Vladka also helped children escape the ghetto and arranged for them to be sheltered in Christian homes. In addition, she acted as an information conduit for Jews searching for news about their relatives in labor and concentration camps or fighting with the partisans in the forest, and assisted other Jews hiding on the Aryan side; and, having survived the uprising, she continued supplying money and papers to help them stay alive.

During her time in the Warsaw underground she met another courier living under false papers, Czesław (Benjamin) Miedzyrzecka (Meed). Accounts differ as to when they were married; dates are given variously as 1943, 1944, and 1945. What is definite is that they were among the first survivors to reach the United States after the end of World War II, arriving in New York on May 24, 1946.

Soon after her arrival, Vladka was approached by American Jewish organizations with a request that she provide lectures to the American public about her experiences; these would form the basis of a book published in Yiddish in 1948. An early first-hand account published on the subject of what later became known as the Holocaust, it would be published in English as On Both Sides of the Wall in 1972, with translations into other languages (including German and Polish) later. It was highly condemnatory of Warsaw's non-Jewish population, who, Vladka asserted, did little to help the Jews in the ghetto.

In 1962 Vladka and Benjamin, with a group of several other survivors, established the Warsaw Ghetto Resistance Organization for the purpose of raising awareness about what they had experienced among the next generation. Vladka traveled and spoke widely about the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and the Holocaust generally. Immediately after the World Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors in Israel in June 1981, an American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors was established to prepare for a second gathering, to be held in Washington, D.C., in April 1983. On this occasion Benjamin Meed was in the forefront of the organizing process, though Vladka also played a key role.

In recognition for her work in Holocaust education, Vladka received an award in 1973 from the Warsaw Ghetto Resistance Organization, and in 1989 the Morim Award from the Jewish Teachers' Association. These were followed by the 1993 Hadassah Henrietta Szold Award and the 1995 Elie Wiesel Remembrance Award. She also received honorary degrees from Hebrew Union College and Bar Ilan University.

Benjamin Meed died of pneumonia in Manhattan on October 24, 2006. Vladka Meed died a little over six years later from Alzheimer's disease at her daughter's home in Paradise Valley, Arizona, on November 21, 2012.

sold about 23,000 copies and the second about 13,000. In 1930 the publisher, Max Amann (a sergeant major in Hitler's regiment during World War I), brought out the work in a single volume that sold 62,000 copies in one year. By the end of 1933 more than 1.5 million copies had been sold. From 1934 the book was figuring in school primers, and in 1936 the Ministry of the Interior recommended that registrars present a copy to every bridal couple. Total sales in Hitler's lifetime were probably around 8 to 9 million. The first English translation was an abridgement, and the complete text did not become available until 1938. Versions appeared in the 1920s, 1930s, and early 1940s in at least 10 European languages, as well as in Arabic, Chinese, and Japanese.

The title was actually Amann's idea—the author's projected title was Four and a Half Years of Struggle against Lies, Stupidity and Cowardice. The book consists of autobiographical recollections intermingled with reflections on political and social principles. Hitler begins by noting the significance of his birthplace, Braunau-am-Inn, on the boundary between Bavaria and Austria. The importance of this becomes clear when he gives an account of his student years in Vienna. It was in Vienna that he discovered the reality of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, an empire in decay, an empire crippled by centrifugal forces of its constituent parts, an empire in which, he asserts, the German peoples were downtrodden and victimized. It was this experience that first developed his German nationalistic feelings. It was also Vienna that converted him to antisemitism, since he witnessed what seemed to him Jewish control of Social Democratic agitation, of the world of the press, and of prostitution in the city. His experience of the Social Democrats showed him the power of fanatical determination allied to a readiness to use violence, and he grew cynical about the purposes of the leaders. He found that although he could have rational arguments with almost anybody from whatever class, his attempts to debate with Jews were always a waste of time and got him nowhere. He realized that part of the success of the Social Democrats had to do with their mastery of oratory and their readiness to address the masses. He noted that liberal leaders tended to be middle class and to rely on the printed word, which was read only by other bourgeois.

Then came the crucial wartime experience. Hitler noted that his generation, who set out for the front in 1914, soon turned from youngsters to old soldiers. He observed the power of Allied propaganda and grew enraged by the feebleness of what was produced by his own side. He sensed that the Allies understood the importance of exaggerating one negative fact about the enemy to the utmost—in this case,

Mein Kampf

Mein Kampf (My Struggle) is a work in which Adolf Hitler set out his philosophy and his vision for Germany. It was published in two volumes, the first on July 19, 1925, and the second on December 11, 1926. By 1929 the first volume had the atrocities of “the beastly Hun.” This gave steel to the Allied troops and also prepared them to fight a vicious enemy. While on the German side the preferred device was the weapon of mockery, the troops in the field discovered that their opponents were extremely tough and consequently felt let down by what they had been told. As the war progressed, Hitler also saw the effectiveness of the Allied thrust to drive a wedge between Prussia and the rest—putting all the blame on the one side in order to embitter the other. He received news of the German capitulation when in the hospital at Pasewalk after a gas attack, and he was shocked to the core. He accepted the popular explanation of betrayal by Jewish propagandists and intellectuals who sapped the will of the government and the middle classes to continue the war, but he also acknowledged the underlying decay that allowed all this to happen. Germany was being undermined by the Jews, and the governing classes were cowardly and irresolute.

After the war, Hitler became increasingly drawn to politics and more and more convinced of the centrality of the racial question. Following a well-established type of racial ideology that went back at least to the French 19th-century thinker Gobineau, he argued that a superior race that allowed itself to interbreed would decay, and that the preservation of the purity of the German race was the prime responsibility of the German people and state. This truth was not widely admitted, and the failure to face it was one of the main reasons for the defeat. Racial theory must be the foundation of a new political order. Young Germans must be indoctrinated in their role in the preservation of racial purity. There should be no truck with compassion for cripples or the mentally disabled.

Western-style democracy, with its electoral and parliamentary obsessions, was a sham. Hitler had been inoculated against parliamentarism by his experiences of observing political debates in Vienna, which had induced in him nothing but contempt for the parliamentary system. He believed that great things come from great individual personalities, not from assemblies. The aristocratic mode was the only one appropriate for Germanic peoples, and that involved individual rulers surrounded by advisers. Trade unions were certainly allowable, but only to prevent abuses in the workplace. Germany’s future rulers needed to realize that the masses must be won over, and on two occasions in the book Hitler writes of them as being like women who respond to a strong man better than to a weak one. Marxism was the big enemy of the day, but it could not be put down simply by force. A philosophy can be defeated only by another force that also has a philosophy. Hitler joyfully describes the way in which he defeated Marxist provocateurs who attempted to break up his meetings by good preparation and the disciplined use of force. This method was often able to get the better of a much larger number of opponents. One of the things he stresses in the book is the role of conviction, will, and resolve, which can enable a well-organized and well-motivated minority to topple a majority. He has a poor opinion of his German contemporaries but sees them as victims of Jewish manipulators. He does not elaborate a systematic antisemitic theory but dismisses the Jews as aliens who can simply never become Germans. The old religious anti-Judaism is feeble; what is needed is a frank recognition that the Jews are a racial enemy that cannot be accommodated or allowed into a Germanic society. They are unstable, dishonest, greedy, and manipulative. Their aim is world domination, and the Jewish religion is simply a tool to enable them to achieve this.

Hitler shows a grudging respect for the Catholic Church, whose inner strength he respects. He notes that celibacy rules require the church to replenish itself in every generation, which it does from the ranks of the poor, and that creates a certain degree of sympathy between the poor and the church that is one of the foundations of its influence. He is, however, very clear about the need to keep politics and religion entirely separate and disclaims any intention to interfere in ecclesiastical affairs. Hitler is very aware of the crucial role of the masses in politics, but not simply as fodder for exploitation. His time in Vienna showed him the horror of the daily life of the laboring poor in a big city and sensitized him to the big social issues. He saw that any serious political party must plan to address these if it was to have any success.

A study of Mein Kampf is very helpful for an understanding of how Hitler came to power. It shows an astonishing combination of ruthless logic, awareness of political realities, and powers of organization. It leaves a distinct impression that the war experience of Hitler and his contemporaries was of the utmost importance for what came after the war. Battle-hardened veterans felt that parliamentarism had betrayed them and could not bring themselves to support the republic. They looked for something in which to believe after the shock of the defeat, and Hitler offered them pride in their nation, a set of simple principles they could understand, and organizations to join that offered some semblance of the camaraderie of the trenches.

Mengele, Josef

Josef Mengele was a German medical doctor who performed quasi-scientific experiments on prisoners in Nazi concentration camps. He was born on March 16, 1911, in Gunzburg, Bavaria, and died on February 7, 1979, in Bertiooga, Brazil.

Josef Mengele was a German SS officer and medical doctor stationed at Auschwitz during World War II. He was infamous for the deadly human experiments he carried out on prisoners, in addition to selecting victims to be killed in the gas chambers. At Auschwitz he conducted genetic research on human subjects, particularly children, focusing primarily on twins. After the war he escaped to South America, where he managed to avoid capture for the rest of his life. This photo is believed to be the last taken of Mengele, while in exile and on the run in Argentina in 1956. (AP Photo)

Mengele began studying medicine in 1930, and had a special interest in anthropology and genetics. From 1935 he worked at a medical clinic. He also joined Germany's National Socialist Party. Mengele became a research assistant at an institute for heredity and "racial purity" at Frankfurt University. By 1938 he joined the SS and the following year married Irene Schoenbein. He volunteered for the German Army in 1940 and took part in the invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941 before an injury rendered him unfit for further military service.

In May 1943 Mengele volunteered to become the senior physician in the women's section of the Auschwitz concentration camp. One of his duties was to examine arriving prisoners and decide whether they were to be sent to the gas chambers or to forced labor. A number of the prisoners also became the subjects of Mengele's medical experiments. Auschwitz provided him an unending supply of research subjects, especially Roma, people with physical deformities, and twins. Mengele's particular interest was twin research, because he believed that if the Nazis could duplicate multizygotic births, the population could attain Aryan perfection. He observed each twin-couple under the same life conditions and killed them in the best of health—an ideal assumption for postmortem research. Mengele's crude surgery included amputations and deliberate infections with diseases in order to observe reactions. He also used methods involving electricity and radiation. Observers noted that he never expressed regret over the suffering of his human subjects. Over time, he became known to the prisoners as the "Angel of Death."

Mengele continued his experiments until the advance of the Red Army forced him to leave Auschwitz on January 17, 1945. U.S. forces captured him, but he managed to escape despite being listed as a war criminal. He returned to Gunzburg and, in 1948, with financial assistance provided by his family, was able to travel to and settle in Argentina under an assumed name. In 1956 Mengele returned to Germany and married for a second time, and in 1961 fled once more, this time to Paraguay. Fearing capture, he moved on to Brazil in 1978. On February 7, 1979, Mengele went for a swim, suffered a stroke, and drowned. After investigations ordered by the U.S. Justice Department, his gravesite at Bertiooga was revealed and experts were able to prove that the skeleton was that of Mengele. The discovery of his death ended a worldwide manhunt.

Microstates during the Holocaust

Europe possesses five microstates: Vatican City, Malta, Liechtenstein, Andorra, San Marino, and Monaco. The smallest of these, Vatican City, was so inextricably intertwined with the policies of the Roman Catholic Church during World War II that it possesses a special status among all the microstates and thus does not fit comfortably alongside the others in discussions relating to the Holocaust and World War II.

A microstate is a very small independent nation, recognized as sovereign by other states. In both geographical size and population, microstates are tiny by contrast with their bigger neighbors. During World War II and the Holocaust, the microstates of Europe played varying roles—from the completely minimal to active participation.

The British island possession of Malta, for instance, saw many Jews who were fleeing Nazism arrive prior to the outbreak of the war, owing to it being the only European country that did not require visas of refugee Jews. Although for a time it was the most bombed place on earth, nonetheless Malta rescued thousands of Jews from persecution. A number of these, together with local Maltese Jews, joined the British army in order to fight both Germans and Italians during the war.

The principality of Liechtenstein was neutral during World War II and sought to have this status guaranteed by forging ever closer relations with Switzerland. It has been estimated that the country accepted about 240 Jewish refugees during the Nazi period. That said, it has also been recorded that Liechtenstein's immigration laws were tightened during 1938, with at least 132 known requests for entry visas refused. Of those Jews who turned up at the border between Liechtenstein and Austria, an unknown number were turned back.

Despite this, the principality chose carefully when it came to accepting wealthy Jews who could introduce a significant amount of capital. Up to 144 such Jews were permitted to become citizens; armed with life-saving visas, however, most elected to migrate to other countries.

The Republic of San Marino, geographically surrounded on all sides by Italy, provided a haven of sorts for Jews fleeing Nazi persecution, as well as for German refugees from Nazism and Italian opponents of the fascist regime of Benito Mussolini. At the start of the war, San Marino possessed a fascist government with ties to that of Mussolini, but in aggregate terms it gave refuge to up to 100,000 Italians and Jews across the period of the 1930s and World War II. The little country suffered a major loss in 1938, however, when its consul general stationed in Vienna, Friedrich Smetana—an Austrian Jew appointed to the position in 1926—was murdered, with his family, by the Nazis.

Andorra, sandwiched between Spain and France and governed jointly by the president of France and Spain's Bishop of Urgell, was quick to declare its neutrality in September 1939. It found it difficult not to get involved with the fate of the persecuted Jews of Europe, however, as it served as a conduit for Jewish refugees fleeing through France to Spain. Some—a very few—remained and settled permanently in Andorra, but most continued on to Spain and Portugal in the hope of obtaining passage to the United States or other destinations beyond war-torn Europe.

The principality of Monaco, located on France's Riviera, had a Jewish population of around 300 before World War II. Both before and during the conflict, the government sought to protect its Jewish residents, even though politically it followed a policy of pro-Axis neutrality. The ruler, Prince Louis II, was pro-Vichy and pro-Mussolini, but that did not stop his government issuing false identity papers to its Jews, or refusing to dismiss Jewish civil servants.

On the night of August 27, 1942, however, Monaco's authorities rounded up Jewish residents and delivered them to the Nazis. At least 42 of these were Central European Jewish refugees; they included women, men, and a child who had taken refuge to escape persecution in France at the hands of the Nazis. Another 24 were Monegasques living in the principality or in France itself. Altogether, around 90 Jews were arrested, handed over to the Nazis by the Monaco police, and deported. Only nine of these survived the war. On the 73rd anniversary of the deportation, August 27, 2015, Prince Albert II of Monaco offered a public apology for Monaco's deportation of Jews during World War II.

Milchberg, Irving

Irving Milchberg was a Holocaust survivor who smuggled arms to resistance fighters, together with food and other supplies, in the Warsaw Ghetto during World War II. He was born Ignac Milchberg in Warsaw, Poland, the son of a prosperous merchant, on September 15, 1927. His world changed forever when Nazi forces invaded Poland in September 1939 and created a ghetto in central Warsaw early the next year. He and his family were forced out of their home, had most of their personal belongings confiscated, and were compelled to live a dingy, cramped apartment over an abandoned grocery store.

Before long, Milchberg and his father were sent out to labor on a work detail, at which time both father and son began smuggling food into the ghetto when they returned from work. His father was shot and killed by a Gestapo agent in 1942 after he had been found pilfering bread; at the time, Milchberg was only 15 years old. Determined to provide his mother and three sisters with additional food, he smuggled bread into the ghetto on the same day that his father was murdered.

Not long after his father's death, Milchberg was seized by Gestapo agents and taken to a transport camp, where Jews were being shipped off to the Treblinka death camp. During the night, he managed to climb a fence and flee back into the ghetto. When he returned, he discovered that his mother and sisters had already been deported to Treblinka. He managed to escape deportation a second time soon thereafter, when he broke a railcar's window and fled on foot after the train had stopped.

Milchberg now decided to conceal his identity. He adopted the gentile Polish name of Henrik Rozowski and began selling cigarettes and other sundries in central Warsaw, joining other Jewish youths who were also trying to hide their identity. Nicknamed "Bull" by his compatriots, he managed to disguise himself effectively thanks in part to his fair hair and blue eyes, which made him look more Polish than Jewish. Milchberg spent many nights sleeping in the streets or in cemeteries. Often hawking cigarettes and other items to Gestapo agents within yards of Gestapo headquarters, he also worked as a smuggler, providing resistance fighters with weapons and bringing food into the ghetto.

Before the April–May 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Milchberg smuggled numerous small-arms weapons into the ghetto in hollowed-out loaves of bread. Sometimes, when he could not get past the guards, he made his way into the ghetto by navigating the city's sewers. Immediately after the Nazis had brutally suppressed the uprising, Milchberg was taken prisoner and shipped off to a death camp. He engineered a third escape, this time by mingling with a group of Polish youths as he was switched from one train to another. Although he managed to make his way back to Warsaw, he injured his leg badly while fleeing. Sometime in 1944, after another cigarette seller was arrested, Milchberg and the others scattered, fearing that they too would be arrested. Until the Soviets liberated Warsaw in January 1945, Milchberg hid from Nazi authorities and was constantly on the move, relying on his own ingenuity and the generosity of strangers to survive.

After the war, Milchberg first went to Czechoslovakia, then Austria, and finally to a refugee camp in Germany. Having learned the craft of watchmaking, he migrated to Canada in 1947, eventually settling in Niagara Falls. There he established a jewelry store and married his wife. In his later years, Milchberg lived in Toronto, and in 1993 he visited Poland to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. He died on January 26, 2014.

Mischling

German, literally "hybrid" but understood in the Nazi context to mean something like "mongrel," "half-breed," or "mixed breed."

After the Nazis attained power in January 1933, their racial agenda ultimately evolved toward the extermination of the Jews, but at the outset of the Third Reich this was not entirely clear. An initial step leading to the exclusion of the Jews from Germany's daily life, however, was to define who would be considered a member of the Jewish "racial enemy." The infamous Nuremberg Laws of 1935 saw this process codified, in which a legal attempt was made to clarify who was, in fact, a Jew; who was not; and who fell in between, in line with the Nazi obsession with “racial purity.” Thus, those with four Jewish grandparents were “full Jews”; those with three Jewish grandparents were “three-quarter Jews”; those with two Jewish grandparents were considered Mischlinge of the First Degree, provided they were not identified with the Jewish religion and not married to Jewish spouses; and persons with only one Jewish grandparent were Mischlinge of the Second Degree. In 1935 such persons in the latter two categories were said to number anywhere between 100,000 and 350,000. Mischlinge were not permitted to join the SS, nor were they permitted to advance in the officer ranks of the Wehrmacht, or German army. For the most part, Mischlinge of the First Degree were classified as Jews; those of the Second Degree were absorbed into German society, albeit with restrictions and discriminations.

Mommsen, Hans

Hans Mommsen was one of Germany’s preeminent historians and a leading expert on Nazi Germany and the Holocaust. He was born into an academic family in Marburg in 1930: his twin brother, Wolfgang Mommsen, was a leading historian of late 19th-century German foreign policy; his father, Wilhelm Mommsen, was a historian of 19th-century Germany; and his great-grandfather, Theodor Mommsen, was a Nobel Prize-winning historian of ancient Rome.

Mommsen taught at the Universities of Tübingen (1960–1961) and Heidelberg (1963–1968), before arriving (as it was to turn out, for the rest of his career) at Ruhr University, Bochum, in 1968. Most of Mommsen’s writing looked at the Weimar and Nazi periods in German history. His books in English focused particularly on the transition between Weimar democracy and the onset of Nazism, as well as on the Nazi period itself. Three of these, in particular, will be discussed here.

First, From Weimar to Auschwitz: Essays in German History (1991) took a broad view of the crisis of the Weimar Republic and the rise of Nazism, tracing the role of the bourgeoisie in late 19th-century Germany and building a perspective on how it was that the expectations of victory during the First World War, having been dashed through Germany’s defeat and descent into revolution, led to resentment and disillusionment with the Weimar Republic. The book considered why it was that middle-class disenchantment with the imperial regime led to the November 1918 revolution, and then, when the republic was established, it was again the middle class that sought its destruction. Mommsen was thereby also forced to deal with more open-ended questions relating to the nature of democracy and totalitarianism (and in particular, Nazi totalitarianism).

In The Rise and Fall of Weimar Democracy (1998), Mommsen examined the Weimar period in Germany between 1919 and 1933—a time of great political, social, economic, and artistic upheaval in Germany. Considering the period from a political and economic perspective, he explored the complexities of the time but resisted the temptation to project what this would mean for the future; in other words, he looked at the period in its own terms, rather than forecasting the “inevitable” onset of Nazism that lay within that history. As a result, he was able to trace Germany’s path through the aftermath of revolution, through parliamentary democracy and its attendant political and economic crises, and show how its internal structural weaknesses were no match for the two parties (communism and Nazism) that were dedicated to its destruction.

Finally, in Alternatives to Hitler: German Resistance under the Third Reich (2003), Mommsen traced the complex history of German resistance to Hitler and the Nazis from their ascent to power in January 1933 through the attempted assassination of Hitler and aborted assumption of power in the Bomb Plot of July 1944. Mommsen considered the full range of acts opposing Hitler, from small acts of political disobedience and statements of resentment or antipathy, to wholesale attempts to overthrow the government. Mommsen did not hold back from passing what he saw to be appropriate judgments; thus, in examining the resisters’ motives, he found that not all were inspired by the highest humanitarian impulses. While there were certainly those who operated out of a sense of principled commitment, some were not convinced that democracy should follow Hitler and were interested only in exchanging the Nazi form of totalitarian state for another version; others operated from pragmatic self-interest; while yet others were thoroughly indifferent or ambivalent toward the Nazi “Final Solution.” Recognizing that resistance to Nazism was itself commendable and virtuous, Mommsen’s consideration of the varied motives of those opposed to Nazism showed that there was little to be achieved in painting a purely black-and-white picture of such behavior.

Mommsen is perhaps best known, overall, for his position in the debate during the 1980s over the Nazi Holocaust, known in Germany as the Historikerstreit (“historians’ quarrel”). This was an intellectual and political controversy about the way the Holocaust should be interpreted, which split historians into two factions: the “functionalists,” who argued that the Holocaust evolved, somewhat chaotically, as a result of the nature of a Nazi administrative system that was both ideologically determined and placed under pressure as a result of the exigencies of war; and the “intentionalists,” who held that the Holocaust was preordained by Hitler, who had a plan for the Final Solution that long predated the outbreak of war in 1939.

Mommsen was a classic “functionalist” who viewed the onset of the Final Solution as part of a process of increasing escalation within a bureaucracy beset with internal rivalries. These rivalries saw the various departments competing with one another in escalating rounds of mounting antisemitic regulations between 1933 and 1941, culminating in the latter year. Hitler himself played a relatively minor role in all this, notwithstanding that he was an extreme antisemite who wanted to do something (though he was unclear as to what that might be) with the Jews. It was essentially the political conditions created by Hitler that led to the destruction of a normal orderly governmental process and prevented the political system from reestablishing some internal balance in the aftermath of the chaotic later Weimar years. Instead, what Mommsen described as a “cumulative radicalization process” formed, which made itself felt primarily in the field of racial (that is, antisemitic) politics.

The role of Hitler, in Mommsen’s view, was far from crucial. While Hitler was important on an ideological level—given that his insatiable hatred against the Jews formed the basis upon which the continuous escalation of anti-Jewish measures took place—his public utterances with respect to the so-called “Jewish Question” avoided any direct allusion to the ongoing annihilation process and were restricted to metaphors.

With regard to the root cause of the Holocaust—antisemitism—Mommsen posited that the Nazi version did not differ significantly from its forerunners in the late 19th century, meaning that something was needed in order to give it the push needed to transform it into a genocidal ideology. What changed, in Mommsen’s view, were the intensity and the circumstances under which it became virulent. The Holocaust, therefore, was not the result of any ideological decision on the part of the Nazi hierarchy, and least of all on the part of Hitler. It was, rather, a political process, one that eventually led to the conclusion that there was no way out but to exterminate the Jews—and even this did not come into being before the second half of 1941.

Mommsen also argued that there were many respects in which the Holocaust was a unique event. As he saw it, however, this uniqueness did not create some form of exclusivity ranking the Holocaust higher than other atrocities. A comparative view is both possible and necessary, with the Holocaust as an extreme example of the decline of Western civilization and its descent into barbarity. He held, further, that future generations had to learn from the complexity of the experience of Nazi Germany in order to prevent the appearance of similar circumstances under which phenomena like the Holocaust might reappear. Comparative analysis and interdisciplinary historical research, in this sense, is the responsible thing to do.

In short, Mommsen’s overall perspective was that political and bureaucratic systems literally create genocides, while leaders establish the climate conducive to their realization and direct the activity while it is taking place.

By showing how the agencies of the state can become perverted, unstructured, mistrustful, and inefficient, Hans Mommsen highlighted an important matter for concern in a contemporary environment that has become more bureaucratic than ever before. Far from the Third Reich being a one-off phenomenon, Mommsen demonstrated how it was that Germany’s experience has a real relevance for the world today, and why constant attention to that time must be maintained as a warning for future generations. Hans Mommsen died on November 5, 2015.

Monowitz

Monowitz was the name given to one of the three primary camps that, along with numerous subcamps, made up the Auschwitz complex. It was distinguished from the other camps by its focus on the provision of slave labor to a new chemical plant built by I.G. Farben in the same area as the other two primary Auschwitz camps. It was in operation from October 1942 to January 1945, when it was liberated by the Soviet army.

The initiative for the camp came from I.G. Farben, Germany's largest corporation—actually, a cartel—and chemical manufacturer. It had decided to build a chemical plant not far from Auschwitz. More specifically, the plant was to be located on the site of the village of Monowice, in the southern part of the section of Poland that was annexed by Germany. This site offered all of the basics required for a major plant, including flat ground and access to water and rail lines.

I.G. Farben saw another reason—this one compelling—to build its plant where it did. It was located so that it could avail itself of the seemingly unlimited source of slave labor that could be provided by the nearby Auschwitz main camp. Building a concentration camp on site to house the slave

Monowitz, also known as Auschwitz III, was a component of the Auschwitz main camp embracing a complex of 45 subcamps in the surrounding area. The SS established the camp in October 1942 in order to accommodate a slave labor reserve for I.G. Farben's Buna industries, producing synthetic rubber for the German war effort. This was later expanded to a much larger range of production activities and industrial enterprises. In this image, SS leader Heinrich Himmler and other Nazi dignitaries are carrying out an inspection at Monowitz in 1942. (Galerie Bilderwelt/Getty Images) labor that would be made available to construct and work in the chemical facility represented a significant financial incentive to I.G. Farben. The SS “leased” these prisoners to I.G. Farben for an extraordinarily low daily rate. As a result, a concentration camp was built by slave labor so that a corporate entity could profit from the ongoing Final Solution of the Jews. This explains why Monowitz has been referred to as I.G. Farben’s “corporate concentration camp.”

The camp was given several names over its years of operation. The primary product to be manufactured at the camp was “Buna,” a type of synthetic rubber named for two of its components: butadiene and sodium, which has the chemical symbol of NA. Thus, the camp was called Buna/Monowitz (and the plant built there, Buna Werk). Its name was later changed to reflect an administrative restructuring of the Auschwitz complex made in late 1943 to provide for three autonomous primary camps. Monowitz became Auschwitz III, with the main camp called Auschwitz I, and Birkenau, the extermination center, called Auschwitz II.

Although its initial group of prisoners came from other concentration camps, the main source of manpower for Monowitz came from Jews who had been sent to Auschwitz. The vast majority of Jews deported to Auschwitz went immediately to their death in the extermination center, Birkenau, but others were assigned to the main camp for slave labor, and still others were sent to Monowitz.

The proposal for a camp for the housing of “employees” and the building of industrial facilities was submitted by I.G. Farben to Rudolf Hoess, the Auschwitz commandant, in October 1941. The proposal was also submitted to the management and board of directors of I.G. Farben in early 1942, resulting in an agreement in June of that year to go forward with the construction of a concentration camp—more accurately, a labor camp—that would be the Monowitz concentration camp (Konzentrationslager Monowitz).

With the help of a major German engineering company—the Organisation Todt, named for the Nazi leader Fritz Todt—Monowitz was ready to receive its first group of prisoners at the end of October 1942. In December 1942 some 3,500 prisoners were housed in the Monowitz concentration camp, but that number grew to more than 11,000 by July 1944.

Monowitz was not headed by a commandant until the administrative restructuring in November 1943 that resulted in it being an autonomous camp. At that time, SS-Hauptsturmführer Heinrich Schwarz was named commandant and served as such until January 1945. Prior to then, the camp was led by a Lagerführer (Camp Leader), SS-Obersturmführer Vinzens Schöttl.

Conditions in the Monowitz camp were in some ways better than in the Auschwitz main camp, with the possibility of working indoors, out of the elements, and even windows and heat in some of the barracks, but the overcrowded conditions, with poor sanitation, the constant risk of disease, and inadequate food took a heavy toll on the population. Prisoners were also subject to harsh production demands from factory supervisors, with failure to meet them resulting in beatings and sometimes death, either on the spot in Monowitz or by transfer to Birkenau.

With the Soviet army closing in, the entire Auschwitz complex, including Monowitz, was evacuated. This resulted in a death march that began on January 18, 1945, with thousands of Monowitz prisoners walking away from I.G. Farben’s corporate concentration camp. Few would survive.

The Mortal Storm

A major Hollywood motion picture made in 1940, The Mortal Storm, based on a novel of the same name by British author Phyllis Bottome, was directed by Frank Borzage. It starred Margaret Sullavan, James Stewart, and Robert Young. The focus of the film rests on the character of Martin Breitner (played by Stewart), a German who refuses to support Nazism. He falls in love with a Jewish woman named Freya Roth (played by Sullavan), to the condemnation of those around him in the small university town in the Bavarian Alps where the movie is set. The Mortal Storm shows how the Nazi ascent to power overturns the peace of the town, and its depiction of its subject is a commanding indictment of Nazism—indeed, one of the few effective anti-Nazi statements made by Hollywood prior to the entry of the United States into World War II in December 1941. The other film to stand out in this regard was Charlie Chaplin’s The Great Dictator (1940), though it was a satirical comedy, far removed from the drama of The Mortal Storm. Yet even here, the filmmakers stopped short of realistic condemnation; Germany is not mentioned by name in the movie (other than a single reference at the very beginning), nor is the word Nazi. The designation “Jew,” to describe the very people being persecuted, is not heard at any point in The Mortal Storm. It is implied that Freya Roth is Jewish, but only the term “non-Aryan” is employed. The movie was a success critically and commercially but was proscribed in Germany. The Nazi government, having threatened MGM studios not to proceed with making the film, banned all MGM movies after the release of The Mortal Storm; this ban was not lifted until after World War II.

Moscow Declaration

The Moscow Declaration was issued by U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt, British prime minister Winston Churchill, and Soviet leader Joseph Stalin in Moscow, on November 1, 1943. It called for the punishment of all German officers, soldiers, and members of the Nazi Party who were responsible for or had taken part in atrocities, massacres, and mass executions. War criminals were to be sent back to the countries where they had committed their crimes, while other criminals, whose offenses had no particular geographical location, would be punished by a joint decision of the Allies. No distinction was made in the Moscow Declaration between war crimes proper and crimes that would later be referred to as crimes against humanity.

Although it had become apparent from the very beginning of World War II that German troops were waging a ruthless war and ignoring the established rules of warfare, the issue of the punishment of these perpetrators had not been an important point on the agenda of the Allied governments. The first denunciations of war crimes came from the governments in exile of Czechoslovakia and Poland and finally led to the Declaration of St. James in January 1942. The governments of Great Britain and the United States, however, were reluctant to be too specific in their condemnations of German war crimes as long as the Germans retained the power to retaliate against Allied prisoners of war in their possession. After the German attack on the Soviet Union in June 1941 and mounting atrocities on the Eastern Front and in German-occupied areas, public pressure on the two governments to be more specific as to the punishment of war criminals at the end of the war grew stronger. That finally led to the establishment of the United Nations War Crimes Commission and to the Moscow Declaration.

In spite of the repeated emphasis on concerted action to be taken by the Allies, the Soviet government decided, in December 1943, to hold the first war crimes trials of German war criminals on the Eastern Front, the famous Kharkov trials. After that, however, no further trials against war criminals took place until the end of the war, largely because the Soviets were worried that the Germans would retaliate against prisoners or civilians in occupied areas. As to the fate of the major Nazi leaders, the three governments were still unsure about what was to be done, except that their fate would be subsequently determined by a joint decision. This was not a subtle propaganda ploy intended to create suspicion or facilitate capitulation; rather, neither the British nor American governments had reached a final decision on what was to be done with major war criminals until the early months of 1945.

The formula chosen in the Moscow Declaration therefore left the fate of the major war criminals open. Churchill, U.S. diplomat Henry Morgenthau, and for some time Stalin, favored summary executions, while U.S. secretary of state Henry Stimson and many legal specialists clearly favored punishment of war criminals through the channels of organized justice, some favoring the creation of an international criminal court, others national, mixed, or military tribunals. The Moscow Declaration furthermore addressed only the traditional range of war crimes and the accompanying phenomena later categorized as “crimes against humanity.”

Aggressive war was at that time not considered a separate crime, though Stalin declared a few days after the announcement of the Moscow Declaration that the Allies must adopt measures to ensure that all fascist criminals responsible for the unleashing of war be punished. Stalin’s plea was taken up by the Commission on the Punishment of War Criminals of the London International Assembly and supported by some legal specialists such as Hans Kelsen and Vaclav Benes, but neither the UN War Crimes Commission nor the governments of the Western Allies were ready to accept such an idea up to the London Conference of 1945.

Müller, Heinrich

Heinrich Müller was head of the Gestapo and one of the principal architects of the “Final Solution.” As chief of the Gestapo, he and his subordinate, Adolf Eichmann, directed the investigation, collection, and deportation of Jews and various other groups deemed socially, racially, and politically undesirable to ghettos, concentration camps, and later death camps.

Müller was born on April 28, 1900, in Munich, Germany. During World War I he served as a spotter pilot and was awarded numerous decorations for his military service. In 1919 he joined the Munich police force and was active in quashing communist uprisings in the aftermath of World War I. He later became head of the political branch of the Munich police and became acquainted with several high-ranking Nazi Party members, including Reinhard Heydrich and Heinrich Himmler. Müller despised communism and was a hard taskmaster to those who worked under him—qualities that endeared him to the Nazis, even if Müller himself had been reluctant to join the movement. Unimpressed with political philosophies of any sort, Müller was the archetypal mid-level bureaucrat who did what he was instructed to do. He finally joined the Nazi Party in 1939, but only because he realized that doing so would enhance his chances of promotion to higher office. That same year he became chief of the Gestapo.

Müller was a key participant at the Wannsee Conference in January 1942, at which Heydrich, head of the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA) and Müller’s superior, announced a directive passed down from Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring, tapping him to oversee the development and implementation of the Final Solution. For his part, the Gestapo deported, conservatively, 3.8 million Jews to their deaths throughout the course of the Holocaust between 1939 and 1945. Moreover, Gestapo functionaries served as vital intelligence links, reporting Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads) actions on the Eastern Front to Adolf Hitler.

In addition to Müller’s integral role in orchestrating the mass logistics of the Final Solution, he was also involved in a variety of other criminal and counterespionage affairs within the Third Reich. He was, for example, instrumental in fabricating cases against Werner von Blomberg, war minister, and Werner von Fritsch, commander in chief of the Wehrmacht, in 1938. Both men were forced from office. A year later, Müller assisted in staging a “Polish” assault on the Sender Gleiwitz radio station (one facet of Operation Himmler) that provided Hitler with the pretense to invade Poland on September 1, 1939, thereby initiating World War II. Müller also headed the criminal investigation of Heydrich’s assassination (Operation Anthropoid, May 1942), successfully tracking down his killers. In addition, he received the Knight’s Cross and the War Service Cross with Swords for his quick and brutal interrogation of the members of the July 1944 Bomb Plot to kill Hitler. Müller was also heavily involved in counterintelligence operations that funneled misinformation to the Soviet Union throughout the war.

Müller was highly regarded for his blind obedience, remorselessness, fanatical dedication to the task at hand, and the ruthless efficiency with which he carried out his duties. Because of his late entrance into the Nazi Party, some high-ranking party members questioned his ideological commitment, viewing him merely as an opportunist. Nevertheless, he remained among the last to depart the Führerbunker as Allied troops converged on it in 1945; witnesses testified that they saw him last on April 28, 1945. His fate remains a mystery. Müller’s disappearance has been the subject of much speculation and investigation by West German police, the Central Intelligence Agency, and British intelligence agencies. The 1960 discovery of his subordinate, Adolf Eichmann, in Argentina, revived conjecture over Müller’s fate, suggesting that perhaps he also had fled to South America. Burial documents from a Berlin cemetery indicated that his body had been reinterred there; however, the exhumed remains could not be definitively identified as his. As of this writing, the ongoing appearance of newly discovered Russian archival records may yet shed light on Müller’s fate.

Münch, Hans

Hans Münch was an SS doctor stationed at Auschwitz between 1943 and 1945. His is a classic case of a conflicted Nazi who was committed to doing his duty but who at the same time drew an ethical line when it came to the mass murder of Jews. His resistance to the dictates of Nazi ideology was selective, but for the Jews he saved it was vitally necessary.

He was born in 1911. Having studied at the universities of Tübingen and Munich, Münch became associated with the Nazi Party as a student, conscious that alignment would be necessary for his employment prospects. Accordingly, he joined the National Socialist German Students' League in 1934. Three years later, in May 1937, he joined the Nazi Party, and in 1939 he qualified as a medical doctor.

At the start of World War II he sought to enlist in the German army, but this was denied on the ground that the civilian need for medical practitioners had to be met. As a result, he worked as a doctor in rural areas in Bavaria, covering for other doctors already serving. Denied the opportunity of serving in a combat unit, he was persuaded by a friend, Dr. Bruno Weber, that if he really wanted to serve he could do so by joining the SS. Upon his successful application in June 1943, he was ordered to report to a Waffen-SS unit stationed at Kraków. He was not expecting, nor was he aware of, the existence of Auschwitz nearby.

Münch was assigned to the SS Hygiene Institute in Raisko, outside the Auschwitz main camp. Here, he was assigned to undertake bacteriological research under the direction of his friend Dr. Bruno Weber.

Münch's work involved bacteriological research, especially involving typhus. As a medical doctor, he was also responsible for general health in the barracks, meaning that from time to time he was obliged to visit the camp itself. When visiting the camp, he was called upon to make "selections" of prisoners when trainloads arrived. This involved a cursory medical inspection to see who was fit enough to work and who would be consigned immediately to death in the gas chambers. The chief of the medical staff at Auschwitz, Dr. Josef Mengele, told him that his cooperation in this task was mandatory. Shocked, Münch went to Berlin immediately and spoke to the head of the SS Hygiene Institute there, saying that this was an assignment he would not undertake, "regardless of the consequences." The result was that his superiors in Berlin interceded and he was absolved from making selections.

This placed Münch in the category of an unusual Nazi within the SS structure at Auschwitz. Moreover, he showed himself to be friendly toward the prisoners, with a personal interest in those around him. Despite his rare attitudes and demeanor, in mid-1944 he received promotion to SS-Untersturmführer (second lieutenant).

Although he refused to conduct selections at Auschwitz, Münch did continue with his human experimentation. He soon realized that within the camp female prisoners were the most vulnerable; once experimentation on them was completed, they were very quickly expendable. Münch could not accept that human beings should be disposed of this way. His approach was to expand the scope and duration of the experiments, such that the women involved could be kept alive for longer periods of time, and thus, perhaps, escape a sudden and horrible death.

He also tried to make prisoners' lives more bearable. He would sometimes visit those who were sick and in the infirmary and, on other occasions, find ways to add to their stocks of food.

In January 1945, with the war coming to an end, Auschwitz was evacuated. Münch was reassigned to Dachau in his home state of Bavaria. The surviving prisoners who had known him were also taken to Dachau, where Weber and Münch compiled a list of former Raisko Institute workers who had accompanied them. Within days they were moved to a less crowded barrack, and a laboratory was established where they resumed their former duties. Upon learning that there might be a further transfer to yet another camp, Münch spoke with the prisoners about a possible escape. One of his ideas was that he would take them through the main gate and then provide them with SS uniforms. Another idea, from the prisoners themselves, was that they would accept going on the new transport train and later escape into the mountains near Switzerland. Münch, remarkably, gave the prisoners a revolver and ammunition for protection in the event of a shootout. He then shook hands with each of the prisoners and wished them good luck and an early freedom. Survivors from that attempt later vouched for his efforts on their behalf.

With the end of the war, Münch went home. He surrendered to the occupation authorities in 1946 and spent nearly a year in prison while awaiting and undergoing a trial in Kraków. Many former prisoners testified in his support, with letters confirming that he set up false experiments and prolonged them in order to save prisoners' lives, and that he did not make selections. The court duly acquitted him on December 22, 1947. Of the 40 Auschwitz staff on trial in Kraków, he was the only person acquitted of war crimes.

On January 27, 1995, on the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, Münch returned to Auschwitz at the behest of Eva Mozes Kor, a survivor of Mengele's experiments on twins. Münch took the opportunity to prepare and sign a document verifying that the gas chambers had existed:

I . . . hereby attest that as an SS physician on duty in Auschwitz in 1944, I witnessed the selection process of those who were to live and those who were to die. Other SS physicians on duty in the camps made selections at the barracks. I was exempt from performing selections because I had refused to do so.

I further attest that I saw thousands of people gassed here at Auschwitz. . . .

I am signing this paper of my own free will to help document the cruel intolerance of my fellow SS.

I, a former SS Physician, witnessed the dropping of Zyklon B into simulated exhaust vents from outside the gas chambers. Zyklon B began to work as soon as it was released from the canisters. The effects of the gas were observed through a peephole by an assigned doctor of the SS officer on duty. After three to five minutes, death could be certified, and the doors were opened as a sign that the corpses were cleared to be burned.

This is the nightmare I continue to live with fifty years later.

I am so sorry that in some way I was part of it. Under the prevailing circumstances I did the best I could to save as many lives as possible. Joining the SS was a mistake. I was young. I was an opportunist. And once I joined, there was no way out.

Dr. Hans Münch was a Nazi who resisted the Holocaust. Known to those around him as "the Good Man of Auschwitz," he was celebrated in The Nazi Doctors, a book by author Robert Jay Lifton, as "a human being in an SS uniform." It could be concluded that, in Auschwitz, Münch was placed in a thoroughly dishonorable position—and he did what he could to remain honorable. His actions demonstrate, moreover, that at times there were ways in which one could defy Nazism without suffering severe consequences.

Munich Agreement

In September 1938 one of the greatest examples of surrendering to bullying on the international stage took place when Britain and France sacrificed the democratic state of Czechoslovakia on the altar of the policy that became known as appeasement, in the hope that they could buy off Adolf Hitler and thus avoid having to confront him in a war they were not physically prepared to fight. By not standing up to him, however, all they did was to encourage him to continue with his campaign of intimidation and threats. Every time the Western powers surrendered to some new demand, Hitler was inspired to reach even higher, firm in his belief that he could get what he wanted at no cost to himself.

The Munich Agreement was signed on September 30, 1938, by Germany, Great Britain, France, and Italy. It permitted Nazi Germany's annexation of the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia, an area populated by about 3 million German-speaking people who had never belonged to Germany. As early as May 1938 it was known that Hitler and his generals had their eyes set on Czechoslovakia, while the Czechs, in turn, relied on alliances with France and the Soviet Union to counter German threats. As the year progressed, however, it became clear that France (and its ally, Britain) was unprepared to defend Czechoslovakia. There was a desperate desire to avoid a military confrontation with Germany—at any price.

In order to keep the peace, British prime minister Neville Chamberlain made three trips during the month of September to see Hitler: on September 15 he went to see Hitler at the Führer's mountain retreat at Berchtesgaden; on September 22 he went to a second meeting at Bad Godesberg, not far from Cologne; and finally, he went to Munich on September 29. In each case, he discussed the situation personally with Hitler, offering whatever concessions it would take to stop Germany from going to war.

The Munich Agreement, signed on September 30, 1938, saw Nazi Germany annex the Sudetenland regions of Czechoslovakia as a result of negotiations conducted in Munich between Germany, Britain, France, and Italy. This agreement, which condemned Czechoslovakia as a viable state, is considered the high point of appeasement, after which Europe would be set on a course for war given Hitler's encouragement that the Western Allies would not intervene in his plans. The image here shows Hitler shaking hands at the meeting with the British prime minister, Neville Chamberlain. (AP Photo)

By the time of the third trip, Chamberlain proposed that a four-power conference be convened to settle the issue, and on that final occasion Hitler, Chamberlain, the French premier Edouard Daladier, and the Italian dictator Benito Mussolini met right in the heart of the Führer's lair in the Bavarian capital. They agreed that Germany would annex Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland, with an international commission to decide the future of other disputed areas.

The Czech government of Edvard Beneš played no role in these discussions and was simply informed of developments. Two Czech delegates were denied access to the Munich meeting and were kept under virtual house arrest in their hotel until the agreement had been signed. Britain and France simply informed the Czechs that there were two options: they could either resist Germany alone or submit to the German invasion of their sovereign territory. So that Britain and France would not have to confront the Nazis, this small democratic nation would have to pay the price they demanded, and Czechs were left to suffer the ultimate punishment for merely existing, as their country was dismembered in tears and sorrow.

Before returning to London, Chamberlain paid Hitler a personal visit in his Munich apartment. He took with him a short note declaring that the two nations agreed henceforth to always resolve their differences through consultation rather than war. Offering this to Hitler, Chamberlain then signed it. Hitler signed too, reputedly telling one of those in his circle later that the British prime minister seemed like such a nice old gentleman he was pleased to offer him his autograph.

Upon his return to London, Chamberlain was met at Heston Airport by jubilant crowds, relieved that the threat of war had passed. The prime minister informed the British public that he had achieved “peace with honor,” saying that he believed the settlement would bring “peace for our time.” A few months later, on March 15, 1939, the hollowness of this promise was revealed when Hitler marched his troops into what was left of Czechoslovakia and snuffed out the little country without a hand being raised to defend it.

It was little wonder that Winston Churchill, then a backbencher seemingly at the end of his political career, could state that the impact of Munich would not mean peace with honor, but war with dishonor. Six months after the invasion of “rump Czechoslovakia,” on September 1, 1939, Hitler tried his bullying tactics one time too many, invading Poland in the firm belief that the democracies would again back down. This time, of course, they did not—and World War II was set in motion.

For the Jews of Czechoslovakia, none of this passed without chilling fear and apprehension. Seemingly within minutes of the Nazi invasion, the full weight of Nazi antisemitic laws was imposed on Czechoslovakia’s Jews, leading to a desperate search for some sort of haven. By this time, however, with the Evian Conference of earlier in the year a bad memory, the doors of entry for Jews were being closed all over the world—a situation that would only get worse in the year after Munich.

Museum of Tolerance

The Simon Wiesenthal Center is an international human rights organization founded in 1977 and named for Simon Wiesenthal, an Austrian Jewish Holocaust survivor and, later, a famed Nazi hunter. The center, which is headquartered in Los Angeles, California, operates the Museum of Tolerance; this is also located in Los Angeles, with two smaller museums in New York and Jerusalem. The center’s core mission is to foster tolerance and fight bigotry and racism, with its major focus on the Holocaust. The Los Angeles museum opened in 1993 at a cost of $50 million. The center sponsors educational programs and research covering bigotry, intolerance, antisemitism, and terrorism, and is also committed to defending Jewish interests internationally and advancing knowledge of the Holocaust. The center maintains offices in New York, Miami, Toronto, Buenos Aires, Paris, and Jerusalem.

The main office in Los Angeles features archives and a library with some 50,000 volumes and other materials. The Wiesenthal Center also sponsors various permanent and periodical publications, including a comprehensive, seven-volume work on the Holocaust, published between 1984 and 1990. In keeping with its namesake, the organization has also been involved in identifying and tracking down former Nazis who were involved in crimes against the Jewish people. In addition, the center is involved in local, national, and international politics that affect or are affected by Jews and the center’s mission.

The Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles attracts as many as 350,000 visitors per year, about a third of whom are school-age children. The facility has many exhibits and interactive displays featuring the latest technologies. Much of the museum is dedicated to multimedia presentations and exhibits; traditional historical artefacts are not a mainstay of the facility. Some critics have asserted that there is an overreliance on technology, which blunts the effects of the Holocaust and draws attention away from exhibits. Others, however, argue that the modern generation of school-age children is used to multimedia technology and therefore expects it. The two smaller museums located in New York and Jerusalem are modeled after the Los Angeles facility. The New York museum also sponsors programs for law enforcement personnel, educators, and other public figures that help instruct them to recognize bigotry and intolerance and stop them before they become a problem. More than 10,000 people have gone through the New York program.

Museums and Memorials

There are currently more than 130 significant Holocaust museums and memorial sites located throughout the world, located in 23 different countries. France has the most, with more than 50; the United States ranks second, with 33 such facilities. Museum facilities invariably include a building or buildings designed to preserve the history of the Holocaust, house artifacts, and narrate particular aspects of the Holocaust. Memorials, on the other hand, which are more numerous, typically include monuments, plaques, fountains, sculptures, statuary, parks, and other public spaces designed to memorialize the Holocaust or some specific aspect of it or people associated with it. Memorials can also include financial endowments, organizations, scholarships, and the like. There are many hundreds of these types of memorials, usually established by individuals with some connection to or interest in the Holocaust.

Among the most notable museums are the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum in Poland and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, which opened in 1993 and is located in Washington, D.C. The museum at Auschwitz-Birkenau is perhaps the most moving and influential because it is located on the site of the notorious Nazi death camp and incorporates some of its buildings and facilities. These include the rail line that led Jews and others to the camp during World War II, the infamous gas chamber, clothing and personal articles from the hundreds of thousands who were killed there, a 98-foot-long display of human hair collected from the dead by the Nazis, and the gallows where Rudolf Höss, the commandant of Auschwitz, was hanged in 1947. In 2009 the shameful sign that hung above the camp's entrance, Arbeit Macht Frei ("Work Makes You Free"), was stolen but recovered several days later. It had been cut into several pieces but was otherwise unharmed. It has been replaced by a replica while the original sign is located in a secure display case inside the facility.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum was designed to be the largest and principal Holocaust museum in the United States. It was funded with federal tax dollars and private contributions. Sitting adjacent to the National Mall, the facility is also dedicated to the prevention of genocide, the eradication of racism and intolerance, and the promotion of democratic ideals. It employs 400 full-time employees and over 650 volunteers. The museum is home to nearly 13,000 artifacts, 80,000 photographs, some 1,000 hours of archival film and footage, 9,000 oral histories, 49 million pages of archival documents, and 85,000 library items. It is intended to be used by scholars and researchers as well as the general public. Between 1993 and 2010 more than 30 million people had visited the facility, and the museum's extensive website averages nearly 30 million visits per year. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum is the most-visited Holocaust museum in the world.

Another notable Holocaust memorial and museum is Yad Vashem, the Israeli government's official memorial to Holocaust victims and survivors, located on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem. It contains both memorial sites, including the Hall of Remembrance and Children's Memorial, as well as various plaques, statuary, and museums, including one for Holocaust art, an educational center, research archives, library, and other facilities. It is visited by more than one million people per year. In 2005 a new—and much larger—museum was dedicated on the same site, which serves not only as a Holocaust memorial but also as a place in which hatred, racism, intolerance, and all genocides may be better understood and prevented.

Other notable Holocaust museums include the Museo della Shoah (Rome), the Anne Frank House (Amsterdam), the Beth Shalom Holocaust Centre (Nottinghamshire, England), the Montreal Memorial Holocaust Centre (Montreal), the Museum of Resistance and Deportation (Besaçon, France), and the Museum of Jewish Heritage (New York City).

Memorials to the Holocaust are many and range from objects as small as a plaque or small stone to huge outdoor venues and even entire parks. One of the largest—and perhaps most moving—of these memorials is the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, located in Berlin, Germany. The huge memorial covers 4.7 acres of land and consists of 2,711 large concrete slabs situated on a gently sloping field in a grid fashion. Dedicated in 2005 and designed by Peter Eisenman, the memorial is intended to overwhelm the senses with its size and scope, emulating the overwhelming enormity of the Holocaust itself.

In Budapest, the famous Shoes on the Danube Promenade, which consists of dozens of bronze shoes on the bank of the Danube River, is meant to memorialize the many Jews who were murdered in the city during World War II. Before they were shot and their bodies dumped into the river, authorities ordered victims to remove their shoes. Another notable memorial, located at the Klooga Concentration Camp (Estonia), serves as a reminder of the thousands who lost their lives there during World War II. The Judenplatz Holocaust Memorial in Vienna, Austria, an austere steel and concrete structure that resembles a windowless tomb covered by seemingly endless rows of books with no titles, memorializes the 65,000 Austrian Jews who were murdered during the Holocaust.

Music and the Holocaust

In the field of Holocaust studies, much attention (and rightly so) is paid to the horror and unfathomable circumstances of the Nazi era. Yet even in an atmosphere of despair, death, and brutality, hope and beauty could still be found. Against all odds, music flourished in this troubled environment. The Nazi regime used music for propaganda, military purposes, to promote “Aryan” supremacy, and in support of the mass murder of the Jews. The discussion here focuses on the music used as a way to rise above Nazi tyranny and that spiritually and emotionally bolstered the victims of the regime.

Music was very much a part of life in the camps and ghettos of Nazi-era Europe. While pieces popular before the war remained popular, new works were also written. New songs ranged in topic from reminiscences of home and family, to hope for better days, and reflections of places and events from the past. Loss and longing for freedom and better times also played a part in newly composed songs. Humorous pieces were also a large part of this new output; examples of these more light-hearted pieces come from the Westerbork concentration camp in the Netherlands, where cabaret performances frequently took place.

In addition to folk-style songs and cabaret pieces, classical music also had a significant role in the camps and ghettos. Beyond pieces from the standard classical repertoire from prior to the war (including chamber works, orchestral works, solo instrument works, opera arias, and art songs), newly composed instrumental and vocal works also became an integral part of musical performances. Prisoners from the concentration camp at Terezín (Theresienstadt), located outside Prague, were especially noted for their contributions to the world of classical music.

In 2005 University of Michigan history professor Shirli Gilbert produced a book titled Music in the Holocaust, which was the first major study in English of the role of music among communities in the Nazi regime. She discussed a broad range of musical activities, including orchestras and chamber groups, choirs, theaters, cabarets, and informal music gatherings in some of the most important internment centers in Nazi-occupied Europe. She included not only places such as Auschwitz but also examined the important role of music in ghettos such as Warsaw and Vilna. The study of music, she concluded, opens a unique window on the internal world of the communities that were destroyed by the Nazis and provides insights into how the people of the time interpreted and responded to their experiences.

Musical performances took place in various settings after Nazi decrees and the Nuremberg Laws took effect. In Berlin, the Kulturbund allowed Jews to perform concerts to Jewish audiences and kept musical culture alive until 1941. In the ghettos, music making took place everywhere, including street corners, where songs were sung about life in the ghetto. Many of these lyrics were set to preexisting folk or traditional melodies.

Organized performances fell under the censorship of the Nazi officials. The music of certain composers was forbidden from the public sphere; all Jewish composers (like Felix Mendelssohn, Benny Goodman, George Gershwin, and Arnold Schoenberg, to name a few) were completely off limits. Non-Jewish composers like Claude Debussy and Alban Berg were also banned, the former having married a Jew, the latter considered a political dissident. Music considered too provocative or explicit, like that of Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky, was also banned. Banned music fell under the term “degenerate.” However, in the camps themselves, pieces written by Jewish composers were allowed to be performed. In Terezín, pieces by Mendelssohn as well as pieces on Jewish subjects were common.

An abundance of music exists from these camps and ghettos. In the Warsaw Ghetto, a virtuoso brass player, Adam Furmanski, organized small orchestras in cafés and soup kitchens. A symphonic orchestra played in the ghetto until April 1942, when the Nazi authorities closed it down for—in this instance—performing works by German composers, which Jews were not permitted to do. In Łódź, the head of the Jewish Council, Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, oversaw musical activities and arranged for the adaptation of the community center to enable musical and theatrical performances, a symphony orchestra, and the famous Zamir choral society (which itself dated back to 1899). In the Kraków ghetto, chamber and liturgical music selections were performed. The Vilna ghetto had an extensive program of musical activities, with a symphony orchestra, several choirs, and a conservatory with 100 students. A revue theater presented many popular songs about ghetto life.

Among the best-known songs composed and performed during the Shoah came from the Vilna ghetto. The best-known of these is “Zog nit keyn-mol” (“Never Say,” also known as the “Partisaner lied,” or “Song of the Partisans”). This song, written by Hirsh Glik, expresses the courage of the Jewish partisans during World War II. Inspired by the story of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of 1943, the song remains a powerful tribute to the commitment of the Jewish people to fighting for their survival. This particular song has become popular in Holocaust commemorations performed around the world.

Music in the camps served various purposes. Many of the death camps included orchestras of prisoners, whom the Nazis forced to play music for arriving Jews, for those marching to work, and for those marching to their deaths in the gas chambers. These orchestras were also forced to act as entertainment for Nazi officers at the end of the day or week. Auschwitz became known for their camp orchestras; at one point the camp had six orchestras with the largest, located at Auschwitz I, containing approximately 50 members. In Birkenau, the women’s orchestra included about 36 musicians and eight music transcribers. This orchestra, under the direction of Alma Rosé (the niece of Gustav Mahler and daughter of famed violinist Arnold Rosé), became known for their performances. Another Auschwitz prisoner, the French singer Fania Fénelon, was also closely involved with this orchestra. The death camps at Treblinka, Majdanek, Bełżec, and Sobibór were all known to have orchestras made up of Jewish prisoners, who also played—under direction, of course—for the pleasure of Nazi camp personnel.

The concentration camp of Terezín became famous for its plethora of musical and artistic life. Czech, German, and Dutch musicians were all interred in this former fortress town in the northwest Czech Republic. A jazz band called the Ghetto Swingers performed in the camp’s main square; cabarets and operas were also prevalent. Original classical music compositions also became prominent here. Viktor Ullmann headed a Studio for New Music and composed piano sonatas, string quartets, and an opera titled The Emperor of Atlantis. Composer Hans Krása created one of the most performed pieces in the camp, the children’s opera Brundibár. This opera, along with a performance of Verdi’s Requiem under conductor Rafael Schächter, was performed when the International Red Cross visited Terezín in June 1944.

In Westerbork, classical music concerts also took place; however, Westerbork became especially known for its cabarets. Six cabaret productions took place between July 1943 and June 1944 and used cabaret songs from Berlin and Vienna. Two Jewish cabaret artists, Willy Rosen and Max Ehrlich, produced many of these performances. One of the most famous songs to come out of Westerbork was the “Westerbork Serenade” by Max Kannewasser and Arnold van Wesel. The duo, more popularly known as Johnny and Jones, recorded “Westerbork Serenade” under the order of the Nazi officials at the camp.

In addition to music from the camps and ghettos, music and Holocaust studies also include those Jewish musicians who went into hiding or were not in the camps for various reasons. Władysław Szpilman, whose autobiography The Pianist would become the inspiration behind the film of the same name, remained in hiding during the war with the help of various colleagues and eventually a Nazi officer by the name of Wilm Hosenfeld. Szpilman played Chopin’s Nocturne in C-sharp minor for Hosenfeld after the latter found him in an abandoned building; Hosenfeld assisted Szpilman until he was liberated. The motion picture The Pianist (Roman Polanski, 2002) was one of the first major commercial successes to shed light on the subject of music and the Holocaust.

Since the Holocaust, those who remained have picked up the musical legacy left by those who did not survive. A post-Holocaust musical tradition has been generated in the name of the victims by such composers as Krzysztof Penderecki, composer of Dies Irae (1967), a memorial to the victims of Auschwitz; Dmitri Shostakovich, whose symphony Babi Yar (1962) commemorates the victims of the massacre near the city of Kiev; Arnold Schönberg, who wrote A Survivor from Warsaw (1947); and Charles Davidson, whose I Never Saw Another Butterfly (1968) is based on the collection of poetry written by the children of Terezín. Even during World War II itself, British composer Michael Tippett wrote A Child of Our Time, an oratorio featuring the life of Herschel Grynszpan, the Jewish teenager whose actions in late 1938 precipitated the Kristallnacht—arguably, as some have said, “the day the Holocaust began.”

More recent musical events have also continued the legacy and memory of those whose lives were brutally ended during the Holocaust. Composer Peter Nocella’s 2002 Missa Brevis commemorates the Martyrs of Nowogródek, 11 nuns from the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth who were killed by the Nazis in the woods of modern-day Belarus. Two concert dramas created by conductor Murry Sidlin, Defiant Requiem (premiered 2002) and Hours of Freedom (premiered 2015), tell the story of the musicians from Terezín.

Defiant Requiem honors the 16 performances of Verdi's Requiem conducted by Rafael Schächter, and Hours of Freedom introduces audiences to the stories and music of many lesser known classical music composers from the camp. In 2008 Kalin and Sharon Tchonev created the Songs of Life Festival to commemorate the rescue of Bulgarian Jews during the war. These are just a few examples of musical commemorations of the Holocaust in the 21st century.

The stories of Jewish musicians during the time period and the examples of music from the camps and ghettos are numerous. In 2013 the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum released findings of a study that found there were 42,500 camps and ghettos throughout Europe; this after an extensive study to document the names of these places. For music and the Holocaust, this means there is so much we have yet to discover. What is clear is that music allowed those under tyranny to keep hope alive, keep faith alive, and have a connection to their homelands and cultures. Viktor Ullmann, in addition to his many musical compositions, also wrote 26 music critiques and three essays detailing performances in Terezín. In a 1944 essay titled Goethe und Ghetto, he said: "To emphasize that I have been in my musical work sponsored by Theresienstadt and not inhibited, that we did not merely sit lamenting by the waters of Babylon and that our culture was equal to our will to live—I am convinced that those who have sought to wrest a reluctant substance from form in life and art will prove me right." Despite being surrounded by the worst of humanity, these musicians and artists found a way to showcase the best of humanity through their artistic and musical talent.

Mussert, Anton Adriaan

Anton Adriaan Mussert, a Dutch engineer, was the best-known fascist in the Netherlands before and during World War II. Mussert founded the National Socialist Movement in the Netherlands (Nationaal-Socialistische Beweging in Nederland, or NSB) in 1931, which became a major political party in the 1930s. As the leading member of the party, Mussert was partially responsible for contributions to the Nederlandsche SS, the Dutch version of the German SS, which was responsible for the deportation of 100,000 Dutch Jews to concentration and extermination camps in Germany and Poland, and the murder of Dutch citizens during Nazi occupation of the Netherlands.

Born on May 11, 1894, in Werkendam, a small village in north Netherlands, Mussert was the fourth child of a primary school headmaster, Joannes Leonardus Mussert. In 1914, following the beginning of World War I, 20-year-old Mussert volunteered for the Dutch army but was overruled due to health issues a year later. By 1918 he had become a civil engineer at the Department of Waterways and Public Works and was then promoted to the Provincial Waterworks Utrecht in 1920. Interested in politics from an early age, Mussert joined several far-right nationalist political organizations, including the Dietsche Bond.

On December 14, 1931, Mussert, Cornelis van Geelkerken, a fellow Dutch nationalist, and 10 others founded the Nationaal-Socialistische Beweging, or National Socialist movement, the Dutch equivalent to Germany's Nazis. As appointed leader, Mussert took great inspiration from Italy's fascist leader Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler in Germany. At a rally in Utrecht in 1933, the National Socialist Movement attracted a crowd of only 600; a year later, the Dutch National Socialists were rallying at an event in Amsterdam with nearly 25,000 supporters.

The Dutch National Socialists, with Mussert at the helm, received 300,000 votes in the 1935 Parliamentary election. However, at the following election in 1937 they received less than half that number. Without much influence remaining, Mussert dedicated his time as a spurned politician to encourage a German invasion.

On May 10, 1940, the Germans invaded the Netherlands. Within days, 800 NSB members were released from prison, and Mussert was given permission by the Nazis to suppress all Dutch political parties other than his own. With increasing German influence, the NSB became progressively more antisemitic. NSB numbers grew, and Mussert, as the leader of the only acceptable political party in the Netherlands, did his best to pull himself up into the highest ranks of political influence, hoping to be appointed to prime minister by the Nazis.

Much to his dismay, Mussert was rejected for the post of prime minister, and his pleas for a Netherlands independent of Germany went unheeded. The Nazis were not leaving the Netherlands to its own devices. Instead, they appointed Austrian Nazi Arthur Seyss-Inquart as leader during the continued German occupation, surpassing Mussert entirely and snatching away his power privileges. Mussert agreed to have NSB members train with the Dutch SS troops, which led to the incarceration of thousands of Dutch citizens. His own influence began to die out as more pro-German politicians, such as Rost van Tonningen, made their way onto the political scene.

Mussert's Dutch nationalist ideals ultimately led to his political demise. He was eventually given the task of controlling the resisting Dutch masses. After the Allies took Antwerp in 1944, many of the NSB's members, including Mussert, fled to Germany. He was arrested on May 7, 1945, after Germany surrendered, and tried for treason. Two days into his trial in November 1945 he was found guilty and was executed by firing squad on May 7, 1946, at The Hague.

Nacht und Nebel

On December 7, 1941, at the insistence of Adolf Hitler, a decree titled Nacht und Nebel Erlass (“Night and Fog Decree”), signed by the chief of the German Armed Forces High Command (Oberkommando der Wehrmacht, or OKW), Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel, was instituted. This effectively circumvented both the military and judicial systems with regard to enemy, specifically nonmilitary, combatants.

The phrase itself was coined by the German poet and playwright Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and referred to the result of clandestine activities whereby a person disappeared into the mists of the night and fog. In the Nazi case, such persons, upon capture, were to be speedily brought to Germany to be tried in special courts and, more often than not, found guilty, after which they immediately disappeared and were presumed murdered or transported to either concentration camps or extermination camps for immediate “disposal” (death). Those who were not murdered immediately but became slave laborers found their garments branded with a double “N” and were separated from the rest of the prisoner population, both male and female. The purpose of the decree was to strike mortal fear into the hearts of the conquered peoples. The total number of such persons who were caught and murdered, however, is still not known.

The same day as the decree went into effect, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler informed the Gestapo that “it is the will of the Führer” that for those engaging in acts detrimental to the Reich “or against the occupation forces in occupied areas” prison, even at hard labor, was no longer sufficient. As an effective and lasting deterrent, only the death penalty or “measures which will leave the family and population uncertain as to the fate of the offender” would henceforth be satisfactory. The conclusion was that “deportation to Germany serves this purpose.” Five days later, on December 12, 1941, Keitel further clarified his understanding of the decree with the comment, “efficient and enduring intimidation can only be achieved either by capital punishment or by measures by which the relatives of the criminals do not know the fate of the criminal.” Ironically, at his trial at Nuremberg at the International Military Tribunal, before being found guilty and hanged on October 16, 1946, he attempted to argue that its purpose was directed solely against Wehrmacht troops found guilty of military misconduct and that its application against civilian populations was a “full and monstrous tragedy.”

The decree itself was relatively short, consisting, after a brief preamble warning of the increasing danger of “communist and other circles hostile to Germany,” of only five directives obligating the military “to take severe measures as a deterrent”: (1) the “adequate punishment” for such offenses is death; (2) unless the death penalty can be carried out quickly, the offenders are to be transported to Germany; (3) information regarding such transported prisoners is not to be given out; (4) military commanders and court authorities in the occupied areas are “personally responsible” for the implementation of this decree; and (5) both Field Marshal Keitel and Reich Minister of Justice Franz Schlegelberger were empowered to issue orders within their spheres of responsibility.

Those who found themselves as prisoners under this decree were primarily from Western Europe: Belgium, Denmark, France, Luxembourg, Norway, and the Netherlands, where many if not most suffered the brutalizations common to all concentration camp prisoners to the point of death. Two camps were the primary recipients of these prisoners: Gross-Rosen in western Poland and Natzweiler-Struthof in the Vosges Mountains in France. Female Nacht und Nebel prisoners were also sent to Ravensbrück in northern Germany, Mauthausen in upper Austria, and Auschwitz in southeastern Poland.

It is not known how many prisoners lost their lives as a result of the Nacht und Nebel decree, so complete was the secrecy surrounding their arrest and subsequent murder. They literally disappeared, with no trace remaining of their capture or subsequent destiny. Ten years after the war, in 1955, French film director Alain Resnais made a documentary film titled Nuit et brouillard (Night and Fog), filmed on location at both Majdanek and Auschwitz, and describing the lives of the camp prisoners in those two sites.

Names under the Nazis, Legislation

On August 17, 1938, the Nazi government of Germany (and recently acquired Austria) passed the Second Decree Supplementing the Law Regarding the Change of Family Names and First Names. As the next in what was becoming a long line of Nazi decrees forcibly imposing “Aryanization” on German society, the Nazis hit on the idea that in order to enforce the many antisemitic policies that had been introduced since the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, it was necessary for officials everywhere to be able to identify Jews in a formal sense. Consequently, the “Change of Family Names and First Names” decree required that all male Jews would be required to adopt the compulsory middle name of “Israel” to their own, and all female Jews to add the name “Sarah.”

The law became operational as from January 1, 1939. From then on, all Jews were required to add the name to their passports and other official documents, and to all identity cards. All newly born children were required to have these names registered alongside the names given by their parents.

Looking at the wording of the decree, we see not only the explicit statement regarding the middle names (for which the decree has become best known), it also states that after the law came into effect Jews would have to choose names for their children from an official list of approved (and highly conspicuous) “Jewish” first names. This reference was to the Guidelines on the Use of Given Names issued by the Reich minister of the interior, who in 1938 was Dr. Wilhelm Stuckart, a lawyer who was one of the co-authors of the Nuremberg Laws, later convicted for war crimes by the Allies. The new naming legislation was underwritten by the Reich minister of justice, Dr. Franz Gürtner.

The law was the latest in a long list of measures that sought progressively to push the Jews out of German society. Because of the earlier Nuremberg Laws, Jews could only marry other Jews and attend Jewish schools. Sleeping and dining cars on railroads, barbershops, hospitals, restrooms, and waiting rooms all became segregated. The Nazis set curfews and shopping hours for the Jews and denied them the use of public telephones. They also removed private phones from Jewish homes.

In October 1938 the letter “J” was stamped on all German passports, ration cards, and other official documents of German Jews. An initiative of the Swiss government in negotiations with the Nazis, the stamping of the letter “J” was introduced as an administrative measure to assist restrictive immigration policies and regulate the entry of Jewish refugees into countries bordering Germany. Later laws required “non-Aryans” six years old and older to wear a Star of David on the left breast of their clothing. All these measures depriving Jews of their identity as Germans led inexorably to their estrangement and the legislative removal of Jews from German life in subsequent years.

National Socialism

A political movement founded in Germany and intimately connected to Adolf Hitler, who attained office in January 1933. To a large degree it began as a movement inspired by the growth of European fascism (particularly its Italian variant under Benito Mussolini, who was seen for some time as Hitler's political mentor), but National Socialist ideology outstripped fascism when it incorporated a powerful and uncompromising strain of antisemitism into its philosophy, together with a racial conception of how the world operated. Like fascism, its essential beliefs were grounded in a vigorous opposition to alternative ideologies, particularly Marxism, socialism, liberalism, and individualism. Hitler's philosophy called for an unyielding obedience of the people to the state, which was the transmitted will of the Volk (people), or national essence. Hitler, as leader (Führer) of the National Socialist party, was the embodiment of the state and bearer of the will of the Volk. The major goals of the National Socialist state were physical expansion in accordance with the principle of racial unification and contiguity, eradication of the nation's racial and political enemies (as defined by the Führer), and a militaristic regimentation of society in every respect. Although possessed of radical ideas regarding society, the economy, and the nature of politics, German National Socialism was effectively a destructive force; through harnessing the power of the advanced industrial state to an ideology predicated on military power, expansion, and social engineering, National Socialism rapidly showed itself to be harmful, bellicose, and a paradigm for all genocidal political movements.

National Socialist German Workers' Party

The National Socialist German Workers' Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei), also called the Nazi Party or Nazis, was the political party of the mass German movement known as National Socialism. Under the leadership of Adolf Hitler, the party came to power in Germany in 1933 and governed by totalitarian methods until 1945.

After World War I, Germany was in chaos due to high inflation, massive unemployment, ineffective government policies, and the financial burden of reparations mandated after World War I by the Treaty of Versailles (1919). This situation gave rise to wandering bands of nationalists, communist revolutionaries, and a significant leftist movement in Germany. Among these groups was the obscure German Workers' Party.

Hitler joined the party in 1919, hoping to find in it a means to achieve the revolution he sought. He quickly became a major player, then leader. He modified the party, took it over, and incorporated paramilitary elements. He renamed it the National Socialist German Workers' Party.

He then had setbacks, including the failure of the Beer Hall Putsch of 1923 and a resultant period of six months' imprisonment, where he wrote the party's manifesto, Mein Kampf. But the party grew, and its representation in the Reichstag, Germany's parliament, grew also. Hitler now preferred legal takeover to a revolution, having been in one failed putsch already. Nevertheless, he was not averse to violence. The leaders of the Nazi Party's Sturmabteilung (SA), originally formed to protect the Nazi Party from its rivals, were becoming a rival center of power. In 1934 Hitler ordered the arrest and execution of Ernst Röhm and other of the SA's top leaders in what is known as the Night of the Long Knives.

In 1928 the party had only 810,000 votes and 12 deputies elected to the Reichstag, versus 3.2 million votes for the communists and 9.1 million for the Social Democrats. In 1930 its total vote was 6.4 million and 107 deputies, and the party had 180,000 members. In 1932 the party gained 39% of the Reichstag before slipping by 34 seats, and in a presidential election Hitler polled 13.5 million votes to incumbent President Paul von Hindenburg's 19.25 million. By 1934 Hitler was chancellor under Hindenburg, and Hermann Göring was president. Soon after his ascent to office in January 1933, Hitler used the pretext of a fire in the Reichstag to suspend civil liberties, suppress the communists and Social Democrats (20,000 were arrested), and suspend the constitution.

Hitler and the Nazi Party now had absolute control of Germany, in what had become a one-party state. Nazism was fascist, antisemitic, rabidly nationalist, and dedicated to pan-Germanism, Lebensraum (physical expansion to the east), and the overturn of the Versailles Treaty. The party led Germany into World War II, the Holocaust, and other crimes.

National Socialist Program

The 25 points comprising the National Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) Program were composed by Adolf Hitler and Anton Drexler. They were formally unveiled February 24, 1920, the same day that the party was renamed from the German Workers' Party.

In the second volume of his book Mein Kampf, Adolf Hitler explained the purpose of the principles in the program as having been devised to give “a rough picture of the movement's aims,” which formed “a political creed” intended to recruit new members and reinforce membership of those already in the party. There had been earlier examples of a similar nature, but here Hitler made it clear that his thoughts would be translated into a plan of action. Although declaring that the program was designed to be “of limited duration,” and that party leaders had no intention of establishing any new principles, subsequent events would demonstrate that the 25-point program was set in place to stay.

The first principle was to set the tone for all the others, a nationalistic statement that left no room for doubt as to the Nazis' desire to expand Germany's current borders into the future: “We demand the unification of all Germans in the Greater Germany on the basis of the people's right to self-determination.” Given that, point two demanded an overthrow of the post-World War I peace treaties of Versailles (Germany) and St. Germain (Austria), something from which Hitler never retreated and which was to characterize his entire foreign policy down to 1939.

This opened the way for the points relating to race, numbers 4 and 5, respectively. In point 4, the program stated that “Only a member of the [German] race can be a citizen. A member of the race can only be one who is of German blood, without consideration of creed. Consequently no Jew can be a member of the race.” As no Jew could be a member of the German race, it figured that, according to point 5, “Whoever has no citizenship is to be able to live in Germany only as a guest, and must be under the authority of legislation for foreigners.” That legislation, as spelled out in point 8, was that “further immigration of non-citizens is to be prevented,” and that “all non-Germans, who have immigrated to Germany since August 2, 1914, be forced immediately to leave the Reich.”

And so it went on. All areas of public discourse that could revert to Germany were demanded, from the “right to determine matters concerning administration and law,” in which “every public office be filled only by citizens” (point 6); to compulsory nationalization of all trusts (point 13); to “struggle without consideration” against those “whose activity is injurious to the general interest,” such as “Common national criminals, usurers, profiteers and so forth,” who would suffer the death penalty for their actions (point 18); and to a complete overhaul of the “whole national education program” (point 20).

Points 24 and 25 summed up where National Socialism was heading, overall: “We demand freedom of religion for all religious denominations within the state so long as they do not endanger its existence or oppose the moral senses of the Germanic race,” as a way to combat “the Jewish-materialistic spirit within and around us”; with this, the party demanded a state in which citizens would put “The good of the state before the good of the individual” (point 24); and, in order to achieve all that the Nazis had set out in their program, “we demand the formation of a strong central power” that would claim “Unlimited authority of the central parliament over the whole Reich and its organizations in general” (point 25).

Overall, the 25-point program of the NSDAP showed Hitler's determination to establish a national community (Volksgemeinschaft) of mutual interest that desired racial purity for the German people, which was governed by a strong central authority unhampered by parliamentary procedures, rather than one that was divided over differing values or as a result of diverse national backgrounds or religious beliefs.

In subsequent years some members of the party sought to amend the National Socialist program, but Hitler blocked every suggestion of changing the program. For him, it was sacrosanct, absolute, and permanent. Moreover, it contained much that was a departure from all previous notions of parliamentary democracy, at a time when Weimar Germany was desperately trying to protect the fragile hold on democratic values it was committed to directing.

Natzweiler-Struthof

The Natzweiler-Struthof Nazi concentration camp was located some 30 miles southwest of Strasbourg (Alsace) in northeastern France. It opened in May 1941 and was initially designed as a forced labor facility. It was not a site of systematic mass murder, as were other German camps, although several thousand people did die there between 1941 and 1944, when it was largely liquidated. The camp was designed to hold about 1,500 prisoners, but as many as 52,000 were interned there in the three years of its operation. Internees included Polish, Russian, French, Dutch, German, and Norwegian prisoners.

Prisoners worked in nearby quarries, on various construction projects, and, beginning in early 1944, in German munitions factories. To curb accelerated activities on the part of the anti-German resistance movement in Western Europe, in the summer of 1943 the Germans began imprisoning many resistance fighters at Natzweiler-Struthof; the largest percentage of these prisoners was from the French Resistance.

In August 1943 the Germans erected a makeshift gas chamber at Natzweiler-Struthof, where medical experimentation was carried out on a number of prisoners, especially the Roma in captivity there. Shortly thereafter, 80 Jewish internees were killed in the gas chamber; their bodies were transferred to Strasbourg University, where German scientists hoped to prove their bogus theories of racial hierarchy by studying the skeletons of the murdered prisoners.

Although the prison was not an extermination camp, there were at least 4,431 documented deaths at Natzweiler-Struthof. Some prisoners died from overwork, while others died from disease, malnutrition, and beatings. In total, as many as 10,000–12,000 people probably died at the main camp and its numerous subsidiary camps. In September 1944, after Allied troops had landed in France, the Germans liquidated most of the camp, sending prisoners to Dachau, where many more perished. On November 23, 1944, Allied troops entered Natzweiler; it was the first such camp discovered in Western Europe. It was later determined that this was the only permanent concentration camp established within France, even though there were many others, such as Drancy, that were not permanent and had different functions.

After the war, several members of the camp's administration were tried and convicted of war crimes, including the commandant. Two were sentenced to death, and one was given a 10-year prison term.

Nazi Book Burning

On May 10, 1933, a phenomenon unseen since the Middle Ages took place in the heart of Berlin, when students from the National Socialist German Students' League, the SA, the SS, and the Hitler Youth, in the presence of Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels, burned around 25,000 books that they considered to be "un-German."

The location of the book burnings was a square in the heart of Berlin, first known as Opera House Square (Platz am Opernhaus, or, colloquially, Opernplatz). On August 12, 1910, it was named Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Platz in honor of Emperor Francis Joseph I of Austria. After the war, on August 31, 1947, the square was given the name it has to this day, Bebelplatz, in honor of August Bebel, one of the founders of Germany's Social Democratic Party.

Situated on the south side of the majestic Unter den Linden, it is bounded to the east by the State Opera building, to the west by Humboldt University, and to the southeast by St. Hedwig's Cathedral. The large square is dominated on one side by the library of Humboldt's Law School.

Soon after the Nazis came to power in 1933, a campaign was conducted by the German Student Union to ceremonially burn books written by authors considered to be subversive or ideologically unacceptable to the Third Reich. Banned genres of literature included the works of traitors, emigrants, and authors from foreign countries; Marxist, socialist, and communist writers; pacifist literature; works advocating “degenerate art”; all literature by Jewish authors; any literature supporting liberal democracy or supporting the Weimar Republic; and many other writings. In this photo, Hitler Youth members from Austria participate in burning books in April 1938. (AP Photo)

Some 40,000 people had gathered on the square prior to the burning, as Goebbels made an inflammatory speech to the youth of Germany in which he declared: “The era of extreme Jewish intellectualism is now at an end. . . . The future German man will not just be a man of books, but a man of character. It is to this end that we want to educate you. . . . And thus you do well in this midnight hour to commit to the flames the evil spirit of the past. . . . Here the intellectual foundation of the [Weimar] Republic is sinking to the ground, but from this wreckage the phoenix of a new spirit will triumphantly rise.”

He continued: “No to decadence and moral corruption! Yes to decency and morality in family and state! I consign to the flames the writings of Heinrich Mann, Ernst Gläser, Erich Kästner.” The latter writer, Erich Kästner, was present among the crowd.

The speech, and the book burnings that followed, were accompanied by the singing of Nazi songs and anthems as well as an abundant use of the Nazi salute. Berlin radio broadcast the occasion triumphantly to listeners throughout Germany live as it happened.

On that awful night, books of all kinds were publicly and symbolically burned. German-language authors, regardless of whether they were from Germany or not, whose books were burned included Walter Benjamin, Ernst Bloch, Bertolt Brecht, Friedrich Engels, Lion Feuchtwanger, Sigmund Freud, George Grosz, Jaroslav Hašek, Franz Kafka, Erich Kästner, Egon Kisch, Karl Kraus, Theodor Lessing, Karl Liebknecht, Georg Lukács, Rosa Luxemburg, Heinrich Mann, Thomas Mann, Karl Marx, Carl von Ossietzky, Erwin Piscator, Erich Maria Remarque, Joseph Roth, Nelly Sachs, Anna Seghers, Arthur Schnitzler, Ernst Toller, Kurt Tucholsky, Jakob Wassermann, Franz Werfel, Arnold Zweig, and Stefan Zweig.

Foreign writers' books were not exempt: these included Victor Hugo, André Gide, Romain Rolland, and Henri Barbusse (France); Joseph Conrad, D. H. Lawrence, H. G. Wells, and Aldous Huxley (Britain); James Joyce (Ireland); Ernest Hemingway, John Dos Passos, Jack London, and Helen Keller (United States); and Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Maxim Gorki, Isaac Babel, Vladimir Lenin, Vladimir Nabokov, Leo Tolstoy, and Leon Trotsky (Russia).

The works consigned to the flames included those of pacifists, liberals, socialists, communists, and anarchists; those whose writings were viewed as subversive or somehow opposed to Nazism; those considered to be traitors; all historical writing deemed as disparaging to the spirit and culture of the German Volk, or antithetical to Aryan racial ideals; writings that praised so-called "degenerate art"; works relating to sexuality and sexual education opposite to the principles of Nazi racial ideas; literature by Jewish authors, regardless of the field; and many other areas to which the Nazis were opposed.

The book burnings were the culmination of a series of events that had begun a few days earlier on May 6, when students began gathering books and dragging them into the square for a purpose yet to be established. Even then, however, it was clear that the intention was to purge local places of learning of works deemed to be unacceptable to the new Nazi regime, installed only a little over three months earlier.

The events on Bebelplatz on May 10, 1933, were just the beginning of a spate of book burnings that took place in many German university cities over succeeding weeks. In 34 towns across Germany the movement to purge those whose writings opposed "the German Spirit" took place with the seeming consent (or at least, acquiescence) of those observing. Nationalistic and Nazi-inspired students marched in torch-lit parades throughout Germany, enjoining their professors and student leaders to address the crowds. Some professors, from what were the finest universities in the world, were incapable of joining in. Many were dismissed; some took their own lives in despair at what Germany had become.

The works of those whose books had been burned were from this point on no longer permitted in university curricula or on the shelves of libraries.

In the Bebelplatz, where the events of May 10, 1933, took place, a memorial has since been set consisting of a glass plate set into the cobblestones, which opens onto a hollow in the ground showing row after row of empty bookshelves. At the site is an engraving of words from Heinrich Heine's 1821 play Almansor. Here, he wrote a much-quoted line: "Das war ein Vorspiel nur, dort wo man Bücher verbrennt, verbrennt man auch am Ende Menschen" ("That was but a prelude; where they burn books, they will ultimately burn people as well"). On the night of the book burnings, Heine's works were also among those burned by the Nazis.

Nazi Criminal Orders, 1941

The Commissar Order, or Kommissarbefehl, was an order issued by the German High Command on June 6, 1941, prior to the June 22, 1941, invasion of the Soviet Union (Operation Barbarossa). The formal name of the order was Guidelines for the Treatment of Political Commissars (Richtlinien für die Behandlung politischer Kommissare).

This was one of the three important directives referred to in some circles as the Nazi Criminal Orders, which, collectively, contributed to mass atrocities against Soviet prisoners of war and the civilian population throughout the German-occupied East. In the spring of 1941 Adolf Hitler outlined his plans for the coming war against the Soviet Union. This was not to be a conventional conflict that followed the usual customs and laws of warfare. Instead, it was to be a "War of Annihilation," a clash between the German and Slavic races and between Nazi and Communist ideology from which there would be only one victor. The nature of the war in the East was to reflect the Nazi policy of Lebensraum ("Living Room"), in which the region would become an area colonized by the so-called "superior" Aryan Germans and where local populations were expendable. After various revisions, the German High Command, particularly Wilhelm Keitel and Walter von Brauchitsch, then wrote and distributed to all German soldiers a group of orders prior to the invasion that codified this vision.

Together, these orders included the "Barbarossa Decree," "Guidelines for the Behavior of the Troops," and the "Commissar Order."

The Barbarossa Decree informed soldiers of the racist component of the war, and that Bolshevism and its “carriers” (meaning Jews) were the “mortal enemy of the German people.” The military was told that “this war demands ruthless and aggressive action against Bolshevik agitators, snipers, saboteurs, and Jews and tireless elimination of any active or passive resistance.” The orders authorized reprisal killings of civilians and further encouraged soldiers to treat all civilian populations “ruthlessly.”

The Commissar Order explicitly ordered the immediate execution upon capture of any political officers serving in the Red Army. These commissars had been tasked with the political instruction of Soviet soldiers. The decree was a direct contravention of the accepted laws of war, particularly those requiring the proper treatment of prisoners of war.

The Guidelines for the Behavior of the Troops mandated that all legal protections for local civilian populations were to be rescinded, and soldiers were informed that actions which would have been considered crimes in the rest of Europe would not be pursued in the Soviet Union. Such guidance, issued directly to the troops, condoned and led to the abuse of civilian populations.

These directives had devastating implications for the conduct of the war in the Soviet Union and for the survival of those living there. The outright refusal to adhere to the accepted laws of war created a climate in which criminality and excess was accepted, indeed, encouraged. The Barbarossa Decree also provided justification for military support of the Nazi genocidal project in the East. By simultaneously instilling suspicion and fear of the local population in the German army and advocating harsh (and illegal) reprisals against them, the “Criminal Orders” also led to systematic mass killing of Soviet citizens.

Finally, these initial orders resonated with and reinforced other instructions to further radicalize the war in the Soviet Union. The Barbarossa Decree, for example, supported other orders that tasked the military with supporting the Einsatzgruppen, or Death Squads. It also augmented the German policy of neglecting or abusing Soviet POWs, which led to millions of deaths and supported the “Hunger Plan,” which condoned the deaths of tens of millions of Soviet citizens as the German military expropriated food. The Barbarossa Decree figured heavily at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials as evidence of aggressive war, war crimes, and all manner of atrocities against civilians.

Nazism and Germany

Although fascism originated in Italy, it was in Germany under Adolf Hitler that the most notorious, powerful, and destructive fascist regime arose in the 1930s, a regime known to history as Nazism. Its origins can be traced back to the previous century. In the aftermath of the French Revolution, Europe saw the rise of various forms of Romantic movements, starting as a mainly cultural reaction to the rationalism of the Enlightenment. Such movements exalted the idealism, the myths, and the hopes of a tragic and suffering individual. As the 19th century drew to a close, these tended to meld gradually with early liberal values. In the German states, however, these Romantic ideas took a slightly different path. Whereas the sense of pessimism and mystical longing for cathartic rehabilitation remained basically unaltered, the individual was instead being replaced by “das Volk” (the people) and the nation was assigned holistic and organic qualities. This shift from an idealization of the single individual to an idealization of the nation, one and undivided, meant that “foreign” values were associated with distinctly negative qualities. These “un-German” values were seen as “progressive” and “liberal” in a negative sense, in that they threatened a traditionalist and protectionist economic system. They were styled by völkisch thinkers as “mechanistic, materialistic, and superficial”—consequently violating a “spiritual” and “authentic” Germanic culture. Furthermore, “foreign” ideas proposed abstract thinking, intellectualism, and rationalism, in contrast to the blessings of “common sense” and of things concrete and tangible, such as the family and the community. Universalistic and egalitarian, such ideas were used in defense of “the rights of man”—in other words, in opposition to “natural hierarchies” that were soon to form the basis for a creed of antisemitism and outright racism. Finally, these “foreign” ideas came to be represented as “feeble” and “worn out,” seeking to obstruct the young and vigorous ideas of the rising Germanic nation.

These psychological and cultural factors were reinforced by the fact that Germany's bourgeois revolution, as opposed to the "healthy" evolution of Britain and France, remained haphazard and incomplete. The nation exhibited a flawed development—"ein Sonderweg" (a special path). Middle-class constituencies remained embedded in a "preindustrial" and "premodern" worldview. Artisans, white-collar employees, and civil servants clung to antique notions of caste and estate, and, anxious to guard their corporatist privileges and mercantilist traditions, mobilized against the advance of modern capitalism. As the bells of 1900 tolled, the philosophical underpinnings for the coming cataclysm had already therefore sunk deep into the foundation of German society.

Other contributory causes of the rise of Nazism were of a more political and practical nature. As a Romantic reaction against a superficial bourgeois existence, movements like the Wandervogel, which were interested in reviving old Teutonic values as a protest against industrialization, attracted mainly middle-class teenagers. Although the Wandervogel were prohibited after 1933, their associations with youth and invigorating country life, marches, and song were systematically exploited by the Hitler regime. The Stahlhelm, or "Steel Helmets," was a movement founded after 1919 by World War I veterans. German-nationalistic and a stern opponent of "bourgeois decadence" and the Weimar Republic, the organization often joined forces with the Nazis, especially in the period after 1929. Germany's war reparations imposed by the 1919 Treaty of Versailles amounted to no less than 132 billion gold marks, even today a sum of immense proportions. This "deliberate act of aggression against the Germanic Volk" was to become an important ingredient in Hitler's speeches. Another World War I myth on which Hitler drew heavily was that of the legend of the "stab in the back" ("die Dolchstoßlegende"), implying that the war on the battlefields was virtually won and that the military had been betrayed by ignorant civilians and feeble-minded bureaucrats, with the sinister figure of "the Jew" lurking behind them.

The major financial crash on Wall Street in 1929 contributed to a momentum for the forces of the Right that was possibly decisive. Unemployment skyrocketed, and the Weimar democrats were subjected to increasing criticism. Correspondingly, calls for forceful leadership grew in proportion, demands from which the charismatic Hitler was soon to profit. Who then supported Hitler? And for what reason? The National Socialists appealed to those social strata that had suffered considerably during the Great Depression. Especially in the early 1930s, they won acclaim for beating the Great Depression and for curing the massive unemployment.

In contrast, Marxist historians point toward the link between the Nazi regime and the ruling classes. Some argue that Hitler's main thrust came from a radicalized, völkisch notion of a community, whereby "non-Aryans," and Jews in particular, were seen as inferior races. Those of a more republican leaning hold, in contrast, that the rise of Nazism should be sought in the cynical fragmentation of society, in the disintegration of a moderate, civic-minded community. Scholars who stress the völkisch, cultural origin of Nazism as opposed to more practical, economic causes often suggest that Hitler had a stronger position among academics than among the working classes. Others, such as Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, argue that the antisemitic issue was the prime reason for Hitler's support; still others play down its real significance. Hitler biographer Alan Bullock, for example, maintains that Austrians might have supported Anschluss in 1938 not because of Hitler's antisemitism but in spite of it. The issue of free choice versus compulsion keeps attracting attention. At times, it is claimed that Hitler simply managed to force the entire German population to support the regime. To others, the system rested mainly on open support and outright enthusiasm by "willing" soldiers and an eager electorate.

Why, then, did the Germans not consciously choose not to support the Nazi regime? Was the German population in general really aware of the unfathomable scale of human suffering caused by Hitler and his party? Information was disseminated in Europe fairly slowly during the 1940s. Many Germans throughout the country insisted that they simply did not know what was going on until the end of the war; and besides, the camps were for the most part situated far from major German cities, many of them being in Poland. Documents regarding the early euthanasia program (that is, the killing of those deemed to be biologically or mentally "inferior") indicate that the Nazis realized that the German public was far from convinced about the "humanitarian" nature of these measures. On the other hand, it has been argued that the Germans gradually adjusted their own values to those of the Nazis. Some even deny the whole idea that Nazi propaganda was crudely forced onto more than 60 million Germans. On the contrary, it was meant to appeal to them and to match up with everyday German thinking. The idea that the average German was simply ignorant about the whole drama has been subject to considerable critique. After all, the trains to the concentration camps passed through virtually all parts of Germany. Major German industries, such as I.G. Farben and Siemens, supplied material to the concentration camps. Hitler himself never shied away from his objectives. Neighbors disappeared, never to return. A vast array of material on the police and the camps and various discriminatory campaigns was regularly published in the press of the day. In brief, the idea of a general unawareness among Germans does not seem convincing.

In the immediate aftermath of 1945, democratic opinion in Germany and abroad felt great distress at the fact that radical rightist values still had an undisputed audience. The German Conservative Party–German Right Party (DKP-DRP) had been formed as early as 1946 by former Nazis. That same year, in one opinion poll, a surprising 48% of Germans thought that some races were more fit to rule than others. After the 1949 Bundestag elections, the Allied system of licensing parties ended. Domestically, the new German government decided to dismantle the denazification program, which was already losing impetus as the Cold War led to changing Allied priorities. This new climate provided the opportunity to create a more truly neo-Nazi party. A remarkable variety of conservative and nationalist groups contested the elections, gaining a total of 10.5% of the vote. The Socialist Reich Party (SPR) was founded in October 1949 as a result of a rightist breakaway from the DKP-DRP. That same year, 6 out of 10 Germans thought, on opinion poll evidence, that Nazism was a good idea badly carried out.

Still, in contrast to certain dark forecasts, the 1950s did not witness a further radicalization of the German political landscape, and by the beginning of the 1960s radical nationalist groups seemed to be slipping into oblivion. One major reason for this was the German economic miracle (Wirtschaftswunder). In 1964 the Ministry of the Interior's official report on neo-Nazism and radical nationalism put forward further reasons for the electoral collapse of the rightist fringes: the growing awareness of the evils of the past, weak radical leadership, personal differences between the leaders, and a strong tendency toward factionalism that made it difficult for one major organization to emerge.

