondering how it all got this far—and why he had not seen it before now.

Here, we see how a stereotypical “good” man does nothing while evil is all around him, oblivious to the fact that through inaction he has not only allowed his best friend to be sent to death, but that everything in which he believes has been sacrificed due to his apathy and sense of self-preservation. The film, certainly a morality play, therefore shows how easily one could fall into the Nazi web. The core thesis of the film is that there is nothing wrong—until it is too late. John is an ordinary, intelligent person; yet all it takes is a bit of ignorance, or, perhaps, of willful denial, and we see a decent German citizen (symbolic, perhaps, of all such citizens) drawn into the madness that overtook his country. The film, just like the play that preceded it, gives an insight into what life was like during the Nazi period.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Concentration Camps; Euthanasia Program

Further Reading

Fellman, Marc Lee. Moral Complexity and the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2009.

Jones, David H. Moral Responsibility in the Holocaust: A Study in the Ethics of Character. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Taylor, C. P. Good: A Tragedy. London: Methuen, 1982.

Göring, Albert

Albert Göring was the younger brother of Hermann Göring, head of the German Luftwaffe (air force), who was, for a lengthy period, the second most powerful man in Germany after Adolf Hitler. Unlike his brother, however, Albert Göring was bitterly opposed to National Socialism and worked to save Jews and anti-Nazi dissidents.

Göring was born in Berlin on March 9, 1895, the fifth child of Heinrich Göring, former governor of German South-West Africa, and his wife Franziska “Fanny” Tiefenbrunn. The Görings were an elite household with many extended family connections in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria; they could count among their relatives such names as Zeppelin, Grimm, Burckhardt, and Merck, among others. Because Heinrich Göring was absent from his family for long periods on state duties, the children spent a lot of time with their godfather, Baron Hermann von Epenstein, who took on much of the responsibility for raising them. Ironically, as it would turn out, von Epenstein was of part-Jewish background, and rumors abounded for many years that it was he who actually fathered both Hermann and Albert during a long-term affair with their mother.

Unlike his brother, Albert Göring evinced no interest in politics, preferring to live the high life as a spoiled child of the near-aristocracy. With the ascent to office of his brother’s party in 1933, however, he proved to be a committed opponent of deep moral conviction. Moving to Vienna, he worked in a film studio, lived for a time on an allowance from von Epenstein, and often spoke out against Adolf Hitler. Once Austria was absorbed into Germany in March 1938, this opposition marked him out for harassment from the Gestapo, but he was protected by his brother Hermann, who ensured that Gestapo attention would always be deflected.

An early example of the kind of assistance Göring could provide related to his former employer, the Austrian film producer Oskar Pilzer. A well-known member of the Jewish community in Vienna, Pilzer was arrested by the Gestapo immediately after the Anschluss of Austria and Germany. Göring not only used his influence to arrange for Pilzer to be freed but also helped him and his family escape Germany; they went first to Rome, and then Paris.

Testimonies from those who survived the Holocaust provide ample evidence that Göring saved many Jewish lives and provided support in other ways. One example among many relates to his intervention when he saw a group of Jewish women who had been forced to scrub the street. Göring joined them, and the SS officer on the scene, upon realizing who this man was, ordered that the scrubbing cease.

As the anti-Jewish measures intensified, Göring decided to act. Seeing the danger facing the Jews, he often forged his brother's signature on transit documents, or helped Jews escape Vienna by obtaining legitimate hard-to-obtain travel documents. On one occasion, in the fall of 1943, he took the completely unauthorized step of signing passports with his own hand for a Jewish family he had befriended. Using his influence, at another time he persuaded SS chief Reinhard Heydrich to release Czech resistance fighters who had been captured by the Gestapo.

Göring's doctor since 1939, Laszlo Kovacs, later stated that Göring provided him with money to establish a bank account in Switzerland, which Jewish refugees could access in order to fund travel to Lisbon. Later, after the German occupation of Italy in the fall of 1943, Göring wrote out a special pass to enable Kovacs to reach safety.

It was clear that, despite their diametrically opposed ideological differences, the two brothers were very fond of each other. Hermann, in particular, seemed to be always on the lookout to ensure that Albert did not get into trouble, and that he could get him out of it if he did. Albert was arrested by the Gestapo several times, but on every occasion he was released due to his brother's intervention. Perhaps, however, this family loyalty only went so far. Richard Sonnenfeldt, chief interpreter of the American prosecution team at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, later recalled how Hermann Göring enjoyed displaying his power to Albert by freeing Jews from the concentration camps when asked to do so. While Albert continually brought newer and newer cases to his brother—and there were more than one hundred verifiable names of those saved at Albert's insistence—Hermann permitted this in order to demonstrate to his sibling how important he was.

Albert, however, possessed some degree of influence on his own. He often helped people in need financially and on the strength of his name alone.

Göring intensified his anti-Nazi activity when he was made export director at the Czech Škoda Works. In this capacity he saved many employees, among them the director, Jan Morávek, and his family. Morávek, as it turned out, was an important member of the Czech resistance movement—and he was not the only Czech resister looked after through Göring's efforts. At Škoda, Göring also encouraged minor acts of sabotage, and it was said that he even refused to return the Nazi salute when officers visited Škoda. When he learned of the imminence of an action involving Jews or captured resisters, he sent trucks to nearby concentration camps with requests for slave labor, only to have them stopped before arriving at the factory so that those on board could escape.

After the war, Albert Göring was questioned during the Nuremberg Trials, but, on the strength of the many people who came forward to speak on his behalf, he was not prosecuted. He was also arrested by the Czechs but was again saved through the intercession of many of the Jewish families he had saved.

The postwar years were anything but kind, however. His name alone dogged him for the rest of his life, leading to many years without employment. He worked for a time as a designer in a construction firm in Munich, and also found occasional work as a writer and translator, but lived out his remaining years on a government pension. Although a devout Catholic, he married four times, and when he died on December 20, 1966, he was survived by his fourth wife, Brunhilde Seiwaldstätter.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Göring, Hermann; Rescuers of Jews; Speer, Albert

Further Reading

Wyllie, James. The Warlord and the Renegade: The Story of Hermann and Albert Goering. Stroud (UK): Sutton, 2006.

Göring, Hermann

German air force marshal and head of the Luftwaffe. Born on January 12, 1893, in Rosenheim, Bavaria, Hermann Göring was educated in military school in Karlsruhe. He then entered officers' training school at Gross Lichterfelde, and on graduation in 1912 was commissioned in the infantry. He served in the German Army and fought in World War I until 1915, when he joined the air service. Göring succeeded Baron Manfred von Richthofen, on the latter's death in combat, as commander of the Richthofen Squadron in July 1918. Credited with 22 aerial victories in World War I, Göring was awarded the coveted Pour le Mérite medal.

After the war he moved to Scandinavia, where he took up show flying and married a Swedish baroness. He returned to Germany in 1921 and became a close associate of Adolf Hitler, and in 1922 Hitler gave Göring charge of the SA,

Hermann Göring was a German politician, military leader, and leading member of the Nazi Party. After helping Adolf Hitler take power in 1933, he became the second-most powerful man in Germany. He founded the Gestapo in 1933, and in 1935 was appointed commander-in-chief of the Luftwaffe. Hitler promoted him to the rank of Reichsmarschall, and in 1941 Hitler designated him as his successor and deputy. (Library of Congress) which grew dramatically in strength. Seriously wounded in the 1923 Beer Hall Putsch, Göring fled Germany but returned in 1927. In 1928 he was elected to the Reichstag and was its president in 1932. He had easy access to influential individuals in industry, banking, and the military, and acted as liaison between them and Hitler, playing a key role in the Nazi ascent to power.

After Hitler became German chancellor in January 1933, Göring secured even more power and influence. Among his many offices were Minister without Portfolio, Minister of the Interior for the state of Prussia, and Minister of the Air Force (Luftwaffe). He soon began rebuilding the Luftwaffe, and was instrumental in all major policy decisions affecting its composition and training. In April 1933 he established the Geheime Staatspolizei (Gestapo, or political police) from out of the Prussian state police; it was a force designed to crush all resistance to Nazism. In 1936 he was appointed to oversee the Four Year Plan, giving him virtual control over the German economy. As far as the Luftwaffe was concerned, Göring supported the notion of a tactical air force at the expense of strategic bombing, arguably the correct decision given the heavy military demands on Germany's industrial base.

In 1939 Hitler appointed Göring Reichsmarschall (Reich Marshal) and designated him as his heir. Göring was also instrumental in the development of concentration camps, and he worked with Reinhard Heydrich, chief of Reich security, in formulating a "Final Solution to the Jewish question" (Endlösung der Judenfrage). Göring also amassed a large personal fortune and, especially during World War II, indulged his passion for collecting fine art.

Göring's Luftwaffe was influential in the early Nazi victories in Poland in 1939 and France in 1940. His interventions in the Battle of Britain in 1940, however, negatively affected the German war effort and led to a loss in his influence with Hitler. Göring opposed Operation Barbarossa, Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union, favoring a Mediterranean strategy instead. He was blamed, probably falsely, for having suggested that the Luftwaffe, with only a limited transport capacity, could supply the Sixth Army at Stalingrad. Popular opinion also turned against him as Allied air raids on the Reich became increasingly effective. Progressively marginalized, Göring spent more time at his estate of Karinhall, where he indulged his interests in hunting and art collecting. Although Hitler had designated Göring as his successor, the latter's impatience at the end of the war—painted by head of the Party Chancery Martin Bormann and others as an attempt by Göring to wrest power from Hitler—led the Führer to order that Göring be stripped of his posts and arrested.

On May 9, 1945, with the end of the war, Göring surrendered to elements of the U.S. 9th Infantry Division and was tried at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. Unrepentant, he was found guilty and sentenced to death, but he committed suicide by swallowing poison on October 15, 1946, only hours before his planned execution.

WENDY A. MAIER

See also: Final Solution; Führerprinzip; Gestapo; Göring, Albert; Heydrich, Reinhard; Kristallnacht; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nuremberg Trials; Sauckel, Fritz; Streicher, Julius; Sturmabteilung

Further Reading

Mosley, Leonard. The Reich Marshall: A Biography of Herman Goering. New York: Doubleday, 1974.

Overy, Richard. Goering: Hitler's Iron Knight. London: I. B. Tauris, 2011.

Graziani, Rodolfo

Rodolfo Graziani was a leading general during the fascist ventenniò (twenty years' regime) in Italy, who reached the height of his career consolidating Italy's colonies in Africa under the government of Benito Mussolini. He was born on August 11, 1882, in Filettino, a small hill town near Rome. His father was a doctor who moved around for work, so Rodolfo spent his childhood in the nearby town of Affile. From his early teens he planned upon a career in the military, but due to a lack of economic support he was unable to join a military academy. He therefore waited until he was twenty-one years of age to join the infantry of the 94th regiment in Rome.

In 1908 Graziano was sent to Africa for the first time to keep order in Italy's original colony, Eritrea. This first experience in Africa inspired him to request a deployment to Libya, which was granted in 1914 following the Italo-Turkish War. He was, however, quickly recalled to fight in World War I. He emerged unscathed in 1918, becoming the youngest colonel in the Italian army. In 1922 he was sent to assist in the pacification of Libya and was soon noticed by his superiors for his military strategy. He was praised for his quick thinking, organizational skills, ability to motivate his troops and prepare them for battle, and capacity to comprehend the enemy in terms of its leaders and warfare.

Graziani ended up spending twelve years in Libya, leading the conquest of the regions of Tripolitania, Cyrenaica, and Fezzan alongside his superior, Pietro Badoglio. After successfully capturing the leader of the Libyan resistance, Omar el-Mukhtar, he was promoted to vice governor of Cyrenaica in 1931. Part of his success in Libya was also the result of a combination of cruel and repressive initiatives against locals in order to weed out any rebel fighters opposing the Italian invasion. These tactics included the forced deportation of 100,000 Cyrenaicans from their homeland into concentration camps, mass hangings of resistance fighters without trial, and the erection of barbed wire fences that split up tribal groups and separated villagers from their livestock.

Testimonies state that in addition to Graziani's general reign of terror, he implemented antisemitic measures against the Libyan Jewish population, which was around 35,000 at the time. He allegedly prohibited them from frequenting certain public spaces in the city of Benghazi, such as beaches and first-class train carriages, and dismissed some Jews from their jobs without notice. A number of Libyan Jews were also sent to concentration camps in Libya and endured severe living conditions. It is not clear why they were sent to these camps, so it cannot be assumed that it was due to a specific act of antisemitism or mere general discrimination against the local population.

The Italian occupation of Libya did not initially mean worsening conditions for the Jewish population, but as the pacification became more successful and the fascistization of the new colony intensified, cultural and religious clashes became more apparent. The fascistization of Libyan schools, for example, led to a rise in tension as the syllabus in religious schools was forcibly altered. Additionally, in 1932 Italian authorities made Saturday school compulsory for all students, signifying that Jews would no longer be exempt from attendance due to the weekly observance of the Sabbath, under penalty of expulsion. This increasing discrimination was undoubtedly the result of Graziani's control together with that of Badoglio, as evident from various testimonies in which both military leaders alluded to their lack of respect and personal dislike for the Jews of Libya. After Graziani and Badoglio's departure from Libya in 1934, the situation for Libyan Jews did not improve, nor did it largely deteriorate, despite the implementation of the Racial Laws in Italy in 1938, which included various harsh antisemitic initiatives for Jews in both Italy and its colonies.

Graziani and Badoglio spent little time back in Italy, as they were soon sent to lead the Italian invasion of Abyssinia in 1935. Operating under a "carte blanche" granted by Mussolini, Graziani's repressive measures against the Abyssinian population ranged from carpet-bombing, to the use of various poison gases (rendered illegal under the Geneva Convention), and the massacre of hundreds of civilians in Addis Ababa and surrounding villages following an attempted assassination of Graziani in February 1937. Due to bad press against Italians in Africa following the massacre, Mussolini ordered Graziani back to Rome that same year, where he stayed until 1941. Here, he became one of the leading fascists to sign the Manifesto of Racial Scientists in 1938, a document published in Italy's principal newspapers asserting the existence of a racial hierarchy, with Jews at the bottom along with Africans.

Following Italy's entrance on the side of the Axis Powers in World War II in 1940, Graziani was sent back to Africa to lead the invasion of Egypt alongside German forces against the British. A lack of armaments, supplies, and organization—all under difficult environmental conditions—led to a swift failure of the initiative. Graziani therefore returned to Italy and spent the next two years back in his home town tending to his family's farm.

September 9, 1943, marked the dawn of an even darker turn in the history of Italy, as King Victor Emmanuel III and Marshal Badoglio signed the armistice with the Allies. Mussolini, on the other hand, regrouped in the north of Italy with his most loyal followers and set up the Republic of Salò, in collaboration with the Nazi forces that had come to occupy the country. Graziani was thus called back into service by Mussolini and became head of the army of Salò, hunting down fellow countrymen who had changed sides. Through this, he became responsible for the deaths of hundreds of Italian partisans.

When Mussolini was finally caught and shot by the partisans, Graziani was captured by the invading Allies and awaited his fate in a prisoner of war camp, first in Rome and then in Algeria, until 1946. British forces then handed him over to Italian authorities as the Allies abandoned any plans to conduct an Italian equivalent to the Nuremberg trials in Germany. Graziani was first put on trial in October 1948 at the Supreme Court in Rome for collaboration with Nazi forces on Italian soil. Consequently he was not tried for any of his colonial crimes in Africa, despite the endless list of alleged atrocities. The court was eventually suspended due to a lack of significant evidence, and a military tribunal condemned him to 19 years of incarceration in 1950; he was, however, acquitted a mere four months later on the ground that he was “following orders.”

Graziani spent the rest of his life out of the public eye, back in Affile, where he tended to his crops. In 1952 he was named honorary president of the Movimento Sociale Italiano, the Italian neo-fascist party and was appropriated as a heroic symbol of the extreme right. He died three years later on January 11, 1955, from a gastric ulcer at the age of 72. His funeral featured many ex-fascist squad members and neo-fascists, men who had fought with him in Italian Africa, and personal followers. This odd ensemble provided a prelude to the manner in which the memory of Graziani lived on after his death through various postcolonial and postfascist instruments, such as the mausoleum erected in his honor in his home town in 2012. This recent commemoration caused controversy only abroad; the persistence of colonial nostalgia and amnesia of the darker parts of Italy's recent past allowed for a measure of hero-worship. The fact that the monument itself was funded by the Regional Government of Lazio was testimony to this, as was the lack of domestic outcry over its erection. In mainstream society, Rodolfo Graziani is largely remembered as he himself wished to be remembered, as the founder of Italian Africa.

VICTORIA WITKOWSKI

See also: Fascism; Italy

Further Reading

- Ben-Ghiat, Ruth, and Mia Fuller (Eds.). Italian Colonialism. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
- Canosa, Romano. Graziani: Il maresciallo d'Italia, dalla guerra d'Etiopia alla Repubblica di Salò. Milano: Mondadori, 2004.
- Del Boca, Angelo (Ed.). Le guerre coloniali del fascismo. Bari: Laterza, 1991.
- Mayda, Giuseppe. Graziani l'Africano: Da Neghelli a Salò. Firenze: La Nuova Italia, 1992.
- Sbacchi, Albert. Ethiopia under Mussolini: Fascism and the Colonial Experience. London: Zed Press, 1985.

The Great Dictator

One of the classics of cinema history, The Great Dictator is a 1940 motion picture produced, directed, written by and starring Charlie (later Sir Charles) Chaplin. A satire on German Nazism and Italian Fascism, the movie was the first comedy to poke fun at Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, and by so doing to draw attention to the brutal antisemitism being experienced by Germany's Jews under the Third Reich. Told through thinly veiled code-language—Adolf Hitler as “Adenoid Hynkel,” Benito Mussolini as “Benzino Napaloni,” Der Führer as “The Phooey,” Hermann Göring as “Marshal Herring,” and so forth—the movie was an enormous gamble for Chaplin, who not only bankrolled its production using his own money but also departed from his career-defining silent movie technique in order to make this, his first “talkie.” Not only that, it was the first time his signature character, the Tramp—in this case known simply as “a Jewish Barber”—spoke dialogue from a prepared script. The film was well received by U.S. audiences and was undoubtedly Chaplin’s most successful film commercially. Critics were more qualified in their acclaim, some pointing out that Hollywood should refrain from foreign political comment at a time of American isolationism. Others saw Chaplin’s comedic portrayal of anti-Jewish persecution as unacceptably bad taste; Chaplin himself was later to write that if in 1940 he had known the full extent of Nazi antisemitic measures (something that could not even be guessed at in 1940) he would never have made the film. However, Chaplin, who was not Jewish, was determined to make Hitler an object of ridicule, and he did so in the most effective way he could—through his comic art. The Great Dictator was nominated for a number of Academy Awards, including Best Picture, Best Actor (Chaplin), and Best Supporting Actor (Jack Oakie, in his role of Benzino Napaloni). The movie has been selected for permanent inclusion in the U.S. National Film Registry.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Fascism; Hitler, Adolf; Life Is Beautiful; The Mortal Storm

Further Reading

Chaplin, Charles. My Autobiography. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1964.

Maland, Charles J. Chaplin and American Culture: The Evolution of a Star Image. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Robinson, David. Chaplin: His Life and Art. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1985.

Greece

Greece is a state located in southeastern Europe, on the tip of the Balkans. In 1939 it had a population of 7.2 million, with a Jewish population of 72,000, comprising approximately 1% of the total population. The majority of Greek Jews—some 42,000—resided in Salonika. There have been Jews in Greece for well over 2,000 years, and modern anthropologists have unearthed the remains of an ancient synagogue that they believe dates to the second century BCE. In general, antisemitism in prewar Greece was much muted, and only a slim minority harbored negative attitudes toward Jews. Compared to Jews in northern and eastern European states, Jews in Greece were largely unaffected by antisemitism and persecution. However, that would change dramatically after the Axis powers invaded and occupied Greece beginning in the fall of 1940.

In October 1940 Italian forces invaded Greece, but the Greeks waged a surprisingly spirited defense and pushed them back into Albania, resulting in a military stalemate. In April 1941 German troops, working with the Italians, Bulgarians, and units from the Hungarian army, launched a major offensive into Yugoslavia and Greece; by the early summer, all of Greece, including its many islands, had been pacified and occupied.

Greece was subsequently divided into three occupation zones, administered by the Italians, Germans, and Bulgarians. In the Italian zone, officials essentially ignored Germany’s demands that Jews be rounded up and deported. Some occupation officials even hid Jews to avoid their capture. Meanwhile, several thousand Jews residing in the German zone fled for safety to the Italian zone. Jews were relatively safe there until fascist Italy was forced to exit the war in September 1943, at which time the Germans took control of the former Italian zone of occupation.

The Germans planned to round up, deport, and murder all Jews in their occupation zone, which included Salonika. Greeks in general suffered grievously during the occupation, with as many as 100,000 people dying during the winter of 1941–1942 alone because of famine and disease. German authorities drafted some 2,000 Jewish men into forced labor in July 1942, and in February 1943 all the Jews in Salonika were herded into ghettos and sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau; nearly all were killed shortly after their arrival. By the summer of 1943 virtually no Jews remained in Greece’s largest Jewish enclave.

In the spring of 1943, under German orders, the Bulgarians rounded up some 4,200 Jews in their zone, mostly from Thrace, and placed them in German custody. The Germans in turn sent them to the Treblinka death camp, where almost all were murdered. After Italy exited the war in September 1943, German occupation officials concentrated some 4,800 Jews in the former Italian occupation zone and sent them to Birkenau, where they were promptly massacred. By the late summer of 1944, after the Germans were retreating militarily and the Bulgarians had switched sides, the Germans retreated from Greece; for more three years, they had wrought havoc on the country. By then, as many as 60,000 Greek Jews had been killed, and fewer than 10,000 remained alive. Large portions of Greece lay in ruins, and the political and economic situation remained perilous. As a result, a punishing civil war settled over the land between 1946 and 1949, bringing even more devastation.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece; Birkenau; Bulgaria; Damaskinos of Athens, Archbishop; Ghettos; Italy; Salonika; Treblinka

Further Reading

Hondros, John Lewis. Occupation and Resistance: The Greek Agony, 1941–1949. New York: Pella Books, 1983.

Mazower, Mark. Inside Hitler's Greece. The Experience of Occupation 1941–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993.

Grese, Irma

Irma Grese, born Irma Ida Ilse on October 7, 1923, was a female SS guard who served in the concentration camps of Ravensbrück and Auschwitz during World War II. She later worked as a guard over women at Bergen-Belsen.

Grese was born to Berta and Alfred Grese, the third of five children. In 1936 her mother committed suicide by

Irma Grese was a female SS guard at the Nazi concentration camps of Ravensbrück, Auschwitz, and Bergen-Belsen. Noted for her cruelty toward her prisoners, at the Belsen Trial after the war, she was convicted for crimes against humanity committed at Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen. Sentenced to death, she was executed by hanging on December 13, 1945. When she was executed, she was just 22 years of age. (Corbis via Getty Images) drinking hydrochloric acid, after learning that Alfred Grese had engaged in an extramarital affair. Alfred Grese joined the Nazi Party in the late 1930s and remarried in 1939.

In 1938, when aged fourteen, Grese left school due to her obsessive dedication to the Bund Deutscher Mädel, or “League of German Girls,” a Nazi youth organization dedicated to shaping young female minds with Nazi ideology. Upon leaving school she was employed in a number of casual jobs, including working for two years in an SS sanatorium. She was later unsuccessful in finding an internship as a nurse.

In 1942, in her early twenties, Grese volunteered to work as a concentration camp guard. Beginning in the summer of that year, she served as an Aufseherin (female guard) at Ravensbrück, and in March 1943 she was transferred to Auschwitz-Birkenau. By the end of 1944 Grese was promoted to Rapportführerin (overseer), the second-highest rank open to female guards. By accepting her promotion, Grese was an active participant in prisoner selections for the gas chambers in Auschwitz-Birkenau. On April 17, 1945, while transporting prisoners from Ravensbrück to Bergen-Belsen, she was captured by British troops together with several other SS personnel.

Irma Grese was one of the 45 defendants accused of war crimes at the Belsen trials, spanning the period from September 17 to November 17, 1945. The Belsen trials were conducted by the British military in Lüneburg, Germany. The charges of war crimes were derived from the Geneva Convention of 1929, concerning the management of prisoners. The accusations against Grese addressed her abuse and murder of those imprisoned at the camps. Women who had lived through her regime in the concentration camps were brought forward to testify. Survivors gave detailed testaments of murder, torture, and other atrocities, particularly toward imprisoned women, which Grese willfully undertook throughout her years at Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen.

These testimonies described acts of cruelty and bloodshed, beatings and indiscriminate shootings of inmates, Grese’s use of trained and allegedly half-starved dogs to attack prisoners, and her selection of prisoners for the gas chambers. Survivors reported that Grese wore heavy boots and carried a whip and a pistol, and testified that she enjoyed using both physical and psychological methods to torture inmates. It was also reported that she enjoyed shooting prisoners in cold blood, while other accounts claimed that she beat some women inmates to death and whipped others using a plaited whip.

One surviving prisoner, Olga Lengyel, a Hungarian prisoner at Auschwitz-Birkenau, wrote in her memoir Five Chimneys that selections in the women's camp were made by both SS Aufseherin Elisabeth Hasse and Irma Grese. Grese was perceptibly satisfied by the dread her presence inspired in the imprisoned women at roll call. Lengyel wrote that Grese had a fondness for selecting not just the sick and the weak but any female who had any remnants of beauty. Lengyel also said that Grese had numerous lovers among the SS in the camp, including Josef Mengele. Lengyel felt that Grese's scrupulous personal grooming, tailored clothing, and overuse of perfume were all part of a deliberate act of hostility against the ragged women prisoners.

In her own testimony about her background, Grese stated, "In July, 1942, I tried again to become a nurse, but the Labor Exchange sent me to Ravensbrück Concentration Camp, although I protested against it. I stayed there until March, 1943, when I went to Birkenau Camp in Auschwitz. I remained in Auschwitz until January, 1945." During the Belsen trials, the press branded Grese as "the Beautiful Beast," alongside Josef Kramer, "the Beast of Belsen." Even though a total of 16 women guards were charged with similar ghastly accusations, Grese was one of only three female guards sentenced to death, on day 53 of the trial, by hanging.

Grese and ten others, eight men and two other female guards, Johanna Bormann and Elisabeth Volkenrath, were sentenced to death for crimes committed at the Auschwitz and Belsen concentration camps. On Thursday, December 13, 1945, at Hamelin jail in Lower Saxony, Germany, Grese and the other women were executed singly and then the men in pairs. According to the British executioner, Albert Pierrepoint, "She stood on this mark very firmly, and as I placed the white cap over her head she said in her languid voice, 'Schnell!'"

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Auschwitz; Bergen-Belsen; Ravensbrück; War Crimes

Further Reading

Brown, Daniel Patrick. The Beautiful Beast: The Life & Crimes of SS-Aufseherin Irma Grese. Ventura (CA): Golden West Historical Publications, 1996.

Lengyel, Olga. Five Chimneys: A Woman Survivor's True Story of Auschwitz. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 1995.

Lower, Wendy. Hitler's Furies: German Women in the Nazi Killing Fields. New York: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 2013.

The Grey Zone

The Grey Zone is a 2001 film directed by Tim Blake Nelson and starring David Arquette, Steve Buscemi, Harvey Keitel, Mira Sorvino, and Daniel Benzali. It is based on the book Auschwitz: A Doctor's Eyewitness Account written by Dr. Miklós Nyiszli, as well as the historical events leading up to and during the revolt of the XII Auschwitz Sonderkommando in October 1944.

The film takes its title from Holocaust survivor Primo Levi, who, in his book The Drowned and the Saved, introduced the term "The Grey Zone." That zone, as he described it, is the space between absolute good and absolute evil, where moral choices are made for the purpose of survival rather than death, and where the desire to live surmounts that to be honorable. Levi recognized that we should hold back from any condemnation of those who collaborated with the Nazis—the Sonderkommando men in the death camps was the example he used—for their work in abetting the killing process of their fellow Jews. As he wrote, "one is never in another's place."

The movie builds on the theme of the XII Sonderkommando in Auschwitz, folding into its story the related account of a prisoner-doctor, Miklós Nyiszli, assigned to work in the crematoria complex alongside the infamous Nazi doctor Josef Mengele on his "experiments" with Jewish children. Immediately, we are confronted by a "grey" dilemma: How could Nyiszli, a Jew, bring himself to work collaboratively in such an inhuman environment, in the interests of perverted science, and alongside the SS fanatic Mengele?

The grey zone metaphor is extended to the prisoners driven as slave labor in the crematoria, whose task it was to assist the camp's guards in marshaling their victims to the gas chambers, keeping them calm before their unanticipated death, and then disposing of their bodies in the ovens. Here, we see the essence of Levi's dilemma: To what lengths are people willing to go to save their own lives, when confronted with an extreme situation in which there is no precedent for what might be considered "right" and "wrong" behavior? In exchange for a few months' reprieve from death (at most, no Sonderkommando was allowed to live beyond four months), those working in the gas chamber complex agree to work for the Nazis as exterminators of their own people. For this work, they receive privileges denied all other prisoners at Auschwitz, such as extra food, tobacco, alcohol of every variety, and medicine. All these things were looted from the very people in whose death they have a hand. As one of the main characters, a prisoner named Hoffman, says at one point:

“I used to think so much of myself. . . . What I’d make of my life. We can’t know what we’re capable of, any of us. How can you know what you’d do to stay alive, until you’re really asked?” Reflecting further, he answers his own question: “For most of us, the answer . . . is anything. It’s so easy to forget who we were before . . . who we’ll never be again.”

If this expression of the grey zone is relatively straightforward (if morally empty), what in turn, would people sacrifice to save the lives of others? In this regard, Tim Blake Nelson, who both wrote and directed the film, brings in an episode from Nyiszli’s account. One day, when removing dead bodies from the gas chamber in which he is working, Hoffman discovers the inert body of a young girl, no more than 14 years of age, who is still breathing. This has never happened before, and, amidst the horror of mass Jewish death, he determines to find a way to keep her alive. Desperate, he hides her and finds Dr. Nyiszli; he revives her, though she is unable to speak. A senior prisoner, Simon Schlermer (Daniel Benzali), immediately sees a new dilemma. The girl cannot be hidden in the crematoria, nor can she be smuggled into the camp proper. Nor, by this stage, could they contemplate revealing her existence to the guards—who would kill her immediately. The ultimate dilemma is then presented: Hand over the girl to the Nazis, or jeopardize the planned revolt of the Sonderkommando? To sacrifice this one life in the midst of a factory dedicated to the production of death, or protect her at the expense of a revolt that could destroy that very machinery and save countless other lives? How this moral “grey zone” predicament is resolved forms a vital backdrop to the depiction of the revolt that follows.

The revolt’s only aim is to destroy the crematoria; no one anticipates escape, or even the prospect of taking on the German army. In its core aim, it is successful; one of the crematoria is destroyed, and another put out of commission. But all those taking part are captured after the revolt and are murdered, execution-style, by the Nazis. The girl, who has survived the revolt, watches this, and then, zombie-like, simply walks away until she too is shot dead.

The movie then ends with a narration in which we hear the girl’s voice from the next world: “After the revolt half the ovens remain, and we are carried to them together. I catch fire quickly. The first part of me rises in dense smoke that mingles with the smoke of others. Then there are the bones, which settle in ash. And these are swept up to be carried to the river. And last, bits of our dust that simply float there, in air, around the working of the new group. These bits of dust are gray. We settle on their shoes and on their faces and in their lungs. And they become so used to us that soon they don’t cough and they brush us away. At this point they’re just moving, breathing and moving like anyone else still alive in that place. And this is how the work continues.” These are the last lines of the film, and become the final expression of “the grey zone”: the fine, invisible gray dust settles everywhere, and thus do the living and the dead intermingle. Little wonder, as Simon Schlermer utters at one point in the movie, during a time when all are compromising everything in order to stay alive for one more day, “I do not wish to be alive when all of this is over.”

Rare among films about the Holocaust, The Grey Zone is a movie that does not finish with a positive ending. There is no happy ending, no drawing together of upbeat themes, and no reconciling of dilemmas. Everyone but the Nazis dies, an important statement from Tim Blake Nelson underscoring the fact that for millions and millions of victims of the Holocaust there was no way out of the awful darkness, in which morality was constantly compromised and problems were only rarely resolved constructively.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz; Levi, Primo; Mengele, Josef; Sonderkommando

Further Reading

Baron, Lawrence. Projecting the Holocaust into the Present: The Changing Focus of Contemporary Holocaust Cinema. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.

Gonshak, Henry. Hollywood and the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2015.

Levi, Primo. The Drowned and the Saved. London: Sphere Books, 1989.

Gross-Rosen

Gross-Rosen was a Nazi-administered concentration and forced labor camp located near the village of Gross-Rosen (now Rogoznica, Poland), about 40 miles southwest of Wrocław in modern-day western Poland. The facility was built in 1940 as a subcamp of the Sachsenhausen concentration camp; the following year, it became autonomous, in an arrangement which would eventually encompass some 97 subcamps. Upon its inception, most prisoners were put to work in a nearby granite quarry, where many died from accidents and overwork. At that time, most detainees were political prisoners, resistance fighters, or those deemed “socially unacceptable” (gay men and Roma, for example). Not until late 1943 and early 1944 did Jews begin arriving at Gross-Rosen and its subcamps in large numbers. The facility was administered by the SS, which also owned the adjacent quarry.

Conditions at Gross-Rosen were similar to other concentration camps. Food was meager and poor, sanitation was primitive, and medical care was virtually nonexistent. Thousands fell victim to starvation and diseases of various kinds, and large numbers of others were killed arbitrarily by guards during beatings and cruel punishments or from overwork.

As the war progressed and the Germans began relying more and more on forced labor, Gross-Rosen (with its subcamps) became one of the largest concentration camp complexes in all of Europe. Eventually, prisoners worked throughout eastern Germany and western Poland for companies like I.G. Farben, Daimler-Benz, and Krupp. Brünnlitz, a subcamp, later became famous when German industrialist Oskar Schindler relocated his factory there, shielding some 1,100 Polish Jews from Nazi depredations and likely death.

It is estimated that at least 125,000 prisoners were detained at or passed through Gross-Rosen between 1941 and 1945. By January 1945 Gross-Rosen and its subcamps held 76,728 prisoners, the majority of whom, by that time, were Jewish. The camp's January 1945 census indicated that almost 26,000 women were interned there, one of the largest groupings of female prisoners in all of the vast German concentration camp system. Most of the Jews at Gross-Rosen had been relocated there from camps in Poland and Hungary.

When Soviet troops began approaching the complex in January 1945, camp officials ordered a mass evacuation. Some 40,000 prisoners endured a brutal forced march to the west in bitterly cold weather, during which several thousand died. The survivors were eventually sent to other concentration camps within Germany. Soviet forces liberated Gross-Rosen in February 1945. By then a total of about 40,000 prisoners had died in camp or during the forced evacuation march.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Concentration Camps; I.G. Farben; Krupp Case; Nacht und Nebel; Zyklon-B Case, 1946

Further Reading

Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1962.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Grüninger, Paul

Paul Grüninger was a Swiss police commander whose actions on the Swiss-German border before World War II saved several thousand Jews who otherwise would have been refused sanctuary. Born on October 27, 1891, in St. Gallen, the son of a cigar shop owner, Grüninger lived a fairly simple lifestyle not especially involved in matters outside of his home town. During World War I, when Switzerland was neutral, he served in the Swiss army as a lieutenant. After the war he joined Switzerland's border police, rising to the rank of colonel; by 1919 he had become commander of the border police for St. Gallen Canton.

When the Nazis came to power in Germany in 1933 many Jews fled to neighboring Austria, but with the Austrian Anschluss on March 12, 1938, Jewish persecution began there immediately. As a result, Jews from Austria sought sanctuary in Switzerland, which, in response, closed its borders in August 1938 to those without proper entry papers. In October the same year, the Swiss government asked Germany to stamp the letter "J" on all Jewish passports so Swiss officials might more easily identify Jews. In 1939 Switzerland decided not to admit religious or racial refugees, thereby denying Jews access.

It was in this context that Paul Grüninger was approached every day by German and Austrian Jews seeking asylum, and, as he heard their stories, he could scarcely believe the things they told him. When faced with choosing between following state laws or staying true to his moral code, his sense of compassion made it nearly impossible for him to turn the Jews away. Many border commanders, similarly torn between these two conflicting approaches to right and wrong, had their subordinates deal with the refugees. Grüninger realized he could easily follow the commands of his superiors, or he could put himself at risk by doing what was humane and right. Ultimately, he believed that saving lives was far more important than preserving his job, and, as a result, he admitted more than 3,600 Jews—by falsifying their passports and entry papers or turning a blind eye when required. He even used his own money to buy winter clothes for refugees who had been forced to leave all their belongings behind.

In addition, he would record the Jews' date of entry into Switzerland as prior to March 1939, when Switzerland further tightened its borders, enabling the arrivals to be treated as legal refugees. They would be taken to a camp established at Diepoldsau on the Austrian frontier, where, aided by Jewish organizations, they could await permits for a temporary stay in Switzerland or their departure to a final destination.

On April 3, 1939, however, Grüninger arrived at work to find a young cadet, Corporal Antón Schneider, standing in front of his office blocking his way. Schneider had not been informed of the reason for the order to deny Grüninger entry to the building, which came directly from the office of the commander-in-chief. Grüninger, however, knew why he was being stopped.

A friend working at a border post in Bregenz, Austria, had informed him that he was on the Gestapo's blacklist due to his having helped a Jewish woman, whom he had already assisted in escaping Austria, recover her jewels. She had left them at a hotel in Bregenz, and Grüninger contacted Ernest Prodolliet of the Swiss consulate in Bregenz to collect the jewels for her. Prodolliet and Grüninger had worked together on missions similar to this before. The woman was so grateful for Grüninger's help that she wrote about his kindness in a letter to some friends. The Gestapo intercepted the letter, imprisoned the hotel owner, confiscated the jewels, and began to keep an eye on Grüninger. This news did not, however, dissuade him from continuing to falsify Jewish passports in order to save Jews.

Soon after this, the Swiss authorities learned of Grüninger's illegal activities and dismissed him. He was placed on trial in January 1939 in proceedings that would last two years. In March 1941 the court found him guilty of a breach of duty; he was imprisoned, had his pension revoked, was forced to pay trial costs, and fined. Although the court accepted that his actions were honorable, they declared that as a state official he should have followed his orders, refused entrance to Jews, and not falsified official documents.

Grüninger was publicly humiliated and lived the rest of his life with a prison record, making it practically impossible to find steady work. He did not seek redress or recognition for his actions, instead focusing on surviving and supporting his family. In 1954 he claimed: "My personal well-being, measured against the cruel fate of these thousands, was so insignificant and unimportant" that he never even took the consequences of his actions into consideration. When Paul Grüninger died at the age of 81 on February 22, 1972, his family was still living in near poverty.

In December 1970 the Swiss government sent Grüninger a letter of apology, but at the same time still refused him his pension. Then, a year before his death, Israel's Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Any other recognition that Grüninger received came posthumously. In 1994 the Swiss government published a Declaration of Honor for him, before finally annulling his conviction one year later. In 1998 the Parliament of St. Gallen Canton agreed to compensate Grüninger's descendants, and his family put the money into the Paul Grüninger Foundation, an organization that works to reward outstanding acts of humanity and courage that align with Grüninger's actions. Although most recognition came after Grüninger's death, his decision to save those in need has served as a model of moral behavior for the world today.

Between 1937 and April 1938 Paul Grüninger is estimated to have saved approximately 3,600 German and Austrian Jews from death or deportation to concentration camps. He did so risking his career and safety to help others, even though he had no apparent Jewish connection in Austria or Germany. He was an upstander to Nazi persecution who used his position as a Swiss civil servant to save as many Jews as he could, against direct orders.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations; Switzerland

Further Reading

Hellman, Peter. When Courage Was Stronger than Fear: Remarkable Stories of Christians Who Saved Jews from the Holocaust. Melbourne: Marlowe, 1999.

Press, Eyal. Beautiful Souls: Saying No, Breaking Ranks, and Heeding the Voice of Conscience in Dark Times. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2012.

Grynszpan, Herschel

By assassinating an official in the German Embassy in Paris, Herschel Feibel Grynszpan, a Polish Jew, unknowingly set off the pogrom called Kristallnacht that represented the turning point in the treatment of the Jews by the Nazis, from one of legal exclusion to that of systematic government-driven violence. At the time, he was 17 years old.

Although Grynszpan was born in Hanover, Germany, on March 28, 1921, he was not considered a German citizen for technical reasons. His parents, Polish citizens, had emigrated from Poland in 1911. They were part of a wave of Ostjuden (Eastern Jews) who settled in Germany. To Christians and the many assimilated Jews of Germany they looked strange: they dressed differently, spoke a different language (Yiddish), took their practice of Orthodox Judaism with all of its rituals very seriously, and combined large families with little money.

A product of his environment, Grynszpan was a religiously observant teenager whose sensitivity to the suffering of the Jewish people was matched only by his love for his family. He was slight of build, not a particularly good

Herschel Grynszpan was a Polish-Jewish refugee born in Germany. On November 7, 1938, he assassinated a German diplomat in Paris, Ernst vom Rath, an act leading directly to the antisemitic pogrom known as the Kristallnacht on November 9–10, 1938. (Keystone/Getty Images) student, and was more likely to settle a disagreement by fighting than by his intellect or personality. Like many young men, he had a hard time finding his place. He studied at a yeshiva (a school of intense Jewish study) but dropped out after a year; he sought permission to move to Palestine, but this, too, did not come through.

In September 1936 Grynszpan entered France, albeit illegally, and made his way to Paris where he lived with his aunt and uncle. He was unable to find work, in part because of his illegal status. He still had a valid reentry permit for Germany and a Polish passport, but both of them expired—the former in April 1937 and the latter in January 1938—leaving Grynszpan stateless and on the run from the French police as an illegal immigrant.

As Grynszpan was struggling with his statelessness, thousands of Polish Jews living in Germany were soon to find themselves in a similar position. On October 16, 1938, Poland passed a law that would prevent Polish Jews living in Germany from returning to Poland. Germany responded by passing a law demanding that Polish Jews immediately leave Germany. Thus, some twelve to seventeen thousand Polish Jews—including Grynszpan's family—found themselves caught in a no-man's-land on the German-Polish border, with Germany pushing them out and Poland refusing to take them in.

The conditions under which these Jews were forced to live were horrible. Grynszpan learned of his family's plight via a postcard he received in Paris from his sister on November 3, 1938. Greatly distressed by the suffering of the Jews, and of his family in particular, Grynszpan determined to strike back. He purchased a pistol and went to the German embassy in Paris on November 7. Claiming to have very important documents, he demanded to see someone in the embassy so he could hand them over personally. Ernst vom Rath, a relatively low-level third secretary in the embassy, was on duty that day and invited Grynszpan into his office. It was then that Grynszpan fired five shots from his revolver, one striking vom Rath in the shoulder, and another—which would prove fatal—in his abdomen. Grynszpan made no attempt to flee and explained to the French police who immediately arrested him that his action was on behalf of the thousands of Jews who were being held at the border between Germany and Poland. By making this declaration, Grynszpan was clearly characterizing the shooting as a political act.

Vom Rath died of his wounds on November 9. That date was a very special one on the Nazi Party calendar: it was the date on which in 1923 the Beer Hall Putsch was launched by Hitler to overthrow the Weimar Republic and establish a new government under the National Socialist German Workers' Party. It was a failure, but nonetheless stood as a symbol of the Nazi Party's commitment to return Germany to its past glory. On this same day fifteen years later Hitler and the top leaders of the Nazi Party were in Munich, commemorating the putsch, when vom Rath died. Joseph Goebbels, Nazi propaganda minister, saw his death as the perfect excuse to launch a "spontaneous" pogrom by German citizens supposedly incensed by the murder of a German embassy official by a Jew. What would be called Kristallnacht was organized by the Nazi leaders in Munich, with instructions sent throughout the extended Reich of Germany, Austria, and the Sudetenland portion of Czechoslovakia to destroy Jewish businesses, synagogues, and homes.

It is at this point that the story of Herschel Grynszpan often recedes into the background, the importance of his actions quickly overwhelmed by the violence they occasioned. But what happened to him after his arrest is an important part of the story of this seventeen-year-old teenager who brought the Final Solution one step closer.

Grynspan's arrest brought him intense media attention, not just in Germany where he was reviled as a Jewish killer acting on behalf of an international Jewish conspiracy, but also in Europe and the United States, where some saw him as a hero, a Jew who stood up against the Nazi juggernaut. For example, the American journalist Dorothy Thompson spoke of Grynspan's role as a symbol and created a defense fund on his behalf. However, many Jews throughout the world saw him as a reckless teenager who acted without regard for the consequences of his act. The official position of organizations and governments, of course, was to condemn the assassination.

Grynspan was represented in France by an outstanding team of lawyers who quickly saw a problem with his earlier declaration that the murder of vom Rath was political; an act of political assassination was severely dealt with under French law. Therefore, they advised him to explain his actions as a crime of passion, one based, for example, on a homosexual relationship between Grynspan and vom Rath. There was absolutely no basis in fact that such a relationship existed, that either of the two men was gay, or even that they knew each other. In fact, when Grynspan entered the German embassy in Paris, he did not ask for vom Rath or anyone by name. However, his lawyers told him that a crime of passion would be considered in a much more lenient light by the French courts. Grynspan refused to change his explanation for the motive behind his actions.

Grynspan was imprisoned in various locations in France. Although Germany insisted on his extradition, France saw a number of legal obstacles standing in the way, perhaps the most important of which was that Grynspan was not a citizen of Germany. He remained in French prisons (without a trial) until Germany conquered France, at which time he was returned to Berlin, and thereafter to various concentration camps such as Sachsenhausen and Flossenbürg.

Goebbels saw Grynspan's incarceration in a German prison as an opportunity for a "show trial" that would prove that Grynspan's actions were at the direction of an international Jewish conspiracy. A trial was never held, however, when it was learned that Grynspan would, after all, claim that he had homosexual relations with vom Rath, surely to be seen as a black mark against vom Rath—who had been elevated by Nazi propaganda to the level of a hero and martyr—that the Nazis could not allow. He was never brought to trial.

The time and place of Grynspan's death is uncertain. It is likely that he lived at least until 1943 or 1944, which was when Adolf Eichmann claimed to have interrogated him, according to Eichmann's trial in 1961. There have been rumors and articles suggesting that he survived the war, but there is no evidence that confirms that theory. It is most likely that he died while in Nazi hands before the end of the war. At the urging of the Grynspan family, a death certificate for Grynspan was issued by a German court on June 1, 1960.

A final issue remains regarding Grynspan. A debate continues to this day about the way he was denounced by many Jews for a rash act that took no account of the Jews it might condemn to death. Was that denunciation justified, or was a young man, distraught by what was happening to his family, abandoned without the support he deserved?

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Goebbels, Joseph; Kristallnacht; Krütfeld, Wilhelm

Further Reading

- Kirsch, Jonathan. The Short, Strange Life of Herschel Grynszpan: A Boy Avenger, a Nazi Diplomat, and a Murder in Paris. New York: Liveright, 2013.
- Marino, Andy. Herschel: The Boy Who Started World War II. New York: Faber and Faber, 1997.
- Schwab, Gerald. The Day the Holocaust Began: The Odyssey of Herschel Grynszpan. New York: Praeger, 1990.

Gunden, Lois

Lois Mary Gunden was an American Mennonite and French professor who helped rescue and shelter war orphans—including a number of Jewish children—in France during World War II. In 2013 Israel's Yad Vashem posthumously honored Gunden as one of the Righteous among the Nations for her work and sacrifice. She is only the fourth American to have been so recognized.

She was born on February 25, 1915, in Flanagan, Illinois, into a Mennonite family. She graduated from Goshen College in 1936 and received a master's degree in French from Peabody College in 1939. That same year, she secured a position teaching French at Goshen College. In 1941 Gunden joined the Mennonite Central Committee, which was dedicated to saving Jewish children and child refugees in France. When she arrived in Lyons, she became affiliated with Secours Mennonite aux Enfants (Mennonite Children's Rescue) and was tasked with establishing a rescue mission and orphanage along France's southern coast.

After the Mennonite Church secured a large house in Canet Plage, on the shores of the Mediterranean, Gunden began her rescue work. She took in a number of young Spanish refugees as well as Jewish children who had been imprisoned with their families at Rivesaltes, a nearby internment camp administered by the collaborationist Vichy French government.

Despite great personal peril, she smuggled several dozen Jewish children out of the camp, often only after pleading with their parents to release their children to her care. The children in her charge later remarked that Gunden was kind, compassionate, and fiercely determined to save as many children as she could. Gunden was also sometimes ingenious in her attempts to shield her young refugees. She wrote in her diary of one close encounter with the local police. When a police officer arrived at the safe house to arrest three Jewish children, she repeatedly stalled for time, praying that the police would eventually give up and move on. In the end, the police officer never returned, and the three children were saved.

After the Germans occupied southern France in late 1942, Gunden continued to run the home and rescue children. In early 1943, however, German occupation officials detained her and held her until she was released in a prisoner exchange in 1944. At that time, she returned to Indiana and her teaching post as Goshen College. She subsequently began graduate work at Indiana University, receiving a PhD in French literature in 1958. That same year she married Ernest Clemens and the couple moved to Pennsylvania. She taught at Temple University (1965–1975) and North Penn High School in Lansdale, Pennsylvania.

Lois Gunden Clemens remained actively engaged in church activities, edited a national Mennonite publication covering women's missionary services, authored a book titled Women Liberated, and sat on the Board of Overseers for Goshen College. She died in Lansdale, Pennsylvania, on August 27, 2005. Her niece accepted her Yad Vashem honor in July 2013.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Children during the Holocaust; France; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

The Mennonite. "Lois Gunden: A Righteous Gentile." Yad Vashem. Women of Valor: Stories of Women Who Rescued Jews during the Holocaust. <http://www.yadvashem.org/yv/en/exhibitions/righteous-women/gunden.asp>.

Gürtner, Franz

Franz Gürtner was a German jurist and leading member of the conservative German National People's Party (DNVP). An old-school bureaucrat, Gürtner was sympathetic to right-wing radicals such as Hitler. On June 2, 1932, he was appointed German minister of justice, and he continued in that role in Adolf Hitler's cabinet, with responsibility for coordinating jurisprudence in the Third Reich, until his death on January 29, 1941. Gürtner provided official sanction and legal grounds for a series of criminal actions under the Hitler administration.

He was born in Regensburg, southeast Germany, on August 26, 1881. The son of a locomotive engineer, he studied law at the University of Munich and then served as an officer in World War I France and in Palestine. He was awarded an Iron Cross for bravery.

After the war, Gürtner resumed a successful legal career and was appointed Bavarian minister of justice on November 8, 1922, a position he held until 1932. A member of the conservative German Nationalist Party, Gürtner also developed strong nationalist beliefs and, like many in Weimar Germany, was infuriated by the terms of the Treaty of Versailles and the 1923 Franco-Belgian occupation of the Ruhr. He was sympathetic toward right-wing radicals such as Hitler, and it was understood that Gürtner used his influence to help Hitler when he was put on trial after the failed Beer Hall Putsch in 1923. Tried for treason, Hitler received a five-year jail term that was spent in some comfort at Landsberg Prison. He had only served nine months before Gürtner used his judicial authority to get an early release for Hitler. Gürtner also persuaded the Bavarian government to legalize the banned Nazi Party and allow Hitler to speak again in public.

In June 1932 Gürtner was appointed minister of justice in the cabinet of Franz von Papen. He was retained by Hitler as minister of justice and given responsibility for coordinating jurisprudence in the Third Reich.

Though a non-Nazi conservative, Gürtner was authoritarian by inclination. He fully supported the Reichstag Fire Decree, which effectively wiped out civil liberties in Germany. Indeed, on the day before the Reichstag fire, he proposed a bill that was almost as heavy-handed and would have instituted severe restrictions on civil liberties under the pretense of keeping the communists from launching a general strike. In office, Gürtner merged the association of the German judges with the new National Socialist Lawyers' Association and provided a veil of constitutional legality for the Nazi state.

In 1933 Gürtner came into conflict with one of his subordinates, Roland Freisler, over the issues of Rassenschande (“racial shame”), or a sexual relationship between an “Aryan” and a “non-Aryan,” which Freisler wanted immediately criminalized. Gürtner, in a meeting, pointed out many practical difficulties with Freisler’s proposal. This did not, however, stop the passing of the Nuremberg Laws in 1935, criminalizing such relationships.

In the weeks following the Nazi Party purge known as the Night of the Long Knives (June 30–July 2, 1934), Gürtner demonstrated his loyalty to the Nazi regime by writing a law that added a legal veneer to it. Signed into law by both Hitler and Minister of the Interior Wilhelm Frick, the Law Regarding Measures of State Self-Defense retrospectively legalized the murders committed during the purge. Gürtner even quashed some initial efforts by local prosecutors to take legal action against those who carried out the murders.

As Reich minister of justice with extensive powers, Franz Gürtner opened the First Session of the People’s Court on July 14, 1934. After nominating all the judges and public prosecutors, Hitler invariably rubber-stamped Gürtner’s nominations and swore the judges in personally. In return, Gürtner signed Nazi laws and mediated between the Nazi regime and conservative jurists to gain their cooperation.

Yet Gürtner also tried to protect the independence of the judiciary and at least a facade of legal norms. The ill-treatment of prisoners in concentration camps under the jurisdiction of local SA leaders provoked a sharp protest from the Ministry of Justice. Gürtner observed that prisoners were being beaten to the point of unconsciousness with whips and blunt instruments, commenting that such treatment revealed a level of brutality and cruelty that was totally alien to German sentiment and feeling. Gürtner also complained about confessions obtained by the Gestapo under torture. In both of these protests, he found himself at odds with Hitler. By the end of 1935 it was already apparent that neither Gürtner nor Frick would be able to impose limitations on the power of the Gestapo or control the SS camps where thousands of detainees were being held without judicial review.

In 1936 Gürtner, acting upon Hitler’s direction, ordered that the fallbeil, a variation on the guillotine, replace the hand axe as the official method for all civil executions throughout Germany. He then joined the Nazi Party in 1937 and found himself providing official sanction and legal grounds for a series of criminal actions, beginning with the institution of Ständegerichte (drumhead courts-martial) (during the war, this court tried Poles and Jews in the occupied eastern territories), and later for decrees that opened the way for implementing the Final Solution.

Upon the outbreak of war, the Ministry of Justice found that its power was swiftly eroded by internal security forces that did not adhere to formal judicial processes. The Gestapo and SD became judge, jury, and executioner, and few in the ministry were brave enough to query their work. In 1939 the SS won the right to order the summary execution of any person deemed subversive or disloyal; all compromise with the state judicial system was abandoned.

A district judge and member of the Confessing Church, Lothar Kreyssig, wrote in 1940 to Gürtner protesting that the T-4 euthanasia program was illegal, since no law or formal decree from Hitler had authorized it. Gürtner promptly dismissed Kreyssig from his post, telling him, “If you cannot recognise the will of the Führer as a source of law, then you cannot remain a judge.”

Gürtner then provided legal backing and support to any act carried out on behalf of Hitler—with the normal explanation being that such action was required to defend the Fatherland. On this basis, Hitler expected Gürtner to legally justify any actions taken by Nazi organizations as well. The usual legal explanation invariably oriented around a “defense of the Fatherland” argument.

Franz Gürtner was still minister of justice when he died in Berlin on January 29, 1941. His death completed Heinrich Himmler’s supremacy of the legal and justice system, as Gürtner’s replacement at the Justice Ministry, State Secretary Franz Schlegelberger, never had Gürtner’s authority or was in any position to challenge the might of the SS.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Freisler, Roland; Kreyssig, Lothar; Names under the Nazis, Legislation; Weimar Republic

Further Reading

- Koch, H. W. In the Name of the Volk: Political Justice in Hitler’s Germany. London: I. B. Tauris, 1997.
- McKale, Donald M. The Nazi Party Courts: Hitler’s Management of Conflict in His Movement, 1921–1945. Lawrence (KS): University Press of Kansas, 1974.
- Miller, Richard M. Nazi Justiz: Law of the Holocaust. Westport (CT): Praeger, 1995.
- Pateman, Colin. Beheaded by Hitler: Cruelty of the Nazis, Civilian Executions and Judicial Terror 1933–1945. Oxford: Fonthill Media, 2014.
- Reitter, Ekkehard. Franz Gurtner, politische Biographie eines deutschen Juristen, 1881–1941. Berlin: Duncker und Humblot, 1976.

Gutman, Yisrael

Yisrael Gutman was an Israeli Holocaust survivor, historian, and writer, born on May 20, 1923, in Warsaw, Poland. In 1940, some 10 months after the September 1, 1939, German invasion of Poland, the Nazis had completed construction of an 840-acre ghetto in which they interned Jews first from Warsaw but then from other parts of Poland. Eventually, Gutman joined the Jewish Fighting Organization, an underground movement within the ghetto designed to fight the Nazi oppressors. He played an active role in the April–May 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, in which the ghetto fighters fought bravely against SS and Germany army troops. Gutman was wounded in the fighting and lost sight in one of his eyes. Meanwhile, his siblings and parents were all killed in the ghetto and its liquidation. Gutman was deported first to the Lublin-Majdanek concentration camp before being transferred to the death camp at Auschwitz. From there, he was force-marched to another Nazi camp at Mauthausen-Gusen. Gutman was liberated by U.S. forces on May 5, 1945.

After his liberation, Gutman went to Italy, where he joined the Jewish Brigade and then helped found Kibbutz Aviv. In 1946 he emigrated to the British Mandate of Palestine and joined Kibbutz Lehavot Habashan, where he remained for more than 25 years. In the early 1970s he pursued graduate work in history at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, receiving a PhD in 1975 for his work on the Warsaw Ghetto and Jewish resistance.

For many years Gutman held the Max and Rita Haber Chair in Modern Jewish History at Hebrew University. He also published extensively, producing some 30 journal articles and books. Gutman was deputy chairman of the International Auschwitz Council (Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation), edited an acclaimed encyclopedia of the Holocaust, and was head of Yad Vashem's International Institute for Holocaust Research between 1993 and 1996. From 1996 until 2000 Gutman served as Yad Vashem's chief historian.

Most of Gutman's historical works dealt with varying aspects of the Holocaust and the experiences of Jews in Poland after 1919. Gutman stressed that he tried not to let his own experiences during the Holocaust color his work or interpretations; instead, he went about the writing process by employing careful and thorough historical research.

Yisrael Gutman died on October 1, 2013, in Jerusalem.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Jewish Fighting Organization; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Yad Vashem

Further Reading

Gutman, Israel. Resistance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Gutman, Yisrael. The Jews of Warsaw, 1939–1943: Ghetto, Underground, Revolt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.

H

Haas, Leo

Leo Haas was a Czech Jewish painter, printmaker, draftsman, and caricaturist whose work as an inmate of the Theresienstadt concentration camp during World War II came to symbolize the nature of artistic resistance. A Slovak, he was born in 1901 in Opava, the eldest of four children. A prodigy in artistic endeavors, at school he was encouraged to pursue his skill, which he did by moving to an art academy in Karlsruhe, Germany. In 1921 he relocated to Berlin to further his studies. In 1923 he traveled to France for further education and inspiration, before moving in 1926 to Vienna. He then returned home to Opava, married Sophie Hermann in 1929, and became a well-known portrait painter.

After the Munich Agreement of September 1938, Opava, located in the Sudetenland, was taken over by Germany. Haas, who was known to the Nazis as a painter of so-called “degenerate art,” was imprisoned during the Nazi takeover. Then, after the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, during which time Opava’s synagogue was destroyed, he and his wife moved out of their home and went to live with her parents in Ostrava.

In October 1939, after the outbreak of war, thousands of Jews from the region, including Haas, were sent to a Nazi-imposed Jewish “reservation” in Nisko near Lublin, where they were put to hard labor. Haas’s work, among other tasks, was as a wagon driver bringing food and construction materials from Lublin. In whatever free time he had, he painted portraits of SS men, and in return received privileges such as better food and fewer restrictions over movement. This gave him the opportunity to draw the building sites, portraits of other prisoners, transports arriving and leaving, and the general life of the camp.

After the Nisko initiative came to an end, Haas returned to Ostrava. Deciding to stay there, his marriage collapsed as Sophie could not accept the idea that by remaining in Ostrava she and Haas would see an end to persecution. Haas, remaining in Ostrava, soon met Erna Davidovitz, whose family was involved in smuggling Jews to Poland. Haas became involved in this activity in 1941, and Erna became his second wife.

In August 1942 he was arrested by the Gestapo but released after a short period. He had, however, been noticed, and was rearrested when the next transport to Theresienstadt was organized a month later. Haas and his extended family arrived at Theresienstadt on October 1, 1942, and were immediately separated. In no time at all, Haas was put to hard labor.

His skills as an artist recognized, he was transferred to a technical drawing unit—the object of which was to develop plans for Theresienstadt’s future development. Several other well-known artists worked here, including Otto Ungar, Ferdinand (Felix) Bloch, and Bedřich Fritta, who became a friend and leader of the team.

Working in the graphics department gave its inmates certain privileges, such as being able to visit other parts of the camp. Using this opportunity, they all made secret drawings documenting ghetto life. Haas used the chance to draw anything and everything: inmates searching for food, waiting to be transported, the nature of the buildings, and sketches of the elderly, the sick, the dying, and the dead. He made portraits of his colleagues and portraits of other inmates. Haas and his comrades risked their lives by making such drawings. Together, and in complete secrecy, Haas, Fritta, and Ungar created a large body of work illustrating all aspects of life in Theresienstadt.

The secrecy was an obvious form of resistance, and the Nazis, keen to ensure that the truth about Theresienstadt did not get out, launched a number of searches of the graphics department. All the artists had to find hiding places for their works: Fritta buried his pictures in the ground inside a metal box; Ungar hid his paintings in a depression in a wall; and Haas hid his in an attic. The necessity of doing so took on urgency when a delegation of the Red Cross visited Theresienstadt on June 23, 1944, to inspect living conditions in the ghetto.

Several days before the visit, the group was detained and interrogated by none other than Adolf Eichmann. They maintained their silence and were imprisoned with their families in what was known as the “Small Fortress.” Haas was confined for three and a half months, and the artists were again employed at hard labor. On October 25, 1944, Haas and Fritta were condemned for distributing “atrocious propaganda” and deported to Auschwitz. They arrived on October 28; Haas, although Jewish, was branded a political prisoner with the number 199885. Fritta died of blood poisoning eight days after arrival.

At Auschwitz, Haas resumed his artistic work in part. He produced sketches, for example, for Dr. Josef Mengele, the “Angel of Death.” In November 1944, however, he was transferred with other artists to Sachsenhausen and given another new number, 118029. Here, the artists were again segregated and joined a team of prisoners who had already been working for the past two years on Operation Bernhard, a secret plan by Nazi Germany to destabilize the British economy by flooding it with forged currency. Haas’s group was given the job of counterfeiting American dollars.

At the end of February 1945, with the war coming to an end, the members of the group were transferred to Mauthausen. Then, on May 5, 1945, they were moved again, this time to the camp at Ebensee, where they were liberated the next day by American troops.

After his liberation Haas returned to Theresienstadt and was reunited with his entire art collection of more than four hundred drawings; in addition, he located many of Fritta’s works. It was then that he learned that most of his friends and family had perished, though his wife Erna had survived.

Fritta’s son Tomáš also survived, and they adopted him. Erna died in 1955 from the effects of medical experiments conducted on her in Auschwitz. After her death, Haas moved to East Berlin, where he worked as an illustrator for a number of magazines and newspapers.

Leo Hass’s resistance work was of a very special kind. Employing his artistic skills, he did what he could to chronicle what he saw and those whom he met. In this way he worked under the most trying of circumstances to bear witness to the Nazi atrocities and reveal these images to people outside the wire. The record he and his comrades created was a vital contribution to the knowledge later generations would possess about this dimension of the Holocaust.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Art and the Holocaust; Nisko Plan; Sachsenhausen; Theresienstadt

Further Reading

Green, Gerald. The Artists of Terezin. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1978.

Troller, Norbert. Theresienstadt: Hitler’s Gift to the Jews. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.

Haavara Agreement

On March 24, 1933, in response to German antisemitic initiatives introduced after Hitler took power, Jewish groups worldwide, but particularly in the United States, France, Britain, and Poland, boycotted German goods in support of German Jewry. They hoped that the boycott would pressure the Nazis to restore Jewish rights. In Germany, this demonstrated the “world Jewish conspiracy” of which Nazi ideology had been warning for years. That the boycott was a response to German anti-Jewish measures rather than an independent Jewish initiative was overlooked.

In the summer of 1933 the Jewish Agency for Palestine, the German Zionist Federation, and the German Economics Ministry drafted a plan intended to allow German Jews migrating to Palestine to retain some of the value of their property in Germany by purchasing German goods for the Yishuv (the Jewish area of Palestine), which would be redeemed in local Palestine currency. Under this Haavara (“Transfer”) Agreement, Jewish emigrants had to hand over their possessions before they left Germany, and the proceeds were used by a company specifically set up for this purpose in Tel Aviv to purchase German goods for sale in Palestine. The proceeds of these sales were then paid in Palestinian currency to the emigrants in Palestine. Agreement was reached on August 7, 1933, and signed on August 25, 1933. The signatories were the Reich Ministry of Economics, the Zionist Federation of Germany (Zionistische Vereinigung für Deutschland), and the Anglo-Palestine Bank (then under the directive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine). The agreement was notified by Circular 54/1933 of the Reich Ministry of Finance and dated August 28, 1933.

For the Zionist Federation, it was a way to save Jews from the claws of an increasingly hostile regime and by so doing attract them to Palestine. The head of the Jewish Agency's political department, Haim Arlosoroff, said the agreement facilitated a way for Jews to get their property out before it was forcefully taken and sold at reduced prices, and the proceeds stolen from them. For the Nazis, signing an international agreement was further proof of its legitimacy; it also broke the Jewish boycott of German goods and helped the recovery of German exports at a time when the German economy was still in the depth of depression. At this time, both sides saw potential benefits in such an agreement.

Many Jews were critical of the agreement from the outset. Despite encouraging Jews to emigrate from Germany, one of the objects of the agreement was to fragment the Jewish boycott on German goods. No one doubted the moral weight that breaking the boycott would have for world Jewry. For this reason, until 1935 the Jewish Agency masked its role, and the Transfer Agreement was presented as an agreement with private parties. The Zionist Federation was accused of collaboration with the Nazis, because those involved in the boycott intended it to cause Germany to change its policies—but most Zionists considered that the Jewish position in Germany was irrevocably lost, and that emigration to Palestine was their only option.

The Nazi authorities were criticized by fellow Nazis for helping Jews when their official policy was to “solve” the “Jewish question.” Though the Haavara allowed Jews to transfer people and money to Palestine, National Socialism did not support the creation of a Jewish state, whether in Palestine or anywhere else. Opposition to such a creation was based on the view that a Jewish state would aggravate the danger of global domination by the international Jewish conspiracy, aiming to destroy Aryan lands and Germany. This conspiracy concern came to overshadow the idea of Palestine as a place to which Germany's Jews could be deported.

As a result of the Haavara Agreement, German exports to Palestine increased so rapidly that by 1937 Germany had moved into first position among countries exporting to Palestine, exceeding even Britain, the Mandatory Power. The exported goods included agricultural machinery, cement, steel girders, iron plates, aluminum, brass products, watches, and photographic equipment. During the era of anti-Jewish persecution in 1933–1939, the Nazi regime, through the Transfer Agreement, encouraged and allowed the movement of sixty thousand people and about a hundred million marks from Germany to Palestine.

Until the Peel Partition Plan of 1937 forced Germany to reexamine its policy on Palestine, the Haavara Agreement did, for a while, meet the goals of both the Nazi regime and the Zionists.

The Haavara Agreement was the first example of a Nazi program of organized Jewish relocation, and acted as the only formal contract signed between Nazi Germany and a Zionist organization. The agreement solved the problems of an affluent class of Germans but did not improve the living conditions of the German Jews left behind, and the number of Jews who actually migrated to Palestine is unclear. The Haavara Agreement continued in effect until the German government ceased to support it at the outbreak of war in 1939.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Confiscation of Jewish Property

Further Reading

- Bauer, Yehuda. Jews for Sale? Nazi-Jewish Negotiations, 1933–1945. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Black, Edwin. The Transfer Agreement: The Dramatic Story of the Pact between the Third Reich and Jewish Palestine. New York: Macmillan, 1984.
- Nicosia, Francis R. The Third Reich and the Palestine Question. London: I. B. Tauris, 1985.

Hadamar

The name of a location in Germany where thousands of people with physical or psychological disabilities, or with incurable diseases, were murdered according to the Nazi “euthanasia program” between 1941 and 1945. It is estimated that approximately 11,000 victims were killed at Hadamar. Part hospital, part sanatorium, the center had originally been established in 1901 and was extended and refurbished in 1933 as the State Psychiatric Center. Hadamar can be likened to the Austrian Hartheim Castle, the center of the Nazi euthanasia program, in which 30,000 people were killed. Hadamar was also utilized for the murder of others; between 1944 and 1945 it was used in order to kill slave laborers who were unable to keep working because of illness or debility, and at other times it was used for the purpose of murdering Allied nationals. Hadamar has become a byword for bureaucratic murder masked as medical “improvement” in the name of perverted science. Many of the doctors involved in the killing at Hadamar were transferred to the Nazi death camps during World War II, the better to practice their lethal skills; these included Drs. Ernst Baumhardt, Guenther Hennecke, Friedrich Berner, and Hans-Bobo Gorgass.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Euthanasia Program; Hadamar Insane Asylum Case

Further Reading

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Hadamar Insane Asylum Case

The first Western trial involving allegations of mass murder to be held after the end of World War II in 1945. The Hadamar Insane Asylum Case established the precedent that civilians, not just the military, were bound by the international laws and customs of warfare.

The United States Army liberated the city of Hadamar, in Hesse, Germany, in April 1945. It soon became clear to the Americans that the Nazis had carried out a series of atrocities at the Hadamar Insane Asylum. Reportedly, the staff had been injecting patients with scopolamine or morphine in lethal doses. U.S. War Crimes Team 5822 investigated the staff, and the U.S. Military Commission, Chief of Prosecution, Subsection War Crimes branch handed down an indictment on September 15, 1945, charging seven with the murder of more than 400 Polish and Soviet slave laborers and with violations of international law. The court eventually heard how at least 400 prisoners were transported from various concentration camps in groups of 70 from July 1, 1944, to April 1, 1945. Only one woman survived by escaping from the asylum. Overwhelming evidence proved that the seven defendants murdered all the other transportees in the “three-story death house” at Hadamar. The court found all the defendants guilty and sentenced three of them to the death penalty.

The seven defendants were Alfons Klein, administrator of the clinic; Adolf Wahlmann, physician in charge; Henrick Ruoff, chief male nurse; Karl Willig, male nurse; Irmgard Huber, chief female nurse; Adolf Merkle, record keeper for the clinic; and Philipp Blum, a grave digger. The indictment alleged that the accused “did, from on or about July 1, 1944 to on or about April 1, 1945 at Hadamar, Germany, willfully, deliberately, and wrongfully, aid, abet, and participate in the killing of human beings of Polish and Russian nationality, aggregating in excess of 400.” Although the clinic had been in operation since 1941, those killed before the indictment dates were German citizens and therefore outside the court’s purview.

The trial began on October 8, 1945, in the city of Wiesbaden, Germany. The best evidence came from the clinic records themselves, although Merkle issued death certificates on different dates. Furthermore, all the certificates stated that the victims died of tuberculosis, yet the asylum had no facilities for the treatment of tuberculosis. In fact, Wahlmann admitted he had never examined the patients’ charts, let alone the patients, to see if they were even sick. All the defendants admitted in both pretrial statements and on the stand to taking part in the killings but claimed that they were acting on the orders of their superiors. They also claimed fear of retaliation if they did not participate and/or tried to leave the clinic. However, the defendants mentioned their fear of retaliation for the first time at the trial; pretrial statements made no mention of these concerns.

The defense attempted to challenge the legality of the military court, claiming that the U.S. military had no right to try civilians. Failing that, they challenged the indictment itself, claiming that the Nazis were not bound to treat with the Soviets under the rules of war as the communist government had denounced all “czarist” treaties; and as regards to the Poles killed, that Poland at the time was legally part of Germany and therefore bound by German law, which made the killing of those unfit for work legal. The court rejected both these arguments. Faced with no viable defense, the attorneys had no choice but to resort to a plea for mercy. This action, however, incensed the American prosecutor, Leon Jaworski. Jaworski instead requested the death penalty for all seven accused.

On October 22, 1945, the Military Commission Court deliberated for two hours before returning a verdict of guilty against all defendants. The court sentenced Klein, Willig, and Ruoff to death by hanging; Wahlmann received life at hard labor; Merkle received 35 years at hard labor; Huber 24 years; and Blum 30. The military governor confirmed all the sentences.

ELIZABETH PUGLIESE

See also: Euthanasia Program; Hadamar

Further Reading

Jaworski, Leon. After Fifteen Years. Houston: Gulf Publishing, 1961.

Kinter, Earl W. (Ed.). War Crimes Trial Series, Vol. IV, The Hadamar Trial, Trial of Alfons Klein and Six Others. London: Hodge, 1949.

Harster, Wilhelm

Wilhelm Harster was a Nazi German SS and SD officer who served as chief of security and police forces in the German-occupied Netherlands (1940–1944) and Italy (1944–1945).

He was born on July 21, 1904, in Kelheim, Bavaria, and earned a law degree from the University of Munich in 1927. Having joined the Reichswehr (Germany's army under the Weimar Republic), Harster served with the 1st Battalion of Wilhelm Harster was a member of the SS, responsible for perpetrating Holocaust crimes that led to the death of up to 104,000 Jews during the German occupation of the Netherlands. Between July 1940 and August 1943 he commanded the security police and SD in the Netherlands; after this he was transferred to Italy as SD commander there. At the end of the war he was captured by the British Army and transferred to the Netherlands for trial. (AP Photo)

the Bund Oberland and was a reservist after his training. In May 1933, only months after Adolf Hitler's ascension to power, he joined the Nazi Party. That November he became a member of the SS, and in October 1935 he joined the SD, eventually rising to the rank of Gruppenfuhrer (group leader).

In the early summer of 1940 Harster was called to active duty in the German Army, being assigned temporarily to a machine gun company. On July 19, 1940, only weeks after the German invasion of The Netherlands, Harster was posted to that country as commander of the SD (police). He would remain in that post until August 1944. As head of the SD, he was partly responsible for the rounding up and deportation of thousands of Dutch Jews, including Anne Frank and her family, who had been kept in hiding in Amsterdam with the Gies family beginning in July 1942. The Franks were discovered on August 4, 1944, arrested, and deported to concentration camps to the east. Harster was then detailed to Italy, where he commanded the SD in German-occupied portions of that country.

British forces captured Harster in 1945. At the insistence of the Dutch, he was extradited to the Netherlands to stand trial for war crimes committed while he headed the SD there. He was convicted in 1949 and given a 12-year prison term for his role in the persecution, deportation, and murder of Dutch Jews. He was released in 1953, having spent a total of eight years in prison, and returned to West Germany, taking a civil service position in Bavaria. By 1963, however, he was compelled to leave that job when his past deeds in the Netherlands came under more scrutiny, although he was permitted to keep his pension. Four years later, he was again placed on trial, this time in West Germany, for having sent thousands of Dutch Jews to their deaths at the Sobibór and Auschwitz death camps. Convicted, he was given a 15-year jail sentence, which was commuted in 1969 for time already served. His early release caused an uproar in some circles, and the Dutch Auschwitz Committee formally petitioned the West German chancellor not to pardon Harster, which he did anyway in 1969. Harster died in Bavaria on December 25, 1991.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Frank, Anne; Italy; Netherlands

Further Reading

Hirschfeld, Gerhard. Nazi Rule and Dutch Collaboration: The Netherlands under German Occupation, 1940–1945. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.

Muller, Melissa. Anne Frank: The Biography. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1998.

Hautval, Adelaide

Adelaide Hautval was a French psychiatrist who was imprisoned by German occupation forces and who defended and aided Jews in several concentration camps.

She was born on January 1, 1906, in Le Hohwald, France, the daughter of a Protestant minister. Extremely intelligent and precocious, she studied medicine at the University of Strasbourg at a time in which very few women became professionals. Upon receiving her medical degree, she became interested in psychiatry and worked in French psychiatric facilities. After Germany invaded France in 1940 the country was divided by the victors, with the Germans directly controlling most of northern and western France; the southern part of France, where Hautval lived, was controlled by the collaborationist French Vichy government.

In April 1942, on receiving news that her mother had died in Paris, Hautval asked for permission to go the city, which was controlled by the Germans, so she could attend the funeral. Her request was denied, and so Hautval decided to cross into the German zone illegally. She was promptly arrested and sent to a jail in Bourges. Several weeks later Jews began arriving at the jail, with yellow identification patches emblazoned with the Star of David. When Hautval loudly protested to jail guards about the way in which Jews were being treated, she was told that she would share their fate. Hautval then pinned a yellow piece of paper to her clothing, which read: "Friend of the Jews." The Germans were outraged by this act of defiance and sent Hautval to several different prisons before shipping her off to the death camp at Birkenau in early 1943.

She was placed in a barracks with some 500 Jewish women, where she attended to many fellow detainees who were suffering from various diseases and illnesses. Before long, her Jewish friends were referring to her as "the saint." When prison officials found out that Hautval was a physician, they forced her to work in the makeshift prison infirmary, though she kept quiet about the women she was treating privately, fearing that if prison authorities found out that they were ill, they would be immediately killed.

Hautval was later transferred to the adjoining Auschwitz I camp, where brutal and inhumane medical experiments were being performed on prisoners. When the SS doctors there asked her to help in these experiments, she flatly refused; she also refused to participate in the involuntary sterilization of female detainees. When a prison doctor asked her, "Don't you see that these people are different from you?" she answered, "Many people are different from me. You, for example." Hautval was eventually sent back to Birkenau when it was clear that she would not participate in Nazi medical experimentation.

Adelaide Hautval was later sent to the Ravensbrück camp in Germany, where she remained until liberated by Allied forces in 1945. As a result of her long incarceration, her health had been permanently damaged. Had she chosen to collaborate with the Germans, she probably would have avoided such a fate, but her moral and professional compasses would not allow for that. In 1962 she testified at the libel trial of Leon Uris in London. Uris had been sued for libel by the Polish physician Władislas Dering, after Uris had detailed the macabre medical experiments that Dering had performed at Auschwitz during World War II. The trial took place in London. Dering was ultimately awarded exactly one-half of a penny for damages. After the trial the judge praised Hautval, proclaiming her as one of the most courageous women ever to appear in an English court.

On May 18, 1965, Israel's Yad Vashem named Hautval as one of the Righteous among the Nations. On October 12, 1988, Adelaide Hautval died in France.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Birkenau; Ravensbrück; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Hautval, Adelaide, and H. Tennyson. "Who Shall Live, Who Shall Die?" Intellectual Digest II 7 (March 1972): 52–54.

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.

Heim, Aribert

Austrian-born Nazi physician whose bizarre and cruel medical experiments on concentration camp internees earned him the sobriquet "Dr. Death." Aribert Heim was born on June 28, 1914, in Radkersburg, Austria. In 1935 he joined the Austrian Nazi Party, and three years later, after the German annexation of Austria, he became a member of the SS. In 1940 he became a member of the Waffen-SS and in October 1941 was appointed chief doctor at the Mauthausen concentration camp, where he began to engage in outrageous and highly unethical experiments on internees.

Heim's experiments included injecting various substances—including gasoline, phenol, various poisons, and water—directly into prisoners' hearts to see which substance resulted in the quickest death. Others included chemical and surgical castration, performing surgical procedures without anesthesia, removing organs from healthy individuals and leaving them to die in the operating room, and crude attempts at amputation and the reattachment of limbs. Soon camp prisoners began referring to Heim as “Dr. Death.”

In February 1942 Heim was transferred to Finland, where he worked for a time in local hospitals. Exactly what he did after that, until the end of the war, is not entirely clear, although he might have been a camp doctor at Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen. On March 15, 1945, he was taken captive by U.S. troops and sent to a prisoner of war camp. Unaware at the time of his past activities, occupation authorities released him later that year, and he resumed a medical practice in Baden-Baden, Germany. In 1962 Heim disappeared after being tipped off that he was about to be arrested for war crimes. He eventually settled in Cairo, Egypt, where he allegedly converted to Islam and assumed the name Tarek Hussein Farid. Meanwhile, he became the Simon Weisenthal Center's most-wanted Nazi-at-large. Over the years, there were reports of him being in South America and Europe, but for much of the time he was actually in Egypt.

Heim remained in written communication with family and friends and regularly received money from a sister in Austria. Finally, in 2009, it was determined by several different sources that Heim had died of cancer on August 10, 1992, in Egypt. This information was corroborated by Heim's son, Rudiger, who agreed to be interviewed about his father's whereabouts. Heim's son had been with his father at the time of his death.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Mauthausen-Gusen; Medical Experimentation

Further Reading

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Helga's Diary

Helga Weiss is a well-known Czech artist and Holocaust survivor. She was born Helga Hoskova-Weissova in Prague in 1929 to a Jewish family. Weiss began keeping a diary in 1938, as World War II neared and the Germans occupied her country. Among her first entries was a description of her family's terrifying ordeal in a Prague bomb shelter, as German planes flew above the city. In December 1941 Weiss and her family were forced to leave their apartment—and virtually all of their belongings—when the Germans forced them into the ghetto at Theresienstadt, located to the northwest of central Prague. She and her family would remain there until 1944, at which time they were deported to Auschwitz.

Weiss's diary, published in 2013 as Helga's Diary: A Young Girl's Account of Life in a Concentration Camp, mainly details her experiences during 1944 and 1945, after deportation; however, the book also describes events at Theresienstadt. In it, she chronicles the physical and mental strain of living in an enclosed ghetto and then the horrors of the concentration camps at Auschwitz and Mauthausen. Despite the deprivations and hardships of her young life, Weiss nevertheless acknowledges that the years in the Theresienstadt ghetto were not universally bad. There she became a young adult, experienced her first crush, and spent quality time with her family. The diary has not been heavily edited, so readers will experience it through the lens and words of a child and teenager, rather than an adult reflecting back, which Weiss hopes will make it more accessible.

Weiss's most riveting—and harrowing—experiences occurred after her deportation in 1944. She and her mother arrived at Auschwitz in October 1944 (her father was also sent there, but the family was separated by gender; Weiss's father was killed sometime later). Upon arrival, Weiss lied about her and her mother's age to avoid being sent to the gas chambers. Instead, she and her mother became laborers. Later on, after the Germans began to liquidate Auschwitz as Allied troops closed in on Germany, Weiss and her mother were sent by rail to the camp at Flossenburg. When Allied troops approached that facility, the Germans sent detainees on a 16-day death march to the Mauthausen camp. Weiss and her mother barely survived the ordeal. When Mauthausen was liberated in the spring of 1945, Weiss writes that she was numb and took no pleasure in the event because she was so sick and had seen so many horrific things.