In 1971 Thies Christophersen set up a publishing house where various neo-Nazi views, such as Holocaust denial, were published. Times were now changing. After a period of shared beliefs and tacit agreement, there were new tendencies toward a political polarization, whereby more pronounced rightist and leftist positions each saw their stock rise. German would-be fascist movements were again enjoying a slightly widening electorate. In 1977 the National Socialist Action Front (ANS) was formed. Its leader, 22-year-old Michael Kühnen, offered a strange mixture of charm and brutality, Marxism and Nietzsche. Kühnen's low esteem of homosexuality was surprising, given his own homosexuality and the fact that he himself was to die of an AIDS-related illness in 1991. In 1989 the Republican Party (Die Republikaner) and Franz Schönhuber attracted a spectacular rise in support, not wholly different from that of Jörg Haider's Austrian Freedom Party. The Republican Party, initially set up in 1983, did not openly defend Nazism. Rather, it seemed to advocate a more authoritarian government that would restore order and national pride. Other rightist parties of moderate fame are the Deutsche Volksumion (DVU), led by Gerhard Frey, and the older Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands (NPD).

There were also a number of rightist attacks against civilians. In 1981 a former member of NPD blew himself up while placing a bomb at the 1980 Munich Beer Festival, killing another 12 people and injuring 211. The euphoria after the reunification of BRD and DDR quickly came to a standstill as the early 1990s saw a major wave of neo-Nazi violence sweeping the country, particularly in the so-called "new" Länder, or districts. In the face of a passive or even encouraging local population and a powerless police, foreign workers and asylum seekers were burned out of their homes by gangs of skinheads in the former DDR city of Hoyerswerda. At Mölln in former West Germany, a fire bomb attack killed a Turkish woman with her young granddaughter and niece. Worse still, in Rostock in the late summer of 1992, some 1,000 Nazis attacked immigrants and asylum seekers. The year 1992 alone had witnessed more than 2,500 rightist attacks on foreigners across Germany, 697 cases of arson, and 17 people killed. Statistics at the time showed that these attacks reflected rightist trends among the entire electorate. In 1989, 38% of West Germans thought that, but for the persecution of the Jews, Hitler could be counted among the country's top statesmen. Other polls revealed that some 10 to 15% of Germans could be classed as antisemitic and that negative stereotypes, such as the belief that Jews are cunning, were increasing.

A rightist trend was also at hand on the German official scene. It was a sign of the times when in 1982 the conservative poet Ernst Jünger was awarded the prestigious Goethe Prize. Even his 1920s writings, hitherto seen as highly problematic because of their indisputable links to fascist aesthetics, were accorded an accolade for their literary and intellectual content. Furthermore, the desire to "normalize" the past was probably the motivation behind Helmut Kohl's controversial decision to invite U.S. president Ronald Reagan to attend a ceremony at the Bitburg Military Cemetery to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II: among the graves were those of 45 members of the Waffen-SS. A few years later, in June 1993, the Christian Democrats and Social Democrats jointly decided to remodel Germany's immigration law from the most liberal in Europe into one of the most restrictive.

Coming in the immediate aftermath of one of the most severe outbursts of German fascist violence since 1945, the new laws could be seen as an ex post facto endorsement of those attacks. However, to some these measures evidently seemed insufficient, as an arson attack in Solingen later on that same year left five Turkish immigrants dead.

As a final indication of a more rightist tendency, the “historians’ debate” (Historikerstreit) had wide repercussions regarding what may, and what may not, fall within the borders of fair and legitimate historical analysis. On the surface, the debate dealt with three major issues. First, those involved discussed the concept of the singularity of the Holocaust, primarily as opposed to Stalinist atrocities. Second, they argued about the need for today’s historians to identify with the German troops during the Nazi period. The liberal critics held that, if an approach of “identification” was to be chosen at all, historians should rather empathize with the prisoners in the concentration camps. Third, the liberal critics assumed that the conservative camp—comprising, among others, Ernst Nolte and Andreas Hillgruber—was part of an overall effort to normalize the representation of the Nazi past and to remove the major conceptual and emotional obstacles to the revival of a politically dubious right-wing German identity.

These recent rightist trends constitute only one aspect of a general polarization of the German political scene. The times since the 1970s have also been characterized by an expanding leftist discussion about the nation’s distressing 20th-century history. Among other things, this “coming to terms with the past” (Vergangenheitsbewältigung) has meant a growing awareness of Nazi atrocities and increasing efforts to capture those criminals still on the run. The gradual rise in number of (would-be) fascist organizations in Germany has also resulted in a proliferation of a corresponding leftist, antifascist movement within the nation. In addition, cultural depictions of postwar Germany in which the wartime period played a vital role—such as the ambitious television project Heimat; critical assessments from a distinctly political perspective of the allegedly apolitical philosopher Martin Heidegger; and, finally, Jewish communities seeking economic compensation for their suffering—all indicated that an era of consensus was coming to an end.

Neighbors

Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland is a book written by Princeton University historian Jan T. Gross about the massacre of scores of Jews in Jedwabne, Poland, in July 1941. The book was published in 2002 and generated much interest and scholarly debate. Gross’s account represents an attempt to illuminate the nature of the Holocaust in Poland; it also demonstrates the role that non-Jewish Poles played in the Final Solution. The history of the Holocaust had traditionally been problematic in Poland, as it was often times impossible to separate the actions of Germans and Polish collaborators from rank-and-file Poles. The fact that all Poles suffered grievously during the German occupation made it even more difficult to determine who did what to whom. The incident in question—the Jedwabne massacre—occurred just as German troops began storming into areas that had been previously occupied by the Soviets, as part of Operation Barbarossa, the June 22, 1941, German invasion of the Soviet Union. For several years after, many Poles believed that the mass killings at Jedwabne had been committed by the Germans.

Gross explains that the massacre was committed mainly by non-Jewish Polish civilians, rather than Germans or Polish collaborators. In the wake of the catastrophe, at least 350 Jewish Poles—men, women, and children—lay dead. Only seven Jews in Jedwabne survived. Gross employs both interviews and eyewitness accounts with physical and forensic evidence to reconstruct the horrific chain of events. The Jews of Jedwabne, he concludes, died at the hands of neighbors (hence the book’s title) who knew them well, rather than at the hands of faceless German occupiers.

The book generated substantial debate and some criticism. One Holocaust scholar asserted that while the book sparked much-needed debate on Poland’s role in the Holocaust, Gross’s failure to look at German sources rendered the author’s conclusions “fundamentally flawed.” Some Poles welcomed Gross’s interpretation, saying that it provided a powerful boost to Poland’s collective memory of World War II and the Holocaust. Others in Poland, however, were skeptical of Gross's findings, claiming that he had overlooked important evidentiary material and that some of the eyewitness testimony upon which he relied was questionable or may have been attained through coercion or torture. One Catholic priest in Poland, however, lauded Gross's book, asserting that it had demolished the persistent myth that Poles during the war were uniformly victims who had never committed wrongdoing themselves.

Netherlands

The Netherlands is a nation in Western Europe with a 1939 population of approximately 9 million people. The country's prewar Jewish population was about 160,000, of whom some 19,500 were children of mixed marriages. These figures include an influx of nearly 25,000 Jews who fled to the Netherlands between 1935 and 1939 to escape Nazi persecution in Germany. The Dutch had long remained neutral in European wars, and when World War II commenced in September 1939, Queen Wilhelmina reiterated that position. German dictator Adolf Hitler personally promised the queen that Germany would honor Dutch neutrality. As he did many times before, however, he reneged on his promise, and German troops invaded the Netherlands in May 1940. Despite vigorous resistance, the Germans had secured most of the country within a week, and Wilhelmina established a government-in-exile in London. German occupation officials, who considered non-Jewish Dutch as fellow "Aryans," hoped to incorporate the Netherlands into the Third Reich, and set about instituting German-inspired legal systems and establishing a one-party political system. Soon, virtually every aspect of Dutch life, including education, was suffused with Nazi ideology.

Resistance to the German occupation among the Dutch remained limited and subdued between mid-1940 and late 1942; however, beginning in 1943, resistance became far more pronounced and widespread. The Germans' blundering policies were certainly the cause for this, but so too was the deteriorating economic situation, which the Germans made far worse by shamelessly exploiting Dutch industry, agriculture, raw materials, and laborers. Perhaps nobody in the Netherlands, however, suffered more than the Jews. In the fall of 1940, German officials promulgated a repressive set of anti-Jewish ordinances that essentially deprived many Jews of their livelihoods and that relegated them to third-class citizenship at best. After Dutch workers called a general strike in February 1941 to protest Nazi actions against Jews, including the deportation of several hundred Jewish men to concentration camps, German occupation authorities decided to tighten restrictions on Dutch Jews.

By early 1942 most Jews had been forced into ghettos, and as many as 15,000 were rounded up and sent to forced labor camps in the Netherlands and Germany. Soon thereafter, most of the remaining Jews in the country were concentrated in one large ghetto in Amsterdam. Jews who had been refugees from other countries were deported to a transit camp in the north of the country.

German authorities, working with a number of Dutch collaborators, began deporting Jews from the Amsterdam ghetto in the summer of 1942; in all, about 110,000 were sent to concentration camps in the east, where most perished. Of that 110,000, just 5,000 survived the war and returned to the Netherlands. Meanwhile, some 25,000–30,000 Jews remained hidden in the Netherlands, often aided by the Dutch resistance and Dutch civilians. The majority of these people managed to survive the war. In the end, perhaps 75% of Dutch Jews (including refugees) were murdered between 1940 and 1945. Jewish losses, on a percentage basis, were higher in the Netherlands than any other state in Western Europe. It has been suggested that this development came about, in large part, because of strong collaborationist elements in the country.

The Netherlands, which suffered grievously during the last months of the war, was not liberated until the spring of 1945. In the meantime, at least 20,000 Dutch civilians died of starvation and disease during the brutal "Hunger Winter" of 1944–1945, when German authorities sealed off the nation from the outside world in a desperate attempt to retain their hold. After the war ended, the shattered Dutch temporarily reinstated the death penalty, tried a number of collaborators, and executed them. Arthur Seyss-Inquart, the German occupation chief in the Netherlands, was tried at the Nuremberg Trials; he too was found guilty and executed.

Netherlands Tribunals

The Netherlands was invaded by the Germans on May 10, 1940. While the country's antiquated armed forces resisted fiercely, the collapse and surrender on May 14 engendered great disillusionment; indeed, a political and moral crisis enveloped the Netherlands, and the departure of the royal family generated a defeatist attitude among the Dutch people. The German occupation was initially tame, but as it progressed the Dutch came under increasing pressures. Nazification, theft, destruction of property, and virulent antisemitism transformed the country into a shell of its former self.

During the occupation, many people collaborated with the Nazis, directly and indirectly. The pro-Nazi Nederlandse Unie (Netherlands Union) enjoyed tremendous popularity. It disagreed with the Germans over the planned invasion of the Soviet Union, however, and was disbanded in December 1941. Such collaboration was also illustrated when Dutch Nazis replaced many teachers, mayors, university boards of governors, government and municipal servants, and police chiefs. The Netherlands administrative system, highly complex, fully intended to keep the social structure intact. The conformist authoritarian nature of the Dutch populace further contributed to collaboration. Economic collaboration resulted in major exports of Dutch products to Germany. Direct Nazi collaboration proved most serious, and as early as 1943, the government-in-exile in London planned criminal proceedings against major Dutch collaborators.

Following liberation, women who had consorted with the Nazis or who had children by them (moffenkind, a pejorative term), had their hair shorn publicly. The Canadians who liberated the Netherlands imprisoned some 90,000 suspected collaborators in a holding camp. In the immediate aftermath of liberation, the Binnenlandse Strijdkrachten, Forces of the Interior, the main resistance group, was given the task of arresting and indicting collaborators.

The more serious offenses of aiding and abetting or collaboration with the Germans were tried at Paleis Kneuterdijk, a former royal residence. Some 425,000 files were opened by the Bijzondere Rechtspleging, or War Crimes Tribunal, for those deemed collaborators or suspected of war crimes. It was deemed that 250,000 were indictable. Courts were established in Amsterdam, The Hague, Leeuwarden, Arnhem, and Hertogenbosch to deal with serious offenses such as crimes against humanity. In 1949–1950, its role was taken over by the Bijzondere Strafkamers, or Special Trials. The most blatant collaborators were held in the Cellen Barracks at the Scheveningen Jail.

Nineteen trials were held between 1945 until 1948. The major cases were held in the cities where the courts had been established; some others were tried regionally. The Netherlands War Crimes Trials sentenced some 120,000 collaborators to prison terms, although some 1,500 of them appeared to have been unjustly sentenced. The most serious cases were against the leaders of the Nationale Socialistische Beweging der Nederland (NSB), the Dutch Nazi Party, which had been established on December 14, 1931. By 1940 the group had more than 250,000 members (out of a total population of 9 million).

NSB leader Anton Adriaan Mussert agreed to Hitler's invasion and his demands, and declared his personal loyalty to him in 1941. In 1942 he received the title of Leider van het Nederlandse Volk (Leader of the Dutch People). At war's end, Mussert was charged with placing the state under foreign occupation, altering the constitution, and aiding and abetting the enemy. Found guilty on all charges, he was sentenced to death on December 12, 1945, and executed on May 7, 1946.

Cornelis van Geelkerken, informally second-in-command of the NSB, remained completely loyal to Mussert. He established the Nationale Jeugdstorm, a Nazi youth group that allowed him to create lists of students for forced labor and reprisal purposes. Van Geelkerken was arrested on May 5, 1945, and sentenced to life imprisonment in 1950. He was released in 1959 and died in 1979.

Meinoud Marinus Rost van Tonningen was Mussert's power-hungry rival and a member of the NSB since 1936. Charged with collaboration and crimes against the state the week before the invasion, he was released in Calais by the German army. The Nazis then appointed him president of the Netherlands National Bank and president of the Netherlands East India Company. He became an SS officer on June 22, 1944. Canadian troops captured him on May 8, 1945. He jumped off a balustrade at the Scheveningen Jail on June 6, 1945, plunging to his death.

Max Blokzijl, a Nazi propagandist, began providing 15-minute Nazi-oriented radio broadcasts beginning in February 1941. He also wrote a pamphlet wherein he held the Allies and communists to be traitors. He was tried as a collaborator and executed on March 15, 1946.

Robert van Genechten, a temperamental, mentally unstable intellectual, and one of the NSB's first members, served as chief procurement officer and provincial commissioner of South Holland. His instability, however, had made him ineffectual. Nevertheless, he was indicted in The Hague on October 17, 1945, but committed suicide on December 13, 1945.

Hans Albin Rauter was responsible for the deportation of scores of thousands of Dutch Jews, the Putten deportations, and the resistance against Operation Market Garden (September 17–26, 1944). Severely wounded by a resistance member on March 6, 1945, he was arrested on May 11, 1945, sentenced to death, and executed on March 25, 1949.

In total, 154 NSB members received death sentences, but 110 were commuted to life imprisonment. The first executions were carried out on May 27, 1945; the last occurred on March 21, 1952. Those convicted of lesser offenses were generally ordered to provide labor for the rebuilding of the Netherlands.

Neuengamme

Neuengamme concentration camp was established by Nazi Germany in December 1938 and was originally intended to be a subcamp of the older and larger camp at Sachsenhausen. It was located on the banks of the Dove Elbe River, a tributary of the Elbe, and close to the city of Hamburg. It was chosen because of an abandoned brickworks factory that the SS hoped to renovate and restore to full production to assist in constructing new public buildings in the city under contract with its own Deutsche Erd- und Steinwerke (German Earth and Stoneworks Corporation). In so doing, it could turn a significant profit. Its first 100 prisoners were transferees from Sachsenhausen, who were sent to begin the construction of the camp itself. In the meantime, they were housed in the abandoned factory.

Six months later, in June 1940, Neuengamme became an independent camp, with 96 subcamps under its jurisdiction. It has been estimated that between 1940 and its liberation by British forces on May 4, 1945, between 95,000 and 106,000 prisoners were incarcerated at Neuengamme, both men and women (13,500 in the main camp, and the rest at the various subcamps). It has been estimated that the following groups, arranged by nationality, constituted its prisoner population: Soviets, 34,500; Poles, 16,900; French, 11,500; Germans, 9,200; Dutch, 4,800; Belgians, 4,800; and Jews, 13,000 (Polish and Hungarian Jews transferred from Auschwitz in 1944).

Neuengamme's first commandant, appointed by Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler, was SS Major Walter Eisele, who was replaced in April 1940 by SS Captain Martin Weiss, and finally SS Lieutenant Colonel Max Pauly, who would later be hanged for his crimes.

As was the case through the entire camp system, conditions for the prisoners were atrocious, to say the least, made all the more so by their intensive labor activities and lack of caloric intake. Inadequate and poor quality food supplies, even poorer shelters, lack of medicines and sanitary facilities, beatings, tortures, starvation, random killings; all of these and more resulted in the spread of various diseases such as dysentery, pneumonia, typhus, and tuberculosis. In December 1941, for example, more than 1,000 prisoners died from a typhus outbreak.

In 1942, as the prison population increased and the number of workers unable to continue working also increased, Neuengamme became one of the sites for the implementation of Aktion 14f13 (which remained in effect until 1944) whereby those who were sick, elderly, or unfit were murdered after having been "examined" by SS and other physicians. That same year, the SS increased its energies at Neuengamme by becoming the primary slave labor provider for the German armaments industry.

Neuengamme was also the site of medical experiments upon the prisoners, the most horrific of which took place at the Dullenhuser Damm School on April 20, 1945. Twenty Jewish children, 10 boys and 10 girls, selected by SS physician Neuengamme was a German concentration camp established in 1938 by the SS near Hamburg. Operating from 1938 until its liberation by the British in 1945, an estimated 106,000 prisoners were held at Neuengamme and at its subcamps. The verified death toll relating to Neuengamme and its subcamps is 42,900 across the duration of its existence. This image shows survivors of Neuengamme at the end of the war. Josef Mengele at Auschwitz, accompanied by four Jewish caretakers and Soviet POWs, were transported to Neuengamme and injected with active tuberculosis bacilli under the watchful eye of Dr. Kurt Heissmayer, enabling their bodies to produce their own antibodies and vaccines. All the children became infected but did not produce the required antigens, and they were subsequently murdered along with the adults who accompanied them. SS-Obersturmführer Arnold Stripfel oversaw the murders; he would later be convicted and given a life sentence. Later freed, he died in Frankfurt in a condominium he purchased with restitution funds from the German government. Heissmayer, too, would later be given a life sentence and would die in prison.

In the early spring of 1945, prior to liberation and the end of the war, the Swedish Red Cross and the Danish government successfully attempted a rescue mission to free, initially, Scandinavian prisoners in the camps, but ultimately others as well, including Jews, and bring them to Sweden in their “White Buses” (painted all white with red crosses on their sides so as to avoid Allied bombs). The mission was led by Swedish diplomat Count Folke Bernadotte, who, ironically, would later be murdered by Jewish radicals in Jerusalem on September 17, 1948, four months after Israel was officially recognized as a sovereign nation-state. On March 29, 1945, the buses arrived at Neuengamme and remained there until April 2 as other Scandinavians were brought there. Though estimates vary, upwards of 15,000 prisoners were rescued from various locations; half Scandinavian, half not, including more than 400 Jews rescued from Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia.

Of the maximum of 106,000 prisoners who passed through Neuengamme, it is now estimated that between 55,000 and 56,000 perished at the hands of the Nazis between 1940 and 1945 by hangings, gassings, shootings, lethal injections, and/or being transported to their deaths in Auschwitz.

Night

Night (1960) is a book written by Holocaust witness and survivor Elie Wiesel, and the first in a trilogy—the other two works being Dawn and Day. These titles denote the author's mood and reaction to the Holocaust during and after the events, moving purposely from somber darkness to the hopefulness of light. This reflects the Jewish belief that a new day begins with nightfall. Wiesel has stated that he wanted to depict night as a time in which “everything came to an end—man, history, literature, religion, God. There was nothing left. And yet we begin again with Night.” Night was first published in Argentina as a much longer work in Yiddish in 1954, titled And the World Remained Silent. Four years later, it was republished in abbreviated form in France under the title La Nuit (Night). In 1960 an even shorter version (116 pages) was published in English. Since then, the book has been published in at least 30 other languages and is now considered one of the seminal works dealing with the Holocaust.

Night is based upon Wiesel's own experiences during the Holocaust, yet it is not written in a style typical of memoirs or autobiographies. The book is narrated by a Jewish teenager named Eliezer, who is clearly a stand-in for Wiesel himself. The stories he narrates are those that the author himself had experienced or witnessed. Some critics have questioned the complete authenticity of the work, claiming that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between fact and fiction. Wiesel, on the other hand, has vehemently rejected such attacks, calling the book a deposition about his experiences of and reactions to the Holocaust. The heavy editing and condensation of the work from Yiddish to French to English rendered a final product that some literary critics have argued is a work of art unto itself. Indeed, the style, which is at once stark, dark, and spare of any excess words, reflects the author's mindset during the events he chronicles.

The story begins with Eliezer studying the Torah and the Kabbala (Jewish mystic writings) in Sighet, located in Hungarian Transylvania. His teacher is deported by the authorities but later returns. The teacher relays to an incredulous Eliezer and his family the scenes he had witnessed, including the mass murder of Jews. Eliezer's teacher is portrayed as mentally unstable, and for a short time life remains normal for the narrator and his family. In 1944, however, his teacher's admonitions become reality as Eliezer and his family are forced into a ghetto and then deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau. Eliezer and his father are separated from his sisters and mother, who are later murdered. After witnessing firsthand the true horrors of the death camp, the teenager and his father are put to work in the forced labor camp at Buna. There they endure unspeakable deprivations, but nevertheless attempt to keep each other going, mentally and physically. Eventually, Eliezer's father becomes ill from dysentery and regular beatings from prison guards. The teenager then descends into a period of deep despair, in which he denounces humanity's indifference, declares the death of God, and decries the seemingly random nothingness and loneliness of life. Eliezer is freed from captivity in 1945, having lost his entire family in the Holocaust.

Wiesel himself vowed at that time not to speak or write of his experiences for 10 years, so he could evaluate them more clearly. His 1954 Yiddish manuscript made good on that promise, and eventually Night would appear in print.

Night and Fog

One of the most vivid depictions of the horrors of Nazi concentration camps, the French documentary Night and Fog (Nuit et brouillard) was directed by Alain Resnais and released in 1955. Filmed at several concentration camps in Poland, the film describes the lives of prisoners in camps such as Auschwitz and Majdanek in order to portray the horror of the brutal inhumanity of the Nazis.

Night and Fog combines color and black and white footage with black and white newsreels, footage shot by the victorious Allies, and stills, alternating between past and present. The narrator, Michel Bouquet, recounts the rise of Nazism and shows how the lives of the prisoners compared with that of their guards. As the film unfolds, it shows the nature of Nazi brutality in the camps, the methods of mass extermination, and, finally, how liberation took place and the horrors that then greeted the world.

Resnais and his crew visited Auschwitz-Birkenau between September 29 and October 4, filming constantly while they were there. After this, from October 7 to 10, they went to Lublin to obtain footage of Majdanek. This was one of the first occasions on which film footage was taken of these camps, other than when the camps were initially liberated in 1944 and 1945.

Earlier, the producer, Anatole Dauman, together with his partners Samy Halfon and Philippe Lifchitz, had arranged for the film to be underwritten by Films Polski and produced through Argos Films. It was Dauman who had approached Resnais to be the director, but he agreed only on condition that the script would be written by Jean Cayrol, a French poet and publisher. Cayrol had been a member of the French Resistance but was captured by the Nazis and imprisoned at the Gusen concentration camp in 1943. For Resnais, if the project was to have any authority the narration needed to be written by one who had been a victim of the Holocaust, and the quality of Cayrol's writing was well known. With this guarantee, Resnais signed his contract for the film on May 24, 1955, and began immediately to plan his project.

In December 1955, immediately prior to its release, there was an attempt by French censors to have certain scenes showing bodies being bulldozed into mass graves cut from the film, as they were deemed to be too shocking for public viewing. After initial screenings to selected audiences, pressure was brought to bear by some former concentration camp prisoners that Night and Fog be premiered at the Cannes film festival. A compromise was reached with the announcement on April 26, 1956, that it would be screened, though not as part of the competition. The film then opened to very high acclaim in Paris theaters during May 1956.

Night and Fog was shown on French television as early as April 26, 1959. It was shown—controversially, in some quarters—on French television in 1990, and since then it has become a staple for teachers of history and World War II throughout France.

Night and Fog is only about 30 minutes in length, but in showing the tragedy of the Holocaust it is devastating in its impact. Certainly, for its time, it revealed the horror to a civilian population that had not yet seen the Jewish tragedy in any detail. Renowned French film director François Truffaut would refer to Night and Fog as “the greatest film of all time,” and many would have agreed with him. Made just 10 years after the end of World War II and the liberation of the camps, its purpose was to create a record of the Holocaust—or at least, the most representative element of it—for future generations.

Nisko Plan

The “Nisko and Lublin Plan” (also known separately as the “Nisko Plan” and/or the “Lublin Plan”) was intended to be a relocation plan for the Jews who found themselves in areas under Nazi occupation as a result of military conquest. Devised initially by Adolf Hitler, it was the result of a conversation between him and ideologue-philosopher Alfred Rosenberg, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler, SS Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann, Governor-General Hans Frank of the Generalgouvernement of Poland, Arthur Seyss-Inquart, Frank’s administrative chief, and Odilo Globocnik, SS Police leader in Lublin. Put in place between October 1939 and April 1940, when it was shut down for “technical reasons,” it was understood to be a solution to the Judenfrage, the so-called “Jewish Question,” and was named for the two cities that bordered both the reservation and the forced labor camps that surrounded it. This so-called “reservation” was approximately 300 to 400 square miles, between the San and Vistula Rivers, southeast of Lublin proper.

The first transport of 901 Jews from the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia arrived on October 18, and a few days later, 1,800 Jews from Katowice in Poland and Vienna, Austria. In the few brief months of its operation, approximately 95,000 Jews in total were relocated.

The centerpiece of the plan was the Belzec camp, which, while initially used for forced labor, in 1942 became the first extermination camp under “Operation Reinhard” with the installation of permanent gas chambers disguised as showers under the direction of SS officer Christian Wirth, sometimes known as “Christian the Terrible” (Christian der Grausame). The other two camps under this operation—Sobibór and Majdanek—were also located in the Lublin region. Early on, the deportees were under the imposed authority of the Lublin Judenrat (Jewish Council) which took its orders directly from the Nazi leadership, but it has been estimated that, by 1943, almost all of the Jews of the region were dead, the result of gassings, forced labor, or by the Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing squads).

The shutdown of the plan may well have been the result of Himmler’s underestimation and pragmatic realization of the number of Jews to be relocated—upward of several million (and Frank’s ongoing reluctance to accept ever more Jews), the men, women, and materiél required to enforce the plan, and the land size need to accomplish the goal. Additionally, Himmler was likewise tasked with finding jobs for Germans themselves relocated to Poland, and this, too, proved too difficult. The forced relocation of Jews would, however, ultimately take a back seat as the Nazi plan for the fate of the Jews was sealed with the commitment to annihilate all the Jews found in Nazi-controlled and Nazi-occupied lands. The establishment of upwards of 1,000 camps and their satellites would result in Nazi successes in death and murder unconceived at the start of World War II.

Though the Nazis tried hard to keep their plans secret, word leaked out of their intentions regarding the Jews, not only to the Poles in the region but beyond. On December 30, 1939, Oswald Garrison Villard, American journalist and civil rights crusader, published a piece in The Nation magazine titled “The Latest Anti-Jewish Horror.” Reporting from The Hague, Netherlands, the month before (November 20, 1939), he wrote of Hitler’s determination to jam all the Jews

“into a small piece of Polish territory which is to be called a ‘Jewish State,’ but which is to be nothing more than a huge concentration camp and charnel house.” Referring to the situation, he noted that 1,950,000 people “were to be jammed, without working capital, without tools or habitations, unable to do business even with the contiguous territories,” into “a space of eighty by one hundred kilometers.” He concluded that “the Jews are treated literally as no German would be allowed under the law to treat a dumb animal.”

Norrman, Sven

Sven Norrman was the head of the Warsaw office of the Swedish engineering company ASEA during the German invasion in 1939. Born in 1891, before the war Norrman enjoyed the life of a business executive in a foreign mission. A fluent speaker of Polish, he collected Polish art, was well liked by his staff, and loved hunting. With the German invasion in September 1939 he was based in Stockholm, though he visited Poland every two to three months. The Nazi occupation saw Norrman and other Swedes in a similar position living relatively comfortable lives. It was in Germany’s interest to ensure good relations with Sweden, which provided such goods and services as matches, ball bearings, and technical equipment to which Germany did not have ready access. At first, as the bombs rained down on Warsaw, the so-called “Warsaw Swedes” lived much of their time in a bunker at the Swedish embassy, but over time life resumed to as normal a condition as was possible under the circumstances. Norrman even fell in love with his secretary, a young Polish Jew named Gizela “Iza” Zbyszynska.

From their elevated standing, the Warsaw Swedes were able to witness the unraveling Holocaust before their very eyes. It began with antisemitic violence, in which Jews, singled out through the compulsory wearing of a Star of David, were beaten in the streets and humiliated in various ways. Norrman photographed such examples of oppression in October 1939 in Włocławek, in northern Poland, which became the first town in Europe in which Jews were required to wear the star. He was also witness to Jews being banned from using the sidewalks. In Warsaw, Norrman entered the ghetto itself, where he secretly took thousands of photographs.

All this, however, was but a prelude to other, more vital acts of opposition. Norrman noticed that Jewish acquaintances were disappearing in increasing numbers—whether through death in the ghetto, deportation, or (less likely) imprisonment—and became more and more anxious as to where developments were heading. Swedes such as Norrman could move around Warsaw as well as to and from Sweden, and he saw that an opportunity existed for him to make the horrors of Poland known more widely. Eventually, he and other Warsaw Swedes began smuggling documents and photographs back into Sweden; not only that, but he brought money back into Warsaw, with which the resistance movement could buy arms.

Both the Polish government-in-exile in London and the Armia Krajowa (Home Army) in Warsaw saw the use that could be made of the Swedes' willingness to help. On May 16, 1942, the Home Army's commander in chief, General Stefan Rowecki, observed that the Swedes were a valuable resource that needed to be protected; a few days later, on May 21, Norrman took one of the most important consignments of documents to Stockholm thus far, with full particulars of the annihilation of 700,000 Polish Jews. His secret package included thousands of negatives of Nazi crimes in Poland.

Within a few weeks, all this information had been passed on to London, and on June 9, 1942, Poland's exiled premier, Władysław Sikorski, made a broadcast over the BBC revealing all the details Norrman had smuggled out. This was the first time in which the world heard news of the Nazi crimes against the Jews in any detail. Some news had previously been revealed, but never before on such a scale.

In response, the Gestapo began rounding up the Warsaw Swedes, instinctively aware that the only way the information could have been smuggled out would have been through them. On the direct order of SS chief Heinrich Himmler, seven Swedes were arrested by the Gestapo: Nils Berglind, Carl Herslow, Sigfrid Häggberg, Tore Widén, Einar Gerge, Stig Lagerberg, and Reinhold Grönberg. By a quirk of fate, Sven Norrman was in Stockholm at the time of the arrests. His mistress, Iza Zbyszynska, managed to get a message to him just before he was due to return. Four of the men, Berglind, Herslow, Häggberg, and Widén, were sentenced to death in July 1943, though all seven were eventually released in the fall of 1944 and returned safely to Sweden. It is likely that intercession by Sweden's King Gustav V led to the releases after he had written to Adolf Hitler seeking an amnesty.

For her part, Iza was taken into custody. Although she had lived as a Christian on the Aryan side in Warsaw, the Gestapo became aware of her Jewish identity once she had been captured, and she was sent to the Moabit prison in Berlin, where she survived until the end of the war. Upon her liberation, she and Norrman were reunited in Warsaw; Norrman then divorced his wife in Sweden and married Iza. In 1974 the Polish government awarded him the Armia Krajowa Cross in recognition of his services for the Polish people during the war.

Sven Norrman explained his motivation in an interview several years later, in words that left little room for doubt as to why he acted as he did: "During my entire life I was a businessman. I liked my job and I was good in my field. I joined the struggle because I wanted to do something that was not for profit for once in my life."

Sven Norrman died on February 8, 1979, in Stockholm. His actions led to the world possessing the first detailed knowledge of the Holocaust while it was taking place, and for this action, undertaken at the risk of his life, he should be remembered with honor.

Norway

Norway is a Scandinavian country with a 1939 population of approximately 2.9 million, of whom just 1,700 were Jewish. In April 1940 German troops invaded Norway, despite that nation's declared neutrality. The Germans hoped to establish naval bases there to counter the British in the North Sea and to secure important raw materials for their war effort. The Norwegians put up a surprisingly spirited defense, although the Germans virtually secured the country by late May. On June 7, King Haakon VII, along with much of the Norwegian government, fled and established a government-in-exile in London. The Germans then recruited Vidkun Quisling, a self-proclaimed Norwegian fascist, to act as head of state. This did not sit well with most Norwegians, however, who disliked Quisling and abhorred Nazi ideology. Quisling remained as the nominal head of state throughout the occupation, although he had little impact on policymaking. A resistance movement began as soon as Germans had imposed their will over Norway. The resistance included both armed and unarmed factions, although much of the movement involved nonviolent civil disobedience. When Quisling tried to introduce Nazi ideology into the school curriculum, teachers refused to go along, even after a number of them were arrested and detained.

Between June 1940 and June 1941, when the Germans launched Operation Barbarossa, the invasion of the Soviet Union, there were few restrictions placed on Norway's Jews. However, that attack prompted German occupation officials to arrest and detain a number of Jews in northern Norway during the summer of 1941. Beginning in October, German officials, working with Norwegian collaborators, began making more arrests, including 260 male Jews living in Oslo. During November 25–26, occupation officials arrested Oslo's remaining Jewish population, including children and women. They were sent first to Germany by sea and from there by rail to the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp, where most perished.

Many Norwegians objected to the arrests and deportations, either hiding Jews or tipping them off about planned arrests. Some 900 Norwegian Jews fled to neutral Sweden, where they took refuge until the end of the war. Perhaps as many as 500 Norwegian Jews died in Nazi concentration camps, but some 1,200 survived the war.

Nuremberg Code

The Nuremberg Code is an internationally applied convention of medical ethics that controls medical experimentation. The code was developed as a result of the Doctors' Trial, which occurred in Nuremberg, Germany, between December 9, 1946, and August 20, 1947. Known officially as United States of America v. Karl Brandt et al., the trial is not to be confused with trials held by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. The Doctors' Trial was conducted strictly by a U.S. military court in Nuremberg. The proceedings tried 23 Nazi German defendants, all of whom were charged with Nazi human experimentation, euthanasia, and mass murder. Most of the defendants were medical doctors, although some were scientists or lower-level functionaries who aided in the commission of the crimes. Much of the Nazi experimentation occurred at concentration and death camps and involved involuntary subjects, many of whom died.

In May 1947 Dr. Leo Alexander, an American physician who was acting as a medical adviser to prosecutors at the trial, submitted to the court six principles which he believed should govern all future medical research. On the day the Doctors' Trial ended, the judges, in their verdict, added four more principles to Alexander's six. The resulting Nuremberg Code became one of the first postwar human rights documents to be adopted on a large scale and was the first such document that prescribed the norms of medical research involving human subjects.

The 10 principles of the Nuremberg Code include the following: that all experimentation must involve voluntarily consenting participants; those conducting the research must take all precautions to minimize or mitigate pain or injury to participants; researchers must be willing to stop or interrupt experiments when participants appear in danger or pain; participants themselves must be able to opt out of an experiment if they believe it necessary; experiments must be structured to yield tangible results with wide applications; experiments must not be random or unnecessary; experiments must be conducted only by qualified scientists and physicians; and all experiments must be structured so that no permanent harm is inflicted on participants.

Many states subsequently adopted the Nuremberg Code to guide their own medical experiments, and the June 1964 Helsinki Declaration, which was based on the code, systemized the code's principles for the international medical community. The Helsinki Declaration was written by the World Medical Association. That declaration has been continually fine-tuned and revised over the years to keep pace with technological and ethical changes.

Nuremberg Defense

The Nuremberg Defense is a legal concept that holds that an individual is not responsible for crimes committed if that person was following the orders of a superior officer or one in authority, assuming he or she had a moral choice while committing such acts. It is also sometimes referred to as the "superior orders plea." The Nuremberg Defense is conversely related to the respondiat superior legal doctrine, which holds that those in authority—or superior positions—are legally responsible for the actions carried out by subordinates. The superior orders plea is often referred to as the Nuremberg Defense because the issue came up repeatedly during the 1945–1946 trials of Nazi war criminals held in Nuremberg, Germany.

The superior orders plea was famously employed in post-World War I trials of suspected war criminals. Most of those trials occurred in Germany, and many suspects were acquitted by invoking the superior orders plea, even though it had been proven that some of them had indeed committed war crimes. A German submarine commander, for example, who admitted to the purposeful sinking of an unarmed British hospital ship in 1917, claimed that he had done so because of orders handed down by his superiors. The court acquitted him because of the plea.

As World War II neared its end and the Allies began to prepare for postwar war crimes trials, they were determined to prevent defendants from employing the superior orders defense. In fact, the August 1945 London Charter of the International Military Tribunal specifically forbade its use in Nuremberg proceedings. This was codified in Article IV of the Nuremberg Principles, which in turn influenced future criminal proceedings as they related to war crimes and crimes against humanity. Numerous defendants at Nuremberg attempted to invoke the superior orders plea, including German generals Wilhelm Keitel and Alfred Jodl. The court rejected both men's pleas, determining that following orders was not an excuse for their actions. Both men were found guilty and executed. Other defendants used the Nuremberg Defense not to escape punishment but rather to lighten their sentences, which in some instances worked.

The trials at Nuremberg did not, however, put an end to attempts at employing the superior orders plea. The issue surfaced again at the 1961 war crimes trial of Adolf Eichmann in Israel. The court there rejected the plea and Eichmann was convicted and executed. But in the 1998 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, the issue was seemingly revived. That document claims that an individual may not be convicted of a war crime if he was legally obliged to follow a superior's orders, did not know the order was unlawful, or if the order was not manifestly unlawful. A careful reading of this, however, suggests that most war crimes would still be exempt from the Nuremberg Defense plea.

Nuremberg Laws

The collective term "Nuremberg Laws" was the name given to two antisemitic laws presented on September 15, 1935, at a special meeting convened at the annual Nuremberg Rally of the Nazi Party held between September 9 and September 15, 1935. The first of these was the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor, forbidding intermarriage and extramarital sexual relations between Jews and "citizens of German blood." It also prohibited the employment of German females under age 45 in Jewish households. The second law was the Reich Citizenship Law, which announced that only those people of “German or kindred blood” and exhibiting appropriate conduct were eligible to be Reich citizens. The remainder were identified as state subjects, without citizenship rights but with obligations toward the Reich. A later decree was necessary to clarify or define who was Jewish for the purpose of these laws. This supplemental Nazi decree was passed on November 14, 1935, and the Reich Citizenship Law came into force on that date. The laws were expanded on November 26, 1935, to include Roma and Afro-Germans. Because of foreign policy concerns, prosecutions under the two laws did not commence until after the 1936 Summer Olympics, held in Berlin.

After seizing power in 1933 the Nazis began to implement policies that included the formation of a German “Volk” or people’s community, based on race. On April 1, 1933, Adolf Hitler declared a national boycott of Jewish businesses, and a week later, on April 7, 1933, the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service was passed; this expelled or excluded most Jews from the legal profession and from government service. On May 10, 1933, books that were considered “un-German,” including those by Jewish authors, were destroyed in a nationwide campaign of public book burning. Jews were harassed and subjected to violent attacks. The Nuremberg Laws were a further step in the removal of Jews from their participation in German community life.

As a result, the laws had serious economic and social impacts on the Jewish community. Those convicted of violating the marriage laws were imprisoned, and (subsequent to March 8, 1938) upon completing their sentences could be rearrested by the Gestapo and sent to concentration camps.

Many non-Jews became uncomfortable with their Jewish neighbors and gradually stopped socializing with Jews or shopping in Jewish-owned stores, many of which were forced to close due to a lack of customers. As Jews were no longer permitted to work in government service or government-regulated professions such as medicine and teaching, many middle-class business owners and professionals were required to take unskilled and basic employment. Wholesalers who continued to serve Jewish merchants were marched through the streets with placards around their necks proclaiming them to be “race traitors.” Overall, many Germans accepted the Nuremberg Laws, partly because Nazi propaganda had successfully persuaded public opinion to accept the belief that Jews were a separate race, but also because to oppose the regime meant leaving oneself and one’s family open to harassment or arrest by the Nazi secret police. Ordinary Germans were thankful that much of the antisemitic violence stopped once the Nuremberg Laws were passed, although some supporters of the banned Communist Party and some elements of the Catholic Church were (and remained) critical of the laws.

Many German Jews reacted to the Nuremberg Laws with a sense of relief, thinking the worst was now over—at least they finally knew where they stood and could get on with their lives even if they had diminished rights. And to some degree they were correct. Over the next few years, the Nazis moved slowly in regard to the Jews. This was the quiet time for Jews in the Third Reich, as Hitler began to focus his attention entirely on diplomatic affairs and military rearmament. Further, concerned that international opinion would be adversely swayed by the new laws, the Interior Ministry did not actively enforce them until after the 1936 Summer Olympics, held in Berlin that August. After this, Jews were actively suppressed, stripped of their citizenship and civil rights, and eventually completely removed from German society.

Nuremberg Principles

The Nuremberg Principles are international guidelines promulgated in 1946 that determine what constitutes war crimes and crimes against humanity. The principles emerged from the International Military Tribunal, convened at Nuremberg, Germany, in October 1945. That court was responsible for prosecuting individuals suspected of having committed war crimes and crimes against humanity in Europe during the late 1930s and 1940s. The United Nations created the International Law Commission in 1946, which formally drafted the Nuremberg Principles and made them part of international law in December 1946.

The Nuremberg Principles are composed of seven principles. The first maintains that anyone who commits a war crime or a crime against humanity is subject to punishment. The second states that if internal or national laws do not penalize an individual who has committed a crime, that person is still subject to prosecution under international law. The third holds that heads of state or other governmental officials are not exempt from prosecution for war crimes or crimes against humanity. The fourth maintains that a person accused of such crimes may not claim innocence simply because he or she was “following orders,” as long as the person had a moral choice in those actions. The fifth states that anyone accused of committing an international war crime is entitled to a fair trial.

The sixth principle is perhaps the most important of the seven principles, because it specifically defines international war crimes. Crimes against peace are defined as those involving the planning, preparing for, initiation of, or waging of a war of aggression or a war that violates international treaties or agreements. War crimes are defined as violations of the laws or customs of war that involve—but are not limited to—murder, deportation, and ill treatment of civilians, the use of slave labor, the murder or ill treatment of prisoners of war, the murder of hostages, or the plunder or destruction of public and private property that is not militarily justified. Crimes against humanity are defined as murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhuman acts perpetrated against civilians, or the persecution of said civilians based on political, racial, or religious grounds when such acts are committed in connection with any war crime or crime against humanity. The seventh principle holds that complicity in the commission of any of the above crimes is by definition a crime under international law.

Since 1946 the Nuremberg Principles have been made part of a host of international and multilateral treaties and conventions. They have also formed the legal basis of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. When the International Criminal Court at The Hague was created on July 1, 2002, the Nuremberg Principles became the foundation of the court’s jurisdictional and legal proceedings.

Nuremberg Trials

The Allies were determined to hold German civilian and military leaders accountable for World War II and the mass killings that had taken place in German-occupied Europe. British prime minister Winston Churchill and Soviet leader Joseph Stalin agreed as early as 1941 to try those apprehended and found guilty of war crimes, and the logistics and framework needed to carry out this policy were discussed throughout the war. At Moscow in October 1943, a declaration signed by British, Soviet, and U.S. representatives stated that war criminals would be brought to trial. Such a procedure was further discussed at important meetings at Tehran (November–December 1943), at Yalta (February 1945), and at Potsdam (July 1945). Finally, the London Agreement of August 8, 1945, set forth the method—a court trial—and identified jurisdiction. Although the Soviets proposed that the trials be held in Berlin, within their zone of occupation, the Western Allies insisted on Nuremberg.

The city of Nuremberg was selected because the palace of justice there had received only minimal damage during the war. The large stone structure had 80 courtrooms and over 500 offices and thus offered sufficient space for a major international legal proceeding. Furthermore, an undestroyed prison was part of the justice building complex, so all prospective defendants could be housed on site. Moreover, the proclamation of the Third Reich’s racial laws against the Jews had been made at Nuremberg. U.S. Army personnel prepared the palace of justice for the trial, repairing damage and laying thousands of feet of electrical wire.

Broadly speaking, the Nuremberg proceedings fell into two categories. The first set took place between November 1945 and October 1946 and involved the trial of 22 defendants before an International Military Tribunal (IMT) established by Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States. Subsequently, a series of other trials was held at Nuremberg until the spring of 1949 before U.S. tribunals in the American zone of occupation, involving nearly 200 other defendants.

The Nuremberg IMT opened on October 8, 1945. Judges from France, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States presided. The Western judges dressed in traditional robes, whereas the Soviet judge wore a military uniform. Soviet justice Iola T. Nikitschenko presided during the first session.

The Nuremberg Trials were a series of military tribunals conducted by the Allied forces in the city of Nuremberg after World War II. The first and best known of these trials was the trial of the major war criminals before the International Military Tribunal, held between November 20, 1945, and October 1, 1946. A second set of trials of lesser war criminals was conducted subsequently by the United States military. These included important tribunals such as the Doctors' Trial and the Judges' (or Justice) Trial. The decisions handed down at Nuremberg marked a new departure for the conduct of international law. (AP Photo)

The prosecution presented indictments against 24 major criminals and 6 organizations. The individuals were Martin Bormann, deputy Führer after 1941 (tried in absentia); Karl Doenitz, admiral and commander of the navy from 1943 to 1945; Hans Frank, governor-general of Poland; Wilhelm Frick, minister for internal affairs; Hans Fritzsche, head of the Radio Division of the Ministry of Propaganda; Walther Funk, minister of Economic Affairs; Hermann Göring, Reichsmarschall (Reich Marshal) and commander of the Luftwaffe; Rudolf Hess, deputy Führer until May 1941; Alfred Jodl, army general and head of Operations, Oberkommando der Wehrmacht (OKW); Ernst Kaltenbrunner, head of the Sicherheitsdienst (SD, Security Service); Wilhelm Keitel, army field marshal and chief of OKW; Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, industrialist and head of Krupp armaments; Robert Ley, head of the Labor Front (he committed suicide on October 16, 1945); Konstantin Neurath, protector of Bohemia and Moravia from 1939 to 1943; Franz von Papen, former vice chancellor and ambassador to Turkey; Erich Raeder, grand admiral and commander of the navy until 1943; Joachim von Ribbentrop, foreign minister; Alfred Rosenberg, minister for the Occupied Territories in the East until 1941; Fritz Saukel, plenipotentiary for the mobilization of labor; Hjalmar Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, from 1933 to 1939 and minister of economics from 1934 to 1937; Baldur von Shirach, leader of the Hitler Youth and Gauleiter (area commander) of Vienna; Arthur Seyss-Inquart, commissioner for the Netherlands from 1940 to 1945; Albert Speer, minister of armaments from 1942 to 1945; and Julius Streicher, publisher of the newspaper Der Stürmer. The indicted organizations were the Nazi Party (NSDAP), the SS, the SD, the Gestapo, the General Staff, and Hitler's cabinet.

The charter governing the proceedings declared that the IMT's decisions would be made by majority vote. British Lord Justice Geoffrey Lawrence, president of the court, would cast the deciding vote in the event of a tie among the four sitting judges. The charter identified four categories of crimes: (1) crimes against peace: planning and/or preparing a war of aggression and violating international agreements; (2) crimes against peace: participating in a conspiracy to plan a war of aggression; (3) war crimes: a violation of custom and laws of war, use of slave labor, killing of hostages; and (4) crimes against humanity.

The trial itself lasted 218 days, and some 360 witnesses gave either written or verbal testimony. A new simultaneous translation system allowed the trial to proceed efficiently and swiftly in four languages. Although the defense was given the right to call its own witnesses, it was not allowed to bring forth any evidence against the Allies.

The proceedings at Nuremberg laid bare before the world the horrific crimes committed by the Third Reich. Most revealing were testimonies regarding the brutalities of the death camps. When shown German films of concentration camps, some of the defendants wept or became otherwise noticeably upset.

One aspect of the trial that caused debate at the time was the legality of trying military officers. Some suggested it was the role of military officers to carry out orders, but this defense was disallowed at Nuremberg. The prevailing view held that German military leaders had knowingly approved and planned aggressive war and had sanctioned war crimes.

On October 1, 1946, U.S. Army Colonel Burton Andrus led 21 defendants into the somber courtroom. (Martin Bormann was tried in absentia, Robert Ley had committed suicide, and Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach was too weak to be present.) Sir Geoffrey Lawrence announced that the verdicts would be delivered first, followed by the sentencing. Twelve defendants were sentenced to death by hanging (the counts on which they were found guilty are in parentheses): Hans Frank (3 and 4), Wilhelm Frick (2, 3, and 4), Hermann Göring (all four), Alfred Jodl (all four), Ernst Kaltenbrunner (3 and 4), Wilhelm Keitel (all four), Robert Ley (all four), Joachim von Ribbentrop (all four), Alfred Rosenberg (all four), Fritz Saukel (3 and 4), Arthur Seyss-Inquart (2, 3, and 4), and Julius Streicher (1 and 4).

Göring escaped the hangman's noose by committing suicide with poison smuggled into the prison. Franz von Papen, Hans Fritzsche, and Hjalmar Schacht were the only defendants to be acquitted. Charges against Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach were dropped on the grounds that he was physically unable to stand trial. The remaining defendants received various terms, ranging up to life in prison: Karl Doenitz, 10 years (2 and 3); Walter Funk, life imprisonment (2, 3, and 4); Rudolf Hess, life imprisonment (1 and 2); Konstantin von Neurath, 15 years (all 4); Erich Raeder, life imprisonment (1, 2 and 3); Baldur von Schirach, 4 to 20 years (1 and 4); and Albert Speer, 4 to 20 years (3 and 4). Of those imprisoned, Hess lived the longest. He died in Spandau Prison in 1987 at age 93.

Even before the trial ended in 1946, debate began on the validity of the tribunal. Although some have argued that the IMT was merely a case of the victor trying the vanquished, it nonetheless exposed the horrors of the Third Reich, most especially the Holocaust, the use of slave labor, and the heinous war crimes.

O

Oberheuser, Herta

A German medical doctor who conducted cruel and sadistic medical experimentation on concentration camp inmates, Herta Oberheuser was born on May 11, 1911, in Cologne and received her medical degree in Bonn in 1937, with specialty training in dermatology. Following the completion of her medical training, the 26-year-old Oberheuser joined the Nazi Party as an intern and later as a physician for the League of German Girls. By 1940 she had been assigned as assistant physician to Dr. Karl Gebhardt, chief surgeon of the SS and personal physician to Reichsführer SS Heinrich Himmler.

The May 27, 1942, assassination of German security police chief Reinhardt Heydrich, who died primarily due to infection, led to the establishment of a branch of the Hohenlychen Sanatorium within the Ravensbrück concentration camp. Hoping to expand their knowledge of infections and how to fight them, Gebhardt and Oberheuser arrived at the facility intent on using the camp's inmates as subjects for their medical experiments.

On July 27, 1942, 75 women at Ravensbrück were ordered to the commandant's headquarters. Once there, Oberheuser physically examined the women and evaluated their suitability for the experiments. Those chosen had their legs cut and bacteria strains placed in the wounds. The subsequent infections were then treated with new sulfanilamide drugs. All of the experiments were conducted without the subjects' consent.

The results of the initial experiments were disappointing because they failed to replicate actual combat injuries. Later experiments sought to correct this. Inmates were subjected to gunshot wounds infected with dirt and foreign material; they also endured severed muscles and broken bones. Wounds were then injected with streptococcus, gas gangrene, and tetanus. Prisoners who survived these experiments were often crippled for life.

Experiments involving bone and muscle transplantation were also conducted by Oberheuser. Oberheuser also oversaw the transfer of inmates to the Hohenlychen Sanatorium, where unnecessary amputations and transplants were conducted. The goal of these experiments was to provide "spare parts" for wounded German soldiers. Once a subject's usefulness had passed, Oberheuser hastened death with injections of gasoline.

Following the end of the war, Oberheuser was the only woman to stand trial at the Nuremberg Doctors' Trial. On August 20, 1947, she was found guilty for her part in conducting human experimentation at Ravensbrück and at Hohenlychen. Originally sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment, her sentence was later reduced to 10 years, and she was released in 1952 after serving only 5 years. She returned to practice as a doctor, establishing a family medical practice in Stocksee, Germany. In 1958 her medical license was revoked after she was recognized by a former Ravensbrück inmate. Oberheuser died on January 24, 1978, in Linz am Rhein, West Germany.

Oberländer, Theodor

Theodor Oberländer was a German scientist, Nazi Party member, and one of the chief architects of Nazi racial and occupation policies in the east. He later served as a politician and government official in the Federal Republic of Germany.

Theodor Oberländer was born on May 1, 1905, in Meiningen, Germany, and became an early adherent of Nazism; in 1923, at the age of 18, he was a participant in the abortive Beer Hall Putsch. He later attended university, ultimately earning a doctorate in agricultural science. In 1933 Oberländer became a member of the Nazi Party and was given a position as a regional deputy party official; soon thereafter, he secured a faculty position at a German university.

During this time, Oberländer began formulating theories about the non-German population in East Prussia. He also took a keen interest in Germany's mounting tensions with Poland, and urged that Germans and Polish immigrants be forbidden from socializing and intermarriage. Part of his ideas embraced the growing antisemitism of the Nazi Party. Indeed, Oberländer readily embraced his party's ill-conceived notions that Jews were carriers of communism and treason; he also suggested that non-Jewish peasants in the east be encouraged to adopt virulent antisemitism. By 1937 Oberländer had established a racially based formula designed to prepare Poland for direct German rule that sought to pit various ethnic groups against each other. Poles were also encouraged to turn against both the Jews and the Russians. In this regard, some have viewed Oberländer as an early proponent of the Final Solution.

When the Germans invaded Poland in September 1939, sparking World War II, Oberländer was sent to Poland to work with anti-sabotage forces attached to the German Army. The next year, he fully endorsed ethnic cleansing in Poland and took a post at the University of Prague, where the Nazis employed him as an ethnic psychologist. In 1941, after the Germans invaded the Soviet Union, Oberländer became an adviser to a Ukrainian-manned German army unit, which precipitated a massacre of civilians in Lvov (Lviv) that same year. He also urged that resistance groups be exterminated en masse. In 1943 he became embroiled in a dispute with his superiors and was sent back to Prague. The following year he joined the staff of the Russian Liberation Army but was taken prisoner by U.S. forces in 1945.

Because of his knowledge of the region and its people, Oberländer was not tried as a war criminal. At the same time, he denied having perpetrated deleterious racial and ethnic policies. He served in the Bundestag (West German Parliament) during the two periods of 1953–1961 and 1963–1965, and was West Germany's minister for displaced persons, refugees, and victims of war from 1953 to 1960. He was forced to leave that position when his Nazi past came under scrutiny. The German Democratic Republic, meanwhile, sentenced him to life imprisonment in absentia in 1960 for his alleged involvement in the Lvov Massacre.

Returning to life as a scholar, Oberländer later denounced any rapprochement between East and West as a scheme concocted by communists and an ill-informed intelligentsia. In 1993, after German reunification, Oberländer's 1960 conviction was rescinded. In his last years, Oberländer became active in Germany's anti-immigration movement. He died in Bonn on May 12, 1998.

Ochota Massacre

German Nazi atrocity consisting of mass murder, rape, robbery, destruction, and arson committed in the Warsaw district of Ochota from August 4 to August 25, 1944. These atrocities were aimed at destroying Warsaw and exterminating its population. The gravest crimes were committed in hospitals, at the Radium Institute, and in the so-called "Kolonja Staszica" and the "Zieleniak" concentration camps. It is estimated that some 10,000 residents of Ochota were murdered. Their property was subsequently looted and the district itself was systematically incinerated by German forces.

On August 1, 1944, an uprising in Warsaw was initiated by the underground Home Army, which sought to defeat the German occupying forces and welcome approaching Soviet troops. The Germans' Warsaw garrison numbered some 16,000 soldiers, and as the unrest increased, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler ordered the strengthening of German forces in the city; he also ordered the destruction of Warsaw and the annihilation of its population.

Within the first four days of quashing the uprising, German troops managed to isolate selected districts of Warsaw, among them Ochota. A special collaborationist SS Sturmbrigade unit, the Russian National Liberation Army (Russkaya Osvoboditelnaya Narodnaya Armiya, or RONA), consisting of war criminals and renegades, was called on to pacify the isolated districts. Its members were given a free hand to loot, murder, rape, and destroy. The brigade was under the command of Bronislav Kaminski, later executed for war crimes. The soldiers of this regiment were remembered as exceptionally cruel and merciless.

At the beginning of the destruction of the Ochota district, on August 5, the Germans erected a special transitional concentration camp (“Zieleniak”), where citizens were detained before being sent to other camps. During the “pacification” of Ochota, at least 1,000 citizens were murdered at Zieleniak alone by the time of its closure on August 19.

On August 5–6, some 170 patients and staff were raped and murdered at the Radium Institute, an oncology hospital, which was later looted and burned. Also in early August, RONA systematically plundered the neighboring “Kolonja Staszica” (Staszic Housing Estate), and raped and murdered its inhabitants.

In all, it is estimated (no complete documentation is available) that at least 10,000 citizens of Ochota were murdered. The massacre occurred throughout the Ochota district, although not all the deaths were documented, and many remain unremembered today. Looting and pillage continued after the district was vacated of its citizens.

Germany attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, German and allied Romanian troops besieged the Ukrainian city of Odessa on the Black Sea. At the time, Odessa was a major city of some 600,000 people, including 180,000 Jews. About half the Jewish population managed to flee Odessa between June and October, but some 80,000–90,000 remained when the city was captured on October 16, 1941. The Romanian occupiers intended to use Odessa as a major administrative center.

On October 22, a huge time-delayed bomb, probably planted by the Soviets, detonated in front of Romania's military headquarters, killing 67 people. Included among them were numerous German and Romanian officers and the chief of the regional Romanian military. Outraged by the carnage, Romanian occupation forces began rounding up Odessa's Jews, forcing them into a public square on October 23. At least 5,000 were summarily shot. Others were soaked with gasoline and burned alive. About 20,000 more Jews were herded toward Dalnik, a small village in the countryside. Once there, they were locked in several large warehouses, which were then set ablaze. Anyone trying to flee was shot to death. Many of the dead were women and young children. The following day, another building housing Jewish men was set on fire, burning the victims alive.

The surviving Jews, numbering perhaps 35,000–40,000, were forced into a ghetto in the suburb of Slobodka, where many died from exposure and starvation over the succeeding weeks. On October 28, reports suggest that 4,000–5,000 Jews from the ghetto were shot to death in a stable area. Beginning in January 1942, Romanian and German officials deported about 19,300 Jews to concentration camps and ghettos in the Berezovka region. Although the precise number of dead remains difficult to determine, the best guess is that as many as 70,000 Jews may have died between October 1941 and January 1942.

Odessa Massacre

A ruthless series of mass killings aimed at the Jewish population of Odessa in late 1941 and early 1942. Although the main massacre occurred during October 23–24, 1941, mass killings and deaths continued into January 1942. After

Ogilvie, Albert

Albert George Ogilvie was the premier of the Australian state of Tasmania between 1934 and 1939, and a rescuer of Jews from Nazi Germany prior to World War II. Born in the Tasmanian capital city of Hobart on March 16, 1890, he was educated at one of Australia's prestigious Catholic colleges, St. Patrick's, Ballarat (Victoria), and the University of Tasmania, where he graduated in law. Admitted to the bar in 1914, he soon developed a reputation as a successful barrister defending criminal cases.

Ogilvie was elected to the Tasmanian Parliament in 1919 as the Labor member for the seat of Franklin (and was the youngest member of the House), and in 1928 he became leader of the Labor Party. He led the party into government at an election in 1934, and, as premier, moved quickly into action to implement the many plans he had for the future of his state. A highly energetic and domineering leader, Ogilvie was determined to modernize Tasmania, expand the population, and improve the state's infrastructure.

In 1935, together with his minister for health, John Francis ("Stymie") Gaha, Ogilvie took a trip to Europe to see firsthand how other countries were dealing with the effects of the Depression. This trip took in Britain, Italy, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, Poland, and the Soviet Union. As a Labor politician his impressions of the latter country were highly favorable, but he evinced horror at what he saw in Italy and Germany. In the Nazi state he met with officials from the German foreign office and also with the president of the Reichsbank, Hjalmar Schacht. In discussions with foreign office representatives mention was made of the Jewish issue, with which Ogilvie had been apprised through the British and Australian press. He was disgusted by what he learned from the Nazi officials with whom he spoke.

Upon his return to Australia he was driven to help Jews who applied to his state for refuge—even though, as a state premier, he had no say over immigration policy, at a time when the federal government in Canberra was applying policies that sought to restrict Jewish refugee admissions. Ogilvie pleaded with his federal colleagues to allow Jews to enter Tasmania, working from the premise that as an island state it would be easy to restrict Jewish entry to the mainland, if that was the federal preference.

The volume of mail his office received from German and Austrian Jews seeking refuge was huge, with large numbers believing that Tasmania was a country separate from Australia, like New Zealand. Numerous applications for entry came straight to Hobart, the refugees believing that the state controlled its own immigration policy. The frustration Ogilvie experienced caused him considerable distress; all his government was able to do, in the usual run of events, was forward these on to the Department of the Interior in Canberra, which dealt with migration matters. More often than not, applications for entry were denied.

Given this, there were times when Ogilvie found himself affronted by the federal government's dismissive attitude. On more than one occasion he interceded with regard to the progress of refugee applications, contacting the responsible minister in Canberra, the United Australia Party's Hattil Spencer Foll, and requesting, as a personal favor, that Jewish refugees be allowed entry to his island home. As Ogilvie came from the opposite side of politics to Foll, and was a state premier rather than a federal politician, Foll rarely gave Ogilvie's appeals a second thought (though there were occasions when the premier's efforts did manage to soften the heart of the otherwise tough minister for the interior).

As a result, there were frequent instances of Jewish rejection before the full facts of a specific case were known. An example of this can be seen in the case of a Warsaw Jew, Mordka Nejman. His brother-in-law, Norman Seidel, had migrated to Australia several years earlier and had settled in Hobart where he soon became established in soft goods manufacture. In 1938, owing to the situation prevailing for Jews in Poland, Nejman decided to sell his flourishing electrical business and move to Australia. Seidel arranged employment that would not displace an Australian, and with an assured landing capital to the value of £500, together with Seidel's maintenance guarantee, Nejman made his application to come to Australia.

The application was refused without the Department of the Interior providing any reasons. Ogilvie took up the case personally, and in a letter to Prime Minister Joseph Lyons—a fellow Tasmanian—on March 14, 1939, he asked whether the department could favorably reconsider Nejman's application. On May 26 the premier received news that upon further reflection the application for the admission of Nejman, his wife, and his children had now been approved. In view of the ease with which reconsideration was given to the case, it is possible to speculate that with a little more care the application would have been approved in the first place.

For Ogilvie, this was only the tip of the iceberg. Overall, he pursued some 15 separate cases of Jewish entry to his island state and was successful in 10. Most of these related to Jews seeking refuge from Nazi Germany and Austria.

He also put forth proposals for block Jewish settlement on Tasmania's offshore King Island, and went to great lengths to oversee the progress of individual applications from refugee applicants. For the most part, sadly, his entreaties rarely softened the position of the federal immigration authorities in Canberra.

On June 10, 1939, Ogilvie collapsed and died of a heart attack in Melbourne while attending a federal loan council meeting. It has been suggested that the pressure under which he had been working on behalf of Jewish refugees was a contributing factor in his death. Of course, he had many other matters to attend to than those of Jewish refugee admission, but it could be suggested that the tragedy of the refugees did little to ease his tension. His untimely death left unfinished a matter on which he would have sought completion ahead of many others.

Albert Ogilvie was arguably the only executive office-bearer in Australia in the 1930s to advocate refugee entry in spite of existing regulations or policy considerations. He was not only prepared to oppose the federal government's restrictive immigration policies; he did so on numerous occasions. That no more than a handful of Jewish refugees made it into Tasmania is not his failure; the lives he saved through his intervention, rather, demonstrate his success.

The main principles for which Ogilvie fought throughout his life sprang from the premise that no one can remain an innocent bystander in the face of suffering. This was abundantly demonstrated in his activities on behalf of Jewish refugees from Nazism.

Ohlendorf, Otto

Otto Ohlendorf was a Nazi Party member, SS official, and head of one of the mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen) that was responsible for the deaths of some 90,000 innocent civilians, most of them Jews, between 1941 and 1942.

He was born on February 4, 1907, in Hohenegelesen, Germany. He studied economics and law at universities in Leipzig and Göttingen before pursuing doctoral work at the University of Pavia. In 1925 he joined the Nazi Party; in 1926 he became a member of the SS. He held several well-regarded positions, and in 1933 became involved with the Institute of World Economy at the University of Kiel, where he focused on the study of Italian fascism and German National Socialism. In 1936 Ohlendorf became an official with the intelligence agency of the SS, where he provided information and reported on German public opinion for Nazi Party leaders.

In June 1941, upon the German invasion of the Soviet Union, Ohlendorf was named commander of Einsatzgruppe D, a mobile killing squad unit that was operational in the Crimea and southern Ukraine. The squad was attached to the Eleventh German Army. Among other atrocities, Ohlendorf's men were responsible for the mass killing of Jews in Kher-son, Nikolaiev, and Podilia. At Simferopol on December 13, 1941, Ohlendorf's unit massacred some 14,300 civilians, mainly Jews. Ohlendorf later testified he had ordered numerous men to fire on victims simultaneously, so that it would be impossible to establish personal responsibility for any single killing. In June 1942 Ohlendorf left the war front and returned to his SS work in Germany. During his roughly one-year tenure as head of the mobile killing squad, as many as 90,000 civilians were murdered.

Ohlendorf was now tasked with laying plans for the reconstruction of the postwar German economy. By the end of 1943, he had already resigned himself to a German defeat in World War II. At the end of the war in 1945 he was taken prisoner by Allied authorities and placed on trial for war crimes. At the Nuremberg Trial of several Einsatzgruppen officials, Ohlendorf was the lead defendant. He testified calmly and accurately at the proceedings, asserting at one point that his unit had committed crimes no less odious than the "push-button" killers who had unleashed the atomic bombs over Japan in 1945. Although he never indicated regret for his actions, his testimony was useful in convicting several others besides himself.

Ohlendorf's trial ended in the early spring of 1948, and in April of that year he was sentenced to death. After spending some three years as a prisoner at the Landsberg Prison, he was hanged there on June 8, 1951.

Olympic Games, 1936

On August 1, 1936, the Summer Olympics began in Berlin. German dictator Adolf Hitler used the Games to showcase the Third Reich and conceal his regime's antisemitic and militaristic intentions, attempting instead to portray a peaceful and tolerant Germany to the international community.

The city of Berlin had been awarded the Games in 1931, prior to Hitler's ascent to power, but the 16-day meet quickly and inextricably became associated with the Nazi regime. By the time the Games of the XI Olympiad got underway, 3,963 athletes from 49 nations (the largest number of countries to that point) competed in 129 events, across 19 different sports.

Of course, as we well know, the Games were controversial. But what many people do not realize is the extent to which they also attracted controversy at the time. From the very start they were marked by racism, with the official Nazi Party paper, the Völkischer Beobachter, writing in the strongest terms that Jews and blacks, regardless of their country of origin, should not be allowed to participate.

Following Nazi demands, the German Olympic Committee denied Jews all opportunity of representing Germany. When the possibility of an international boycott was threatened—robbing Germany not only of the Games but also of both the showcase the Nazis were looking for and of much-desired foreign currency—there was a token relaxing of the rules: now, one athlete with a Jewish background was allowed to compete for Germany. Helene Mayer, who had a Jewish father, was a world champion fencer who had already won a gold medal at the 1928 Amsterdam Games. With an eye to the prospect of her winning another gold medal for

The Opening Ceremony of the Summer Olympics of 1936 in Berlin, August 8, 1936. The Games were a showpiece for Adolf Hitler's new Germany, in which the Third Reich could promote the Nazi ideals of racial supremacy to a watching world. German Jewish athletes were prevented from representing Germany, and Jewish athletes from other countries were discouraged from attending. When threatened with a boycott of the Games, however, Hitler realized that stopping Jewish athletes from outside was not something he could prevent. To Hitler's chagrin, an African American sprinter, Jesse Owens, won four gold medals and became the most successful athlete to compete in Berlin. (The Illustrated London News Picture Library)

Germany, she became the token Jew permitted to compete. As it turned out, she won silver in the individual foil event.

The prospect of other Jewish athletes competing for Germany was denied, however. The four-time world record holder and 10-time German national champion in shot put and discus throw, Lilli Henoch, was excluded; she was later deported and murdered in the Riga ghetto in 1942. Gretel Bergmann, an internationally recognized champion high jumper, was replaced on the German team by Dora Ratjen, who was later revealed to be a male who had been raised as a girl.

In order to reassure foreign opinion, Berlin was purged of all traces of Nazi antisemitism. Local party authorities removed street signs bearing such slogans as “Jews not wanted” from Berlin’s main tourist areas, while all vagrants and Roma (known as “Gypsies”) were physically moved on to a specially constructed “holding camp” outside the city at Marzahn.

In view of such developments, there was considerable debate outside Germany prior to the Games over whether or not a boycott should go ahead. In some countries, notably Britain, France, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, and the Netherlands, discussion took place over whether the Games should perhaps be relocated, while throughout Europe exiled political opponents of the Nazis kept up the pressure for a boycott. These initiatives did not amount to anything definite, the excuse always being given that the Games had been awarded to Berlin in 1931 and that it would be wrong to punish the city simply because of a change of government.

Individual Jewish athletes from a number of countries, on the other hand, elected to take matters into their own hands and refused to attend. In this regard, brave athletes such as the South African Sid Kiel and Americans Milton Green and Norman Cahners should be mentioned.

As one of the world’s leading sporting nations the position of the United States was crucial, and in September 1934 the United States Olympic Committee accepted a German invitation to visit on a fact-finding mission. After interviewing German Jews who had been carefully selected by the Nazi regime, U.S. Olympic Committee president Avery Brundage concluded that he had not found any discrimination against the Jewish population of Germany. He then became a major supporter of the Games being held in Berlin, famously arguing that “politics has no place in sport.” By 1935 he had convinced the Amateur Athletic Union of the United States that an American team should be sent to Berlin. The American Jewish Congress and the Jewish Labor Committee supported a boycott, but they had no say in what was effectively an institutional project by the American Olympic Committee.

Most African American newspapers, on the other hand, supported participation, arguing that this was an opportunity for Nazi racial theories to be challenged and, hopefully, defeated. And to some degree, they were right; the iconic Jesse Owens won four gold medals in the sprint and long jump events, and became the most successful athlete to compete in Berlin.

On the day of the men’s 4 × 100 relay, the Jewish American sprinters Sam Stoller and Marty Glickman were omitted from the team. While this gave Owens the opportunity to win his fourth and final gold medal, the speculation has ever since been that in the aftermath of Owens’s earlier victories Avery Brundage did not want to add to Hitler’s embarrassment by having two Jews win gold medals. Suggestions have been consistent that the omission of Stoller and Glickman was deliberately antisemitic, and a direct appeasing of Hitler. This does not, however, take into account the prospect of environmental circumstances on the day of the race itself, always a consideration in a team sporting event.

What must be considered an act of appeasement, however, was the tortured debate that took place within the hierarchy of Britain’s BBC over whether or not to accredit its foremost sporting commentator, the former Olympic gold medalist from the 1924 Paris Games, Harold Abrahams. It was felt that the presence of Abrahams, who was Jewish, could have been embarrassing to the British government if the Nazis took it as a provocative act. The BBC’s controller of programs, Cecil Graves, wrote to his colleagues: “We all regard the German action against the Jews as quite irrational and intolerable . . . but would it be discourteous to send a Jew commentator to a country where Jews are taboo?” After much deliberation and many internal memos, Abrahams was sent to Berlin, with Graves concluding that the BBC should inform the Germans of the BBC decision and “leave them to raise any objections.”

Ultimately, Germany was the most successful country at the Games, winning 33 gold medals and 89 medals overall. The United States came second in the medal tally, with 24 gold and 56 overall.

The Berlin Olympics torch relay from Mount Olympus in Greece was the first of its kind, and the Games were the first to have live television coverage. Despite these advances, they were also to be the final Olympic Games for 12 years owing to World War II.

Hitler’s anti-human ideologies and his quest for supreme domination and racial supremacy were the biggest challenge to the Olympic ideal until 1972—when Palestinian terrorism and the murder of Jewish athletes at the Munich Games threatened the Olympic ideal once more. The president of the International Olympic Committee then was the same Avery Brundage who so dominated the American team in 1936.

Oneg Shabbat

During the period the Warsaw Ghetto was under Nazi domination in Poland, Jewish historian and educator Emanuel Ringelblum trained a group of colleagues and others to secretly record the daily events of life in the Warsaw Ghetto for posterity under the name Oneg Shabbat (Hebrew, “Joy of the Sabbath”). Begun in November 1939, this massive collection of historical data, hidden primarily in tin boxes and metal milk cans, continued until Ringelblum’s murder in March 1944.

Efforts were made continuously to transmit information obtained by Ringelblum and his colleagues to the Allies—for example, knowledge of the Chelmno death camp. After the war, between 1946 and 1950, much but not all of this material was retrieved and continues to be a major resource for scholars and others regarding the reality of life and death in the Warsaw ghetto, which has most closely been identified with resistance to the Nazis, where the Jewish inhabitants held off their enemies for six weeks following the Nazis’ attack at Passover in April 1943. The material itself consists of more than 6,000 documents, maps, pictures, memorabilia, testimonials, analyses, reports, and research on a wide array of issues (for example, smuggling, relationships with the Poles, starvation, the underground economy). Today, much of this material is housed in the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, Poland.

Opdyke, Irene Gut

Irene Gut Opdyke was a Polish upstander who aided and saved Jews during the Holocaust. She was born Irena Gut on May 5, 1918, in Koziencice, Poland, one of five daughters in a devoutly Catholic family. She later moved with her family to Radom, where she eventually became a nursing student. In 1939, after Germany attacked Poland and the country became partitioned into German and Soviet zones, Gut escaped to Ukraine to join the Polish resistance army. There she was captured by Soviet soldiers, brutalized and raped, and left for dead in the snow. She was found by Polish and Ukrainian partisans and recovered, but was later arrested by the Germans and made a prisoner in Poland.

By 1942 she was working as a forced laborer in a German munitions plant in Glinice, Poland. In April of that year, she witnessed a scene so shocking that she became determined to resist the Germans at all costs and help the Jews who were being systematically repressed and murdered. While on a break from work, she watched in horror as a Nazi officer tossed a baby into the air and shot him dead, as if he had been honing his target-practice skills. This scene convinced her that she had to do her part to shield and rescue Jews. Her resolution to do so became even stronger when the local Gestapo forced her and other Poles to witness the hanging of a Jewish couple and their would-be Polish rescuer.

While still in Glinice, a 70-year-old German officer, Major Edward Rugemer, noticed Gut and took pity on her. He quickly arranged for her to be transferred to an officers’ mess located in a local hotel. There she began to actively assist Jews in the nearby ghetto. She routinely sent in food and leftovers, and before long she had become involved in smuggling Jews out of the ghetto and into the surrounding forests, where they could escape. She engaged in these activities knowing that if she were to be caught, she would be executed.

When Rugemer was transferred to Ternopol (Ternopil), in modern-day Ukraine, he requested that Gut accompany him and serve as his official housekeeper and cook. The move brought Gut to an abandoned villa that included a large but well-hidden cellar located under a gazebo. Gut arranged for 12 Jews to take refuge in the cellar, feeding them from Rugemer's kitchen. During the day, when Rugemer was away from the house, Gut's hidden guests helped her with the household chores.

When Rugemer discovered the presence of the hidden Jews, he threatened to alert the SS and have Gut and her "guests" arrested. Rugemer now demanded that Gut become his mistress; if she did not, he would report her to the authorities. Gut agreed, and the arrangement remained undisturbed until the winter of 1944, when Gut and her Jewish friends fled into a nearby forest, remaining hidden until Soviet forces had retaken Poland. At that point, they were all placed in a camp for displaced persons. Many of the Jews she had rescued eventually made their way to Palestine; Gut, meanwhile, with the help of some Jewish friends, made her way to western Germany and then later migrated to the United States.

In the late 1940s William Opdyke, an American working for the United Nations, interviewed Gut to determine if she was eligible for permanent residency in the United States. For the first time, Gut recounted her amazing tale. Gut later married Opdyke. The couple raised a family and eventually moved to California; Irene Opdyke, meanwhile, kept quiet about her World War II-era exploits. In 1974 she was asked to fill in for her husband as a speaker at a local Rotary Club meeting, and it was there that she first shared her tale with an audience. After that, she spoke often, and to many audiences, about her experiences. In 1999 she published her memoir, In My Hands: Memories of a Holocaust Rescuer, which has sold well over a million copies.

Meanwhile, in 1982 Israel's Yad Vashem recognized Opdyke as one of the Righteous among the Nations. In 1995 Polish-born Pope John Paul II bestowed upon Opdyke a personal papal blessing during the pontiff's visit to California. This was bittersweet for Opdyke, for she had earlier abandoned the Catholic Church because a priest had refused to absolve her when she asked for forgiveness for having had the affair with Major Rugemer, even though that affair had saved her life and the lives of 12 others. Opdyke went on a speaking tour after her book was published. Opdyke died in Orange County, California, on May 17, 2003.

Operation Barbarossa

Code name for the German invasion of the Soviet Union, June 22, 1941, along a 2,900-kilometer front from the Baltic to the Black Sea. It was the greatest frontal advance in military history. The German forces numbered 3,200,000 men in 151 divisions, with 3,350 tanks, 7,184 guns, and 1,945 planes. Accompanying the German forces were those of their allies: there were 40,000 Italian troops, and 18 Finnish, 14 Roumanian, and 2 Hungarian divisions. With the attack on the USSR, Hitler overturned the policy he had initiated a year and 10 months before when he signed a pact of nonaggression with the Soviet Union (August 29, 1939). Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union was accompanied by a proclamation in which he reinforced his often proclaimed role of Savior of Europe against Bolshevism. Operation Barbarossa itself began on June 22 and lasted for several weeks, after which most of its major military objectives had been achieved. Where they had not, new campaigns had to be devised, whilst simultaneously confronting Soviet counter-offensives. Prior to Barbarossa, on June 6, 1941, Hitler issued his Kommissarbefehl ("Commissar Order"), in which he directed that any Soviet cadres and political leaders captured would be summarily executed. By extension, within the Nazi conception of communism, this included all Jews, as they were viewed as the chief disseminators of Bolshevik ideology. Accordingly, special mobile killing squads, the Einsatzgruppen, were established to accompany the combat troops of the German army close behind in the weeks following Barbarossa.

Operation Barbarossa was the code name for the invasion of the Soviet Union by Nazi Germany and its allies, launched on June 22, 1941. It was a massive invasion, comprising three great army groups with over 3 million German soldiers, 150 divisions, and 3,000 tanks, across a front line that stretched over 2,000 miles. Barbarossa was the most important turning point in World War II; its eventual failure, later in the year, forced Nazi Germany into a two-front war against a coalition possessing immensely superior resources. Operation Harvest Festival

Taking place on November 3, 1943, Operation Harvest Festival (Aktion Erntefest) was the largest single mass murder operation of Jews to take place over the entirety of World War II. As direct retaliation for a sequence of resistance operations within concentration camps and ghettos, Operation Harvest Festival, ordered by Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler and carried out by SS officers Christian Wirth and Jakob Sporrenberg, killed approximately 43,000 Polish Jews from the Lublin-Majdanek death camp and the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps, ultimately destroying the Jewish population of the Lublin district of German-occupied Poland.

Heinrich Himmler ordered the liquidation of these camps following multiple expressions of resistance throughout the areas controlled by Germany, including the revolts at the Sobibór and Treblinka death camps, as well as the Jewish resistance in the Warsaw, Białystok, and Vilna ghettos. Fearing further Jewish resistance, Operation Harvest Festival was planned and carried out with the intention of crushing any possibility of further resistance.

Operation Harvest Festival began at dawn on November 3, when Majdanek, Trawniki, and Poniatowa were surrounded by SS officers and German police. Inmates at Trawniki and Poniatowa were taken out of the camps and shot, their bodies falling into massive ditches; at Majdanek, under the watchful eye of Erich Muhsfeldt, the Jews were separated from the rest of the prisoners and then taken to be killed. Muhsfeldt, a senior SS noncommissioned officer, had been transferred from Auschwitz to Majdanek on November 15, 1941, and was closely involved in the mass shooting of the camp's Jewish inmates during Operation Harvest Festival. After Majdanek had been liquidated, he was transferred back to Auschwitz, where he supervised Jewish prisoners in the Sonderkommando in Crematoria II and III.

During Aktion Erntefest the victims had originally been ordered to dig massive trenches designed to combat oncoming Soviet tanks but instead of this the trenches were used as mass graves. During the mass shootings at both Majdanek and Trawniki, music was played over loudspeakers to drown out the sounds of continuous gunshots. The process was completed in a single day at Majdanek and Trawniki; Erntefest took place over two days at Poniatowa, however, owing to prisoner resistance within the camp.

Operation Harvest Festival was responsible for the largest single number of casualties during a mass shooting conducted by the SS. It was part of the much larger Operation Reinhard (Aktion Reinhard), an organized mass murder of all the Polish Jews in German-occupied Poland.

Operation Spring Wind

“Operation Spring Wind” also known as “Operation Spring Breeze” (“Opération Vent Printanier”) was the code name for the arrests made by more than 4,500 French police, under the control of French officials, during the nights of July 16–17, 1942. The incident is now called “La Rafle du Vel’ d’Hiv” (The round-up of the Vel’ d’Hiv). The Vichy government, sensing pressure from Berlin regarding France’s Jewish population, conducted the raid and roundup of more than 13,000 Jews in advance of their deportation out of France. Code named Operation Spring Wind, the action was a French police campaign that had been organized after several discussions between the government of Vichy France, including Marshal Philippe Pétain, Prime Minister Pierre Laval, and the Nazi occupation administration. Operation Spring Wind and the roundup operations of July 1942 were the culmination of Vichy’s antisemitic policies up to that point.

The collaboration of French police and the Gestapo saw the arrest of 13,152 Jews, 31% of them children, over the course of two days. Roughly 7,000 of them were held under the harshest of conditions at the Vélodrome d’Hiver, a stadium for bicycle races and other sporting events in the center of Paris. Others were held at or taken to nearby internment camps such as Drancy, Pithiviers, or Beaune-la-Rolande before being deported to Auschwitz for extermination.

The collaborationist government of Pierre Laval had been called upon to work with the Nazis through the arrest and transportation of the Jews of Paris to places from where they would be deported. Laval, who held antisemitic beliefs and was a supporter of the Statut des Juifs, Vichy’s domestic anti-Jewish law, was also obsessed with the maintenance and recognition of French sovereignty. He willingly collaborated with the Nazis and took the opportunity to offer French services, which he felt would be rewarded appropriately by a more lenient form of cooperative occupation from the Germans.

René Bousquet, the secretary general of police; Theodor Dannecker, the Nazi leader of the Judenreferat at the SD post in Paris; Louis Darquier de Pellepoix, the commissioner for Jewish affairs in Vichy; and Helmut Knochen, the senior commander of the Security Police and SD in Paris, all joined Laval on July 4, 1942, for the organizational meeting regarding the operation planning. Senior officials of the Paris and French police were also present. The agreement for Operation Spring Wind was decided on June 16, 1942. On July 7 the collaborators agreed to postpone the raid from the original date of July 13 to July 16–17 in order to avoid an overlap with France’s national holiday, Bastille Day.

The original schedule for the July 13 raid and roundup mobilized 6,000 French police officers. However, prior to the roundup, the French Resistance and some Jewish organizations learned about Operation Spring Wind and were able to help nearly 9,000 Jews escape the arrest—which, when it took place, included entire families, including for the first time women and children, who were ordered from their homes in dawn raids by the French police. The French police worked with a level of enthusiasm that surprised the German occupiers who had commanded them. Many non-Jewish French citizens also openly welcomed the persecution. A number of individuals clapped as the raids took place, even going so far as to loot the newly empty homes.

The original Operation Spring Wind plan called for Jews over the age of 16 to be arrested; however, Laval amended this such that all children, irrespective of age, were arrested. This went beyond the orders given to him by the Germans, as he had originally been given specific instructions to spare children under the age of 16. Laval justified his position by arguing that his preference was to keep children and their parents together. However, when the American Friends Service Committee arranged visas for the United States for the Jewish children, he also attempted to prevent the children from leaving. In wanting to expel the Jewish children from France, his objective was that they be sent to Nazi camps—not a foreign refuge. Thus, between July 17 and September 30, 1942, more than 6,000 Jewish children from all over France were arrested and transported to their deaths.

The planning and operation of Spring Wind was carried out in the German-controlled zone of France, in Paris and its surroundings. There was very little direct involvement on the part of the German authorities. The planning and execution of Operation Spring Wind was a French concern. The Vichy authorities held the ultimate responsibility for the decisions taken and the outcomes that followed.

After the war, Pierre Laval fled to Germany, then to Spain, then to Austria, where he was arrested and sent back to France. He was tried, along with Philippe Pétain, on charges of treason and found guilty of high treason. After attempting to poison himself, Laval was executed by firing squad on October 15, 1945.

“Ordinary Men”

The phrase “ordinary men” is taken from the title of Christopher Browning’s 1992 book Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland. It refers specifically to the very ordinariness of the 500 middle-aged, lower- and lower-middle class family men from Hamburg, Germany, drafted into Reserve Police Battalion 101 (the so-called Order Police), who were active in murdering the 1,800 Jews of Josefow, Poland, and the surrounding area in July 1942 and beyond. Estimates of their overall involvement in such death-related activities run as high as 38,000, with commensurate transportation responsibilities in the hundreds of thousands.

Why the majority of these nonmilitary combatants engaged in this genocidal behavior when others in their unit, perhaps 10% to 20%, did not (and did not suffer punishments because of their refusal) remains, even today, deeply troubling and deeply disturbing. Although Browning presents a variety of hypotheses regarding the motivation behind their behavior—wartime brutalization, racism, segmentation and routinization of task, special selection of perpetrators, careerism, obedience to authority and orders, deference to that same authority, ideological indoctrination, conformity, quasi-military status, and a sense of elitism (perhaps for many for the first time)—he also asserts, reasonably, that no one explanation provides either the answer or the key insight. That the men themselves, after being interviewed (more than 400 interviews were conducted), could not themselves explain their own behavior remains equally troubling and reveals quite starkly how little we continue to understand about the psychological totality and capacity of the human person to engage in horrific behaviors and to rationalize such activity.

Osako, Tatsuo

Tatsuo Osako was a civilian Japanese official stationed with the Japan Tourist Bureau during World War II who helped as many as 2,000 Jews escape Europe via the Soviet Union.

Born in Japan in 1917, Osako worked closely with Chiune Sugihara, who was the Japanese vice consul in Kovno, Lithuania. Both Osako and Sugihara have been compared to the German upstander Oskar Schindler, who saved more than 1,000 Jews during the war.

By 1941, months after the start of the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union and the Germans institution of the Holocaust there, Sugihara began arranging transit and residence visas for Jews wishing to flee Europe. They would eventually be taken to Japan, where they would be resettled. To assist Sugihara in this endeavor, Osako agreed to accompany the refugees by ship from Vladivostok to the Japanese port city of Tsuruga. Most Jews were transported to Vladivostok via the Trans-Siberian Railroad. From Vladivostok, Osako would accompany the Jews on the final leg of their journey, making sure that they were reasonably comfortable and had all of the necessary immigration papers. Between September 1940 and June 1941 Osako crossed the stormy Sea of Japan roughly every two weeks, bringing some 2,000 Jews to safety. Osako and Sugihara's mission was curtailed, however, when the United States entered the war later that year and became an ally of the Soviet Union.

Like many upstanders, Osako never mentioned his heroic deeds. His involvement in the rescue missions did not come to light until many years later, when a scrapbook he had kept was found. It contained records of the transports and many photographs of the passengers Osako had helped.

Tatsuo Osako died in 2003. Akira Kitade, a retired Japanese tourism executive who had worked for Osako for many years, says that Osako had never mentioned his World War II activities.

The Jews who resettled in Japan during 1940–1941 have stated that they were treated well by the Japanese. They were taught Japanese, given free medical care, and were fed by local farmers. The role Japan played in the Holocaust is not widely known, and only recently have the stories of Osako and Sugihara become widely distributed to the general public.

P

Paper Clips

An 82-minute documentary released by Miramax Films in 2004 that tells the simple but moving (and true) story of middle school students in a small, impoverished Tennessee town who set out to collect 6 million paper clips in order to illustrate the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust. The project began in 1998, when Whitwell Middle School sponsored a voluntary, after-school class on the Holocaust for eighth graders. The ultimate goal was to teach students about tolerance. When students learned that the Norwegians had worn paper clips on their lapels during World War II to protest the Nazi occupation of their country, the students decided to begin collecting 6 million paper clips, which would represent the number of people murdered in the Holocaust.

Whitwell, Tennessee, is a former coal-mining town with a population of just 1,600 people; it is nearly 98% white, and none of the students who began the project were Jewish. Nevertheless, they earnestly began their improbable quest, which was carried over into subsequent school years. Their project soon attracted the attention of journalists, and in 2001 the Washington Post ran a feature story about it. Before long, the Paper Clip project had come to involve virtually all of the town's residents and had attracted attention from around the world. Many politicians and celebrities sent in paper clips, including presidents George W. Bush and Bill Clinton, Steven Spielberg, Tom Hanks, and Tom Bosley. By 2004, the school had collected 24 million clips; by 2010, it had amassed some 30 million.

The movie features interviews with Whitwell teachers, students, parents, Holocaust survivors, and people who donated paper clips, including Bosley. Simple yet compelling, the documentary illustrates how a small, isolated community can come together to fight the ravages of bigotry and intolerance and make a difference on the world stage.

Papon, Maurice

French politician and the only Frenchman convicted of complicity in crimes against humanity committed in France during World War II. Born on September 3, 1910, in Gretz-Armainvilliers in the Seine-et-Marne Department, Maurice Papon was educated at the Lycée Montaigne in Paris and the Lycée Louis-le-Grand. In 1929 he entered the Faculté de Droit et de Lettres in Paris. While a student, he joined the radical socialist youth movement. In February 1931 Papon entered government service, working on the staff of Jacques-Louis Daumesnil, Prime Minister Pierre Laval's minister of air. He joined the staff of the undersecretary of state in June 1936 and worked on Moroccan and Tunisian affairs. Papon, also an officer in the French army at the outbreak of World War II, was discharged in October 1940, after the start of the German occupation.

Faced with the choice of joining the Free French under Charles de Gaulle or staying with the pro-Nazi, collaborationist Vichy government, Papon opted to work for the Vichy regime and began service in the Ministry of the Interior. In 1942 he was appointed general-secretary of the Gironde prefecture, of which Bordeaux is the capital; among other duties, he was placed in charge of Jewish affairs in the region. Despite his apparent collaboration, by late 1943 the Germans considered Papon pro-American, and in mid-1944 he began to provide information on German movements to the French Resistance. When Allied forces liberated Bordeaux in August 1944, Papon was given a position in the new government. For his work with the Resistance, Papon was awarded the Carte d'Ancien Combattant de la Résistance. After the war, he and his family moved to Paris.

In January 1947 Papon was named the prefect of Corsica, a position he held until 1949. He was then appointed prefect of the Constantine region in Algeria, and in 1954 was named secretary-general of the Protectorate of Morocco. He returned to Paris in March 1956, when he was appointed to a post in the Ministry of the Interior. In March 1956 Papon became the prefect of Paris police, a position he held until June 1966. In 1961, police under his command allegedly killed anywhere between 50 and 300 Algerians protesting a curfew in Paris.

Papon entered politics in 1968, when he was elected as a Gaullist to the National Assembly representing the Cher region; he was reelected in 1973 and 1978. In April 1978 President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing appointed him as budget minister. On May 6, 1981, however, details about his past activities under the Vichy regime emerged when a French newspaper published documents signed by Papon that demonstrated his responsibility in the deportation of 1,690 Bordeaux Jews to the Drancy internment camp between 1942 and 1944.

Papon was charged with crimes against humanity in 1983, but the charges were dropped in 1988. Seven years later, however, he was accused of the unusual charge of "complicity in crimes against humanity." Papon's trial began in October 1997, and in April 1998 he was found guilty and sentenced to ten years in prison. After fleeing to Switzerland during his appeal, Papon was arrested, returned to France, and jailed at the Fresnes prison in Paris. A French court freed him in September 2002 because of ill health. Papon died on February 17, 2007, in Pontault-Combault, France.

Paulavicius, Jonas

Jonas Paulavicius was a Lithuanian who rescued and hid 12 Jews and up to 4 Russian prisoners of war on his property outside Kovno (Kaunas) during World War II. In 1983, 33 years after his death, Israel's Yad Vashem honored him as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Paulavicius was born in Lithuania on June 7, 1897, into humble circumstances. After receiving a grade-school education, he married Antonina and worked principally as a carpenter. The couple eventually had two children, a son and a daughter. By 1940, when World War II came to Lithuania, he lived on the outskirts of Kovno on a small farm. In June 1940 the Soviets invaded and occupied Lithuania, which until that time has been a sovereign nation since the end of World War I. The Soviet invasion resulted in widespread persecution of Lithuania's Jewish population, as many Lithuanians wrongly blamed them for the invasion and occupation. Many Jews had their property confiscated, and a sizable number of them were exiled to Siberia. Others were beaten and even murdered. Paulavicius witnessed the growing persecution of Lithuanian Jews with mounting unease.

Upon the German invasion of Lithuania in June 1941, the situation for the Jews became far worse. On June 24, 1941, the Germans occupied Kovno, at that time Lithuania's largest city. About 25% of the city's population was Jewish. Almost immediately, the Nazis set in motion the systematic segregation of Lithuanian Jews; many were forced to live in a ghetto that had been established in Kovno's Jewish district, while others were murdered outright or deported to concentration and death camps. Before long, the Germans had turned the ghetto into a makeshift concentration camp, but in June and July 1944, as Soviet troops battled their way west into Lithuania, Nazi officials decided to liquidate what was left of the ghetto. Although most of the ghetto's Jews had already been deported or murdered, those who remained were sent to concentration camps in Estonia, Latvia, and Poland, where virtually all perished.