After the war, Weiss returned to Prague and studied at the Academy of Fine Arts there. She also apprenticed under the well-known Czech artist Emil Filla and went on to become one of the foremost artists in postwar Czechoslovakia. After the collapse of communism in 1989, she displayed her work in Germany, Italy, and Austria. She has since been recognized many times for her courage and artistic talent, receiving the prestigious Medal of Merit in 2009.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also

Auschwitz; Czechoslovakia; Mauthausen-Gusen; Theresienstadt

Further Reading

Weiss, Helga. Helga's Diary: A Young Girl's Account of Life in a Concentration Camp. New York: Norton, 2013.

Helmy, Mohammed

Mohamed Helmy was a Berlin-based medical doctor who helped save Jews during World War II. Born in 1901 in Khartoum, Sudan, to an Egyptian father and a German mother, he moved to Berlin in 1922 to study medicine. He worked in the field of urology at the Robert Koch Hospital until 1938, where he rose to be head of the department. Due to Nazi racial laws, however, he was dismissed from his position because he was not an Aryan. In 1939 he was arrested for having spoken out against Nazism, along with many other Egyptian nationals living in Germany. He was detained for over a year but was discharged on health grounds.

After his release, a young Jewish patient of his, Anna Boros (later Gutman), sought his help. By way of response, and notwithstanding the great danger, from March 10, 1940, until the end of the war he hid her in a cabin on the outskirts of Berlin. There were times he would have to shuttle her around the homes of various friends in order to escape detection, but the cabin remained her core hiding place throughout most of the war years. With the help of Frieda Szturmann, a German woman he knew, he also arranged for three members of her family—Anna's mother Julie, her stepfather Georg Wehr, and her grandmother Cecilie Rudnik—to be hidden. He also provided the family with medical care. All survived the war and later migrated to the United States.

Helmy did all he could to assist Anna during her long period in hiding. Documents in German and Arabic were later found revealing just how far he was prepared to go. These included a certificate from the Central Islamic Institute in Berlin (headed by the antisemitic Haj Amin al-Husseini, Mufti of Jerusalem) attesting to her having converted to Islam, and a certificate saying that she had married an Egyptian in a ceremony that was held in Helmy's home.

After the war, Helmy remained in Germany and married his prewar fiancée, Emmi. It was later said that they decided not to have any children because they were concerned about the type of world they would be brought into. Frieda Szturmann, who had provided such assistance in saving the lives of Anna and her family, died in 1962. Mohamed Helmy died in 1982, aged 81.

Several years later, Jerusalem's Yad Vashem learned of Helmy through letters written by several Jewish survivors he had helped. An investigation took place, in which researchers from the Department of the Righteous searched for as much information as could be found and spoke to a number of people including Anna Boros-Gutman. With no known next of kin, Yad Vashem asked the Egyptian embassy in Israel for help in tracking down any relatives. It was known, for example, that Helmy had been visited from time to time in Germany by nephews from Egypt in the decades after the war.

The result saw a decision, on March 18, 2013, to recognize Mohamed Helmy and Frieda Szturmann as Righteous among the Nations. It was a momentous decision, as Helmy now became the first Arab rescuer to be so recognized.

Yad Vashem made contact with Helmy's great-nephew in Egypt in order to present the award, but he rejected it on the ground that it was an honor bestowed by the state of Israel. Mervat Hassan, speaking on behalf of her husband, was quoted as saying: "If any other country offered to honor Helmy, we would have been happy with it. . . . But not from Israel." The rejection was met with some measure of consternation at Yad Vashem, where a spokesman said that in Nazi Germany, which was in a state of "total moral collapse, there was a small minority who mustered extraordinary courage to uphold human values. Bystanders were the rule; rescuers were the exception. Helmy was one of them." The level of disappointment was intense, particularly in view of the fact that this recognition of a Muslim Arab who rescued Jews had come in honor of his individual goodness, not his national background.

It was indeed an ironic situation. The man whom some news outlets dubbed the "Arab Schindler" received due acknowledgment for saving Jewish lives during the Holocaust, at risk of his own life and in the face of Nazi persecution, but he did not have the honor recognized by his own family in his home country for political—not moral or humanitarian—reasons.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Los Angeles Times. "Egyptian Hero's Kin Reject Honor by Israel's Holocaust Museum." October 20, 2013.

Yad Vashem. "Rescued by an Egyptian in Berlin: Dr. Mohamed Helmy and Frieda Szturmann."

Herz-Sommer, Alice

Alice Herz-Sommer was a noted classical pianist and music teacher and, at the time of her death in February 2014, the oldest known living survivor of the Holocaust.

Alice Herz-Sommer was born Alice Herz in Prague (then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire) on November 26, 1903. Her father was a well-to-do businessman and her mother a well-educated member of Prague's intelligentsia. The Herzes sponsored a cultural salon in their home, where the young Alice Herz was exposed to philosophers, writers, artists, and musicians. The most famous of these visitors were the composer Gustav Mahler and the famed existentialist philosopher and writer Franz Kafka. The family became quite close with Kafka, whom Herz described as quiet, congenial, but "slightly strange."

As a very young girl, Herz began learning piano under the tutelage of her older sister, and it soon became apparent that she had a musical gift. While still in her teens, Herz was determined to become a classical pianist, and she went on to study at the Prague German Conservatory of Music, where she was the youngest student. She also studied under the watch of Vaclav Stepan. In 1931 Herz married Leopold Sommer, an amateur musician and businessman. Now going by the name Herz-Sommer, she began touring Europe giving concerts. She gave birth to a son, Stephan (later known as Raphael), in 1937.

The following year, when Nazi Germany annexed the German-speaking portion of Czechoslovakia known as the Sudetenland, life for Herz-Sommer and her family became perilous. In 1939 Germany annexed the remainder of Czechoslovakia, including Prague. The Nazis immediately began to segregate and repress the Jews in Prague, and Herz-Sommer was forbidden from giving public recitals or teaching non-Jewish pupils.

During 1939 most of Herz-Sommer's friends and family fled to Palestine, but Herz-Sommer and her immediate family chose to stay in Prague so she could care for her ailing, elderly mother. Eventually her mother was arrested and killed, and in July 1943 the Nazis deported Herz-Sommer and her son to the concentration camp at Theresienstadt. Leopold Sommer, meanwhile, had been deported to the Dachau concentration camp in Germany. He died there of typhus in 1944.

Fortunately for Herz-Sommer and her young son, the two were allowed to remain together at Theresienstadt, and he was among only a few children who survived the ordeal. As a prisoner, Herz-Sommer participated in more than 100 concerts, sometimes appearing with other musicians. These concerts were put on for other prisoners as well as guards. Years later, she explained that the Nazis permitted these performances so that they could prove to the Red Cross (and thus the rest of the world) that the Jews were not being mistreated, even though they were being held against their wills in concentration camps. Herz-Sommer would later state that "music saved my life and music saves me still. I am Jewish, but Beethoven is my religion."

After Theresienstadt was liberated in early 1945, Herz and her son Raphael went back to Prague. In March 1949, less than a year after the creation of the State of Israel, they took up residence there, joining other family members who had emigrated to the region years earlier. For decades Herz-Sommer taught music at the Jerusalem Academy of Music, until moving to London in 1986 to be near Raphael, who was a noted cellist and conductor. Raphael died in 2001, at the age of 64. Alice Herz-Sommer remained passionate about music until she died on February 23, 2014, at the age of 110, in London. In 2013 a short documentary film of her experiences, The Lady in Number 6, was released to critical acclaim. On March 2, 2014, the film won an Academy Award for Best Documentary Short Subject.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Czechoslovakia; Theresienstadt

Further Reading

Muller, Melissa, and Reinhard Piechocki. Alice's Piano: The Life of Alice Herz-Sommer. New York: Macmillan, 2008.

Stoessinger, Caroline. A Century of Wisdom. New York: Random House, 2012.

Hess, Rudolf

Rudolf Hess will be remembered for more than being second in line of succession—behind only Hermann Göring—to Adolf Hitler. He also will be remembered for one of the most bizarre events in the history of the Nazi government. (Note that Rudolf Hess should not be confused with Rudolf Höss, sometimes spelled Hoess, who served as commander of Auschwitz.)

Hess was born Rudolf Walter Richard Hess on April 26, 1894, into a financially successful family of German ethnicity in Alexandria, Egypt. He was educated in a German-speaking school in Alexandria and came to live in Germany in his early teens when he was sent there to boarding school. He served valiantly in World War I, where he was wounded three times and earned several medals and promotions along the way.

He trained as a pilot, but the war ended too soon for him to see action in that capacity.

Hess met Hitler in 1920 and soon devoted himself entirely to the Nazi Party then being developed. He joined the party on July 1, 1920, and, sharing many of Hitler's antisemitic beliefs, brawled in the streets on behalf of the party following Hitler's rallies and studied at the University of Munich under Karl Haushofer, whose theories included the concept of Lebensraum ("living space"). He was arrested with Hitler following the failed Beer Hall Putsch of November 1923, and while both were in prison Hitler dictated to Hess his book, Mein Kampf. They were released within ten days of each other in December 1920, and together saw membership of the Nazi Party grow into the hundreds of thousands.

With Hitler's rise to power, Hess was appointed to several positions within the party and the government, including, ultimately, that of deputy führer, but his power was less than his titles suggested. What he brought to his position more than anything—certainly far more than any deep technical or military skill—was his blind devotion to Hitler and a fanaticism that was notable even by Nazi standards. It was this unquestioning allegiance that Hitler rewarded when he named Hess second in line after him.

As Hitler became more involved in war-related decisions, however, Hess found himself further and further removed from Hitler's inner circle, even as Martin Bormann eclipsed him in power and access. This seemed to have been the trigger for a decision that Hess made with the hope that it would bring him back into Hitler's group of most valued advisers: he would fly from Germany to Britain to negotiate a peaceful resolution to hostilities between the two countries. More specifically, he would offer that Germany would withdraw from Western Europe if Britain made no move to interfere with Germany's plans to invade Russia.

Thus it was that on May 10, 1941—just six weeks before Hitler was to launch Operation Barbarossa, Germany's invasion of Russia—Hess parachuted into Scotland after a harrowing solo flight. His goal was to speak directly with Douglas Douglas-Hamilton, the 14th Duke of Hamilton, whom Hess respected as a fellow airman, and who, he believed, opposed Britain's engagement in the war. Hess was immediately arrested and, to his surprise, his "peace offer" was dismissed out of hand by Hamilton and, of far greater importance, by Churchill. Hess was despondent.

Although some have suggested that Hitler had approved of Hess's trip—this, most recently on the basis of a document purportedly written by Hess's adjutant—the overwhelming consensus is that Hitler was shocked and outraged, fearful that his allies—Italy and Japan—would think that Hess's proposal was part of a plan by Hitler to negotiate without their knowledge or approval. The decision was therefore made that Hitler must distance himself and the Nazi government from Hess's trip, and that the most effective way to do that was to strip him of all his titles and to declare Hess mentally ill. Even if effective, however, this response to Hess's extraordinary self-proclaimed "peace mission" would not fully solve Hitler's problems, since convincing the Germans of Hess's mental instability would raise the question of Hitler's judgment in having appointed him deputy führer.

During the remainder of the war, Hess remained under arrest and in the control of the British. His behavior often gave credence to Hitler's characterization of him as mentally unstable. In addition to a number of failed suicide attempts, Hess was convinced that someone was trying to poison his food, and he feigned (although at times he might actually have had) memory loss.

After the war, Hess was transferred to Nuremberg to stand trial as one of the 24 high-level Nazi defendants at the International Military Tribunal from November 1945 to October 1946. Again, Hess complained of amnesia, but he did not deny signing many of the orders coming from Hitler, as well as anti-Jewish legislation—including the infamous Nuremberg Laws—in his capacity as deputy führer. He argued that his activities were not related to the extermination of the Jews, and, further, that he could not be held accountable for any of the German government's actions after he left Germany for Scotland in the spring of 1941.

On September 30, 1946, Hess was convicted of crimes against peace and conspiracy to commit crimes—although not specifically war crimes or crimes against humanity—and sentenced on October 1 to life in prison at the Spandau military prison in Berlin. There Hess stayed for the next forty-one years, during the last twenty of which he was the only prisoner in the facility, until his death by suicide on August 17, 1987, at the age of 93.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Mein Kampf; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nuremberg Trials

Further Reading

Douglas-Hamilton, James. The Truth about Rudolf Hess. South Yorkshire: Frontline Books, 2016.

Padfield, Peter. Hess, Hitler and Churchill: The Real Turning Point of the Second World War—A Secret History. London: Icon Books, 2014.

Pick, Daniel. The Pursuit of the Nazi Mind: Hitler, Hess, and the Analysts. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Hesselblad, Maria Elisabetta

Maria Elisabetta (Mary Elizabeth) Hesselblad was a Swedish nurse and Roman Catholic nun who saved the lives of 60 Jews by hiding them in a convent in Rome during the Holocaust for over half a year. Born the fifth of 13 children on June 4, 1870, in Fåglavik, near Gothenburg, Sweden, she was raised as a Lutheran. With a deteriorating economic situation in Sweden she went to work when aged 16, but two years later, in 1888, she left for the United States. Here, she studied nursing in New York; at the same time she became interested in the tenets of Roman Catholicism, and converted several years later, in 1902. Two years later she went to Rome, where she joined the Carmelite religious community before establishing the Bridgettine order on September 8, 1911. The Bridgettines had been founded in the 14th century by Saint Bridget, who was canonized in 1391, but the order had declined after the Reformation. Hesselblad took the Bridgettine Sisters back to Sweden in the early 1920s, before returning to Rome in 1931, when she received the Holy See's permission to house her order there. She now became Mother Superior of the Monastery of the Order of Salvatore di Santa Brigida in Rome's Piazza Farnese.

During World War II, from December 1943 until June 4, 1944, she used her position and the monastery to offer refuge to twelve members of two Jewish families, the Pipernos and the Seds. These families had been desperately searching for a refuge in northern Italy after the surrender of Italy on September 8, 1943, and its subsequent occupation by the Germans. Returning to Rome, they found their way to the Monastery of Salvatore di Santa Brigida. At this time it was not known that they were Jewish, but in January 1944 Mother Maria Elisabetta learned of their identity and, rather than turning them in, went out of her way to ensure that they would be looked after and that their safety would be secured. She also ensured that others in a similar situation would also be taken care of. Some were Jewish; some were not. For Mother Maria Elisabetta, their status did not matter, only that they were in danger.

While they were in her care, Mother Maria Elisabetta made sure that the children of the Piperno-Sed families fulfilled their religious obligations as Jews, and that they recited their Hebrew prayers. It was symptomatic of her broader approach: she was known to have great respect for the religious freedom of both non-Christians and non-Catholics, while at the same time welcoming any who wanted to convert to Catholicism—though she did not make her assistance conditional upon them doing so. She promoted a movement for peace that involved all faith groups, living her religious belief to the extent of devoting herself to charitable works on behalf of the poor as well as Jews in Italy who suffered due to Benito Mussolini's racial laws after 1938.

Early in the morning of April 24, 1957, Mother Maria Elisabetta died in Rome, aged 86. Almost immediately, moves were made in Rome to consider the case for her beatification. The process investigating her sainthood commenced in Rome in 1987 and concluded its work in 1990. On March 26, 1999, Pope John Paul II proclaimed her to be Venerable, following which he beatified her on April 9, 2000. Pope Francis approved her canonization in late 2015; the canonization date was determined on March 15, 2016, and was celebrated on June 5, 2016, in St. Peter's Square, Rome. In declaring her sainthood, Pope Francis created Sweden's first saint in six centuries. Mother (now Saint) Mary Elisabetta Hesselblad became only the second Swede to receive sainthood, following St. Bridget in 1391.

After the Holocaust, the Jews she had rescued held very fond memories of their wartime protector, and her actions were remembered with fondness and gratitude. On August 9, 2004, Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust remembrance authority, recognized the actions of Mother Maria Elisabetta Hesselblad for her work in saving the lives of Jews during World War II, when it honored her as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Catholic Church; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Valli, Aldo Maria. La ragazza che cercava Dio. Vita di Maria Elisabetta Hesselblad. Milan: Ancora, 2012.

Yad Vashem. "Hesselblad, Elisabetta (1870–1957)," at <http://db.yadvashem.org/righteous/family.html?language=en&itemId=5203980>.

Heydrich, Reinhard

Chief of the German security police and Sicherheitsdienst (SD). Born in Halle, Germany, on March 7, 1904, Reinhard Heydrich believed in the stab-in-the-back legend (Dolchstoßlegende), the myth that the German Army had not been defeated militarily in World War I but had been undone by the collapse of the German home front. He also believed in the myth of Aryan supremacy. He joined the Freikorps at age 16 and the German Navy in 1922. Planning to make the navy his career, Heydrich was forced to resign in 1931 following an indiscretion with another officer's daughter. That Reinhard Heydrich was one of the highest-ranking Nazi officials in the SS during World War II. As head of the Reich Main Security Office, he was directly responsible for organizing and carrying out the Holocaust. In January 1942 he chaired the Wannsee Conference in Berlin, which formalized plans for the “Final Solution,” the deportation and annihilation of all Jews under German control. As “Reich Protektor” of Bohemia and Moravia, he was gunned down by Czech partisans in May 1942. (AP Photo) same year, Heydrich joined the National Socialist Party and became active in the Sturmabteilung (SA) in Hamburg. Heydrich’s managerial abilities and Germanic appearance led SS chief Heinrich Himmler to appoint him as head of the SD. Heydrich soon built the SD into a powerful organization, and by 1933 he was an SS-Brigadeführer.

After directing the opening of Dachau, the first of the Nazi concentration camps, Heydrich helped to organize the 1934 purge of the SA (the “Night of the Long Knives”), in which the SA leadership was liquidated. Feared even within party ranks for his ruthlessness and known as the “Blond Beast,” Heydrich helped create the Nazi police state. He also played a leading role in the November 9, 1938, Kristallnacht pogrom, an orgy of SA violence against the German Jewish community.

Following the invasion of Poland, Heydrich assumed command of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt (RSHA, Reich Main Security Office), which was responsible for carrying out Hitler’s extermination of the Jews. He established the Einsatzgruppen killing squads charged with executing Jews and members of opposition groups in German-controlled Poland and later in the Soviet Union. Heydrich was also a leading participant at the Wannsee Conference on January 20, 1942, when top Nazis planned the extermination of European Jewry.

Although he still retained his other duties, Heydrich in late 1941 became the Reich Protector of Bohemia and Moravia. On May 27, 1942, British-trained Czech commandos ambushed his car, seriously wounding him, and he died a few days later on June 4, 1942. In retaliation for his death, the Germans destroyed the village of Lidice and murdered many of its inhabitants.

CULLEN MONK

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Conspiracy; Dachau; Einsatzgruppen; Final Solution; Göring, Hermann; Himmler, Heinrich; Kristallnacht; Madagascar Plan; Müller, Heinrich; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Sicherheitsdienst; Vel’ d’Hiv Roundup; Wannsee Conference; Yellow Star

Further Reading

Calic, Edouard. Reinhard Heydrich: The Chilling Story of the Man Who Masterminded the Nazi Death Camps. New York: William Morrow, 1984.

Dederichs, Mario. Heydrich, the Face of Evil. Drexel Hill (PA): Casemate, 2009.

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Gerwarth, Robert. Hitler’s Hangman: The Life of Heydrich. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2011.

Hilberg, Raul

Raul Hilberg, one of the earliest major scholars of the Holocaust, was an Austrian-born American political scientist. His examination of the evolution and execution of the Nazi program of Jewish annihilation, The Destruction of the European Jews (1961), detailed for the first time the manner in which mass murder under the Nazis became possible. The work was a groundbreaking piece of research that effectively set in train the academic study of the Holocaust throughout the English-speaking world.

Hilberg was born in Vienna in 1926; in April 1939 his family fled Nazi persecution for the United States. Settling in New York, the young Raul Hilberg attended Brooklyn

College, and when the United States entered World War II he was drafted into the U.S. Army. As a native speaker of German, he was seconded to the War Documentation Department, charged with examining Nazi (and other) archives. It was this that prompted his initial research into the Nazi destruction of the Jews.

After the war Hilberg returned to academic study, completing an MA and a PhD at Columbia University. He obtained an academic position at the University of Vermont in 1955, where he spent the rest of his academic life until he retired in 1991.

The Destruction of the European Jews became Hilberg's best-known scholarly work, though initially he found it difficult to find a publisher. There were still many in the United States in the late 1950s and early 1960s who were reluctant to confront precisely what had happened in the Third Reich. He offered the manuscript to a number of mainstream academic publishers, most of whom rejected it on the grounds that at over 1,200 pages long it was too unwieldy, or that as a work of scholarship it was based too exclusively on German documents. Eventually he was successful in attracting the attention of Quadrangle Books, then a small Chicago publisher. It began with a tiny print run, but the book's sheer size and authority meant that it could not remain hidden for long. Added to the fact that it appeared at precisely the same time as the capture and subsequent trial of Adolf Eichmann, the book began to capture the interest of specialists within the academy, as well as among a broader readership. The appearance of The Destruction of the European Jews marked an important passage in the historiography of what, later in the decade, came to be called the Holocaust.

Hilberg's main thrust was that the Holocaust was the result of a huge bureaucratic machine with thousands of participants, and not the fulfilment of a preconceived plan by Hitler. Responsibility was diffused out to a wide variety of agencies, as innumerable instructions from a multitude of government offices were forwarded, formally and informally, to a range of actors. These included not only Nazis enforcing policy directives but also train timetablers, procurement agents, and concentration camp designers, among others. Hilberg established a model, supported by a painstaking devotion to tens of thousands of Nazi documents, of how the bureaucratic machinery of the Nazi state had made the murder of millions of Jews possible. Instead of focusing on leaders, he showed how the Nazi program was the product of a system that evolved over time. Each step in this process was more extreme; in a classic taxonomy of genocide, Hilberg identified that the Jews were first defined as enemies of the state, then discriminated against and disenfranchised, then had their property expropriated, were moved into ghettos, and, finally, transported to their deaths.

While publication of The Destruction of the European Jews in the United States was difficult, it took Hilberg even longer to find someone to translate the book into German, prior to the search for a publisher there. Moreover, Hilberg's methodology was not seen to be sufficiently sympathetic to Hitler's targets, the Jews. Not only did he place his emphasis on the perpetrators rather than the victims but he also showed that Nazi-imposed institutions such as the Judenräte (Jewish councils) led some Jews to be complicit in their own demise, an approach that generated criticism in both the United States and Israel.

Overall, however, Hilberg's omission of examining the suffering of the Jews was deliberate; his preference was to examine the means whereby the Nazis could achieve their objective of wiping out a complete group of people numbering millions. When critics attacked his book, therefore, they were in fact often condemning him for a book he did not write, rather than the one before them.

As the field of Holocaust Studies developed over the next fifteen to twenty years, Hilberg's pioneering contribution came to be recognized more widely. Over time, the work was regarded as a seminal study of the process of the Nazi Final Solution. His fidelity to the documents escorted him through all his work, acting as the ultimate guidance for the conclusions he drew, and his influence grew steadily among succeeding generations of Holocaust scholars. Not only Hilberg's model, but in many instances also his very terminology—such as, for example, his reference to the principal actors in the Holocaust as perpetrators, victims, and bystanders—has since been employed widely.

The Destruction of the European Jews, which was produced as a single volume on double-columned pages, was reissued twice more in expanded editions of three volumes (in 1985 and 2003), further reinforcing Hilberg's place as one of the most pioneering and original thinkers regarding the process of Nazi destruction of Jews during the Holocaust.

So committed was Hilberg to the necessity of using documents in historical writing that in a much later work he evaluated the varied types of source material scholars have available from which to rescue the history of the Holocaust. In Sources of Holocaust Research: An Analysis (2001), he attempted to develop an accessible means whereby scholars could amalgamate data and draw conclusions about the nature of the Third Reich. Survivor testimony, contemporary government memoranda, diary entries, letters of all kinds, newspaper accounts: these and many other sources of Holocaust history were analyzed, with the intention both of alerting readers to their diversity and of showing some of the ways in which the material could be employed. As he showed, engaging in such work is not always an easy task. Moreover, he insisted documents could be as significant for what they do not say as for what they explicitly describe. Overall, he demonstrated that different types of documents can be utilized as accurate sources for the writing of history, showing that all material, even the most fragmentary, can be employed to recreate a reliable record of what happened during the Holocaust.

The Destruction of the European Jews was the definitive statement of Hilberg's authority, but he nonetheless saw a need to supplement it with an investigation of the people behind the process he had so thoroughly delineated. The result was Perpetrators, Victims, Bystanders: The Jewish Catastrophe, 1933–1945, which appeared in 1992. Here, he put forth his views on the “who,” rather than the “how” of the Holocaust, and, as with his treatment of the multifarious nature of documents, he showed that those involved in the Holocaust were many and varied. While this might seem like a given, it had not yet been treated thoroughly until Hilberg painstakingly articulated the notion. It was to investigate the multifarious responses of everyday people that Hilberg devoted his attention. The project had taken him several years of research and writing.

In 1996 Hilberg produced his memoir, The Politics of Memory: The Journey of a Holocaust Historian. This was a sometimes passionate account of the testing ordeals that befell him as he strove to advance his career, establish himself in the area of Holocaust Studies, and fend off those who did not agree with his conclusions. Less a vindication of his work than an explanation of how it came to take the shape it did, this book gave an insight into the man behind the writing, and showed just how difficult it was for him to find acceptance in a field that was still original even as he wrote.

When Raul Hilberg died in 2007, he was mourned by generations of students and colleagues who acknowledged his immense contribution to the establishment of a field of study that had not existed prior to his pioneering endeavors.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Bureaucracy; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Final Solution; Functionalists; Shoah

Further Reading

- Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1961.
- Hilberg, Raul (Ed.). Documents of Destruction: Germany and Jewry, 1933–1945. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1971.
- Hilberg, Raul. Perpetrators, Victims, Bystanders: The Jewish Catastrophe, 1933–1945. New York: Aaron Asher Books, 1992.
- Hilberg, Raul. The Politics of Memory: The Journey of a Holocaust Historian. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1996.
- Hilberg, Raul. Sources of Holocaust Research: An Analysis. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2001.

Himmler, Heinrich

Heinrich Himmler was one of the most famous and notorious members of Adolf Hitler's inner circle in Germany's Nazi Party. As head of the SS, Himmler oversaw the mass murder of Jews and other peoples during the Holocaust of World War II.

Born in Munich, Germany, on October 7, 1900, to devout Catholic, middle-class parents, Himmler was a sickly and awkward boy during his early years. He was intelligent, though, and an avid reader, especially of racist pan-German writers who condemned what they perceived as the inordinate Jewish influence in Germany. As World War I progressed during Himmler's teenage years, he became more and more eager to serve in the German Army. He took an emergency high school diploma and volunteered for military service, but the war ended before he reached the front.

From 1919 to 1922 Himmler studied agricultural science at the Technical University in Munich, later taking a job as an agricultural assistant. He became involved with a conservative nationalist paramilitary group known as the Reich Flag but soon moved into the ranks of Hitler's National Socialist Party. Himmler felt he had found his calling within the Nazi Party, and he took part in Hitler's failed Beer Hall Putsch in 1923. With his background in agriculture, Himmler was well placed in a movement that emphasized the mythology of “blood and soil,” and he translated his education into an obsession with selective breeding and racial perfection. These ideas became especially important in the SS, of which Himmler became Deputy Reichsführer in 1927. Part of the paramilitary SA (Sturmabteilung, also known as Brown Shirts) that made up the backbone of Nazi support, the SS was Hitler's personal security service. Under Himmler, the SS rapidly gained a separate and racially elite identity, especially after he became Reichsführer of the organization in 1929.

Through a genius for bureaucratic organization, hard work, and ideological zeal, as well as a fastidious personal life and unquestioning loyalty to Hitler, Himmler had risen to great prominence within the Nazi Party by the time Hitler seized power in Germany in 1933. In 1934 the SS was made independent from the SA. Himmler and his closest adviser, Reinhard Heydrich, were instrumental in convincing Hitler to purge the leadership of the SA. This purge, accomplished through multiple executions during the Night of the Long Knives, and Himmler's appointment to chief of all the German police, rendered him one of the most powerful men in Germany next to Hitler himself.

When World War II broke out in 1939, the SS seized responsibility for the liquidation of "enemies" of the German Reich in the occupied territories. The Einsatzgruppen, special killing squads under the direct command of Heydrich, began the systematic mass murder of Jews, Roma, partisans, communists, Slavic peoples, and others considered to be "subhuman" all over Eastern Europe and the German-occupied territories of the Soviet Union. Those Jews who were not summarily shot were herded into ghettos and then later into extermination camps, where they were gassed to death and burned in crematoria. Himmler was intimately involved in these actions, often personally visiting execution sites and the camps, and it was he who was most active in translating Hitler's murderous hatred of Jews and other peoples into an actual program of extermination.

Meanwhile, Himmler continued to increase his power and accumulate more offices. He became Minister of the Interior in 1943, commander of the replacement army (Ersatzheer) in 1944, and finally commander of Army Group Vistula in 1944. After the July 20, 1944, attempt on Hitler's life by a group of army officers, Himmler personally oversaw the arrest, prosecution, and execution of those responsible.

His loyalty to Hitler was beginning to waver by the spring of 1945, however, as Germany was clearly losing the war to the Allies. Having made desperate attempts to conceal and destroy evidence of his monstrous crimes, Himmler sought to arrange a German surrender to the Western Allies. He hoped to avoid capture by the Red Army and counted on the anticommunist sentiment of the West to negotiate an anti-Soviet alliance that would include Germany. When Hitler found out about these unauthorized peace overtures, he was furious. In the political testament he wrote before his suicide in April 1945, Hitler stripped Himmler of his offices and party membership. The notorious former SS leader was now unwelcome in the new German government that was negotiating its surrender to the Allies, and he attempted to escape the ruined country through British lines. Himmler was captured, and on May 23, 1945, in Lüneburg, committed suicide by swallowing a cyanide capsule.

RICHARD FOGARTY

See also: Al-Husseini, Haj Amin; Blood and Soil; Einsatzgruppen; Gebhardt, Karl; Gestapo; Heydrich, Reinhard; Mauthausen Trial; Nacht und Nebel; Nisko Plan; Operation Harvest Festival; Pohl, Oswald; Reich Flight Tax; Röhm, Ernst; Rosenstrasse Protest; Schutzstaffel; Sicherheitsdienst; Sippenhaft; Speer, Albert; SS-Totenkopfverbände; Sturmabteilung; Waffen-SS; Wannsee Conference; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Warsaw Rising; Wolff, Karl

Further Reading

Breitman, Richard. The Architect of Genocide: Himmler and the Final Solution. Hanover (NH): University of New England Press, 1991.

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Himmler, Katrin, and Michael Wildt (Eds.). The Private Heinrich Himmler: Letters of a Mass Murderer. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2016.

Longerich, Peter. Heinrich Himmler. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Hinzert

A Nazi German concentration camp established in 1938 in the Rhineland-Palatinate region of Germany, not far from the Luxembourg border. The Hinzert facility served several functions. It served as a transit camp for individuals being sent to concentration camps further east (where most were killed); it provided forced labor for the surrounding area; and it held a large number of political prisoners. When it was initially constructed in late 1938, Hinzert housed petty criminals and individuals who were deemed "antisocial" (gay men, communists, and other so-called "asocials"). The original facility burned to the ground in August 1939. A newer, larger facility was erected beginning in October 1939.

In July 1940 Hinzert was taken over by the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps. At about the same time, there was a large influx of political prisoners from France, Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands, a consequence of the German invasion of those nations that began in late May 1940. In February 1942 the SS took over command of the camp. Under the SS, conditions for prisoners, which were never good, deteriorated. SS guards and administrative personnel were notoriously strict, and beatings and other extreme punishments became routine. Rations were also meager, illness and diseases were widespread, and medical services were virtually nonexistent.

Most of the Jews who went to Hinzert were there only for a short time, as they were sent from there to concentration and death camps further east. The camp never contained a large number of Jews; most of the more permanent detainees were forced laborers or political prisoners. Although Hinzert was not a designated death camp and did not become involved in mass killings, there were nevertheless a number of murders there. In 1941 some 70 Soviet prisoners of war were taken to Hinzert for “interrogation.” Instead, shortly after their arrival during a bogus medical inspection, they were injected with cyanide and died. A makeshift cemetery outside the camp attests to the prisoners who died or were killed there. Some guards also tortured prisoners in an attempt to extract information from them concerning resistance efforts in occupied areas.

Between 1939 and 1945 some 13,600 prisoners were kept—at one time or another—at Hinzert. In late November 1944 the administration of Hinzert was taken over by that of the Buchenwald concentration camp. On February 22, 1945, an Allied bombing raid badly damaged the camp, although the number of casualties remains unknown. The facility remained operational until early March, when surviving prisoners were sent to Buchenwald or were sent on a forced march to Upper Hessen, during which many died.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Buchenwald; Concentration Camps

Further Reading

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Hippler, Fritz

Fritz Hippler was a German filmmaker who ran the film department in the Propaganda Ministry of the Third Reich, under Joseph Goebbels. He was born on August 17, 1909, and brought up in Berlin. The son of a minor official who died in France during World War I, he was only ten years of age when the Treaty of Versailles was signed—but during his teenage years he developed an intense hatred toward the Weimar Republic; in 1927 he joined the Nazi Party and became a member of the SA. When he was old enough, he became a law student at universities in Heidelberg and Berlin. By 1934 he had earned his PhD at the University of Heidelberg.

In 1932 he became a Nazi Party district speaker and was promptly expelled from the University of Berlin for inciting violence. On April 19, 1933, however, the newly installed National Socialist education minister, Bernhard Rust, overthrew all existing disciplinary actions against students associated with the Nazi Party, enabling Hippler’s return. Hippler then became the district and high school group leader for Berlin-Brandenburg in the National Socialist German Students’ League. On May 22, 1933, following the lead of Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels on May 10, Hippler gave a speech to his fellow students, which precipitated a march from the student house to Opera Square with a collection of banned books that were then publicly burned.

In 1936 Hippler became an assistant to the artist, photographer, and film director Hans Weidemann. In this capacity he worked on the production of newsreels and learned the techniques behind documentary filmmaking. His work was undertaken through the Reich Propaganda Ministry, and with it came a promotion, in 1938, to the rank of SS-Hauptsturmführer (captain). In January 1939 he took over Weidemann’s position, meaning that he now worked directly for the minister, Joseph Goebbels. By August 1939 Hippler had been promoted to head the film department at the ministry. Among his tasks he determined which foreign films would be allowed on German screens and what parts of them would be cut.

He also produced and directed movies. In 1940 Hippler directed Der Feldzug in Poland (The Campaign in Poland), a propaganda film demonstrating the superiority of German arms in the first phase of World War II from September 1939 onward.

His most famous—indeed, infamous—creative work was undoubtedly another feature-length film from 1940, Der Ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew), arguably one of the most offensive antisemitic propaganda movies ever made. The film consists of documentary footage combined with materials filmed shortly after the Nazi occupation of Poland. Hippler shot footage in the Jewish ghettos of Łódź, Warsaw, Kraków, and Lublin, the only footage, as it turned out, shot specifically for the purpose of the film. The rest of the film consisted of stills and archival footage from other feature films—footage that the film presented as if it were additional documentary film. The film itself covered four essential tropes: “degenerate” Jewish life as seen in the Polish ghettos; the nature of Jewish political, cultural, and social values; Jewish religious ceremonies, instruction, worship, and ritual slaughter; and Adolf Hitler as the savior of Germany from the Jewish images that had already been shown.

While the intention of the film was to prepare the German population for the coming Holocaust (even though the Nazis had not themselves yet decided on mass annihilation as the means to destroy Europe's Jews), the movie did not have the desired impact on the German public owing to the fact that a major motion picture, Jud Süß (Veit Harlan, 1940), had already appeared to rapturous acclaim, employing top box-office stars and building on a captivating period drama. By contrast, Der Ewige Jude was a documentary based on limited original footage, still images, and archive film clips. Unlike Jud Süß, therefore, which was a great commercial success, Der Ewige Jude was a failure at the box-office. As a propaganda film, it was shown more for training purposes to troops on the Eastern Front and SS members than it was in cinemas—though a number of foreign-language voiceovers were made and the film was exported to countries occupied by Germany.

Hippler, for his part, was honored by Adolf Hitler, and his career was made. In October 1942 he was appointed director in charge of Reich filmmaking, with responsibility for all control, supervision, and direction of German movies. He now became second only to Goebbels, and by 1943 he was promoted to SS-Obersturmbannführer (lieutenant colonel).

Such a career trajectory, though impressive, generated resentment in some quarters—no less than in Goebbels, his chief. The Reichsminister had long kept a watching brief on Hippler, whom he saw as sometimes impertinent, often immature, disorganized, and too fond of alcohol. In this latter area Goebbels had a point; Hippler indeed suffered from an alcohol addiction, and it was for this that Goebbels finally dismissed him in June 1943. Hippler was stripped of his SS rank, and a trumped-up accusation was brought against him of having denied that he had a Jewish great-grandmother. Hippler was sent to an infantry replacement battalion and underwent mountain infantry training. Released from active duty, he was then given the task of shooting newsreel footage as a cameraman until February 1945. At the end of the war he was arrested by the British as a prisoner of war.

In 1946 he was tried for directing Der Ewige Jude and was sentenced to two years in prison. Staging a comeback after his release, he collaborated on documentary movies under another name. In a 1981 memoir he claimed that Goebbels was the real creator of Der Ewige Jude, having directed large parts of it himself and giving Hippler the credit. Later, he stated that he regretted being listed as the director of the movie because it unfairly resulted in his later treatment after the war. In his opinion he had nothing to do with the killing of Jews and only shot some footage for a film that Goebbels himself then put together. Moreover, he claimed that at the time he had little knowledge of the Nazis' murderous policies toward the Jews and was not aware of the Holocaust as it was taking place. If he was able, he said, he would "annul" everything about the film, which had caused him such personal difficulties in his subsequent life.

Fritz Hippler lived in Berchtesgaden, Bavaria, until his death on May 22, 2002, aged 92.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Goebbels, Joseph; Jud Süß; Propaganda in the Holocaust

Further Reading

Longerich, Peter. Goebbels: A Biography. New York: Random House, 2015.

Moeller, Felix. The Film Minister: Goebbels and the Cinema in the Third Reich. Stuttgart and London: Edition Axel Menges, 2000.

Rentschler, Eric. The Ministry of Illusion: Nazi Cinema and Its Afterlife. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1996.

Historikerstreit

The Historikerstreit, or "historians' quarrel," was an intellectual and political controversy that took place in Germany in the 1980s, centering on the way in which the Holocaust should be interpreted. The "quarrel" ostensibly began on June 6, 1986, when the historian Ernst Nolte published an address in the newspaper Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. Titled "Die Vergangenheit, die nicht vergehen will" ("The Past That Won't Go Away"), it argued that Hitler's mass murder policies in the death camps, based on Nazi conceptions of race, were a response to Stalinist visions of class warfare and mass murder of specific social groups in the Soviet Union. As Nolte saw it, the German people embraced Nazism as a force that would protect them given the threat they faced through Soviet Bolshevism.

Responding in the newspaper Die Zeit, philosopher Jürgen Habermas was scornful of Nolte's argument, asserting that it was a form of whitewashing of Germany's Nazi past and of the Holocaust. This set off a flurry of activity in the German newspapers, particularly in the Letters to the Editor columns, where venomous and often hurtful comments were often expressed by those on both sides of the debate.

In many respects, the debate was an outgrowth of a more extensive, international division that split historians into two factions: the “Functionalists” (sometimes, though less rarely, “Structuralists”), who argued that the Holocaust evolved, somewhat chaotically, as a result of the nature of a Nazi administrative system that was both ideologically determined and placed under pressure as a result of the exigencies of war; and the “Intentionalists,” who held that the Holocaust was preordained by Hitler, who had a plan for the Final Solution that long predated the outbreak of war in 1939.

As a historiographical debate about the origins of the Holocaust, the main issues revolved around two fundamental questions: first, did Hitler possess a master plan for the annihilation of the Jews that could be traced to an earlier time; and second, was the Final Solution ordered directly by Hitler, or did the decision “evolve” over time through the actions of the German bureaucracy and military? A number of historians from around the world participated in the debate on both sides, with prominent Functionalists including Hans Mommsen, his brother Wolfgang, Raul Hilberg, Christopher Browning, Götz Aly, Karl Schleunes, Martin Broszat, and Zygmunt Bauman. Among the leading Intentionalists were Andreas Hillgruber, Karl Dietrich Bracher, Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, Klaus Hildebrand, Eberhard Jäckel, Richard Breitman, and Lucy S. Dawidowicz. Moreover, not all Functionalists or Intentionalists advocated their points equally, with moderates and radicals on both sides.

Generally speaking, the Historikerstreit in Germany spanned the years 1986 to 1989. It centered on four main questions: were the Holocaust and other Nazi-era crimes uniquely evil in history; did German history follow a “special path” (Sonderweg) leading inevitably to Nazism; were other genocides comparable to the Holocaust; and were the crimes perpetrated by the Nazis a reaction to Soviet crimes under Stalin, as Nolte argued in his original article in 1986?

Historians involved with the debate, on both sides of the divide, included such historians (besides Nolte) as Michael Stürmer, Andreas Hillgruber, Hans Mommsen, Hans-Ulrich Wehler, Joachim Fest, Wolfgang Mommsen, Götz Aly, Gerhard Ritter, Martin Broszat, Karl Dietrich Bracher, Klaus Hildebrand, and Eberhard Jäckel. Moreover, the Historikerstreit had decidedly political overtones, to a large degree setting historians of the political right and left against each other in the quest to provide an explanation for Hitler, the Nazis, and the Holocaust.

In an interview in 1997 Hans Mommsen stated that the years following the Historikerstreit had seen something of a convergence between the two positions, though there seemed to have emerged “a divergence between the younger generation and the generation to which I belong, which makes itself felt in the realm of Holocaust research, while the conflict between the Functionalists and the Intentionalists is vanishing.” Given this, Mommsen held that the main issue in the debate was still related to the question as to when the Holocaust was set in motion, but that now it was being asked with more science and less passion.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Browning, Christopher; Friedländer, Saul; “Functionalists”; “Intentionalists”; Mommsen, Hans

Further Reading

Baldwin, Peter. Hitler, the Holocaust and the Historians Dispute. Boston: Beacon Press, 1990.

Berg, Nicolas. The Holocaust and the West German Historians. Historical Interpretation and Autobiographical Memory. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2015.

Evans, Richard. In Hitler's Shadow: West German Historians and the Attempt to Escape the Nazi Past. New York: Pantheon, 1989.

Jarausch, Konrad H. “Removing the Nazi Stain? The Quarrel of the Historians.” German Studies Review 11 (2): 285–301.

Kershaw, Ian. The Nazi Dictatorship: Problems and Perspectives of Interpretations. London: Arnold, 1989.

Maier, Charles. The Unmasterable Past: History, Holocaust and German National Identity. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1988.

Hitler, Adolf

Adolf Hitler was the charismatic leader of Germany who led his nation to bloody ruin. In a failed bid for racial domination, the wars in which his Third Reich engaged led to the deaths of 35 million people. For many people, he remains the personification of evil.

Hitler was born at Braunau-am-Inn, Austria, on April 20, 1889, the son of a German customs clerk and an Austrian peasant woman. An indifferent, sullen student, he dropped out of school to work as an aspiring artist, but twice failed to gain entrance into the Vienna Academy of Fine Arts. The onset of World War I finally gave him an outlet to vent his anger, and he left Austria to enlist in the 16th Bavarian Infantry Regiment. For four years Hitler functioned in the dangerous role as a messenger, along the way receiving four decorations for bravery, including the prestigious Iron Cross, First Class. At one point, he sustained serious injuries in a gas attack and spent several months recuperating. Hitler finally mustered out of the German Army in 1919 with the rank of corporal.

Adolf Hitler was the leader of Germany's Nazi Party and Chancellor, then Führer (Leader) of the Third Reich between 1933 and 1945. In his capacity as German dictator he launched the invasion of Poland in September 1939, precipitating World War II—the deadliest conflict in human history. Arguably the greatest antisemite in history, Hitler was directly responsible for the Holocaust of the European Jews through his racial conception of world affairs and how they were to be ordered into the future. (Photos.com)

The German surrender that ended World War I in November 1918 led to the 1919 Treaty of Versailles, which imposed severe economic penalties as restitution. These penalties occasioned much hardship on the German people and increased their resentment toward the democratic Weimar government for signing such an agreement. Like many disenchanted veterans, Hitler joined the German Workers' Party, which he later helped expand into the National Socialist German Workers' Party, better known as the Nazis. Hitler proved to be a master of oratory and political intrigue, and became intent upon seizing the national political agenda. However, when an attempted coup against the Bavarian government (later known as the Beer Hall Putsch) was crushed by police and military units during November 8–9, 1923, Hitler was sentenced to five years in Landsberg Prison. He only served nine months before a general amnesty was proclaimed, and he used the interval to outline his political philosophy in a book, Mein Kampf (My Struggle). In it, he openly flaunted his antisemitism, as well as Germany's dire necessity for territorial expansion in the east. However, the book was never taken seriously by critics, and its warning signs went unheeded.

The experience of imprisonment garnered Hitler political respectability, and he resolved to overthrow the established Weimar Republic by working within the system. His great eloquence and nationalist fervor, as well as the country's general economic unrest, led to increasing Nazi representation at all levels of government through elections held during the 1920s. Hitler's goals received a tremendous boost during the global depression of 1929, as more and more Germans turned to him for leadership in this national economic crisis. By 1932 the Nazis had become the largest party in the Reichstag, though they never achieved a majority of votes or seats. Hitler's promises of jobs, security, and a resurrected Germany continued to resonate with the electorate, however, and in 1933 he came to power by being appointed chancellor by President Paul von Hindenburg. When Hindenburg died the following year, Hitler combined the offices of chancellor and president to become the "uncontested leader" (Der Führer) of the German nation.

Once in power, Hitler ruthlessly suppressed civil rights, murdered his political opponents within the Nazi Party during the infamous Night of the Long Knives on June 30, 1934, and began to reinvigorate the emaciated German economy. He accomplished an economic revival for the country by expanding the military industrial sector in clear violation of the Versailles Treaty. As a military leader, Hitler some knowledge of military tactics and had a working grasp of military technology. He took a special interest in encouraging fast tanks and airplanes that would eventually form the basis for the extremely mobile "blitzkrieg" warfare of World War II.

As Germany grew stronger militarily, Hitler grew bolder on the international stage. He also routinely disregarded sound military advice from his senior generals, whose perceived timidity he regarded with open contempt. In 1936 he marched troops into the Rhineland, restoring it to Germany, and also formed an alliance with Benito Mussolini's fascist Italy. Two years later, Hitler annexed Austria to Germany. At the Munich Conference of September 1938, Hitler convinced Britain and France to allow him to annex the Sudetenland (an area of western Czechoslovakia containing mostly ethnic Germans). Within six months of the conference, however, he decided to annex the rest of Czechoslovakia, embarrassing Britain and France and making all of Europe increasingly wary of his expansionist ambitions. In August 1939 he then stunned the world by signing a nonaggression pact with Soviet leader Joseph Stalin, which ensured the stability of Germany's vulnerable eastern border. The lack of decisive leadership and resistance to his plans evidenced by the Western democracies did little to discourage Hitler, who by the end of the 1930s was finally ready to gain new territories by force.

In September 1939 German forces attacked Poland. That act precipitated World War II, as Britain and France quickly declared war on Germany in defense of their Polish ally. The newly developed blitzkrieg tactics worked brilliantly, and Poland was crushed in a matter of weeks. Despite the declaration of war, however, France and Britain took no offensive action. Hitler used the hiatus to shift his forces westward, and by June 1940, France had been conquered and British troops chased off the continent at Dunkirk in northern France. Owing to the ineptitude of Luftwaffe commander Hermann Göring, however, Germany lost the Battle of Britain (the German Luftwaffe's attack to weaken Britain before a land invasion by the German Army), and an invasion of Britain had to be postponed—as it turned out, indefinitely.

Hitler instead turned his attention to other parts of Europe. Greece and Yugoslavia were subdued, along with most of North Africa, before Hitler committed his single biggest mistake of the war.

In June 1941, in Operation Barbarossa, German forces launched an all-out offensive against the Soviet Union, in open disregard of the nonaggression pact. Initial Russian casualties were colossal, and the Red Army was driven back deep into Russia's interior. When Hitler refused to allow his men to retreat from Russia for the winter, the Soviets counter-attacked at Moscow, inflicting the first real German defeat on land.

Hitler was so enraged that he sacked most of his leading generals, remained contemptuous of the rest, and appointed himself as commander in chief of the armed forces. For the next four years, Germany waged a losing war in the east against superior numbers of Soviet forces, and in late 1941 Hitler compounded his mistakes by declaring war on the United States after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. As a sign of his growing degeneration, he began relying more on astrology than the opinions of his senior generals when making major decisions.

In addition to waging a war of aggression, Hitler embarked on what was arguably the greatest crime against humanity ever committed. Having espoused the notion of a racially pure (or Aryan) nation, he turned his hatred of Jews into a national policy of mass extermination through creation of numerous death camps. Jews were deported from occupied countries, used as slave labor, and then dispatched in gas chambers when unable to work further. Thus an estimated 6 million Jews perished in Hitler's "Final Solution," also known as the Holocaust.

By 1944 several attempts had been made on Hitler's life, including one by Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, who exploded a bomb at Hitler's East Prussian headquarters. By now the Third Reich's days were clearly numbered, but Hitler embarked on several desperate gambits to stave off defeat. He directed construction of numerous "super weapons," including jet fighters, pilotless bombs, and guided missiles, in a spectacular but futile attempt to turn the tide of the war back to Germany's favor. After surviving the July 1944 assassination attempt, he squandered Germany's final military reserves in the ill-fated Battle of the Bulge in December of that year but failed to defeat the Western Allies. By April 1945 the vengeful Soviet Army had all but surrounded Berlin, and Hitler was a virtual captive in his command bunker. He had always declared that Germany would fight "until five past midnight," but on April 30, 1945, he and his wife of a few hours, his longtime mistress Eva Braun, committed suicide rather than face capture. Thus, the vaunted Third Reich, which the Nazis boasted would last 1,000 years, collapsed in utter ruin after only 12 years.

JOHN C. FREDRIKSEN

See also: Austria; Death Camps; Fascism; Final Solution; Führerprinzip; The Great Dictator; Keitel, Wilhelm; Mein Kampf; National Socialism; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nazism and Germany; Operation Barbarossa; "Racial Hygiene"; Third Reich; World War II

Further Reading

- Bullock, Alan. Hitler: A Study in Tyranny. London: Odhams, 1952.
 Kershaw, Ian. Hitler: A Biography. New York: Norton, 2008.
 Payne, Robert. The Life and Death of Adolf Hitler. New York: Henry Holt, 1973.
 Toland, John. Adolf Hitler. New York: Doubleday, 1976.

Hitler Youth

The Hitler Youth was an organization established by Adolf Hitler to indoctrinate German children into the ideology of the Nazi Party. Young people were a dynamic yet malleable force that Hitler believed could be a powerful influence in propelling forward the Nazi ideology of total German unity.

The Hitler Youth (Hitlerjugend) was the Nazi Party's youth organization. Comprised of boys aged from 14 to 18, between 1933 and 1945 it was the only youth organization permitted in Germany. It was intended that the Hitler Youth would condition boys into a life of sacrifice for the Fatherland, preparing them for military service and blind obedience to the Führer. Its female equivalent was the League of German Girls (Bund Deutscher Mädel). This picture is of a Hitler Youth parade from 1936. (Universal History Archive/Getty Images)

Hitler founded his Hitlerjugend (Hitler Youth) in 1926. After the Nazis took over the government in 1933 and the public schools eventually all taught the principles of Nazism, the Hitler Youth took care of children's spare time. The organization was later run by Baldur von Schirach, who managed all the country's youth programs. By 1935 about 60% of all German boys were members of the Hitler Youth. Membership became compulsory for all "Aryan" German boys on July 1, 1936, when the organization became an official agency of the state.

When a boy turned the age of 10, he registered with the authorities, who investigated his background to determine that he was racially "pure." If he qualified for inclusion, he entered the Deutsches Jungvolk (German Young People). After the boy's 13th birthday, he joined the Hitler Youth with much ceremony that marked a new stage in life. At that age, boys were also asked to make a statement of faith. When a boy reached the age of 18, he became eligible to join the Nazi Party and was henceforth obliged to serve as a public servant or in the military until the age of 21.

Boys in the Hitler Youth were taught all the principles of the Nazi Party, including Aryan superiority and antisemitism. The qualities of dedication, comradeship, and obedience also were encouraged and awarded. A similar group for girls, called the League of German Girls, promoted more feminine Nazi qualities, such as homemaking and motherhood.

The Hitler Youth dissolved after World War II, although there are several neo-Nazi groups that declare themselves the descendants of the organization.

KELLIE SEARLE

See also: League of German Girls; Nazi Book Burning; "Racial Hygiene"; Scholl, Hans and Sophie

Further Reading

- Koch, H. W. The Hitler Youth: Origins and Development 1922–45. London: Macdonald and Jane's, 1975.
- Littlejohn, David. The Hitler Youth. Fredericksburg (VA): Johnson Reference Books, 1988.
- Rempel, Gerhard. Hitler's Children: The Hitler Youth and the SS. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.

Hitler's Willing Executioners

Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust is a controversial book written by Daniel Jonah Goldhagen concerning the genesis and causes of the Holocaust in Germany. Published in 1996, the book is largely a rebuttal of Christopher Browning's 1992 book Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. It stemmed from Goldhagen's doctoral dissertation at Harvard University. Goldhagen had savagely criticized Browning's work since it first appeared in print, claiming that every major premise of it was faulty and declaring it as unhistorical because it downplayed or ignored larger trends and traits in German culture that had given birth to the Holocaust. It is worth noting that Goldhagen is not a historian but rather a political scientist. He is also 15 years younger than Browning, who by 1996 had already published an impressive body of work on Germany and the Holocaust.

Goldhagen asserts that nearly all Germans were, as his title suggests, "willing executioners" and were not accidental killers caught up in the pressure of the moment, as Browning suggests. Germans behaved as they did, Goldhagen argues, because of their unique culture and history, which included what he terms "eliminationist antisemitism." Further, he states that this particularly virulent form of antisemitism was entirely unique to Germany, and that "ordinary" Germans were willing and perhaps even content to kill Jews because it was ingrained in their cultural DNA. The problem with this line of thinking, of course, is that there was virulent antisemitism in other nations before and during World War II, which would seem to argue against it being a uniquely German phenomenon. There were certainly other Europeans who willingly and even happily contributed to the Holocaust. And since World War II, genocides committed by other groups far removed from Germany or Europe have behaved in a similarly abhorrent fashion.

Not surprisingly, Goldhagen's book generated a wide array of reactions, many of them negative. Most historians dismissed the book as being badly flawed, unresponsive to the larger body of work on the subject, too emotional and pedantic, and overly focused on refuting Browning's thesis. Other critics charged that Goldhagen simply ignored decades of past research in order to bolster his own interpretation. One Holocaust scholar wrote that "there simply was no general, murderous, racist antisemitic norm in Germany in the 19th century."

Despite its many critics, Goldhagen's book became quite popular and sparked a lively and important scholarly debate that went on for several years after its publication. There are certainly important and cogent points to be found in Goldhagen's work which, when added to other interpretations and approaches, can help foster a broader and deeper understanding of the Holocaust.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Antisemitism; Browning, Christopher; Einsatzgruppen; Final Solution; "Intentionalists"; "Ordinary Men"; Reserve Police Battalion 101

Further Reading

- Bartov, Omer. Germany's War and the Holocaust: Disputed Histories. Ithaca (NY): Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Bauer, Yehuda. Rethinking the Holocaust. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 2001.
- Goldhagen, Daniel J. Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust. New York: Vintage, 1997.

Hlinka Guard

The Hlinka Guard was a Slovakian militia operating between 1938 and 1945, created by Catholic priest and Slovakian nationalist Andrej Hlinka. It was modeled after the Italian dictator Benito Mussolini's Black Shirts and was controlled by the Hlinka Slovak People's Party (Hlinkova slovenská Ľudová strana), or HSSP. The Hlinka Guard was also responsible for rampant antisemitism in Slovakia, with many of its followers believing that Jews were responsible for the ceding of southern Slovakia to Hungary after World War I.

The Hlinka Guard was officially recognized on October 8, 1938, but the roots of a Slovakian nationalist force can actually be traced as far back as the 1920s with the emergence of the Domobrona (colloquially, People's Defense), which lasted from 1923 to 1927 until it was forced to disband by the Czechoslovakian government. While the Hlinkas were officially created in October 1938, groups wearing the black uniforms could be seen in Slovakia as early as July of that year, when Hitler demanded that Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland regions become incorporated into Nazi Germany's empire as a result of the Munich Agreement.

Given that it was founded by a Catholic priest, the Hlinka Guard saw most of its adherents coming from Slovakian Catholics, particularly at the start. Andrej Hlinka created the guard as a bulwark for Slovakian independence within Czechoslovakia. However, a more radical wing of the HSSP was led by Vojtech Tuka, who had formed the Domobrona back in 1923. His ties to the German National Socialist Party led to its dissolution by the Czechoslovakian government.

Karol Sidor became the Hlinka Guard's first commander following its consolidation at the beginning of October 1938. On October 29, 1938, the Hlinka Guard became the only political group to undergo military training. Many members of the guard trained with SS troops in Germany. While the Hlinka Guard was originally intended as a military police force inside Slovakia, it was also responsible for the constant harassment of the Jewish community. Intended to protect its citizens, the Hlinka Guard was also responsible for balancing against the Czechoslovakian police forces.

Both the Nazis and the Slovaks, particularly the nationalists, wanted to break apart Czechoslovakia; Germany for military alliance purposes, Slovakia for the purpose of achieving independence. When Nazi Germany invaded Bohemia and Moravia in March 1939, the Slovakian government claimed independence, and on March 15, 1938, Alexander Mach became both prime minister of Slovakia and leader of the Hlinka Guard. As a result, the Hlinka Guard became a key collaborator and ally with Germany's Nazi regime all the way through to 1945.

With a new pro-Nazi government in place, the Hlinka Guard was responsible for the looting and confiscation of Jewish properties and the desecration of synagogues and cemeteries. Accounts of the Hlinka Guard describe them as being as violent as the German SS or the Romanian Iron Guard. During the war years, the Hlinka Guard was responsible for helping the Nazis in the deportation of Slovak Jews to Nazi concentration camps such as Auschwitz.

By October 1942 the Hlinka Guard had overseen the deportations of more than 60,000 Slovak Jews to their deaths. A total of 19,000 Jews remained in Slovakia, but only because they had exemption papers. Some 3,500 Jews were removed to labor camps, and only 10,000 avoided deportation because they fled to Hungary.

In August 1944 the Slovak National Uprising, an armed insurrection organized by the Slovak communist partisan resistance movement, sought to overpower the SS and overthrow the collaborationist government of Father Jozef Tiso. The rebels were largely defeated by German forces, and in the aftermath of the uprising the SS took over the Hlinka Guard and began training it for an internal policing function and to range against partisans and Jews. With the end of the war in 1945, the Hlinka Guard was disbanded and many of its members were arrested and tried for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Collaboration; Czechoslovakia; Slovakia; Tiso, Jozef

Further Reading

- Długoborski, Waclaw. The Tragedy of the Jews of Slovakia: 1938–1945: Slovakia and the “Final Solution of the Jewish Question.” Oświęcim: Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum, 2002.
- Jelinek, Yeshayahu A. Storm Troopers in Slovakia: The Rodobrana and the Hlinka Guard. London: Sage Publications, 1971.
- Kliment, Charles K., and Břetislav Nakládal. Germany's First Ally: Armed Forces of the Slovak State, 1939–1945. Atglen (PA): Schiffer, 1997.
- Ward, James Mace. Priest, Politician, Collaborator: Jozef Tiso and the Making of Fascist Slovakia. Ithaca (NY): Cornell University Press, 2013.

HMT Dunera

The Hired Military Transport (HMT) Dunera was a ship sent from Britain to Australia in 1940 for the purpose of removing enemy alien internees (Germans and Italians) from British areas vulnerable to Nazi attack, thereby helping to secure Britain from possible fifth columnist penetration.

A ship displacing 12,615 tons, the Dunera carried a total of 2,732 internees, together with 141 guards and crew. The majority of those on board, though technically enemy aliens by virtue of their nationality as Germans, Austrians, or Czechs, were, in actuality, refugee Jews who had found sanctuary in Britain prior to the outbreak of war on September 3, 1939. The Australian government had agreed to house them and guard them in internment camps (at British expense) but not to permit them to be released in Australia. When the British government realized its mistake, it dispatched an officer, Major Julian David Layton, to Australia to arrange their compensation and repatriation to Britain. Those who did not wish to brave the perils of possible Nazi attack on the high seas could remain in Australia, but they had to stay interned. All the internees were male; many were in their 20s, and some were as young as 16—hence their nickname: the “Dunera Boys,” which remained for the next seven decades, even as they aged.

The Dunera Boys were joined in internment by a second, smaller contingent of internees, Germans and Austrian Jewish refugee families evacuated from Singapore on the Queen Mary in September 1940, in the face of the Japanese threat. Their Australian experience was, in many respects, identical to that of the Dunera Boys, save that they included women and small children. Ultimately, all those opting to stay in Australia were released. Most of the “Boys” joined the Australian Army, in a specially raised unit called the 8th Employment Company. It was this military service that qualified them for permanent residency, then citizenship, at the war’s end.

Although the journey of the Dunera was itself quite shocking—the guards, who had seen some of the hardest fighting around Dunkirk, believed the internees to be Nazi saboteurs and spies, and treated them with such brutality that the Dunera became known as a “floating concentration camp”—once the Dunera Boys arrived in Australia they were able to make new lives for themselves in the new country. Saved from the Nazis twice (first by leaving Germany, then by leaving blitz-ravaged Britain), the Dunera Boys of 1940 became the harbingers of the multicultural Australia that was to receive its kick-start after the war. Many went on to become professors, company founders and directors, judges, senior public servants, and leading members of their professions.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: British Response to the Holocaust

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. with Gabrielle Eisen (Ed.). The Dunera Affair: A Documentary Resource Book. Melbourne: Schwartz and Wilkinson, 1990.

Patkin, Benzion. The Dunera Internees. Sydney: Cassell Australia, 1979.

Pearl, Cyril. The Dunera Scandal: Deported by Mistake. Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1983.

Ho Feng-Shan

Ho Feng-Shan was one of the first diplomats to save Jews by issuing them visas to escape the Holocaust. Between 1938 and 1940 he was responsible for saving thousands of Jews in Nazi-occupied Austria.

He was born into a poor family in rural Yiyang, Hunan province, on September 10, 1901. His father died when he was seven, and his family was assisted by the Norwegian Lutheran Mission, which enrolled him at its mission school. An excellent student, the foundation he received here enabled him to go on to further study—first, at the College of Yale-in-China, after which he was accepted into the University of Munich in 1928. By 1932 he had earned a PhD in political economy, graduating magna cum laude.

In 1935 Ho began his career as a diplomat representing the Republic of China, with an initial posting to Ankara, Turkey. In the spring of 1937 he was placed as first secretary to the Chinese legation in Vienna, but when Nazi Germany invaded Austria in March 1938 and the country became absorbed into the German Reich, the legation was transformed into a consulate. In May 1938 Ho Feng-Shan was appointed to the post of consul-general. The staff comprised Ho and one other officer, who had the title of vice-consul.

Ho found the Vienna posting an ideal location. Fluent in both English and German, he was an active participant in the social scene, often called upon to speak in public about Chinese culture and customs. He developed a wide circle of friends and acquaintances, many of whom, given the groups among whom he was associating, were Jewish.

After the Anschluss, however, Austria’s Jews became subjected in the space of six weeks to all the same antisemitic measures that had befallen German Jewry across the previous five years. Desperate to leave the country, Austria’s Jews began looking for any country that would accept them, at a time when few were prepared to.

The situation then intensified to major crisis proportions after the November pogrom, known as the Kristallnacht, of November 9–10, 1938. Ho was shocked by the nature of Nazi violence and experienced something of the Nazis’ racism himself when he was at one stage held at gunpoint by Nazi thugs searching for Jews. He identified that the Jews of Austria were in extreme danger, and that he could help them to get out.

The government of China was far from convinced that this was a matter requiring Chinese involvement; in fact, China’s leader, Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi), flirted with Germany’s Nazi government throughout the 1930s. He employed German military advisers in his struggle against both the Japanese invaders and the Chinese communists, and purchased large quantities of weapons from Germany.

Against this background, it was perhaps not surprising that he wanted to maintain good relations with Germany and did not oppose Hitler's racial policies. Accordingly, the Chinese ambassador to Berlin, Chen Jie, instructed Ho Feng-Shan in Vienna that he was not to issue visas to Jews.

Ho, however, acting against Chen Jie's explicit orders, began issuing visas for Shanghai. Although he was convinced that most would not actually go there, he knew that possession of such a document was considered sufficient to enable Jews to purchase a ship ticket and leave Austria.

His efforts were assisted by contributions made by American relief organizations, which at that stage were trying desperately to assist Jews to get out. Ho was forced to maintain contact with these organizations covertly, as he had been forbidden from helping Jews.

For continuing to issue visas despite a direct order for him not to do so, a black mark, or "demerit," was entered into Ho's personnel file in 1939. He continued issuing visas, however, until recalled to China in May 1940. It is not known how many visas he actually authorized prior to then. He issued his 200th visa in June 1938 and signed number 1,906 on October 27, 1938. There is solid room for speculation, therefore, that in the ensuing months until his departure from Vienna, many, many more, probably numbering in the thousands, would have been issued.

Ho went on to represent China in a number of diplomatic posts in Egypt, Mexico, Bolivia, and Colombia. In 1949 he chose to remain loyal to the Republic of China rather than recognize the newly victorious People's Republic of China. He retired in 1973 and moved to the United States, settling in San Francisco. Here he became a founding member of the Chinese Lutheran Church and wrote his memoirs, Forty Years of My Diplomatic Life, published in 1990. Explaining his actions in helping the Jews of Austria against the instructions of his own government, he expressed the view that "I thought it only natural to feel compassion and to want to help. From the standpoint of humanity, that is the way it should be."

On August 7, 2000, he was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his courage in issuing Chinese visas to Vienna's Jews. Ho Feng-Shan died at his home in San Francisco, California, on September 28, 1997, aged 96.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Austria; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Feng-Shan, Ho. My Forty Years as a Diplomat. Pittsburgh: Dorrance Publishing, 2010.

Paldiel, Mordecai. Diplomat Heroes of the Holocaust. New York: Yeshiva University/KTAV, 2007.

Yad Vashem. "Chinese Visas in Vienna: Feng-Shan Ho."

Hoess, Rudolf

Rudolf Hoess was the commandant of the Auschwitz concentration camp from 1940 to 1943. Born on November 25, 1900, in Baden-Baden, Germany, he grew up in a strict Roman Catholic household, and his family wanted him to train for the priesthood. During World War I he was eager to join the army but instead joined the Red Cross in 1916 since he was too young to volunteer to fight. He quickly tired of this and lied about his age so he could join the army. He was posted to the Middle Eastern Front and served in Turkey and Palestine. Hoess was wounded twice and was awarded the Iron Cross and other decorations. After the war, he visited the Holy Land, where his faith was shaken by the traffic in holy relics.

Hoess returned to Germany and, as with many of his contemporaries, had no idea of what to do with his life. Like many young veterans, he joined a Freikorps group and found himself fighting Poles and Lithuanians in the Baltic lands. Hoess was completely at home in the right-wing militaristic milieu in which the Freikorps operated. He was rabidly conservative, racist, and extremely nationalistic. He joined the National Socialist German Workers' Party, the Nazis, in 1922 and plunged into street fighting against communists and "traitors." In June 1923 he was arrested for beating a man to death for turning a "patriot" over to the French for crimes committed during the Ruhr occupation. He was sentenced to prison for 10 years and remained in prison until July 1928.

Hoess married Hedwig Hensel in 1929 and ultimately had five children (they later lived at Auschwitz with him). He emerged from prison a hero to right-wing nationalists but retired to private life and turned away from active politics until Heinrich Himmler asked him to join the SS in 1934. Hoess's life changed forever when he agreed.

Hoess's first job in the SS was as a noncommissioned officer among the guards at Dachau concentration camp. He was a model guard and worked his way up the ranks. In August 1938 he was transferred to the concentration camp at Sachsenhausen and was made commandant in December 1939. Hoess paid such close attention to detail and was

Rudolf Hoess (also spelled Höss) was commandant of Auschwitz extermination camp in World War II. In this capacity, he was most directly responsible for carrying out Hitler's plan for the "Final Solution" of the Jews, that is, the systematic extermination of the Jewish population of Nazi-occupied Europe. It was Hoess who introduced Zyklon-B into the killing process, in so doing making Auschwitz the largest murder site in the history of the world. After the war he was captured, tried in Warsaw, and sentenced to hang for crimes against humanity. This image shows him at Fürth Airport in Germany, on his way to Warsaw for trial. (AP Photo) capable of such concentrated work that when Himmler decided to create a new camp at Auschwitz, Poland, in April 1940, he appointed Hoess as its first commandant.

There were already a few shabby buildings at the site when he arrived, but Hoess built Auschwitz into a large, efficient killing machine. In October 1941 he cleared a huge area around Auschwitz and built a second camp, Auschwitz II, called Birkenau, which became Auschwitz's killing center. Hoess built a third camp, Auschwitz III, or Monowitz, in May 1942 to provide slave labor for German chemical firm I.G. Farben's synthetic rubber works. By 1943 Auschwitz was an enormous complex that at its height housed about 100,000 prisoners. It is estimated that 2.5 million people died in Auschwitz—mostly Jews, but also Roma, Russian prisoners of war, and many other nationalities and ethnic groups.

Hoess was intimately involved in selecting the best methods for killing large numbers of people. He participated in experiments in which a truck's exhaust fumes were piped back into a sealed cabin to asphyxiate those trapped inside. When it was decided that trucks took too long to kill large numbers of people, Hoess helped with the implementation of the gas chambers. Ultimately, he found a fumigation poison, Zyklon-B, which could kill faster and more thoroughly than exhaust fumes. Hoess was efficient at administrative details and keeping to a strict schedule. This clerk-like adherence to routinely horrific matters ingratiated him with Himmler, who also had the mentality of a clerk.

In December 1943 Hoess was rewarded for his work at Auschwitz with a promotion to chief inspector of all concentration camps. He traveled all over Germany inspecting and improving the function of the Nazi camps, whether death or slave labor camps. As the German armies retreated across Europe he then began to arrange for the dismantling of some of the camps.

When Germany surrendered in May 1945, Hoess knew he was a wanted man and went into hiding. The Allies actively looked for him, and in March 1946 he was discovered and arrested. He was a witness at the trial of the major war criminals at Nuremberg and then was turned over to the Polish government, who demanded his extradition. He was tried for murder and various war crimes and was found guilty. Hoess never denied what he did, but—like most Nazis on trial—claimed simply to have been following orders and was therefore blameless. He was taken to Auschwitz, the scene of so many of his crimes, and hanged on April 15, 1947.

LEE BAKER

See also: Auschwitz; Birkenau; Gas Chambers; Mann, Francis; Monowitz; Sachsenhausen

Further Reading

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.

Harding, Thomas. Hans and Rudolf: The True Story of the German Jew Who Tracked Down and Caught the Commandant of Auschwitz. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2013.

Hoess, Rudolf. Commandant of Auschwitz: The Autobiography of Rudolf Hoess. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1959.

Hollerith Machine

An electric machine that employed punch cards to tabulate and compile statistics and other information. Pioneered by the U.S.-based International Business Machines (IBM) Company, the Hollerith machine was named for the German Hollerith Machine Company, which manufactured the machines in Germany during the period 1922–1945. The punch cards that were fed into the machines were made of stiff paper that had hundreds of small holes in each one; the number and position of the holes were read by the machine and represented specific digital information. The cards themselves were made by IBM and were sold to the Hollerith Company. It is estimated that IBM supplied as many as 1 billion punch cards per year to the Germans. The machines, which were precursors to modern computers, were used to tabulate German census figures and a wide variety of other government statistics. Some were used to track Jews and others. The Hollerith machine thus played an important role in Nazi racial policies and the Holocaust.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: “Racial Hygiene”

Further Reading

Black, Edwin. IBM and the Holocaust: The Strategic Alliance between Nazi Germany and America’s Most Powerful Corporation. New York: Crown, 2001.

Holocaust

The Holocaust is the term in English most closely identified with the attempt by Germany’s National Socialist regime, together with its European allies, to exterminate the Jews of Europe during World War II—particularly during its most destructive phase between 1941 and 1944. While an exact number of those murdered is impossible to determine, the best estimates settle on a figure of around 6 million Jews, 1 million of whom were children under the age of 12 and half a million of whom were aged between 12 and 18.

While the term “Holocaust” has entered common parlance to describe the event, two other terms are also employed, particularly within the Jewish world. The Hebrew word Churban, or “catastrophe,” which historically has been employed to describe the destruction of the two temples in Jerusalem, is one of these; the other, utilized increasingly by Jews, is the Hebrew term Shoah (“calamity,” or, sometimes, “destruction”).

The first step on the road to the Holocaust can be said to have taken place on the night of February 27, 1933, when the Reichstag building in Berlin, the home of the German parliament, was burned in a fire. The day after the fire, on the pretext that it had been set by communists and that a left-wing revolution was imminent, newly appointed chancellor Adolf Hitler persuaded President Paul von Hindenburg to sign a Decree for the Protection of the People and the State, suspending all the basic civil and individual liberties guaranteed under the constitution. It empowered the government to take such steps as were necessary to ensure that the current threat to German society was removed. In a mass crackdown, hundreds were detained in the first few days, and tens of thousands in succeeding weeks.

Then, on March 20, 1933, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler announced the establishment of the first compound for political prisoners, about 15 kilometers northwest of Munich, on the outskirts of the town of Dachau. Other camps soon followed, among them Oranienburg, Papenburg, Esterwegen, Kemna, Lichtenburg, and Borgermoor. These camps were originally places of political imprisonment. In their most basic sense they removed political opposition from the midst of the community and intimidated the population into accepting the Nazi regime.

Previously, Jews had often been arrested for transgressing within the framework of the existing political classifications, but from 1935 onward they were frequently victimized for their Jewishness alone. This was due largely to the effects of the so-called Nuremberg Laws on Citizenship and Race. According to these laws, the formal status of Jews in the Nazi state was defined and put into practice. Jewish businesses were boycotted, Jewish doctors excluded from public hospitals and only permitted to practice on other Jews, Jewish judicial figures were dismissed and disbarred, and Jewish students were expelled from universities. Jews were increasingly excluded from participation in all forms of German life. The Nuremberg Laws also withdrew from Jews the privilege of German citizenship. It became illegal for a Jew and a non-Jew to marry or engage in sexual relationships. Life was to be made so intolerable for Jews that they would seek to emigrate; those who did not often found themselves arbitrarily arrested and sent to concentration camps. These arrests did not become widespread until 1938, and in most cases the victims were only held for a short time. The emphasis was to terrorize them into leaving the country.

The first large-scale arrests of Jews were made after November 9, 1938, as “reprisals” for the assassination of consular official Ernst vom Rath by Jewish student Herschel Grynszpan in Paris. The event precipitating these arrests has gone down in history as Kristallnacht, the “Night of Broken Glass.” The resultant pogrom was thus portrayed as a righteous and spontaneous outpouring of anger by ordinary German people against all Jews, even though for the most part it was Nazis in plainclothes who whipped up most of the action in the streets. The pogrom resulted in greater concentrated destruction than any previous anti-Jewish measure under the Nazis and spelled out to those Jews who had up to now thought the regime was a passing phenomenon that this was not the case.

Henceforth, Jews were targeted for the sole reason of their Jewishness. Prior to the Kristallnacht, Nazi persecution of Jews was not premised on acts of wanton destruction or murder; the November pogrom, however, had the effect of transforming earlier legislative measures against Jews into physical harassment on a broader and more indiscriminate scale. From now on, physical acts of an antisemitic nature became state policy. At the same time that Germany’s Jews began frantically seeking havens to which they could emigrate in order to save their lives, however, the Western world began to close its doors to Jewish immigration. And, with Hitler’s foreign policy appetite growing and new areas becoming annexed to the Third Reich, the number of Jews coming under Nazi control increased to less manageable proportions.

The outbreak of war on September 1, 1939, saw the establishment of a system of ghettos in occupied Poland from October 1939 onward, in order to confine Poland’s Jewish population. Here, they were persecuted and terrorized, starved and deprived of all medical care. From the summer of 1942 onward, the ghettos began to be liquidated, with the Jews sent to one of six death camps located throughout Poland.

Prior to this, mobile killing squads known as Einsatzgruppen (“Special Action Groups”), accompanying the German military during the Nazi assault on the Soviet Union beginning in June 1941, had been at work murdering all Jews found within their areas of domination and control. The initial means by which they operated was to round up their captive Jewish populations—men, women, and children—take them outside of village and town areas, forcing the victims themselves to dig their own mass graves, and then shooting them to death. When the repetition of that activity proved psychologically troublesome, mobile gas vans using carbon monoxide poisoning were brought in both to remove the intimacy of contact and to sanitize the process. While technologically at times quite inefficient, from an economic perspective it was cost-effective regarding the use of both men and material.

It is estimated that between 1941 and 1943 the Einsatzgruppen were responsible for the deaths of more than 1 million Jews. It is not known precisely when the decision to exterminate the Jews of Europe was made, though best estimates settle on sometime in the early fall of 1941. At a conference held at Wannsee, Berlin, on January 20, 1942, the process was systematized and coordinated among Nazi Germany’s relevant government departments, and in the months following a number of camps were established in Poland by the Nazis for the express purpose of killing large numbers of Jews. These six camps—Auschwitz-Birkenau, Belzec, Chełmno, Majdanek, Sobibór, and Treblinka—were a departure from anything previously visualized, in both their design and character. With the exception only of Auschwitz, these camps were different from all others in that they did not perform any of the functions—political, industrial, agricultural, or penal—attributed to those farther west or north. These were the Vernichtungslager, the death (or extermination) camps.

The death camps were institutions designed to methodically and efficiently murder millions of people, specifically Jews. These mass murders took place in specially designed gas chambers, employing either carbon monoxide from diesel engines (either in fixed installations or from mobile vans), or crystallized hydrogen cyanide (known as Zyklon-B), which on contact with air oxidized to become hydrocyanic (or prussic) acid gas.

As the Nazi armies on the Eastern Front began to retreat before the advancing Soviet forces (and later from American and British troops in the west), renewed efforts were made at annihilating Jews while there was still time. Then, in March 1944, a shock of cataclysmic proportions fell upon the Jews of Hungary, the last great center of Jewish population still untouched by the Holocaust. Some 400,000 Jews were murdered in the space of four months, with the killing facilities working nonstop, day and night. This was the fastest killing operation of any of the Nazi campaigns against Jewish populations in occupied Europe.

When viewing this campaign and the means employed to attain it, one reservation must be made: Belzec, Treblinka, Sobibór, and Chelmno had by this time already been evacuated. Only Auschwitz remained to carry out the massive undertaking during the spring of 1944, as April had already seen the start of the evacuation of Majdanek. With the Soviet armies continuing their advance toward Germany throughout the latter half of 1944, the position of Auschwitz itself seemed uncertain, and the complete evacuation of the complex was ordered for January 17, 1945. The earliest date of free contact with Soviet forces was January 22, 1945; when the site was formally occupied two days later, there were only 2,819 survivors left.

Any prisoners still alive in the eastern camps at the end of the war were evacuated by the Nazis so as not to fall into the hands of the advancing Russians. These evacuations have properly been called death marches, as vast numbers of prisoners died or were killed while en route. Evidence that the Nazis tried to keep their prisoners alive is scant; any prisoners who did not make it to their final destination were treated with the same contempt as they would have been had they remained in the camp. Evacuated in the winter and early spring of 1944–1945, they had to contend with bitter cold, fatigue, hunger, and the SS guards, as well as their own debilitated condition, and for those who had already reached the limit of their endurance the death marches could have only one result. For others, the experience represented yet another challenge that had to be overcome. Often, the Russians were so close while the prisoners were marching away that the sounds of battle could be clearly distinguished, further adding to their distress. When they arrived at their new destination their trials were hardly eased, as they faced massive overcrowding in the camps to which they had been evacuated.

The prisoners, dropped into places like Bergen-Belsen to await liberation through death or an Allied victory, had little time to wait in real terms, though each day dragged by unendingly. Painfully slowly, as German units both west and east surrendered, the camps were liberated. On April 12, 1945, Westerbork was set free. The day before, Buchenwald's inmates rebelled against their SS guards and took over the camp, handing it to the Americans on April 13. Belsen was liberated by the British Army on April 15, and on April 23 the SS transferred Mauthausen to the International Committee of the Red Cross. The next day Dachau was overrun by the U.S. Army. Five days later, on April 29, Ravensbrück was liberated. Theresienstadt was handed over to the Red Cross by the Nazis on May 2, and on May 8 American troops occupied Mauthausen—the last major camp to be liberated in the west.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Churban; Final Solution; Genocide; Holocaust; Shoah; Third Reich; Total War and the Holocaust

Further Reading

- Arad, Yitzhak, Yisrael Gutman, and Abraham Margalio (Eds.). Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews of Germany and Austria, Poland and the Soviet Union, 1981.
- Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.
- Gutman, Israel (Ed.). Encyclopedia of the Holocaust. 4 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1990.
- Marrus, Michael R. (Ed.). The Nazi Holocaust: Historical Articles on the Destruction of European Jews. 9 vols. Westport (CT): Meckler, 1989.

Holocaust

Holocaust was a television miniseries written by author Gerald Green that first aired on the NBC network during April 16–19, 1978. Later that same year, Green published a novel with the same title, which was a longer and more detailed story of the one told in the television program. The miniseries and novel examined the Holocaust by employing fictional stories about the German-Jewish Weiss family, which is forced to endure the horrors of the Holocaust, and the Dorf family, led by Erik Dorf, a Berlin attorney whose wife encourages him to join the German SS to advance his flagging career. Dorf soon finds himself in charge of extermination operations at a concentration camp. Initially, he is tormented by his role in mass killings, but as the story progresses, he gradually loses his moral compass and becomes a willing accessory to the Holocaust.

The head of the Weiss family, Josef, a respected physician, is deported to Poland because he is alleged to be a foreign citizen. He soon becomes a leader in the Warsaw Ghetto, but is sent to the Auschwitz death camp, along with his wife and several other family members, where they are eventually killed in the gas chambers. Other family members endure similar fates, although some manage to escape the death camps. In the end, only a few family members survive. Dorf, meanwhile, is captured by U.S. troops at the end of the war in 1945 and is slated for trial as a war criminal. He ultimately commits suicide by swallowing a cyanide capsule.

The Holocaust miniseries was critically acclaimed and won an Emmy Award in 1978. Its cast included Meryl Streep, Michael Moriarty, James Woods, and Sam Wannamaker. A few critics, however, claimed that the show trivialized the Holocaust. The novel Holocaust was also well received, and Green was awarded the Dag Hammarskjöld International Peace Prize in 1979 for his effort.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Auschwitz; Holocaust; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Flanzbaum, Hilene (Ed.). The Americanization of the Holocaust.

Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999

Green, Gerald. Holocaust: The Story of the Family Weiss. New York: Bantam Books, 1981.

Rosenfeld, Alvin H. The End of the Holocaust. Bloomington:

Indiana University Press, 2011

Holocaust and Genocide Studies

A leading academic journal, published by Oxford University Press on behalf of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, that focuses on genocide and the Holocaust. The current editor of Holocaust and Genocide Studies is Richard D. Breitman, a professor of modern German history at the American University in Washington, D.C. The editorial and advisory boards include distinguished scholars from both the United States and internationally. The journal is peer-reviewed and began publication in 1986. Over the years, its publication schedule has varied, but currently it is published three times per year (spring, summer, and winter).

Each issue features several in-depth scholarly articles on the Holocaust or other genocides, as well as interpretative essays and book reviews covering recent publications in the humanities and social sciences. Holocaust and Genocide Studies has traditionally served as the principal journal in which scholars have used the Holocaust as a basis upon which to examine other genocides in human history. The publication instructs readers to examine multiple facets of human behavior, to probe moral issues and dilemmas, to study the interplay of technology and human behavior, and to reexamine the role social and political factors have played in the Holocaust and other genocides.

Holocaust and Genocide Studies is indexed and abstracted by a number of services, including America: History and Life; Arts and Humanities Citation Index; Historical Abstracts; Index to Jewish Periodicals; Sociological Abstracts; and Violence and Abuse Abstracts, among several others.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Bauer, Yehuda; United States Holocaust Memorial Museum

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.

Facing History and Ourselves. Elements of Time: Holocaust Testimonies. Brookline (MA): Facing History and Ourselves, 2012.

Holocaust by Bullets

The phrase “Holocaust by bullets” describes a phase of the Final Solution that preceded the industrialized mass murder of the extermination camps. It is also the title of a book that has explored and brought to the world’s attention this deadly aspect of the Nazi effort to make Europe Judenfrei (free of Jews).

The murder of millions of innocents—primarily Jews—through the phenomenon of the Nazi extermination camps is correctly seen as one of the distinguishing characteristics of the Holocaust. The extent of the industrialization of the killing process, such that the sole product of these factories was corpses, is well documented. That Auschwitz is often regarded as the symbol of all that was evil in the Nazi regime is an indication of how closely the Final Solution is associated with the gas chambers and crematoria of the extermination camps.

This, however, was not the method of mass killing first used against the Jews of Europe, which came, rather, in the form of mass murder by shooting. The use of mobile killing units (Einsatzgruppen), though less efficient than the gassing of thousands of victims at a time, was nonetheless sufficiently deadly that it claimed the lives of perhaps 1.5 million Jews, primarily during the years of 1941 and 1942. The killing units followed behind the German army as it successfully pushed east through Poland and into western Russia, areas that held as many as 5 million Jews. The sole purpose of these killing units was to kill communists and Jews, groups that were conflated in the Nazi Weltanschauung (worldview) as “Judeo-Bolsheviks.”

Unlike the distance—physical and psychological—that the industrial method of killing of the extermination camp allowed between the killer and the victim, the method of shooting the victim was extraordinarily intimate. The victims—Jewish men, women and children—were brought by carts or trucks to a location where a very long and deep trench had been dug (often by an earlier group of victims). The trench was kept out of sight of the victims when they were ordered to strip off all of their clothes. Then, in groups as small as five or six, or as large as twenty-five or more, they were brought naked to the pit. Sometimes they were forced to lie face down on top of the victims who preceded them, and were shot by their killers who stood on the bank of the pit. More often, the victims were lined up on the bank of the trench and were shot by the killers, standing behind them, in the nape of the back of the neck immediately below the skull.

The victims fell into the pit, on top of the previous victims, presumably killed by the shot. That was not always the case, however, as some were not yet dead. A few were not shot at all, but somehow fell into the pit an instant before the shot was fired. One reason for these errant shots was the unlimited amounts of alcohol provided to the shooters. These victims almost always died of their wounds or by suffocation as other bodies piled up on top of them, and when dirt was piled on top of the pit to bury the bodies. A few of the victims—a very few—managed to survive long enough to wait until the day’s killing was finished and the shooters left the shooting site. Of those, still fewer were able to crawl their way out of the pit and escape.

This was the phase of the Final Solution that has been called the “Holocaust by bullets.” The phrase has become well entrenched in Holocaust terminology primarily because of a book, written by Father Patrick Desbois and published in 2008, titled The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest’s Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews. Desbois, born in Chalon-sur-Saône, France, in 1955, is a Roman Catholic priest who undertook an extensive on-site study of World War II’s killing fields where the “Holocaust by bullets” took place in Ukraine. His contributions to the scholarship of the mass shootings in this part of occupied Europe include not only locating the thousands of murder trenches scattered throughout the countryside but also talking with and recording the eyewitness accounts of the non-Jews, most of them Ukrainian peasants, who witnessed these mass shootings because they lived in or near the villages and surrounding forests in which the shootings occurred.

One of the most significant insights of Desbois’s research was the extent to which thousands of people, many of them children, simply because they lived in the immediate proximity of the shooting, were “requisitioned”—at threat to their own lives—to play one of many roles that were critical for the efficient completion of the killing event. According to Desbois, the “requisitioned” were forced to dig the pits; give food to the shooters; extract gold teeth from the Jewish victims, sometimes before they were killed, and sometimes after they were shot and lying in the pits; provide material—lime, sand—to cover the bodies; transport the victims to the killing site; and help to dig up the bodies from the pits once it was decided that they were to be burned in order to eliminate the evidence of what had taken place there. These were only some of the tasks required of those who were “requisitioned” that contributed to the killing process. Desbois was astonished by the large number of people who were forced to perform these tasks—thousands in all—and by their presence at every mass shooting that took place, which spoke to the critical nature of the tasks they performed.

Further, in describing and documenting their role, Desbois created a new category of person who experienced the Holocaust, one who was not fully a perpetrator, a victim, or a bystander. The category of “requisitioned” blurs the line between bystander and perpetrator, because they were bystanders who also performed tasks necessary for the perpetrators to do their work. In addition, the category of “requisitioned” blurs the line between perpetrator and victim, because they participated in the killing process but they also were victimized. Their recorded accounts include many of the elements of victims’ memoirs: the terror, the total lack of power over what was happening to them, the suffering they experienced at the hands of the killers, and the often deeply conflicted sense of guilt and morality that they felt as survivors. Desbois's account of a young girl whose job it was to tamp down the layer of dirt thrown over each layer of victims, and to do this in bare feet, reveals someone who committed acts that assisted the perpetrators and who was also a victim of the perpetrators.

One other thing that Desbois's research confirmed is that for three days after a mass shooting that was a part of the "Holocaust by bullets," the earth over the trench moved. This observation was almost universal in the accounts of the requisitioned.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Babi Yar Massacre; Collaboration; Einsatzgruppen; Trawniki Men

Further Reading

Brandon, Ray, and Wendy Lower (Eds.). The Shoah in Ukraine: History, Testimony, Memorialization. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2008.

Browning, Christopher. Ordinary Men: Reserved Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. New York: Harper, 1998.

Desbois, Patrick. The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest's Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2008.

Homosexuals

Homosexuals have been persecuted in many countries and time periods over the course of history. It is perhaps not surprising then that in the hate-filled environment of Nazi Germany, homosexuals, particularly gay men, were targeted for arrest, incarceration, and sometimes murder. The Nazis were neither first nor last to persecute homosexuals, though the severity of persecution during the Nazi era was particularly severe within the context of modern European history.

When Germany united in 1871, the German Constitution criminalized male homosexuality in Paragraph 175. In terms of the behavior it proscribed, this part of the German Constitution was very much like laws in other European countries and the penalties assigned to men caught engaging in homosexual acts were limited primarily to incarceration for a short period of time. In Germany during the interwar period, the law prohibiting homosexuality was rarely enforced. In fact, a thriving gay and lesbian culture flourished in a number of German cities, particularly Berlin. Most Germans, however, especially those who lived in rural areas, viewed homosexuality and urban culture in general as objectionable and "un-German."

When the Nazis came to power in 1933, they immediately began to enforce homosexuality laws, despite the fact that some Nazis were gay. Lesbian and gay culture in the cities ceased quickly as bars and social clubs were raided, gay men arrested and thrown in concentration camps, and homosexuals of all socioeconomic classes harassed and followed. In addition, the Nazis rewrote Paragraph 175. It became a stricter and more punishing law; more behaviors were criminalized and the severity of punishment increased. Gay men could be incarcerated for years.

Thousands of gay men were arrested and sent to jails or concentration camps. Others were put in mental institutions. Still others were forcibly sterilized. The goal of these punishments was either to prevent men from having sex or to educate them to have the "right" kind of sex—heterosexual sex. Nazi racism sought to achieve two goals: increase the number of "Aryans" (whom they believed to be the master race) and decrease the number of people of other races. This meant that all German men and women whom the Nazis perceived as "Aryan" were encouraged to have large numbers of children. The Nazis targeted gay men in part because they were not fathering children. By incarcerating them, they argued, they could reeducate gay men to be heterosexual, to marry, and to reproduce.

Gay men's experiences in jails and camps, however, did not cause them to become heterosexual. In fact, the idea of reeducation quickly became a practice of punishment, and gay men suffered terribly. Sadly, they were targeted for violence not only by Nazi camp guards but also by fellow prisoners, many of whom viewed homosexuality as immoral or simply wrong. Gay men, marked with a pink triangle in concentration camps, were beaten, abused, and murdered. Nevertheless, the Nazis did not aim to kill every gay man they incarcerated—that goal was reserved for Jews.

The Nazis actively targeted gay men for persecution. They less actively pursued lesbians, whose sexuality they considered only a minor threat to Aryan racial proliferation. Nevertheless, the lesbian community as a whole and individual lesbians experienced tremendous repression under the Nazi regime. Gay culture, including lesbian culture, went completely underground. Many lesbians hid their identity by marrying men or pretending they were not lesbian. Some lesbians were arrested and put in jails or concentration camps, where they were marked with a black triangle (anti-social) or forced to work in brothels. This was, however, a rare occurrence.

Gay men in particular and gay culture generally suffered under the Nazi regime and persecution continued until the end of the war in May 1945. Gay men who had been victims of the Nazis found themselves in a unique position after the war. In many European countries, homosexuality remained criminal and widely stigmatized until the 1980s. Any effort to receive compensation or reparation from Germany could result in loss of a job, family, or even incarceration. It took a number of years for gay men to receive attention as victims of Nazi persecution.

SARAH CUSHMAN

See also: Beck, Gad; Concentration Camps; “Racial Hygiene”; Sachsenhausen; Sterilization; Wiedergutmachung

Further Reading

Grau, Gunther, and Claudia Schoppman. The Hidden Holocaust?

Gay and Lesbian Persecution in Nazi Germany, 1933–1945.

Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1995.

Plant, Richard. The Pink Triangle: The Nazi War against Homosexuals. New York: Henry Holt, 1986.

Höppner, Rolf-Heinz

Rolf-Heinz Höppner was a German lawyer and Obersturmbannführer in the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), responsible for the deportation of Jews and Poles and the settlement of ethnic Germans in the German-occupied area of Poland known as the Wartheland. As a result of a series of memoranda from Höppner to his superior officer, Adolf Eichmann, commencing on July 16, 1941, the Nazi murder program moved to a new level, which brought about indiscriminate mass death by gassing.

Höppner was born on February 24, 1910, in Siegmarschönau, Saxony. He studied law at the University of Leipzig, passing both state examinations. As early as 1931 Höppner was a member of the National Socialist Party and the SS. Initially he undertook voluntary press work with the Sicherheitsdienst (SD) and in early 1934 was hired by the SD as a speaker. He was then involved in personnel and organizational issues, rising to become head of the Central Resettlement Office in Poznan (West Prussia), a position he held until June 1944.

As head of Resettlement, Höppner was responsible for the “resettlement of foreign Nationals,” namely the deportation of Jews and Poles to the Generalgouvernement and the settlement of ethnic Germans in Wartheland. In that capacity, on July 16, 1941, Höppner, now one of the leading officers on the General Staff of the police and the SS in the Warthegau, wrote a now notorious memorandum to Adolf Eichmann. In this he summarized a number of meetings that had been held in the local governor’s office in Poznan to solve the Jewish question in the Reich. Höppner noted that some of the solutions that were suggested might sometimes sound bizarre but that nonetheless they would, in his view, perform well.

One proposal suggested that in place of ghettos such as Łódź, all 300,000 Jews should be concentrated into a massive camp, built in barrack form, where the inmates would perform slave labor. This establishment could be supervised by a much smaller police presence, and able-bodied Jews could be pulled out as required and used for work. Höppner suggested that all Jewish women of childbearing age should be sterilized, so that “the Jewish problem is completely liquidated with this generation.”

Apparently Höppner was aware that such a huge prison system could not be built within a few months. He therefore added a further point, which extended the application of Nazi policy: “The Jews are at risk this winter of starving. It should seriously be considered whether the most humane solution would be to liquidate the Jews unfit for work by any quick acting means. In any case, it would be more pleasant than letting them starve.” It is noted that this liquidation was directed to Jews who were “not fit to work” rather than in relation to “all Jews.”

Five weeks after Höppner’s memorandum, other Nazi policies intruded. The so-called “euthanasia campaign,” known as Aktion T-4, had to be interrupted following the emergence of rumors and criticism from the Catholic Church in Germany regarding the murder of those with physical and psychological handicaps. Although a coincidence, it made Höppner’s ideas appear feasible.

On September 3, 1941, Höppner sent a long memorandum to Eichmann expressing his concern that with the expansion of the German Reich a number of racially undesirable groups would have to be deported on a large scale. He proposed that vast areas of the Soviet Union could be used for this purpose after the war. There were 11 million Jews in Europe, but the overall population of “non-Germanizable” Europeans was many times larger than that. Höppner raised the question of whether such “undesirable people” from the conquered parts should be assured of a “certain continuous life,” or whether they should be completely eradicated. In this regard, he returned to the “fact-acting agent” to which he referred in his memorandum of July 16, 1941.

As it turned out, such a “fast-acting agent” already existed—namely, murder by carbon monoxide gas from steel cylinders. This had already begun under Herbert Lange in 1939 in the Wartheland as part of Aktion T-4, and it was expanded considerably from the summer of 1941 onward. On December 8, 1941, members of the SS-Sonderkommando

Kulmhof began the systematic gassing of tens of thousands of Jews in Chelmno. Just before this, on November 1, 1941, construction work began at the Belzec extermination camp, followed by two more camps at Sobibór and Treblinka. The “fast-acting agent” suggested by Höppner now took on a life of its own, and saw the ultimate realization of the Holocaust.

On June 21, 1944, Höppner was promoted to Obersturmbannführer and was called to the Reich Security Main Office in Berlin in July 1944 to head up the legal system in Office Group III A.

Höppner was arrested in July 1945 near Flensburg, Schleswig-Holstein. He appeared as a defense witness in the Nuremberg Trial of the Major War Criminals, which examined the responsibility of the Reich Security Main Office for the murders of the Einsatzgruppen.

In 1947 Höppner was delivered to Poland for trial and was sentenced on March 15, 1949, to life imprisonment. He was released on December 12, 1956, as part of a Polish major amnesty and went to live in the Federal Republic of Germany, where he worked as a senior civil servant in the Housing Ministry. Unmolested, he died on October 23, 1998, in a nursing home in Bad Godesberg.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Euthanasia Program; Final Solution; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Sicherheitsdienst

Further Reading

Aly, Götz. “Final Solution:” Nazi Population Policy and the Murder of the European Jews. London: Arnold, 1999.

Carruthers, Bob (Ed.). The Gestapo on Trial: Evidence from Nuremberg. Barnsley (UK): Pen & Sword, 2014.

Mazower, Mark. Hitler’s Empire: How the Nazis Ruled Europe. New York: Penguin, 2008.

Horthy, Miklós

Miklós Horthy was Hungarian regent from 1920 until his abdication in 1944. He rose from midshipman in the Adriatic fleet to become the most important leader in World War I Hungary through the nationalism, antisemitism, and anticommunism that made him a controversial figure in Hungarian history. Yet during World War II, he acted as a balance to more radical elements in Hungarian politics. His policies of pragmatic neutrality saved Hungarian lives and Hungary itself from much of the destruction of World War II.

Horthy was born on June 18, 1868, in the small village of Kenderes, about 70 miles east of Budapest. His family came from the middle ranks of the landowning nobility, and his Calvinist father and Roman Catholic mother raised him as a Protestant. He spent his early years at boarding schools in Debrecen and Sopron, where he learned French and German. When his brother Béla was killed in a freak accident at the naval academy, Horthy was allowed to take his place. There, the 14-year-old learned Croatian and Italian, required for all naval officers. He showed excellent physical agility and mechanical aptitude. He was commissioned in 1886 and in 1904, while at port in the Adriatic, was tutored in English by the then unknown writer James Joyce. He served as aide-de-camp to Emperor Franz Joseph from 1909 to 1914, and his language abilities came in handy as he greeted and socialized with visiting dignitaries.

Horthy was deeply suspicious of social experimentation and democracy and demonstrated conservative approval of religion and authoritarian government. He was thus an excellent aide for the imperial court but faced trying times as the Austro-Hungarian Empire faced defeat and dismemberment in World War I. Horthy himself received commendation for his service in the Adriatic Sea during World War I, where he was wounded during the Battle of Otranto. He returned to active duty in February 1918 and received a promotion to rear admiral to reward him for the stern measures he used to restore discipline among his war-weary men. In late October, when Emperor Karl announced that an armistice would be declared, Horthy was ordered to hand the Adriatic fleet over to the new Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, later to become the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. Horthy viewed this event as a “crushing blow. . . . It was calamitous to relinquish our glorious undefeated fleet without a fight. No enemy lurked outside the harbour, the Adriatic was empty.”

Horthy saw the outbreak of civil war in Hungary in November 1918 as a “Jewish conspiracy,” ignoring the many issues that separated the conservative leaders who hoped to maintain the prewar social structure of Hungary and the leftist groups who believed the time had come for substantial reform in their country. Horthy was horrified as Hungary slipped under the revolutionary influence of the new Soviet Union when Belá Kun organized the Hungarian Soviet Republic in March 1919. Horthy traveled to the provincial town of Szeged, where he was asked to become the minister of defense of a provisional government being formed. He became head of a counter-revolutionary army whose young officers were extremely nationalistic, antisemitic, and anti-communist. This was the army of the “White Terror”—a name it received due to its terrorist methods of combat and

Admiral Miklós Horthy was a Hungarian statesman who served as regent of the Kingdom of Hungary between March 1920 and October 1944. Horthy's foreign policy allied him with Hitler's Germany in the Axis alliance of World War II, leading to Hungarians playing an active role in Operation Barbarossa, the German invasion of Yugoslavia, and the Holocaust. This latter role ended when Horthy refused to continue participating in antisemitic acts after the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944. The image here shows Horthy as the guest of Nazi leader Hermann Göring at Carinhall, Göring's country estate. (Library of Congress) the sadistic punishments it inflicted on villagers who were accused of sympathizing with the communists. Many talented Hungarians fled the country during this period to enrich the culture of other European nations.

Horthy's forces prevailed in Hungary, but the World War I victors, Britain and France, had a hand in designing the new Hungarian government since the Treaty of Versailles (1919) could not be concluded until the situation in Hungary was settled. The separate Treaty of Trianon reduced Hungary's territory by 70%, leaving important natural resources under the control of neighboring countries and stranding 28% of ethnic Magyars in other countries. The treaty also stipulated that no member of the Habsburg family (the dynasty that had long ruled Austria and Hungary) could ascend the Hungarian throne.

Under these circumstances, no king was chosen immediately, and Horthy was named regent, an inevitable choice since his army was the only force that could maintain order in the sharply divided country. He accepted after being given expanded powers and continued to prevent the restoration of King Karl. Horthy's belief in Magyar nationalism guided his policy-making. He enacted legislation that limited the numbers of students at educational institutions to their proportional representation in society. This 1920 law was specifically aimed at Jews, who were traditionally well educated and prominent in government. Moderate land reform was attempted in favor of those Magyars and Christians who had fought in World War I and the anticommunist campaigns. Horthy reinstated corporal punishment and public floggings and reintroduced the duel as a method of resolving disputes.

As the 1920s wore on, Horthy became an increasingly ceremonial head of state but was more active in the 1930s as the hardships of the Great Depression sparked social unrest in Hungary and inspired the extremes of right and left to action. As the German government of Adolf Hitler began to extend its influence throughout Central Europe, Horthy sided with those Hungarian politicians who hoped to maintain their connections with the West. Horthy saw Hitler as a threat to Hungarian sovereignty. Nevertheless, cooperation with the Germans offered the possibility of recovering territory once ruled by Hungary. In return for signing the Anti-Comintern pact of 1936, Hungary was awarded old imperial territories in Slovakia. After the Munich Conference of 1938, it became obvious that Britain would not fight Hitler in order to protect the interests of smaller European nations, and Horthy and other Hungarian politicians had to devise a pragmatic strategy to deal with Hitler.

Once World War II began with Hitler's Polish invasion in 1939, Horthy tried to maintain Hungarian neutrality and a centrist position with respect to the Axis and the Allies. He was ambivalent about the Polish invasion but allowed Polish refugees to enter Hungary through Slovakia. Hungary supplied foodstuffs, oil, and raw materials to the German war machine in return for territory in Transylvania. In April 1941, Horthy decided to join Hitler in invading Yugoslavia as a way of restoring historical Hungarian frontiers. This action was not taken, however, without first consulting the British minister in Budapest. Hungary provided only a minimum of troops for the Eastern Front, and by December 1941, only a bicycle corps was active.

In 1942, Horthy appointed a new prime minister, Miklos Kállay, who shared his anticommunism and also his hope that the Allies might win the war. They continued the pragmatic policy of neutrality, known as the "see-saw policy," in case Germany could not be defeated. Horthy had also made a secret deal with the Allies, promising to protect Hungarian Jews in exchange for the Allies not bombing Budapest. Because of Hungarian unwillingness to cooperate in the genocide of Jews and the government's contact with Allied forces, Germany invaded Hungary on March 19, 1944, and the next day began to organize the concentration and deportation of Hungary's Jews.

After Romania fell to the Allies in August 1944, Horthy looked for a way to withdraw from the war "with honor." Still an anticommunist, he secretly hoped that Budapest would be occupied by the British and Americans, not the Soviets, though he attempted to make a pact with the latter in order to stop the German ravages of Hungary.

Horthy was arrested on October 16, 1944, and abdicated the next day. He said later that this was to avoid a bloodbath in Budapest. He was put on a train and sent to Austria. He was held in custody in Bavaria until war's end in April 1945. In an ironic twist of fate, it was Joseph Stalin who saved him from being tried as a war criminal in Hungary after his release in 1946. Horthy then moved to Portugal with his family and died in Lisbon on February 9, 1957.

MICHAEL D. JOHNSON

See also: Arrow Cross; Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions; Hungary; Rotta, Angelo; Slachta, Margit; Szálasi, Ferenc; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Braham, Randolph L. The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary (Condensed edition). Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2000.

Fenyo, Mario D. Hitler, Horthy, and Hungary: German-Hungarian Relations, 1941–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1972.

Sakmyster, Thomas. Hungary's Admiral on Horseback: Miklós Horthy, 1918–1944. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.

Hudal, Alois

Alois Hudal was a bishop in the Roman Catholic Church whose pro-Nazi sentiments were evidenced not only by his 1937 book that praised National Socialism but also by the extensive efforts he made after World War II to help Nazi war criminals escape Europe to countries beyond the reach of Allied justice.

Born in Graz, Austria, on May 31, 1885, Hudal was ordained as a priest in 1908. After receiving a doctorate in sacred theology, he joined the faculty of the University of Graz in 1914. After serving as a military chaplain in World War I, he continued his rise in the ecclesiastical world and established connections with the Vatican, meeting Pope Pius XI in 1922. With the pope's help, Hudal became the rector of the primary theological seminary in Rome for German-speaking seminarians, the Collegio Teutonico di Santa Maria dell' Anima.

The Vatican's view of Hudal as the primary representative of the Austrian Church allowed him expanding influence in the higher levels of Rome's hierarchy. This was threatened when Hitler and the Nazis came to power, not by any actions by the Nazi regime against him, but by the concerns of his fellow prelates about Hudal's own views. As a rabid anticommunist, Hudal saw the Nazis as the best and last hope to prevent the spread of communism and its existential threat to the continuation of the church. This strong position of anticommunism, along with a related antisemitism that conflated Jews and communists, served to explain Hudal's support for the Nazi government.

A book written by Hudal and published in 1937, The Foundations of National Socialism, embraced the Nazi Party and reflected his conviction that a working relationship should and could be established between Catholicism and Nazism. Its publication put an abrupt end to Hudal's role and power in the ranks of the clergy and resulted in his being ostracized from the Vatican's inner circle, including from Eugenio Pacelli, then the Cardinal Secretary of State and soon to be Pope Pius XII.

If his Vatican-centered cohort pulled back from Hudal, his National Socialist-centered one did not. This was especially the case as the war wound down and Nazi perpetrators recognized the consequences they would face when an Allied victory was final. Hudal and several others helped develop and run what were called "ratlines," referring to locations from which Nazi war criminals could escape Europe—with forged papers, visas, passports, and letters of recommendation, many of which were written by Hudal—and escape the threat of being held accountable for their actions, in many cases resettling in South America, especially Argentina. The infamous Nazi war criminals who benefited from Hudal's help included the commander of the Treblinka extermination camp, Franz Stangl, the "Angel of Death," Josef Mengele, and Adolf Eichmann, who was so central to the facilitation of the Final Solution throughout Europe.

The beneficiaries of Hudal's efforts also included leaders of the notorious Ustashe, the government that was installed by the Nazis in Croatia. It was the Ustashe that, among its many atrocities, committed genocide against the Serbs during World War II. In matters of cruelty, the Ustashe "out-nazied" the Nazis, something that obviously was of no concern to Hudal.

The controversy that surrounds Hudal and his ratlines activities is not whether he supported the Nazi government or facilitated the escape from justice of thousands of Nazi war criminals. Those actions are beyond dispute, given that Hudal made no efforts to conceal his actions, claiming that he was acting out of Christian mercy for the men of the Nazi regime. The controversy, rather, revolves around the role, if any, Pope Pius XII and the Vatican may have played in those actions. As with so many of the issues that have been debated about Pius's response to the Nazi regime generally and his response to the extermination of the Jews in particular, there are two well-defined sides to the argument.

One side takes the position that Pius and the Vatican were not only aware of Hudal's efforts to provide for the escape from justice of Nazi perpetrators, but that they actually sanctioned and funded his activities and the activities of others like him who were dedicated to the welfare of Nazi fugitives. It is asserted that this was done through the Vatican Relief Commission, which, so the argument goes, was enthusiastically supported by the very highest levels of the Vatican, including by Pius XII, and which used the Vatican bank to provide for its financial needs.

The other side of the argument rejects that position as nonsense. Perhaps the strongest point made in this regard is that Hudal himself, in his memoir published posthumously, states that the pope had no knowledge of his postwar activities. This side of the argument acknowledges that Hudal was helping Nazi war criminals escape justice (as were other Catholic prelates and priests), and further acknowledges that fleeing Nazis no doubt managed to sneak into the church's programs to help refugees find a new start outside of Europe, but it categorically rejects the accusation that Pius or the Vatican supported or authorized, let alone financed, Hudal's ratlines efforts.

However the argument may be resolved—and it will probably not be resolved until the Vatican releases all of its relevant archives for examination by scholars—it is clear that Hudal, sometimes referred to as the "Brown Bishop," remained convinced right up to his death on May 13, 1963, that his efforts to protect some of the most barbaric Nazi war criminals was nothing more than what any good Christian should do.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Catholic Church; Pius XII; Ratlines; Stangl, Franz; Ustashe

Further Reading

Cymet, David. History vs. Apologetics: The Holocaust, the Third Reich, and the Catholic Church. Lanham (MD): Lexington Books, 2010.

Ventresca, Robert A. Soldier of Christ: The Life of Pope Pius XII. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2013.

Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions

On January 25, 1945, as World War II was drawing to a close, Hungary's Provisional National Government enacted an important piece of legislation. Act VII (Decree No. 81/1945), set into effect on September 16 of the same year, committed the Hungarian government to prosecuting those accused of war crimes during World War II. The act specified that criminals could be indicted even if laws forbidding the alleged crime(s) were not in effect at the time of commission. Consequently, from the time of enactment until March 1, 1948, the Hungarian People's Courts convicted more than 27,000 persons; of 322 death sentences, 146 were carried out. These judgments, alongside other punitive measures such as police internment, expulsion, and denazification commissions, indicate that 3% of Hungary's population and one in ten adult males received some form of postwar retribution. Meanwhile, self-styled People's Courts had already been in operation for several months.

These developments reflected the political conflicts of the years following the end of the Austro-Hungarian Empire at the close of World War I. In quick succession, abortive attempts had been made to establish first a democratic and then a communist regime in Hungary. In 1920 the counter-revolutionary government of Regent Miklós Horthy gained power, the same year that the Treaty of Trianon confirmed the loss of two-thirds of the country's territory. Horthy's conservative, antisemitic government allied itself with Axis forces during World War II, thereby regaining sizable portions of pre-Trianon territory. Hungary officially entered the war in June 1941, sending an army to the Russian Front. Meanwhile, from 1920 onward, the Hungarian government had imposed legislation depriving the country's Jews of their civil rights and, after 1939, drafting them into labor service. Apart from some 21,000 Jews deported or massacred in 1941 and 1942 and some 42,000 drafted by labor brigades, the full-scale extermination of Jews did not begin until after the government of Prime Minister Miklós Kállay tried to negotiate a separate peace with the Western Allies. In response to Kállay's overture, the German army occupied Hungary on March 19, 1944, forcing Horthy to appoint a pro-German puppet government that proceeded to collect and deport more than 618,000 Hungarian Jews. A second attempt to negotiate a separate truce with the Western Allies and the Soviet Union led to the regent's deposition and the appointment of Ferenc Szálasi, leader of the fascist Nyilas (Arrow Cross Party), as head of state on October 15, 1944. It was not long thereafter that surviving German forces and a large number of fascist collaborators fled westward when the Red Army overran Hungary. In the meantime, 564,507 Jews had died either by deportation to concentration camps or by extermination at the hands of Arrow Cross death squads.

Consequently, with the victory of Soviet forces and the flight of fascist occupiers, the demand for retribution was rife, not only because of Hungary's participation in the Holocaust but also for its collaboration, albeit often hesitant, with Adolf Hitler's Germany. As the people's judge Ákos Major stated, it was the task of the People's Courts to make amends to all Hungarians of honest intent. Nevertheless, retribution, not justice, was the order of the day as postwar Justice Minister István Ries soon confirmed. The People's Courts were consequently little more than show trials wherein only a few major perpetrators were punished but a large number of opportunists and turncoats escaped judgment.

Under Act VII, two types of courts were set up: county-level people's tribunals, which were, in principle, headed by a professional judge alongside five lay "people's assessors"; and an appeal body, the National Council of People's Tribunals (NOT), with a professional judge appointed by the justice minister. The composition of the courts was, however, partisan. Ideally, each non-fascist party was to delegate a member, later supplemented by nominees of the National Trade Union Council. In effect, the unwillingness of politically uncompromised professional judges to serve often led to politically expedient appointments dominated by left-wing groups. Appeals to NOT from the People's Courts were possible only when the majority of judges agreed the appellant deserved mercy and when prison terms exceeded five years unless the prosecutor decided a new hearing was in order.

Legal irregularities characterized the trials. Files and documents were missing, and defendants were often expected to provide evidence against other defendants. Judgments were erratic. For instance, László Radocsi, justice minister from November 1939 to March 1944, was not tried; László Ferenczy, a major figure in the Jewish deportations, received a death sentence; while Gábor Faragho (inspector general of the Gendarmerie, who appointed personnel for the deportations spearheaded by Adolf Eichmann), served as a witness but was sentenced to only light custody on his estate. Generally, defense witnesses were not heard.

Primary war criminals shot or hanged in 1945–1946 belonged to four groups: Horthy ministers, Arrow Cross officials, former guards or officers in Jewish forced labor contingents, and the ethnic German Volksbund. Principles of collective accountability were frequently applied and individual actions seldom investigated. Once the interest of the general public and press had waned in the second half of 1946, however, sentences became progressively lighter and reprieves by the appeal court were more frequent. Other matters, such as inflation, food shortages, and the suppression of the Smallholders Party in favor of communists increasingly absorbed the populace's attention. Consequently, the People's Courts of postwar Hungary served as little more than a replacement for Horthy's right-wing elite and Szálasi's Hungarian (i.e., pro-fascist) Party with a new pro-Soviet dictatorship. Hungary underwent little soul-searching for its role in the Holocaust and its collaboration with the Third Reich. Nevertheless, it is important to remember that Hungarian courts handed over citizens accused of war crimes abroad to face charges in Romania and Yugoslavia for alleged crimes committed after Hungary repossessed Northern Transylvania, previously part of the successor state of Romania, in 1940, and areas of Yugoslavia in 1941. Nevertheless, in the European context of postwar trials, postwar retribution in Hungary was not atypical of similar developments in other European countries but did distinguish itself by a relative absence of mob violence that overtook countries going through similar transitional experiences.

ANNA M. WITTMANN

See also: Arrow Cross; Horthy, Miklós; Hungary; Szálasi, Ferenc; War Crimes

Further Reading

Braham, Randolph L. The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2000.

Karsai, László. "The People's Courts and Revolutionary Justice in Hungary, 1945–46." In The Politics of Retribution in Europe: World War II and its Aftermath, edited by István Deák, Jan T. Gross, and Tony Judt, 233–251. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 2000.

Hungary

A land-locked country located in central Europe. From 1920 until 1944 Hungary was governed by Regent Miklós Horthy, whose principal goal was to regain some or all of the land that Hungary had lost as a result of World War I. This led him to ally his country with the Axis powers of Italy and

DEPORTATIONS FROM HUNGARIAN GHETTOS 1944

Germany, which resulted in sizable territorial gains for Hungary between 1938 and 1941. In following its goals of territorial reclamation, the Hungarian government formally signed on as an associated Axis power in December 1940. Thereafter, Hungarian armed forces fought with Germany in Yugoslavia, beginning in April 1941, and in the massive German offensive against the Soviet Union (Operation Barbarossa) beginning in June 1941. Even before Hungary allied itself with Germany, its government, which contained strong rightist and antisemitic elements, sought to persecute and marginalize Hungarian Jews, who in 1941 numbered about 825,000, including Jews who lived in lands that had been annexed by Hungary between 1938 and 1941.

By the late 1930s the Hungarian government had already implemented so-called race laws that mimicked the Nuremberg Laws in Germany. These revoked equal citizenship for Jews, restricted them from working in certain professions, barred them from civil and military service, and prevented them from marrying non-Jews. Because Jews were barred from the military, in 1938 the Hungarian government established a forced labor program for Jewish males of draft age; before long, this program included all able-bodied Jewish males. Many of these men were forced to labor under impossible conditions, without adequate medical care, food, water, and shelter. Between 1940 and 1944 it is estimated that at least 27,000 Jews died under the supervision of the Hungarian army, which had put them to work on a variety of defense and infrastructure projects.

Just as Hungarian troops were being deployed eastward to take part in the invasion of the Soviet Union, the Horthy regime forcibly deported 20,000 Jews to Ukraine, where virtually all were murdered by the German Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads). These Jews were not Hungarian citizens and came from territories recently annexed by Hungary. In early 1942 Hungarian troops killed nearly 3,000 Jews in the portion of Yugoslavia they then controlled, but the government was reluctant to move en masse against Hungarian Jews. Indeed, Horthy's prime minister, Miklós Kallay, refused to deport Hungarian Jews, even under pressure from Berlin to do so.

The brutal battle for Stalingrad, which ended in an Axis defeat on February 2, 1943, and resulted in catastrophic losses for the Hungarian army, convinced Horthy that the war was lost. Prime Minister Kallay, with encouragement from Horthy, now sought to negotiate an armistice with the Allied powers and exit the war. To prevent this, the Germans invaded and occupied most of Hungary in March 1944, and although Horthy was allowed to stay on as regent, Kallay was ousted. He was replaced by Dome Sztójay, who was pro-German and was willing to implement fully Berlin's liquidation of the Jews.

The next month, Sztójay ordered that all Jews living outside Budapest (some 500,000 people) be rounded up and concentrated in hastily established ghettos in several urban centers. There the living conditions were appalling, and Jews were frequently subjected to rape, violence, and extortion by troops and militias guarding the ghetto areas. In May the mass deportation of Hungarian Jews began, and in less than two months some 440,000 Jews had been sent east. Most were murdered at Auschwitz or were worked to death at forced labor.

In July 1944 Horthy ordered the deportations stopped, mainly because he knew the Germans' military position had deteriorated. The following month, he deposed Sztójay and sounded out Allied authorities with regard to the possibility of an armistice, which he very nearly accomplished before the Germans deposed him. Horthy was replaced by Ferenc Szálasi, a fascist and leader of the right-wing Arrow Cross Party. Szálasi immediately moved against the remaining Jews in Budapest. In late 1944 several thousand Jews were force-marched toward Austria; many died en route.

After a brutal and lengthy siege devastated Budapest, Hungary signed a truce with the Soviets, who had already occupied part of the country, in January 1945. By the early spring of 1945 German troops had been expelled from Hungary, replaced by Soviet occupation forces. In the end, only about 250,000 Jews—out of the 825,000 who had existed in 1941—lived to see the end of the war. The vast majority of those who died were killed after the German occupation beginning in March 1944.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Arrow Cross; Auschwitz Protocols; Brand, Joel; Csatory, Lazlo; Horthy, Miklós; Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions; Joint Distribution Committee; Kasztner, Reszó; Lantos, Tom; Lutz, Carl; Night; Operation Barbarossa; Perlasca, Giorgio; Rosenbaum, Pinchas; Rotta, Angelo; Salkaházi, Sara; Slachta, Margit; Soos, Géza; Szálasi, Ferenc; Szenes, Hannah; Vrba, Rudolf; Wallenberg, Raoul; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Abbott, Peter, Nigel Thomas, and Martin Windrow. Germany's Eastern Front Allies, 1941–45. London: Osprey, 1982.

Braham, Randolph L. The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2000.

Cornelius, Deborah S. Hungary in World War II: Caught in the Cauldron. New York: Fordham University Press, 2011.

Iceland

Iceland is an island country situated between the North Atlantic and the Arctic Ocean. From 1262 to 1814 the country was ruled by Norway, until, in the aftermath of the Napoleonic Wars, it became a possession of the Kingdom of Denmark. This situation remained until 1918, when Iceland became a separate kingdom in a personal union with Denmark. The population in 1939 was about 120,000 people, of whom only a tiny number were highly assimilated Jews.

During the 19th century nationalism began to develop in Iceland, accompanied by a rejection of foreigners. This continued into the early decades of the 20th century, and impacted the country's attitude toward Nazism and the possibility of Jewish refugees seeking a haven in Iceland. Jews attempting to enter the country found a more hostile reception during the 1930s than non-Jewish immigrants from Germany or Scandinavia. Moreover, many Icelanders saw the rise of Hitler in Germany as a potential force for good that could lead to full independence from Denmark.

Remarkably, in 1939 a member of German royalty, Prince Friedrich Christian of Schaumburg-Lippe—a member of the Nazi Party since 1929—was even invited by a group of Icelandic right-wing nationalists (including the Icelandic composer laureate, Jón Leifs) to become king of an independent Iceland. The proposal was considered briefly and had the support of Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, but it was eventually rejected due to the opposition of German foreign minister Joachim von Ribbentrop.

In 1933 a small Nazi-leaning party was founded in Iceland. The Nationalists, a party dedicated to maintaining the alleged “purity” of the “Icelandic race,” soon developed close links to the National Socialists in Germany. With so few Jews in Iceland they were unable to generate a political form of antisemitism, but in their literature and speeches they blamed Jews for all of Iceland's problems. While their perspectives did not translate to success at the ballot box—and by 1938 the party had attracted insufficient support to be able to continue—elements of its agenda penetrated into the political mainstream, such that Prime Minister Hermann Jónasson, in 1938, could refer to the need to keep Iceland “racially pure.”

This translated to Jewish refugees often being expelled from Iceland to Denmark, or placed under restrictive conditions should they be allowed to remain in the country at all. Indeed, in the late 1930s the Icelandic authorities offered to pay the Danish government for the further expulsion of Jews to Germany, if Denmark would not take care of them after they had been expelled from Iceland. Hardly any Jewish refugees managed to get into the country, and fewer were able to remain. Quite simply, Jews were not welcome in Iceland during the 1930s.

Moreover, while their case was maintained by only a small number of Icelanders in the professions, this did not penetrate very deeply. Religious leaders, academics, and authors, for example, often motivated by a xenophobic form of nationalism, did not extend support to the refugees.

With the outbreak of World War II in September 1939, Iceland, as a dependency of Denmark, was declared neutral. During World War II a few Icelanders made their way to Germany and joined the Waffen-SS, while some were known to serve as guards in Nazi concentration camps such as Dora-Mittelbau in 1943–1944. Other Icelanders caught in Nazi Europe, and informed upon for their political views, were murdered in these same concentration camps. While Icelanders who served in the forces of the Third Reich were treated with contempt after the war, those who had belonged to Iceland's Nazi Party were quickly forgiven after the war, and many rose to positions of prominence in the postwar years.

On April 9, 1940, Denmark was invaded and occupied by Nazi Germany, severing communications between Iceland and Denmark. Soon thereafter, Norway was similarly occupied by the Nazis, leaving Iceland highly exposed. Due to Iceland's geographic position the government of Britain decided it could not risk a German takeover of the island, and on May 10, 1940, forestalled the prospect by preemptively invading. In July 1941 the occupation of Iceland passed to the United States under a U.S.-Icelandic agreement. After a nationwide referendum in which 97% of the population voted in favor of independence from Denmark, Iceland became an independent republic on June 17, 1944.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Denmark

Further Reading

Vilhjálmsón, Vilhjálmur Örn. "Iceland, the Jews, and Anti-Semitism, 1625–2004." Jewish Political Studies Review 16, 3–4 (Fall 2004), at <http://www.jcpa.org/phas/phas-vilhjalmur-f04.htm>.

I.G. Farben

On December 25, 1925, six German chemical companies, all with an interest in cornering the world market in the chemical manufacture of dye-making—BASF, Bayer, Hoechst, Agfa, Chemische Fabrik Friesheim-Elektron, and Chemische Fabrik vorm. Weiler Ter Meer—merged (with American Wall Street support) to create the cartel Interessen-Gemeinschaft Farbenindustrie AktienGesellschaft (I.G. Farben). At its high point, it was the largest such cartel in the world and the world's fourth largest industrial enterprise overall. Three of its chemists received Nobel Prizes for their work prior to the outbreak of World War II: Frederich Bergius and Carl Bosch in 1931; Gerhard Domagk in 1939; and one, Karl Alder, along with Otto Diels, after the war in 1950.

Even prior to Hitler's ascent to power, the leaders of I.G. Farben, under the direction of Carl Krauch, saw "the hand-writing on the wall" and supported his efforts to rearm, remilitarize, and reindustrialize Germany in the aftermath of its defeat in World War I and the devastation caused by the Versailles Treaty of June 28, 1919. On February 20, 1933, he contributed 400,000 Reichmarks (RM) to Hitler's election campaign, representing the single largest sum in the 3,000,000 RM raised overall. He did so at a meeting in which banker Hjalmar Schacht, party leader and World War I flying ace Hermann Göring, and soon-to-be police Reichsführer Heinrich Himmler were all present. Once in power, Hitler continued to reward I.G. Farben for its support and commitment. For example, in all areas conquered and occupied by the Nazis, I.G. Farben took over both the ownership and the administration of chemical factories.

The most notorious of I.G. Farben's industrial involvement with Nazism was its construction of the Buna Werke plant for the production of buna (synthetic rubber) and gasoline, located in extremely close proximity to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Heading this "Auschwitz Project" were two of I.G. Farben's board members, Otto Ambros and Heinrich Bütetisch. The company "employed" upwards of 300,000 slave laborers, most of whom would lose their lives; in turn, I.G. Farben paid the SS, who oversaw the camp, a pittance for each worker. Somewhat ironically, the now-infamous Zyklon-B gas used in the gas chambers (originally invented by German Jewish chemist and 1918 Nobel Prize winner Fritz Haber) was purchased from the wholly-owned I.G. Farben subsidiary Degesch, which had already bought the patent as far back as 1920.

It is thus not surprising that, with such a ready supply of victims, one of the I.G. Farben companies, Bayer, was involved in the so-called "medical experiments" conducted at Auschwitz and elsewhere, supplying its medical staff with experimental drugs (and placebos) to test on hapless prisoners, many of whom died as well. Not only Dr. Josef Mengele—the so-called "Angel of Death"—but others, such as Dr. Carl Clauberg, also used medications supplied by I. G. Farben/Bayer. One example of such practices, discovered in the Auschwitz correspondence after the war, was the use of 150 women prisoners, all of whom died, for which Bayer paid the SS 170 RM per person (negotiating the price down from the original 200 RM requested). The now-acknowledged scientific value of these horrendous efforts has been assessed as nil, given the physical status of the victims and the

I.G. Farben was one of the major German chemical and pharmaceutical companies before and during World War II. A conglomerate of eight leading German chemical manufacturers, including Bayer, Hoechst and BASF, it controlled the patent for the pesticide Zyklon-B, which it licensed to various companies around the world including the German firm Degesch. Degesch, in turn, employed Zyklon-B in the gas chambers during the Holocaust. I.G. Farben owned 42.2% of the shares of Degesch and was represented in its supervisory board. In addition, I.G. Farben exploited Jewish slave labor in its factories at Auschwitz, as shown here. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum) unsanitary conditions of the camp laboratories wherein they were carried out.

At war's end, under the jurisdiction of the International Military Tribunal (IMT) held at Nuremberg, Germany, twenty-four directors of I.G. Farben were brought to trial. The indictment against them was filed on May 3, 1947, and the trial lasted from August 27, 1947, until July 30, 1948. It was one of three trials against the industrial giants of Germany; the others were against the steel magnate Friedrich Flick and his company (April 19–December 22, 1947) and the arms manufacturer Alfred Krupp and his company (December 8, 1947–July 31, 1948). The five-count indictment against I.G. Farben involved the planning, preparation, initiation, and waging of wars of aggression and invasions of other countries; war crimes and crimes against humanity through the plundering and spoliation of occupied territories, and the seizure of plants in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, France, and Russia; war crimes and crimes against humanity through participation in the enslavement and deportation to slave labor “on a gigantic scale” of concentration camp inmates and civilians in occupied countries, and of prisoners of war, and the mistreatment, terrorization, torture, and murder of enslaved persons; membership in a criminal organization, the SS; and acting as leaders in a conspiracy to commit the crimes mentioned under counts (1), (2), and (3).

Thirteen of the 24 directors were found guilty of one or more charges and sentenced to prison terms of one-and-a-half to eight years (including time already served). Ten of the defendants were acquitted, and one was removed for medical or health reasons. None of those sent to prison served their full term; most were released in three to four years and returned to prominence in German industry as the need for the restabilization of the postwar German economy, especially under the American Marshall Plan, was paired with the need to create a West German buffer to the advance of Soviet Russia and the beginnings of the Cold War.

Collectively, however, the Western Allies made a momentous decision: because of the thorough corruption of I.G. Farben, the cartel was to be broken up and its original constituent companies were to be separated; four of them—Agfa, BASF, Bayer, and Hoechst—became, again, independent entities by 1951, though Hoechst in 1997 and 1999 divested itself of its chemical businesses. Today, these same companies remain enormously successful but their profits continue to dwarf those achieved during wartime.

The former prisoners who rose to prominence included Hermann Schmitz, Georg von Schnitzler, Fritz ter Meer, Otto Ambros (of Auschwitz infamy), Heinrich Bütefisch (also of Auschwitz infamy), Max Ilgner, and Heinrich Oster. Among the acquitted, those who also found themselves again in positions of importance and distinction included Fritz Gajewski, Christian Schneider, Hans Kühne, Carl Lautenschläger, Wilhelm Rudolf Mann, Carl Wurster, and Heinrich Gattineau.

In 2001 what remained of I.G. Farben reached an agreement to cease to exist by 2003, partially as a result of its ongoing failure to compensate its victims and their descendants, though it did agree, after much prolonged negotiations with the Jewish Material Claims Conference founded in 1951, to pay 27,000,000 deutsche marks (DM) to a compensation fund. Part of the agreement was no admission of guilt and a restriction to Jewish prisoners only. Still technically a “corporation in liquidation,” it exists even as something of a shadow of its former self.

Finally, the collusion of American corporations, their leaderships, and wealthy industrialists, not only before the war but also during it, has been largely neglected by historians and politicians given the primacy of realpolitik. For example, between 1927 and 1939 the American National City Bank of Cleveland, Ohio, at the time one of the ten largest banks in the United States, floated a bond issue of $30,000,000 USD. In 1941 it was discovered that the Standard Oil Company under the leadership of John D. Rockefeller had an agreement with I.G. Farben that resulted in a slow-down of other investigations into the production and manufacture of synthetic rubber. It has also been estimated that more than 2,000 cartel agreements were legalized with American firms such as Alcoa, Dow Chemical, DuPont, and others. By 1930 American I.G. Farben’s board of directors included Edsel B. Ford of the Ford Motor Company; Herman A. Metz of the Bank of Manhattan; Charles E. Mitchell of the Federal Reserve Bank; Walter Teagle and Paul M. Warburg, also of the Federal Reserve Bank; William E. Weiss of Sterling Drugs; German American research chemist and industrialist Walter Duisberg; and German American philanthropist Adolf Kuttroff. Many of these same financial leaders also served on one another’s boards as well.

Many, if not most, scholars are of the opinion today that, without the strong support and loyalty of I.G. Farben to the Nazi war effort and its initial successes, World War II could never have taken place, or at least, not in the manner in which it played out.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Auschwitz; Degussa; Flick Case; Gross-Rosen; I.G. Farben Case; Medical Experimentation; Monowitz; Zyklon-B; Zyklon-B Case, 1946

Further Reading

- Borkin, Joseph. The Crime and Punishment of I.G. Farben. New York: Free Press, 1978.
- DuBois Jr., Josiah E. The Devil’s Chemists: 24 Conspirators of the International Farben Cartel Who Manufactured Wars. Boston: Beacon Press, 1952.
- Hayes, Peter. From Cooperation to Complicity: Degussa in the Third Reich. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007.
- Hayes, Peter. Industry and Ideology: I.G. Farben in the Nazi Era. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Higham, Charles. Trading with the Enemy. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1983.
- Jeffreys, Diamuid. Hell’s Cartel: I.G. Farben and the Making of Hitler’s War Machine. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 2010.

I.G. Farben Case

In the United States of America v. Carl Krauch, et al. (May 3, 1947, to July 30, 1948), Military Tribunal VI tried 24 directors and managers of the chemical cartel I.G. Farben (Interessengemeinschaft Farbenindustrie Aktiengesellschaft or Community of Interests, Dye Industry, Public Corporation). Accused were Krauch, Hermann Schmitz, Georg von Schnitzler, Fritz Gajewski, Heinrich Horlein, August von Knierem, Fritz ter Meer, Christian Schneider, Otto Ambros, Max Bruggemann, Ernst Burgin, Heinrich Butefisch, Paul Hafliger, Max Ilgner, Friedrich Jahne, Hans Kuhne, Carl Lautenschläger, Wilhelm Mann, Heinrich Oster, Karl Wurster, Walter Durrfeld, Heinrich Gattineau, Erich von der Heyde, and Hans Kugler. The indictment listed five counts: (I) crimes against peace; (II) war crimes and crimes against humanity (plunder and spoliation); (III) war crimes and crimes against humanity (complicity in mass murder, illicit medical experiments, and slave labor); (IV) membership in a criminal organization; and (V) conspiracy. All defendants were charged with counts I, II, III, and V, but count IV applied only to Schneider, Butefisch, and von der Heyde. The case against Bruggemann was later suspended for health reasons.

Some I.G. Farben prosecutors, like deputy counsel Josiah E. DuBois, worked in the U.S. Treasury and Justice Departments of the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration, which predisposed them to view I.G. Farben as a trust to be busted or integral to German imperialism. Arguing that directors supplied Adolf Hitler the means necessary for war-making, DuBois contended that they harmonized their foreign business in league with Nazi espionage and propaganda. The defendants represented a menace to future peace, as had their predecessors at Fried[rich] Bayer AG and BASF (Badische Anilin und Sodafabrik), two of eight companies that formed I.G. Farbenindustrie in 1925.

Similarly to the Krupp Case, Tribunal VI acquitted all defendants on counts I and V. The court argued that Krauch was too far removed from Adolf Hitler's inner circle to be privy to his aggressive plans. Among all defendants, he had the closest connections to the Nazi leadership, serving from 1937 to 1945 as Plenipotentiary for Special Chemical Questions in Hermann Göring's Four-Year Plan Office, as well as top executive positions in IG. These facts rendered all the more problematic the peace charges against the other accused.

The prosecution presented a stronger case regarding spoliation. After German conquest, I.G. Farben took over chemical firms in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, and France, and examined properties in occupied Soviet territory. Attempting to rationalize the French dye industry, it exerted undue pressure upon French manufacturers, by proposing the revision of previous cartel arrangements before the German-dominated Armistice Commission at Wiesbaden. In November 1941 it obtained a 51% interest in the new Francolor cartel, transferring in exchange to three French companies (Kuhlmann, Saint-Denis, Saint-Clair) 1% of IG's total stock, or about 13 million Reichmarks in 1941 terms, inalienable except among participants. The tribunal excluded allegations concerning properties in Austria and the Sudetenland, since these takeovers had occurred before the war. Deeming voluntary certain transactions with companies in occupied territories, it agreed with a ruling in the Flick Case that the Aryanization of Jewish property did not comprise a crime against humanity. On count II, it convicted Schmitz, von Schnitzer, ter Meer, Burgin, Hafliger, Ilgner, Jahne, Oster, and Kugler.

The prosecution combined several charges under count III. These involved IG's knowledgeable participation in the sale of poison gas for the purpose of mass murder, involuntary pharmaceutical experimentation on concentration camp inmates, and the deployment and maltreatment of forced and slave labor. Unlike the Zyklon-B case, Tribunal VI found little evidence to prove that the directors responsible for overseeing IG's interest in Degesch (German Society for Pest Control), Mann, Wurster, and Horlein, knew how the SS were using Zyklon-B, despite receiving Degesch's sales reports. While the prosecution established that the SS physicians had forcibly injected camp detainees with anti-typhus and other IG drugs, the court determined that its executives summarily ended the tests upon suspicion of malfeasance.

Against Krauch, Ambros, Butefisch, ter Meer, and Dürfeld, the synthetic rubber and oil project called IG Auschwitz furnished damning evidence. While the prosecution contended that the nearby concentration camp determined the site's location, the tribunal lukewarmly endorsed the defense claim that technical criteria (proximity of natural resources and layout) informed the decision, it but concluded that availability of slave labor played a secondary role. Scholars still debate IG's degree of culpability in the initiation of slave labor deployment. Founded in 1941 at government urging, IG Auschwitz fostered a lethal working environment for slave laborers, especially during the first two years. Conditions were still awful when British prisoners of war arrived in late 1943 (some of these POWs, like Charles Coward, subsequently gave moving testimony at Nuremberg). Determining that IG initiated the project, and that approximately 25,000 prisoners lost their lives in consequence, the tribunal found the defense's claim of necessity unconvincing in this case.

The prosecution alleged that Butefisch, Schneider, and von der Heyde were active members in the SS after September 1, 1939. In this connection Tribunal VI deemed insufficient the evidence against the first two, and ruled that von der Heyde ought to have been charged as a member of the illegal Sicherheitsdienst (Security Service), not the SS. The court acquitted ten defendants on all charges, including Gajewski, Horlein, von Knierem, Schneider, Kuhne, Lautenschlager, Mann, and Wurster. It imposed terms of confinement ranging from one-and-a-half to eight years upon the remainder and reserved the lengthiest sentences for those connected with IG Auschwitz.

JOSEPH ROBERT WHITE

See also: Crimes against Humanity; Degussa; I.G. Farben; Krupp Case; Monowitz; War Crimes

Further Reading

Borkin, Joseph. The Crime and Punishment of I.G. Farben. New York: Free Press, 1978.

Hayes, Peter. Industry and Ideology: I.G. Farben in the Nazi Era. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

White, Joseph Robert. “‘Even in Auschwitz . . . Humanity Could Prevail’: British POWs and Jewish Concentration-Camp Inmates at IG Auschwitz, 1943–1945.” Holocaust and Genocide Studies 15:2 (Fall 2001): 266–295.

“Intentionalists”

“Intentionalists” are a group of scholars who argue that the Holocaust was primarily centered in the person of Adolf Hitler, his antisemitism, and his commitment to bringing to realization a world free of Jews (in German, Judenrein). They hold that Hitler “intended” to kill the Jews from an early date, while differing as to how early that might have been. The perspective is, moreover, that the road to Auschwitz was premeditated and carefully planned.

The classic intentionalist perspective is the opposite of that held by their intellectual opponents, the “functionalists” (sometimes also called “structuralists”), who contend that the road to the Holocaust was anything but straight, but was, rather, a “twisted” road that emerged gradually in a spate of fits and starts before finally commencing sometime in the second half of 1941.

Historian Lucy S. Dawidowicz was one who saw the germ cell of Hitler’s ideas regarding the extermination of the Jews as early as 1919. To support her interpretation, she pointed to Hitler’s many public speeches containing numerous extreme antisemitic statements, vilifying the Jews and promising them harm.

Other intentionalists hold that the Nazi program of total annihilation of the Jews, as envisaged by Hitler, could be traced to at least 1924 and the appearance of his masterwork Mein Kampf—and particularly his assertion that if 12,000 to 15,000 Jews had been gassed, “the sacrifice of millions at the front would not have been in vain.”

Such speeches are critical to the intentionalist understanding. Perhaps the most famous of these was his speech to the German Reichstag on January 30, 1939, when he publicly affirmed that if “international Jewry” would be the cause of yet another world war, “then the result would not be the Bolshevikization of the earth and with it the victory of Jewry, it will be the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe.” One historian, Gerald Fleming, makes reference to documents and speeches about Adolf Hitler in order to trace what he calls an “unbroken continuity of specific utterances,” demonstrating a straight path—“a single, unbroken, and fatal continuum” pointing directly toward what became the Holocaust.

Another scholar, Harvard University political scientist Daniel Goldhagen, takes arguments such as these even further, building on Dawidowicz’s and asserting that ordinary Germans permitted themselves to be transformed by the Nazis into genocidal killers of Jews because of cultural characteristics within German society that allowed for a specific type of what Goldhagen termed “eliminationist antisemitism.” In his book published in 1996 titled Hitler’s Willing Executioners, he argued that an innate German antisemitic culture caused the Holocaust, enabling the Germans to welcome the persecution of Jews by the Nazi regime with some degree of enthusiasm.

One of the many intentionalist arguments in support of the general contention regarding the direct and long-held route to Auschwitz takes things a little further down the track, contending that the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941 (Operation Barbarossa), and the Wannsee Conference of January 20, 1942, proved that Hitler’s plans for the Jews could now be realized, as he mobilized the Nazi effort to carry out his long-sought agenda.

Many intentionalist historians focus their work on the role of Adolf Hitler in fomenting the Holocaust, maintaining that without him the drives of the Nazi state would not have been achieved. Indeed, in a famous essay published in Commentary magazine in 1984, essayist Milton Himmelfarb asserted “No Hitler, No Holocaust,” a trenchant argument that confronted historians who attributed the Holocaust to larger socioeconomic forces or ignored the possibility that there existed in the world individuals such as Hitler who actually do harbor demonic impulses. His position was clear: “Hitler willed and ordered the Holocaust, and was obeyed.” None of the other causes attributed to the Holocaust by dissenting historians, such as “traditions, tendencies, ideas, [or] myths” made Hitler murder the Jews. It was his will alone that was the Holocaust’s cause and saw its realization. (For all that, it must be noted that no actual document signed directly by Hitler ordering the physical destruction of the Jews has ever been discovered, and was, most probably, never written.)

To this day, despite a softening of the intentionalist position generally, there are still some historians who remain entrenched on the subject. Moreover, in the media and the popular consciousness the intentionalist position is still sometimes quite strong, both in former Allied countries and within Germany itself.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Bauer, Yehuda; Dawidowicz, Lucy S.; “Functionalists”; German Army, Role in the Holocaust; Historikerstreit; Hitler’s Willing Executioners; Mein Kampf; Mommsen, Hans

Further Reading

Bessel, Richard. “Functionalists vs. Intentionalists: The Debate Twenty Years on, or Whatever Happened to Functionalism and Intentionalism?” German Studies Review 26, 1 (2003), 15–20.

Haberer, Erich. “Intention and Feasibility: Reflections on Collaboration and the Final Solution.” East European Jewish Affairs 31, 2 (2001), 64–81.

Marrus, Michael. The Holocaust in History. Lebanon (NH): University Press of New England, 1987.

International Committee of the Red Cross

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is the oldest and, arguably, perhaps the world’s most influential international humanitarian organization. It was established in 1863 in Geneva, Switzerland, by Henri Dunant, a Swiss businessman, who had witnessed firsthand the terrible carnage caused to soldiers of both sides in the Franco-Austrian Battle of Solferino in 1859. In 1864, at Dunant’s urging, the Swiss government convened a 16-nation international committee in Geneva for the purpose of establishing a set of universal norms that would allow for humane treatment of both those wounded in battle and prisoners of war. This was the first of several Geneva Conventions.

ICRC delegates are usually permitted access to all sides of a dispute because of respect for a guiding principle that has characterized the organization’s operations from its inception—the principle of absolute neutrality and confidentiality. For most of its history, the ICRC has acted as a silent witness to some of the worst excesses of state and nonstate behavior, hardly ever deviating from these core principles. The position it advocates by way of justification for this silence is a straightforward one: if the ICRC were to speak out publicly about the things it sees after having been allowed access to prisons, detention centers, concentration camps, and the like, violators of human rights norms could simply refuse ICRC delegates continued access—in which case, prisoners and other populations at risk would be denied the succor that the ICRC can bring to such situations.

The ICRC’s ability to see to its core tasks—monitoring of prisoner conditions, carrying messages between prisoners and their families, advocating more humane conditions, providing food and other “comforts” for prisoners, delivering emergency aid to victims of armed conflicts, among other things—has enabled it to achieve admiration unsurpassed among humanitarian aid agencies. Yet its policy of confidentiality has come under increasing criticism in the face of genocide, and many around the world are of the opinion that perpetrators of genocide must not be greeted with silence.

During the Holocaust, there is little doubt that the ICRC knew about the Nazi atrocities as they were taking place; indeed, one argument has it that as early as August 1942 the ICRC had as complete a contemporary knowledge of the Holocaust as did the Allied governments. It was, moreover, the principal humanitarian institution maintaining communications with both the Allied and Axis powers. But while the ICRC provided assistance and protection to prisoners of war held by Nazi Germany, it did not do the same for Jews. As civilians, they did not fall immediately within the ICRC’s remit as it stood at that time; further, the Nazi government in Berlin refused all humanitarian requests to help Jewish victims. By way of rationalization, the ICRC has since explained, on numerous occasions, that during the war its leaders felt powerless to speak out, defending itself with the argument that if it had disclosed what it knew, it would have lost its ability to inspect prisoner of war camps on both sides of the front, and that speaking out would have compromised its supposed neutrality.

That said, there were various ways in which individual delegates of the ICRC sought to assist Jews, particularly in Hungary after the Nazi invasion of March 1944 and the introduction of the Final Solution to that country. But here, of course, lies the gravamen of the allegations made against the ICRC’s role during the Holocaust; its assistance came late in the war, and those who benefited from its efforts were comparatively few when compared with the millions who died without even an acknowledgment from the committee.

A good example of the ICRC’s failure to assist—indeed, of its blindness to the reality before it—came when inspections were made of certain camps, in particular that at Terezín, also known as Theresienstadt, in Czechoslovakia. In actuality, Terezín was a way station for Jews and other prisoners headed to the death camp at Auschwitz, but the camp's reputation as a "humane" institution remained unblemished to the outside world. The ICRC sent delegates to the camp a number of times to investigate conditions, the most well-known being in June 1944. The delegates reported favorably on what they had seen: clean streets, well-stocked provisions in shopfront establishments, and smartly dressed inmates who appeared to be gainfully employed. By the time the report was issued, however, the Jews on whom it was based had already been sent to their deaths in Auschwitz. There was little doubt that the committee allowed itself to be used by the Nazis and was routinely manipulated by the Nazis as a result.

That said, at the same time, the ICRC, even when it was informed of what was happening, refused to make any public announcement or appeal to the outside world, or to denounce the deportation of Jews to concentration camps.

On April 27, 2015, at a commemorative event in Geneva marking the 70th anniversary of the Allied liberation of the Nazi death camps, the president of the ICRC, Peter Maurer, admitted the committee had failed to protect Jews during the Holocaust because it "lost its moral compass," stating at the same time that "the ICRC failed to protect civilians and, most notably, the Jews persecuted and murdered by the Nazi regime."

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Displaced Persons; Theresienstadt; War Refugee Board

Further Reading

Ben-Tov, Arieh. Facing the Holocaust in Budapest: The International Committee of the Red Cross and the Jews in Hungary, 1943–1945. Berlin: Springer-Verlag, 1988.

Crossland, James. Britain and the International Committee of the Red Cross, 1939–1945. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2014.

Favez, Jean-Claude. The Red Cross and the Holocaust. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Moorehead, Caroline. Dunant's Dream: War, Switzerland and the History of the Red Cross. New York: Carroll and Graf, 1999.

International Holocaust Remembrance Day

International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust is a global day of remembrance observed on January 27 in honor of those killed during the Nazi Holocaust. Also known as International Holocaust Remembrance Day, the day of observance was officially established by the United Nations General Assembly on November 1, 2005. It was first observed on January 27, 2006, and has been observed on that day ever since. The resolution creating the day of remembrance also coincided with the 60th anniversary of the Allied liberation of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

The resolution creating International Holocaust Remembrance Day also condemned any and all denials of the Holocaust and all demonstrations of religious intolerance. It also declared unacceptable any harassment or violence against individuals or groups based on religion or ethnicity. The UN resolved to hold educational and memorial programs commemorating the Holocaust at its New York headquarters, and directed that its information centers around the world do the same. Outreach programs on the Holocaust were to be held on or around January 27 with an eye toward memorializing the Holocaust victims and preventing future genocides and mass killings.

The UN sponsors or organizes Holocaust-related art exhibits, historical displays, educational programs, and speakers' seminars. It also issues special commemorative stamps, sponsors Holocaust-related film screenings, holds book signings for new volumes dealing with the Holocaust, and even organizes concerts given by musicians who are Holocaust survivors or their descendants. Individual nations commemorate the day with a wide array of events and ceremonies, including academic seminars on the Holocaust, special curricula in schools, religious observances, and specific programming on television, radio, and other media outlets.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Denial of the Holocaust; Yom Hashoah

Further Reading

Rothberg, Michael. Multidirectional Memory: Remembering the Holocaust in the Age of Decolonization. Stanford (CA): Stanford University Press, 2009.

Iron Guard

The Iron Guard was a fascist group in Romania. Founded in 1927 and known originally as the League of the Archangel Michael, it merged with other nationalist movements to form the militant section of the movement as the Iron Guard in 1930. Its leader, Corneliu Zelea Codreanu, promoted Orthodox Christian belief systems and led the movement until his death in 1938. Those who were followers of "The Legion,” as it was often called, were widely known as “legionnaires.” Iron Guard members were known as “greenshirts,” because of the uniforms they wore. After a while, the movement overall became better known as the Iron Guard, especially by those outside. In 1940, after integrating with the Romanian government, the Iron Guard was responsible for implementing a series of antisemitic pogroms and political assassinations throughout the country.

While the Iron Guard’s own ideology was inspired by the nationalistic movements of Nazi Germany and fascist Italy, it was not inherently the same. Many characteristics remained comparable, such as anti-Jewish and anticommunist philosophies, but the Iron Guard was also rooted in Christian aestheticism, particularly Romanian Orthodox traditions. Nae Ionescu, a Romanian scholar and philosopher, claimed that the League of 1927, or its more modern interpretation, the Iron Guard of 1930, was a political manifestation of Romanian Orthodoxy.

In 1930 the Iron Guard became a political party. It would often hold conferences and sessions with Romanian students; these meetings would often end in anti-Jewish riots and the vandalism and destruction of synagogues and Jewish businesses. Some of the most well-known riots took place in 1927 in Oradea Mare in Transylvania and in Cluj, where eight synagogues were raided and burgled.

The Iron Guard would become the third-largest political party in Romania after the elections of 1937, with just over 15% of the overall vote. In February 1938 King Carol II, Romania’s monarch, made himself royal dictator of the country to combat both fascist and communist influences in Romania. In March 1938 the Romanian interior minister, Armand Călinescu, who despised the Iron Guard and antisemitism, demanded that the Iron Guard be put down for a final time, and by April, King Carol had Codreanu imprisoned and convicted for slandering Romanian historian Nicolae Iorga. He was later convicted of treason in a second trial in May and was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

However, in October of the same year, the Iron Guard unleashed a campaign of assassinating police officers and government officials, while staging the bombings of several government buildings. As the murderous campaign against the Romanian government began, King Carol agreed to have all of the Iron Guard leaders currently in custody, including Codreanu, murdered. On November 29–30, 1938, Codreanu and other leaders of the Iron Guard were shot as a means of wiping out Iron Guard leadership, remembered in Romania as the “night of the vampires.”

After Codreanu’s death, many members of the Iron Guard fled Romania and went to Germany, where they received aid, but the Iron Guard did not dissipate completely within Romania. After a year of royal dictatorship, the Romanian government was reformed in March 1939, and Călinescu was made prime minister. However, as early as September he was assassinated by members of the Iron Guard in retaliation for Codreanu’s murder.

At the start of World War II, Romania, under King Carol, was determined to remain neutral. The country had close ties and an alliance with France; however, it became very clear to Carol after the surrender of France in 1940 that an arrangement with the Axis Powers would prove to be necessary if Romania were to survive the war. Carol was forced to cede regions of Bessarabia (an area of eastern Romania) and Bukovina to the Soviet Union, parts of northern Transylvania to Hungary, and southern territories of Dobrudja to Bulgaria, as mandated by the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact between Nazi Germany and the USSR. Antisemitic measures and crimes became unprecedented during that summer.

In September 1940 Horia Sima was appointed leader of the Iron Guard, and General Ion Antonescu became prime minister of Romania—with the blessing of Adolf Hitler and Nazi Germany. Antonescu and Sima then formed an alliance that forced King Carol II to abdicate. He was then forced into exile; two months later, the Iron Guard detained and murdered more than 60 of the king’s supporters, including Nicolae Iorga, who had aided Carol’s escape. Once in power, Sima and Antonescu’s reign over Romania was characterized by blatant and murderous antisemitic pogroms and political assassinations.

A Legionnaire rebellion against Antonescu in January 1941 led to the deaths of 120 Jews within Bucharest, and 30 more outside the city. Sima and other Iron Guard leaders fled Romania after Antonescu ended the rebellion. In 1944 an anti-Nazi coup ended the Iron Guard’s presence, and the Germans sent Sima and other Iron Guard members to Vienna.

The earliest massacres of Romanian Jews took place in the annexed areas of Bessarabia and Bukovina, given to the USSR in the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. On June 26, 1941, Romanian Iron Guard members and the German army rounded up Jews in the streets and began shooting them. Thousands were killed on the spot, while thousands more were packed into freight cars and sent east. More than 1,400 Jews suffocated or died from malnutrition and thirst on one train, while another train carried another 1,200 Jews. Overall, 118,847 Jews were deported from the regions of Bessarabia, Bukovina, and the Dorohoi, all of which had been taken from greater Romania back in 1939 and were now reconquered in the war with the Soviet Union.

In 1946, with the war over, Antonescu was tried on charges of war crimes, crimes against the peace, and treason. Found guilty, he was executed by a military firing squad on June 1, 1946.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Antonescu, Ion; Jagendorf, Siegfried; Romania

Further Reading

Ancel, Jean. "Antonescu and the Jews." In Michael Berenbaum and Abraham Peck (Eds.). The Holocaust and History: The Known, the Unknown, the Disputed and the Reexamined. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999, 463–479.

Codreanu, Corneliu Zelea. For My Legionaries: The Iron Guard. Madrid: Editura "Libertatea," 1976.

Deletant, Dennis. Hitler's Forgotten Ally: Ion Antonescu and His Regime, Romania, 1940–1944. Basingstoke (UK): Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.

Italian Jews and Fascism

The settlement of Jews in Italy dates back to the Republic of Rome in the first-century BCE, when the first Jews came as merchants or slaves and developed a strong community that exists to this very day. Their persecution dates back to this beginning, when the ancient Romans failed to accept their religious customs—a prejudice that only worsened during the promotion of Christianity.

Oppressive laws and expulsions were sporadic throughout the early Christian period and Middle Ages, but became more apparent in early modern Italy with the appointments of various popes. Pope Paul II created the first Jewish ghetto in Italy in 1555, where Roman Jews were forced to live and put under curfew in pessimal living conditions until the unification of Italy in 1870, and consequently the end of the powerful papal states. This made the Roman ghetto the last remaining Jewish ghetto in Western Europe until the rise of the Nazis.

By 1900, out of the 45,000 Jews living in Italy, one in three had a spouse from a different religion and all spoke a variety of Judeo-Italian dialects. This suggests that although many were Jewish in sentiment, Jewish practice and orthodoxy was neglected as they felt more Italian. The majority were also Italian nationalists and had been active participators in the process of Italian unification. In 1905 Italy got its first Jewish prime minister, Alessandro Fortis, followed shortly after by Luigi Luzzati in 1910. Even the mayor of Rome between 1907 and 1913, Ernesto Nathan, was Jewish. When Benito Mussolini came to power, the Italian fascist Party had a significant Jewish membership quota and many Italian Jews were active promoters of the new government, such as Giuseppe Volpi, Italy's finance minister and Margherita Sarfatti, Mussolini's mistress, journalist, and propaganda adviser.

Tensions began to rise, however, in 1929 when the Lateran treaties were signed in the Duce's attempt to appease the Catholic Church, declaring it the sole religion of the state, despite Mussolini's condemnation of the introduction of the Nazis' racist policies in the early 1930s. A growth in ideological antisemitism by the Italian state became evident in 1936, with Hitler and Mussolini's first military alliance in the Spanish Civil War and their signing of the Rome-Berlin Axis in the same year. Furthermore, the Italian invasion of Ethiopia in May 1936 urged the justification of a more concrete institutional racism over Italy's new colonial subjects, as a law banning mixed-race marriages was passed. Italo-German relations became even more concrete with Italy's signing of the Anti-Comintern Pact in 1937 along with Japan, and the military Pact of Steel in 1939.

Despite this timeline, which suggests heavily that closer ties with Germany helped conceal the fate of Italian Jews, some historians, such as Michele Sarfatti, argue that the fascist government was antisemitic from its inception. Another historian, Meir Michaelis, agrees, holding that Hitler never encouraged Mussolini to accept his racial theories. Alexander Stille, however, highlights the complexity of the Italian Jewish experience under fascism, following the story of five Italian Jewish families, and argues that the fascist government sought a close bond with them at least in the beginning. What most scholars agree on, however, is that the implementation of discriminatory policies in the late 1930s was not received warmly by the majority of the Italian public and marked the beginning of the end of mass consensus for the regime.

These events all precluded the passing of the Italian Racial Laws in October 1938, which stretched any previous racist legislation to all Jews under Mussolini's rule. These laws stripped all Jews of their Italian citizenship and prohibited them from marrying non-Jewish Italians, taking professional posts in the civil service, or entering higher education or the entertainment business. The legislation was accompanied by an avid propaganda campaign, which included a bimonthly magazine promoting racism, Difesa della Raza, and the Manifesto of Racial Scientists, which was published in the newspaper Il Giornale d'Italia on July 14, 1938. The manifesto was an academic publication of 10 racist assertions signed by 10 scholars at leading Italian universities, together with a number of top fascists. It insisted that human races biologically existed and were separated into “large” and “small” races according to hierarchy, with the “pure Aryan Italian race” at the top and all those of “non-European” origin, that is, Jews, Arabs, and Africans, at the bottom. The manifesto explicitly encouraged Italians to “proclaim themselves frankly racist,” and wrote that the “Jews do not belong to our Italian race.”

Despite this new legal persecution, counts of physical violence against Jews remained isolated and were largely the preserve of fascist squad members until the occupation of Italy by German forces in September 1943. Meanwhile, Mussolini set up the Republic of Salò in the north of Italy along with his most loyal followers, which operated as a puppet government. Under the republic, antisemitic measures were intensified as all Jews became liable for arrest and internment and legally lost all of their property. More than 8,564 Jews from Italy and other Italian-occupied zones, like Libya, Slovenia, France, and the Greek islands, were deported to concentration camps from 1943 until the end of the war; many went to one of the 25 camps in Italy, but most went to those outside the country such as Auschwitz-Birkenau, Bergen-Belsen, Buchenwald, Flossenbürg, and Ravensbrück. It must be noted, however, that overwhelming evidence suggests there was an exception in Italian-occupied southeastern France between 1940 and 1943. Once Nazi persecution of Jews began in Vichy France, 80% of French Jews, around 300,000 people, took refuge in the Italian-occupied zone. Many survived the war due to the refuge and protection provided by Italian forces there, who refused to cooperate with the Nazis in handing them over.

In Rome alone, 1,000 out of 10,000 Jews were rounded up by Nazi officers and deported to Auschwitz on trains, first on October 16, 1943, and then by the head of the republic’s police force, Guido Buffarini Guidi, on November 30, 1943. Only 16 people out of this number survived. Similarly, in Venice, only 8 out of 250 who were sent to camps returned home after war.

Many Jews joined the fight with other Italian partisans against both Nazis and fascists, while others were hidden by partisan neighbors and villagers living in rural areas. Furthermore, on March 22, 1944, as a reprisal for a partisan attack by dynamite that killed 28 German SS men, 335 Italians were taken into the Ardeatine caves outside Rome and shot at point-blank range. Out of 335 victims, 75 were Jewish, as the criteria for capture was vague, ranging from being passersby merely taken from the streets, or those arrested in their homes from fascist tips of resistance activity, or, in the case of the Jews, chosen due to the Nazis’ fervent antisemitism.

It is estimated that around 75% of Italian Jews survived the Holocaust, while around 7,500 fell victim to it. Many left Italy after the war, despite an influx of Libyan Jews in the 1970s when Muammar Gaddafi came to power in Libya. Italian authorities have only recently conducted a handful of trials against Nazi perpetrators against Italian Jews. For example, in 1998 an Italian court convicted Karl Hass and Erich Priebke for their participation in the Ardeatine cave massacre, as a result of which they were put under house arrest for life.

VICTORIA WITKOWSKI

See also: Concentration Camps; Fascism; Ghettos; Italy; Life Is Beautiful

Further Reading

De Felice, Renzo. Storia degli ebrei italiani sotto il fascismo. Torino: Einaudi, 1961.

Michaelis, Meir. Mussolini and the Jews: German-Italian Relations and the Jewish Question in Italy, 1922–1945. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.

Sarfatti, Michele. The Jews in Mussolini’s Italy: From Equality to Persecution. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2006.

Stille, Alexander. Benevolence and Betrayal: Five Italian Jewish Families under Fascism. New York: Summit Books, 1991.

Zimmerman, Joshua. Jews in Italy under Fascist and Nazi Rule, 1922–1945. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Italy

Italy is a nation situated in south-central Europe. Italy’s population in 1939 was 44.4 million, of whom some 52,000 were Jewish. Jews have lived in Italy for well over 2,000 years, and over time became completely vested in Italian society and culture. Italians in general did not exhibit open antisemitism, and unlike National Socialism in Germany, Italian fascism was not predicated on theories of ethnic and racial hierarchies or antisemitism. Indeed, until the Italian national assembly passed a series of antisemitic laws in 1938, Jews were permitted membership in Italy’s fascist Party.

As Italy’s dictator Benito Mussolini tied his nation closer to Germany, he came under increased pressure to crack down on Italian Jews. Thus, in 1938, the Italian government promulgated a series of anti-Jewish laws, which were watered-down versions of Germany's Nuremberg Laws. This legislation barred Jews in the military and from certain professions, especially teaching. They were also not permitted to hold government positions or to work in radio and journalism. Marriage between Jews and non-Jews was prohibited, and resident alien Jews were placed into internment camps. In practice, however, the Italian government only half-heartedly enforced these measures, and in some instances simply ignored them altogether. Even in the alien internment facilities Jews were treated relatively humanely and were not subjected to violence by Italian authorities. This does not mean that Italian Jews in general did not suffer after these laws were passed, however, and a number left Italy, choosing to live in the Americas or elsewhere.

Italy did not enter World War II until June 1940, but it was by then firmly allied with Nazi Germany. Italy would eventually establish military occupations in southern France, Albania, Greece, and Yugoslavia. German officials expected the Italians to round up and deport Jews in those areas, but most Italian officials wanted nothing to do with the mass killing of Jews. As a result, during 1941–1943, thousands of Jews left German-occupied areas for the relative safety of Italian-occupied territory. In an effort to shield some of them, Italian naval officials covertly evacuated some 4,000 Jews from France, Greece, and Yugoslavia to southern Italy, where they were interned. Virtually all lived to see the end of the war.

These dynamics changed dramatically in 1943, however. By then, the war was going badly for Italy, and Italians were frustrated and angry with Mussolini's military escapades. In July, when Allied forces invaded Sicily, Mussolini's days became numbered. He was ousted from power by the end of the month, and in September the new Italian government under Pietro Badoglio negotiated a surrender with the Allies, just as Allied troops had begun assaulting the Italian mainland at Salerno. Mussolini, meanwhile, was rescued by German commandos and installed as head of the puppet Italian Socialist Republic in northern Italy. The Germans now imposed a grinding occupation on the Italians, and Italian Jews suffered accordingly.

During October and November 1943 German occupation officials commenced a roundup of Jews in all of Italy's large cities in the north, including Rome. They planned to concentrate them in several points and then transport them to the death camps in Poland. Italian civilians and government officials, however, stymied the German effort by warning Jews of the operation and hiding Jews. Police in the affected cities also refused to take part in the operation. So successful was this resistance in Rome that only 1,100 Jews were seized; the city's Jewish population was at least 10,000. During this operation, 4,733 Italian Jews were deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau, of whom just 314 survived the war.