Determined to shelter as many Jews as he could, Paulavicius in the late summer of 1941 took a four-year-old Jewish boy into his home. Before long, he had agreed to take in the boy's parents as well. To keep them well hidden, Paulavicius and his son expanded an already-existing cellar into an underground shelter; meanwhile, several other Jews were hidden, as were several Russian soldiers.

Paulavicius designed the shelter to resemble a train's sleeping compartments, with bunk beds lining the walls to permit as much room as possible. He supplied his guests with food, water, and a radio. Every few days, he spirited them into his house at night to allow them to bathe. Paulavicius was fully aware that if he was caught, either by neighbors or the Germans, he would most certainly be arrested and probably executed. Realizing this danger, he sent his daughter to live in a room he rented some distance from his house.

Paulavicius conducted rescue missions as late as 1944, when he took in Miriam Krakinowsky, who was about to be deported from Kovno to certain death in a concentration camp. The Soviets finally liberated Kovno and the area surrounding it on August 1, 1944, and Paulavicius's rescue efforts came to an end. However, he suffered enormously in the immediate aftermath of the war. He lost his home to a devastating flood, and just two months later his only daughter died of tuberculosis. Antisemitism in Lithuania survived the war, and some of Paulavicius's neighbors disliked him because of his wartime activities. In 1950 an antisemitic Lithuanian murdered Jonas Paulavicius, and in 1983 his widow, Antonina, traveled to Israel to accept the Righteous among the Nations award in honor of her husband.

Pavelić, Ante

Nationalist leader of the puppet Croatian state created under the Nazis between 1941 and 1945. Born in Bradina, Bosnia-Herzegovina on July 14, 1889, Ante Pavelić was trained in law at the University of Zagreb. Elected to the Skupstina, the Yugoslav parliament, in 1920, he believed that violence and terrorism were legitimate means with which to achieve political ends. In the parliament, he represented the small nationalist Croatian Party of the Right. Following King Alexander's suspension of the constitution and a government crackdown on nationalist activities in 1929, Pavelić fled to Italy, where the following year he formed the Croatian Liberation Movement, known as the Ustashe.

With covert Italian support, Pavelić launched a terror campaign against the Yugoslavian state. In October 1934 Ustasha gunmen assassinated King Alexander and French foreign minister Louis Barthou at Marseille, for which a Yugoslav court sentenced Pavelić to death in absentia.

With the German invasion and defeat of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Pavelić and his supporters established the Independent State of Croatia with the backing of Italy, which occupied the country. Following the Italian surrender in 1943, Pavelić's Ustasha regime transferred its allegiance to Germany and remained a German client until the end of the war.

Pavelić, who proclaimed himself Poglavnik (leader), subjected Croatia to four years of abject terror. Bands of Ustasha militia roamed the countryside, expelling or executing scores of Jews, Serbs, Muslims, Roma, and other minorities in an attempt to create a purely Croatian state. Aping the Nazis, the Ustashe also established concentration camps in which tens of thousands of victims were exterminated. Ultimately, the lawlessness and violence of Pavelić's regime alienated it from the majority of Croats and swelled the ranks of the partisans. By early 1945 it is estimated that Pavelić's murderous policies had resulted in the deaths of some 30,000 Jews, 29,000 Roma, and between 300,000 and 600,000 Serbs. Moreover, such excesses also aroused grotesquely ironic protests from Pavelić's German overlords, who complained that Ustashe abuses were hindering the establishment of order necessary for the exploitation of Croatia's economic resources.

After the defeat of Germany in May 1945, Pavelić escaped to Rome, where he was shielded in the Vatican until 1948. He then went to Argentina, where he served as an adviser to Argentinean president Juan Perón. Pavelić was badly wounded in a 1957 assassination attempt by Yugoslavia's secret police, which compelled him to flee to fascist Spain. He died in Madrid, Spain, on December 28, 1959.

Pechersky, Alexander

Alexander “Sasha” Pechersky was a Jewish soldier in the army of the Soviet Union and the leader of the Sobibór revolt on October 14, 1943. It was the most successful uprising and mass escape of Jews from a Nazi death camp during the Holocaust.

The son of a lawyer, Pechersky was born on February 22, 1909, in Kremenchuk, Ukraine. In 1915 his family moved to Rostov-on-Don; after graduating from university with a diploma in music and literature, he managed a small school for amateur musicians.

On June 22, 1941, the day of the German invasion of the Soviet Union, Pechersky enlisted in the Red Army with the rank of lieutenant. In October 1941, during the Battle of Moscow, he was captured by the Nazis and became a prisoner of war. After a period of sickness, escape, recapture, transfer to different camps (during which the Nazis learned that he was Jewish), and incarceration in the Minsk ghetto, he was eventually sent to Sobibór on September 22, 1943, together with other Jewish soldiers and approximately 2,000 Minsk Jews. Almost everyone in the convoy was gassed on arrival; Pechersky and about 80 others were selected to live and work as slave labor.

The arrival of the Soviet soldiers at Sobibór was a huge morale boost for the prisoners already there. They had already devised a number of plans for escape or revolt but did not have the strategic expertise to be able to put any of them into practice. A military presence, it was hoped by many, could possibly change things for the better.

The prisoners at Sobibór realized that time was of the essence if they were not all to be wiped out and the camp liquidated. The biggest question was whether to engage the guards in battle or force a mass escape in the hope that at least some people would be able to survive and bear witness. Within five days of Pechersky and his men arriving at Sobibór, the Polish Jews, led by Leon Feldhendler, approached Pechersky about his ideas for an escape plan. Pechersky saw that the choice was clear; a mass escape should be mounted, with as many prisoners as possible getting away while SS officers and Ukrainian auxiliaries were killed. As a soldier, he also had a goal of his own—to join the partisans and continue fighting the Nazis.

He began by studying the camp carefully, learning its layout and routine. Once he saw how the place operated, his plan was to surreptitiously kill a maximum number of SS officers—rendering the auxiliaries leaderless—and then start the escape by rushing the fence and the main gate. The prisoners would have obtained weapons prior to eliminating the auxiliaries. The plan was timed to begin at 4:00 p.m. on October 14, 1943, but the revolt began a little ahead of time owing to one of the SS officers learning of the plan and starting to shoot Jews. Prior to this a number of other SS had already been dispatched individually in different locations around the camp.

With no time to lose, a general uprising now started on Pechersky’s command. There was a wild rush to the main gate and fences all around the perimeter, with prisoners breaking out and running through the surrounding minefields in a mad scramble to reach the woods outside. In the chaos, huge numbers of prisoner-escapees were shot down.

The uprising was to see a grisly accounting of death. Eleven SS officers and an unknown number of Ukrainian auxiliaries were killed; from an approximate number of 550 Jewish prisoners, 130 did not participate in the uprising; about 80 prisoners were killed during the escape; and another 170 were hunted down by the Nazis and killed in a bloody aftermath. Best estimates are that only about 53 of those who escaped from Sobibór survived the war.

It had only taken Pechersky 22 days from the time of his arrival at Sobibór to leading, with Feldhendler, what would be the biggest death camp revolt of World War II.

Having survived the breakout, Pechersky was joined in the forest by a group of about 50 prisoners, most of them soldiers who had arrived in camp with him. Over several days they split into smaller groups, with Pechersky and his men continually heading east in the hope of meeting with Soviet partisans. On the night of October 19, 1943, they crossed the Bug River, and after encountering other partisan units they eventually met a detachment from the famous Voroshilov regiment. From this point on, they became part of the formal resistance movement.

Alexander Pechersky’s tribulations were far from over, however. The Soviet attitude was that prisoners of war were cowards and traitors who deserved to be punished. Although fighting with the partisans, Pechersky was denounced and sent to a Soviet prison for several months, prior to being drafted into a punishment battalion and sent in the first wave of a series of near-suicidal attacks toward the end of the war. Not only did he survive but he was also promoted to captain and received a medal for bravery.

After the war, Pechersky returned to his hometown of Rostov-on-Don, but in 1948 he was arrested by the Soviet authorities during Stalin's campaign against Jews suspected of pro-Western leanings. He was only released after Stalin's death in 1953.

Regardless of his status as a free citizen or as a prisoner, however, he was forbidden by Stalin's government to testify at any of the postwar international trials related to the Holocaust, such as at Nuremberg, where the prosecution had hoped he would have appeared as a witness. In like manner, he was sought after as a witness to appear at the trial of Adolf Eichmann in 1961, but he was forbidden to travel to Israel. He did, however, appear as a witness during the Soviet trial in 1963 of 11 former Ukrainian guards at Sobibór. All were convicted, and 10 were executed.

In 1987 a movie was made about the Sobibór revolt featuring Dutch actor Rutger Hauer in the role of Alexander Pechersky and Alan Arkin as Leon Feldhendler. Escape from Sobibor (dir. Jack Gold) won or was nominated for several awards, with Hauer receiving the Golden Globe for Best Supporting Actor. Pechersky, however, was forbidden to leave the Soviet Union in order to attend the movie's premiere. Alexander Pechersky died just short of his 81st birthday on January 19, 1990, and was buried in Rostov-on-Don.

Perlasca, Giorgio

Giorgio Perlasca was an Italian rescuer of Jews during the Holocaust in Hungary, posing as the Spanish consul-general during the winter of 1944–1945 and saving 5,218 Jews from deportation and certain death. Perlasca was born in Como, Lombardy, in 1910 and raised in Maserà, Padua. Swayed by the ideals espoused by Italian poet and nationalist Gabriele D'Annunzio, Perlasca supported the fascist regime of Benito

Mussolini. He fought in the Italian army during the invasion of Abyssinia in 1935 and was a volunteer during the Spanish Civil War in 1936 on the side of Francisco Franco. After his return to Italy he deserted fascism, replacing his former belief with a more general patriotism and loyalty to his king, Victor Emmanuel III.

After World War II broke out Perlasca became a procurement officer and was sent as an emissary to Eastern Europe with the task of purchasing meat for the Italian army. In the fall of 1943 he was appointed an official of the Italian trade commission in Budapest, Hungary. Wider developments in the war then took over. On September 8, 1943, Italy surrendered to the Allies, and on October 13, 1944, he was interned by the Hungarian government—an Axis ally—as a diplomatic detainee. Eventually, on medical grounds, he was granted parole, and sought asylum in the Spanish embassy. He changed his name from Giorgio to the Spanish Jorge, and owing to his earlier service during the Spanish Civil War was granted the rights of a Spanish citizen.

Seeking work through the embassy, he spoke with the Spanish chargé d'affaires, Ángel Sanz Briz, who had been issuing protective passes to Budapest Jews since the spring of 1944. Sanz Briz gave Perlasca responsibility for safe houses sheltering Jews under Spanish protection.

Toward the end of 1944 Sanz Briz was ordered to leave Hungary because of Spain's refusal to recognize the new pro-Nazi government of Ferenc Szálasi. On November 30, 1944, Perlasca learned that Sanz Briz had gone to Switzerland and that he had been invited to accompany him on a diplomatic passport. Perlasca chose to remain in Hungary, however, and informed the Hungarian authorities that the embassy had not closed and he had been appointed charge d'affaires. He did not possess any official documentation to that effect but managed to convince the Hungarian minister of the interior that Sanz Briz would return shortly from a period of leave and had appointed him his temporary successor. Haste was needed; the Hungarians, believing that official Spain had left, saw this as an opportunity to take over the Spanish embassy and the safe houses where Jews were hiding under Spanish protection.

Over the next few months, Perlasca worked actively to hide, feed, and transport thousands of Budapest Jews. He obtained medicine and food on the black market and developed a system of safe conduct passes using a Spanish law dating from 1924 allowing Spanish-born Jews full citizenship and protection. This was then extended to all Jews of Sephardic origin, including those who were the descendants of Spanish and Portuguese Jews expelled from Spain in 1492 and 1497.

Giorgio Perlasca saved more than 5,200 Hungarian Jews from certain death. An Italian posing as charge d'affaires of the Spanish embassy, Perlasca, working with Raoul Wallenberg of Sweden, managed to hide, feed, and transport thousands of Budapest Jews to safety. He was recognized in 1988 by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations, and here he is seen as the first recipient of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council's Medal of Remembrance in 1990. (Cynthia Johnson/The LIFE Images Collection/Getty Images)

Across the winter of 1944–1945, Perlasca worked to save the lives of Hungarian Jews alongside Sweden's Raoul Wallenberg, apostolic nuncio Angelo Rotta, and the Swiss Red Cross delegate Friedrich Born. It has been calculated that Perlasca had been responsible for saving the lives of more than 5,200 Jews by the time the Soviet army accepted the surrender of Budapest in February 1945.

After the war, Perlasca returned to his family in Padua and lived a quiet life. For 30 years he did not speak about his actions while in Hungary; not even his family knew of his exploits. In 1987, however, a group of Hungarian Jewish survivors who had been trying to trace his whereabouts for several years finally found him and began telling the world of his heroic deeds during the dark years.

Following this, Perlasca became well known around the world. In 1991 an Italian journalist, Enrico Deaglio, wrote a bestselling biography, La banalità del bene: Storia di Giorgio Perlasca (1991), which was later published in English as The Banality of Goodness. This, in turn, was used as the basis of a movie, Perlasca—Un eroe Italiano (2005, dir. Alberto Negrin), starring Luca Zingaretti in the title role.

Giorgio Perlasca received many honors for his heroic acts of resistance during World War II. Among his decorations were Israel's Medal of the Knesset (1989), Hungary's Star of Merit (1989), the Town Seal of Padova (1989), the United States Medal of the Holocaust Museum (1990), Italy's Grande Ufficiale della Repubblica (1990), Spain's Orden de Isabel la Católica (1991), and Italy's Gold Medal for Civil Bravery (1992). In 2011 a 10,000-tree forest was planted in his honor in Israel's Galilee, following his recognition as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem on September 6, 1988.

Giorgio Perlasca was a man who continually risked his life to save others. He had the option to leave the danger zone in exchange for his personal safety, yet he chose to remain in order to provide aid to the Jews for whose lives he had assumed responsibility. He died at home of a heart attack on August 15, 1992, and was buried in his hometown of Maserà, outside Padua. He expressed the wish that the words “Righteous among the Nations” be written in Hebrew on his tombstone.

Peshev, Dimitar

Dimitar Peshev was a leading Bulgarian politician in the 1930s and 1940s, and a major actor in resisting the pro-Nazi government of Premier Bogdan Filov. Through this opposition he prevented the deportation of Bulgaria’s 48,000 Jews to the death camps of Nazi Germany.

Born in 1894 to an affluent family in Kjustendil, a town in far western Bulgaria, he studied languages in Salonika and law in Sofia and became a magistrate after having fought in World War I and completing his law degree. In 1935 he was appointed minister for justice and was elected deputy speaker of the Sobranie (Parliament) in 1938.

Like many other Bulgarian political figures, Peshev favored Bulgaria’s alliance with Nazi Germany, signed by Czar Boris III and Adolf Hitler in 1940. This worked well for Bulgaria; after the German conquest of Yugoslavia in April 1941 and the country’s partition, Bulgaria expanded at Yugoslavia’s expense. Given that he thought the alliance would bring prosperity to Bulgaria and its people, Peshev was blind to the real goals of the Nazi government.

One of the costs of the alliance was that Bulgaria would develop antisemitic laws in line with those of the Nazis. On January 23, 1941, Peshev’s party enacted the Law for the Protection of the Nation, restricting Jewish participation in the country’s economic and social life. The law ordered controls such as Jews being compelled to change their names, new rules regarding Jewish places of residence, confiscation of Jewish possessions, exclusion from the public service, and a prohibition on economic and professional activity. Other measures included a prohibition on marriages between Jews and Bulgarians, special taxes, requirements that all Jews wear a star, and that male Jews be drafted for forced labor. Peshev supported this new law, seeing it as only a temporary expedient that would soon pass and could be controlled. Of interest was that most Bulgarians actually opposed the law, though in view of the authoritarian nature of the government this did not alter the new realities.

In the spring of 1943 the Bulgarian government signed a new law whereby all of Bulgaria’s 48,000 Jews would be deported through Kyustendil on March 10, 1943, and sent to Nazi death camps in Poland. Jews in the Bulgarian-occupied territories of Thrace and Macedonia would also be rounded up and deported. When the Jews of Kyustendil learned of their imminent deportation, they attempted to have the order overturned through the intercession of one they knew as a friend: Dimitar Peshev.

On March 8, 1943, a local delegation, including a personal friend of Peshev’s, Jakob Baruch, spoke with him about the government’s deportation plan. Peshev had not previously known of this, but upon confirmation decided that the deportations had to be stopped. He traveled to Kyustendil and met with the assistant chief of police, who described to him how the deportations were to take place. Peshev felt that acquiescence to the Nazi demands was no longer an option. He saw all too clearly the consequences of the alliance with Hitler and decided that it was his responsibility to act.

Next, he and his close friend and colleague (also from Kyustendil), Petar Mihalev, went to Parliament and burst into the office of Interior Minister Petar Gabrovski, insisting that he cancel the deportations and explaining the gravity of the situation. After a fierce argument, Gabrovski called the governor of Kyustendil and instructed him to stop preparations for the Jewish deportations. By 5:30 p.m. on March 9—just one day after Peshev had learned about the planned action against the Jews—the deportation had been cancelled.

Despite the minister’s assurance, however, Peshev needed further guarantees, especially after he learned that the Jews in the occupied territories of Thrace and Macedonia were already being deported. Most of the Jews of Thrace were deported to Treblinka (with some going to Auschwitz), while almost all the Jews of Macedonia were deported to Auschwitz, the last transport leaving on March 29, 1943.

Peshev decided to bring the matter to the Sobranie. On March 17, 1943, he wrote a letter of protest and had 42 parliamentarians sign it. Disregarding Prime Minister Filov's instruction not to subject the letter to a vote in the House, it was discussed in caucus on March 23, 1943. So as not to have his authority undermined, Filov demanded that each of the signatories stand and announce their support of Peshev's letter. Under this pressure, only 30 of the original 42 confirmed their support, and when a final vote was taken the party decided to censure Peshev. The next day he was forced to step down as deputy speaker.

After Bulgaria was knocked out of the war by the Soviet invasion of September 1944, Peshev was arrested as a member of the former Bulgarian collaborationist government, charged with antisemitism and collaboration. He was facing the death penalty, but members of the Jewish community from Kyustendil, led by Joseph Nissim Yasharoff, testified on his behalf. He was sentenced to 15 years in prison at forced labor, with all his property turned over to the state. After a year and a half, however, he was released once the court reviewed his case and confirmed his key role in saving Bulgaria's Jews. Upon his release, he was forced to live in isolation, without a job or a means for sustenance. His deeds during the war went unrecognized.

In January 1973, however, Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations for his role in saving the Jews of Bulgaria. A few weeks later, on February 20, 1973, he died—a Holocaust resister recognized by his home country only after his death.

Pétain, Philippe

Between 1940 and 1944, Henri-Philippe Pétain headed the Vichy regime, a government established in France in the wake of a crushing military defeat by Nazi Germany. As France suffered under German occupation, Pétain and his government promoted collaboration with the nation's former enemies. As a result, France contributed enormously to the German war machine and deported nearly 80,000 Jews to the Nazi death camps.

Pétain was born on April 24, 1856, in Cauchy à la Tour, near Bruay-en-Artois, to a family of well-to-do peasants. Educated by Jesuits at Saint-Omer and by Dominicans at Arcueil, as a young man he entered the prestigious military academy at Saint Cyr. In 1878 he graduated as a junior officer, ranked 229th out of the 336 in his class. Ten years later, he underwent two more years of officer training at the elite École de Guerre, and after some additional military postings he returned to this institution as an instructor in 1901, teaching infantry tactics. It was there that he first gained a reputation for championing defensive strategy over offensive. His views were frowned upon by the military establishment, which denied him the promotion to brigadier general that he felt he deserved.

Once World War I broke out in August 1914, Pétain rose swiftly to that rank and beyond, as his expertise in defensive

As the head of the French Vichy government, Philippe Pétain's name is virtually synonymous with French collaboration with the German government during World War II. tactics proved useful in the age of trench warfare and the machine gun. In June 1915 he was given command of the Second Army. The following year, as the German offensive at the Battle of Verdun gained momentum, the French high command called on Pétain to take control of French forces in the region. His leadership at Verdun won him the enduring affection of the French people, in that he seemed to care more about the welfare and survival of the rank and file soldier than other French generals. (For the rest of his life, Pétain bore the nickname “the Victor of Verdun.”) His efforts were rewarded on May 15, 1917, when he was made the chief general of all of France’s armies. In that position, he reinforced his compassionate, fatherly reputation through his handling of a mutiny and his careful attention to the provisioning of French troops. On November 19, 1918, a week after the armistice that ended World War I, Pétain was appointed marshal, a title bestowed upon only two other World War I French generals.

Just over a year later, in January 1920, Pétain was made vice president of France’s War Council, which meant that he would be supreme commander in the event of another war. The following year, he was also named the army’s inspector general. By virtue of these positions, Pétain exercised enormous influence on French military planning. In 1927, at his urging, France began construction of the Maginot Line, a series of fortresses along much of the eastern border, which committed France to a defensive posture vis-à-vis Germany. Pétain retired from the War Council in 1931 at the age of 75. By that time, the other two marshals of France had died, rendering Pétain the most prominent living symbol of French valor.

In 1934, in the wake of rioting by right wingers, Pétain served briefly as minister of war in a government of national unity, his first foray into politics. In this position, Pétain spoke often of the need for moral reform. Although his tenure in office was brief, he emerged as a favorite of the radical Right. His heroic and moralistic image made him seem the ideal man to restore order to French society, which many across the political spectrum had come to see as decadent. For most of the remainder of the 1930s, Pétain was content to receive the accolades of the Right without taking part in the politics of the French Third Republic. Then, in 1939, he accepted the post of ambassador to Francisco Franco’s government in Spain, which had recently consolidated its civil war victory over Spanish republicans.

Although World War II broke out in September 1939, it was not until May 1940 that Adolf Hitler began his onslaught against France. Bypassing the fortresses of the Maginot Line, the German forces employed a highly mobile strategy combining tanks and air power, dubbed by the Germans Blitzkrieg, or “Lightning War.” French defenses proved wholly inadequate and disaster loomed. French prime minister Paul Reynaud made the 81-year-old Pétain vice premier, hoping to bolster French confidence by capitalizing on the marshal’s heroic image. After the fall of Paris, Pétain replaced Reynaud as the head of the French government on June 16 and immediately began to negotiate with the Germans for peace. An armistice was signed on June 22. By its terms, German forces would occupy the northern three-fifths of the country. The remainder of France, known as the “Free Zone,” was left unoccupied until 1942, when Allied landings in North Africa prompted the Germans to renege on this clause of the agreement and occupy the entire country.

The French government, having fled from Paris, reassembled in Vichy, a spa town in the Free Zone. There, on July 9 and 10, the French Parliament voted overwhelmingly to settle all authority on Pétain, who quickly abolished the Third Republic. In its place, he created an authoritarian regime, rewriting the French slogan of “Liberty, Equality, Fraternity” as “Family, Fatherland, Work.” Declaring itself the champion of traditional French values, Vichy launched what it called the National Revolution. The regime purged Jews from French public life, brought labor to heel, reorganized the French economy in ways favorable to big business, and created various organizations devoted to indoctrination. In addition, it propagated a cult of hero worship centered on Pétain. For the first two years or so of the occupation, Pétain’s fatherly persona served as a refuge from the shame of defeat for the vast majority of French men and women.

Pétain’s announced policy of collaboration with Germany (symbolized by a meeting between himself and Hitler at Montoire in October 1940) held out the promise of more favorable treatment by the occupiers and a place at Germany’s side in the new European order Germany hoped to create. A few individuals recognized the moral and material cost of such a policy early on and began to resist in various ways in a scattered movement that became known as the French Resistance. However, most people were content to trust in Pétain and wait to see what happened.

After the war, Pétain and his defenders would claim that Vichy had acted as a shield against the Germans, protecting the French people from the worst of which the Nazis were capable. In fact, France suffered more than most other occupied countries in Western Europe, despite its government’s eager collaboration. For example, the French endured the lowest per capita calorie intake of all West European peoples, largely because the Vichy regime was so efficient at confiscating French agricultural production for shipment to Germany. Likewise, Pétain's assertions of having played a double game against the Germans—by supposedly secretly aiding the Allied cause while only appearing to cooperate with Germany—falls flat when one considers the vast amount of French industrial output that went to the German war effort. Finally, Pétain's claim to have preserved French sovereignty also falls short, for it often amounted to Vichy officials doing the Nazis' dirty work for them. For example, even before the Free Zone was occupied in 1942, Vichy police rounded up Jews who had fled there and handed them over to the Germans, all in the name of preserving French sovereignty.

By the time the Allies landed at Normandy in the D-Day operation of June 1944, Pétain was 88 years old and at the head of a regime that had lost all claims to independence of action. As the liberating armies advanced, the Germans seized Pétain on August 20, eventually bringing him to the stronghold of Sigmaringen in Germany. Hitler did not allow him to leave until April 1945, when Pétain returned to France via Switzerland. Placed under arrest as soon as he was detected, Pétain was tried by France's High Court of Justice in July and August 1945. The court convicted the marshal of treason and condemned him to death, but the government commuted this sentence to life imprisonment in view of his age. Pétain died six years later, on July 23, 1951, at the Île d'Yeu Prison.

The Pianist

The Pianist is a major motion picture from 2002, starring Adrien Brody and directed by Polish/French filmmaker Roman Polanski. It is the true story of a Polish Jewish pianist of renown, Wladyslaw Szpilman, and his quest for survival during the Holocaust. The film, in turn, was based on Szpilman's memoir of the same name, published in English in 1999, and was adapted for the screen by Ronald Harwood.

Much of the film concern's Szpilman's life in the Warsaw Ghetto and afterward, and in this it is reminiscent of other "ghetto" movies such as Schindler's List (Steven Spielberg, 1994), about the Kraków Ghetto, and Uprising (Jon Avnet, 2001) for Warsaw. What makes The Pianist unique within the genre, however, is the degree to which Polanski has sought to recreate the physical environment of the Warsaw Ghetto as accurately as possible. In order to achieve this, filming took place at a number of sites in central and Eastern Europe, with many scenes filmed in and around Warsaw itself. The Pianist was a remarkable success both critically and commercially. It won three Academy Awards, for Best Actor (Brody), Best Director (Polanski), and Best Screenplay Adaptation (Harwood); two BAFTA (British Academy of Film and Television) Awards (UK), for Best Film and Best Director; the Palm d'Or at Cannes; and a raft of other awards and nominations around the world. Produced with an estimated budget of US$35 million, The Pianist brought the Holocaust to the screen for a new generation of moviegoers in the twenty-first century.

Pilecki, Witold

Witold Pilecki was a Polish cavalry officer who infiltrated Auschwitz as a volunteer in order to start a military underground movement there. He was born on May 31, 1901, in the Karelian town of Olonets, close to the border with Finland. A subject people under the Russian Empire, the Poles rebelled in 1863–1864, with the result that after the uprising's suppression Pilecki's grandfather, Józef Pilecki, was exiled to Siberia. The family was then subject to internal exile and forcible resettlement, resulting in their making their home in Olonets. In 1910 they moved to Vilna (Vilnius), and in 1916 the teenage Witold Pilecki relocated to Orel, southwest of Moscow. After Poland's independence from Russia in 1919, Pilecki joined the Polish army and fought in the Polish-Soviet War of 1919–1920. He remained in the army, becoming a junior cavalry officer in 1926. On April 7, 1931, he married Maria Pilecka, née Ostrowska, with whom he had two children, Andrzej and Zofia.

With the invasion of Poland by Nazi Germany on September 1, 1939, Pilecki's unit was heavily engaged until being forced to withdraw to the south. It disbanded after the Soviet Union invaded on September 17, and Poland surrendered.

On November 9, 1939, Pilecki, together with Jan Henryk Włodarkiewicz and Władysław Surmacki, founded one of the first Polish underground movements, the Tajna Armia Polska (Secret Polish Army, or TAP), which, by 1940, comprised some 8,000 men. In 1942 it was incorporated into the Armia Krajowa (Home Army, or AK).

In mid-1940 Pilecki sought operational permission to infiltrate the newly constructed concentration camp at Auschwitz after it had been established for Polish political prisoners. In a report written after the war, Pilecki stated the aims of the movement he intended to create: keeping up fellow prisoners' spirits by supplying and spreading news from outside; organizing extra food and dividing clothing among TAP members; sending reports outside; and, above all, preparing for a takeover in the event of an assault on the camp from outside. Receiving permission to proceed, he was given forged papers and a new identity as "Tomasz Serafiński," let himself be taken prisoner in a Warsaw roundup, and arrived in Auschwitz on September 22, 1940.

To create his organization, Pilecki reasoned that only a system based on the strictest secrecy could have any hope of success. He decided to base the movement in two main areas, the revier (infirmary) and the Arbeitseinsatz (office responsible for labor distribution), as he saw these as the most likely places to start a program of camp welfare. He named his secret network the Związek Organizacji Wojskowej (Union of Military Organization, or ZOW).

At the same time Pilecki was establishing his resistance movement, another was being formed by Stanisław Dubois under the direction of the Polish Socialist Party. Within a short time, a third group was formed by right-wing Polish nationalist elements. It was not until December 1941 that the three groups came together as some sort of federated movement, but by that stage it was no longer representative of all sections of the camp. Until the middle of 1941 the camp had only housed Poles; by the end of the year, however, other national groups had appeared and these, too, had organized their own resistance movements. After considerable difficulties, Pilecki's organization managed to unify with the most important of these, the Czechs, Russians, and later the Austrians under the leadership of a communist, Hermann Langbein.

The ZOW soon became the major resistance movement at Auschwitz. Some smaller national groups still persisted, and inmates occasionally held dual membership within their own group as well as the ZOW. This enabled a small group of communists and socialists led by the Austrian Langbein and a Pole, Józef Cyrankiewicz, to break with the ZOW and form a new movement, Kampfgruppe Auschwitz (Auschwitz Combat Section), on May 1, 1943. One element of the internal politics this generated was to play out several years later and contribute to Pilecki's death.

ZOW provided the Polish underground with invaluable information about the camp, and from October 1940 it smuggled reports to Warsaw. As early as March 1941, via the Polish authorities in London, Pilecki's reports were informing the British government of the atrocities taking place in Auschwitz, and these reports intensified as gassings of Jews increased. In 1942 the ZOW was broadcasting from a secret radio station and providing up-to-the-minute details as to the number of transports, arrivals, and deaths in the camp. These reports were, for a time, the main source of Allied intelligence about Auschwitz, and Pilecki hoped that action would be taken to attack the camp and bring its operations to an end.

In 1943, after nearly two-and-a-half years at Auschwitz, he made the decision to escape so he could testify in person on the situation and force the AK to mount an assault on the camp. On the night of April 26–27, 1943, he and two comrades overpowered a guard and broke out.

Making his way to Warsaw, he reached AK headquarters but was unable to convince anyone to mount the hoped-for attack. He did, however, compose a detailed report more than 100 pages long, which was transmitted to London; it was the first sustained intelligence report on the Auschwitz concentration camp. Through this, Pilecki confirmed for the Allies the Holocaust that was then taking place. "Witold's Report," as it came to be known, was the first insider documentation confirming the Holocaust.

After this, Pilecki resumed his role as an officer with the AK, staying loyal to the London-based Polish government-in-exile. On August 1, 1944, the Warsaw Uprising broke out, and he fought as a private until assuming a command role later in the revolt. When it was defeated he went into captivity as a prisoner of war. He returned to Poland in October 1945 to engage in undercover work for the Polish government-in-exile, but on May 8, 1947, was arrested as part of a prosecution of Home Army members who still gave their allegiance to the government-in-exile. Among those presenting evidence for the state was Józef Cyrankiewicz, who was in Auschwitz at the same time as Pilecki as a member of the leftist Kampfgruppe Auschwitz. On March 3, 1948, a show trial took place, and Pilecki was convicted of a variety of crimes against the newly installed communist government. On May 15, 1948, he was sentenced to death, with the sentence carried out on May 25.

After the end of communism in Poland, Witold Pilecki was rehabilitated on October 1, 1990. In 1995 he was posthumously decorated by the Polish government with the Order of Polonia Restituta and in 2006 received the highest Polish decoration, the Order of the White Eagle.

Pius XI

The Roman Catholic pope, reigning between 1922 and 1939, Pope Pius XI was born Ambrogio Damiano Achille Ratti on May 31, 1857, in Desio, Italy. He was ordained a priest in 1879, thereafter earning three separate doctorates from the Gregorian University of Rome. He then became a professor in a seminary. He began his Vatican career in 1911, when he became its vice prefect. In 1918 Ratti began his diplomatic career when he was posted to the newly independent Poland. There he helped establish a working relationship with the Polish government and also sought an accommodation with the Bolsheviks in Russia. After Pope Benedict XV died, Ratti was elected to the papacy on the 14th ballot on February 6, 1922, and took the name Pius XI.

Scholarly and bookish by nature, Pius XI was an activist pope who in many ways embraced modernity and did not shy away from using new media like the radio to broadcast the church's message and teachings to a wide audience. He also greatly accelerated evangelism by sponsoring more missionaries throughout the world and by ordaining more priests and other religious personnel.

It was in the diplomatic realm, however, that Pius's reign had the most far-reaching effect. Although he deeply distrusted Italian fascism and eyed Benito Mussolini warily, in 1929 he signed the Lateran Treaty with Mussolini's government. This saw an understanding created between the church and state in which both parties pledged not to interfere in the affairs of the other; Mussolini also agreed to recognize Vatican City as a sovereign state within Italy, something that had not existed since the days before Italian unification.

Pius soon ran afoul of Mussolini's regime. By the early 1930s he had denounced fascist youth groups in Italy. In 1931 he authored a papal letter in which he stated that one could not be a fascist and a Catholic at the same time. Not surprisingly, the Vatican's relations with Mussolini's regime went into a tailspin. This did not stop Pius from negotiating a second concordat, this time with Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime in Germany in 1933. Pius was later criticized for this, but to his way of thinking, communism was a worse scourge than fascism or Nazism. Thus, he sought to protect Catholics and Catholic clergy in Germany while hoping that Hitler would continue to be a bulwark against Soviet-exported communism. In any event, Hitler largely ignored the concordat, and by the late 1930s Pius had begun to denounce Nazi ideology—especially its rabid antisemitism. He also lambasted Mussolini for copying the Nazis' antisemitism with new racial legislation beginning in 1938.

Pius XI continued to be outspoken in his dislike of fascism, communism, and Nazism. He was also the first pope to address seriously the subject of Christian ecumenism and issued a stinging indictment of racism of all kinds, which was clearly aimed at Germany and the Soviet Union. Pius died in the Vatican on February 10, 1939, only months before World War II began.

Pius XII

Pius XII was pope from 1939 to 1958. Long considered a strong pope because of his anticommunist preachings and devotion to piety, he has in recent years come under criticism for not speaking out against Adolf Hitler, Nazism, and the Holocaust.

Pius was born Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli on March 2, 1876, in Rome, Italy. His father was a lawyer in the service of the Catholic Church. Pius emulated his father's career, studying at the Gregorian University, Capranica College, and Saint Apollinaire Institute. He was ordained a priest in 1899 and began his career with the papacy in 1901. From 1904 to 1916 he served as the assistant to Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, who was delegated by the pope to codify canon law. Pius also taught international law at the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics.

In April 1917 Pope Benedict XV appointed Pius as nuncio to the Bavarian capital, Munich. Benedict sent Pius as his envoy with a proposed peace plan to end World War I, but even though Pius had a meeting with Kaiser Wilhelm II, no agreement was reached. In 1920 Pius was appointed papal nuncio to the Weimar Republic. During his sojourn in Germany, he reached concordats with Bavaria in 1924 and Prussia in 1929.

Pius returned to Rome in 1930 and was appointed a cardinal by Pope Pius XI. In February 1930 he became the Vatican's secretary of state, and it was he who negotiated concordats with Austria and Nazi Germany in 1933. As secretary of state Pius traveled widely, visiting Argentina, France, Hungary, and the United States. After Pope Pius XI died on February 10, 1939, he was elected pope on March 2 after a one-day conclave. He was crowned on March 12, 1933, as Pius XII.

The world was then drifting faster and faster toward another world war, and Pius tried hard to prevent the outbreak of fighting. He appealed for diplomacy to avert war and urged that an international convention be called to discuss a peaceful end to differences between nations. He also tried to stop Benito Mussolini from involving Italy in the conflict but failed to do so. When war came, Pius indicated that he would take an impartial stand, not a neutral one. He worked hard to ensure that Rome remained an open city to avert the danger of Allied air raids. Although soft in his open criticism of Hitler and Mussolini, Pius also opposed the Allied demand for an unconditional surrender of the Axis Powers, espoused at the 1943 Casablanca Conference.

Recent historians have severely criticized Pius for his alleged failure to speak out against Hitler and the Nazi Party's genocidal policy against Jews. They cite Pius's general statements opposing Hitler's policies but fault the pope for not being more explicit in his words. Some have painted Pius as anti-Jewish in outlook to explain his official silence when the Nazis deported most of Rome's Jewish citizens to concentration camps. Those sympathetic to Pius have defended his actions by pointing out that the Vatican could have been occupied by German troops at any time, and he thus had to tread a fine line to avoid tragedy.

Pius's postwar years were very productive. He believed that communism was a distinct threat to the world and that social reform must seek to preserve individual dignity, freedom, and value. He emphasized the importance of the family and said the state must subordinate its interests to those of the individual. In order to help fight communism, Pius declared 1950 to be a holy year, which meant Catholics were encouraged to make a pilgrimage to Rome. Indeed, millions ventured to the city that year.

Pius also laid the groundwork for what became Vatican II. He instructed Catholic biblical scholars to take full advantage of all modern tools of critical, scientific scholarship and called for greater participation by the laity in worship services. He reformed the liturgy, relaxed the Eucharistic fast, and introduced evening masses (which had begun during World War II). But Pius also condemned the "new theology," stating that once he had spoken on a church matter, it was no longer open for discussion. He was the first pope to use radio to make addresses and was perhaps the world's best-known pope by the time of his death.

Pius condemned the notion of collective guilt in 1944 and 1946 that many were then applying to Germany. After the war, he reached concordats with Portugal in 1950 and Spain in 1955. He canonized 33 people, including Pope Pius X. Pius's other actions included the creation of more cardinals, a large number of new dioceses, and the supervision of excavations under St. Peter's Basilica in an attempt to locate St. Peter's actual burial place.

Pius died on October 9, 1958, and was buried in St. Peter's.

Pivnik, Sam

Sam Pivnik was a Holocaust survivor whose harrowing experiences were published in a well-received book in 2012.

He was born Szmuel Piwnik in Będzin, Poland, on September 1, 1926. In early 1943 he and his family were forced into the Jewish ghetto at Będzin, and on October 6 they were deported to the Auschwitz death camp, where his mother, father, three brothers, and two sisters were murdered soon after their arrival.

Pivnik, probably owing to his age and good health, was spared the gas chambers and put to work processing newly arriving Jewish prisoners. This work meant that he had ready access to valuables and food they brought with them. He used these goods to help feed himself and to bribe Kapos, prisoners who worked in an administrative capacity, as well as prison guards.

In late December 1943, Pivnik fell ill with typhus and was eventually admitted to the camp hospital. At any time, the Germans could have simply condemned him to the gas chambers, and yet he survived and was sent to Fürstengrube, a subcamp of Auschwitz. There he was put to work in a coal mine and used his position as an overseer to help fellow Jews and to bribe camp guards.

Pivnik remained on this detail until January 19, 1945, when the Nazis evacuated the facility as the Soviet army approached from the west. He survived a brutal forced march in frigid weather and was then herded onto a train with other prisoners. Many prisoners had died prior to reaching the railhead. Pivnik spent nine days in an unheated boxcar on starvation rations before reaching Dora-Mittelbau, a forced labor camp in central Germany. He was on a work detail there for approximately three months before he and his fellow prisoners were evacuated by barge on the Elbe River to Holstein, located in northern Germany. There, Pivnik was put to work on a farm.

In late April or early May of 1945 Pivnik was once again relocated. Force marched to the post at Neustadt, he and his fellow prisoners were herded onto an old German cruiser that was doubling as a prison ship. On May 3, 1945, planes from the British Royal Air Force bombed the ship, setting it ablaze. Pivnik, who had been fortunate enough to still be on the top deck, dove into the water and swam to safety. Of the several thousand prisoners on the ship, only a few hundred survived. The following day, British ground forces found Pivnik and he was liberated; after the war he went to London to live, where he became an art dealer.

Pivnik published Survivor: Auschwitz, the Death March, and My Fight for Freedom in 2012. In it, he tells the gripping tale of survival amid unspeakable horror, depravation, and sadness at the loss of his family. The book is uplifting in that it demonstrates how the human spirit can overcome high odds and survive, somehow still intact. Pivnik also continues to give lectures on his Holocaust experiences.

Ploetz, Alfred

German physician who pioneered the concept of eugenics and racial hygiene; his work had a significant impact on Nazi ideology and policies. Alfred Ploetz was born on August 22, 1860, in Swinemünde, Germany (now Świnoujście, Poland), and was raised in Breslau. His university studies commenced in political economy, and he soon became part of a small clique of like-minded students who advocated socialist policies. However, laws aimed at punishing socialists eventually led him to pursue his studies in Zurich, Switzerland. After a brief visit to the United States, Ploetz returned to Zurich, where he began to study medicine. After receiving a medical degree in 1890, he lived for several years in the United States, returning to Germany where he began to lay out his theories on eugenics and racial hygiene.

He first coined the term “racial hygiene” in 1895, and in 1905 he cofounded the German Association of Eugenics. His 1895 book, The Efficiency of Our Race and the Protection of the Weak, detailed specific policies that would result in a eugenically ideal society. They included strict restrictions on intermarriage and, depending on the group of people, prohibitions on reproduction, including forced sterilization. Disabled infants as well as the sick and weak were to be aborted or euthanized. Although Ploetz clearly believed that the “Nordic” race (to which racially pure Germans allegedly belonged) was superior to all others, early on he did not demonstrate antisemitism; in fact, he believed that Jews were the second-ranked “cultural race” of Europeans, right below the Nordic peoples. He claimed that their innate intelligence and important contributions to the arts, letters, and music made them an important addition to the European racial hierarchy.

In his later work, however, Ploetz reversed his view of Jews, arguing that they would soil the Nordic race because they were too individualistic in outlook and not sufficiently geared toward the martial arts or patriotism. This later view played right into the hands of nascent Nazi leaders. Ploetz enthusiastically embraced Adolf Hitler and the advent of Nazism in Germany during the 1930s, becoming a member of the Nazi Party in 1937. In 1933 he was appointed to a government advisory board on population and racial policies that greatly influenced Nazi race laws and policies toward minorities and non-Germans. To show his appreciation, Hitler named Ploetz to a prestigious professorship in 1936.

Alfred Ploetz died on March 20, 1940, in Hersching, Bavaria, Germany.

Pohl, Oswald

Born in Duisburg-Ruhrort, Germany, on June 30, 1892, Oswald Pohl became one of the most powerful men in the Nazi SS and supervised its economic component as well as the administration of the Nazi concentration camp system. In 1912 Pohl enlisted in the German Imperial Navy and served throughout World War I, rising to the position of paymaster. Following the end of the war, he became active with the Friekorps movement, drawing on his naval training as paymaster. In 1925 he joined the SA and a year later the Nazi Party.

By 1934 Pohl had come to the attention of Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler. Himmler tasked Pohl with overseeing the administration of the Allgemeine-SS, the largest branch of the SS overall. Pohl quickly expanded his influence to include the administrative and financial control of the Totenkopfverbände (SS Death Head's units), the Verfügungstruppe (later renamed the Waffen-SS), and the Budget and Building Department of the Reichsführer-SS, which oversaw the construction of concentration camps. By 1939 Pohl's authority had expanded to the administration of the concentration camp system. In 1942 his power was consolidated into the Wirtschafts-und Verwaltungshauptamt (SS Economic and Administrative Department, or WVHA).

As leader of the WVHA, Pohl had emerged as the third most powerful man in the SS, superseded only by Heinrich Himmler and Reinhard Heydrich. The WVHA oversaw the administration and supplying of the entire Waffen-SS, exercised control over 20 concentration and labor camps, controlled all SS and police building projects, and managed all SS business concerns.

Overseeing the concentration and labor camps provided Pohl with some 600,000 slave laborers. Originally organizing the camps to punish and exterminate the enemies of the Nazi regime, he now reorganized them to exploit their victims' labor. Not exclusive to the SS, Pohl rented out his slave workforce to meet the labor needs of private industries. By 1944, 250,000 laborers were working in the private armament industries, and many industries were allowed to open factories within or adjacent to the camps. As labor needs grew, Pohl and the WVHA also appropriated the labor of surviving Jews in the ghettos and eastern camps.

Pohl and the WVHA also controlled all SS-owned industries, such as the German Excavating and Quarrying Company, the German Equipment Company, the German Experimental Establishment for Foodstuff and Nutrition, and the Society for Exploitation of Textiles and Leatherworks. Industries not owned by the SS were indirectly controlled by the WVHA, including mineral water production and the furniture industry. Jewish-owned and foreign industries were also seized by the WVHA.

Captured by the British at the end of the war, Oswald Pohl was sentenced to death by an American military court on May 27, 1946. Imprisoned rather than immediately executed, he rejoined the Catholic Church and in 1950 published Credo: My Way to God. Pohl was hanged on June 7, 1951, at Landsberg Prison.

Poland

Poland is a country located in east-central Europe with a 1939 population of 34.7 million, of whom an estimated 3.5 million were Jewish. Attacked on September 1, 1939, by 1.8 million German troops moving into the country from three directions, Poland was the first nation to fight the Germans in World War II. In response, Britain and France declared war on Germany on September 3. Under the security guarantees that had been given to Poland that country was supposed to fight a defensive campaign for only two weeks, at which time the Allies would counterattack from the west. The Allied offensive, however, never occurred. By September 14, the Germans had surrounded Warsaw, and three days later, following the secret protocol of the Nazi-Soviet nonaggression pact of August 27, 1939, Soviet forces invaded Poland from the east. The last Polish forces surrendered on October 5. After the German invasion, some 300,000 Polish Jews fled to the Soviet occupation zone in the east, where many died.

The Nazi-Soviet nonaggression pact also called for a partition of Poland, and under its terms the Soviets absorbed the eastern part of the country, including the great cultural centers of Lwów (Lviv) and Vilna (Vilnius). In the Soviet zone, 1.5 million Poles, many of them Jewish, were deported to labor camps in Russian Siberia. In a deliberate effort to exterminate the Polish intelligentsia and leadership classes, Soviets authorities transported thousands of captured Polish officers, including many reservists, from universities and industry, to the Katyn Forest of eastern Poland and other locations, where they were executed in April and May 1940 and buried in anonymous mass graves.

A number of Poles, including many in the armed forces, managed to escape from the country before the Germans and Soviets tightened their viselike grip on it. Those who escaped established a government-in-exile in London, with Władysław Raczkiewicz as president and General Władysław Sikorski as prime minister. In Poland, meanwhile, the Polish Resistance established the Armia Krajowa (AK, or Home Army), which became the largest underground movement in Europe with 400,000 fighters.

Of the territory they occupied, the Germans annexed Pomerania, Posnania, and Silesia in the west. What was left became an area known as the Generalgouvernement, under the harsh rule of Hans Frank. The Germans then began a campaign to liquidate the Jews of Poland and grind down the rest of the Poles. The Polish Jews were first herded into ghettos while the Germans built more than 2,000 concentration camps in Poland, including the industrial-scale death centers at Auschwitz-Birkenau, Chełmno, Bełżec, Sobibór, Mauthausen, and Treblinka.

Poland was at the epicenter of the Holocaust because Jews from all across Nazi-occupied Europe were deported and murdered there. After the Polish Jews had been placed in large ghettos—the biggest one located in Warsaw—they were usually deported to one of the death or forced labor camps within Poland. Conditions in the ghettos were appalling, and many died of starvation, illnesses and communicable diseases, or freezing cold in the winter. The mass killing of Polish Jews, code-named Operation Reinhard by the Germans, began in earnest in the autumn of 1941, when the first of the major death camps were constructed.

There were certainly attempts to resist the German occupation in many of the Polish ghettos, but most attempts to protest or escape were met with almost certain death. Yet Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto staged a fierce resistance demonstration between mid-April and mid-May 1943 in a desperate attempt to prevent their imminent deportation to the death camps. When the uprising ended, some 50,000 of the remaining Jews in the ghetto had been killed or would be immediately deported and later murdered. The fighting resulted in the deaths of 16 German soldiers; another 85 were wounded.

At the sprawling Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp, which underwent several expansions, a total of at least 950,000 Jews—Polish and non-Polish alike—were murdered. At the Treblinka death camp, which saw nearly 250,000 Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto transported there during the summer of 1942, up to 900,000 Jews are thought to have been killed. Some 600,000 Jews were murdered at Bełżec, while as many as 250,000 Jews were killed at Sobibór.

Although there had been a long-standing history of anti-semitism in Poland, many Poles helped hide, feed, or transport to safety scores of Jews between 1939 and 1945. Many did so despite the fact that German occupation officials had made helping Jews in any way a crime punishable by death.

Beginning in early 1942, as the Red Army slowly pushed the Germans from the Soviet Union and back to the west, the USSR's postwar intentions for Eastern Europe began to unfold. At the November–December 1943 Tehran Conference, British and U.S. leaders agreed to Soviet leader Joseph Stalin's demands that the Soviet Union be allowed to keep the Polish territory taken in September 1939—in effect, the old Curzon Line established by the Allied governments in the peace settlement following World War I. After the war, Poland was partially compensated for its territorial losses in the east with a strip of German land in the west to the line of the Oder and Neisse Rivers. In July 1944, after the city of Lublin was liberated, the Soviets established their own Polish government, a direct rival to the one in London, which was now led by Stanisław Mikołajczyk.

By August 1, 1944, the Red Army reached the right bank of the Vistula River opposite Warsaw. Armia Krajowa (AK) units in the city rose up against the Germans, anticipating Soviet support against the common enemy. The Soviets did nothing. Not only did they not help the AK, they refused landing rights on Soviet-controlled airfields for any Allied aircraft that might attempt aerial supply missions. The Poles fought on alone, street by street and house by house, for 63 days, and in the end the Wehrmacht and the Waffen-SS destroyed virtually the entire city. When the Germans finally withdrew from what was left of Warsaw, the Soviets moved across the river.

The destruction of Warsaw eliminated the remaining political and military institutions in Poland still loyal to the London government-in-exile and paved the way for a complete Soviet takeover. The final blows to a free Poland were delivered by the victorious Allies at the 1945 Yalta Conference. World War II ended, but Poland remained under the Soviet yoke until the very end of the Cold War more than 40 years later.

Poland suffered as heavily as any nation in the war, losing an estimated 38% of its national assets. The country lost 22% of its population—some 500,000 military personnel and 6 million civilians. Roughly half the Poles who died between 1939 and 1945 were Jews, meaning that about 90% of the prewar Jewish population had perished by 1945. The survival rate for Jews in Poland was the lowest of any European nation involved in the war.

Ponary Forest

The Ponary (Lithuanian: Paneriai) Forest was a wooded area about six miles south of Vilna (Vilnius), Lithuania, on the road to Grodno. Before war came to the area in the summer of 1941, it was the choice of the residents of Vilna for holidays and recreation, and they would often go there on weekends to gather berries and mushrooms, as well as for their summer holidays.

The pre–World War II Jewish population of Vilna was nearly 100,000, comprising around 45% of the city's total. The Jewish community was large and vibrant, known around the world as “the Jerusalem of Lithuania.”

Between July 1941 and July 1944 the Germans used Ponary as the principal site for the mass murder of up to 100,000 people, mostly Jews, as well as Polish intelligentsia and Russian POWs. The murders took place near the Ponary train station and were carried out by German SD, SS Einsatzgruppen, as well as Lithuanian collaborators. During the killing spree, at least 70,000 Jews were murdered in Ponary, together with an estimated 20,000 Poles and 8,000 Russians.

Vilna had been part of the reconstituted state of Poland after the Great War, but following the start of World War II and the Soviet invasion of eastern Poland in September 1939, the city was transferred by the Soviets to Lithuania; the whole country was then annexed to the Soviet Union in June 1940. In the summer of 1941 Lithuania was invaded by Germany during Operation Barbarossa, and the killing of Jews began almost immediately. Einsatzkommando 9, part of the notorious Einsatzgruppe A, descended on Vilna, rounded up 5,000 Jewish men from the city, took them to Ponary, and shot them there.

The first executions took place on July 8, 1941. One hundred Jews at a time were brought from the city to Ponary, where they were ordered to undress and hand over whatever money or valuables they had with them. They were then marched naked, in single file, in groups of 10 or 20 at a time, holding hands, to the edge of pits that had been dug by the Soviet Army to store fuel. They were then shot into the pit by rifle fire. A thin layer of sand was placed over them, and the next group was led to the edge of the pit, where they, too, were shot. The killing went on for hours, as in a production line. The killings then continued throughout the summer and fall of 1941. By the end of the year, more than 20,000 Jews had been murdered, but this was only the beginning.

With the creation of the Vilna ghetto in September 1941, the Nazis had a ready pool of slave labor at their disposal, so the pace of the killing slowed during the early part of 1942. But with the changing fortunes of war, the murders intensified toward the end of the year.

During 1943 information about the massacres at Ponary began to spread beyond the local area, and with the advance of the Soviets westward Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler ordered the establishment of a special unit, Kommando

1005, whose task it was to burn the bodies of mass murder victims and hide any traces of the killings. In Vilna this translated to a unit made up of Jewish prisoners to perform this grisly task. In August 1943 the Germans returned to Ponary with this group and began to dig up and burn the corpses. The group, numbering 80 Jewish prisoners, was sent to Ponary at the end of September 1943. After working to exhume the bodies and burn the remains for seven months, on the night of April 15, 1944, they managed to escape after having dug a tunnel under Ponary, but they were almost all captured and they, too, were murdered. Fifteen of them succeeded in escaping and managed to reach the partisans in the Rudniki forests. The work of burning the bodies continued, however, and by the end of their assignment in 1944 they had burned upward of 60,000 corpses in Ponary.

So far as can be ascertained, the total number of victims by the end of 1944, Jews and non-Jews, was anywhere between 70,000 and 100,000, with the latter figure taken as the most likely possibility. With the end of the war, only 24,000 of Lithuania's Jews, in total, survived. Ninety percent of the prewar total had been murdered. The Ponary massacre site is commemorated today by a memorial to the victims of the Holocaust, a memorial to the Polish victims, and a small museum, which contains the remains discovered, at the scene, of some of the victims.

Popovici, Traian

Traian Popovici was a Romanian lawyer and administrator responsible for saving some 20,000 Romanian Jews from deportation and likely death during World War II. In 1969 Israel's Yad Vashem declared him one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Popovici was born on October 17, 1892, in Rusi Manastiora (Udești), Romania, the son of an Orthodox priest. He studied at the Faculty of Law in Cernăuți (modern-day Chernovtsy, Ukraine, and the former capital of Bukovina) from 1913 until 1914, served in the Romanian army for a time during World War I, and then completed his education in 1919, receiving a doctor of law degree. After World War II began in 1939, the Nazi-Soviet nonaggression agreement allowed the Soviet Union to annex Bukovina, where Popovici then lived and practiced law. This prompted him to move to Bucharest, the Romanian capital, where he came into contact with Romanian fascist dictator Ion Antonescu. Popovici, at the time, did not support Antonescu or his government.

In the summer of 1941 Germany broke its nonaggression pact with the Soviet Union and invaded the USSR with the help of Antonescu's government and Romanian troops. Within a period of weeks, the Germans had returned Romanian areas annexed by the Soviets to the Antonescu regime, including Bukovina. Antonescu's government now began a full-scale assault against Romanian Jews, confiscating their property and preparing to gather them into ghettos for final deportation to concentration or death camps. That same summer, after Bukovina had been secured, Antonescu asked Popovici to serve as mayor of Cernăuți.

Popovici initially refused the offer as he did not wish to serve a fascist regime and did not agree with its policies toward Romanian Jews. However, he quickly realized that he would be in a position to safeguard Jews if he took the position and agreed to serve as mayor. On October 10, 1941, the Antonescu regime ordered that all of Cernăuți's Jews were to be rounded up and placed into a ghetto for eventual deportation. By mid-November, as many as 28,000 Jews had been deported (and up to one-half of them died soon thereafter). Thousands of others, meanwhile, had been herded into a ghetto, where the living conditions were deplorable.

Popovici was now determined to save as many Jews as possible from deportation and certain death. Before the end of 1941 he had managed to convince the Antonescu government to permit him to exempt a number of Jews because, as he explained, they were essential to the Romanian economy and war effort. In the end, he secured exemptions for about 20,000 Jews, who were then permitted to return to their homes. As it turned out, Popovici's exemptions went far beyond what the government had mandated, however, and by the spring of 1942 he had been replaced as mayor of Cernăuți and sent to Bucharest.

Although some 5,000 Jews in Cernăuți were deported to concentration camps, where most died, after Popovici left office the Jews who remained in the city managed to survive until war's end. There is little doubt that they too would have been deported had it not been for Popovici's efforts. After the war, Popovici published a book, Confession of Conscience, in which he explained that his classical education and religious background instilled in him the sanctity of all humanity, which in turn prompted him to shield Romanian Jews from extermination.

Traian Popovici died in Romania on June 4, 1946.

Priebke, Erich

A member of the Nazi Gestapo in Italy, “Hauptstrmführer Erich Priebke participated in the massacre of 335 Italians in the Ardeatine Caves in Rome on March 24, 1944.

He was born in Hennigsdorf, Brandenburg, Germany on July 29, 1913, and enlisted in the Waffen-SS and later the Gestapo. Priebke’s rise to infamy was tied to that of SS Major

Some 50 years after the end of World War II, Erich Priebke, former Nazi SS officer, was extradited from Argentina to stand trial in Italy for his role in the massacre of 335 Italians, both Jews and non-Jews, as revenge for the killing of 42 German soldiers by Italian partisans. He was ultimately sentenced to 15 years of house arrest for his crimes. The photograph here shows Priebke entering the military court in Rome on December 7, 1995. (AP Photo/Domenico Stinellis)

Herbert Kappler. With the German occupation of Italy in September 1943, Kappler was promoted to command all SS police and security units in Rome, and Priebke served as Kappler's second-in-command.

On March 23, 1944, Italian partisans detonated a bomb along the Via Rasella in Rome. The blast killed as many as 42 German policemen and 10 civilians. Enraged by the attack, Adolf Hitler ordered that for every German killed, 10 Italians were to be executed immediately. The task of procuring and executing the Italians fell to Kappler and Priebke. Prisoners who had already been condemned to death were initially chosen, but this failed to meet the required number. As the Gestapo extended its net in search of victims, those arrested for minor offenses against Germans, in addition to 75 Italian Jews, were also chosen to be executed.

On March 24, 1944, the SS led 335 bound victims into the Ardeatine Caves beneath Rome. Priebke checked each name off from a master list as the victims entered in groups of five. They were then shot in the back of the head. Priebke evidently also participated in the shooting of a number of individuals.

With the defeat of German forces in Italy, Priebke was arrested by U.S. forces on May 13, 1945. During interrogations he admitted his role in the Ardeatine Massacre. In January 1946, however, he escaped from a prisoner-of-war camp in Rimini. With the help of the Catholic Church, he remained hidden in Italy until 1947 when, along with his family, he fled to Argentina, where he would live freely for decades.

In 1994 NBC television reporter Sam Donaldson cornered the 81-year-old Priebke on a street in Bariloche, Argentina. As a result, Priebke was soon arrested and later extradited to Italy. Standing trial for his role in the Ardeatine Massacre, Priebke claimed that he was simply following orders. In August 1996 an Italian military tribunal found Priebke guilty but not punishable, and he was released. International outrage, however, resulted in the verdict being overturned. Priebke was ordered to stand trial again. On July 22, 1997, Priebke was found guilty and sentenced to 15 years under house arrest. He died in Italy on October 11, 2013, at the age of 100.

Priest Block, Dachau

Roman Catholic priests and other clergy imprisoned in Dachau were arrested as part of the Nazi attempt to destroy the power of the church in the territories it occupied, and during the 1930s priests who spoke out against the Nazis were routinely harassed, persecuted, and often imprisoned. From December 1940 priests from all of the Third Reich's concentration camps and prisons were imprisoned solely in Dachau, in three barracks almost completely isolated from most of the other inmates. After March 1941 they were separated from the rest of the camp by an internal barbed wire perimeter. The area, comprising blocks 26, 28, and 30, became known by the collective name of "The Priest Block." By the end of the war, 2,579 Catholic, 109 Protestant, 30 Orthodox, and two Muslim clergymen from 24 nations were imprisoned there; overall, across the duration of the war, up to 1,000 would meet their death in Dachau.

The main urgency dominating the imprisoned clergy for much of the early period was for a chapel to be built in which they could conduct services. Although the SS opposed the granting of any special privileges of this nature, nonetheless work on such a place was begun in January 1941. The first services took place later that month, though these were made as difficult as possible by the Nazis. The SS imposed certain conditions under which services could be held; the windows had to be made opaque, and access for the other prisoners was severely restricted. It was said that the priests' efforts were met by sarcasm and vulgarity from the SS, who would burst into the chapel smoking cigars and interrupting the service, or spit and trample on rosaries and medallions.

The isolation of the priests from the rest of the camp was to be as tight as possible. There was only one door for access, and no other prisoners were allowed through it. At night the doors were locked, and during the daytime priests unable to work had the task of seeing that the access door was closely monitored. Despite this, occasional contacts between the inmates were established, particularly at work.

The men of the Priest Block were housed in overcrowded, nightmarishly unsanitary facilities intended for less than a third of their number. Vehemently anti-Catholic SS guards and criminal kapos appeared to take pleasure in tormenting the priests. They would be beaten and tortured, subjected to brutal work details, and denied food and medical care on virtually any pretext. Corpses of those who died overnight or at hard labor were expected to be dragged to morning and evening roll call and counted alongside the living. Other priests were beaten to death or hung from crosses where they slowly perished. On Good Friday in 1941, 60 priests were crucified; their wrists were tied together behind their backs, their palms facing outwards. The hands were then turned into the body, a chain tied round the wrists and they were hung up so that their body weight dislocated their shoulders, elbows, and wrists. If the intense pain did not trigger a heart attack, the positions in which the victims found themselves could cause death by slow asphyxiation, with the added ordeal, if outside, of exposure.

Soon after this, and coinciding with the segregation of the priests from the rest of the camp, orders came from Berlin that conditions should improve. There is little doubt that the reason for this was political, as the Nazis sought to convince the world's Catholics—and the Vatican in particular—that the priests were being looked after satisfactorily. Excluded from performing acts of hard labor, they were supplied with adequate bedding, and Russian and Polish prisoners from outside the Priest Block were assigned to look after their quarters. The priests were given an extra hour's rest in the morning and could rest on their beds for two hours in the morning and afternoon. Free from work, they could give themselves to study and to meditation. They were given newspapers and allowed to use the library. Their food was adequate; they sometimes received up to a third of a loaf of bread a day; there was even a period when they were given half a litre of cocoa in the morning and a third of a bottle of wine daily.

Unfortunately, the provision of such “privileges” often proved to be illusory. Where the wine was concerned, for example, this was sometimes transformed into a sadistic ritual. The priests were ordered under threat of beating to uncork and pour out the wine and then drink their third of a bottle in one gulp.

Nonetheless, any concessions meant a great deal—though their major effect was to alienate the priests from the majority of the other prisoners who, until then, had been with them at least in spirit as fellow prisoners. Resentment became widespread and was hardly eased when some of the priests began to receive large food parcels from their parishes outside the camp. Many tried to smuggle their food to the prisoners in the camp proper, but further resentment developed when it was found that some stored their food—and even risked its going bad rather than sharing it.

Little knowledge of the power politics being played outside the wire penetrated the closed world of the concentration camp.

The result forced the imprisoned clergy back on themselves. Through the common medium of Latin, they could communicate with one another despite their varied ethnic and linguistic backgrounds, and because of their isolation from the rest of the prisoners they were effectively compelled to unite as a group for their own self-defense. They had no one else on whom to rely. This enforced fellowship had some measure of success. The priests were able to ease their conditions within the barracks whenever the SS or kapos were not present. Their plight became slightly less desperate; they created a community in which they could act largely according to the precepts of their faith; and, for some, even their chances of survival increased.

Among the many clergy imprisoned in the Priest Block at Dachau were the following: Father Jean Bernard, Pastor Martin Niemöller, Father Josef Beran, Blessed Father Stefan Wincenty Frelichowski, Blessed Father Titus Brandsma, Bishop Ignacy Jeż, and Pastor Max Lackmann. Blessed Father Bernhard Lichtenberg, a resister of the Nazis and rescuer of Jews, was in the process of being transferred to Dachau, but died on his way there in 1943. The Priest Block remained in operation through the end of World War II and the liberation of Dachau by American troops on April 29, 1945.

Project Paperclip

The code name given to a joint British-American operation toward the end of World War II, in which groups of special agents were parachuted behind German lines with the objective of seizing Germany's top scientists, engineers, and technicians, and transporting them back to Allied countries. The roundup was intended to fulfill what some had referred to as “intellectual reparations,” whereby German scientific figures would be required to work for the Allies as a way of expunging the German academic world's contribution to the Third Reich's criminal activities.

Allied agents dropped behind enemy lines would track down specific scientists, and as an inducement for the scientists' cooperation their families were sometimes also taken into Allied custody. The success of Project Paperclip can be measured in two ways. First, a total of 642 German scientists and technologists were able to provide the Allies, upon detailed interrogation, with considerable intelligence regarding the latest developments in armaments, gases, biological and chemical warfare, and missile technology. Second, the scientists were in various ways persuaded to help advance the defense programs being generated by the Allies (particularly the Americans) in order to fight the Cold War. Their employment by the United States, moreover, ensured that their expertise was denied to the Soviet Union, which was itself trying to skim the cream of German technical expertise at the end of the war.

From the perspective of the Holocaust, the acquisition of these scientists and technicians was a critical issue. It meant that these people, many of whom were in the forefront of medical experiments on human subjects in the Nazi concentration camps or had, in some cases, assisted in the design and functioning of the death machinery at places such as Auschwitz, were "laundered" of war crimes charges or had their sentences reduced substantially. The need of the Allies for advanced technical expertise during the Cold War superseded any qualms about wartime accountability for war crimes or crimes against humanity—in this case, an instance of justice being sacrificed for what was deemed to be a higher cause in the confrontation with the Soviet Union. Understandably, some, if not many, saw that as a dubious proposition.

Propaganda in the Holocaust

Propaganda is information purposely spread to manipulate people's opinions, often by half-truths or by "spinning" facts. Thinking leads to action; thinking of humans as less than human leads to atrocity.

One of the Nazi government's most effective steps toward genocide was its extensive use of propaganda, dehumanizing the Jews so consistently that Germans, many of whom had never met a Jew, did not see their death as the murder of a human being. One of the most ubiquitous of caricatures, shown here on a poster, was of the "Eternal Jew" with gold coins and the hammer and sickle to associate Jews with Russia and communism. (Michael Nicholson/Corbis via Getty Images)

From the beginning of the Third Reich, Adolf Hitler and his followers were convinced that the Jewish people posed a deadly threat to all that was noble in humanity. The Nazis considered all of their enemies as part of "international Jewry," and they were convinced that Jews controlled the national governments of Russia, the United Kingdom, and the United States. In the Nazi vision, Jews, the enemies of civilization, were represented as parasitic organisms—as leeches, lice, bacteria, or vectors of contagion. Hitler dehumanized the Jews by naming them an "inferior race" (Untermenschen, or subhuman). As such, Jews were excluded from the system of moral rights and obligations that bind humankind together. In this conception, it is wrong to kill a human being but permissible to exterminate a rat.

In 1926 Hitler wrote in Mein Kampf that “Propaganda works on the general public . . . and makes them ripe for the victory of this idea.” He advocated using propaganda to spread the ideals of National Socialism—among them racism, antisemitism, and anti-Bolshevism.

Following the Nazi seizure of power in 1933, Hitler established a Reich Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, headed by Joseph Goebbels. The ministry’s aim was to ensure that the Nazi message was successfully communicated through art, music, theater, films, books, radio, educational materials, and the press. Goebbels was a propaganda genius, and he created various forms of propaganda that showed different messages to advertise the Nazis and turn the people against the Jews. Films, radio programs, and music were huge elements of such propaganda. Flags, also, were important symbols to the Nazis. Art was used most famously as propaganda in the form of posters.

Goebbels created a negative image of the Jewish people, blaming them for the economic and social problems of Germany and the world. To the Nazis, all the Jews, Roma, and others were dangerous, disease-carrying rats. The Nazis decided that Jews must be excluded from society as a whole, eventually requiring Jews to wear a yellow star on their clothes to mark them as Jewish and, therefore, as different.

The Nazis utilized schools, the media, and popular art forms such as posters to teach and project a distorted image of the Jews. This propaganda, combined with antisemitic feelings already prevailing in many parts of Europe, resulted in violence, humiliation, and anti-Jewish persecution.

Hitler began shaping the beliefs of schoolchildren through the reading of assigned texts in which Jews were portrayed in a series of increasingly negative scenarios. The use of stereotyped conceptions of Jews as lecherous old men seducing young Aryan women and girls, of dirty Jewish butchers, unscrupulous Jewish lawyers, hard-hearted Jewish landlords, rich Jewish businessmen and their wives ignoring the poverty around them, all combined to create a hate-filled image of Jews. In one of these comic books, after providing such “evidence” of the despicable nature of Jews, three suggestions were provided: dismissing Jewish children from German schools, prohibiting Jews from using public facilities like parks, and then expelling them from the country. The originator of this idea was Julius Streicher, editor of a weekly newspaper, Der Stürmer, which spread antisemitic propaganda to the general public in Germany. The “facts” presented in the newspaper (for adults, parents, and soon-to-be recruited Nazi SS perpetrators of destruction) were carried over into these schoolbooks. Streicher sought to create a perception of Jews as a subhuman race that was a threat to the national state of Germany. The idea was for this total indoctrination of these beliefs in the minds of the young and the old to such an extent that they came to have a conviction about the inferiority of Jews and the need to eliminate the threat they posed to the purity and superiority of the Aryan race.

Another aspect of the process of creating dehumanized images of Jews in the minds of the German populace, later in the process of their destruction, was to show pictures of their naked bodies, gaunt from starvation, sickness, and overwork in such ways that it was easy to dissociate them from the rest of humanity, to make them look subhuman in ways that no other peoples have been.

Since not every German could travel to see Hitler speak, Goebbels bought every citizen a cheap radio. These were called People’s Receivers. Citizens (but not Jews) were expected to use these receivers to take advantage of Hitler’s regular broadcasts to the German people.

Flags bearing the Hitler-adopted swastika became a propaganda tool. They were cheap to make, and Germans were encouraged to fly these in support of the Reich. Jews were prohibited from flying these flags.

Propagandists offered more subtle antisemitic language and viewpoints for educated, middle-class Germans offended by crude caricatures. University professors and religious leaders gave antisemitic themes respectability by incorporating them into their lectures and church sermons.

Books became the subject of propaganda. Hitler’s own Mein Kampf became “the Nazi bible”: it was distributed free to newlywed couples and soldiers. In addition, the Ministry for Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda identified “degenerate literature,” which was taken out of university and public libraries. These volumes included books that were anti-Nazi or communist works, written by Jews, or those sympathetic to Jews. These were subject to book burnings commissioned by the ministry. One book burning destroyed 25,000 volumes; it was a huge event at which Goebbels and other high Nazis spoke.

Posters were the most famous form of propaganda. They were placed everywhere. They represented everything Hitler wanted the Germans to see, and nothing they did not. Many were used to dehumanize Jews.

The cinema played an important role in disseminating racial antisemitism, the superiority of German military power, and the intrinsic evil of the enemies as defined by Nazi ideology. Nazi films portrayed Jews as “subhuman” creatures infiltrating Aryan society. For example, in 1940 Die

Ewige Jude (The Eternal Jew), directed by Fritz Hippler, portrayed Jews as wandering cultural parasites, consumed by sex and money. Die Ewige Jude prepared the German people for the removal of Jews from their midst, so that when the deportations began, neighbors would associate Jews with rats or vermin rather than see them as humans.

Cartoons in German newspapers, above all Der Stürmer, used antisemitic caricatures to depict Jews. After the Germans began World War II with the invasion of Poland in September 1939, the Nazi regime employed propaganda to impress upon German civilians and soldiers that the Jews were not only subhuman but also dangerous enemies of the German Reich.

During the wartime period of the Final Solution, SS officials at killing centers compelled their victims to maintain the deception needed to smoothly deport Jews from Germany and occupied Europe. These prisoners, many of whom would soon die in the gas chambers, were forced to send postcards home saying they were well and living in good conditions. The authorities used this deception as propaganda to cover up atrocities and mass murder.

In June 1944 the German Security Police allowed the International Committee of the Red Cross team to inspect the Theresienstadt ghetto. The SS and police had set up Theresienstadt in November 1941 as an instrument of propaganda, to explain to Germans the destination of deported German and Austrian Jews who were elderly, disabled war veterans, or locally known artists and musicians who had gone “to the East” for “labor.” In preparation for the Red Cross visit, the ghetto underwent a “beautification” program, and after the inspection, the SS officials made a film using ghetto dwellers to show the kind treatment the Jewish “residents” of Theresienstadt supposedly enjoyed. Once the film was completed, SS officials deported the “cast” to the Auschwitz-Birkenau killing center.

The Nazi regime used propaganda effectively to mobilize the German population to support its wars of conquest until the very end of the regime. Nazi propaganda was likewise essential in motivating those who implemented the mass murder of the European Jews and of other victims of the Nazi regime. It also served to secure the acquiescence of millions of others—as bystanders—to racially targeted persecution and mass murder. Eliminating their rights and freedoms, and driving Jews into poverty and despair, Nazi propaganda created hatred against the Jews and set the stage for the cruel mass genocide.

Protestant Churches, German

As early as 1933 Protestants in Germany were describing their church-political conflicts as a Kirchenkampf—a “church struggle.” Ever since, the term has been used to describe clashes within German Protestantism and between the churches and Adolf Hitler’s National Socialist regime.

Even before the Nazi seizure of power, the two-thirds of Germans who belonged to Lutheran, Reformed, or Union churches were confronted with the anti-Western, anti-Bolshevik, and antisemitic Nazi ideology, expressed through verbal abuse and physical violence. Hitler’s Darwinian worldview idolized the mystical blood-bound community of Germans, scorning traditional Christian teachings about sin, salvation, compassion, and humility. Nonetheless, conservative Protestants who feared the secularization of Weimar Germany and the threat of atheistic communism flocked to Nazism. In Thuringia, Protestant clergy formed the Faith Movement of the German Christians, a church party aiming to renew ecclesiastical life through a masculine, militant fusion of Nazi ideology and Christian religiosity.

Some leading Nazis understood their movement as an expression of Christianity, and even a completion of the Protestant Reformation. They celebrated Martin Luther as a German national hero and called for a moral and national renewal of Germany. Other Nazis rejected Christianity, cultivating Nazism as a political religion or neo-pagan cult. Publicly, however, the Nazi Party platform advocated “positive Christianity,” and Hitler declared that Protestantism and Catholicism would be pillars in his Third Reich. Theologians like Gerhard Kittel, Paul Althaus, and Emanuel Hirsch supported Nazi antisemitism and praised Hitler's seizure of power, as did Protestant church leaders. In many regions, Protestant church attendance, membership, marriages, and baptisms all surged. Uniformed SA units attended church services in formation. Many church buildings were constructed or renovated in consciously Nazi styles. Such was the religious atmosphere of 1933.

That July, Hitler publicly endorsed the German Christian Movement, which captured more than 70% of the votes in national church elections and seized control of most of the 28 Protestant regional church governments. A new church constitution followed, along with the formation of a centralized Reich Church headed by Reich Bishop Ludwig Müller, a German Christian military chaplain. Governing according to the authoritarian Nazi "leadership principle," Müller and his German Christian followers agitated in both Prussian and national church synods for the speedy unification of German Protestantism. When regional churches in Württemberg and Bavaria resisted, Müller suspended their leaders and seized control of their church governments. In November 1933 radical German Christians in Berlin called for the abolition of the Old Testament and the writings of the "Rabbi Paul," reinterpreting Jesus as an Aryan fighter.

By this time, however, Berlin pastor Martin Niemöller was spearheading an opposition movement, the Pastors' Emergency League. It was devoted to defending "non-Aryan" clergy from dismissal under the terms of the government's Aryan Paragraph, and to basing church ministry on the Bible and Reformation confessions of faith. Soon more than one-third of Protestant pastors (roughly 7,000) had signed on as members. Many read illegal pulpit declarations criticizing the Müller church government and were fined, suspended, or arrested. In April 1934 representatives from newly emerging confessing synods sympathetic to the Emergency League founded the Confessing Church. Their Barmen Declaration—written largely by Swiss theologian Karl Barth—affirmed the Bible as the unique source of divine revelation, proclaimed Jesus Christ Lord of all, opposed the coordination of Protestantism with Nazism, and rejected the state's claim to ultimate authority. At a subsequent synod in Dahlem that November, the radical wing of the Confessing Church cut off all ties to the official church government, establishing its own Provisional Church Leadership. In March 1935 Prussian members of the Confessing Church denounced Nazi racial ideology and heathenism, for which roughly 700 clergy were temporarily incarcerated. In June 1936 Confessing Church members reiterated their criticism of the Nazi glorification of "blood, race, nationality, and honor" in a private memorandum to Hitler. Within weeks, the memorandum was leaked and published abroad.

In mid-1935 the Nazi government abandoned Reich Bishop Müller because he was unable to achieve the coordination (Gleichschaltung) of the churches under Nazi rule. A new Ministry of Church Affairs was created under Hanns Kerrl, who established national and regional church committees to bring together members of the German Christian Movement and the Confessing Church. While this brought temporary peace to many church communities, increasing Nazi antagonism toward Christianity and the churches prevented any lasting settlement. Gestapo police, Special Court judges, Nazi officials, and German Christian church administrators all harassed, suspended, and imprisoned clergy, disseminated anticlerical propaganda, secularized public education, restricted church meetings, closed theological seminaries, and suppressed the church press. In response, Confessing Church clergy—supported by large numbers of parishioners—withheld church offerings, ignored official church correspondence, conducted illegal church services and confirmation classes, and trained new pastors—not least at theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer's illegal seminary in Finkenwalde.

By 1937 Hitler had given up on Kerrl's system of church committees, called and then cancelled new church elections, and stepped up government persecution of dissident clergy. Confessing Church leader Martin Niemöller was arrested and placed in concentration camps for the duration of Nazi rule. Pastor Paul Schneider was murdered in Buchenwald, while Friedrich Weissler, a Christian of Jewish descent, was blamed for the leak of the 1936 Confessing Church memo and murdered in Sachsenhausen. In 1938 Friedrich Werner, president of the Old Prussian Union Church, replaced Kerrl at the head of German Protestantism and promptly issued a decree demanding that all Protestant clergy swear a personal oath of allegiance to Hitler. While most acceded, a minority refused, adding yet another layer of bitter conflict to the church struggle. It is from this period (1937–1945) that the most virulent anti-Christian statements were issued by Hitler and his associates.

Even as leading Nazis became more convinced of the fundamental opposition of Christianity, which regular SS reports on the mood of the German populace confirmed, most Protestants actually supported Nazi racial policy, foreign policy, and the war of annihilation in the East. While a few Protestants such as the teacher Elisabeth Schmitz or the pastor Heinrich Grüber defended and aided Jews and while some members of the German Resistance drew on Christian convictions, most Protestants remained silent in the wake of the Nuremberg Laws, the Kristallnacht pogrom, the euthanasia program, and the deportation of German Jews to the ghettos and death camps of Eastern Europe. Indeed, parish clergy supplied many thousands of baptismal records in support of the Proof of Aryan Ancestry certificates required by civil servants. Many clergy volunteered as front-line soldiers or military chaplains, roles in which they actively supported both war and genocide. In the Warthegau, a German province created in occupied Poland, officials implemented a policy of dechristianization, illustrating the radical anti-Christianity of wartime Nazism. On the home front, the German Christian theologian Walter Grundmann founded the Institute for the Study and Eradication of Jewish Influence on German Church Life, mobilizing academics and clergy for the task of dejudaising Jesus, the New Testament, confessions of faith, and church music.

The defeat of Nazism did little to rectify the many injustices and errors of the church struggle. Few German Christians were suspended from church positions or held accountable in the denazification process. Members of the Confessing Church assumed the important positions of Protestant church leadership, belatedly taking on the identity of anti-Nazis. Only later, after much historical research, has a full picture of the vast complicity of Protestants in Nazi Germany come to light. Even so, exceptions like the martyr Dietrich Bonhoeffer, whose life story and theological writings became widely popular in the postwar era, have often been mistaken as normative.

Protocols of the Elders of Zion

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is an antisemitic Russian literary invention dating from the end of the 19th century, describing an international Jewish elite plotting to subvert and control Western (and, thereby, world) society. This myth of a Jewish world conspiracy with demonological and millenarian motifs was an early element of Nazi ideology in the 1920s. Addressing perennial concerns about Jewish separation and success, such a conspiracy theory invariably projects believers' fears, hopes, and intentions onto a demonized "other," who, as a result, might then be legitimately persecuted or even exterminated. Described as a "warrant for genocide," the Protocols encouraged pogroms in czarist Russia and contributed to the atmosphere of opinion in which the Holocaust became possible. The tract sets out the Elders' secret plans for a Jewish world government. The first 9 protocols criticize liberalism and outline methods for achieving global power, while the remaining 15 outline the nature of the final world state. The first protocol indicates that a plot has been in operation over many centuries to place political power firmly in the hands of the Elders of Zion (that is, the Jewish elite). All traditional order and authority are supposedly being dissolved by liberalism and democracy, thus identified as the best means to destabilize the traditional gentile world and render it more amenable to Jewish despotism. The Elders have destroyed religion, especially the Christian faith, through the intellectual fashions of Darwinism and Marxism. The Elders' final goal is the Messianic Age, when the world will be ruled by a Jewish sovereign of the House of David. Such dominion will be divinely ordained, since the Jews are God's chosen people.

The origins of the Protocols lie in medieval anti-Judaism in the Christian world. Jews were then supposed to worship the Devil, and a corresponding political myth described a secret Jewish government in Muslim Spain, directing a war against Christendom with the aid of sorcery. The myth of a Jewish world conspiracy represents a modern adaptation of this old demonology. During the French Revolution, conspiracy theories involving philosophes, liberals, and Freemasons circulated among those disturbed by the profound revolutionary challenges to traditional authority of the church and monarchy. By the early 19th century, Jews had become fellow suspects in this political mythology of subversive and secret elites. By the mid-19th century, democracy, liberalism, secularism, and socialism had become significant political factors abhorrent to many conservatives. Their fears and anxieties about the future of the old order led to a rear-guard action against the proponents of the new, mobile society. As this political transformation offered manifold new opportunities to Europe's Jews, they in turn became the target of this powerful reaction.

Norman Cohn has traced the origin, motivation, and development of the Protocols through French, German, and Russian antisemitic texts of the 19th century up to their actual composition sometime around 1897 by the Russian secret police or other reactionaries wishing to defend the autocratic czarist regime. At the same time, these conspiracy texts were used by agitators to incite pogroms against ordinary Jews living in the Pale of Settlement. Mythical accounts of the Protocols' origins vary. The earlier editions, published by Russian antisemitic agitators between 1903 and 1906, claimed that the translation was made from a document taken from the "Central Chancellery of Zion, in France." White Russian emigrés believed that they originated among late 19th-century French occultists and Theosophists. A mystical-apocalyptic edition of the Protocols was first included in the second edition of The Great in the Small (1905) by Sergei Nilus. A fanatical defender of the czarist autocracy, Nilus hated secular modernity, seeing in democracy and technological progress the omens of Antichrist. A later edition of 1917, He Is Near, Hard by the Door, was read by Alfred Rosenberg in Russia. Nilus described the Protocols as a strategic plan for the conquest of the world, supposedly worked out by Jewish leaders during the many centuries of dispersion and finally presented to a presumed Council of Elders by Theodor Herzl at the first Zionist Congress, held at Basle in August 1897.

Following the Russian Revolution and civil war (1917–1921), many White Russian refugees brought the Protocols to Germany, and a German edition appeared in 1919. The myth of a secret Jewish plot in Russia was then transformed by Nazi ideology into powerful political propaganda, implicating all Jews in the subversion of nations, cultural Bolshevism, and international finance, and thereby legitimizing the Holocaust. The Protocols appealed to international readerships dislocated by war, defeat, and economic loss in the 1920s, and the Protocols were translated into English, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Finnish, Romanian, Hungarian, Lithuanian, Polish, Bulgarian, Spanish, Italian, Greek, Japanese, and Chinese. Arabic and South American editions have continued to be published since the defeat of Nazi Germany, while reprints of older European editions circulate among small neo-Nazi parties and splinter groups in Europe, Russia, and the United States up to the present.

Quisling, Vidkun

Norwegian collaborationist leader with Nazi Germany. Born in Fyresdal, Norway, on July 18, 1887, Vidkun Quisling entered the army in 1911. By 1918 he was Norwegian military attaché in Petrograd, Russia, and after holding several administrative posts he became minister of defense in 1931. Known as a capable army officer and government official, Quisling became controversial through his support of Germany's Nazi Party, and in 1933 he helped found the Nasjonal Samling Party, a Norwegian fascist organization. In 1939, with the failure of his party to achieve any electoral success, Quisling met German dictator Adolf Hitler and argued for a German occupation of Norway with the object of placing the Nasjonal Samling in power. During the German invasion of Norway in April 1940, Quisling founded a government in which he was named as minister-president.

Quisling's government lasted only one week. The Germans crafted a new ruling body, in which Josef Terboven was Reich commissioner. On February 1, 1942, Quisling managed to attain greater political power as Norway's minister-president in a Nasjonal Samling government. He subsequently embarked on a program of Nazification for his country. His policies, which included efforts to convert churches and schools to the principles of National Socialism, met with opposition from most of the Norwegian population. Quisling's government was also responsible for transporting more than 1,000 Jews to German concentration Pictured here making a speech in November 1941, Vidkun Quisling was a Norwegian politician who collaborated with Nazi Germany during World War II and led Norway's government after the country was occupied by Germany. Between 1942 and 1945 he served as minister-president, collaborating with the German-imposed administrator Josef Terboven. camps. The effectiveness of Quisling's government to carve out an autonomous Norwegian fascist identity was impeded both by interference from Berlin and by Norwegian partisan resistance.

Following the liberation of Norway in May 1945, Quisling was imprisoned in Norway to await trial for war crimes. During the subsequent court proceedings he claimed that he had acted for the greater good of Norway but was found guilty of high treason. He was executed at Akershus Castle in Oslo on October 24, 1945. His name has subsequently become synonymous with that of traitor.

Rabe, John

John Rabe was a German businessman in China who helped shield as many as 250,000 Chinese civilians from harm during the December 13, 1937–January 22, 1938, Nanking (Nanjing) Massacre. The Nanking Massacre (sometimes referred to as the “Rape of Nanking”) occurred when Japanese forces attacked and then occupied the city of Nanking during the Sino-Japanese War (1937–1945).

John Heinrich Detlev Rabe was born in Hamburg, Germany, on November 23, 1882. As an executive of the Siemens AG Corporation, he was sent to China in 1908, where he became involved in the company’s Chinese operations in several cities before being assigned to Nanking. By the mid-1930s he had also joined the Nazi Party, which was a virtual prerequisite for any German seeking continued career advancement. There is, however, no clear indication that Rabe subscribed to all—or even part of—Nazi Party ideology.

After the Sino-Japanese War began in 1937, a number of foreign nationals still residing in Nanking decided to establish a demilitarized area, known as the Nanking Safety Zone, where Chinese civilians could seek refuge from the Japanese onslaught. Rabe was selected to lead this effort, a task he took with great seriousness. The Japanese, who were already allied with Germany via the 1936 Anti-Comintern Pact, were more likely to cooperate with a German citizen, particularly one who was a member of the Nazi Party.

By November 1937, when Rabe and his foreign compatriots were establishing the safety zone, the Japanese had vowed not to attack civilian areas in which Chinese military forces were absent. Rabe thus persuaded Chinese military authorities to vacate the western quarter of Nanking, where many residents were now relocated. Civilians were at this time housed at Nanking University as well as foreign embassies and other government buildings. In addition, Rabe housed several hundred civilians in his personal residence and at Siemens AG properties in and around Nanking. Of the hundreds of thousands of deaths that occurred during the Rape of Nanking, virtually none were recorded in the safety zone, and estimates indicate that Rabe’s efforts shielded 200,000–250,000 Chinese from Japanese depredations.

In late February 1938 Rabe was asked to leave Nanking. He soon made his way back to Germany, taking with him film, photos, and other evidence of the massacre. He immediately began giving public lectures about the events he had witnessed in China and even wrote a letter to German dictator Adolf Hitler in which he asked the leader to stop Japanese aggression in China. Running afoul of Nazi authorities, Rabe was arrested and questioned by the Gestapo. Only a plea by Siemens AG officials won Rabe’s release. He was ordered never again to write or talk about the Nanking Massacre and spent the World War II years in relative obscurity.

In 1945, after Germany had been defeated, Rabe was arrested because of his previous affiliation with the Nazi Party. He was forced to undergo “denazification” and spent virtually all of his money defending himself from potential prosecution. Rabe soon became destitute and was unable to find steady work. When the story of his reversal of fortunes reached Nanking, the city’s residents raised thousands of dollars that were to be sent to Germany. Nanking’s mayor personally traveled there to present Rabe with the money and with food supplies.

Rabe died on January 5, 1950. For decades his heroic exploits remained largely forgotten, except perhaps in Nanking. However, in the late 1990s, Rabe’s wartime diaries were published, finally bringing his deeds into the international spotlight. In 1997 the city of Nanking erected a marker giving tribute to Rabe, and in 2006 the city turned Rabe’s former Nanking residence into a memorial museum. To further mark his heroic exploits, a motion picture, John Rabe (Florian Gallenberger, 2009) was co-produced by Chinese, German, and French filmmakers, starring German actor Ulrich Tukur in the title role.

“Racial Hygiene”

A designation introduced and developed in 1894 by German medical doctor Alfred Ploetz and picked up by many others in the early part of the twentieth century, “racial hygiene” (Rassenhygiene) was a concept that had at its base the notion of eugenics, the branch of knowledge dealing with the production of genetically superior human beings through improvements in their inherited qualities.

In accordance with the Nazi view regarding the racial state, the world was inhabited by three different types of people: culture-founders (typified by the Nazi ideal, the Aryan, who was the most supreme form of humanity according to every index of qualitative measurement); culture-bearers (such as Latin Europeans and Japanese—peoples who could not create civilizations but could ape those established by the culture-founders); and culture-destroyers (most clearly Slavs, Africans, most Asians—but primarily the Jews, who were such inferior examples of humanity as to be barely recognizable as humans at all). In the racial state that was to be established under Nazi rule, inferior races would have to be destroyed utterly in order to safeguard the purity of the Aryan, with no possibility of blood admixture through intermarriage or cross-breeding.

As the Nazis developed their thoughts in such matters as these, this translated into proposals calling for the compulsory sterilization of physically and psychologically “inferior” humans; for others, added to this could be measures designed to control the breeding of those with criminal tendencies, with incurable diseases (or even those that were curable, such as venereal disease), or with social abnormalities such as chronic alcoholism. The fear of a degeneration in “quality” of the German “race” should such things go unchecked became a crucial element of Nazi ideology and was attractive to the racial thinking that dominated the National Socialist worldview—to such a degree that sterilization and, later, compulsory euthanasia became state policy for the purpose of ensuring the health and virility of the German people in the future.

In order to achieve their desired racial state, the Nazis built a powerful bureaucracy to oversee special laws promulgated at Nuremberg in 1935, the purpose of which was to dismantle Jewish communal life throughout Germany. Upon this legislative foundation it was intended that the racial state would be constructed.

What it required was, in the most fundamental of ways, known as a rassenkampf, or “racial struggle.” According to this, the Nazi conception was that all human life constituted an ongoing confrontation for supremacy between competing races of people. This struggle was both typified by and expressed at its most extreme through an abiding conflict between the Aryan race and the Jewish race—a conflict forced by the Jews for the purpose of subverting the perfect world order in which the Aryans should, by virtue of their superiority, rightly predominate. The rassenkampf was relentless and had to be fought until the death of one of the two parties would see either an ideal future for the world under the unchallenged rule of the Aryans or a hopeless future dominated by the forces of darkness unleashed by the satanic Jew. The race struggle, of necessity, had to be genocidal in scope; neither compromise nor mercy would ever be possible if the required victory was to be achieved.

Given this, the concept of “racial treason” (rasseverrat) was perhaps the most heinous of crimes that could be committed by an Aryan against his or her fellow Aryans. An illicit sexual relationship between an Aryan and a Jew would invariably lead to the destruction of the Aryan race and had to be forestalled with all the means available to the state.

Thus, “race shame” or “racial defilement” (rassenschande) had to be proscribed at every turn, and accordingly, under the Nuremberg Laws of September 1935, various relationships between Jews and non-Jews were proscribed, and any acts of a sexual nature between a Jew and a non-Jew—even those who were intermarried—were completely banned. By 1944 any such sexual relationship became a capital offense, though the death penalty had already been carried out in an infamous case in 1942, when Leo Katzenberger, an elderly Jewish businessman, was beheaded on a trumped-up case of rassenschande with a non-Jewish woman, Irene Seiler. Later, the law regarding rassenschande was also applied to sexual contact between German Aryans and Slavs.

Given the nature of Nazi race thinking with regard to racial hygiene, it comes as no surprise to conclude that it was the Nazis’ understanding that proscribed sexual relationships would pollute, and thereby weaken, the “purity” of the Aryan race, especially if children resulted from the sexual liaison. The totality of Nazi rule thus extended even to this most intimate of human impulses, which was severely regulated on grounds of race.

of Foreign Affairs between May 1940 and April 1943. Born on February 20, 1906, in the town of Neustrelitz, Mecklenburg, he studied law in Rostock and Munich, receiving his license to practice in April 1932 and entering the civil service. In 1932 he joined the SA (Sturmabteilung), and the following year, in March 1933, he became a member of the Nazi Party. He joined the Foreign Office in 1937 and served several years overseas as a diplomat before being appointed head of D III in 1940. An avowed antisemite, he was recognized by those around him as a “Jewish expert”; given this, he sought to elevate the role of the Foreign Office in Jewish affairs, particularly in finding a way to remove the Jews from German life. With this in mind, he suggested that all Jews falling into the German sphere—which, given the conquest of Poland, had increased considerably—be expelled and deported to the French island of Madagascar, off the coast of Africa in the Indian Ocean. Throughout the spring and summer of 1940 he worked hard on developing his plan, along the way alienating himself from the Jewish expert at the SS, Adolf Eichmann, who was attempting to take control of the project himself. The question over who was ultimately to have ownership of the scheme became moot, however, when Germany failed to defeat Britain in 1940 and thereby had to abandon the plan owing to the latter’s continued dominance of the sea lanes.