Small numbers of Jews from other parts of German-controlled Italy were also deported, and in one concentration camp near Trieste, as many as 5,000 were tortured and killed. Most were avowed or suspected socialists, communists, partisans, and other political "undesirables." From approximately September 1943 until April 1945 the Germans deported 8,564 Italian Jews, as well as Jews from Italian-controlled areas in France and the Greek isles. Of that number, only 1,009 survived the war and returned to Italy. As well, nearly 200 Jews were shot and killed in and around Rome in early 1944. It is estimated that some 40,000 Italian Jews were still alive at war's end.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Borromeo, Giovanni; Fossoli di Carpi; Globocnik, Odilo; Graziani, Rodolfo; Greece; Harster, Wilhelm; Italian Jews and Fascism; Kappler, Herbert; Levi, Primo; Life Is Beautiful; Marie-Benoît, Père; Microstates during the Holocaust; Munich Agreement; Resistance Movements; World War II; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Sarfatti, Michele. The Jews in Mussolini's Italy: From Equality to Persecution. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2006.

Zimmerman, Joshua. The Jews in Italy under Fascist and Nazi Rule, 1922–1945. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005

Zuccotti, Susan. The Italians and the Holocaust: Persecution, Rescue, Survival. New York: Basic Books, 1987.

J

J.A. Topf and Sons

A German engineering and manufacturing company that supplied crematoria equipment in the form of incineration furnaces employed at Nazi extermination and concentration camps beginning in 1939. J.A. Topf and Sons was established in 1878 in Erfurt, Germany, not far from the future site of the Buchenwald concentration camp. Leadership of the firm passed to Ludwig and Ernst-Wolfgang Topf, the sons of the founder, in 1935. During the 1920s the company's fortunes rose considerably as more Germans chose cremation for the disposal of their loved ones' remains. J.A. Topf and Sons also produced brewery and malting equipment, although by the early 1930s their principal product lines were dedicated to cremation and funeral services. Indeed, the company pioneered the design and production of crematoria that were virtually smoke- and odor-free.

In 1939 a major outbreak of typhus at the Buchenwald camp necessitated the disposal of large numbers of corpses. Nazi officials contacted Topf, which provided a portable incineration oven for Buchenwald. Officials were so impressed by the equipment that they placed an order for more crematoria and exhaust systems, which were capable of handling far larger quantities of bodies. By the early 1940s, with the mass killing of the Holocaust reaching its zenith, Nazi officials had contracted with Topf for large quantities of crematoria equipment, which was employed at concentration and death camps at Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Mauthausen, Dachau, Belzec, and Gusen.

Company officials certainly knew that their equipment was being used for nefarious purposes, but they extended their contracts nevertheless. Indeed, Kurt Prufer, the company's chief engineer, paid at least five visits to Auschwitz. He later told Soviet officials after the war that he knew about the mass killing as early as the spring of 1943.

When World War II ended in May 1945, Prufer was arrested by Soviet occupation authorities and sent to a gulag, where he died in captivity sometime in 1952. Ludwig Topf was also arrested by the Soviets, but he committed suicide on May 31, 1945, leaving a note that attempted to absolve him from participation in the Holocaust. His brother, Ernst-Wolfgang, was put on trial for war crimes but was found not guilty. He later took up residence in West Germany and established another incinerator company in 1951; the firm entered bankruptcy in 1963.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Belzec; Birkenau; Buchenwald; Dachau; Death Camps; Gas Chambers; Mauthausen-Gusen

Further Reading

- Bauer, Yehuda. A History of the Holocaust. New York: Franklin Watts, 2001.
- Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Jackson, Robert H.

Robert H. Jackson was an attorney, U.S. attorney general (1940–1941), associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1941–1954), and chief U.S. prosecutor at the Nuremberg Trials (1945–1946). Jackson’s well-argued decisions during the 1940s and 1950s made him one of the court’s most articulate jurists.

Jackson was born on February 13, 1892, in Spring Creek, Pennsylvania. After graduating from high school, he read law under a local attorney (the last U.S. Supreme Court justice to do so), attended Albany Law School for one year, and was subsequently admitted to the bar and practiced in Jamestown, New York. He later established a successful practice in Buffalo. Participation in local Democratic politics

Justice Robert H. Jackson was an American attorney and judge who served as the U.S. chief of counsel for the prosecution of Nazi war criminals at the Nuremberg Trials after World War II. Appointed by President Harry Truman in 1945, Jackson took a leave of absence from the Supreme Court in order to accept this position. He helped draft the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal, which created the legal basis for the Nuremberg Trials. He remained an associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court from 1941 until his death in 1954. (Library of Congress) acquainted Jackson with Franklin D. Roosevelt and Charles Evans Hughes.

After he became president, Roosevelt appointed Jackson as general counsel to the Treasury Department’s Bureau of Internal Revenue in 1933. In 1938 he appointed him as solicitor general of the United States, and in 1940 Jackson was made attorney general. Although Roosevelt initially promised to appoint Jackson as chief justice when Hughes retired in 1941, he instead promoted Harlan Fiske Stone to the post and named Jackson as an associate justice, a position he held until his death in 1954.

In 1945 President Harry S. Truman appointed Jackson to serve as the lead American prosecutor at the Nuremberg Trials, where 24 high-ranking Nazi officials were to be tried for war crimes and crimes against humanity. The trials began in October 1945 and lasted until November 1946. Jackson also helped write the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal, which established the legal basis for the subsequent trials. He prosecuted his cases with great energy and eloquence, and his opening and closing statements before the tribunal are now considered among the best speeches of the century. He refused to give credence to the idea that “following superior orders” trumped morality and conscience. Although his summations and speeches were known for their compelling persuasiveness, Jackson was sometimes less effective as a cross-examiner. He lost his patience several times during his questioning of senior Nazi leader Hermann Göring and was in fact chided by the trial judges for his outbursts. Jackson wrote two books about his Nuremberg experiences—The Case against the Nazi War Criminals (1946) and The Nuremberg Case (1947). In general, Jackson’s performance at Nuremberg was deemed a success, and he helped set the tone for the proceedings.

Jackson’s leave of absence from the Supreme Court did not sit well with other justices, and it deepened his feud with Justice Hugo Black. That made the selection of either man to the position of chief justice difficult. Jackson remained on the court after President Truman appointed Fred Vinson to replace Stone, and he joined the Warren Court’s desegregation decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Despite relatively little formal higher education, Jackson was among the Supreme Court’s most articulate justices. He is known for his opinion reversing an earlier precedent and overturning a compulsory flag salute law in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943). He authored a forceful dissent in the Japanese exclusion case, Korematsu v. United States (1944), and wrote a much-quoted concurring opinion in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), in which he attempted to categorize occasions where presidential power was at its greatest and its weakest.

Justice Robert H. Jackson died in office on October 9, 1954, in Washington, D.C.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Lemkin, Raphael; London Charter Agreement; Nuremberg Defense; Nuremberg Trials; Taylor, Telford

Further Reading

Conot, Robert E. Justice at Nuremberg. New York: Basic Books, 1993.

Harris, Witney. Tyranny on Trial: The Trial of the Major German War Criminals at the End of World War II at Nuremberg, Germany, 1945–1946. College Station (TX): Texas A & M University Press, 1999.

Taylor, Telford. The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Memoir. New York: Knopf, 1992.

Jagendorf, Siegfried

Siegfried (Schmiel, or Sami) Jagendorf managed a factory in Mogilev, Romania, through which he saved thousands of Jewish lives during the Holocaust. Born on August 1, 1885, in the northern Bukovina village of Zviniace, he was the youngest of four children and the only son of Abraham Jagendorf and Hannah Bassie Offenberger. The Jagendorfs were Orthodox Jews; Abraham owned and operated a flour mill and kept a small herd of livestock.

After completing school, Jagendorf enrolled in a three-year mechanical engineering course at the Technical Trade-Museum in Vienna. Here he joined a student Zionist organization. He completed his engineering qualification on May 31, 1907, at the Technikum Mittweida, near Dresden, specializing in tool making, around this time adopting the German name “Siegfried.” On May 9, 1909, he married 21-year-old Hinde (“Hilda”) Feller in Radantz, Bukovina.

Jagendorf’s service as an officer in the Austro-Hungarian army during World War I earned him the Order of Franz Joseph, the empire’s highest military decoration. After the war he was employed at the Siemens-Schukert Werke in Vienna and was transferred to Cernauti, Bukovina.

In 1923, after just one year in Bukovina, Jagendorf resigned from Siemens-Schukert Werke and for the next four years served as general director of Foresta, the society of Bukovina’s lumber industry. In March 1938, when German forces entered Austria, Jagendorf found himself trapped in Vienna. He managed to escape by bribing his way back into Romania.

Shortly after arriving back in Cernauti, Jagendorf was drafted into the Romanian army. He served until September 2, 1940, when he was demobilized owing to an antisemitic purge in the military.

In August 1939 Hitler and Stalin signed a pact containing a secret provision returning Bessarabia to Soviet rule. Ten months later the Soviet foreign minister, Vyacheslav Molotov, demanded the evacuation within 48 hours of all Romanian forces from Bessarabia; at the same time, the Soviet Union took over northern Bukovina and the Jews were blamed by local Romanians for this humiliation.

On July 4, 1940, King Carol II of Romania appointed a pro-Nazi, Ion Gîrgurtu, to head the government and declared an amnesty for the fascist Iron Guard. Gîrgurtu enacted harsh antisemitic legislation, dismissing Jews from the army and civil service, from editorial posts and corporate board-rooms, and restricted Jews from practice in the legal and other professions. The definition of “Jews” was based on the Nazi Nuremberg Laws categorizing Jews as a race rather than a religion.

After Gîrgurtu resigned in August 1940 he was replaced by Marshal Ion Antonescu. On September 14, 1940, Antonescu appointed the leader of the fascist Iron Guard, Horia Sima, as vice president. The Iron Guard conducted murderous rampages, and on January 2, 1941, Sima attempted to overthrow Antonescu in an unsuccessful coup. This degenerated into a pogrom in Bucharest. Two hundred of Bucharest’s most distinguished men and women were taken to the abattoir on the edge of the city, stripped, forced to kneel on all fours, and put through all stages of animal slaughter until the beheaded bodies, spurting blood, were hung on iron hooks on the wall. Antonescu finally crushed the rebellion, after which the Germans took Sima and 300 of his Iron Guard to Buchenwald, where they were kept in a special section of the camp.

When the Romanian and German armies invaded the Soviet Union in the summer of 1941, a rumor circulated that the Jews had sheltered Soviet spies and shot at Romanian soldiers. Antonescu used this as a pretext to order the execution of 50 Jews for every Romanian killed. In the pogrom that followed, more than 10,000 Jews were murdered. The Nazis, ironically, disparaged this pogrom as barbaric.

Antonescu called for the Jews of Bessarabia and Bukovina to be deported to Russia. The entire state apparatus—army, gendarmerie, police, civil authorities, prefectures, city councils, and tribunals—joined together to implement this ethnic cleansing. Some 140,000 to 150,000 Jews from Bessarabia, Bukovina, and Dorohoi were deported to Transnistria in western Ukraine.

On October 12, 1941, Siegfried and Hilda Jagendorf were deported across Romania's eastern frontier, and the leaders of the Jewish community asked Jagendorf for assistance in organizing the exodus. He was assured that no more than 40 people would occupy the cattle cars evacuating the Jews, but more than 100 families were instead crammed into them. After a two-day journey they were offloaded at Atachi, Bessarabia—the last station in Romania, where Ukrainian gangs competed with Romanians in pillaging the deportees. A group of Jews, including the Jagendorfs, reached the eastern bank of the Dniester River, avoided the gendarmes, and entered the city of Moghilev-Podolski unmolested. Jagendorf found shelter and set out to find the local German commandant.

He dressed himself in his Romanian officer's uniform before the meeting. With the aid of a letter identifying him as a former director of Siemens-Schukert Werke, he was eventually ushered into the commandant's office. Once inside, he asked immediately what the Germans planned for the evacuees, and where he could find food and shelter. In reply he was told that the area was now under Romanian control, and that the Germans had no official role to play. Moghilev was out of bounds to Jews; the city was devastated, and had no electricity or other vital services.

Jagendorf realized that the group's fate was in Romanian hands. The Jews would have to become indispensable. As the city was without electricity, he decided that the Jews could provide the technical expertise and manpower necessary to repair the power station, and perhaps even rebuild Moghilev's shops and factories. This idea, he realized, he had to sell to the local town prefect, Colonel Ion Baleanu.

He found an empty movie theater, applied at police headquarters for permission to use the building, and persuaded the police chief that confining several thousand Jews in one place would ease his task when the evacuation orders arrived. The chief thereupon instructed his officers to allow anyone Jagendorf designated to occupy the theater. When the theater reached capacity, the police put several damaged houses at Jagendorf's disposal. At that point Jagendorf took responsibility for the fate of Romania's banished Jews.

To meet Baleanu, Jagendorf was clean shaven and wore a white shirt, a clean suit, and gloves. Baleanu told Jagendorf that he had granted the interview because he needed his services. With the power station incapacitated, he asked Jagendorf to select four or five electricians and mechanics, and set up a machine shop.

He then sent scouts into Moghilev to find an abandoned machine shop, and on November 3, 1941, they found a large disused foundry. Jagendorf told Baleanu that he could not do the job with the limited workers at his disposal but instead needed at least 100 men; there was no other way to restore the foundry and get electricity to Moghilev. This became the Turnatoria foundry.

Baleanu ordered that the requisite authorizations be issued. Jagendorf then presented a list of 116 names and asked that the men's families be allowed to remain with them. Each man claimed ten or more dependents; nearly 1,200 authorizations were issued. Jagendorf billeted the workers and their families in a school building, repaired with materials taken from bombed houses. The electrical engineers and mechanics worked on the municipal power station and restored the power to Moghilev within two weeks. Baleanu then ordered Jagendorf to repair the city's damaged government buildings; to do so, Jagendorf requested hundreds of additional authorizations, which Baleanu routinely signed, and Jagendorf repaired the lumber mill, flour mills, and wineries.

Over time, the Germans saw that restoration of food production in the district would alleviate food shortages on the battlefield. By this time more than 10,000 Jews were engaged in unpaid productive labor. Jagendorf asked for authorizations for doctors, dentists, barbers, tailors, cooks, and shoemakers. With official approval the Jewish specialists could work in essential manufacturing enterprises.

Baleanu was eventually dismissed because he was seen as too soft on the Jews. The new, harsher arrangements imposed on Jagendorf required him to impose tougher discipline on those in the foundry. He demanded complete obedience and tolerated no dissent. This attitude was needed: at least two serious typhus epidemics threatened the community, while Jagendorf still could not prevent Jews from being taken into forced labor battalions outside.

Jagendorf left Transnistria for Romania just days before Soviet troops arrived in Moghilev in March 1944. Of the approximately 150,000 Jews deported to Transnistria, some 50,000 were still alive. At least 15,000 of those who survived could put their fate down directly to Jagendorf's efforts.

When the war ended, Siegfried Jagendorf became one of the chief witnesses for the Romanian government in local war crimes trials, though he did not stay long. He and his wife Hilda soon emigrated, arriving in the United States on December 23, 1946, where they were met by their daughters. He died of cancer in California on September 8, 1970.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Antonescu, Ion; Iron Guard; Rescuers of Jews; Romania

Further Reading

Jagendorf, Siegfried. Jagendorf's Foundry: Memoir of the Romanian Holocaust, 1941–1944. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.

Jasenovac

Site of five concentration camps established between August 1941 and February 1942 on the banks of the Sava River, some 60 miles south of Zagreb in central Croatia. The five facilities were Krapje, Brocica, Ciglana, Kozara, and Stara Gradiska. The first two were in existence for only four months. Established by the neo-fascist, right-wing Croatian nationalist group known as Ustashe, the Jasenovac complex was created and administered entirely by the Ustashe Party, although both the Italian and German governments had encouraged its establishment as a way to neutralize dissidents and enemies of the Independent State of Croatia. Most of the prisoners were Serbs, Jews, and Roma. Political and religious dissidents were also incarcerated at Jasenovac, most of them Muslims or Croats.

Jasenovac was one of numerous concentration camp facilities constructed by the Ustashe during World War II; it was also the largest. Conditions in the camps were absolutely appalling. Barracks were hopelessly overcrowded, food rations meager, and sanitation facilities crude. In the cold winter months, the flimsily constructed buildings offered little in the way of warmth or shelter. Disease and sickness were rampant, and prisoners—men, women, and children—were routinely subjected to savage beatings and even torture by camp guards. Inmates were often murdered over the slightest infraction, or when guards were in a bad mood. Many of the Jews imprisoned at Jasenovac were shot and killed at nearby sites such as Gradina or Granik. In August 1942 and again in May 1943 German authorities transferred most of the surviving Jews from Jasenovac to Auschwitz-Birkenau in southern Poland.

The few Jews at Jasenovac who were spared death or deportation were those individuals with useful backgrounds, including carpenters, tailors, physicians, and electricians. Between 1941 and 1945, it is estimated that at least 100,000 people may have died at Jasenovac, though estimates vary considerably. The range includes 45,000–50,000 Serbs; 12,000–20,000 Jews; 15,000–20,000 Roma; and 5,000–12,000 political and religious dissidents.

Toward the end of the war, in April 1945, a group of prisoners at Jasenovac sensed an opportunity to rebel and staged a major uprising. Guards, however, brutally suppressed it, and several hundred prisoners died. Most of the remaining survivors were killed before Ustashe guards hastily dismantled the facilities. By early May, Yugoslav partisan troops under Josip Tito had taken control of the area and made known the wartime activities there.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Concentration Camps; Croatia; Serbia; Ustashe; Yugoslavia

Further Reading

Gitman, Esther. When Courage Prevailed: The Rescue and Survival of Jews in the Independent State of Croatia, 1941–1945. St. Paul: Paragon House, 2011.

Lituchy, Barry M. (Ed.). Jasenovac and the Holocaust in Yugoslavia. Brooklyn (NY): Jasenovac Research Institute, 2006.

Jedwabne Massacre

The Jedwabne massacre was the murder of an uncertain number of between 400 and 1,600 Polish Jews on July 10, 1941. This killing, carried out in large part by the town's non-Jewish Poles, is an important event in the history of the Holocaust not least because of the public and scholarly debate it raised over the behavior of non-Jewish Poles under German occupation.

Jedwabne is located in eastern Poland, about 120 miles northeast of Warsaw. It was occupied in 1939 by the Soviet Union as part of its pact with Nazi Germany. However, after the German invasion in 1941, it came under German control. While the historical documents are often complex and conflicting, the basic events of the massacre were as follows. Though there was a German police detachment in the town and some evidence that a Gestapo unit was present during the massacre, the evidence suggests that the town's mayor, Marian Karolak, and a large group of collaborators received permission from the German authorities to carry out a pogrom against the town's Jewish population. Jedwabne's inhabitants, together with others from the surrounding area, carried out the murder of the Jews in a particularly brutal manner which culminated in the burning of a barn full of Jewish residents. The systematic plunder of Jewish property accompanied the massacre. The perpetrators acted out of a variety of motivations, such as antisemitism, greed, revenge against imagined collaboration with Soviet authorities, and personal animosities.

After the war, several of the participants in the Jedwabne massacre were tried by communist Polish courts. The trials were marked by a desire to minimize Polish participation for political reasons, and many of the confessions were tainted by accusations of the use of torture and coercion.

The Jedwabne massacre first received mass public attention with the 2001 book Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland by Polish-born historian Jan T. Gross. Its appearance caused controversy and heated debate, as it described in detail the voluntary participation of non-Jewish Poles in the murder of their Jewish neighbors. Some accused Gross of overemphasizing the role of Polish citizens and of not recognizing the victim status of Poles during the war, while others charged him with uncritically using perpetrator testimony produced by a communist regime. Though the number of victims and precise extent of German instigation or involvement remain contentious, the basic historical outline sketched by Gross is widely accepted. The Jedwabne massacre highlights, among other things, the complex position of Poles under Nazi occupation as victims and bystanders, but also as collaborators and perpetrators.

Jedwabne remains a highly contentious and politicized topic, especially for Poles. Conservative and nationalist groups, for example, often accuse Gross and his supporters of attempting to hold Poles collectively guilty. In 2002 the Polish Institute for National Memory conducted an investigation which upheld many of Gross's conclusions, while dismissing the larger figure of 1,600 victims based on a cursory exhumation of the mass grave in Jedwabne. Lastly, for historians, Jedwabne raised important questions of the use and value of various kinds of evidence and of local histories in explaining the Holocaust.

WAITMAN W. BEORN

See also: Collaboration; Neighbors; Poland

Further Reading

Gross, Jan T. Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland. New York: Penguin Books, 2001.

Michlic, Joanna B., and Antony Polonsky (Eds.). The Neighbors Respond: The Controversy over the Jedwabne Massacre in Poland. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 2004.

Jehovah's Witnesses

The Jehovah's Witness Movement, founded in the United States in the last quarter of the 19th century, came into conflict with the Third Reich when Witness beliefs on the nature of the world and its meaning came sharply into conflict with the tenets of National Socialism. Members of the movement believe that the world is in its last days and under the rule of Satan. They are witnesses to their God, Jehovah, on the stage of history while awaiting the end of the current order, and they are dedicated to spreading knowledge of Jehovah and His plans. Members of the organization see their allegiance as being to their God rather than to the political regimes of Satan's world, although they are law-abiding and good citizens where their faith allows. They will not swear an oath, vote, bear arms for a civil state, or belong to a political party. In Nazi Germany, this stance led members of the group most dramatically to refuse to enlist or to give the "Heil Hitler" salute. A bitter conflict with the authorities swiftly followed.

The Nazis banned Jehovah's Witnesses' meetings and missionary work, and some lost their jobs as civil servants. Others had their children taken away to be brought up in Nazi homes. Of the 20,000 or so members active in Germany under Adolf Hitler's regime, many found themselves or saw their families and cobelievers in prison or concentration camps. Jehovah's Witnesses were among the first Germans to be placed in the camps, where they were often tortured and murdered.

CHRISTINE KING

See also: Concentration Camps; Sachsenhausen

Further Reading

Peukert, Detlev. Inside Nazi Germany: Conformity, Opposition and Racism in Everyday Life. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1989.

Soumerai, E. N., and C. D. Schulz. Daily Life during the Holocaust. Westport (CT): Greenwood Press, 1998.

Jewish Fighting Organization

The underground Jewish military group established in the Warsaw Ghetto to resist deportations of Jews to extermination camps, the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB), was established on July 28, 1942. It is sometimes also known as the Jewish Combat Organization.

During a two-and-a-half month wave of deportations from the Warsaw Ghetto to Treblinka from July 22, 1942, to September 12, 1942—a period known to the Germans as "Gross-Aktion Warschau" (General Action Warsaw)—it was intended that this would bring about an end to those living there. During this period, more than 5,000 Jews were deported each day—altogether, some 265,000 Jews were deported, reducing the ghetto population to just over 55,000 residents.

While those in the ghetto did not know the precise destination or fate of those who had been deported, vague reports of mass murder at Treblinka did manage to leak back. During the period of the deportations a member of the Jewish youth movement Hashomer Hatzair, 23-year-old Mordecai Anielewicz, had escaped to southwest Poland on an underground mission to organize other branches of his movement, but upon returning to Warsaw he found the ghetto devastated. He and others now decided to resist any further deportations.

In the meantime, other members of Jewish youth groups had formed the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization) on July 28, 1942. With Anielewicz back, they issued a proclamation calling on the ghetto residents not to go to the rail cars when called upon to do so. When the deportations ended, members of the ŻOB elected Anielewicz as their leader in November 1942, and preparations started for a defense of the ghetto whenever the next wave of deportations should begin.

Most of the Jewish elders disapproved of armed resistance out of fear of provoking a devastating German retaliation. However, Anielewicz and another Zionist leader, Yitzhak Zuckerman, began looking for support outside the ghetto and were able to contact the Polish government in London in order to procure weapons. While this was difficult, they managed to obtain a few rifles and pistols. The ŻOB officially became part of the High Command of the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK), and the AK began providing weapons and training. An initial consignment of weapons was provided in December 1942. In the meantime, the ŻOB prepared for the next onslaught by the Germans and executed those Jews in the ghetto who had helped the Nazis carry out the deportations.

In early January 1943 Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler visited the Warsaw Ghetto and ordered a further—perhaps final—deportation. This began, unannounced, on January 18. In response, the ŻOB and several other small fighting groups began uncoordinated guerrilla warfare against the Nazis. Anielewicz developed a plan in which his fighters obeyed the deportation orders until they reached a certain part of town, where they received a signal to attack. Despite the death of all of the Hashomer Hatzair fighters except Anielewicz, many Jews escaped. The Nazis stopped the deportation four days later, after the ŻOB's action had cost the lives of several German troops.

With the deception of peace, the Nazis then tried to coax the remaining Jews to board boxcars to Treblinka. Anielewicz continued to command underground operations, as the groups planned and prepared for further combat by procuring arms and building bunkers. The final deportation began on the eve of Passover, April 19, 1943, when Himmler ordered the Warsaw Ghetto cleared of all Jews before Adolf Hitler's birthday the next day. Under the command of SS General Jürgen Stroop, more than 2,000 Nazi soldiers and Polish police moved into the ghetto to begin this final deportation. Approximately 1,500 Jews armed with two machine guns, 15 rifles, 500 handguns, hand grenades, and Molotov cocktails began to attack the Nazi invaders of the ghetto. The ŻOB knew that it was not a professional army and that it could not hope to defeat the might of the German army. Therefore, the fighters used the only strategy they could, employing guerrilla warfare tactics and the advantage of surprise. The resisters achieved a remarkable victory on the first day, forcing the Nazis to retreat after the ŻOB attacked their tanks and artillery. The Nazis suffered heavy losses and left behind weapons.

The second day, the Nazis returned to drive the Jewish fighters from their hideouts by using gas, smoke bombs, and flame throwers. On the third day of battle, the Nazis used small patrols for street-to-street fighting. The Jewish resistance was outnumbered and outgunned, but the fighters refused to surrender and often hid in sewers. The Nazis then began to burn every house in the ghetto and flood the sewers in order to force them out. After the first few days of battle, Anielewicz moved from the streets to the headquarters of the Jewish Fighting Organization.

After a four-week battle in which the Nazis shelled and bombed the ghetto and killed 60,000 Jews, the Nazis captured and gassed the Jewish Fighting Organization's headquarters at Miła 18 on May 8. There, they found Anielewicz and most of the remaining ghetto fighters dead. Many had committed suicide to avoid capture. On May 16, 1943, General Stroop reported to his superiors in Berlin that "the former Jewish quarter of Warsaw [is] no longer in existence," and to mark the occasion he razed Warsaw's Great Synagogue. Throughout and after the revolt, the Nazis still worked on deporting the ghetto's remaining Jews. Of the more than 56,000 Jews captured, some 7,000 were shot, with the remainder sent to their deaths at camps such as Treblinka and Majdanek, or to forced labor camps.

Mordecai Anielewicz lost his life, together with many others, during the Nazis' final assault on the ŻOB command bunker at Miła 18 on May 8, 1943, and altogether only about a hundred of the ghetto fighters of the ŻOB survived. They included leaders such as Simcha Rotem, Zivia Lubetkin, Yitzhak Zuckerman, and Marek Edelman. Many of these went on to fight alongside Polish resisters belonging to the Armia Krajowa during the Warsaw Uprising of August 1944. Some of the other resistance fighters succeeded in escaping the ghetto altogether and joining partisan groups in the forests around Warsaw.

Once news got out about the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, Jews in other ghettos also rallied to resist Nazi occupation. The actions of the Jewish Fighting Organization in leading the largest ghetto uprising during World War II were therefore inspirational not only to those experiencing the Holocaust but have since been to subsequent generations of young Jews throughout the world.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Altman, Tova (Tosia); Anielewicz, Mordecai; Gutman, Yisrael; Jewish Military Union; Jewish Partisans; Jewish Resistance; Lubetkin, Zivia; Meed, Vladka; Resistance Movements; Stroop, Jürgen; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Zuckerman, Yitzhak

Further Reading

Arens, Moshe. Flags over the Warsaw Ghetto: The Untold Story of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Jerusalem: Gefen, 2011.

Gutman, Israel. Resistance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Kurzman, Dan. The Bravest Battle: The Twenty-eight Days of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. New York: Putnam, 1993.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Jewish Ghetto Police

The Jewish ghetto police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst) were Jewish police units established by the Nazis in the ghettos of German-occupied Eastern Europe during the Holocaust. With the German conquest of Poland in 1939, the Nazis set up nominally self-governing Jewish Councils (Judenräte) and ordered them to establish policing units for the purpose of maintaining order in the ghettos. The occupiers set strict guidelines—which were not always followed—regarding Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst recruitment, involving a certain level of physical fitness, military experience, and secondary or higher education. When first established these units did not have official uniforms; often, all they possessed to distinguish themselves from the rest of the population was an armband, a police hat, and a badge. They carried batons to maintain order; they were not permitted firearms.

At first, the Jewish ghetto police had a prescribed set of duties to perform, and for the most part these were less about law and order, and more about maintaining a viable form of existence in the ghetto. Thus, their roles included such activities as traffic control, sanitation and garbage collection, organizing for snow to be cleared off the streets, and generally ensuring that life continued in as nondisruptive a manner as possible under the circumstances. In addition, the hope was that the ghetto police would be able to serve as a force to prevent crime—a desperate need in view of the poverty and overcrowding that characterized ghetto life.

As the Holocaust proceeded from 1941 onward, the Jewish ghetto police were used by the Nazis as an agency to assist in the process of rounding up and deporting Jews to the death camps. Unfortunately, this often resulted in an excessive use of violence and even cruelty, as the ghetto police attempted to ensure that they would themselves be spared through the demonstration of their efficiency and effectiveness in carrying out the dictates of the Judenrat (which is to say, the Nazis from whose orders they proceeded).

All too often, however, members of the Jewish ghetto police and their families were murdered along with other ghetto Jews (particularly during the Holocaust's most murderous phase in 1942 and 1943) once it was deemed by the Nazis that their effectiveness had come to an end. For many, this was directly opposite to their initial reasons for joining the police in the first place, as membership in what was recognized as a protected part of the ghetto administration was seen to provide some measure of immunity from persecution. Such immunity also extended to the obtaining of additional benefits such as more food, money, clothing, and shelter; these were often obtained as a result of a notorious level of corruption and intimidation practiced by the more unscrupulous members of the ghetto police. In the long run, in most cases it did not matter whether a police officer compromised his values in order to keep his family safe; indeed, some remained at their posts right up to the last moment, when they were themselves deported. Others left the police service long before, unable to look their neighbors in the eye—even though they had joined initially with the belief that by joining they would have an opportunity to serve their community.

One of the characteristics of ghetto life in many places was the existence of a resistance movement—sometimes vigorous, other times weak, and yet others relatively unformed. Given that the role of a police force should be the maintenance of law and order, the attitude of the Jewish police toward such movements was mixed. Frequently, the relationship between the resistance and the police was strained; while the former saw the ghetto police as traitors to their

The Jewish Ghetto Police were auxiliary police units organized within the Jewish ghettos of German-occupied Eastern Europe by local Judenrat councils under the ultimate authority of the Nazi occupiers. Unarmed other than with batons, and without any official uniforms, their many tasks included the maintenance of all forms of public order in the ghetto, but they were also employed by the Nazis for securing the deportation of other Jews to concentration and death camps. This photo shows officers of the Jewish Ghetto Police in the Warsaw Ghetto in 1941. (P. K. Knobloch/Galerie Bilderwelt/Getty Images) people who did the Nazis' work for them, the latter saw it as their role to eliminate the threats to the smooth running of the ghetto and not bring down the wrath of the occupiers. Sometimes, the police refused to intervene in resistance activities, or gave assistance to those who would become ghetto fighters; indeed, in certain places some were simultaneously members of both groups.

The Jewish ghetto police forces varied in strength, but, depending on the ghetto, could be relatively large. Probably the biggest was that in the Warsaw Ghetto, numbering up to 2,500 officers and men at its maximum. The ghetto at Łódź had about 1,200, while that in Lvov (Lviv) numbered some 500 Jewish policemen and those in Kovno and Kraków had 200 and 150 respectively. The size of the Jewish ghetto police force depended on the size of the Jewish community.

It is sometimes difficult to pass judgment on the Jewish ghetto police. To a large degree they fall into a similar "gray zone" as the leaders and members of the Judenräte for whom they worked. Each policeman had his own motives for joining the force, behaving in certain ways while in it, and remaining there for as long—or as short—as he did. There are no simple answers to the complex questions posed by the existence of the ghetto police.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Ghettos; Jewish Honor Courts; Jewish Resistance

Further Reading

- Anonymous. The Clandestine History of the Kovno Jewish Ghetto Police. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2014.
- Gutman, Yisrael, and Cynthia Haft (Eds.). Patterns of Jewish Leadership in Nazi Europe, 1933–1945. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1979.
- Perechodnik, Calel. Am I a Murderer? Testament of a Jewish Ghetto Policeman. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 1996.

Jewish Honor Courts

Jewish honor courts were formed as a direct response to the end of World War II and the Holocaust by those who had survived atrocities committed by the Nazis. Known in many languages, by many names, and in many different countries, these were nongovernmental trials conducted by several Jewish social, cultural, and professional organizations against other Jews who had been seen to collaborate with the Nazis in various ways.

The offenses with which they were charged often had to do with questions of honor and integrity, and abuse of power during the war. The honor courts did not hold much in the way of judicial power, though they found other ways in which to punish those found guilty for their alleged crimes. These courts were meant to establish the independence of the European Jewish community following the war, creating a sense of autonomy for those who had survived the Holocaust.

Jews on trial were accused of collaboration with the Nazis. Those charged included, but were not limited to, Jewish community council (Judenrat) members, Jewish ghetto policemen, concentration camp kapos, and Nazi informers. Those who had survived the Holocaust established these courts in order to question the motives of these Jews and bring them to some form of justice.

Honor courts, though taking place throughout Europe, were exceptionally well accepted in postwar Poland. The Central Committee of the Jews in Poland, established officially in 1946, had worked during World War II to provide food, shelter, and basic necessities to suffering Jewish communities throughout the country, particularly after 1944. The Central Committee of the Jews of Poland grew, by 1946, to be the most important Jewish organization in Poland. This organization was able to establish a Jewish honor court in Warsaw following the war. In Poland alone, 175 cases were opened to question a collaborator's honor, and 25 of those brought to trial were prosecuted.

Honor courts were officially disbanded in 1950. The number of those accused was not large, but the courts themselves held a serious meaning to the Jewish community following World War II. The courts allowed the Jewish community to represent themselves in solidarity and finally to bring at least a modicum of closure to those communities most affected by the destruction wrought by the Holocaust.

DANIELLE JEAN DREW

See also: Collaboration; Jewish Ghetto Police; Judenrat

Further Reading

- Gross, Jan Tomasz. Fear: Anti-semitism in Poland after Auschwitz. New York: Random House, 2006.
- Jockusch, Laura, and Gabriel N. Finder (Eds.). Jewish Honor Courts: Revenge, Retribution, and Reconciliation in Europe and Israel after the Holocaust. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2015.
- Zimmerman, Joshua D. (Ed.). Contested Memories: Poles and Jews during the Holocaust and Its Aftermath. New Brunswick (NJ): Rutgers University Press, 2003.

Jewish Military Union

The Żydowski Związek Wojskowy, or ŻZW, was an underground military organization active in the Warsaw Ghetto during the Holocaust. At its maximum strength, it numbered approximately 250 fighters. Comprising young Jews from the Betar Zionist Youth Movement, it was supported politically by right-wing Revisionist Zionists and was formed in November 1939 from among Jewish former officers who had served in the defeated Polish Army. At the end of December 1939 an initial form of resistance organization was established under the title Żydowski Związek Walki, or Jewish Combat Union. It was then formally sanctioned on January 30, 1940, by General Władysław Sikorski, commander in chief of the Polish forces and prime minister of the Polish Government in Exile, then in France (and soon to be relocated to Britain).

At first, ŻZW operations focused on acquiring arms in advance of a possible extensive scheme that would see the fighters fight their way through Poland to neutral Hungary, from where they could join the Polish army in exile. Given the fortunes of war, however, the decision was made to remain in Poland and help to organize resistance there. The ŻZW, which had developed a solid working relationship with a larger resistance organization, the Union of Armed Struggle (Związek Walki Zbrojnej, or ZWZ), was able to receive forms of weaponry and military training for its otherwise civilian members.

Over time, its activities translated into an active preparation for armed struggle for Jews in the ghettos, which were being formed throughout Poland in 1940. The ZWZ, which existed from November 13, 1939, was renamed the Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK) in February 14, 1942, at which point it became Poland's leading underground organization and military force, closely linked to the Polish Government in Exile.

Though starting in Warsaw, the ŻZW spread to other towns and cities in Poland over the next two years. Given that it had a strong Jewish youth movement component from the start, it attracted interest from members of several Jewish political parties from before the war; these embraced Betar, the Revisionist movement HaTzohar, and Revisionists within the Polish Zionist Party.

The actual number of ŻZW fighters able to take part when the Uprising began in April 1943 is unclear, but it was at least 240 to 250. This grew to about 400 well-armed fighters, grouped into 11 units, by the time the Uprising took hold. The military leader of the ŻZW was Paweł Frenkiel; its political chair was David Wdowiński, who, unlike most of the other operatives of the organization, was not a military commander (though his role served an important ideological function).

Political tensions between the ŻZW and the left-leaning Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB), led by Mordecai Anielewicz, Yitzhak Zuckerman, and Marek Edelman, threatened to derail prospects of unified anti-Nazi action. But with the onset of large-scale deportation offensives by the Nazis against the Jews of Warsaw in the summer of 1942, both groups saw little alternative but to work together and mount a united opposition.

Given that many of the members of the ŻZW came from the Revisionist movement's Betar youth wing, were connected with the Polish Home Army, and had a more nationalistic and right-wing perspective than the ŻOB, it could have been anticipated that there would have been tension. However, as it was the latter body that had greater numbers, more resources, and a more extensive youth basis, it became the ranking resistance organization in the ghetto and dominated with regard to strategy and time.

While the fighting in the uprising was united when the Warsaw Ghetto rose in revolt on April 19, 1943—and the sacrifices were shared, with massive casualties from both groups—the rancor characterizing the relationship intensified even as the fight was taking place. Wdowiński and others claimed that the ŻOB refused to incorporate them into the overall command structure; the ŻOB, in turn, held that the more nationalistic ŻZW wanted to take over. That they managed to fight alongside each other was a development brought about through sheer necessity and the desperation of the situation.

ŻZW actions during the uprising took place on Muranowska Street, where ŻZW headquarters was located (four units under Frenkiel and another under Roman Winsztok) and Miła Street (units under Dawid M. Apfelbaum and Jan Pika); in actions near Zamenhof Street (Heniek Federbusz's unit); and in the district around Nalewki Street (Leizer Staniewicz and Dawid Berliński's units), among other locations. When the ghetto resistance was finally broken, surviving ŻZW members fled through the sewers to the Aryan side of Warsaw and continued the fight alongside nationalist Poles from there. There was little doubt that the ŻZW fought heroically and played a major role in the revolt, but with many of the military leaders of the ŻZW dead, David Wdowiński was one of the last authority figures remaining by the end of the war.

After the war a struggle broke out over how the Warsaw Ghetto resistance should be remembered. Surviving commanders of the left-leaning ŻOB rarely, if ever, mentioned the ŻZW's role in the uprising, preferring to emphasize its proletarian nature. This fit in well with the changed political realities of Poland after the country's takeover by the Soviet Union, as well as with the political orientation of the socialist-Zionist youth movements from which the ŻOB was originally formed.

It left only Dawid Wdowiński to mount any sort of defense on behalf of his fellow-fighters from the ŻZW. In 1963, in New York, he published his memoirs, And We Are Not Saved. In this he gave his interpretation of the ŻZW's involvement in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, writing the truth as he saw it in contrast to what had by now become conventional wisdom from the perspective of the ŻOB. Among other things, he noted the leftist political orientation of those who were not from the ŻZW or the Polish Home Army. The book was never translated into Polish, nor released there. The contested memory concerning the relationship between the ŻZW and the ŻOB during the Uprising became internalized in many recollections of the event, so often that it became something of a historical truth.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Fighting Organization; Jewish Partisans; Jewish Resistance; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising

Further Reading

- Apfelbaum, Marian. Two Flags: Return to the Warsaw Ghetto. Jerusalem: Gefen, 2007.
- Arens, Moshe. Flags over the Warsaw Ghetto: The Untold Story of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Jerusalem: Gefen, 2011.
- Kurzman, Dan. The Bravest Battle: The Twenty-Eight Days of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. New York: Putnam, 1976.
- Wdowiński, David. And We Are Not Saved. New York: Philosophical Library, 1963.

Jewish Partisans

Jewish partisans were individuals who conducted a variety of guerrilla and paramilitary operations in enemy-held territory during World War II. Jewish partisans operated in numerous countries between 1939 and 1945 and numbered between 20,000 and 30,000. Most were men, but there were also Jewish women who engaged in partisan activities. Partisans engaged in sabotage (e.g., blowing up bridges, derailing trains, ripping up rail tracks, damaging or destroying factories), sniping at German soldiers, bombing police or military headquarters, fomenting ghetto uprisings, facilitating ghetto and prison escapes, assassinating collaborators, and general guerrilla warfare.

Being a partisan was not for the faint of heart. It required extraordinary bravery and cunning as well as the ability to withstand challenging living conditions. Finding adequate shelter, especially in winter, was always a challenge, as was keeping warm. All too often partisans dared not light fires for warmth out of fear that the smoke would reveal their location. Finding food was also a significant challenge, and sometimes the partisans had to resort to force to extract food from farmers and villagers. Malnutrition and a complete lack of medical care were always daunting challenges. Many partisans were either unarmed or very lightly armed and lived in constant fear of enemy patrols. On top of these problems, most partisans had to deal with overt antisemitism from the noncombatant or neutral communities among whom they operated. And the threat of brutal German reprisals was never far off. In some cases, after partisans killed German soldiers or personnel, the Germans would order wholesale reprisals, demanding that 20 Jews be killed for every German death. Many Jews killed in this manner were not even partisans themselves.

Partisans operated against the Germans and their collaborators in Lithuania, Belarus, Ukraine, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Italy, and France, among other countries. Some lived brazenly in the open in France and Italy, using stolen or forged documents and identity cards while conducting sabotage and other anti-German activities clandestinely. Others purposely hid themselves in remote, densely forested areas and rugged territory, where the enemy would be less apt to find them.

There are many examples of individual and group partisan action during the war. In July 1941 the Nazis established a huge ghetto for Jews in Minsk, Belarus. After the Germans killed several thousand Jews there, a group of internees established an underground resistance movement in August 1941. That group contacted partisans outside the ghetto, helped certain ghetto dwellers to escape, and organized a larger escape effort that ultimately succeeded. Those who left the ghetto took up residence in nearby forests and engaged in guerrilla activity against the Germans. It is estimated that as many as 10,000 Jews escaped the Minsk ghetto by 1944.

In early 1942 Jewish partisans in Toulouse, France, founded the Jewish Army, which became a potent resistance and partisan group, especially in southern France. The army trained partisans in guerrilla warfare, raised money to help Jews escape to neutral Spain, and helped Jews in France survive the German occupation. In early 1944 near Vilna (Vilnius), Lithuania, Jewish partisans formed the United Partisan Organization, which fomented an uprising in the Vilna ghetto in the fall of 1943. Many Jews escaped into the woods and surrounding countryside and subsequently engaged in guerrilla warfare and sabotage operations against the Germans. In 1944, as the Allies systematically liberated France, the Jewish Army incited rebellions in Lyon, Paris, and Toulouse in order to distract the Germans and force them to divert their military forces from the fighting front.

In late May 1944 a Hungarian-born Jewish paratrooper trained in Palestine to rescue Jews, Hannah Szenes, was among 32 paratroopers who were dropped behind German lines in Central Europe. Szenes was supposed to make her way to Hungary to warn Jews there about Nazi extermination camps and the Germans' plans to relocate them there. On June 7, 1944, she crossed the border into Hungary but was captured the next day. She was later tortured and executed as a Hungarian traitor.

Other Jewish partisans included the Bielski Partisans in Belarus, who managed to rescue more than 1,200 Jews and committed acts of sabotage while hidden deep in a dense forest; the Parczew Partisans, who operated in southeastern Poland; and the Jewish Fighting Organization and the Jewish Military Union, which were two partisan groups that engineered the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in April and May 1943.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Armée Juive; Bielski Partisans; Jewish Fighting Organization; Jewish Military Union; Jewish Resistance; Kempner, Vitka; Korczak, Rozka; Kovner, Abba; Rufeisen, Oswald; Szenes, Hannah; United Partisan Organization; Wrobel, Eta; Yoran, Shalom

Further Reading

- Ainsztein, Reuben. Jewish Resistance in Nazi-Occupied Eastern Europe: With a Historical Survey of the Jew as Fighter and Soldier in the Diaspora. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.
- Epstein, Barbara. The Minsk Ghetto, 1941–1943: Jewish Resistance and Soviet Internationalism. Berkeley (CA): University of California Press, 2008.
- Glass, James M. Jewish Resistance during the Holocaust: Moral Uses of Violence and Will. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Langbein, Hermann. Against All Hope: Resistance in the Nazi Concentration Camps, 1938–1945. New York: Paragon, 1994.
- Latour, Anny. The Jewish Resistance in France (1940–1944). New York: Holocaust Library, 1970.
- Suhl, Yuri (Ed.). They Fought Back: The Story of the Jewish Resistance in Nazi Europe. New York: Crown, 1967.

Jewish Question

The so-called “Jewish Question” (German, die Judenfrage)—that is, the integrative role of the Jews in Western culture and nation-states—precedes the rise of Adolf Hitler and Nazism in Germany. Prior to France granting the Jews the right to vote as citizens in 1789, what to do with this minority was already being discussed in England, resulting in the “Jew Bill” of 1753 (officially passed by Parliament as the “Jewish Nationalization Act”) and its near-immediate repeal in 1754. Almost one hundred years before the rise of Nazis, German historian and theologian Bruno Bauer wrote a book titled The Jewish Question, arguing strenuously that in order for the Jews to achieve full emancipation in society and equality within the nation state, they would have to abandon their religious parochialism in favor of a more secular (that is, nonreligious) position. Perhaps somewhat ironically, the father of socialism-communism, Karl Marx, himself of Jewish parentage but baptized in infancy by his father and already living in England, responded with his own tract On the Jewish Question (German, Zur Judenfrage), critiquing Bauer and arguing that religion—any religion—is part and parcel of society, but that individuals tied to it, Jews included, are participants in an oppressive socioeconomic-political system, and that true liberation for the individual must result in a rejection of all manner of religious identification. Scholars remain divided, however, as to whether Marx furthered the arguments of antisemitism or rejected them. Not so as regards Bauer, against whom the consensus is decidedly that his “solution” was, indeed, antisemitic.

The year of Hitler’s birth, 1889, saw the rise of the Antisemitic German Social Party, a merger of a number of already acknowledged antisemitic groups committed to displacing the Jews in German social, cultural, and political life, and included such public persons as Max Liebermann von Sonnenberg; Otto Böekel, already a member of the Reichstag; and Adolf Stoecker, chaplain to Kaiser Wilhelm II, Lutheran pastor, and the founder of the Christian Social Party.

Other leading writers and intellectuals in Germany addressing this “Jewish Question” included Wilhelm Marr (The Victory of Judaism over Germanism, 1879); Karl Eugen Düring (The Parties and the Jewish Question, 1881); Theodor Fritzsche (The Handbook of the Jewish Question, also known as The Anti-Semitism Catechism, 1893); Houston Stewart Chamberlain (The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century, 1899); and Paul de Lagarde (German Writings, 1878–1881).

Hitler himself addressed the “Jewish Question” in a now-infamous letter to one Adolf Gemlich, a response to a need for clarification initially addressed to Captain Karl Mayr, the head of the Intelligence Section of the Reichswehr (Imperial Defense Force), who turned it over to him. Dated September 16, 1919, and now believed to be Hitler’s first antisemitic writing and revealing himself to be politically motivated while still in uniform after Germany’s defeat, he replied that “The danger posed by Jewry for our people today finds itself expression in the undeniable aversion of wide sections of our people. . . . Antisemitism as a political movement may not and cannot be defined by emotional impulses, but by recognition of the facts. The facts are these: First, Jewry is absolutely a race and not a religious association. . . . In his effects and consequences he is like a racial tuberculosis of the nations.” Hitler deduced from this that “an antisemitism based on purely emotional grounds will find its ultimate expression in the form of a pogrom.” On the other hand, a form of antisemitism based on reason “must lead to systematic legal combating and elimination of the privileges of Jews”—in other words, some form of Aliens Law that will distinguish the Jews from “other aliens who live among us.” The ultimate objective, however, “must . . . be the removal of the Jews in general.”

Hitler would continue to speak out against the Jews, refining his thinking, writing, and understanding of the “Jewish Question.” Thus, with the Nazi takeover of Germany and Hitler’s ascent to the chancellorship, the “Jewish Question” became linked to its resolution; eventually, by 1941 and 1942, this became the “Final Solution to the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage), the evolving plan for the extermination and annihilation of the Jews of Europe in what would later be termed the Holocaust.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Final Solution; Nisko Plan

Further Reading

Fleming, Gerald. Hitler and the Final Solution. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.

Gordon, Sarah Ann. Hitler, Germans, and the Jewish Question. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 1984.

Robertson, Ritchie. The “Jewish Question” in German Literature, 1749–1939: Emancipation and Its Discontents. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Roudinesco, Elisabeth. Revisiting the Jewish Question. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2014.

Jewish Resistance

The Nazis exterminated 6 million Jews during World War II. Those who claim that Jews went meekly, as “sheep to the slaughter,” ignore the many instances of remarkable courage in the face of this staggering crime against humanity. In reality, Jewish resistance took many forms. That it often proved futile reflects the poignant vulnerability of Jews rather than any lack of bravery or courage.

Resistance can be divided into the two general categories of passive and active. Passive resistance took the form of cultural and spiritual endurance and assertiveness. Jews confined to ghettos such as Warsaw continued to practice their culture and religion despite prohibitions. They organized symphonies, drama clubs, schools, and other voluntary and educational associations. They also risked their lives by trading across ghetto walls, despite threats of torture and execution.

Passive resistance drew on a long and esteemed Jewish tradition of outlasting the persecutor. Initially believing that the Nazis and their various European sympathizers wanted to put Jews in their place, not in their graves, Jewish leaders sought to endure discriminatory laws, pogroms, and deportations, hoping for an eventual relaxation of antisemitic policies or perhaps even a defeat on the battlefield.

JEWISH PARTISAN ACTIVITY IN EASTERN EUROPE 1942–1944

Thus, Jewish resistance remained largely nonviolent until 1943, in part because the Germans succeeded in deceiving the Jews. They were helped in this by the fact that the German soldiers of World War I had generally behaved decently, treating Jewish noncombatants humanely. Jews in Poland and the east initially expected similar behavior from the Nazi invaders. Even after it became apparent that Nazi soldiers and especially police were intent on human butchery on a scale previously unimaginable, Jewish cultures that embraced the sanctity and sheer joy of life found it difficult to comprehend a culture built on hate and murderous brutality, especially one that continued to worship civilized icons such as Goethe and Beethoven. Many Jews put their faith in God—hoping for the best, preparing for the worst, yet not daring at first to think the unthinkable.

When Jewish communities and individuals recognized that unthinkable—that the Nazis and their various European allies wanted to exterminate systematically all Jews in Europe—active and armed resistance increased. Active resistance included acts of industrial sabotage in munitions factories and isolated bombings of known Nazi gathering spots. One must recognize, however, the near utter futility of such efforts, given the impossibility of Jews “winning” pitched battles against their killers. The Nazis had machine guns, dogs, and usually superior numbers, and they could call on tanks, artillery, and similar weapons of industrialized modern warfare. The Jewish resisters were often unarmed; at best, some might have pistols or rifles with limited ammunition, perhaps supplemented by a few hand grenades. Such unequal odds often made the final result tragically predictable, yet many Jews decided it was better to die fighting than to face extermination in a death camp.

For example, when it became apparent that they were being deported to Treblinka to be gassed, the Jews of Warsaw at first refused to assemble and then led a ghetto uprising in April 1943, the ferocity of which surprised the Germans. More than 2,000 German soldiers, supported by armored cars, machine guns, flame throwers, and unlimited ammunition, faced approximately 750 Jews with little or no military training. The SS general in command, Jürgen Stroop, estimated he would need two days to suppress the uprising. In fact, he needed a full month, as Jews, armed mainly with pistols, homemade grenades, and Molotov cocktails, fought frantically and ferociously from street to street and bunker to bunker. The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was only the most famous example of nearly 60 other armed uprisings in Jewish ghettos.

Resistance was less common in death camps such as Chełmno and Bełżec, mainly because there was not sufficient time for resistance networks to form. Resistance requires leaders, organization, and weapons. These elements cannot be improvised and employed in a few hours or even days: months of planning and training are required. Despite nearly insurmountable difficulties, however, Jews did revolt in two of the death camps, as well as at Auschwitz-Birkenau and 18 forced labor camps.

One of the most extraordinary acts of Jewish resistance took place at Treblinka. On August 2, 1943, one year after the camp's inauguration, a group of Jewish prisoners rose up, killed their guards, burned the camp, and escaped. Of 600 prisoners who got away, only about 40 survived the war. At Sobibór, on October 14, 1943, a successful revolt by Jewish prisoners took place, in which 11 SS and a number of Ukrainian guards were killed. Three hundred prisoners escaped, though only 50 survived the Second World War. After the revolt, SS chief Heinrich Himmler ordered the camp dismantled and had it converted into a farm.

Jews also participated actively in resistance networks in Poland, the Soviet Union, France, and other countries. Their plight was difficult in the extreme, since antisemitism within these networks often required Jews to hide their ethnicity. In some cells of the Polish resistance, Jews were killed outright. Many Soviet partisans distrusted and exploited Jews; nevertheless, between 20,000 and 30,000 Jews fought as partisans in the Soviet Union against Nazi invaders. In France, Jews made up less than 1% of the population yet 15 to 20% of the French underground. In 1944 nearly 2,000 Jewish resisters in France united to form the Organisation Juive de Combat (Jewish Fighting Organization), which supported Allied military operations by attacking railway lines as well as German military installations and factories.

Impressive as it was, Jewish resistance was always hamstrung for several reasons. In general, Jews lacked combat experience, since many countries forbade Jewish citizens from serving in the military. As with Soviet prisoners of war taken by the Germans, many Jews, especially those confined in ghettos, were weakened by disease and deliberate starvation. Under these conditions, trained Soviet soldiers died with hardly a murmur of protest, so it is not surprising that Jewish families who had never been exposed to the hardships of war would likewise succumb.

The Nazis succeeded in creating a Hobbesian state of nature in which people were so focused on surviving from hour to hour that their struggles consumed virtually all their energy and attention. Dissension within Jewish communities also inhibited resistance, with older Jews and members of the Judenräte, or Jewish councils, tending to support a policy of limited cooperation with the Nazis, hoping that by contributing to the German war effort they might thereby preserve the so-called productive elements of Jewish communities.

More controversially, Jewish resistance was hampered by weak and irresolute international support. Although Western leaders often condemned Nazi actions, they took little action. Official Catholic and Protestant statements were equally tentative. Irresolute and sporadic support unintentionally played into the hands of the Nazis as they planned for Jewish extermination.

Observant Jews put their faith in God, with Jewish culture in general tending to disavow militant actions. Confronted by murderous killing squads possessing all the tools of industrialized mass warfare, some Jews nevertheless resisted courageously, both passively and actively. That their resistance often ended tragically does not mean that it failed.

WILLIAM J. ASTORE

See also: Algeria; Armée Juive; Auschwitz; Bauer, Yehuda; Baum, Herbert; Beck, Gad; Bialystok Ghetto; Bloch, Marc; Bretholz, Leo; Cohn, Marianne; Comité de Défense des Juifs; Jewish Fighting Organization; Jewish Ghetto Police; Jewish Military Union; Jewish Partisans; Kaplan, Chaim A.; Katzenelson, Itzhak; Latvia; Lubetkin, Zivia; Meed, Vladka; Milchberg, Irving; Pechersky, Alexander; Resistance Movements; Robotka, Roza; Rosenbaum, Pinchas; Rufeisen, Oswald; Sobibór; Treblinka; United Partisan Organization; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Weltsch, Robert; Zygielbojm, Shmuel

Further Reading

Gutman, Israel. Resistance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Levin, Dov. Fighting Back: Lithuanian Jewry's Armed Resistance to the Nazis, 1941–1945. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.

Tec, Nechama. Resistance: Jews and Christians Who Defied the Nazi Terror. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2013.

When Adolf Hitler and the Nazis came to power in January 1933, they began to implement laws that would push Jews out of German society and culture. Over the course of five years, between 1933 and 1938, these laws forced Jews out of their jobs, prevented them from using public spaces, and limited their contact with gentiles. Germany became a segregated society, and Jews second-class citizens (and, eventually, not citizens at all). These laws affected Jewish men and women in different ways. As in most countries at the time, men were the primary breadwinners. Nazi anti-Jewish laws forced most Jewish men out of the workforce. But families still needed money. Many Jewish women found work within the Jewish community to try to make ends meet.

Relationships between men and women changed because of Nazi anti-Jewish policy. In addition to losing jobs, men also found it more difficult to be in public spaces; they were targeted for violence and found their loss of work embarrassing. Jewish men stayed home while Jewish women took on outside responsibilities including filling out paperwork to emigrate, acquiring food, and interacting with their gentile neighbors. Traditionally female skills—stretching food and budgets, sewing and cleaning—became important as both means of survival and sources of income. This sometimes caused tension. Disagreement arose about emigration—to leave Germany or to stay. Men typically favored staying; women, leaving. Many factors figured into this discussion, but ultimately more men left.

Nazi anti-Jewish policy escalated at the end of 1938 as a result of individual and international refusal to oppose Hitler's domestic and foreign policies. The Evian Conference in July 1938 indicated that few countries would help to facilitate Jewish migration from Germany. Two other events in 1938, the German annexation of Austria (March) and the crisis surrounding the Sudetenland (October) showed that no country would stand up to the Nazis militarily. Jews had nowhere to go and no one to help them. Hitler's response was the November pogrom known as Kristallnacht, or the Night of Broken Glass. On November 9–10, the Nazis staged their first nationwide, coordinated attack on the Jewish community. Members of the SA and the SS burned down synagogues, looted stores, and broke into homes. They killed hundreds of Jewish men and sent tens of thousands to concentration camps. Women were left to clean up the mess. They spent their time and energy helping men get out of the camps and then out of the country. The Jewish community was forced to pay damages.

With the start of World War II and the rapid conquest and occupation of Poland and Western Europe by mid-1940,

Jewish Women and the Holocaust

During the Nazi era, Jewish women were subjected to the same laws as Jewish men, but how the Nazis applied these laws to women and how women responded mark a difference in experience from that of Jewish men.

all Jews in Europe came under Nazi attack. They rapidly became impoverished and isolated; they had limited options of where to live and virtually no opportunity to leave Europe. In the West until 1942, most Jews remained in their own homes. In Poland, they were forced into ghettos, where they resided until deportations began. In either case, women responded much as women in Germany had when the Nazis came to power. They tried to help their families get by. They found work and they stretched food, other supplies, and budgets.

With the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1942, violence against Jews escalated once again. German policy evolved into genocide that began as mass shootings of Jewish people throughout Eastern Europe by mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen). There was little time to respond, and most Jewish communities in Eastern Europe were destroyed in their entirety. The killing squads killed every Jewish man, woman, and child they could reach (approximately 1.8 million people). In some cases, women suffered the additional attack of rape before being shot.

Shortly after the mobile killing squads went into action, the Nazis developed death camps, where Jews were shipped to be killed. These six camps (Chelmno, Belzec, Sobibór, Treblinka, Majdanek, and Auschwitz) were created in whole or in part to gas to death the Jews of Poland and Western Europe. They were distinct from other camps in the Nazi concentration camp system. As with killing squads, most people were killed immediately upon arrival. However, the journey to the camps and the experiences of the small number of people who were not killed immediately can be distinguished along gender lines.

Women at that time were the primary caretakers of children. Therefore, if they had children or young relatives, they were often near them during transit and took responsibility for their care and protection. This included breastfeeding and pregnancy—experiences that men did not have. In addition, menstruation may have added to their discomfort in transit during which personal hygiene became impossible to maintain. Upon arrival in the camps, the small number of people not sent to the gas chambers was selected based primarily on their perceived ability to perform slave labor for the Germans. Women, whether because they were viewed as physically weaker or because they had accompanying children, were typically sent immediately to the gas chambers along with the very young and the elderly.

Some, however, were admitted to the camps as laborers. The conditions they experienced tended to be as bad as and sometimes worse than those for men. They received little food and were forced to perform various types of hard labor. They suffered from disease, starvation, filth, overcrowding, sleep deprivation, and violence. Under such circumstances, a majority of women died within months of arrival in Auschwitz. They often lived longer in other labor camps. In these conditions, it was extremely difficult to maintain relationships and feelings of dignity and humanity. Most women tried to connect with other women and create bonds of mutual responsibility: they shared food, stories, learning, religion, and political ideas. Men created similar kinds of relationships, but their groups tended to be smaller. In camps, women faced sexual violence from guards and other prisoners. Sometimes women became pregnant, and if discovered, they would be killed. Camp doctors (other prisoners themselves) performed abortions either with or without the knowledge of the pregnant woman, so that at least she might survive.

The effort to connect with others was the major form of resistance in camps and ghettos for both men and women; however, other forms of resistance also occurred. Women tried to escape from ghettos and camps, but less frequently and in smaller numbers than men. If they did escape, they may have had an easier time hiding because they were less easy to identify as Jewish. They had more difficulty than men in engaging in armed resistance, except in ghettos. Most partisan groups did not welcome women. When they were permitted, they often were forced into one sexual relationship so that other men would not attack them. Occasionally, women became fighters, but more often they were assigned supportive roles like cooking and washing. Women were involved in uprisings in ghettos and camps including the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and the October 1944 Sonderkommando uprising in Auschwitz-Birkenau. In the latter, women smuggled gunpowder from a munitions factory to the Sonderkommando. Four women were hanged in January 1945 as a result of this activity.

Jewish women's experiences and responses during the Holocaust illustrate that although the Nazis targeted all Jews for murder, individuals experienced persecution in different ways. Each person responded as best he or she could with the limited resources at their disposal.

SARAH CUSHMAN

See also: Death Camps; Ravensbrück

Further Reading

Hedgepeth, Sonja, and Rochelle G. Saidel (Eds.). Sexual Violence against Jewish Women during the Holocaust. Lebanon (NH): University Press of New England, 2010.

Helm, Sarah. Ravensbrück: Life and Death in Hitler's Concentration Camp for Women. New York: Nan E. Talese/Doubleday, 2015.

Ofer, Dalia, and Lenore Weitzman (Eds.). Women in the Holocaust. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998.

Roth, John, and Carol Rittner (Eds.). Different Voices: Women and the Holocaust. St. Paul: Paragon House, 1993.

Joint Distribution Committee

The history of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (known throughout the Jewish world as “The Joint,” or JDC) may be subsumed under four headings: (1) founding to World War II; (2) World War II and the Holocaust; (3) the aftermath of the Holocaust; and (4) the present day.

At the start of World War I, approximately 60,000 Jews were living in Ottoman-controlled Palestine, the majority of whom were originally from Europe and dependent upon monies sent by their brethren at home for their very sustenance and survival. Significantly, the war began to destroy the pipeline, and, in their desperation the Jews appealed to the American ambassador to Turkey, Henry Morgenthau Sr., who would, at the same time, also champion the genocidal plight of Armenian Christians. Morgenthau, on August 31, 1914, sent a telegram to two of his friends, American-Jewish banker and philanthropist Jacob Schiff, and lawyer and American-Jewish communal leader Louis Marshall, asking for US $50,000 to ease the plight of these unfortunate Jews. By October 25 they had formed the Central Committee for the Relief of Jews Suffering through the War, composed largely of German American Reform Jews and including among their leadership banker Felix M. Warburg. Earlier that same month, on October 4, Orthodox Jews had formed their own committee under the leadership of Leon Kamaiky, while the socialist People's Relief Committee under the leadership of Meyer London had their own organization. The ongoing crisis in the Middle East, however, and the necessity of getting the required monies to those most in need mandated their coming together, and on November 27 “the Joint” was formed.

World War I itself also mandated an expansion of their activities as the fate of Jews in the countries that were to become Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary—literally and physically caught in the crossfire of opposing militaries—necessitated their relief efforts. By the end of 1917, more than $2,000,000 went to Russian Jewish relief efforts, $3,000,000 to Polish and Lithuanian efforts, and more than $1,000,000 to Galician efforts, with smaller amounts directed to other localities. Between 1921 and 1922 the JDC expended more than $22,000,000 in relief.

With the war at an end, the JDC refocused its efforts on rehabilitating and reconstructing those same now-devastated communities and included Soviet Jews as well. Efforts were directed toward medicine, sanitation, childcare, and education. In 1924 the JDC set up the American Jewish Joint Agricultural Corporation (Agro-Joint) with the Soviets, and resettled more than 600,000 Jews in the Crimea and Ukraine, only to be expelled in 1938.

With the takeover of the Nazis in Germany in 1933, and prior to America's entry into the war in 1941, the JDC began directing its efforts toward German and Austrian Jews whose lives were increasingly restricted and threatened; more than $5,000,000 was expended vis-à-vis medical care, schools, vocational education, and welfare-related programs. Between 1933 and 1939 almost 200,000 Jews, aided by the JDC, were able to leave Germany, almost 100,000 of whom left Europe altogether. Jews in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, often surreptitiously, were also recipients of JDC aid. As of 1941, JDC representatives were still able to operate, and continued to do so underground in such as places as Warsaw, Kraków, and other places.

The Joint, with only limited resources, made valuable efforts to provide relief and rescue to the Jews of Europe during the Holocaust. Over time, it emerged as the only Jewish organization involved in immigration, refugee aid, and rescue operations throughout the world. Arguably, it could be suggested that hundreds of thousands of Jews who managed to escape from Nazi Europe did so as a result of JDC efforts.

Post-World War II efforts were initially directed toward enabling Europe's surviving Jews to emigrate to pre-state Israel (Palestine), and more than 115,000 successfully made the journey. Additionally, support for those living in displaced persons camps in Germany, Austria, and Italy, numbering more than 600,000 Jews, was also a primary concern of the JDC. With the birth of the State of Israel in May 1948, the JDC helped more than 440,000 Jews from Europe, the Middle East, and North Africa migrate to Israel in such actions as Operation Magic Carpet (1948) for the Jews of Yemen, Operation Ezra (1951–1952) for the Jews of Iraq and Kurdistan, and later Operation Solomon (1991) for the Jews of Ethiopia.

Since 1948 Israel has remained a primary focus of the JDC's activities, especially the care of aged immigrants and those with handicaps. Two programs stand out in this regard: Malben, the Organization for the Care of Handicapped Immigrants; and Eshel, the Association for the Planning and Development of Services for the Aged. In each case, the Joint works in concert with both the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government. It also continues its work in Central and Eastern Europe and the countries of the former Soviet Union, addressing poverty among Jews living there, as well as in Africa, Asia, and South America. Overall, the Joint operates in more than 70 countries and has joined with other relief organizations to aid in mega-tragedies such as earthquakes (for example, in the aftermath of the 2010 Haiti earthquake) and economic chaos (the ongoing financial problems in Argentina).

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Austria; Czechoslovakia; Displaced Persons; Hungary; Poland

Further Reading

Bauer, Yehuda. American Jewry and the Holocaust: The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 1939–1945. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1981.

Bauer, Yehuda. My Brother's Keeper: A History of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 1929–1939. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1974.

Handlin, Oscar. A Continuing Task: The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 1914–1964. New York: Random House, 1964.

Kochavi, Arieh. "British Involvement of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Illegal Immigration in Palestine." Immigrants and Minorities 8, 3 (1989): 223–234.

Shactman, Tom. I Seek My Brethren: Ralph Goldman and "the Joint." Rescue, Relief, and Reconstruction. New York: William Morrow, 2001.

Jonas, Regina

Regina Jonas was a unique woman; during the 1930s she was the first (and, to that point, only) female rabbi, anywhere. She was born in Berlin on August 3, 1902, the daughter of Wolf and Sara Jonas, and grew up in the Scheunenviertel, a poor, mostly Jewish neighborhood. Her father was a merchant; when Regina was 11, he died of tuberculosis, leaving her mother to take care of herself, her son Abraham, and Regina.

At high school, Regina's passions for Jewish history, the Bible, and Hebrew led her to develop an interest in what at the time was unthinkable for a girl: she wanted to become a rabbi. She spoke about it often with her fellow students and studied hard in order to be able to teach. She enrolled in Berlin's Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums (Higher Institute for Jewish Studies) and took courses designed for liberal student rabbis.

In 1935 Regina Jonas became the first woman to be ordained as a rabbi. The Nazi intensification of anti-Jewish measures made it impossible for her to conduct regular synagogue services, so she worked consistently as a teacher of religion while clandestinely ministering to Jewish communities. In November 1942 she was arrested by the Gestapo and deported to the concentration camp at Theresienstadt. Working there as a teacher and rabbi, she was deported to Auschwitz in mid-October 1944, where she was murdered. (ZUMA Press, Inc./Alamy Stock Photo)

Several people supported her along the way, leading Orthodox rabbis among them. She was even tutored in a weekly shiur (study session) by Rabbi Max Weyl, until his deportation to Theresienstadt during World War II. In 1924 she graduated as an "Academic Teacher of Religion," along with her fellow female students. She then became the only woman who hoped to go one step further and be ordained a rabbi.

The thesis that followed would, in the normal run of events, have been required as one of the important steps leading to ordination. Supervised by Professor Eduard Baneth, who was responsible for rabbinic ordination, her thesis was titled, "Can a Woman Be a Rabbi According to Halachic Sources?" Submitted in June 1930, this was the first known attempt to find a basis in Jewish religious law that would allow for female ordination. Her conclusion was that there was no prohibition in law holding women back from being ordained.

Her work received a grade of “good,” which should have paved the way for ordination. Shortly after the thesis had been passed, however, Professor Baneth died and his conservative successor, Rabbi Hanoch Albeck, refused to ordain her because she was a woman. The result saw Regina graduate as a teacher of religion—but only that.

After the Nazis came to power in early 1933, there was an increased demand for Jewish religious teachers. Jewish children were forced out of public schools and into Jewish establishments, and “Miss Jonas” worked hard to impart both Jewish knowledge and Ahavat Yisroel (a love of the Jewish people) to her pupils.

Throughout the years following, she continued to pursue ordination, until finally, in 1935, Rabbi Max Dienemann agreed. On December 27, 1935, she became Rabbinerin Regina Jonas. She began working as a chaplain in various Jewish organizations, though as a woman she was denied a pulpit by congregations across Germany. The spiritual head of German Jewry, Rabbi Leo Baeck, endorsed her ordination after the fact, though he refused to assist in the process leading her to the rabbinate on the ground that a female rabbi, at that time in German Jewish history, would have caused massive and unnecessary complications within the Jewish community.

In the years that followed, Regina threw herself into pastoral work. Although she did not have her own pulpit, she spent long hours visiting the sick in Berlin’s Jewish Hospital, and she cared especially for elderly Jews whom circumstances—whether through age or finances—had left in a precarious position. With the onset of war she became a roving rabbi, ministering to Jewish communities in towns that no longer had one.

In 1941 she led special services in lieu of regular worship, such activity no longer being viable in smaller communities from where large-scale emigration had taken place. Her messages were always positive, emphasizing the need to remain true to Judaism and a Jewish identity despite the horrors taking place outside.

On November 6, 1942, Regina and her mother were deported to Theresienstadt. Two days beforehand she was forced to fill out a declaration listing all her property; this was then confiscated by the state.

At Theresienstadt she continued working. Here, as well as counseling older Jews, she also spent a lot of her time and energy preaching to children about the glory of being Jewish and the privilege of doing God’s work. She helped the renowned Austrian Jewish psychoanalyst Viktor Frankl in establishing a department of mental hygiene as a means to prevent suicide attempts.

Working without a break for two years, she lectured, preached, counseled, and gave hope constantly to those around her. Being a “woman rabbi” was never a concern to her—being a rabbi was. She was aware of her unique status, but considered that to be only a temporary uniqueness; her hope was that she would be the harbinger of more to follow.

On October 12, 1944, time ran out. Rabbi Regina and her mother were deported to Auschwitz and probably killed that day or the next. There is no certainty, however; it could even have been as late as December of that year.

Among her papers, found in 1991 by Dr. Katharina von Kellenbach from St. Mary’s College of Maryland, was a sermon that could have been her epitaph: “May all our work be a blessing for Israel’s future (and the future of humanity). . . . Upright ‘Jewish men’ and ‘brave, noble women’ were always the sustainers of our people. May we be found worthy by God to be numbered in the circle of these women and men. . . . The reward of a mitzvah is the recognition of the great deed by God.”

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Theresienstadt

Further Reading

Klapheck, Elisa. Fräulien Rabbiner Jonas: The Story of the First Woman Rabbi. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2004.

Silverman, Emily Leah. Edith Stein and Regina Jonas: Religious Visionaries in the Time of the Death Camps. Durham (UK): Acumen, 2013.

Jud Süß

A novel written in Germany in 1925 by Jewish author Lion Feuchtwanger and translated into English as Power. Feuchtwanger’s writings had been suppressed during World War I because of what was held to be their revolutionary content, and he became one of the earliest critics of Hitler and the Nazis. He was forced into exile in London by the Nazis in 1934. In Jud Süß (Jew Suss), he chronicled the story of a powerful ghetto businessman, Oppenheimer, who believes himself to be a Jew. His ruthless business practices result in the betrayal of an innocent girl; for this he is arrested and sentenced to death, the victim of anti-Jewish laws. Rather than turn against the Jews of the ghetto by declaring his non-Jewish identity, which he discovers through a set of letters given to him by his mother revealing that his father was in fact a Christian nobleman, he dies on the gallows with dignity and honor.

Feuchtwanger intended the book to be an attack against antisemitism, an allegory on German society for his own day. It was picked up by the Nazis, however, and transformed into a viciously antisemitic movie in 1940. It was directed by Veit Harlan and starred Werner Krauss in the title role. The plot was twisted to show Oppenheimer as a real Jew, portrayed according to Nazi stereotypes: greasy hair, hooked nose, unscrupulous, bearded, cowardly, and a rapist. At his arrest and execution, he is seen as screaming and unmanly; by contrast his executioners appear to be upright, solid citizens. After Oppenheimer's execution, the rest of the Jews of the city are driven into exile. As a piece of propaganda cinema, the movie had a powerful effect on its audiences, helping to prepare the German public for further atrocities against Jews. Many viewed it as though it were a documentary and were driven to acts of violence against Jews in the street after having seen it. Heinrich Himmler, the head of the SS, ordered all members of the various official bodies under his command to see the movie; this extended to local police and concentration camp guards. Its effectiveness as a propaganda tool was thus not limited to the general public, as it was used in order to achieve specific dehumanizing goals regarding the perceived racial enemy, and to whip up violence against that enemy. Veit Harlan was later tried for crimes against humanity by the Allies at Nuremberg, but his case was dismissed due to a lack of direct evidence implicating him in the destruction of the Jews.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Antisemitism; Marian, Ferdinand; Propaganda in the Holocaust

Further Reading

Feuchtwanger, Lion. Jud Süß. Berlin: Verlag von th. knauer nachf, 1931.

Tegel, Susan. Jew Süß. Life, Legend, Fiction, Film. London: Bloomsbury, 2011.

Judenrat

The Judenräte (singular, Judenrat) were Jewish community councils set up by the Nazis during their occupation of Poland and Eastern Europe during World War II. They were established to maintain order in the Jewish ghettos.

On September 21, 1939, shortly after the Polish invasion, Reinhard Heydrich and Adolf Eichmann, leaders of the Gestapo, established the Judenräte during their relocation of Jews to ghettos in Poland. A Judenrat was a group of 24

Jewish community leaders, often but not always rabbis, who were responsible for community services and governance like education, sanitation, and policing. The Judenrat also helped provide food for the impoverished ghettos. The ghettos often differed greatly from one another, as did the methods of governing. Some Judenräte also controlled commerce within the community, including tax collections.

The relationships between the Judenräte and the Nazis were often troubled, and ghetto inhabitants targeted their anger at the Nazis against members of the Judenrat because they were often seen as collaborators for enforcing Nazi laws. The Nazis used the ghettos to consolidate and demoralize the Jews in order to make extermination easier. The Nazis allowed the ghettos very few supplies, and residents blamed the Judenrat. Thousands of Jews died in the ghettos from starvation and diseases like typhus.

By late 1941 Nazi control of the ghettos had grown stricter. The Judenräte were soon put in charge of supplying the Nazis with lists of capable workers in their communities. The chosen workers were issued a limited number of work permits and allowed to stay, while those who did not receive permits were sent to concentration camps. The chairman of the Warsaw Judenrat, Adam Czerniakow, killed himself rather than choose who would die and who would live. Other leaders who refused to participate were often killed, while yet others became the nucleus for covert resistance activities.

As the Nazis' intentions became clearer, some Jews began leading such armed insurrections as the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. These insurrectionists often killed Judenrat leaders because they opposed insurrection as a challenge to law and order in the ghetto. Almost all of the Judenrat leaders were killed before the end of the war. Although the leaders were faced with incomprehensible duties, many Holocaust survivors and historians have blamed their maintenance of law and order for making it easier for the Nazis to implement the Final Solution.

PHILIP J. MACFARLANE

See also

Arendt, Hannah; Bauer, Yehuda; Czerniakow, Adam; Gens, Jacob; Ghettos; Jewish Honor Courts; Łódź Ghetto; Nisko Plan; Zygielbojm, Shmuel

Further Reading

Trunk, Isaiah. Jewish Responses to Nazi Persecution: Collective and Individual Behavior in Extremis. New York: Stein and Day, 1979.

Trunk, Isaiah. Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation. New York: Collier Macmillan, 1973.

Judges' Trial

Held under the authority of Control Council Law Number 10, the case against members of the German Ministry of Justice opened on March 5, 1947, before an American tribunal. Fourteen men were tried for abuse of the justice system. For crimes against humanity and war crimes, 10 of the men received guilty verdicts and were given various prison terms; the rest were found not guilty. The basis of the charges arose from the infamous Nach und Nebel ("Night and Fog") decrees ordered by Adolf Hitler to terrify the population of occupied territories into submission and to prevent resistance. The ministers and judges were tried because they had actively participated in this system in contravention of the accepted practices of justice.

Prior to the 1933 Nazi takeover of Germany, lawyers and judges were respected worldwide for their high standards based on knowledge of the law and justice applied equally. The Nazis replaced these politically neutral standards with ones emphasizing ideology. A man need not know the law if he knew National Socialism as espoused by Hitler and was physically fit. These standards made it easier to put men in charge who did not know or care for the law but only cared about protecting the Third Reich. When decrees such as the Night and Fog decree and those creating the People's Courts, with their mandatory harsh sentences, were established, there was no one to stop them. Trials were conducted in name only; often the court did not allow the defendant to defend himself appropriately. The People's Courts ordered death sentences for comparatively minor crimes. After the sentences were carried out, the bodies were not returned to the families, nor were death certificates filed.

After World War II, the perpetrators of these injustices were themselves called to account before a court of law. Prosecutors filed the indictment with Tribunal II of the International Tribunal on January 4, 1947. It contained several counts: conspiracy to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity; war crimes; crimes against humanity; and membership in the SS, SD, or Leadership Corps of the Nazi Party. The tribunal later dismissed the conspiracy count in accordance with a common ruling that the court had no jurisdiction on a charge of conspiracy as a separate charge. The court also excluded the defense of "acts of state," claiming that the Nazi government was not the legitimate government of Germany and therefore no order issued by it had the force of law. Seventeen men of the justice ministry and the German courts were indicted, although only 15 stood trial; two men committed suicide in jail, including the head of the ministry from 1942 to 1945. The court dismissed charges against one defendant in mid-trial for health reasons.

Although the case touched on the singling out of Jews for extermination, the trial also encompassed the lynching of Allied airmen, castration and sterilization of all "undesirables," and the Nazi euthanasia program. The prosecutor's case centered primarily on Night and Fog decrees and the abuses of the so-called People's Courts. Hitler had promulgated these decrees as a way to suppress resistance movements, and established the People's Courts as a way to move the cases out of the military courts and into civilian courts, as he claimed that the military's adherence to its code of justice was sabotaging his war efforts. The tribunal made no ruling on the legitimacy of the courts or the charges against those brought before them; they ruled only on the excessive sentences and other abuses perpetrated by these courts.

Opening arguments began on March 5, 1947. Telford Taylor was the chief U.S. prosecutor. The defendants were allowed counsel of their choice and allowed to present evidence and witnesses in their defense. As was common in almost all the war crimes trials of this period, the defendants attempted to shift blame to others (including those not charged or dead) and all claimed that they hated the rules under which they were forced to operate. Every defendant claimed he did not truly believe in Nazi ideology but only went along with the prevailing beliefs in order to maintain his position and protect his family. A few even claimed that they stayed on in order to mitigate the worst abuses and save whom they could. The prosecution pointed out the various contradictions in testimony and evidence of active involvement in the abuses. Any such discrepancies the prosecution overlooked, the judges did not.

Verbal testimony ended on September 27, 1947. The last day to introduce documentary evidence was October 13, 1947. Closing arguments were held the week of October 3, 1947. The court then recessed to consider its judgment. The verdict was delivered over two days, from December 3 to December 4, 1947. Four of the remaining defendants, mostly judges of the People's Court, were acquitted. Three received life sentences, the rest received varying prison terms with credit for time served. The judges of the tribunal were scathing in their criticism of the alleged judicial process carried out in the Nazi regime.

ELIZABETH PUGLIESE

See also: Crimes against Humanity; Judgment at Nuremberg; Rothaug, Oswald; Schlegelberger, Franz; Taylor, Telford; War Crimes

Further Reading

History of the U.N. War Crimes Commission and Development of the Laws of War, Compiled by the U.N. War Crimes Commission. London: His Majesty's Stationery Office, 1948.

Telford, Taylor. Final Report to the Secretary of Army on Nuremberg Trials under Control Council Law Number 10. Washington, DC: United States Government Printing Office, 1950.

Judgment at Nuremberg

A 1961 American movie directed by Stanley Kramer and written by Abby Mann, this film focuses on a post–World War II Nazi war crimes trial held three years after the war—and three years since the most important Nazi leaders had already been tried. The trial centers around four Nazi judges who used their office to conduct Nazi sterilization and cleansing policies. A retired American judge, Dan Haywood (Spencer Tracy), is brought to Nuremberg in order to serve as chief judge on a three-man bench that is trying four other judges, who were following the law of the land while they were in office.

The plot of Judgment at Nuremberg proceeds from the actual “Judges’ (or Justice) Trial” held against members of the German Ministry of Justice from March 5, 1947, before an American tribunal. For crimes against humanity and war crimes, 10 of the 14 men accused received guilty verdicts and were given various prison terms. The ministers and judges were tried because they had actively participated in the Nazi legal system, in contravention of what were considered to be accepted practices of justice.