In October 1941 Rademacher became directly involved for the first time in the mass murder of Jews. At the request of the local Foreign Ministry representative in Belgrade who had asked for the city’s Jews to be deported, he was sent to Serbia to help occupation authorities there find a “local solution” to the Jewish question. Rademacher, who normally operated from Berlin, traveled to Belgrade to see firsthand whether the problem could be resolved in person. An agreement was reached without any further ado to shoot 1,300 Jews in situ. Upon his return to Berlin, Rademacher then filed a travel expense claim describing the reason for his trip as the “liquidation of Jews in Belgrade.”

From this beginning, Rademacher became involved more deeply in the developing Holocaust of the Jews. He helped to organize the deportation of Jews from France, Belgium, and the Netherlands to the extermination camps, employing the Foreign Office as the vehicle for demanding that governments allied to Germany surrender their Jewish citizens. In this way, Rademacher’s office was able to reduce any minimizing external complications that could otherwise have held the deportations back. Within Germany, he liaised with various state instrumentalities such as the SS, the better to smooth the path leading to the deportations. As a leading

Rademacher, Franz

Franz Rademacher was a German diplomat in charge of the so-called “Jewish desk” (Judenreferat D III) in the Ministry bureaucrat in foreign affairs, Rademacher exercised great skill in carrying out the requirements of his office, and he brought external policy and race policy together in a relationship that was literally murderous.

In the spring of 1943 Rademacher became caught up in internal departmental politics. His immediate superior, Martin Luther, involved Rademacher in a plot to supplant Joachim von Ribbentrop as foreign minister. Luther, for his pains, was arrested and sent to Sachsenhausen concentration camp; Rademacher was dismissed from the Foreign Office and forced to join the navy as an officer for the remainder of the war, ending the war in an intelligence unit. The Foreign Office was reorganized, with Rademacher's department closed down and all foreign matters relating to Jews transferred to the responsibility of Eberhard von Thadden, a lawyer who was head of the office's Inland II unit.

With the end of the war, Rademacher was arrested by British military police in November 1945. Although released, he subsequently became one of the few Nazi diplomats to be investigated. He was brought to trial in Germany in February 1952 for the murders he had overseen in Serbia and convicted by a German state court in Nuremberg-Furth. Appealing the case in 1953, he jumped bail while proceedings were taking place and fled to Syria with the aid of Nazi sympathizers in September of that year. The court convicted him in absentia and sentenced him to three years and five months' imprisonment.

While in the Middle East, his whereabouts were known, and in 1962 he became the subject of a failed assassination attempt at the hands of Israeli spy Eli Cohen. To some degree, this was the beginning of the end for Rademacher. In 1963 he was arrested on charges of spying; released in 1965 owing to ill health, he returned voluntarily to Germany, penniless, in 1966. He was arrested at Nuremberg airport on November 30, 1966, faced a new trial, and was again convicted of war crimes. On this occasion he was sentenced to five and half years' imprisonment, with the court ruling that he could be released owing to what it considered to be time served. A German high court overruled this judgment in 1971 and ordered another new trial. Rademacher appealed this action, but before proceedings could begin he died on March 17, 1973.

Ratlines

The term “ratlines” refers to a system of escape routes set up for Nazis and members of other fascist groups toward the end of World War II. The main escape routes led toward refuges in South America, particularly in the countries of Argentina, Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, and Bolivia. Other destinations included the United States, Canada, and the Middle East. There were two primary ratlines in the aftermath of World War II. The first route went from Germany to Spain, then Argentina; the second stretched from Germany to Rome, then to Genoa, and then South America. These routes originally developed independently but would eventually conjoin in order to collaborate.

The first ratlines are associated with numerous advances in Vatican-Argentine relations before and during the Second World War. In 1942 Italian cardinal Luigi Maglione contacted Ambassador Llobet of Argentina, questioning whether the Argentinian government was willing to expand its immigration laws in order to accommodate European Catholic immigrants. Following this, a German priest, Anton Weber, the leader of the Rome-based Society of Saint Raphael, traveled to Portugal and then to Argentina in order to lay the foundation for impending Catholic immigration. This route, meant for European Catholics, became a route that fascist outcasts would exploit, without the knowledge of the Catholic Church.

Spain, not Rome, was the original epicenter of ratline activity enabling the escape of Nazi fascists. However, the migration of Nazis and fascists was actually planned within the Vatican. Charles Lescat, a French associate of Action Française (a far right political movement, suppressed by Pope Pius XI and rehabilitated by Pius XII), and Pierre Daye, a Belgian with friends in the Spanish government, were some of the main planners of the fascist evacuation. Lescat and Daye were able to flee Europe first using the ratlines, with the help of Argentine cardinal Antonio Caggiano.

By 1946 there were hundreds of war criminals in Spain, as well as thousands of former Nazis and fascists. Unlike the Vatican emigration of European Catholics in Italy, focused in Vatican City, the ratlines of Spain, although promoted and created by the Vatican, were still autonomous from the Vatican Emigration Bureau.

After World War II came to an end in Italy, Bishop Alois Hudal, designated as the “Spiritual Director of the German People resident in Italy,” became active in ministering to German-speaking prisoners of war and detainees held in prisoner camps throughout Italy. In December 1944 the Vatican secretariat of state received permission to appoint a representative to visit the German-speaking prisoners in Italy, an occupation allocated to Hudal. He then used his position to assist in the escape of wanted Nazi war criminals. Some of his escapees included Franz Stangl, former commandant of the Sobibór and Treblinka death camps; Gustav Wagner, one-time commandant of Sobibór; Alois Brünner, director of the Drancy internment camp near Paris, and in charge of deportations in Slovakia to German concentration camps; and the overall head of the “Final Solution,” the notorious Adolf Eichmann. Some of these men were being detained in internment sites, usually without identity papers, and they would be registered in camp records under false names. Other Nazis had already escaped to Italy, and they sought out Hudal as his part in supporting escapes became known informally in Nazi circles.

Hudal stated in his memoirs, “I thank God that He [allowed me] to visit and comfort many victims in their prisons and concentration camps and to help them escape with false identity papers. . . . The Allies’ War against Germany was not a crusade, but the rivalry of economic complexes for whose victory they had been fighting. This so-called business . . . used catchwords like democracy, race, religious liberty and Christianity as a bait for the masses. All these experiences were the reason why I felt duty bound after 1945 to devote my whole charitable work mainly to former National Socialists and Fascists, especially to so-called ‘war criminals.’” Hudal was the first Catholic priest to commit himself to forming Nazi escape routes. Declassified U.S. intelligence reports have shown that Hudal was not the only priest assisting Nazi escapees at this time. Overall, Hudal’s ratline was relatively small-scale compared to larger operations.

The major Roman ratline was operated by a small but significant network of Croatian priests, members of the Franciscan order, and led by Father Krunoslav Draganović, who prepared a highly refined correspondence with headquarters at the San Girolamo degli Illirici Seminary College in Rome, but with associations from Austria to the final embarkation point in the port of Genoa.

Ravensbrück

Ravensbrück was a Nazi concentration camp for women, located 56 miles north of Berlin on swampy land near the Havel River. On May 15, 1939, the first prisoners arrived when 867 women were transferred from Lichtenburg. The camp was staffed by 150 female SS supervisors (Aufseherinnen), male guards, and male administrators. In 1942 and 1943 Ravensbrück served as a training base for female guards, and 3,500 women were trained there for work in Ravensbrück and other camps.

In late 1939 the camp held 2,000 prisoners. By late 1942 there were 10,800. In 1944 the main camp contained 26,700 female prisoners and several thousand female minors grouped in a detention camp for children. Most of the camp was evacuated in March 1945 as the Russians approached, and 24,500 prisoners were marched into Mecklenburg. When the camp was liberated by Soviet troops during April 29–30, they found only 3,500 ill and famished women left.

During its existence, at least 107,753 (123,000 according to Germaine Tillion) women were interned in Ravensbrück and its satellite camps, most of which were industrial slave labor sites. There was a concentration camp for men near Ravensbrück, but it was connected with the Sachsenhausen camp rather than being allocated to the Ravensbrück administration. It has been estimated that approximately 50,000 inmates died at Ravensbrück across the camp’s duration. In addition to general overwork, exposure, malnutrition, disease, and abuse, individual women were subjected to excruciating medical experimentation while in the camp, including bone transplants, induced gas gangrene, and deliberately infected incisions. Early in 1945 a gas chamber was constructed at the camp, where, it is asserted, between 2,200 and 2,400 women were gassed. Max Koegel, who had been commandant from the opening of the camp until the summer of 1942, committed suicide in 1946. His successor, Fritz Suhren, was tried and executed in 1950.

Ravensbrück was a concentration camp for women located north of Berlin. It is estimated that anywhere from 107,000 to 123,000 women passed through the camp and its satellite camps, with perhaps as many as 50,000 deaths. Refoulement

Refoulement is a French term, from the word “refouler” (to repress), meaning sending a person back to a country where he or she faces a threat to life or freedom. This was a policy introduced in Switzerland in 1938 as a way of ensuring that Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi Germany without satisfactory means or documentation were either forbidden from entering at the border, or returned to Germany upon arrival.

The stimulus for the change in what had previously been a more liberal acceptance policy was the German Anschluss, or union, with Austria in March 1938. Over the next few months, thousands of desperate Austrian Jews sought sanctuary in Switzerland. The country's motives behind the refoulement policy were several: a fear of being swamped with refugees; antisemitism within certain sections of the government and the bureaucracy; and concerns about German countermeasures, even aggression, should Switzerland be seen to be adopting a pro-Jewish policy. Refoulement saw the Swiss government develop a highly restrictive position, such that only families with children under 16 or adults over 60 were to be allowed entry. By October 1938 the policy received an enormous boost in the form of a new regulation to the passport laws of Germany and Switzerland; at the Swiss suggestion, the Nazi government agreed to stamp all Jewish passports with the letter “J” in red, as an indication of the bearer’s Jewish status. This greatly simplified the job of Swiss border guards assigned the task of identifying Jews and turning them back. In February 1939 Swiss authorities imposed even more stringent regulations, reducing further the number of Jews allowed into Switzerland.

All in all, Switzerland accepted about 200,000 refugees during World War II, a little over 10% of whom were Jews. Many thousands more passed through the country in transit to somewhere else, and among these, too, were Jews. Of those saved, though, the Swiss policy of refoulement ensured that only a minority got through. Recognizing the discriminatory injustice of the policy, in 1995 the president of Switzerland, Kaspar Villiger, officially apologized to the Jewish people for the actions of his predecessors over half a century earlier.

Since the Holocaust, a new concept, non-refoulement, has entered international refugee law as a direct response to the Swiss position during World War II, as many states in the postwar world were anxious to ensure that incidents like sending Jewish refugees back into the hands of the Nazis would not happen again. Non-refoulement prohibits states from sending refugees back to the countries or territories from which they have fled due to a threat to their lives and/or a deprivation of their basic freedoms. As part of customary international law, the principle of non-refoulement means that it is binding on all states, whether or not they are parties to the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (1951).

Reich Citizenship Law

The Reich Citizenship Law was the second of the so-called Nuremberg Laws introduced, after the tabling of the Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor, at the NSDAP rally held in Nuremberg from September 9 to 15, 1935. It introduced a new distinction between “Reich citizens” and “nationals.” Reich citizens had to meet two tests:

they were to be Germans of “German or kindred blood,” and they had to comport themselves appropriately (“willing and able to faithfully serve the German people and Reich”). The law provided that only citizens of the Reich could enjoy full political rights, which stripped Jews of any such rights; they henceforth became state nationals with the status of second-class subjects, though with particular obligations that they still owed to the Reich. In the following months the regime used this reduced status to push Jews out of a number of careers, professions, and programs of study for which Reich citizenship was required.

The right to citizenship under this law was now to be acquired by the granting of Reich citizenship papers. However, certificates of Reich citizenship were in fact never introduced, and all Germans other than Jews were provisionally classed as Reich citizens until 1945.

The question of who exactly was a Jew needed to be clarified with precision in order to effectively enforce either of the two Nuremberg Laws. An official definition was provided by the First Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law, introduced in November 14, 1935 (also called the Implementing Decree), which defined in some detail who was a “full Jew” or a Mischling (“mixed-breed”) in the National Socialist sense.

This decreed that a “full Jew” was a person who practiced Judaism or a person with at least three Jewish grandparents, regardless of religious practice. Those with fewer than three Jewish grandparents were designated as Mischlinge, of which there were two degrees: Mischling of the First Degree (a person with two Jewish grandparents, who did not practice Judaism and did not have a Jewish spouse); and Mischling of the Second Degree (a person with one Jewish grandparent and who did not practice Judaism). Unlike earlier forms of antisemitism, the new regulation defined Jewishness by “race” rather than by religion.

Clause § 4 of the First Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law stated that a Jew cannot be a citizen of the Reich, with no right to vote in political affairs or occupy a public office. Further, Jewish civil servants would “retire” as of December 31, 1935. This included the so-called Hindenburg provision, which was that if these civil servants served at the front in World War I, either for Germany or its allies, they would receive in full, until they reached the age limit, the full pension to which they were entitled according to the last salary they received; they would, however, not advance in seniority. After reaching the age limit, their pensions would be calculated anew, according to the last salary they received, on the basis of which their pension was calculated. The regulation also provided that the Reich Chancellor could grant exemptions from the regulations laid down in the law. The Nuremberg Laws were expanded on November 26, 1935, to include Roma and Afro-Germans.

The Nazi regime made a number of regulations under the Reich Citizenship Law. On June 14, 1938, the third regulation to the Law, passed in Nuremberg, defined a Jewish business or enterprise. As a consequence, if an owner or partner in a business was defined as a Jew, the company was considered Jewish and had to be registered as such. This regulation paved the way for compulsory “Aryanization” of Jewish businesses. With this, earlier discrimination against Jews in the German economy progressed to the removal of Jews from economic life.

On September 27, 1938, Regulation No. 5 to the Citizenship Law disbarred Jewish lawyers from the legal profession. From then on, a small proportion of these lawyers was allowed to work, providing legal counsel for Jewish clients only. Also in 1938 the government issued a regulation that revoked the medical licenses that had been issued to Jewish doctors and restricted them to the treatment of Jews.

Later, in 1939, another law forced Jewish landlords to house only Jewish tenants. The population got the message and began to post signs on stores and in towns denying goods and services to Jews or banning them outright. In 1941 the government stepped up its campaign by commencing the expropriation of real property and other property belonging to Jews, again by statute.

On September 19, 1942, also under the terms of the Reich Citizenship Law, all Jews were required to wear a yellow Star of David, and if found without it prominently displayed on their clothing, they were subject to severe punishments at the discretion of local law enforcement.

One of the last statutory measures in Hitler’s Germany in accordance with modern definitions of a “law” or “statute” was a regulation issued pursuant to the Reich Citizenship Law on July 1, 1943. This transferred the enforcement and punishment of Jews for alleged breaches of the law to the SS. It was the end of even a semblance of judicial process for Germany’s so-called “non-Aryans.” As early as 1942, however, the government had effectively shown that there was no longer any need to play out the charade of legislation or statute.

From the moment the Nazis came to power in 1933, the Jews of Germany were subjected to a never-ending series of discriminatory laws. The Reich Citizenship Law was the bedrock on which many of these rested, as, during the 12 years of Hitler’s regime, more than 400 separate regulations were issued against Jews, ranging from ownership of a radio, to attending a movie, to purchasing sugar from a grocer.

Reich Flight Tax

By the time the Nazis assumed office in January 1933, the notion that citizens saving tax by residing abroad was an “unpatriotic desertion” punishable with a tax levy was not new. As far back as 1918 the German government had issued a “law against tax evasion”; this was, however, abolished in 1925.

On December 8, 1931, the Weimar government introduced “the Fourth Decree of the Reich President for the Assurance of Economy and Finance and the Protection of Inner Peace” as part of reparations. The flight tax was just one of many other measures to be regulated by law; it was also about price and interest rate cuts, housing, social security, labor provisions, household security, wage cuts, and a blanket ban involving measures against misuse of weapons.

The flight tax (Reichsfluchsteuer) was seen as a tax on wealthy emigrants. It was presented as a temporary measure to halt capital flight and tax evasion by persons who were, on March 31, 1929, citizens of Germany and had moved their residence abroad, or would relocate from that date until December 31, 1932. A flight tax was payable provided the citizen possessed chargeable assets of more than 200,000 Reichsmarks (RM) or an annual income of about 20,000 RM. The tax rate was set at 25% of the total assets or the income and levied retroactively.

Taxable persons who tried to evade this levy were liable to be punished with not less than three months’ imprisonment and an unlimited fine. The names of those abroad who were found to have evaded this penalty were to be listed in a “Tax Wanted” poster published in the German Gazette (Reichsanzeiger), and they were subject to arrest in the event they visited Germany. Any assets remaining in Germany belonging to tax evaders who had moved overseas were liable to be seized. The law was due to expire at the end of 1932, but that year it was extended until December 31, 1934.

After the Nazis came to power in 1933, the existing flight tax law was extended six times, the last time on December 9, 1942. The first amendment was issued on May 18, 1934, named the “Law Concerning Revision of the Specifications of the Reich Flight Tax” (Gesetz über Änderung der Vorschriften über die Reichsfluchtsteuer). This measure lowered the asset threshold, previously 200,000 Reichsmarks, to 50,000 Reichsmarks. A much larger group of people was affected by this compulsory levy. The flight tax now mostly caught Jews forced to leave owing to fear of violence and imprisonment in concentration camps, and destruction of their right to work.

Before 1933 the tax revenue from the flight tax was of little significance; it was only just under one million Reichsmarks for the second financial year. After May 18, 1934, however, the Reichsfluchtsteuer formed a significant part of the Reich budget. The tax received rose to 17 million Reichsmarks in 1938, reaching a later annual peak of 342 million. Overall, the Nazi state received 941 million Reichsmarks from the flight taxes collected, with an estimated 90% coming from racially oppressed migrants.

The transfer of remaining funds out of Germany after emigration was further depleted due to manipulated exchange rates. Even the export of small sums was an extremely complicated process. The exemption limit for foreign exchange in 1934 was fixed at 10 marks. Banking and securities balances left behind had to be paid into a “blocked emigrant’s account” and were released only in certain cases.

For the impounded funds to be converted into foreign currency it was necessary to pay a fee or “commission” on transfer. In January 1934 the “commission” on capital transfer from the émigrés’ blocked accounts, that is, the fees deducted, was approximately 20% of the total amount transferred. By June 1935 it had jumped to 68%. In October 1936 it increased to 81%, and in June 1938 it rose to 90% of the total. From September 1939 the fee was uniformly 96%.

Even after all taxes and levies had been paid and all formalities settled, wealthy émigrés were subjected to further extortion before leaving the country. A tight surveillance net was created to discover persons planning to flee the country: the post office tracked change of address orders by Jews; freight companies were required to report moves; notaries reported sales of real estate; life insurance companies were required to report cancellations of life insurance. The Gestapo tracked the letter and telephone correspondence of suspected individuals.

The obligations that had to be met by a Jew emigrating from Germany at the end of 1938 were (1) the 20% fine levied upon his or her entire fortune as punishment for the assassination of Ernst vom Rath, the German legation secretary in Paris in November, 1938; (2) the 25% Reich flight tax, payable by all persons with assets of 50,000 marks or more; (3) the 100% tax on all personal belongings purchased after 1933; and (4) sale of any remaining marks to the Gold Discount Bank at the prevailing rate of 6.5%, provided that the bank was willing to purchase.

On October 23, 1941, all further Jewish emigration was prohibited by an order of Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler. With the end of the war, the imposition of Allied military rule, and then the reversion to democracy, the law relating to flight tax was repealed by the “Law for the Repeal of Obsolete Tax Regulations” of July 23, 1953.

Reichssicherheitshauptamt

The Reich Security Main Office, or RSHA, was the central office through which the Nazis dealt with their political and ideological enemies. It was established on September 27, 1939, as a combination of the Sicherheitsdienst (Security Service, or SD) and the Sicherheitspolizei (Security Police, or SiPo), which included the Geheime Staatspolizei (Secret State Police, or Gestapo) and the Kriminalpolizei (Criminal Police, or Kripo).

Reinhard Heydrich was the first commander of the RSHA until he was assassinated on June 2, 1942. His place was taken by Ernst Kaltenbrunner in January 1943. Under Heydrich’s leadership, the RSHA grew into the terror organization used most extensively by the Nazi state. Once organized, it comprised seven departments: I, “Administration and Legal”; II, “Ideological Investigation”; III, “Spheres of German Life”; IV, “Suppression of Opposition”; V, “Suppression of Crime”; VI, “Foreign Intelligence Service”; and VII, “Ideological Research and Evaluation.” The entire organization was answerable to Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler.

Department IV, under the control of Heinrich Müller, was the Gestapo. It, in turn, was divided into 14 divisions, each dealing with matters such as political enemies, treason, and counterintelligence. Section IV B-4, also called the Jewish Affairs Department, was headed by SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann. From late 1941 on, section IV B-4 was responsible for the “Final Solution of the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage), and, as such, coordinated the deportation of European Jews to ghettos, forced labor and concentration camps, and extermination camps. Much of the “heavy lifting” in this process was undertaken by the Sicherheitspolizei (the SiPo), comprising the Gestapo and Kripo.

While the RSHA regulated all the security services of Nazi Germany, it was also heavily involved in the racial issues that so consumed the Third Reich. Through the SiPo, the RSHA recruited and maintained the men who staffed the Einsatzgruppen units that carried out the mass extermination of Jews, Roma, and others in the Soviet Union and the occupied eastern territories. The RSHA also acted to extend its remit with regard to the Final Solution into countries allied to Germany, such as Slovakia, Croatia, Romania, and especially Hungary, where a special unit of SS administrators, headed by Eichmann himself, was sent in March 1944 to assist the Hungarians in facilitating the identification, concentration, and deportation of that country’s Jewish community.

Overall, therefore, it can be concluded that the RSHA formed the administrative core of the Holocaust. Not only was it the formal and intelligence agency for the security police, it was also the coordinating agency for the Holocaust. During the years of its existence it expanded enormously, both in terms of personnel and also in respect of its functions—either delegated to it or which it arrogated unto itself.

dehumanize, and ultimately destroy the Jewish people of Europe. They said no in a wide variety of ways and for a plethora of reasons.

A few individuals, such as Oskar Schindler, Raoul Wallenberg, and André Trocmé, have received widespread public attention. But most remain unknown to the wider public, even though their efforts on behalf of Jews are remarkable and deserving of broader recognition. A few examples will suffice here.

Tina Strobos was a Dutch medical student who, with her mother, helped save more than 100 Jews from the Nazis during World War II by giving them refuge on the upper floor of her Amsterdam home—just a few blocks away from another safe house in the same neighborhood, where Anne Frank and her family were being shielded by Miep Gies and others.

Ho Feng-Shan was the Chinese consul to Vienna, and one of the first diplomats to save Jews by issuing them visas to escape Nazi Germany. Between 1938 and 1940 he was responsible for saving thousands of Jews in Nazi-occupied Austria. For continuing to issue visas despite a direct order for him not to do so, a black mark, or “demerit,” was entered into Ho’s personnel file in 1939. He continued issuing visas, however, until recalled to China in May 1940. It is not known how many visas he actually authorized prior to then, but there is solid room for speculation that many, probably numbering in the thousands, were issued.

María Errázuriz was a Chilean woman who worked with the French Resistance during the Nazi occupation of France in World War II, saving Jewish children at considerable risk to her own life. Captured and tortured, she never broke when demands were made to reveal where she had hidden the children in her care.

William L. Shirer was an American journalist, war correspondent, and historian, perhaps best known for his book The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich. Wherever possible, he took a stand against the Nazis through his reportage, but there was only so much on which he could report—his outgoing dispatches were watched carefully by the Nazis as a condition of his credentials being respected, or he would have been expelled. Despite this, he and his wife Tess sheltered Jews in their home as a refuge for those who had gone into hiding. Occasionally the Shirers would find themselves harboring a Jewish man who had just been released from a jail or concentration camp. In such circumstances, their guest would often have been badly beaten or mistreated, and they would care for him until he had recovered sufficiently to be able to return to his family in something resembling a passable condition.

Rescuers of Jews

Rescuers were people who said no to the attempt by National Socialist Germany, between 1933 and 1945, to disenfranchise,

Well over 26,000 rescuers have been recognized by Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Memorial Authority situated in Jerusalem. It honors non-Jews who risked their own lives, and often those of their families, to save Jews during the Holocaust. Such people are given the title Righteous among the Nations (in Hebrew, Hasidei umot Haolam). After an exhaustive investigation process, if a person's actions are deemed to be sufficiently worthy of recognition as Righteous, the honoree (or their heirs) are invited to Jerusalem to receive a plaque and to plant a carob tree in the Garden of the Righteous, in permanent commemoration of the act for which they are being recognized. This is generally acknowledged as the highest form of recognition that can be bestowed upon non-Jews who saved Jews.

None of this, of course, speaks to the large number of Jews who worked to rescue other Jews during the Holocaust. There were many who managed to find ways to save their fellow Jews; among many thousands can be included names such as Wilhelm Bachner, Moussa Abadi, Marianne Cohn, Mila Racine, Aron Grünhut, Rabbi Regina Jonas, and Walter Süsskind.

Saving lives during the Holocaust was sometimes next to impossible. It was a time when living space, food, sanitation facilities, and medicine were at a premium, and those who helped Jews risked their own lives as well as those of their families. Given the enormous risks involved in undertaking rescue efforts, it is remarkable that any of these initiatives took place at all. When we ask, therefore, why there were so few examples of upstanding during the Holocaust, the question could more readily be, in view of everything people faced, why were there so many?

Rescuers existed in all countries under Nazi occupation. They came from all walks of life, belonged to every nationality, confessed to every religious belief, and belonged to all age groups and social classes. They comprised both men and women; some were educated, others were not.

During the Holocaust rescuing Jews was very far from being a soft option, and all too frequently choosing to become a rescuer was fraught with emotional, moral, and physical dilemmas. To stand out from the crowd, to refuse to acquiesce, to not compromise one's own values in order to guarantee personal safety at the expense of that of others—these were grueling issues for people to confront during this most extreme period in history. Human behavior during the Holocaust, it might be said, was the paradigmatic example of all the best—and the worst—that human civilization carries within it, and those who rescued Jews were among the finest examples of human beings acting under conditions of extreme stress on behalf of others.

Reserve Police Battalion 101

German Nazi mobile killing squad comprised chiefly of middle-aged German reservists from Hamburg, who operated in occupied Poland and the Soviet Union during World War II and played a key role in the implementation of the Holocaust. The unit was first activated and dispatched to Poland in September 1939. Once there, it took Polish soldiers as prisoners, staffed a prisoner of war camp, and confiscated Polish military supplies. On December 13, 1939, the battalion returned to Hamburg and was partly reconstituted.

The battalion returned to Poland in May 1940, where it was engaged in rounding up and deporting Jews, Roma, Poles, and others in the western sector of the country. In just five months, the unit rounded up some 37,000 people. By the late summer of 1940 the battalion was tasked with pursuing Poles who had defied earlier deportation orders. In late November 1940 the unit was sent to patrol the Łódź ghetto, with orders to shoot to kill any Jews who strayed too close to the fence surrounding them.

In May 1941 the battalion was again sent back to Hamburg where it was reorganized, this time with a number of men from Luxembourg along with those from Hamburg. It trained there for the better part of a year and was also involved in the deportation of Jews from Hamburg. Many of these were sent by train to Minsk, Riga, or Łódź. By June 1942 the battalion had returned to Poland, this time assigned to the Lublin District. There it was tasked with gathering Jews from smaller towns and outlying areas for deportation to concentration camps or ghettos. In July 1942 the unit participated in mass shootings of Jews and others deemed “undesirable” in a number of smaller Polish communities.

From this time on, the battalion perpetrated one of the largest civilian massacres of World War II; at least 32,000 people were killed in three separate concentration camps in the Lublin District. Indeed, between July 1942 and November 1943, it is estimated that the unit murdered in excess of 39,000 people and deported 45,000 others. Between January 1944 and the end of the war in April 1945 the battalion was engaged mainly against local partisans, resisters, and enemy forces. The unit returned to Hamburg in the spring of 1945.

Despite the atrocities committed by Reserve Police Battalion 101, just four members were brought to justice in the immediate postwar period. In 1947 the men were sent to Poland where they were tried and convicted; two received prison sentences and the other two were condemned to death. However, the battalion’s activities came under more scrutiny by the mid-1960s, resulting in the trial of 14 more members. Nearly all were convicted, but just five were sentenced to prison. Later, the sentences were reduced on appeal.

countless individual acts of resistance to large, well-organized resistance movements. In every nation occupied by German or Axis forces, there was some level of resistance, both by Jews and non-Jews, and not just against military occupations. Many also resisted Nazi and fascist ideology. Resistance was most keenly felt in Eastern Europe and was largely (though far from exclusively) carried out by Jews. The number of resisters and resistance groups will likely never be known for certain, because many postwar governments tended to inflate the number of resisters for political reasons. In many places, resistance was not monolithic or centrally organized; in fact, some resistance movements were badly split by ideological, political, and religious differences as well as by age-old ethnic feuds and the egos of the various resistance leaders.

Resistance itself encompassed a wide array of active and passive measures. Active resistance included sabotage, murder, assassinations, intelligence gathering, bombings, and the like. Passive resistance also took many forms. It included noncooperation with authorities, civil disobedience, organizing underground newspapers, smuggling Jews and other targets of Nazi persecution out of the country, and hiding Jews and other Nazi targets. Resistance, of course, occurred via large-scale resistance groups, like the Jewish Fighting Organization, the Jewish Army, the National Council of the Resistance in France, the Cetniks in Yugoslavia, and the secret Home Army in Poland, among a number of others.

A somewhat popular but completely false impression of resistance developed in the postwar period. That interpretation seemed to suggest that most Jews did not offer any resistance toward their Nazi persecutors and went to their deaths without much of a fight—as it was said, “like sheep to the slaughter.” This is simply not true. Jews resisted their oppressors and captors in every ghetto, on every deportation train, and in every concentration camp. Their resistance was sometimes solitary, but could also be a part of an organized group effort. It took many forms—from smuggling, to sabotage, to assassinations, to spying, to running underground newspapers, to devising anti-German propaganda. Passive resistance had its own end—to simply survive the ordeal while maintaining one’s dignity, and this, of course, was far more daunting than it appears on the surface. Jewish spiritual resistance took on a multitude of forms. It ranged from creating Jewish institutions in ghettos and concentration camps to providing clandestine education for children. It also encompassed the observation of Jewish holidays and religious and cultural rituals, preserving the history of communal existence, maintaining journals and memoirs, and Resistance to the Nazi onslaught took many forms throughout Europe. Whether by Jew or non-Jew, an organized group or individuals, by means of the circulation of anti-Nazi pamphlets, hit-and-run raids, ghetto or camp uprisings, or, as in this picture, saboteurs placing explosives, the efforts to be free of the Nazi yoke spanned the entirety of the 12 years of the Third Reich. collecting and hiding documentation of Jewish experiences during World War II.

Within Germany itself, there was a considerable Jewish resistance movement, mainly composed of sabotage, assassinations, and intelligence gathering for the Allies. Most of this activity was carried out by leftist Zionist groups. Jews in the Netherlands worked closely with the communists and other non-Jewish resisters, and at least 1,000 Dutch Jews actively resisted the German occupation; of that number, only half survived the war. In Belgium, Jewish resistance ramped up as soon as the German occupation began in the late spring of 1940. It grew to include sabotage, urban guerilla-style warfare, and hiding Belgian Jews. At least 3,000 Jewish-Belgian children were successfully hidden from Germans between 1941 and 1945. In France, Jews made up nearly 20% of the French Resistance movement, even though they comprised only about 1% of the French population. The Armée Juive, or Jewish Army (numbering some 2,000 at its peak), which was formed in Toulouse, conducted attacks and sabotage against German personnel and interests, smuggled hundreds of Jews into neutral Spain, Portugal, and Switzerland, and incited uprisings in major French cities in the summer of 1944 to help divert German attention and troops from the Allied landings at Normandy beginning in June 1944.

There were, of course, a number of Jewish revolts in ghettos as well as concentration and death camps. There were at least 14 separate major uprisings in ghettos between 1941 and 1945. The April–May 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was the largest and most noteworthy. When those imprisoned in the ghetto learned that they were to be deported to Treblinka, the Jewish Fighting Organization and the Jewish Military Union instigated a major rebellion that lasted for several weeks, killing some 16–18 Germans and wounding 85 more. A revolt at the Treblinka death camp in August 1943 witnessed attacks against German guards and widespread sabotage, ultimately forcing the camp's closure. In October of that year, Polish Jews at the Sobibór death camp killed their German and Ukrainian guards before staging a mass breakout in which some 300 prisoners managed to escape. Only about 60 of these survived the war. At Auschwitz in October 1944, prisoners in the XII Sonderkommando blew up one of the crematoria with explosives smuggled into the camp by female prisoners.

General resistance in France to the Nazi occupation, which began in June 1940, was among the most well-organized and most well-known resistance movements during the war. This included the Maquis, who were dogged guerrilla-style fighters, as well as the National Council of Resistance. In Norway, resisters launched a strike against a hydroelectric plant in February 1943 and sank a ferry that helped delay Nazi production of an atomic bomb. There were also many active resisters in the Soviet Union; they fought against the German occupation, mainly in the western portions of the country, and included Jews and non-Jews alike.

The extent to which these various resistance groups helped to defeat the Germans and their allies is hard to gauge. Nevertheless, resistance movements certainly forced the Nazis to divert considerable manpower and resources to staunch rebellious activity and track down resisters. In this the resisters were quite successful.

Rhineland Bastards

The term “Rhineland Bastards,” or, in German, Rheinland-bastarde, was a designation given in the Third Reich during the 1930s to the children of mixed liaisons (rarely marriages) between German women and soldiers from French Africa who were stationed in the Rhineland as occupation forces between 1920 and 1930. It was estimated that there were some 500 of these mixed-descent offspring. As they were German citizens, there was at first no legal basis for launching discriminatory measures against these children; the 1933 Sterilization Law, for example, did not consider race as a reason for compulsory sterilization. However, in 1937 the so-called “Rhineland Bastards” were secretly sterilized by the Gestapo. It has been suggested that the order to proceed with this action came from Hitler himself, as he was just as concerned about interracial crossbreeding between Aryans and Africans as he was between Aryans and Jews.

Riefenstahl, Leni

Leni Riefenstahl was an accomplished dancer, actress, photographer, innovator in the art of cinematography, and more, but the powerful and technically cutting-edge Nazi propaganda films that she directed were at once her greatest achievements in life and her lifelong albatross.

Helene Bertha Amalie “Leni” Riefenstahl was born in Berlin on August 22, 1902, to a financially comfortable family. Her first love was dance, and she might have continued in that field but for a knee injury that sidelined her for about Leni Riefenstahl, shown here editing film in 1935, was an effective and innovative German cinematographer who used her technical and directorial talents to create what are generally regarded as some of the most powerful propaganda films of World War II. Her close relationship with Adolf Hitler, together with the content of her films, worked against her when she attempted to find a place for herself in Hollywood after the war. three months in 1924. It was then that she saw a film—Der Berg des Schicksals (The Mountain of Destiny), directed by Arnold Fanck—that so impressed her that she turned her talents toward acting and, eventually, directing.

The first time Riefenstahl saw Adolf Hitler speaking at a rally she was spellbound. Similarly, when Hitler saw her first film in 1932—Das Blaue Licht (The Blue Light)—he was so impressed with her ability to capture his own sense of Germanic greatness that in 1933 he asked her to direct a short film. This paved the way for his commissioning her to direct the film for which she is best known, Triumph des Willens (Triumph of the Will), released in 1935. It chronicled the grandiose Nazi Party Congress of 1934, held in Nuremberg, focusing on Germany's seemingly invincible military strength, the almost reverential devotion of the German people to their Führer, and what was shown as the compelling nature of Hitler's charismatic leadership. Her unique use of cameras, including aerial photography, and her overall directing skills gave the film such power that it is considered today to be one of the most effective propaganda films ever made.

This led to Riefenstahl directing another propaganda film that is also regarded as one of the very best. Released in 1938, Olympia is a documentary of the 1936 Olympics in Germany. The cinematographic innovations in it—including, for example, slow motion—may today be taken for granted, but at the time they were groundbreaking. Like Triumph of the Will, it was greeted with acclaim.

However, as Riefenstahl was soon to discover, the films that brought her fame in Germany only brought her infamy elsewhere. On a 1938 trip to Hollywood, during which she sought to promote Olympia and find a distributor for it, she was shunned by most studio executives (although Walt Disney did meet with her) and was unable to find a distributor for the film. The negative reaction she faced on that trip was exacerbated by the violence of Kristallnacht that had erupted in Germany, but it was her association with the Nazis—and Hitler in particular—that would come to dog her wherever she went, not just at that time but during the 57 years of her life after the war.

Riefenstahl's relationship with Hitler was always a subject for speculation. It is clear that her work was highly regarded by him, but it was never clear if their relationship had a more personal side to it. A similar uncertainty surrounds the question of the level of her support for the Nazi Party, which she never joined. Those who would characterize her belief in Nazi ideology as minimal point to her distress when she saw German troops killing Polish civilians. She found it so upsetting that she appealed to Hitler to order a halt to such actions.

After the war, Riefenstahl was subject to intense scrutiny, first by the Americans and later the French, to assess her role in the Nazis' actions. She claimed she knew nothing of the extermination of the Jews and others, and argued that she made her films through her own independent film company and not through the Nazi government. After several "denazification" programs, it was decided that despite her role in the creation of Nazi propaganda films and her relationship with Hitler, she was no more than a "follower" or a "fellow traveler" (Mitläufer), a term of classification that was a step below "exonerated" (Entlastete), but above "less incriminated" (Minderbelastete). The Americans reached that conclusion and released her in June 1945, and the French in July 1949.

Despite these official decisions and her obvious talent as a film director, Riefenstahl found herself a pariah in the film industry. Even after she moved from film to still photography—where, again, she showed both skill and creativity—she could not shake the public’s perception of her as a Nazi propagandist. Riefenstahl brought many civil suits against those who she said had maligned her by suggesting a greater involvement with the Nazi Party, and she was herself the subject of a suit that was not settled until she apologized in 2002 for having incorrectly claimed that all of the Roma concentration camp prisoners that she used as extras in one of her films had survived the war.

Riefenstahl published her autobiography in 1987 and wrote several books on the Nuba people in Sudan, but she remained the subject of controversy for her entire life. In 1997, when she was 95, a showing of her photographs was the subject of protests. Riefenstahl died on September 8, 2003, at the age of 101.

Riegner Telegram

The Riegner Telegram was sent in 1942 by Gerhart Riegner, the representative of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva, to contacts in the governments of the United States and Great Britain with information regarding the planned imminent extermination of the Jews under Nazi control. It is as important for the way the telegram was handled as for what it said.

Gerhart Moritz Riegner, a Jew, was born on September 11, 1911, in Berlin. Having fled to Switzerland to escape anti-semitism in the early years of the Nazi regime, Riegner became the director of the Geneva office of the World Jewish Congress. It was in this capacity that he found himself in receipt of information regarding the Nazi plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe. The information came from a successful German industrialist, Eduard Schulte, and was considered by Riegner to be reliable.

On August 8, 1942, Riegner went to both the U.S. embassy and the British consulate in Geneva. In the former he asked a vice-consul to send a telegram containing his information to the State Department in Washington and also to Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, president of the World Jewish Congress; in the latter, he asked that the information be sent to Samuel Sidney Silverman, a member of Parliament and chairman of the British section of the World Jewish Congress. The telegram stated:

Received alarming report stating that, in the Fuehrer’s Headquarters, a plan has been discussed, and is under consideration, according to which all Jews in countries occupied or controlled by Germany numbering 3½ to 4 millions [sic] should, after deportation and concentration in the East, be at one blow exterminated, in order to resolve, once and for all the Jewish question in Europe. Action is reported to be planned for the autumn. Ways of execution are still being discussed including the use of prussic acid. We transmit this information with all the necessary reservation, as exactitude cannot be confirmed by us. Our informant is reported to have close connexions [sic] with the highest German authorities, and his reports are generally reliable.

Although it later proved to be inaccurate in parts, at the time Riegner brought the telegram to the attention of the U.S. State Department and the British Foreign Office it was believed that the killing of millions of Jews was to start within a month, and the extermination was to be done “at one blow.” This made a response to the information urgent.

The British Foreign Office delayed for several weeks but did send the information to Silverman. He, in turn, forwarded the telegram to Wise, who received it on August 28, 1942. The State Department, however, did not send the telegram to Wise, despite Riegner’s request. Wise learned of Riegner’s telegram only because Silverman sent it to him. Upon receipt of the information from Silverman, Wise contacted Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles, who asked Wise not to make the information public until it could be confirmed by additional sources. That did not happen until November 24, 1942, by which time the State Department had received numerous corroborating reports of what was happening in Germany and the extended Reich. At that time Wise was free to make the Riegner Telegram public.

On December 17, 1942, the Allied governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union simultaneously issued a statement acknowledging and condemning the exterminatory actions against the Jews being taken by the Nazi government. That announcement was issued less than a month from the date on which the existence and information of the Riegner telegram was made public. However, from the time Riegner first informed the U.S. and British governments of the information he had received from Schulte, to the date that it was allowed to be publicized—a full three and a half months—and the fact that the State Department did not forward the information to Rabbi Wise as requested, represented a delay during which tens or hundreds of thousands of Jews were killed, and during which 3.5 to 4 million Jews were expected to be killed.

The Riegner telegram was not the first report the Allies had received of mass murder of the Jews by the Nazis, but it was of great significance nonetheless because the information came from a German source. The treatment of the information has been cited as one of many pieces of evidence that the U.S. State Department was unconscionably slow in its response to the crisis of the extermination of the Jews of Europe.

Riga

Riga, the capital of Latvia, saw its prewar population of 40,000 Jews totally devastated at the hands of the Nazi occupiers, with significant hands-on cooperation by Latvian auxiliaries who volunteered to be part of the extermination process.

After World War I, Riga was the capital of an independent Latvia, but that was to change in August 1940 when Russia annexed the country—and imposed restrictions on the Jewish community—making it the capital of the Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic. That status, too, was short lived. In less than a year, Germany occupied the country, making Riga the capital of a country now under the administration of the Reichskommissariat Ostland. This was established specifically to provide civilian administration of the Baltic countries, with interlinked objectives: to exterminate the Jews and resettle Germans in their stead.

Germany made its presence known to the Jewish community of Riga—which only a few years earlier had been a vibrant, prosperous, and culturally robust community—immediately. Jews were assaulted, beaten, tortured, killed, and forced to watch as synagogues in the city were destroyed by fire. During the whole time of Germany's occupation, Latvian police units volunteered to help the Nazis in these actions. As was the case in Nazi Germany, Latvia adopted antisemitic laws that forced Jews from their professions, required the wearing of the Star of David, and restricted the stores in which food could be purchased, among many such laws.

The next step occurred in August 1941, when the Jews of Riga—now reduced to some 30,000 in number—were forced into a ghetto established in one of the city's suburbs. It was sealed in October. Like all of the ghettos established by the Nazi regime, the space, housing, sanitation, food, and water supplies were wholly inadequate to support a population of that size.

Also as was the case with other ghettos, a Judenrat (Jewish Council) was established to organize the ghetto and interact with Nazi command. The Judenrat, chaired by Michael Elyashov, was able to bring some order to an otherwise deadly and chaotic environment. A Jewish police unit was established, as was a hospital, pharmacy, schools, and so forth.

The Riga ghetto had two sections, each initially run as a separate entity. The “small” ghetto originally housed only Jews who were capable of working, with the majority of the Jewish population in the “large” ghetto. All of this changed when the plan to totally exterminate the Jews became operative.

During the ten days from November 30, 1941, to December 9, 1941, some 26,000 Jews were shot by German units and Latvian police auxiliaries, eliminating the entire population of the large ghetto. Although much of the killing in the earlier days of the German occupation took place in the Rumbula Forest, more of the killing occurred in the Bikernek Forest.

The remaining 4,000 to 5,000 Jews were held in the small ghetto. With the large ghetto now empty, approximately 20,000 Jews were shipped there from various parts of the Reich. By November 1942 the small ghetto had been absorbed so there was now one ghetto, but it was separated into two sections, one for German Jews and the other for Latvian Jews.

The Riga ghetto had an active resistance group that wanted to escape and join partisans in the surrounding woods. In October 1942 a small group was able to get out of the ghetto but was captured in short order, resulting in reprisal killings by the Nazis, especially the killing of the Jewish police unit.

In the summer of 1943 some of the surviving Jews were sent to the Kaiserwald concentration camp or to its subcamps. In November of that year a major killing operation took place in the ghetto, and it was liquidated in December 1943.

One last task remained: the destruction of evidence of the mass killings that took place in Riga. To that end, in 1944 the final surviving Jews were ordered to open the mass graves and remove and burn the bodies. By the time the Soviets liberated Riga in October 1944, the Jewish community of Riga had effectively ceased to exist.

Righteous among the Nations

By an act of Israel's Knesset (parliament) in 1953, non-Jews who risked their own lives, and often those of their own families, sometimes resulting in their deaths, to aid and/or rescue Jews, have been recognized as "Righteous among the Nations" (Hebrew, Hasidei umot haolam). The term is taken from the Talmud ("the righteous of all nations have a share in the world to come," Talmud Bavli Tractate Sanhedrin 105a). Although the term had been used by rabbis in a religious sense as early as the tenth century CE to designate those Christians who, by their merit, are as eligible as any member of the House of Israel to enter the Hereafter, it has come to mean non-Jews who risked their lives to save Jewish lives during the Holocaust.

Acts of rescue during the Holocaust included sheltering Jews seeking to avoid capture by the Nazis; supplying false documents; providing food, clothing, and shelter; and guiding Jews to places of safety, among many other rescue efforts. Since the early 1960s those who are recognized as "Righteous" have been honored at Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial authority in Jerusalem, though public recognition. After an exhaustive investigation process, if a person's actions during the Holocaust are deemed to be sufficiently worthy of elevation to the status of "Righteous among the Nations," either the honoree or his or her heirs are invited to Jerusalem to receive the award of a plaque from Yad Vashem and to have their name added to those on the Wall of Honor in the Garden of the Righteous in permanent commemoration of the act for which they are being acknowledged. In earlier times the honoree was entitled to plant a carob tree in the garden, but this had to be discontinued owing to a lack of space. Under Israeli law, recognition of Righteous status enables Yad Vashem "to confer honorary citizenship upon the Righteous among the Nations, and if they have died, the commemorative citizenship of the State of Israel, in recognition of their actions."

When Yad Vashem was established in 1953, one of its earliest goals was to recognize non-Jews who chose to save Jews during the Holocaust. Since 1963 the identification and recognition of such people has been the responsibility of a commission headed by a justice of Israel's Supreme Court, whose duty is to investigate cases brought before it and then, when appropriate, make the award. A very tight set of criteria have been established in order to enable the commission to do its work. These include the following: only a Jewish party can put a nomination forward; helping a family member, or assisting a Jew to convert to Christianity, is not a criterion for recognition; assistance has to be sustained and/or substantial; and assistance has to be given without any financial gain expected in return (although covering normal expenses such as rent or food is acceptable).

Nehama Tec, a Holocaust survivor and professor emerita of sociology from the University of Connecticut, Stamford, has suggested six common characteristics of righteous rescuers: individuality or separateness from their social environment, independence or self-reliance, a commitment to helping the needy, a modest self-appraisal of their extraordinary actions, unplanned initial engagement in Jewish rescue, and universalistic perceptions of Jews as human beings in dire need of assistance. That said, it must be emphasized that non-Jewish rescuers during the Holocaust acted from a wide variety of motives, while sharing in common the distinction that they all saved Jews from the mortal fate intended by the Nazis.

Some names of those recognized as "Righteous among the Nations" stand out in public memory, even today. These include the Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, whose efforts saved up to 100,000 Jews in Hungary; the German businessman Oskar Schindler, whose factory served as a refuge for more than 1,200 Jews while still producing goods for the German war effort; the Swiss vice-consul to Budapest, Carl Lutz, who, like Wallenberg, used his influence to guarantee the lives of more than 62,000 Jews in Hungary; and an Italian citizen, Giorgio Perlasca, who posed as a Spanish diplomat in order to save more than 5,000 Jews in Budapest. Others include the Japanese representative Chuine “Sempo” Sugihara; Miep Gies, who aided the family of Anne Frank; and the inhabitants of the French village of Le Chambon under its Huguenot pastor, André Trocmé.

Since 1962 Yad Vashem has recognized those deemed to be Righteous from 44 different countries and nationalities. There are Christians from all denominations and churches, Muslims and agnostics, and men and women of all ages. The number of Righteous is updated at the beginning of each year: as of February 2016, the award of Righteous status has been made to some 25,685 people, literally from all over the world. Some 6,620 came from Poland, 5,516 from the Netherlands, 3,925 from France, 2,544 from Ukraine, and 1,707 from Belgium. Others range from several hundred to (in the case of a number of countries) one.

Ringelblum, Emanuel

Emanuel Ringelblum was a Polish Jewish historian best remembered for creating the Oneg Shabbat archive (also called the Ringelblum Archive) in the Warsaw Ghetto. He was born in Buchach (then in the Austro-Hungarian Empire) on November 21, 1900. He moved to Nowy Sącz in 1914, and under the influence of two friends, Raphael Mahler and Artur Eisenbach—both of whom would also become noted historians—Ringelblum joined Poale Zion (“Workers of Zion”), a Marxist-Zionist Jewish workers’ movement established across Russia at the start of the twentieth century. After the party split in 1920 he moved further to the left and played a major role in the organization’s Yiddish cultural work.

In 1927 he earned a doctorate in history from the University of Warsaw, focusing on the history of the Jews of Warsaw during the Middle Ages, and developed a reputation as an expert on Polish Jewish history from late medieval times to the eighteenth century. After completing his thesis he taught history at Yehudiya, a private secondary school for girls, before working for the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

In November 1938 he was sent by the JDC to the Polish border town of Zbaszyna, where six thousand Jewish refugees from Germany were huddled with nowhere else to go. They had been expelled from Germany but forbidden from entering Poland. Ringelblum’s task was to try to coordinate relief efforts helping these people—a duty leaving him with much on which to reflect concerning the nature of good, evil, and helping those in need. He later wrote a book, Notes on the Refugees in Zbaszyn, giving a detailed perspective on the situation there.

After Poland was invaded by the Nazis in 1939, Ringelblum and his family were forced into the Warsaw Ghetto. It took him little time to realize what he needed to do; he would collect information in secret regarding every facet of life in the ghetto, to serve as a comprehensive and permanent record of what the Nazis were doing to the Jews of Warsaw and, by extension, to Poland. He recruited a number of Jewish writers, scientists, and other citizens to work with him in collecting diaries and documents. He organized studies to be undertaken, and sent younger people out onto the streets to gather posters and announcements pasted around the ghetto.

This all came together under the aegis of what Ringelblum called the Oneg Shabbat (or “Sabbath Pleasure”) Archive, which he founded in November 1940. He would coordinate and collect materials by day and spend his evenings writing. Overall, his archive would eventually comprise nearly 30,000 individual sheets of data relating to towns, villages, the ghetto, and the resistance movement, as well as whatever was known about other ghettos, the Chełmno and Treblinka death camps, and the effects of starvation and disease on artificially confined civilian populations.

While engaged in these activities, Ringelblum remained active in the day-to-day life of the ghetto, working for the Żydowska Samopomoc Społeczna (Jewish Social Aid), which had been established to assist those suffering from starvation. He organized welfare programs and soup kitchens, and tried to find other ways in which to help combat deprivation. At the same time, he also co-founded, with Menahem Linder, the Yidishe Kultur Organizatsye, a society to maintain and advance Yiddish culture in the ghetto.

The gathering of materials for Oneg Shabbat continued at least until late February 1943, but after this other events overtook the project. The resistance movement had already begun to fight back against the Nazis the month before, and the liquidation of the ghetto seemed imminent. Ringelblum saw that he should attempt to escape if he was to continue his work. Before he did so, however, he made sure that the archive would be protected. It was placed into three large milk cans and several metal boxes. They were buried and placed in various parts of the ghetto.

In March 1943 Ringelblum took his family into the Aryan section of Warsaw. After the uprising began on April 19 he returned to the ghetto; when captured, he was deported to the Trawniki labor camp but in August 1943 managed to escape helped by a Polish man and Jewish woman. He hid in an underground bunker with his wife Yehudis, son Uri, and 34 others at Grójecka 81. While in hiding, Ringelblum worked around the clock writing a history of Polish-Jewish relations during World War II, together with essays on key members of the Jewish intelligentsia. These writings, now known as Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto, survived and were published after the war.

On March 7, 1944, the Germans discovered the hideout and apprehended all those inside. A few days later Ringelblum, his family, and the other Jews with whom he had been hiding were taken into the ruined ghetto and murdered. Overall, only three members of the Oneg Shabbat survived the war: Hersh Wasser and his wife Bluma, and Rachel Auerbach.

After the war, people searched for Ringelblum’s Archive in the ruins of the ghetto, with mixed results. In September 1946 ten metal boxes were found, and in December 1950 two of the milk cans were located. Despite repeated searches, the rest of the archive, including the third milk can, was never found.

The Jewish Historical Institute (Żydowski Instytut Historyczny or ŻIH) is a research establishment in Warsaw dealing primarily with the history of the Jews in Poland. Created in 1947, it was renamed in 2009 in honor of Emanuel Ringelblum. The centerpiece of the collection, the Warsaw Ghetto Archive, is the legacy of Ringelblum’s work with Oneg Shabbat, containing about 6,000 documents comprised of nearly 30,000 individual sheets. The archive, as well as Ringelblum’s own writing, constitutes the most comprehensive repository in existence dealing with the daily experience of the Jews in Warsaw during the Holocaust.

Ringelblum Archive

A large collection of archival material collected by historian Emanuel Ringelblum, a Polish Jew, between 1939 and 1944. Ringelblum sought to chronicle virtually all aspects of life in the Warsaw Ghetto, where he and his family were forced to live after the German invasion of Poland in September 1939. As a historian, he was keenly aware of the importance to future generations of an archive on the Warsaw Ghetto. He was also concerned that people be informed of Nazi policies and activities pertaining to Polish Jewry. Ringelblum appointed a number of assistants to help him gather material, document it, and write reports on all aspects of life in the ghetto. He and his assistants worked clandestinely, hiding their growing collection in various places within the Warsaw Ghetto. Ringelblum gave the project the code name Oneg Shabat (“Enjoyment of the Sabbath,” “Sabbath Joy,” or “Sabbath Pleasure”) to further conceal its existence. Many of the documents were placed in metal boxes and milk cans in the hope that they would be preserved.

The Ringelblum Archive is a vast collection of documents of all types chronicling life in the Warsaw Ghetto. The secret documentation was organized by Emanuel Ringelblum, a Polish Jew, and other members of Oneg Shabbat, the code name given to the project. Documents were buried throughout the ghetto in canisters such as those shown here. (Photo12/UIG via Getty Images)

More specifically, Ringelblum's archive contained various documents, reports, interviews, and testimonials—all evidence of German abuse and atrocities—together with diaries, memoirs, letters, underground newspapers in various languages (Polish, German, Yiddish, Hebrew), a detailed narrative of deportations, orders and meeting minutes of the Nazi-imposed Jewish Council (Judenrat), concert announcements and tickets, food coupons, paintings, sketches, posters, and photographs. It was Ringelblum's intention to archive every aspect of living in the ghetto—day-to-day affairs as well as economic, scientific, cultural, artistic, literary, social welfare, and even health and medical issues. Given the severe constraints under which he labored, he did a remarkable job in doing so. Indeed, the archive is perhaps the single most important resource for Holocaust studies in Poland.

By early 1942 so much material had been collected and documented that Ringelblum and his associates began work on a 2,000-page master report divided into four sections: General; Economic; Cultural, Scientific, Literary, and Artistic; and Social Welfare. The archive also offered insights into women and their roles during the war, youth in the ghetto, relations between gentile Poles and Jewish Poles, educational endeavors, politics, theater, food smuggling, and the operation of the black market. The Warsaw Ghetto was liquidated in the spring of 1943, and Ringelblum was murdered by the Nazis in March 1944.

In September 1946 part of Ringelblum's archive was found. It included 1,505 files, containing up to a dozen documents each (of greatly varied length). In all, it contained 20,740 pages. Another part of the archive was unearthed in December 1950; it contained 585 files, for a total of 7,906 pages. Also included in both finds were paintings, diaries, photographs, and many other vestiges of life under the Nazis. There is a third part of the archive, which contains information on the organization and activities of the ghetto underground, but it has never been found. Rumors persist, however, that it lies buried beneath the Chinese embassy in Warsaw. There are likely other canisters and boxes that lie undiscovered. The extant archive is now housed at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw.

Ritter, Robert

Robert Ritter was a psychologist and physician whose work concerning the Roma, Lalleri, and Sinti people (often referred to, sometimes disparagingly, as “Gypsies”), informed Nazi anti-Roma racial policies. His interest in the relationship between heredity and criminality led him to do major research during the Nazi regime, and this served as a justification for the Nazis to isolate and then annihilate the Roma and Sinti, first in Germany and then throughout occupied Europe.

Ritter was born on May 14, 1901, in Aachen, Germany, and earned a PhD in psychology in 1927 from the University of Munich. He continued his education at the University of Heidelberg, where he received a medical degree in 1930. He then secured a position at the University of Tübingen, where he began to conduct research into the ethnic makeup of Germany's Roma and Sinti population. He also sought to "prove" that "mixed-race" peoples were more inclined to engage in criminal activity.

In 1936 Ritter was named head of the newly established Eugenic and Population Biological Research Station. In this capacity, he was well placed to carry on his research, now with the full backing of the Nazi regime. The next year, he and his associates engaged in a major effort to interview all Roma and Sinti people living in Germany. In the end, he concluded that at least 90% of this population was of mixed ethnic and racial origin, which made them undesirable to Germany. (The fate of the remaining 10% was to cause administrative difficulties for the Nazis.) Further, he created an index of descent, not unlike that applied to Jews in Nazi Germany when constituting Gypsy genealogy in order to determine "mischlinge" (that is, mixed-descent) status. This would be used to marginalize—and then exterminate—thousands of Roma and Sinti. Convinced that a "criminal" admixture constituting Gypsy genealogy was innate, his arguments to the Nazi authorities provided a strong racial justification for, at first, sterilization, then outright extermination. As a result of his work, which hardly could be considered scientific, forced sterilization was used against the Roma. By the late 1930s and early 1940s forced sterilization had mutated into a policy of placing the Roma and Sinti population in concentration camps, where thousands were murdered.

Ritter retained his academic position at the University of Tübingen (where he taught criminal biology) through the end of the Nazi period and into 1946, and in 1947 he joined the Frankfurt Health Office as a pediatrician. Meanwhile, his disreputable prewar research was barely mentioned. The following year, however, a group of Roma pressed Frankfurt's chief criminal prosecutor to open an investigation into Ritter's prewar research and his wartime activities. It was later determined that there was not enough evidence to charge Ritter with a specific crime, however. On April 15, 1951, Ritter died suddenly in Oberursel, Germany. His death certificate listed a natural cause of death; nevertheless, many believed that he committed suicide.

Robota, Roza

Roza Robota was one of a group of four women hanged at Auschwitz for their role in the revolt of the XII Sonderkommando on October 7, 1944. She was born in 1921 in Ciechanów, Poland. As a youth she was a member of the Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair and was engaged in underground activities undertaken by the movement during the Nazi occupation. When the liquidation of the Ciechanów ghetto was carried out in 1942, she was deported with her family to Auschwitz. She was the only member of the family to survive the selection process, the others being sent directly to their deaths upon arrival. At first she was allocated to the women's camp at Auschwitz I, but she was transferred to Birkenau later in 1942.

She was assigned to the clothing shed in the Kanadakommando, right next to Birkenau's Crematorium III. Here, the belongings of Jews transported to Auschwitz-Birkenau were sorted before being transported back to Germany for use by German citizens for the war effort. The name "Kanada" was given by the prisoners to this area rich in all manner of items such as clothing, jewelry, and foodstuffs—as Canada, the country, symbolized wealth and abundance.

In view of her past membership in Hashomer Hatzair, and given that through this she was known to some of those working in the Auschwitz underground, she was recruited to smuggle a form of gunpowder—schwartzpulver—to the men working in the Sonderkommando in Crematorium III. She was one of a number of such women brought into the resistance movement. Others, such as Estusia Wajcblum, Ala Gertner, and Regina Safirsztajn, had already been smuggling small amounts of gunpowder, at enormous personal risk, from their workplace at the Weichsel-Union-Metallwerke, a munitions factory in the Auschwitz complex, to those in the camp proper.

Roza established contact with about 20 women in the Union plant who were willing to cooperate, and over a period of several months they smuggled in the schwartzpulver. There were risks: prisoners were often searched when returning from work on aussenarbeit (outside labor beyond the wire), though each day they were able to pass on tiny amounts to the men of the underground in matchbox-size quantities.

It took a year and a half of careful preparations before the revolt took place, but there was, unfortunately, never a large enough quantity of powder to enable the prisoners to stage a fully successful revolt of sufficient strength. When the men of the Sonderkommando rose in rebellion on October 7, 1944, however, enough had been accumulated to enable the resisters to blow up Crematorium IV.

The Sonderkommando uprising was unexpected, breaking out before a hoped-for general camp revolt. In the chaos, around 600 of the Sonderkommando workers broke through the fences separating the crematorium from the rest of the camp, though ultimately all those who escaped were caught and shot.

The Gestapo was brought in after the revolt had been crushed, with the express purpose of tracing the source of the explosives used in the revolt. They were tracked back to the Union plant, and several suspects were arrested. In subsequent days, Roza, Ala, Estusia, and Regina were arrested and placed in the notorious Block 11, where the kapo Yakov Kozalchik managed to sneak in the occasional visitor. Under brutal torture, they were subjected to weeks of interrogation. They refused to reveal the names of others who had participated in the smuggling operation and were duly hanged on January 5, 1945—Estusia and Regina at the morning roll-call assembly, and Roza and Ala in the evening. The executions, only two weeks before the camp was liberated, were in public, as a warning to the entire camp.

According to some eyewitness accounts, Roza Robota and her comrades shouted “Nekamah!” (“Revenge!”) to the assembled inmates before they died. Roza’s last message was a note in Hebrew, scratched on a piece of paper she managed to smuggle from her cell: “Chazak V’amatz”—“Be strong and have courage.” When Roza Robota was executed, she was just 23 years old.

Röhm, Ernst

Ernst Röhm was one of the first members of the nascent Nazi Party, perhaps Adolf Hitler’s oldest and closest friend, the leader of the Nazi Stormtroopers—some 4 million strong—and ultimately was killed on Hitler’s order in a party purge nicknamed the “Night of the Long Knives.”

Born Ernst Julius Günter Röhm on November 28, 1887, in Munich, Röhm—the son of a railway official—was commissioned in the military in 1908. He was wounded three times during his service in World War I—including a serious wound to his face that left him permanently disfigured—and was awarded the Iron Cross First Class in 1916. By the end of the war he had been promoted to the rank of captain (Hauptmann).

After the war he remained in the military but soon evinced an interest in politics. Among other things he helped to put down the Räterepublik, a short-lived effort in April and May of 1919 to replace the newly installed Weimar Republic with a communist government in Munich.

Of greater importance, it was shortly after the war that Röhm first met Hitler. In 1919 Röhm had joined the German Workers’ Party (Deutsche Arbeiterpartei), a tiny right-wing fringe party that would soon change its name to the National Socialist German Workers’ Party (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei), soon to become known as the Nazi Party. He recognized Hitler’s oratorical and leadership skills, and they became fast friends. Even after Hitler rose to power in Germany, Röhm still addressed him using the informal form of German, and he was one of the very few people who called him by his first name.

It was Röhm who safeguarded Hitler in his Beer Hall Putsch in November 1923. Hitler hoped to lead a rebellion against the Weimar Republic. It was a stunning failure, with Hitler and Röhm, among other Nazis, arrested and convicted of treason. Although Röhm did not actually serve time (instead, he resigned from the military), he nonetheless had earned his place in Hitler’s inner circle as an “Old Fighter” (Alte Kämpfer) and had shown his unquestioning loyalty to the future Führer.

During the 1920s and 1930s it was very common for there to be street brawls between competing German political parties, often after their rallies. This made it necessary for most political parties to have groups of men who could not only engage in these brawls but also protect the party speakers and officials and strong-arm the opposition. For the Nazis, this task fell to a group—a militia or paramilitary unit—founded by Hitler in 1921, called the Sturmabteilung (SA, also known as the Stormtroopers or Brownshirts).

Röhm, at Hitler’s request, became the leader of the SA in early 1930. By late 1933, due in part to Röhm’s popularity, the organization exceeded 3 million members and had become a formidable force, dwarfing the Reichswehr, the professional German military that was restricted under the Treaty of Versailles to 100,000 men.

The growth of the SA eventually became a problem for Hitler, the Nazi Party, and the Reichswehr. Röhm, who saw himself as gaining in both power and importance, had high expectations for the SA, and made corresponding demands of Hitler that ultimately caused an irreparable rift between the two old friends. Röhm and many of the SA members had an expectation that Hitler would lead a political revolution that would lean more heavily on a socialist philosophy—one, for example, that would support working men on strike—than on a capitalist one. This socialist tendency of the SA was of great concern to the business leaders in Germany, including—much to Hitler’s disquiet—the major financial contributors to the Nazi Party.

Even as Hitler was shifting some of the Stormtroopers’ former responsibilities—such as protecting party leaders—to Heinrich Himmler and his Schutzstaffel, or SS, Röhm continued to insist that he and the SA should play a larger role in the party. Perhaps of greater concern was Röhm’s demand, made in early 1934, that the SA would be the core of Germany’s military, a concept that was anathema to the professional officer corps that viewed the SA as a group of undisciplined thugs. Hitler, recognizing his need for the army’s support, was loath to agree to Röhm’s demands.

In addition to rejecting his play for power, the Reichswehr officer corps also spurned some of the personal habits of Röhm and others in SA leadership, finding them to be an offense to the standards of the professional military. Specifically, Röhm was homosexual and made no efforts to hide that fact. When combined with the image of Röhm and the SA generally as recalcitrant thugs and drunks, the opposition of the military to Röhm and the SA was complete.

Hitler increasingly saw Röhm and the SA as a threat to his position of primacy, and he became concerned about the possibility of a coup attempt Röhm might make against him. He thus asked some of his top aides, including Hermann Göring and Himmler, to draw up a list of SA leaders who should be killed in order to dismantle the group and integrate it into the German military. Once the list was completed Hitler contacted Röhm, where he was vacationing in Bad Wiesse, and ordered him to call all SA leadership to a conference at the hotel, to be held on June 30, 1934. Hitler flew to Bad Wiesse and supervised the arrest and imprisonment of Röhm and other top leaders, with many others killed outright. Reluctant to kill his old friend, Hitler nonetheless bowed to pressure from Göring and Himmler, and on July 1, 1934, had Röhm shot.

The purge of the SA—called the Night of the Long Knives—solidified the army’s support of Hitler and greatly increased Himmler’s power and role in the Nazi regime. Hitler had his actions retroactively legalized with the passage of the Law Regarding Measures of State Self-Defense, and he explained in a speech that they were done to protect the state against treason. After Röhm’s death, Hitler made efforts to remove his name from German memory.

Roma and Sinti

The Roma and Sinti are people of mixed ethnic lineage who entered European history as nomads. During the late Middle Ages, they began to arrive and settle on lands that would eventually comprise Germany, Austria, and Central and Eastern Europe, particularly Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, Slovakia, Serbia, Poland, and Croatia. Ethnographers theorize that the Roma and Sinti had their origins on the Indian subcontinent, from where they originated. They speak their own language, which has varying dialects and has been heavily influenced by various Germanic vernaculars. Together, they have often been referred to as “Gypsies,” a term that is viewed by many as highly pejorative.

The Roma and Sinti who were located in Germany (which had one of the highest concentrations of Roma population prior to World War II) endured much discrimination and ill treatment well before Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933. Their unique culture, language, dress, and customs made them easy targets for many non-Roma Germans. The emergence of Nazi racial ideology during the 1920s subjected them to much harsher treatment. Amid the Nazis’ bogus racial and ethnic “types,” the Roma and Sinti were considered to be pariahs, and their mixed heritage was deemed a threat to the supposed racial purity of the German (“Aryan”) race. They were also frequently seen as criminals, even though there is no evidence to suggest that they were any more inclined toward crime than other Germans.

In June 1933 Hitler’s recently installed government enacted the Law for the Protection of Offspring and Hereditary Defects, which resulted in the forced sterilization of thousands of German Roma. The Law against Dangerous and Habitual Criminals, promulgated in November 1933, brought the arrests of several thousand Roma, who were deemed “antisocial.” Most were incarcerated in concentration camps. As the 1930s progressed, more anti-Roma legislation was passed, further marginalizing them.

After the German Anschluss (“union” with Austria) in 1938, the Lalleri, a subgroup of the Roma and Sinti who lived in Austria, were similarly oppressed, arrested, and incarcerated. In September 1939 Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler became determined to eradicate the Roma because of the belief that they posed a serious security risk.

Nearly all of the Roma remaining in Germany were deported to Poland and housed in bleak and brutal concentration camps. After Germany took control of the western two-thirds of Poland, large numbers of Roma were relocated to death camps at Chełmno, Treblinka, and Majdanek. Some Roma were also placed in ghettos, moved in as Jews were themselves deported to their deaths. Toward the end of 1942, Himmler decreed that all surviving Roma in Poland and Eastern Europe would be sent to a segregated camp at Auschwitz-Birkenau, where most died by gassing, rampant disease and sickness, or exhaustion from hard labor. In May 1944, with the advance of Soviet troops from the east, the Germans decided to vacate the camp. Rather than moving the Roma, Sinti, and Lalleri, they simply killed them in vast numbers and cremated their bodies.

The Nazi effort to exterminate these people resulted in a catastrophe. Although precise numbers of those killed are not available, researchers have estimated that anywhere between 500,000 and 1.5 million Roma, Sinti, and Lalleri died between the early 1930s and the mid-1940s. Perhaps as much as 50% of the Roma, Sinti, and Lalleri population throughout all of Europe was wiped out during that period. The Porrajamos, which means “The Devouring” in Romani and refers to the period of the 1930s and 1940s, has been largely overshadowed by the much larger Shoah (Holocaust) of the Jewish people. These two horrific developments unfolded at the same time, however, and for much the same reasons. Indeed, many Roma and Sinti prisoners were incarcerated in the same concentration camps that held Jews and other people deemed “undesirable” by the Nazis. Much more recognition of and research into the Porrajamos is needed.

Romania

Romania is a nation situated in south-central Europe. When Romania entered World War II on the Axis side in 1940, it had a population of 15.91 million, of whom 550,000–625,000 were Jews. The Holocaust in Romania was an absolute calamity for Jews and Roma, who were deported and/or murdered mercilessly between 1941 and 1944. During 1940 Romania was forced to cede large portions of its territory to the Soviet Union, Hungary, and Bulgaria. On September 6, 1940, partly as a result of these territorial losses, King Carol II was forced from his throne; he was replaced by Michael, his 19-year-old son, who would remain a figurehead leader until 1944. At the same time, the Romanian government began to rule through a coalition of right-wing army officers led by General Ion Antonescu, who wasted little time aligning Romania with Germany and Italy; Romania formally joined the Axis alliance on November 23, 1940.

Although there had been much persecution of Jews in Romania prior to the autumn of 1940, actions and violence against Jews increased dramatically once Antonescu and the Iron Guard took control of the country. Army and police personnel, along with right-wing paramilitary groups, began assaulting and killing Jews in urban areas; they also vandalized, robbed, or seized Jewish-owned businesses. Much of this violence was orchestrated by the fascist Iron Guard, who caused so much disruption in Romanian cities that Antonescu attempted to rein it in. That resulted in an armed struggle between the Iron Guard and army elements loyal to Antonescu for several days in January 1941. Antonescu ultimately prevailed. Aided by German soldiers, the Iron Guard instigated a huge pogrom in Bucharest during the uprising, which killed thousands of Jews. After their deaths, some victims were hung on meat hooks in a nearby slaughterhouse, their bodies mutilated in a macabre imitation of kosher slaughtering techniques.

Antonescu was anxious to take part in Operation Barbarossa, the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, hopeful that Romania would win back areas lost to the Soviets just a year prior. Thousands of Romanian soldiers joined the fight, and by early July, Romanian military officials had already begun perpetrating violence against Jews in the east. In Iasi, Moldavia, some 4,000 Jews died in a horrific pogrom and orgy of violence; several thousand others were deported by train, with many dying from starvation and overcrowding.

Romanian army and special police forces, sometimes working alongside German SS units, also killed thousands of Jews in Transnistria, Bukovina, and Bessarabia, areas that the Romanians controlled after the invasion of the Soviet Union. At least 11,000 Bessarabian Jews were placed in a ghetto in the summer of 1941 and forced to work in a labor camp, where many died. That fall the survivors were deported to concentration camps or to ghettos in Transnistria, joining Jews from northern Bukovina. The conditions in the camps and ghettos were appalling, and the death rates were high.

During December 1941 nearly all the Jews living in the ghetto in Bogdanovka, Transnistria, were massacred. More deaths occurred in two concentration camps, also in Transnistria. The killings in the region continued, sporadically, until the spring of 1944, when Soviet troops seized control of Transnistria. That summer, Bessarabia fell to Soviet forces. The Soviet army continued moving west, and Antonescu refused to admit defeat or request an armistice with the Allies. As a result, on August 23, 1944, King Michael ordered Antonescu's arrest. A new government was quickly formed, and Michael announced that Romania was leaving the Axis alliance. Romanian troops then fought alongside the Red Army until Germany was defeated in 1945. Romania, however, would fall into the Soviet orbit after the conflict and would remain behind the Iron Curtain until the end of the Cold War.

The war proved disastrous for Romania, which lost thousands while fighting the Soviets and then the Germans. For the Jews and Roma, the war was a cataclysm. Between 185,000 and 250,000 Romanian and Ukrainian Jews died in Transnistria. Another 270,000 Jews died within Romania.

For his part, Ion Antonescu did not escape justice for his part in the violence. He was tried and convicted at a show trial in Bucharest, where he was executed on June 1, 1946.

Rosé, Alma

Alma Rosé, the niece of composer Gustav Mahler, was a renowned virtuoso violinist who resisted the Nazis though actually being seen to collaborate with them as the driving force and conductor of the women's orchestra at Auschwitz. Through her commitment to excellence and precision, she created an aura of indispensability around the women's orchestra, thereby ensuring the survival of its members—even though this was to be at the cost of her own life.

She was born in Austria in 1906. Her father, Arnold Rosé, led the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and the Vienna State Opera orchestra, and a career in violin was mapped out for her from an early age. In 1932 she founded the woman's orchestra Die Wiener Walzermädeln ("The Waltz-Girls of Vienna") and in 1930 married a Czech violin virtuoso, Váša Příhoda, from whom she was subsequently divorced in 1935.

The annexation of Austria by Nazi Germany in March 1938 caught the completely assimilated Rosé family by surprise. Alma went to London with her father, but she returned to the continent and continued performing in the Netherlands. In 1940 she fled to France and went into hiding. She attempted to get to Switzerland but was betrayed and arrested in late 1942. In July 1943 she was deported, via Drancy, to Auschwitz.

In August 1943, in view of her former public profile, she was given the task of leading the Mädchenorchester von Auschwitz (Girl Orchestra of Auschwitz), which had earlier been formed under the leadership of a Pole, Zofia Czajkowska. The orchestra was the initiative of an SS officer, Oberaufseherin Maria Mandel. In recognition of her new role and Mandel's fondness for her pet project, Alma requested special living and working quarters for the orchestra and demanded an end to playing in all weathers. She also managed to have additional sheet music provided. After her appointment, she began to work on the orchestra's performance. Weaker musicians were removed, though not fired; in order to ensure they would not be sent back to the barracks, she sought to retain them in auxiliary roles as helpers. The musicians themselves were subject to a strict practice schedule, with entire days given over to rehearsal when they were not performing.

Although the orchestra included two professional musicians—cellist Anita Lasker-Wallfisch and vocalist/pianist Fania Fénelon—it was comprised essentially of amateur musicians playing a variety of instruments. The orchestra played classical pieces at the main gate each morning when the work gangs went out, and in the evening when they returned. It also gave weekend concerts for the prisoners and the SS and entertained at SS functions. It is inconclusive whether or not the orchestra was required to play during gasings, though it is possible the Nazis would have employed it in order to ease tensions among newly arrived prisoners, making the task easier for the SS killers.

As conductor, Alma had a higher status than the other prisoners and was given privileges and comforts such as extra food and a room of her own. She was under no illusions that by playing for the Nazis the members of the orchestra were providing a service enabling them to extend their lives; she thus worked hard to ensure the highest possible musical standards, the better to retain SS patronage.

A perfectionist, her creative temperament was sometimes taken for egotism and personal ambition. One account, written by Fania Fénelon, controversially portrayed Alma as a cold-hearted disciplinarian who abused those around her and bowed before the Nazis. Others, however, have strongly disputed this image, claiming that Alma's ultimate interest was to protect the well-being of the women in her orchestra. This demanded not only that she establish and maintain high musical standards but also that she satisfy the Nazis. Her sponsors among the SS included such camp luminaries as Maria Mandel, camp commandant Josef Kramer, and the infamous Dr. Josef Mengele.

Under this leadership, the orchestra underwent rapid improvement. Alma varied the program according to the sheet music she had available and wrote orchestrations for the various instruments from memory. Classical works from the great German and Austrian composers were introduced, as she recognized the attraction the music could have for the camp personnel. This, in turn, could help to guarantee lives; the longer the orchestra was viable and wanted, the greater was the possibility that the musicians could stay alive. While the Nazis saw the prisoners as less than human, the prisoners, seeking to retain their humanity in spite of everything to which they were exposed, showed that they were not prepared to succumb to the Nazis' designs. Alma Rosé knew this, and acted accordingly.

It is understood that all those in the orchestra escaped death at the hands of the SS so long as Alma remained its director. Among those who survived to be able to recall their experiences, Alma was generally remembered as a heroine who forced her musicians to work hard in order to save their very lives. Through her actions in this, the only female musical ensemble in the Nazi camps, she was able to save the lives of nearly 50 women.

On April 4, 1944, Alma Rosé died, having fallen ill at a concert given for the SS two days earlier. Speculation surrounds her death; while the most frequently given explanation is food poisoning, typhus has also been offered. Fania Fénelon alleged later that Rosé was deliberately poisoned. In her honor, the SS allowed a service of remembrance to be held on her behalf.

In 1980 a movie was made about the women's orchestra of Auschwitz, Playing for Time (dir. Daniel Mann and Joseph Sargent). Based on the memoir of the same name by Fania Fénelon, it starred Jane Alexander as Alma Rosé, Vanessa Redgrave as Fania Fénelon, and Shirley Knight as Maria Mandel.

Rosenbaum, Pinchas

Pinchas Tibor Rosenbaum was a Jewish Hungarian rabbi and humanitarian who helped saved dozens of Jewish families from deportation and likely death at the hands of the Germans and their Hungarian collaborators during World War II.

Rosenbaum was born on November 2, 1923, in Kleinwardein, Hungary, the son and grandson of respected rabbis. While still in his late teens, he too was ordained a rabbi. He also became a leader in one of Hungary's many Jewish youth organizations, Bnei Akiva. As the Hungarian government allied itself with the Nazis and aided in the carrying out of the Holocaust, Rosenbaum was determined to resist this effort and aid as many Hungarian Jews as possible. His desire to do so increased significantly after his own family was deported to Auschwitz, where they eventually perished.

Having repeatedly escaped the clutches of occupation officials and government collaborators, Rosenbaum was soon engaged in engineering daring and creative rescues of Jewish families, principally in the Hungarian capital, Budapest. Using many aliases and falsified identification papers, he frequently disguised himself as a Hungarian security officer and sometimes even as a German Gestapo agent. He was successful in this in part because he did not possess stereotypical Jewish "looks" and so usually did not attract the attention of the authorities. When he knew that a Jewish family was about to be rounded up and deported, Rosenbaum would often burst into their home, disguised as a Hungarian agent, and escort them—many times at gunpoint—to a safe haven known as the "Glass House." Only then would he reveal his true identity. Rosenbaum would subsequently work to spirit the families out of Hungary to safety.

One of Rosenbaum's most daring missions witnessed him attending a party for the Hungarian secret police, during which he spent most of the night pretending to drink with them. Once he managed to ascertain from them the next Jewish family to be deported, he hurried to their home early the next morning and helped all of them escape. In 1944, when German authorities apprehended Zvi (Zeidi) Zeidenfeld, a leader of the Jewish underground in Hungary, Rosenbaum and several accomplices disguised themselves as SS and Gestapo officers and spirited him out of a hospital (Zvi had been badly beaten and tortured).

After the war, Rosenbaum married, settled in Geneva, Switzerland, and raised three children with his wife Stephanie. A committed Zionist, he worked as a banker and aided in the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. He also reportedly undertook several clandestine missions for the Mossad (Israel's intelligence service). Rosenbaum died on October 23, 1980. In April 2014 Liberty Studios premiered a feature film, Walking with the Enemy, which examines Rosenbaum's miraculous work. The movie stars Ben Kingsley as Miklós Horthy, Hungary's collaborationist leader, and Jonas Armstrong as Rosenbaum.

Rosenberg, Alfred

Alfred Rosenberg was a German National Socialist Party publicist and a leading Nazi racial theorist and "philosopher" of National Socialism. Born in Reval, Russia (today's Tallinn, Estonia), on January 12, 1893, he came from a family that spoke German but may have been of Estonian extraction. He studied architecture at Riga Technical University, which moved to Moscow with the approach of German forces in World War I. He graduated in Moscow in 1918 and witnessed the early days of the Bolshevik Revolution. He soon emigrated to Paris, and at the end of the year settled in Munich. There he joined the German Workers' Party, which later became the National Socialist Party. Rosenberg became a German citizen in 1920 and gradually assumed the position of the party's chief ideologue. In 1923 he was the sole editor of the party daily, the Völkischer Beobachter. He participated in the unsuccessful November 1923 Beer Hall Putsch and was Adolf Hitler's personal choice to serve as interim party leader while Hitler was in prison.

Rosenberg headed the new National Socialist Society for Culture and Learning from 1929, and he was elected to the Reichstag as a Nazi Party deputy from Hesse-Darmstadt in 1930. In that year, he also published his major work, The Myth of the Twentieth Century, which became the most popular party work after Hitler's Mein Kampf. A turgid, racially obsessed, pseudoscientific study, it claimed that the Germans represented a pure Nordic race destined to rule Europe. It attacked Jews, Freemasons, the Catholic Church, and many others.

Rosenberg held numerous party posts. After Hitler rose to power in 1933, Rosenberg headed the foreign policy office and was made Hitler's deputy for supervising the spiritual and ideological training of the Nazi Party. In January 1940 he was tasked with founding the so-called High School, which was to evolve into the postwar Central National Socialist University. One of the institutes within the High School was the Institute for Research of the Jewish Question, the libraries of which were filled with looted Jewish art. The Einsatzstab Rosenberg (Special Staff Rosenberg) and Rosenberg's special "furniture action" confiscated art, furniture, rugs, and even appliances from the homes of Jews.

The peak of Rosenberg's career came in 1941 when he was designated Reichsminister for the Occupied Eastern Territories. In this position, he opposed the expulsion of populations, believing it made more sense to utilize their support against the Soviet Union. Despite his party positions, Rosenberg never achieved the influence or recognition he believed he merited. He was disappointed when Joachim von Ribbentrop became foreign minister in 1938 and was upset with the August 1939 Nazi-Soviet Nonaggression Pact, which he believed sacrificed ideology to political motives. Rosenberg was an inept administrator, and Joseph Goebbels referred to him as "a monarch with neither country nor subjects" and spoke of his "ministry of chaos."

Frustrated by his lack of influence, Rosenberg attempted to resign in October 1944, but Hitler never answered his letter. Arrested at the end of the war, he at last achieved the notoriety to which he believed he was entitled when he was tried among the principal Nazi leaders at the Nuremberg proceedings. Rosenberg remained unrepentant in his support of Hitler and a true believer in National Socialism, but he argued that some of Hitler's intentions had been subverted by more devious and bloodthirsty officials. Convicted on all four counts of war crimes, he was hanged at Nuremberg on October 16, 1946. His body was cremated and his ashes scattered in the Isar River.

Rosenstrasse Protest

February 27, 1943, is notorious in Germany because of the mass arrests of Jews that occurred that day across the Reich. "Actions to Eliminate Jews from Reich Territory," is what SS and Police Chief Heinrich Himmler's men called these arrests. On that day the Berlin Gestapo initiated what it called the "Final Roundup" of Berlin Jews (which became known after the war as the Fabrikaktion, or "Factory Action"). The SS and Gestapo arrested close to 10,000 Berlin Jews, including about 2,000 who were married to non-Jews.

In November 1941 Hitler told Goebbels that Jews were to be deported aggressively as long as this did not cause

In March 1943 approximately 2,000 Jewish men in intermarriage relationships were rounded up in Berlin for deportation, despite an exemption granted to this classification of Jews. In protest, hundreds of wives of these men stood outside the building on Rosenstrasse in which the men were housed until they were released. unnecessary difficulties. In this context, intermarried Jews with gentile relatives were to be pursued with special watchfulness. This would require lifting a ban that “temporarily” exempted intermarried Jews from deportations. By early 1943 such bans had already been lifted in hundreds of cases in order to draw intermarried Jews into the Holocaust. As the party leader (Gauleiter) of greater Berlin, Joseph Goebbels had resolved to declare Berlin free of Jews once and for all. Anyone identified by the Jewish star, including intermarried Jews, must be eliminated from public view, Goebbels wrote. Berlin Jews would be pushed out by the middle or end of March at the latest, he wrote on February 18, 1943, in batches of 2,000 at a time.

On March 1, 1943, as nearly 2,000 arrested intermarried Jews awaited deportation in a building at Rosenstrasse 2–4 in central Berlin, SS officials were expecting the arrival of 15,000 skilled Jewish laborers from Berlin for work at I.G. Farben's Auschwitz factories. This number could not be reached without deporting intermarried Jews. A Gestapo order from Frankfurt on the Oder dated February 24 underscored the regime's desire to arrest intermarried Jews, so long as this did not draw attention to the intermarried problem. Even in that backwater city of Frankfurt, where Goebbels was not the Nazi leader and intermarried Jews were rare, the Gestapo had authority to include them during the “Elimination of Jews” arrests that began on February 27.

That day in Berlin, as they discovered that their Jewish husbands were imprisoned at Rosenstrasse, hundreds of their wives hurried to that street, located within a few city blocks of the most feared centers of Nazi power. A feeling of solidarity and desperation arose among these intermarried gentiles, who began to call out together for the release of their husbands. The Gestapo repeatedly threatened to shoot the protesters in the street, which caused them to scatter briefly before resuming their collective demonstration to have their husbands back. The Rosenstrasse protest demanding the release of intermarried Jews continued over several days and nights until March 6, when Goebbels ordered the Jews to be released, because this was the most effective way of quelling the protest.

During these same days, about 7,000 of the last Jews in Berlin were sent to Auschwitz. However, the protest thwarted Goebbels's plan to make Berlin free of Jews as he wished. Even some intermarried Jews, who had already been sent to Auschwitz from Rosenstrasse and put to work there for I.G. Farben, were returned to Berlin. This street protest by gentile women willing to put their own lives at risk posed a challenge to a regime determined to avoid signs of dissent and a recurrence of war-weariness on the home front like the one the Nazis blamed for Germany's defeat in World War I.

The Rosenstrasse Protest was not the only collective street protest in Nazi Germany. For example, the secret police (SD) reported that 300 women protested in Adolf Hitler Square in the western German Ruhr valley city of Witten on October 11, 1943, against an official decision to withhold their food ration cards. The women had been evacuated and had returned to Witten without permission. The regional Nazi Party leader had decided to withhold their ration cards to punish them and to force them back to rural areas, even though many of their husbands worked in war industries in the city.

According to the SD report of November 18, the protesting women aimed to force the regime to issue their food rations in Witten. Like the women on the Rosenstrasse, Witten's women had taken to the street to protest an official measure that threatened their families. The city authorities called in the police to disband the protest. In a further example of unpunished disobedience, Witten police refused to obey, even though public gatherings had been banned since Hitler had taken power. Following the protest, Goebbels worried that the will of the state was bending to the will of the people. On November 11, he wrote that giving in to the street would become increasingly dangerous, because each time the state did so, it lost authority, and in the end it would lose its authority altogether.

Despite Goebbels's concerns, the regime did bend to the will of the people in an effort to consolidate German popular support. In January 1944 Hitler himself ordered all Nazi Party regional leaders not to withhold the ration cards of evacuees who returned home without permission. In July 1944 Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler and Hitler's private secretary, Martin Bormann, jointly ruled that such coercive measures were not suitable means for bringing the "people's community" into line with the regime's will. In October 1944 Bormann reiterated this point.

Like very few others, the Rosenstrasse protesters were willing to express their commitment to Jews publicly. Few supported them then, and for decades thereafter, their stories were absent in histories and commemorations of Nazi Germany. Instead, since the war and still today, the belief prevails that the Nazi regime brutally repressed all opposition. Yet protests by non-Jews, motivated by traditional customs and in certain circumstances, caused Hitler himself to compromise, choosing, like Goebbels, to assuage rather than draw further attention to open protests, as the best way to protect the popular German belief in Hitler's authority. As German women in particular demonstrated, opposition to Hitler was mortally dangerous but not always futile.

Rothaug, Oswald

Oswald Rothaug was a Nazi jurist. In June 1933 he was named a prosecutor in Nuremberg and in April 1937 he became the regional court director in Schweinfurt and the director of Nuremberg's Special Court (Sondergericht). In 1938 he became a member of the Nazi Party and worked closely with the SD (Sicherheitdienst). In 1942 he sentenced a 25-year-old Polish slave laborer to death, explaining that the inferiority of the defendant was obvious given that he was part of Polish subhumanity. Rothaug sought after, and presided over, the trial of Leo Katzenberger in March 1942, ordering his execution in May 1943 for so-called racial defilement. Following the trial Rothaug was brought to Berlin as a member of the People's Court (Volksgeschichtshof).

Oswald Rothaug was born on May 17, 1897, in Mittelsinn, Bavaria. The son of a primary school teacher, Rothaug's education was interrupted from 1916 to 1918 while he was in the German Army. He passed the final law examination in 1922 and the state examination for the higher administration of justice in 1925.

In December 1925 he began his career as a jurist, first as an assistant to an attorney in Ansbach and later as assistant judge at various courts. In 1927 he became a public prosecutor in charge of criminal cases, rising to senior public prosecutor in Nuremberg in June 1933. Between April 1937 and May 1943 he was director of the Nazi Special Courts in Nuremberg, except for a period in August and September of 1939 when he was in the Wehrmacht.

In 1938 Rothaug became a member of the NSDAP, the start of his membership being backdated to May 1937, the date of his application for party membership. Although he alleged he was not a member, he worked closed with the SD as an “honorary collaborator” on legal matters.

He was an up-and-coming judge of Nazi Germany when, in 1942, the case of 68-year-old Lehman Israel “Leo” Katzenberger came before him. Katzenberger was a shoe wholesaler and head of the Jewish community in Nuremberg. He was accused of the crime of “racial pollution” because of his alleged sexual intercourse with a young “Aryan” woman named Irene Seiler, the daughter of a close non-Jewish friend. In fact, the investigation showed that the two had a relationship but it was one of debtor and creditor: Katzenberger had loaned Seiler some money, and she was renting an apartment and shop front from him.

Both Katzenberger and Seiler denied the charge, and the original police report indicated that there was no evidence of a sexual relationship. In response, Rothaug had Katzenberger’s case transferred from a more traditional criminal court to a Sondergericht established by the Nazi regime to try racial and political enemies of the state. Rothaug, a proud member of the Nazi Lawyers’ League, was excited about drawing this assignment. So clear was he in his bias that he sent tickets to the Nazi hierarchy to attend the trial.

Katzenberger never had a chance. During the proceedings, Rothaug tried with all his power to encourage the witnesses to make incriminating statements against the two defendants, who were hardly heard by the court; their statements were passed over or disregarded. During the course of the trial, Rothaug took the opportunity to give the audience a National Socialist lecture on the subject of the Jewish question. The witnesses found great difficulty in giving testimony because of the way in which the trial was conducted, since Rothaug constantly anticipated the evaluation of the facts and gave expression to his own opinions.

The punishment for racial pollution was not death, but an eyewitness appeared who gave evidence that Katzenberger had been seen leaving Seiler’s house after dark. This opened the door to a different wartime law offense involving the death penalty, which was when a crime had been committed during blackout hours.

In the course of his findings, Rothaug stated that the visits by Katzenberger to Seiler under the protection of the blackout served at least the purpose of keeping relations going, arguing that it did not matter whether sexual relations took place during these visits or whether the two only conversed; in his view, the very nature of the two interrelating on any level was sufficient to prove Katzenberger’s race treason. He sentenced Katzenberger to the guillotine, and the sentence was carried out on June 2, 1942. Irene Seiler, who gave evidence that there had been no sexual relationship between herself and Katzenberger, was convicted of perjury and sentenced to two years in jail with hard labor.

From May 1943 to April 1945 Rothaug was public prosecutor at the People’s Court in Berlin. Here he handled for a time national cases of high treason and, from January 1944, cases concerning the undermining of public morale in the Third Reich.

At the end of the war Rothaug was arrested by the Allies and taken before the International Military Tribunal (IMT) sitting at Nuremberg in the Nazi Judges’ trial in 1947. The tribunal view was that it was not concerned with the legal incontestability under German law of these cases discussed above. It found that the evidence established beyond a reasonable doubt that Katzenberger was condemned and executed because he was a Jew; and that others before Rothaug met the same fate because they were Poles. Their execution was in conformity with the policy of the Nazi State of persecution, torture, and extermination. Rothaug, in this context, was the knowing and willing instrument in the Nazi program of persecution and extermination.

In the course of their findings, the tribunal also stated that by Rothaug’s manner and methods he made his court an instrument of terror and won the fear and hatred of the population. The tribunal stated that, from the evidence of his closest associates as well as his victims, Oswald Rothaug represented in Germany the personification of both secret Nazi intrigue and cruelty. Calling him a sadistic and evil man, the court held that under any civilized judicial system Rothaug could have been impeached and removed from office or convicted of malfeasance in office on account of the scheming malevolence with which he administered injustice.

Oswald Rothaug was found guilty of crimes against humanity but not guilty of war crimes through the abuse of the judicial and penal process and membership in a criminal organization. He was sentenced on December 14, 1947, to life imprisonment for crimes against humanity. His sentence was later reduced to 20 years, and he was released on parole on December 22, 1956. He died in Cologne a free man in 1967.

Rotta, Angelo

Angelo Rotta was the apostolic nuncio in Budapest when the Holocaust came to Hungary in 1944. An Italian originally from Milan, he was born on August 9, 1872. After attending high school he studied philosophy and theology in Rome and was ordained in 1895. He then held a number of positions in the church until 1922, when Pope Pius XI appointed him an archbishop. In 1925 Rotta was part of a papal delegation to Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, and El Salvador, and, later the same year, he was apostolic delegate to Istanbul.

With the onset of World War II in September 1939, Rotta began rescue activities immediately. Polish soldiers and Jewish civilians escaping the Nazi onslaught began flooding into Hungary, where they were frequently arrested and imprisoned prior to repatriation back to Nazi-occupied Poland. He began a diplomatic campaign to prevent this, visiting the camps where they were being held in order to demonstrate his support publicly.