Of the four judges on trial in the film, the largest question mark surrounds Dr. Ernst Janning (Burt Lancaster), an internationally renowned judge of very high standing within the legal profession. Haywood begins his examination by trying to learn how Janning could have sentenced so many people to death, and the prosecuting attorney, Colonel Tad Lawson (Richard Widmark), presents his case against Janning and the others passionately, even obsessively. For the defense, counsel Hans Rolfe (Maximilian Schell) invokes a number of issues that introduce a degree of moral equivalence between Nazi and Allied war crimes. Overall, in this way, the film deals with the whole issue of war crimes against civilian populations during the Holocaust, along the way examining the post–World War II geopolitical complexity of international tribunals of this kind.

One of the film’s important plot lines relates to a real case within the Third Reich and is based on the notorious Katzenberger Trial. Lehmann (Leo) Israel Katzenberger, a Jewish businessman and head of the Nuremberg Jewish community, aged 68 years, was accused of the crime of “racial pollution” because of his alleged sexual intercourse with a younger Aryan woman named Irene Seiler. She was found guilty of perjury for denying the charge and imprisoned for two years at hard labor; on March 14, 1942, Katzenberger was sentenced to death and was executed by beheading.

In the film, the so-called “race defilement” trial was referred to as the Feldenstein case, in which Feldenstein, an elderly Jewish man, had been tried for having a relationship involving sexual acts with a 16-year-old “Aryan” girl, Irene Hoffman Wallner (Judy Garland), in direct contravention of the Nuremberg Laws on Race. Feldenstein was found guilty and executed in 1935. During a brutal interrogation of Irene Hoffman Wallner from defense attorney Rolfe, Dr. Janning decides to speak up. He recognizes that he is guilty of the crime of condemning to death a Jewish man on the charge of “blood defilement,” while he knew all the time that there was no evidence to support such a verdict. It is a key moment in the film. Eventually, after some riveting courtroom drama and the showing of authentic documentary footage filmed by American and British cameramen after the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps at Buchenwald, Dachau, and Bergen-Belsen, all four defendants are found guilty and sentenced to life in prison.

Judgment at Nuremberg was graced by an all-star cast comprising some of the biggest box-office drawcards of the day. In addition to Tracy, Lancaster, and Widmark, major roles were taken by such acting greats as Werner Klemperer, Marlene Dietrich, Montgomery Clift, and a young William Shatner.

The film became a highly celebrated essay on the morals of international justice and morality. It was nominated for 11 Academy Awards, and saw one of the very few occasions on which two actors from the same movie were nominated for Best Actor (Schell and Tracy; Schell won the award). Abby Mann won the award for Best Adapted Screenplay. Apart from Tracy’s nomination, others included Best Picture, Best Director (Stanley Kramer), Montgomery Clift (Best Supporting Actor), and Judy Garland (Best Supporting Actress). In 2013 Judgment at Nuremberg was selected for preservation in the United States National Film Registry by the Library of Congress, in the category of films that are “culturally, historically, or aesthetically significant.”

One final point needs to be made about the movie’s dialogue. As the screenwriter, Abby Mann was determined to emphasize that there can be no place for moral neutrality when faced with a situation as horrendous as the Holocaust. Therefore, in one of the film's final scenes, Judge Haywood, at Dr. Ernst Janning's request, visits Janning in prison. He states that the reason he asked Haywood to come was to try to explain his position to one he thought would understand. In relation to the Holocaust, he says: "I never knew it would come to that. You must believe it, you must believe it!" Haywood replies, in what are the last spoken lines of the film, "Herr Janning, it 'came to that' the first time you sentenced a man to death you knew to be innocent." As Haywood leaves, a final message appears on the screen to the effect that of 99 defendants sentenced to prison terms in the various post-International Military Tribunal trials at Nuremberg, none were still serving their sentences at the time of the film's release.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Judges' Trial; Katzenberger Trial; Nuremberg Laws; "Racial Hygiene"

Further Reading

Gonshak, Henry. Hollywood and the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2015.

Mann, Abby. Judgment at Nuremberg: A Play. New York: New Directions, 2002.

Mann, Abby. Judgment at Nuremberg, the Script of the Film. London: Cassell, 1961.

K

Kaiser Wilhelm Institute

The Kaiser Wilhelm Society for the Advancement of Science (Kaiser-Wilhelm-Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Wissenschaften, or KWG) was a German scientific institution established in 1911. It created some of the most prestigious and influential scientific and academic institutes in the world, encompassing scientific and academic disciplines such as physics, chemistry, biology, cell biology, psychiatry, neuropathology, genetics, anthropology, metallurgy, and law. The Rockefeller Foundation supported both the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute (KWI) of Psychiatry and the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Anthropology, Human Heredity and Eugenics; it partially funded the actual building of the institute and helped keep the institute afloat during the Depression.

During the Third Reich the KWG was involved in Nazi scientific operations. The participation of scientists associated with the KWG enhanced the credibility of the Nazi state's program of scientific terror and murder. The 1933 Sterilization Law, to which the KWG Institute of Psychiatry contributed, established the basis for the Nazi programs of selection and eugenic and racial purification, including the killing of handicapped children and the T-4 Aktion for the murder of adults in psychiatric institutions. The KWG was an umbrella organization for many institutes, testing stations, and research units spawned under its authority. After World War II, its functions were taken over by the Max Planck Society.

The KWG was established in 1911 to promote the natural sciences in Germany, by founding and maintaining research institutions formally independent from the state. The institutions were to be under the guidance of prominent directors, which included luminaries such as Walther Bothe, Peter Debye, Albert Einstein, Fritz Haber, and Otto Hahn. A board of trustees also provided guidance.

Between its establishment in 1911 and 1948 the Kaiser Wilhelm organization supported 35 institutes in Germany and other countries. Many Nobel laureates of the 20th century were associated with Kaiser Wilhelm institutes, and the international esteem of the KWG is reflected in the support it received from the Rockefeller Foundation, which made major contributions to the construction of the Kaiser Wilhelm institutes of brain research and psychiatry. The Rockefeller Foundation also supported research at the Munich psychiatric institute and twin research at the KWI of Anthropology, Human Genetics and Eugenics at Berlin-Dahlem.

Remarkably, the three Kaiser Wilhelm institutes that were major beneficiaries of Rockefeller endowments ultimately played important roles in the development, application, and operation of the racial programs of the Third Reich. KWG scientists joined with the Nazi state in its goal of improving German society's health, with emphasis on eugenics and racial purification. The resulting collaboration between science and the Nazi state not only legitimized the policies and programs of the Hitler regime; it resulted in the exploitation, mutilation, and murder of untold thousands of innocent victims by physicians and scientists associated with some of the world's leading universities and research institutes.

In 1917 the eminent psychiatrist Emil Kraepelin established the German Institute for Psychiatric Research, with major financial support from James Loeb, an American-born Jewish philanthropist and a one-time patient of Kraepelin. This became the foremost psychiatric research institute in the world and in 1924 joined with the Kaiser-Wilhelm research organization.

Kraepelin assembled a stellar group of clinicians and researchers at the new KWI of Psychiatry, including the psychiatrist/neurologist Alois Alzheimer and the neurohistologist Franz Nissl. These were then joined by the Swiss-born psychiatrist/geneticist Ernst Rüdin, and all three joined Kraepelin when he moved from Heidelberg to Munich. The focus of Rüdin's research was on the inheritance of psychiatric disorders, and in 1928 he became director of a "greatly expanded" genealogical department. In 1931 he was elected to head the Institute. Building on Kraepelin's earlier relationships, his research was well endowed with funding from Rockefeller and the Loeb estate. Loeb, who died in 1933, bequeathed $1,000,000 to the Munich institute.

Rüdin became an active supporter of the eugenic and racial hygiene policies of Hitler's regime, and was in the forefront of the Nazi program of enforced eugenic sterilization entrenched under the 1933 Sterilization Law. Under Rüdin the KWI of Psychiatry became a major center of eugenics research during the Hitler period, and he was honored twice by Hitler for his contribution to German eugenics. The 1933 Sterilization Law established diagnostic categories for enforced sterilization; two of these, schizophrenia and manic-depressive disorder, were psychiatric conditions first characterized by Kraepelin and investigated by Rüdin. Under the law, an estimated 400,000 German citizens would be sterilized, with both doctors and the courts turning to the KWG Institute of Psychiatry for an "expert" opinion on eugenic matters.

In 1935 the Rockefeller Foundation withheld funding for genealogical and demographic research, and in 1940 the executors of the Loeb estate did the same. Desperate for support, Rüdin turned to the SS for salvation, and as a result in 1939 the world's foremost psychiatric research institute came under the influence, if not the control, of the SS and its research organization, the notorious Ahnenerbe.

The 1933 Sterilization Law to which Rüdin contributed, and in which the KWI of Psychiatry participated, established the basis for the Nazi programs of selection and eugenic and racial purification. These programs included the killing of handicapped children and the T-4 Aktion for the murder of adults in psychiatric institutions.

The T-4 killing program was exploited by Professor Julius Hallervorden of the KWI of Brain Research to augment the neuropathological collection of brain material for research. The founding director of the institute, Oskar Vogt, a socialist opposed to the Nazi Party, had been dismissed and replaced by Hugo Spatz, who then appointed Hallervorden, with whom he had worked on identifying a congenital neurological condition then known as "Hallervorden-Spatz Disease."

Hallervorden's main collection point for specimens was the euthanasia killing center in Brandenburg. Victims were assembled in a large room disguised as a shower where they were asphyxiated with gas. Hallervorden was present for some of the killings and removed the victims' brains shortly after their murder. Many victims came from the nearby Görden psychiatric hospital. Hallervorden's neuropathology facility at Görden prepared specimens that were sent to the KWI in Buch. In 1944 the KWI for Brain Research and its neuropathological collection were moved from Berlin to a permanent facility near the University of Frankfurt, where the specimens procured by Hallervorden remained until 1990.

The third Kaiser Wilhelm institute implicated in the crimes of the Third Reich was the KWI of Anthropology, Human Genetics and Eugenics in Dahlem, Berlin. This institute opened in September 1927 in conjunction with the 8th International Congress on Heredity, the first international scientific conference to be held in Germany after the end of World War I. Three main departments were created: Anthropology, Genetics, and Eugenics and Racial Hygiene. Research was carried out in disciplines such as experimental genetics, evolutionary biology, embryology, medicine, and anthropology, through methods such as twin research, blood group research, and animal models.

The founding director was the noted anatomist/anthropologist Eugen Fischer, whose interest was in the anthropology of natives from Germany's African colonies. Upon Hitler taking power, Fischer declared that the institute was prepared to undertake research for the regime. Under Fischer, the sterilization of so-called "Rhineland Bastards" (children born of German mothers and African fathers during the occupation of the Rhineland after World War I) was undertaken. The research activities of institute scientists for the regime aligned with their own views regarding the attainment of racial hygiene. Fischer, a radical antisemite, became involved in the Final Solution when he attended the Frankfurt Institute for the Investigation of the Jewish Question on March 27–28, 1941.

Baron Dr. Otmar von Verschuer, an institute scientist from Tübingen and noted expert on the genetics of twins, was a champion of the racist goals of the Hitler state. In 1936 Verschuer left to head the new Institute of Genetics and Racial Hygiene at the University of Frankfurt, where institute staff provided expert opinions to Nazi courts on decisions under the 1933 sterilization law and the Nuremberg racial laws. Verschuer's first assistant in Frankfurt was a medical student, Josef Mengele, who had recently received his PhD from the University of Munich.

Verschuer exploited his position as a noted geneticist to expound his antisemitic views, which included a new total solution of the Jewish problem. In a 1942 editorial published in a journal he edited (Der Erbarzt), Verschuer called for "a final solution to the Jewish question." In the second edition of his textbook on race hygiene (1942) he repeated his provocative statement that the political demand of the time was the new total solution of the Jewish problem.

In 1942 Verschuer succeeded Fischer as director of the Dahlem institute, where, as KWI director, he exploited helpless human beings in Auschwitz to use in studies intended to prove Nazi racial theories, including the study of twins. His former Frankfurt assistant, Josef Mengele, was at Auschwitz and served as Verschuer's agent and research assistant. Jews and Roma were studied, murdered, dissected, and their body parts sent by Mengele to Verschuer in Berlin. Where victims happened to have eyes of a different color (known as heterochromia of the iris), these were sent to Dr. Karin Magnussen at the Dahlem institute.

Anthropobiology was used to support stereotyped views of Roma, Jews, blacks, the mentally ill, and those with physical handicaps. Anthropobiology utilized anthropometry: the measurement and recording of "metrics" (different physical or mental factors), which could then be used to classify people by race or value. Thus, for example, Jews had a particular type of nose; blacks had kinky hair; Roma were always criminals; and so on. The work done at KWI of Anthropology used a variety of criteria to identify races, such as hair color and shape, skin color, eye color, freckles, blood group, skull shape and capacity, facial characteristics, and body type. These stereotypes were primarily used to create propaganda support for a number of Nazi programs: Lebensborn, sterilization, euthanasia, mass murder in concentration camps, deportations, and medical experimentation done by other programs such as the Waffen-SS. The purpose of the propaganda was to dehumanize those who were considered to be enemies of the Third Reich.

Studies carried out on Auschwitz victims included an examination of their blood for certain elements that were believed to be formed in response to infection. Verschuer's institute lacked the capacity to do the required blood testing, so the blood of Auschwitz victims was sent to the neighboring KWI for Biochemistry headed by Adolf Butenandt. The tests themselves were performed at the biochemistry institute by Günther Hillmann. Butenandt, a pioneering biochemist whose discovery of the male and female hormones in humans had earned him the Nobel Prize for Chemistry in 1939, led the way to many modern therapies including the birth control pill.

Verschuer, like Fischer, participated in the Final Solution when he attended the Frankfurt Institute on the Jewish Question on March 27–28, 1941. After the war he fled Berlin and hid or destroyed the records of KWI of Anthropology activities at his family home. Soon after, accusations were made against him concerning Auschwitz research. A committee of KWG scientists was formed to review the case against him, and its report, which was not made public, made it impossible for him to be reappointed to a university position.

Butenandt, in addition to directly or indirectly assisting Verschuer with his studies on the blood of Auschwitz victims, helped restore Verschuer's postwar standing in the scientific community. Despite the evidence, a new committee concluded that Verschuer was not a Nazi, was not a race fanatic, was tolerant with his collaborators, and did not know what went on at Auschwitz. The committee stated that von Verschuer had all the qualities that destined him to be a researcher and teacher of academic youth. Having been exonerated, Verschuer went on to assume the position of professor of genetics at the University of Münster and the director of that university's genetics institute, becoming the most prominent geneticist in West Germany. He died in 1969.

After the German capitulation in May 1945, the institute was dissolved entirely, and most of its thousands of files and lab material were moved to an unknown location or destroyed. It was never obtained by the Allies to use as evidence in war crimes trials, and most members of the institute staff were able to escape trial.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Eugenics; Euthanasia Program; Fischer, Eugen; Medical Experimentation; Medical Experimentation; "Racial Hygiene"; Rhineland Bastards; Sterilization

Further Reading

Burleigh, Michael. Death and Deliverance: 'Euthanasia' in Germany 1900–1945. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

Müller-Hill, Benno. Murderous Science: Elimination by Scientific Selection of Jews, Gypsies, and Others in Germany, 1933–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1988.

Schafft, Gretchen Engle. From Racism to Genocide: Anthropology in the Third Reich. Urbana (IL): University of Illinois Press, 2004.

Kalina, Antonin

Antonin Kalina was a Czech communist internee at the Buchenwald concentration camp during World War II who helped shield some 900 Jewish (and some 300 non-Jewish) boys from Nazi depredations.

He was born in the small Czech village of Trebic in 1902, but little is known about his life either before or after World War II. He apparently became a communist, and in 1939, after the Germans had occupied Czechoslovakia, he was arrested and eventually interned at Buchenwald.

Beginning in the autumn of 1944, as German armies were being pushed west by Soviet forces, German authorities began to liquidate various concentration and death camps in the east. In doing so, they forced thousands of mostly Jewish prisoners to embark on ruinous death marches. The survivors were then reincarcerated in German camps, including Buchenwald. In the early winter of 1945, a group of about 1,200 Jewish and non-Jewish boys, aged between 12 and 16, arrived at Buchenwald from liquidated concentration camps elsewhere. They had already endured unspeakable horrors, including the loss of their families, and had been emotionally and physically brutalized.

The boys' fate appeared grim, but Kalina made certain that they would not suffer unduly in their new environment. By now, he was a high-ranking member of the camp's underground, which, with Nazi acquiescence, basically ran the camp's operations. Kalina and his deputies placed the boys in a special barracks, numbered 66, which was away from the camp's main housing. This would ensure that the boys would not be subjected to German scrutiny or beatings. As the elder of Block 66, Kalina did everything in his power to shield the boys from abuse.

The boys were not required to go outside for roll call twice a day, were not required to work, and, supplies permitting, were provided with blankets and larger food rations. Kalina did all of this knowing that if the Germans found out about the boys' special treatment, he could be shot. In April 1945, as the Germans were on the verge of complete defeat, they decided to deport and kill all of Buchenwald's remaining Jews. To prevent this, Kalina told the boys not to report for assembly; he also falsified their records and changed the religion on their badges to make it appear as if all were Christians. These heroic acts saved the boys from almost certain death. When Allied troops liberated Buchenwald on April 11, 1945, a group of the boys carried Kalina out of the squalid prison on their shoulders.

After Kalina returned to Czechoslovakia, he lived in virtual obscurity. He never spoke of his actions in public, nor did he seek any credit for them. He died in Prague in 1990. Nearly 20 years after his death, some of the survivors whom Kalina had saved participated in a documentary project titled Kinderblock 66: Return to Buchenwald, in which a filmmaker detailed their return to Buchenwald 65 years after it was liberated. That triggered a process that ultimately brought official recognition of Kalina's heroic acts. In July 2012 Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust remembrance authority, bestowed its highest recognition on Kalina when it posthumously awarded him the status of Righteous among the Nations. Sadly, however, no members of Kalina's family had survived to accept the honor.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Buchenwald; Czechoslovakia; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Jones, David H. Moral Responsibility in the Holocaust: A Study in the Ethics of Character. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Kaltenbrunner, Ernst

Leader of the Austrian SS and chief of the Reich Main Security Office in 1943. Born in Ried/Innkreis, Austria, on October 4, 1903, Ernst Kaltenbrunner earned a doctorate in law at the University of Graz in 1926 and entered legal practice in Linz. Joining the Austrian Nazi Party in 1930, he worked to destabilize the Austrian Republic. He became head of the Austrian SS at Linz in 1934 but was arrested and accused of being involved in the assassination of the Austrian chancellor, Engelbert Dollfuss, on July 25, 1934. Following the Anschluss (the union between Germany and Austria) in March 1938, Kaltenbrunner became minister for state security as well as police chief in Vienna. During the next three years, he served as commander of the SS in what was now the former Austria.

Ernst Kaltenbrunner was head of the Reich Main Security Office of the SS following the assassination of Reinhard Heydrich in 1942. Born in Austria, he rose to the rank of SS general (Obergruppenführer), and, after the defeat of Germany in 1945, he became the highest-ranking SS officer to face trial at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. He was executed in 1946. The image here shows him as he testifies on the witness stand during his trial. (Corbis via Getty Images)

Kaltenbrunner impressed the German SS chief, Heinrich Himmler, who, on January 30, 1943, appointed him to succeed Reinhard Heydrich as head of the Reich Main Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, or RSHA) and SS intelligence. Kaltenbrunner not only controlled the Gestapo (the secret police) but was also responsible for carrying out the “Final Solution of the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage). Kaltenbrunner held his position until the end of the war and was promoted to SS Obergruppenführer and general of police on June 21, 1943. He took personal interest in the different methods used to kill the inmates in the extermination camps. Besides supervising the hunting down of Jews, he was also responsible for the murder of Allied prisoners of war.

Kaltenbrunner’s power increased greatly after the July 20, 1944, attempt on Hitler’s life. He directed the Gestapo’s investigation into the plot and was in charge of administering Hitler’s policy of retribution against the conspirators. When the Allies were closing in on Germany in early 1945, Kaltenbrunner gave orders for all prisoners to be killed. Then, he fled south. He was captured in the Austrian mountains on May 15, 1945. Charged with conspiracy to commit crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, Kaltenbrunner was found guilty and was hanged on October 16, 1946, in Nuremberg.

MARTIN MOLL

See also: Austria; Final Solution; Nuremberg Trials; Reichs-sicherheitshauptamt; Sicherheitsdienst

Further Reading

Black, Peter. Ernst Kaltenbrunner: Ideological Soldier of the Third Reich. Princeton (NJ): Princeton University Press, 1984.

Koehl, Robert Lewis. The Black Corps: The Structure and Power Struggles of the Nazi SS. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1983.

Kaplan, Chaim A.

Chaim Aron Kaplan was an educator and diarist of the Holocaust who resisted the Nazis by chronicling the day-to-day events of the Warsaw Ghetto, making a record of life there under German occupation. Kaplan was born in 1880 in Gorodishche (Horodyszczce), a village in Belorussia in the Russian Empire. He was educated at the famous Mir yeshiva and later studied at the Vilna teachers' college. In 1902 he moved to Warsaw, where he established an elementary Hebrew school; he would remain there as principal for the next 40 years. In 1921 he visited the United States and in 1936 Palestine, with the idea of joining his two children. As he saw little economic future for himself there, however, he returned to Warsaw.

Kaplan devoted his efforts to education and writing. He began keeping a diary around 1933, and in September 1939, at the start of World War II, decided to detail Jewish life in Warsaw and thus preserve a record for posterity. This was to become Kaplan's Scroll of Agony. His very first entry, on September 1, 1939, was prescient: "This war will indeed bring destruction upon human civilization. . . . I doubt that we will live through this carnage. The bombs filled with lethal gas will poison every living being, or we will starve because there will be no means of livelihood."

After Warsaw's surrender to German forces on September 27, 1939, Kaplan wrote: "the Nazis' objective was to eliminate the Jews physically through a slow choking process." By the time the ghetto was established formally on October 12, 1940, roughly 375,000 Jews (nearly a third of Warsaw's population), along with many refugees, were squeezed into a ghetto that took up 2.4% of Warsaw's surface area. To make matters worse, Jews in the ghetto were only allotted one-tenth of the required caloric intake and were subjected to forced labor, disease, and slaughter. Kaplan commented on the frequent murder of Jews and the constant treatment they experienced, explaining that: "The Aryans are put to death after a short period of arrest; the Jews are killed without even a pretense of arrest." He further detailed how the Nazis carried out many of their violent acts: "The murderers burst into a home in the middle of the night and put an end to a life."

Scroll of Agony would become one of the most powerful and inspiring testimonies from the Holocaust period. Kaplan recorded his diary in small notebooks and focused primarily on daily experiences. He attempted to remain objective despite the dire conditions and saw his mission as preserving a record for posterity, focusing strictly on facts and situations as they appeared.

The diary recorded the events and experiences Kaplan witnessed himself, or were told to him by members of the ghetto community. He set down his thoughts as well as conversations with friends and with those he met in the streets, and sought out firsthand information to provide immediacy and authenticity.

Keeping a diary or any sort of written testimony during the Holocaust created many risks; however, Kaplan did not fear being caught. He felt that recording his experiences was a responsibility. He continually expressed the hope that the diary would be saved, realizing its significance for future generations. As he moved from place to place, and the Nazis seemed to be intensifying their murderous activities, he worked faster, often writing several times a day in order to include every detail of the horror surrounding him.

This sense of duty was emphasized in the January 16, 1940, entry, when Kaplan wrote: "Anyone who keeps such a record endangers his life, but this does not frighten me. I sense within me the magnitude of this hour, and my responsibility toward it, and I have an inner obligation that I am not free to relinquish. . . . My record will serve as a source material for the future generation." In essence, he wrote his diary so that others would someday be able to understand the Holocaust and never forget the Jews' experiences during it. In 1942 conditions in the Warsaw Ghetto worsened, as Kaplan wrote in his diary: "The Jewish section of Warsaw had become a city of slaughter."

Kaplan was not as concerned about his own future as he was about the future of his diary. He knew he had to get it out of the ghetto if there was any chance that his observations, so carefully chronicled, would survive. Thus, in late 1942 he gave his diary to a Jewish friend to whom he refers only as Rubinsztejn, who did forced labor each day outside the ghetto. Rubinsztejn smuggled the notebooks out and delivered them to a Pole, Władysław Wojcek, who lived in the small village of Liw, near Warsaw. In the early 1960s, Wojcek moved to the United States, where he sold the notebooks.

Eventually, they were edited, translated, and published, and the diary has since appeared in English, German, French, Danish, and Japanese.

Kaplan's final entry was made on August 4, 1942: "If the hunters do not stop, and if I am caught, I am afraid my work will be in vain. I am constantly bothered by the thought: If my life ends, what will become of my diary?" The diary did survive, but Kaplan and his wife did not. They were deported to Treblinka, and it appears they were murdered in December 1942.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Resistance; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Kaplan, Chaim A. (edited by Abraham I. Katsh). Scroll of Agony: The Warsaw Diary of Chaim A. Kaplan. New York: Macmillan, 1965.

Kapos

"Kapo" was a term used to describe prisoners in German concentration camps who worked with the Nazi administration to enforce discipline and perform various other functions. Kapos, derived from the Latin/Italian word for "head" (as in, "head of"), were utilized widely in German camps and prisons to free men for service in the armed services. They were utilized in regular prisons, forced labor camps, and concentration camps. Oftentimes, Kapos were Jews overseeing other Jews in concentration and death camps. They assumed these roles sometimes by coercion, but sometimes willingly. These prison functionaries were usually granted special privileges by prison administrators, including more and better food, better quarters, and sometimes even parole or early release. The use of Jewish Kapos in German concentration and death camps was particularly troubling, and made postwar prosecution of them highly problematic, as some were forced to undertake such duties under the ever-present threat of death or harm to their families.

Most Kapos were appointed to their positions by SS officers who usually administered the Nazis' extensive prison and internment system. They often enticed these prisoner-functionaries (Funktionshäftlinge) with rewards that sometimes included private quarters, access to clean linen and bathing facilities, and little or no manual labor. Most Kapos did not want to see these privileges revoked, so they carried out SS orders to the letter.

Many Kapos were cruel and unforgiving toward their fellow prisoners, and so it is no surprise that they were intensely disliked by other inmates. Indeed, there were ample examples of prisoners murdering Kapos. There were several different levels—or ranks—of Kapos, depending upon their roles and seniority. There was often a single Kapo over the entire camp or prison; under him were block (or barracks leaders), room (or cell) leaders, and block/barracks clerks who did mainly clerical work. Kapos who oversaw forced labor gangs often did no work at all while prisoners under them worked until exhaustion in appalling conditions. These Kapos often met untimely ends at the hands of disgruntled prisoners.

SS chief Heinrich Himmler decreed in February 1944 that Jews would no longer serve as Kapos because Nazi dogma stipulated that no Jew could be put into a superior position over non-Jews. After World War II ended, a number of Kapos, some of them Jews, were tried and convicted under the Israeli Nazi and Nazi Collaborators Punishment Law of 1950; most of the trials took place between 1951 and 1964, and there were at least 15 convictions of Jews during that period. Without the extensive network of Kapos, the Germans could never have administered such a large and far-flung prison camp system.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Collaboration; Concentration Camps; Death Camps; Funktionshäftling

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Gutman, Yisrael, and Michael Berenbaum (Eds.). Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Todorov, Tzvetan. Facing the Extreme: Moral Life in the Concentration Camps. New York: Henry Holt, 1996.

Kappler, Herbert

Herbert Kappler was a German SS officer and the architect of the March 1944 Ardeatine Massacre in Rome.

Kappler was born on September 23, 1907, in Stuttgart, Germany. He worked as an electrician for a time before becoming involved in Nazi Party organizations. When he joined the party in 1931, he also became a stormtrooper in the SA. In 1932 he left the SA and gained provisional membership in the SS, becoming a full member in May 1933.

Thereafter he held various assignments throughout Germany. In 1935, as Germany began to mobilize for war, he was drafted into the German army but was released in 1936 after a period of military training. He then returned to the SS, where he would be involved in security and police work.

Kappler rose steadily through the ranks and joined the Gestapo in November 1938. With the German invasion of Poland in September 1939 he was deployed to engage in Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads) work, rounding up Polish Jews for deportation. He was then sent to Belgium to help staunch resistance activity; later he helped orchestrate mass deportations of Jews and other “undesirables” to death camps in Eastern Europe. By the end of 1941 Kappler had been assigned as a liaison officer to the Italian government of Benito Mussolini. He also served as an adviser to Mussolini’s secret fascist police organization. After Mussolini was ousted from power in the late summer of 1943, Kappler was named chief of police and security for occupied Rome. As such, he helped SS special forces locate Mussolini, who was spirited to safety in northern Italy. At the same time, he instituted a campaign to round up several thousand Italian Jews living in and around Rome, the vast majority of whom died in Nazi death camps.

Kappler became widely known for his role in the March 24, 1944, Ardeatine Massacre, in which 335 Italians (including 75 Jewish Italians) were shot to death after being forced into a series of caves on the Via Ardeatine in Rome. The killings, ordered by Kappler, were in retaliation for a bomb attack on German police in Rome by Italian partisans in which 42 Germans were killed. That had occurred the day before, on March 23. None of those killed in the caves, however, were linked to the bombing.

As Rome fell to the Allies toward the end of the war, Kappler sought refuge in the Vatican, but British officials arrested him in mid-1945 before he could make his way to the Holy See. He was detained in Rome and turned over to Italian authorities in 1947; they, in turn, placed him on trial, convicted him, and sentenced him to life in prison. In 1975 Kappler fell ill with inoperable cancer and the following year was relocated to a military hospital in Rome. In 1977, with the help of his wife, Kappler escaped the hospital and fled to West Germany. The West Germans refused to extradite him back to Italy, and Kappler died on February 9, 1978, in Soltau.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Einsatzgruppen; Italy; Priebke, Erich

Further Reading

Katz, Robert. Morte a Roma: Il massacro delle Fosse Ardeatine.

Rome: Editari Riuniti, 1968.

Trevelyan, Raleigh. Rome '44: The Battle for the Eternal City. New York: Viking Press, 1982.

Karski, Jan

Jan Karski was a member of the Polish underground. He documented and publicized the plight of Polish Jews during World War II, having infiltrated the Warsaw Ghetto and other places in order to be able to report firsthand on what he had seen.

He was born Jan Kozielski on April 24, 1914, in Łódź, Poland. A Christian, he was raised in an integrated and tolerant neighborhood where there were many Jews. He received part of his education in a military college, graduating with

Jan Karski was a Polish resistance fighter who served as an intelligence agent by smuggling himself into the Warsaw Ghetto and Nazi extermination camps, following which he reported back to the Polish government in exile in London as well as the British and U.S. governments. The portrait here is of Jan Karski during his mission to the United States, dated July 1, 1943. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Jan Karski) high marks in the class of 1936. At the same time he also studied at the University of Lvov, from where he obtained a degree in law in 1935. Joining the Foreign Service as a trainee diplomat, he served in Germany, Romania, Switzerland, and Britain. He gained a First in Grand Diplomatic Practice, and on January 1, 1939, started work with the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Karski served as an officer in eastern Poland after World War II began in September 1939, seeing action against Soviet troops following the invasion of September 17, 1939. Taken prisoner, he pretended to be a private soldier rather than an officer, and the Soviets handed him across to the Germans because his birthplace was Łódź, in the German zone. In November 1939 he escaped and joined what was later to become known as the Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK). Beginning in January 1940 he undertook a series of daring missions acting as a courier and spy for the Polish government-in-exile, crossing enemy lines and national borders between France, Britain, and Poland on numerous occasions. In July 1940 he was arrested by the Gestapo in Slovakia and was severely tortured during interrogation. Smuggled out by the resistance, he returned to active service after a short period of recuperation.

In 1942 the London-based Polish government-in-exile selected Karski for a new mission; he was to ascertain the extent of German atrocities in occupied Poland and report back. On at least two occasions he was smuggled incognito by Jewish underground leaders into the Warsaw Ghetto, witnessing firsthand the brutality of the Nazis' policies there.

In addition, Karski visited what he thought was the death camp at Belzec, though indications are that he confused his visit with a particularly brutal ghetto at Izbica, from where Jews were deported to Belzec. The first mass deportation to Belzec took place in mid-March 1942, and it is possible Karski witnessed this and conflated the horror of the two themes in his understanding of what was happening.

In the fall of 1942 Karski visited London and personally briefed leaders of the Polish government-in-exile, together with Allied officials such as British foreign secretary Anthony Eden, about the horrors of the Warsaw Ghetto and the Nazi death camps. He also produced hard evidence of anti-Jewish atrocities, contained in microfilm he had carried with him from Poland. On the basis of this information, Polish foreign minister Edward Raczynski could provide the Allies with some of the first information available about the Holocaust. Karski implored Western leaders to stop the killing, but Allied leaders gave greater priority to other issues related to the war effort.

In the early summer of 1943 Karski traveled to the United States, where he engaged in a whirlwind campaign publicizing the plight of the European Jews. He met with American politicians, conferred with senior religious leaders from several religious denominations, and gave lectures around the country. On July 28, 1943, he met with President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the Oval Office. There he presented a detailed account of his experiences, though it was later reported that Roosevelt did not ask a single question about the Jews. Of all the influential political leaders to whom he spoke, Karski was unable to convince any to make the Holocaust a priority.

In 1944, with the war still raging, he published a book titled Courier from Poland: The Story of a Secret State, which told of his exploits with the Polish underground. As an indictment of the Nazi occupation of Poland it was a revelation to many Americans and became a runaway bestseller. Within a year, it had sold more than 400,000 copies. The book was re-released in 2013, educating an entirely new generation.

After the war, Karski settled in the United States. He earned a doctorate in international relations from Georgetown University in 1952, became an American citizen in 1954, and spent the next four decades at Georgetown teaching political science and international relations.

On June 2, 1982, Karski was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his work in bringing the Holocaust to the world's attention. In 1994 he was made an honorary citizen of the State of Israel. Among the many other awards he received were Poland's Order of the White Eagle and the Virtuti Militari, Poland's highest military decoration for bravery in combat. In addition, he was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. On July 13, 2000, Jan Karski died of heart and kidney disease in Washington, DC.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Poland; Resistance Movements; Righteous among the Nations; Upstander; Warsaw Ghetto; Zygielbojm, Shmuel

Further Reading

Karski, Jan. Story of a Secret State: My Report to the World.

Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1944.

Paldiel, Mordecai. Saving the Jews: Amazing Stories of Men and Women Who Defied the "Final Solution." Rockville (MD): Schreiber, 2000.

Wood, E. Thomas, and Stanisław M. Jankowski. Karski: How One Man Tried to Stop the Holocaust. Lubbock (TX): Texas Tech University Press, 2014.

Kasztner, Reszó

Reszó (Rudolf) Kasztner was a controversial Jewish rescuer of Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary. Born in 1906 to Yitzhak and Helen Kasztner, he was raised with his two brothers in Cluj (Kolozsvár, Klozenberg), Transylvania. He was well educated, with a qualification in law. A linguist, he was fluent in Hungarian, Romanian, French, German, Latin, Yiddish, Hebrew, and Aramaic.

Early in his career, he worked as a journalist for the Zionist newspaper Uj Kelet. A committed Zionist, he edited the youth periodical Noar (Youth) from 1926 to 1928 and then worked in Budapest between 1929 and 1931. In 1934 he married Elizabeth Fischer, the daughter of Dr. József Fischer, a member of Parliament, president of the Jewish community of Kolozsvár, and member of the National Jewish Party. By 1942 he was fully ensconced in that city and opened the local office of Keren Hayesod, the United Palestine Appeal. From 1943 until 1945 he was the deputy chairman of the city's small Zionist Organization.

After the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944, he and Jewish rescue worker Joel Brand found themselves interacting with SS Lieutenant-Colonel Adolf Eichmann, who had come to Budapest specifically to establish the Reich Security Main Office to implement the Final Solution in Hungary. However, the very idea of their negotiating with the Germans was controversial, both during the war and afterward.

While the Nazis were imposing the “Final Solution,” they were clearly bent on the destruction of Hungary’s Jews; but at the same time, they were also the only authority with whom Jews could negotiate if rescue was to be achieved. As Kasztner was trying to work within this genocidal regime, the fundamental topic of conversation settled on an initiative that became known as the “Blood for Goods” (“Blut für Ware”) proposal. According to this, Nazi Germany would receive certain quantities of supplies for the German war effort from neutral countries (with the help of international Jewish bodies), in exchange for the survival of the Jewish population and their transfer from German-occupied territories to safety abroad, particularly Palestine.

This meant Kasztner had to deal face-to-face with Eichmann and other Nazis in his capacity as head of the Vaada Etzel Vehatzalah (Jewish Relief and Rescue Committee). The negotiation ultimately led to the Nazis releasing a trainload of 1,368 Jews, which included such luminaries as Rabbi Joel Teitelbaum, founder of the Satmar Hasidic dynasty, as well as members of Kasztner’s own family. The train left Budapest on June 30, 1944, but instead of heading directly to Switzerland it was diverted to Bergen-Belsen on July 9. Then followed months of delay, during which Kasztner worked to negotiate the Jews’ release. They were segregated from the other inmates and given a subsistence diet. Prior to their release in two batches—some in August and others in December—several died. By this stage, no war matériel had yet been transferred to the Nazis; the release was an initial gesture of good faith in the expectation that the relationship would hold and that these goods would be forthcoming at some stage soon thereafter.

Kasztner and his committee arranged for a diverse group of Jews to be assembled for the rescue. People of all ages and of all social classes were included: Zionists and non-Zionists, Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox, 972 females and 712 males. Baron Fülöp von Freudiger, director of the Orthodox congregation in Budapest, selected 80 rabbis and other prominent figures and paid for their inclusion in the passenger list.

It was, however, because of the 150 seats that were auctioned off to wealthy Jews that Kasztner’s name was vilified—and it was to cost him his life several years later. He was criticized not only for charging wealthy Jews but also for rescuing some of his family members at the expense of other members of the Jewish community.

His success in arranging for the transfer of these Jews to Switzerland would later come to be viewed as both self-serving and evidence of collaboration with the Nazis. Later, at his trial in Israel, Eichmann said that Kasztner had “agreed to help keep the Jews from resisting deportation—and even keep order in the collection camps—if I would close my eyes and let a few hundred or a few thousand young Jews emigrate to Palestine. It was a good bargain.”

The story of the Kasztner Train quickly became a controversial episode in the history of Jewish rescue during the Holocaust. As things turned out, the train was unique; it was a “life train,” as distinct from the death trains that had been conveying Jews to their fate in the extermination camps up to that point.

Overall, some 1,670 Jews survived as a result of Kasztner’s negotiations with Adolf Eichmann, which is about four hundred more than Oskar Schindler saved through his famous list. The difference between Kasztner and Schindler, however, is that some viewed Kasztner, a Jew, as having sold out vast numbers of other Jews in order to save his own life and that of his family and favorites, whereas Schindler, a gentile, has been recognized for his unconditional goodwill toward Jews.

After the war, Kasztner and his family remained in Europe prior to immigrating to Israel. Upon his arrival, he was welcomed into the ranks of the Mapai (Labor) Party which led pre-state Palestine and later governed Israel. He twice stood unsuccessfully for election to Israel's Knesset.

Kasztner's role in working with the SS made headlines in 1953 when he was accused, in a pamphlet produced by Malchiel Gruenwald, of collaborating with the Nazis. It said that this enabled the mass murder of Hungarian Jewry, and that Kasztner also partnered with Nazi officer Kurt Becher in the theft of Jewish property—and then saved Becher from punishment after the war. Kasztner sued Gruenwald for libel in a trial that was turned around and became an action exposing Kasztner's behavior during the war. In his ruling, Judge Benjamin Halevi acquitted Gruenwald of libel on the first, second, and fourth counts. The Israeli government appealed on Kasztner's behalf, and the Supreme Court of Israel overturned most of the original judgment against him in 1958.

This was not the end of Kasztner's ordeal, as, soon after midnight on March 4, 1957, he was shot in Tel Aviv by Ze'ev Eckstein, a veteran from the pre-state right-wing militia Lehi (known also as the Stern Gang), who, with his accomplices Yosef Menkes and Dan Shermer, accused him of selling out the Jewish people for his own convenience. Kasztner died on March 12 and was buried on March 17, 1957. Together, his assassins were found guilty of murder and given life sentences, but seven years later they were released.

To this day, despite the rescue of more than 1,600 Jews and the subsequent birth of the many thousands of descendants they produced, Rudolf Kasztner remains a divisive figure among survivors. He is, in short, seen as a hero in some circles and a hated collaborator in others, with a legacy that is still highly disputed and controversial.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Blood for Goods; Brand, Joel; Collaboration; Eichmann, Adolf; Hungary; Rescuers of Jews; Soos, Géza; Vrba, Rudolf

Further Reading

Aronson, Shlomo. Hitler, the Allies, and the Jews. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Braham, Randolph L., and William J. vanden Heuvel (Eds.). The Auschwitz Reports and the Holocaust in Hungary. New York: East European Monographs/Columbia University Press, 2011.

Porter, Anna. Kasztner's Train: The True Story of an Unknown Hero of the Holocaust. New York: Walker Books, 2008.

Zweig, Ronald W. The Gold Train: The Destruction of the Jews and the Looting of Hungary. London: Allen Lane, 2002.

Katzenberger Trial

The Katzenberger trial was a notorious Nazi show trial. A Jewish businessman and head of the Nuremberg Jewish community, Lehmann (Leo) Israel Katzenberger, aged 68 years, was accused of the crime of “racial pollution” because of his alleged sexual intercourse with a younger, Aryan woman named Irene Seiler. She was found guilty of perjury for denying the charge and imprisoned for two years hard labor; on March 14, 1942, Katzenberger was sentenced to death and was executed. The Katzenberger trial exemplified how antisemitism in Nazi Germany distorted the justice system. The presiding judge at the trial, Oswald Rothaug, was later tried at the Nuremberg Trials and sentenced to life imprisonment. The Katzenberger trial later formed the basis of a subplot in the award-winning motion picture Judgment at Nuremberg (Stanley Kramer, 1961).

Together with his two brothers, Leo Katzenberger (born November 28, 1873, in Massbach) owned a large shoe wholesale shop as well as some thirty other footwear stores throughout southern Germany. He was a leading member of the Nuremberg Jewish community, and from 1939 he was chairman of the Nuremberg Jewish Cultural Organization. He had a long-standing friendship with a young photographer, Irene Seiler (née Scheffler), the daughter of a non-Jewish friend, who from 1932 rented an apartment and a small storefront in the building at 19 Spittlertorgraben which the Katzenbergers owned, and which was situated next to the firm's offices. Although his business was “Aryanized” in 1938, he was still considered well-off and continued to own his building and rent space to Seiler. Local gossips had for years claimed that Seiler and Katzenberger were having an affair.

Someone denounced Katzenberger to the authorities and he was arrested on March 18, 1941, under the so-called Racial Protection Law (Rassenschutzgesetz), one of the Nuremberg Laws, which made “racial defilement” (Rassenschande)—in reality, sexual relations between “Aryans” and Jews—a criminal offense. Katzenberger consistently denied the charges, as did Irene Seiler, who claimed the relationship between them was that of a father and daughter. The original police report indicated that there was no evidence of a sexual relationship.

Under interrogation Katzenberger and Seiler denied that there was any sexual element to their relationship. The judge who initially investigated the case was unable to find sufficient evidence that sexual intercourse had occurred between them and concluded that there was too little evidence to proceed with the case.

The investigation had, however, attracted the attention of Oswald Rothaug, a judge known for his severity and fervent support for Nazism. Rothaug recognized the publicity such a trial would generate and saw it as a way to display his Nazi credentials and further his career. Rothaug had Katzenberger's case transferred from a more traditional criminal court to the Nuremberg Special Court (Sondergericht) established by the Nazi regime to try racial and political enemies of the state. He sent out tickets for the trial to all the prominent Nazis in Nuremberg.

The indictment before the Special Court was prepared according to the orders of Rothaug, and Katzenberger was not charged only with race defilement in this new indictment but also an additional charge under the Decree against Public Enemies, which made the death sentence permissible. The new indictment also joined Seiler on a charge of perjury. The effect of joining Seiler in the charge against Katzenberger was to preclude her from being a witness for the defendant—a combination contrary to established practice.

Prior to the trial, Rothaug called on Dr. Armin Bauer, medical counselor for the Nuremberg Court, as the medical expert for the Katzenberger case. He stated to Bauer that he wanted to pronounce a death sentence and that it was, therefore, necessary for the defendant to be examined. This examination, Rothaug stated, was a mere formality since Katzenberger “would be beheaded anyhow.” To the doctor's reproach that Katzenberger was old and it seemed questionable whether he could be charged with race defilement, Rothaug stated: “It is sufficient for me that the swine said that a German girl had sat upon his lap.”

There was great public interest in the proceedings and the court was crowded both days. Both Katzenberger and Seiler continued to deny that there was any sexual aspect to their relationship. Nevertheless, witnesses at the trial pointed out that Katzenberger had given Seiler a bouquet of flowers and that both had attended a café together. Rothaug, in what was a deliberately orchestrated show trial, repeatedly referred to Katzenberger as a “syphilitic Jew” and “an agent of world Jewry.”

No conclusive evidence was presented during the trial that Katzenberger and Seiler had ever had an affair, let alone that it had continued up to and during the war. The law at the time did not call for the death sentence for breaking the race laws. The normal sentence would have been a term of imprisonment of several years.

There was no question of the outcome. Rothaug convicted Katzenberger of race defilement and imposed the death penalty by applying not just the Law for the Protection of German

Blood and German Honor but also the Ordinance against Public Enemies (also called the Folk Pest Law) of 1939. The latter law permitted the death penalty if the accused exploited wartime conditions to further his or her crime, such as making use of the wartime blackout regulations to commit a crime. This law was used against Katzenberger on the grounds that he secretly visited Seiler “after dark.”

Leo Katzenberger was guillotined at Stadelheim Prison in Munich on June 2, 1942. Irene Seiler was found guilty of perjury for denying that an affair had taken place and sentenced to two years' imprisonment—in accordance with Hitler's wishes, women were not charged under the racial protection law but could be charged with perjury or obstruction of justice.

The written findings of the case reveal a series of inconsistencies and perversions allowed under the Nazi justice system. The accused were arrested on the basis of rumors and innuendo; their sworn statements were twisted and used against them to further the aims of the prosecution; and the verdict was written to meet a predetermined outcome of guilt. It was a public demonstration designed to inflame anti-semitic feeling and justify the extraordinary measures put in place to persecute Jews and other so-called enemies of the regime.

This case was an act in furtherance of the Nazi program to persecute and exterminate Jews. The fact is that nobody but a Jew would have been tried for racial pollution. Katzenberg was tried and executed only because he was a Jew.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Judgment at Nuremberg; “Racial Hygiene”; Rothaug, Oswald

Further Reading

Kohl, Christiane. The Maiden and the Jew: The Story of a Fatal Friendship in Nazi Germany. Hanover (NH): Steerforth Press, 2004.

Reicher, Harry. “Evading Responsibility for Crimes against Humanity: Murderous Lawyers at Nuremberg.” In The Law in Nazi Germany: Ideology, Opportunism and the Perversion of Justice, ed. Alan E. Steinweis and Robert D. Rachlin, 137–159. New York: Berghahn Books, 2013.

Katzenelson, Itzhak

Itzhak Katzenelson was a Hebrew and Yiddish poet and dramatist in Poland who was active in cultural resistance to the Holocaust. Born to Hinda and Jacob Benjamin Katzenelson on July 21, 1886, in Karelchich (Korelichy), a small town near Minsk, he received his early education from his father. He was a descendant of a long line of rabbinical and Talmudic sages and scholars dating back to the great Talmudic commentator Rabbi Yom-Tov Lipmann Heller.

Katzenelson was raised in Łódź, where the family had moved soon after he was born. He was considered a literary prodigy and by the age of 12 had already written his first play, Dreyfus un Esterhazy. As a young adult before World War I he opened a secular Hebrew school and undertook the creation of a network of such schools in Łódź from kindergarten to high school, which functioned until 1939. He also became known for his Hebrew textbooks and books for children, which were the first of their kind.

In addition, Katzenelson wrote Yiddish comedies (translated into Hebrew) and in 1912 founded the theater Habima Halvrit (“The Hebrew Stage”), which toured Poland and Lithuania. Several of his Yiddish plays were performed in Łódź before World War I. His first volume of poetry, Dimdumim (Twilight), appeared in 1910.

Beginning in 1930 Katzenelson belonged to the Dror Zionist movement in Łódź and also to Hechalutz, which, with emigration to Palestine its goal, operated a training commune, Kibbutz Hakhsharah. During the period between the wars, Katzenelson was conditioned by his belief that Jewish life in Poland was without hope due to the ingrained antisemitism of the Polish masses.

Nazi Germany invaded Poland on September 1, 1939, and eight days later Łódź was occupied. Katzenelson’s school was immediately closed down, later serving as the city’s Gestapo headquarters.

Urged on by his family, in late November 1939 Katzenelson fled to Warsaw. Once he was settled, his wife, Hanna, and their three children followed. Hanna and his two younger sons, Benjamin and Ben Zion, would be deported to their deaths in Treblinka on August 14, 1942.

In the ghetto, Katzenelson entered his most creative period, writing poems and articles in the underground Zionist press, as well as approximately fifty plays. He wrote poems reflecting the contemporary suffering of the ghetto, masked through biblical or historical themes. His descriptions were his responses to the wretched conditions in which the Jews of Warsaw found themselves, and through his plays he hoped to improve ghetto morale. His Yiddish play Iyov (Job) was published on June 22, 1941, possibly the only Jewish book published in the ghetto during the German occupation.

On July 20, 1942, just before the Nazis began their mass deportations of Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto, Mordechai Tenenbaum, one of the leading members of Dror and a founder of the Jewish Fighting Organization (ŻOB), concealed some of Katzenelson’s writings in an underground hiding place. Some of these survived the war.

In April 1943 the Jews of the Warsaw Ghetto began a revolt that would last for the next 27 days. The day after the start of the revolt, to save his life, friends smuggled Katzenelson and his surviving son Zvi out of a bunker at Leszno 50 and into the Aryan part of the city.

They went to the Polski Hotel, from where they obtained documents from Katzenelson’s friend David Guzik of the Joint Distribution Committee, certifying that they were citizens of Honduras. In possession of his new passport, they were transferred to the French internment camp at Vittel in May, 1943, where the Nazis held Allied citizens and nationals of neutral countries for possible later prisoner exchange.

It was here, on October 3, 1943, that he wrote possibly his greatest Yiddish work, Dos Lid funem Oysgehangen Yidishn Folk (“The Song of the Murdered Jewish People”). He completed this epic, a poem in 15 chapters describing the horrors of the Holocaust, on January 18, 1944. Among its lines were included:

And it continued. Ten a day, ten thousand Jews a day.

That did not last very long. Soon they took fifteen thousand.

Warsaw, The City of Jews—the fenced-in, walled-in city,

Dwindled, expired, melted like snow before my eyes.

Warsaw, packed with Jews like a synagogue on Yom Kippur, like a busy market place

Jews trading and worshipping, both happy and sad

Seeking their bread, praying to their God.

They crowded the walled-in, locked-in city.

You are deserted now, Warsaw, like a gloomy wasteland.

You are a cemetery now, more desolate than a graveyard.

Your streets are empty—not even a corpse can be found there.

The poem ended with the words “Woe to me, everything is over . . . there once existed a nation but she is no more.”

Katzenelson made two copies of the poem, one of which was given to Ruth Adler, a German Jew from Dresden who had a British Palestinian passport. In the spring of 1944 she received permission to leave the country in a prisoner exchange, smuggling out one of the copies and taking it to Palestine. Katzenelson buried the manuscript of the other copy in bottles under a tree at Vittel with the help of a fellow prisoner, Miriam Novitch, who retrieved it after liberation. The poem was first published in May 1945. Extracts have since been published in numerous languages, and a stand-alone volume has also appeared.

In the early spring of 1944 the Jews interned at Vittel were declared stateless, and on April 18, 1944, those of Polish origin were transported in three railroad cars to the Drancy transit camp near Paris. In late April 1944, Itzhak and Zvi Katzenelson were sent on a transport to Auschwitz, where they were murdered on May 1, 1944.

In Israel, the Ghetto Fighters' House (Beit Lohamei Hage'taot) has been named in Katzenelson's honor as the Itzhak Katzenelson Holocaust and Jewish Resistance Heritage Museum. This was founded in 1949 by Holocaust survivors, former ghetto fighters, and veterans of partisan units. Its aim is to serve as a place of testimony relating the story of the Jewish people in the 20th century, and in particular during World War II. As a further lasting monument, the museum has made extensive efforts to collect as many of Katzenelson's manuscripts as can be located and to translate his works into English and other languages.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Jewish Resistance; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Aaron, Frieda W. Bearing the Unbearable: Yiddish and Polish Poetry in the Ghettos and Concentration Camps. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.

Rudavsky, Joseph. To Live with Hope, to Die with Dignity: Spiritual Resistance in the Ghettos and Camps. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 1987.

Keitel, Wilhelm

Wilhelm Keitel was Germany's highest-ranking officer of World War II. His shameless subservience to Adolf Hitler proved disastrous to German strategy and garnered him the nickname of "lakeitel" (lackey).

Keitel was born at Helmscherode, Hanover, on August 22, 1882, into a family of successful farmers. The Keitel family was of a decidedly unmilitary persuasion, and reputedly, Keitel's father, when drafted, was not allowed to wear his army uniform in the house. In 1900 Keitel broke with this tradition by joining the military as an artillery officer. He fought in World War I and was wounded but remained more of a staff than combat officer.

After the war, Keitel circulated among the many paramilitary organizations that terrorized the streets of Germany during the rule of the Weimar Republic before joining the dramatically scaled-down German Army. A competent if dull administrator, he rose steadily through the ranks and, in 1929, was named to head the Army Organization Department. In 1933 he gained appointment to the secret German General Staff, which had been outlawed by the Treaty of Versailles. Again, Keitel performed smoothly, and in 1937 he was promoted to general of artillery. That same year, he married army chief of staff Werner von Blomberg's daughter. When Hitler sacked Blomberg in 1938, he inquired as to Keitel's identity. Blomberg informed him that Keitel was nothing more than his military secretary, and Hitler responded, "That is exactly the kind of man I am looking for." Thus the dull and previously undistinguished Keitel became the head of the army's General Staff and part of Hitler's inner circle.

Thereafter, Keitel's relationship with Hitler was one of subservience. Despite his rank as head of the armed forces, he never seriously challenged any of Hitler's directives or instructions, and his willingness to obey his superior's every wish garnered him the contempt of fellow generals. This relationship exerted the most disastrous consequences on Germany's military fortunes, as Keitel's deliberate suppression of generals who questioned Hitler's decisions undermined the effectiveness of the General Staff. Through his willing compliance, strategic direction of the impending war passed directly into Hitler's hands.

When World War II began in September 1939, Keitel functioned as Hitler's chief strategic adviser, a position he held for the next six years. Hitler valued his advice, promoting him to field marshal after the fall of France in the spring of 1940 and authorizing him to conclude an armistice with the conquered country. Keitel and his subordinate, General Alfred Jodl, basically agreed to any operational dictate that Hitler cared to impose on the military, regardless of the consequences. On several occasions, he pronounced Hitler "the greatest commander of all time." Only once, when he threatened to resign over the projected invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941, did Keitel display any independence. Furthermore, his servile demeanor also led to complicity in major war crimes. Foremost among these was the famous "Night and Fog" directive, which declared that any German citizen deemed a threat to the state was liable to disappear without explanation to next of kin. Keitel also authorized brutal SS units to execute men, women, and children in occupied territories at their convenience. True to form, Keitel was standing at Hitler's side during the failed bomb plot of July 1944 and was first to congratulate him upon surviving. He consequently played a prominent role in the Army Court of Honor that sentenced to death hundreds of innocent army officers suspected of complicity in the bombing. Following Hitler's suicide in April 1945, Keitel worked briefly for the new government under Admiral Karl Doenitz, and on May 9 he formally signed Germany's surrender to the Allies in Berlin.

Within days, Keitel was arrested by Allied authorities and charged with war crimes. During the Nuremberg Trials, he matter-of-factly explained that he was only carrying out orders issued by his superior. Not surprisingly, the court found him guilty on several counts and sentenced him to hang. Keitel apparently experienced a change of heart, admitted to his guilt, and requested to be shot like a soldier. When this request was denied, he was hanged on October 16, 1946.

JOHN C. FREDRIKSEN

See also: Hitler, Adolf; Krajevac Massacre; Operation Barbarossa; Nacht und Nebel; Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941; Nuremberg Defense; Nuremberg Trials

Further Reading

Fest, Joachim C. The Face of the Third Reich: Portraits of the Nazi Leadership. New York: Pantheon Books, 1970.
Mueller, Gene. The Forgotten Field Marshal: Wilhelm Keitel. New York: Cooper Square Press, 1955.

Kempner, Vitka

Vitka Kempner was a Jewish partisan who fought the Nazis during World War II.

Born in the Polish town of Kalisch in 1920, she fled Poland following the German conquest in the fall of 1939. Arriving in Vilna, Lithuania, after an arduous journey on foot, Kempner linked up with fellow members of Hashomer Hatzair (the Young Guard), a Zionist youth organization. They helped her find work and a roommate, Rozka Korczak, another refugee from Poland. Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union and conquest of Lithuania, both Kempner and Korczak joined an underground resistance movement organized by Abba Kovner, a Hashomer Hatzair leader. Kovner built his organization, the Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatsie (United Partisan Organization, FPO), into one of the largest and most effective Jewish partisan units of the war.

Kempner, who bleached her hair blond and could pass as non-Jewish, became one of the FPO's most important scouts and spies. She frequently traveled from the Vilna Ghetto, where the Germans had ordered all Jews confined, past German patrols to nearby forests to meet with various partisan units. She helped smuggle weapons into the ghetto and led an FPO team on one of its first missions, the successful demolition of a German train as it crossed a bridge. As the Germans slowly deported Jews from the ghetto to labor and death camps, Kempner helped Kovner smuggle more and more partisans out of Vilna and into the nearby forests. She led the last group out of Vilna on the night of September 23–24, 1943, shortly before the Germans massacred the ghetto's remaining inhabitants. Operating from bases in the forests, Kempner and the FPO continued to conduct sabotage operations against the Germans for the next year, blowing up trains and bridges, cutting telephone lines, and supplying the Soviet Army with important intelligence. The FPO also rescued several hundred Jews from labor camps.

After the war, Kovner and 50 other partisans, including 8 women, formed a new organization, Nakam (Hebrew for revenge), to avenge the Holocaust. The Jewish leadership in Palestine opposed extrajudicial revenge and blocked Nakam's attempts to smuggle large quantities of poison into Europe to use against Allied-held Nazi prisoners. Kovner persevered, and Nakam operatives sought targets in Europe and manufactured poison on their own. Kempner coordinated part of this operation from Paris and decided to focus on the Nuremberg camp, where the Allies held 30,000 Nazi and SS prisoners. Nakam operatives poisoned the camp's bread shipment with arsenic in April 1946. Several thousand prisoners became seriously ill and more than 100 died over the next few months as a direct result of arsenic poisoning. Afterward, Kempner smuggled the plot's participants into Palestine, where she married Kovner. Along with several other former partisans, they settled in Kibbutz Ein Hahoresh.

Vitka Kempner died on February 15, 2012.

STEPHEN K. STEIN

See also: Jewish Partisans; Kovner, Abba; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Ghetto in Flames: The Struggle and Destruction of the Jews in Vilna in the Holocaust. New York: Holocaust Library, 1982.
Bar-Zohar, Michael. The Avengers. New York: Hawthorne Books, 1967.
Cohen, Rich. The Avengers: A Jewish War Story. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2000.
Levin, Dov. Fighting Back: Lithuanian Jewry's Armed Resistance to the Nazis, 1941–1945. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.

Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph

Louis-Joseph Kerkhofs was a Roman Catholic priest and bishop of Liège, Belgium, from 1925 until 1961, playing a significant role in harboring Belgian Jews during World War II.

He was born on February 15, 1878, in Val-Meer, Belgium. After undertaking seminary studies, including a period in Rome, he was ordained a priest in 1900. The following year, he was appointed to the philosophy faculty at a seminary in Saint-Trond. In 1917 he was named professor of dogmatic theology at Belgium's preeminent seminary in Liège. In 1924 Kerkhofs was made auxiliary bishop of Liège, and the following year he became bishop.

Kerkhofs was an outgoing and extremely magnanimous man who worked hard to mitigate suffering among his flock. He was also an outspoken opponent of ethnic and racial discrimination and worked closely with Belgium's Jewish population, particularly in Liège. In the spring of 1940 German troops invaded Belgium and imposed a rigid occupation on its people. Part of the Germans' occupation policies included the rounding up and deportation of Belgian Jews, including a number of alien Jews who had fled to Belgium for safety prior to the invasion.

Kerkhofs immediately instructed his priests and other religious people to do whatever they could to hide Jews and prevent them from being deported to concentration camps. By late 1941 there were several hundred Jews in hiding at monasteries and convents throughout Belgium. Kerkhofs provided refuge for several dozen Jews in his official residence, including Cantor Joseph Lepkifer, who was a leader of Liège's Jewish community, and his family. In 1943, when fears surfaced that the Lepkifers might be discovered by occupation authorities, Bishop Kerkhofs personally drove Mrs. Lepkifer to a small convent on the outskirts of Liege, where she remained until Belgium was liberated the following year. Kerkhof is credited with having helped save several hundred Jews from possible deportation and death.

Kerkhofs retired as bishop in December 1961 and died in Liège on December 31, 1962. In July 1981 Israel's Yad Vashem proclaimed the late bishop as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his efforts to aid Jews during World War II.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Belgium; Catholic Church; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Moore, Bob. Survivors: Jewish Self-Help and Rescue in Nazi-Occupied Western Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Vromen, Suzanne. Hidden Children of the Holocaust: Belgian Nuns and Their Daring Rescues of Young Jews from the Nazis. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Kharkov Trial

Arguably the first anti-Nazi war crimes trial took place not at the end of World War II, but rather in December 1943, and not when victory against the Nazis had been achieved, but when it was far from guaranteed. Moreover, the trial took place in the Soviet Union.

The background to this can be found in a declaration several weeks earlier in Moscow. Formally titled the Declaration of the Four Nations on Security, the Moscow Declaration was an Allied statement signed on October 30, 1943, by the governments of Britain, the Soviet Union, China, and the United States. It was a warning to the Nazi government that those responsible for or participating in atrocities, massacres, or executions, upon being apprehended, would be returned for trial to the countries in which they had committed their crimes. In clear language, it stated that those who participated in perpetrating atrocities would be held accountable for their actions. It was not made specifically in order to punish those responsible for the Holocaust and did not address directly the Nazi persecution of the Jews.

The declaration was, however, highly influential in the development of international war crimes law, as it placed the punishment of crimes committed in wartime as a war aim. Accordingly, it was the "birth certificate" of what became the International Military Tribunal established to try alleged war criminals at Nuremberg.

It also set the stage for the first war crimes trials in December 1943, as the Soviet leaders saw in this declaration the possibility of putting on trial Nazis they managed to capture during the war. This did not bode well for the Nazis captured in the eastern Ukrainian city of Kharkov (Kharkiv).

This city had suffered significantly during World War II. It was first captured by Nazi forces on October 24, 1941, but was retaken by the Soviets on February 16, 1943. The Nazis then recaptured the city on March 15, 1943, before the Soviets finally liberated it on August 23, 1943. Seventy percent of the city had been destroyed, and tens of thousands of citizens had been killed.

In view of this, the Soviet authorities were not well disposed to any forms of leniency for captured Nazis. Following the Moscow Declaration, and in a spirit of retribution and overtly expressed justice, the Military Tribunal of the 4th Ukrainian Front conducted the first war crimes trial against Nazi defendants on December 15–18, 1943. Three Nazis and a native Ukrainian collaborator were charged with war crimes perpetrated during the German occupation of the area.

Considerable publicity was given to the proceedings, which took place in a large theater with an audience of six thousand Kharkov residents. While the accused were defended by eminent Soviet lawyers, the fact that the forms of Soviet law were followed was not necessarily the best indication that justice would be done or be seen to be done. It was, therefore, inevitable that the accused would confess to a series of what were labeled as appalling atrocities that they committed in accordance with orders issued from the highest quarters.

Stating that they were the instruments of brutal crimes deliberately planned from above, they blamed their political leaders—Hitler, Himmler, and Alfred Rosenberg—as the “real” war criminals. The tribunal was not convinced, particularly given the all-too-recent Moscow Declaration. While the tribunal had all the hallmarks of a Soviet-style show trial, it also provided a precedent that was later to be invoked at Nuremberg: the principle that where a moral choice was possible, the defense of “following superior orders” was unacceptable.

Accordingly, after a trial that began on Wednesday, December 15, 1943, the sentence of death by hanging was handed down on Saturday, December 18. The next day, the sentences were carried out against three members of the Kharkov Gestapo: Hans Rietz, Wilhelm Langfeld, and Reinhard Retzlaff; and a Ukrainian collaborator who acted as a driver for the Gestapo, Mikhail Bulanov. All of them were hanged in Kharkov’s public square.

The story of the now-forgotten Kharkov Trials, which sought justice for the thousands killed in Ukraine two years prior to Nuremberg, was recently been brought to light by a journalist from Orlando, Florida, Greg Dawson. In a book titled Judgment before Nuremberg (2012), he chronicled the full story of the trial at Kharkov, following a trail that took him to the city itself and to some fascinating conclusions about this first attempt at anti-Nazi justice—18 months before the end of World War II, and two full years before the opening statement by the prosecution at Nuremberg.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Moscow Declaration; Nuremberg Defense; Soviet Union

Further Reading

Dawson, Greg. Judgment before Nuremberg: The Holocaust in the Ukraine and the First Nazi War Crimes Trial. New York: Pegasus, 2012.

Kielce Pogrom

In the aftermath of the Holocaust and the liberation of the Jews from Nazi captivity, many of those who had survived returned to their home towns searching for loved ones and in the quest to reestablish their lives. About 200 of these returned to the city of Kielce, in southern Poland. They arrived at a time that was not favorable for Jews. Many Poles were opposed to a Jewish return, and a deep-seated antisemitic tradition, dating from well before World War II, did not create welcoming conditions for them. Some, if not many, Poles also feared they would have to surrender their illegal possession of Jewish property and homes they had acquired upon the deportation and arrest of the Jews. Furthermore, Jews were increasingly seen as agents for the occupying Soviet troops and the Polish communists who had been installed in Warsaw on orders from Moscow. An extremist right-wing group, Narodowe Sily Zbrojne (National Defense Force), was even known to have pulled returning Jews off trains and murdered them. Across Poland, it was estimated that up to 400 Jews were murdered between February and September 1946.

On July 4, 1946, a nine-year-old Polish boy, Henryk Blaszczyk, was reported missing in Kielce. His father accused returning Jews of kidnapping his son, and the townsfolk, emulating anti-Jewish pogroms from earlier times, began to clamor for the destruction of the entire Jewish community. A blood libel was invoked that the Jews had wanted the boy’s blood for ritual purposes. Marching into the Jewish quarter—which was already largely depopulated because of the losses of the Holocaust—the mob, which comprised townsfolk of all ages, went on a violent rampage. Synagogues and homes were burned, and the Jewish Community Center was besieged. Police assisted in luring Jews out of their hiding places, only to hand them over to the mob. Ransacking the Jewish district lasted throughout the day and well into the night. At the Jewish Community Center, the panic-stricken pleas of the community leaders over the phone to the local bishop and other nearby figures of authority fell on deaf ears. By the time the mob’s frenzy had abated, 42 Jews, most of them survivors of Nazi concentration camps and death camps, had been murdered. About 50 others were injured, some seriously. As for Henryk Blaszczyk, the boy whose disappearance had initiated the pogrom, it was later discovered that his father had earlier sent the boy away to the next town in order to support the prearranged kidnapping story. The Kielce Pogrom was a tragic addendum to the Nazi Holocaust and a signal to Jews throughout Europe that Poland was no longer a country in which they could feel safe.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Blood Libel; Poland

Further Reading

Engel, David. "Patterns of Anti-Jewish Violence in Poland, 1944–1946." Yad Vashem Studies XXVI (1998), 43–85.

Gross, Jan. Fear: Anti-Semitism in Poland after Auschwitz. New York: Random House, 2007.

Schleunes, Karl A. The Twisted Road to Auschwitz: Nazi Policy toward German Jews, 1933–1939. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1970.

Kindertransport

Kindertransport, literally meaning “the transport of children” in German, was the informal term used to describe the British government’s program that transported and temporarily resettled mainly Jewish children from Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland between December 1938 and September 1939. The official name of the effort was the Refugee Children Movement (RCM), which rescued some 10,000 children in roughly nine months; the children ranged in age from infants to 17 years old. The rescued children were resettled in hostels, foster homes, and sometimes on farms.

On November 15, 1938, in the immediate aftermath of the Kristallnacht pogrom in Germany and Austria, when Jewish businesses and interests came under attack, Jewish leaders in Britain appealed directly to Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain for help in rescuing Jewish children from these two

The Kindertransport, or “children’s transport,” was organized by the London-based Central British Fund for German Jewry. In the year 1939 it arranged for the rescue of nearly 10,000 predominantly Jewish children from Germany and Austria. A private Kindertransport initiative for Jewish children from Czechoslovakia was also organized by Nicholas Winton. Under the scheme, children were placed in British foster homes, hostels, and farms. In this image, a youth leader is ringing the dinner bell at a camp for Kindertransport children in January 1939. (Reg Speller/Fox Photos/Getty Images) countries. Specifically, they asked that immigration requirements be altered so that unaccompanied Jewish children might be allowed into the country on a temporary basis. In short order, Parliament took up the issue and agreed to the request, although it did not set a limit on the number of children to be admitted. Various Jewish relief agencies swung into action, as did the World Jewish Relief Fund, which worked with British officials in identifying children to be moved and making arrangements for their transport and resettlement.

Within days of the public announcement of the Kindertransport program, some 500 British households offered to take in a child or multiple children. Children were sent by train and boat to Harwich, in the southeast of England, where they were oriented and then resettled. They left their homes without valuables, a maximum of ten marks, and were permitted only one small suitcase. The first Kindertransport, numbering some 200 children, left Berlin on December 1, 1938, and arrived in Harwich the following day. Later, after the Germans invaded Czechoslovakia, the program was expanded to include Czech children, in an initiative that lay directly at the feet of a private individual, Nicholas Winton. Several groups also came from Poland, especially during the summer of 1939.

A number of the hostels in which some of the children were settled, particularly in the southwest of England, were administered by a Jewish youth organization known as Habonim, which was a socialist movement dedicated to Zionism. Many other children spent time with English families in cities or on farms in the countryside. The program ended in September 1939, when Germany attacked Poland, sparking World War II. In all, about 10,000 children were resettled in Britain; had the program commenced earlier, that number might have been much larger.

After the war was over in 1945, many Kindertransport children attempted to reunite with their loved ones. Although some were successful, it was a sad fact that many were unable to do so, as their families had perished in the Holocaust or had been killed in combat or other wartime tragedies.

In 1989 Eddy Behrendt, who had been sent to England in 1939 at the age of nine, established the Kindertransport Association, which is dedicated to helping unite Kindertransport survivors with family members and sponsoring reunions of survivors so that they might share memories of and insights into their common ordeal. After the war, Behrendt had made his way to the United States and became an American citizen. The organization he founded worked closely with the Simon Wiesenthal Center to identify Kindertransport survivors living in the United States.

The organization has since sponsored a yearly reunion of survivors and has provided new insights into a neglected part of the narrative of the Holocaust. Today, the association raises money for children in need, is involved in numerous educational endeavors, and publishes a quarterly journal. It has active chapters in four states as well as the District of Columbia and Toronto, Canada.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: British Response to the Holocaust; Children during the Holocaust; Winton, Nicholas

Further Reading

Byers, Ann. Saving Children from the Holocaust: The Kindertransport. Buchanan (NY): Enslow, 2011.

Samuels, Diane. Kindertransport. London: Nick Hern Books, 2010.

Koch Trial

The so-called “Koch Trial” was a war crimes trial of Ilse Koch conducted by the U.S. General Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals in Dachau, Germany, from April 11 to August 12, 1947. Ilse Koch was the wife of Karl Koch, the former commandant of the Buchenwald concentration camp. She was accused of killing inmates who had tattoos in order to collect their skin. After Allied troops entered Buchenwald in April 1945, many of the 21,000 survivors were interviewed. Some of them talked about a “Kommandeuse,” a fierce red-haired woman who was perverse and brutally cruel. The prisoners called her the “Witch of Buchenwald,” which the press transformed into the “Bitch of Buchenwald.”

In June 1945 Ilse Koch was identified by an ex-inmate and arrested. Subsequent inquiries into activities in Buchenwald produced a huge amount of evidence against her. Among the physical evidence was a lampshade made of human tattooed skin, a discovery that greatly inflamed international public opinion. The trial began nearly two years later on April 11, 1947. It would be one of the most complex events in Nazi war crimes judicial history but had no connection to the Nuremberg Tribunal.

The court was made up of nine military judges; the prosecution consisted of three civilian lawyers. The task of defending Ilse Koch fell to a mixed staff of both military and civilian lawyers. Ilse Koch was charged with war crimes and violation of the Geneva and Hague conventions. She was indicted for having concurred with the National Socialists' common design by killing and mistreating thousands of people. The 16 prosecution witnesses helped to portray her nefarious nature. She had brutally abused prisoners in the camp, using the power that her husband had arbitrarily granted her to perpetrate sadistic and perverse acts on Buchenwald's inmates. The heart of the trial in Dachau became the famous articles made of human skin.

During the investigation, several items of tattooed human skin were discovered at the camp. Most of the evidence was handed over to military staff, which had taken them to Nuremberg. The prosecution thus had only a receipt for the evidence; nevertheless, the Allies already knew of the existence of articles made of human skin.

The trial ended on August 12, 1947. The prosecution asked for the death penalty, but Koch was at that time seven months pregnant, which made an immediate death sentence impossible. On August 14, 1947, she was condemned to life imprisonment. The unanimous verdict declared her guilty of having broken the laws of warfare and of having concurred with the National Socialists' common design. The defense asked for a rehearing, challenging the credibility of the witnesses and attacking the procedural weakness concerning the lack of hard evidence against Koch. The trial was indeed reheard. A central commission of the U.S. occupation force in Europe acknowledged the problem of the witnesses' integrity and the deficiency of tangible evidence against Koch. On June 8, 1948, General Lucius D. Clay, commander of the American occupation troops in Europe, reduced her sentence to four years' imprisonment.

Clay's decision was kept confidential until a journalist discovered and divulged it, causing a backlash among the American public. The press coverage of Clay's decision quickly turned it into a political problem, and a U.S. congressional committee investigated the case, drawing it to the attention of President Harry S. Truman. Meanwhile, the Bavarian government gave notice that if Koch were released, new proceedings would be brought against her. Nevertheless, she was set free in October 1949 and, after bureaucratic wrangling between the U.S. government and the government of East Germany, she was handed over to West German authorities, who again arrested her.

A seven-page indictment enumerated the West German accusations against Koch, among them the charge of having ordered inmates in Buchenwald murdered in order to obtain their tattooed skin. On November 26, 1950, the new trial began; this was the first independent German trial of a Nazi war criminal. The 15 members of the jury heard from almost 200 witnesses, but the prosecution failed to produce any new evidence against Koch. Koch was nevertheless found guilty of abuse of prisoners and of incitement to homicide, but again, the tattooed skin could not be directly connected to her.

Koch was sentenced to life imprisonment. Her defense attorney put forward several petitions for pardon, arguing that because of the great clamor surrounding her case, she had never received a fair trial. On September 2, 1967, Ilse Koch committed suicide in her cell.

MASSIMILIANO LIVI

See also: Buchenwald; War Crimes

Further Reading

Jacobson, Mark. The Lampshade: A Holocaust Detective Story from Buchenwald to New Orleans. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2011.

Whitlock, Flint. The Beasts of Buchenwald: Karl & Ilse Koch, Human-Skin Lampshades, and the War-Crimes Trial of the Century. Brule (WI): Cable, 2011.

"The Witch of Buchenwald," Newsweek, July 28, 1947, 28–29.

Kolbe, Raymond

Raymond Kolbe was a Polish Roman Catholic priest and martyr who perished at Auschwitz, volunteering to die in lieu of another prisoner.

Kolbe was born on January 8, 1894, in Zdunskawola, Poland. Under the influence of the Franciscan mission in the parish of Pabianice, the first of the three Kolbe children entered the seminary of the Conventual Franciscans in Lviv in the early 1900s. Raymond entered the seminary in 1907 along with his brother Francis. Raymond took the name Maximilian on September 4, 1910, as he became a Franciscan novice. The other brother, Joseph, entered the seminary that same year. In 1911 Maximilian professed his first vows. He was soon sent to Rome to study philosophy at the Gregorian University from 1912 to 1915 and then theology at the Collegio Serafico, obtaining doctorates in both. In the meantime, as Maximilian Maria, he professed his solemn vows in 1914; he was ordained a priest on April 28, 1918.

While still a deacon, Maximilian had founded a Marian movement called Militia Immacolatae (Militia of the Immaculate One)—a spiritual and educational movement dedicated to apostolic work. In Poland, the Militia opened its own printing press, which circulated periodicals, newspapers, and numerous catechetical and devotional writings to more than 1 million people. In the fall of 1927 Father Kolbe obtained land just west of Warsaw and there established an evangelization center and soon the largest Catholic religious house of the time (762 members in 1939), which he called Niepokalanow, the “City of the Immaculata.” Mindful of his apostolic mission, he envisioned Marian centers in every country and set out to Asia, where he founded friaries, seminaries, and printing houses in Japan and India. The movement, however, was thwarted by lack of funds.

After Father Maximilian was recalled to Poland in June 1936 to supervise the original Niepokalanow, the center intensified its didactic and apostolic activity within Poland. With the German invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, the friary was dissolved, and its members heeded the call of the Polish authorities to serve the Polish Red Cross. In the same month, the Nazis arrested Father Kolbe along with 37 other brothers who remained in Niepokalanow. After the friars were released in December 1939, they resumed their charitable work. The friary sheltered more than 3,000 displaced Poles, some 2,000 of whom were Jewish, until it was closed down in February 1941. Father Kolbe was himself arrested that same month.

Together with four companions, Maximilian was taken to the Gestapo prison in Warsaw and then transported to the death camp at Auschwitz, where he was tattooed with the number 16670. While working in the camp, he ministered to other prisoners, Jews and Christians alike, secretly heard confessions, held mass, and delivered communion, using smuggled bread and wine. At the end of July, in retribution for an escape from the camp, Commandant Karl Fritsch sentenced 10 prisoners to death by starvation. Father Kolbe volunteered to die for one of the condemned and was placed together with the other prisoners in starvation chamber number 18. After two weeks, four men were still alive, among them Maximilian. The men were killed with injections of carbolic acid on August 14, 1941, their bodies cremated the following day. On October 17, 1971, Maximilian was beatified by Pope Paul VI, and on October 10, 1982, he was canonized by Pope John Paul II, who proclaimed him a “martyr of charity.”

EWA SLOJKA

See also: Birkenau; Catholic Church; Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Dewar, Diana. Saint of Auschwitz: The Story of Maximilian Kolbe. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1982.

Kolbe, Maximilian. The Kolbe Reader: The Writings of St. Maximilian M. Kolbe, OFM Conv. Edited by Anselm W. Romb. Libertyville (IL): Franciscan Martown Press, 1987.

Treece, Patricia. A Man for Others: Maximilian Kolbe, Saint of Auschwitz, in the Words of Those Who Knew Him. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1982.

Kommissarbefehl

The Kommissarbefehl, or “Commissar Order,” was an order issued by the Armed Forces High Command on June 6, 1941. It was a clear manifestation of the deeply ideological nature of the Nazis’ view of how the forthcoming struggle with the Soviet Union was to be fought. The full and formal name of the order was Guidelines for the Treatment of Political Commissars (Richtlinien für die Behandlung politischer Kommissare).

Within the Soviet state, political commissars were Communist Party officials who supervised the political education and administration of military units. They were not subject to military discipline and reported directly to party leaders. Their primary task was to transmit political propaganda from the party and prevent dissent among the troops. When the Nazi High Command issued the Kommissarbefehl, therefore, the core demand was that German soldiers shoot any Soviet political commissars taken prisoner in the forthcoming conflict following Operation Barbarossa. The belief was that Soviet political commissars were the carriers of Judeo-Bolshevik ideas, which were antithetical to everything for which Nazism stood. By extension, within the Nazi conception of communism, this included all Jews, as they were viewed as the chief disseminators of Bolshevik ideology. Accordingly, special mobile killing squads, the Einsatzgruppen, were established to accompany the combat troops of the German army in the weeks following the invasion of June 22, 1941.

The order was signed by General Walter Warlimont and approved by General Wilhelm Keitel—a clear indication that this was approved at the highest levels. Among other things, the order included the following paragraphs:

In the battle against Bolshevism, the adherence of the enemy to the principles of humanity or international law is not to be counted upon. In particular it can be expected that those of us who are taken prisoner will be treated with hatred, cruelty and inhumanity by political commissars of every kind.

The troops must be aware that:

1. In this battle mercy or considerations of international law is false. They are a danger to our own safety and to the rapid pacification of the conquered territories.

2. The originators of barbaric, Asiatic methods of warfare are the political commissars. So immediate and unhesitatingly severe measures must be undertaken against them. They are therefore, when captured in battle, as a matter of routine to be dispatched by firearms.

The following provisions also apply:

3. Political commissars as agents of the enemy troops are recognizable from their special badge—a red star with a golden woven hammer and sickle on the sleeves. . . . These commissars are not to be recognized as soldiers; the protection due to prisoners of war under international law does not apply to them. When they have been separated, they are to be finished off.

As this order called for the mass murder of noncombatants by German combat troops, it was clear to the German commanders that the order was a contravention of international law; but having been underwritten by Adolf Hitler, whose word was above written law and overrode existing foreign obligations, the Kommissarbefehl was accepted by the High Command.

Enforcement of the Commissar Order led to thousands of executions; not only of political commissars but also of Jews (regardless of whether or not they had anything to do with communism) and of huge numbers of Soviet prisoners of war, seen as racial enemies just as much as bearers of Bolshevik ideology. Moreover, every German general involved in Operation Barbarossa throughout the summer and autumn of 1941 enforced the order.

Though effective in murdering tens of thousands of those who might otherwise have raised and maintained the morale of Soviet troops, the Kommissarbefehl rebounded against the Nazis. With the realization that the Nazis were slaughtering Soviet citizens and soldiers regardless of their belligerent status, Red Army troops mounted intensified levels of resistance against the Germans. In response, several German army commanders sought to have the order rescinded or modified, but on September 23, 1941, Hitler declined “any modification of the existing orders regarding the treatment of political commissars.” On May 6, 1942, however, less than a year after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, the Kommissarbefehl was finally overturned after continued appeals to Hitler from German field commanders.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Communists in the Holocaust; Einsatzgruppen; Lubny Massacre; Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941; Operation Barbarossa; Soviet Union; Total War and the Holocaust; Waffen-SS

Further Reading

Bartov, Omer. The Eastern Front, 1941–45: German Troops and the Barbarisation of Warfare. Basingstoke (UK): Palgrave Macmillan, 1986.

Fritz, Stephen G. Ostkrieg: Hitler’s War of Extermination in the East. Lexington (KY): University Press of Kentucky, 2011.

Megargee, Geoffrey P. War of Annihilation: Combat and Genocide on the Eastern Front, 1941. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2006.

Korczak, Janusz

Janusz Korczak (Henryk Goldszmit) was a Polish Jewish pediatrician, children’s author and educator, journalist, and social activist. Born to a nonobservant Jewish family in Warsaw in 1878 or 1879 (sources vary) as Hersz (Henryk) Goldszmit, he was the son of Józef and Cecylia Goldszmit. His father was a lawyer; the family prospered, but when Henryk was 11 his father became mentally ill and died in a mental hospital six years later. The family faced suffering and deprivation, and while attending school in Warsaw, Henryk started working as a tutor for other pupils. In 1896 he debuted on the literary scene with a satirical text on raising children.

A mediocre student, he committed all his free time to his interest in literature. In 1898 he adopted the pen name Janusz Korczak as part of a literary contest and began associating with liberal educators and writers. He wrote for several Polish-language newspapers, while his first books, Children of the Streets (1901) and A Child of the Salon (1906), gained him literary recognition. In 1898 he began studying medicine at the University of Warsaw and upon graduation he was drafted into the Russian army during the Russo-Japanese War as a military doctor.

As a pediatrician Korczak was fascinated by children, and between 1905 and 1912 he worked at a Jewish Children’s Hospital in Warsaw. In 1912 he became a director of Dom Sierot, a new and spacious orphanage for Jewish children, which opened a summer camp in 1921 that remained open until the summer of 1940.

In 1914 Korczak was again called up as a military doctor in the Russian army. At this time he wrote his first important work, How to Love a Child. He also wrote essays based on observing parents and children in the war-torn countryside. With the end of the war, Korczak established an orphanage for Polish Christian orphans (Nasz Dom) in 1919 in Warsaw. During summer holidays the children of Dom Sierot and Nasz Dom played together.

During the 1920s Korczak began collaborating with institutions educating teachers, especially the National Institute of Special Pedagogy. Besides serving as principal of Dom Sierot and Nasz Dom, he hosted a hugely popular radio show that promoted and popularized the rights of children; he was a principal of an experimental school, a docent at a Polish university, and wrote a great deal. Korczak also served as an expert witness in a district court for minors, became well known in Polish society, and received many awards.

By the mid-1930s Korczak's public career underwent a change. Following the death of the Polish dictator, Jozef Pilsudski, political power in the country came into the hands of radical right-wing and openly antisemitic circles. Korczak was removed from many of the positions in which he had been active. His radio program was terminated in 1937, as the station was reluctant to keep a Jew on the air. The right-wing press castigated him, saying that as a Jew he could never be a real Pole and should not be allowed to educate Polish children. In 1934 and 1936 Korczak visited Palestine and, influenced by the kibbutz movement, he concluded that all Jews should move there.

In 1939, with the outbreak of World War II, Korczak volunteered for duty in the Polish army but was refused due to his age. With the Nazi imposition of antisemitic measures, Korczak was at first jailed by the Nazis, and when the Warsaw Ghetto was created in 1940 his orphanage was forced to move into the ghetto. Korczak moved in with them.

The ghetto population numbered some 400,000 Jews, who soon suffered from starvation, cold, and disease. Now an elderly and tired man, Korczak was unable to keep track of the many changes taking place around him, but he continued to preserve and protect his orphanage. This, in turn, was kept clean and orderly, the staff and the children remained close, an internal honor court had jurisdiction over both children and teachers, every Sunday a general assembly was held, there were literary evenings, and the children gave performances. During this time Korczak had many offers of rescue but he rejected them all, saying, "You do not leave a sick child in the night, and you do not leave children at a time like this."

On August 5 or 6, 1942, German soldiers came to round up the 200 or so orphans and staff members to transport them to the Treblinka extermination camp. Korczak again refused offers of sanctuary, insisting that he would go with the children. The children were dressed in their best clothes, and Korczak led them marching in organized rows with attendants through the ghetto to the Umschlagplatz (deportation point to the death camps) and from there to the train. Nothing is known of their last journey to Treblinka, where all were murdered by the Nazis.

During the occupation and his time in the ghetto, Korczak kept a diary; this has survived and been published. Many of his other written works were destroyed when the ghetto was destroyed by the Nazis in 1943. His overall literary output covers the period 1896 to August 8, 1942. It comprises works for both children and adults, and includes literary pieces, social journalism, articles, and pedagogical essays (as well as unpublished works)—in all, more than 20 books, some 1,400 texts, and around 300 texts in manuscript or typescript form.

Korczak introduced progressive orphanages designed as just communities into Poland, founded the first national children's newspaper, trained teachers in moral education, and worked in juvenile courts defending children's rights. His books gave parents and teachers new insights into child psychology. Generations of young people grew up on his books, especially the classic King Matt the First, which tells of the adventures and tribulations of a boy king who aspires to bring reforms to his subjects.

Janusz Korczak's name and image have appeared on stamps in Poland, Israel, and Germany. In 1991 Polish filmmaker Andrzej Wajda made an eponymous film about Korczak; there are four statues of him in Warsaw, and a school named after him for street children in Thailand.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Children during the Holocaust; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Josephs, Sandra. A Voice for the Child: The Inspirational Words of Janusz Korczak. London: Thorsens, 2007.

Korczak, Janusz. Ghetto Diary. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003.

Lifton, Betty Jean. The King of Children: A Biography of Janusz Korczak. New York: Schocken Books, 1989.

Korczak, Rozka

Rozka Korczak was a Jewish partisan who fought the Nazis during World War II. Born in Bielsko, Poland, in 1921, she moved with her family to the small village of Plosk, where she attended the public school and experienced fierce anti-Jewish bigotry. As a teenager, she joined Hashomer Hatzair (the Young Guard), a Zionist youth organization. She fled Poland following the German conquest in 1939 and made her way on foot to Vilna, Lithuania. There, she joined other members of Hashomer Hatzair, who helped her find work and a roommate, Vitka Kempner, another refugee from Poland. Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union and the conquest of Lithuania, both Korczak and Kempner joined an underground resistance movement organized by Abba Kovner, a Hashomer Hatzair leader. Kovner built his organization, the Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatsie (United Partisan Organization, FPO), into one of the largest and most effective Jewish partisan units of the war.

Operating from the Vilna Ghetto, where the Germans had ordered Jews confined, Korczak and fellow members of the FPO smuggled food and other supplies into the area. As the Germans slowly deported Jews from the ghetto to work and to death camps, Korczak and other FPO members tried to convince residents to fight back against the Nazis. Some ghetto residents took up arms and joined the FPO, but most refused and insisted that resistance would simply provoke even harsher Nazi reprisals. In small groups, Kovner smuggled his partisans out of the ghetto and into the nearby Rudnikai Forest, where they set up camp and operated as saboteurs against the German Army. Korczak was among the first to leave the ghetto. She distinguished herself in sabotage operations and emerged as one of the FPO's most important leaders. She led several raids against the Germans, and Kovner, with whom she had formed a close relationship, placed her in charge of the partisans' camp.

The FPO fought alongside the Soviet Army to liberate Vilna in July 1944, but afterward the Soviets ordered the Jewish partisan units to disperse. Korczak and other FPO members turned their efforts toward helping Jewish refugees left starving and homeless by the war. Korczak helped smuggle some of the refugees past the British blockade and into Palestine, arriving there herself on December 12, 1944. She was among the first eyewitnesses to report to Jewish leaders on the severity of the Holocaust, and from Palestine she continued to help smuggle Jewish refugees into the country. Along with Kovner, Kempner, and other former partisans, she settled in Kibbutz Ein Hahoreh in 1946. She remained active in the kibbutz movement and Holocaust education until her death in 1988.

STEPHEN K. STEIN

See also: Jewish Partisans; Kovner, Abba; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Arad, Yitzhak. Ghetto in Flames: The Struggle and Destruction of the Jews in Vilna in the Holocaust. New York: Holocaust Library, 1982.

Cohen, Rich. The Avengers: A Jewish War Story. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2000.

Levin, Dov. Fighting Back: Lithuanian Jewry's Armed Resistance to the Nazis, 1941–1945. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.

Kovner, Abba

Abba Kovner, renowned in postwar Israel as a poet and cultural hero, was a leading partisan in Vilna (Vilnius) during the Holocaust. Born on March 14, 1918, in Sevastopol,

Abba Kovner was a Jewish resistance leader in the Vilna ghetto during the Holocaust. Kovner was one of the founders of Vilna's United Partisan Organization, one of the first armed underground ghetto organizations formed while the Holocaust was being carried out. In July 1943 Kovner became its leader. An accomplished poet, Kovner later moved to Israel at the time of the state's founding. The photo here was taken of him on a visit to Palestine in December 1945. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Vitka Kempner Kovner)

Crimea, his parents were Rachel (Rosa) Taubman and Israel Kovner. When he was a child the family moved to Vilna, where he was educated at the Hebrew high school and the school of arts. Like many young Polish Jews of his generation, he became a Zionist and joined the youth movement Hashomer Hatzair.

Living in Vilna, his life during World War II was initially dominated by the Soviet occupation of eastern Poland, but on June 24, 1941, two days after Germany launched its surprise attack against the Soviet Union, this changed forever. The Nazis occupied Vilna; Kovner, together with other members of Hashomer Hatzair, escaped and hid for a time in a Dominican convent outside the city. The convent, under the direction of Anna Borkowska (known as Mother Bertranda), gave shelter to Kovner and 16 other young Jews, for which, in 1984, she would be recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Kovner did not stay in hiding for long. Returning to the ghetto, it took him no time at all to see the dire circumstances facing the Jews, with oppression—and liquidation—beginning almost immediately. In July, less than a month after the Germans occupied Vilna, 6,000 Jewish men were rounded up by the SS and taken to the forest at Ponary, just outside the city, and shot. At the end of August, supposedly in retaliation for an attack against the Germans, a four-day killing spree took place in which another 8,000 men and women were shot at Ponary. After this, tens of thousands of Jews from surrounding areas were crowded into Vilna, and the ghetto became filled to bursting point.

Kovner realized that a revolt would be necessary, if not to stop the killing, then at least to hinder the Germans. He started building a ghetto defense force, and in December 1941 a number of meetings were held in which a resistance movement was established. It was decided to remain in the ghetto and fight rather than trying to escape. On New Year's Eve, before a gathering of 150 Jews at Straszuna 2, in a public soup kitchen, Kovner proclaimed:

Jewish youth!

Do not trust those who are trying to deceive you. Out of the eighty thousand Jews in the "Jerusalem of Lithuania" only twenty thousand are left. . . . Ponar is not a concentration camp. They have all been shot there. Hitler plans to destroy all the Jews of Europe, and the Jews of Lithuania have been chosen as the first in line.

We will not be led like sheep to the slaughter!

True, we are weak and defenseless, but the only reply to the murderer is revolt!

Brothers! Better to fall as free fighters than to live by the mercy of the murderers.
Arise! Arise with your last breath!

Three weeks later, on January 21, 1942, a meeting was held at the home of Josef Glazman. Representatives from the major youth groups met: Kovner, from Hashomer Hatzair; Glazman, from Betar; Yitzhak Wittenberg and Chyena Borowska, representing the communists; and Nissan Reznik of Hanoar Hazoni. Other groups came into the movement soon after.

Kovner's assertion that Hitler wanted to kill all the Jews of Europe was the first time such a conclusion had been reached by Jews in occupied Europe, and it sounded a tocsin for Jewish communities throughout Poland. That the groups had agreed to unite, given the fractious nature of Jewish communal politics before the war, was an indication of just how serious the matter was, and Kovner played an important role in the unification process. The group formed themselves into the Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatsie (United Partisan Organization, or FPO), with multiple aims: to prepare for mass armed resistance; perform acts of sabotage; join the partisans where possible; and convey the message to other ghettos that they, too, should revolt. Wittenberg was appointed commander, with Glazman and Kovner his staff officers. The FPO was one of the first ghetto resistance organizations to be established.

As a poet—something for which he would later receive the prestigious Israel Prize—Kovner was inspirational at this time. His poems were published by Hashomer Hatzair in Vilna, and in 1943 one was smuggled out of Poland and made its way to Palestine, where it was published in the newspaper Haaretz.

In July 1943 Kovner became the leader of the FPO after Wittenberg was arrested at a meeting with the head of Vilna's Jewish Council (Judenrat), Jacob Gens. Six weeks later, the Nazis decided to liquidate the ghetto. The FPO issued a call for the Jews not to participate in the deportations, proclaiming that the time had come for the ghetto residents to "Defend yourselves with arms!" and not to go "like sheep for the slaughter!" Sadly, most did not pay attention, and they were sent to labor camps in Estonia where they were eventually killed by the SS.

On September 1, 1943, the FPO rose in revolt but had little support, and in short order its members saw that they were fighting alone. Escaping to the forests through the sewers, some created a partisan group of their own and others joined those already under Soviet command. Kovner, with Vitka

Kempner and Rozka Korczak, commanded a partisan group called the Avengers (Nokmim) in the forests near Vilna. Here, they engaged in sabotage and guerrilla attacks against the Germans and their local collaborators, operating from September 1943 until the arrival of the Soviet army in July 1944.

On May 8, 1945, Kovner was one of the founders of a secret postwar organization, also called the Avengers (Nakam), building on the Nokmim partisan group of the same name. The 50 or so members of the group, including Rozka Korczak and Vitka Kempner, decided to dedicate their lives to avenging the 6 million Jews who were murdered by the Nazis. To do so, they planned to undertake an extensive program of revenge against the people of Germany, one plan of which called for the extermination of 6 million Germans through poisoning the water supplies of Hamburg, Frankfurt, Munich, and Nuremberg. Another was to kill SS prisoners held in Allied POW camps, and in April 1946 Nakam operatives actually broke into a bakery where bread was being prepared for the Langwasser internment camp near Nuremberg. The bread was poisoned, and more than 2,200 of the German prisoners fell sick, but no deaths ensued.

With the end of the war, Kovner looked to a future that would be built on the ruins of the Holocaust. He was one of the prime movers behind the movement known as Bricha (“flight”), an underground operation conducted between 1944 and 1949 to move Jews from Europe to Palestine/Israel. In July 1945 he traveled to Palestine via Italy, and in 1946 married Vitka Kempner, his partner in the FPO. They settled, with other former partisans, at Kibbutz Ein Hahoresht. Kovner joined the Haganah in December 1947, serving as an officer in the Givati Brigade of the Israel Defense Force during the War of Independence in 1948. At the end of the war he returned to his kibbutz and devoted most of his time to poetry, publishing two prose volumes and collections of poems. In 1961 he gave important testimony about his experiences in the Vilna ghetto at the trial of Adolf Eichmann. Abba Kovner died at Kibbutz Ein Hahoresht on September 25, 1987, at the age of 69, survived by his wife, Vitka Kempner.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Borkowska, Anna; Jewish Partisans; Kempner, Vitka; Korczak, Rozka; Ponary Forest; United Partisan Organization; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Cohen, Rich. The Avengers: A Jewish War Story. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2000.

Porat, Dina. The Fall of a Sparrow: The Life and Times of Abba Kovner. Palo Alto (CA): Stanford University Press, 2009.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Krajugevac Massacre

The premeditated mass murder of some 2,700 Serb men from the Serbian city of Krajugevac by German forces on October 20–21, 1941. The Nazi-inspired massacre was in fact rather gratuitous, as the Germans perpetrated the killings in retaliation for the deaths of Nazi soldiers during an operation against resistance partisans in another part of Serbia. There was no evidence, in fact, that any of those killed had anything to do with the earlier operation, and no violent acts had been committed against the German troops in Krajugevac.

In September 1941, German field marshal Wilhelm Keitel promulgated a standing order covering all of Europe occupied by German forces. He decreed that 50 communists were to be executed for each German soldier wounded in operations against them. He further ordered that 100 communists were to be executed for each German soldier killed. Only some three weeks later, a group of Chetniks and communist guerrillas attacked a German position near Gornji Milanovac, resulting in multiple German casualties, including a number of deaths. Because there were not enough people to be sacrificed near the scene of the attacks, local German commanders set their sights on Krajugevac, which was a sizable city.

The terror in Krajugevac began on October 18, when all the city’s Jewish males were rounded up and arrested. A small number of communists were also detained. Still far short of the number of people required to fulfill Keitel’s order, on October 19 German troops stormed the city and arrested virtually all of the male population, aged 16–60. In all, about 10,000 men were detained. Also involved in the operation were the Serbian State Guard and a detachment of the Serbian Volunteer Command. Males 16 and older, who were attending high school classes at the time, were literally pulled from their classrooms and marched to the outskirts of town.

The actual massacre commenced on October 20, when soldiers began shooting the civilians in large groups, some with as many as 400 people. The mass executions continued into October 21. When the requisite number had been killed, those remaining alive were imprisoned as hostages, to be sacrificed in the future if more Nazis died at the hands of communists. It should be noted that the vast majority of those killed at Krajevac were in fact not communists. The dead were buried in unmarked mass graves in the countryside on the outskirts of the city. Although the estimated number of those killed has varied greatly over the years, modern scholars suggest that about 2,800 died during October 20–21, 1941.

Today, there is a series of memorials to the event, located in a memorial park that was erected on the approximate site of the killings.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Keitel, Wilhelm; Serbia

Further Reading

Pavlowitch, Stevan K. Hitler's New Disorder: The Second World War in Yugoslavia. New York: Columbia University Press, 2008.

Roberts, Walter R. Tito, Mihailović and the Allies 1941–1945. New Brunswick (NJ): Rutgers University Press, 1973.

Kraków-Plaszow

Kraków-Plaszow was a Nazi forced labor and concentration camp located in Poland, near the Kraków suburb of Plaszow. Established in 1942, it was initially begun as a forced labor facility mainly for Polish Jews. It had a separate camp for men and women, and a special section for non-Polish Jews who were detained there because they had violated German occupation policies. As labor needs increased and more manufacturing facilities were built in or near Plaszow, the Germans continued to expand the facility to meet demand. At the height of its operations, in 1944, the camp held about 20,000 prisoners simultaneously.

Run by the SS, Kraków-Plaszow was notorious for its wretched living conditions and the overworking of its detainees. Food was scant and often inedible, medical care was essentially nonexistent, housing quarters overcrowded and squalid, and camp personnel were cruel. Harsh punishments, some of which resulted in deaths, were commonplace. Starvation and disease alone killed several thousand prisoners, while hundreds more died of exhaustion and overwork. Precise casualty figures are almost impossible to determine because the Germans went out of their way to cover up their activities, including the mass cremation of bodies.

German industrialist Oskar Schindler, who operated an enamelware factory in the vicinity of Kraków, exploited labor from the Plaszow camp. He shielded his mostly Jewish workforce, however, and when he was forced to relocate his factory in 1944, he managed to take some 1,100 Jewish workers with him, saving them from deportation and likely death.

In early 1944 the focus of the camp shifted from forced labor to concentration. During that year, Plaszow became a temporary home to Jews in transit to death camps in the east. As well, more and more of the camp's permanent detainees were being deported to camps farther east. In the summer of 1944, however, as Soviet troops began approaching from the east, the Germans attempted to liquidate completely the Plaszow facility. They shipped many prisoners to Auschwitz, where most were killed. Soon, the Germans engaged themselves in a major effort to erase any evidence of wrongdoing. Barracks and buildings were demolished, and mass graves were opened. The bodies contained in them were then exhumed and burned. The last prisoners left Plaszow in January 1945; many died during a forced march to Auschwitz, while many more were killed after their arrival. It is not possible to determine exactly how many people died at Plaszow, but deaths most certainly numbered in the several thousands, of all causes.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Concentration Camps; Schindler, Oskar; Schindler's Jews

Further Reading

Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1962.

Kogon, Eugen. The Theory and Practice of Hell: The German Concentration Camps and the System behind Them. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006.

Kramer, Josef

Known as the “Beast of Belsen,” Josef Kramer was born on November 10, 1906, in Munich. Trained as a bookkeeper, he joined the Nazi Party in 1931 and volunteered for the SS in 1932. Originally assigned to the Dachau concentration camp in 1934 as a guard, Kramer's slavish devotion to orders earned him promotions and transfers to camps at Sachsenhausen and Mauthausen.

In 1940 Kramer was assigned to assist Rudolf Hoess, commandant of the Auschwitz concentration camp. Ostensibly tasked with choosing a site for the development of a synthetic fuel plant, their true mission was to select a suitable site for the implementation of the Final Solution, the mass killing of Jews. Kramer's attention to strict discipline and sadistic demeanor earned him the praise of Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler.

From May 1941 to August 1943 Kramer served as commandant of the Natzweiler concentration camp in France. At Natzweiler, one of Kramer's duties was to provide suitable human remains to August Hirt, an anatomist at the Strasbourg Medical University. Eighty inmates were transported from Auschwitz to Natzweiler, where Kramer participated in their execution. In November 1943 Kramer was again stationed at Auschwitz, where Hoess assigned him to oversee the gas chambers at Birkenau.

In December 1944 Kramer was promoted to the rank of Hauptsturmführer-SS (captain) and appointed commandant of the Bergen-Belsen camp. Kramer brought to Belsen the strict discipline and sadism he had already demonstrated. Lengthy roll calls, harsh labor, and insufficient food became common at Belsen. As Nazi Germany began to disintegrate in early 1945, more and more transports continued to bring prisoners to the already overcrowded Belsen. With a population of 15,257 inmates at the end of 1944, the number soared to 44,000 by March 1945.

By April 1945 order within the camp had vanished, and Allied bombings had disrupted the camp's water and food supplies. As a typhus epidemic raged, the camp's crematorium could no longer handle the increasing number of dead bodies. Kramer reported that up to 300 inmates per day were dying. Corpses were simply left where they had died. As Allied armies pushed farther into Germany, prisoners from threatened camps were transported to Belsen. During the week of April 13, more than 20,000 additional prisoners were transported to Belsen.

On April 15, 1945, British troops liberated Belsen. They found some 40,000 starving survivors along with some 35,000 unburied corpses that littered the camp. To his surprise, Kramer was arrested. On September 17, 1945, Kramer and 44 others stood trial before a British military tribunal. The prosecution detailed the horrific conditions of Bergen-Belsen and also presented evidence of Kramer's time spent at Auschwitz. His defense argued that he was merely following orders in a time of war and had been following German laws, but this defense was not permitted or accepted by the court. Kramer was found guilty and hanged on December 13, 1945, in Hamelin, Germany.

ROBERT W. MALICK

See also: Bergen-Belsen; Natzweiler-Struthof

Further Reading

Shepard, Ben. After Daybreak: The Liberation of Bergen-Belsen, 1945. New York: Schocken Books, 2005.

Snyder, Louis L. Hitler's Elite. New York: Brinkley Books, 1990.

Kraus, Gilbert and Eleanor

Gilbert and Eleanor Kraus were an American-born Jewish couple from Philadelphia who helped rescue 50 Jewish children from Austria and Germany just prior to the commencement of the Holocaust.

Gilbert was born in 1898 and became a successful lawyer. He eventually married Eleanor, who was born in 1905, and the couple had two of their own children. As war clouds gathered over Europe in the late 1930s, and the Nazis began to implement policies designed to segregate, repress, and eventually murder European Jews en masse, the Krauses decided that they had to do something to save European Jews. This would not be an easy task. At the time, the U.S. government had strict immigration quotas that prevented most Jews from escaping to America. On top of that, there was rampant antisemitism in the United States, which made it difficult to rally support for their cause.

Nevertheless, in the early winter of 1939 Gilbert Kraus, along with Lewis Levine, who was president of Brith Sholom, a Jewish fraternal organization, hatched a plan to spirit 50 Jewish children out of Nazi-occupied Europe and settle them with American families in the Philadelphia area. Many Jewish leaders refused to support the plan, however, believing that it was bound to fail and stoke localized antisemitism. The plan was to convince American families to sign affidavits sponsoring the children. The Krauses would then secure visas for the children under the guise that they would be attending a summer camp in the United States. Once the children were safely in America, the odds were good that the U.S. government would permit them to stay after their visas had expired.

A few months later, Gilbert and Eleanor, along with Levine and several others, traveled to Vienna, Austria. There they painstakingly worked with Jewish leaders and selected 25 boys and 25 girls who would return with them to the United States. The Krauses personally interviewed each child and his or her family before deciding which ones would make the best candidates. All of this was done in strict secrecy, and had the Krauses' mission been uncovered the Nazis could have arrested or jailed them.

The 50 children safely made the voyage to America with the Krauses and were placed in sponsor homes. The Krauses themselves took in two of the children. Most of the children would never see their parents or siblings again, as many were killed in the Holocaust. It is believed that the Kraus mission brought the largest single group of unaccompanied children to the United States during all of World War II. Indeed, fewer than 1,200 unaccompanied children were permitted to enter the United States between 1939 and 1945. The Krauses had planned on another rescue mission, but the formal outbreak of war in Europe in September 1939 prevented that.

The Krauses rarely spoke of their heroic deed, even to family members. Gilbert died in 1975 and Eleanor in 1989. It was not until after Eleanor's death that the full story about their rescue mission became known to their children and grandchildren. As it turned out, Eleanor had kept a detailed diary and journal in which she had kept many details—including documents and photographs—relating to the rescue mission.

Still, this miraculous story was not brought to the public's attention until 2013, when Steven Pressman, who married one of the Krauses' granddaughters, decided to do a short documentary film about the Krauses. It was produced by HBO and released under the title 50 Children. In 2014 Pressman published a book under the same title, which goes into far more detail about the Krauses' exploits. Like the film, it uses many passages from Eleanor's journal, as well as photos, documents, and interviews with more than a dozen of the surviving children, to tell the story of the Krauses and their rescue mission.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Children during the Holocaust; Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Pressman, Steven. 50 Children: One Ordinary American Couple's Extraordinary Rescue Mission into the Heart of Nazi Germany. New York: Harper, 2014.

Kreyssig, Lothar

Lothar Kreyssig was a German judge during the Weimar and Nazi era. He was the only German judge who attempted to stop the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program, an intervention that cost him his job. Almost alone among the judges of the Third Reich, he upheld the notion that justice mattered more than career advancement, and after World War II he came to be appreciated as a resistance fighter against Nazism.

Lothar Ernst Paul Kreyssig was born on October 30, 1898, in Flöha, Saxony, the son of a businessman and grain merchant. After elementary school, he attended a gymnasium in Chemnitz. He deferred his education and enlisted in the army in 1916, during the First World War. During his two years in World War I, he served in France, the Baltic lands, and Serbia.

Between 1919 and 1922 he studied law at the University of Leipzig, receiving his doctorate in 1923. In 1926 he went to work at the district court in Chemnitz and in 1928 became a judge there. In 1933 Kreyssig was pressured to join the Nazi Party, but he refused, citing his need for judicial independence.

Kreyssig's superiors in Chemnitz considered him to be a good judge, until he began a series of minor insubordinations such as slipping out of a ceremony in his court when a bust of Hitler was unveiled and, after the Nazi accession to office in 1933, publicly protesting the suspension of three judges who failed to follow the interpretation of "Aryan laws" favored by Nazi authorities.

An early supporter of the Confessional Church, Kreyssig became one of its foremost representatives and led the first Confessional Synod in Saxony in October 1935. His active involvement in church policy brought him into continual conflict with the Nazi regime, and he, in turn, referred to Nazi church policies as "injustice masquerading in the form of law." Kreyssig was, however, still able to work within the legal profession. In 1937 he was reassigned to the lower district court at Brandenburg an der Havel, where he became a mental health guardianship judge, making him responsible for several hundred mentally retarded children and adults.

During the summer of 1940 the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program saw death certificates relating to those in his care accumulating on Kreyssig's desk, and reams of odd paperwork, often nearly identical except for the names, came to him for approval. Dozens, then hundreds, of people were dying on his watch. He concluded that this was in fact a forced euthanasia program on a huge scale, and he was placing his own imprimatur on the horrible act. He refused to do so.

Reporting his suspicions to Minister of Justice Franz Gürtner in a letter dated July 8, 1940, Kreyssig condemned the Aktion T-4 program. In the same letter he also addressed the disenfranchisement of prisoners in Nazi concentration camps, making all his arguments on firm legal grounds. He referred to the situation in which entire segments of society were being excluded from their rights under the law, not only in the concentration camps but now also in hospitals and sanatoriums.

Trusting in German justice, Kreyssig then filed criminal charges against the program administrator, Philipp Bouhler, head of the Reich Chancellery, for murder. He also filed injunctions against several institutions in which he had housed his wards, prohibiting them from transferring those in his care without his consent.

On November 13, 1940, Kreyssig was summoned to a meeting by Justice Minister Franz Gürtner, who laid before Kreyssig a letter from Hitler that had authorized Aktion T-4, which constituted the sole legal basis for it. Kreyssig replied, “The Führer’s word does not create a right,” clearly signifying that he did not recognize this as a legal right. Gürtner then informed Kreyssig that if he could not recognize Hitler’s will as a source of law, he could no longer remain a judge. Gürtner then demanded that Kreyssig withdraw his injunctions against the hospitals; Kreyssig refused.

Marginalized over the next two years, Kreyssig was eventually forced to retire from the bench. After the war, living in Leipzig in communist East Germany, Kreyssig lost part of his estate as an alleged Prussian Junker. When he was offered a position as a judge, however, given that the rule of law in the Soviet occupation zone was considered insufficient, Kreyssig decided against resuming his legal career. He preferred, instead, to serve as the consistorial president of the Evangelical Church of the Church Province of Saxony in Magdeburg. In this capacity he spent his later years working vigorously to atone for the wrong his countrymen had wrought, believing that even those who resisted should have, and could have, done far more to stop the evil in their midst.

In 1958 he founded the organization Action Reconciliation Service for Peace (ARSP) with a commitment to send young Germans to former enemy countries (as well as Israel) to ask for forgiveness and, by volunteering to do good deeds, to atone for the bombing and crimes of the war years. The first projects were in Norway, the Netherlands, Britain, France, and Greece. To date, many thousands of German youth have participated in these programs.

In 1971 Kreyssig and his wife Hanna moved to West Berlin. He lived in a nursing home from 1977 in Bergisch Gladbach, near Cologne, until his death on July 6, 1988, after living a life of honor and principle. To this day, Kreyssig is known as the only judge who tried to stop the systematic murders conducted under the T-4 program, and in his lifetime he was nominated for several awards for fighting against the Nazi regime.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Euthanasia Program; Führerprinzip; Gürtner, Franz; Protestant Churches, German; Upstander

Further Reading

Müller, Ingo. Hitler’s Justice: The Courts of the Third Reich.

London: I. B. Tauris, 1991.

Weiss, Konrad. Lothar Kreyssig: Prophet der Versöhnung.

Gerlingen: Bleicher Verlag, 1998.

Kristallnacht

Known as the “Night of Broken Glass,” Kristallnacht was a sudden and widespread assault on Jews and their property in Germany prior to World War II. It was the first widespread use of massive force against Jews by the Nazi regime. The attack legitimized violence against Jews by the Nazi state and foreshadowed Adolf Hitler’s later attempts to exterminate European Jews through the so-called Final Solution.

The violence of Kristallnacht took place on November 9–10, 1938. The impetus for the attack stemmed from the assassination of Ernst vom Rath, a German government official in the French Embassy. Herschel Grynszpan, a 17-year-old German Jewish refugee then living in Paris, had recently learned that his parents had been deported. Angered by the treatment of his parents by the Nazis, Grynszpan decided to strike back at Germany. He entered the French Embassy and attempted to shoot the German ambassador to France; however, he missed the ambassador and instead killed vom Rath.

After learning of the news, the German government whipped up public antisemitism. Joseph Goebbels, the Nazi Minister of Propaganda and Public Enlightenment, organized a widespread pogrom against German Jews. A special unit of the Nazi political machine, known as the SA, led groups of civilians across urban centers of Germany, where they sacked more than 500 Jewish homes, synagogues, and storefronts.

When the violence ended, 90 Jews lay dead (according to Nazi figures) and over 30,000 Jewish men were taken into “protective custody” in concentration camps and prisons. During the attack, German men also raped Jewish women, despite severe penalties regarding sexual relations between Jews and German citizens.

The term Kristallnacht itself reveals the rampant antisemitism that fueled the violence. So many Jewish synagogues and storefronts had been smashed that Hermann Göring described the shattered glass as so many Jewish “crystals” or “diamonds.” Two days after the attacks, Göring ordered the enactment of statutes to further punish the Jewish community. Jews were disallowed from owning stores; working as independent skilled workers; or attending concerts, movies, or other forms of public entertainment—they were even prohibited from driving cars.

Perhaps the most harmful aspect of Göring’s new laws for Jews was the freeing of German insurance companies from paying for claims resulting from the destruction of Jewish property. As a further insult, Göring ordered that the Jewish community be fined $400 million for the attack. Not

Kristallnacht was the euphemistic name given by the Nazis to a major anti-Jewish pogrom that took place on the night of November 9-10, 1938. Also known as the “Night of Broken Glass,” the name is derived from the shards of broken glass from thousands of smashed windows that shone in the November moonlight. The night has been dubbed by some historians as “the day the Holocaust began.” In this image, a pedestrian inspects the wreckage of a Jewish shop in Berlin the day after the Kristallnacht. (AP Photo) surprisingly, over 150,000 Jews left the country in the wake of Kristallnacht.

One of the most far-reaching changes wrought by Kristallnacht was a general shift in Nazi policy toward the Jews. Prior to Kristallnacht, the German government had dealt with its Jewish “problem” by compelling Jews to emigrate voluntarily to other nations. The essential purpose behind the Kristallnacht, on the other hand, was to force Jews to realize that there was no longer a future for them in Germany and that they were henceforth to redouble their efforts to leave—or face similar (or worse) measures.

JASON NEWMAN

See also: Aryanization; Baum, Herbert; Confiscation of Jewish Property; Goebbels, Joseph; Göring, Hermann; Grynspan, Herschel; Heydrich, Reinhard; Krütfeld, Wilhelm; Lichtenberg, Bernhard; Salomon, Charlotte; Schmeling, Max; Segerstedt, Torgny; SS St. Louis; St. Hedwig’s Cathedral; Sturmabteilung

Further Reading

Gerhardt, Uta, and Thomas Karlauf (Eds.). The Night of Broken Glass: Eyewitness Accounts of Kristallnacht. London: Polity, 2012.

Gilbert, Martin. Kristallnacht: Prelude to Tragedy. New York: Harper, 2007.

Schleunes, Karl A. The Twisted Road to Auschwitz: Nazi Policy toward German Jews, 1933–1939. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1970.

Thalmann, Rita, and Emmanuel Feinermann. Crystal Night: 9–10 November 1938. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1974.

Krupp Case

In United States of America v. Alfred Krupp, et al., Military Tribunal No. III tried 12 executives of the German Friedrich Krupp firm under the authority of Allied Control Council

Law No. 10, between August 16, 1947, and July 31, 1948. The indictment charged the defendants with crimes against peace; war crimes and crimes against humanity (plunder and spoliation); war crimes and crimes against humanity (forced and slave labor); and conspiracy. The accused were Alfried Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, Ewald Loeser, Eduard Houdremont, Erich Muller, Friedrich Janssen, Karl Pfirsch, Max Ihn, Karl Eberhardt, Heinrich Korsch, Friedrich von Bulow, Werner Lehmann, and Hans Kupke. The prosecution later dropped the first and fourth counts against von Bulow, Lehmann, and Kupke.

In October 1945 the Allies indicted Alfried Krupp's father, Gustav Krupp, as a major war criminal before the International Military Tribunal (IMT). After serving the indictment, the IMT determined that the elder Krupp was unfit to stand trial and considered four possibilities for adjudicating his case, as proposed by the prosecution and defense: trial in absentia, dismissal, indefinite postponement, or indictment of Alfried Krupp. In the interest of fairness, the IMT adopted the third course but rejected the proposal of charging the son for allegations against the father. The U.S. Office of the Chief of Counsel for War Crimes thereupon tried the firm's executives as Case IX of the Nuremberg Subsequent Proceedings.

Despite the insistence of prosecutor Telford Taylor that the accused sit in the dock to answer for their misdeeds, the postponed case against Gustav Krupp cast a shadow over the proceedings. According to the prosecution, the firm conspired in 1919 to prepare for future German aggression that matched Adolf Hitler's imperialistic ambitions. After a unanimous defense motion, the tribunal dismissed the charges of crimes against peace and conspiracy against all defendants on grounds that private citizens could not wage war, and that the IMT Charter fixed strict temporal limits on the court's jurisdiction.

After marrying Bertha Krupp, Gustav von Bohlen und Halbach presided over Fried, Krupp AG from 1906 to 1943. His eagerness to please Hitler resulted from a determination to preserve family control over the business, not ideological affinity. His persistent lobbying led to Hitler's issuance of Lex Krupp in November 1943; by decree, the public corporation (Aktiengesellschaft) was transformed into a perpetual proprietorship, whose owner had to bear the Krupp name. The von Bohlens attached "Krupp" to their name and Alfried took possession of the newly minted Fried, Krupp Essen.

The prosecution recounted Krupp's participation in the spoliation of steel plants and collieries in Austria, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Yugoslavia, and the Soviet Union.

During the German retreat in 1944, the firm looted machinery and other goods from French and Dutch companies. The defense described such behavior as excusable under emergency conditions, but the tribunal convicted defendants Krupp, Loeser, Houdremont, Muller, Janssen, and Eberhardt for spoliation. On two occasions, Krupp participated in the "Aryanization" of Jewish-owned steel plants in Liancourt and Paris. In contrast to the Flick trial, Tribunal III accepted the argument that offenses against industrial property may constitute crimes against humanity. A majority acquitted the defendants of spoliation in Austria, Yugoslavia, and the Soviet Union.

The most damaging evidence against Krupp concerned the deployment of forced and slave labor. In western and eastern Germany, the firm utilized some 100,000 conscripted foreign civilians, prisoners of war, and concentration camp prisoners. Noted for generous if paternalistic care of the Kruppianer (the main German workforce), Krupp brutalized its captives. From fall 1942 to spring 1944 it attempted to establish an automatic gun factory, then a fuse factory, at the Auschwitz concentration camp. Accepting the Reich's proposal of location, it abandoned the project because of logistical bottlenecks and its inability to meet contractual obligations, not humanitarian considerations.

Withdrawal from Auschwitz did not spell the end of Krupp's involvement with slave labor, however. Gross-Rosen's inmates erected the Bertha-Werke at Markstädt, in Upper Silesia. Five hundred female Jewish internees from Buchenwald also toiled at the main Krupp-Essen plant in late 1944 and early 1945. According to the defense, the Nazi regime caught Krupp between the Scylla of inflexible production quotas and the Charybdis of labor allocation imposed from above. The defendants thus had no choice but to accept whatever labor the state supplied. While the judges in the Flick and I.G. Farben cases endorsed a similar defense of necessity, Tribunal III found that such pleadings ought to apply strictly to life-and-death circumstances, not cases concerning the potential loss of property. The court also determined that Krupp had aggressively procured and exploited coercive labor, and thereby demonstrated initiative, an exception to the Flick ruling. Eleven defendants were convicted on the slave labor count.

The court sentenced all but one defendant to terms of imprisonment that ranged from 2 years and 10 months to 12 years. It also ordered the confiscation of Alfried Krupp's industrial property, as provided by Allied Control Council directives. Pfirsch was acquitted. Two of three judges, President H. C. Anderson and William Wilkins (the third was Edward Daly), issued concurring and dissenting opinions. Anderson found the sentences against all defendants except Krupp too severe, and expressed reservations about the seizure of the latter's property. By contrast, Wilkins opined that the tribunal had erred in acquitting the defendants on certain spoliation charges. In January 1951 U.S. High Commissioner for Germany John J. McCloy restored the firm to Krupp's ownership and commuted his 12-year sentence.

JOSEPH ROBERT WHITE

See also: Aryanization; Crimes against Humanity; Flick Case; Gross-Rosen; I.G Farben Case; Nuremberg Trials; War Crimes

Further Reading

United Nations War Crimes Commission. Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals. Vol. X. London: HMSO, 1949.

United States Nuremberg Military Tribunals. Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10. Vol. IX. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1950–1953.

Young, Gordon. The Fall and Rise of Alfred Krupp. London: Cassell, 1960.

Krützfeld, Wilhelm

Wilhelm Krützfeld was the chief of police precinct number 16, Hackescher Markt, in the center of Berlin, and in that capacity was instrumental in stopping the attack on the New Synagogue (Neues Synagoge) during the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938.

Born on September 12, 1880, in Horndorf, a small village in the district of Segeberg, Schleswig-Holstein, Krützfeld was a career officer who joined the police force in 1907 after a period in the army. After serving in the National Police Office, he became the senior officer at police station 65 in the Prenzlauer Berg, followed in April 1937 by assignment to station 16 at Hackescher Markt.

The infamous Nazi pogrom on the night of November 9–10, 1938, was called, euphemistically, the “Night of Broken Glass” or Kristallnacht. It was supposedly a spontaneous protest against Germany's Jews in retaliation for the assassination of the third secretary of the German embassy in Paris, Ernst vom Rath, by Herschel Grynszpan, a Polish Jewish teenager. In reality, it was a carefully orchestrated assault on Jewish life in Germany carried out by the SA, the SS, and civilians who were Nazi sympathizers. According to Nazi figures, more than 30,000 Jews were arrested, 815 shops and 29 department stores owned by Jews destroyed, hundreds of synagogues and cemeteries vandalized and burned, and 91

Jews killed outright (with many others in the concentration camps later). These figures are all certainly underestimates.

The New Synagogue was situated on Oranienburger Strasse 29–30, Berlin-Mitte—right within Krützfeld's precinct. It was the largest synagogue in Germany and arguably the most beautiful. It had been built between 1859 and 1866, the year of its consecration. Designed in the Moorish style and resembling the Alhambra in Spain, it was intended to serve the growing Jewish population of Berlin, in particular immigrants from the East. It was built to seat 3,200 worshippers and was dedicated in the presence of Otto von Bismarck and many other imperial and Prussian dignitaries. Ornate and imposing on the Berlin skyline, the New Synagogue had been granted legal protection by Kaiser Wilhelm I. It was this document of protection that was to be the key to Krützfeld's defense of the building on the night of November 9–10.

When the SA storm troopers arrived, they invaded the synagogue and desecrated whatever they could find. Furniture was destroyed, Torah scrolls were torn up, and anything that could be set on fire was ignited. Police station 16, located on the corner of Rosenthaler Strasse and the Spandau Bridge, was very close to the scene, and one of Krützfeld's officers, Lieutenant Otto Bellgardt, was quick to arrive. Stopping the assault before the fire got out of hand, Bellgardt pulled out his gun and, facing down the Nazis, ordered them to leave. Acting on the strength of local knowledge, he knew the building was a protected historical landmark and said as much to the assailants, affirming that he would uphold the law that underwrote its protection.

With this, he called in the fire department and permitted them access to extinguish the fire before it could spread—despite the ban on fighting fires taking place on Jewish properties. From this time on, it was under round-the-clock police protection. As Bellgardt's superior, Senior Lieutenant Wilhelm Krützfeld was directly responsible for his actions, but rather than rebuke his subordinate he supported his action and covered up the full extent of what he had done to save the synagogue. Moreover, the next day, Berlin's police president, Wolf-Heinrich Graf von Helldorf—who was not only a member of the SA and ardent antisemite, but also the man who orchestrated the Kristallnacht events in Berlin—summoned Krützfeld to his office for an explanation. Krützfeld took full responsibility for his department's actions and did not betray Bellgardt. Von Helldorf reprimanded Krützfeld, but, surprisingly, took no further action on the matter. Krützfeld was neither arrested nor dismissed; in 1940 he was transferred to another police station, and in 1943 he took early retirement.

Krützfeld and Bellgardt—and, so far as can be ascertained, other members of the precinct—already had a history of anti-Nazi activity before the November pogrom. Indeed, Bellgardt reputedly stamped forged identity cards, while both of them warned Jews in the neighborhood when orders came in regarding new antisemitic measures. It is also clear that they provided Otto Weidt with appropriate time to organize himself in advance of Gestapo raids on his brush-making factory, also within the precinct's boundaries, where he employed and shielded a number of deaf and blind Jews.

The New Synagogue, for its part, remained intact—one of two synagogues, along with the Rykestrasse Synagogue in Berlin's Prenzlauer Berg district—not to be destroyed during the Kristallnacht. The damage was repaired by the congregation and it remained a place of worship until the beginning of April 1940, when the Nazis prohibited any further services. The synagogue was formally declared closed to Jews on April 8, and the German army subsequently took the building over as a place for the storage of military uniforms.

Little is recorded regarding the life or fate of Otto Bellgardt, though it is believed he died at the end of the war in 1945. Wilhelm Krützfeld survived the war and died peacefully in Berlin on October 31, 1953.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Grynspan, Herschel; Kristallnacht; Upstander; Weidt, Otto

Further Reading

Bourke, Eoin. "Wilhelm Krützfeld and Other 'Good' Constables in Police Station 16 in Hackescher Markt, Berlin." In Representing the "Good German" in Literature and Culture after 1945: Altruism and Moral Ambiguity, ed. Pól Ó Dochartaigh and Christiane Schönfeld, 66–84. Rochester (NY): Camden House, 2013.

Gerhardt, Uta, and Thomas Karlauf (Eds.). The Night of Broken Glass: Eyewitness Accounts of Kristallnacht. London: Polity, 2012.

Gilbert, Martin. Kristallnacht: Prelude to Tragedy. New York: Harper, 2007.

Kuper, Leo

Leo Kuper was a professor of sociology at the University of California, Los Angeles, who wrote extensively on race relations and genocide. Born into a religiously observant Lithuanian Jewish family in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 1908, he studied at the University of the Witwatersrand and practiced law in Johannesburg until 1940. Soon after the outbreak of World War II he joined the South African Army, serving in Kenya, Egypt, and Italy. After the war he organized the National War Memorial Health Foundation, which helped to provide social and medical services for those who were disadvantaged—at first Africans, Coloureds, and Indians, and, later, whites. He was appointed as a lecturer in sociology at Britain's University of Birmingham, undertaking a PhD degree in sociology. At the same time he directed a research project intended to assist the city of Coventry to recover from the destructive bombing of the Second World War, resulting in the publication of his first book, Living in Towns (1953). In 1953 Kuper returned to South Africa as professor of Sociology at the University of Natal, where he remained until 1961.

That year he moved to the University of California, Los Angeles, as a professor of sociology, where he remained until his retirement in 1976. He served for four years as the director of the African Studies Center and was a member of the board of directors of the African Studies Association. The murder of his brother (a judge in South Africa) in 1963 strengthened Kuper's commitment to finding ways to achieve peaceful social change, and his published works began more and more to demonstrate what he saw as an obligation to the future. A work he wrote in 1977, The Pity of It All, was to stamp Kuper as a scholar determined to look into the forces leading to social and political violence, and how these could be met.

Kuper was a founding member of the Council of Jerusalem's Institute on the Holocaust and Genocide, established in 1979 by Israel Charny, Shamaï Davidson, and Elie Wiesel. In 1985 he and Michael Young, Baron Young of Dartington, established International Alert, a forum relating to ethnic conflict, genocide, and human rights. Its main concern related to anticipating, predicting, and preventing genocide and other mass killings. Its twin aims were, first, with conflict resolution and conflict avoidance in accordance with international standards, and, second, as its name implies, to work to "alert" international opinion to situations of ethnic violence that were assuming genocidal proportions.

When writing on the massacres of Tutsi and Hutu in Rwanda and Burundi in the 1960s and 1970s, Kuper came to the conclusion that poor (and no) intervention from international agencies and governments had done more harm than good in the past, and that this could be addressed through the greater provision of information and consciousness-raising among the broader population.

Kuper's scholarly work on genocide became more sustained and focused during the early 1980s. His most important book, Genocide: Its Political Use in the 20th Century (1981), was the first in a run of three key works that placed him in the forefront of major influences over the direction that genocide studies would take. Its authority began with a discussion on the very definition of the word genocide. Whereas many subsequent arguments would turn on definitions of genocide—more often than not because commentators did not like that of the 1948 UN Convention on Genocide that made genocide a crime—Kuper's book followed precisely that description. What followed was a thorough dissection of the various intricacies of genocide, in which he actually did extend the definition of genocide to include political groups, through an analysis that showed how politics was at the base of so much of the persecution of the four groups mentioned in the UN Convention. He provided a broad historical background in order to undertake a theoretical examination of the question of genocide, providing case studies of the Armenians in Turkey, the Jews in Europe, and the Hutu in Burundi, among others. He considered atrocities committed by Asians and Africans as well as by Nazis and Soviets, and assessed the record of the UN to that time.

Among many path-breaking innovations within the book, one that came to be axiomatic of Kuper's approach related to localized massacres that, while not necessarily appearing as part of a state-wide policy of group destruction, might nonetheless destroy a given population within a region or defined territory. Noting that the annihilation of a section of a group in a contained situation (for example, in the wiping out of a whole village of men, women, and children) contains some of the elements of a genocide, Kuper sought to find a way to give such massacres their proper place within a model of genocide while recognizing that such events did not, by themselves, constitute genocide. He introduced the notion of "genocidal massacre" to deal with such situations, finding the concept especially useful in describing colonial situations. The large number of massacres accompanying colonial acquisition, he concluded, pointed clearly to an affinity between colonialism and genocide. While even an aggregation of genocidal massacres did not necessarily connote a policy of genocide, nonetheless the motives that underlay such massacres were, in their time-and-place circumstances, motivated by a genocidal intent. For Kuper, therefore, the genocidal massacre, while not equating with genocide, was a device for explaining the many examples of destruction that took place during territorial acquisition, maintenance, and decolonization. All in all, Genocide was a book that arguably articulated the issues and the history of genocide more completely than any previous work (save the pioneering unpublished study by Raphael Lemkin) had so far done.

Kuper's second key piece on genocide in the early 1980s was a short work titled International Action against Genocide (1982). This essentially distilled many of the main points about nonintervention that had been made in Genocide, but here he also succinctly summarized the history of the major genocidal outbreaks of the twentieth century to that time and offered some suggestions that could create an international movement to eradicate "this most horrifying crime against humanity." It was an excellent introductory essay on its topic, and it prepared the groundwork for Kuper's third discourse on genocide from this period, The Prevention of Genocide (1985).

In this book he divided the crime of genocide into two categories: domestic genocides, which he referred to as those arising out of internal divisions within a society; and genocides arising out of international warfare. Kuper analyzed critically the major obstacles holding back effective UN action to staunch genocide, while assessing realistically the prospects of such action in the future. He considered past failures regarding punishment, lamenting the impunity that had for so long allowed perpetrators to engage in their murderous acts. The book combined discussions of philosophy and morality (covering such issues as the right to life, ideology, and self-determination) with discussions of politics and the law (looking at the past record of individual states against a context of domestic and international regulations). This work in part took him back to his legal roots and extended his expertise into the realm of international relations, as he pondered the subtleties of realpolitik against state expressions of altruism. Ultimately, Kuper concluded that the refusal of the international community to live up to the promises of the UN Convention on Genocide was a major contributor to the high incidence of genocidal outbreaks in recent times.

As a sociologist, Leo Kuper's work on race relations and intergroup dynamics showed where the breakdown of social stability could lead. His work was characterized by a thoughtful examination of his topics based on meticulous research. His pioneering work in genocide theory, and the lead he gave to younger scholars searching for ways into the subject, made him one of the foremost thinkers in the field—perhaps, it could be said, the successor par excellence to the founder of the field of genocide studies, Raphael Lemkin. His major concern was always that a means could be found to bring effective international action to bear in order to stop what he referred to as "the odious scourge," but that genocide should also be understood more fully by informed, educated people in the broader sphere as well—and it was to achieving these twin objectives that he dedicated his work and his thinking.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Lemkin, Raphael; UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

Further Reading

Kuper, Leo. Genocide: Its Political Use in the Twentieth Century. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1981.

Kuper, Leo. International Action against Genocide, London: Minority Rights Group, pamphlet no. 53, 1982.

Kuper, Leo. Living in Towns: Selected Research Papers in Urban Sociology of the Faculty of Commerce and Social Science, University of Birmingham. London: Cresset Press, 1953.

Kuper, Leo. The Pity of It All: Polarisation of Racial and Ethnic Relations. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1977.

Kuper, Leo. The Prevention of Genocide. New Haven (CT): Yale University Press, 1985.

THE HOLOCAUST

THE HOLOCAUST

An Encyclopedia and Document Collection

VOLUME 2: L - Z

Paul R. Bartrop and
Michael Dickerman,
Editors

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC
Santa Barbara, California • Denver, Colorado

Copyright © 2017 by ABC-CLIO, LLC

Every reasonable effort has been made to trace the owners of copyright materials in this book, but in some instances this has proven impossible. The editors and publishers will be glad to receive information leading to more complete acknowledgments in subsequent printings of the book and in the meantime extend their apologies for any omissions.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except for the inclusion of brief quotations in a review, without prior permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Bartrop, Paul R. (Paul Robert), 1955- editor. | Dickerman, Michael, editor.

Title: The Holocaust : an encyclopedia and document collection / Paul R. Bartrop and Michael Dickerman, editors.

Description: Santa Barbara, California : ABC-CLIO, [2017] | Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2016059758 (print) | LCCN 2016059898 (ebook) | ISBN 9781440840838 (set : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848322 (volume 1 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848339 (volume 2 : alk. paper) |

ISBN 9781440848346 (volume 3 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440848353 (volume 4 : alk. paper) | ISBN 9781440840845 (ebook)

Subjects: LCSH: Holocaust, Jewish (1939–1945)—Encyclopedias.

Classification: LCC D804.25 .H655 2017 (print) | LCC D804.25 (ebook) | DDC 940.53/1803—dc23

LC record available at <https://lcn.loc.gov/2016059758>

ISBN: 978-1-4408-4083-8 (set)

978-1-4408-4832-2 (vol. 1)

978-1-4408-4833-9 (vol. 2)

978-1-4408-4834-6 (vol. 3)

978-1-4408-4835-3 (vol. 4)

EISBN: 978-1-4408-4084-5

21 20 19 18 17 1 2 3 4 5

This book is also available as an eBook.

ABC-CLIO

An Imprint of ABC-CLIO, LLC

ABC-CLIO, LLC

130 Cremona Drive, P.O. Box 1911

Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

www.abc-clio.com

This book is printed on acid-free paper ☺

Manufactured in the United States of America

To Our Grandchildren
The next generation to carry a sacred tradition,
and the memory that accompanies it

Paul R. Bartrop
Jacob, Madeline, Mila, Asher, Max, Xavier

Michael Dickerman
Ethan, Holden

Grandchildren are the crown of the aged (Proverbs 17:6)

Contents

Volume 1

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

Preface xix

Historical Introduction xxi

Essays 1

- What Caused the Holocaust? 1
 - Who Were the Perpetrators of the Holocaust? 3
 - Who Were the Victims of the Holocaust? 4
 - What Was the Response of Bystanders to the Holocaust? 5
 - How Did the International Community React to the Holocaust? 6
 - What Were the Consequences of the Holocaust? 8
- A–K Entries 11

Volume 2

List of Entries ix

List of Maps xvii

L–Z Entries 383

Chronology 745

Glossary 751

Bibliography 759

Contributors List 765

About the Editors 769

Volume 3: Holocaust Testimonies

Testimonies List vii

Topical Guide to Testimonies ix

Preface xi

Introduction xiii

Holocaust Testimonies 771

Volume 4: Documents on the Holocaust

List of Documents vii

Introduction xiii

Documents 1051

I. The Othering of the Jews 1051

Antisemitism and Nazi Ideology

Anti-Jewish Legislation

Nazi Propaganda

German and Occupied Jewry

II. The Nazi Assault 1138

III. Genocide 1191

IV. Responses and Other Victims 1321

V. Post-Holocaust Developments 1353

Index 1397

List of Entries

A Crime without a Name	Asocials
Abetz, Otto	Auschwitz
Action Française	The Auschwitz Album
Aktion	Auschwitz Protocols
Aktion Reinhard	Austria
Albania
Algeria	Babi Yar Massacre
Al-Husseini, Haj Amin	Baeck, Leo
Alice, Princess Andrew of Greece	Banality of Evil
Altman, Tova (Tosia)	Barbie, Klaus
André, Joseph	Barmen Declaration
Anielewicz, Mordecai	Bartali, Gino
Anne Frank House	Barth, Karl
Anschluss	Battel, Albert
Antisemitism	Bauer, Yehuda
Antonescu, Ion	Baum, Herbert
Antwerp Pogrom	Beck, Gad
April Boycott	Becker-Freyseng, Hermann
Arbeit Macht Frei	Beitz, Berthold
Arendt, Hannah	Belarus
Armée Juive	Belgium
Armenians, Hitler Statement	Belzec
Arouch, Salamo	Bergen-Belsen
Arrow Cross	Bergson Group
Art and the Holocaust	Berlin Jewish Hospital
Aryan	Bermuda Conference
Aryan Paragraph	Best, Werner
Aryanism	Bettelheim, Bruno
Aryanization	Białystok Ghetto

x List of Entries

- Biebow, Hans
Bielecki, Jerzy
Bielski Partisans
Bilecki, Julian
Bingham, Harry
Birkenau
Bloch, Marc
Blome, Kurt
Blood and Soil
Blood for Goods
Blood Libel
Bogaard, Johannes
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich
Borkowska, Anna
Bormann, Martin
Borromeo, Giovanni
Boss, Hugo
Bousquet, René
Brack, Viktor
Brand, Joel
Brandt, Karl
Bretholz, Leo
British Response to the Holocaust
Browning, Christopher
Brunner, Alois
Buchenwald
Bulgaria
Bunel, Lucien-Louis
Bureaucracy
Büro Grüber
- Calmeyer, Hans
Cargas, Harry James
Catholic Church
Central Office for Jewish Emigration
Channel Islands
Chełmno
Children during the Holocaust
Children's Literature of the Holocaust
Christian X, King of Denmark
Churban
Cohn, Marianne
Collaboration
Comité de Défense des Juifs
Communists in the Holocaust
Concentration Camps
Confiscation of Jewish Property
Conspiracy
- Coughlin, Charles
Credit Suisse
Crimes against Humanity
Croatia
Csatary, Lazlo
Czechoslovakia
Czerniakow, Adam
- Dachau
Dahlem Declaration
Damaskinos of Athens, Archbishop
Dannecker, Theodor
Dawidowicz, Lucy S.
Death Camps
Death Marches
Death Marches, Austrian
Degrelle, Léon
Degussa
Dehumanization
Delbo, Charlotte
Denazification
Denial of the Holocaust
Denmark
Denunciation
The Deputy
Der Stürmer
Desk Killers
De Sousa Mendes, Aristides
Deutsche Bank
The Diary of a Young Girl
The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak
Dinur, Yehiel
Displaced Persons
Doctors' Trial
Dora-Mittelbau
Drancy
Duckwitz, Georg
- Eckart, Johann Dietrich
Edelman, Marek
Edmonds, Roddie
Eichmann, Adolf
Eichmann in Jerusalem
Eichmann Trial
Eicke, Theodor
Einsatzgruppen
Enabling Act, 1933
Estonia

- Ethnic Cleansing
 Eugenics
 Euthanasia Program
 Evian Conference
Exodus 1947

 Fabrikaktion
 Facing History and Ourselves
 Fackenheim, Emil
 Fascism
 February Strike
 Ferencz, Benjamin
 Film and the Holocaust
 Final Solution
 Finland
 Fischer, Eugen
 Fleischmann, Gisi
 Flick Case
 Flossenbürg
 Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies
 Fossoli di Carpi
 France
 Frank, Anne
 Frank, Hans
 Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial
 Franz, Kurt
 Freisler, Roland
 Frick, Wilhelm
 Friedländer, Saul
 Fry, Varian
 Fugu Plan
 Führerprinzip
 “Functionalists”
 Funktionshäftling

 Galen, Clemens August Graf von
 Gas Chambers
 Gas Vans
 Gebhardt, Karl
 Generalgouvernement
 Genocide
 Gens, Jakob
 German Army, Role in the Holocaust
 German Census, 1933
 Gerstein, Kurt
 Gestapo
 Geulen-Herscovici, Andrée
 Ghettos

 Gibraltar Camp, Jamaica
 Gies, Miep
Gleichschaltung
 Globke Trial
 Globocnik, Odilo
 Glücks, Richard
 Goebbels, Joseph
Good
 Göring, Albert
 Göring, Hermann
 Graziani, Rodolfo
The Great Dictator
 Greece
 Grese, Irma
The Grey Zone
 Gross-Rosen
 Grüninger, Paul
 Grynszpan, Herschel
 Gunden, Lois
 Gürtner, Franz
 Gutman, Yisrael

 Haas, Leo
 Haavara Agreement
 Hadamar
 Hadamar Insane Asylum Case
 Harster, Wilhelm
 Hautval, Adelaide
 Heim, Aribert
Helga’s Diary
 Helmy, Mohammed
 Herz-Sommer, Alice
 Hess, Rudolf
 Hesselblad, Maria Elisabetta
 Heydrich, Reinhard
 Hilberg, Raul
 Himmler, Heinrich
 Hinzert
 Hippler, Fritz
Historikerstreit
 Hitler, Adolf
 Hitler Youth
Hitler’s Willing Executioners
 Hlinka Guard
 HMT Dunera
 Ho Feng-Shan
 Hoess, Rudolf
 Hollerith Machine

xii List of Entries

- Holocaust
Holocaust
Holocaust and Genocide Studies
Holocaust by Bullets
Homosexuals
Höppner, Rolf-Heinz
Horthy, Miklós
Hudal, Alois
Hungarian War Crimes Prosecutions
Hungary
- Iceland
I.G. Farben
I.G. Farben Case
“Intentionalists”
International Committee of the Red Cross
International Holocaust Remembrance Day
Iron Guard
Italian Jews and Fascism
Italy
- J.A. Topf and Sons
Jackson, Robert H.
Jagendorf, Siegfried
Jasenovac
Jedwabne Massacre
Jehovah’s Witnesses
Jewish Fighting Organization
Jewish Ghetto Police
Jewish Honor Courts
Jewish Military Union
Jewish Partisans
Jewish Question
Jewish Resistance
Jewish Women and the Holocaust
Joint Distribution Committee
Jonas, Regina
Jud Süß
Judenrat
Judges’ Trial
Judgment at Nuremberg
- Kaiser Wilhelm Institute
Kalina, Antonin
Kaltenbrunner, Ernst
Kaplan, Chaim A.
Kapos
Kappler, Herbert
- Karski, Jan
Kasztner, Reszó
Katzenberger Trial
Katzenelson, Itzhak
Keitel, Wilhelm
Kempner, Vitka
Kerkhofs, Louis-Joseph
Kharkov Trial
Kielce Pogrom
Kindertransport
Koch Trial
Kolbe, Raymond
Kommissarbefehl
Korczak, Janusz
Korczak, Rozka
Kovner, Abba
Krajugevac Massacre
Kraków-Plaszow
Kramer, Josef
Kraus, Gilbert and Eleanor
Kreyszig, Lothar
Kristallnacht
Krupp Case
Krützfeld, Wilhelm
Kuper, Leo
- Landmesser, August
Lange, Herbert
Lange, Rudolf
Lantos, Tom
Latvia
Laval, Pierre
Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor
Lawrence, Geoffrey
Le Chambon-sur-Lignon
League of German Girls
Lebensborn
Lebensraum
Leitz, Ernst, II
Lemkin, Raphael
Levi, Primo
Liberation, Concentration Camps
Lichtenberg, Bernhard
Life Is Beautiful
“Life Unworthy of Life”
Lipke, Janis and Johanna
Literature and the Holocaust
Lithuania

- Łódź Ghetto
 London Charter Agreement
 Lubetkin, Zivia
 Lubny Massacre
 Lutz, Carl
 Luxembourg

 Madagascar Plan
 Majdanek
 Mann, Franczeska
 Manstein, Erich von
 Manstein Trial
 Marian, Ferdinand
 Marie-Benoît, Père
Maus and Maus II
 Mauthausen Trial
 Mauthausen-Gusen
 Mechelen
 Medical Experimentation
 Meed, Vladka
Mein Kampf
 Mengele, Josef
 Microstates during the Holocaust
 Milchberg, Irving
 Mischling
 Mommsen, Hans
 Monowitz
The Mortal Storm
 Moscow Declaration
 Müller, Heinrich
 Münch, Hans
 Munich Agreement
 Museum of Tolerance
 Museums and Memorials
 Music and the Holocaust
 Mussert, Anton Adriaan

 Nacht und Nebel
 Names under the Nazis, Legislation
 National Socialism
 National Socialist German Workers' Party
 National Socialist Program
 Natzweiler-Struthof
 Nazi Book Burning
 Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941
 Nazism and Germany
Neighbors
 Netherlands

 Netherlands Tribunals
 Neuengamme
Night
Night and Fog
 Nisko Plan
 Norrman, Sven
 Norway
 Nuremberg Code
 Nuremberg Defense
 Nuremberg Laws
 Nuremberg Principles
 Nuremberg Trials

 Oberheuser, Herta
 Oberländer, Theodor
 Ochota Massacre
 Odessa Massacre
 Ogilvie, Albert
 Ohlendorf, Otto
 Olympic Games, 1936
 Oneg Shabbat
 Opdyke, Irene Gut
 Operation Barbarossa
 Operation Harvest Festival
 Operation Spring Wind
 "Ordinary Men"
 Osako, Tatsuo

Paper Clips
 Papon, Maurice
 Paulavicius, Jonas
 Pavelić, Ante
 Pechersky, Alexander
 Perlasca, Giorgio
 Peshev, Dimitar
 Pétain, Philippe
The Pianist
 Pilecki, Witold
 Pius XI
 Pius XII
 Pivnik, Sam
 Ploetz, Alfred
 Pohl, Oswald
 Poland
 Ponary Forest
 Popovici, Traian
 Priebke, Erich
 Priest Block, Dachau

xiv List of Entries

Project Paperclip
Propaganda in the Holocaust
Protestant Churches, German
Protocols of the Elders of Zion

Quisling, Vidkun

Rabe, John
“Racial Hygiene”
Rademacher, Franz
Ratlines
Ravensbrück
Refoulement
Reich Citizenship Law
Reich Flight Tax
Reichssicherheitshauptamt
Rescuers of Jews
Reserve Police Battalion 101
Resistance Movements
Rhineland Bastards
Riefenstahl, Leni
Riegner Telegram
Riga
Righteous among the Nations
Ringelblum, Emanuel
Ringelblum Archive
Ritter, Robert
Robota, Roza
Röhm, Ernst
Roma and Sinti
Romania
Rosé, Alma
Rosenbaum, Pinchas
Rosenberg, Alfred
Rosenstrasse Protest
Rothaug, Oswald
Rotta, Angelo
Rubenstein, Richard L.
Rufeisen, Oswald
Rumbula Massacre

Sachsenhausen
Salaspils
Salkaházi, Sára
Salomon, Charlotte
Salonika
Sauckel, Fritz
Schacter, Herschel
Schindler, Oskar

Schindler’s Jews
Schindler’s List
Schlegelberger, Franz
Schmeling, Max
Schmid, Anton
Scholl, Hans and Sophie
Scholtz-Klink, Gertrud
Schönerer, Georg Ritter von
Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard
Schutzhaft
Schutzstaffel
Second Generation
Segerstedt, Torgny
Serbia
Seyss-Inquart, Arthur
Shanghai Ghetto
Sharp, Waitstill and Martha
Sheptytsky, Andrey
Shirer, William L.
Shoah
Shoah
Sicherheitsdienst
Sippenhaft
Slachta, Margit
Slave Labor
Slavs
Slovakia
Sobibór
Social Darwinism
Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français
Sondergericht
Sonderkommando
Soos, Géza
Soviet Union
Spain
Speer, Albert
SS St. Louis
SS-Totenkopfverbände
St. Hedwig’s Cathedral
Stangl, Franz
Stein, Edith
Sterilization
Streicher, Julius
Strobos, Tina
Stroop, Jürgen
Struma Disaster
Stuckart, Wilhelm
Sturmabteilung
Stutthof

- Sugihara, Chiune
 Survivor Testimony
 Süskind, Walter
 Sweden
 Switzerland
 Szálasi, Ferenc
 Szenes, Hannah
 Szeptycki, Andreas Alexander

 Taylor, Telford
 Ten Boom, Corrie
 Teudt, Wilhelm
 Theological Responses to the Holocaust
 Theresienstadt
 Thierack, Otto
 Third Reich
 Tiso, Jozef
 Topography of Terror
 Total War and the Holocaust
 Touvier Case
 Trawniki Men
 Treblinka
Triumph of the Spirit
 Trocmé, André and Magda
The Truce
 Turkey

 Ukraine
 UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide
 United Partisan Organization
 United States Holocaust Memorial Museum
 United States Response to the Holocaust
 Universities, Complicity in the Holocaust
Uprising
 Upstander
 USC Shoah Foundation
 Ustashe

 Vaivara
 Vel' d'Hiv Roundup
 Venezia, Shlomo
 Vichy France
 Vilna Ghetto
 Vittel
 Volk
 Volksgemeinschaft
 Volksgerichtshof
 Von Faulhaber, Michael

 Von Moltke, Helmuth James
 Vrba, Rudolf
 Vught

 Waffen-SS
 Wagner, Richard
 Waldheim Affair
 Wallenberg, Raoul
 Wannsee Conference
 War Crimes
 War Refugee Board
 Warsaw Ghetto
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising
 Warsaw Rising
 Wegner, Armin T.
 Weidt, Otto
 Weimar Republic
 Weiss, Helga
 Weltsch, Robert
 Westerbork
 White Buses
 White Rose
 Wiedergutmachung
 Wiesel, Elie
 Wiesenthal, Simon
 Wilde-KZ
 Winton, Nicholas
 Wirth, Christian
 Wise, Stephen S.
 Wolff, Karl
 World War II
 World War II, Outbreak of Wrobel, Eta

 Yad Vashem
 Yellow Star
 Yom Hashoah
 Yoran, Shalom
 Yugoslavia

 Żabiński, Jan
 Zegota
 Zimetbaum, Mala
 Zuckerman, Yitzhak
 Zuehlke Trial
 Zygielbojm, Shmuel
 Zyklon-B
 Zyklon-B Case, 1946

List of Maps

The Holocaust, 1939–1945:	xxv
Jews in Europe, 1937–1941:	xxvi
Holocaust Deaths, 1941–1945:	xxvii
Anne Frank, 1929–1945:	26
Auschwitz Environs, Summer 1944:	50
The Liberation of Major Nazi Camps, 1944–1945:	133
Rescue of Danish Jews, Fall 1943:	163
Holocaust: Einsatzgruppen Aktions in Eastern Europe:	187
“Euthanasia” Centers in Germany, 1940–1945:	193
Ghettos in Occupied Europe, 1939–1944:	245
Deportations from Hungarian Ghettos, 1944:	309
Jewish Partisan Activity in Eastern Europe, 1942–1944:	336
Romanian Camps and Ghettos, 1942:	548
Voyage of the SS St. Louis , May 13–June 17, 1939:	610
Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943:	699

L

Landmesser, August

August Landmesser worked during the 1930s at the Blohm & Voss shipbuilding and engineering works located in Hamburg. He is best remembered for an act that has become renowned as one of the starkest of all acts of resistance in Nazi Germany; among thousands of others with their hands raised in the Hitler salute on June 13, 1936, he was pictured with his arms folded in direct protest of the Nazi regime.

Landmesser was born on May 24, 1910, the only son of August Franz Landmesser and Wilhelmine Magdalene, née Schmidtpott. In 1930 he joined the Nazi Party, thinking it might improve his job prospects at a time when the Great Depression was destroying the German economy. There is no evidence that he was committed to Nazi ideology; in fact, in 1934 he did what no committed Nazi would ever do when he met and fell in love with Irma Eckler, a young Jewish woman.

Within a year they were engaged; immediately, he was expelled from the party, and their application to be married was rejected in accordance with the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, one of which, the Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor, prohibited Jews from marriage with other Germans. Sexual relations were also prohibited, referred to as Rassenschande, or “race shame”—in effect, “defiling the Aryan race.” Once the laws began to be applied systematically across Germany, the crime became a capital offense. Nazi ideology held that “race mixing” would weaken the “purity” of the Aryan race, especially if children resulted from the union. It was hardly a surprise, therefore, that the birth of the couple’s baby girl, Ingrid, on October 29, 1935, alerted the Gestapo to their existence, after which they were watched closely.

It was perhaps with this in mind that Landmesser, who by now must have harbored no little dissatisfaction with the regime, took his famous action at the shipyard on June 13, 1936. The occasion was the launch of a new naval vessel, the training ship Horst Wessel, a ceremony filled with significance. In the presence of Adolf Hitler, his deputy, Rudolf Hess, gave a speech, and the mother of Horst Wessel christened the ship with a bottle of champagne. Wessel, of course, was an SA man who was killed in the early Nazi struggle for power, and who had written the song that became the Nazi anthem played or sung on every official occasion after the Nazis assumed office.

Refusing to give the Nazi salute was Landmesser’s ultimate protest against the Nazis. He was probably unaware that his action was photographed, or that he stood out to the extent that he did. Now, more than ever, he was being watched by the authorities. For this single act of resistance he could well have been arrested; that he was not said much about his luck in snubbing the regime at this time.

In 1937 Irma was again pregnant, and the little family attempted to flee to Denmark. Their flight, however, was unsuccessful, and they were arrested near the border. Landmesser was charged with “dishonoring the race,” and in July 1937 he was imprisoned in accordance with the Nuremberg

Laws. In the trial that followed, both he and Irma argued that neither of them knew she was Jewish, as she had been baptized in a Protestant church after her mother remarried. Accordingly, on May 27, 1938, Landmesser was acquitted for lack of evidence. He was warned that he would be subjected to very harsh punishment if he was ever again arrested for the same offense.

Almost as if to dare the Gestapo to follow through on their threat, the couple continued their relationship in the open. On July 15, 1938, Landmesser was arrested again, and this time he was sentenced to hard labor for two-and-a-half years in a concentration camp. It was to be the last time he saw his family.

Irma was also detained by the Gestapo on the basis of a law that allowed for the arrest of Jewish wives where an Aryan man had “dishonored the race.” She was held for a time at the local prison in Hamburg, Fuhlsbüttel, where she gave birth to a second daughter, Irene. From there she was sent to the concentration camp at Lichtenburg and then transferred to Ravensbrück. She was compulsorily (and permanently) separated from her two daughters. It is known that she was still alive in January 1942, as letters from her exist up to then, but in February 1942 she was relocated to a Nazi “euthanasia center” at Bernburg, Saxony, where she was gassed to death. She was one of 1,400 women from Ravensbrück murdered in Bernburg by the spring of 1942. In 1949 she was pronounced legally dead.

Landmesser was probably unaware of this. He had been discharged from prison on January 19, 1941, and sent to work as a foreman for a transport company stationed in the seaside resort town of Warnemünde. In February 1944 he was drafted into a penal unit, the 999th Fort Infantry Battalion, which saw service in Greece and other parts of the Balkans. He was killed during fighting in Croatia on October 17, 1944; at the time he was declared missing in action, but in 1949 he, like Irma, was pronounced legally dead.

After their mother’s arrest, Ingrid and Irene were first taken to Hamburg’s city orphanage. Ingrid was later permitted to live with her maternal grandmother, but the infant Irene was removed from the orphanage and about to be sent to a concentration camp when, at the last moment, she was picked up by someone known to the family and sent to temporary safety in Austria. Upon her return to Germany she was hidden in a hospital where her Jewish identity was suppressed, and she was able to escape detection until the end of the war. Both children lived with foster parents after 1945.

In 1951 the marriage of August Landmesser and Irma Eckler was recognized retroactively by the Hamburg Senate.

In the fall of that year Ingrid took her father’s surname, Landmesser, though her sister Irene continued to use the surname Eckler.

The story of August Landmesser’s defiant action in the Blohm & Voss shipyard in Hamburg achieved widespread coverage after March 22, 1991, when the German weekly newspaper Die Zeit published the photograph taken on June 13, 1936, and Landmesser was identified by one of his daughters. Then, in 1996, Irene Eckler published a book, Die Vormundschaftsakte 1935–1958: Verfolgung einer Familie wegen “Rassenschande” (The Guardianship Documents 1935–1958: Persecution of a Family for “Dishonoring the Race”), in which she chronicled, with documents, how her family had been destroyed in the aftermath of her father’s solitary act of resistance and her parents’ love for each other that transcended racial ideology and a brutal totalitarian regime.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Ravensbrück; Upstander

Further Reading

Eckler, Irene. A Family Torn Apart by “Rassenschande:” Political Persecution in the Third Reich: Documents and Reports from Hamburg in German and English. Horneburg: Horneburg Verlag, 1998.

Lange, Herbert

Herbert Lange was one of the main perpetrators of the Nazi murder of patients in Germany and occupied Poland during the Aktion T-4 euthanasia program. At the end of 1939 he became the head of the so-called Sonderkommando Lange, and by the following summer this unit had murdered more than 6,000 Polish and Jewish patients from the hospitals and nursing homes in the area known to the Nazis as the Warthegau, in East and West Prussia and other annexed areas. As of December 1941, Sonderkommando Lange was using gas vans to kill tens of thousands of Jews and Roma classed as “unfit to work” in the extermination camp of Chelmno, of which Lange was the first commandant until April 1942. Later, he commanded Sonderkommando Lange in carrying out the extermination of Jews from the Łódź ghetto.

Herbert Lange was born in Menzlin, Western Pomerania, on September 29, 1909. He enrolled to study law at university but failed to graduate. He subsequently joined the Nazi Party on May 1, 1932. Three months later he enlisted in the SA, led by Ernst Röhm, and in 1934 he joined the SS. By 1935 he had become a deputy police commissioner.

In 1939 Lange joined Einsatzgruppe Naumann (EG VI), which consisted of about 150 men. In the wake of the German army's invasion of Poland, he entered Poland with EG VI during the September campaign. On November 9, 1939, he was promoted to the rank of SS-Untersturmführer.

As part of his duties, Lange was ordered on September 12, 1939, to build a concentration camp at Poznań (Posen). This became known as KZ Fort VII and was part of the huge Prussian fortifications encircling the city. For a very short time, from October 10 to 16, Lange was the camp commandant. Once he had established the camp, however, he moved on.

From mid-October 1939, at the head of his own "special unit" (Sonderkommando Lange), he carried out inspections of the mental establishments in Owinska, Koscian, and Gniezno. Early in 1940 Sonderkommando Lange was tasked with the extermination of mentally ill people in the Nazi administrative area known as the Wartheland. By mid-1940 he and his men had been responsible for the murder of about 1,100 patients in Owinska, 2,750 patients at Koscian, 1,558 patients and 300 Poles at Działdowo, and hundreds of Poles at Fort VII, where the mobile gas chamber (Einsatzwagen) was invented. The unit, equipped with a gas van, shuttled between hospitals, picking up patients and killing them with carbon monoxide, thereby becoming a mobile killing unit.

Lange's effectiveness in organizing these murders in the "Euthanasia Aktion" in Poland was highly regarded by the SS hierarchy. He was promoted to SS-Obersturmführer on April 20, 1940, and in December 1941 he was appointed the first commandant of the Chełmno extermination camp. From April 1940 his unit was permanently stationed at the Soldau concentration camp. Later, Lange was responsible for mass killing activity in the Konin region, but officially from the end of November 1940 to late 1941 he was head of the Economic Crimes department of the criminal police.

SS and police authorities established the Chełmno killing center in order to annihilate the Jewish population of the Wartheland, including the inhabitants of the Łódź ghetto. It was the first stationary facility where poison gas was used for the mass murder of Jews, and Lange was tasked with the liquidation of 100,000 Jews from the region. In April 1942 Lange's unit was renamed SS Sonderkommando Kulmhof (Chełmno), and he introduced improvements to the extermination process. Lange constructed cremation pits to replace mass graves. He was succeeded by Hans Bothmann, who formed Sonderkommando Bothmann later in 1942. At a very minimum, 152,000 people were killed at the camp, with later estimates charging up to 180,000 victims.

Lange held the position of commander of the Chełmno extermination camp from December 7, 1941, until February 21, 1942. He was then transferred to the Reich Main Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, or RSHA). Here he served under Arthur Nebe as a criminal investigator and went to the Balkans on an antipartisan mission.

In March 1944 Lange returned to the already inactive death camp at Chełmno as part of SS Sonderkommando Bothmann. He resumed the gassing operations in the forest camp for the final 10 transports of ghettoized Jews.

In 1944 Lange aided in catching the conspirators of the assassination attempt on Hitler's life by army officers led by Klaus von Stauffenberg (the July Bomb Plot). His work in this endeavor was so highly regarded that he was promoted to SS-Sturmbannführer.

The circumstances of Lange's death are unclear. It is believed that he was killed in action during the Battle of Berlin, probably around April 20, 1945.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Chełmno; Concentration Camps; Death Camps; Einsatzgruppen; Euthanasia Program; Łódź Ghetto; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Sonderkommando

Further Reading

Friedlander, Henry. The Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Montague, Patrick. Chełmno and the Holocaust: The History of Hitler's First Death Camp. London: I. B. Tauris, 2012.

Lange, Rudolf

Rudolf Lange was a prominent Nazi police official and a key Einsatzkommando officer who was present at the Wannsee Conference in January 1942. Lange commanded the Nazi Party Intelligence Organization (Sicherheitsdienst, or SD) and the Nazi Security Police (SiPO) in Riga, Latvia. He was a mass killer who was largely accountable for the extermination of the Jewish population of Latvia. Einsatzgruppen A, which operated within his area of command, killed more than 250,000 people in a little less than six months.

Lange was born on November 18, 1910, in Weisswasser, Saxony, the son of a railway construction supervisor. He finished high school in 1928 and studied law at Friedrich Schiller University, Jena.

He received a doctorate in law in 1933 and joined the Sturmabteilung (SA) in November of that year, having been recruited by the Gestapo. Feeling that this had been a bad career move, in 1936 Lange joined the Schutzstaffel, or SS.

Within a year he had absorbed the values of SS morality and ideology, leading him to resign his church membership by 1937. In May 1938, soon after the Anschluss of Austria with Germany, Lange was transferred to the Gestapo in Vienna to supervise and coordinate the fusion of the Austrian police system with that of Germany. He was then transferred to Stuttgart in June 1939, where he became a Gestapo administrator. By 1940 he was Berlin's deputy head of police.

In 1941 Lange was promoted to the rank of SS major, and on June 5, 1941, he reported to Pretzsch, Saxony, and the command staff of Einsatzgruppe A, headed by SS-Brigadeführer Franz Walter Stahlecker. Lange was placed in charge of Einsatzkommando 2, or EK2. He was one of the few people aware of the "Führer Order" (Führerbefehl) dealing with the so-called "Jewish problem" in Latvia. He was sent to Riga and became chief of the Riga Gestapo and Criminal Police in July 1941.