Over time, increasing numbers of refugees from the war inundated Hungary, coming from countries all over Eastern Europe. In 1942 Rotta learned of a group of Jewish children who were about to be deported to Poland. Rushing to the camp where the children were being held, he established an orphanage on the spot to protect and hide them. He nominated this as a place "for the children of Catholic Polish officers," knowing that, because they were now under his protection as "Catholic" children, they would be safe—even though they were, in fact, Jewish. Everyone, it seemed, knew of the deception, but when he demanded that the Hungarian authorities provide them new, non-Jewish names, they did so without demur. Later, as Vatican representative for church interests in Bulgaria, he issued false baptismal certificates and visas for Jews to travel to Palestine.

Before 1944 Rotta's reports to the Vatican provided very detailed intelligence regarding Hungarian antisemitic measures, as well as the level of German interference in the affairs of its Hungarian ally. In 1944 he became nuncio representing Pope Pius XII in Budapest and devoted his attention to protecting the Jews. As dean of the diplomatic corps, he actively protested Hungary's mistreatment of the Jews, and after the German invasion of Hungary in March 1944, he worked with the pope to lobby the Hungarian regent, Miklós Horthy, to stop their deportation.

When it became known that Rotta was sympathetic to the Jews, people began besieging the Vatican embassy in the hope that he and his staff might be able to give them assistance. While this was happening, he organized a covert network of priests and nuns prepared to help—knowing that by doing so they were placing themselves at risk by hiding Jews.

Among the activities Rotta undertook was a leading role in a combined Swiss, Swedish, Portuguese, Spanish, and Vatican initiative, together with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), to establish an "International Ghetto" comprising dozens of apartment buildings into which large numbers of Jews were brought. These became safe houses once the various embassies placed their respective countries' coats of arms on them, and eventually some 25,000 people were saved. The enterprise was the brainchild of the Swiss vice-consul, Carl Lutz, and involved such figures as Giorgio Perlasca, Friedrich Born, Raoul Wallenberg, and Ángel Sanz Briz.

When Friedrich Born from the ICRC asked Rotta if he could find a way to organize some pre-signed blank identity papers bearing the Vatican stamp, these were not only forthcoming but came with Rotta's full backing. Eventually, he was responsible for issuing more than 15,000 safe conduct certificates to Jews and Jewish converts to Christianity. He issued hundreds of baptism certificates to Jews in labor camps and elsewhere, set up and personally protected numerous safe houses throughout Budapest, and even hid two Jews in his own house.

Moreover, he was unceasing in his protests against the deportation and murder of the Hungarian Jews. On November 19, 1944, the Vatican, through Rotta, joined the four other neutral powers in a further collective protest to the Hungarian government, on this occasion calling for the suspension of deportations. Perhaps surprisingly, the call was successful, even though the Hungarian fascists, the Arrow Cross, ignored the government's commitment. They raided the International Ghetto and murdered Jews, even as Soviet forces approached Budapest. Rotta went directly to the Arrow Cross leadership and demanded that the party take control over its members and desist from attacks, deportations, and atrocities against the Jews.

Angelo Rotta utilized his diplomatic position to protest actively against the Holocaust. He was simultaneously an upstander and a resister, on many occasions going directly against the preference of his own cardinal primate, Jusztinián György Serédi, in making public statements condemning the deportations and antisemitic violence. This also ran counter to the preferred position of Pius XII, who, it was said, shunned Rotta upon his return to the Vatican in 1945.

With the arrival of Soviet troops, Rotta was expelled from Hungary. He returned to Italy and lived in retirement in the Vatican while serving as a member of the Secretariat of Christian Unity. When Angelo Roncalli, an old friend and colleague, became Pope John XXIII, Rotta was offered a position as a cardinal, but he declined on the ground that by now, in his mid-80s, he was too old. He died at the Vatican on February 1, 1965, aged 92.

In 1997, more than three decades after his death, he was honored by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Only then did his many acts on behalf of Jews during the Holocaust become public and well known.

question of God in light of the Holocaust. Born in New York City in 1924, he began his academic education in 1942 at Hebrew Union College, Ohio, but became disillusioned with the nature of the curriculum. He moved to the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, from where he obtained his rabbinic ordination in 1952. He then studied at Harvard Divinity School, where he was awarded a master of sacred theology and earned his PhD. In 1970 Rubenstein moved to Florida State University, where he remained until 1995, when he took up the position of president of the University of Bridgeport.

In 1966 Rubenstein published a work that was simultaneously to change the nature of Holocaust thought and to alter the future direction of his own life. After Auschwitz: Radical Theology and Contemporary Judaism explored a number of theological frontiers in Jewish thought and was a significant discussion on the meaning and impact of the Holocaust for Judaism. For Rubenstein, the Holocaust exploded the traditional Judaic concept of God, especially the God of the Covenant with Abraham. As he viewed it, not many of those around him had thus far realized that the Holocaust—which he encapsulated within the paradigmatic image of Auschwitz—had altered, even destroyed, the basis upon which Jewish faith had hitherto always rested. In the simplest of terms he asked how Jews could still believe in an omnipotent, beneficent God after Auschwitz. The classical Jewish explanations for the conundrum of undeserved suffering in light of an omnipotent, omnipresent, and covenantal God had, until the Shoah, always been able to address this through reference to forms of interpretation that put the onus back on the Jewish people themselves, usually through divine retribution for sin. But here was an experience that was so immense, and caused the death and suffering of so many people, that punishment for sin could not possibly have explained it all. Further, its very magnitude had elevated it into a category of evil that was sui generis when compared to all other catastrophes that had befallen the Jewish people. The thought that a benevolent and compassionate God could send Hitler was for Rubenstein completely unacceptable. As he saw it, the evil of the German death camps seemed so purposeless that to see God's hand in it defies credulity. To portray what happened as an expression of God's will, therefore, would be to maintain that God wanted Auschwitz, a notion that for Rubenstein was utterly repugnant.

Rubenstein argued that the Holocaust overturned traditional Jewish teaching regarding the God of history, and a void now existed where once the Jewish people experienced God's presence. In the original Covenant between God and Rubenstein, Richard L.

Richard Lowell Rubenstein, who has in large part helped to define the agenda of post-Holocaust theology, is a theologian and one of the doyens of philosophical reflection on the Israel, an omnipotent deity would look to the interests of the Jewish people in exchange for their fidelity to his laws. The God of Israel was the God of history, but Rubenstein argued that as a result of the Shoah Jews could no longer advocate the notion of an omnipotent God at work. Further, the Covenant was now irretrievably broken, and the Jews should no longer see themselves as the Chosen People. In the wake of the Holocaust, life had to be lived on its own terms; there was no ultimate meaning, no hidden truth waiting to be revealed at the end of days.

This “death of God” notion did not, however, mean that Rubenstein abandoned the idea of divinity. The God of history might no longer exist, and the Covenant might be broken forever, but Rubenstein did not replace God with atheism. His revolutionary book attacked belief in the God of history, the notions of Covenant and divine election, and the idea embedded in theodicy that God’s goodness and justice, in the face of the existence of evil, could be defended. It was as much controversial as it was fascinating; no theologian, Jewish or Christian, had ever before attacked these beliefs with such passion or vehemence. After Auschwitz was an innovative, controversial work. It suggested that the basis upon which all previous belief had rested for the past three millennia were in fact fatally flawed. While the book caused outrage in many circles, there was little doubt that Rubenstein’s thinking was appropriate for its time, coming a generation after the Holocaust itself and in a decade (the 1960s) when questions were being asked about all manner of existential realities thus far unchallenged.

The book’s influence was considerable, and it generated intense debate within theological and philosophical circles. It is generally agreed today that After Auschwitz initiated most future discussion on the implications of the Holocaust for Jewish religious thought, and for many this led to a reevaluation of the meaning of belief. After Auschwitz took the Jewish community by storm and established Rubenstein’s name as a major thinker, but it also outraged many among the Jewish religious establishment and shunted Rubenstein into something of a theological wilderness for the rest of his career.

His next important book, The Cunning of History: Mass Death and the American Future (1975), drew him back to his earlier arguments about the Holocaust, this time looking at the nature of the society created by humans rather than by God. In what was a profound argument, Rubenstein concluded that the Shoah was a supreme expression of modernity, and of how Enlightenment reason and industrial knowledge could lead to mass murder—the ultimate articulation of secularization, modern planning, bureaucracy, and technical development in the service of national and racial unity. In short, the onset of modernity laid the foundation, and the realization of the modern bureaucratic state provided the means. As he explained, accompanying these developments was a trend in the unfolding European story toward viewing certain segments of a given population as expendable. Unwanted people could henceforth be “processed” in the same manner as any other unwelcome commodity, and it was here that Rubenstein’s title—the cunning of history—became most clearly apparent. History, he asserted, is cunning because it deceives us; offered the best the world had to offer, that “best” proved to be a chimera when corrupted in unscrupulous hands.

Rubenstein developed some of these ideas in The Age of Triage: Fear and Hope in an Overcrowded World (1983), which was an examination of the history of the destruction of unwanted populations. It looked at events as diverse as the Holocaust, the Irish famine of the 1840s, the enclosure movement in Tudor England in the 16th century, and the Vietnamese boat people in the 1970s. The study proceeded from an examination of so-called “surplus humans,” those people in any modern society who can find no viable role in the society in which they live. Once more, the idea was that modernity was responsible, and that the march of so-called progress was not always linear and upward. This was a theme he first established in The Cunning of History, but in The Age of Triage he developed the theme and illustrated it in much more detail. The book was a highly original way to articulate the preconditions of genocide, and it offered Rubenstein to a broader audience as a thinker regarding secular ideas, as distinct from the theological dimension for which he was already well known.

In 1987, together with a Christian scholar from California, John K. Roth, he produced Approaches to Auschwitz, a study exploring the continuing significance of the Holocaust and the various ways in which it has been studied. It sought to clarify the political, historical, and economic roots of the Shoah without losing sight of the complexities of its history, and in so doing it analyzed the Holocaust without losing sight of its definitive impact on human civilization and its unparalleled importance in determining the fate of the world. Intended as a text for students, the book was a thought-provoking study of the Holocaust from a number of different disciplinary perspectives.

The book’s penultimate chapter, “God and History: Philosophical and Religious Responses to the Holocaust,” took Rubenstein back to his original thinking in After Auschwitz, through a quick survey of some other authors who had considered the same issues as he had back in 1966. Rubenstein described the personal and academic experiences he had undergone as a young scholar and rabbi, which led him to conclude that the God of history must be denied as a result of the Holocaust. Here, he again argued that notions of Covenant and divine election are destructive theologies and reaffirmed the statements about the death of the covenantal God he had made more than two decades before.

Richard L. Rubenstein has been an innovative thinker whose approach to Judaism and religion in light of the most destructive period of human history—and arguably the most murderous sustained assault any people has faced—shook the religious tradition he addressed and from which he came. His books and articles have been at once vilified and praised, dismissed and embraced. His notions about “surplus people,” moreover, have shown him to be a multidimensional thinker who is as much at ease in discussing history and sociology as he is with theology. As one of the tiny number of those who were at the cutting edge of serious philosophical and theological reflection on the Holocaust at its inception, Rubenstein’s overall contribution to the field has been creative, powerful, controversial, and highly profound.

Rufeisen, Oswald

Oswald Rufeisen was a resister in the Mir ghetto in eastern Poland whose actions led to the escape and survival of more than 200 Jews. He was born Shmuel Rufajzen in 1922 to a Jewish family living in Zadziele, a small village in Upper Silesia near Oświęcim (Auschwitz), not far from Kraków. As a teenager he belonged to B’nei Akiva, a nonsocialist religious Zionist youth movement.

When Poland was invaded by Nazi Germany in September 1939, Rufeisen fled with his brother and some friends to eastern Poland, where there was a large Jewish population in Vilna (Vilnius). The country was about to be invaded by the Soviet Union, but before this large numbers of Zionist youth arrived from Poland in the hope that they could somehow use the country as a staging post for later migration to Palestine.

After the Soviet takeover, Rufeisen decided to stay. At that point, some visas were made available to nonresidents to leave the country; with a choice to make, Rufeisen gave his place to his younger brother, and remained.

In June 1941 Germany launched Operation Barbarossa against the Soviet Union, invading through Soviet-occupied Poland and the Baltic States. Rufeisen was drafted for forced labor, chopping wood in the frozen Ponary Forest just outside the city. Seeking escape, he slipped away quietly with the help of a Polish peasant farmer and began to walk. Finding himself in the small town of Mir in November 1941, and carrying false identity papers, he told the German military police occupying the town that he was a Volksdeutscher, that is, an ethnic German. He then talked his way into a job.

At the same time, he also made contact with whoever had not fled from the local Jewish community. They had been concentrated in an improvised and sealed ghetto, and Rufeisen informed them of forthcoming Nazi measures. Before this, they had had no idea of what was happening outside. He also made contact with the tiny ghetto underground and smuggled in a few weapons from police headquarters.

When he overheard the planned date for the ghetto liquidation, Rufeisen warned his friends inside and falsified his translations in order to get the police out of town; while this was happening he arranged a mass escape for those in the ghetto to flee to the forest, where many joined the partisans. About 200 of the 850 still alive on the night of August 10, 1942, made it into the woods. The rest were slaughtered.

Having been exposed as a Jew and not an ethnic German working for the Nazis, Rufeisen was arrested. Finding a way to escape, he fled the police station and received sanctuary at a nearby convent run by the Sisters of the Resurrection. He hid here until December 1943, on occasion even dressing as a nun when the convent was forced to relocate to another building or he had to go out in public. While in the convent he decided to convert to Catholicism.

During the winter of 1943–1944 he left the convent and joined a partisan unit in the Naliboki Forest, a large area that was a hotbed of anti-Nazi partisan activity and the center of operations for, among others, Tuvia Bielski. He provided a valuable service by translating between the fighters and their German prisoners. At first he was suspected by Soviet partisans, knowing that he had not only cooperated with the Nazis but had actually worn a German uniform, but was saved through the intervention of those he had helped escape from Mir who identified him and helped clear his name. He then returned to the area just as the Red Army drove out the Nazis and was instrumental in identifying collaborators. This, in turn, led to his becoming involved in prosecutions against these same collaborators. He also testified against Nazi war criminals. Later, he was decorated by the Soviet Union for his partisan activities.

With the war over, in 1945 he returned to his native Poland and began to study for the priesthood. He became a Discalced Carmelite friar, taking the name Brother Daniel, and eventually became a priest.

Anti-Jewish measures during and after the Stalinist period of the early 1950s saw Rufeisen (who still saw himself as a Jew culturally) deciding to leave Poland. In 1958 he made his way to Israel and applied for citizenship under the Law of Return, which gives Jews the right to immigrate and gain automatic Israeli citizenship. Here he reunited with his brother and survivors from the Mir ghetto.

The Israeli government denied Rufeisen's request for citizenship under the Law of Return on the ground that he was now a Christian and had denied his status as a Jew. Rufeisen appealed the case to Israel's Supreme Court in what became a celebrated test case regarding Jewish identity. This brought the rabbinate into the equation, as it was the body that adjudicated issues relating to Jewish religious law such as identity. It ruled that Rufeisen/Brother Daniel should be given citizenship as a Jew because, having been born to a Jewish mother, his identity remained Jewish irrespective of any faith decisions he had made. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling in 1962 that a person could not be both a Catholic priest and a Jew. Rufeisen lost his case, and the government's original decision stood.

Nevertheless, he was given permission to enter Israel as a regular immigrant. He later became a naturalized Israeli citizen and in 1965 founded the Stella Maris Carmelite Monastery in Haifa; here, he would spend the rest of his life. It was said that from the moment he arrived in Israel he was accepted by those who originally came from Mir as one of their own. Oswald Rufeisen died in Haifa in August 1998.

Rumbula Massacre

The mass murder of some 25,000 Jews—mainly from Latvia—by German authorities and Latvian collaborators at Rumbula, a small village and rail station located about seven miles south of Latvia's capital city of Riga. After Germany attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, Nazi troops also invaded and occupied the Baltic States, including Latvia, which had been occupied by the Soviets since the summer of 1940. After the German conquest, Nazi officials began implementing the Holocaust there, forcing thousands of Jews into a ghetto in Riga. By the autumn of 1941 the Germans sought to liquidate the Jews of the Riga ghetto in order to make room for an influx of Jews from Germany and Austria, who would take their place. In charge of the process was Friedrich Jeckeln, an SS officer and leader of a mobile killing squad in Riga. Jeckeln was careful to involve Latvian collaborationists in the operation, in order to give the appearance that they—and not the Germans—had devised and carried out the plan.

With thousands of Jews already on trains bound for Riga, the Germans had little time to empty the Riga ghetto and exterminate its inhabitants. Jeckeln, who had been involved in other similar massacres, had planned the Riga operation to the last detail. Nazi-controlled police would gather people together and march them in groups of 1,000 into the countryside, where they would be shot en masse and buried in mass graves. The weather was bitterly cold, and a number of people died of exposure. Meanwhile, three huge pits had already been dug. The victims were stripped of their clothing and personal possessions, pushed or thrown into a pit face down, and shot once in the back of the head. When the next group arrived, they were ordered to lie face down on top of the bodies of those already shot; they in turn were shot in the head. When the pit was full, it was covered over with dirt by bulldozers; a number of people were buried alive. On the first day alone, November 30, 1941, about 13,000 Latvian Jews (and a few hundred German Jews transported from the west) were murdered in this way.

Organizational difficulties and unexpected resistance from some Jews in the ghetto delayed the second day of the massacre until December 8, when some 12,000 more were murdered in similar fashion. Only three people managed to survive the second day of killing; they later gave testimony about their experiences. Two of the survivors had managed to flee while being marched to Rumbula; the third feigned death and later escaped. A number of those responsible for the Rumbula Massacre were later tried and convicted for their crimes. Jeckeln was captured at the end of the war and hanged by Soviet officials on February 3, 1946, in Riga.

Sachsenhausen

Sachsenhausen was a Nazi concentration camp established in July 1936. It was located north of Berlin, near Oranienburg. Administered by the SS, Sachsenhausen initially housed political prisoners and others deemed “dangerous” to the German government. Beginning in 1937 and continuing into 1945, the camp expanded dramatically and soon became home to a wide array of detainees, including Jews, Jehovah’s Witnesses, male homosexuals, individuals deemed “asocial,” and Roma. Between 1936 and 1945 some 200,000 detainees were either incarcerated at Sachsenhausen or transited through it. A few Soviet civilians were held there, and the camp became a major staging area for Soviet prisoners of war. By 1945 the number of Jewish prisoners at Sachsenhausen totaled about 11,000. In the period immediate following Kristallnacht in 1938, at least 6,000 German Jews were rounded up and imprisoned at Sachsenhausen. Most Jews were released, however, and by early 1939 only 1,345 remained.

After World War II began in September 1939, however, Sachsenhausen once again became home to many Jews, mainly resident aliens who had been residing in Germany, or Polish Jews. Many of those people were transferred to death camps in the east, where most perished. In 1944 Hungarian and Polish Jews who had been residing in various ghettos began arriving in large numbers, while Soviet POWs began arriving in the late summer of 1941; as many as 18,000 of these men were shot and killed there between 1941 and 1945. Their bodies were cremated in an on-site crematorium. In the autumn of 1944 German officials arrested thousands of Polish civilians, of whom approximately 6,000 were sent to Sachsenhausen. Most were non-Jews.

As in all concentration camps, conditions at Sachsenhausen were appalling. Food was scant and of poor quality, living quarters were overcrowded, sanitation facilities were crude at best, and medical care was essentially nonexistent. Many prisoners were ordered to perform forced labor in area factories, where some were worked to the point of exhaustion and death. Malnutrition and disease were perhaps the biggest killers. Including the Russian POWs who died at Sachsenhausen, a total of some 30,000 people died at the camp between 1936 and 1945. Others were beaten to death or executed, and some became the victims of Nazi medical experimentation.

In early April 1945, as Allied troops closed in on Berlin, the SS decided to liquidate the facility. Prisoners were force marched toward the north and east, a brutal process that resulted in many more deaths. When the Soviet Army liberated Sachsenhausen on April 22, 1945, there were still some 3,000 prisoners there, including 1,400 women.

Sachsenhausen was a Nazi concentration camp near Berlin that housed political prisoners from its establishment in 1936 until its liberation in May 1945. During its existence some 30,000 prisoners lost their lives there from a wide variety of causes. Toward the end of the war, with the advance of the Soviets, Sachsenhausen was evacuated. A death march took place in April 1945, during which thousands did not survive. On April 22, 1945, the camp's remaining 3,000 inmates, including 1,400 women, were liberated by the Soviet and Polish troops. (AP Photo)

Salaspils

Salaspils is a small city in Latvia, situated on the Daugava River. It is located about 11 miles (18 kilometers) to the southeast of Latvia's capital, Riga.

Toward the end of 1941 a concentration camp, a little over one mile out of town, was established at Salaspils. Originally it was intended for former Soviet prisoners of war and political prisoners, but by the time it was at its peak the camp became the largest civilian concentration camp in any of the Baltic republics. Officially, Salaspils (known in German as Kurtenhof) was designated as a Police Prison and Work Education

Camp (Polizeigefängnis und Arbeitserziehungslager), spread over an area measuring about 650 by 450 yards.

In October 1941 a senior Einsatzgruppen officer, SS-Sturmbannführer Rudolf Lange, began planning a detention camp to be built at Salaspils. He then oversaw the planning and implementation of the Rumbula massacre, a program that saw the murder of 24,000 Latvian Jews from the Riga ghetto, which occurred between November 30 and December 8, 1941. Later in December he began working as commander of both the security police (Sicherheitspolizei) in Latvia and also of the Security Service (Sicherheitsdienst). His idea for the Salaspils camp was to create a place in which to confine not only those arrested in Latvia for political reasons or as resisters but also as an end point for Jews deported from Germany. Eventually, this would also extend to other occupied countries.

There was a precedent for this dating to before the establishment of Salaspils. On November 29, 1941, a trainload of approximately one thousand Jews from Germany arrived in Riga, where they were murdered. This served as a precedent for others, starting on December 3, 1941. Salaspils now became a convenient location for the Nazis' grisly task, situated on the main rail line between Riga and the next largest city in Latvia, Daugavpils.

Development of the camp took place during January 1942, when around one thousand Jews from the Riga ghetto were conscripted to work on the site. By the fall of 1942 Salaspils was comprised of 15 barracks. In addition, there were two additional camps for Soviet prisoners of war nearby, which also fell under the overall jurisdiction of the camp administration. The death rate here, as in other compounds holding Soviet POWs, was high; while the exact number is unclear and subject to varying estimates, perhaps up to a thousand Soviet prisoners died, the victims of inferior accommodation and sanitary conditions and poor nutrition.

There was a juvenile barrack block at Salaspils, where children aged from 7 to 10 years old, upon being separated from their parents, were held. It has been recorded that these children were often victims of medical experimentation, which, together with typhoid fever, measles, and other diseases, saw a death rate that numbered at least half of the children incarcerated. Indeed, in one of the burial places discovered after the war, 632 corpses of children of ages 5 to 9 were found. While imprisoned, moreover, children were given special badges with their names and family information on them, but should the badges be lost—which happened particularly with younger children, who would often play with their badges or swap them around—their identities would also be lost.

On January 20, 1942, in recognition of his anti-Jewish measures in Riga, Rudolf Lange was invited to attend the Wannsee Conference in Berlin. This only served to encourage him (as well as those around him) to push for higher results in the mass killing of Jews. Plans for the camp at Salaspils were then revised, with a projected population of 15,000 Jews deported from Germany anticipated. While this did not eventuate, nonetheless between 12,000 and 15,000 people did transit through the camp in one way or another during its existence.

Figures concerning the overall mortality rate at Salaspils have fluctuated considerably over time. A reasonable estimate for the total number of deaths has landed at anywhere between 2,000 and 3,000. Not all were Jews, though it is certain that hundreds of German Jews were deliberately murdered or died as a result of sickness, overwork as slave labor, or callous treatment on the part of the guards. During the Cold War, Soviet estimates placed the number of deaths at anywhere between 50,000 and 100,000, but these figures are clearly way too high on account of the camp never taking in that many prisoners to begin with.

On October 13, 1944, the Soviet army liberated Riga—now completely emptied of all of its Jewish population—and on the same day the camp at Salaspils was also overrun. On October 31, 1967, a memorial complex was opened at the site of the Salaspils concentration camp, embracing a small museum and various forms of commemorative artwork.

Salkaházi, Sára

Sára Salkaházi was a Hungarian Catholic nun who saved the lives of approximately one hundred Jews during the Holocaust. She was born Sára Schalkház in Kassa (Košice) in the Slovak-speaking area of the Habsburg Empire on May 11, 1899. The second of three children, her father died when she was still an infant. A thoughtful and religiously devout child, as a teenager she began to write plays and short stories. As a young adult she earned an elementary school teacher's degree, which was the highest available qualification for women in education at the time. She taught school only for one year, leaving to move to another profession, that of book-binding. Later still, she learned millinery. After this, she turned to journalism.

Politically, she joined the Christian Socialist Party of Czechoslovakia and worked as editor of the party newspaper with a specific focus on social problems as they pertained especially to women. Over time, however, she realized that something was missing, until she found solace in religion.

Only after a long personal journey did she decide that her life should be spent in the service of others. In 1929 she entered the Society of the Sisters of Social Service in Budapest, a religious order founded in 1923 by Margit Slachta devoted to charitable, social, and women's causes. At Pentecost 1930 she took her first vows, choosing as her personal motto the words "Here am I! Send me!" (Isaiah 6:8). She took her final vows in 1940.

In 1941 Sister Sára, as she was now known, was sent to Budapest to serve as the national director of the Hungarian Catholic Working Women's Movement. She became editor of the movement's publications and through these cautioned members against the growing influence of Nazism. She also established a network of Working Girls' Homes in order to create a safe environment for working single women.

With the onset of war, political conditions in Budapest became less clear-cut than they were in earlier times. The Arrow Cross Party, the Nazi-inspired antisemitic movement in Hungary, began persecuting Jews, and the Sisters of Social Service, in response, commenced a program of providing safe havens for Jews fleeing from harassment. Sister Sára opened up the order's Working Girls' Homes as places of refuge under increasingly dangerous circumstances with other efforts extended to the provision of food and other vital goods.

As conditions worsened, by 1943 she saw there was only one possible option for her to consider; in order to truly live up to the example set by Jesus, she offered her life for the Society of the Sisters of Social Service and its mission. She pledged herself to God as a willing sacrifice to ensure that the other sisters and the order were not harmed.

With the intensification of anti-Jewish persecution during 1944, Sister Sára redoubled her efforts to save as many people as she could. Ultimately, the Society sheltered up to a thousand Jews, with Sister Sára personally responsible for approximately one hundred.

On the morning of December 27, 1944, armed Arrow Cross troops came to one of the Girls' Homes under Sister Sára's care, looking for Jews. They took four Jewish women and children and a religion teacher, Vilma Bernovits, into custody. Sister Sára was not present at that time, but when she arrived she was immediately detained. Later that night the little group was driven to the Danube Embankment, stripped naked, and shot into the river. It was said that as they were lined up Sister Sára knelt and made the sign of the cross. Her body was never recovered.

In 1969, after having been nominated by the daughter of one of the Jewish women who was killed alongside her, Sister Sára was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Further recognizing her martyrdom, on September 17, 2006, Sister Sára was beatified in a proclamation by Pope Benedict XVI, in what was the first beatification to take place in Hungary since that of King Stephen in 1083.

In an ongoing tribute to her martyrdom, the Sisters of Social Service now hold an annual candlelight memorial service on the Danube Embankment every December 27, the anniversary of Sister Sára's death. It is generally acknowledged that offering herself as a martyr for the society saved not only many Jews suffering persecution but also the order itself.

Salomon, Charlotte

Charlotte Salomon was a German Jewish artist whose autobiographical work, Life? or Theatre?, combines paintings, text, and musical cues in a unique chronicle of her life. Salomon's autobiography deals with her childhood in Weimar-era Germany, her coming of age during the Nazi years, and her exile in France as a refugee from the Nazi regime. It reveals her battle to define her existence and identity in the face of constant personal and political conflict.

Born into a prosperous family in Berlin in 1917, the young Charlotte Salomon struggled to find her own place and voice amid the turbulence of interwar Germany and the antisemitic policies of the Nazi regime. She quit school in 1933 but later applied and was admitted to the esteemed Berlin Art Academy. (Her openly avowed Jewish heritage would eventually lead to her dismissal from that institution.) There she learned classical, Nazi-sanctioned methods and techniques of realism, from which she broke almost completely in her own artistic work.

Increasing persecution at the hands of Adolf Hitler's government ultimately convinced the Salomon family to leave their homeland. In the immediate aftermath of the anti-Jewish pogrom known as Kristallnacht (the Night of Broken Glass) on November 9, 1938, Salomon's father, Albert, along with thousands of other Jews, was sent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp outside Berlin. His family managed to secure his release, and from that point forward the family prepared to leave Germany. Charlotte Salomon left in January 1939 to join her grandparents, who had fled Nazi rule in 1933, on the French Riviera. A plan to reunite with her father and stepmother in exile never materialized; her parents ended up in Amsterdam, where they survived World War II and the Holocaust.

After the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Salomon's grandmother, distressed by the expansion of Hitler's empire, tried to commit suicide (she made another, successful attempt the following year). It was only then that Salomon learned a family secret hidden from her since childhood: six people in her family, including Salomon's mother, had taken their own lives. (Salomon had been told that her mother, who died when Salomon was eight years old, had succumbed to influenza.) Her grandmother's death, the dislocations of war, and her increasing clashes with her grandfather—including an exchange in which he angrily suggested that Salomon kill herself—provided her with the determination to paint the story of her life to avoid falling victim to this fate and as a means of grappling with her family's history. Salomon spent more than a year crafting her autobiography in 1941 and 1942, composing over 1,300 notebook-sized gouache paintings on which text was written directly or on attached overlays. From these, she selected more than 700 for inclusion in Life? or Theatre?

In June 1943 Salomon married Alexander Nagler, an Austrian Jewish refugee also living in southern France. Just three months after their marriage, they were arrested during intensified Nazi roundups of Jews along the Riviera. Before her apprehension, Salomon had given Life? or Theatre? to a friend, with whom it safely remained until the end of the war. After her arrest, Salomon was transported to Auschwitz, where she apparently was gassed soon after her arrival on October 10, 1943.

may go as far back as the Babylonian Exile of the Jews from Judea (ca. 586 BCE). Equally significant, with the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, many fled to this city in such large numbers that the Jews already living there (Romaniote—Jewish communities with distinctive features who have lived in Greece and neighboring areas for more than 2,000 years) were absorbed, albeit, at times, somewhat reluctantly, into a new cultural ethos and set of specifically Sephardic (Spanish) religious practices.

Be that as it may, in April 1941 the Germans both conquered and occupied Greece and divided the spoils into three zones of occupation: German, Bulgarian, and Italian. (Jews in the latter two zones would fare quite differently from each other: the Bulgarians were quick to implement the Nazi policies of death and destruction, while the Italians tended to ignore or evade the more heinous Nazi antisemitic decrees and activities.) At war's end, however, more than 95% of the 50,000 Jews initially found in Salonika under German control had been murdered, either directly in the city itself or transported to the death camp at Auschwitz-Birkenau and gassed immediately upon arrival. Others—males—would become part of the internal camp labor force, especially Sonderkommando—“special handlers”—tasked with emptying out the gas chambers of bodies, examining them for hidden valuables, transporting them to the crematoria, and, finally, removing the increasingly large quantities of ashes. Many of these same Jewish Greeks (the preferred more accurate term) would also play a part in the unsuccessful Auschwitz uprising, which would destroy one of the crematoria. Several members of the Salonikan leadership, including Rabbi Koretz and his family, were transported to Bergen-Belsen.

From the initial Nazi takeover until February 1943, the Jewish community of Salonika would experience increasing pressure on its leadership with the arrests and removal of those in charge, especially Chief Rabbi Tzvi Koretz, a divisive figure who would be transported to and imprisoned in Vienna, Austria, only to later return and resume his position and that of president of the Jewish community. (Even today, Koretz remains something of a controversial figure among both survivors and historians, questioning not only his possible collaborationist activities but also his imperial high-handed leadership, his accommodationist subservience, and the like.)

With the arrival of Adolf Eichmann's henchmen SS Hauptsturmführer Dieter Wisliceny and SS Hauptsturmführer Alois Brunner—the latter would go on to become the commandant of Drancy, France's primary deportation camp, later dying in Damascus, Syria, where he fled after the

Salonika

Due to the vibrancy of its Jewish culture the city of Salonika (Thessaloniki) was known for more than five hundred years as the “Jerusalem of the Balkans.” St. Paul makes an important, though negative, reference to the community in 1 Thessalonians 2:14–16 (ca. 50–52 CE) as thwarting his agenda of promoting his new religious understanding. There are even scholars who have contended that the origins of settlement war—and the active complicity of German SS Captain Max Merten; the German plenipotentiary Günther Altenburg; and the governor-general of Macedonia, Vasilis Simonides, the “Final Solution to the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage) would begin to take an ominous turn.

On July 11, 1942, 9,000 Jewish men between the ages of 18 and 45 were told to assemble in the Plateia Eleftheria (Liberty Square) for forced labor registration. Without shade, water, or food, the Germans instituted a vigorous calisthenics regimen replete with beatings and verbal harassments from which many died in the sweltering heat of that month. Two thousand of the survivors would be transported to Auschwitz-Birkenau and elsewhere to work for the German army. The remaining men were ransomed after a negotiation between the Nazis and the organized Jewish community of Greece to the tune of $3.5 billion drachmas (more than $1,000,000 USD). Four thousand would be put to work building a road linking Salonika with Katerini and Larissa through lice-infested territory. In addition, with the further collaboration of the Greek authorities, the huge Jewish cemetery of Salonika, housing more than 500,000 graves, was plundered of its tombstones to be used for construction projects. (Today, Aristotle University is built upon this site.)

By the end of February 1943 the remaining Jews of Salonika were rounded up and forced into three ghettos, the ultimate goal of which was to make their deportation to death that much easier. The ghettos were Kalamaria, Singrou, and Vardar/Agia Paraskevi. Ironically, the deportation camp location was in the Baron (Maurice/Moritz) de Hirsch section of the city, funded by the German philanthropist to care for the less fortunate, often refugees, and make their transition into city life that much easier, because of its proximity to the train station.

The deportations to Auschwitz-Birkenau began on February 8, 1943, with the first of what would be 19 transports of more than 45,000 Jews from Salonika. The last transport left on August 8, 1943. By the end of the war, only two thousand Jews were left alive in Salonika.

Ironically, the tragic fate of the Jewish Greeks of Salonika was not unknown to the Allies, due to reports appearing in The Times, London (May, 1943) and the New York Times (February 1944, May 1944, and November 1944). Nothing, however, was done to increase their chances of survival.

Sauckel, Fritz

Ernst Friedrich Christoph “Fritz” Sauckel was a member of the German Nazi Party and the general plenipotentiary for labor deployment from 1942 to the end of World War II. He was one of 24 Nazis to be accused, tried, and convicted of war crimes during the Nuremberg Trials of 1945–1946. As general plenipotentiary for labor deployment, Sauckel was responsible for providing the forced labor to accommodate wartime productivity in Nazi Germany. Due to his efforts, approximately 5 million people were deported from their homes throughout the Third Reich and forced to work for the German war machine.

Sauckel was born on October 27, 1894, in Bavaria. The only son of a postman and a seamstress, he spent his pre-World War I years working with the merchant marine in Norway and Sweden. As a sailor, he rose to the rank of Vollmatrose, or able-bodied seaman. At the start of World War I he was working on a German vessel headed for Australia when it was captured by the British and its crew interned. He spent four years as a captive in France, from August 1914 to November 1919.

Sauckel returned to Germany after the war, joining the German Nazi Party in 1921. Six years later, in 1927, he was appointed Gauleiter (a Nazi district political governor) of Thuringia, a central-eastern region of Germany. Sauckel served as a member of Thuringian government into the 1930s, and following Hitler’s appointment as chancellor in 1933 he was promoted to Reich regent of Thuringia and Reichstag member and an Obergruppenführer in the SS and SA.

In 1942 Sauckel was again promoted, to general plenipotentiary for labor deployment, after a recommendation from Martin Bormann, Adolf Hitler's private secretary. In this capacity, Sauckel was directly subordinate to Hermann Göring, president of the Reichstag. The war effort resulted in increasing demands for labor in Germany. Unfortunately, voluntary labor within the Reich was severely lacking, and Sauckel turned to Germany's newly occupied territories, particularly Poland and the Soviet Union. According to Sauckel's testimony at Nuremberg, of the 5 million people who were placed in forced labor, approximately 200,000 came voluntarily. Sauckel's view was that all workers were to be exploited in the most efficient way possible: "All the men must be fed, sheltered and treated in such a way as to exploit them to the highest possible extent at the lowest conceivable degree of expenditure." Such management led to the death of thousands of Jews in the work camps in Poland and other eastern territories.

In 1945, following the end of World War II, Sauckel and 23 other Nazi officials were tried for various counts of war crimes. The Nuremberg Trials, which took place from November 20, 1945, to October 1, 1946, were a series of Allied military tribunals to bring the biggest Nazi criminals to justice. Sauckel swore in his testimony that he was innocent of all war crimes and that he had been unaware of the concentration camps. He defended his position as Reich plenipotentiary for labor, stating his job had "nothing to do with exploitation. It is an economic process for supplying labor." He was found not guilty on Nuremberg Trials' indictments one and two, namely "The Common Plan or Conspiracy" and "Crimes against Peace." However, he was found guilty on indictments three and four, "War Crimes" and "Crimes against Humanity" for his work as general plenipotentiary for labor deployment. He was sentenced to death by hanging and was executed on October 16, 1946. His last words on the scaffold were recorded as, "Ich sterbe unschuldig, mein Urteil ist ungerecht. Gott beschütze Deutschland!" or, "I die an innocent man, my sentence is unjust. God protect Germany!"

Schacter, Herschel

Herschel Schacter was an influential Orthodox rabbi who was the first Jewish chaplain in the U.S. Army to enter the Buchenwald concentration camp upon its liberation in April 1945.

Schacter was born on October 10, 1917, in Brooklyn, New York, the son of immigrants from Poland. After receiving a BA degree from New York's Yeshiva University in 1938, he was ordained a rabbi in 1941, having studied under the highly esteemed Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. During 1941 and part of 1942, Schacter served as a rabbi in Stamford, Connecticut, before enlisting in the U.S. Army as a chaplain in 1942. He held the rank of lieutenant. Throughout World War II, he served in a variety of locations and settings in the European theater.

On April 11, 1945, advance units of the U.S. Third Army (VIII Corps) made their way to Buchenwald. Having learned that the concentration camp was about to be liberated, Schacter commandeered a jeep and raced to the camp. What he saw when he arrived was horrifying and heartbreaking. Emaciated, ill prisoners lay in squalid barracks, while piles of corpses were strewn about like firewood. He then proceeded to go from barracks to barracks, shouting in Yiddish, "Peace be upon you Jews, you are Free!"

Schacter later described a deeply moving scene. As he moved around the camp, he spotted a seven-year-old boy cowering in a dark corner. He picked the boy up and, asking him his name, the child meekly replied, "Lulek." Schacter then asked him how old he was. The boy replied, "What difference does it make? I'm older than you anyway." Puzzled, the chaplain asked him what he meant. The boy proceeded to tell him "because you cry and laugh like a child. . . . I haven't laughed in a long time, and I don't cry anymore. So who's older?" The young boy would later migrate to Palestine and become a rabbi. Now known as Yisrael Meir Lau, he serves as Tel Aviv's chief rabbi.

After Buchenwald's liberation, Schacter remained there for many months. He ministered to the survivors, held religious ceremonies, and later helped to resettle them. There had been almost 1,000 orphans at Buchenwald, nearly all of whom Schacter helped resettle. Many went to France, including a young Elie Wiesel, who later became a renowned writer, while others went to Switzerland. Schacter himself accompanied a group of orphans to Palestine. He was discharged from the army in early 1946.

In 1947 Rabbi Schacter became the chief rabbi for the Mosholu Jewish Center in the Bronx, New York, where he remained until 1999, when the facility was closed. Schacter died in the Bronx on March 21, 2013. In 2011 Rabbi Lau published a memoir, Out of the Depths, which details his encounter with Schacter in 1945 and how it affected the remainder of his life.

Schindler, Oskar

Oskar Schindler is perhaps the best known rescuer of Jews during the Holocaust by virtue of a multi-award-winning movie, Schindler's List, made by filmmaker Steven Spielberg in 1993. At his enamelware and munitions factories in Poland and later Bohemia-Moravia, Schindler saved more than 1,200 Jews from extermination at the hands of the Nazis.

Born to Johann and Franziska Schindler, née Luser, on April 28, 1908, in Zwittau (Svitavy), Austria-Hungary, Oskar Schindler had an unsettled education that carried over to his early adult years. On March 6, 1928, he married Emilie Pelzl. An opportunist and womanizer always interested in get-rich-quick schemes that inevitably failed, with little else going for him he joined the Abwehr, the German military intelligence network, in 1936. He applied for membership in the Nazi Party on November 1, 1938, and in February 1939, five months after the German annexation of the Sudetenland, this was accepted.

Following the German invasion and occupation of Poland, Schindler moved to Kraków in October 1939. Taking advantage of the German occupation program to “Aryanize” businesses in the so-called Generalgouvernement (General Government), in November 1939 he purchased an enamelware factory from its Jewish owner, Nathan Wurzel, and Oskar Schindler was a German industrialist and rescuer of Jews credited with saving the lives of 1,200 Jews during the Holocaust. His first enamelware factory was located in Krakow, Poland, where he manufactured goods for the German military. This enabled his workers to be protected from deportation to the Nazi concentration camps. In 1963 he was recognized as one of the Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem. reopened it as Deutsche Emalwarenfabrik (German Enamelware Factory), or, by its shortened version, Emalia. He employed Jewish slave labor, at extremely exploitative rates payable to the SS, which he brought in from the Kraków ghetto. After the ghetto's liquidation in March 1943 the Jewish workforce was relocated to the concentration camp at Plaszów under the command of Amon Goeth.

Schindler went to great lengths to ensure the survival of “his” Jews, or Schindlerjuden, as they came to be called. Though they were still subject to the draconian and deadly rules and regulations of the concentration camp (and the whims of Goeth's erratic regime), Schindler made constant intercessions on the Jews' behalf, seeing to it that they were neither deported nor killed. He repeatedly demanded that they not be harmed on the ground that they were essential to the war effort, and, with the assistance of his Jewish accountant Itzhak Stern, he managed to keep the prisoners in one place while making it appear as though the factory was performing valuable war work.

It was no surprise at first that Schindler was only interested in making money from his enterprise, but as he witnessed the brutal treatment Jews were experiencing, he became more and more disillusioned with Nazi ideology and what he saw it as representing. Over time he became transformed from the money-grubbing opportunist he had always been to a humanitarian with a desperate desire to save Jewish lives. The underlying reason for this change of heart has eluded historians, but it can be said with certainty that Schindler was never part of any organized resistance movement or rescue organization, and acted from motives that were his alone.

Protecting his workers came at a huge financial cost, but the money Schindler had made as a war profiteer he spent in bribes and expensive presents to Nazi officials. Eventually, he lost count of how much he had spent in protecting “his” Jews. Certainly, it was many millions of Reichsmarks. In trying to ensure that his workers would survive the war, he was prepared to spend all his money. Servicing huge costs in order to protect his workers, Schindler had to engage in illegal business dealings on the black market, which saw him arrested on three separate occasions. He was also twice arrested for Rassenschande, or “race shame,” after kissing Jewish girls—one of them on the cheek as a gesture of affection and gratitude.

With the advance of the Eastern Front during 1944, many of the concentration camps located in eastern Poland began to be closed down. Seeing the prospect of this happening to Plaszów, a Jew working as Goeth’s personal secretary, Mietek Pemper, informed Schindler that all factories not directly involved in the war effort, including his factory camp, were at risk. He then proposed that Schindler would be more secure if he were seen to be producing armaments instead of pots and pans. Accordingly, in October 1944, Schindler sought permission to relocate his factory to Brünnlitz (Brněnec) in Moravia, taking as many of his “highly skilled workers” as possible with him, and to resurrect it as an arms factory. Permission was granted, and the factory became reestablished as a subcamp of Gross-Rosen.

Pemper then compiled a list of people who, it was argued, had to go to Brünnlitz. The names were provided by a corrupt member of the Kraków Jewish police, Marcel Goldberg, who identified a thousand of Schindler’s workers and two hundred from the textile factory of a Viennese businessman in Kraków, Julius Madritsch. The lists were typed up by Goldberg; unlike popular wisdom, Schindler was not present when this took place. Nonetheless, all were sent to Brünnlitz: 800 men deported by the SS from Plaszów via Gross-Rosen and just over 300 women who went from Plaszów via Auschwitz, rescued at the last moment from gassing by the timely arrival of Schindler’s secretary, Hilde Albrecht, who came armed with bribes of black market goods, food, and diamonds.

Because they were relatively safe at Brünnlitz when compared to the possible fate that would have greeted the Jews if they had remained at Plaszów, Schindler worked at ensuring his charges would remain secure by continuing to bribe the SS and other Nazis, some of whom had an eye for profit, others with an ideological commitment that said the Jews had to keep working unto death.

By the time Brünnlitz was liberated by the Russians on May 9, 1945, Schindler was bankrupt and, as a member of the Nazi Party and a perceived war profiteer and exploiter of slave labor, he was on the run. He smuggled himself and his wife, Emilie, back into Germany, where they settled in Regensburg and kept a low profile.

They stayed there until 1949, when they migrated to Argentina. Just as before the war, he again failed in his business ventures. His marriage to Emilie broke down, and in 1957 they separated. In 1958 he returned to Germany alone.

On July 18, 1967, for his efforts in rescuing over 1,200 Jews during the Holocaust, Schindler was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Emilie was similarly recognized on June 24, 1993. Oskar Schindler died, penniless, on October 9, 1974, in Hildesheim, Germany. Later, he was buried in Jerusalem on Mount Zion. He was the only member of the Nazi Party ever to be so honored.

In 1980 Australian novelist Thomas Keneally learned about Schindler from Leopold (Poldek) Pfefferberg, a “Schindler Jew.” The result was a fictionalized account of the story, Schindler’s Ark, which appeared in 1982. In the United States the book was published as Schindler’s List. The book was later adapted for the screen by Steven Spielberg, using the American title, to immense critical and popular acclaim. The film won seven Academy Awards, including Best Picture, and Liam Neeson was nominated as Best Actor for his portrayal of Schindler. Because of the high profile accorded Schindler as a result of the movie, and a vast array of books and documentaries that followed, his name has become a byword for rescue during the Holocaust—such that one of the highest accolades many can today give a rescuer is that he or she is “the Oskar Schindler of . . .” a given situation.

Schindler's Jews

"Schindler's Jews," or Schindlerjuden in German, is a term that refers to a group of some 1,100 mostly Polish Jews who were saved from almost certain death during the Holocaust by German businessman Oskar Schindler. After the German invasion of Poland began on September 1, 1939, Schindler purchased an enamelware factory near Kraków, Poland. His accountant, a German-speaking Jew by the name of Itzhak Stern, helped Schindler secure the services of some 1,100 Polish Jews, who would work in his factory.

Schindler witnessed more and more brutality toward Jews in Kraków, which troubled him greatly. After Nazi soldiers rounded up scores of Jews in 1943 for deportation to concentration camps, Schindler stepped up his efforts to shield his Jewish workers from Nazi atrocities. Increasingly, Schindler defended his workforce and claimed exemptions for them because his business was considered essential to the war effort. Schindler treated his workers fairly and civilly, even permitting them to pray.

Late in the war, as Soviet troops advanced to the west, Schindler learned that Nazi officials planned to close all factories in Poland, including his own. He then convinced SS officials to allow him to operate a factory in Brännlitz (now in the Czech Republic), where he would manufacture military items. He also received approval to relocate his mostly Jewish labor force to the new facility, under the premise that the workers were already trained and hence indispensable to his operations. Before the move, which took place in October 1944, a list of 1,200 workers—mostly Jews—was drawn up and presented to the authorities.

In reality, few military items were made in the new factory, and those that were had been purposely sabotaged. By mid-1945 Schindler and his family had closed the facility and fled to Austria, but almost all of his workers survived the war.

There are now more than 7,000 descendants of Schindler's Jews living throughout the world, chiefly in Europe, Israel, and the United States. Nearly all of the original survivors have now died, and in January 2013, Leon Leyson, the youngest of the Schindler survivors, died at the age of 83 in Los Angeles, his adopted city. Leyson was reunited with Schindler almost 30 years after the war when Schindler visited the United States. Although there has been no formal mass reunion of Schindler's Jews, a number of them did meet with other survivors after the war, often in conjunction with meetings with Schindler, who died in 1974.

Schindler's deeds were later brought to light in a book written by Australian writer Thomas Keneally; titled Schindler's Ark (1982), it was published as Schindler's List in the United States. In 1993 Steven Spielberg produced a masterful and popular film rendition of the book, again titled Schindler's List.

Schindler's List

Considered perhaps the most famous Holocaust film ever to be made, Schindler's List is a motion picture directed by multi-award-winning filmmaker Steven Spielberg in 1993. The film was nominated for 12 Academy Awards and won seven: best picture, best director (Spielberg), best adapted screenplay (Steven Zaillian), best cinematography (Janusz Kaminski), best original score (John Williams), best editing (Michael Kahn), and best art direction (Ewa Tarnowska and Allan Starski).

The film was produced almost entirely in black and white, at times taking on the manner of a quasi-documentary, though color was introduced briefly on three occasions: in its opening and closing sequences, and showing a little girl in a red coat (the coat makes a brief appearance on one other occasion).

The movie starred Liam Neeson in the title role as Oskar Schindler, Ben Kingsley (Itzhak Stern), and Ralph Fiennes (Amon Goeth), and was based on Schindler's Ark, a book from 1982 written by Australian writer Thomas Keneally. It tells the dramatic story of real-life Sudeten-German businessman and Nazi Oskar Schindler, a morally corrupt adulterer, opportunist, and profiteer, who operated a slave labor factory producing enamelware intended for military use in Kraków, Poland, during World War II.

The movie is a dramatized account of the life of Schindler during the Holocaust, as he makes a dramatic turnaround from exploiting Jewish slave labor to seeing the need to save the lives of his workers. Once he realizes a way to do so, he composes a list of those he wishes to save; a list that he strove to make as long as possible (eventually comprising nearly 1,200 names), right under the gaze of the SS.

Spielberg was said to have been interested in the story of Oskar Schindler from the time of the book's first appearance but needed time to carefully consider how it could be made. He was, however, seemingly always determined to make the film, not only from an artistic perspective but also from the perspective of his own personal commitment; upon finishing, he later spoke of how the process of making of the movie had a deep emotional impact on him.

The three-hour-long epic has been hailed as among the most accurate portrayals of the reality of the Holocaust for the events it describes. In certain circles it stimulated controversy, however, particularly for its ending. After the audience has accompanied Schindler and those around him through their various ordeals and journeys, the film moves to a cemetery in Jerusalem, where surviving "Schindler Jews" (Schindlerjuden), accompanied by the actors who portrayed them in the movie, line up in order to place stones on Oskar Schindler's grave—a traditional Jewish custom to signify that a visit has been made by one who remembers the departed. The last person at the grave is Liam Neeson (Oskar Schindler). He places a rose on the tombstone. A postscript informs viewers that the Jews saved by Schindler have now embraced life, with more than 6,000 descendants.

The reason for the controversy, among some critics, was because this was seen as both a maudlin and an inferior ending to what had otherwise been a brilliant evocation of the Holocaust experience—for some, it was even unnecessary. Despite this, the film generated additional historical research (particularly among younger viewers and schoolteachers), inspired new Jewish-Christian dialogue, and served to relocate the Holocaust at the forefront of American consciousness.

The movie's tagline, coming from the Talmud (Mishnah Sanhedrin 4:5; Yerushalmi Talmud 4:9, Babylonian Talmud Sanhedrin 37a), is celebrated as an inscription inside a ring presented by the survivors to Schindler at the end of the movie: "Whoever saves one life saves the world entire." As a coda for the whole movie, it was clear that Spielberg was attempting to send a moral message to his viewing audience through this device; indeed, through the whole movie.

Building on this, in 1994 Spielberg founded and financed the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, whose aim was to record testimonies of survivors and witnesses of the Holocaust. In January 2006 it partnered with the University of California to establish the USC Shoah Foundation Institute for Visual History and Education. The fundamental goal of the Shoah Foundation is to provide an oral history archive for the filmed testimony of as many survivors of the Holocaust as possible, so that future generations will be able to hear the actual voices of those who experienced the Holocaust in their very flesh.

Schlegelberger, Franz

Louis Rudolph Franz Schlegelberger was state secretary in the German Reich Ministry of Justice and served as German justice minister during the Third Reich. He was the highest-ranking defendant at the Judges' Trial in Nuremberg.

Schlegelberger was born on October 23, 1876, into a pious Protestant family from Königsberg, where he attended gymnasium and sat for his school-leaving examination in 1894. He began studying law in Königsberg in 1894, continuing his legal studies in Berlin from 1895 to 1896. In 1897 he passed the state legal examination. At the University of Königsberg (by some accounts, the University of Leipzig) he graduated as a doctor of law on December 1, 1899.

On December 9, 1901, Schlegelberger passed his state law examination. Two weeks later he became an assessor at the Königsberg local court, and on March 17, 1902, assistant judge at the Königsberg State Court. On September 16, 1904, he became a judge at the State Court in Lyck (now Elk, Poland). In early May 1908 he went to the Berlin State Court and in the same year was appointed assistant judge at the Berlin Court of Appeals (Kammergericht). In 1914 he was appointed to the Kammergericht Council (Kammergerichtsrat) in Berlin, where he stayed until 1918.

On April 1, 1918, Schlegelberger became an associate at the Reich Justice Office, receiving appointment later in the year to the Secret Government Court and Executive Council. In 1927 he took on the post of ministerial director in the German Reich Ministry of Justice. Schlegelberger had been teaching in the Faculty of Law at the University of Berlin as an honorary professor since 1922 and was a well-known jurist who, in September 1929, even traveled to Latin America. On October 10, 1931, Schlegelberger was appointed state secretary at the Ministry of Justice under Franz Gürtner and kept this job until Gürtner's death in 1941.

After the Nazi Party came to power in 1933, in an attempt to restrain executive power, Schlegelberger objected to a decree retroactively imposing the death penalty on those blamed for the Reichstag Fire on the basis that the decree was a violation of the ancient legal maxim nulla poena sine lege ("no punishment without law"). By January 30, 1938, following Adolf Hitler's orders regarding judges in the Third Reich, Schlegelberger joined the Nazi Party.

In March 1940 Schlegelberger proposed that lawyers be expelled from their profession if they did not fully and without reservation support the National Socialist state. As minister of justice, he reiterated that call in a conference of German jurists and lawyers in April 1941. The first item on the conference agenda was the Nazi regime's T-4 euthanasia initiative, in which Schlegelberger announced the Führer's policies so that judges and public prosecutors understood that they might not use legal means to oppose the Aktion T-4 measures against the will of the Führer.

After Franz Gürtner's death in 1941, Schlegelberger became provisional Reich minister of justice for the years 1941 and 1942 while still holding his post as state secretary. Otto Thierack was appointed after Schlegelberger's acting position expired. During Schlegelberger's period in office the number of judicial death sentences rose sharply. He drafted the Poland Penal Law Provision (Polenstrafrechtsverordnung), under which Poles were executed for tearing down German wall posters and proclamations.

Schlegelberger's work assisted the institutionalization of torture in the Third Reich. After defendants accused of "political" crimes started to show signs of torture, Schlegelberger's Justice Ministry "legalized" such acts, to such an extent that the Reich Ministry of Justice even established a "standard club" to be used in beatings, so that torture would at least be regularized.

In 1941 a police captain named Klinzmann was convicted of torture for beating an arson confession out of a Jewish farm laborer. When the German Supreme Court refused to hear Klinzmann's appeal, Schlegelberger created a new procedure called "cancellation" that gave the Reich a means to end every trial independently of judicial decisions. Klinzmann was set free and so had no criminal record against his name.

On October 24, 1941, Schlegelberger wrote to the chief of the Reich Chancellery, Minister Hans Lammers, informing him that acting under the Führer Order of October 24, 1941, Schlegelberger had handed over to the Gestapo for execution a Jew named Markus Luftglass, sentenced by the Special Court (Sondergericht) in Katowice to two-and-a-half years in prison (for the crime of hoarding eggs). That was clearly a violation of the legal maxim "no punishment without law."

In November 1941 Schlegelberger was among those whom Reinhard Heydrich invited to attend the Wannsee Conference. As things turned out, his subordinate, Roland Freisler, attended as Schlegelberger's deputy. After the conference, Schlegelberger supported efforts to apply a more restrictive definition of the persons subjected to the "Final Solution." In a letter on April 5, 1942, to Lammers, he suggested that "mixed people" should be given a choice between "evacuation to the East" or sterilization, writing that "The measures for the final solution of the Jewish question should extend only to full Jews and descendants of mixed marriages of the first degree, but should not apply to descendants of mixed marriages of the second degree. . . . There is no national interest in dissolving the marriage between such half-Jews and a full-blooded German."

Schlegelberger wrote several books on the law and at the time of his retirement was called "the last of the German jurists." Some of those law texts commenting upon German law were still in use and available for purchase in 2017. Upon Schlegelberger's retirement as justice minister on August 24, 1942, Hitler thanked him with a huge financial endowment and permitted him to purchase an estate with the money, something outside the rules then in force; clearly Hitler held Schlegelberger in high esteem.

After the war Schlegelberger was one of the main accused indicted in the Nuremberg Judges' Trial in 1947. He was sentenced to life imprisonment for conspiracy to perpetrate war crimes and crimes against humanity. The judgment stated, in part, "that Schlegelberger supported the pretension of Hitler in his assumption of power to deal with life and death in disregard of even the pretense of judicial process. By his exhortations and directives, Schlegelberger contributed to the destruction of judicial independence. It was his signature on the decree of 7 February 1942 which imposed upon the Ministry of Justice and the courts the burden of the prosecution, trial, and disposal of the victims of Hitler's Night and Fog. For this he must be charged with primary responsibility."

In 1950 the 74-year-old Schlegelberger was released from prison on "health grounds" by the American High Commissioner for Germany. He then lived in Flensburg until his death at the old age of 93 on December 14, 1970.

Schlegelberger was perceived as a reluctant supporter of Hitler's rule and given a lenient sentence. From the available records it appears that Schlegelberger's most acute regrets dealt with what he experienced, rather than what he helped inflict on others. Given his record, he was the model for the character of Ernst Janning, the penitent German jurist portrayed by Burt Lancaster in the multi-award-winning motion picture Judgment at Nuremberg, a depiction of the Judges' Trial at Nuremberg.

Schmeling, Max

Max Schmeling was a German heavyweight boxer who risked his life to save two young Jewish brothers by hiding them in his hotel room and then helping them escape Germany during the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 1938.

Of modest background, Maximilian Schmeling was born in Klein-Luckow, Germany, near Hamburg, on September 28, 1905. The son of a sailor, from a young age his life was to be that of a boxer. He turned professional in 1924 at age of 19 and won the German light heavyweight title two years later. On June 19, 1927, he won the European light heavyweight title, and then the German heavyweight crown. He soon went to the United States, where he had his first American fight at Madison Square Garden against Joe Monte on November 23, 1928. He won by knockout. The following year, also in New York, Schmeling signaled his intentions by defeating a pair of top heavyweights, Johnny Risko and Paulino Uzcudun.

With these victories, he moved to the number-two ranking and a shot at the heavyweight title. At that time the crown was vacant, and Schmeling met Jack Sharkey to settle the title. They met on June 12, 1930, and Schmeling won when Sharkey was disqualified in the fourth round after delivering a low blow. This became the only occasion in boxing history when the heavyweight championship was won by disqualification.

In April 1933, not long after Adolf Hitler became chancellor of Germany, he summoned Schmeling—by now his favorite athlete—for a private dinner meeting with himself, Hermann Göring, Josef Goebbels, and other Nazi officials. In discussion, he told Schmeling that when he was in the United States he should inform the American public that reports about Jewish persecution in Germany were untrue. When Schmeling arrived in New York he complied, saying that there was no antisemitism in Germany and emphasizing the point that his manager, Joe Jacobs, was Jewish. Few were convinced, particularly as Hitler had banned Jews from boxing soon after he and Schmeling had met.

In July 1933 Schmeling married a blond, beautiful Czech movie star, Anny Ondra, and the two became Germany's most glamorous couple. The same year, Schmeling lost the title in a rematch with Sharkey after a controversial 15-round split decision, followed by defeat at the hands of Max Baer before a crowd of 60,000 at Yankee Stadium in June 1933. With this, the loss was deemed a "racial and cultural disgrace" by the Nazi propaganda newspaper Der Stürmer, which considered it outrageous that Schmeling would even have deigned to fight a "non-Aryan." Baer's father was Jewish, and Baer himself fought wearing shorts emblazoned with a Star of David.

By this stage Schmeling was viewed as a something of a Nazi puppet, when not being accused of sympathizing with Nazism. On March 10, 1935, he fought and knocked out American boxer Steve Hamas in Hamburg. At this, the 25,000 spectators spontaneously stood and sang the Horst Wessel (the Nazi anthem), with arms raised in the Hitler salute. This caused outrage in the United States, with Schmeling now being publicized in Germany as the very model of Aryan supremacy and Nazi racial superiority, something he would detest all his life.

During the 1936 Olympics in Berlin, Schmeling requested from Hitler a promise that all American athletes would be protected, which Hitler respected. Around this time, the German dictator also began pressuring Schmeling to join the Nazi Party, which would have made a wonderful propaganda coup for the regime. Not only did Schmeling refuse, he also turned down every inducement to stop associating with German Jews or fire Joe Jacobs as his manager.

Nonetheless, the German propaganda machine still found enough traction in Schmeling to retain him as a propaganda model of Aryan supremacy. The U.S. public also wanted Schmeling, but for the opposite reason. Rather than celebrating him, many in the United States hoped he would come back for another fight and lose—this time against the young American hero, the “Brown Bomber,” Joe Louis. As Schmeling’s record of late had not been strong, he went into the fight a 10–1 underdog, and many people thought that at 30 years of age he was past his prime.

On June 19, 1936, the fight took place at Yankee Stadium. Schmeling had studied his opponent’s technique closely and found a weakness in his defense. In the 12th round, he scored what some consider the upset of the century, when he sensationally knocked Louis out. In Germany, the Nazi press—to Schmeling’s dismay—boasted of the victory as representing white Aryan supremacy. When he returned to Berlin, he was invited by Hitler to join him for lunch.

A rematch at Yankee Stadium on June 22, 1938, was arguably the most famous boxing bout in history. The fight had huge implications, plain for all to see. It became a cultural and political event, billed as a battle of the Aryan versus the Negro, a struggle of evil against good. Held before a crowd of more than 70,000, the match saw a determined and highly motivated Joe Louis knock Schmeling out within two minutes and four seconds of the first round.

Schmeling later said that although he was knocked out in the first round and shipped home on a stretcher with a severely damaged spine, he was relieved that the defeat took Nazi expectations off him. It made it easier for him to refuse to act as a Nazi, and he was shunned by Hitler and the Nazi hierarchy for having “shamed” the Aryan Superman ideal.

On the night of November 9, 1938, as antisemitic mobs were sacking Jewish property throughout the Reich, Schmeling’s opposition to Nazism was tested as never before. One of his friends, a Jew named David Lewin, was a tailor at Prince of Wales, the shop where Schmeling bought his suits. As the Kristallnacht intensified throughout the night, Lewin asked Schmeling to shelter his two sons, Heinz and Werner, aged 14 and 15 respectively. Without hesitation, Schmeling took them to his room in the downtown Excelsior Hotel and kept them there for three days. He told the desk clerk that he was ill and must not be disturbed. After things settled down, he drove them to his house for further hiding; waiting another two days, he then delivered them to their father.

In 1939 Schmeling helped the family to flee the country altogether. They went to the United States where one of them, Henri Lewin, became a prominent hotel owner in Las Vegas.

For his part, Hitler never forgave Schmeling for losing to Louis, especially given the circumstances, or for refusing to join the Nazi Party. During World War II he saw to it that at the age of 35 Schmeling would be drafted into the Luftwaffe as an elite paratrooper, where he served during the Battle of Crete in May 1941. It was said that the Führer took a personal interest in seeing to it that the former champion would be sent on suicide missions.

After the war, Schmeling tried to reinvigorate his boxing career. He fought five times, but in May 1948 was beaten by Walter Neusel, whom he had defeated in a classic match several years earlier. This was his last fight. Across his career, Schmeling’s record read as 70 fights for 56 wins (40 by KO) and four draws.

In retirement, Schmeling became one of Germany’s most revered and respected sports figures. He remained popular not only in Germany but also in America. He was awarded the Golden Ribbon of the German Sports Press Society and became an honorary citizen of the City of Los Angeles. In 1967 he published his autobiography, Ich Boxte mich durchs Leben, later published in English as Max Schmeling: An Autobiography.

He bought a Coca-Cola dealership in 1957, from which he derived much financial success. This enabled him to become one of Germany’s most beloved philanthropists, a popular and much respected figure not only in Germany but also in America. He became friends with many of his former boxing opponents, in particular Joe Louis. He would often help out Louis financially, and their friendship lasted until the American’s death in 1981, when Schmeling, in a final tribute, paid for the funeral.

On February 28, 1987, Schmeling’s wife of 54 years, Anny Ondra, died. In 1992 he was inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame, though sadly he was never honored by Yad Vashem as a Righteous Gentile for his actions during the Kristallnacht of November 1938. No one, it seems, ever nominated him.

Max Schmeling was a man in conflict with both the Hitler regime and the racial policies of Nazism. The degree of resistance he showed was built around a sense of what it was to be a decent human being. On February 2, 2005, he died aged 99, at his home in Hollenstedt, near Hamburg.

Schmid, Anton

Anton Schmid, an Austrian soldier serving in the Wehrmacht during World War II, resisted the Holocaust through the saving of Jews—and was executed as a result. He was born in Vienna in 1900, married his wife Stefi, and had a daughter. An electrician by trade, by the time he reached early middle age he owned a radio shop and lived a comfortable life in Vienna.

Having been drafted into the German army after the Anschluss with Austria, he was mobilized upon the outbreak of war in September 1939. He was sent first to Poland, and then, after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, transferred to Nazi-occupied Lithuania. By the autumn of 1941 the now Sergeant Schmid was stationed near Vilna (Vilnius).

Witnessing the creation of the Vilna ghetto in September 1941, Schmid soon learned what the fate of the Jews was to be. Mass killings had already been taking place since July 1941, and they continued throughout the summer and fall. By the end of the year, some 21,700 Jews had been murdered by Einsatzgruppen units and their Lithuanian allies in the Ponary Forest near Vilna. Schmid was appalled, particularly as he saw children being beaten in front of him. From his perspective, it was unthinkable not to try to find a way to go to the Jews' aid.

Schmid's assignment in Vilna saw him commanding a unit responsible for reassigning soldiers who had been separated from their detachments. He was based at the Vilna train station; from here, he saw a great deal of the treatment meted out to Jews, and he lost no opportunity in using his position to ease their situation. He would take them off the trains and employ them as workers, arranged for some to be released from prison, organized new papers for others, and even—at immense personal risk—sheltered Jews in his office and personal quarters.

Among those he hid were Herman Adler and his wife Anita, both members of Vilna's prewar Zionist movement. Through them, Schmid met with one of the leaders of the nascent Jewish resistance movement in the ghetto, Mordechai Tenenbaum. The result saw him smuggling Jews out of Vilna to other Jewish cities such as Białystok—places where it was thought the Jews could have a better chance of survival. Schmid also acted as a conduit enabling various resistance groups to establish contact with one another.

Ultimately, Schmid's actions in hiding Jews, supplying them with false papers, and arranging their escape managed to save the lives of up to 250 men, women, and children. Within resistance circles, news of his activities on behalf of Jews spread; inevitably, he began to be watched more closely by Nazi authorities. The knowledge that he could be found out only emboldened him to work on behalf of Jews with greater determination and audacity.

Inevitably Schmid was found out. In the second half of January 1942 he was arrested, and on February 25 he was summarily court-martialed for high treason. The death penalty was the only possible outcome of such a trial, and on April 13, 1942, he was duly executed by firing squad.

Anton Schmid was an extremely brave human being. He clearly knew that he was placing himself in danger through his actions, and that, if caught, his fate would be sealed. For all that, however, he did not see anything particularly special in what he did. In his last letter to his wife Stefi, written from his prison cell prior to execution, he wrote, "I only acted as a human being and did not want to hurt anyone." His actions had an unfortunate outcome for Stefi, besides the obvious one of depriving her of her husband, his income, pension, and a war hero's death. When word got back to Vienna, her neighbors shunned her, referring to her husband as a traitor and socially ostracizing her. At one point, her windows were smashed.

The life-saving deeds of Anton Schmid had another outcome, however, when, on May 16, 1967, Yad Vashem in Jerusalem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Stefi Schmid received the award personally, having been flown to Jerusalem for the occasion.

Then, on May 8, 2000, the German government named a military barracks in Schmid's honor in Rendsburg, northern Germany, as the Feldwebel-Schmid-Kaserne. At the naming ceremony Germany's defense minister, Rudolf Scharping, said: "We are not free to choose our history, but we can choose the examples we take from that history. Too many bowed to the threats and temptations of the dictator, and too few found the strength to resist. But Sergeant Anton Schmid did resist."

Scholl, Hans and Sophie

Hans Scholl and his sister Sophie were a brother and sister who were at the forefront of organizing a resistance movement within Germany against the Nazi regime during World War II. The movement, known as the Weisse Rose (“The White Rose”), was largely centered on the University of Munich, where the Scholls were students.

Hans was born on September 22, 1918, in Ingersheim, the second of six children. Sophie was born on May 9, 1921, in Forchtenberg. Hans joined the Hitler Youth (Hitlerjugend), and Sophie the League of German Girls (Bund Deutscher Mädel) soon after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933, and at first they were enthusiastic supporters of the Nazi regime. Their parents, however, were far less enamored with the Nazis and expressed their dissatisfaction to others.

The younger Scholls became increasingly disenchanted with the Nazi Party during their years at the University of Munich. Hans became a medical student, and Sophie studied biology and philosophy. By the early 1940s they had developed a belief that Hitler and the Nazis were ruining the German nation and engaged in atrocities against Jews and Hans and Sophie Scholl, a brother and sister who, with others, organized the White Rose, an anti-Nazi movement centered among students at the University of Munich. They produced and distributed a series of leaflets condemning Nazism and calling on the German people to rise up against it. others. They had also come to realize that all Germans had a duty to object to their government's policies and activities, and their attitudes were reinforced at home; in 1942 their father, Robert Scholl, was arrested for publicly doubting Germany's ability to win World War II.

In 1942, with a group of fellow students including Christoph Probst, Willi Graf, and Alexander Schmorell, and their professor, Dr. Kurt Huber, the Scholls helped to spearhead the White Rose. The group began posting and mailing various antigovernment posters and literature publicizing the atrocities perpetrated by Hitler's government, and urging Germans to resist the government and its policies. One of those who met with them and assisted briefly in these early days was a Swedish Red Cross delegate, Sture Linnér.

The focus of these statements was a series of numbered pamphlets campaigning for the overthrow of Nazism and the revival of a new Germany dedicated to the pursuit of goodness and founded on the purest of Christian values. The group's opposition to Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party was essentially based on religious morality and humanitarianism, with little, if any, overt political motivation.

The name of their movement came from a novel that had inspired the Scholls when they were young. Their initial pamphlet, of what would eventually be six, was secretly published in June 1942. The pamphlets attracted public attention, and copies were made and distributed widely. Problems arose regarding state-regulated supplies of paper and ink, which could only be overcome illegally, but eventually White Rose pamphlets were dispersed throughout Germany and Austria, denouncing the activities of the Nazi Party and decrying the murder of innocent German citizens, including Jews.

The activities of the group quickly drew the attention and ire of the Gestapo. Hans, Christoph Probst, and others were sent to fight on the Russian front from the summer of 1942 onward, exposing them to the horrors of the Holocaust and other wartime atrocities. This only encouraged their efforts to resist Nazi authority when they returned to Germany.

The range of the White Rose group expanded beyond the University of Munich. Students at the University of Hamburg also joined, and at its peak membership it had about 80 adherents.

In mid-February 1943 the White Rose arranged a small anti-Nazi demonstration in Munich. Their ideals inspired them to an ever-increasing number of daring acts, such as a run through the buildings of the university during which leaflets condemning the Nazis were scattered liberally in the hallways. On February 18, 1943, a janitor who was a Nazi Party member, Jakob Schmid, spotted Hans and Sophie scattering copies of the sixth pamphlet from a balustrade in the atrium of the university. He raised the alarm, called the Gestapo, and had the Scholls and Probst arrested.

They were sent for a summary trial in the Volksgerichtshof (People's Court) on February 22, 1943, and stood before Judge Roland Freisler, who berated them for their activities. They were quickly indicted for treason, and, defiantly, they admitted their crimes. Inevitably found guilty, Hans and Sophie Scholl, together with Christoph Probst, were executed by beheading the same day. It was noted by witnesses that all three faced their deaths bravely, with Hans claiming as his last words, "Long live freedom!" Hans was 24, Sophie was 21, and Christoph was 22. From arrest to execution took only four days.

Shortly afterward, numerous others associated with the White Rose were denounced, identified, and arrested by the Gestapo. Later that same year, other executions took place. Alexander Schmorell (age 25) and Dr. Kurt Huber (age 49) were both executed on July 13, 1943, and Willi Graf (age 25) on October 12, 1943. Another member, Hans Conrad Leipelt, who helped distribute the sixth leaflet in Hamburg, was executed on January 29, 1945, aged 23. Most of the other students convicted for their part in the group's activities received prison sentences; many were consigned to concentration camps.

The text of the sixth White Rose leaflet saw their efforts crowned in part, however. It was picked up by Helmuth James von Moltke and smuggled out of Germany, through Scandinavia, to the United Kingdom. In July 1943 tens of thousands of copies of the leaflet were air-dropped over Germany as "The Manifesto of the Students of Munich."

The White Rose movement and the story of the Scholls have become the subject of numerous depictions in literature and film, most notably two movies: Die Weiße Rose (dir. Michael Verhoeven, 1982) and Sophie Scholl, Die letzten Tage (dir. Marc Rothemund, 2005).

In death, the members of the White Rose became a spur to other anti-Nazi groups as well as the political left throughout Germany. After World War II the movement began to be seen by Germans as an admirable example of resistance to evil. The Scholls have become revered as among Germany's greatest heroes (particularly among younger Germans), with the White Rose Foundation and White Rose International serving as contemporary organizations that seek to preserve the memory of the White Rose and continue its tradition of "principled resistance." The bravery of the Scholls and their friends has come to represent individual sacrifice in the midst of unspeakable oppression and evil.

Scholtz-Klink, Gertrud

Gertrud Scholtz-Klink, born Gertrud Treusch and also known as Maria Stuckebrock, was born on February 9, 1902, in Adelsheim, Baden, Germany and died on March 24, 1999, in Tübingen-Bebenhausen. A Nazi Party member, Scholtz-Klink was leader of the National Socialist Women's League (NS-Frauenschaft) during the period of the Nazi regime. In 1920 Scholtz-Klink married Eugen Klink and had six children with him before he died in 1930. Scholtz-Klink joined the Nazi Party during its rise in the early 1920s, and she became leader of the women's section in Berlin in 1929. In 1932 she married Guenther Scholtz, but they divorced in 1938.

When the Nazi Party came to power in 1933, Adolf Hitler appointed Scholtz-Klink as the Reich Women's Führerin, or "Women's Leader," and head of the Nazi Women's League. The National Socialist Women's League (Nationalsozialistische Frauenschaft, or NS-Frauenschaft) was the women's wing of the Nazi Party. The Frauenschaft was subject to Nazi Party leadership, the Reichsleitung. From February 1934 to 1945 Scholtz-Klink led the NS-Frauenschaft. A talented speaker, she was tasked with promoting male preeminence, the delights of housework, and the importance of child-bearing. In one of her speeches, "To Be German Is to Be Strong," she expressed to her followers that "the mission of woman is to minister in the home and in her profession to the needs of life from the first to last moment of man's existence."

In spite of her own elevated position in politics, Scholtz-Klink spoke against the participation of women in government. She stated, "Anyone who has seen the Communist and Social Democratic women scream on the street and in the parliament, will realize that such an activity is not something which is done by a true woman."

In July of 1936 Scholtz-Klink was promoted to head of the Women's Bureau in the German Labor Front, responsible for persuading women to work to the advantage of the Nazi government. In 1938 she argued that "the German woman must work and work, physically and mentally she must renounce luxury and pleasure." Scholtz-Klink had the same impact over German women in the Nazi Party that Hitler had over Germany as a whole. In 1940 she married her third husband, SS-Obergruppenführer August Heissmeyer, and made recurrent trips to visit women in concentration camps.

Following World War II, Scholtz-Klink fled from the Battle of Berlin with Heissmeyer. In the summer of 1945 she was imprisoned in a Soviet prisoner of war camp near Magdeburg but escaped soon after. With the aid of Princess Pauline of Württemberg, she went into hiding in Bebenhausen, Germany. She spent the next three years under the alias of Maria Stuckebrock.

On February 28, 1948, Scholtz-Klink was identified and arrested. A French military court sentenced her to 18 months in prison on the charge of forging documents. In May 1950 an evaluation of her sentence categorized her as a "main culprit" and penalized her with an additional 30 months. After her release from prison in 1953, Scholtz-Klink settled back in Bebenhausen. In her 1978 book Die Frau im Dritten Reich (The Woman in the Third Reich), Scholtz-Klink confirmed her ongoing support for the National Socialist ideology, beliefs she held to her death on March 24, 1999.

Schönerer, Georg Ritter von

Georg Ritter von Schönerer was an early advocate of Pan-Germanism, Germanic religion, and antisemitism, and an important influence on the young Adolf Hitler. He was born on July 17, 1842, in Vienna. In 1869 and again from 1873 to 1888 and from 1897 to 1907, he was a member of the Austrian House of Delegates; in 1888, as a result of his involvement in an act of violence against political opponents, he was condemned to four months' imprisonment and loss of his parliamentary mandate. After 1907 he became politically very isolated in Catholic Austria on account of his Los-von-Rom movement, in which he called for people to leave the Catholic Church (on the grounds of its alleged “friendliness to Slavs”) and to become Protestants. In 1879 Schönerer was involved in the foundation of the Pan-German Nationalist Party. In the Linzer Programme of 1882, he demanded the annexation of Austria to Germany under the leadership of the Hohenzollerns as a “fulfillment” of the German Reich and the abandonment of the “Slavic territories.” As leader of the Alldeutsche Bewegung, he established a hero cult of Richard Wagner—whom he saw as liberator of German art from “Judaization”—and Otto von Bismarck, who remained reserved toward him. Schönerer pursued an aggressively antisemitic campaign in his newspapers (Unverfälschte Worte and Alldeutsches Tagblatt). He claimed that a “Greater German Reich” was the desire of all Germans and pointed to the Jews as “an unproductive and alien element,” undermining the “moral and material foundations” of the German people (Volk).

Schönerer regarded antisemitism as “the central pillar of the national idea,” called for a battle to be waged for the “purity of German blood,” and attacked “the Jewish press.” Many of his demands anticipated later Nazi measures, such as his demand for special laws even for baptized Jews to establish a limitation of freedom of domicile, exclusion of Jews from the civil service, from the teaching profession and the press, and the creation of special “Jewish registers.” From February 1884 his gatherings took place under a banner that read: “Entry forbidden to Jews!” In his newspapers, Schönerer introduced the greeting “Heil to the Führer!” (addressed to himself). His German nationalism took on more and more strongly religious overtones; in 1883 he had described “German Volkstum” (national character) as “the perfect replacement for religion.” With his cult for old Germanic symbols like runes and Midsummer, Midwinter, and Yuletide festivals, and his introduction of old Germanic names of the months and ways of living among his followers, he influenced the later Germanic cult of Heinrich Himmler and the SS. Schönerer also argued that his followers should marry only “Aryan partners” and must be investigated for the “healthiness of their line.” Hitler referred to Schönerer admiringly many times in Mein Kampf but criticized him for his failure to win mass support and his faith in the parliamentary system.

Schönerer died on August 14, 1921.

Schöngarth, Karl Eberhard

Karl Georg Eberhard Schöngarth was born on April 22, 1903 in Leipzig, Saxony. His father was a builder. After graduating from high school in 1920, he served in the Freikorps. In 1922 he joined the Nazi Party, and earned his living as a bank employee. He served in the army during 1924, and then began studying law and statecraft. His doctor of laws was awarded in June 1929, and he worked as a university professor at Leibniz University in Hannover. From June 1932 Schöngarth was a legal assessor in Magdeburg, Erfurt, and Torgau.

On March 1, 1933 he joined the SS, and in May of that year rejoined the NSDAP, before joining the Prussian Gestapo in 1935. From November 1935 to 1936 he was assigned to the press section in the Berlin Gestapo, and during the first half of that year also acted as a political lawyer. From May 1936 to 1937 Schöngarth was in charge of the Gestapo office in Arnsberg, and during 1937–1938 was in charge of the Gestapo office in Bielefeld, Westphalia, then Dortmund, and then Munster.

In 1939 he became the chief government counsel to the SS, then, from October 1939 to March 1941, an inspector for SiPo and the SD in Dresden. From January 30, 1941 (the day he was also promoted to the rank of SS-Oberführer, or senior colonel) to January 14, 1943 he commanded the SiPo and SD in the Generalgouvernement in Poland. A fanatical enemy of the Jews, Schöngarth believed their “extermination” was necessary and wanted to harden his SiPo-SD commanders with the necessary “steel hardness” to be able to carry out their murderous actions. During the execution of Jews in Lvov, for example, he informed officers under his command that any SS officer failing to carry out an order of execution would himself be shot, and that he would support any officer who shot his comrade for this failure.

Schöngarth was characterized by an outstandingly fast intellectual grasp, strong willpower, and an impressive appearance, which commanded respect and obedience. His experience and high position within the security services of the Generalgouvernement, together with his ideologically safe political approach, led to his chief of the RSHA, Reinhard Heydrich, inviting Schöngarth to attend the Wannsee Conference on January 20, 1942, where he participated in the discussion of the “Final Solution to the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage).

Schöngarth was promoted to SS-Brigadeführer (brigadier general) and police major general on January 30, 1943, and in July of the same year was transferred to the 4th SS Police Division in Greece, where he served until early July 1944.

From early July 1944 until the end of the war, Schöngarth was the senior commander of the SiPo and SD in The Hague, Holland. After his immediate chief HSSPF Hanns-Albin Rauter was wounded in 1945 in an ambush by Dutch resistance fighters, Schöngarth ordered the execution of 260 Dutch hostages in retribution. With the unsuccessful attempt on Rauter’s life, Schöngarth served in his place as higher SS and police leader in The Hague during March and April 1945.

After the war, Schöngarth was captured by the British, who investigated his background. After these inquiries, he was charged with the crime of murdering a downed Allied pilot (on November 21, 1944), and tried by a British Military Court in Burgsteinfurt. The murder of this airman came to light immediately after the war through two Dutch political prisoners who were employed at the SS/SD headquarters. On November 21, 1944 the crew of an Allied bomber bailed out near Enschede in Holland. One of the crew, a 26-year-old U.S. airman, fell into the grounds of a villa that was the headquarters of the German SS/SD. The American airman was unhurt, put into civilian clothes, and, with his hands cuffed behind him, taken by two SS men to a spot within the compound where a grave had already been prepared. He was shot in the back of the neck, buried, and the grave was then carefully camouflaged. In following a directive of Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler concerning the treatment of captured Allied airmen, Schöngarth executed the downed pilot.

The two Dutch prisoners witnessed the airman falling to the ground, saw the airman in the cellar of the headquarters, and witnessed the airman’s transfer from the cellar to the grave where he was shot. The Dutch witnesses also confirmed the presence of Schöngarth and several other SD/SS who were present at the time. On his arrest Schöngarth denied complicity in the murder throughout. It was clear from the evidence of the co-accused that Schöngarth was implicated and had in fact given the order to execute the airman. He was found guilty of this war crime on February 11, 1946; he was sentenced to death by hanging. Schöngarth was executed by Albert Pierrepoint on May 15 or 16, 1946 at Hameln Prison.

It should be noted that Schöngarth was charged and executed for the one single act of murdering the airman in November 1944. He was not charged for the many crimes he committed against thousands of murdered Jews in Galicia or in Lvov, or against the Dutch hostages in The Hague, or the many other crimes carried out by Einsatzgruppen units under his control.

Schutzhaft

After the Reichstag Fire of February 27, 1933, the newly installed government of Adolf Hitler persuaded President Paul von Hindenberg to sign a Decree for the Protection of the People and the State. One of the measures introduced under this was a form of arbitrary arrest known as “protective custody,” or Schutzhaft.

As a policing concept, this had greater implications than would be found in the mere removal of a wrongdoer from society. Very few ordinary citizens were aware of what happened to a person taken into protective custody. Men who had been imprisoned and then released were cowed into such submission that they refused to discuss their experiences, and the Nazi authorities (the SS, SA, Gestapo, and SD) revealed nothing. Often a man simply disappeared from his home, his place of work, or even from the street, and his whereabouts were not disclosed.

Ignorance of the fate of Schutzhaft detainees served to provoke fear among the general population. As it appeared the authorities were indiscriminately arresting all manner of people on the flimsiest of charges (or often for no reason at all), it did not take long for the notion of protective custody to become synonymous with the word fear. Uncertainties abounded: the motives behind the arrest; what would happen in the future; treatment at the hands of the Nazis; and the means of avoiding such an arbitrary system of seizure and captivity. Schutzhaft was a necessary precursor to the concentration camps in its effect on the psychology of the masses; together, the two would combine to suppress all opposition to the Nazi regime.

The wave of early arrests understandably put enormous strains on the existing prison system, and it was soon clear that such a situation could not continue indefinitely. Moreover, the concept of protective custody, some believed, might become less terrifying if it became known that the detainee had “merely” gone to prison. An institution was thus needed that would concentrate all the Schutzhaft prisoners of a given region within a single, nonpenal, nonpublic detention center. There were decided practical and political advantages to the creation of such an institution: it would relieve the overcrowding in local prisons; it would assemble all the prisoners in one compound far removed from the prying eyes of civilian prison authorities; and it would serve to give concrete form to the sense of dread accompanying Schutzhaft arrests.

The earliest origins of a “concentrated” form of Schutzhaft imprisonment can be traced to a letter from Adolf Wagner, the leading Nazi official at the Bavarian Ministry of the Interior, to Dr. Hans Frank, his counterpart at the Bavarian Ministry of Justice, dated March 13, 1933. Wagner suggested that if the existing prison system should prove unable to carry the strain of the great influx of new prisoners, “special protective custody quarters separate from the police prisons and those of the Ministry of Justice” be established. This was the genesis of what became the concentration camp system.

Once the singular function of gagging political opposition had been achieved, however, the Nazis saw the desirability of retaining the camps as a bolster to the regime. A regulation issued on April 12, 1934, by Minister of the Interior Wilhelm Frick acknowledged this, adding that the time was “not yet ripe for the complete abolition of protective custody.” The regulation produced a series of guidelines clarifying the whole issue, including such matters as how and to whom protective custody was to be applied, together with its intentions and its duration. One of its most important points stated that the use of protective custody would be permissible only (a) for the protection of the prisoner and (b) “if the prisoner by his behavior directly endangers law and order particularly by subversive activities.”

This made the likelihood of arbitrary arrests far greater than before, as it was now unnecessary to justify an “enemy” by seeking out an opponent belonging to a distinct group. By its vagueness the regulation left the choice of who was subject to Schutzhaft arrest open to the discretion of the senior Nazi officer on the scene, also noting that protective custody was not to be used as a punishment for criminal offenses.

In addition to standardizing the principles surrounding Schutzhaft, however, Frick’s regulation also expressed the desire of the administration to restore “normal” conditions, and it followed that for the rest of 1934 and most of 1935 thousands of prisoners were actually released from protective custody. As a judicial concept, however, Schutzhaft was to stay in operation across the duration of the Third Reich, right down to the end of the regime in 1945.

Schutzstaffel

The Schutzstaffel (SS), or Protective Squad, was created in 1923 as a specialized unit of fifty men as Adolf Hitler’s personal bodyguard, composed of men personally loyal to him. Heinrich Himmler took over its leadership in January 1929, when it had about 280 men. Himmler’s visions for his organization could have been inspired by his own Roman Catholic upbringing, and his admiration for the military strength and obedience of the Jesuit order. In its creation, Himmler conceived of this paramilitary group composed of persons of high moral caliber, honesty, decency, committed to the Nazi vision and agenda, and thoroughly antisemitic in orientation. The SS was technically part of the Sturmabteilung (SA) until July 1934. Wearing distinctive black uniforms to distinguish them from the SA—uniforms created by fashion designer Hugo Boss—applicants for membership had to submit genealogies proving pure Aryan ancestry for at least four generations in order to qualify. The black uniforms and Totenkopf or “Death’s Head” insignias were introduced in 1932; its motto was “Loyalty is my honor.”

In 1930 Hitler made the SS the internal police of the Nazi Party and gave it responsibility for dealing with rebels within the party. The SS began to accumulate enormous power after Hitler became chancellor of Germany in January 1933. In April 1933 Himmler was appointed the chief of police for Bavaria, and by 1936 he had control of every police organization in Germany, including the Gestapo. The SS completed

The Schutzstaffel, abbreviated as SS, was the organization most responsible for the genocidal killing of the Jews during the Holocaust, as well as millions of other victims in war crimes and crimes against humanity during World War II. its ascendancy within the Nazi Party in June 1934, when, on orders from Hitler, it murdered the leadership of the SA (and others) in the "Night of the Long Knives" and was made an independent party organization.

The SS consisted of two main groups: the Allgemeine-SS and the Waffen-SS. The Allgemeine-SS was composed of police units and organizations whose job was to monitor racial matters. Included within this division were the Gestapo, regular police, and the Sicherheitsdienst or SD, which was the Nazi espionage bureau. The Waffen-SS was created in September 1933, when Hitler's personal bodyguard was organized as a semi-independent battle formation. At its peak, the Waffen-SS fielded almost 40 full-strength divisions on both the Eastern and Western fronts. The Waffen-SS also administered the concentration camps through its Death's Head units.

The SS was branded a criminal organization at the Nuremberg Trials in 1946, which made membership an offense punishable by prison, regardless of any other charges that might have been brought for individual actions. Himmler escaped capture for a few weeks after Germany's surrender, but he was caught at a British checkpoint and committed suicide in late May 1945.

The SS was an elite organization whose members felt a strong esprit de corps due to their rigorous physical training and supposed racial purity. By 1945, through Himmler's careful accumulation of various powers, it had become second in power to no other entity within Germany. It is certain that had Hitler died before the war ended, Himmler would have succeeded him or at least played a major role in selecting his successor.

Second Generation

A term that refers to the children of Holocaust survivors and victims. As the Holocaust generation rapidly diminishes, the second generation is becoming more and more central to understanding the Holocaust and the memories and myriad issues it has produced. The second generation has had to deal with a host of issues that spring directly from their parents' experiences. Many feel obligated to preserve their parents' memories, which becomes a burden for some because they find themselves having to carry "transmitted trauma," particularly after their parents have died. This is not an easy task. Most members of the second generation have been affected by their parents' experiences in one way or another, and to varying degrees.

The children of non-Jewish survivors and victims have had a particularly difficult time coming to terms with the Holocaust because the larger culture has tended to view the Holocaust as purely a Jewish experience. And while Jews certainly suffered more than any other group, hundreds of thousands of victims and survivors were not Jews. Yet, there is little popular recognition of that, which has made it more difficult for non-Jews to process their emotions and memories. Some children of first-generation non-Jewish survivors have had to deal with guilt in the mistaken assumption that their parents did not suffer as much as Jews.

In addition, non-Jewish children have not had the same sense of cohesiveness as that of Jewish children, and they have not had access to the large number of support organizations that Jews established soon after the Holocaust ended. There is a feeling among some non-Jewish children that their memories and voices have not been heard with the same intensity and variation as the many Jewish stories about the Holocaust.

The perspective by which most second-generation victims and survivors view the Holocaust is fundamentally different from that of their parents or society at large. The second generation has the ability to judge the Holocaust knowing the after-effects of it and how they have impacted those involved in it. This retrospective viewpoint can be very useful, but it also means that the second generation must rely increasingly on their memories or perceptions of their parents' memories, in effect second-generation memories, which can be problematic.

Those among the second generation have also experienced a far more complex and nuanced understanding of the Holocaust, particularly when compared to other individuals who have had no familial connections to it. They have learned that some survivors are not necessarily saints, or even "good" people. Others in the second generation came to learn from their parents that the Holocaust was not always black and white or good versus bad. Some survivors, for example, have told their children that some Jews during the Holocaust behaved abhorrently. Other have told stories of heroic Germans, Austrians, Poles, and others who are often grouped together with perpetrators in a monolithic way.

There can be no doubt that many in the second generation have borne—and continue to bear—the emotional and psychic scars of the Holocaust, which were (knowingly or not) passed on to them. Many Holocaust survivors suffered from lifelong emotional and mental afflictions, including post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). Until the 1970s, however, these problems went largely unrecognized and untreated, meaning that the children of those suffering from such illnesses were subjected to less-than-ideal family relationships and childhoods. As children, some in the second generation were ashamed of their parents, not because they were Holocaust survivors, but because they exhibited strange behaviors that did not mesh with the norms of the larger society in which they lived. These issues significantly affected some in the second generation, but they also affected their relationships to their parents.

Several recent studies have shown that some in the second generation are also prone to emotional disturbances and even PTSD, despite the fact that they did not experience the Holocaust themselves. One study conducted in 2010 has even suggested that there are subtle differences in the genetic makeup of Holocaust survivors, which might be passed on to their children. It is not yet known how this might affect the children, however. Another recent study conducted at an Israeli university, however, has asserted that children of the Holocaust are no more likely to suffer emotional trauma than those who have no connection to it, unless their parents had suffered "extreme trauma" during the Holocaust.

The second generation has also begun producing a varied and rich body of work on the Holocaust, although many of its authors have experienced—to varying degrees—the same problems and limitations that the second generation in general has experienced. Some are like Art Spiegelman (author of Maus and Maus II), who has poignantly described how the Holocaust affected his parents, changing their lives as well as his in dramatic ways. Spiegelman had a contentious relationship with his father, which is one of the major themes in his graphic novels. Several other works also feature this theme.

More recently, studies have begun to be made of the grandchildren of the Holocaust, known in some circles as the Third Generation, or 3G. As the last generation of Jews who will have had firsthand relationships with survivors of the Holocaust, some see that they have a very special responsibility to ensure that the legacy of their grandparents lives on in the work they do, the lives they lead, and the memory they seek to transmit. In some Jewish communities, Third Generation activity is becoming a new vehicle for Jewish identity formation, and broad networks are being created.