From the beginning of his involvement in Latvia, Lange gave orders to squads of Latvians, such as the Arajs Kommando, to carry out massacres in the smaller cities. Another local group receiving orders from Lange was the Vagulāns Kommando, responsible for the Jelgava massacres in July and August 1941. Lange personally supervised some of the executions, and ordered that all the SD officers should personally participate in the killings.

Between November 25 and November 29, 1941, Jews from the Reich itself were also sent to Riga. As construction of the Riga concentration camp had not been begun, Jews coming off trains from Berlin, Frankfurt, Munich, Vienna, and Breslau were summarily shot without evaluating whether or not they were suitable for work. In addition, Lange planned and executed the murder of 24,000 Latvian Jews at the Rumbula Forest near Riga from November 30 to December 8, 1941.

By December 1941 Lange's EK2 had killed about 60,000 Jews from Latvia, as well as those from Germany and Austria. That month he was named commander of the Security Police and Security Service in Latvia. As his department served as the focus of all SD operations in Latvia, Lange is widely recognized as one of the primary perpetrators of the Holocaust in Latvia.

On January 20, 1942, representing SS Lieutenant General Friedrich Jeckeln, Lange participated in the Wannsee Conference in Berlin to discuss the "Final Solution." By now he was the deputy head of all SS task forces in Latvia. Although he was the lowest ranking SS officer present at Wannsee, his on-site experience in conducting the mass murder of deported Jews was considered valuable for the conference as his command was largely responsible for implementing the extermination of Latvia's Jewish population. He had been in charge of the mass killings on the outskirts of Riga that murdered 35,000 people in two days. He also carried out further killing operations against Jews, political opponents, and partisans in Latvia through the use of gas vans. Later in 1942 he was promoted to SS-Obersturmbannführer in Riga, where he remained until 1945. He assumed command of the SD and SIPO for the Reichsgau Wartheland, situated in Posen (Poznań), Poland.

In January 1945 Lange was promoted to SS-Standartenführer, and Posen, which lay on the main route between Warsaw and Berlin, had to be cleared by the Red Army before the final assaults designed to capture Berlin and end the war could begin. Bitter fighting saw the outlying forts reduced and city blocks seized, as the Soviets succeeded in pushing the German defenders toward the city center. Lange was killed in action in the fighting in February 1945 while trying to recapture his headquarters. The manner of his death is unclear. One report states that Lange committed suicide on February 16, 1945; another stated that he was killed in battle on February 23, 1945. He was posthumously awarded the German Cross in Gold for his actions in the Battle of Posen.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Austria; Einsatzgruppen; Latvia; Riga; Salaspils; Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard; Sicherheitsdienst; Wannsee Conference

Further Reading

- Angrick, Andrej, and Peter Klein. The "Final Solution" in Riga: Exploitation and Annihilation. New York and Oxford: Berghahn Books, 2009.
- Ezergailis, Andrew. The Holocaust in Latvia 1941–1944: The Missing Center. Washington: United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 1996.
- Lumans, Valdis O. Latvia in World War II. New York: Fordham University Press, 2006.

Lantos, Tom

A member of the United States Democratic Party, Tom Lantos represented California's 12th District in the U.S. House of Representatives from 1981 until his death in 2008. The only Holocaust survivor ever to serve in the U.S. Congress, Lantos was known as a strong advocate for human rights.

One of the few U.S. Congress members not born in the United States, Tamás Péter Lantos was born in Budapest, Hungary, on February 1, 1928. In 1944, when he was 16, the German Army invaded and occupied Hungary. The only child of Jewish upper-middle-class parents, Lantos found himself in a dangerous world.

Lantos was forced into a work camp with other young male Jews. His work crew was responsible for maintaining an important railroad bridge in Szob. An unsuccessful escape attempt resulted in an intense beating at the hands of his Nazi captors, although Lantos later succeeded in breaking free. He headed back to Budapest, taking refuge with, and eventually gaining diplomatic protection from, Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, whose actions were responsible for saving more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews through an underground network that sent them to safety. Instead of leaving Budapest, Lantos joined the anti-Nazi underground. Disguised as a military cadet, he moved around the city bringing supplies to Jews in hiding.

By the time Russian forces liberated Hungary from Germany in 1945, Budapest had fallen apart. And Lantos's search for his parents revealed that they had been killed. However, he was able to reestablish contact with an old childhood friend, Annette Tillemann, who had survived the Nazi occupation by going into hiding in Switzerland with her mother. Tillemann returned to Budapest, where she and Lantos were reunited. They were married in 1950. Lantos's story is one of several told in the Academy Award-winning documentary The Last Days.

A Hillel Foundation academic scholarship to the University of Washington, Seattle, won on the merits of an essay on President Theodore Roosevelt, brought Lantos to the United States. Working at dozens of odd jobs while attending school, he graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1949 and a master's degree in 1950. He enrolled at the University of California, Berkeley, for his postgraduate studies in international economics, and earned his doctorate in 1953.

A varied 30-year career in economics followed. Lantos became a professor of economics at San Francisco State University, worked as a television news analyst, and served as a business consultant. In the late 1970s he served as economic and foreign policy adviser to the U.S. Senate, which inspired him to run for Congress.

Lantos was elected by a slim margin to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1980, a rare Democratic win in the year of Ronald Reagan's Republican landslide. In the House, Lantos served on the Government Reform Committee and chaired the Foreign Affairs Committee, and his career in Congress was marked by his fight against government waste and his support of Israel. Lantos also worked for human rights as the founder and co-chair of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, and often supported sending U.S. military forces abroad to intervene in conflicts involving human rights violations. Lantos helped round up Democratic support for the 2002 resolution authorizing President George W. Bush to take military action in Iraq. However, as the Iraq War progressed, Lantos became increasingly critical of Bush's handling of it and eventually called for a significant withdrawal of U.S. troops. Lantos also focused his legislative efforts upon improving the quality of life in the San Francisco Bay Area and protecting the environment.

In January 2008, during his 14th term in the House, Lantos announced that he had been diagnosed with esophageal cancer. He also announced that he would not run for reelection but that he intended to finish his term, which was up in January 2009. However, on February 11, 2008, Tom Lantos died at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Maryland, at the age of 80.

KELLIE SEARLE

See also: Hungary; Wallenberg, Raoul

Further Reading

Biographical Directory of the United States Congress. <http://bioguide.congress.gov>.

Marmor, John. "Against All Odds." University of Washington Alumni Magazine (www.washington.edu/alumni).

Spielberg, Steven, and the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation. The Last Days. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 1999.

Latvia

Latvia is a Baltic state situated in northeastern Europe. It had a 1939 population of approximately 1.99 million people, of whom some 94,000 were Jewish. Latvia became an independent constitutional republic in 1918, but in 1934 Karlis Ulmanis seized power and promptly established a right-wing quasi-fascist government. That government remained in power until June 1940, at which time Soviet troops moved in and occupied the country; two months later, Latvia was annexed outright and became a Soviet republic. This event had been presaged by the 1939 German-Soviet Non-aggression Pact, in which Germany and the Soviet Union had agreed to divide and occupy certain areas of eastern and central Europe. Jews living in Latvia had been fully integrated into the social and political fabric of Latvia during the interwar years, and despite Ulmanis's fascist tendencies, Latvian Jews were generally spared the persecution faced by Jews in other European nations during the 1930s. At least half of Latvia's Jews resided in the capital city of Riga in 1939.

The Soviet occupation proved short-lived, because after Germany attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, German troops quickly seized control of the Baltic States, including Latvia. The Germans proceeded to impose a harsh occupation on the Latvians, and Jews were singled out for deportation and death. The Germans seized the property of Jews and non-Jews alike, drove civilians into forced labor or military service, and imposed Nazi ideology in educational curricula. The Latvian economy virtually collapsed, and its currency was devalued to the point of uselessness. As time went on, the German occupation became ever more repressive.

After the Germans moved in during the summer of 1941, Nazi mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen) murdered thousands of Latvian Jews. Occupation authorities also established ghettos in Riga, Liepaja, and Dvinsk, in which most of the Jews died or were killed. A Jewish resistance movement in Riga gained some traction before the Germans brutally suppressed it. Between the autumn of 1941 and the winter of 1942, the Germans moved several thousand Jews into the Riga ghetto, most of whom came from Austria or Germany. The majority of these deportees were killed in Latvia or deported to death camps. By early 1943 the Jewish population in all of Latvia had plummeted to just 5,000, and all lived in the urban ghettos. Nazi officials also established several forced labor camps for Jews as well as establishing a concentration camp, Kaiserwald.

In the fall of 1944, as the Germans slowly retreated west, the Soviets reoccupied the Baltic States, including Latvia. By then, there were fewer than 500 Latvian Jews remaining in the war-torn country. At war's end in 1945, about 1,000 Latvian Jews who had survived deportation and the concentration camps returned to Latvia; several thousand more who had fled to the Soviet Union prior to the German conquest also survived, although many did not return, opting to remain in the Soviet Union. Latvia remained under Soviet domination until the end of the Cold War in 1991.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Einsatzgruppen; Jewish Resistance; Lange, Rudolf; Lipke, Janis and Johanna; Riga; Rumbula Massacre; Salaspils

Further Reading

Mangulis, Visvaldis. Latvia in the Wars of the Twentieth Century. Princeton Junction (NJ): Cognition Books, 1983.
 Misiunas, Romauld, and Rein Taagepera. The Baltic States: Years of Dependence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
 Press, Bernard. The Murder of the Jews in Latvia. Evanston (IL): Northwestern University Press, 2000.

Laval, Pierre

While Germany occupied France during World War II, Pierre Laval was a leading member of the French government. Laval led France down a road of collaboration with the Nazi victors, yielding vast resources for the German war effort and facilitating the deportation of tens of thousands of Jews to German concentration camps, most of whom perished in the Holocaust.

Pierre Jean-Marie Laval was born on June 28, 1883, in Châteldon, a village in France's Auvergne region. His parents, Baptiste and Claudine, ran a small inn. His father also managed the mail coach that served local mountain communities. Laval's first job, for which he left school at the age of 12, was that of driver for his father. His education continued sporadically after that, but he was a dogged learner. For a time, he made his living as a tutor, eventually working his way through university. His efforts culminated in degrees in Pierre Laval, twice prime minister of France prior to Nazi Germany's occupation, had a long-standing history of favoring Franco-German reconciliation. It was not inconsistent, then, that he played a significant role in the collaboration of the Pétain government established in Vichy, resulting in the deportation of tens of thousands of French Jews to concentration camps and, with few exceptions, to their deaths. (AP Photo) geology and, a number of years later, law. Drafted into the military, his term of service was cut short for medical reasons.

In 1909 Laval married a woman from his village, Eugenie Claussat. By that time he was already practicing law in Paris. He made a name for himself by successfully defending an avowed anarchist who had been charged with severing telegraph wires. This case led to Laval being appointed an attorney for France's trade union federation, the Confederation General du Travail. He also took up a daily column in the federation's newspaper. By 1914 Laval had become sufficiently well known to win a seat as a socialist in the Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of the French parliament.

Laval spent much of World War I as one of the relatively small number of socialists who favored conciliation with Germany. By the end of the conflict, he had softened his opposition to the war, but he nonetheless voted against the Treaty of Versailles. In his view, it imposed too harsh a penalty on Germany and provided no sure mechanism of enforcement. That same year, the political Right made a comeback in elections, and Laval lost his seat in the chamber.

This break from politics gave Laval the opportunity to attend to his personal finances. He invested shrewdly and made a good deal of money in banking and radio, among other endeavors, thus setting the stage for his return to politics. In 1924 he regained his seat in the Chamber of Deputies, this time as an independent but still socialist candidate, in coalition with the parties of the Left. Over the next two years, Laval held various cabinet posts, until his left-wing coalition fell from power in 1926. He abruptly broke with the Left, joining forces with the right-wing National Republican Union. The following year he won a seat in the Senate and was appointed minister of labor and social security by Prime Minister André Tardieu. Laval served in this capacity until January 1931, when he himself became prime minister.

Laval spent his first term in office dealing mainly with foreign affairs, traveling extensively and, by his comments, revealing that he still favored Franco-German reconciliation. For example, he strenuously denounced the Polish Corridor, which separated the predominantly German city of Danzig from the rest of Germany. After only a year in power, however, parliamentary maneuvering dislodged him from the premiership. He did not exercise substantial influence again until 1934, when he was appointed foreign minister in Gaston Doumergue's cabinet. In that position, he made his mark by negotiating with Italian leader Benito Mussolini a swap of certain French colonial territories in Africa in exchange for Italian recognition of French supremacy in Tunisia.

In 1935, when German leader Adolf Hitler announced that (contrary to the Versailles Treaty) Germany had begun to rearm itself, Laval secured a mildly worded joint French, British, and Italian condemnation. Laval envisioned the four powers eventually coming to an understanding, but parliamentary pressure forced him to court a fifth power, the Soviet Union. In May 1935 he negotiated a Franco-Soviet agreement for mutual assistance, but he delayed its implementation indefinitely.

That June, a financial crisis brought him the premiership once again. Having opted to retain the foreign affairs portfolio, in December Laval entered secret negotiations with Britain and Italy over Ethiopia, which Mussolini had invaded. Laval's plan was to allow Italy to annex all but a third of the African empire. When the press learned of these terms, Britain quickly backed out, confirming Laval's antipathy for what Anglophobes in France called "perfidious Albion." A month or so later he fell from power once again, returning to his seat in the Senate.

As Hitler made more and more aggressive demands to expand German influence, Laval made a few statements condemning German actions and advocated solidarity between the "Latin bloc" of nations (France, Italy, and Spain) as the key to preventing hostilities. In September 1939 France and Britain declared war on Germany for the latter's invasion of Poland. After several months of a "phony war" (in which very little fighting actually occurred), Germany attacked France, rapidly breaking through French lines.

The French government fled Paris, establishing itself in Vichy. As France faced defeat, aging World War I hero Philippe Pétain assumed the premiership. On June 22, 1940, France signed an armistice with the invaders, agreeing to German occupation of three-fifths of the country, and the next day Laval took a high position in Pétain's government. Laval then played a leading role in convincing parliament to give dictatorial powers to Pétain.

The new Vichy regime, with Pétain as head of state and Laval as his designated successor, set about trying to revive France with an eclectic mix of reforms, some of which were traditional and some of which were quasi-fascist. Pleased to no longer be in alliance with Britain, Laval encouraged close cooperation with Germany. In October 1940 he and Pétain met with Hitler at the small French town of Montoire, making the policy of collaboration official. A few months later, Pétain dismissed Laval in order to placate other members of his government, but a little more than a year later, in April 1942, Pétain reinstated him. (In the interim, Laval had survived a bullet wound in the chest, one of a number of assassination attempts against him during the war.)

Laval's actions as a Vichy leader have brought him much condemnation. After the war, his supporters argued that he had played "a double game," yielding token concessions to the Germans while secretly advancing the cause of the Allies. The historical record does not support such a view. Laval was convinced that France was best served by finding a place at Germany's side in a new European order. To that end, he took every opportunity to demonstrate French goodwill to the Germans. He and Pétain had a specific, some might say peculiar, notion of French honor. Precisely because France had been defeated, they believed it was of paramount importance to prove that France retained its sovereignty. This view led them to do much of the Germans' dirty work for them. If Jews had to be rounded up, better that it be the French police who seized them rather than German troops. (The Vichy government's efforts in this area targeted Jewish immigrants and refugees more than native-born Jews.) If French hostages had to be executed, better that the French government designate who was to die rather than the occupying forces.

Laval encouraged French collaboration on an economic level as well. He negotiated the transfer of French skilled laborers to work in German war factories, eventually compelling compliance by drafting French workers. (This measure drove many such men into the countryside to join the French Resistance.) In addition, he organized the export of French material resources to Germany, so that by 1943 more than 40% of French agricultural and industrial output was devoted to the Nazi war effort.

Laval's policies, morally disastrous for France, proved to be personally disastrous for him. Spirited away to Germany on Hitler's orders after France's liberation in 1944, he was eventually captured in Spain and sent back to France. There, he was condemned to death for the role he played during the war. Hours after an unsuccessful suicide attempt, he was shot by a firing squad on October 15, 1945.

DANIEL SIEGEL

See also: Collaboration; France; Operation Spring Wind; Pétain, Philippe; Vichy France

Further Reading

Burrin, Philippe. France under the Germans: Collaboration and Compromise. New York: New Press, 1996.

Paxton, Robert O. Vichy France: Old Guard and New Order, 1940–1944. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Warner, Geoffrey. Pierre Laval and the Eclipse of France, 1931–1945. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor

The so-called "Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor," also known as the "Blood Protection Law," released at the Nuremberg Party Rally of September 15, 1935, was the first of the two so-called Nuremberg Laws released on that date. It aimed to isolate the Jews racially and socially by prohibiting them, under pain of severe punishment, from marrying or having extramarital sexual relations with non-Jews. In addition, Jews were prohibited from employing Aryan housemaids younger than 45. The preamble to this law stated that the Nazi state was entirely convinced that the purity of German blood was essential to the further existence of the German people, and, further, that the law was "inspired by the uncompromising determination to safeguard the future of the German nation."

The first provision of the Blood Protection Law forbade marriages between Jews and citizens of German or kindred blood, and it voided marriages concluded in defiance of this law, even where the marriage was concluded abroad. The second provision of the law banned sexual relations outside marriage between Jews and nationals of German or kindred blood.

The third provision prevented Jews from being able to employ German female citizens under 45 years as domestic servants. The presupposition behind this was that women under this age were still able to bear children and therefore were at risk of seduction by Jewish males in the household. The fourth provision was that Jews were prohibited from flying the national flag. Breaching the marriage provision was punishable by hard labor; having extramarital sexual relationships in breach of the second stipulation was punishable with imprisonment or hard labor; and employing a domestic servant or flying a flag in breach of the third and fourth provision was punishable with imprisonment up to a year and a fine, or both.

The announcement of the Nuremberg Laws had the unexpected result of creating much uncertainty and argument as to how to define who was a Jew, given that there had been extensive intermarriage up to that time. Consequently, it was necessary for a supplementary Nazi declaration to define a Jew for the operation of the law. This was undertaken by the First Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law, issued on November 14, 1935. This decreed that a "full Jew" was a person who practiced Judaism or a person with at least three Jewish grandparents, regardless of religious practice. Those with fewer than three Jewish grandparents were designated Mischlinge (mixed breeds or half-breeds), of which there were two degrees: a First Degree Mischling, who was a person with two Jewish grandparents, did not practice Judaism, and did not have a Jewish spouse; and a Second Degree Mischling, who was a person with one Jewish grandparent and did not practice Judaism. Unlike earlier forms of antisemitism, the new regulation defined Jewishness by “race” rather than by religion.

A number of rather complicated instructional diagrams were issued to help Nazi bureaucrats decide the diverse degrees of Jewishness. As a rule, the more “full-blooded” a Jew was, the bigger the level of bigotry. But much uncertainty remained. In many cases, the required hereditary evidence about Jewish genealogy was simply not available.

The efforts to prove one’s non-Jewish ancestry generated a new activity, with many groups of “licensed family researchers” offering their assistance to fearful Germans afraid of finding Jewish ancestors of whom they were, at that time, unaware. These initiatives also occupied the time of the Health Ministry and church officials, which had to provide certificates of birth and baptism.

These searches resulted in about 350,000 Germans who could be classified as Mischlinge. Of these, some 50,000 had families that had converted to Christianity from Judaism, a further 210,000 were classified as half-Jews, and approximately 80,000 were considered as quarter-Jews. Many of these had been brought up with no knowledge whatever of their links to any Jewish ancestry and had functioned as full members of Christian congregations.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Aryan Paragraph; Frick, Wilhelm; Globke Trial; Mischling; Nuremberg Laws; “Racial Hygiene”; Stuckart, Wilhelm

Further Reading

Evans, Richard J. The Coming of the Third Reich. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews, 1933–1945. New York: HarperCollins, 2009.

Schleunes, Karl A. The Twisted Road to Auschwitz: Nazi Policy towards German Jews, 1933–1939. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1970.

Lawrence, Geoffrey

British soldier, attorney, and jurist who presided over the 1945–1946 Nuremberg war crimes trial of 24 top leaders of Nazi Germany, including Hermann Göring, Rudolf Hess, Joachim von Ribbentrop, and Albert Speer. Lord Geoffrey Lawrence was born on December 2, 1880; his father was the first Baron Trevithin and had served as lord chief justice. After attending New College at Oxford University, Lawrence was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1906. He soon developed expertise in tax, property, appeals, and international arbitration law. During World War I, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Hertford Royal Field Artillery, serving in France, Palestine, and Gallipoli. During the war, he was wounded, twice recognized for his command of a brigade, and won the Distinguished Service Order. Between the wars, he served as commander of the 86th Royal Artillery Brigade in the Territorial Army, retiring as a colonel in 1926.

Returning to legal practice in 1924, Lawrence was made a King’s Counsel and in 1928 was named attorney general to the Prince of Wales. He was appointed a judge of the King’s Bench Division of High Court in 1932 and was subsequently knighted. As a judge, he became known for his diligence, objectivity, and precedent-setting decisions. During World War II, Lawrence served as a private in the Parliamentary Home Guard and was twice wounded during the 1940 blitz while stationed at the House of Commons in London. In 1944 he was made a Lord Justice of Appeals and thus placed on the Privy Council.

Lawrence’s placement on the tribunal at Nuremberg and his later designation as presiding judge resulted more from chance than design. Sir Norman Birkett, a leading British barrister of the time, was originally asked by the Lord Chancellor to fill Britain’s seat on the four-judge panel (representing Britain, France, the United States, and the Soviet Union); Birkett, however, was assigned an alternate post when the British Foreign Office urged that a Law Lord be chosen. The Lord Chancellor then turned to Lawrence. The American judge, former attorney general Francis Biddle, appeared to have an early lock on the presiding judge position but was asked by chief American prosecutor Robert H. Jackson to step aside so as to give the court a less American and more international component. Accordingly, Lawrence was unanimously elected president of the tribunal on October 14, 1945, at the judges’ preliminary meeting in Berlin.

On arrival in war-ravaged Nuremberg, the prim and balding Law Lord looked every inch the upright British judge. Indeed, Lawrence’s Victorian demeanor, precise speech, and commanding presence immediately gave the tribunal an air of dignity and legitimacy when it convened on November 20, 1945. More importantly, with constant attention to detail and calm strength, he kept complete control of the courtroom during heated moments and while dealing with such powerful personalities as Göring and Jackson; a disapproving glance over his spectacles or the tap of his pencil on the bench was usually sufficient rebuke. Only once during the proceedings did Lawrence seem to show emotion. After viewing horrifying films of the victims of the concentration camps, he hurried from the courtroom without adjourning the session.

Lawrence was devoted to maintaining fairness in the proceedings. Some defendants themselves conceded that they were fairly tried and noted the contrast with Nazi courts. Prosecutors, press, defense lawyers, and many of the accused greatly admired the courteous and unflappable presiding judge. To the disapproval of some observers, however, he permitted defendants to use counsel with Nazi backgrounds. Although Lawrence eventually limited oratorical digressions, Jackson was particularly unhappy with the leeway allowed Göring in responding during cross examination and the fact that each defendant was granted a day of closing arguments.

During deliberations, the chief judge was deft at forging compromises and maintaining unity. Lawrence firmly supported the conspiracy charges, even though they were not recognized in continental jurisprudence, and voted for the death sentences rendered. He also barred cameras from the sentencing to keep the occasion from becoming undignified.

After the trial, Lawrence returned to the law courts and his beloved Hill Farm in Wiltshire. He was created first Baron Oaksey and a Lord of Appeal, serving from 1947 to 1957. He inherited the title of third Baron Trevithin from his brother in 1959 and died on August 28, 1971.

RUSSELL FOWLER

See also: Nuremberg Trials

Further Reading

Marrus, Michael R. (Ed.). The Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, 1945–46: A Documentary History. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's, 1997.
 Persico, Joseph E. Nuremberg: Infamy on Trial. New York: Viking Penguin, 1994.

Le Chambon-sur-Lignon

Le Chambon-sur-Lignon is a small village located in rural south-central France, in the Haute-Loire Department. After France fell to Nazi Germany in June 1940, the armistice dictated German control of the northern and western industrial zones of the country. The French government, located now in the town of Vichy, embarked on collaboration with Germany. Until November 1942, when Germany occupied the rest of the country, Vichy administered the largely rural southern unoccupied zone, where Le Chambon is located.

During the Holocaust, thousands of Jewish refugees were rescued in Le Chambon and surrounding villages and farms, collectively known as the Plateau Vivarais-Lignon. Local residents, their spiritual and community leaders, as well as representatives from French, religious, and international organizations worked together to create a safe haven for individuals pursued by the German and Vichy French governments. Many Jews who reached the safe haven participated in rescue and resistance efforts.

The Plateau had a long history of serving as a refuge to the oppressed. In the 17th and 18th centuries, Huguenots (French Protestants) took shelter in the region during persecution by the Catholic majority, and priests were harbored there during the French Revolution. The tradition continued into the 20th century, when political refugees from Spain, Germany, and elsewhere found a haven there. Much like their ancestors, the people of the Plateau understood that the intensifying persecution of the Jews was fundamentally wrong. Inspired by their leaders and supported by a growing network of resistance and rescue networks, they opened their homes to Jews and other refugees.

One of the leaders of the rescue efforts was Pastor André Trocmé. A staunch pacifist, he along with his wife Magda, Pastor Edouard Theis, teacher Roger Darcissac, the local doctor Roger LeForestier, and numerous other pastors and leaders throughout the region encouraged residents to defy the dictates of the German and Vichy regimes. Pastor Trocmé is credited with leading much of the rescue effort in Le Chambon. His presbytery, like those of many other pastors on the Plateau, served as a way station for Jewish refugees who reached the region and who sought a safe place to stay. He and Magda helped connect them to families who were willing to take them in.

Jewish refugees of all ages were hidden in small homes, boarding schools, hotels, and guesthouses throughout the region. Jewish refugees managed to reach the Plateau through various channels, including personal contacts and word-of-mouth. Some were hired as educators for the École Nouvelle Cévenole, a school created by Pastors Theis and Trocmé in 1938, even after Vichy regulations stripped Jews of their right to teach. Others had known about the region from holidays spent there or came to know it through their forays into rural areas in search of food and supplies. Some Jews, including many children, came to the Plateau with the assistance of organizations such as the American Friends Service Committee (Quakers), the YMCA, and the Jewish Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants (OSE, or Children's Relief Organization). These organizations helped release Jews from French internment camps and supported the creation of boarding schools and group homes on the Plateau.

The influx of Jews and other refugees to the area did not go unnoticed by the Vichy regime or German occupation authorities. In summer 1942, during the intensification of the deportation of Jews from France, French police descended on Le Chambon to round up Jews rumored to be in hiding there. In response to increased police and other official presence, many Jews were spirited out of the towns and dispersed to surrounding farms. Some were provided false papers, which enabled them to make the harrowing trek over the Swiss border.

Several villagers were arrested and some even executed for their participation in rescue efforts. However, this did not deter the people of the Plateau or those who helped them. By the time France was liberated in September 1944, the villagers of Le Chambon and the surrounding villages had provided shelter to several thousand people, including thousands of Jews.

CHRISTINE E. SCHMIDT

See also: Rescuers of Jews; Resistance Movements; Righteous among the Nations; Trocmé, André and Magda; Upstander; Vichy France

Further Reading

Hallie, Philip. Lest Innocent Blood Be Shed: The Story of the Village of Le Chambon, and How Goodness Happened There. New York: HarperPerennial, 1994.

Henry, Patrick. We Only Know Men: The Rescue of Jews in France during the Holocaust. Washington, DC: Catholic University Press, 2007.

Rittner, Carol. The Courage to Care: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: New York University Press, 1986.

League of German Girls

The League of German Girls (Bund Deutscher Mädel) was the female division of the German youth movement during the Nazi regime from 1933 to 1945. This complemented the male Hitler Youth (Hitlerjugend), and, although an important socializing agency among young females, it nonetheless

Much like the Hitler Youth movement that educated and trained young German males for their future role in the Reich, so the League of German Girls did the same for German females. The role envisioned for its members was to bear and raise the next generation of Aryan children. (AP Photo) did not rank on an equal footing in the Nazi state with its male counterpart.

The organization was formed in 1930 (prior to the Nazi accession to power) and was structured on parallel lines to the Hitlerjugend. Girls aged 10 to 14 years were enrolled in the Jungmädel and graduated at 15 to the higher levels of the Bund Deutscher Mädel. At age 17, the girls became eligible for entry to the Glaube und Schönheit (Faith and Beauty) organization, where they were taught domestic science and received advanced training in preparation for marriage.

The organization taught constantly that women in the Third Reich had but a singular function—to bear and raise children. In advance of marriage, they were required to serve a year of national labor service to the state. In line with the militaristic regimentation undertaken by the male organization, girls were continually instructed in the areas of service to the state, physical fitness, comradeship, and the raising of families. As with the Hitlerjugend, the leader of the league was the high-ranking Nazi Baldur von Schirach.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Hitler Youth; Lebensborn; Oberheuser, Herta; Scholl, Hans and Sophie

Further Reading

- Fischer, Klaus. Nazi Germany: A New History. New York: Continuum, 1995.
- Koch, H. W. The Hitler Youth: Origins and Development 1922–45. London: Macdonald and Jane's, 1975.
- Reese, Dagmar. Growing up Female in Nazi Germany. Ann Arbor (MI): University of Michigan Press, 2006.

Lebensborn

The Nazi program of selective breeding of its population to produce a superior or “master” race, named Lebensborn, or the “fountain of life,” was established in 1935 with the aim of increasing the birth rate of “Aryan” children. This was to be achieved through the close breeding of German women who met stringent physical standards with SS men who met the same standards of height, weight, blond hair, blue eyes, and athleticism. The focus of the program was one of pure racial reproduction, in which Nazi concepts of racial hygiene would be to the fore.

An initiative of the SS, the Lebensborn program was state-supported and an integral element of the Nazi racial system. Without benefit of marriage, Lebensborn encouraged anonymous births by unmarried women, who would become impregnated on SS-run “stud farms.” In reality, these were often luxury hotels and spas, where young women and men would meet prior to retiring discreetly to bedrooms, after which they would separate never to meet again. Upon conception, the women were sent to special maternity homes where they were cared for until the birth of their children, following which the children would be adopted by parents who would be equally “racially pure” and thoroughly imbued with Nazi ideals—particularly SS members and their families.

The Lebensborn program, in the long term, did not prove successful. By 1942 the term had become a code word for the kidnapping of Polish and other children who met the idealized Nazi racial characteristics; once identified, they were then placed in German families. After the war, many of the actual records of such births and kidnappings were lost; thus, no actual numbers in either category can be accurately assessed.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aryan; League of German Girls; “Racial Hygiene”; Scholtz-Klink, Gertrud

Further Reading

- Clay, Catrine, and Michael Leapman. Master Race: The Lebensborn Experiment in Nazi Germany. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1995.
- Oelhafen, Ingrid von, and Tim Tate. Hitler's Forgotten Children: A True Story of the Lebensborn Program and One Woman's Search for Her Real Identity. New York: Berkley, 2016.
- Weiss-Wendt, Anton, and Rory Yeomans (Eds.). Racial Science in Hitler's New Europe, 1938–1945. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2013.

Lebensraum

Lebensraum, meaning “living space,” was a pan-Germanic slogan during Germany’s unification process in the mid-19th century. During the late 1930s, this ideology helped justify German chancellor Adolf Hitler’s aggressive policies toward neighboring Czechoslovakia, Poland, and ultimately the Soviet Union, and was a prime cause of the start of World War II.

Developed by the German geographer Frederick Ratzel in the 1800s, Lebensraum applied Charles Darwin’s theories to geographical spaces. Critics charged this concept as “anti-modern, anti-industrialist, and ideologized agrarianism.” According to historian Gerhard Weinberg, it was “a vulgarized version of Social Darwinism.” Lebensraum was closely related to the American ideal of Manifest Destiny, which, for many Americans, justified westward expansion in the 1800s.

Lebensraum resembled other German ideologies such as Grossraumwirtschaft—economies of large spaces—and Weltpolitik—politics of large areas.

Early in the 20th century, German scholars such as Karl Haushofer and Friedrich von Bernhardi expanded upon Ratzel's work. A key beginning of the implementation of the idea was the German experience in South-West Africa where, mixed with colonialism and racism, the Germans practised genocide on the Herero and Nama peoples. Their experience there, as well as the justifications before the Reichstag, would foreshadow future Nazi lebensraum policies. Friedrich von Bernhardi in Germany and the Next War, published in 1912, identified potential areas for German imperial expansion in competition with Britain, France, and Russia as World War I loomed on the horizon.

Germany's defeat and territorial loss as a result of World War I, a worldwide depression, and hyperinflation at home retarded German economic development. However, the rise of Hitler to power, and a wave of new German nationalism, gave Nazi ideologues the ammunition to revive Lebensraum as a powerful political tool and violate the Treaty of Versailles. Germany desperately needed war materials for its army, food to sustain a population boom, and steel to build a powerful new navy—three tools that Hitler needed to create and maintain his empire.

In 1938 Hitler used the ideology of Lebensraum to justify an aggressive turn against Czechoslovakia and demand the return of the Sudetenland—home to 3 million ethnic Germans. Moreover, Hitler's Lebensraum called for an invasion of Poland and the Soviet Union, which would reestablish the Holy Roman Empire under the mantle of the Third Reich, thus giving Germany complete control in Eastern and South-eastern Europe.

Germany was divided after its defeat in 1945. The United States, Britain, and France controlled West Germany. The former Soviet Union controlled East Germany. Lebensraum as an official instrument of foreign policy died out during the occupation. The increasing Cold War tensions between two nuclear-armed superpowers in the United States and the Soviet Union prevented neither of the two Germanys from creating an independent foreign policy. However, during the late 1980s the Soviet Union collapsed, allowing East and West Germany to take a more active role in European politics. Under the guise of revisionspolitik (foreign policy revision) and sicherheitspolitik (national security), Lebensraum played an important role in the push for the reunification of the two Germanys.

JEFFREY OTHELE MAHAN

See also: Anschluss; Armenians, Hitler Statement; Austria; Blood and Soil; Czechoslovakia; National Socialist German Workers' Party; Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941; Operation Barbarossa; Poland; Soviet Union; Volksgemeinschaft; Waffen-SS; World War II

Further Reading

Hehn, Paul N. A Low Dishonest Decade: The Great Powers, Eastern Europe, and the Economic Origins of World War II, 1930–1941. New York: Continuum, 2002.

Kershaw, Ian. Hitler 1936–45: Nemesis. New York: Norton, 2000.

Taylor, A. J. P. The Origins of the Second World War. New York: Antheum, 1968.

Verheyen, Dirk. The German Question: A Cultural, Historical, and Geopolitical Exploration. Boulder (CO): Westview Press, 1999.

Leitz, Ernst, II

Ernst Leitz II was the owner of the German Leica Camera Company. Through the company he and his daughter, Elsie Kuhn-Leitz, mounted a remarkable rescue effort known as the Leica Freedom Train, in which hundreds of Jews were smuggled out of Nazi Germany before the Holocaust.

Born in 1871, he was the second son of Ernst Leitz I, who founded an optics company in the Hessian town of Wetzlar in 1869 and turned it into a company of world renown. The family was Protestant, with a social conscience ahead of its time. Ernst I, for example, instituted an eight-hour work day long before it became mandatory in Germany, accompanied by pensions, sick leave, and health insurance. When Ernst I died in 1920 his son, Ernst II, became head of the E. Leitz optical company and remained in charge until his own death in 1956.

The Leitz family supported democratic causes in the interwar years and had no time for Nazism. Certainly, as it became clear that Nazi antisemitism was an integral part of the party's raison d'être, Leitz distanced himself as far as possible after the Nazis took power in January 1933. His political sense told him, however, that he should join the party, and as a result he became a member soon after Hitler came into office.

Within days, Leitz began retraining a group of young Jewish apprentices from Wetzlar in preparation for transferring them to New York. Here they would work in the Leica showroom on Fifth Avenue, or with distributors across the United States. In this way, he felt, he could rescue them from what he anticipated would be a horrible fate at the hands of the Nazis. In other instances, he learned that certain of his employees were related to Jews by marriage; to these he also held out the hand of affiliation with the company and worked to ensure that they, too, would be taken care of.

One of the Leica refugees was a camera mechanic, Kurt Rosenberg. Leitz not only paid for his journey to New York in 1938 but also helped him obtain a U.S. landing visa, aided by the fact that there was a job waiting for him at the Leica showroom on Fifth Avenue. This was but a start.

Leitz established what became known over time as the Leica Freedom Train, a secret means of allowing his Jewish workers and colleagues to leave Germany in the guise of Leitz employees being assigned overseas. The train was most active during 1938 and early 1939, with groups of Jewish refugees disguised as Leica workers sailing to New York every few weeks. In addition, Leitz moved others to places elsewhere in Europe—for example, to France or Britain. He was even known to arrange for his Leica “employees” to be sent to Hong Kong as salespeople or camera technicians. Everyone in Leitz’s care would be supplied with a Leica camera, as it could be exchanged for cash if needed. They were also paid a small allowance until they could find regular work.

Not everyone in this scheme was an employee, nor was everyone involved in the camera industry. Still, many were—whether as designers, repair technicians, salespeople, marketers, or writers for the photographic press. Leitz worked to ensure that everyone would be looked after, but this care extended beyond employees to retailers, family members, and even friends of family members. As a way to get them out of Germany Leitz “employed” them and then watched carefully as they were dispersed to various sales offices around the world.

With the invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Germany closed its borders and the transports were stopped. By then, hundreds of German and Austrian Jews had escaped to havens outside. The number is not known accurately, but if both the workers and their families are counted it would certainly have run to 300 in the United States alone, with hundreds more elsewhere.

In order to engage in his life-saving work Leitz ran considerable risks—not only for himself but also for his family. He was openly defying the Nazis by trying to save Jewish lives, and taking matters into his own hands rather than waiting to be told what to do. From time to time, this defiance backfired. A senior executive, Alfred Turk, was jailed when caught trying to help Jews, and freed only after Leitz had paid a large bribe. On another occasion, Leitz’s daughter, Elsie Kuhn-Leitz, was imprisoned by the Gestapo after she was caught at the Swiss border helping Jewish women cross to safety. Interrogated, she was eventually freed—but not until after the Gestapo had given her the obligatory beating in custody.

A question occurs as to how such a public figure as Ernst Leitz II and the Leica Camera Company was able to pull off such a remarkable and sustained rescue operation. The answer is straightforward: the Nazis were dependent on the military optics produced at Leitz’s factory. The importance of having the Leitz Company maintain production often outweighed the potential value of arresting and removing him from the workplace. Moreover, the Leitz name carried cachet overseas and was an important face in the international marketplace. Executives were convinced that this was enough in itself for the Nazis to leave the company alone, as it brought in hard currency from overseas at a time when it was desperately needed. They knew, too, that Leitz’s single biggest market for optical goods was the United States.

Both before and after the war, the Leitz family did not seek any publicity to recognize or celebrate their heroic efforts under the Nazis. Ernst Leitz himself never spoke about what he had done, considering that he was only doing what any decent person would have done in his position. Those he had saved, however, knew and did not forget. On February 9, 2007, the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) recognized Leitz posthumously with its Courage to Care Award, presented in honor of those who rescued Jews during the Holocaust. The award was accepted by his granddaughter, Cornelia Kuhn-Leitz, at the league’s National Executive Committee Meeting in Palm Beach, Florida. As of this writing, an investigation is taking place at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem over whether Ernst Leitz II should be accorded the status of Righteous among the Nations.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Rescuers of Jews

Further Reading

Smith, Frank Dabba. The Greatest Invention of the Leitz Family: The Leica Freedom Train. New York: American Photographic Historical Society, 2002.

Lemkin, Raphael

Raphael Lemkin was a Polish Jewish refugee, lawyer, and legal scholar, and the man who coined the word “genocide.” He was born on June 24, 1900, in the rural village of Bezvodene in eastern Poland (then part of the Russian Empire), in an area of restricted Jewish residence commonly known as Best known for his unceasing (and ultimately successful) efforts to create a word to capture mass killings of the most awful kind, to define it, and then to shepherd its way into international vernacular, Raphael Lemkin is considered the father of the term and concept of genocide. His early writings on the crime of genocide still serve as the bedrock for research and interpretation of the term that today is recognized throughout the world. (Bettmann/Getty Images)

the “Pale of Settlement.” He was one of three children, all boys: his brothers were named Elias and Samuel. Elias survived the Holocaust, while Samuel and his parents did not. His father, Joseph, and his uncle co-owned a farm called Ozerisko, 14 miles from the city of Wolkowysk, despite the general thrust of Russian antisemitic laws. His mother, Bella, whose own love of languages, painting, literature, history, and philosophy inspired her son, prompted him to master several languages during his early years, including French, Hebrew, Russian, Spanish, and Yiddish. According to Lemkin’s own accounts, those early years were happy ones.

Sometime during his teenage years, Lemkin came across a copy of the book Quo Vadis by the Polish 1905 Nobel laureate for Literature, Henryk Sienkiewicz. This novel described the nearly successful attempt by the Roman emperor Nero to exterminate all the Christians in his realm. The effect upon Lemkin of this graphic account of those horrors, even though fictionalized, was electric. He was simply unable to conceive how it was that people could engage in such massively destructive behavior toward other human beings, and it was this initial confrontation with horror that led Lemkin, already a voracious reader, to search for other equally devastating accounts of what he would later term “genocide” and impel him toward his chosen profession of law. Ultimately, from this base, he would work for the passage of an international legal agreement against genocide itself.

Next to nothing is known of Lemkin’s life during the years of World War I, other than his own admission of following closely the increasing revelations of the Ottoman Turkish genocide of the Armenians (1915–1923) and the release of more than 150 British-interned Turks from the island of Malta (where they had been held on charges of “war criminality”). In 1926 he obtained his doctorate in law from Lvov University (having also studied in Germany at the University of Heidelberg), just as another incident claimed his attention.

On May 25 of that year, in Paris, Sholom Schwartzbard assassinated Symon Petlyura, a Ukrainian socialist politician, statesman, and leader of the Ukrainian fight for independence from the Soviet Union. Brought to trial for his crime, Schwartzbard’s defense was that of avenging the deaths of 15 members of his family, including his parents, murdered in a series of pogroms in Ukraine, for which he felt Petlyura had not done enough either to prevent them from happening or to punish those responsible during his brief term as president of the Ukraine Republic. The French jury found him not guilty. Lemkin’s response was to publish an article applauding both the act and the acquittal, but noting that no such law and process existed for addressing such tragedies on a larger scale of national, racial, or religious groups.

By 1929 Lemkin was appointed deputy public prosecutor in Warsaw and secretary of the penal section of the Polish Committee on Codification of Laws. In addition, he represented Poland at the annual meeting of the International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law and served as secretary-general of the Polish Group for the Association of Penal Law.

In 1933 an international conference on penal and criminal law met in Madrid, Spain. Lemkin felt that the time was ripe for him to present his idea of an international law addressing two crimes: “barbarity” and “vandalism.” The former he defined as destroying a national or religious collectivity, the latter as destroying works of culture representative of the genius of such groups. Although he had sent his paper ahead, Lemkin was ultimately prevented from attending by the Polish minister of justice, who evidently agreed with the antisemitic Gazeta Warszawska, which, in a series of articles, saw Lemkin's work as being a Jewish issue only. Between 1933 and 1939 (and the start of World War II), Lemkin continued to sharpen his thinking about the legal implications and ramifications of such violence against groups.

On September 1, 1939, Germany invaded Poland; two days later, World War II began. Lemkin joined the Polish Army and was deployed to help defend Warsaw in the last days of the German siege. He was wounded by a bullet to the hip and narrowly evaded capture by the Nazis. As Warsaw experienced destruction at firsthand, Lemkin's initial thoughts were to flee to safety to either Lithuania or Sweden and then move on to the United States, places where he had already established good contacts. Despite travel difficulties brought on by the war, he managed to return home from Warsaw to see his family in eastern Poland. They urged him to flee; with the exception of his brother, he never saw them again. In total, Lemkin lost 49 family members during the Nazi Holocaust that was to follow.

Arriving safely in Lithuania, he was already making plans to proceed to Sweden. During his sojourn there, he went also to the city of Riga, Latvia, where he met with the renowned Jewish historian Simon Dubnow, the author of the definitive 10-volume World History of the Jewish People (1929). Dubnow further encouraged Lemkin to continue his legal work in safety.

The day after this meeting, Lemkin flew to Stockholm. From there, he flew to Moscow, traveled the Trans-Siberian Railway to Vladivostok, took a small boat to the Japanese port of Tsuruga, and then boarded a larger vessel, the Heian Maru, bound for the United States. The ship docked first in Vancouver, British Columbia, before reaching its final destination of Seattle, Washington, in early 1941. Lemkin then went to Chicago, on his way to Duke University in North Carolina, where friends had secured an academic appointment for him at the Duke Law School.

One year later, in June 1942, Lemkin received a letter from the Board of Economic Warfare in Washington, D.C., inviting him to serve as its chief consultant. He accepted the offer immediately. The chairperson of that board was Henry A. Wallace, at the time vice president of the United States. Through this and other contacts, Lemkin was able to submit to President Franklin D. Roosevelt a one-page brief vis-à-vis his proposal for an international treaty banning "vandalism and barbarity." Roosevelt responded affirmatively, but, due to the exigencies of the war itself, such work would have to come later.

At the same time, Lemkin was also working hard on his massive 674-page book Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress, published in 1944 by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, D.C. During this same period, rumors were rife through the nation's capital regarding Nazi atrocities against Jews that accompanied Germany's military successes. In chapter 9 of Axis Rule, Lemkin devoted the entire chapter to a discussion of "genocide"—a "new term and new conception for destruction of nations."

Immediately after the war, Lemkin served as adviser to Supreme Court justice Robert H. Jackson, in Jackson's capacity as chief U.S. prosecutor at the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg during 1945–1946. Lemkin managed to have the word "genocide" inserted into the overall indictment against the leading Nazis in the dock. It would, however, ultimately be removed by the jurists themselves; they concurred that they were bound by the statute of the International Military Tribunal, which did not contain a charge of genocide.

Before the conclusion of the trials on October 1, 1946, Lemkin was already hard at work writing and publishing a number of articles in a wide variety of journals in the United States, Belgium, and Norway (among others), advocating an international law banning genocide. Upon his return to the United States, and with the Nuremberg Trials over, Lemkin refocused his energies toward achieving recognition from the newly established United Nations.

In July 1948, while teaching at Yale Law School, Lemkin received a cable informing him that the Economic and Social Council of the UN would take up the idea of a convention against genocide at its meeting in Geneva, where the issue had been directed prior to being forwarded to the Security Council. He flew to Switzerland, where he again proceeded to involve himself actively not only in the writing and rewriting of the document but also in seeking the necessary reaffirmations of the delegates there assembled to secure its passage. Returning from a much-needed break in August 1948, he learned that the convention proposal had passed and was to be forwarded to the Security Council after review by its Legal Committee, then scheduled to meet in Paris. It was there that a serious stumbling block developed.

The British representative, Attorney-General Sir Hartley Shawcross, opposed the convention, citing protocols already established and reaffirmed at Nuremberg. Others cited the inclusion of "political groups" together with those to be protected from genocide, while yet others desired to protect only national, racial, religious, and ethnic groups. Originally included, political groups were omitted after a second vote for reconsideration was taken; this omission remains, even today, one of the most serious critiques of the convention.

Finally, all of the difficulties were overcome, and on December 9, 1948, the General Assembly of the UN, now with the support of both its Legal Committee and the Security Council, began its deliberations. The convention passed unanimously, and two days later, on December 11, 1948, 22 member states signed the declaration to proceed to ratification by their own home governments. Lemkin was jubilant. The following day found him in the hospital in Paris, suffering from complete and total exhaustion, or, in his own words, “genociditis, exhaustion from working on the Genocide Convention.” He would never regain his full vigor, and after his return to the United States spent more time in the hospital.

Several weeks later, Lemkin resumed his teaching duties at Yale University. He was determined to work on U.S. ratification, which he was to do, frustratingly, and in concert with others, until his death in 1959. With every other signatory state successfully ratifying the Genocide Convention, Lemkin redoubled his efforts, seemingly to no avail. The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide went into effect by the UN on January 21, 1951; it was only ratified by the United States on October 14, 1988, and signed into law by President Ronald Reagan on November 4, 1988.

Twice nominated for—though not awarded—the Nobel Peace Prize (in 1950 and 1952), Lemkin’s vision was truly pioneering. He brought to the world’s stage the concept of genocide, having himself no official status whatsoever. On August 28, 1959, he died of a heart attack in New York City. In an ironic final twist of cruel fate for a man whose life was dedicated to the remembrance of millions of victims of genocide, only seven people—not even enough for a minyán, or quorum of 10 Jewish men required for ritual services such as burial—attended his funeral.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: A Crime without a Name; Genocide; Jackson, Robert H.; Kuper, Leo; UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

Further References

- Lemkin, Raphael. Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress. New Haven (CT): Lawbook Exchange, 2008.
- Neier, Aryeh. War Crimes: Brutality, Genocide, Terror, and the Struggle for Justice. New York: Times Books, 1998.

A chemist by training, he was born in Turin, Italy, in 1919 to nonobservant Jewish parents. As a child he developed a voracious appetite for reading and was encouraged in his educational interests by his parents. In October 1937 he enrolled at the University of Turin to study chemistry, and, despite the difficulties placed upon Jewish students by Mussolini’s racial legislation from 1938 onward, he managed to graduate in the summer of 1941. In October 1943 he joined the liberal Giustizia e Libertà partisan movement, but was captured by the fascist militia and told he would be shot as a partisan. To save his life, he confessed to being Jewish in order for his “crime” to be reassessed and was sent to an internment camp for Jews at Fossoli, near Modena, in central Italy.

When Fossoli fell into the hands of the Germans, however, they began deporting the camp’s Jews to Auschwitz. On February 21, 1944, he arrived at that camp and had the number 174517 tattooed on his left forearm. He then spent nearly a year at Auschwitz, until liberated by the Russians in January 1945. His survival was in large part due to a last-moment reprieve caused through a bout of scarlet fever, which prevented him from becoming part of the infamous and deadly Auschwitz death marches. He returned to Turin ten months after the liberation, his long journey home having taken a circuitous route from Poland, through Belorussia, Ukraine, Romania, Hungary, Austria, and Germany. This trip he later chronicled in his book La Tregua (The Truce, or, in its American version, The Reawakening).

In 1947 he published his first important work, If This Is a Man (U.S. title, Survival in Auschwitz: The Nazi Assault on Humanity). This was Levi’s account of his time in Auschwitz, and it became his best known work. In 1958 the book was translated into English and was published in Britain in 1959. Also in 1959 it was translated into German, followed by several other languages. Eventually, it was accepted as a classic of Holocaust literature, as it remains today.

Levi set out systematically to remember his experiences, thinking through what had happened and how he was able to survive it, and rendering that experience comprehensible in a prose style that would be understandable to all. He was impelled to write the book in order to bear witness to the horrors of the Nazis; without sentimentality, he recounted his experience with powerful words that described the fear, the endless hunger, and the pain of life in the concentration camp. At the same time, he was also able to show examples of affection, generosity, and even, from time to time, humor. The book was a masterpiece about the survival of the human spirit in a place designed to destroy it. Its strength lay in how Levi was able to show the ways in which prisoners dealt with ongoing moral dilemmas and challenges to their physical endurance, and provided insight into how they viewed their hopes for the future.

Levi, Primo

Primo Levi was an Italian Jewish Holocaust survivor and author, best known for his insightful memoirs, short stories, poems, essays, and novels.

In 1948 Levi began working as an industrial chemist, as he would remain for the next thirty years. At the same time, he continued to write, and most of his works were translated into English and other languages. The best known of these were The Truce (1963), The Periodic Table (1975), The Monkey's Wrench (1978), If Not Now When? (1981), and The Drowned and the Saved (1986). Having experienced the pain of writing his Auschwitz and post-Auschwitz memoirs (which have often since been republished together in a single-volume format), Levi preferred to be known also as a writer about other subjects. He became a regular contributor of newspaper commentaries and articles, wrote science fiction and poetry, and even wrote a novel.

Levi retired from his position as an industrial chemist in 1977 to devote himself full-time to writing, but on April 11, 1987, he fell to his death from his third-story apartment in Turin to the ground floor below. It was, to add to the tragedy, the same multistory apartment where he had been born in 1919. The question of whether his death was in fact suicide (he had been under a doctor's care for depression, having already suffered from this both after the war and in the early 1960s) or not (a loss of balance as the result of the medications) remains unresolved.

In his quest to understand what the Holocaust experience meant for humankind, in his book The Drowned and the Saved Levi introduced and addressed what he called "The Grey Zone." That zone, as he described it, is the space between absolute good and absolute evil, where moral choices are made for the purpose of survival rather than death, where the desire to live surmounts that to be honorable. Levi recognized that we should hold back from any condemnation of those who collaborated with the Nazis—the Sonderkommando men in the death camps was the example he used—for their work in abetting the killing process of their fellow Jews. As he wrote, "one is never in another's place. Each individual is so complex an object that there is no point in trying to foresee his behavior, all the more so in extreme situations; and neither is it possible to foresee one's own behavior."

Building on this further, while he reserved his condemnations for the perpetrators of the crimes, he could not exonerate the cowardice of the German people as a whole, and in particular their failure to confront themselves and their past. Not afraid to address the controversial, he also addressed the contentious issue of the "uniqueness" of the Holocaust, writing that "the Nazi concentration camp system remains a unicum [that is, a sui generis example or specimen], both in its extent and its quality. At no other place or time has one seen a phenomenon so unexpected and so complex: never have so many human lives been extinguished in so short a time, and with so lucid a combination of technological ingenuity, fanaticism, and cruelty."

As a thinker, Levi brought to bear on the Shoah the rational objective insights of the scientist together with the literary skills of the writer and forced his readers to look at the events not through colored lenses but as they truly were: ugly, ignoble, neither the work of demi-gods nor demisatans, but ordinary human beings capable of extraordinary evil. His writing was the direct result of his own experiences during his time at Auschwitz, and might, ultimately, have been a contributory factor to his death years later. He argued for the necessity of a new approach to philosophy, and of understanding the world, after the Holocaust.

In the work of Primo Levi can be found the unrelenting eye of the objectivist who focused his own lens unremittingly on the Holocaust—the result of his own personal and tragic experiences—and that, combined with his skilled literary talents as a writer, has left us a legacy not only of descriptive accuracy recording what actually transpired, but of memory that will simply not allow us to forget the event itself. By raising the most uncomfortable questions, and allowing the questions themselves to lead to the answers, he ensured that the debate regarding such answers will continue for many years to come.

STEVEN LEONARD JACOBS

See also: Auschwitz; Concentration Camps; Death Camps; The Grey Zone; Italy; The Truce

Further Reading

Alford, C. Fred. After the Holocaust: The Book of Job, Primo Levi, and the Path to Affliction. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009.

Angier, Carole. The Double Bond: Primo Levi—A Biography. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2002.

Gordon, Robert S. C. (Ed.). The Cambridge Companion to Primo Levi. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Liberation, Concentration Camps

In 1933 Adolf Hitler rose to power. A year later he had complete control of Germany. In 1939 Hitler's Germany started World War II in Europe with the invasion of Poland. Hitler's “Thousand Year Reich” would only last 12 years, though Nazism left European society shredded in every possible way, leaving nations destroyed and millions of people dead, maimed, and displaced.

Nazism was founded on the ideal of racial superiority. Hitler marked certain groups of people as inferior or subhuman. These enemies—for example, Jews, communists, socialists, Roma, and homosexuals—were political, social, and cultural threats to the Nazi way of life. At first they were ostracized and oppressed through legal means. Later they were arrested and sent to labor and concentration camps. The greatest perceived threat to the Nazis were European Jews. Hitler and his henchmen had a special plan to rid Germany of its “Jewish problem”—the Final Solution, which called for the identification, concentration, and extermination of all Jewish people in Europe.

To accomplish this task the Germans built a series of concentration and death camps, such as Auschwitz, Treblinka, Buchenwald, and Dachau, to house prisoners marked for labor or death. These camps were spread throughout the occupied countries, but especially in Eastern Europe. There were thousands of subcamps. Prisoners in these camps were subjected to horrific conditions and barbaric treatment. Prisoners died from overwork, starvation, torture, and disease. Millions were killed in gas chambers, and their remains were cremated to hide the evidence of mass murder. Most of the prisoners in these camps died or were killed before the Allies arrived to liberate them from the grip of Nazi depravity.

On June 6, 1944, the Allies launched Operation Overlord when American, British, and Canadian forces invaded Europe on the coast of Normandy. D-Day began the drive to crush Nazi Germany between the converging Western Allies and the Red Army of the Soviet Union, which, since 1941, had fought the bulk of the German army. After three years of bitter fighting, costing millions of deaths, the Soviets began to push the Nazis west toward Germany. As the Soviet army advanced, they captured the first Nazi death camp, Majdanek, in Poland. It was there that Soviet soldiers discovered the horrific machinery of the Final Solution—extermination sites outfitted with large-scale gas chambers and crematories. Later in 1944 the Red Army liberated or overran the death camps (or the sites where they had been located) at Sobibór, Belzec, and Treblinka. In January 1945 the Red Army liberated Auschwitz, the largest death camp.

In Western Europe, Allied forces drove east, liberating Paris in August 1944 with the help of Free French forces. The same month, the Allies invaded southern France with Operation Dragoon. Now the Allies operated on a broad front in the west, forcing the German army to retreat. After crossing the Rhine River in late March 1945, Allied forces moved into Germany. Throughout April and May 1945 the American, British, Canadian, and French military liberated camps through the western half of Germany. On April 11, the U.S. Third Army’s 6th Armored Division rolled into Buchenwald, freeing 20,000 prisoners. Generals Dwight D. Eisenhower, Omar Bradley, and George S. Patton inspected many of the ghastly facilities in the surrounding towns. Later American forces liberated camps such as Dachau and Flossenbürg. British and Canadian armies liberated Bergen-Belsen and other camps north of the American positions.

By mid-May the war was over in Europe. Once liberated, the survivors of the concentration camps faced a multitude of problems—disease, malnutrition, and the by-products of abuse from the hands of their captors. Thousands died after liberation. Ultimately, tens of thousands of people were now refugees, left with nothing and relying on the occupying Allied armies to help them reconstruct a new life. The relief and relocation process took years to complete.

The United States Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., recognizes the 35 United States Army divisions that liberated concentration camps from Nazi tyranny with the presentation of their divisional flags. When the museum opened in 1993, 20 flags (all 35 flags rotate throughout the year) were displayed near its 14th Street entrance. These flags symbolize the sacrifice made by thousands of Americans and Allied soldiers to liberate Europeans from the most notorious aspect of Hitler’s Third Reich.

ERIK D. CARLSON

See also: Belzec; Bergen-Belsen; Buchenwald; Concentration Camps; Dachau; Death Camps; Displaced Persons; Flossenbürg; Majdanek; Schacter, Herschel; Sobibór; Treblinka; The Truce; United States Holocaust Memorial Museum

Further Reading

- Abzug, Robert H. Inside the Vicious Heart: Americans and the Liberation of Nazi Camps. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Bridgman, Jon. The End of the Holocaust: The Liberation of the Camps. Portland (OR): Areopagitica Press, 1990.
- Hirsh, Michael. The Liberators: America’s Witness to the Holocaust. New York: Bantam Books, 2010.
- Stone, Dan. The Liberation of the Camps: The End of the Holocaust and Its Aftermath. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2015.

Lichtenberg, Bernhard

Bernhard Lichtenberg was a German Catholic priest who resisted Nazi antisemitic and racial doctrines by preaching against them from the pulpit, before being arrested and dying while being transported to the Dachau concentration camp. The second oldest of five siblings, he was born on December 3, 1875, at Ohlau (Oława), some 30 kilometers southeast of Breslau (Wrocław) in what was then the Prussian province of Lower Silesia. The merchant family from which he came was part of a Catholic minority in what was, at the time, a predominantly Protestant city.

Lichtenberg obtained his Abiturium (school-leaving exam) at the local high school and decided to become a priest. He studied theology in Breslau and Innsbruck and was ordained in 1899. In 1900 he began his ministry in Berlin as pastor of the Heart of Jesus community, Charlottenburg, where he remained for more than a decade. The remainder

Bernhard Lichtenberg was a German Catholic priest who at great personal risk prayed openly and unceasingly for the Jews who were being persecuted and killed by the Nazi machine. When he did not accede to warnings to stop, Lichtenberg was arrested, jailed, and died in transit to Dachau. He was beatified in 1996. (AP Photo/KNA-Archive) of his career would be focused on Catholic activities in and around Berlin.

With an interest in Catholic politics, Lichtenberg served from 1913 until 1920 as a representative of the Center Party in the District Assembly in Charlottenburg, and between 1920 and 1930 he was a member of the regional assembly of the Berlin district of Wedding. During World War I he served as a military chaplain, after which he became a member of the Peace Association of German Catholics (Friedensbund Deutscher Katholiken). In 1929 he was elected to the board of the Inter-Denominational Working Group for Peace (Arbeitsgemeinschaft der Konfessionen für den Frieden).

In 1931 he was appointed rector of St. Hedwig's Cathedral, Berlin, a position he took up in 1932. Even by this stage, before the National Socialist Party had attained power, he had shown himself to be opposed to their ways of thinking. In 1931 he underwrote an invitation to Catholics to watch a performance of the film version of the American antiwar film All Quiet on the Western Front (dir. Lewis Milestone, 1930), which led to a personal attack on him by the Nazi newspaper Der Angriff.

Then, on March 31, 1933, two months after the Nazi takeover, Lichtenberg arranged for the Jewish banker Oskar Wassermann to meet with Adolf Cardinal Bertram, archbishop of Breslau and president of the German Episcopal Conference, in a vain attempt to convince him to intervene in the antisemitic boycott of Jewish businesses planned by the government for the next day. Cardinal Bertram, however, held that the matter lay outside the church's sphere of activity, and no action was taken. Still, with this Lichtenberg marked himself out as an opponent of Nazism who needed to be watched in the future.

In 1937 Lichtenberg was elected cathedral provost, a role that saw him thrust deeper into helping Berlin's Jewish community. This was followed, in August 1938, with his being put in charge of the Relief Office of the Berlin episcopate, assisting Catholics of Jewish descent who wished to emigrate from Nazi Germany. When the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, took place, Lichtenberg spoke out against Nazi brutality and prayed publicly for the Jews during services—one of only a few who did so. After the outbreak of war in September 1939, Lichtenberg continued his protests in another area, this time writing to the air raid authorities remonstrating against an order dated December 14, 1939, decreeing racial segregation in Berlin's air raid shelters.

While the Nazi authorities initially dismissed Lichtenberg as a nuisance, he was nonetheless warned that he should be careful lest he be arrested. However, he continued with his protests, condemning the Nazi euthanasia program and even organizing demonstrations outside concentration camps. He was finally denounced by two female students who had heard him pray publicly for Jews and concentration camp inmates and was arrested on October 23, 1941, by the Gestapo. In their search of his home and possessions they found incriminating evidence: a pulpit proclamation in favor of Jews to be read in the cathedral that Sunday, in direct defiance of a police order.

He refused to retract his words during his interrogation, even going so far as to condemn Hitler's Mein Kampf as antithetical to Christianity. In May 1942 he was duly sentenced to two years' imprisonment; when asked if he had anything to say upon sentencing, he asked that no harm should come to citizens who pray for the Jews.

Toward the end of his prison term he was given the opportunity to remain free provided he undertook to refrain from preaching for the duration of the war. The offer was conveyed to him by Berlin's Bishop Konrad von Preysing on behalf of the Gestapo. In response, Lichtenberg requested instead that he be allowed to accompany the deported Jews and Jewish Christians to the Łódź ghetto, where he would serve as a priest.

With little other alternative, the Nazi authorities ordered that he be sent to Dachau, where all anti-Nazi priests were imprisoned. On November 5, 1943, while in transit and awaiting his final transport to the camp, he collapsed and died.

Father Bernhard Lichtenberg was beatified as a Blessed Martyr by Pope John Paul II on June 23, 1996. The beatification ceremony took place in Berlin during a Mass celebrated at the city's Olympic Stadium. Lichtenberg's tomb is situated in the crypt of St. Hedwig's Cathedral in Berlin. On July 7, 2004, Jerusalem's Yad Vashem recognized Bernhard Lichtenberg as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Father Lichtenberg was one who "lived" his faith and the teachings it espoused. He listened and responded to the voice of his conscience as he witnessed the growing power of Nazism and its anti-Jewish ideology. Driven by his faith, he was a courageous resister who lost his life in the cause of stopping an evil he identified as detrimental to all humanity.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: April Boycott; Catholic Church; Euthanasia Program; Kristallnacht; Priest Block, Dachau; Righteous among the Nations; St. Hedwig's Cathedral; Upstander

Further Reading

- Kidder, Annemarie S. Ultimate Price: Testimonies of Christians who resisted the Third Reich. Maryknoll (NY): Orbis Books, 2012.
- Kock, Erich. Er Widerstand: Bernhard Lichtenberg, Domprobst bei St. Hedwig. Berlin: Morus Verlag, 1996.
- Riebling, Mark. Church of Spies: The Pope's Secret War against Hitler. New York: Basic Books, 2015.

Life Is Beautiful

An Italian-made movie about the Holocaust, Life Is Beautiful (in Italian, La Vita è Bella) was the brainchild of actor-director Roberto Benigni. The film was produced in 1997 and focuses on an Italian Jew in the 1930s, Guido Orefice, who falls in love with and marries a non-Jewish woman, Dora (played in the film by Benigni's real-life wife, Nicoletta Braschi). After the Nazis have occupied Italy and imposed the full weight of German antisemitic legislation, Guido and his infant son, as "racial" Jews, are sent to a concentration camp. At her request, Dora is permitted to join them. In order to maintain his child's morale—in effect, to give him the will to live—Guido convinces his son that everything that is happening to them is actually part of a big game, in which the winner of the first prize wins an army tank. In a tribute to the other great comedy about the Nazi persecution of the Jews from 1940, Charlie Chaplin's The Great Dictator, Benigni gave his character Guido the same concentration camp prisoner number as that on the uniform of Chaplin's character, the Jewish Barber.

The popular and critical acclaim for Life Is Beautiful was little short of phenomenal. It won the Grand Jury Prize at Cannes and Oscars for Best Foreign Film, Best Actor (Benigni), and Best Original Dramatic Score for the music of Nicola Piovani. Although it is not a "Holocaust movie" in the strict sense of historical fiction or documentary, Life Is Beautiful is nonetheless an important movie that extends the boundaries of cinema about the Holocaust into areas of fantasy and fable.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Children during the Holocaust; The Great Dictator; Italian Jews and Fascism; Italy

Further Reading

- Baron, Lawrence. Projecting the Holocaust into the Present: The Changing Focus of Contemporary Holocaust Cinema. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.
- Bullaro, Grace Russo. Beyond "Life Is Beautiful": Comedy and Tragedy in the Cinema of Roberto Benigni. Leicester (UK): Troubador, 2005.

Gonshak, Henry. Hollywood and the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): Rowman and Littlefield, 2015.

“Life Unworthy of Life”

First used in a 1920 book by German jurist Karl Binding and German psychiatrist Alfred Hoche, The Permission to Destroy Life Unworthy of Life, the term “life unworthy of life” was employed by the Nazis for those afflicted with hereditary illnesses, including the mentally ill, who were perceived as a political and economic burden to German society and thus deserving only of being killed. The resultant policy, in which the phrase Lebensunwertes Leben was employed, was based on the July 1933 Law for the Prevention of Offspring with Hereditary Diseases. Passed by the Reichstag, it established so-called euthanasia centers in order to put to death by medical means anyone labeled with a disability that would, in the view of the Nazis, weaken the “Aryan” race.

Prior to this, mass compulsory sterilizations of those targeted by the Nazis took place, in which between 300,000 and 400,000 Germans became victims. In October 1939 Adolf Hitler authorized the chief medical officers of the Reich to institute measures that would put to death those considered to be “life unworthy of life.” The order was retrospective to September 1, 1939, to make it appear as though required by the exigencies of war. Six killing centers were established for the purpose of carrying out Hitler’s order, all of which were located in the pre-war Old Reich: Hartheim Castle, Sonnenstein, Grafenek, Bernberg, Hademar, and Brandenburg. Hiding behind a facade of medical respectability, those carrying out the killings were members of the SS. The murders were a graduated combination of starvation, lethal injections, and gassing; some of the doctors supervising or performing these extrajudicial killings later became experts in the technology of mass murder and were employed as specialists in the Nazi death camps. As the result of a public outcry once the program became known, the Nazis agreed—overtly—to cease the killing, but they continued to do so covertly throughout the war.

Owing to the enthusiastic contributions of the SS doctors involved in the program, anywhere between 200,000 and 275,000 people with disabilities were massacred by the campaign to “improve” the German gene pool, as the Nazis aimed to “purify” Germany through what was code-named the “T-4” program owing to its headquarters being located at Berlin’s Tiergartenstrasse 4. Compulsory euthanasia—in reality, state-sanctioned murder—was employed to rid Germany of those who were incurably ill, those with psychological disorders, or those with physical handicaps. Such people, who were referred to as “lebenundwertes lebens,” were also classed as “useless eaters.” Their death was necessary, in this thinking, in order to “purify” the physical German body.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aryan; Euthanasia Program; “Racial Hygiene”; Sterilization

Further Reading

- Aly, Götz, Peter Chroust, and Christian Pross. Cleansing the Fatherland: Nazi Medicine and Racial Hygiene. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.
- Benedict, Susan, and Linda Shields (Eds.). Nurses and Midwives in Nazi Germany: The “Euthanasia Programs.” New York: Routledge, 2014.
- Freidlander, Henry. The Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution. Durham (NC): University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Schmidt, Ulf. Karl Brandt: The Nazi Doctor: Medicine and Power in the Third Reich. London: Bloomsbury, 2007.

Lipke, Janis and Johanna

Janis and Johanna Lipke were Latvian upstanders who saved many Jewish lives during World War II. Janis Lipke was born in Jelvaga, Latvia, in 1900 to a family of modest means. After attending elementary school and some high school, he served in the military from 1919 to 1920. In 1920 he married Johanna, who was born in 1903. The couple eventually had children—Aina, Alfreds, and Zigfrids. By 1940 the Lipkes had moved to the port city of Riga, on the Baltic Sea, where Janis was a dockworker.

In 1940 Latvia was overrun by the Soviet Union, meaning that in June 1941, when Germany invaded the Soviet Union from the west, Latvia was subjected to a second conquest. This prompted one of the Lipke family’s sons to join the Red Army. On July 1, 1941, German forces occupied Riga and began persecuting Jews; eventually, they would place them in ghettos and deport many of them to concentration or death camps. Once the German occupation commenced, Janis Lipke secured a job in a warehouse operated by the German Luftwaffe (Air Force). From November 30 until December 8, 1941, Lipke and his wife witnessed the shockingly brutal roundup of Riga’s Jews. Some were savagely beaten, and many ended up in Riga’s Jewish ghetto or in concentration camps outside the city and in other parts of Latvia. The Lipkes, who had counted several Jews among their friends, were horrified by what they had witnessed, and Janis Lipke decided that he must do something to save Riga's Jews.

Using his warehouse position, Lipke managed to convince German authorities to hire young Jewish men from the ghetto to work in the warehouse. When the ghetto was liquidated, Lipke and his wife decided that they must do more to help the city's Jews. They first took in Chaim Smolianski, an old friend of Janis Lipke, and hid him in a cellar at their home. Before long, the family had taken in 8 or 10 more Jews after having dug a hidden underground bunker beneath a shed on their property. Johanna Lipke was primarily responsible for their well-being, providing them with meals, drink, clothing, conversation, and even radios. Soon, however, the bunker became full. Janis Lipke now determined that he would have to expand his rescue effort beyond his own property.

In early 1943 he secured hiding places on farms in the nearby town of Dobele, even spending his own money to rent a house so that occupation authorities would not be tipped off as to the clandestine activities there. Before long, he had assembled a major rescue operation, working with some 25 "assistants" who helped him secure hiding spots, weapons, food, and clothing, rescue Jews from concentration camps, and even bribe German officials. It is believed that Lipke and his wife directly rescued and hid as many as 50 Jews, within a broader rescue mission that may have aided several hundred others. In the fall of 1943 Janis Lipke personally took part in securing the escape of a Jewish physician from the Balasta Dambis concentration camp. He then teamed up with him to steal a German truck full of weapons, ammunition, and explosives. He also helped secure blank travel papers, which he and others used to transport Jews within Latvia under assumed names.

The Soviets liberated Riga in the early autumn of 1944, and the family's rescue efforts ended. In the decades after the war, Janis Lipke worked in several low-level jobs in Riga, and he and his wife thereafter survived on a meager Soviet pension. On June 28, 1966, however, Israel's Yad Vashem recognized both Janis and Johanna Lipke as Righteous among the Nations in honor of their life-saving work during the Holocaust.

By the 1980s the couple was living in near-poverty in a small hut on the outskirts of Latvia. Janis died in 1987; Johanna died in 1990. In 2013 a monument that recognized their contributions was dedicated in Riga, Latvia.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Latvia; Riga; Righteous among the Nations; Soviet Union; Upstander

Further Reading

Paldiel, Mordecai. The Righteous Among the Nations: Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. New York: Harper, 2007.
Yad Vashem. The Righteous Among the Nations. "Lipke Family." <http://db.yadvashem.org/righteous/family.html?language=en&itemId=4022619>.

Literature and the Holocaust

Literature encompasses written works, especially those considered of superior or lasting artistic merit. What is Holocaust literature? This is the term given to the substantial body of written works, in many languages, which respond to the catastrophe that was the destruction (by the German Nazi state and its collaborators) of the Jews of Europe, as the primary target, between 1933 and 1945. Such written works include diaries, creative writing, literary texts, compositions, informal literature, texts, reports, studies, poems, plays, leaflets, brochures, pamphlets, circulars, flyers, handouts, handbills, bulletins, fact sheets, publicity, propaganda, and notices. Because the writers were drawn from all European states, it is an international literature. Most frequently, literary works on the Holocaust have been written in Hebrew, English, Yiddish, Polish, German, or French, but most have been translated into English.

At the highest level, this literature provides readers with deep insights into the experiences of the Holocaust period through stories, poems, and plays that scrutinize the events as they unfolded and the debasement, cruelty and suffering of the lives lived. Such writing engages the heart and mind and provokes empathetic inquiry into what it means to be human, and to deliberate upon the human and inhuman condition.

There are the writings created during the Holocaust itself. Testimonies left behind attest to the fact that the demand for literature intensified as conditions deteriorated. For some people, writing was a sort of revenge; for others, there was a need to bear witness; for yet others, the desire to commemorate the dead, or to warn humanity of its capacity for genocide.

Among those confined in ghettos and concentration camps, literature served as an important channel of defiance and escape. Covert efforts resulted in many manuscripts that were distributed by clandestine methods; these writings served as a great spiritual source for inmates in the ghettos and camps. In some instances, where paper was scarce, writing was created on logs of wood, and these messages would then be transferred from camp to camp.

Great attention has been paid to the poems written by children in Terezín (Theresienstadt), which the Nazis created as a “showpiece” concentration camp. Of the 15,000 children under the age of 14 who passed through Terezín, it is estimated that only some 80 to 100 survived. Poetry from these children is uneven in quality, but some poems show not only wisdom born of suffering but also a mastery of form.

These are the voices of the victims, for whom writing on the Holocaust represented the experience of total anomie and the defilement of integrity and dignity, in addition to physicality, of the individual.

In the years immediately following World War II, writers began to confront the task of describing in fiction the seemingly indescribable and multifaceted world of the Holocaust. Even though some survivors immediately started to write of their Holocaust experiences, many were unable even to speak about what they experienced. However, facing the inevitable reality of their own mortality, a number have since written testimonies detailing what they remember experiencing, so that these may serve as an historical record. The literature of many of the survivors shares unique qualities of cultural dislocation and of cross-cultural perspectives because it is a literature of uprooted persons mostly writing in acquired languages. The writing is that of displaced persons, replacing their native tongue, but not the way they describe experience, for the language of their new country.

For writers struggling to leave a literature of testimony, issues of how to portray incidents without distorting them took on nearly debilitating significance. Notwithstanding, most writers resolved that silence was no alternative.

Some accounts of victims and survivors have been written by other people—children and friends of survivors, Jewish communal record keepers, and historians. Sometimes the perpetrators have written their own accounts of the Holocaust period and in doing so have often generated accounts that are clearly exculpatory.

Much of the body of Holocaust writing created by people other than victims or survivors has been created by Jewish writers attempting to understand what occurred during the Holocaust, and why and how it happened. For these authors there is an urgent need to try to understand this earth-shattering event that fixed the fate of each Jew, regardless of merit, in circumstances where there was scarcely any mercy or dignity, and where the victim’s very survival was an aberration.

Accordingly, many writers have fixed themselves on cases of unrecognized heroes of the Holocaust, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who resisted the Nazis in ways big and small.

These remarkable stories of defiance counter the myth that Nazi victims passively submitted to their fate. Many stories have been recorded of those whom Yad Vashem in Israel has referred to as the Righteous among the Nations, those relatively few non-Jewish individuals who took definite steps and frequently risked their lives to save fellow human beings. Many of these people did not consider that they were being heroic, but often used a faith-based moral compass to do “what was only right.”

A genre of literature was created to teach the moral lessons stemming from the Holocaust to children at a level they could understand and which would not cause them stress. And where the goal has been to prevent the recurrence of such a tragedy, there have been a number of written works detailing a careful examination of the circumstances that permitted the rise of Nazism and the conduct of leaders and participants during the rise and rule of the Nazi state.

Post-Holocaust writing has also set down the moral lessons that the world had to learn from this tragedy, and those who have attempted to respond to this question have produced critical analyses, as well as fiction, drama, and poetry that honor the victims and survivors.

Tens of thousands of authors around the world have made the Holocaust the primary focus of their writing. Many are Jewish, such as Aharon Appelfeld, Elie Weisel, Tadeusz Borowski, Viktor Frankl, and Primo Levi. Others, whether Jewish or not, have utilized the Holocaust within their writing, even though not necessarily classifying themselves as writers on the Holocaust. These include Yehudah Amichai, Cynthia Ozick, Jean-Paul Sartre, and William Styron, while scholars from academe, such as Lawrence Langer, Sidra DeKoven Ezrahi, Sara Horowitz, Sue Vice, and James E. Young, have made very important inroads in trying to understand the literature generated on the Holocaust.

While any list of key texts on the Holocaust will always be contentious, at a minimum it might be argued that the following would likely be included in most collections if compiled in the early 21st century: Elie Wiesel, Night; Anne Frank, The Diary of a Young Girl; Art Spiegelman, Maus; Primo Levi, If This Is a Man; William Styron, Sophie’s Choice; Bernhard Schlink, The Reader; Jonathan Safran Foer, Everything Is Illuminated; John Boyne, The Boy in the Striped Pyjamas; Sara Nomberg-Przytyk, Auschwitz: True Tales from a Grotesque Land; Anatoli Kuznetsov, Babi Yar; John Hersey, The Wall; and Markus Zusak, The Book Thief.

An intrinsic worth of literature is its capacity to transport readers to other times, faraway locations, and unique situations. Through the genre of Holocaust literature, readers can not only learn about the Nazi state and World War II but they can also connect as human beings with those persons who lived and died during the Holocaust.

EVE E. GRIMM

See also: Children's Literature of the Holocaust; Delbo, Charlotte; The Deputy, The Diary of a Young Girl; The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak; Dinur, Yehiel; Helga's Diary; Levi, Primo; Maus and Maus II; Night; Schindler's List; Survivor Testimony; Wiesel, Elie

Further Reading

DeKoven Ezrahi, Sidra. By Words Alone: The Holocaust in Literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.

Langer, Lawrence L. Art from the Ashes: An Anthology of Holocaust Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Rosen, Alan (Ed.). Literature of the Holocaust. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2013.

Roskies, David G., and Naomi Diamant. Holocaust Literature: A History and Guide. Waltham (MA): Brandeis University Press, 2013.

Lithuania

Lithuania is a Baltic state that had a 1939 population numbering about 3 million people, of whom some 160,000 were Jewish. The country gained its independence as World War I drew to a close in 1918 and remained independent until 1940. Unlike the other Baltic countries, Lithuania maintained relatively cordial relations with the Soviet Union during the interwar period. Between 1926 and 1940 Antanas Smetona imposed a virtual dictatorship over Lithuania, as his regime attempted to curry favor with the Soviet Union. These attempts did not, however, keep the Soviets from clandestinely agreeing with the Germans in 1939 that Lithuania would become a Soviet territory upon the outbreak of war. Prior to World War II, Lithuania had a vibrant Jewish community, with Lithuanian Jews even employing a distinct dialect of Yiddish. As well, the Jews of Lithuania were at the forefront of the international Zionist and Jewish labor movements.

In March 1939, despite their earlier agreement with the Soviets, the Germans annexed Memel-Klaipeda, an area of Lithuania that had a large German-speaking population. In June 1940, after World War II began, Soviet troops marched into the rest of Lithuania, and in August the Soviet Union formally annexed the country. Soviet officials proceeded to impose a rigorous occupation regime in Lithuania, which would include the complete transformation of the nation to Soviet-style communism. By June 1941 some 40,000 Lithuanians who opposed this were sent into exile deep inside the Soviet Union. Meanwhile, nearly 100,000 Jews, mostly from German-occupied Poland, had sought refuge in Lithuania between September 1939 and June 1941.

On June 22, 1941, the Germans invaded the Soviet Union and quickly overran the Baltic States, including Lithuania. Because of the huge influx of foreign Jews prior to this, and the Soviet Union's occupation policies, rioting among Lithuanians targeted Jews, resulting in numerous deaths. German mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen), working with Lithuanian militias, began massacring Jews during the summer of 1941, and by September nearly all Jews living in rural regions had been killed. At year's end, many of the Jews residing in urban ghettos had also been murdered. By early 1942 only some 40,000 Jews remained alive in Lithuania; they lived in ghettos or were interned in several forced labor camps, where they lived in hellish conditions. The following year, two of the four remaining ghettos were liquidated, with most Jews (about 15,000) being transported to concentration camps in Estonia and Latvia. Some 5,000 others were sent to camps in Poland, where they were promptly killed.

In April 1944 Soviet troops began moving back into Lithuania, and before the Germans departed, they transported many Jews from the remaining two ghettos to concentration camps in Germany. Most died after their arrival. Meanwhile, the Soviets reimposed their earlier occupation policies on the Lithuanians, and the country would remain in the Soviet orbit until 1991.

Between 1941 and 1944 the Germans killed 90% of Lithuania's Jews, rendering the country's death rate as one of the highest for Jews of any nation occupied by Germany during World War II.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Collaboration; Death Camps; Einsatzgruppen; Ghettos; Paulavicius, Jonas; Soviet Union; Vilna Ghetto

Further Reading

Buttar, Prit. Between Giants: The Battle for the Baltics in World War II. Oxford: Osprey, 2013.