Segerstedt, Torgny

Torgny Segerstedt was a Swedish journalist who served as editor-in-chief of the newspaper Handelstidningen, one of Sweden's leading liberal newspapers, between 1917 and 1945. The son of a teacher, he was born in Karlstad in 1876 and educated at Lund University, where he taught the history of religion from 1904 to 1912. In 1913 he moved to Stockholm University, where he taught until joining the newspaper in 1917.

Segerstedt's resistance to Nazism began as soon as Adolf Hitler became chancellor of Germany in 1933. Through the pages of his paper he launched an unceasing campaign against Hitler, starting with the comment that "To force the politics and press of the entire world to deal with that character, that is unforgivable. Mr. Hitler is an insult." He continued with other articles, prompting a response within days from senior Nazi Hermann Göring, who protested that the tenor of Segerstedt's articles, if continued, could threaten relations between Germany and Sweden.

Segerstedt's criticism saw him become one of the earliest European journalists to recognize where Nazism could lead, identifying that it could eventually lead to a new global conflict. In years to come, members of the Swedish government expressed concern at Segerstedt's condemnations, but he persisted nonetheless. As Nazi anti-Jewish measures intensified, he wrote in response to Sweden's silence on the passage of the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, "We are responsible for what we say and for what we do not say."

Segerstedt opposed Sweden's participation at the Berlin Olympic Games in 1936 and was critical of the high point of British and French appeasement of Hitler, the Munich Agreement of September 1938. The excesses of Nazism, culminating with the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, saw his campaign continue with relentless vigor.

On November 30, 1939, the Soviet Union—at that time allied to Germany—attacked Sweden's immediate neighbor, Finland. Then, on April 9, 1940, Norway and Denmark were invaded by Germany. With war encroaching on Scandinavia, the Swedish government began to fight hard to maintain its neutrality, desperate not to antagonize the Nazis, and press censorship was introduced resulting in Segerstedt's editorials being cut. His response was to leave blank columns as an indication to his readers that press freedom had been assaulted.

Across Nazi-occupied Scandinavia, Segerstedt's articles and the Handelstidningen newspaper were banned, a measure that only served to give inspiration to resistance movements in Norway and Denmark. Indeed, in Norway the paper was smuggled into both countries, the intention being to give hope to the fighters that they were not alone.

Throughout the war years Segerstedt continued to defy his government, which, in turn, held that he was too uncompromising in his sustained criticism of Nazi Germany. In 1940, at the request of the government, King Gustaf V called Segerstedt to Stockholm's Royal Palace for an audience in which he reproached Segerstedt for his irresponsibility. The king informed him that "If Sweden gets into the war, it will be your fault." When Segerstedt objected and tried to point out the morality of his stance, the king is reputed to have said: "We know why you are defending the Jews."

In this regard, Segerstedt's relationship with his Jewish mistress, Maja Forssman, was being thrown in his face. Soon after this Handelstidningen began to lose its advertising sponsors, while certain editions of the newspaper were actually seized by the government amid threats from Berlin. Despite such pressure, Segerstedt never gave in and maintained his condemnation of Hitler and Nazi Germany.

Segerstedt's story relates one man's moral courage in the face of intense pressure to back down for the sake of state interests. At the same time that Prime Minister Per-Albin Hansson, a longtime friend, pleaded with him not to drag Sweden into the war, he continued his writing—indeed, it has been estimated that Segerstedt wrote up to ten thousand articles across the span of his career. Of course, along the way he made many enemies. Several even played the antisemitic card in view of his relationship with Maja Forssman, sending him hate mail and calling him a "lackey" of the Jews.

On March 31, 1945, after a walk with his dogs (one of whom he had named "Winston" in honor of the British prime minister), Segerstedt fell ill and died in Gothenburg.

He was recalled in an award-winning movie made in 2012, The Last Sentence (dir. Jan Troell; Swedish title, Dom över död man, or Judgement on the Dead), which painted a particularly sensitive picture of Segerstedt as a man of intense convictions who struggled with what he saw as his moral duty in a world of increasing immorality. Starring Jesper Christensen, the film shows a Segerstedt who is zealous in his opposition to Hitler, conflicted in his interpersonal relations with those around him, and a major hero of the opposition to Nazism—against the advice of his friends, the preferences of his government, and the demands of his king.

Serbia

Serbia was occupied by German forces in April 1941. By August 1942 it became the second country in Europe—second only to Estonia—to declare itself Judenfrei (free of Jews); such was the scope and lethality of the Holocaust in Serbia.

During the years that are relevant to the Holocaust, Serbia was an independent republic within the broader Federation of Yugoslavia. Its capital, Belgrade, was also the capital of Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia attempted to remain neutral during the initial years of World War II. When this was no longer possible, it joined Germany and the Axis powers on March 25, 1941. A coup was immediately staged by military officers who opposed the decision to ally with Germany. This, in turn, resulted in Hitler's decision to invade Yugoslavia, which Germany—along with Italy, Bulgaria, and Hungary—did on April 6, 1941. One week later, Germany occupied Belgrade, and 11 days after the invasion, on April 17, 1941, Yugoslavia officially surrendered. The four invading powers divided Yugoslavia among themselves. Serbia was occupied by Germany.

Before the month was out, the German occupiers were instituting anti-Jewish measures, similar to those that had been in place in Germany for years. These included registration with the police; restrictions against practicing certain professions; the need to wear an identifying Star of David on all outer clothing; restrictions on food; and a prohibition against the use of public transportation.

What occurred over the next 13 months—from April 1941 to May 1942—was the near-annihilation of the Jewish community in Serbia, which had numbered about 16,000 at the start of the war. Initially the Nazis intended to deport all the Jews from Serbia to the “East” (a euphemism for the extermination camps in Poland), but when that proved unworkable, and upon the advice of Adolf Eichmann, the decision was made for extermination.

The first wave of killing was focused on Jewish men. They were imprisoned in detention camps, including Topovske Šupe. During this time there was significant partisan resistance, leading to the issuance of an order by the Germans that proved disastrous for the Jews. It was an order for reprisal killing: for each German killed, a hundred Jews, communists, suspected communists, and others were to be killed; for each German wounded, fifty were to be killed. Since Jews and communists were conflated in the Nazi worldview, it was not surprising that nearly all Jewish men (approximately 8,000) were killed by November 1941. Once there were no more Jews to be killed, non-Jews became victims, including 1,000 male Roma. The death toll—both Jews and non-Jewish Serbs—is estimated to have reached 30,000.

In December 1941 the Nazis shifted their focus to Jewish women and children. By that time, the Semlin (Sajmište) concentration camp was built and began receiving this cohort of victims.

The Semlin camp was built in Belgrade on what were the Belgrade Exhibition Grounds. The now-empty pavilions on that site had been used in 1937 by Yugoslavia and other countries participating in the international exhibition. In October 1941 the decision was made by the Germans to convert these grounds and the pavilions into a concentration camp. It was named the Judenlager Semlin (the Semlin Jewish camp). Jews were forced to work on this conversion through November 1941, with Jewish women and children from Belgrade entering the camp in early December. More than 5,000 Jews were there by the end of the year, with that number set to expand to 7,000 in the early months of 1942. The combination of a particularly cold winter in 1941–1942, terrible conditions of overcrowding in the pavilions (now barracks), and a wholly inadequate diet, led to the death of more than 500 Jews by March 1942.

As was the case with Serbia's Jewish men, the Nazis had at one time entertained the possibility of deporting the women and children to the “East,” and made the same decision to kill them instead. However, unlike the men who had been shot, the women and children were killed in the spring of 1942 by the use of a gas van. This was a van that had a sealed divider that separated the victims from the driver. It was configured so the van's exhaust was redirected into the sealed section, thereby asphyxiating the women and children. More than 6,300 Jewish women and children were killed in this manner, meaning that virtually no Jews—men or women—were still alive in Serbia.

Romani victims were also brought to Semlin. They, however, fared better than the Jews. Although all were subject to terrible conditions and an unknown number were killed throughout Serbia, most of them were released from Semlin during the first four months of 1942.

In May 1942, with the Serbian Jewish population almost completely eliminated, Semlin was converted to a detention camp and a distribution center for all of Yugoslavia. By August 1942 Serbia declared itself Judenfrei. While this was not completely true, the magnitude of the loss was staggering.

The impact of Nazi occupation was just as devastating in Vojvodina, an autonomous province in the north of Serbia. It was composed of four districts or regions: Baranja, in the northwest, and Bačka, in central Vojvodina, were controlled by Hungary; Syrmia, in the southwest, was controlled by the Nazi-puppet government of the Independent State of Croatia; and Banat (sometimes referred to as “the Banat”), the eastern third of Vojvodina, was, like Serbia, controlled by Germany, although in Banat the Volksdeutsche (people considered to be part of the German people or race, regardless of country of citizenship, living outside of Germany), a large minority, played a role in administering and enforcing the occupation.

Most of the Jews of Banat—about 2,500 in number—were deported to Serbia and killed, but not before they were tortured by the Volksdeutsche. Although Baranja had a very small Jewish community of perhaps 500, the Bačka Jewish community had some 20,000 Jews. These Jews were subject to beatings, torture, and killing by the occupying Hungarian forces. For example, over a two-day period in January 1942 the Hungarian army killed approximately 1,100 Jews in Bačka and an additional 900 Serbs. The vast number of Bačka Jews were ultimately deported to and killed in Auschwitz.

The statistics of all of this killing in Serbia and its autonomous province of Vojvodina show how severely the Jewish community was decimated during the Holocaust. Although, as noted, the Nazi occupiers of Serbia declared it to be Judenfrei, the fact is that there were Jewish survivors, albeit in very small numbers. Of the approximately 16,000 Jews living in Serbia when World War II broke out, only 1,500 survived. Of the approximately 20,000 Jews in Vojvodina (most in the Bačka region), only 3,000 survived. This represented a total loss of almost 90% of all the Jews in this area.

Seyss-Inquart, Arthur

Arthur Seyss-Inquart was a prominent Austrian Nazi and Reich commissioner in the Netherlands, largely responsible for the persecution of Dutch Jews.

Born in Stannern, Moravia, on July 22, 1892, Seyss-Inquart studied law at the University of Vienna before joining the Austro-Hungarian army. During World War I, he saw action and was badly wounded. After the war he became a lawyer in Vienna, where he developed right-wing views. A strong advocate of Anschluss (union with Germany) in the 1930s, Seyss-Inquart was regarded as the leader of the small Austrian Nazi organization. Publicly he sought to achieve reconciliation with the government headed by Kurt von Schuschnigg, but behind the scenes he eagerly undermined the Austrian state.

Seyss-Inquart became state councillor in May 1937, and in February 1938, following pressure by Adolf Hitler, Schuschnigg appointed Seyss-Inquart to the position of minister of the interior. When Schuschnigg announced a plebiscite on the Anschluss issue, the German government pressured him to resign on March 13, 1938, in favor of Seyss-Inquart as chancellor. The same day, German forces moved across the border, and Hitler announced the union of Austria with Germany.

Seyss-Inquart then became the Reich representative in the former Austria and minister without portfolio in Hitler’s cabinet. After Germany invaded Poland on September 1, 1939, and then conquered the country within two weeks, Seyss-Inquart served as deputy governor there under Hans Frank. Displeased with the atrocities committed by SS forces and unable to exert any influence over policies, he asked for a new appointment.

In May 1940 Seyss-Inquart became Reich commissioner of the newly occupied Netherlands. He tried to come to terms with the Dutch and have them carry out a Nazification program, but instead of achieving collaboration, he found himself dealing with the Dutch Nazi movement. In Seyss-Inquart’s view, Dutch Nazi leader Anton Mussert’s followers were unsuited for German occupation policy. They were only a small minority with no real support from the Dutch population and no administrative experience.

Therefore, Seyss-Inquart preferred to work with, and through, the traditional elites. He sought to resign his post, but Hitler refused his request, believing that Seyss-Inquart’s moderate approach would achieve the desired results. On the other hand, Seyss-Inquart instituted a reign of terror toward certain elements of the Dutch population. He was partly responsible for recruitment of Dutch workers to be relocated in the Reich, was wholly responsible for the deportation of scores of thousands of Dutch Jews to the extermination camps, and worked to ensure German exploitation of the Dutch economy.

After the war Seyss-Inquart was charged with war crimes and tried at Nuremberg. Specifically, the charges against him cited his heavy-handed repression of the Dutch resistance effort, the placement of thousands of Jews in the Amsterdam ghetto, and the deportation of some 110,000 Jews to death camps in the East, where all but 5,000 perished—leading to an overall loss of 75% of Dutch Jews (including foreign nationals) between 1940 and 1945. Seyss-Inquart was found guilty and hanged on October 16, 1946.

Shanghai Ghetto

The Shanghai Ghetto was an area in the Hongkew (Hongkou) section of Shanghai, China, in which thousands of refugee Jews from Germany, Austria, Russia, and Poland lived before and during World War II. The area, which covered about one square mile, saw a large influx of Jews fleeing persecution in Europe beginning in the 1930s; by 1939 the number of Jews residing there was about 17,000. There were small concentrations of Jews in other parts of the city, some of whom had been there since the early part of the 20th century. After the Sino-Japanese War began in 1937, Japanese forces occupied much of Shanghai, but they did not immediately impose restrictions on Jews residing there. Not until the December 1941 Pearl Harbor attack, which brought war between Japan and the United States, did the Japanese require virtually all Jews in Shanghai to live in the ghetto.

The Shanghai ghetto was part of the International Settlement, which dated to 1842, when the port at Shanghai was opened to international trade and commerce. It was administered by a council of Western nations including France, the United States, Britain, Italy, and Portugal. The first Jews to arrive in the settlement were Sephardic Jews from Iraq, who quickly established commercial enterprises there. They numbered between 700 and 1,000 people. During and after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, the settlement became home to several thousand Ashkenazi Jews who were fleeing persecution. Many became shopkeepers and small business owners who catered to the city's small Jewish population.

In 1933, after the Nazis came to power in Germany, German Jews began migrating to Shanghai in increasing numbers; many were professionals and businessmen and their families. In 1938, after Germany's annexation of Austria in March and the November Kristallnacht Pogrom, which saw widespread destruction of Jewish-owned businesses and property, the pace of Jewish immigration to Shanghai increased dramatically, with as many as 15,000 arriving there between 1938 and 1941. Between late 1940 and early 1941, some 2,100 Jews from Lithuania also found refuge in Shanghai. This brought the total number of Jews in Shanghai to about 24,000; virtually all lived in the International Settlement. After the Pearl Harbor attack, however, hardly any Jews were able to make their way to Shanghai.

Even though the Japanese were allied with Nazi Germany, they did not share the same hatred or antipathy toward Jews. Most Japanese occupation officials in Shanghai viewed them simply as stateless refugees. Indeed, as the war progressed and the Germans called for the Japanese to institute draconian measures against Shanghai's Jewish refugees, Japanese officials did not comply. In late 1942, however, the Japanese did hatch a plan that would require virtually all Jews in Shanghai to live in the "Designated Area for Stateless Refugees," which would informally be known as the Shanghai ghetto. The plan was implemented in February and called for all Jews who had arrived in Shanghai after 1937 to reside in the ghetto. This pushed the area's Jewish population to some 20,000. The Japanese did this to protect the refugees and to ensure that they did not become collaborators with Chinese forces.

Although conditions in the ghetto were not nearly as bad as those in Europe, Jewish refugees nevertheless found themselves chronically short of food and clothing and forced to reside in crowded and primitive living quarters. The Japanese did not erect a wall or fence around the area, but they did enforce a curfew and required that anyone leaving or entering the ghetto have a written pass. Native Chinese continued to live among the Jews in the ghetto, which lessened their isolation. The Shanghai Ghetto witnessed the thriving of Jewish education, culture, and religious observances, unlike Nazi-run ghettos in Europe, where such things were strictly forbidden. The ghetto had its own newspapers, theaters, schools, sports teams, synagogues, and even cabarets. Indeed, each group (German, Austrian, Russian, and Polish) had their own such institutions, based on language and culture.

In 1944 U.S. bombers began operations against Shanghai in the final push to defeat Japan and drive its troops out of China. In July 1944, an air raid on Shanghai resulted in the deaths of 40 Jewish refugees in the ghetto; it is believed that as many as several hundred Chinese residents were also killed. This was the only time during the war that Jewish refugees in Shanghai were killed. American troops entered Shanghai and liberated it in September 1945. Thereafter, many Jews left, choosing to settle in the new State of Israel after 1948. After Mao Zedong's communist forces took control on mainland China in late 1949, most of the remaining Jews left. Today, it is believed that no Jews are left in Shanghai.

Sharp, Waitstill and Martha

Waitstill Sharp was a Unitarian minister and humanitarian who helped hundreds of Jewish and non-Jewish refugees in Europe during the late 1930s and early 1940s. He was aided in these efforts by his wife, Martha, who was a prominent American social worker. In 2006 Israel's Yad Vashem posthumously honored the Sharps as Righteous among the Nations.

Waitstill Sharp was born in Boston in 1902 to an old and distinguished family. He attended Boston University, Harvard Law School (class of 1926), and earned a master's degree from Harvard University in 1931. He then became involved in the Unitarian Church, was ordained a minister, and first presided over a congregation in Pennsylvania in 1933. Martha Sharp was born Martha Ingham Dickie in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1905. She studied at Pembroke College (Brown University) and then undertook advanced studies in social work at Northwestern University. She also earned a master's degree from Radcliffe College (Harvard University). Martha went on to become a noted social worker, having wed Waitstill in 1927. In 1936 the couple moved back to the Boston area when Waitstill became pastor of a Unitarian church in Wellesley, Massachusetts.

In 1939 the American Unitarian Association asked the Sharps to join the Unitarian Service Committee, which was tasked with aiding displaced persons and refugees in Europe as World War II approached. The couple immediately accepted the challenge and were sent to Prague, Czechoslovakia, where they administered aid and relief to hundreds of Jewish and non-Jewish refugees. They were also instrumental in securing visas for several hundred refugees and arranged transport to other nations, principally Great Britain, with Martha personally escorting 35 refugees there. In the late summer of 1939 the Sharps were warned that the Gestapo was aware of their activities and would likely arrest them.

In August 1940 the Sharps fled Prague and passed through Vichy-controlled France. They were bound for Lisbon, Portugal, where they hoped to continue their aid and rescue efforts. While in France, they were alerted that Lion Feuchtwanger, a prominent German-Jewish writer, had been imprisoned there. The Sharps set in motion an elaborate rescue scheme to free Feuchtwanger, which was facilitated by the U.S. consulate in Marseille, as well as by Varian Fry, an American journalist and emissary for the U.S. Emergency Rescue Mission. The plan was akin to a plot from a spy thriller, with Feuchtwanger spirited out of prison disguised as a woman. In September 1940, Martha, disguised as a local peasant woman, accompanied Feuchtwanger and his wife to a train at the French-Spanish border. Once they reached Spain, Waitstill and Martha secured passage for the couple on a ship to the United States later that same month.

After this heroic rescue, Martha returned to France to arrange for travel permits for a number of refugee children, including nine Jews. After having secured the permits and the required U.S. visas, in late November 1940, Martha sent the children to the United States; they arrived in New York the following month. The Sharps also worked with the World YMCA to help secure the release of Czech prisoners of war being held by Vichy. The Sharps aided a number of other Jewish and non-Jewish refugees in neutral Lisbon.

After the war ended, Waitstill and Martha separated and were later divorced; both believed that the stress of their rescue efforts had led to the split. Waitstill continued on with the Unitarian Church and was involved in a variety of philanthropic and relief efforts. Martha became heavily involved in Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization, and also helped resettle Jews—many of them children—in Israel after its formal founding in 1948. Between 1950 and 1953 she also sat on the National Security Resources Board, an advisory panel designed to keep the U.S. president and secretary of defense informed on issues relating to defense and national security. Waitstill died in 1984; Martha died in 1999.

Sheptytsky, Andrey

Andrey Sheptytsky was the Metropolitan archbishop of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church in Lvov (Lviv) between 1901 and 1944, harboring hundreds of Jews in his residence and in Greek Catholic monasteries during the Holocaust.

Born on July 29, 1865, in the village of Prylbychi, Galicia, he came from a family that had strong Polish, aristocratic, and Catholic roots, though with an Orthodox Ukrainian line stretching back many centuries. Sheptytsky received his education first at home and then in Kraków. He studied law in Kraków and Breslau (Wrocław), earning a doctorate in 1888, and then entered a Basilian monastery of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church and took the name Andrey, after Ukraine's patron saint. He was ordained on August 22, 1892, following which he studied at the Jesuit Seminary in Kraków. Here, in 1894, he received a second doctorate, in theology. On September 17, 1899, he was consecrated a bishop by Metropolitan Julian Sas-Kuilovsky, and the following year, on December 12, 1900, appointed Metropolitan Archbishop of Lvov.

During World War I, Sheptytsky was arrested by the Russians due to his national origin in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. In March 1918, as a result of the Russian Revolution, he was released and returned to Ukraine, at that time a quasi-independent republic under German suzerainty.

Before World War II Metropolitan Sheptytsky became the de facto head of all Ukrainian aspirations, and where Jewish-Christian relations were concerned he had a long and sympathetic past from which he could draw. While a student he had learned Hebrew; in his pastoral visits to mixed Ukrainian-Jewish villages he would be met by local delegations led by the town or village priest, who would be followed by the local rabbi carrying the village Torah. Given the time and place, Sheptytsky's relationship with the Jews was strong.

That said, Sheptytsky's responses to the war were to be diverse. Following the Nazi invasion of Ukraine at the end of June 1941, the Organization of the Ukrainian Nationalists, led by Yaroslav Stetsko, declared an independent Ukrainian state. This was immediately crushed by the Germans, but Sheptytsky had already issued a pastoral letter welcoming the Nazis as liberators from the Soviet yoke and recognizing Stetsko as de facto head of the new Ukrainian government. This would throw a huge cloud over his subsequent actions, the more so as anti-Jewish pogroms broke out immediately after the declaration of independence was announced.

Sheptytsky knew of the pogroms; he had been informed of developments on either July 1 or 2 by Lvov's chief rabbi, Ezekiel Lewin. The extent to which he tried to check them, however, is highly disputed. It is likely, in fact, that he might have had little control over what was happening in any case, given the mob nature of the riots.

How Sheptytsky responded to Chief Rabbi Lewin is unknown to this day. It is clear, however, that he offered sanctuary to Lewin and his family, and that Lewin accepted the offer on behalf of his children but refused it for himself, saying that his duty was to stay with his community. Later, he was arrested by Ukrainian militia and murdered. Sheptytsky took charge of two of Lewin's three sons (the other died in a Nazi camp), providing forged certificates of baptism, new identities, and instructions to his priests to train the boys to pray in Ukrainian. Both were to survive.

From early 1942 onward Sheptytsky had been providing a refuge to Jews through his church, instructing monasteries and convents to follow his lead. From then until the liberation, no Jewish child was forcibly converted to Christianity, and all were to survive the Nazis. It has been calculated that Sheptytsky personally arranged for the hiding of 150 Jews—mostly children and about a dozen rabbis—in his official residence and throughout his monasteries.

He also protested the killing of Jews to high-ranking Nazis who made official visits to his residence, and sent a letter to Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler objecting to Nazi treatment of the Jews and the use of Ukrainians in anti-Jewish repressions. His letter included a request that Ukrainian police and militias be removed from duty in the camps. On November 21, 1942, he issued a strong pastoral letter to all Ukrainians denouncing the killing. As a final indicator of his attitude toward Nazi antisemitic measures, he wrote a number of letters to Pope Pius XII advising him of the Nazis' "diabolical" nature.

While it seems clear that Sheptytsky sheltered Jews during the Holocaust, there is a great deal of ambiguity regarding his support for the Nazis. He did not sympathize with Nazi ideology but initially thought that German rule would be better than that of the Soviets, and he appeared to hold hopes of exploiting the German presence in order to buttress a possible Ukrainian state. The invasion of Ukraine in the summer of 1941 did not at first shake this belief; indeed, it took nearly a year before he realized that Nazi occupation policies were even more brutal than those of the Soviets. It was only after this that he really began to assist the Jews, leading some to ask whether his early support for the Nazis actually served to assist them in the first year of the Holocaust in Ukraine.

Adding to the complexity of Sheptytsky's response to the Nazis and, through that, to the Holocaust is the support he gave to the creation, in April 1943, of the 14th Waffen-SS Grenadier Division ("Galician"), a German military formation initially made up of volunteers from Galicia with a Ukrainian ethnic background. Sheptytsky blessed the division and those who joined it—perhaps thinking that they could serve as the nucleus of a future Ukrainian army, perhaps in the hope that they could protect the country in the event of a German collapse and Soviet reconquest.

The gray area involving Metropolitan Andrey Sheptytsky during the Holocaust is thus highly complex. Many of those he saved have sought to have him recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations, including former Polish foreign minister Adam Daniel Rotfeld, Nobel Prize-winning chemist Roald Hoffmann, and Chief Rabbi David Kahane of the Israeli Air Force. In Israel, the Commission for the Designation of the Righteous has debated in considerable detail whether Sheptytsky's initial support for the Nazi occupation contributed to the murder of Jews in Ukraine and has, as a result, continued to deny him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Ironically, Sheptytsky's brother, Klementiy, was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations in 1995, and on June 27, 2001, was beatified by Pope John Paul II.

On November 1, 1944, Metropolitan Andrey Sheptytsky died at the age of 79 in Lvov. In 1958 an initial investigation into the cause for his possible beatification and canonization commenced, and on July 16, 2015, Pope Francis signed a decree declaring him "venerable," an initial step in the sainthood process.

Shirer, William L.

William Lawrence (Bill) Shirer was an American journalist, war correspondent, and historian. Born in Chicago in 1904, he attended Coe College in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and in 1925

William L. Shirer was a leading American journalist in prewar Europe. He and his wife Tess would often shelter Jews in their own home and provide them with foreign currency and the means to escape the country for other lands of refuge. Upon leaving Germany in December 1940, he smuggled out voluminous notes and diaries that were subsequently published and did much to alert American public opinion as to why the Nazis had to be resisted in the future. (Corbis via Getty Images) moved to France to take up a position as European correspondent for the Chicago Tribune. In 1931 he married Theresa (“Tess”) Stiberitz, an Austrian photographer. Between 1934 and 1940 Shirer lived and worked in Nazi Germany, working for the Berlin bureau of the Universal News Service until 1937 and then as European bureau chief of CBS radio based in Vienna, reporting to Edward R. Murrow.

Fluent in German, French, and Italian, Shirer thrived in his new environment. When the German annexation of Austria took place on March 12, 1938, Shirer, as the only American broadcaster in Vienna, was obliged to fly to London to report on what he had seen; he could not do so in Vienna itself, as CBS did not possess radio facilities there. With this as a precedent, he then reported on all the major developments in Europe that followed, including the Munich Agreement (September 30, 1938), the German annexation of what remained of Czechoslovakia (March 15, 1939), and the German invasion of Poland (September 1, 1939).

Throughout this time, Shirer was an acute observer of Nazi policies regarding the harassment of Jews, and almost as soon as he arrived in Germany he was conscious of the Nazi attempt to terminate the Jewish presence. In 1935 he reported on the Nuremberg Laws, which stripped Jews of their German citizenship and introduced other restrictions reducing them to second-class noncitizens. He continued his reports the following year when additional restrictions on Jews were made, and with each successive antisemitic measure he became more and more disgusted by what he witnessed.

Wherever possible, Shirer took a stand against the Nazis through his reportage, but he found himself in a difficult position. There was only so much on which he could report, as his outgoing dispatches were watched carefully by the Nazi state as a condition of his credentials being respected. While reporting the 1936 Olympics from Berlin, for example, he was publicly condemned by the Ministry of Propaganda for exposing the antisemitism he detested. He was threatened with expulsion and accused of being a “German hater,” in what would not be an isolated reference.

The threat of expulsion dogged Shirer. He was concerned that if he went too far he could suffer the same fate as Dorothy Thompson, who, in August 1934, became the first American journalist to be expelled from Nazi Germany for having written articles considered offensive to the regime. Shirer’s reporting, therefore, was fenced in by a form of self-censorship; this was to become much more formalized once war broke out, when state-imposed censorship was introduced.

As foreigners, Bill and Tess Shirer did what they could to help such Jews as they encountered, though the position of Tess, as an Austrian-born U.S. citizen, placed her in a precarious position. They put themselves at risk by sheltering Jews whom they knew personally, using their home as a refuge for those who had gone into hiding. Shirer exploited his contacts located in the United States, as well as in the British, French, and Swiss embassies and consulates, to try to get visas for Jews trying desperately to leave Germany. Despite the ban on trading in foreign currency, he also worked to procure moneys to help tide Jews over once they managed to move to new countries.

Occasionally the Shirers would find themselves harboring a Jew who had just been released from a jail or concentration camp. In such circumstances, he related later, their guest would often have been badly beaten or mistreated, and they would care for him until he had recovered sufficiently to be able to return to his family in something resembling a passable condition. For all his efforts at saving people, however, Shirer knew that his contribution was only a minor one, as most Jews could not avail themselves of the help he and Tess were able to provide.

As a journalist from a neutral country, Shirer was permitted to remain in Germany and report back to the United States. He covered the invasion of Denmark and Norway in April 1940, followed by Germany’s further invasions of the Low Countries and France on and after May 10. He moved with the German armies as they progressed through France and was the only foreign correspondent to report in person to the American people on the French surrender at Compiègne on June 22, 1940.

Despite this, he found himself increasingly frustrated by the Nazi state from which he was reporting. With Germany victorious on all fronts, Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels placed pressure on Shirer to broadcast official accounts of Germany’s war efforts, rather than independent reports. Shirer began pestering CBS management in New York to relieve him of this assignment, and the situation was not helped when he learned that the Gestapo was waiting for him to slip up in one of his reports so they could arrest him for espionage. Finally, he managed to leave Germany in December 1940. As he left, he smuggled with him his diaries and notes from his time in Germany. These were to be published in 1941 as Berlin Diary: The Journal of a Foreign Correspondent, 1934–1941.

Much of what Shirer wrote did not refer specifically to Jews; he was too savvy to commit his thoughts to paper, and certainly not to broadcast them. Shirer’s resistance to Nazism, where Jews were concerned, must be measured by his actions—and in this regard, his behavior spoke loudly.

Underscoring his commitment to covering the crimes of Nazi Germany, he returned to Europe to report on the Nuremberg Trials in 1945.

Shirer's masterwork, although it appeared well after the end of the war, was to be his study of Nazi Germany, The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, which appeared in 1960. One of the first major studies of its subject, it won the 1961 National Book Award for Non-Fiction. The author of many other important works, Shirer died in Boston in 1993, aged 89.

Shoah

The word Shoah is a Hebrew term used to describe the mass murder of several million Jews by the Nazis and their allies during the 1930s and 1940s. Within a number of European languages, it has come to serve as a synonym for the English word Holocaust. Shoah may be translated as "Devastation," "Destruction," or "Catastrophe." In recent years, an increasing number of scholars, Holocaust researchers, and Jews have begun to eschew the use of the term Holocaust, and have been substituting it with the word Shoah.

One of the problems with the term Holocaust is that it was a label given to the genocide of the Jews largely by non-Jews. The other problem with the term is that it is derived from the Hebrew Bible concept of offering a complete and consumable burnt offering to God for the expiation of sins. The Holocaust was certainly not an offering to God, so scholars and others sought a more appropriate descriptor for the genocide of the Jews.

The word Shoah can be found in the Book of Isaiah (10:3) and in that context refers to the day of reckoning that will precede the final judgment of the Israelites. Although Shoah is perhaps closer than the word Holocaust in describing the Nazi-inspired genocide of European Jews, it too does not fully describe the events of the 1930s and 1940s, which were not set into motion by God but rather by evil-minded human beings. The term Shoah was first used in print in 1940, and it was popularized in 1985, when French filmmaker Claude Lanzmann released a nine-and-a-half-hour documentary film by the same name that examined the events of the Holocaust and its aftereffects through a series of interviews with witnesses and survivors.

Shoah

A nine-and-a-half-hour film documentary on the Holocaust, directed by French filmmaker Claude Lanzmann, Shoah was released in 1985 and is available in several languages, with subtitles in French, English, Polish, German, Yiddish, and Hebrew. The documentary took nearly 11 years to make, as it features dozens of interviews with victims, perpetrators, and witnesses that were conducted in 14 different countries. It is unusual among documentaries in that it does not employ the use of any archival footage; rather, it lets the interviewees relay the arc of the story. There are also no narrative interpretations or conclusions. Some of the interviews go into minute detail of seemingly mundane and everyday occurrences, which taken as a whole divulge the "banality" of evil, to use Hannah Arendt's terminology.

Because of Lanzmann's approach to the subject, the film has a somewhat loose and fluid narrative. The documentary is, however, broken down by subject matter—it covers the Chełmno, Treblinka, and Auschwitz-Birkenau death camps and then the Warsaw Ghetto. These four general topics are treated using current-day footage and scores of interviews. Jan Karski was interviewed extensively concerning the Warsaw Ghetto. One interview with a former camp guard was filmed clandestinely; the interviewee had granted only an audio interview. Finally, historian Raul Hilberg answers questions relating to German propaganda and the Holocaust. During many of the interviews, survivors and witnesses are actually taken to the sites of massacres, where their reactions—most of them emotion-charged—add to the film's effectiveness.

After its release, Shoah was lauded by moviegoers and critics alike as a film that literally had no equal. The celebrated reviewer Roger Ebert called it “an extraordinary film” but refused to name it best film of the year because he believed it was in a class by itself and should not be ranked against any other movies. Shoah won numerous awards and prizes in the United States and around the world.

Sicherheitsdienst

The Sicherheitsdienst—the Nazi state security and intelligence agency—was created in 1931 by Heinrich Himmler, head of the SS and one of the highest-ranking Nazi Party leaders. The Sicherheitsdienst des Reichsführers, usually abbreviated simply as SD, was founded almost two years before Adolf Hitler came to power in January 1933. Its primary purpose was to act as internal spy agency, but it soon became one of the prime movers of Germany’s mass deportation and extermination of European Jews. The SD detected and helped root out all actual or potential enemies of the Nazi state and worked closely with the Gestapo (secret police), which arrested, deported, or killed state enemies.

Reinhard Heydrich headed the SD until his assassination in June 1942, after which Himmler appointed Ernst Kaltenbrunner to succeed him in January 1943; he remained in the post until the end of World War II in 1945. From 1933 until 1939 the SD, which reported directly to Himmler, was run as an independent SS office. After 1939 it became part of the Reich Main Security Office (RSHA).

The SD employed several hundred full-time intelligence agents but made use of thousands of informants, who worked inside Germany until 1939, and then both inside Germany and in occupied territories between 1939 and 1945. As German armies pushed into areas and occupied them, the SD sometimes lent its staff to the Einsatzgruppen, or mobile killing squads, which rounded up and killed Jews and other “undesirables” in places like Poland and the western part of the Soviet Union. SD personnel were also posted to concentration and death camps, and the SD was the principal security and police force tasked with keeping order in the various Jewish ghettos throughout Europe.

Within Germany, the SD enforced Nazi racial laws by intimidating, terrorizing, killing, or deporting Jews and other groups deemed “undesirable.” It also confiscated millions of dollars’ worth of private property that had belonged to German Jews and other oppressed groups. The SD played a major role in the Kristallnacht pogrom (November 9–10, 1938), during which at least 500 Jewish businesses, homes, and synagogues were destroyed. According to Nazi statistics, some 90 Jews died during the pogrom (though the figure is almost certainly much higher than this), and another 30,000 were arrested and detained. Many of those men were never seen again.

In the immediate aftermath of the war, the International Military Tribunal (IMT), which conducted the Nuremberg Trials, ruled the SD to be a criminal organization. As part of the wider effort to bring about denazification in postwar Germany, the occupying Allies banned the SD and ordered its immediate dissolution. Unfortunately, many of the SD’s leaders were never brought to justice.

Sippenhaft

Sippenhaft, or Sippenhaftung (“kin liability”) was a legal practice in Nazi Germany whereby relatives of those accused of crimes against the state were held to be equally responsible, and arrested and sometimes executed. The concept was based on ideas of blood and purity. A relative of the perpetrator could be punished in place of or in addition to the perpetrator, depending on the circumstances. These threats, fears, and infliction of Sippenhaft formed part of the Nazi system of terror.

As a legal principle, Sippenhaft is derived from traditional Germanic law (the law of Germanic peoples before the widespread adoption of Roman canon law), which accepted that the clan of a criminal was liable for offenses committed by one of its members. This law, which also prevailed among Anglo-Saxon and Scandinavian peoples, distinguished between two forms of justice for severe crimes such as murder: blood revenge, the right to extrajudicially kill a Germanic freeman in the context of clan feuds; and blood money, the obligatory pecuniary restitution given to the kin of the victim in accordance with the nature of the crime and the social status of those affected. The kin of the offender was liable to pay in addition to or in substitution for the family member who committed the crime.

Another form of Sippenhaft distinct from traditional kin liability is the practice of kin punishment, often used in Nazi Germany toward the end of World War II. Examples of Sippenhaft being used as a threat exist within the Wehrmacht from around 1943. Soldiers accused of having “blood impurities,” or soldiers conscripted from areas outside of Germany, also began to have their families threatened and punished with Sippenhaft. In Nazi Germany, the term was given a new meaning: the punishment of relatives for the offense of a family member. In this form of Sippenhaft the relatives of persons accused of crimes against the state were held to share the responsibility for those crimes and were subject to arrest and sometimes execution.

An example is the case of a soldier, Panzergrenadier Leiss, who was accused of desertion on the Eastern Front in December 1942. After the Düsseldorf Gestapo discovered supposed “Polish” links in the Leiss family, in February 1943 his wife, child, two brothers, sister, and brother-in-law were arrested and executed at Sachsenhausen concentration camp.

By 1944 several general and individual directives were ordered within divisions and corps, threatening troops with consequences against their families.

After the failure of the July 20, 1944, Bomb Plot, SS chief Heinrich Himmler told a meeting of Nazi Party district chiefs in Posen that he would introduce absolute responsibility of kin. According to Himmler, the bomb plotters had committed treason. Their “blood” was “bad,” and that blood must therefore be “wiped out.” Accordingly, the members of the family of Claus von Stauffenberg, who had planted the bomb that failed to kill Hitler, were all under suspicion. His wife, Nina Schenk Gräfin von Stauffenberg, was arrested and sent to Ravensbrück concentration camp (she survived and lived until 2006). His brother Alexander, who knew nothing of the plot and was serving with the Wehrmacht in Greece, was also sent to a concentration camp. Similar punishments were meted out to the relatives of Carl Goerdeler, Henning von Tresckow, Adam von Trott zu Solz, and many other conspirators. Younger children of arrested plotters were sent to orphanages under new names: Stauffenberg’s children, for example, were renamed “Meister.” The fact that most of these families belonged to well-established Prussian aristocracy added to the zeal with which they were persecuted.

The threats of kin liability were extended to include all German troops and, in particular, German commanders. A decree of February 1945 threatened death to the relatives of military commanders who showed what Hitler regarded as cowardice or defeatism in the face of the enemy.

Slachta, Margit

Margit Slachta was a Hungarian pioneer in social service and a leading political figure in interwar Hungary. During the Holocaust, members of the religious order she founded, the Sisters of Social Service, worked to protect their Jewish neighbors while at the same time continuing their commitment to social justice.

Born in Kassa, Hungary, on September 18, 1884, she lived with her parents in the United States when she was a child but returned to Hungary before the turn of the century. Upon her return, she taught French and German at a Catholic school in Budapest. In 1908 she joined a religious community, the Society of the Social Mission. She became an activist for social causes, establishing the Union of Catholic Women, an organization to promote the female franchise in Hungary. As early as 1919 she organized the Catholic Women’s Party, and in 1920 became the first woman to be elected to the Hungarian Parliament (for a term lasting two years), where she campaigned on behalf of women, children, families, and the safeguarding of workers’ rights.

On May 12, 1923, Margit Slachta founded a new order, the Sisters of Social Service, whose members were dedicated to carrying out their commitment to care for those in need and combat the suffering around them. Over time, the sisters became well known throughout Hungary for nursing, midwifery, and taking care of orphans.

As an outspoken woman, committed Christian, and promoter of socially advanced causes, she defied the spirit of the age. When Hungary began to introduce measures discriminating against Jews, it was inevitable that Mother Margit (as she now was) would rebel against such developments. With the first anti-Jewish laws appearing in Hungary in 1938, she began publishing articles opposing official antisemitism in her newspaper, Voice of the Spirit. In 1943 the paper was suppressed, but Mother Margit continued to publish it underground. Sisters were instructed to familiarize themselves on Jewish matters and prepare accordingly.

Mother Margit's political activities increased as World War II was unleashed, with the German invasion of Poland in September 1939 leading to waves of Jewish refugees seeking refuge. In 1940 Hungary joined the Axis Powers, and that fall, before the Nazis insisted on it, deportations of Jews began in certain regions of the country. Mother Margit responded immediately by agitating for these actions to be stopped at once, and in one region, at least, the deportations ceased as a result of her actions.

Beyond this, she also provided shelter and protested against forced labor and antisemitic laws. In 1943 she even went to Rome to try to persuade the Vatican to step in and intervene to stop the persecution of Jews in Slovakia.

Mother Margit instructed her sisters that they had a bound duty to protect the Jews, even at the risk of their own lives. She considered it a theological matter, in view of the fact that the Jews were God's people and the people among whom Jesus was born and raised.

Between July 15 and August 12, 1941, any Jews living in Hungary who could not prove legal residency since 1850 were deported to southern Poland, there to await their fate at the hands of the Germans. It is estimated that this numbered about 20,000 people. Upon learning this, Mother Margit demanded that the process be stopped, protesting directly to Magdolna Purgly, the wife of Hungary's regent, Miklós Horthy.

When the Nazis occupied Hungary in March 1944, bringing the full weight of the Holocaust with them, the Sisters of Social Service began to arrange baptisms of convenience in the hope that by doing so they would be able to spare Jews from deportation. As things got worse, the sisters focused completely on helping the Jews. Giving of themselves selflessly, they hid at least 1,000 Jews and provided food and safe houses whenever they could for fugitives.

Following Mother Margit's lead, one of the sisters, Sára Salkaházi, took the admonition to offer her life for the Jews literally. She personally saved the lives of about 100 Jews, and as the persecution intensified during 1944 she redoubled her efforts to save as many as she could. Eventually, she was caught by Hungarian Arrow Cross soldiers and murdered on the banks of the Danube on December 27, 1944. Her body was never recovered.

In a singular act of defiance once the Nazis had invaded, Mother Margit began to live in the order's Mother House, located on Budapest's Thököly Street. This itself acted as a place of refuge for Jews, but its location was both ironic and a challenge, as it was situated right opposite the 14th District Arrow Cross Party headquarters. At one point, gangs invaded the house and carried out a brutal hunt for Jews, attacking Mother Margit as well as several of the sisters. On this occasion she only narrowly avoided execution.

With the end of the war, Mother Margit Slachta once more became a member of the Hungarian Parliament during the democratic period prior to the communist takeover. At the end of 1948 she fled Hungary for the West, arriving in the United States on June 22, 1949. On January 6, 1974, she died, at age 89, in Buffalo, New York. In recognition for her work in hiding Jews, supplying basic goods, and providing false evidence when in the process of saving Jewish lives during the Holocaust, she was recognized by Yad Vashem on February 18, 1969, as one of the Righteous among the Nations.

Slave Labor

During World War II, prisoners in most of the Nazi concentration camps were exploited mercilessly as slave labor. Political prisoners included communists, political dissidents and other opponents of Germany (broadly defined), as well as captured partisans and even citizens of countries occupied by the Germans randomly picked up for conscripted work details. In addition, people who had volunteered for well-paid positions in German war factories ended up as slave prisoners of the Germans once Germany began losing the war. Most abundantly taken advantage of, however, were Jews in every country occupied by the Nazis.

The foreign workers came from Germany's satellite states or occupied territories to work for the German Reich. As early as March 1938, when Germany invaded Austria, some 100,000 Austrian civilians were taken to work in Germany, and by August 31, 1939, 70,000 workers from Bohemia and Moravia had been conscripted for work in the Reich. After Germany's invasion of Poland in September 1939 and its invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, harsh methods were used to press workers into laboring on behalf of the German war effort, as replacements for the millions of Germans who were fighting in the army.

In opposition to international law, Germany also used prisoners of war to help support the German economy. As early as fall 1939, 340,000 Polish POWs were being compelled to work the land, and in August 1942 Germany enacted a decree that made forced labor possible in all occupied countries and POW camps. In Western Europe, local authorities cooperated with the Germans in recruitment in an effort to have their own POWs released or to have the status of their POWs changed to that of foreign workers in Germany.

Although Germany recruited millions of workers between 1942 and 1944, there were never enough for the country's needs, partly because word had spread about the terrible working conditions and the treatment of foreign workers, and partly because of Germany's impending military defeat. Nevertheless, by late 1944 there were 9 million foreign workers (including POWs) in Germany. One out of every five workers was a foreigner, and one out of every four tanks and every four aircraft manufactured in Germany was made by foreign workers.

In most instances, foreign workers were supervised by the Sicherheitspolizei (Security Police, or SiPO) and the Ausländische Arbeiter (Foreign Worker) section of the Gestapo, and members of those groups were guided by racism, xenophobia, and arbitrary decisions. They regarded Poles and Russians as inferior and subhuman beings. Thus, the East European workers were subjected to hard physical labor, humiliated, and severely penalized for misdeeds. They received very low pay, they had to wear special signs on their clothes—"P" for Poles and "Ost" (East) for Russians—and they could not socialize or mix with German society in any way. Germans who had sexual intercourse with foreign workers could be sentenced to death. Even though Western European workers were treated better, they also complained that they were treated like slaves. Jews who became foreign workers or were taken as POWs tried to avoid being identified as Jewish.

The majority of the millions of Jews caught in the Nazi net and earmarked for death were gassed upon arriving by train at one of the six Nazi death camps in Poland. In these camps only a relatively small minority were selected for labor (with the exception of Auschwitz and Majdanek), but hundreds of thousands were sent to work as slave labor in other camps, as well as in the Nazi-imposed ghettos throughout Eastern Europe. When Germany invaded Poland in September 1939, army units recruited Jews at random for forced labor, including removing roadblocks and paving roads. Not only were the Jews mistreated, but their work was specifically chosen to degrade them. At the same time, Jews were subject to constant beatings and harassment.

From October to December 1939 in Poland, the Nazis issued decrees drafting into compulsory labor Jewish men and women aged 14 to 60 and children aged 12 to 14. Jews had to register with the local Judenrat, the Nazi-enforced Jewish council, and they had to carry out temporary work assignments like removing snow, loading goods the Nazis had confiscated from other Jews, and building ghetto walls. Eventually, special labor camps were set up for the Jews; in the Lublin district in Poland alone, there were 29 such camps by July 1940. In August 1940, 20,000 Jews from the ages of 19 to 35 were ordered to report to the labor camps. Many defied the recruitment despite the danger involved in doing so.

Conditions in the labor camps were horrific. Often, the men had no sleeping quarters and had to sleep outside. Sometimes they were not fed even their meager rations and were humiliated and persecuted with dogs, Nazi threats, and beatings. Those working on land amelioration projects sometimes had to stand in water to work. Out of 6,000 men sent from the Warsaw Ghetto to labor camps, 1,000 were no longer fit for labor after only two weeks. In Poland's Łódź ghetto, the entire Jewish population had to partake in forced labor as the ghettos themselves became labor camps.

Large numbers of Jews worked in German factories in Poland and in workshops during the last years of the ghettos. At the end of 1940 more than 700,000 Jews were engaged in forced labor in Poland. The figure dropped to 500,000 in 1942 and to little more than 100,000 in mid-1943 owing to the high ghetto death rate and to deportations of the Jews from the ghettos to the death camps. Factories using Jewish labor had to pay sizable sums to the German secret police, and Jews had to pay bribes in order to obtain such employment, which they naïvely believed would exempt them from being deported to the concentration camps.

In mid-1942 and April–May 1943 some of the Jews in the ghettos were taken to the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps in Poland, and in November 1943 the Germans murdered 40,000 Jews in those camps. In most work camps, the Jews had to work at least 10 to 12 hours a day. In those rare circumstances where they were paid, they were paid less than the meager wage that people of other nationalities received. Jewish wages did not enable them to purchase food on the black market, so most of the workers starved.

Jews arriving in Auschwitz who were selected for work and not death faced the horrors of forced labor. Eating only a small piece of bread and watery soup either before or after a long, tough workday, most Jewish prisoners succumbed to diseases like typhus. Health conditions in the camps were primitive and the water undrinkable, and epidemics spread quickly. The Germans kept the Jews in a constant state of terror. People could be shot any time and for any reason.

Jews had to do the dirty work in the Nazi-instigated death camps against their fellow Jews, often relatives or fellow Jewish community members. Unlucky men and women were selected for the most hideous medical experiments. Jewish prisoners had to clear rocks, fill trains full of dirt, dig trenches and tunnels, sort the possessions of new arrivals (which were confiscated by the Germans), and work in ammunition factories. Mostly, Jews were slave laborers in factories for the German military effort. Whether Jews were making or putting together airplane parts or ammunition, working in coal mines, or working in machine shops, they were thoroughly and completely abused and exploited. Jews were compelled to steal in order to survive, and some Jewish women were forced into prostitution.

Toward the end of World War II, Jewish prisoners were often shot in forests or on long marches by foot, or journeys by train, after camps were evacuated because of Allied bombings. Many Jewish prisoners ended up in Bergen-Belsen, where they were neglected and left to die of typhus. In the last days before liberation, the Germans poisoned potato storehouses so that many Jews died when eating that food, the only food to be found. After liberation by the Allies, many prisoners died from overeating. Most Jews selected for labor in the death camps did not survive until liberation.

Slavs

The term Slavs denotes a variety of ethnicities and nations in Central, Eastern, and Southeastern Europe, whose tongues belong to the Slavic language group. The Slavs were seen by the Nazis as inferior peoples. In comparison to the Jews, however, they occupied an indeterminate position in the Nazi racial hierarchy. They were collectively or separately characterized as fremdvölkische (“nationally alien”), Untermenschen, or “Asiatic,” and constituted the majority of victims of Nazi annihilation, deportation, and exploitation policies from 1938 to 1945. Nevertheless, representatives of all three Slavic subgroups—Western, Southern, and Eastern—were, at one point or another, accepted as German allies. A number of Nazi publications considered parts (and in some cases all) of the Slavs as belonging to the original “Nordic” or “Indo-Germanic” peoples. The Third Reich’s attack on Eastern Europe may have been primarily determined by motives other than anti-Slavism, such as anti-Bolshevism and the quest for new “living space” (Lebensraum), yet implementation of these aims accounts only partly for the deaths of the millions of Russians, Ukrainians, Poles, and other Slavs who perished not only in combat against, but primarily under the occupation of, the Wehrmacht and the SS during World War II.

Nineteenth-century German public opinion and research on Eastern Europe and Russia showed, along with certain Russophile tendencies, strong currents of anti-Slavism that continued earlier negative stereotypes about Poles and Russians. Views of Slavs as “unhistorical,” “cultureless,” or “barbaric” were voiced by representatives of both Right and Left—including Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. In the völkisch discourse of late imperial Germany, Slavs were described as “racially mixed” or “mongolized.” A significant minority of nationalist and racist publicists with influence on the Nazi movement, including Houston Stuart Chamberlain, did, however, write positively about the Slavs. The Slavs played a relatively minor role in interwar German racist discourse in general and Nazi racial thinking in particular. Both official statements and unofficial procedures of the Third Reich regarding Slavic people continued to be marked by contradictions and shifts right down to 1945. Although the Czechs were viewed by Hitler in the 1920s more negatively than the Poles, German occupation policies in the Reichsprotektorat of Czechoslovakia were more permissive and less violent than those in the Generalgouvernement and other annexed Polish territories. Whereas “only” 40,000 or so Czechs perished during the Nazi occupation, the overwhelming majority of the 1.8 to 1.9 million non-Jewish Polish civilian victims of World War II were killed by Germans. In spite of manifest SS anti-Polonism, Himmler’s Generalplan Ost of 1942 made a distinction between eindeutschungsfähige Poles (“those who can be Germanized”) and Poles who were to be deported to Siberia within the next decades. Earlier, the greater part of the Czech population had become regarded as assimilable by the Nazis, while the Slovaks had been allowed to form their own satellite state.

Whereas in the Balkans Orthodox Serbs were among the nations least respected by Hitler, Orthodox Bulgarians (seen as being of Turkic origin) occupied a relatively higher position in the Nazi racial hierarchy and were referred to by Joseph Goebbels as “friends.” Bulgaria was permitted to abstain from participation in the attack on the Soviet Union and to pursue an independent policy with regard to its Jews. The Soviet people were labeled “beasts,” “animals,” “half-monkeys,” “hordes,” and the like. Among the approximately 10 million Soviet civilians who perished under the Nazis, there were 3.3 million prisoners of war, most of them Eastern Slavs. Yet, as the German advance into the Soviet Union halted, the Waffen-SS recruited, among other soldiers from the Soviet Union, a specifically Ukrainian division (“Galicia”) and a Belorussian unit. Impressed by the phenotype of the Ukrainians, Hitler, in August 1942, proposed the assimilation of Ukrainian women. Toward the end of the war, German troops were assisted by General Andrei Vlasov’s Russian Popular Army of Liberation, consisting of tens of thousands of Russian POWs and emigrés. The Cossacks—though being Eastern Slavs—were even seen as “Germanic.” Shortly before his suicide, Hitler described the “Slavic race” as stronger than the Germanic one, whose destiny it was to succumb.

Slovakia

In 1919 the new country of Czechoslovakia was formed out of the Czech-speaking regions of Austria and the Slovak-speaking regions of Hungary, the former Austro-Hungarian, or Hapsburg, Empire having been dissolved by the postwar peace treaties of Saint Germain and Trianon. While the state was a democratic republic, it nonetheless came under pressure from Nazi Germany during the 1930s owing to its large German-speaking minority in the region known as the Sudetenland. Consequently, by the Munich Agreement of September 1938, Nazi Germany began to dismember the country by occupying the Sudetenland and then, in March 1939, invading and annexing the Czech areas of Bohemia and Moravia. An independent Slovakia became a puppet regime under Nazi German domination.

Prior to World War II, 135,000 Jews lived in Slovakia, though many sought to leave during the later 1930s; at a census on December 15, 1940, there were 88,951 Jews still in the country. After Slovakia became independent, a series of antisemitic measures were introduced, the first of which excluded Jews from the military and all government positions. Slovakia’s president, Monsignor Jozef Tiso, was himself thoroughly pro-Nazi and entered into negotiations with the German government to work on having the country’s Jews deported. A “Jewish Code,” based in part on Germany’s Nuremberg Laws, was passed in September 1941. Among other things, it banned Jews from intermarriage with other Slovaks, excluded Jews from many professions, and demanded that Jews henceforth wear a yellow armband. By October 1941, 15,000 Jews were ejected from Bratislava; 10,000 were expelled outright, and 5,000 who held work permits, were government employees, or were business professionals were permitted to stay with their families nearby. On October 28, 1941, the first transport of 238 Jews left Bratislava.

Earlier, in November 1940, Slovakia had affiliated the Axis alliance and then joined in the invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. It declared war on Britain and the United States in December 1941.

Where the Holocaust was concerned, Slovakia was the first of Germany’s allies, in March 1942, to consent to the deportation of its Jewish population in pursuit of the Nazis’ “Final Solution.” The Holocaust then became a distinctly Slovak national project, as the Slovak police and military, together with the antisemitic paramilitary Hlinka Guard, massed together more than 57,000 Slovak Jews between March and October 1942. These people were housed in locally built concentration camps at Sereď, Novaky, and Vyhne.

Deportations of Jews from Slovakia to “the East” started on March 25, 1942, when the first transport, comprising almost 1,000 women, was sent to Auschwitz. Beyond this, Jews were transported to the Generalgouvernement in Poland, or Germany itself; here, the Slovak authorities turned their Jewish captives over to the SS, who in turn deported them to Auschwitz, Majdanek, or Sobibór. By October 1942 some 58,000 Jews had been deported. More than 99% of the 58,000 Jews deported between March and October were murdered. About 6,000 Slovak Jews fled to Hungary during this time. The deportations were halted on October 20, 1942.

The deportations were stopped largely on account of intervention from President Tiso. He had learned of the fate of Slovakia’s Jews via the papal nuncio in Bratislava, who had, in turn, been alerted from the Vatican after news was received from two Slovak Jewish leaders, Gisi Fleischmann and Rabbi Michael Ber Weissmandl. After strenuous efforts at negotiation, they were successful in persuading the government to cease the deportations, and the remaining 24,000 Jews in Slovakia were not deported to their deaths.

The deportations resumed on September 30, 1944. Not only had the Soviet Red Army reached the Slovak border by this stage, but an uprising among Slovak nationalists had broken out on August 29. In response, German troops occupied all of Slovakia, and the country’s independent status came to an end. Nearly 14,000 Slovak Jews were now deported; 7,936 went to Auschwitz (where they were gassed on arrival) and 4,370 to nearby Theresienstadt (Terezín), with most of the rest murdered within Slovakia itself by German SS and Hlinka Guard units. This final round of deportations lasted until March 31, 1945, when the last group of Jewish prisoners was taken from Sered, where they were being concentrated and held, to Terezín.

When taken overall, it can be concluded that up to 70,000 Jews were deported from Slovakia across the duration of World War II. Of these, some 65,000 were murdered or died in concentration camps at the hands of German SS and Slovak police, troops, and Hlinka Guard militias. Throughout this period, thousands more Jews remained in hiding or did not identify themselves openly during the roundups or other actions. Although figures are difficult to fix, it has been estimated that up to 105,000 Slovak Jews, representing 77% of the prewar population, died during the war.

Sobibór

Sobibór was a death camp established by the Nazis in Poland in April 1942. It was located in modern-day eastern Poland, five miles south of Włodawa, and like most death camps it was situated in a sparsely populated, remote area. Measuring 1,969 feet long and 1,312 feet wide, Sobibór was erected along the Chełm-Włodawa rail line, which facilitated the shipment of condemned Jews into the camp. Surrounded by a high, wire fence, it was masked by trees planted along its perimeter, so outsiders would not be aware of its true purpose. Beyond the fence and trees was a 50-foot-wide minefield to thwart escape attempts.

Sobibór was administered by 20–30 SS and security officials; the guard force numbered between 90 and 120 men, some of whom were Polish or Ukrainian civilians or Soviet prisoners of war. SS First Lieutenant Franz Stangl ran the facility from April until August 1942; he was replaced by SS Captain Franz Reichleitner, who headed the camp until it was decommissioned in November 1943. Most of the Jews sent to Sobibór were from the eastern and northern parts of Poland’s Lublin District, although Jews from Austria, Germany, Bohemia, Slovakia, Moravia, France, and the Netherlands were also sent there.

In May 1942 Sobibór officials began systematically gassing arriving detainees. As trainloads of Jews pulled into the reception area, they were herded onto platforms, had their valuables taken, and then were forced to disrobe. They were then led into the “tube,” a leafy and wooded tunnel that connected the reception area to the gas chambers. The system could accommodate up to 20 freight cars at a time. Once the victims were in the gas chambers, which the Germans cruelly told them were “showers,” the doors were sealed and they would be gassed to death with carbon monoxide. Sonderkommandos, prisoners forced to work in the camps, then emptied the chambers and buried the dead in mass graves; before doing so, they extracted any jewelry or gold fillings from the corpses.

Sobibór was the site of a major prisoner uprising in October 1943, led by Alexander Pechersky and Leon Feldhendler. On October 14, after learning that they would likely be deported to other camps where they would meet certain death, about 600 prisoners killed some 12 German prison administrators and guards. Amid the chaos, at least 300 prisoners managed to exit the camp. About 100 were caught in the days immediately after the uprising, and up to 60 managed to survive the war.

The following month, SS officials decided to close Sobibór. The remaining prison guards shot any surviving internees still in camp and were ordered to dismantle the gas chambers and bulldoze the facility to the ground. By March 1944, when the last of the guard contingent had left the area, trees had been planted over the site of Sobibór to mask its existence. No prisoners were taken to the facility after November 1943. Sobibór was one of six dedicated death camps operated by the Nazis and situated in Poland during the Holocaust.

Social Darwinism

A social theory developed in the second half of the 19th century that applied the evolutionary ideas of Charles Darwin to human society, social Darwinism was a significant element in Nazi ideology. Natural selection became a central concept in social and political thought soon after the first popularization of Charles Darwin's evolutionary theory, both in Europe and in North America. Socialist thinkers emphasized the inevitability of social evolution, at the end of which the classless society would arise. Others used Darwin's thesis to justify the bourgeoisie's claim to power and social distinctions. Conflicts within societies were now interpreted as much on the premise of the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest as on the premise of conflicts between peoples and nations. The oppression of colonial peoples and imperialistic expansion projects now acquired a significant natural scientific justification. But within Europe, too, representatives of certain nations such as Britain, France, and Germany thought of themselves as superior to each other and, with the help of Darwinistic ideas, argued the necessity of conflict. War and soldierly virtues were glorified as necessary and beneficial for humanity and progress.

With the popularization of racist ideas in the second half of the 19th century through Gobineau and others, a synthesis of racism and social Darwinism was quickly made. In order to be able to survive the necessary struggle between the nations, one's own "race" must be strengthened. At the end of the 19th century many in Europe and North America thought that they could perceive massive signs of degeneration. The mass misery of the workers caused all kinds of rapid physical and mental decline, violent criminality, and alcoholism. Civilization was interpreted as a disturbance of natural selection, allowing a greater number of the allegedly biologically unfit to survive. Prophets of cultural pessimism prophesied unstoppable decline, unless and until the reproduction of "unworthy" life was blocked and the reproduction of the fittest furthered by massive state intervention.

Social Darwinism and racism were well entrenched both in North America and in Europe by the beginning of World War I. They entered even more into mainstream thinking, a store of ideas of which well-known politicians and scientists and many racist, völkisch, nationalistic, and fascist movements (but also reformist groups and splinter groups) could make use. From the beginning of the 20th century, population policy concepts developed both in Europe and in North America that were intended to assist natural selection through sterilization and control. Some of these concepts were implemented in a few of the U.S. states and in Sweden. Although the U.S. laws on sterilization of the seriously handicapped passed before World War I were applied only in a few cases, they were put forward as a model in Germany. In Sweden, a law was passed on January 1, 1935, that made possible the sterilization of persons with mental and physical illnesses, and it was applied as late as the 1970s.

Social Darwinism served National Socialist ideology as a justification for eugenics, euthanasia, the persecution of the Jews, and war. The radicalization of popular social Darwinism took place during World War I and during the economic crises of the 1920s and 1930s. With Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party, a man and a party came to power that implemented social Darwinistic ideas bound in with racism and antisemitism in a regime of terror. The Law on the Prevention of Reproduction by Those with Inherited Disorders, which came into force on January 1, 1934, belongs in this context, like the Nuremberg Race Laws of October 18, 1935, and the Marriage Health Law of October 18, 1935. After the beginning of World War II, all of the remaining barriers fell, and millions—including thousands of persons with mental and physical handicaps—were murdered in the “race war” in which the main targets were Jews and Slavs.

Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français

Since 2000, France’s national railroad, Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Français (National Society of French Railways, SNCF), has been the subject of several lawsuits by Holocaust survivors who claim that the railroad was complicit in carrying out the Holocaust during World War II.

In 1940, when the Germans occupied France and began to implement the Holocaust there, the French government owned 51% of SNCF, making it the majority shareholder. The railway is now completely owned by the French government. Since the end of the war in 1945, SNCF officials have acknowledged their company’s role in the Holocaust and have admitted transporting at least 76,000 Jews and other “undesirables” from Drancy, a transit camp outside Paris, to the death camp at Auschwitz. However, the company has resisted paying monetary reparations to non-French victims who were transported by SNCF. The company has claimed that it participated in the Holocaust only because it had been ordered to do so by German occupation officials and had no choice but to carry out those orders.

In September 2000, 12 U.S. Holocaust survivors brought suit against SNCF in a U.S. federal court. The suit (Abrams v. SNCF) claimed that the railway had committed crimes against humanity by knowingly sending civilians to German-run death camps in the east. SNCF claimed sovereign immunity to the lawsuit because it was majority owned by the French government at the time. It bolstered this defense by citing a 1976 statute extending sovereign immunity from lawsuits to foreign governments. The court dismissed the suit in November 2001.

In June 2003 the court’s decision to dismiss was appealed, with the plaintiffs’ lawyers arguing that the cited 1976 statute was not retroactive, meaning that it did not apply to actions occurring prior to 1976. On June 13, 2003, an appeals court overturned the lower court’s decision and ordered that same court to determine whether or not the 1976 statute was indeed retroactive. SNCF appealed this ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court in 2004; the high court, ruling on another case, determined that the 1976 statute was retroactive. Meanwhile, it referred the Abrams case back to the appeals court, which dismissed the suit in November 2004. In February 2005 the Abrams plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court, but that tribunal refused to hear the case.

With the Abrams suit seemingly at a dead end, in February 2005 U.S. Holocaust survivors filed a parallel suit (Freund v. SNCF). This time, the plaintiffs sought restitution from SNCF for personal property that had been confiscated on SNCF trains bound for death camps. The case was dismissed and appealed. In September 2010 an appeals court upheld the dismissal.

A number of Holocaust survivors provided eyewitness testimony to the events involving SNCF. Leo Bretholz, one of the star witnesses, asserted that SNCF was complicit in implementing the Holocaust because railway officials prevented deportees from escaping and subjected them to inhumane conditions.

Beginning in 2010, with the SNCF lawsuits in the United States all but dead and a similar case in France having been dismissed in December 2007, U.S. Holocaust survivors decided on another strategy. They began lobbying Congress to enact the Holocaust Rail Justice Act, which would permit U.S. Holocaust survivors to sue SNCF for damages and reparations in U.S. courts, thereby nullifying the 1976 statute, at least in this instance. Bretholz and others testified numerous times before congressional committees, and the act is still winding its way through Congress.

Meanwhile, the issue of SNCF reparations gained new traction when Keolis, a majority-owned subsidiary of SNCF, became involved in the potential building of new passenger rail lines in Florida, California, and Maryland. Holocaust survivors mounted a major effort to prevent Keolis from bidding on those projects unless SNCF agreed to pay reparations. By 2013 the French and U.S. governments were engaged in talks to include American Holocaust survivors in an already-existing program by which the French government pays reparations to Holocaust survivors. By early 2014 SNCF seemed more willing to consider reparations to Americans, largely because it feared it would be barred from bidding on a $6 billion contract to build a light rail line in suburban Maryland. In December 2014 SNCF agreed to pay up to $60 million worth of compensation to Holocaust survivors in the United States; this figure corresponds to approximately $100,000 per survivor.

Sondergericht

Germany's police forces were significantly reorganized by the Nazis; most of the country's civil and criminal courts were not. Prior to 1933 the Nazis stated that German courts were too liberal, with conventions that favored criminals rather than their victims. The NSDAP's 25-point plan even talked of scrapping the entire court system and replacing it with a new system of National Socialist courts.

In response to the suspicious Reichstag fire on February 27, 1933, Adolf Hitler convinced President Paul von Hindenburg to issue the Reichstag Fire Decree in February 1933, which abolished the civil rights that had been granted to German citizens by the constitution of the Weimar Republic for the sake of "public safety." Internal opposition to the Nazi regime in Germany was quashed; the Communist Party was disbanded and its members imprisoned, eliminating the Nazis' strongest political competition. By the middle of 1933 the Nazi Party was the only legal political party operating in Germany.

The Nazis then reorganized the German judicial system according to their philosophy that the law should not be based on individual rights and equality but rather on the interests of the People's Community (Volksgemeinschaft). Defined as ethnically bound characteristics of the German people, the supreme aims of the law should be the protection of the German ("Aryan") race, national honor, defense capabilities, and public order. For political opponents and so-called "antisocials" as well as Jews and "foreigners," special, tougher laws were introduced successively, in order to secure their total obedience to the new regime or to eliminate them. Perhaps because they feared that their court system faced abolition, Germany's judges, lawyers, and legal experts caved in to many Nazi demands and expectations. The Nazis did not have to change the court system; the system simply changed for them.

Judges were at the heart of this transformation. They interpreted and enforced Nazi legislation, even their dubious racial and eugenics policies, for the most part without question. They did not question or criticize the Gestapo, which acted beyond the reach of the courts, and acquiesced to Nazi demands for tougher sentences for certain crimes.

After the passage of the Enabling Act on March 23, 1933, the Nazis gradually supplanted the normal justice system with political courts with wide ranging powers, creating Sondergerichte (Special Courts), which operated outside and free of the previous constitutional court system.

A Special Court had three judges, and the defense counsel was appointed by the court. Even as heavy-handed as justice was in Nazi Germany, defendants were afforded at least nominal protections under the regular courts' rules and procedures. These protections were swept away in the Special Courts, since they existed outside the ordinary judicial system. There was no possibility of appeal, and verdicts could be executed at once. The court decided the extent of evidence to consider, and defense attorneys were not permitted to question the proof of the charges.

Especially during the first years of their existence, Special Courts had a strong deterrent effect against opposition to the Nazis; the German public was intimidated, it was said, through arbitrary psychological terror. By 1942 the number of Special Courts had increased from 26 in 1933 to a high of 74.

The People's Court (Volksgerichtshof) was created as a Special Court in April 1934 for dealing with cases of treason or attacks on national or regional government members; it was created owing to government dissatisfaction with the fact that most of the communists charged with burning down the Reichstag were acquitted. The function of this court was just like that of the Special Courts, to suppress opposition to the regime.

The workload was thereafter divided between the People's Courts and the Special Courts in such a way that the People's Courts took the most important cases, while the Special Courts dealt with a wider array of "crimes" relating to anti-Nazi opposition. Eventually, virtually any crime, major or minor (including the frequent charge of being an “antisocial parasite”), could be tried in either court; punishment was almost always harsh, ranging from time in a concentration camp to execution. The Nazis had earlier introduced the concept called Schutzhaft (“protective custody”), allowing them to arrest and detain people without charges.

With the onset of war, the number and toughness of the laws and decrees from which the Sondergerichte and Volksgerichtshof acted increased dramatically. The Wartime Special Penal Code of August 1938 had already introduced the death penalty for espionage, guerrilla activities, and “defeatism.” In late 1939 several additional decrees broadened the use of the death penalty to crimes of sabotage, damage of military assets, theft under extraordinary wartime conditions (for example, pillage during and after air bombardments), and all crimes of violence. These laws were aimed at Germans as well as other nationals.

Also, Sondergerichte were set up in countries under German military occupation once the war broke out. The Special Courts played a major role in carrying out summary executions via judicial murder in Nazi-occupied Poland. Owing to increasing resistance in the occupied territories, a special penal code for Jews and Poles in the eastern territories annexed to the Reich was issued on December 4, 1941. It introduced extraordinarily harsh sentences, including death, punishment camp, or transfer to the Gestapo, for any kind of disobedience against the German occupants. The courts could effectively sentence Poles and Jews to death for anything. Terminology in the courts was full of statements such as “Polish subhumans” and “Polish rabble,” with some judges even declaring that Poles were to have lengthier sentences than Germans since they were racially inferior. Overall, between 1933 and 1945, 12,000 Germans were executed on the orders of the Sondergerichte set up by the Nazi regime.

Sonderkommando

Sonderkommando is a term that refers to prisoners in Nazi death camps who helped herd newly arriving prisoners into the gas chambers and then deposited their corpses into crematoria. The term, meaning “special commandos,” was also used on other occasions to describe special killing units of the SS, which targeted Jews and other “undesirables” as German armies advanced into newly conquered territory. However, its most common usage refers to death camp workers.

Sonderkommandos were invariably young, able-bodied Jewish males who were selected for slave labor soon after their arrival in the death camps. They helped process newly arrived prisoners and readied them for the gas chambers. This included the removal of their clothing and the shaving of women’s heads. After the victims were gassed to death, they also gathered the personal possessions of those who had been murdered, removed any gold that victims might have had in their teeth, and moved the corpses from the gas chambers into the crematoria. The work was grim and gruesome, and shifts lasted for 12 hours, seven days a week.

Because the Sonderkommando were intimately familiar with the Nazis’ factory-like extermination procedures, they were housed in separate barracks, so they could not interact with other internees or tip them off as to their fate. And because the Nazis wished to keep the particulars of their death camps a secret, Sonderkommandos were routinely killed and replaced by newly arriving recruits. The average lifespan of a Sonderkommando was three to four months. To entice the workers to do such horrific labor, and to prevent them from influencing other inmates, the camp’s administrators usually gave the Sonderkommando special privileges, including better and more abundant food and better housing.

Only a very few Sonderkommando workers survived their ordeal, and some rebelled against their captors. On August 2, 1943, a number of Sonderkommando men participated in an uprising at the Treblinka death camp, and nearly 100 prisoners managed to escape. At Auschwitz-Birkenau on October 7, 1944, a carefully planned revolt took place involving a number of men from the XII Sonderkommando, who managed to destroy one of the camp’s crematoria. For several months prior to the rebellion, prisoners had been hiding gunpowder, which was used to blow up one of the ovens.

Almost all those who participated in this revolt were caught and executed.

Soos, Géza

Géza Soos was a member of the Hungarian resistance during World War II. Born in 1912, he became a member of the Reformed Church in Hungary, where he was head of the Soli Deo Gloria youth movement. Soos was a member of the Hungarian Foreign Ministry during the regency of Miklós Horthy and a key resister in the secret Hungarian independence movement against the Nazi occupation of Hungary.

Between July 6 and July 15, at Evian-les-Bains, France, an international conference called by U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt took place to discuss the problem of what to do about Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany and Austria. Géza Soos, then in France representing Soli Deo Gloria at a conference, went to Evian, entirely on his own initiative, on July 5, 1938. It was from his attendance at this meeting that he gained a measure of appreciation of the situation facing Jews under the Nazis, and from this point on he realized that he should be doing something to assist them. By 1942 he was working actively with the Good Shepherd Committee of the Reformed Church, and with their assistance hid many Jews, both families and individuals.

As a member of the Hungarian Foreign Service, Soos was part of a cohort dedicated to resisting the Nazis, including László (Leslie) Veress, Domokos Szent-Iványi, and Ferenc Vali. Perhaps his most important contact was the Swedish emissary Raoul Wallenberg, with whom he developed a close working relationship dedicated to saving Jews. Their personal connection is unclear; perhaps they became friends, but this is not certain. Their cooperation was, however, an efficient one. Soos was the first non-Swedish official Wallenberg encountered after his arrival in Budapest in July 1944; together the two experienced related dangers requiring them to hide out in different places each night in various safe houses.

Soos, who was Szent-Iványi's deputy both formally and within the Hungarian independence movement, is considered by some to be the Hungarian official who did the most to save Jews from deportation in 1944. At one point he acquired a motor vehicle with diplomatic plates enabling him to move Jews around Budapest to safe houses, and on another occasion he appropriated a military aircraft and flew to Rome, where he engaged in discussions with the Allies in the hope of giving Budapest the status of an open city and negotiating a separate peace—and, by doing so, sparing the population from unnecessary suffering. Activities such as these placed his life at risk, but he did so in order to provide help to those in need.

Arguably, the most vital service undertaken by Soos took place in the aftermath of the escape from Auschwitz on April 10, 1944, of Rudolf Vrba and Alfréd Wetzler. It seems that Soos obtained the German-language testimony through a member of the Budapest Jewish community, Resző (Rudolf) Kasztner. Soos gave it to József Éliás, head of the Good Shepherd Mission. Éliás's secretary, Mária Székely, then translated it into Hungarian and prepared six copies. These were in turn forwarded to diplomats and Jewish leaders in Hungary and overseas. In an attempt to generate attention at the highest levels in Hungary, Soos also passed the report to Countess Ilona Edelsheim-Gyulai, Horthy's daughter-in-law. Taken overall, this was the first time that a complete and authentic report of the extermination operations at Auschwitz had been released to world leaders. Unfortunately, public acknowledgement of Vrba's testimony was delayed for political reasons, just as the full force of the Nazi killing process fell on the Jews of Hungary. Arguments still reverberate as to whether the lives of hundreds of thousands of people could have been saved if the news from Soos had been made public and acted upon.

Nevertheless, when the Auschwitz report reached Horthy, he immediately acted to stop the deportations of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz. While it is difficult to speculate as to why he did this, one suggestion could be that the intervention of Soos, through Ilona Edelsheim-Gyulai, played a role in his calculations.

Research into Soos's activities during the Nazi invasion and occupation of Hungary is difficult, as most of what he did was illegal when measured against his formal duty as a government official. Documentation, therefore, is rare. As in many similar cases of helping activities, the only ones who know of Soos's activities with any authority are those whom he helped directly—the survivors who owe him their lives.

When peace came in 1945, Soos returned to Hungary. The Soviet takeover of the country, however, placed him in an unsafe position given that he had been a leading civil servant of the Horthy regime. Communists expected him to join the party, which he refused to do. In 1946, therefore, he left for Geneva, Switzerland, where he studied for his ordination as a pastor. At the same time, he edited Hungarian-language journals for distribution around Europe.

In 1951 Géza Soos and his wife, Ilona Tüdös, together with their five children, moved to the United States, where they settled in North Carolina. Two years later, at the age of just 41, Soos died in a road accident, in what some asserted were suspicious (though unconfirmed) circumstances.

Soviet Union

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) or Soviet Union was a large Eurasian state with a 1940 population of some 193 million, of whom perhaps 7–8 million were of Jewish origin. The USSR was a polyglot entity of many different nationalities and religions, with at least 170 different languages and dialects spoken. The majority of the population—about 100 million people—lived in the largest Soviet republic of Russia. After the communists had taken control of Russia in the 1920s, Jews in general prospered under Soviet rule. While there was certainly antisemitism and discrimination, Jews did better than they had under czarist Russia. Between 1925 and 1940, nearly 40% of the Jews living in what had been the Pale of Settlement (roughly western Russia, Lithuania, Belarus, Poland, and Moldova) had left the grinding poverty of the countryside to relocate in Russia's large cities, like Leningrad and Moscow. This mass migration meant that there would be fewer Jews in areas overrun by the Germans during World War II, sparing hundreds of thousands from the Final Solution. Jews in Russia concentrated on acquiring higher education, making them among the best-educated groups in interwar Europe.

Soviet leader Joseph Stalin, ever the scheming pragmatist, entered into a nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany in August 1939, after he was unable to secure a firm alliance with the Western European Allies. Among other things, the pact had clandestinely promised the Soviets free rein in eastern Poland and in parts of the Baltic countries once the war began between Germany and the West. When war did come in September, the Soviets wasted little time in securing what they believed to be their share of the spoils. In spite of numerous and increasingly disquieting signs that Germany was preparing to invade the USSR, Stalin refused to believe that Hitler would break the 1939 nonaggression pact so quickly. Thus, when the Germans struck in Operation Barbarossa on June 22, 1941, the Soviets were ill-prepared for the onslaught.

By early 1942, German forces had occupied all of the former Pale of Settlement as well as Russia west of a line that ran from Stalingrad to Moscow to Rostov. In total, these conquered lands contained a Jewish population of approximately 5 million. The Soviets tried to evacuate as many Jews to the east as possible, mainly from western Russia, but their primary goal was to stop the German offensive before it reached Leningrad and Moscow. Perhaps 1 million Jews were successfully evacuated, leaving some 4 million to stand alone against the Nazi menace. Almost immediately after the June 1941 attack, German mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen) began killing Jews, Roma, and communists in horrifying numbers. By the end of that year alone, the killing squads had murdered approximately 15% of the Jews in the newly occupied areas. Intent on exterminating all of the Jews, the Germans also deported them to concentration and death camps further west, where they were murdered en masse.

The Soviets finally stopped the German offensive at Stalingrad in February 1943, which was the turning point of the war in the east; from then on, the Germans would engage in a gradual fighting retreat that would not end until 1945, when Germany was defeated and Berlin lay in ruins. The USSR suffered grievously during the war, certainly more than any other belligerent in terms of human and material losses. Millions of civilians died from starvation, disease, or war violence and millions more were displaced. Much of the Soviet countryside in the western areas was decimated, first by retreating Soviet soldiers and then by retreating German forces. Estimates now place Soviet war deaths at 27–28 million, including 7–8 million military dead and 19–20 million civilian dead. The Soviets claimed that 1,700 towns and some 70,000 villages were destroyed, while major cities like Stalingrad, Odessa, Kiev, and Leningrad also suffered catastrophic damage. An estimated 25 million Soviets were left homeless by the end of the war, and estimates indicate that at least 25% of the total national wealth of the country was wiped out between 1941 and 1945.

For Jews, the losses were even more staggering. Almost all of the Jews in the former Pale of Settlement areas were killed. On the other hand, as many as 600,000 Jews fought in the Soviet army between 1941 and 1945, of whom approximately 143,000 were killed in action. Clearly, the epicenter of the Holocaust unfolded in areas that had been controlled by the Soviets prior to 1941.

After the war, Jews enjoyed a brief period of relative calm under Stalin's watch. Although the dictator had taken an official anti-Zionist stance for years, he hoped that the creation of the State of Israel would usher in a socialist regime in the Middle East. Thus, he tacitly encouraged an Israeli state, which he believed would offset Western influence in the Middle East and which might be incorporated into the communist orbit. When that failed to materialize, he ordered an internal backlash aimed at Jews. In August 1952 Soviet authorities quietly arrested and executed 13 important Jewish actors, writers, poets, and other intellectuals. For years, the Soviets denied that these events took place.

6,000. The civil war was fought between left-wing Spanish Republicans and far-right Nationalists, in many respects a fascist political movement led by General Francisco Franco. He, in turn, received considerable support from Germany's Adolf Hitler and Italy's Benito Mussolini; both sent naval, military, and air support (in the Italian case, in strength), and each used the war as a mask to test new military technology.

Where the Jewish community was concerned, the Spanish Civil War saw synagogues closed down, even though there were no overt or official expressions of antisemitism. Most of the Jews who had fled other parts of Europe also fled Spain during the war, while nearly all Jewish organizations remaining within Spain by the end of the war were shut down the moment Franco became dictator.

Franco was not interested in engaging in fighting when World War II broke out in 1939, even though both Germany and Italy had helped secure a victory for the Nationalists. Not technically neutral, but instead choosing a state of nonbelligerency, Franco did not provide military support, but, with a similar political ideology and his signature in 1936 on the Anti-Comintern Pact, chose instead to support the Axis Powers in other ways, such as through the provision of various raw materials. He did, however, supply a division of "volunteers" (the so-called "Blue Division") to aid Germany in its invasion of the Soviet Union after the summer of 1941.

In June 1940, after the surrender of France to the Germans, thousands of French refugees bolted for the Spanish boundary. Even though strict immigration regulations were still in place, thousands were able to move into Spain without a visa or proper documentation. For many of the European refugees, Spain was only a partial destination, since they had intentions to leave Europe entirely from a port in either Spain or Portugal. However, those who missed their boats or were found without proper visas or documentation were sent to Miranda de Ebro concentration camp, a detention center intended for political adversaries of the Franco regime, or were sent back to France.

In October 1940 Hitler and Franco met in Hendaye, a coastal town in southwest France, to discuss Spain's possible involvement in the war. Hitler wanted to use Spain as a point of transit for Germany to attack Great Britain. However, Spain was still devastated from the aftershocks of the Spanish Civil War, with many of its citizens starving. Franco demanded provisions and military equipment, along with Spanish control of Gibraltar and French North Africa. Still coming to terms with the new developments in France, Hitler could not concede to Franco's demands, and Spain continued its neutrality. Additionally, Franco refused to hand

Spain

A country in southwestern Europe, Spain had a long Jewish history stretching back many centuries. Within two years of Hitler's rise to power in Germany in 1933, some 3,000 Jews had entered Spain as refugees, and by the time the Spanish Civil War broke out in 1936 this had increased to around over foreign Jews living in Spain, a task other Axis countries and German-occupied territories were expected to do. Hitler spoke to Mussolini after his time in Hendaye, stating in relation to Franco, “I would rather have three or four teeth extracted than go through that again.”

Jewish refugees were able to pass from Germany to France and into Spain until 1941. The Nazis prohibited people in German territory from leaving, and Spain closed its borders in order to provide some sense of cohesion with Germany. By then, however, an estimated total of up to 25,600 Jews had made it through Spain, using the country as an escape route provided they could produce evidence that they were transiting to other places. Even after the Nazis banned emigration from German territories, Jewish refugees were still able to move into Spain, particularly when the Nazis began to deport Jews from the Low Countries. Those who were caught by the Spanish government were meant to be sent back to France, but the Allied Powers intervened, warning the Spanish government against sending these refugees to their deaths. As a result, in 1943, Spain began accepting European refugees once more. Near the end of the war, another 7,500 Jews were able to move into Spain as a temporary safe haven.

In addition to all this, when World War II broke out in 1939 some 4,000 Spanish Jews were in German or soon-to-be German-occupied territories. Due to Spain’s neutrality, these Jews were also under the protection of the Spanish government, which meant that many Jews living outside of Spain were forced to rely on the mercy of these Spanish representatives for help in the event that they had been mistreated. In 1943 the Germans demanded that Spain remove all Spanish Jews then living in German-occupied territory. However, instead of saving the 4,000 Jews who were still living in Europe, Spain only chose to become even more selective when it came to granting visas, and only allowed 800 Spanish Jews to reenter Spain.

Despite this, many of the representatives of the Spanish government, as well as civilians, were responsible for helping hundreds of Spanish Jews in several German-occupied territories, such as Hungary. The best known examples of such diplomatic effort on behalf of Jews caught in the Nazi net were Spanish diplomats such as Ángel Sanz Briz and Giorgio Perlasca, who together protected some 4,000 Jews in Budapest.

Although Spain seemingly played a more active role in helping Jews escape deportation to the concentration camps than other neutral countries, there has been debate about Spain’s wartime attitude toward Jewish refugees. While it is true that Franco’s regime did not evince the same degree of radical antisemitism of the Nazis, it is also true that his government only permitted Jewish transit through Spain rather than long-term settlement. Moreover, Franco provided a safe haven, of a different sort, to Nazis, fascists, and collaborators fleeing the victorious Allies at the end of the war. It is interesting to note that after Germany’s defeat in 1945 the Spanish government attempted to destroy all evidence of cooperation with the Nazis, seeking rapid rehabilitation and reentry to the family of “respectable” nations.

Speer, Albert

Albert Speer, an architect by profession, made his greatest contribution to the Nazi regime in the critical area of armament and munitions production. He used his exceptional organizational skills as well as the forced labor of millions of concentration camp prisoners and prisoners of war to keep the Nazi military machine armed and in the fight for much longer than would have otherwise been the case.

Born into a comfortable middle-class family in Mannheim on March 19, 1905, Berthold Konrad Hermann Albert Speer became an architect, as his father and grandfather before him. He joined the Nazi Party in March 1931, finding in Hitler not only an inspiring speaker but also the answer to his concerns about communism and Germany’s need to return to its past glory.

After successfully renovating the Berlin headquarters of the Nazi Party and providing plans for the Nuremberg rally of 1933 that met with Hitler’s approval, Speer quickly found himself with constant—often daily—contact with Hitler, who designated Speer the Nazi Party’s chief architect in early 1934. With successful projects, including the building of a huge stadium in Nuremberg designed to hold over 300,000 people and a pavilion for the 1937 International Exposition in Paris that conveyed the dominance of Germany, Speer was soon the inspector general of the Reich.

Although the start of World War II prevented many of his architectural plans—including the rebuilding of Berlin to achieve its rightful splendor—from moving forward to construction, Speer’s proven efficiency and business skills put him in position to replace Fritz Todt—who died in an airplane accident on February 8, 1942—as minister for armaments and war production. His first focus was to bring the German economy up to the level needed for wartime production. Since so much of the German economy was now based on military production, he effectively found himself in charge of the entire economy.

The results of Speer’s efforts were truly impressive. In 1943 he was able to greatly increase tank and airplane production, and dramatically reduce the time to bring a German submarine from the planning stage to its launching, all despite the fact that Germany was the subject of massive Allied bombing. Although detached from day-to-day operations due to a three-month-long illness, Speer was able to fight off the efforts of others—including Göring, Bormann, and Himmler—to take over some of his areas of responsibility. With Hitler’s support, this situation was quickly resolved in Speer’s favor.

After Hitler’s death, Speer worked in the government of Karl Dönitz—Hitler’s handpicked successor—until he was arrested by the British. It was not just Speer’s success in greatly increasing Germany’s weaponry that caused him to be indicted in the trial of major war criminals (the International Military Tribunal) held in Nuremberg following the war; it was the fact that Speer attained that success by the use of forced labor—including millions of Jewish concentration camp prisoners and prisoners of war—in factories around the Reich, in horrid conditions that resulted in death for many of the workers. Accordingly, he was charged with planning and/or participating in a war of aggression, conspiring to plan a war of aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. He was convicted on the last two charges.

During the trial, Speer was the only defendant who acknowledged responsibility for the crimes of the Reich and for his role in them. He contended that he knew nothing of the extermination of the Jews and that he plotted to kill Hitler in 1945—contentions that were and continue to be seriously doubted—but his was a unique response to the charges of the tribunal. Speer was sentenced to and served 20 years in Spandau Prison, from which he was released on October 1, 1966. He then authored three books, including Inside the Third Reich and Spandau: The Secret Diaries. He died in London on September 1, 1981.

SS St. Louis

On May 13, 1939, a German luxury cruise ship, the St. Louis, set sail from Hamburg carrying 937 German Jews who were seeking refuge abroad. To contextualize this journey, it is important to look back a little and see what caused these people to make what proved to be, in the words of one study, a “voyage of the damned.”

The Kristallnacht of November 9–10, 1938, was, for many Jews, the final prod needed to realize that no accommodation could be reached with Nazism. If ever there was a time to leave, it was now. However, the inhibitions to successful emigration were many, not the least of which was a hardening of attitudes in countries around the world to the admission of Jews. Visas were often practically unachievable, and the speed with which they were needed—given that lives were on the line—only served to place further obstacles in the path of German and Austrian Jews seeking sanctuary.

For those who managed to obtain passage on the St. Louis, therefore, this seemed to be not only their best chance to leave Germany but also their opportunity to start a new life in a free country. Not only that, Gustav Schroeder, the captain of the German luxury liner, did everything in his power to make his passengers comfortable. He removed a picture of the Führer from the social hall of the boat and permitted Jewish religious services to take place, much to the consternation of some Nazi crew members.

When the ship left Hamburg, its destination was Havana, Cuba. Adding to the optimism of those on board, it had been arranged that most of the Jewish passengers would have visas enabling them to land temporarily while they obtained permanent residence elsewhere.

The St. Louis was a German ship which worked the Atlantic route between Hamburg and the Americas. On a voyage in 1939 the ship carried over 900 Jewish refugees from Germany, but upon their arrival in Cuba they were denied entry even though many were bearing legitimate landing visas. After repeated further denials in the United States and Canada, the ship turned back to Germany. Many managed to find sanctuary in Britain, while others were eventually accepted by various European countries such as Belgium, the Netherlands, and France. Many were later murdered during the Holocaust. (Universal History Archive/Getty Images)

Upon their arrival, however, the president of Cuba, Federico Laredo Bru, refused the ship permission to dock; under such circumstances, the passengers would be unable to land. In an attempt at making profit from the refugees' plight, Bru demanded a payment of $500,000 as an entry fee. After a great deal of hesitation, negotiation, and standoff, only 22 Jews were permitted to land.

What made the situation even more intolerable was the fact that some 700 of the refugees possessed U.S. immigration quota numbers that would have seen them eligible for entry to the United States at some point within the next three years.

Denied entry to Cuba, and with no other alternative but to leave, the ship turned toward the Florida coast, in the desperate hope that the refugees might perhaps negotiate with the American authorities for an earlier entry.

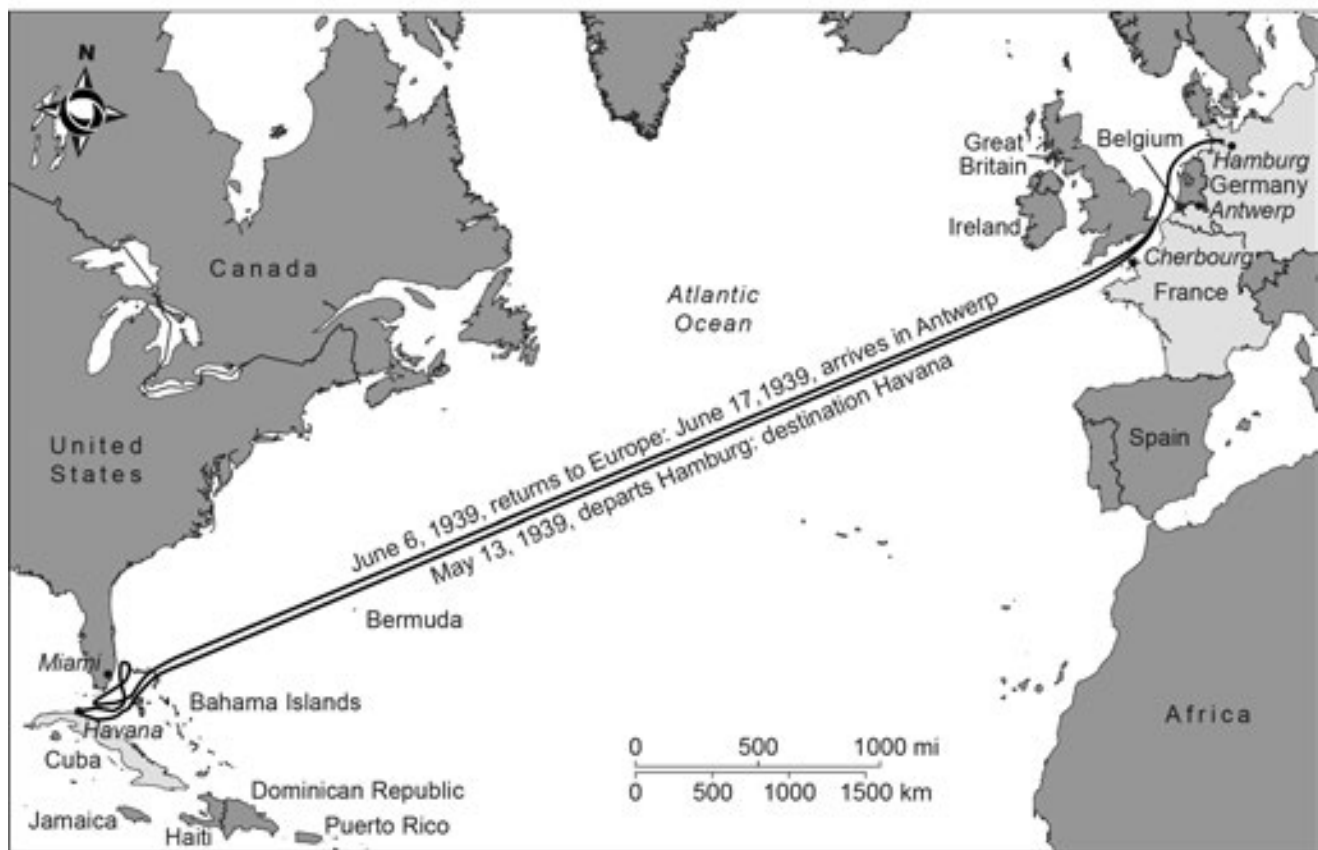

The government of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, however, was adamant: no early admissions, no landing of refugees, and no docking of the St. Louis. Some accounts refer to vessels from the U.S. Coast Guard having been ordered to intercept the ship so as to ensure that it would not enter U.S. territorial waters. In reality, however, the Coast Guard had actually been sent following a request of Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau Jr. Far from seeking to deny the St. Louis entry, he was concerned for the passengers' welfare and wanted the ship followed in case a change in government policy would allow it to land. He was practically alone, however, as the government was not about to retreat from its stated position.

American Jewish organizations, such as the Joint Distribution Committee, then worked feverishly on the refugees' behalf. Knowing that the U.S. option was unlikely to be successful, pleas were made to secure admission to any Western Hemisphere country. Again, none of these amounted to anything.

With little other alternative available, and with both food stocks and patience dwindling, the ship turned around; first, it left American waters and returned to Cuba, and then, a few days later, the captain, following orders from the ship's German owners, made the decision to return to Europe. Captain Schroeder devised a plan to run the St. Louis close to the Sussex coast of England and set the ship on fire, allowing the passengers to escape ashore. While this scenario did not play out, in the meantime negotiators from the American Joint Distribution Committee worked around the clock to make arrangements for the passengers to enter Belgium, Holland, France, and Britain. On Tuesday, June 13, 1939, the world learned that the refugees would not be returning to Germany.

The St. Louis docked at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 17, 1939. After further negotiations involving the Joint Distribution Committee, most of the Jews on board were accepted for temporary refuge by a number of countries including Britain (228 refugees), Belgium (214), France (224), and the Netherlands (181).

Of those admitted into Britain, all but one survived World War II—a victim of a German air raid in 1940. After the Nazis ran all over Western Europe, however, many of the others did not share the fate of those who went to the United Kingdom. Nearly 90 managed to reemigrate before the German invasion of Western Europe in May 1940, but some 532 St. Louis passengers were trapped when Germany conquered Western Europe. Among the 254 who were murdered subsequently, 84 had been granted refuge in Belgium, 84 in Holland, and 86 in France.

Their heartbreaking fate was to become victims of the Holocaust—a fate they could have escaped had their initial visas been accepted and the gates of the refuge they had sought not been barred.

The story of the St. Louis has become symbolic of the failure of the countries of the Americas to assist the Jews of Nazi Germany in their hour of need, a symbol brought into even starker relief by the legitimacy of the documentation the refugees possessed. The definitive study of their nightmare, written by Gordon Thomas and Max Morgan Witts in 1974, was titled Voyage of the Damned. In light of subsequent events, it might be said that no truer statement, embedded within a book title, could have been made.

SS-Totenkopfverbände

Specially trained SS personnel whose primary job was to provide administrative and guard duties for Nazi German concentration camps. The term SS-Totenkopfverbände (SS-TV) can be translated as “Death’s Head Squad.” By early 1934, the head of the SS, Heinrich Himmler, had gained control over Germany’s nascent system of concentration camps and created an Inspectorate of Concentration Camps under Theodor Eicke as chief inspector. Eicke already had charge over the camp at Dachau, which would serve as a model for all subsequent camps. In April 1934 he established the SS-TV. All SS-TV personnel were highly trained and were thus well placed to maintain day-to-day operations in the camps including discipline, which, as time progressed, became more and more brutal for those incarcerated. In 1937 there were just four concentration camps in Germany; that number increased dramatically as Germany established many other camps within its borders as well as in those areas occupied by German troops after the war began in 1939. In 1939 the SS-TV had some 24,000 personnel, a number that had nearly doubled to 40,000 by early 1945.

After 1938, concentration camps became important not only in terms of the Holocaust but also as a centerpiece of Germany’s forced labor system, particularly in occupied areas outside Germany. The SS-TV created a string of forced labor camps, which farmed out prisoners as slave labor to civilian contractors for a profit. In some instances, the SS-TV actually owned companies, using concentration camp prisoners as forced labor. Meanwhile, in 1939 a combat division of the SS-TV was formed, which later became part of the Nazi Party army, the Waffen-SS. The uniforms of the SS-TV, designed by Hugo Boss, were adorned with a menacing skull-and-crossbones patch, a grim reminder of its major role in the Holocaust.

Between 1939 and 1945 alone, it is estimated that the SS-TV was directly responsible for the murders of at least 2 million people. They included Jews, political dissidents, Roma, Jehovah’s Witnesses, homosexuals, alleged career criminals, and others. After the war ended in 1945, a number of SS-TV officers were tried for various war crimes and crimes against humanity.

St. Hedwig’s Cathedral

St. Hedwig’s Cathedral is the seat of the Catholic archbishop of Berlin. Modeled after the Pantheon in Rome, it was built between 1747 and 1773 as Prussia’s first Catholic church since the Protestant Reformation. In allowing it to be built, King Frederick II offered Catholic immigrants, especially those from Upper Silesia, a place of worship. The church was dedicated to the patron saint of Silesia, St. Hedwig of Andechs.

There was nothing specific in the cathedral’s history that would mark it as a place to stand out against the Nazis during the Third Reich, but the elevation of a new bishop in 1935, Konrad Graf von Preysing, provided a portent of how things might go, for, even prior to his move to Berlin, he was known to be an opponent of Nazism. Immediately after the Nazis came to power in January 1933, he became one of the most consistent senior Catholics opposing the government.

Born into an aristocratic Bavarian family on August 30, 1880, von Preysing became a law student at the University of Munich in 1898 before moving to the University of Würzburg in 1901. Choosing to become a priest, he was ordained in Munich on July 29, 1912. In 1913 he earned a doctorate in theology from the University of Innsbruck. In 1932 he was appointed personal secretary of the archbishop of Munich, Cardinal Franziskus von Bettinger. On July 6, 1935, he was named bishop of Berlin, and he argued that strong opposition should be mounted by the church against the Nazis.

On March 14, 1937, Pope Pius XI issued Mit Brennender Sorge, an encyclical reinforcing the inviolability of human rights and accusing the Nazi government of “systematic hostility” toward the church and what it stood for. Von Preysing was a member of the commission that prepared this strong anti-Nazi statement.

On August 24, 1938, he became one of the co-founders of the Welfare Office of the Berlin Diocese Office. Through this he made himself personally responsible for the care of Catholics of Jewish background as well as unbaptized Jews. In 1940 and 1941 he also protested the Nazi euthanasia program, in which those with mental and physical disabilities and incurable diseases were murdered by the state. He sent numerous letters to his priests urging them to protest similarly.

One of these was the rector of St. Hedwig's, Father Bernard Lichtenberg. In 1931 he had been appointed rector of St. Hedwig's, and even by this stage he had shown himself to be opposed to Nazism. In 1931 he underwrote an invitation to Catholics to watch a performance of the American antiwar film All Quiet on the Western Front (Lewis Milestone, 1930), which led to a personal attack on him by the Nazi newspaper Der Angriff.

Then, on March 31, 1933, Lichtenberg arranged for the Jewish banker Oskar Wassermann to meet with Adolf Cardinal Bertram, archbishop of Breslau and president of the German Episcopal Conference, in a vain attempt to convince Bertram to intervene in the antisemitic boycott of Jewish businesses planned by the government for the next day. Bertram, however, held that the matter lay outside the church's sphere of activity, and no action was taken. Lichtenberg had marked himself out as an opponent of Nazism who needed to be watched in the future.

In 1937, having already worked with Bishop von Preysing on Jewish matters, Lichtenberg was elected cathedral provost, a role that saw him thrust deeper into helping Berlin's Jewish community. In August 1938 he was put in charge of the Relief Office of the Berlin episcopate, assisting Catholics of Jewish descent desperate to emigrate from Nazi Germany. When the Kristallnacht pogrom took place on November 9–10, 1938, Lichtenberg prayed publicly for the Jews during services, proclaiming to his congregation: “The burning synagogue outside is also a house of God!” At the time of his protest, he was one of only a few Catholic prelates to do so. After the outbreak of war in September 1939, Lichtenberg continued his protests in another area, this time writing to the air raid authorities remonstrating against an order dated December 14, 1939, decreeing racial segregation in Berlin's air raid shelters.

Lichtenberg was warned repeatedly that he should be careful lest he be arrested, but he continued with his protests, even organizing demonstrations outside concentration camp. He was finally denounced by two female students who had heard him pray publicly for Jews and concentration camp inmates, and he was arrested by the Gestapo on October 23, 1941. Under interrogation he refused to retract his words, even going so far as to condemn Hitler's Mein Kampf as antithetical to Christianity. Under cross-examination he stated that no matter what his fate, he would not desist from expressing his beliefs or stop praying for the Jews. In May 1942 he was duly sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and when asked if he had anything to say upon sentencing, he asked that no harm should come to citizens who pray for the Jews.

Toward the end of his prison term he was given the opportunity to remain free provided he undertook to refrain from preaching for the duration of the war. The offer was conveyed to him by Bishop von Preysing on orders from the Gestapo. In response, Lichtenberg requested instead that he be allowed to accompany the deported Jews and Jewish Christians to the Łódź ghetto.

With little other alternative, it was ordered that he be sent to Dachau, where all anti-Nazi priests were imprisoned. On November 5, 1943, while in transit, he collapsed and died. The circumstances of his death were never made public. No one among the Nazi hierarchy regretted his death. Joseph Goebbels, who considered him a nuisance, was joined by SS Chief of Police Reinhard Heydrich, who referred to him as the “gutter priest from Berlin.”

Shortly after Lichtenberg's arrest in 1941, Bishop von Preysing appointed another anti-Nazi opponent, Margarete Sommer, to take his place. A teacher, in 1934 she was forced to resign after she refused to teach her students the Nazi laws regarding compulsory sterilization. She then worked at the Episcopal Diocesan Authority in Berlin, counseling “non-Aryan” Christians through Caritas Emergency Relief. In this way she was able to assist those forced to leave the Third Reich. In 1939 she became increasingly involved in the work of the relief agency of the Berlin Episcopate, founded in August 1938 at Bishop von Preysing's initiative.

After Lichtenberg's arrest she took immediate charge of operations and began coordinating Catholic aid for victims of racial persecution, providing them with food, clothing, and occasionally financial assistance. She also began to gather information regarding Nazi antisemitic measures from Catholic workers across Germany. She began to employ this material in a series of reports, one of which, in August 1942, was conveyed to the Vatican under the title “Report on the Exodus of the Jews.” Bishop von Preysing gave her his full support and endorsement throughout this time.

In 1943 Sommer and von Preysing drafted a statement for consideration by the German bishops, rebuking Hitler for human rights abuses and mass murder. It began, “With deepest sorrow—yes even with holy indignation—have we German bishops learned of the deportation of non-Aryans in a manner that is scornful of all human rights. It is our holy duty to defend the unalienable rights of all men guaranteed by natural law.” It was a very clear statement, which, if accepted and read publicly, would have left the Nazi regime in no doubt as to the official attitude of the Catholic Church in Germany. The statement was not, however, published.

A further dimension of Margarete Sommer’s efforts on behalf of Jews involved her employing her legal skills to challenge the Third Reich’s laws on mixed marriages. Again, Bishop von Preysing gave her his support, even though it did not stop the Nazis.

Throughout all this, Bishop von Preysing also worked with leading members of the German resistance, particularly Carl Goerdeler and Helmuth James von Moltke. One of his pastoral letters was even broadcast in German by the BBC in London. Finally, in 1944, he met with resistance leader Claus von Stauffenberg prior to the failed July Bomb Plot that attempted to assassinate Hitler. Von Preysing blessed von Stauffenberg and wished him well in his endeavor, though expressing misgivings as to whether killing Hitler would be permitted under church law.

In 1946 von Preysing was elevated to the position of cardinal by Pope Pius XII, a position he held until his death, in Berlin, on December 21, 1950. His remains, and those of Father Lichtenberg, rest in the crypt of St. Hedwig’s Cathedral. Lichtenberg was beatified as a Blessed Martyr by Pope John Paul II on June 23, 1996. After the war Margarete Sommer continued to work at the Episcopal diocesan authority in Berlin, assisting survivors looking to pick up the threads of their destroyed lives. She died in Berlin on June 30, 1965, and on May 5, 2003, was posthumously recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. On July 7, 2004, Bernhard Lichtenberg was similarly recognized.

Stangl, Franz

Franz Stangl was a Nazi extermination camp commandant. Born in Austria on March 26, 1908, his original profession was as a weaver. In 1931 he became a police officer and soon thereafter joined the then-illegal Austrian Nazi Party, but the German Anschluss with Austria provided him with opportunities denied him under domestic Austrian rule. By 1940 he had become the superintendent at Hartheim Castle, where he oversaw the mass murder of people with physical and psychological disabilities, under the auspices of the T-4, or “euthanasia,” program.

In 1942 Stangl was transferred to the new death camp at Sobibór as commandant. During his term there, between March and September 1942, Stangl’s approach to the mass annihilation of Jewish prisoners won him admiration in Berlin. As a consequence, he was moved on to another death camp, this time at Treblinka, where he served as its commandant from September 1942 through the camp’s closure in August 1943. While at Treblinka, Stangl was responsible for the system that would see the murder of most of Treblinka’s 870,000 Jewish victims.

After Germany’s defeat in 1945, Stangl went into hiding, was identified and interned in Austria, then escaped to Syria with the assistance of Nazi sympathizers in the Vatican such as Bishop Alois Hudal. In 1951 he was spirited into Brazil, where he lived until he was tracked down by Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal and extradited to Germany in 1967. In 1970, following a trial, Stangl was sentenced to life imprisonment. In prison, British journalist Gitta Sereny conducted some 70 hours of interviews with him, attempting to penetrate to the core of his consciousness vis-à-vis his role as a mass murderer. Her study of Stangl based on these (and other) interviews was published in 1974 as Into That Darkness: An Examination of Conscience. On June 28, 1971, the day after Sereny completed the last of her interviews with him, Stangl suffered a heart attack and died.

Throughout his trial, Stangl claimed that his conscience was clear; this he reaffirmed in his last interview with Sereny, adding that he “never intentionally hurt anyone. . . . But I was there [and] in reality I share the guilt.”

Stein, Edith

Germany's Edith Stein was a Jew whose study of philosophy and metaphysics led her on a religious odyssey from the Judaism of her family through atheism and eventually to an embrace of Catholicism. In 1933 she became a Catholic nun, but her association with the church did not spare her from persecution as a Jew in the Holocaust during World War II.

The Catholic Church has honored Stein not only for her religious struggles but also for her bravery in the face of death, canonizing her in October 1998.

Stein was born in Breslau, Germany (present-day Wrocław, Poland), on October 12, 1891. She was the youngest of seven children in a religiously observant Jewish family. Her father ran a lumberyard, and when he died suddenly in 1893, his wife, Auguste, was left to take over not only as head of the household but also head of the business. Auguste was a resourceful woman, however, and proved an extremely successful businessperson.

Stein herself proved equally resourceful, though more restless than her mother. At the age of six, she demanded to be admitted to school early. At 13, she made a permanent decision to reject Judaism and declared herself an atheist. In 1911 she entered the University of Breslau but quickly became disillusioned with the intellectual opportunities there.

Although Stein hated the idea of leaving her mother, her intellectual curiosity took her to Göttingen, where she studied with Edmund Husserl, a philosophy professor who was building a reputation for his innovative theories on human thought and experience. Stein struggled through her years as a student, often feeling overwhelmed and depressed. She interrupted her studies during World War I to work as a volunteer nurse. In 1916 she managed to finish her dissertation, graduated summa cum laude, and continued to work as an assistant to Husserl, who was now in Freiburg. He proved a difficult boss, giving her little credit for her work editing his manuscripts. Her own academic future remained highly uncertain since most universities remained adamantly opposed to hiring a female philosophy professor.

In 1921 an entirely different path opened for Stein. After reading the autobiography of St. Teresa of Ávila, she was so affected that she not only rejected atheism but converted to Catholicism. On January 1, 1922, she was baptized in her new faith. Her mother refused to accept her conversion, and many of her friends cut off contact with her altogether.

Stein gave up her position with Husserl and began teaching at a Dominican college in Speyer. During her tenure there, which lasted until 1932, she translated St. Thomas Aquinas's De veritate (On Truth). After leaving Speyer, Stein took a position at the German Institute for Scientific Pedagogy in Münster. She was forced to resign the post a year later as a result of antisemitic laws passed by the new Nazi government. Alarmed by Nazi activity, Stein wrote to Pope Pius XI asking him to condemn Nazi antisemitism. Her letter went unanswered.

In October 1933 Stein entered the Carmelite convent at Cologne, where she was given the religious name of Teresa Blessed by the Cross. Although now a nun, she continued to pursue her scholarship. While in Cologne she completed a metaphysical work, Finite and Eternal Being, which was an effort to reconcile the philosophies of Aquinas and her former mentor, Husserl.

In 1938 Stein's life in Cologne was disrupted by the growing threat of Nazi persecution of all Jews. For her protection, Stein was transferred to the Carmelite convent at Echt, in the Netherlands. As she was forced to flee, she expressed concern for the plight of her family, but she looked to her religious training, both old and new, for consolation. On October 31, 1938, she wrote of her religious exile: "I keep having to think of Queen Esther who was taken from among her people precisely so that she might represent them before the king. I am a very poor and powerless little Esther, but the King who chose me is infinitely great and merciful. That is such a great comfort." Stein hoped that her conversion to Catholicism might now serve her in aiding her fellow Jews.

Stein's move to the Dutch convent secured her safety for only a short period of time. On May 10, 1940, Nazi Germany invaded the Netherlands. In 1942, to punish the Catholic community for criticism of the Nazi regime by the Dutch bishop, Catholics of Jewish background began being deported to Auschwitz. Stein and her sister Rosa, also a convert living in the Echt convent, were among those sent to the death camp. Both women were gassed at Auschwitz on August 9, 1942.

Edith Stein has proved as controversial to the religious community in death as she did to her friends and family in life. The Catholic Church chose to honor her as a martyr for her faith. On May 1, 1987, Pope John Paul II beatified her, but efforts to declare her a saint created dissent among Jewish leaders, who pointed out that she was sent to her death not for her Catholic faith but for her Jewish background (as the Nazis would have contended, for her Jewish "race"). The Catholic Church, however, has remained committed to its veneration of Stein, officially canonizing her in a ceremony held on October 11, 1998.

Sterilization

Sterilization, in the context of the Holocaust, is defined as meaning the prevention of reproductive capacities of individuals by medical surgeries, and of groups by social segregation. Surgically, it renders a person physically incapable of producing offspring. Within the terminology of genocide, sterilization is the surgical destruction of reproductive organs, as well as the segregation of intended victim groups into intentionally destructive living conditions.

As Richard Evans has stated, sterilization, in the forms of surgical interventions and ghettoized segregation, initiated the genocidal Nazi social order and murderous Holocaust policies. Legally, Article II of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide permits compulsory sterilization of members of a group to be classified as genocide.

Initially during the Holocaust, surgeries prevented births. Later, victim groups suffered intentionally destructive living conditions in camps and ghettos.

Theories, and later practices, of rendering a society sterile of unwanted subsections originated with 19th-century social Darwinist segregation. In 1895 Alfred Ploetz began the German Rassenhygiene (racial hygiene) movement. Ploetz viewed modern medicine as counterselective to the observed natural order of stronger organisms dominating their physically weaker neighbors. For privileged Europeans struggling with the demands of emerging interdependent societies, the state had inadvertently developed policies of racial degeneration. Social Darwinists called for artificial selections within their communities. Ploetz suggested withdrawing medical care for people he termed “the weak.” This model became active during the Holocaust when segregated ghettoization included the removal of state support deliberately to hasten the destruction of groups collectively termed Untermenschen (“subhumans”). Targets included Jews, Slavs, and those with physical or psychological disabilities.

Several barriers to overt Nazi destructive social engineering were initially lowered in Britain and the United States. Efforts to control breeding, including surgical sterilization, grew in popularity prior to the Third Reich. In 1883 the eugenics ideology of Sir Frances Galton hoped to increase the reproduction rates of Britain’s educated classes. Galton united British and German social Darwinists in his honorary roles as president of both the Eugenics Education Society and the Society for Race Hygiene. Reacting to the increasing proportion of uneducated children and adults, eugenicists adapted their positive hopes to grow wealthier families into preventive attempts to limit further additions of poorer Britons and Americans.

Journalist Edwin Black has expertly traced the influential American eugenics movement. His work from 2003, War against the Weak, demonstrably highlights the links between Aryan and Nordic racism and genocide as committed by American and German forced surgical sterilization programs.

Unable to contrive legally sanctioned surgeries in the United Kingdom, informal segregation within inner-city slums attempted to maintain some limitations upon industrialized laborers. In 1907 the United States implemented surgical sterilization as a practice of preventative eugenics. It is important to recognize pre-Nazi events in the development of genocidal sterilization. Democracies, not dictatorships, eroded moral limitations by empowering eugenicists to experiment and enact social Darwinist theories. Failed positive and preventive breeding measures to regenerate imagined degenerate Western societies incited negative eugenics, the intentional destruction of perceived inferiors as occurred in Nazi-occupied Europe.

The application of sterilization during the Holocaust owed much to Ploetz’s generation. The theoretical development of Lebensunwertes Leben (“life unworthy of life”) directly influenced destructive Nazi practices. In April 1933, too elderly to maintain his ideological ambition toward a racially sterilized Germany, Ploetz wrote to Reich Chancellor Adolf Hitler to endorse the new leader’s eugenic policies. In July 1933 the Law for the Prevention of Genetically Diseased Offspring ushered in the social Darwinist mission of the National Socialist regime. Nazis adapted American eugenic statutes that targeted people deemed by law to be feeble-minded, mentally and physically impaired, blind, deaf, and alcoholic. In Germany, compulsory reproductive destruction impacted as many as 400,000 surgical victims. In addition to surgically sterilizing perceived inferiors, Nazi segregation attempted to legally prevent births between Jews and “Aryan” Germans. The 1935 Nuremberg race laws redefined Jews as “subhumans,” a socially unacceptable group for procreating German citizens. Social sterilization, as legal segregation, set the precedent for deliberately destructive ghettoization of groups defined as subhumans during the Holocaust.

Streicher, Julius

Julius Streicher was a German politician and rabid antisemitic Nazi propagandist, born in Fleinhausen (Bavaria) on February 12, 1885. Choosing to become a schoolteacher, in 1909 he took an administrative post at a secondary school in Nuremberg. He saw military service during World War I, and in the immediate aftermath of that conflict he became involved in radical, right-wing politics. Shortly thereafter he founded the Nuremberg chapter of the German Socialist Party, an entity that was in fact not socialist at all but rather fiercely antisemitic, anti-Catholic, and intensely nationalistic. Streicher helped merge the party with the incipient National Socialist German Workers' Party (Nazi Party) in 1922, making him one of Adolf Hitler's oldest political associates.

Julius Streicher was one of the most notorious antisemites in history, whose newspaper, Der Stürmer, became one of the core texts employed by the Nazis in their propaganda against Germany's Jews. It reached a peak circulation of 600,000 in 1935. Appointed as Gauleiter (Nazi local governor) of the Bavarian region of Franconia (embracing Nuremberg), Streicher became isolated when war came in 1939, largely owing to his excesses in office. One of his leading opponents was Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring. After the war, Streicher stood trial at the International Military Tribunal, was convicted of crimes against humanity, and executed. A year later, in 1923, Streicher began publishing Der Stürmer (The Attacker), a reactionary antisemitic newspaper that served as a useful tool for Nazi propaganda and which reinforced the party's bizarre racial policies. As the founder, editor, owner, writer, and publisher of this weekly Nazi Party newspaper, he excelled in producing graphically violent, obscene, and pornographic stories about "Jewish perfidy."

After participating in Adolf Hitler's abortive Beer Hall Putsch later that same year, Streicher was fired from his teaching position. Thereafter, he concentrated on his newspaper, which grew substantially in readership, and engaged in illicit right-wing political activities. From 1924 until 1932 he also held a seat in the Bavarian assembly. After Hitler was released from jail, he named Streicher head of the Nazi Party's Franconia District, which included Streicher's hometown of Nuremberg.

After Hitler and the Nazis came to power in 1933, Streicher organized the April 1 boycott of Jewish-owned businesses in Germany. In 1935 he helped formulate the infamous Nuremberg Laws, which formed the basis of German racial policies and, later, of the Holocaust. Meanwhile, Streicher's newspaper and other publishing ventures had reached the pinnacle of success, and he continued to enjoy Hitler's confidence. Nevertheless, Streicher was viewed by many Nazi leaders as a loose cannon; he was vain, mercurial, and greedy. His political downfall came in 1939, when he was foolish enough to publicly castigate Reich Marshal Herman Göring. This episode resulted in his effective internal banishment from the inner echelons of the Nazi Party. He was forbidden to issue any public statements and, by 1940, had been stripped of his rank and other offices. Der Stürmer continued on, however, until early 1945.

In May 1945, after Germany was defeated, Allied troops took Streicher into custody and charged him with crimes against humanity. He was convicted by the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg and sentenced to death on October 1, 1946. Julius Streicher was hanged on October 16, 1946, in Nuremberg. His last words were reported as "Heil Hitler" and "Purimfest," an allusion to the Book of Esther in the Hebrew Bible in which the enemy of the Jews, the prime minister of Persia, Haman, was also hanged on the gallows.

Strobos, Tina

Tina Strobos was a Dutch medical student in Amsterdam who, with her mother, helped save more than 100 Jews from the Nazis during World War II by giving them refuge on the upper floor of her Amsterdam home.

Born Tineke Buchter in Amsterdam on May 19, 1920, Tina was an only child. She came from an activist family: her mother, who raised Tina after her divorce, was a socialist (and atheist) who had housed refugees during World War I; her grandmother (whom Tina was later to describe as “the only person I know who scared the Gestapo”), had been involved with the Dutch labor movement in the latter part of the 19th century.

When Germany invaded the Netherlands on May 10, 1940, Tina was almost 20, a university student working toward a degree in medicine. When she and her classmates refused to sign an oath of loyalty to Adolf Hitler, the medical school was forced to close down; many students, including Tina, then joined the underground movement.

At first, this involved assisting those fighting in the resistance. Tina smuggled guns, explosives, and radios by hiding them in the basket of her bicycle as she rode around the countryside. Then, however, as the nature of resistance became transformed into acts of sabotage and targeted assassinations, Tina’s acts themselves changed. Instead of engaging in or assisting with acts of physical violence, she found another outlet for her opposition to the Nazis: helping Jews.

Fluent in German, she would ride her bicycle relatively unmolested while at the same time carrying ration stamps to Jews hiding on farms. She created false identity papers in a variety of ways: sometimes she would steal legitimate documents from guests at her mother’s boarding house; sometimes she would arrange for pickpockets at train stations to “lift” documents from travelers; on one occasion, when attending a family funeral, she even searched through mourners’ coats looking for documents.

Her early motivation might have been found in the need to save her Jewish fiancé, Abraham Pais, who later became a celebrated physicist serving as an assistant to Niels Bohr and working with Albert Einstein at Princeton University. Tina arranged hiding places for Pais and other Jews in Amsterdam. When the Germans began forcing the Dutch Jews into a ghetto, Tina found a place for his sister Annie and her husband Hermann to hide; sadly, they did not take up the opportunity, and Annie was later murdered at Sobibór. Tina also found a refuge for Pais’s parents on a farm outside Amsterdam, from where they were able to survive the war.

Her relationship with Pais notwithstanding—and their marriage ultimately did not take place—Tina’s efforts did not stop there. In what became a conspiracy of goodness, she and her mother, Marie Schotte, helped shelter more than 100 Jewish refugees, in small groups, for short periods. The upper floors and attic of their three-story boarding house, located at 282 Nieuwezijds Voorburgwal (just behind the royal palace, in the center of Amsterdam), saw the creation of a secret compartment that could hold up to four people behind a hard-to-spot door in the attic. While the refugees were in this sanctuary, Tina, her mother, and her grandmother provided them with food and medical care. Through her contacts in the resistance, as well as through her own earlier experiences, Tina was able to provide false passports that would assist the Jews in the next step of their journey to safety.

The house was just a few blocks away from another safe house located at 263 Prinsengracht. This was where Miep Gies and others were hiding the family of Anne Frank, a young German-born diarist who hid with her family at the same time as Tina Strobos was rescuing other Jews.

The work Tina was doing was not without risks, of course. Her grandmother had a radio transmitter hidden in the house, which was used to pass messages from the underground to the Dutch military authorities in London, and discovery could have exposed the house at any moment. Indeed, the house was searched by the Gestapo, Dutch police, and Dutch Nazis on at least eight occasions, and Tina herself was arrested and questioned by the Gestapo nine times. On one of these, she was physically manhandled and left unconscious after she had been thrown against a wall.

When asked later why she engaged in these hazardous actions, she said that in her view what she did was “just the right thing to do.” Another time, she admitted that “I never believed in God,” but, rather, always “believed in the sacredness of life.”

In 1946, with the end of the war and the liberation of the Netherlands, Tina resumed her medical studies at the University of Amsterdam. Earning her degree, she went on to further study in London under the direction of Anna Freud, the celebrated psychoanalyst and daughter of Sigmund Freud, the father of psychoanalysis.

In 1947 she married Robert Strobos, a neurologist, and together they had three children. They were later divorced, and Tina married Walter A. Chudson, an economist. In 1951 she migrated to the United States, where she became a U.S.

citizen and practiced psychiatry in New York until the age of 89. In 1989 Yad Vashem recognized Tina Strobos and her mother, Marie Schotte, as Righteous among the Nations, and in 2009, in further recognition of her efforts to save Jewish lives, Tina received a special award from the Holocaust and Human Rights Education Center of New York. On February 27, 2012, Tina Strobos died of cancer in Rye, New York, aged 91.

Stroop, Jürgen

Jürgen Stroop was an SS general during World War II. He was in command of Nazi troops during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and, in victory, wrote the Stroop Report, a book-length account of the operation.

He was born Josef Stroop on September 26, 1895, in Detmold, in the state of Lippe, Germany. His father, Konrad Stroop, was Lippe's chief of police; his mother, Katherine Stroop, was a devoutly religious woman, whom Jürgen alleged subjected him to childhood physical abuse. After an Jürgen Stroop was an SS general during World War II, notorious for having commanded the German troops that suppressed the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of 1943 with such ferocity. Reducing the ghetto by fire, block by block, he was responsible for a massive loss of Jewish lives as a result. After this he commanded SS forces in Greece, with brutality on a similar scale. Prosecuted by the Americans after the war, he was extradited to Poland where he was tried for crimes against humanity, convicted, and hanged. The photo here shows Stroop in command during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. (Photo12/UIG via Getty Images) elementary education, he was apprenticed with the land registry in Detmold. During World War I he served in several infantry regiments on the Western Front. Wounded in action in October 1914, he returned after eight months' sick leave and fought in Russian Poland, Lithuania, Belarus, Austrian Galicia, and Romania. He was awarded the Iron Cross 2nd Class on December 2, 1915.

After demobilization, Stroop returned to the land registry. He joined the National Socialist Party and SS in 1932, and in 1933 he was appointed leader of the state auxiliary police; later he worked for the SS in Münster and Hamburg.

In September 1938 Stroop was promoted to the rank of an SS colonel, initially serving in the Sudetenland. After Germany's invasion of Poland in September 1939, he commanded the SS section in Gnesen (Gniezno). He was then transferred to nearby Poznań (Posen) to head the so-called "self-defense" group of local ethnic Germans.

In May 1941 Stroop changed his name from Josef to Jürgen in honor of his dead infant son. From July 7 to September 15, 1941, Stroop served with the SS on the Eastern Front and received further military awards.

One day later, on September 16, 1942, he was promoted to SS general and posted as an inspector of the SiPo and SD of the Higher SS, and police leader for Russia. In this position he worked to help secure a key logistical route for German forces on the Eastern Front. From October 1942 Stroop commanded an SS garrison at Kherson, before becoming the SS and police leader (SSPF) for Lvov (Lviv) in February 1943.

Stroop is notorious for his role in the suppression of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. He was sent to Warsaw on April 17, 1943, by Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler to suppress the Jewish revolt. Stroop was put in charge of two Waffen-SS battalions, 100 infantry, units of local police, and local Security Police. It was the function of the latter to accompany SS units in groups of six or eight, as guides and experts in ghetto matters.

Stroop ordered the entire ghetto to be systematically burned down and blown up, building by building. With the exception of a few who made it into the Aryan side of Warsaw via the sewers, nearly all of the survivors, including men, women, and children were either killed on the spot or deported to extermination camps.

Stroop expressed bewilderment that the ghetto's Jewish combatants, whom he viewed as "subhumans," had fought so tenaciously against his men. After the uprising was suppressed, he ordered that Warsaw's Great Synagogue be blown up and destroyed as a symbol of Nazi victory and the total subjugation of the Jews. He then formally assumed the position of SS and police leader of Warsaw, and on June 18, 1943, was presented with the Iron Cross First Class for the Warsaw Ghetto "action."

Stroop created a detailed 75-page report with 69 pictures, along with communiques relevant to the suppression of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. The report covered the period April 24, 1943, to May 24, 1943. Bound in black leather and titled The Jewish Quarter of Warsaw Is No More!, the report was intended as a souvenir album for Heinrich Himmler.

Stroop was subsequently placed in charge of the SS and police in Greece on September 8, 1943. The local civilian administration found his methods and behavior unacceptable and withdrew cooperation, forbidding the local Order Police from having anything to do with him, which made his position untenable. Consequently, Stroop was removed and on November 9, 1943, was appointed commander of SS in Wiesbaden, Germany, serving there until the end of the war.

Stroop was involved in the purge of anti-Nazi Germans that followed the failure of the July 20, 1944, Bomb Plot against the life of Adolf Hitler. For his involvement, Stroop claimed to have offered Field Marshal Günther von Kluge a choice between suicide and a show trial before the notorious judge of the People's Court, Roland Freisler. Kluge demanded his day in court, and Stroop personally shot Kluge in the head. Himmler announced that the field marshal had committed suicide.

Between October 1944 and March 1945 nine men of the U.S. Army Air Corps were summarily executed after being shot down and captured in Stroop's district.

On May 10, 1945, carrying forged discharge papers, Stroop surrendered to the American forces in the village of Rottau, Bavaria. It was two months before he admitted to his actual identity on July 2, 1945. He was then prosecuted during the Dachau Trials. He pretended no knowledge of the killings of the American servicemen, despite the fact that as senior commander of the SS and police he would have given the orders for their execution. After an eight-week trial, Stroop was convicted on March 21, 1947, for the shooting of the American POWs and was sentenced to death by hanging. In November 1947, however, before the sentence was carried out, Stroop was extradited to Poland.

Stroop's trial in Poland began on July 18, 1951, at the Warsaw Criminal District Court. It lasted for just three days. Duly tried, he was convicted on July 23, 1951, and on the evening of March 6, 1952, was hanged at Mokotów Prison for crimes against humanity.

Struma Disaster

The Struma disaster refers to the sinking of a ship, the MV Struma, on February 24, 1942. The Struma had been responsible for taking several hundred Jewish refugees from Axis-allied Romania to the British Mandate of Palestine. The Struma was a small vessel with a detailed history encompassing a series of fluctuations in its use and many changes of name. It was built in 1867 as a British nobleman's luxury steam yacht and ended 75 years later as a Greek and Bulgarian diesel ship for carrying cattle on the Danube River. The Struma was launched as SS Struma, but successively carried the names Sölyst, Sea Maid, Kafireus, Esperos, Makedoniya, and finally Struma. It was only 148.4 feet (45 meters) long, 19.3 feet (6 meters) wide, and had a draught of 9.9 feet (3 meters). In spite of the Struma's small size, an estimated 781 Romanian refugees were packed into it.

On December 12, 1941, the Struma left Constanța, Romania, and ventured into the Black Sea. The waters off Constanța were mined for defense, so a Romanian vessel escorted the Struma clear of the minefield. The Struma's diesel engine failed numerous times before it arrived in Istanbul, Turkey, on December 15. The little ship remained there at anchor while British diplomats and Turkish officials discussed the fate of the passengers on board. Due to Arab and Zionist turbulence in their territory of Palestine, Britain had resolved to apply the full measure of the conditions imposed by the White Paper of 1939 in order to lessen Jewish migration to Palestine. Adopted by British prime minister Neville Chamberlain in response to the 1936–1939 Arab Revolt, the White Paper provided details for the establishment of a Jewish national home in an independent Palestinian state within 10 years, but it also limited Jewish immigration to Palestine to 75,000 for five years. While British officials implored the Turkish government to prevent the Struma from continuing its voyage, the Turkish government refused to allow its passengers to come ashore, and as a consequence, while awaiting Turkish and British officials to come to an agreement in Istanbul, the Struma ran short of supplies.

After weeks of intense discussion, the British decided to accept the expired Palestinian visas held by a few of the Struma's passengers, who were then permitted to continue their journey to Palestine by land. On February 12, British officials approved that children between the ages 11 to 16 on the ship would be given Palestinian visas, but an argument erupted with the Turks regarding their transportation to Palestine. Britain refused to send a ship for the released children, while Turkey denied them permission to travel by land.

On February 23, 1942, with the ship's engine still unworkable and the desperate refugee passengers still aboard, Turkish authorities attempted to board the ship. They were met with resistance by the passengers. A larger group of about 80 police came and surrounded Struma with motorboats. After about half an hour of confrontation, Turkish officials were able to come aboard, detached the Struma's anchor, and hauled the ship from Istanbul through the Bosphorus waterway in northwestern Turkey, and out to the coast.

On the morning of February 24 there was an enormous explosion, and the Struma sank. Years later, it was discovered that it had been torpedoed by a Soviet submarine, which had also destroyed the Turkish vessel Çankaya the night before— notwithstanding the fact that the Soviet Union and Turkey were not at war, and that Turkey was actually a neutral in the wider conflict of World War II. The Soviet torpedo attack killed all 780 refugees and 10 crew members, making it the Black Sea's largest fully civilian naval disaster during World War II.

Some passengers aboard the Struma survived the sinking by hugging pieces of debris, but for hours no rescue came. All but one of the passengers died from drowning or hypothermia; only 19-year-old David Stoliar survived. He survived the blast and hung onto a floating piece of what remained of the ship's deck. Later, he was united with the ship's Bulgarian first officer. Stoliar later claimed that the first officer told him that he saw the torpedo before it sank the Struma. The officer eventually died overnight.

The Struma disaster, combined with the sinking of SS Patria 15 months earlier in 1940, carrying 1,800 Jewish refugees and killing 267 people, became a rallying point for Jewish underground movements in Palestine, particularly the Irgun and Lehi, and encouraged violent responses against the British presence in Palestine. It is generally recognized today that the neglect and abandonment of the Struma passengers was a major catastrophe that could have been avoided if the will to do so had existed.

Stuckart, Wilhelm

Wilhelm Stuckart was a Nazi Party lawyer who co-wrote the Nuremberg race laws in 1935 and coauthored a follow-up commentary on them in 1936. His notoriety also emanated from his attendance at the Wannsee Conference in January 1942, called to settle procedural, jurisdictional, and legal questions regarding the mass murder of Europe's Jews.

Stuckart was born on November 16, 1902, in Wiesbaden, Germany. The son of a railway employee, he had a Christian upbringing. In 1919 he joined the far right Freikorps to resist Allied occupation in the Rhineland, centering on the French in the Ruhr Valley. In 1922 he began his studies of law and political economy at the Ludwig Maximilian University of Munich, and at the Goethe University, Frankfurt am Main. He joined the Nazi Party in December 1922 and remained a member until the party was banned after the failed Beer Hall Putsch of 1923. To support his parents, Stuckart had to defer his studies temporarily, only completing his degree in 1928.

Passing the bar examination in 1930, Stuckart served as a district court judge. There he renewed his association with the Nazi Party and provided party comrades with legal counseling. As judges were prohibited from being politically active, Stuckart's mother joined the party on his behalf.

From 1932 to 1933 Stuckart was a member of the SA, working as their lawyer and legal secretary in Stettin. With the recommendation of SS chief Heinrich Himmler he joined the SS on December 16, 1933; eventually, by 1944, he had reached the rank of SS-Obergruppenführer.

Stuckart's quick rise in the German state administration was unusual for a person of modest background, and it would have been impossible without his long dedication to the National Socialist cause. Having been a party member since December 1922—that is, before the Beer Hall Putsch of 1923—he held the coveted Golden Party Badge.

On April 4, 1933, he became the mayor and state commissioner in Stettin, and he was also elected to the state parliament and the Prussian council of state. On May 15, 1933, he was appointed ministerial director of the Prussian Ministry of Education and the Arts, and on June 30, 1933, he was made a state secretary.

In 1934 Stuckart was intimately involved in the dubious acquisition, by the Prussian state under its prime minister, Hermann Göring, of the Guelph Treasure of Brunswick—a unique collection of early medieval religious precious metalwork, at that time in the hands of several German Jewish art dealers from Frankfurt, and one of the most important church treasuries to have survived from medieval Germany. Disagreements with his superior led Stuckart to leave the ministry and move to Darmstadt, where he worked for a few weeks as the president of the superior district court.

On March 7, 1935, he began serving in the Reich Ministry of Interior, with responsibility for constitutional law, citizenship, and racial laws. In this role, on September 13, 1935, he, together with Bernhard Lösener and Franz Albrecht Medicus, was given the task of co-writing the antisemitic Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honor and the Reich Citizenship Law. Together these are better known as the Nuremberg Laws, which enacted the legal basis of Nazi racial policy, removing Jewish participation in “Aryan” society. The laws deprived Jews of citizenship, prohibited Jewish households from having German maids under the age of 45, prohibited any non-Jewish German from marrying a Jew, and outlawed sexual relations between Jews and Germans. Drafted in two days, the laws were imposed by the Nazi-controlled Reichstag on September 15, 1935.

In 1936 Stuckart, as the chairman of the Reich Committee for the Protection of German Blood, co-authored (with Hans Globke) the Nazi government's official Commentary on German Racial Legislation in elaboration of the Reich Citizenship and Blood Protection Laws. The commentary explains the basis of these laws on the concept of Volksgemeinschaft (“People's Community”) to which every German was bound by common blood. The individual was not a member of society (a concept viewed by the Nazi legal theorists as a Marxist one), but a born member of the German Volk, through which he or she acquires rights. The interests of the Volk were to always override those of the individual. People born outside of the Volk were seen to possess no rights, and in fact to represent a danger to the purity of the people's community. As such, anti-miscegenation legislation was justified, even necessary.

On August 18, 1939, Stuckart signed a confidential decree regarding the “Reporting Obligations of Deformed Newborns,” which became the basis for the Nazi regime’s euthanasia of children.

In October 1939 Stuckart was given the task of investigating the comprehensive rationalization of the state administrative structure by decentralization and simplification. He proposed that the state and party should effectively be combined in an overarching concept of the Reich, and should cooperate at the highest levels of power so that ground-level friction between the institutions could be solved by referencing upward. The transformation of the state administration from a technical apparatus for the application of norms to a means of political leadership was the central idea in Stuckart’s model: the ideal Nazi civil servant was not to be a passive lawyer of the bygone “liberal constitutional state” but a “pioneer of culture, colonizer and political and economic creator.” The administrative structure of the Reichsgaue (district), where the party and state authorities were combined and the Gauleiter, or district head, fielded almost dictatorial powers over his domain, reflected Stuckart’s theorization.

In 1940, he participated in the preparatory measures designed to deprive Jews of their German citizenship, working out a proposal by 1941 for having Jews inside the German Reich wear distinguishing marks.

At the Wannsee conference on January 20, 1942, which discussed the imposition of the “Final Solution of the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage), Stuckart represented Wilhelm Frick, then interior minister. According to the edited conference minutes, Stuckart objected to the Nuremberg Laws being ignored by the SS in fulfilling the “Final Solution” and pointed out the bureaucratic problems of such a radical course of action, insisting that mandatory sterilization for persons of “mixed blood” (Mischlinge) instead of evacuation (extermination) would preserve the spirit of the Nuremberg laws.

However, Reinhard Heydrich, chairing the meeting, informed Stuckart that the decision to exterminate the Jews had been made by Adolf Hitler and that according to the Führerprinzip Hitler’s word was above all written law. Stuckart and several others at the conference recognized that Hitler did not give this order in writing.

Heydrich called a follow-up conference on March 6, 1942, which further discussed the problems of “mixed blood” individuals and mixed marriage couples. At this meeting, Stuckart argued that only first-degree Mischlinge (persons with two Jewish grandparents) should be sterilized by force, after which they should be allowed to remain in Germany and undergo a “natural extinction.” He was also concerned about causing distress to German spouses and children of interracial couples.

In May 1945 Stuckart served briefly as interior minister in Karl Dönitz’s “Flensburg Government,” the short-lived government of Nazi Germany during a period of three weeks following the suicide of Adolf Hitler on April 30. With the end of the war he was arrested and tried by the Allies in the Ministries Trial for his role in formulating and carrying out anti-Jewish laws. The court characterized him as an ardent Jew-hater, who pursued his antisemitic campaign from the safety of his ministerial office. Former co-worker Bernhard Lösener testified that Stuckart had been aware of the murder of the Jews even before the Wannsee Conference. The defense argued that his support for the forced sterilization of Mischlinge was in order to prevent or delay even more drastic measures. The court, unable to resolve the question, sentenced him in April 1949 to three years and 10 months’ imprisonment, which, because of his preceding detention, was counted as having been served.

In 1951 he was tried in a denazification court, classified as a “fellow traveler” (Mitläufer) of the Nazis. For this, in 1952 he was fined 500 Marks.

Stuckart was killed on November 15, 1953, near Hanover, West Germany in a car accident a day before his 51st birthday. Ever since, there has been speculation that the accident was set up by persons hunting down Nazi war criminals still at liberty.

The Sturmabteilung, or SA, was the first paramilitary wing of the Nazi Party. Known colloquially as the Brownshirts, the SA was important in the rise to power of Adolf Hitler. As a private party army, the SA saw itself as an extra-military force and evolved military titles for its members. A private bodyguard unit for Hitler, wearing black shirts, was formed from the SA; this became the Schutzstaffel, or SS. In 1934 Hitler purged the SA in order to centralize power in his own hands, and its role as an enforcing body for the party was effectively toppled. The movement remained an extant organization, however, until the end of World War II. (AP Photo) during their rise to power as a tool to intimidate opponents and protect their own meetings and rallies from attack. Later, after the Nazi takeover of power in 1933, the SA engaged in key episodes of violence to destroy such civic institutions as newspapers and unions that stood between the Nazis and the exercise of dictatorial power. It also played a crucial role in boycotting Jewish-owned businesses and intimidating and oppressing German Jews prior to World War II.

Nazi leader Adolf Hitler created the SA in 1921. The uniform he adopted for its members was a brown shirt and pants, and they were nicknamed the Brownshirts or Storm Troopers. The SA provided security at party meetings, protected Hitler, and went in force to the rallies of the communists and the German Social Democratic Party in order to heckle their speakers and break up their meetings.

Street fighting was one of the SA's most characteristic duties, and its members were a fierce and violent addition to the political landscape of Weimar Germany. Many of its members were veterans of World War I who had found it difficult to assimilate back into society. They found refuge in one of the hundreds of Freikorps, private paramilitary groups that proliferated in Germany to put down leftist revolts and uprisings during the period 1919–1920.

In January 1931 Ernst Roehm was appointed leader of the SA. A World War I veteran, Roehm was a prime example of a tough street fighter. He took the socialist aspects of the Nazi Party program more seriously than most Nazis, hoping to fashion the SA into a proletarian army and use it to overthrow the Weimar Republic. Roehm also wanted the SA to form the nucleus of the new German Army, which was limited to 100,000 men under the 1919 Treaty of Versailles. In 1932 the SA had perhaps 400,000 men; by the time Hitler was made chancellor of Germany in January 1933, it had about 2 million members.

Roehm's aspirations for the SA clashed with the political realities Hitler faced as the leader of Germany. The army generals feared Roehm as a rival and wanted Hitler to reduce both his influence and the size of the SA. Wealthy industrialists who had financed Hitler during the 1920s and 1930s also did not appreciate Roehm's emphasis on socialism and the need for a "second revolution." Roehm finally pushed Hitler too far, and in June 1934 Hitler reluctantly ordered the SS to arrest the leadership of the SA in what became known as the Night of the Long Knives. Roehm and his top officers were summarily executed.

Thereafter, the SA continued to exist, but it ceased to play a major political role in Nazi affairs. The organization was subsequently headed by Viktor Lutze, who now directed most of the SA's energy toward intimidating Germany's Jewish population. Indeed, the SA played a pivotal role in the nationwide pogrom against Jews on November 9–10, 1938, which is known as Kristallnacht, or Night of Broken Glass. That event witnessed the damaging or destruction of nearly 200 synagogues, more than 7,000 Jewish-owned stores, shops, and businesses, the desecration of Jewish cemeteries and private homes, and, according to Nazi figures, the deaths of at least 95 Jews (though the figure is almost certainly higher). As many as 30,000 Jewish men were arrested and sent to forced labor or concentrations camps. After 1939 the SA further diminished in membership and importance and was largely superseded by the SS. By then, many SA members were serving in the Wehrmacht (German Army).

After Lutze died in 1943, SA leadership fell to Wilhelm Schepmann, who presided over a rapidly shrinking organization. The SA's role was so diminished that it was not even declared a criminal organization by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg after the war.

Stutthof

Stutthof was a Nazi forced labor and concentration camp located in a sparsely populated area west of the town of Stutthof, some 22 miles east of Danzig (Gdansk), Poland.

The camp was established in September 1939, in the immediate aftermath of the German invasion of Poland on September 1. Initially, it served as a civilian prison camp and was administered by the Danzig police; in November 1941, it became a "labor education" camp, which was supervised by the Sicherheitspolizei (German Security Police, or SiPO). In January 1942 it became a fully fledged concentration camp. At that time, the SS provided guards for the facility, and these were joined by Ukrainian auxiliary personnel beginning in early 1943. The camp expanded exponentially between 1939 and 1944, eventually encompassing 105 subcamps throughout central and northern Poland. The two principal subcamps were Elbing and Thorn.

Nearly all the prisoners at Stutthof were compelled to work as forced laborers. Some worked in workshops on premises, while others worked in local agriculture, various privately owned industries, brickyards, or the German Equipment Works (DAW). Overwork and exhaustion were commonplace, and a sizable number of prisoners became sick or died as a result. The camp was greatly enlarged in 1943, as a new camp was built adjacent to the original facility. In 1944 a large aircraft manufacturing facility was built in nearby Stutthof, which caused the prisoner population to increase markedly.

At first, most of Stutthof's prisoners were non-Jewish civilian Poles. Later, as the Jewish population increased, many Jews from Białystok and Warsaw were housed there. Beginning in 1944, as Soviet troops pushed east, the Germans transferred a large number of Jews to Stutthof from concentration camps located in the Baltic States. It is estimated that Stutthof and its subcamps housed more than 100,000 prisoners in its six-year lifespan.

Conditions at Stutthof were grim. Food and adequate clothing were always in short supply, living conditions were squalid, and medical care was nonexistent. Typhus epidemics took a dreadful toll during the winters of 1942 and 1944. Guards routinely brutalized prisoners, and those who fell ill from disease or overwork were gassed in the on-site gas chamber. Others were given lethal injections.

As Allied forces began to press into the region, in January 1945 the Germans decided to evacuate Stutthof's prisoners. At least 50,000 prisoners, most of them Jews, were force marched out of the camp. Some 5,000 people were marched to the Baltic Sea, forced into the water, and mown down by machine-gun fire. Most of the others were marched into eastern Germany amid brutal cold and snow. Many died of exposure or were killed by guards. In April 1945 the rest of the prisoners were forced toward the sea, where hundreds were murdered. About 4,000 were sent to Germany by boat, and a sizable number drowned during the perilous voyage. At least 25,000 prisoners died during the evacuations alone, or one out of every two detainees. A total of 60,000 prisoners died between 1939 and 1945. When Soviet troops liberated the camp in May 1945, they found only about 100 prisoners, who had survived the camp's final liquidation by hiding in order to escape the brutal evacuations.

In the aftermath of the war, four Stutthof trials were held in Gdańsk against former guards and kapos, who were charged by the Polish government with crimes of war and crimes against humanity. The first trial was held against 30 former camp personnel between April 25, 1946, and May 31, 1946. All were found guilty, and 11 were sentenced to death, while the others were sentenced to a range of terms of imprisonment. The second trial, held between October 8 and 31, 1947, saw charges brought against 24 former Stutthof officials and guards. Found guilty, 10 received the death penalty. The third trial was held across the period November 5–10, 1947. Twenty were brought before a Polish Special Criminal Court; 19 were found guilty, and one was acquitted. The final trial, a short time later, was held from November 19 to November 29, 1947. Twenty-seven were tried, of whom all but one were found guilty.

Sugihara, Chiune

Chiune “Sempo” Sugihara was a Japanese diplomat who issued travel visas in direct defiance of his government’s wishes, enabling more than 6,000 Jewish refugees to escape

Chiune “Sempo” Sugihara, Japanese vice-consul in Kovno (Kaunas) during 1939 and 1940. He issued thousands of travel visas to Jews, enabling them to transit through the Soviet Union to temporary refuge in Japan. From here, they could move safely to more permanent havens. He was forced to leave his diplomatic career after the war, possibly because of his disobedience in contravening Japanese immigration regulations back in 1940. (The Asahi Shimbun via Getty Images) to safety from German-occupied Lithuania during World War II.

He was born on January 1, 1900, to Yoshimizu and Yatsu Sugihara in Yaotsu, Gifu Prefecture. He was one of six children, with a sister and four brothers. Yoshimizu raised his children under the strict code of ethics that characterized Japanese samurai tradition, but after finishing his secondary education with honors Chiune Sugihara defied his father’s wish that he enter the medical profession and instead enrolled at Waseda University in 1918 to study English literature. A year later he moved to a foreign language institute in Harbin, Manchuria, to study Russian, after first passing an overseas studies exam administered by Japan’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He graduated in 1924 and began a diplomatic career by accepting a clerical position at the Japanese consulate in Harbin. While there, he continued to study the Russian language and also acquired proficiency in German.

In 1932 Sugihara was promoted to deputy consul in the Japanese Foreign Ministry in Manchuria. In that capacity, he successfully negotiated the purchase of the Northern Manchurian Railroad, a vital component of Manchuria's economic infrastructure, from the Soviet Union. He also converted to Orthodox Christianity during that time. In 1934 he resigned his consular post in protest at Japan's treatment of the Chinese in occupied Manchuria following the Manchurian invasion. He returned to Tokyo the following year, where he married Yukiko Kikuchi.

Sugihara received a new assignment in 1937, when he was sent to work in the Japanese embassy in Helsinki as interpreter and secretary. He remained there for two years, after which, in March 1939, he was sent to Kovno (Kaunas), then the capital of Lithuania, to open a new embassy there as vice-consul.

When Germany invaded Poland in September 1939 thousands of Jewish refugees fled to Lithuania to escape Nazi atrocities. On June 15, 1940, the Soviet Union invaded and occupied Lithuania, and Soviet authorities would not allow Jews to emigrate from Soviet-occupied territory without special travel documents. Although Germany and the Soviet Union were not yet at war, Soviet antisemitism was strong and Nazi troops were very close to the border, prompting substantial numbers of Jews in Kovno to line up outside the Japanese embassy in hopes of securing transit visas to East Asia.

Soviet authorities then issued an order requiring that all foreign embassies vacate Lithuania by July 1940. Sugihara was able to negotiate a three-week extension, during which time he risked his career, and possibly his life, to issue more than 2,000 travel visas covering entire families, facilitating the escape of more than 6,000 Jewish refugees to Japanese territory. To make the situation of the refugees easier, the Dutch consul in Kovno, Jan Zwartendijk, was at the same time working to provide Jewish refugees with visas issued on his own initiative to the Dutch colony of Curaçao, which, he argued, did not possess any restrictive entry requirements. The advantage of this lay in the fact that the Japanese government demanded that anyone granted a visa for Japan should also have a visa to a third destination, which meant, in reality, that Japan was only allowing Jews short-term transit privileges.

Aware that the Jews were in grave danger of their lives if they remained, Sugihara started granting visas without further consultation. He knew that his actions contravened official Japanese policy but proceeded regardless. Throughout July and August 1940, with help from his wife Yukiko, he wrote out and signed thousands of visas by hand, barely pausing to eat or sleep. He handed out the last of these from the window of his train as it left Kovno station on September 1, 1940.

Many of the refugees he saved ended up in Shanghai, China, resulting in the growth of an already flourishing Jewish refugee community there. Despite the insistence of their German allies, the Japanese government proved to be unwilling to round up and murder Jews; in like manner, they did not follow through on their preliminary plans for mass deportation.

After the Kovno mission was closed, Sugihara was reassigned to Berlin and then Prague, where he served between March 1941 and late 1942. He then went to Königsberg and Bucharest, and remained in Romania through the end of World War II. His family's return to Japan was delayed, however, by a period of imprisonment in a Soviet internment camp, as Japan and the Soviet Union had been at war since August 9, 1945. Released in 1946, they traveled across the Soviet Union and returned to Japan. Sugihara was asked by the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to resign in 1947—some, including Yukiko Sugihara, asserting later that it was because of his disobedience in Kovno back in 1940.

In 1978 the government of Israel honored Sugihara for saving the lives of thousands of Jews during the Holocaust, and in 1985 he was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. By this time he was too ill to travel to Israel, so Yukiko Sugihara and her son went to Jerusalem to accept the honor on his behalf. Chiune Sugihara and his descendants were then awarded honorary Israeli citizenship.

On July 31, 1986, he died at his residence in Fujisawa at the age of 86, recognized around the world and in his home country as one of Japan's foremost humanitarians.

Survivor Testimony

Survivor testimonies play the most crucial role in forming our understanding of what life was like during the Holocaust. As first-hand narratives written by people who lived through the barbarities of the Nazi system, testimonial accounts are among our primary links to the SS state. As such, it can be argued that all accounts, regardless of their artistic quality or historical accuracy, must be considered and respected. There is merit in every survivor account, even those that at first glance would seem to be of little use to the historian.

The authors of survivor accounts come from all walks of life and from all corners of Europe. Their accounts were produced contemporaneously: from the perspective of a few months or after the reflection of many years. They offer a representative sample of the Holocaust experience and what the survivors wish to be understood about that experience.

There are a number of issues relating to the distinctive quality of survivor testimony that need to be considered, however. For a start, we must ask whether (and to what degree) we can utilize survivor accounts as accurate pieces of history. For many, this is far from a clear-cut issue; some scholars actually situate their discussions of survivor testimony in the category of literature rather than memoir or autobiography, oblivious to the fact that literature is precisely what testimonial accounts are not.

Testimonies therefore need to be questioned if they are assessed as a reliable source. After all, most accounts were written after the fact, when the survivors were safely away from the Nazis and their experience was but a nightmarish memory. Moreover, such accounts were for the most part not recounted by accomplished writers. Further, more often than not they were written for publication, suggesting that a sifting process could have taken place in an author's mind or by an editor's hand, in which some elements of memory had to be sacrificed for the sake of publication while others were retained—and possibly even enhanced for the same reason.

Such considerations alert us to a type of memoir that needs to be read differently from other forms of historical documentation. Published survivor accounts are quite clearly subjectively true, in that they chronicle events either directly witnessed by their authors or told to them by others at the time of their ordeal. It is this truth, and these events, that survivors attempt to impart to their readers. Survivors aim to tell their stories in as clear a manner as possible, the better to be able to convey to their audience the essence of what they went through.

In a court of law, such evidence serves a different purpose from that of the historian. To those who would argue that the only standard of proof to be adopted by a scholar should be that found in a courtroom, it must be pointed out that the evidence a judge is looking for is altogether different from that of the historian. In a courtroom, the prosecution, defense, judge, and jury all look for specific evidence of a precise type—the kind of evidence that will either acquit or convict a person against whom a certain charge has been brought. The questions asked, therefore, are of a very special nature; generally speaking, they do not look for the textures, smells, sights, and contours of a person's experience, nor do they explore the wider contextual backdrop against which things occurred.

Given the event-laden historical richness within which the Holocaust took place, in which there was an enormous amount of activity occurring in many areas, it is perhaps surprising that all too often there are major gaps in the historical record, but it is through testimonies that we can appreciate the fears, miseries, and other features of life characterizing the Holocaust. Even one survivor account can place us in a better position to try to understand what people went through, and we therefore find ourselves relying on whatever we can find to begin the long process of comprehending what happened.

It is thus necessary to consider every piece of survivor testimony individually and to assess each on its merits. What historians make of these accounts must be up to them, and any scholar contemplating the study of the Holocaust is counseled to treat the subject with a combination of both rigor and respect. If all we have to go on as we attempt to reach an understanding of the Holocaust experience are the written accounts of survivors, it is important that we treat these accounts seriously.

Above all, we must be aware of just what it is the survivors are trying to convey. Generally speaking, they seek to convey a sense of what happened to them, as they remember it. Overall, however, the reflections and reminiscences of Holocaust survivors are intimate accounts of individual experiences that the survivors wish to share with others.

How representative are survivor accounts? When assessing a given situation, can the memoir of any single survivor be held up as exemplary of life and conditions in, say, Auschwitz, and as therefore representative of all other survivor accounts? Do their accounts tell the full—or only—story? Given that every survivor's experience was unique and intimate to themselves, we must look at the totality of their experience alongside those of as many of their fellows as we can find and ask broad questions that might be capable of being narrowed down later. Certain survivors might provide aspects of the picture that are neater, sharper, or more elegantly defined, but none can tell the whole story alone.

For most survivors, the experiences they depict have become embedded in their souls, and the descriptions they provide almost always recount an atmosphere that is true if not necessarily believable. Not all accounts were written by educated people; many lack self-control and grammatical discipline, but they are no less true for that. Some accounts provide dates, for example, which we know are incorrect, and in other cases even a full chronological sequence of events is dubious. But we need to bear in mind that the Holocaust was a time that was not always dictated by a calendar in the sense that we understand it. What is true of dates, moreover, is equally true of numbers, of Nazi institutions and ranks, and even of activities undertaken by Jews in different parts of the same country. It must be borne in mind that trying to make sense of the whole from ground level was invariably impossible. And all this, of course, was compounded by language differences. Usually, all a survivor could “know” was the reality of which he or she formed a part. The rest inevitably had to be filled in later.

Thus, survivor accounts do not ask us to try to “imagine” the Holocaust; for the most part, that is not what they are attempting to achieve. For many survivors—possibly most—it is sufficient simply to tell their story, to record, to bear witness, to show that the world through which they lived was in fact all too real. The challenge is one of conveying to the world an understanding of what the survivor went through, of explaining the essence of the evil that one group of people inflicted upon another group of people, as seen from the perspective of one who was there as a participant-observer-victim. Survivor testimonies do not attempt to make magic, nor do they attempt to imagine the unimaginable. They simply try to tell the story from their own individual perspectives.

Ultimately, a survivor’s testimony should be regarded as much as a historical document as a contemporary government memorandum, a diary entry, a letter, or a newspaper account. As with all documents, its applicability to a particular type of historical writing should be weighed prior to its use, and employed or rejected on that basis rather than according to some more subjective standard. All survivor testimony has its place. It is just a matter of finding where and how to use it.

Süskind, Walter

Walter Süskind was a German-born Jewish businessman of Dutch background. Born on October 29, 1906, in Ludenscheid, Germany, he became a manager for the German company Bolak in 1929. In 1935 he married Johanna (known as Hannah) Natt, and in March 1938 they, together with Johanna’s mother Fran Natt and Walter’s mother Frieda Süskind, moved to Amsterdam. With other family members already in the United States, the intention was to find a way to migrate there later.

After the German invasion of the Netherlands in May 1940, however, the family became trapped. In July 1942 the Nazi-imposed Amsterdam Jewish Council (Joodse Raad) appointed Süskind, as one with management experience, to manage the Hollandsche Schouwburg (Dutch Theater), which was renamed the Jüdische Schouwburg and utilized for the purpose of holding Dutch Jews who were apprehended prior to being sent to the transit camp at Westerbork. From there—though it was not widely known—they were deported regularly to their deaths at Sobibór and Auschwitz.

Right opposite the Dutch Theater was a nursery, where the Nazis preferred to place young Jewish children. Süskind, together with another member of the theater administration, Felix Halverstad, and the director of the nursery, Henriette Henriques Pimentel, established a means whereby Jewish children could be rescued. Children were brought secretly to the Hervormde Kweekschool (Reformed Teacher Training College), two houses from the theater, and, with the assistance of the college director, Johan van Hulst, passed through the garden and into the theater.

From within the Dutch Theater registry, Süskind and Halverstad then manipulated the records to show that these children were not registered; in this way, their names did not appear in any official capacity. They would sneak the children out from under the Nazis' gaze using a variety of ruses, whisking them off to safer locations out of the city. During the 18 months that Süskind was in charge of the Dutch Theater he was able to save the lives of some 600 Jewish children. In this he was helped by a number of different Dutch resistance groups.

Such rescue came at a price, however. In order to remain at his post he had to show himself to be an effective administrator of Nazi dictates, which meant organizing the deportation of thousands of Jews to the euphemistically named "East." Moreover, to achieve such effectiveness he was obliged to develop a relationship with the Nazi in charge of the deportations, Ferdinand aus der Funten, at that time a senior officer of Amsterdam's Central Office for Jewish Emigration. Süskind was therefore seen by many to be a Jewish collaborator, the more so as he used his position in order to secure the safety of his wife Johanna and their daughter, Yvonne.

During the entire operation, Süskind and those around him were never betrayed or discovered by the Nazis, even as he worked seemingly hand-in-hand with aus der Funten. Only a few people, moreover—those directly involved with the escapes—ever knew the details of Süskind's activities.

Süskind experienced considerable turmoil over his role, particularly the dilemma over the issue of saving his family or saving others. Every leader of every Jewish Council throughout Europe was confronted with one fundamental question: should the Nazis be met with opposition at every turn, or should one collaborate with them if by doing so it would be possible to save at least some lives? Does one become a traitor, or a hero? After his realization of what the Nazis were actually doing by sending transports to the East, he sought to thwart their deportation plans so far (at least) as the children were concerned.

On September 2, 1944, time and luck ran out for the Süskind family. They were sent to Westerbork, but, even there, Süskind attempted to find a way to help people escape. In this endeavor, however, he failed. From Westerbork, in October 1944, the family was deported to Theresienstadt. As this happened, a forged letter, purportedly from a high-ranking Nazi, was in Süskind's possession. It described how Süskind had been valuable to the Nazi administration in Amsterdam, and he hoped it could serve as some sort of guarantee for him and his family. He attempted to present it to the commandant of Theresienstadt, Karl Rahm, but a kapo got in the way and instead pushed him into a railcar headed for Auschwitz.

Johanna and Yvonne Süskind were murdered immediately upon arrival. The fate of Walter Süskind himself has been disputed. Most accounts argue that he was believed to have died on February 28, 1945, on a death march somewhere in Central Europe, but another version is that he was murdered by Dutch prisoners in Auschwitz who believed he was a collaborator.

In 2012 a Dutch film was made about the exploits of Walter Süskind. The eponymously titled Süskind, directed by Rudolf van den Berg, compares well, in several areas, to what is possibly the best-known of all Holocaust movies, Schindler's List (dir. Steven Spielberg, 1993). In fact, a number of parallels can be drawn between the two. One vitally important difference can be observed, however, apart from the obvious fact that Oskar Schindler was not Jewish, while Walter Süskind certainly was. Unlike Schindler's List, there is nothing remotely resembling a happy ending in Süskind. The heartbreaking end of the movie mirrors the tragic reality that was Walter Süskind's own story.

Sweden

Sweden is a Scandinavian country situated in northern Europe. Sweden's population in 1939 was approximately 6.5 million, with only a tiny minority of Jews, perhaps numbering only several hundred. The country had a long-standing tradition of neutrality and had remained aloof from World War I. When World War II began on September 1, 1939, the Swedish government immediately declared its neutrality, although the nation was tied to Germany economically. At the time, Sweden was supplying some 50% of Germany's iron-ore imports.

In the Winter War between Finland and the Soviet Union, Sweden provided moral support for the Finns, and at least 10,000 Swedes volunteered to fight on Finland's behalf; however, the Swedes were careful not to be drawn directly into the conflict themselves. When Germany invaded Norway and Denmark in the spring of 1940, the Swedish government augmented its defenses but insisted on retaining its neutrality.

Eventually, Sweden was cut off from much of the rest of the world and fell increasingly within the German orbit. To prevent a German invasion and occupation, the Swedes temporarily accommodated Berlin, including permission to employ Swedish rail lines to supply German troops in Norway. Germany also compelled Sweden to permit the passage through Sweden of a German army division in preparation for the June 1941 attack on the Soviet Union as part of Operation Barbarossa.

By the late summer of 1943, with German military fortunes flagging and under pressure from Allied nations, Sweden revoked its transit arrangements with the Germans. Thereafter, although it remained neutral, Sweden in fact generally worked with the Allies to bring an end to the war. It did not, however, insert any of its military forces into the fighting.

During the war, Sweden ended up becoming a significant refuge for Jews fleeing persecution and potential death in other areas of Europe. In fact, numerous Swedes, encouraged by their government, undertook a sizable number of rescue missions. In the fall of 1943 some 5,500 Danish Jews were spirited out of that country and sent on small boats to Sweden, where they took up residence until the end of the war. Many Swedes in fact supported and aided the Danish resistance movement. Beginning in the summer of 1941, at least 900 Jews from Norway took up temporary asylum in Sweden. Sweden also became a destination for Jews fleeing the war in the Baltic States.

In the late winter and spring of 1945, as the war in Europe was drawing to an end, the Swedish Red Cross, along with Danish officials, launched a major campaign to rescue prisoners being held in various European prisoner-of-war and concentration camps. The effort began as a way to rescue prisoners of war but was soon expanded to include civilians as well. After being rescued, most were transported to Sweden. The Swedish Red Cross reported that 15,345 prisoners were rescued, of whom half were Scandinavian and the rest from other parts of Europe. Only a minority of these individuals were Jews, but the effort helped Sweden overcome suspicions that it had accommodated the Nazis too generously in the early years of the war.

Arguably the most important Swedish contribution to the saving of Jewish lives during the Holocaust can be attributed to Swedish diplomats in foreign missions. In this regard, names such as Raoul Wallenberg, Per Anger, and Valdemar Langlet stand high in the annals of goodness in the face of the Nazi genocide.

Switzerland

Switzerland has had a history of being a neutral country since the 19th century and was a state under a position of armed neutrality during World War II. Switzerland also has a pattern of accepting refugees in times of war. Although taking thousands of Jewish refugees during World War II, its record is a mixed one—often bordering on exclusion of Jews while taking in refugees from other backgrounds.

Leading up to and during the war, Switzerland permitted 23,000 Jewish refugees to enter, but frequently this was only in order to transit to another destination. These refugees were safe from the war but were not given the same assistance that non-Jewish refugees were given. During the war the Swiss Aid Society for Jewish Refugees, a collaborative group of Swiss Jewish aid organizations, was established. In 1939, when war broke out after the German invasion of Poland, Switzerland immediately began to mobilize its troops.

Earlier, after Hitler and the Nazis had risen to power in 1933, thousands of Jews left Germany and tried to gain entry to Switzerland. When Germany annexed Austria in 1938, the number of refugees increased. However, the Swiss government divided these refugees into three groups: political refugees, who were granted immediate entry; Jews, who were granted entry for a short period of time, and only allowed to use Switzerland as a transit area to a final destination; and other refugees, who were rejected and removed as soon as possible. The Swiss government was able to talk the German government into stamping a “J” in Jewish passports, to further distinguish Jewish refugees from the non-Jews who were fleeing Germany. This was intended to enable the Swiss border authorities to be even more selective of those who crossed into the country.

In October 1939, only a month after the war had started, the Swiss government began to approve a series of laws that made it more difficult for immigrants, and particularly Jews, to enter the country. This was mostly because Switzerland, although remaining neutral, was nonetheless still dependent on Germany economically. After France surrendered to Germany in the summer of 1940, the Swiss government knew that a German invasion was a real possibility. In order to combat the genuine possibility of future German aggression, the Swiss government effectively closed the Swiss border to immigrants and delivered 20,000–25,000 fleeing Jewish refugees into German hands.

This action was because of direct fear of German invasion, and the Swiss government felt that turning these refugees back to the Germans was a means of tamping down any invasion prospects. The German army, however, had a plan to invade Switzerland, Operation Tannenbaum, as soon as France surrendered. The Nazis had their eye on the country due to part of its population being ethnically German, and therefore they wanted to bring them into the Reich. Additionally, Switzerland's Italian-speaking regions were desired by Benito Mussolini, Hitler's ally and Italy's fascist dictator.

Eventually, Operation Tannenbaum was cancelled and never carried out. A small Nazi support group within Switzerland tried to gain support for the country to be annexed by Germany as Austria had been, but this movement never took strong hold and was put down quickly. With a fear of invasion in 1940, the Swiss military, under the leadership of General Henri Guisan, was ready to defend Switzerland from the Germans. This fear, however, never came to fruition.

In 1941 the Swiss government was more accepting of Jewish refugees from Belgium and the Netherlands, and this saved thousands of lives. However, in 1942 the Swiss border police force was able to pass a regulation refusing travelers the defensive status of "refugee" on racial grounds, which meant that their Jewish background denied them the protections of a refugee. Most of those who made it through the border left Switzerland for another destination. Toward the end of the war, only 25,000 Jews had been granted refuge in Switzerland. From World War II's beginning to its completion, Switzerland took in approximately 300,000 refugees; of these, only 26,000 were Jews. It has been estimated that over 30,000 Jewish refugees were denied protection in Switzerland during the war, with at least 10,000—and perhaps many more—Jewish children among those who were refused entry.

Szálasi, Ferenc

Ferenc Szálasi, as the leader of the infamous pro-Nazi Arrow Cross Party and government, was responsible for the deaths of thousands of Jews during the last six months of the existence of the Jewish community in Hungary. Born on January 6, 1897, in Kassa, Hungary, Szálasi was brought up in a strict family with a very religious mother. Like his father, Szálasi pursued a military career and served as liaison with the General Staff during World War I. He was promoted to captain in 1924, appointed to the General Staff in 1925, and by 1933 was a major.

During his rise in the military ranks, Szálasi began developing his own political-ideological program for the restoration of the Hungarian state following its dramatic reduction in size due to the post-World War I Treaty of Trianon. He did this as a member of the secret Hungarian Life League—a "race-protecting" organization—that he joined in 1930. His first published work—the Plan for the Construction of the Hungarian State—reflected his sense that he had a messianic role to play in the resurgence of Hungary.

After resigning from the military in 1934, Szálasi established a number of ultra-nationalist, right-wing parties, including the Party of National Will (sometimes the "Nation's Will Party") in 1935, and the Hungarian National Socialist Party in 1937, both of which were banned by the government as being too extreme. The parties he founded drew most of their support from the lower classes, due, in part, to the centrality of nationalism, anticommunism, and antisemitism in their policy positions.

Szálasi founded the Arrow Cross Party (Nyilas in Hungarian) in 1939. It won 25% of the votes in the Hungarian Parliament that year, but it was banned by Hungarian regent Admiral Miklós Horthy when World War II broke out. It combined elements of Italian fascism and German National Socialism, but it differed from Nazism in its goal of creating a Greater Hungary (a goal contrary to Germany's vision of Nazi dominance throughout Europe) and in its approach to the Jews. Rather than focusing on extermination as the answer to the Jewish Question, the Arrow Cross Party looked more to emigration. That, however, soon changed.

Germany invaded Hungary in March 1944. In October, it removed Regent Horthy (in the so-called Nyilas coup), in part because of his reluctance to allow mass deportation of Jews. The Nazis installed the Arrow Cross Party as a puppet-government with Szálasi as “Leader of the Nation.” The Arrow Cross government then went on a six-month reign of terror.

With Szálasi at the head of the new government, deportations of Jews resumed after a pause that Horthy had earlier imposed. By this time, Adolf Eichmann had already supervised the deportation of about 440,000 Jews from Hungary, mostly to Auschwitz, leaving the Jews in Budapest as the last Jewish community extant in Hungary. There they were consigned to “yellow star” houses, making them very vulnerable to gangs of Arrow Cross members that roamed the city, randomly assaulting Jews with impunity, including killing hundreds of them after marching them to the banks of the Danube. In November 1944 a ghetto was established for about 70,000 of the city’s Jews. On Eichmann’s command, Szálasi ordered that approximately 25,000 Jewish men and 10,000 Jewish women be marched out of the city to build fortifications around Budapest. In addition, also beginning in November 1944, he ordered that about 80,000 Jews be forced to march toward the Austrian border.

Szálasi never had time to implement his ideology of “Hungarism”—his own mixture of fascism, Hungarian nationalism, and antisemitism—due to the surrender of Hungary to the Soviets on February 13, 1945, less than six months after Szálasi’s installation as head of government. During that short time, however, he and his Arrow Cross Party were responsible for the deaths of tens of thousands of Jews.

Szálasi fled Hungary but was captured and returned by American troops in May 1945. He was tried in a Hungarian court in Budapest, found guilty of war crimes and high treason, and was hanged on March 12, 1946.

Szenes, Hannah

Hannah Szenes was a Hungarian-born Jewish paratrooper trained in Palestine to rescue Jews during the Holocaust. She

Hannah Szenes was a Hungarian-born Zionist who migrated to Palestine during World War II. In 1943 she enlisted in the British Army in the Women’s Auxiliary Air Force and began training as a paratrooper for the British Special Operations Executive. She was one of 37 Jewish SOE agents who parachuted into Yugoslavia to assist in the rescue of Hungarian Jews about to be deported to Auschwitz. Arrested by Hungarian authorities almost as soon as she crossed the border, she was imprisoned and tortured before being tried for treason in October 1944. She was executed by a German firing squad on November 7, 1944. The photo here shows her in the garden of her home in Budapest in 1937. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, courtesy of Beit Hannah Senesh) was born into an assimilated family in Budapest on July 17, 1921. Her father, Béla Szenes, had been a well-known writer and playwright, but he died when Hannah was six years old, leaving her and her brother, György, to be raised by their mother, Katharine. Following her famous father, she demonstrated literary talent, keeping a diary from the age of 13 until shortly before her death.

As a student she attended a high school for Protestant girls that also accepted Catholics and Jews, and it was here that she first experienced antisemitism. As she grew older, she sought to learn more about what it meant to be Jewish; she adopted Zionism as her political lodestone and joined Maccabea, a Hungarian Zionist youth movement that helped to develop her skills in Hebrew and her love for Eretz Yisrael.

In 1939 Hannah finished school and made the decision to emigrate to what was then the British Mandate of Palestine. She studied first at the Girls' Agricultural School at Nahalal, and then, in 1941, settled at Kibbutz Sdot Yam, near Haifa. She continued the diary she had begun in Hungary, as well as writing poetry and even a play about kibbutz life. The work in which she was engaged included working in the communal kitchen and the kibbutz laundry.

In 1943 she joined the Palmach (the combat units of the Haganah) and was soon training for a special mission: a secret scheme that would see her join the British army and be parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe. She would assist Allied efforts behind the lines and make contact with resistance fighters in an attempt to offer aid to European Jewry. At first she studied wireless operation procedures, and in January 1944 she moved to Egypt to be trained as a paratrooper. She was one of a unit of 33 people of both sexes.

In mid-March 1944 they were dropped into Yugoslavia, where Hannah spent three months with Tito's partisans. Entering Hungary had to be put on hold for a time, as the parachute drop coincided directly with the German invasion of Hungary. Instead, Hannah worked with the partisans until the time was opportune to cross into Hungary.

On June 7, 1944, just as the deportation of the Hungarian Jews was at its most intense, Hannah decided to move into Hungary with the aim of reaching Budapest. It was an extremely dangerous time; in fact, her two partners on the mission, Yoel Palgi and Peretz Goldstein, both counseled against proceeding. In spite of their caution, she decided to go ahead alone. Within hours of crossing the border she was arrested by Hungarian gendarmes; finding her British military credentials and radio transmitter, they imprisoned and tortured her for the transmission code so they could track down all the other parachutists. She was tortured repeatedly for months but refused to divulge anything about her mission. When the authorities arrested her mother (who did not know Hannah had moved to Palestine or that she was back in Budapest on a secret military mission), she still would not speak.

Seeing themselves with little other option, the Hungarian fascist authorities tried her for treason and spying. The trial began on October 28, 1944, its outcome a foregone conclusion. Convicted as a spy, she was sentenced to death by a German (not Hungarian) firing squad on November 7, 1944. When facing her executioners she refused a blindfold. At the time of her death she was 23 years old.

In 1950 the remains of Hannah Szenes were taken to Israel and reburied in the military cemetery on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem. A tombstone was erected for her in November 2007 at her kibbutz in Sdot Yam, and with the end of the Cold War a Hungarian military court overturned the original decision and posthumously exonerated her.

Hannah's diary was published in Hebrew in 1946. Her poetry contains lines that have become iconic in Israeli literature, the best known of which is the poem "Halikha LeKesaraya" ("A Walk to Caesarea"), commonly known as "Eli, Eli" ("My God, My God"), set to music by David Zahavi and sung or played in most Jewish remembrance services to this day. Another of her poems, "Ashrei Hagafur" ("Blessed Is the Match"), equals it for recognition and has been quoted frequently since the Holocaust. Written after she was parachuted into Yugoslavia, the most crucial lines are:

Blessed is the match consumed in kindling flame.
Blessed is the flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart.

Hannah Szenes remains a national heroine in Israel, where she is representative of all that Israeli society seeks in terms of idealism and self-sacrifice in the face of adverse circumstances. As a resister, she was unable to achieve her objectives, but the symbolism of her actions was (and remains) immense.

Szeptycki, Andreas Alexander

Andreas Alexander Szeptycki was a Polish-born Ukrainian-Greek Catholic priest and prelate who served as the archbishop of Lvov (Lviv) in southeastern Poland from 1901 until 1944.

Szeptycki was born on July 29, 1865, in Przyłbice, Poland, into an aristocratic family with strong ties to the church. He studied in Kraków and Wrocław, earning a doctorate in law in 1888. He then entered a seminary in Domobryl, taking the name Andrew (Andreas); his given name had been Roman. He was ordained a deacon in August 1892 and became a priest in the Order of St. Basil that same year. In 1894 he earned a doctorate in theology from the Jesuit seminary at Kraków. A well-respected and learned clergyman, Szeptycki was named bishop of Ivano-Frankivsk (Stanisławów) in 1899. The following year he was appointed archbishop of Lvov and was confirmed in that position in 1901. He was to hold his place here for the remainder of his life.

In the early 1900s Szeptycki visited the United States and Canada, where he ministered to Ukrainian Greek Catholic enclaves. He spoke out against the outbreak of World War I in 1914 and was arrested and jailed by Russian authorities. Szeptycki had always been a proponent of religious ecumenism, and his interest in this went beyond Christian denominations. Indeed, he had studied Hebrew in the seminary and regularly visited Jewish communities, where he read and preached from the Torah.

On September 22, 1939, Soviet troops rushed into Lvov, which had been under Polish control, and occupied the city. Meanwhile, as German troops occupied western Poland, an influx of some 200,000 Polish Jews flooded into the city. The Soviets forced many of Lvov's Jews to liquidate their businesses and close their synagogues, part of a wider effort to "Ukrainize" the city. Archbishop Szeptycki publicly denounced Soviet policy, but his protestations had little impact on Soviet occupation authorities.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the Germans occupied Lvov and began to implement the Final Solution there. Jews were targeted, persecuted, rounded up, placed in a squalid ghetto, and many were deported to death camps. Szeptycki was outraged and deeply troubled by German policies toward Jews, and he took an early public stand in which he denounced anti-Jewish activities. He also instructed his clergy to report to him antisemitic activities and to preach against antisemitism. He even wrote and distributed a pastoral letter titled "Thou Shalt Not Kill," which was aimed at German occupation officials, and threatened to excommunicate anyone in his flock who collaborated with the Nazis. By 1943 the archbishop was sheltering 21 Jews in his home and cathedral and had facilitated the sheltering of as many as 200 other Jews in monasteries and convents under his control.

Archbishop Andreas Szeptycki was later hailed by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations, and in general his tenure in office brought much good to the archdiocese. He died in Lvov on November 4, 1944. He is considered the 20th century's most influential prelate in eastern Poland and Ukraine.

T

Taylor, Telford

An American lawyer best known for his role as the counsel for the prosecution at the Nuremberg Trials, Telford Taylor was born in Schenectady, New York, on February 24, 1908. After graduating from Harvard Law School in 1932, he held a series of legal jobs with the federal government. One of these would have a profound impact on his career. From 1939 to 1940 Taylor was a special assistant to U.S. attorney general Robert Jackson. During World War II he joined the U.S. Army as a major in 1942, rising to the rank of colonel by 1944. He worked in intelligence analyzing information obtained from the Ultra code. Near the end of the war, Justice Robert Jackson, now U.S. prosecutor for the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, had remembered Taylor's earlier work and personally requested him for his staff. Taylor acknowledged that he had no experience with international law in general or war crimes in particular, and he also believed that, despite the high-profile nature of the appointment, it would be detrimental to his legal career because he had planned to enter private practice after the war. Nevertheless, the excitement of the work involved convinced him to take the job. Although motivated largely by his own admittedly selfish reasons, he devoted himself wholeheartedly to bringing fair and impartial justice to those who had committed war crimes.

As the Allies gathered more information related to Nazi atrocities, it became clear that there was a need for more trials than those convened by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, which tried only the top-ranking Nazis. Taylor thus became the chief U.S. prosecutor for the 12 subsequent trials conducted under Control Council Law Number 10. In this regard, he helped prosecute judges, industrialists, doctors, and others, all in the same manner, adhering strictly to due process and the rules of evidence. He left Nuremberg still committed to law, but seeing a need for an international legal regime that would be applied fairly to all belligerents, not just those on the losing side of war.

Once discharged, Taylor briefly worked with the Small Defense Plants Administration. He then became a private attorney, about the same time that Republican senator Joseph McCarthy began his anticommunist witch hunt in 1950. Taylor was one of the few men who stood up to McCarthy from an early date, denouncing his actions in speech after speech and defending many of those McCarthy had accused of "un-American activities." His past experience trying Nazis was one of the reasons he opposed McCarthy so vehemently. Indeed, he viewed McCarthy's attempts to subvert the democratic process as the equivalent of the takeover of the German government by the Nazis in the early 1930s.

After taking on McCarthy, who fell from grace in 1954, Taylor turned to writing. In all he wrote nine books, most focusing on World War II and receiving critical acclaim. His 1992 book The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Biography told the story of his experiences as a war crimes prosecutor. Taylor never left the law completely, however, and served as a special observer to the 1961 Eichmann Trial in Jerusalem, which he denounced as a violation of the process of due process and fairness. He also worked to help free Jews imprisoned in the Soviet Union. Taylor died on May 23, 1998, in New York City.

Ten Boom, Corrie

Cornelia (Corrie) ten Boom was a Dutch rescuer of Jews during the Holocaust, proceeding from a firm Christian belief that demanded she help those in need. It is estimated that overall she and her family saved the lives of upward of 800 Jews.

She was born in Haarlem, near Amsterdam, on April 15, 1892, the youngest in a family of four children. She had two sisters, Betsie and Nollie, and a brother, Willem; their father, Casper, was a jeweler and watchmaker. Cornelia was named after her mother. Their home was always crowded, as Corrie's three maternal aunts also lived with her family. In 1924 Corrie, having learned at the feet of her father, became the first licensed female watchmaker in the Netherlands. As she became older, she established a youth club for teenage girls, ran a church for people with disabilities, raised foster children in her home, and engaged in other charitable works. After the Nazis invaded the Netherlands in May 1940, Corrie was forced to close down the girls' youth club.

The ten Booms were members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and Corrie came from a family tradition that had long championed Jewish causes. Already during the 19th century, Corrie's grandfather had supported efforts to improve Christian-Jewish relations, and her brother Willem, a Dutch Reformed minister assigned to convert Jews, studied antisemitism and ran a nursing home that, in the late 1930s, became a refuge for Jews fleeing Germany.

Within months of the German takeover, the social, political, and legal climate of the Netherlands had been transformed. It did not take long for the ten Booms to become involved in resistance activities, with various extended family members taking a number of different underground roles. Corrie became directly involved when she, her father, and her sister Betsie decided to hide Jews in the family home. She established contacts with members of the resistance, who assisted her through obtaining extra ration books and building a hiding place in the family home. This tiny secret room, built into Corrie's bedroom behind a false wall, became a refuge for Jews, students, and political dissidents. It could hold up to six people, standing, and was serviced by a rudimentary ventilation system.

The "hiding place," also known as "de Beje"—an abbreviation of their street address on the Barteljorisstraat, a shopping street in Haarlem—thus became a center of short-term rescue. From this start, Corrie became a leader in what became nicknamed the "Beje movement," in which a series of safe houses was established throughout the Netherlands.

On February 28, 1944, a Dutch informant betrayed the ten Booms and denounced them to the Nazis. That same day the Gestapo raided the house, and Corrie, her father, brother, sisters, together with other family members as well as some resistance fighters, were arrested. In total, the Gestapo arrested more than 30 people in the ten Boom family home. Although German soldiers searched the house thoroughly, they did not find the Jews who were at that moment concealed in the hiding place next to Corrie's room. They remained there for nearly three days, until the Nazis gave up their surveillance and Dutch resisters, who knew they were there, moved in and rescued them. By the end of the war, all but one survived.

The ten Booms were sent immediately to Scheveningen prison. Nollie and Willem, and Corrie's nephew, Peter, were released straight away, but Corrie, Betsie, and their 84-year-old father Casper remained incarcerated. Casper died 10 days later after having fallen ill. Corrie and Betsie stayed at Scheveningen until June 1944, when they were transferred to the concentration camp at Vught. In September 1944 they were deported to Ravensbrück, where Betsie died on December 16, 1944.

Corrie was released from Ravensbrück on December 28, 1944, in what was believed to have been a clerical error. She traveled by train to Berlin, where she arrived on January 1, 1945. From there she made her way back to the Netherlands.

After the war, Corrie set up a rehabilitation center for concentration camp survivors. In a Christian spirit of reconciliation, she also took in and sheltered those who had cooperated with the Germans during the occupation but who were now homeless and without the means of making a living. She returned to Germany in 1946 and began a worldwide ministry that led to her appearing in more than 60 countries. As an evangelist and motivational speaker she would refer to her experiences in Ravensbrück, and as a social critic she protested the Vietnam War. Her main message focused on reconciliation as a means for overcoming the psychological scars left by war. She also wrote a great deal, with many inspirational books appearing advocating a Christian message of love, goodwill, and human understanding through the embrace of Christ's message.

The main written work for which Corrie ten Boom was remembered was the story of her own family in their confrontation with Nazism during World War II. This was titled The Hiding Place; appearing in 1971, it became a best seller. In 1975 it was made into a motion picture with the same name, directed by James F. Collier and starring Jeannette Clift as Corrie and Julie Harris as Betsie.

In recognition of her work during the war, Corrie ten Boom was knighted in 1962 by Queen Juliana, and, on December 12, 1967, for her efforts in hiding Jews from arrest and deportation, she was recognized by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous among the Nations. In 1977 Corrie, by now 85 years of age, moved to the United States, where she settled in California. She died on April 15, 1983, her 91st birthday.

In resisting the Nazi persecution of the Jews, Corrie ten Boom suffered imprisonment, internment in a concentration camp, and the loss of family members. She followed both the letter and the spirit of her Christian beliefs, seeing that what had to be done was a duty that all those purporting to be true Christians should have fulfilled.

Teudt, Wilhelm

On February 2, 1934, the Nazis in Germany, in pursuing their ideal of a completely Jew-free society, began unveiling a new, "Aryan" version of the Bible. The first offering in this regard was a rewritten Book of Psalms that eliminated all references to Jews, "reworking" them in order to purge them of their "Jewish taint."

The new version appeared in a hymnbook written by an eccentric author named Wilhelm Teudt. Born in 1860, Teudt, who studied theology and worked as a pastor from 1885 to 1908, was an amateur archaeologist who spent much of his time searching for an ancient Germanic civilization. In 1921

he joined the German National People's Party, and in 1933, at the age of 73, he moved on to the National Socialists—the party that, on January 30 that year, had come into office under Adolf Hitler.

Teudt's new version of the Psalms numbered 75, rather than the original 150. As an example of his efforts, his version of the 87th Psalm read as follows:

The Lord loveth the height of Germany more than all the dwellings abroad.

The Lord loveth the yew tree of the Odenwald and the oak of the Baltic.

I will make mention of the vulgar Euphrates and the Ganges, where our forefathers ruled.

Behold the lands of the Goths, the Longobards, and Andalusians: it shall be said our brothers were born and died there;

But on Osning the Lord shall count those sprung from blood of the sons of Mannus: Ingo, Istu, and Ermin.

Osning is part of the Teutoberger Forest: Ingo, Istu, and Ermin were ancient Germanic gods.

This can be compared with the original, which states:

His foundation is in the holy mountains.

The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God.

Selah.

I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia; this man was born there.

And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man was born in her: and the highest himself shall establish her.

The Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there. Selah.

As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee.

Teudt maintained in the foreword to his book that Jesus was of pure Aryan blood and that "His whole spirituality" was "foreign to Jews." He could not delete the whole of the Old Testament from Christian scripture, but he stated, instead, that many features of it were obnoxious and had to be pruned.

American readers knew of Teudt's removal of all references to Jews as he worked through the Old Testament. They read about it in the pages of their newspapers and discussed the issue in their churches. Of course, as with most things the Nazis began, Teudt's initiative did not stop there. Hitler's ultimate intention was gradually to "Nazify" the church, beginning with the scriptural underpinnings upon which it rested. In 1939 he authorized the creation of what we would today call a think-tank in order to rewrite the Bible completely; its charge was to remove all references to Jews and Judeo-Christian notions of compassion. Those appointed to work on this thoroughly Nazi version of the Bible had the brief of "cleansing" church texts "of all non-Aryan influences."

In addition to his work redrafting the Psalms, Teudt's beliefs in German völkisch culture led him to develop theories that, even among his peer group, were considered outlandish. Believing in an ancient, highly developed Germanic civilization, Teudt's interest in what he called "Germanic archaeology," through an investigation of Germanic pagan sacred sites, developed in the 1920s. He held that he possessed a paranormal ability to picking up the vibrations of his Germanic ancestors, which provided him with the capacity to visualize ancient sites as he was excavating them.

Studying ancient Saxon shrines, his work attracted the interest of senior Nazis, who were obsessed with locating the spiritual elements of Aryanism. Developing an ever deeper fascination with Saxon culture as the seedbed of all that Germanic culture would become, he viewed the conversion of the Germanic tribes to Christianity before the turn of the first millennium as the greatest catastrophe ever faced by Aryan civilization.

After Teudt joined the Nazi Party, he was rewarded by Adolf Hitler through appointment to a professorial position. He founded or became a member of a number of esoteric research organizations, and his work was valued by the Nazis through the awarding of prizes and various honors. Wilhelm Teudt died on January 5, 1942, in the city of Detmold, Lippe.

such shattering force as to call into question society's basic understanding of humanity. Among the many questions it raised are those that examine Jewish and Christian theology in a post-Holocaust world. Of all of those theological questions, none is more basic for Christians and Jews than "where was God?" Also, for Jews it was "how could it happen to us?" and for Christians "how could we have done it?"

Although theologians wrestled with these questions even while the Holocaust was still in progress, it was not until the 1960s that they were examined and debated in a public and robust way. In August 1966 Richard L. Rubenstein, a conservative rabbi born in 1924 in New York, wrote in his book After Auschwitz: Radical Theology and Contemporary Judaism (since retitled: After Auschwitz: History, Theology, and Contemporary Judaism) that it was impossible to believe in the traditional Jewish concept of God after Auschwitz. That concept includes God's omnipotence, omniscience, mercy, engagement in history, and covenantal relationship with the Jewish people.