Greenbaum, Masha. The Jews of Lithuania: A History of a Remarkable Community, 1316–1945. New York: Gefen, 1997.

Sabaliunas, Leonas. Lithuania in Crisis. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1972.

Łódź Ghetto

The Łódź Ghetto, located in Poland, was established in February 1940 and was the longest lasting of the Polish ghettos. It operated, overall, for more than four years.

The Łódź Ghetto, established in Poland in early 1940, was second in size only to the Warsaw Ghetto, and the longest surviving Polish ghetto. For more than four years the ghetto effectively turned itself into a city of factories and was successful at making itself indispensable by the goods the ghetto manufactured for the Nazis. In this picture a man is helpless to fend off the abuses of ghetto guards. (Galerie Bilderwelt/Getty Images)

Łódź is located in central Poland, about 75 miles southwest of Warsaw. During the Holocaust, it was second only to Warsaw in the size of the city and the size of its Jewish population, with some 230,000 Jews. It has a history of being a vibrant industrial city, especially in textiles. It was occupied by the Nazis one week after Germany's invasion of Poland that began on September 1, 1939. It was renamed Litzmannstadt (named for a German general in World War I) and incorporated into Germany as part of the Warthegau, that section of conquered Poland that was made a part of Germany, run by Gauleiter Arthur Greiser.

The initial months of the German occupation of Łódź were difficult for the Jewish community. A combination of hard labor, arrests, random beatings, terror and humiliation, and widespread plunder made for a frightening environment. It was exacerbated by the passage of laws restricting and marginalizing the Jews, including the application of the Nuremberg Laws and the requirement that Jews wear, at first, an armband, and later, in December 1939, a yellow Star of David. In mid-November 1939 the four major synagogues of Łódź were burned to the ground.

The ghetto was established in February 1940 in the northern section of the city. The number of Jews forced into its very small area (1.5 square miles) ranged from 160,000 to 164,000. It was sealed on May 1, 1940, surrounded by a wooden fence, barbed wire, and armed guards.

Bridges were built over city streets that ran through the ghetto, thereby allowing the Jews to move to and from various sections of the ghetto without leaving it. A tram ran through the ghetto, but for non-Jews only, and no stops were made inside.

Conditions for the Jews imprisoned in the ghetto were terrible. Overcrowding, disease (tuberculosis, typhus, and dysentery, among others), atrocious sanitation, and the absence of electricity and running water were only some of the things that threatened survival. Hunger, leading to death by starvation, as well as contributing to the outbreak of some of the diseases already noted, was perhaps the greatest burden within the ghetto. Unlike at some other ghettos, there was virtually no successful smuggling of food into Łódź.

As in other ghettos, the Nazis required that a Judenrat (Jewish Council) be established to administer the ghetto and to implement Nazi orders. Mordecai Chaim Rumkowski was appointed as chair. In that capacity almost all of the important decisions made within the ghetto were made by him.

Born on February 27, 1877, in a small village in Russia, Rumkowski, with little formal education, found some success—though he could not hold onto it for long—as a merchant. He became an insurance agent in the interwar years. He was childless despite two marriages, each of which ended in the death of his spouse. He seemed to find his place as the director of an orphanage, perhaps because of his unfulfilled desire to be a father.

Rumkowski organized administrative services within the ghetto that were essential for the survival of the Jews. He established departments for health (with up to as many as seven hospitals), education, supplies, housing, registration, a Jewish police force, and so forth. Without running water or sewerage systems, the need for a sanitation department—which he established—was critical. Despite these efforts, the terrible conditions of life in the ghetto were the direct cause of the death of one out of every five people.

Schools—elementary and high school—were established for the thousands of children in the ghetto. Orphanages, prayer services, and cultural activities helped to make the ghetto as livable as possible in such a terrible situation.

With food the most needed—and the least available—of all essentials, Rumkowski's first concern was to somehow convince the Germans to provide more sustenance for the ghetto. His solution, such as it was (the problem of hunger and starvation was never solved no matter the efforts), dovetailed perfectly with his broader plan for the survival of the ghetto and its inhabitants. He was convinced that the only thing that would forestall the murder of the Jews was to make them of critical importance to the German military machine. Accordingly, he sought to make the Łódź ghetto as industrious as the city of Łódź itself. He established factories and workshops throughout the ghetto, making textiles, German uniforms, munitions, and whatever else the Nazis looked upon as necessary. His goal was to have a job for everyone who wanted one; his hope was that this would protect as many Jews as possible from being killed or deported.

The Nazis accepted the industrialization of the ghetto and agreed to a proposal by Rumkowski to pay those working in the more than 100 ghetto factories in the form of food. His plan was simple: work was a form of protection and a means of getting critically needed food into the ghetto.

Although the amount and quality of the food given to the ghetto by the Germans was still inadequate to provide anything but a near-starvation diet, it appears that Rumkowski's trust in the value of work was sound. The ghetto was the longest surviving ghetto in Poland, and the number of individuals who survived the ghetto—as small and heartbreaking a number as it was—was the largest number of survivors of any ghetto in Poland.

Despite what would seem to be a well-deserved place in Holocaust history as one of the best of the Judenrat leaders, Rumkowski was—and remains today—perhaps the most controversial of all Judenrat chairmen. His governance style was dictatorial, his attitude imperious. He rode through the ghetto in an opulent carriage pulled by white horses. He and his inner circle of family and officials seemed to be well fed, and always among those not listed on the deportation lists.

Apart from his domineering personality, his responsibility to assure the Nazis that the number of Jews to be deported on a given date would be at the designated gathering place, at the appointed hour, invariably left him vulnerable to criticism by desperate Jews who saw him as seeming to help the Nazis at their task of extermination. Others, however, saw him as a tireless leader trying to administer Nazi orders in a way that would cause the least pain and keep alive as many Jews as possible.

The almost impossible position that Rumkowski was in, as the chairman of the Judenrat, can best be seen in the infamous or heartbreaking speech (depending on one's point of view) he made on September 4, 1942, known generally as the "Give me your children" speech. In it he had to explain why it was necessary to deliver up for deportation all children under age 11, and the elderly. He explained that he had no choice, and that the Germans were asking for the "best we possess." He said: "I must stretch out my hands and beg: Brothers and sisters! Hand them over to me! Fathers and mothers: Give me your children!"

As crowded as the ghetto was, the Nazis added another 20,000 Jews, and 5,000 Roma (housed in their own section) to the ghetto in October and November 1941, with another 17,000 to 20,000 Jews added later. The conditions these new residents found were shocking. For example, in the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews had to burn virtually every piece of wood they could find for warmth, lest they freeze to death.

In January 1942 the Nazis ordered Rumkowski to draw up a list of 10,000 Jews for deportation to Polish farms, or so they were told. In fact, they were to be deported to Chełmno, the newly opened extermination camp northwest of Łódź. Deportations continued, with more than 70,000 Jews deported to Chełmno in 1942. The manner of execution at Chełmno was asphyxiation due to carbon monoxide rerouted from a van's exhaust so it entered the rear of the van and caused all to die (the driver was separated from the passenger section of the van by a hermetically sealed divider).

Deportations were halted from September 1942 through May 1944 due to the German army's need for the munitions that were being produced in the ghetto factories. In February 1944 Himmler ordered the liquidation of the ghetto, with a group of 7,000 Jews deported to Chełmno during one month in the summer of 1943. By August 1944 the 75,000 Jews still alive in the ghetto were deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau. When the Soviets liberated the ghetto on January 19, 1945, fewer than 10,000 of the 230,000 Jews of Łódź had survived.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Biebow, Hans; Birkenau; Chełmno; The Diary of Dawid Sierakowiak; Ghettos; Judenrat; Lange, Herbert; Music and the Holocaust; Reserve Police Battalion 101; Slave Labor; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Adelson, Alan, and Robert Lapides (Eds.). Lodz Ghetto: Inside a Community under Siege. New York: Viking Penguin, 1989.
 Dobroszycki, Lucjan. The Chronicle of the Lodz Ghetto, 1941–1944. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984.
 Rosenfeld, Oskar. In the Beginning Was the Ghetto: Notebooks from Lodz. Evanston (IL): Northwestern University Press, 2002.
 Trunk, Isaiah, Lodz Ghetto: A History. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2008.

London Charter Agreement

On August 8, 1945, the United States, France, Britain, and the Soviet Union signed the London Agreement that established the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (IMT), also known as the London Accord or London Charter Conference. This was the agreement that set down the procedures by which the subsequent Nuremberg trials were to be conducted. It was drafted over two months during the summer of 1945 by Chief Justice Robert H. Jackson of the United States Supreme Court, together with a team that included his son William E. Jackson. One of the key issues was to work out a consensus among the Allies as to how to proceed with the trial of major Nazi war criminals. During the most important drafting periods, French judge Robert Falco and General Iona Nikitchenko, a judge of the Supreme Court of the Soviet Union, were brought in to assist and also to give credibility to the notion of international justice having been properly constituted.

The Allied signatories agreed to establish not only the Charter of the International Military Tribunal to try the Nazi leadership but also what the charges would be that were going to be brought against them. Once settled, these were crimes against peace (that is, the waging of aggressive war); war crimes (violations of universally accepted standards of military conduct); and crimes against humanity (violations of standards regarding civilians).

The Charter called for “the just and prompt trial and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis,” and its jurisdiction was outlined in article 6 of the Charter. The tribunal would consist of four members (and four alternates), one from each of the signatories; all members of the tribunal must be present to constitute a quorum, with one to be elected president; attributing one's acts to the head of state, a government official, or “following superior orders” would not be considered as lessening one's responsibility (thus, obedience to orders could only be considered at the tribunal's discretion, and in the interests of justice); procedures for the tribunal would follow standard legal and courtroom methods as commonly understood; the tribunal itself, as well as both prosecutors and defense counsels were also required to follow accepted legal and courtroom procedures; and judgment and sentencing were the sole responsibility of the tribunal.

The form of procedure to be employed by the tribunal was essentially based on civil rather than common law. Trials would be before a bench of judges rather than before a jury. Defendants would be permitted to present evidence in their defense and to cross-examine witnesses, and there was an appeal mechanism (in such cases, the Allied Control Council would serve as an appeals court).

Once signed by the four signatory states, the Agreement and Charter were subsequently ratified by 19 other Allied states. Pursuant to the stipulations laid down in the Charter, the International Military Tribunal, sitting at Nuremberg, opened formally on November 20, 1945.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Crimes against Humanity; Jackson, Robert H.; Moscow Declaration; Nuremberg Defense; Nuremberg Trials; War Crimes

Further Reading

Harris, Whitney. Tyranny on Trial: The Trial of the Major German War Criminals at the End of World War II at Nuremberg

Germany, 1945–1946. College Station (TX): Texas A&M University Press, 1999.

Mettraux, Guénaël (Ed.). Perspectives on the Nuremberg Trial. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008.

Lubetkin, Zivia

Zivia Lubetkin was a leader of the Jewish underground in Poland and one of the founders of the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB) in Warsaw. She was born in Beten (Byteń), Poland, on November 9, 1914, to Ya'akov-Yizhak and Hayyah Lubetkin, née Zilberman. An affluent family, the Lubetkins had six daughters and a son. Both parents and four of Zivia's sisters perished in the Holocaust, while her brother Shelomo and sister Ahuvah, who had both managed to migrate to Palestine, survived.

A stalwart leader of Jewish resistance to the Nazis, whose first name was used as the code word for “Poland,” Zivia Lubetkin was one of the founders of the Jewish Fighting Organization and a veteran of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. She continued her insistence to stand up to power after the war when she testified at the trial of Adolf Eichmann, as seen here. (Library of Congress)

Zivia studied at a Polish government school. From early childhood she was a member of the Zionist-Socialist youth movement Freiheit (Freedom), which gave her a solid grounding in Jewish communal life and a sense of duty. She also joined and worked with the Hechalutz youth movement in Warsaw as a coordinator. In 1938 Freiheit joined Hechalutz to form one movement, Dror, and Zivia became a member of its executive council. In 1939 she traveled to Geneva for the 21st Zionist Congress, returning to Poland just before the outbreak of war.

After Nazi Germany attacked Poland on September 1, 1939, the movement decided to send its leadership cohort east, away from the fighting. Then, when the Soviet Union invaded eastern Poland on September 17, Zivia went to Lvov to help organize Dror underground activities. During the winter of 1939 she and other members left the Soviet zone and returned to German-occupied territory to continue their resistance work. In January 1940 they reached Warsaw. As the ghetto was forming, Zivia's tasks included organizing the movement and facilitating communications with those outside the ghetto. During this period she also met and fell in love with another underground leader, Yitzhak Zuckerman.

By the fall of 1941 there could be little doubt that the Jews were being exterminated, though the precise means by which this was happening was still unknown. Zivia, realizing that there was little hope left for the Jews if they simply sat by passively, decided to resist. On July 28, 1942, during the first mass deportation from Warsaw, she was among the founders of the ŻOB as well as a member of the ŻOB's political arm, the Jewish National Committee (Żydowski Komitet Narodowy, or ŻKN).

Zivia Lubetkin became the only woman on the ŻOB's high command, and her name in Polish, “Cywia,” became the code word for “Poland” among resistance groups on both sides of the ghetto wall during World War II.

In January 1943 the Germans launched a new wave of deportations, and the ŻOB's resistance network decided to act. Fighting a limited action against the Nazis, the ŻOB turned the Germans on the defensive and the deportations were brought to a temporary halt. Zivia was among the fighters in this initial resistance operation.

In April 1943, when the final liquidation of the ghetto began, Zivia was instantly involved in the combat that followed. While the first few days of fighting seemed to offer some measure of success, it was inevitable that the overwhelming firepower the Nazis could bring against the fighters would prevail in the long term. As the resistance began to falter, Zivia, while keeping her combat command role, also acted in a liaison capacity with the various groups of fighters and maintained contact between them. On May 8 the ŻOB command in the bunker at Miła 18 sent Zivia to try to find a way out through the sewers leading to the Aryan side. She was successful, and on May 10 navigated the sewer system with the last of the fighters. The remaining fighters in the bunker—Mordecai Anielewicz, Mira Fuchrer, Rachel Zilberberg, and nearly fifty others—were either killed or took their own lives in order to avoid capture.

Until the end of the war, Zivia remained on the Aryan side, continuing to serve in the underground. She fought with the remaining ŻOB units during the Warsaw Uprising from August to October 1944 until, together with the last of the fighters, she surfaced during November 1944. She was one of only 34 Jewish fighters from the Warsaw Ghetto to survive the war. After the liberation of the city by Soviet troops on January 17, 1945, she once more met with her beloved, Yitzhak Zuckerman.

After the war Zivia was active in organizing Bricha (“Flight”), an organization helping Jewish survivors migrate to Palestine. She herself wished to go as quickly as possible, and on March 1, 1945—even before the war was over—she attempted to do so by going to Romania with another resistance fighter, the partisan Abba Kovner, and members of his group. Unable to proceed beyond Bucharest, however, she returned to Warsaw.

While there, she was hardly inactive. Together with Zuckerman and a survivor of the Białystok ghetto, Chaika Grossman, she created an infrastructure to enable survivors from the Soviet Union to migrate to Israel. She and Zuckerman finally left for Palestine in May 1946 and were married in 1947. The same year they met with other ghetto fighters and partisans to start the process that would lead, by April 19, 1949, to the establishment of Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot. A museum focusing on Jewish resistance, Ghetto Fighters’ House, was created on its grounds. The Zuckermans built their home and raised their two children at the kibbutz, where Zivia preferred to live as an ordinary member without fanfare. In 1961, however, she was among the principal witnesses at the trial of Adolf Eichmann and provided important evidence relating to the destruction of Polish Jewry.

On July 11, 1978, at the age of 64, Zivia Lubetkin died and was buried at the kibbutz the next day. The year of her death saw the birth of a granddaughter, Roni. In 2001 Roni Zuckerman became the first female fighter pilot in the Israeli Air Force.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Anielewicz, Mordecai; Eichmann Trial; Jewish Fighting Organization; Jewish Resistance; Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; Zuckerman, Yitzhak

Further Reading

Guterman, Bella. Fighting for Her People: Zivia Lubetkin, 1914–1978. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2015.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak. A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Lubny Massacre

The city of Lubny is located in the Poltava Oblast of central Ukraine. It is reputed to be one of the oldest cities in Ukraine, allegedly founded in 988 by Prince Vladimir the Great of Kiev. The first written record concerning Lubny dates from 1107. Jews settled in Lubny in the first half of the 17th century. On the eve of World War II, in 1939, the Jewish population numbered 2,833, about 10.5% of the total.

After the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union (Operation Barbarossa) on June 22, 1941, the residents of Lubny became immediately vulnerable to German attacks, but the city was not occupied until September 13, 1941. Lubny and its surrounds became a major resistance center, and partisans fought the Nazis outside of the city. With the German takeover, however, all Jews were immediately registered under the so-called Kommissar Order (Kommissarbefehl). The Nazis counted around 1,500 Jewish residents of the city, though this did not take into account those from outlying villages who had come in looking for refuge.

On October 10, 1941, the occupying authorities sent an order out to the Jews of Lubny that they were to gather in the nearby village, Zasule, for resettlement, making sure to take with them warm clothes and valuables. The “resettlement” was to take place a few days later, on October 16, 1941.

On the appointed day, the Jews of Lubny gathered at the Kirov Square. Unknown to them was the fact that Sonderkommando 4a, one of the units of Einsatzgruppen C and under the command of Colonel Paul Blobel, had also received orders: to effectuate the liquidation of the entire Jewish population of Lubny. Blobel was one of the SS officers who had organized the huge massacre of Jews at Babi Yar, Kiev, in late September 1941, where 33,771 Jews were murdered in the space of two days. Later, in November 1941, Blobel received and put into operation the first gas vans in Ukraine, as well.

As perpetrated by Blobel’s unit, all the Jews were then herded just outside of Lubny—they never made it to the village of Zasule, which was just a ruse to assemble the population—and murdered in small batches at the Zasylskiy ravine. As many members of the population as could be located were shot into the ravine: men, women, children, babies, and the elderly. On that day, 1,865 Jews were murdered; not just the Jews of Lubny but also those from Shtalag-328, a makeshift concentration camp that had been established earlier in Lvov (Lviv) and the areas around Babi Yar. The Nazis did not stop the killing there. In the second half of November 1941 they found and killed another 73 Jews missed in the first sweep. Those who, despite all this, still managed to survive as skilled laborers in demand for the German military were killed during April and May 1942.

Overall, therefore, across the period from October 1941 to May 1942, approximately 2,000 Jews were murdered in Lubny. Their fate would have been largely forgotten were it not for the fact that a number of photographs were taken by the SS themselves during the killing process. The originals of these are filed in the archives of Hamburg's Institut für Sozialforschung (Institute for Social Research) and were used by Danish documentary filmmaker Ove Nyholm in his celebrated 2004 film The Anatomy of Evil (Ondskabens Anatomi).

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Einsatzgruppen; Kommissarbefehl; Operation Barbarossa; Ukraine

Further Reading

- Arad, Yitzhak, and Shmuel Krakowski. The Einsatzgruppen Reports: Selections from the Dispatches of the Nazi Death Squads' Campaign against the Jews, July 1941–January 1943. New York: Holocaust Library, 1990.
- Rhodes, Richard. Masters of Death: The SS-Einsatzgruppen and the Invention of the Holocaust. New York: Random House, 2002.

Lutz, Carl

Carl Lutz was the Swiss vice-consul in Budapest between 1942 and 1945. Through his actions, tens of thousands of Jews were saved from deportation and death at the hands of the Nazis following the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944.

He was born in Walzenhausen, Switzerland, on March 30, 1895 and migrated to the United States as an 18-year-old, working in a number of places before attending college at Central Wesleyan College, Missouri. In 1920 he joined the Swiss legation in Washington, D.C., and while there completed his education at George Washington University. In 1926 he worked at the Swiss consulate in Philadelphia, before moving on to the consulate in St. Louis, where he worked until 1934. That year, he was appointed as vice-consul in Jaffa, Palestine, serving there for the next eight years.

His next appointment was as Swiss vice-consul to Budapest, where he arrived in January 1942. As chief of the Department of Foreign Interests he represented some 14 countries then currently at war with Hungary. Additionally, given his experience of the past few years, it was not long before he began cooperating with the Jewish Agency for Palestine to help in facilitating Jewish immigration through issuing Swiss safe conduct documents, enabling almost 10,000 Hungarian Jewish children to emigrate.

Germany invaded and occupied Hungary on March 19, 1944. Almost immediately, the Holocaust arrived in the form of SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, who brought with him a team of experts to oversee the ghettoization and eventual deportation of Hungary's Jews. Lutz began to help the Jews by trying to persuade the Hungarian government to stop the deportations. He then negotiated a special deal involving both the Hungarian government and the Nazis, obtaining permission to issue protective letters to 8,000 Hungarian Jews for emigration to Palestine. By the time he had finished, almost 50,000 Jews had been put under Swiss protection as potential immigrants to Palestine, each one having received a letter of protection (Schutzbrief) guaranteeing their safety from persecution until they left for Palestine.

As a way of hiding this vastly overinflated number, Lutz repeated numbers 1 through 8,000 with each new batch of visas, and grouped each batch of 1,000 names together into one Swiss collective passport.

In like manner as his Spanish contemporary, Ángel Sanz Briz, he also established safe houses around the capital—some 76, in fact, all bearing the Swiss consular seal declaring them to be extensions of Swiss diplomatic territory. One of these was the property known as “the Glass House,” where, at one time, around 3,000 Jews found refuge. As an engaged Christian, Carl Lutz felt he had to find every means possible to protect the people he considered to be in his care. In the houses, Lutz's wife Gertrud played an important role in providing food and assisting with finding medical treatment. Lutz possessed only paltry financial resources, but his attitude was that if assistance was needed, a way could always be found to provide it.

He worked closely with others in the diplomatic community. These included men such as Raoul Wallenberg of Sweden, Carlos de Liz-Teixeira Branquinho and Sampaio Garrido of Portugal, Angelo Rotta from the Vatican, Ángel Sanz Briz and Giorgio Perlasca representing Spain, and Friedrich Born, the Swiss delegate of the International Committee of the Red Cross. Lutz, with his longer experience in refugee relief, instructed Wallenberg and the others on the best use of the protective letters, and provided his colleagues with information as to whom they should approach in Hungarian official circles.

During the death marches of November 10–22, 1944, Carl and Gertrud Lutz followed the Jews. Whenever possible, they would pull prisoners out of the line by producing documents declaring them under Swiss protection and demanding that the guards allow them to return to Budapest.

The Swiss Minister in Budapest, Maximilian Jaeger, supported Lutz thoroughly until the government in Bern ordered him home as the Soviet army approached in late 1944. Help and support for Lutz then continued at the hands of Harald Feller, who took over after Jaeger's recall. As the Soviet siege of Budapest intensified during December 1944, when all diplomatic and consular missions except Sweden's had left the Hungarian capital, Lutz remained at his post. He risked his life to continue saving Jews, and for a period of nearly a month he and Gertrud remained in a bunker under the residence of the former British embassy with a group of Jews they had rescued. Finally, when the Soviets took over in January 1945, Carl and Gertrud Lutz returned to Switzerland.

After the liberation a Swiss inquiry into Lutz's wartime activities took place. He was criticized for having exceeded his authority and endangering Swiss neutrality, despite the fact that he had saved the lives of tens of thousands of people. As a result, his career suffered and he was denied opportunities to advance. His reputation was only restored in 1958, when Switzerland reconsidered its role during World War II. At this, Lutz became something of a national hero in the eyes of the public, the more so when it was realized that he was responsible for helping 62,000 Jews to survive. He finally retired in 1961.

On March 24, 1964, Yad Vashem recognized Carl Lutz as one of the Righteous among the Nations, the first Swiss national to be so named. Fourteen years later, on February 13, 1978, Gertrud Lutz was similarly recognized. Carl Lutz died in Bern, Switzerland, on February 12, 1975, a few weeks short of his 80th birthday.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Hungary; Perlasca, Giorgio; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations; Rotta, Angelo; Sweden; Wallenberg, Raoul; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

- Paldiel, Mordecai. Diplomat Heroes of the Holocaust, New York: Yeshiva University/KTAV, 2007.
- Paldiel, Mordecai. The Path of the Righteous: Gentile Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust. Hoboken (NJ): KTAV, 1993.
- Tschuy, Theo. Dangerous Diplomacy: The Story of Carl Lutz, Rescuer of 62,000 Hungarian Jews. Grand Rapids (MI): William B. Eerdmans, 2000.
- Vámos, György. Carl Lutz (1895–1975): Swiss Diplomat in Budapest 1944. A Righteous among the Nations. Geneva: Éditions de Penthes. 2012.

Luxembourg

Luxembourg is a small, land-locked constitutional monarchy located in west-central Europe. The country had a 1939 population of 293,000 people, of whom some 3,500 were Jewish. A sizable number of these Jews had moved to Luxembourg from Eastern Europe during the 1930s to escape persecution. In spite of Luxembourg's declaration of neutrality at the time of the outbreak of war in 1939, it was invaded by German forces in May 1940 and temporarily governed by military officials; in late July, civilian occupation officials took over. In August the Germans formally annexed Luxembourg. The Nazis attempted to "Germanize" the country, which met with much resistance among a majority of the population. In September 1940 occupation officials instituted anti-Jewish laws and restrictions that were modeled after Germany's Nuremberg Laws. At the same time, Jews were encouraged to leave Luxembourg, which a good number did (perhaps as many as 2,500), between the fall of 1940 and the fall of 1941. Most resettled as refugees in the unoccupied areas in neighboring France.

As Luxembourg's resistance movement took hold, German authorities began deporting Luxembourgers to Germany in April 1941; almost 12% of the population would ultimately be moved. Meanwhile, in October 1941, German officials banned further Jewish emigration. Thereafter, 800 Jews were interned at a transit camp in the northern part of the country. Between October 1941 and April 1943, 674 of those Jews were transported to concentration camps further east. Of that number, only 36 were thought to have survived until the end of the war. In France, most of the Jews who had migrated there from Luxembourg in the early stages of the conflict were also deported to the east and murdered.

In the early autumn of 1944 Allied troops moved into Luxembourg, pushing the Germans to the east. During the December 16, 1944–January 16, 1945, Battle of the Bulge, however, the tiny nation was physically devastated; it would not be entirely liberated until February 1945. More than 5,150 civilians died in Luxembourg during the war, and estimates of Jews killed range from 1,000 to as high as 2,500.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Nuremberg Laws

Further Reading

Eyck, F. Gunther. The Benelux Countries: An Historical Survey. Princeton (NJ): Van Nostrand, 1959.

Newcomer, James. The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 1984.

M

Madagascar Plan

The Madagascar Plan was a preposterous plan that nevertheless was taken very seriously for a period of time by the Nazi regime as a possible way to rid Europe of its Jews. The plan was to expel Europe's Jews to the French colonial island of Madagascar. It represents the Nazi policy with regard to Jews that immediately preceded the "Final Solution," the extermination of Europe's Jews.

Expelling the Jews from Europe to Madagascar was not a new idea. It was proposed as early as 1885 and continued to be discussed during the early 20th century.

Madagascar is an island in the Indian Ocean, off the coast of Mozambique in the southeastern part of Africa. It is more than 225,000 square miles in size, subject to a six-month rainy season, oppressive heat, and cyclones. It became a French colony in 1897, which was its status at the time of the Holocaust.

Although previously considered by the Nazi leadership—Reinhard Heydrich ordered and received a report from Adolf Eichmann in December 1938—the idea of using Madagascar as the repository for Europe's Jews became a serious policy proposal when Franz Rademacher, the head of the Jewish Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Judenreferat, or Referat D III) wrote a memorandum on June 3, 1940, suggesting this as a solution to the Jewish Question. The idea spread so quickly within the Nazi leadership that it was not long before Hitler mentioned it, and Reinhard Heydrich successfully argued that it fell within his remit. Even the possibility of such a plan gave hope to Hans Frank, the governor of the Generalgouvernement—the section of Poland not annexed to Germany—who desperately sought a way to deal with the millions of Jews in his territory.

The Madagascar Plan envisioned the island transferred from France to Germany under a mandate. It would become the site of a colony of Jews under the administration of a German Police Governor (Rademacher referred to it as a huge ghetto). Although it would be a police state, the Jews would create their own administration, including mayors, police, and so on. The Jews would be liable for the value of the island (that is, they would have to pay for the value of the land), and payment was to be made through the establishment of an intra-European bank that would be funded by the sale of the property of the exported Jews and by contributions from American Jews.

Two other provisions of the plan were telling: the Jews would lose the citizenship of whatever country they came from and would not be German citizens; and they would be held there in order to assure "good behavior" by American Jews.

Adolf Eichmann drafted a plan for Madagascar on August 15, 1940, titled Reichssicherheitshauptamt: Madagascar Projekt (Reich Main Security Office: Madagascar Project), in which he proposed that 1 million Jews would be deported to Madagascar each year for four years.

The feasibility of the entire plan rested on the outcome of two military events. The first was the surrender of France to Germany following the German invasion on May 10, 1940. When that happened on June 22, the needed land mass—Madagascar—was now, potentially at least, able to be transferred to German control. The second event was the Battle of Britain, the intensive effort by Germany to dominate the Royal Air Force (RAF), which was waged for more than three months between July and October 1940. It was assumed by the Germans that victory over the British in the air would be the first step toward the invasion and complete surrender of Britain. The outcome of the battle was relevant to the Madagascar Plan: Germany's victory would remove Britain's Royal Navy as a source of military intervention of ships taking Jews to Madagascar; and it would provide Germany with the ships needed to carry out such a massive operation.

Germany's loss in the Battle of Britain brought an abrupt end to the Madagascar Plan. That it had been considered very seriously by Nazi leaders, including Hitler, Heydrich, and Eichmann, provides an insight into Germany's thinking in 1940 regarding Europe's Jews. Although it was clear to all that the Madagascar Plan—had it gone forward—would have resulted in the death of hundreds of thousands of Jews trying to survive in a police state in a difficult climate, it was also clear that the decision to exterminate every Jewish man, woman, and child in Europe had not yet been made.

MICHAEL DICKERMAN

See also: Ethnic Cleansing; Frank, Hans; Generalgouvernement; Heydrich, Reinhard; Rademacher, Franz

Further Reading

Browning, Christopher R. The Origins of the Final Solution: The Evolution of Nazi Jewish Policy, September 1939–March 1942. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2004.

Jennings, Eric. "Writing Madagascar Back into the Madagascar Plan." Holocaust and Genocide Studies 21, 2 (2007), 187–217.

Longerich, Peter. Holocaust: The Nazi Persecution and Murder of the Jews. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Majdanek

A Nazi forced labor and death camp established by the Nazis in Poland on October 1, 1941, which remained operational until July 22, 1944, when it was liberated by Soviet troops. Majdanek was located just outside the Polish city of Lublin; unlike other Nazi camps in Poland, it was the only one not to be situated in a rural, isolated locale. Throughout its existence, the capacity of the camp continued to be expanded as more and more prisoners were transported there. Majdanek also served as a transit camp, where prisoners were temporarily housed while en route to other camps. Initially, SS leader Heinrich Himmler ordered the construction of Lublin-Majdanek as a forced labor camp that was to house Soviet war prisoners. The camp was to have a prisoner population of 50,000. By the end of 1941 that capacity had been raised to 250,000. Much of the early construction was done by Soviet prisoners of war and Jews deported from nearby Lublin.

Like most of the Nazi death camps, Lublin-Majdanek was staffed with SS officials along with locally recruited police forces. Prisoners also helped run the camp. Kapos helped maintain order and discipline in the barracks, while slave labor working in the crematoria (Sonderkommandos) readied prisoners for the gas chambers and later moved their bodies to crematoria or mass graves.

During 1942 and 1943 the camp's population continued to expand as Jews from other parts of Poland were deported there. By 1943 Lublin-Majdanek had 145 barracks; that same year, the subcamps of Budzyn, Trawniki, Krasnik, Pulawy, Luopwa, and Poniatowa were subsumed by Majdanek's administration. Perhaps the largest single influx of Jews to arrive at Majdanek occurred in 1942, when some 25,000 were transferred from Belzec, another death camp. The following year, 18,000–22,000 more Jews were sent to the camp; most had been residents of the Warsaw Ghetto, which had been liquidated as a result of the April 13, 1943, uprising there.

Beginning on a massive scale in the fall of 1943, camp officials began exterminating prisoners using carbon monoxide and Zyklon-B gas. Most of the bodies were incinerated in the facility's crematoria. Beginning on November 3, Nazi officials forced prisoners and Jews detained in nearby subcamps to begin digging mass graves. SS officials then shot and killed 18,000 Jews outside Lublin-Majdanek (8,000 from the camp alone) and buried them in the graves that the victims themselves had dug.

On July 22, 1944, Soviet troops rushed toward the camp. Because of their hasty arrival, camp officials were unable to disguise or hide their activities as they did at other mass murder sites. What the Soviets found was deeply disturbing—detainees who were near starvation and rail-thin, gas chambers with bodies still in them, and crematoria with human remains and mounds of ashes. In August the Soviets cordoned off the entire camp and convened a Soviet-Polish commission designed to investigate the Nazis' activities at Lublin-Majdanek. This was one of the first efforts to document German war crimes in Eastern Europe, and it occurred almost a year before the end of World War II. Because the Soviets secured the camp before the Nazis could properly dismantle it, it is considered the best-preserved death camp site from the Holocaust era.

Estimates as to the death toll at Lublin-Majdanek vary considerably, from as low as 78,000 to as high as 1.5 million. Holocaust scholars have since determined that the death toll may have been around 360,000, although an exact number is impossible to determine. Some 75,000–90,000 Jews (60,000 of them Polish Jews) were deported to the camp between 1941 and 1944. While many were gassed to death, many also died from the brutal conditions in the camp as well as from forced labor.

Numerous camp personnel were prosecuted for war crimes and crimes against humanity. The first trial occurred in late 1944, when four SS soldiers and two kapos were tried; five of the men were executed on December 4, 1944, while the sixth man committed suicide. Of the approximately 1,037 SS personnel who worked at Lublin-Majdanek, only 170 were prosecuted for war crimes; the last trial occurred in West Germany in 1981. After World War II ended in 1945, three of the camp's commandants were also tried, convicted, and executed.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Belzec; Concentration Camps; Crimes against Humanity; Death Camps; Final Solution; Gas Chambers; Liberation, Concentration Camps; Night and Fog; Operation Harvest Festival; Roma Genocide in the Holocaust; Slovakia; Sonderkommando; War Crimes; Wrobel, Eta; Zyklon-B

Further Reading

Mailänder, Elissa. Female SS Guards and Workaday Violence: The Majdanek Concentration Camp, 1942–1944. East Lansing (MI): Michigan State University Press, 2015.

Wachsmann, Nikolaus. KL: A History of the Nazi Concentration Camps. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2015.

Mann, Franczeska

Franczeska Mann was a Jewish dancer from Poland who expressed her resistance to the Nazis in a particularly dramatic way immediately prior to her murder at Auschwitz in October 1943. Born on February 4, 1917, she was based in Warsaw, where she studied dance at the Irena Prusicka dance school, one of the city's three largest dance academies.

When the war broke out she was renowned as a beautiful performer at the Melody Palace nightclub, seen as one of the most promising dancers of her generation. It was not long before she moved into the Warsaw Ghetto, but she managed to leave again holding a foreign passport, probably obtained from the Hotel Polski on the Aryan side. In July 1943 the Germans arrested the 600 Jewish inhabitants of the hotel. Some were sent to Bergen-Belsen, while others were sent to Vittel in France to await transfer to South America. Franczeska Mann was one of those on the Bergen-Belsen transport.

On October 23, 1943, a train with some 1,700 Polish Jews carrying foreign passports was transported out of Bergen-Belsen and sent to Auschwitz. They had been led to believe that they were being taken to a transfer camp called Bergau, near Dresden, from where they would continue on to Switzerland to be exchanged for German POWs; but this was a ruse to get them to cooperate. They were told that they had to have showers and to be “disinfected” prior to moving on to Switzerland and were taken into a room next to the gas chamber where they were ordered to undress.

At this, in a famous and often-quoted episode of camp lore, Franczeska attacked two SS men: the roll call officer, SS Sergeant Major Josef Schillinger and an SS sergeant named Emmerich. Having come from Warsaw, where stories of the mass killing of Jews had already been circulating for some time, it did not take long for those in the transport to realize what their fate would be. They soon became, in the words of Filip Müller, a Sonderkommando worker who was there, “restless,” knowing, it would seem, “what was up.” As the Jews began to disrobe, the two SS men were attracted by Franczeska's beauty. Schillinger ordered her to undress completely, and with this, as soon as she noticed they were staring at her, Franczeska launched into what appeared to be a seductive strip-tease act. The SS men became fascinated by her performance and paid little attention to anything else. On seeing that they had momentarily relaxed, she acted, it was recalled later, “with lightning speed.” As she was taking off one of her shoes she sprang at Emmerich and slammed the heel into his forehead, at the same time grabbing his pistol and firing two shots, point-blank, into Schillinger's stomach. Then she fired a third shot, which wounded Emmerich.

A panic broke out among everyone present, the SS retreated to safer ground, and the Sonderkommando managed, with difficulty, to lock the doors of the gas chamber before a riot took place. Reports as to what happened next vary. According to one, the shots served as a signal for the other women to attack the SS guards; to another, an SS man had his nose torn off and one was scalped. Elsewhere, the only victims referred to were Schillinger and Emmerich.

Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Hoess rushed to the scene with reinforcements carrying machine guns and grenades. A report stated later that the women were removed from the scene one by one, taken outside, and shot. Another view, from Filip Müller, is that all women not yet inside the gas chamber were mown down by machine guns; yet another states that they were pushed into the chamber and then gassed.

Given the various conflicting accounts, it is unclear what happened after the incident, but some things can be confirmed. Josef Schillinger died and Sergeant Emmerich was wounded at the hands of Franczeska Mann, who refused to be a passive victim; all the Jewish women were subsequently murdered; and the incident prompted a panicked response from the SS command. In view of this, it could be said that Franceska's subsequent death was bought for the Nazis at a high price, emphasizing that not all Jewish victims were prepared to walk to their death without resistance.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Auschwitz; Bergen-Belsen; Hoess, Rudolf; Warsaw Ghetto

Further Reading

Bartrop, Paul R. Surviving the Camps: Unity in Adversity during the Holocaust. Lanham (MD): University Press of America, 2000.

Müller, Filip. Eyewitness Auschwitz: Three Years in the Gas Chambers. New York: Stein and Day, 1979.

Manstein, Erich von

Germany's Erich von Manstein was one of World War II's leading exponents of panzer tactics. He originated the plan to defeat France in 1940, and his mobile defensive tactics on the Eastern Front are classics of the art of war.

Friedrich Erich von Lewinsky Manstein was born in Baden, Germany, on November 24, 1887, into a family steeped in military service. Orphaned at an early age, he was adopted by his uncle, a general in the German Imperial Army. Manstein attended the Prussian Cadet Corps and graduated an officer-cadet in 1906. After several years of military service, he was selected to attend the prestigious War College in 1913. The school closed after World War I broke out in August 1914, however, and Manstein transferred to the Eastern Front as a staff officer. He acquitted himself well, was severely wounded in action, and in 1919 was one of only a few junior officers retained in the peacetime German Army.

Until 1927 Manstein held a variety of troop and staff assignments before being transferred to the Ministry of War as a major. Two years later, he was promoted to colonel and gained appointment to the General Staff. In this capacity, he served under General Ludwig Beck until the latter was dismissed by Adolf Hitler in August 1938. Manstein, viewed with some suspicion, was then transferred out of the General Staff and assigned to command an infantry division. On the eve of World War II, his men formed part of General Gerd von Rundstedt's Southern Army Corps.

In September 1939 Manstein distinguished himself in combat during the invasion of Poland. That fall, the General Staff was ordered by Hitler to draw up plans for an invasion of France. The strategy fielded by Chief of Staff Franz Halder called for a simple repetition of the traditional Schlieffen Plan. However, Manstein, who possessed a flair for operational planning, audaciously countered with a plan of his own. He called for concentrating armored forces in the center of the Allied line at the Ardennes, where thick forests would mask such movement, and charging headlong into Sedan. The General Staff initially rejected the plan as too risky, but it eventually came to the attention of Hitler himself, who approved it.

Manstein aspired to lead the tank forces in his own operations, but the General Staff, smarting from his interference, saw to it that he commanded an infantry corps instead. Nonetheless, the attack, spearheaded in May 1940 by General Heinz Guderian's panzers, worked brilliantly and broke through French lines. Manstein himself led the first infantry force across the Rhine River and played a major role in the ensuing German victory. The following July he was personally rewarded by Hitler with promotion to lieutenant general and command of his own panzer corps. He was scheduled to direct landing operations during the anticipated invasion of England, but when this scheme was abandoned following the Battle of Britain, he transferred back to Poland to command a panzer corps there.

Beginning on June 22, 1941, Manstein bore a conspicuous role in Operation Barbarossa, the German invasion of the Soviet Union. On the first day, Manstein's armored column drove 50 miles through enemy lines on a direct course for Leningrad. However, he had so outstripped supporting units that his tanks were required to stop and allow them to catch up. In July Manstein resumed the drive on Leningrad until Hitler ordered him south to fend off a Soviet counterattack at Lake Ilmen. This done, Hitler then ordered several panzer divisions away from the drive on Moscow to support operations in the Ukraine. The Germans captured nearly 1 million prisoners but also lost much valuable time in mopping up operations. Consequently, when Manstein was finally able to approach Leningrad that fall, the city was heavily fortified and ready for him. Before he could probe its defenses, Manstein gained appointment as commander of the 11th

Army on the Southern Front, with orders to take Rostov and the Crimea. Lacking the strength to do both, he initiated a modest but technically brilliant drive upon the latter, and after much heavy fighting, he captured Sebastopol in September 1942. This victory culminated in his promotion to field marshal and acknowledgment as one of Germany's finest tank commanders.

Despite tactical victories over the Soviet army, the German strategic position deteriorated in the fall of 1943 when General Friedrich von Paulus's forces became trapped during the Battle of Stalingrad. In January 1943 Manstein initiated Operation Winter Storm to relieve Paulus. He came within 25 miles of the beleaguered defenders, but Hitler had forbidden Paulus's troops to abandon the city. Paulus, promoted to field marshal in order to promote German morale, was captured along with his army on February 2, 1943, but Manstein managed to extricate German forces further east in the Caucasus Mountains. The strategic initiative then passed to the Soviets, and the Germans were forced to fend off larger and larger offensives against their thinning ranks.

Manstein, however, came up with a novel tactical solution that he dubbed the "mobile defense." Whenever Soviet forces penetrated German lines, his panzers would hammer away at their flanks and rear, destroying them. In this manner, he recaptured Kharkov in February 1943, inflicting 40,000 casualties. Later that spring, he enthusiastically supported Operation Citadel, the proposed reduction of the Kursk salient, provided it could be attacked in April before Soviet defenses had consolidated. Hitler managed to delay the offensive until July, when the Soviets were thoroughly dug in, and German forces suffered a bloody drawn battle. Manstein's panzers penetrated farthest into the southern Soviet defensive belt, but even they could not overcome such horrendous losses.

By 1944 the Germans were continually losing ground to Soviet forces. These problems were compounded by Hitler, who insisted that not a single foot of soil be yielded in retreat, regardless of the consequences. Manstein, for his part, maintained his mobile defense scheme for as long as possible, punishing several Soviet columns over the next few months. Hitler came to view his successful tactics as defeatist, however, and relieved him of command on March 25, 1944.

Manstein retired to his estate until the end of the war and was arrested there by the British as a war criminal. Although charges of executing Jews in Russia were eventually dropped, he was found guilty of failing to protect civilians in wartime and sentenced to 18 years in prison. This sentence was eventually commuted to 10 years, but he was discharged on a medical release in August 1952. Manstein spent the next few years helping organize the army of the Federal Republic of Germany. Manstein died in Irschenhausen on June 11, 1973.

JOHN C. FREDRIKSEN

See also: France; Manstein Trial; Operation Barbarossa

Further Reading

Cooper, Matthew. The German Army, 1933–1945. New York: Bonanza Books, 1984.

Manstein, Erich. Lost Victories. Novato (CA): Presidio, 1982.

Manstein Trial

The war crimes trial of Field Marshal Erich von Manstein was held from August 23 to December 18, 1949. Manstein was the only German of that rank tried for war crimes after World War II. His trial, the last of the Allied trials of German war criminals in Germany, was controversial in light of the political realities of postwar Europe. After being found guilty on the charge of neglecting his supervisory duties and therefore participating in the crime of genocide, in addition to other war crimes, Manstein was released after serving less than half of his sentence.

In mid-1947 American war crimes prosecutor Telford Taylor stumbled across incriminating material against the German field marshals in British custody, namely Walther von Brauchitsch, Gerd von Rundstedt, and Fritz Erich von Lewinski (called Manstein), as well as against the senior general, Adolf Strauss. Taylor then informed British public prosecutor Sir Hartley Shawcross of his findings. Pointing out that political protests were likely to ensue, a commission called together by Lord Chancellor William Allen Jowitt in October 1947 supported the recommendation of the British minister of war, Frederick Bellenger, to have charges brought against the generals at the High Command (OKW) Trial. The American military governor, Lucius D. Clay, however, rejected this proposal, as the German experts of the Foreign Office and the representatives of the British military government in Germany did not wish to damage British-German relations by launching their own trial against members of the former Wehrmacht elite. On the other hand, others, including Shawcross; parliamentary secretary of state Elwyn Jones; foreign minister Ernest Bevin; and the new minister of war, Emanuel Shinwell, argued for criminal proceedings to begin.

In March 1948 the government of the Soviet Union issued extradition papers for Rundstedt and Manstein; Poland followed suit. The British government then announced that the generals would be brought before a British military court, and on July 5, 1948, the cabinet decided that a trial would be held. Major resistance to the effort emerged among prominent representatives of the British military, the peace movement, and the Conservative Party under the leadership of Sir Basil Liddell Hart. After Brauchitsch died in October 1948 and the government dropped charges against Strauss and Rundstedt for reasons of health, the British government had to defend itself particularly against accusations by Poland and the Soviet Union of having gone soft on the prosecution of war criminals. On May 5, therefore, the cabinet decided, despite the resistance, to press charges against Manstein alone.

Sir Arthur Comyns-Carr, who had already represented the British government at the war crimes tribunal in Tokyo, served as the prosecutor, with Elwyn Jones designated as his deputy. The indictment against Manstein listed 17 charges and several hundred crimes committed by military units including the SS, military police, secret police, and SS-operational forces under Manstein's command during the war against Poland and the Soviet Union. Manstein was accused of having broken military laws and practices by having agreed to criminal orders and/or by having given such orders himself, therefore rendering him responsible for their consequences. The charges included all aspects of the German war of annihilation in the East: abuse, deportation, forced labor, murder of war combatants and populace, and the shooting of Soviet commissars. A central charge claimed that Manstein had incited army units to acts of murder against Jews. The legal grounds for the trial were established among other sources by the Royal Warrant of August 1945, British military law, the HLKO of 1907, as well as the administration of justice at the Nuremberg trials.

Pretrial support for Manstein continued to build. In addition to the criticism aimed at the legal grounds of the trial, the support for Manstein was primarily motivated by the goal of keeping West Germany as a Cold War ally; with this in mind, the bishop of Chichester urged a general amnesty. Members of the British House of Lords, supported by former prime minister Winston Churchill, began a successful money-raising effort to help pay defense attorneys. Thanks to these funds, Manstein was represented by a total of five attorneys. In addition to Germans Paul Leverkuehn and Hans Laternser, the defense counselors included Reginald T. Paget, a Labor Party representative; Samuel C. Silkin, a Jewish Labor Party representative; and Bill Croome, a British defense specialist. Manstein also contributed strongly to his own defense.

The trial began on August 23, 1949, one week after the election of the first postwar West German parliament. Held in Hamburg in a British military court under the direction of Lieutenant-General Sir Frank Simpson, it was the last war crimes trial held by the Allies in Germany. The defense particularly used the trial as an anticommunist platform. Nevertheless, on December 18, 1949, the court sentenced Manstein to 18 years' imprisonment. He was exonerated on eight points but convicted of having neglected his duties of supervision and of thereby having shared responsibility for genocide as well as, among other things, having allowed the deportation, abuse, and shooting of Soviet prisoners and commissars of the Red Army and civilians.

In light of the circumstances, the sentence was surprisingly harsh and prompted a wave of support for Manstein in Germany and in many other Western countries; in February 1950, the commander-in-chief of the British Rhine Army, Sir Charles Keightley, reduced the sentence from 18 to 12 years. Manstein became one of the most prominent German prisoners in Allied custody and soon stood at the center of debates surrounding the treatment of the German soldiers convicted of war crimes in West Germany and Great Britain. His release was accelerated by public interest in the fate of Manstein, who was granted early release in May 1953. Manstein later served as a military consultant to the West German government.

OLIVER VON WROCHEM

See also: Genocide; Manstein, Erich von; Nuremberg Trials; Taylor, Telford; War Crimes

Further Reading

Hoffman, J. H. "German Field Marshals as War Criminals? A British Embarrassment." Journal of Contemporary History 23 (1988): 17–35.

Paget, Reginald T. Manstein: His Campaigns and His Trials. London: Collins 1951.

Marian, Ferdinand

Ferdinand Marian was an Austrian theater and film actor, best known for playing the leading character of Joseph Süß Oppenheimer in the Nazi propaganda film from 1940, Jud Süß, directed by Veit Harlan. Born in Vienna as Ferdinand Haschkowitz on August 14, 1902, he came from a musical family; his father was a bass player and his mother an opera singer. He gravitated to the theater from an early age, working through his father as an extra at the majestic Stadttheater Graz, before developing a career in acting. Seeking to make his own way, he moved to Germany and by 1938 began performing as part of the company with the Deutsches Theater in Berlin. Here, his most celebrated performance was as Iago in Shakespeare's Othello, a characterization that received a positive review from Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels.

Turning to movies, he attracted attention for his portrayals of attractive leading men in such films as Der Tunnel (Curtis Bernhardt, 1933), Madame Bovary (Gerhard Lamprecht, 1937), and La Habanera (Detlef Sierck, 1937). In many of his roles he played the part of a villain or devious ladykiller, typecasting him in a particularly negative way that would haunt him later.

From 1940 onward he was engaged repeatedly for Nazi propaganda films, certainly because of his drawing power, but not least because of his ability to play unsavory characters of the kind useful for the purposes of wartime and anti-semitic indoctrination. The most important of these was his portrayal of Joseph Süß Oppenheimer in the title role of Jud Süß. Goebbels took a special interest in seeing to it that Marian was cast by Harlan in this role, from what he had seen of Marian as Iago years earlier.

Initially Marian was reluctant to take the assignment, but Goebbels wrote in his diary: "Talked with Marian about the Jud Süß material. He hesitates to play the Jew. But I will make him play the part," Goebbels added, "emphatically." Goebbels is reported to have been a frequent visitor to the set and to have even written or rewritten parts of the script.

Based on a novel of the same name by Lion Feuchtwanger, the film told the story of Joseph Oppenheimer, known as "Jud Süß," a financial advisor to the Duke of Württemberg in the 18th century. Whereas the book drew a sympathetic picture of a tragic figure, Harlan and Goebbels created an image of Süß and the Jews around him as materialistic, immoral, cunning, and untrustworthy. Indeed, Süß, who shaved off his beard, wore court clothes, and worked on his accent to ensure that he would be able to insinuate himself into gentile society, was considered even more detestable owing to this duplicity. The other "Jewish" actors "looked" alien; Süß, appearing to be German, conformed completely to the Nazi image of the treacherous Jew worming his way into "Aryan" society in order to destroy it from within. The Nazis were thus able to utilize the Süß story as a parable about the alleged Jewish threat to Germany, and why it was good and legitimate to draw out the Jews and destroy their influence wherever possible.

The film became a runaway success not only in Germany but across Europe. Seen by tens of millions of moviegoers, it was a huge hit at its premiere at the 1940 Venice Film Festival. During the war years it was a favorite among Nazi and fascist youth groups throughout Europe, and it was even shown to concentration camp guards and German soldiers on the front. Marian's performance as the evil Jew Süß led to the film becoming arguably one of the most successful anti-semitic propaganda movies ever made.

He continued appearing in such movies, notably the 1941 propaganda movie Ohm Krüger, a 1941 biographical film directed by Hans Steinhoff depicting the life of the Afrikaner leader Paul Kruger and his eventual defeat by the British during the Boer War. The film attacked the brutal and imperialistic British in their takeover of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, showing Britain to be a nation seeking gold (of course, at the behest of the Jews), while attempting to destroy the Boers' honorable agrarian lifestyle. Marian, made to look like a gangster, took the role of British South African imperialist Cecil Rhodes.

After a number of wartime propaganda movies, Marian returned to acting in popular nonpolitical films in the latter half of the war, but his earlier successes dogged the rest of his career. Jud Süß was classified by the Allies as sheer anti-semitic Nazi propaganda, and after the war Marian's past caught up with him as he was banned from any future acting roles.

Part of the tragedy of Ferdinand Marian's life is that he was not a Nazi and, in fact, had a daughter from his first marriage to Jewish pianist Irene Saager. Moreover, his second wife's former husband, Julius Gellner, was also Jewish, and was hidden by Marian and his wife in the family home during the war.

On August 7, 1946, he was killed in a car crash near the village of Dürneck, Bavaria, aged 46. It was rumored at the time that Ferdinand Marian committed suicide, unable to come to terms with the roles he had taken during the war and suffering from previously unresolved feelings of guilt. Another argument is that he was intoxicated, having celebrated the news that he had been granted denazification papers from the American occupying authorities that would have enabled him to resume acting.

In 2010 a motion picture appeared focusing on Marian's performance in Jud Süß, focusing on the personal torment he suffered while making the film. Jew Süss: Rise and Fall, directed by Oskar Roehler, starred Austrian actor Tobias Moretti as Marian in the title role. When the movie had its world premiere at the Berlin International Film Festival on February 18, 2010, it was received with more boos than applause, and with scathing reviews critical of the filmmakers for revising historical accuracy in order to portray an overly sympathetic image of Marian.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Goebbels, Josef; Jud Süß; Propaganda in the Holocaust

Further Reading

Garden, Ian. The Third Reich's Celluloid War: Propaganda in Nazi Feature Films, Documentaries and Television. Stroud (UK): History Press, 2012.

Knilli, Friedrich. Ich war Jud Süß: Die Geschichte des Filmstars Ferdinand Marian. Berlin: Henschel, 2000.

Tegel, Susan. Jew Süß: Life, Legend, Fiction, Film. London: Continuum, 2011.

Marie-Benoît, Père

Père Marie-Benoît was a French Catholic priest credited for having saved several thousand Jews from near-certain deportation and death during World War II. Born Pierre Péteul on February 5, 1895, in Bourg d'Iré, western France, Père Marie-Benoît saw action during World War I as a medic's assistant and was wounded at Verdun. After the war he became a friar with the Capuchin Franciscan order. Ordained a priest, he undertook advanced studies in Rome, where he earned a doctorate in theology. Until 1940 he lived in the Capuchin monastery in Rome, but when war between France and Italy seemed inevitable, he returned to France and moved into the Capuchin monastery at Marseille.

Aware that there were thousands of Jewish refugees in the region hoping to flee to the relative safety of Spain or Switzerland, Père Marie-Benoît began a major operation to provide for the transportation of these people out of France. In the basement of his monastery he set up an elaborate assembly line producing bogus baptismal certificates, identification cards, passports, and other documents for Jewish refugees. He received aid from members of the French Resistance, as well as members of other religious organizations (Protestant, Greek Orthodox, and Jewish), and built solid (though illicit) relationships with local border guides, or passeurs. Through them, and utilizing the false documents he had engineered, he managed to smuggle thousands of refugees into the neutral countries. As his reputation grew, it was said that the waiting room in his monastery was always full and that the printing press in the basement worked overtime.

In November 1942 the Germans moved into what had, until then, been Unoccupied France. This included Marseille, which jeopardized Père Marie-Benoît's rescue activities. In order to be able to continue rescuing Jews, therefore, he moved to Nice, which was at that time still under Italian occupation. Here, he met with Guido Lospinoso, the Italian commissioner of Jewish affairs, whom Mussolini had hand-picked for the purpose of ensuring that there would be no special deals for Jews. Instead, Père Marie-Benoît negotiated a deal with Lospinoso to permit the passage of Jews through the city so they could seek refuge in Switzerland. He also successfully lobbied the Italians not to deport or harm the many French Jews living in Nice.

In July 1943 Père Marie-Benoît went to Rome in the hope of soliciting the Vatican's help in transporting Jews from France in northern Italy. While he was in Nice, Père Marie-Benoît met Angelo Donati, a leading Italian-Jewish banker. Donati had a plan that would see the relocation of the Italian Jewish population to North Africa. Such a huge operation, however, would require the support of the Italian government, which meant the cooperation of the Vatican. In April 1943 arrangements were made for Père Marie-Benoît to meet with Pope Pius XII to discuss the plan. According to one report, Marie-Benoît received a cold reception from the pope, who declined to assist. Besides, when the Germans occupied northern Italy and the Italian-occupied zone of France, the idea had to be shelved.

Vatican officials did, however, provide an alternative source of help. Père Marie-Benoît returned from Rome to France in order to facilitate the transportation of French Jews to safety in neighboring Spain, proceeding from an arrangement made with the Spanish government that allowed at least 2,600 French Jews to enter by offering "proof"—using Marie-Benoît's falsified documents—that they were of Spanish extraction.

In addition to helping Jewish refugees materially, he also attended to their spiritual needs, often comforting children as they awaited transport out of France. He worked hard to find safe houses to protect Jews from deportation.

When his supporters became concerned toward the end of the war that the Nazis and their French collaborationist allies were about to uncover his activities, Père Marie-Benoît fled France and took up residence in northern Italy under the alias "Father Benedetti." In Rome he was elected to the board of Delasem (Delegazione Assistenza Emigranti Ebrei, or Delegation for the Assistance of Jewish Emigrants), the main Jewish welfare organization in Italy. When the Jewish president of Delasem was arrested, Père Marie-Benoît was named acting president.

He immediately transferred the organization's headquarters to the International College of the Capuchins, where he recommenced the forging of documents for Jews. He contacted the Swiss, Romanian, Hungarian, and Spanish embassies, and obtained from them documents enabling Jews to circulate freely under false names. He also obtained ration cards from the police, asserting—deceptively—that they were meant for non-Jewish refugees. None of this escaped the attention of the Gestapo, and in early 1945 his office was raided several times. Most of the Delasem leadership were arrested, tortured, and executed.

Soon after this, Père Marie-Benoît went into hiding. Until the end of the war, however, he persisted in his efforts to save Jews.

When Rome was liberated in June 1944, the Jewish community held an official synagogue ceremony in honor of Père Marie-Benoît. Then, on December 1, 1966, Yad Vashem in Jerusalem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations, and he was presented with the award in person at a ceremony at the Israeli embassy in Paris in November 1967.

Père Marie-Benoît died in France on February 5, 1990, recognized by many in the Jewish community, fittingly, as Père des juifs—the Father of the Jews.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Catholic Church; France; Italy; Rescuers of Jews; Righteous among the Nations

Further Reading

Rogow, Sally M. They Must Not Be Forgotten: Heroic Priests and Nuns Who Saved People from the Holocaust. Martinsburg (WV): Holy Fire Publishing, 2005.

Zuccotti, Susan. Père Marie-Benoît and Jewish Rescue: How a French Priest Together with Jewish Friends Saved Thousands During the Holocaust. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2013.

Maus and Maus II

Two graphic novels (written and drawn in comic-book format) by acclaimed cartoonist Art Spiegelman. These books intertwine his parents' experiences as Holocaust survivors with his own troubled relationship with his parents. The Maus chronicles were first serialized in Raw, an avant-garde comics magazine published by Spiegelman and his wife, Françoise Mouly, from 1980 until 1991. In 1986, after an exhaustive search for a publisher, Spiegelman published the first six chapters of his serialization with Pantheon Books. They appeared as Maus: A Survivor's Tale, My Father Bleeds History. The last five chapters were published in 1991, also by Pantheon. That book was titled Maus II: A Survivor's Tale, And Here My Troubles Began. Since then, the two depictions have been republished separately and also together in one volume. In 1992 Spiegelman won a Pulitzer Prize for Literature, with Maus becoming the first comic book to be awarded this coveted honor.

Spiegelman's Maus serialization presented aspects of the Holocaust in an entirely new style and genre. Although some critics were critical of his decision to present such a grave subject in such an unconventional genre, others lauded his efforts to transcend the usual memoir-like depictions of the Holocaust and to open the subject to individuals who might not normally read about it. Indeed, Maus was perhaps the first comic medium to attract the serious attention of academics, intellectuals, and teachers. The style of the drawings can best be described as minimalist, although the author does a masterful job in terms of structure and layout. The story is driven largely by the text, however, with only a few panels lacking words. In all, there are some 1,500 black-and-white drawings in both volumes. Notably, the characters portrayed in the comic novel are represented by various animals. Germans are portrayed as cats, Jews as mice, and Poles as pigs. This is meant, in part, to deride the Nazis' strict and bogus classifications of humans, which drove their racial policies and the ensuing Holocaust.

Spiegelman's story arc moves back and forth in time, alternating between "present" time (1978–late 1980s), which is set in his father's hometown of Rego Park, New York, and "past" time (mid-1930s–1945), which takes place in Europe and chronicles his father's experiences before and during the Holocaust. A large part of the story deals with Spiegelman's contentious relationship with his father, Vladek, whom he portrays as being paranoid, stubborn, overly judgmental, and racist. Indeed, Spiegelman's retelling of his father's Holocaust testimony is in part colored by that relationship. The story also deals with Spiegelman's anger and grief over the 1968 suicide of his mother, also a Holocaust survivor, when he was just 20 years old. Other main characters include his stepmother, Mala, who is also a Holocaust survivor, and his wife, who converted to Judaism to please Vladek, although she never quite measured up in his father's eyes.

Maus and Maus II are ingenious not only because they are in a comic-book format but also because they are considered to be postmodern in their outlook. That is, they deal essentially with the memory of someone else's memory—in this case that of Spiegelman's father. Notably, he does not chronicle his mother's Holocaust ordeal because after her suicide Vladek destroyed her diaries in a fit of anguish. Spiegelman's work was among the first to chronicle the relationship of the children of Holocaust survivors with the survivors themselves.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Art and the Holocaust; Second Generation; Survivor Testimony

Further Reading

- Geis, Deborah R. (Ed.). Considering Maus: Approaches to Art Spiegelman's "Survivor's Tale" of the Holocaust. Tuscaloosa (AL): University of Alabama Press, 2007.
- Miller, Frieda. Maus: A Memoir of the Holocaust: Teacher's Guide. Vancouver: Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, 1998.
- Spiegelman, Art. The Complete Maus: 25th Anniversary Edition. New York: Pantheon, 1996.
- Spiegelman, Art. Metamaus: A Look inside a Modern Classic. New York: Pantheon, 2011.

Mauthausen Trial

The Mauthausen Trial was a war crimes trial of 61 German perpetrators associated with the Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp that was held from March 29, 1946, to May 13, 1946, conducted by a U.S. military government tribunal in Dachau, Germany. All 61 of the defendants were found guilty of having committed war crimes; 48 were hanged. This represented the single largest mass execution carried out among all of the U.S. war crimes tribunals. Mauthausen-Gusen was a large Nazi concentration camp located outside Linz, Austria. It was established in August 1938 and was the largest of its type in Austria. It featured a large main facility and 59 smaller camps, all administered by the same personnel. It was designed chiefly as a slave-labor center and may have held as many as 150,000 prisoners. Many, though not all, were Jews. Mauthausen was an important manufacturing center for the German war effort but was a brutal location for those interned there. Many inmates were literally worked to death, while thousands of others died from malnutrition, disease, beatings, and medical experimentation. U.S. troops liberated the camp on May 5, 1945.

After the 1945 liberation, U.S. military officials quickly determined that an investigation into the activities at Mauthausen should be carried out and, further, that prison personnel would be tried in a mass tribunal rather than through individual trial procedures. They chose to hold just one trial because individual ones would be too costly, time-consuming, and difficult to orchestrate. After a period of investigation and interviews, Lieutenant Colonel William D. Denson, a judge advocate for the U.S. Army, chose 61 individuals to prosecute. They had worked in the regional administration, main camp, and subcamps and included personnel from many ranks and strata—from the regional Nazi Party officer, August Eigruber, to rank-and-file guards. The group indictment was simple and straightforward; it charged each person with participation in a “common design” to commit war crimes. The wording of the indictment was purposefully broad and eliminated the need for the prosecution to prove wrongdoing on the part of each defendant. Because the defendants had all worked together, were aware of the activities in the camp, and had agreed to carry out the orders of the commandant and his superiors, it was held that all were equally culpable in the commission of war crimes.

The tribunal convened for just five weeks. In the end, all the defendants were convicted, and 48 were handed death sentences. The remainder received prison terms of varying lengths. During May 27–28, 1947, those given the death penalty were hanged in Landsberg Prison, Germany. Among those executed was Eigruber. Another eight individuals who had worked at the camp were tried during August 6–21, 1947; all were found guilty and executed on August 10, 1948. The second trial received little notice at the time. In the decades since the Mauthausen Trial, some critics have argued that the tribunal was deficient in both fairness and due process, but others have asserted that the proceedings were judicially sound based on the legal prescriptions and precedents of the time.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Mauthausen-Gusen; War Crimes

Further Reading

- Jardim, Tomaz. The Mauthausen Trial: American Military Justice in Germany. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 2012.
- Le Chêne, Evelyn. Mauthausen: The History of a Death Camp. London: Methuen, 1971.

Mauthausen-Gusen

Located approximately 12 miles east of the city of Linz in Upper Austria, this concentration camp was actually two sites—Mauthausen and Gusen (Gusen I, II, and III)—and further establishments numbering more than 100 subcamps throughout Austria. Its specific locale was between the small villages of Mauthausen and Sankt Georgen an der Gusen (or, simply, Gusen). This was located in what was formerly a heavily forested area away from the larger population centers and close to the stone quarry of Wienergraben. In terms of its horrific conditions and brutality, as well as the numbers of murdered victims (Jews, interestingly enough, being a decided minority), it rivaled Auschwitz-Birkenau in south-eastern Poland. In fact, it was the only camp(s) given Category III status and thus identified by the twin understandings Rückkehr unerwünscht (“return not desired”) and Vernichtung durch arbeit (“extermination by work”). In the offices of the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) in Berlin, it was also known, somewhat colloquially, as the Knochenmühle (“bone mill”).

Its primary victims were political and social dissidents and intellectuals, initially from Austria, but later from Spain (more than 7,000 anti-Franco Republicans and communists, members of the so-called International Brigade who also fought against the fascist takeover), Czechoslovakia, Soviet Russia, and Poland. Prior to liberation, in 1944 these groups began organizing serious resistance efforts, which culminated in an unsuccessful insurrection on February 1, 1945. It was organized primarily by Soviet prisoners, almost all of whom were either killed or captured. This “action” was labeled Mühlviertler Hasenjagd (“rabbit chase”) by the SS and those who assisted them. Jews, however, played a relatively minor role in both the organizing of such efforts and their implementation, due primarily to their smaller numbers and late arrival.

Mauthausen-Gusen was established under the direct imprimatur of Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler on August 8, 1938, after an initial visit to select the location, almost five months to the day after the German Anschluss with Austria on March 12, 1938. It would ultimately become one of the largest—if not the largest—slave labor complex in the whole of Nazi-occupied Europe. Although under the direct control of the Nazi state, Mauthausen-Gusen was initially founded by a private company as an economic enterprise. Its first commandant was SS Captain Albert Sauer (August 1, 1938–April 1 1939), until he was replaced by SS Colonel Franz Ziereis. He remained at the helm until the camp’s liberation on May 5, 1945. From March 1940 onward, SS Captain Georg Bachmayer was tasked with internal control of all prisoners inside the camps. Though estimates of victims vary, due largely to the destruction of vital records, overall numbers approached 200,000 between August 1, 1938, and May 5, 1945, with almost 100,000 murdered, including approximately 14,000 Jews. Of the more than 300,000 imprisoned in the various subcamps, no more than 80,000, representing 26%, survived. The liberation of Mauthausen-Gusen was achieved by members of the 41st Reconnaissance Squad, 11th Armored Division, 3rd U.S. Army, and it was the last such camp to be liberated by Allied forces. Among the more famous of those liberated was Simon Wiesenthal, acclaimed Austrian Nazi hunter and writer, and Hungarian Tibor Rubin, who would later go on to win the U.S. Congressional Medal of Honor for his military service in the Korean War.

As a slave-labor enterprise, Mauthausen-Gusen was the most successful operation under Nazi control in terms of both production outputs and profits, generating more than 11,000,000 Reichsmark by 1944. Among the major German corporations that benefitted from these slave laborers were Accumulatoren-Fabrik AFa (military batteries); Bayer Pharmaceuticals (medicines and medications); DEST cartel (bricks and quarry stone); Flugmotorenwerke Ostmark (airplane engines); Heinkel und Messerschmidt (airplane and rock production); and Otto Eberhard Patronenfabrik (munitions).

As regards the prisoners themselves, gas chambers for their deaths were originally in operation by 1940 and permanently by 1941, and, by war’s end, 10 functioning gas chambers were constructed and in use. The standard litany of abuse—beatings, torture, starvation, random shootings, and disease—was equally fully in evidence. Perhaps the most notoriously brutal method was that of requiring the stone quarry prisoners to race up the 186 “Stairs of Death” carrying their stones, often close to their own body-weights and averaging 110 pounds, falling to their deaths, being trampled by other prisoners, and, then, finally, making it to the top only to stand in line and be shot from behind—to the amusement and delight of their captors. Then, too, on many occasions prisoners were assembled in the various collection sites, sprayed with water and left to freeze to death in sub-zero temperatures or forced to take cold showers at the end of their work day, with the same effect. Camp diseases, such as dysentery, also took an enormous toll.

In the spring of 1946, 61 defendants were tried by the U.S. Military Tribunal stationed at Dachau. Fifty-eight were sentenced to death (49 executions were carried out), and three to life imprisonment. Later, nine of the initial death sentences were commuted to life sentences; and, between 1950 and 1951, the remaining 12 prisoners were released. However, more than 90% of the additional 224 Mauthausen-Gusen perpetrators (202) were found guilty and sentenced to varied prison terms.

The Mauthausen-Gusen site was declared an important historical site by Austria in 1949. Its museum officially opened in 1974. Mauthausen has remained largely intact, but Gusen I, II, and III have been transformed into residential dwellings.

See also: Austria; Concentration Camps; Gas Chambers; Heim, Aribert; Himmler, Heinrich; J.A. Topf and Sons; Mauthausen Trial; Reichssicherheitshauptamt; Weiss, Helga; Wiesenthal, Simon

Further Reading

Haunschmeid, Rudolf A., Jan-Ruth Mills, and Siegl Witzany-Durda. St. Georgen-Gusen-Mathausen: Concentration Camp Mauthausen Reconsidered. Books on Demand (www.gusen.org), 2008.

Horwitz, Gordon J. In the Shadow of Death: Living Outside the Gates of Mauthausen. New York: Free Press, 1990.

Kulish, Nicholas, and Souad Mekhennet. The Eternal Nazi: From Mauthausen to Cairo, the Relentless Pursuit of SS Doctor Aribert Heim. New York: Doubleday, 2014.

Le Chêne, Evelyn. Mauthausen: The History of a Death Camp. London: Methuen, 1971.

Mechelen

Mechelen (in French, Malines), a Belgian city of about 60,000 residents located halfway between Antwerp and Brussels, was the location of a transit camp from which the Nazis deported Jews to their death at the Auschwitz concentration and death camp in Poland.

Around 90% of Belgium's Jews lived either in Antwerp or Brussels, and Mechelen was ideally located about halfway between the two on a conveniently placed railroad line. In the summer of 1942 the Germans began to make preparations to deport Belgium's Jews and found that the Dossin de St. Georges military barracks in Mechelen, once modified, would make an excellent site for their needs. Once it was established, it was staffed by German SS with the assistance of Belgian SS collaborators belonging to the Algemeene-SS Vlaanderen.

Initially, Belgian prisoners had been taken to Breendonck, which had been a military fort before being turned into a holding camp by the Germans for Jews and political prisoners prior to their transfer to Germany. The first such prisoners arrived on December 20, 1940, and as the war intensified the camp became notorious as a place of horror. The precise number of victims across its duration is unknown, but estimates show that there were at least 3,000 deaths at Breendonck.

With the extension of the Holocaust to Belgium, the first group of Belgian Jews was arrested in Antwerp on July 22, 1942, and taken to Breendonck prior to being forwarded on to Mechelen on July 27. On August 4 this first transport was then sent to Auschwitz, where it arrived on August 6. This began a surge in deportations, such that between August and December 1942, two transports with about 1,000 Jews each left for Auschwitz each week. Overall, the period from August 4, 1942, to July 31, 1944, saw a total of 28 trains leave Mechelen for Poland. An aggregate of 24,916 Jews and 351 Roma were sent on these trains, most of whom were subsequently murdered at Auschwitz. It has been estimated that only 1,240 survived the Holocaust.

While in Mechelen, every Jewish inmate was required to wear an identification badge. These differed in accordance with what the immediate fate of each person would be: those marked with a "T" were Transport-Juden, that is, Jews who would be sent to the east. The letter "Z" was for citizens of the Allied countries or neutral countries, while "E" stood for Entscheidungsfalle (cases with a decision pending subject to further investigation). Finally, Jews marked with the letter "G" were known as Gefährliche Juden, or "dangerous Jews," who would be sent to a so-called straflager, or punishment camp. Jews who were married to non-Jews were sent to Drancy in German-occupied France; eventually, many of these, too, were deported to their deaths at Auschwitz.

While Mechelen was a place of transit for Jews on their way to their deaths, some people did manage to succeed in escaping from the trains on which they were traveling. All in all, perhaps up to 500 such escapes took place from the 28 transport trains leading out of the camp.

During the period 1942–1943, the Comité de Défense des Juifs (CDJ), the Belgian Jewish resistance movement, managed to derail several deportation trains coming out of Mechelen, but most of the Jews on those trains were subsequently picked up and deported to Auschwitz in later transports.

On the evening of April 19–20, 1943, however, the CDJ derailed one more train—the 20th—leaving Mechelen for Auschwitz. The CDJ was able to learn the exact date and time of the deportation from Mechelen, and they smuggled tools from the camp's workshop onto the train cars in order to pry open doors and floorboards to aid escape. Three members of the CDJ unit Group G, under the direction of Georges Livchitz, forced the train to a halt by signaling it with a red lantern. While Livchitz held the engineer at gunpoint with his revolver, the other two members, Robert Maistriau and Jean Franklemon, aided in the escape of several prisoners within the cars. The three members were able to escape under gunfire with some prisoners. This action saw the CDJ save 231 Jews out of 1,631 heading for Auschwitz, in what is the only instance of a known armed assault anywhere in Europe in order to halt a train transporting Jews en route to their deaths. The escape did not come without cost, however, as guards escorting the train shot 23 Jews during the battle and in their ensuing attempt at flight.

The last transport from Mechelen to reach Auschwitz left on July 31, 1944. Throughout the duration of the camp's existence, members of the CDJ kept in contact with those in the camp, sufficiently to enable warnings to be conveyed—though this was often to little avail in view of the transient nature of the camp population.

The camp was finally liberated by the Allies on September 4, 1944. The Germans had fled before the Allied advance the previous night, and some of the prisoners managed to escape at that time. The next morning, the 527 remaining Jewish prisoners welcomed their liberators. Despite the many hardships to which they had been subjected, these prisoners had managed to survive. The camp was soon utilized for housing suspected Belgian collaborators.

Known as the “Antechamber of Death,” Mechelen was then left alone, a silent witness to Belgium’s experience of the Holocaust. From 1948 onward the site reverted to a military barracks until it was abandoned in 1975. After then, certain buildings were employed for public housing. In 1996 a museum to the Holocaust was established; this was named the Museum of Deportation and Resistance, and serves as Belgium’s premier location for Holocaust remembrance to this day.

PAUL R. BARTROP

See also: Aktion Reinhard; Auschwitz; Belgium; Comité de Défense des Juifs; Concentration Camps

Further Reading

Michman, Dan (Ed.). Belgium and the Holocaust: Jews, Belgians, Germans. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1998.

Schreiber, Marion. The Twentieth Train: The True Story of the Ambush of the Death Train to Auschwitz. New York: Grove Press, 2003.

Medical Experimentation

During the Holocaust, German doctors and scientists performed a wide variety of medical experiments on individuals imprisoned in concentration camps. These experiments were usually based on faulty or pseudoscientific premises and were conducted with virtually no regard for the victims’ well-being or survival. Indeed, many experiments ended in the permanent disfigurement or death of the people involved. The Nazi experiments may be divided into three broad categories: exercises that involved the testing of new drugs and the treatment of various illnesses or injuries, tests designed to ascertain certain physical effects on soldiers and pilots, and experiments that sought to “prove” Nazi racial theories or purge the German bloodline of so-called “inferior” peoples.

The development of new drugs and the treatment of injuries—especially those sustained in battle—were of particular importance to doctors at the Buchenwald, Dachau, Natzweiler, Sachsenhausen, and Neuegamme concentration camps. There doctors administered untested pharmaceutical compounds, inoculations, and serums to various individuals to gauge their effectiveness against such maladies as typhoid fever, malaria, tuberculosis, infectious hepatitis, and yellow fever. While it may have been commendable to seek treatments or cures for such illnesses, the experiments were forced upon internees and many died during or after the experiments. At Ravensbrück, prisoners’ legs and arms were broken to test bone-grafting and amputation techniques. Many of these tests were done using little or no anesthetic. At other camps, internees were exposed to mustard and phosgene gas as doctors experimented with various antidotes; many of the victims died. There were even attempts to transplant limbs, although the results were disappointing and many of the victims died of massive infections.

At Dachau particularly, prisoners were employed to test various conditions that pilots and soldiers might have to endure. These included placing people in low-pressure chambers to gauge the effects of high altitude on air force personnel. Physicians here were joined by German civilian physicians from the Institute of Aviation. Other prisoners were studied to gauge the effects of hypothermia on the human body. Victims were either forced to lie in the snow in winter with no clothes on or were immersed into tanks of ice-cold water for an hour or more at a time. Many of the victims died or suffered greatly. Still others were compelled to drink seawater until they passed out or died.

The last category of experiments, which aimed to prove or sustain Nazi racial and social policies, was perhaps the most cruel and bizarre of all. Many tests involved young children. At Auschwitz and Ravensbrück, mass sterilization experiments were conducted on men and women, who had their sex organs irradiated. Many were badly burned in the process. Doctors also engaged in wide-scale surgical castration to ensure that prisoners did not engage in sexual intercourse. At Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen, doctors conducted serological tests on Roma, which included children, to study how different “races” contracted or responded to communicable diseases.

No other German physician became as widely known for his bizarre and cruel experimentation as did Josef Mengele, who became chief medical officer at Auschwitz in 1943. Mengele took a special interest in child twins and those who exhibited some sort of physical abnormality. He would often ingratiate himself to children by offering them sweets and then perform inhumane experiments on them. One experiment witnessed the injection of different chemicals into

Medical experiments involving large numbers of concentration camp prisoners took place during the Holocaust. The victims ranged widely, involving Roma, Soviet prisoners of war, Germans with disabilities, and Poles, among others. Foremost among the victims, however, were Jews. Among the most notorious of these experiments were those involving children at Auschwitz, under the brutal regime of Dr. Josef Mengele. In this photograph, an experiment is taking place involving compression and decompression in which a prisoner is subjected to extreme trauma in a pressure chamber. (Bettmann/Getty Images) children's eyes to see if their eye color could be altered. Other children underwent bizarre amputations and other experimental surgeries, often without proper anesthesia. One particularly grotesque experiment involved sewing together two Roma twins to create conjoined twins. They eventually died of gangrene and massive infections. Young girls were routinely sterilized and given shock treatments to gauge their reactions to such stimuli. One night saw the rounding up of 14 pairs of Roma twins; they were taken to a lab, killed by the injection of chloroform into their hearts, and meticulously dissected by Mengele himself.

It is estimated that the Germans conducted at least 70 different "medical research" programs, supervised by nearly 200 physicians and scientists. At least 7,000 prisoners were involved, many of whom were killed or permanently injured. A number of these programs were connected to civilian laboratories, hospitals, and universities, which was an indictment of the entire German medical establishment. After the war, more than 20 Nazi physicians were tried for crimes against humanity at Nuremberg, beginning in October 1946. Seven were given the death penalty, nine were handed long prison terms, and seven were found not guilty. Unfortunately, Mengele fled Germany, finally taking up residence incognito in South America. He was never brought to justice for his many crimes. There was but one silver lining in the darkness of the Nazi experiments; after 1946, the international medical community put in place specific guidelines for medical experimentation so that the grotesque excesses of World War II would not be repeated.

PAUL G. PIERPAOLI JR.

See also: Becker-Freyseng, Hermann; Blome, Kurt; Buchenwald; Dachau; Doctors' Trial; Gebhardt, Karl; Glücks, Richard; Heim, Aribert; I.G. Farben; Kaiser Wilhelm Institute; Mengele, Josef; Münch, Hans; Natzweiler-Struthof; Neuengamme; Nuremberg Code; Oberheuser, Herta; Project Paperclip; Ravensbrück; Sachsenhausen

Further Reading

Lifton, Robert Jay. The Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide. New York: Basic Books, 2000.
 Posner, Gerald L., and John Ware. Mengele: The Complete Story. New York: Cooper Square, 2000.
 Proctor, Robert. Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis. Cambridge (MA): Harvard University Press, 1988.

Meed, Vladka

Vladka Meed was a member of the Jewish underground in the Warsaw Ghetto from its inception. Born Feigele Peltel in Warsaw on December 29, 1921, to Shlomo and Hanna Peltel, she was educated in Yiddish but picked up Polish readily and became fluent while still young. At the age of 14 she became active in Zukunft, a youth movement connected to the Jewish Labor Bund.

Feigele and her family were forced into the Warsaw Ghetto once it was established in 1940. Over time, her father died of pneumonia and her mother, sister, and younger brother Chaim were sent to their deaths at Treblinka. With few other alternatives, Feigele decided to become part of the resistance movement in the ghetto, and she joined the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, or ŻOB) soon after it was formed in 1942. She was inspired to join after hearing a Bund leader, Abrasha Blum, speak about the need for armed resistance. Blum was a member of the Jewish coordinating committee, a body that sought to unite the diverse political factions of the ghetto. It was at this time she assumed the resistance code name of Vladka, which she kept for the rest of her life.

Owing to her flowing red locks and typically "Aryan" appearance, and fluency in Polish, she passed as a non-Jew outside the ghetto. Her major assignments involved working as a courier—essentially of money, arms, and intelligence information. One of her most important missions was to smuggle a map of Treblinka out of the ghetto and into the hands of resisters outside, who would, it was hoped, forward it on to the Allies. This information was also vitally important in the ghetto itself, as news spread more widely about where the deportations ended up. The upshot was a determination on the part of the ŻOB to resist further deportations by force, leading, in April 1943, to the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