In making the argument that he did, Rubenstein was rejecting the position of Orthodox Judaism that Jewish suffering during the Holocaust was part of God's plan, just as Jewish suffering has been throughout history. This generally meant that the Jewish people were being punished for a sin—perhaps straying from the laws of Torah, or establishing the land of Israel without waiting for the coming of the Messiah. No matter the explanation, Rubenstein found the possibility that Hitler was an instrument of God to be "obscene." Rubenstein's position proved to be deeply unsettling to Jewish and Christian theologians alike, and it opened the door to examining the meaning of the Holocaust from a religious perspective.

If Rubenstein's position represents one end of the spectrum in response to the Holocaust, then Emil L. Fackenheim's response represents the other end. Fackenheim was born in Germany in 1916 and was a rabbinical student at the time he was sent to a concentration camp, from which he was released after several months. He ultimately relocated to Ontario, Canada, and then to Israel.

Fackenheim sought a middle ground between the unquestioning acceptance of the traditional Jewish position regarding suffering and Rubenstein's conclusion that God—as conceived in traditional Judaism—cannot exist in light of the Holocaust. He did so by declaring a 614th commandment (in addition to the Torah's 613), namely, that it is commanded that "authentic" Jews in a post-Holocaust world must survive and must do so as Jews, lest Hitler be able to declare a posthumous victory over the Jewish people. The

Theological Responses to the Holocaust

There was nothing small about the Holocaust. It impacted, directly or indirectly, fundamental tenets of civilization with source of this commandment is what Fackenheim calls “a commanding Voice” that “speaks from Auschwitz.”

For many, Fackenheim went too far. He accused death camp prisoners who during the Holocaust were unable to believe in God of being Nazi accomplices and stated that whoever argued with his assertion that there was a “commanding Voice” at Auschwitz was willfully abandoning God.

It is clear that Rubenstein and Fackenheim both viewed the Holocaust as a unique and theologically significant event in Jewish history. Rubenstein saw the horror of the Holocaust as proof that the God defined by traditional Judaism does not exist; Fackenheim saw it as evidence of God’s engagement and commanding voice. Further, Rubenstein, having rejected the God of the covenant, also thereby rejected the covenant itself. By contrast, Fackenheim saw the covenant as affirmed by the Holocaust in the sense that it was the means by which a new commandment was given to the Jewish people.

Other Jewish theologians—Eliezer Berkovits, Martin Buber, Arthur A. Cohen, Abraham Joshua Heschel, David Weiss Halivni, and Steven T. Katz, among many others—address the same issues as Rubenstein and Fackenheim but find themselves somewhere between their polar-opposite positions.

For example, Irving Greenberg, an Orthodox rabbi who was born in 1933, writes that the two foundational positions of Judaism—God’s engagement in history and the absolute value of every person—were critically threatened by the Holocaust, thereby necessitating certain basic changes in the Jewish understanding of faith and covenant. Faith must be recognized as coming and going, as sometimes clear and strong, and other times as overwhelmed by the reality of the Jewish children who were thrown alive into the flames of the crematoria. The covenant, too, must be reframed from a “commanded covenant”—one that was entered into by the Jewish people in response to a demanding God—to a “voluntary covenant,” one that is freely entered into, and one that is subject to renewal. Greenberg answers the question of where God was during the Holocaust by saying that God was there with the Jewish people during, and sharing in, their suffering.

The theological issues with which Christians must wrestle are no less daunting than those facing Jews. Germany was a highly cultured country where virtually every non-Jew was a member of a church: two-thirds were Protestant, and one-third were Roman Catholic. Christianity was one of the bulwarks of German society. All of the leading Nazi leaders were associated with a church, including Hitler, who was a Catholic who never renounced his Catholicism and was never excommunicated. So the question is this: how can men educated in the Christian faith lead a program of extermination of innocent men, women, and children? On a broader level, how can millions of Christians, including some clergy, follow these leaders on a crusade to kill every Jew in Europe?

Among the many Christians who have sought to answer these questions—such as Karl Barth and Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who dealt with the incongruity between Christianity and Nazism during the Holocaust, as well as post-Holocaust theologians, including Harry James Cargas, Alice and Roy Eckardt, Eugene J. Fisher, Hubert G. Locke, John T. Pawlikowski, and John K. Roth—several can be cited for their critical role in the evolution of post-Holocaust Christian theology.

Harry James Cargas, who was born in Hamtramck, Michigan, in 1932 and who died in 1998, converted to Catholicism at the age of 19. It was shocking to him when he realized that probably every killer in the Nazi regime had been a baptized Christian. His statement to the effect that no other event, save the crucifixion, was as tragic as the Holocaust in Christian history, reflects the importance he ascribed to the need to somehow reconcile the fact of the Holocaust with the Christian faith that was so central to him.

He was a prolific author, but it is possible to identify what was perhaps his most significant contribution to post-Holocaust Christian theology. What made it so valuable was the fact that he did not focus on theological concepts but set forth 16 concrete proposals for what was necessary for Christianity to redeem itself from its complicity in the Holocaust. Some of those proposals were: Hitler must be excommunicated; there must be full recognition by all Christians of the ways in which Christianity was in error about and harmful to the Jews; the Catholic Church must reevaluate and reconsider its understanding of evil and of history; the Vatican must open up all of its archives for the period of the Holocaust; the terms “Old Testament” and “New Testament” must be changed so as to eliminate any implication of the latter replacing or fulfilling the former; and missionizing the Jews must be curtailed and those efforts be turned toward making Christians better Christians.

Franklin H. Littell, who was born in 1917 in Syracuse, New York, and who died in 2009, was a minister of the United Methodist Church, a renowned educator, and a prolific author. Of greater importance, however, was his courageous declaration that Christian antisemitism and the theological principle of supersessionism had a direct causal relationship with what happened to the Jews in the Holocaust. Supersessionism is the belief that Christianity supersedes Judaism in every important respect, some of which are: the New Testament fulfills the Old Testament; the revelation through Jesus supersedes revelation at Sinai; and Christians replace the Jews as the people of the covenant. This renders Judaism marginalized, if not totally irrelevant except to the extent that conversion of the Jews to Christianity is a prerequisite for the second coming of the Messiah.

Littell was so concerned with the actions of Jesus's followers during the Holocaust that he questioned whether Jesus was a true prophet, for how could the followers of a true prophet do what was done against the Jews? He also refused to allow Christians to look upon what Hitler and millions of Nazis did as an accident. Instead, he wrote that what they did was reflective of a Christianity that was "formless and heathen at heart."

Over the decades since the end of the Holocaust there has been an increasing understanding by the Protestant and Catholic churches of the role Christian theology played in what became the Final Solution, and significant efforts to turn away from the Christianity that allowed it. The Catholic Church took a tremendous step in the direction Cargas and Littell would wish it to go when Pope John XXIII convened the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council, generally known as "Vatican II," on October 11, 1962. One of its objectives was to address relations between the Catholic Church and the Jews. To that end, the Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, known commonly as Nostra Aetate ("In our time"), was proclaimed by Pope Paul VI on October 28, 1965.

Paragraph 4 of Nostra Aetate spoke directly to the church's theological position relative to the Jews (who are referred to as "Abraham's stock"). It rejected the accusation against the Jews of deicide that had long been a part of Christian theology, absolving the Jews—both those at the time of Jesus's crucifixion, and all those since—of that crime. It made clear that the covenant between the Jews and God is still in force, that Christians should not put themselves above the Jews or refer them as "rejected" or "cursed" by God. It made no mention of the millennia-long goal of converting Jews to Christianity, and it referred to the Jews as "beloved by God."

Nostra Aetate has been followed by the Catholic Church with documents that further confirmed this new relationship: in December 1974 and June 1985, documents on how the principles of Nostra Aetate should be taught; in March 1998, a document titled We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah; in 2002, a document regarding the need for Catholics to understand how Jews approach the Hebrew Bible; and in December 2015, a document that further explores the meaning of Nostra Aetate.

The Protestant churches have also responded to the theological implications of the Holocaust. In one of the earliest post-Holocaust statements—issued on October 19, 1945—the Council of the Evangelical Church in Germany

(Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland) issued the Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt (Stuttgarter Schuldbekennnis), which reads, in part, "With great anguish we state: through us has endless suffering been brought to many peoples and countries. . . . we accuse ourselves for not witnessing more courageously . . . and for not loving more ardently."

Except for statements from the World Conference of Churches (WCC), which currently represents more than 345 churches around the world, as a general rule each denomination has made its own declaration regarding its relations with Jews in light of the Holocaust. At the founding assembly of the WCC in 1948, churches represented by the organization were asked to denounce antisemitism as being "absolutely irreconcilable with . . . the Christian faith." At the third assembly, in 1961, the WCC—much like Vatican II would do later in the 1960s—rejected the charge that the Jews of today were responsible for the death of Jesus. This was echoed by the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church (USA) in 1964.

The United Methodist Church issued its statement regarding the need to establish a new relationship with the Jewish community in 1972. In 1987 the General Synod of the United Church of Christ recognized the ongoing covenant between God and the Jewish people. That same year the Presbyterian Church (USA) rejected supersessionism. Seven years later, in 1994, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America denounced the virulent antisemitic statements made by Martin Luther in the 16th century and characterized antisemitism as "an affront to the Gospel."

These are but a few of the more than 100 declarations by various denominations and organizations from around the world acknowledging the role that religious antisemitism played in the Holocaust and pledging to reject all aspects of antisemitism going forward. Efforts to reconcile the Holocaust within Jewish theology, within Christian theology, and between Christians and Jews continue.

Theresienstadt

Located in the town of Terezín, some 35 miles from Prague in northwestern Czechoslovakia, Theresienstadt was a Nazi-established Jewish ghetto as well as a concentration and transit camp. The camp was contained within an old fortress constructed in the 17th century. It became operational on November 24, 1941, and was liberated by Soviet troops on May 8, 1945.

Theresienstadt was designed to fulfill two primary functions. First, it was a transit point for Czech Jews who were being deported to concentration camps, death camps, and forced labor camps located in Eastern Europe and the Balkans. Second, it was a labor camp where elderly, disabled, or prominent Jews were housed. The Nazis perpetrated an elaborate hoax by implying that detainees who remained at Theresienstadt were being treated well as “retirees”; they even called the camp a “spa town.”

In 1942 the Nazis began deporting large numbers of Jews at Theresienstadt to the east, where many perished. Nevertheless, the Germans continued to allude to the camp in quite glowing terms in an effort to disguise their activities and keep the outside world from learning about the true scale of the Holocaust. In 1944 the Germans permitted representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to visit the facility, after receiving negative press about the Nazis’ deportation of Dutch Jews to Theresienstadt. The visit occurred in June 1944. When ICRC officials arrived, they were impressed with what they saw. Gardens had been cultivated, barracks were clean and renovated, and buildings were freshly painted. Camp officials even staged social and cultural events for their visitors, many of which included detainees. When the ICRC personnel left, however, deportations from Theresienstadt were resumed, and they continued until October 1944. Camp authorities had, of course, forced internees to perform renovations and other projects prior to the visit of the Red Cross.

At least 140,000 Jews were either interned or passed through Theresienstadt between 1941 and 1945. Of that number, some 90,000 were ultimately deported to death or concentration camps in the east; the vast majority of them perished. Some 5,000 children were transported to the east via Theresienstadt, and it is estimated that about 90% died in death camps. The death toll within the camp is estimated at 33,000. Many of those individuals died from disease, illness, malnutrition, exposure, or abuse by camp personnel. By mid-1942 the death toll became so high that camp authorities had to build a crematorium just outside the walls that processed as many as 200 bodies per day.

Unlike most concentration camps, Theresienstadt boasted a vibrant cultural scene; in this case, it resembled many Jewish ghettos. Because the camp housed a number of artists, writers, teachers, actors, and musicians from Czechoslovakia, Germany, and Austria, prisoners benefited from concerts, plays, lectures, art exhibits, and other cultural happenings. The library at Theresienstadt held an impressive 60,000 volumes, and although they were officially forbidden from instructing children, older prisoners held daily classes for hundreds of students.

On May 2, 1945, with Adolf Hitler dead and Soviet forces pressing in from the east, camp personnel turned over control of Theresienstadt to the ICRC. Soviet troops officially liberated the camp on May 8.

Thierack, Otto

Otto Thierack was a Nazi jurist and politician. He was the Reich minister of justice under Adolf Hitler between August 20, 1942, and April 30, 1945.

One of his first steps as justice minister after assuming office on August 20, 1942, was to direct the president of the People’s Court that in criminal proceedings against the Jews, the decisive factor must always be their Jewishness rather than their culpability. Thierack not only made penal prosecution of all unpopular persons and groups harsher but he also waived any pretense of legality and simply began handling “antisocial” prisoners (usually Jews, Poles, Russians, and Roma) over to the SS. Thierack came to an understanding with Heinrich Himmler that certain categories of prisoners were to be, to use their words, “annihilated through work.” As Reich minister, Thierack ensured the reduction of clemency proceedings for those sentenced to death.

Otto Georg Thierack was born in Wurzen, Saxony, on April 19, 1889. His father was a merchant. In 1910 he commenced the study of law at the University of Marburg and received his doctorate in 1914 from the University of Leipzig. In World War I he served as a volunteer in the German army, reaching the rank of lieutenant. He suffered a facial injury and was decorated with the Iron Cross, second class.

After the war he resumed his interrupted law studies, graduating in 1920 with his assessor (junior lawyer) examination. He then entered the judicial service of Saxony as a junior lawyer, and in 1921 he was appointed a public prosecutor at the district court in Leipzig. In 1926 he became a prosecutor at the Supreme Court of Dresden.

In 1932 Thierack joined the Nazi Party and became the leader of the National Socialist jurists organization (the Rechtswahrerbund), which led to his career as a leading Nazi judge. In 1933, after the Nazi assumption of power in Germany, he became the Saxon minister of justice. In 1935 he was appointed vice president of the Reich Court in Leipzig. At the same time he also represented the minister of justice in coordinating the integration of Nazi jurisdiction in the Reich.

On May 1, 1936, Thierack was appointed president of the People’s Court (Volksgerichtshof), where he concentrated on tightening its jurisdiction. This court prosecuted people accused of crimes against the Third Reich, in closed sessions, and without the right of appeal. He held the position of president of the People’s Court, interrupted by two periods in the German army in World War II, until 1942 when he was succeeded as president by Roland Freisler.

On April 23–24, 1941, Thierack was a participant in the meeting of judicial officers about the so-called “destruction of life unworthy of life,” in the context of Aktion T-4 medical murders.

On September 9, 1942, now as justice minister, Thierack gave directions to the president of the People’s Court that “in criminal proceedings against the Jews, the decisive factor is their Jewishness, rather than their culpability.” The following month he introduced monthly legal briefs that presented model rulings—decisions, with names left out, upon which German jurisprudence was to be based. He also introduced in proceedings of public interest the so-called Vorschauen (“previews”) and Nachschauen (“reviews”), which required that the higher state court presidents were to discuss with the public prosecutor’s office and the State Court president—who had to pass this on to the responsible criminal courts—how a case was to be judged before the court’s decision. This was to be done at least once every two weeks.

One year later the Third Reich changed the laws again, this time removing Jews from the jurisdiction of the court altogether and leaving their fate in the hands of the police or the SS. This legalized the sending of “asocials” or certain foreign prisoners or forced laborers—Jews, Poles, Gypsies, Russians and Ukrainians—directly to the SS, by sending them to concentration camps in the East, where they would be “exterminated through work.”

After Hitler’s intervention, Thierack ordered death sentences were to be enforced immediately. In the opinions of the trial court, the prosecutors, the attorney general and other bodies, petitions for mercy were in principle no longer necessary.

At Thierack’s instigation, the execution shed at Plötzensee Prison in Berlin was outfitted with eight iron hooks in December 1942 so that several people could be put to death at once, by hanging (there had already been a guillotine there for some time). When a number of mass executions began on September 7, 1943, it also happened that some prisoners were hanged “by mistake.” Thierack simply covered up these mistakes and demanded that the hangings continue. He was recognized as one who was ruthless in the furthering of his career, power hungry, and ambitious. His support staff described him as hardworking and resilient, but also high-handed and autocratic.

At the end of the war, Thierack was arrested by the Allies and imprisoned at the prisoner of war camp at Eselheide in 1945. He committed suicide in jail on November 22, 1946, before he could be put on trial at Nuremberg.

Third Reich

The Third Reich (Das Dritte Reich in German), was the name used by the Nazi Party to describe Germany under its rule. In the German language the term Reich translates to the English word “empire”; hence, the Third Reich was Germany’s third empire, following the Holy Roman Empire, which was shattered by Napoleon Bonaparte, and the Second Empire, which had been fashioned by Otto von Bismarck and lost through the reckless rule of Kaiser Wilhelm II.

Nazi propagandists also referred to their domain as the “Thousand Year Reich,” but it lasted just 12 years, from 1933 until Germany’s defeat in World War II in 1945. During that span, the Third Reich persecuted and killed millions of people for racial and political reasons; initiated and waged World War II throughout Europe, the Atlantic, and North Africa; and brought unparalleled destruction.

The Third Reich was proclaimed when the Nazis assumed political power in Germany at the end of January 1933. Although much power was concentrated in Adolf Hitler’s hands, the Third Reich functioned more like a chaotic bureaucracy, with constant institutional and personal conflict at lower levels of the government and party. Despite this, it maintained itself through both the acceptance and support of much of the German people and the intimidation and repression of opponents.

The Third Reich received strong initial popular support because it appealed to nationalist feelings and seemed to offer a solution to the economic Depression of the early 1930s. Hitler and the Nazis pulled Germany out of that deep worldwide crisis and solved the problem of widespread unemployment through massive rearmament programs and other public works projects. The Nazis also appealed to the national pride of many Germans offended by defeat in World War I and the harsh peace terms of the Treaty of Versailles. They claimed to unite Germans from all walks of life and political perspectives into a higher unity, a nation with a unified sense of purpose and destiny. Toward the end of the 1930s, however, public support waned and was replaced more and more by acquiescence ensured by the threat of state-sanctioned violence.

The basis for the Nazis’ belief in the higher unity of all Germans was biological. Hitler and the Nazis believed in enduring, unchangeable racial differences between different nationalities. The Third Reich was to be an extensive empire of “racially pure” Germans, in which other races served as slaves or were eliminated altogether. These goals led to the murder of millions of Jews, Roma, and members of other nationalities, as well as Germans with hereditary diseases. The concentration camp system, initially begun in 1933 to imprison political prisoners, evolved into a complicated but ruthlessly efficient system of enslavement and mass murder.

Hitler sought to expand the Third Reich by annexing or invading other countries. He and the Nazis precipitated World War II when Germany divided Poland with the Soviet Union (after annexing Austria and Czechoslovakia during 1938–1939). Following the outbreak of war, the Third Reich subsequently conquered and dominated almost the entire European continent, stretching from the Atlantic coast of France to deep into the Soviet Union. Ultimately, however, the main countries allied against Germany—Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States—succeeded in defeating and occupying Germany and destroying the Third Reich in 1945.

Tiso, Jozef

Slovak nationalist leader named president of the Slovak Republic in 1939. Born on October 13, 1887, at Velka Bytca, Slovakia (then Hungary), Tiso was ordained a Roman Catholic priest in 1910. In 1918 he helped to found the Slovak People’s Party (SPP), representing it in the Czechoslovakian Parliament in 1925—where he also served as minister of health between 1927 and 1928. With the death of SPP leader Andrej Hlinka in August 1938, Tiso took over as head of the party.

On October 6, 1938, he became prime minister of an autonomous Slovakia, which had been created under the terms of the Munich Agreement. In March 1939 the Czechoslovakian government deposed him for promoting Slovak independence, but Tiso received Adolf Hitler’s support during a visit to Berlin on March 13 of that year; the following day he proclaimed Slovak independence. The Germans occupied what remained of Czechoslovakia on March 15, 1939, and the next day Tiso placed the new Slovak state under the protection of Germany, primarily to avoid its annexation by Hungary.

Jozef Tiso was a Slovak Roman Catholic priest who led the first Slovak Republic between 1939 and 1945. A leader of the Slovak People's Party, Tiso remained an active priest throughout his political career and was supported by the Vatican in his efforts to uphold Catholicism in Slovakia during World War II. As a major collaborator with Hitler's Germany, he was convicted and hanged for treason, war crimes, and crimes against humanity on April 18, 1947. (AP Photo)

On October 26, 1939, Tiso became president of the newly created Slovak Republic. Although he personally opposed Nazism, he was forced to share power with the fascist paramilitary Hlinka Guards, and his government willingly collaborated with the Germans, allowing some 68,000 Slovakian Jews to be deported to German concentration camps.

Tiso's government survived an internal uprising in August 1944 but fell to the Red Army and Czech partisans in April 1945. Tiso fled to Austria but was apprehended by U.S. authorities and extradited to Czechoslovakia, where he was tried and convicted of treason and war crimes. He was executed by hanging in Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, on April 18, 1947.

Topography of Terror

The Topography of Terror (Topographie des Terrors) is a museum complex in Berlin, Germany, documenting the history of the various Nazi policing institutions located in the immediate vicinity of the district, and of the crimes originating from there. It is located on the site of buildings that, during the Nazi regime from 1933 to 1945, were the headquarters of the Gestapo and the SS. Between 1933 and 1945 these organizations, together with the Security Service SD (Sicherheitsdienst, or SD) and the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, or RSHA), were the foci of National Socialist terror.

The street address of the museum is on Niederkirchnerstrasse, formerly Prinz-Albrecht-Strasse. The buildings were largely destroyed by Allied bombing during early 1945, and after the war the boundary between the American and Soviet zones of occupation ran right across Prinz-Albrecht-Strasse. The area became the boundary between the two zones, with the Berlin Wall eventually running along the south side of the street. After the end of the Cold War, the wall at this part of Berlin was never demolished and is thus the longest segment still visible today. This remnant of the Berlin Wall now forms part of the museum site.

As part of the celebration of Berlin's 750th anniversary year, it was decided to transform the area into a museum. The first exhibition took advantage of an excavation of the cellar of the Gestapo headquarters. Several of the cells where prisoners were held and tortured are clearly visible, and are among the first sights that greet visitors to the museum.

A number of attempts at creating a permanent museum and memorial followed, but it was not until 2010 that the current structure took shape and opened to the public. The Documentation Center followed the design of architect Ursula Wilms and was officially opened on May 6, 2010, by German federal president Horst Köhler. The opening coincided with the 65th anniversary of the end of World War II.

The Topography of Terror maintains three permanent exhibitions that are open to the public, all of which are presented in both German and English. The first of these is the “Topography of Terror” permanent exhibition itself. The focus of the exhibition outlines the central institutions of the SS and police in the Third Reich, highlighting their crimes not only in Germany but across all of occupied Europe, and educating visitors as to their victims. The second of the facility’s permanent exhibitions examines Berlin as the Nazi capital, emphasizing National Socialist rule and its consequences for the city and its population. Finally, the Topography of Terror offers a tour of the ground on which the site is located, providing an overview of the historic location and the site’s use during the Nazi period and the post-war era.

As an educational facility, the Topography of Terror operates a specialist library focusing on the police, SS, and Gestapo, as well as on National Socialism generally. It holds some 25,000 volumes and a large periodical collection. In the same vicinity, a seminar center for events, lectures, and school groups can accommodate up to 200 people.

The Topography of Terror Foundation provides comprehensive advice and coordination tasks in the field of national and international memorial sites, and it is arguably the most important authority for all other memorial sites in Germany. Through this, it also serves the purpose of coordinating and promoting international collaboration. With more than one million visitors a year, the Topography of Terror museum is one of the most frequented memorial sites and institutions of its kind in Berlin.

war is built on two related components: the engagement of all aspects of society—not just the military—to support and wage war, and the need to destroy all aspects of the enemy’s society, which also is fully engaged in supporting and waging war.

Total war stands in contrast to a “limited war,” meaning a war carried out by professional armies on clearly defined battlefields and conducted so as to protect civilians, to respond to enemy actions in a way that does not exceed proportionality, and to conduct oneself, individually and as a group, in recognition of the common humanity of both parties to the conflict.

Although aspects of total war can be seen as early as the French Revolution, it is clearly the dominant form of warfare of both the American Civil War and World War I. The destruction inflicted on Atlanta and the South by Union general William T. Sherman and the mobilization of total national resources by all countries involved in World War I, including manpower and entire economies, represent two key characteristics of total war.

It was in World War II that the full meaning of total war was realized, requiring the populations and resources of entire nations to field large armies with weapons of enormous destructive power, and to target the populations and resources of enemy militaries so as to limit or prevent altogether their ability to do the same. This transformed the world into a battlefield where the distinction between the front lines and the home front nearly disappeared.

The concept of total war and the reality of the Holocaust have a disturbing relationship. A total war need not include genocide, but genocide is in itself an act of total war. The Holocaust is an example of total war conducted against a particular victim group that was seen by the perpetrators as “the enemy,” without distinction between those members of the group, if any, who constituted an objective threat to the perpetrators, and those who did not. It did not limit its violence to the front lines; instead, it reached into the homes, the synagogues, and the businesses of the victim group without regard to military necessity.

Total war means that vast numbers of civilians will support the imposition of untold death and destruction on an enemy population, and, further, that large numbers of civilians will be the victims of the combination of indiscriminate or collateral damage and the intentional perpetration of mass murder. In the process, the first and perhaps most important casualty is the concept of the innate value of human life. When millions are dying, the death of any single person loses its ability to shock, is stripped of the moral

Total War and the Holocaust

The term “total war” or “limitless war” refers to the all-encompassing efforts of entire nations to completely destroy their enemies—combatants and noncombatants alike. Total complexities that normally would be associated with ending a human life, and therefore combatant countries become free of cultural restraints to pursue their efforts to defeat the enemy not only militarily but also in its entirety.

This is seen clearly in the Holocaust. One of the shocking and almost universal observations in survivors' memoirs relates to descriptions of the ease with which the Nazis and their collaborators chose who lived and who died, and then processed the killing in a way that prompted no more moral anguish than what was associated with the commission of any mundane day-to-day activity. While this attitude may be expected in soldiers killing other soldiers, the application of the same amoral approach to the killing of civilians—and to see doing so as a necessity, an integral part of the war process—is what brings the Holocaust within the ambit of total war.

Total war makes no difference between soldier and civilian, but it also makes no distinction between those civilians who cannot possibly constitute a threat—the ill, the weak, the very young, the very old—and those who could conceivably be capable of bringing harm to the military cause. During the Holocaust there were few killers who showed any hesitation to perform their duty to kill or facilitate killing, even when their victims were the most innocent and vulnerable of society. That does not mean that the killers did not have any psychological concerns about what they were doing. For example, with few exceptions, members of the Einsatzgruppen, who were responsible for the up-close shooting of old men, women, and children, needed alcohol to deaden their innate moral revulsion at these types of killings. This is a reflection of the lingering power of traditional concepts of right and wrong, but ultimately those concepts proved all too susceptible to the pressures and propaganda of a country intent on the extermination of a particular victim group.

Total war, even more than limited war, subsumes the individual to the will of the group regarding both the actions of the perpetrators and their perception of the victims. The power of group identification, along with the fear of being ostracized from the group, was a substantial motivator in the actions of the killers of the Holocaust. Since the widespread and intentional death of civilians is one of the distinguishing characteristics of total war, and since under any other circumstances the perpetration of such actions would be anathema, the need to diffuse individual guilt by sharing it with the group is a critical element of mass murder. This was clearly the case in the Holocaust. Similarly, the actions of the Nazi killers were such that it became necessary for them to view their victims not as individuals but as faceless members of a vilified group.

Just as in the case of total war, so too the Holocaust fails to meet any of the criteria of a limited war: its deaths were not incurred on the battlefield; it made no effort to protect civilians—in fact, just the opposite; it showed no proportionality in its responses to the Jews' real or perceived threat; and it most certainly and sadly did not recognize the common humanity of the perpetrators and the victims.

Touvier Case

The Touvier Case, a trial that took place from March 17 to April 20, 1994, almost 50 years after the end of World War II, was historic on two accounts. First, it was the first judgment of “crimes against humanity” brought against a Frenchman; second, it showcased the long-standing involvement of the Catholic Church in protecting war criminals from World War II. The filing of the complaint and the subsequent trial would never have happened by the will of the French government or of the French courts without the constant pressure of human rights activist Serge Klarsfeld and publications from historians like Robert Paxton.

Paul Touvier was born on April 3, 1915, and after failed attempts to settle himself professionally he joined the Milice (a highly politicized militia) of the collaborationist Vichy regime, where he soon rose to the rank of chief of intelligence in the region of Lyon. His counterpart in the German occupation administration was the notorious “Butcher of Lyon,” Klaus Barbie. In this position, Touvier was responsible for a number of murders of Jews and of individual persons with real or suspected ties to the Resistance. Upon the collapse of collaborationist rule in France, he went into hiding and was sentenced twice in absentia to the death penalty for collaboration with the enemy and treason by French courts during the Épuration (the mass legal purge of Vichy officials) of the late 1940s. Arrested during a robbery in 1947, he escaped and found shelter within institutions of the French Catholic Church. In 1967 his condemnations to death from the 1940s expired because of a 20-year statute of limitations regarding such judgments under French law. Some minor judicial restraints remained valid, and therefore elements of the French Catholic clergy lobbied President Georges Pompidou to grant a pardon to Touvier. This occurred in 1971 and caused a public outcry when it was publicized by the media a year later. The outrage increased when it was revealed that Touvier was claiming property as his own that had been seized from Jews during the war. Soon thereafter, former Resistance fighters tried to bring legal action against Touvier on counts still punishable under French law. Touvier again went into hiding, aided by the Catholic Church, now with the Archbishop Lefebvre splinter group.

Although the French justice system took some steps to bring the absent Touvier to court again during the late 1970s and early 1980s, it was not until the trial of Klaus Barbie in 1987 that the Touvier case reentered the public debate. Barbie, who was not a French citizen, was the first person in French legal history to be convicted on counts of the nonprescriptive “crimes against humanity.” Pressure now mounted to bring the same charges against the most important French subordinate of Barbie: Paul Touvier. In 1989 he was finally arrested in his hiding place, but French judges demonstrated an unwillingness to convict him and they suspended proceedings in 1992. After a public outcry, a higher court ordered a trial in 1993.

The trial did not get under way until March 20, 1994. Nevertheless, the charges had to be reduced, as many cases of murder were ineligible for trial under French statutory limitations, as they were “merely” individual war crimes and not “crimes against humanity.” However, the killing of seven people of Jewish origin in 1944 in retaliation for a Resistance killing of a prominent Vichy figure “qualified” in the legal sense for charges on account of “crimes against humanity.” Touvier’s defense argued that the killing of the seven persons had been the lesser evil, as Touvier thereby had avoided the killing of even more people, which had been ordered by Nazi occupation officials. This argument, however, failed to convince the court. Touvier was ultimately sentenced to life imprisonment. An appeal was rejected in 1995, and Touvier died in a prison hospital soon after, on July 17, 1996. His funeral service took place in a Parisian Catholic church administered by Lefebvre followers and was attended by prominent figures of the extreme right and by one member of the French Chamber of Deputies.

Trawniki Men

Named for the concentration camp in which they were trained, “Trawniki men” (Trawnikimänner) or “Trawnikis” were auxiliary police guards who played a deadly role in the day-to-day process of mass murder that was the Final Solution.

In order to implement Operation Reinhard—the Nazi plan to exterminate the Jews of the Generalgouvernement (the German-controlled section of Poland that was not annexed to Germany)—trained men were needed to guard extermination camps, enforce and escort deportations, liquidate ghettos, and shoot—up close—Jewish men, women, and children into mass graves. Most of the men who trained under this program were Soviet prisoners of war who “volunteered” for this in exchange for release from the horrid, starvation-level conditions in which they were held. As such, they were part of a larger group called Hilfswilliger (volunteers), also called Hiwis.

The facility in which they trained was part of the Trawniki concentration camp, built where once there was a sugar refinery outside the village of Trawniki, some 20 miles southeast of Lublin. The camp was established shortly after the beginning of Operation Barbarossa, Germany’s invasion of Russia in July 1941, on the orders of SS-Gruppenführer Odilo Globocnik, SS and police leader (SS-und Polizeiführer) of the Lublin District. He placed SS-Hauptsturmführer Hermann Höfle in command of the camp and SS-Hauptsturmführer Karl Streibel in command of the training program and facility for the Trawniki men.

The Trawniki camp served several functions over its three years of operation. For its first three months (July through September 1941) it was used to hold Soviet civilians. Beginning in September 1941 and continuing to July 1944, it was the training center for Trawniki men who were to be Guard Forces (Wachmannschaften) as part of Aktion Reinhard. It served as a forced labor camp from July 1942 to September 1943, at which point it functioned as a subcamp for the Majdanek concentration and extermination camp, also located in the Generalgouvernement, near Lublin.

From the inception of the training program through late 1944, more than 5,000 men were screened for sufficient levels of anticommunist and antisemitic sentiments, recruited and trained for their role in the murder of the Jews. Not all were Soviet POWs. Others were conscripted Volksdeutsche, that is, men who were “Germans in terms of people or race,” but were not living in, nor citizens of, Germany. Most were from Eastern Europe so that the Trawniki men—the Soviets and the civilian conscripts—could communicate with (in reality, order) prisoners in a language they could understand, such as Polish, Russian, Ukrainian, Belarusian, Estonian, Latvian, and so forth.

Trawniki men were trained for and participated in some of the most violent aspects of an already monstrous campaign of mass murder. They served as guards at almost all of the Nazi extermination camps, such as Belzec, Sobibór, and Treblinka (more specifically, Treblinka II, the killing site within the Treblinka camp). They were brutal participants in the deportations of Jews from ghettos to the assigned extermination camp, and in the liquidation of those ghettos. Thus, in the ghettos of Warsaw, Czestochowa, Lublin, Białystok, and others, they killed all Jews who had not yet been deported.

Perhaps their most notorious task was to kill hundreds or thousands of Jews at a time, shooting them individually in the soft spot immediately below the back of the skull, or forcing them to lie down on their stomachs on the rows of bodies that were killed before them, and then shooting them, even as the next row of victims was brought to the edge of the open pit to await their turn. Some of the members of the German army or the Reserve Police Battalions found this task—killing innocent men, women, and children in a close up and personal way—to be psychologically difficult, so it was not unusual that the Trawniki men—who seemed to have no such qualms—would take over the killing operation.

The Trawniki training camp, which remained operational to the very end, was overrun in July 1944. After the war, Globocnik and Höfel committed suicide. Streibel, along with other leaders of the program, was charged and brought to trial, only to be acquitted in 1976.

Treblinka

Consisting of a labor camp and an extermination camp, Treblinka contributed mightily to the death toll of the Holocaust with approximately 870,000 victims—almost all Jews—killed there during its operation. Treblinka was located near the villages of Treblinka and Malkinia, about 50 miles northeast of Warsaw, in the Generalgouvernement. Two conditions made this an ideal location in which to carry out the tasks of the camps: it was in a lightly populated but heavily wooded area; and it was near a rail line, with a station stop at Malkinia, which allowed for a spur to be built to the camp.

Treblinka was one of three extermination camps established as part of Operation Reinhard (Aktion Reinhard), named after SS Obergruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich, head of the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), who was assassinated in June 1942. Belzec and Sobibór were the other two Operation Reinhard extermination camps.

Treblinka consisted of two camps. Treblinka I was a forced labor camp (Arbeitslager), opened in November 1941. Its prisoner population was composed of Jews, and non-Jewish Poles for whom the camp was a means of political detention. Though held in two different areas of the camp, both cohorts did hard labor, primarily in a gravel pit. Deportees who appeared capable of work when they arrived at Treblinka were housed here. The commandant of Treblinka I was SS-Sturmbannführer Theodor van Eupen. He served in that capacity from the camp’s inception until its closing in July 1944.

Treblinka II was the extermination camp (Vernichtungslager). It was completed and operational in July 1942. This was where virtually all Jews from each deportation train were sent after being adjudged incapable of performing the tasks required in Treblinka I. It was here that they were gassed within hours of their arrival.

There were three commandants of Treblinka II. They were SS-Untersturmführer Dr. Irmfried Eberl, from July to August 1942; SS-Obersturmführer Franz Stangl (who had served as commandant of Sobibór), from August 1942 to August 1943; and SS-Oberscharführer Kurt Franz, from August to November 1943.

Treblinka was an extermination camp established by Nazi Germany for the purpose of facilitating the Holocaust. Functioning between July 23, 1942, and October 19, 1943, it is estimated that at least 700,000 and possibly up to 900,000 Jews were killed in its gas chambers, rendering it a killing site second only to Auschwitz in the number of Jews murdered there. A Jewish revolt in October 1943 saw the end of the mass murder operations at Treblinka. (Mondadori Portfolio via Getty Images)

Treblinka II was composed of three areas. The first was the reception area where the Jews who made up the human cargo packed into railroad cattle cars detrained. The second area was divided into two subsections. One included housing for the German and Ukrainian staff, administrative offices, storerooms, a clinic, and workshops. The staff consisted of 20 to 30 SS men in command and administrative posts, all of whom had received their training through their participation in the Aktion T-4 operation under which Germans who, due to physical or mental disabilities, were deemed to be living “lives not worthy of living” were killed by carbon monoxide gas. Ninety to 120 Soviet prisoners of war, as well as Ukrainian and Polish civilians, served as guards, and some participated in tasks associated with the gas chambers. They were schooled at the Trawniki labor camp, which was the training center for Operation Reinhard police and guards.

The second subsection of Treblinka II was composed of the barracks for the Jews who temporarily worked in the camp at the camp’s workshops, while the third area was the extermination center. The entire camp was surrounded by two fences of barbed wire and numerous watch towers.

Sometimes referred to as the “upper camp” (and identified to its incoming victims as a transit camp), the extermination site of Treblinka II was maintained in its own fully fenced area, with a large earthen mound and branches intertwined in the fence to make it difficult for anyone outside of the area to see what was happening. It contained three gas chambers (which would be expanded by another 10 as more trainloads of victims kept coming). The process that led to the gas chambers began in the reception area.

Deportation trains were often 50 or 60 cars long. As each train approached the “station” where the victims would detrain, the train would stop and be broken into segments of 20 cars each. Each 20-car train pulled into the reception area and was handled before the next segment of the deportation train pulled in. There the doors of the train cars were thrown open and the Jews who managed to survive the trip—often lasting for days, with no food, water, sanitation, or light—would be berated and beaten in order to bring them all out into the bizarre scene that awaited them. Once they were out of the cars and on their way to the next step in this process, a special work unit (Sonderkommando) of Jewish prisoners jumped into each car, removing the bodies of those who did not survive, collecting whatever food, clothing, and valuables were left behind, and cleaning the car so it could be put into use for the same purpose again.

Jews who were unable to walk were taken to an “infirmary” (Lazaret) with a Red Cross flag on it. They passed through the building and exited on the other side where they were shot and thrown into huge pits that were already dug for just this purpose. Those who were able to walk were immediately divided by gender (children with the women). A very few of the men and women—the strongest among them—were selected to go to the forced labor camp—Treblinka I—while all the rest would be just minutes away from their deaths. The condemned group entered two barracks—men in one, women and children in the other—where they were ordered to remove all their clothing to prepare for a shower before they would be allowed into the camp. During this time, all valuables—money, jewelry, and so forth—were collected from them, to be stored and sorted in large storerooms until shipped back to Germany. Beginning in the fall of 1942, women and children were shorn of their hair.

Then these people—naked and no doubt terrified—were forced by fists and whips to run down a path—itsself fenced in and covered with branches to hide what was happening—from the barracks to the building with gas chambers. This path was called the “tube.” As soon as they left the undressing barracks, another special work unit would gather up all the clothing (which would be examined for valuables and taken to storerooms for sorting) and clean the room so the next group of victims could be brought and the process repeated.

The gas chambers at Treblinka used carbon monoxide as its killing agent. It was generated from a large diesel engine in a shed (although some reports refer to other sources for the carbon monoxide) and then piped through to the “shower heads” in the gas chamber. There unsuspecting victims took up to 30 minutes to die.

Disposal of the bodies began after a second set of doors was opened and the remaining gas dissipated. Not far from the gas chambers’ doors were huge trenches where the bodies were buried. This was the case until Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler issued an order in early 1943 to exhume all the buried bodies and burn them in an effort to destroy all evidence of the killing that took place there. This began the horrible process of opening the graves and moving the bodies to large pits with burning pyres, some built using train track railings. The burning continued for several months.

There was a Jewish resistance group at Treblinka that began its planning for an uprising in April 1943, which took place on August 2, 1943. The first step was to break into the armory in the camp and take weapons. Before this could be completed, however, the Germans became aware of the prisoners’ actions, meaning that the prisoners were unable to arm themselves sufficiently to take control of the camp as they had planned. Instead, the resistance group set fire to buildings (but the gas chambers remained unscathed), and hundreds of prisoners stormed the fence surrounding the camp. Fewer than 100 were able to escape and survive until liberation.

The killing operation continued through August 1943. The camp was dismantled throughout that fall and winter, with the gas chambers destroyed and a farmhouse built in its place. Soviet forces entered the camp on August 16, 1944.

The number of Jews killed at Treblinka—there were other groups killed there, such as 2,000 Roma, but the victims were almost all Jews, and almost all from Poland—is staggering. In the 15 months from July 1942, when killing operations first began, until the fall of 1943, when operations ceased, it is estimated that more than 870,000 Jews were killed, including: 254,000 from Warsaw and another 112,000 from the Warsaw district; some 337,000 Jews from the Radom district; 35,000 from the Lublin district; more than 107,000 from Białystok; and approximately 29,000 Jews from other countries, including Greece, Macedonia, Slovakia, and Salonika.

Two postwar trials were held in Düsseldorf related to the perpetrators of these mass killings. The first—from October 12, 1964, until August 24, 1965—tried and convicted 10 defendants, including Commandant Kurt Franz. At the second trial—from May 13 to December 22, 1970—the only defendant was Commandant Franz Stangl. He was sentenced to life in prison.

Triumph of the Spirit

A motion picture produced in 1989, based on the life of a Greek-Jewish boxer named Salamo Arouch, who was a victim of the Nazis incarcerated at Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp between 1943 and 1945. Arouch, who came from the city of Salonika, had represented Greece at the Berlin Olympics in 1936 and was Balkans middleweight champion prior to World War II. On March 15, 1943, with the Nazi assault on the Salonika ghetto, he and his family were deported to Auschwitz. Upon learning Arouch's identity, SS guards in the camp arranged bi-weekly boxing matches involving Jewish and Roma inmates: the winner would receive an additional food ration; the loser would be consigned to the gas chamber at Birkenau. Arouch was reputed to have fought in no fewer than 200 such bouts. Triumph of the Spirit, a motion picture directed by Robert M. Young, starred Willem Dafoe in the role of Salomo Arouch. A controversy regarding the movie arose soon after its release when another Greek-Jewish survivor of the Auschwitz boxing matches, Jacko Razon, claimed that the film actually told his story, not that of Arouch. Nothing came of the controversy, however, and the film, which was shot on location in Auschwitz itself, was met with critical and popular acclaim.

Trocmé, André and Magda

André Trocmé was a French Huguenot pastor who, with his wife Magda, née Grilli di Cortona, directed a remarkable rescue effort of Jewish and other refugees in the village of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon and its surrounding areas, a rural mountainous region in south-central France known as the Plateau Vivarais-Lignon.

Born in Saint-Quentin-en-Tourmont in northern France on April 7, 1901, Trocmé was the son of a French father and German mother, and the product of a strict bourgeois Huguenot upbringing. As an eyewitness to the horrors of World War I, he was shattered by its tremendous violence and the decimation of an entire generation, and advocated for the resolution of conflict through nonviolent means. In 1926 he married the equally dedicated Magda Grilli di Cortona, whom he had met while conducting graduate work at the Union Theological Seminary in New York. They would have four children: Nelly, Jean-Pierre, Jacques, and Daniel.

Trocmé became an outspoken proponent of nonviolence, making him a controversial figure in the French Protestant church. Seeking to limit his influence, he was sent to the remote parish of Le Chambon, though once there he did not hesitate to impart his pacifist convictions into his work. In 1938 he and Pastor Edouard Theis, who came to the village to assist him, opened the École Nouvelle Cévenole, a coeducational secondary school based on the principles of tolerance, pacifism, and internationalism.

Trocmé's preaching was also politically shaded. He spoke out against Nazism in neighboring Germany, pointing out its discriminatory policies toward Jews. With the coming of World War II, his opposition toward the Nazis, and his pacifism, would be tested in a manner he did not anticipate.

In 1940 France capitulated to Germany in a few short weeks. On June 23, 1940, the day after the armistice was signed, Trocmé and Theis emphasized their views in a celebrated sermon directed squarely at their Protestant Huguenot congregation: "The duty of Christians is to resist the violence brought to bear on their consciences with the weapons of the spirit—we will resist whenever our adversaries try to force us to act against the commands of the Gospel. We will do so without fear, but also without pride and without hatred." When the deportations of Jews began in France in 1942, Trocmé urged his congregation to give shelter to "the people of the Bible," the more so as the village and its outlying areas were quickly filled with hundreds of fleeing Jews. Trocmé showed the way by enjoining his congregation to take in refugees—particularly children—in need of sanctuary. From this point on the people of Le Chambon would prove over and over again that they were willing to open their doors courageously to Jews and other persecuted refugees seeking shelter.

Magda Trocmé also assisted refugees in their search for safe havens, connecting them with those prepared to take them in. While not part of any formal resistance network, the efforts of the Trocmés to assist Jews overlapped with the work of many others who were supporting rescue efforts in the area.

As a result, large numbers of people found permanent shelter in and around Le Chambon, while others were sheltered temporarily until a way could be found to smuggle them across the border into Switzerland. They were housed with local townspeople and farmers, in public institutions, and in homes for children. There were many ways in which people provided help. It was not only a matter of families being prepared to accommodate the Jewish refugees; when the Jews (nicknamed “Testaments” by the villagers) arrived at the local train station, designated members of the community would meet them before spiriting them away to their new homes. Schools found ways to accommodate increased enrollments, and fabrications of school registers were made so it appeared as though the children—with changed names—had always been there. With very few dissenters, the entire community of Le Chambon, it seemed, banded together as one in order to rescue Jews.

While the people of Le Chambon were effectively hiding the children “in plain sight,” the Vichy authorities learned of Pastor Trocmé’s clandestine work. Accordingly, in January 1943 he and Pastor Theis, together with the local headmaster, Roger Darcissac, were arrested and imprisoned for several weeks in the St. Paul d’Eyjeaux internment camp for political prisoners, near Limoges. When he was arrested and first told to desist from his rescue activities, Pastor Trocmé made a famous statement: “These people came here for help and for shelter. I am their shepherd. A shepherd does not forsake his flock. . . . I do not know what a Jew is. I know only human beings.”

After a period of imprisonment, they were released through the intervention of several individuals—including André’s cousin Daniel Trocmé, who was also involved in refugee work in Le Chambon, and who was himself later arrested; deported to Majdanek, he died in 1944.

Following his release Pastor Trocmé continued his efforts on behalf of Jews and others in Le Chambon, but he was forced to go into hiding for several months. His absence did not deter the residents of Le Chambon, nor close down the rescue operation he had begun. They continued welcoming persecuted Jews into their homes, providing a sanctuary for them and enabling many to see out the war in relative safety.

No one knows precisely how many Jewish refugees were hidden or saved at Le Chambon during World War II. Some estimates consider about 3,500 Jewish refugees were saved; others range as high as 5,000, taking into account those Jews who at least passed through Le Chambon and vicinity, as well as those who remained for any length of time.

After the war, André and Magda Trocmé continued the cause of nonviolent resolution of problems, with André serving as European secretary for the International Fellowship of Reconciliation, a nongovernmental pacifist organization founded in 1914 in response to the horrors of war in Europe. He spent his final years as pastor of a Reformed Church in Geneva.

On January 5, 1971, Yad Vashem recognized Pastor André Trocmé as one of the Righteous among the Nations, with Magda receiving the same recognition on May 14, 1984. In an unprecedented move, in 1998 Yad Vashem presented this honor to the entire village of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon.

Pastor André Trocmé died on June 5, 1971, in Geneva, followed by his wife Magda on October 10, 1996, in Paris. Both are buried in the family grave in Le Chambon.

The Truce

An Italian-produced motion picture, filmed in English-language dialogue, recounting the post-Holocaust return of Italian Jew Primo Levi from his liberation at the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp to his home in Italy. The movie covers a period of nine months, during which Levi, played by actor John Turturro, is shunted around eastern Europe under the direction of Soviet liberation troops. Given the multinational composition of the prisoner body, Levi shares his experiences with other Italians, Poles, Greeks, Russians, and—always present—German soldiers who had been forced to surrender to the Red Army. The movie was directed by veteran Italian filmmaker Francesco Rosi and released in the United States through Miramax Films in 1996. The Truce, based on Levi’s 1963 memoir (La Tregua), is a movie proceeding from an uncommon scenario, namely, a postgenocidal situation. While many (perhaps most) Holocaust and genocide-related movies deal with events surrounding the period of the killing, The Truce is unique in addressing the multitude of issues facing survivors upon their liberation. For this reason, it stands alone within its genre.

Turkey

Often referred to as the bridge between Europe and the East, Turkey was officially neutral in World War II until months before the end of the conflict, when, on February 23, 1945, it declared war on Germany. The extent of its efforts to save Turkish Jews from the ravages of the Nazis, however, belies that characterization of neutrality.

Once the heart of the mighty and wide-flung Ottoman Empire, Turkey had seen that empire diminish in size and power beginning in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. By the late 19th and early 20th centuries it was known as “the Sick Man of Europe.” Its theocratic government held back its development while other countries in Europe were experiencing the new thinking of the Enlightenment and a general growth in prosperity. This led to a revolution in the early 20th century when the religious and political leader of Turkey—Sultan Abdul Hamid II—was overthrown by a Turkish reform group called the Young Turks. Although promising sweeping reforms and modernization, the Young Turks soon turned from that orientation to one of extreme nationalism, pan-Turkism, and expansionist irredentism.

The plans of the Young Turks to restore Turkey and the Ottoman Empire to its former glory were stalled when the western Balkan countries of Bulgaria, Greece, Montenegro, and Serbia formed the Balkan League and broke free from the empire in the Balkan War of 1912, greatly diminishing the empire’s presence in Europe. During World War I, when it was allied with Germany and the Central Powers, Turkey again found itself on the losing end of a significant and humiliating military defeat, this against the Russians at the Battle of Sarikamish in January 1915.

Turkey was more than an ally with Germany in World War I. Its army became in some respects an extension of the German military. In an effort to improve the ill-trained and poorly disciplined Turkish army, Germany embedded officers into virtually every Turkish unit. Despite this infusion of leadership and weaponry by the Germans, and notwithstanding its victory at Gallipoli in 1915, Turkey’s overall experience in World War I—its relationship with Germany, the losses it suffered on the battlefield, and the difficult conditions at home—left Turkey reluctant to take sides in World War II. Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, who became president of Turkey in October 1923, sought to modernize Turkey during the interwar years. To that end, he invited the leading scholars and scientists of Europe—including Jews—to live in Turkey and contribute to its movement forward.

Turkey’s neutrality during World War II provided some level of security to Jews living there and also gave it diplomatic access to Germany and its occupied countries. Thus, for example, the Turkish embassy in Vichy France was able to play a significant role in protecting the approximately 10,000 Turkish Jews living there. These efforts were spearheaded by diplomats on the ground—the ambassador, consuls, and deputy consuls—but were fully supported by the Turkish government, as seen by the direct intervention by the Turkish foreign minister and the president in early 1944 when the Vichy government planned to deport all of its Turkish Jews to “the East,” meaning to the extermination camps of Poland. The plan was cancelled.

Turkey defied the Germans in a number of ways. It refused to close the Bosphorus Strait or the Dardanelles, something requested by Germany because they were waterways by which Jewish refugees attempted to flee Europe. It allowed Jews who reached Turkey to continue to its southern coast and the Mediterranean Sea for travel to Palestine. If turned back by the British, those Jews were given safe harbor in Turkey. It allowed for the presence of various Jewish organizations—for example, the Jewish Agency—on Turkish soil to help bring European Jews to safety and, ultimately, to Palestine.

Turkish diplomats were especially active. The Turkish ambassador to France, as well as consuls in Paris and Marseilles, made certain that Jews’ papers proving Turkish citizenship were up-to-date and issued false citizenship cards if necessary. But their most significant efforts were made to exempt Turkish Jews living in France from the many and onerous anti-Jewish laws and regulations applicable to French Jews. They did this by sending strong official statements to French diplomats, in which they rejected the argument made by those diplomats that by living in France, Turkish Jews were implicitly accepting the rules and regulations of that country.

The basis on which Turkish diplomats made their arguments was a simple and courageous one: that Turkey did not treat its citizens differently because of religion, and therefore would not allow other countries to do so. Although this was not consistent with its treatment of the Armenians, Greeks, and Assyrians during World War I, Turkey's diplomats—especially Selahattin Ülkümen, the Turkish consul general on the island of Rhodes; Namik Kemal Yolga, the Turkish deputy consul general in Paris; Necdet Kent, the deputy consul general in Marseille; and Behiç Erkin, the Turkish ambassador to Paris—argued again and again that Turkish Jews were not to be subject to any rules or restrictions based on their religion.

When Germany and France sent notice that all foreign Jews needed to be repatriated to their homelands no later than May 1944 or else they would become subject to the rules applicable to all Jews, Turkish diplomats arranged for trains to return some 2,000 Jews to the safety of Turkey.

It was not just Turkish Jews that Turkish diplomats helped. Jews in Eastern Europe—in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia, among other places—as well as Jews in Greece also benefited from their efforts. And it was not just its diplomats who did the helping. The papal nuncio to France—Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli (who would become Pope John XXIII)—helped many Jews to survive the Nazi onslaught.

There was one significant lapse in Turkey's generally protective attitude toward Jews. In December 1941, a ship—the Struma—filled with more than 780 (some accounts put the number at 769) Romanian Jewish refugees on their way to Palestine was towed into Istanbul (its engine had died). While British and Turkish officials argued over the Struma's right to continue on to Palestine, its passengers were not allowed to disembark. They were restricted to the ship because of Turkey's fear that if the British did not let them enter Palestine, Turkey would have to take them in. Finally, on February 23, 1942, the ship was allowed to proceed (it had to be towed from Istanbul; its engine was still not working), but on the next day it was torpedoed by a Soviet submarine, killing all passengers and crew.

The estimates of the number of Jews saved because of the efforts made by the Turkish government and its diplomats vary widely, from a low of 15,000 to a high of 100,000, with the consensus somewhere between 20,000 and 30,000.

U

Ukraine

In 1939 Ukraine was a Soviet socialist republic and had a population of 41.34 million. The republic had a sizable Jewish population, and in places like Kiev, Jews made up 25% or more of the total. In Odessa the figure was estimated to be almost 35%. Although most Ukrainians lived in the Soviet republic in 1939, a number of Ukrainians also lived in areas controlled by Hungary, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. When the Germans attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, Ukraine was hit severely, and Jews suffered grievously, chiefly because of Nazi policies that sought their complete extermination in the region. Indeed, the Germans hoped to clear Ukraine of much of its native population so that it could be used as a German colony after the war.

Even prior to Operation Barbarossa, Ukraine had seen substantial misery. Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin's drive to collectivize Ukraine's overwhelmingly agricultural production sector during the late 1920s and 1930 resulted in widespread famine that had wiped out several million Ukrainians by the mid-1930s. The economic dislocation this fostered brought hardship to urban Jews in Ukraine, and some non-Jews blamed the Jews for the country's general economic misfortune.

Prior to the German invasion, antisemitism in Ukraine was certainly an undeniable part of everyday life for most Jews, but it was not nearly as pervasive as it was in other parts of Europe, and the Soviet government did not, as a general rule, sponsor antisemitic laws or ordinances. In fact, Ukraine's Jewish population had been increasing since the late 1930s as Jews living further west fled east, away from the threat posed by Nazism. Between June and September 1941, however, as German armies fought their way into Ukraine, some 100,000 Jews evacuated the capital of Kiev. That, however, still left some 60,000 Jews in the city, most of whom were ill, elderly, women, or children.

Alleging—falsely—that the Jews had been responsible for bombings in Kiev as German troops secured the city, German mobile killing squads (Einsatzgruppen) retaliated by promulgating one of the worst single incidents of mass killing in the history of the war. On September 29–30 the killing squads shot civilians—most of them Jews—execution style at Babi Yar, just outside Kiev. Also killed were Roma, Soviet prisoners of war, and anyone suspected of being a communist. In two days 33,771 men, women, and children were killed. Some claim the true number killed might be closer to 100,000. The following month, German and Romanian troops murdered some 50,000 Jews in Odessa.

In all, the Einsatzgruppen were probably responsible for the deaths of 500,000 Jews in Ukraine between 1941 and 1944. Many more Jews were deported to concentration, forced labor, or death camps, where the vast majority of them died or were murdered. German extermination policies alone were responsible for the deaths of at least 3 million Ukrainians; as many as 900,000–1,000,000 were Jewish. The mass murders were sometimes committed with the help of local collaborators.

The Soviets began retaking Ukrainian territory in late 1943, slowly pushing the Germans to the west. In November Kiev was liberated, but the city's entire prewar Jewish population had by then been slaughtered. It took the Soviets until May 1944 to liberate most of Ukraine, but the Ukraine military campaign only added to the Ukrainians' misery. In July 1944 Soviet troops secured all of the country, and Ukraine once more became a Soviet republic. It would remain so until it declared its independence on August 24, 1991, at the end of the Cold War.

UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

The United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (UNCG) is a comprehensive international legal convention that details the definition and meanings of genocide and provides very general guidelines for the punishment of genocide perpetrators. The United Nations General Assembly was promulgated on December 9, 1948, and signed by 22 member states on December 11, 1948, who agreed to then proceed to ratification by their own home governments. The Convention, which remains in force, recognizes that genocide is a crime under international law.

The UNCG's definition of genocide has not been without its critics. Some have argued that it is unnecessarily expansive, as it enumerates behaviors that are not necessarily lethal. That seems to fly in the face of the philology of the term "genocide," which literally means the killing of people. Others detractors have asserted that the Convention does not go far enough, because it does not include the killing of people on the basis of political or social affiliations in the definition of genocide. This was the result of several states' efforts, including those of the United States and Soviet Union, to exclude politics and social affiliations from the definition for specific internal political reasons. Also absent are groups identified on the grounds of gender or sexual orientation, or cultural group. Despite these concerns, however, the UNCG has remained an important component of international law and has been invoked many times since 1948.

The UNCG would probably not have been approved when it was had it not been for the herculean effort of one man: Raphael Lemkin. Lemkin, a Polish Jew, was a lawyer and historian who fled Poland in 1939 and settled in the United States in 1941. By then, he had already spent much time contemplating mass murder and its implications for the international community. He published and lectured widely on the subject, and in 1944 he coined the term "genocide" in his book Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress. That book placed Lemkin's quest to enact an international convention against genocide in the public spotlight. In 1945 he published an article, "Genocide—A Modern Crime," which was read widely and lent even more credence to his efforts.

In 1945–1946 Lemkin served as a legal adviser to the Nuremberg war crime trials in Germany, and he redoubled his efforts to push for a global convention against genocide. In 1946 Lemkin was told that his idea of a genocide convention would be formally considered by a UN committee. Although the proposal encountered some turbulence early on, the UN General Assembly unanimously approved a convention banning genocide in December 1948. By then, however, Lemkin had seriously undermined his own health in his quest to establish a genocide convention. The convention went into effect on January 21, 1951, and until the end of his life in 1959, Lemkin worked tirelessly to secure U.S. ratification of the measure. That would not occur until November 4, 1988, however, when President Ronald Reagan signed the ratification agreement.

Today, there are still only 41 signatories to the UNCG. Nevertheless, it is regarded as the bedrock of international law dealing with war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. A number of courts have since been established to indict and prosecute such crimes, including the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, and the International Criminal Court. All of these owe their jurisdiction in to the UNCG.

United Partisan Organization

The United Partisan Organization (Fareynegte Partizaner Organizatzye, or FPO) was a Jewish anti-German underground organization in the ghetto of Vilna (Vilnius) during World War II. Throughout December 1941 a number of meetings were held involving members of various Jewish youth groups in Vilna, in which options for resistance to the Nazis were discussed. Over time, a nascent resistance movement began to form, and it was decided to remain in the ghetto and fight rather than trying to escape. On December 31, 1941, before a gathering of 150 members of the He-Halutz (Pioneer) youth movement at Straszuna 2, Abba Kovner made a speech in which he proclaimed that "Hitler plans to destroy all the Jews of Europe, and the Jews of Lithuania have been chosen as the first in line. We will not be led like sheep to the slaughter!" Kovner declared that all the Jews who were taken from Vilna were murdered in the Ponary Forest, and he called upon the Jewish youth to organize for armed struggle against the Germans.

Three weeks later, on January 21, 1942, the Fareynigte Partizaner Organizatzye was established. A meeting was held at the home of Josef Glazman. Representatives from Vilna's major Jewish youth groups met: Abba Kovner, from Hashomer Hatzair; Glazman, from Betar; Yitzhak Wittenberg and Chyena Borowska, representing the communists; and Nissan Reznik of Hanoar Hazioni. Other groups came into the movement soon after.

That the groups had agreed to unite, given the fractious nature of Jewish communal politics before the war, was an indication of just how serious the matter was, and Kovner played an important role in the unification process. In forming themselves into a formal resistance movement, the group had multiple aims: to prepare for mass armed resistance in the ghetto; to perform acts of sabotage; to join the partisans where possible; and to convey the message to other ghettos that they, too, should revolt. Wittenberg was appointed commander, with Glazman and Kovner his staff officers. The FPO was one of the first ghetto resistance organizations to be established.

The FPO was organized into two battalions, each composed of 100 to 120 fighters. It sent emissaries to Grodno, Białystok, and Warsaw to promote the idea of resistance, as well as to inform them of the mass extermination of the Jews that had been taking place in Vilna. An attempt was also made to send several female emissaries (kashariyot) into the Soviet Union, but they were arrested by the Germans before they reached safety. Most managed to escape, however, and made their way back to Vilna.

At its height, the FPO had some 300 organized members. They carried out acts of sabotage beyond the ghetto confines, such as mining railway lines used by trains going to the front lines; they sabotaged weapons and equipment in German factories where underground members worked, and they created documents for fellow Jews. Where possible, they also attempted to obtain weapons, buying some from the local Polish population and stealing them and then smuggling them into the ghetto from a nearby German arsenal. FPO members also prepared and stored Molotov cocktails for use whenever an uprising might take place. Before they had the opportunity to do so, however, fate intervened.

In early 1943 a Polish communist by the name of Kozlovsky was captured by the Gestapo. Under extreme torture, he was forced to divulge the names of any other resisters, and one, a Lithuanian partisan named Vitas, was revealed. Vitas was also captured. When in due course he also was tortured, he surrendered the name of Yitzhak Wittenberg, the FPO commander.

Jacob Gens, the chairman of the Vilna Jewish Council (Judenrat), knew of the FPO's existence and had maintained contact with Wittenberg and other leaders. On July 8, 1943, when the Germans learned about the existence of the FPO, they ordered Gens to find Wittenberg and deliver him to them. Gens might have privately sympathized with the ideals of the resistance but held that its existence endangered the continued existence of the ghetto. Thus, on the night of July 15, Gens, together with Salek Desler, chief of the Jewish police, called Wittenberg and others from the underground to his office for a "meeting." It was a trap; after a few moments, armed SS men appeared with machine guns drawn. Desler identified Wittenberg, who was immediately arrested.

Members of the FPO who had accompanied the leaders to the meeting and were waiting outside attacked the Gestapo and rescued him. Furious, the Nazis told Gens that if he did not bring Wittenberg back at once they would liquidate the ghetto. Ghetto inhabitants now took a stand. Terrified, they demanded that Wittenberg be handed over, lest they and their families be deported to their deaths. The choice was clear: surrender Wittenberg or civil war would break out in the ghetto.

During the day Wittenberg met with members of the leadership group. He thought of taking his life, but word came from Gens that the Germans had demanded him alive. Abba Kovner told Wittenberg the sad truth that either he hand himself across or the FPO would be forced to fight the people who were demanding that he give himself up. Wittenberg would not tolerate the idea of Jew fighting Jew while the Nazis looked on, and so, regrettably, he handed command over to Kovner and went out into the street with the words “Ich gehe” (“I Go”) and gave himself up to the Jewish police. Gens accepted the surrender in person.

Wittenberg was taken out of the ghetto and handed across to the Germans, who placed him in a cell. When they came to begin his interrogation the next day, they found him dead. He had taken poison—some said it was smuggled to him by Gens—in order to avoid the torture that was awaiting him.

In July 1943 Abba Kovner became the leader of the FPO, but a rift had opened within the organization. Some members argued that the ghetto could not be defended because most Jews were not prepared to fight; the best way to resist the Nazis, they felt, was through escaping to the forest where they would join the partisans. The first group of 21 left on July 24, 1943, calling themselves the “Leon” unit in honor of Wittenberg’s resistance codename. Others remained.

Six weeks later, on September 1, 1943, the Nazis began liquidating the ghetto. Led by Kovner, the remaining FPO commanders issued a call for the Jews not to go “like sheep to slaughter,” and rose in revolt. The fighters, however, had little support from the inhabitants, who thought they were being sent elsewhere to work. The FPO saw that they were fighting alone and gave up on a ghetto uprising for lack of support. Escaping to the forests through the sewers, they were met by those who had joined the partisans earlier and were already under Soviet command. Here, they were able to establish themselves as Jewish battalions within the Soviet partisan movement. Over time, however, some of the Jewish units were disbanded and their members absorbed, while others were joined by non-Jewish partisans. This came about as a result of a Red Army directive, which was opposed to the idea of separate Jewish units.

Meanwhile, back in the ghetto, most of those who did not join the revolt—the majority—were captured and sent to labor camps in Estonia, where they were eventually killed by the SS. FPO members, on the other hand, now that they had been transformed into Soviet partisans, lived to participate in the liberation of Vilna by the Red Army on July 13, 1944.

United States Holocaust Memorial Museum

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., is both a memorial to the Holocaust and its victims and a study center on the Holocaust and genocide more broadly. Since its opening in 1993, more than 30 million people have visited it, with the numbers increasing every year.

The archival collection is massive: 50 million pages of records, 13,000 artifacts, 80,000 photographs, and a listing of several hundred thousand survivors. It has developed 10,000 oral histories. The memorial was built on land adjacent to the Washington Mall, with $190 million in private donations.

Although its primary function is educational, the pilgrimage aspect of its halls and memorials are what attract most visitors. James Ingo Freed, the museum’s architect—himself a Holocaust survivor—designed the memorial as “a resonator of memory.” The Hall of Remembrance is a large octagonal room of great simplicity; it has an eternal flame.

The permanent exhibition is a disconcerting experience intended to draw the visitor into the experiences of the Holocaust. It avoids the museum display approach for one of involvement. Visitors arrive at the exhibits by an industrial elevator, where they receive the identification card of a real Holocaust victim. They exit the elevator to walk through a history of the Holocaust with pictures and videos, including survivors’ accounts. The fate of “their” prisoner is shown in the identification card they have held throughout the duration of their visit.

Hate groups have made the memorial a focus of attacks on several occasions. On June 10, 2009, Museum Special Police Officer Stephen Tyrone Johns was shot by an antisemite, James Wenneker von Brunn, who later died in prison.

January 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau, is observed as International Holocaust Remembrance Day with a candle-lighting ceremony at the museum. During the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in April, a week of observances is held. The Holocaust Memorial Museum holds the national ceremony on the steps of the Capitol rotunda.

United States Response to the Holocaust

The American response to the Holocaust was marked by pronounced hesitancy. It was also conditioned by U.S. cultural biases, antisemitism, politics, media coverage, and Allied war aims.

After World War I, Americans retreated into a period of considerable isolation. Many believed that turning inward and staying out of the affairs of the world—especially Europe—would insulate their nation from conflict and war. This isolationism was reinforced by the advent of the Great Depression of the 1930s and further reinforced by a profound sense of xenophobia—the intense dislike and distrust of anyone or anything deemed “foreign.”

It is no surprise, then, that the U.S. Congress began enacting legislation beginning in 1921 that greatly curtailed immigration to the United States. The Immigration Act of 1924 further limited immigration, and, because of the way it was structured, it most severely curtailed immigration from southern and Eastern Europe (the latter region where most of the world's Jews resided). In 1940, citing national security concerns, the U.S. government delayed or cancelled visa approvals from Nazi Germany and Austria. And after the U.S. entrance into World War II in December 1941, the small stream of immigrants to America virtually dried up.

Most of the Jews who made it to the United States before the Holocaust (about 150,000 of them) arrived prior to 1941.

Another factor affecting the U.S. response to the Holocaust included pronounced antisemitism among many non-Jewish Americans. Indeed, the U.S. State Department was especially suffused with antisemitism, and State Department official Breckinridge Long actively worked to prevent Jewish refugees from migrating to the United States. Even American Jews themselves were conflicted in their response to the Holocaust. Although many Jews supported the Democratic Party and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, they were hesitant to press the president too strongly over immigration and refugees, fearing an antisemitic backlash.

The American press also played a role in U.S. ambivalence toward the Holocaust. Most media outlets did not emphasize or even report on German atrocities committed against Jews. They tended to focus on U.S. war aims and how American GIs were faring in Europe and Asia. Even America's preeminent news daily, the New York Times, tended to shy away from coverage of the Holocaust. This bias against Holocaust coverage continued even after 1942, when the enormity of the German atrocities had become known in the West.

From a political standpoint, Roosevelt stood little to gain but much to lose if he moved too hastily on the issue of immigration and Jewish refugees. For the Americans, as well as their British, French, and Soviet allies, winning the war was of paramount importance. If aiding the Jews in Europe could have brought a speedier conclusion to the war, the Allies would probably have done so. But relieving the Jews' plight, no matter how horrific, was very much tangential to winning the war.

All of this is not to say, however, that the Americans did nothing to alleviate the plight of European Jews. In March 1938, after the German annexation of Austria, Roosevelt called for a conference to determine the disposition of thousands of German and Austrian Jews seeking to flee Nazi persecution. The resulting July 1938 Evian Conference, involving delegates from the United States and 31 other nations, ended with no firm policies toward lifting restrictive immigrations, however. In December 1942 the United States and its allies issued a joint statement specifically condemning the Germans for engaging in mass murder against the Jews, but this was the only such statement made during the entirety of the war and did not lead to a change in Allied war aims. Furthermore, by then, 2 million Jews had already been deported to concentration camps, and several hundred thousand others had been systematically killed.

American Jews were buoyed briefly by the 1943 Bermuda Conference, where the issue of Jewish refugees was to be discussed. That meeting, however, was obscured in secrecy and sidelined by discussions of prisoners of war and other issues unrelated to the Holocaust. In early 1944 Roosevelt created the War Refugee Board, upon the urging of his Treasury secretary, Henry Morgenthau Jr., which aided some Jews in gaining easier access to America, but it was largely too little too late.

The United States and its allies had several opportunities to intervene in the Holocaust, but for reasons that are not altogether clear, they refused to do so. Clearly, however, a combination of war aims, internal and international politics, and antisemitism combined to play a role in this inaction. Inexplicably, the Allies decided not to bomb rail lines leading to the Auschwitz death camp in Poland, even after it was clear what was taking place there. Some Allied planners wanted to bomb the camp but were rebuffed. Late in the conflict, when Adolf Eichmann made it known that he would “ransom” Hungary’s Jews for cash payments, Washington, London, and Moscow demurred. The offer may well have been insincere, but the Allies did not pursue it. In the end, America’s response to the Holocaust was regrettably slow, episodic, and far too tepid. But it also mirrored the reactions of the international community as a whole.

two major institutions of German society—other than the government itself—were the church and the university. Each had to determine how it would react to the Nazi regime.

A significant number of Protestant churches—called the German Christians—embraced Nazi ideology and integrated it into their concept of Christianity, while others—called the Confessing Church—sought to keep Nazism out of Christianity. The Catholic Church entered into an agreement with the Nazi government just months after Hitler’s appointment as chancellor, agreeing to keep out of the politics of the regime in exchange for the promise (honored more in the breach than in fact) by the government to keep away from the church’s primary responsibilities, namely, religious worship, education of the young, and maintaining its humanitarian organizations, such as hospitals and orphanages.

Just as the Protestant and Catholic churches were forced to find accommodation with the new regime, so too were universities: How would they deal with the national program at the heart of the new regime’s vision for governing, namely, nazification?

On April 7, 1933, the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service required the dismissal of Jews from the civil service. The section of the law that called for this is referred to as the “Aryan paragraph.” The application of the Aryan paragraph to the church would require the dismissal from the clergy of all non-Aryans if they were considered to be Jews as the state defined them. This would also apply to parishioners by requiring that so-called “Jewish-Christians,” meaning Jews who had converted to Christianity, no longer be considered members of the church. The application of the Aryan paragraph was a matter of heated debate, with the German Christians arguing that it did apply, and the Confessing Church arguing the opposite.

No such questions existed regarding the application of the Aryan paragraph to German universities since, as state-funded institutions, they were subject to the April 7, 1933, law regarding the civil service, meaning that all employees of universities—faculty, staff, and governing bodies—were state employees. This set in motion a crisis for each university; if they were to follow this law it meant the dismissal of all Jewish faculty, a move that would have a different impact on each university, since some—such as the University of Tübingen—had never given a full professorship to a Jew, while others would find their faculty greatly reduced by such a move. In all, some 1,200 Jewish faculty members were dismissed as a result of this law.

The decision to dismiss Jewish faculty on the sole basis of their being Jewish created a moral conflict for some of the Universities, Complicity in the Holocaust

A key component of Nazi ideology was the concept of Gleichschaltung, the coordination of individuals and institutions with Nazi ideology; what is often called “nazification.” The non-Jewish faculty. While some were fervent supporters of the Nazi government and ideology, others found the intrusion of the government in affairs of the university to be an assault on the pursuit of knowledge that is the purpose of the university, and an invasion of free speech and free thought that should be subject only to reason and the accepted standards of scholarship. The issue of academic freedom became even more acute for some when the Reich minister of education required that university curricula include courses and programs consistent with Nazi thought and goals, especially those courses that extolled past German accomplishments and power. To be excluded from curricula were courses that might acknowledge the role of the Jewish people in history, or shine a neutral or positive light on the Jews. Courses in the humanities were relegated to a secondary position, and courses in the sciences were elevated. New courses on “racial science” abounded.

Whatever their discomfort with these requirements, only a very few faculty members in all of Germany’s universities voiced opposition to the new Nazi rules. This might well be explained by the ability of the new government to intimidate opposition thinking, reminding any faculty member so inclined that the newly established camp, Dachau, had been established for just these purposes. Also, the absolute certainty that speaking up would result in the immediate loss of one’s job no doubt discouraged many from objecting.

Intimidation by the government and the fear of losing one’s job, however, is only part of the explanation for the acceptance by universities and their faculties of requirements that cut at the foundation of Western civilization’s concept of higher education. Universities as a whole in Germany were bastions of conservatism and nationalism. Members of their governing bodies and faculty, like so many other elements of German society, felt the humiliation of the loss of World War I, suffered through the ensuing economic crises—hyperinflation and the worldwide depression set off by the Wall Street crash of 1939—rejected the ill-fitting and ineffective Weimar Republic, and yearned for a return to German glory. Further, they, too, were the products of the antisemitism that continued to sweep across Germany, especially now that it was a keystone of the Nazi government.

The next step in the Nazi efforts to close off higher education to Jews came on April 25, 1933, when the Law against Overcrowding in Schools and Universities set forth the requirements that had to be met regarding the makeup of student enrollment in order for universities to be considered sufficiently nazified. The law imposed a limit on the number of new admissions of Jewish students to colleges or universities at the percentage of Jews in the general population, a number that was less than 1%. The nationwide quota for new admissions was later set at 1.5% of the total applicants. Second, the percentage of Jewish students enrolled in a college or university could not exceed 5% of a school’s total student population. Given the disproportionately high percentage of Jews enrolled in colleges and universities in Germany in the 1930s, this meant the expulsion of a significant number of Jewish students.

As with the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service passed several weeks earlier, the Law against Overcrowding in Schools and Universities contained certain exceptions, limited, however, to children of World War I veterans and children of certain mixed marriages.

Non-Jewish students at universities were in many cases radical antisemites and supporters (if not members) of the Nazi Party. Many students pushed for the dismissal of Jewish faculty, protested against their reinstatement if that was being considered, and railed against the continuing enrollment of any Jewish students. Much of the pro-Nazi and anti-Jewish fervor came from the National Socialist Student League ((Nationalsozialistischer Deutscher Studentenbund, or NSDStB), and some of it spilled over into violence against Jewish students and faculty. It was from the rabid antisemitism of students in German universities that book burning took place across Nazi Germany on and after May 10, 1933.

In November 1938, just one week after the murder of Ernst vom Rath by Herschel Grynszpan that touched off the pogrom called Kristallnacht, a decree was issued by the Reich minister of education prohibiting Jews from attending lectures or even entering university buildings. The elimination of Jews from all aspects of universities in Nazi Germany was complete.

Uprising

Made in 2001, Uprising is a motion picture about the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of April–May 1943. Produced and directed by U.S. filmmaker Jon Avnet, the film has an all-star cast including Leelee Sobieski, Hank Azaria, David Schwimmer, Jon Voight, and Donald Sutherland. A long film of nearly three hours' duration, Uprising explores the background to the Warsaw Ghetto revolt, the resistance leadership, and the heroism of the revolt itself. The style adopted by Avnet is semi-documentary in format, telling the story in a linear fashion through the eyes of the main historical characters involved: Adam Czerniakow, Mordecai Anielewicz, Yitzhak Zuckerman, and SS Major General Jürgen Stroop, among others. Considered by many to be a definitive cinematic interpretation of the Warsaw Ghetto Revolt, Uprising won or was nominated for numerous awards, including Emmys and Golden Globes. Although a made-for-television movie, it also had short seasons in selected cinemas throughout the English-speaking world, usually showings to packed houses.

Upstander

An upstander is an individual, group, or institution that performs a positive action in order to aid a person or group of people who are the victims of injustice and/or are in distress. The term is most commonly associated with those who have stood up to help the victims of genocide and persecution, sometimes at great personal risk. But there are in fact different types of upstanders, including those who help the poor and disadvantaged and civil rights activists, among many others. Common tactics employed by upstanders include bringing attention to the plight of victims, advocating for government policies to help those being persecuted, and directly intervening in situations in order to protect and save lives. An example of this would be the people in German-occupied countries during World War II who let Jews hide in their homes in order to protect them from the Nazis.

This is in contrast to a bystander, who knows that someone is suffering injustice but takes no action.

In more recent years, the term upstander has been employed to counter bullying, mostly in school situations. In this case, upstanders can play a wide variety of roles, from directly challenging a bully, protecting a person or group from bullying, or promoting an atmosphere in which bullying is discouraged. Indeed, in states like Texas, educators have gone even further, teaching about genocide within the context of bullying. Upstanders in anti-bullying programs can include students who positively defend themselves or others from bullies; individuals who report bullying to teachers, parents, or others in authority; or those who attempt to change social and cultural attitudes to ensure that bullying is discouraged or eliminated. There are currently a number of websites and organizations that focus on upstanders and bullying, such as the National School Climate Center, the Holocaust Memorial Resource and Education Center of Florida, Stomp out Bullying, and the National Bullying Center.

The Holocaust spawned countless upstanders who assisted Jews in one way or another or helped hide them. There were upstanders in every country touched by the Holocaust, and many tried to help or intervene at great personal peril, as most places occupied by the Germans had passed laws (or had laws imposed on them) that made aiding or hiding Jews a capital crime. Some of the more famous Holocaust upstanders, whom the world Jewish community and the State of Israel refer to as Righteous Among the Nations (Hebrew, Chasidei umot Ha-olam), include: Miep Gies, who hid Anne Frank, her family, and several other Jews in Amsterdam between 1942 and 1944; Raoul Wallenberg, who helped rescue thousands of Jews from near certain-death in Hungary; and Oskar Schindler, who shielded some 1,200 Jews from deportation or death by employing them in his manufacturing business. Well over 25,000 such people have been recognized by Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust authority in Jerusalem.

Examples of upstanders who in some way intervened in other genocides include: Nicholas D. Kristof, an American journalist who helped publicize the recent genocide in Darfur; Paul Rusesabagina, a hotel manager in Kigala who shielded some 1,300 mostly Tutsi refugees during the 1994 Rwandan Genocide; Rigoberta Menchú, who wrote passionately about her experiences during the Guatemalan Genocide, thus focusing world attention on it; and Dith Pran, a Cambodian journalist who revealed fully to the world the horrors of the genocide in Cambodia. Upstanders not tied to genocide per se are legion, and they include civil and human rights activists in the United States and abroad, women's rights activists, antiwar activists, antipoverty activists, and even environmental activists. People involved in these activities are considered upstanders because they adopt a positive stand toward a particular wrong or problem and are acting on behalf of others or themselves.

USC Shoah Foundation

Established in 1994 by American filmmaker Steven Spielberg, the USC Shoah Foundation Institute for Visual History and Education (formerly Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation) moved with considerable speed toward realizing the vision of a video-based, interactive archive of tens of thousands of survivor testimonies, an irrefutable record that transforms our understanding of Holocaust history and influences the way in which all history and the social sciences are taught and learned. In 2006 the foundation commenced a partnership with the University of Southern California (Los Angeles), which has permitted the foundation to increase its presence among scholars and educators by making its history search technologies and archival holdings available to more people. The foundation has also expanded its purview and collection to other genocides, although the Holocaust remains its principal focus. Currently, the foundation's archival staff is working on a project to document and make available for viewing thousands of victims' and survivors' testimonies from the Rwandan genocide of 1994.

Since its establishment, the foundation has conducted or collected more than 52,000 interviews with Holocaust survivors in more than 30 languages and 50 countries. It has also developed an indexing system—a thesaurus—to make survivor testimonies fully accessible through keywords, geographical locations, and biographical information; and it has developed technology that provides electronic viewing capacity at numerous locations around the world. In addition, the indexing system is being used to create other genocide databases, to include the Rwandan genocide. Interviews in languages other than English are subtitled so anyone may watch and understand them.

The Shoah Foundation's multimedia archive of eyewitness testimonies of the Holocaust is the world's largest interview archive ever assembled of a single event. It would require nearly 12 years to watch all the testimonies from start to finish.

Looking up and accessing material is quite simple. The key can be a single word or person's name. An end-user types these words at a computer interface at any one of the Shoah Foundation's repository sites at museums and educational institutions around the world—words like “lullaby,” “Auschwitz” or “liberator.” These keywords will call up relevant sections of all the catalogued testimonies in the archive that touch upon this theme. Researchers may search within individual testimonies as well as across the entire collection with the touch of a finger.

A team of historians, archivists, and information technologists developed the foundation's English-language keyword authority list as well as the digital technology and custom-designed software that support it and make the accessing process easy. The index is supplemented by tens of thousands of additional personal and place names contained in the archive database.

While the outline of Holocaust history is well known, human stories, the stories from which we can perhaps learn the most, are now coming to light through the Shoah Foundation's and other projects' efforts. Many of the testimonies in the foundation's archive contain information previously unknown to historians and the world at large. The purpose of the Shoah Foundation is to gather interviews; catalogue them; disseminate them to named repositories, the most notable of which include Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., New York's Museum of Jewish Heritage, and the Fortunoff Video Archive for Holocaust Testimonies at Yale University; and then to make this material available for educators, scholars, historians, and filmmakers to learn the story of the Holocaust and other genocides and to teach tolerance in classrooms. The foundation also offers online exhibits, classroom products and lesson plans, documentary films, teacher workshops, and international forums so teachers from around the world may interact on issues relating to the foundation's databases.

Ustashe

The Ustashe (literally, “rebels”) was an extreme right-wing Croat nationalist movement that fought for the secession of Croatia from Yugoslavia prior to and during World War II. Following the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918, the Croat nationalists were disappointed to see their dreams of an independent Croatia crushed with the establishment of a new multiethnic state, the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, later to be known as the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. Croat radical nationalism eventually expressed itself in the creation of the Ustashe, which employed terrorist means in order to achieve its nationalist ambitions of an independent state.

The start of World War II provided the Ustashe with an opportunity to try to establish an independent Croatia. In 1941 the Ustashe came to power with the support of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy and formed a fascist puppet state in Croatia. Governed by Ante Pavelić (1889–1959), Croatia incorporated Bosnia and Herzegovina and had a significant Serb population. The Ustashe pursued a policy of ethnic cleansing against Jews, Roma, Muslims, and Serbs in territories under its control. It established a network of concentration camps, the largest of which was Jasenovac (about 60 miles south of the Croatian capital of Zagreb) that became as notorious in the Balkans as Auschwitz was in Nazi-occupied Poland. Implemented with merciless brutality, the Ustashe's extermination policies were responsible for the deaths of more than 500,000 Serbs, 20,000 Roma, most of the country's Jews, and untold thousands of political opponents. Well over 150,000 Serbs fled or were deported from Croatia, and as many as 200,000 Orthodox Christians were forced, often at gunpoint, to convert to Roman Catholicism.

Yugoslav resistance to the Germans and their supporters, the Croatian Ustashe and Serbian general Milan Nedić's government, centered on two factions. Colonel Dragoljub “Draza” Mihajlovic, who strongly supported restoration of the monarchy, set up the Chetniks (named for Serb guerrillas who had fought the Turks); while Josip Broz Tito, leader of the Yugoslav Communist Party since 1937, headed the second resistance group, the Partisans, which were particularly active in Montenegro, Serbia, and Bosnia. After failing to develop a cooperative approach against the Germans and Ustashe, Tito and Mihajlovic turned against each other. Ultimately, the Partisans gained an upper hand and by the end of the war their numbers had reached over half a million men and women.

After the war, Tito's Partisans exacted vengeance on their opponents, including the Ustashe and Chetniks. Within weeks of the war's end, the Partisans had executed without trial up to a quarter of a million people who had sided with the Germans, most of them Croats. However, many of the Ustashe leaders were able to flee to safety in South America. Pavelić himself fled to Argentina, where he reorganized the Ustashe in exile. He was, however, wounded in an assassination attempt in Madrid in 1957 and died two years later from his injuries.

Vaivara

Vaivara was a Nazi transit and concentration camp established in northeastern Estonia in August 1943 near the Vaivara train station. It served as the main concentration camp in Estonia, created originally as a camp for Soviet prisoners of war. Over time, it became the largest concentration camp in Estonia, with about 20 other smaller labor camps. Approximately 20,000 Jews passed through Vaivara, most of them from Latvia and the Lithuanian ghettos of Vilna and Kovno. In addition to serving as a concentration camp, it had the function of a transit camp, housing up to 1,300 prisoners at a time prior to them being sent off to labor and death camps. Most of Vaivara's prisoners were Jews, but it also included Russian, Dutch, and Estonian inmates.

Vaivara's commandant was SS-Hauptsturmführer (captain) Hans Aumeier, who also assisted in Dachau, Buchenwald, Auschwitz, and other concentration camps during the Nazi period. Directors of Vaivara included Max Dahlmann, Kurt Panike, and Helmut Schnabel. Franz von Bothmann served Vaivara as the camp's chief physician, while the camp was guarded by an Estonian SS unit.

While in Vaivara, prisoners worked at various forms of hard labor from sun up to sun down. Some of the work in which they engaged included assembling railways, crushing stones into gravel, digging ditches, and felling trees. Daily food rations consisted of seven ounces of bread with "ersatz" or substitute jam or margarine, vegetable soup, and coffee.

At night the prisoners were forced to sleep in wooden huts, divided into five sections. Each section housed anywhere from 70 to 80 prisoners. Prisoners had barely any access to water, and they were allowed to wash themselves only rarely, and as a result sicknesses and lice were prevalent throughout the camp.

The camp administration at Vaivara conducted regular "selections," when they would choose which inmates were fit for work and which ones were not. Those who were deemed too old, too young, or too sick to perform work were killed. The first of these selections took place in 1943, soon after the camp had opened; 150 Jewish men and women were killed after being found unfit to work. Soon after, the same selection and execution process took place again, and 300 Jews were killed. After these first two selections, similar processes leading to the murder of prisoners at Vaivara took place approximately every two weeks; eventually, this was repeated roughly 20 times following the camp's inception. Five hundred more Jews were murdered in these actions. During one of these, Jewish children, who until then had been kept separate from the rest of the camp in their own hut, were taken and killed. Those who survived the selections were nonetheless still subjected to severe beatings and possibly death at the hands of the SS officers who supervised Vaivara.

When the Soviet Army closed in on Estonia and Vaivara in 1945, hundreds of the remaining inmates were taken west on death marches. Some of the prisoners were transported to Saki, another camp in western Estonia. Lagerführer Helmut Schnabel, one of Vaivara's directors, was tried for war crimes in 1968 and sentenced to 16 years in prison; his sentence was reduced to six years the following year. Hans Aumeier, Vaivara's commandant, was sentenced to death in Kraków, Poland, and executed on December 22, 1947.

Vel' d'Hiv Roundup

The Vel' d'Hiv Roundup was a raid and mass arrest organized and carried out by French authorities and police under the direction of Nazi Germany on July 16–17, 1942. The reasoning behind the raid was to round up the Jews of Paris under an action code named Operation Spring Wind, and then transport them to death camps located in Nazi-occupied Europe. The captives were taken to the cycling and sports stadium known as the Vélodrome d'Hiver ("Winter Velodrome") in the 15th Arrondissement of Paris, near the Eiffel Tower.

In the months leading up to the Vel' d'Hiv Roundup, Reinhard Heydrich, the head of the German SD, Fritz Sauckel, the organizer of forced labor for German armament factories, and Adolf Eichmann, the SS official in charge of Jewish policy, had made several trips to Paris. During this time, the French officials in charge of the "Jewish Question" were replaced with a German administration, ultimately accelerating the anti-Jewish policies in France.

At the request of German authorities, at 4:00 a.m. on the morning of July 16, 1942, approximately 4,500 French police officers began arresting Jews living in Paris. More than 11,000 Jews were arrested on the same day and confined to the Vélodrome d'Hiver (known colloquially as the Vel' d'Hiv). French police officers were instructed to make the arrests quickly and without discussion. The arrested Jews were forced out of their homes and only allowed to take shoes, a blanket or sweater, and two shirts.

Over the course of several days 13,152 Jews were arrested, of which 5,802 were women and 4,051 were children. Although French police had previously been arresting Jews in Paris, the raids that began on July 16, 1942, were the first

The Vel' d'Hiv Roundup, code named Operation Spring Wind, was a mass arrest of Jews in Paris that took place on July 16–17, 1942. Conducted by French police at the behest of the occupying Germans, it was part of a larger campaign intended to eliminate France's Jewish population. The roundup saw the arrest and confinement of over 13,000 Jews (including some 4,000 children) in the stadium known as the Winter Velodrome (Vélodrome d'Hiver, hence its abbreviation of Vel' d'Hiv). Here, they were held with little in the way of water or food, in extreme overcrowding and no sanitary facilities. Most were transported from the Vel' d'Hiv to the transit camp at Drancy, from where they were shipped off to their death at Auschwitz. This photograph is the only known image of the roundup at the Vel' d'Hiv. (Apic/Getty Images) to specifically target women, children, and the elderly. Despite various warnings of the forthcoming raids, many women and children did not go into hiding, as they expected the police to target only adult males, as they had done in the past. As it turned out, children between the ages of 2 and 16 were arrested, together with their parents. Many of the Jews who were arrested were already refugees from Germany, Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Russia.

The arrested Jews were placed on buses, with the instructions that all of the windows on the bus were to remain closed to restrict their airflow. The buses transported 5,000 of the arrested adult Jews to the transit camp at Drancy, with the remainder sent to the Vélodrome d'Hiver.

The majority of those arrested and sent to the Vél' d'Hiv were women and children, who were held there for several days. Over time conditions in the stadium deteriorated dramatically. The detainees were kept in extremely crowded conditions, deprived of water, food, and sanitary facilities. Within a week, the number of Jews held in the arena had reached 13,000, including 4,000 children. The stadium's dark glass roof, painted blue to avoid bombings, in conjunction with all of the windows permanently sealed shut for security, raised the heat significantly in the already warm summer month of July. Of the 10 restrooms available, 5 had been sealed shut due to the windows offering an escape route. Other than tap water, the only food or water that was brought in was by several doctors and members of the Red Cross, who were allowed to enter. Any Jew who tried to escape was shot on the spot; in some cases, desperate individuals took their own lives.

In the week following the arrests, the Jews at the Vel' d'Hiv were deported to transit camps at Beaune-la-Rolande and Pithiviers in the Loiret region south of Paris, and to Drancy, near Paris. At the end of July and the beginning of August, the Jews detained in these camps were separated from their children and deported. After shaving their heads and a violent body search, most of these Jews were then transferred by train in freight cars to Auschwitz and murdered. More than 3,000 babies and children were left alone in Beaune-la-Rolande and Pithiviers. Of the 13,152 Jews that had been arrested, fewer than 100 survived. None of the more than 4,000 children, who were all deported to Auschwitz, survived. In the two months that followed the arrests, approximately 1,000 Jews were deported to Auschwitz every two or three days, and by the end of September 1942 France had deported almost 38,000 Jews. Approximately 780 of these Jews survived and remained alive in 1945.

There were varied French reactions to the arrest and deportation of the Jews, ranging from active collaboration with the Germans to indifference, empathy, and rescue efforts. Certain elements of French society, such as the media and the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches, voiced repulsion for the arrests and treatment of the Jews, and publicly protested the events. The sight of Jewish mothers holding their babies and children being placed under arrest were the turning points that led to the French public's condemnation of the arrest and deportation of the Jews in France during the German occupation.

A number of markers have been installed in the area to commemorate the victims held captive in the Winter Stadium; there are no photographs of the events of July 16–17, 1942. A commemorative plaque located at 8 Boulevard de Grenelle now sits facing the Bir-Hakeim metro station. The plaque mentions the number and eventual fate of the Jews who were held in the Vélodrome d'Hiver. It was not until 53 years after the event, on July 16, 1995, that France publicly acknowledged its role at the Vélodrome d'Hiver in a historic speech given by President Jacques Chirac.

Venezia, Shlomo

Shlomo Venezia was a Greek-born Italian Jew who chronicled his experiences as a forced laborer at the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp. He was born in Salonika to an impoverished family on December 29, 1923, as part of an Italian-Jewish émigré community. As a teenager he worked odd jobs. With the entry of Greece into the war in 1941, Salonika was occupied by Italian troops, who attempted to shield Italian Jews from antisemitic persecution from the Germans. In March 1944, however, Venezia and his family were deported to Athens, and then sent by boxcar to Auschwitz-Birkenau, arriving there in April 1944. Upon arrival, he was separated from his mother and two younger sisters, who perished in the gas chambers.

Selected for forced labor because he was young and healthy, Venezia was soon made a member of the Sonderkommando, prisoners who were forced by the Nazis to herd newly arriving prisoners into the gas chambers and then deposit their corpses into crematoria. The work was grim and gruesome, and his shifts lasted for 12 hours, seven days a week. Venezia worked in the Sonderkommando for nearly nine months before being shipped out to Germany in January 1945. At that time, all surviving prisoners were force marched west to Germany in brutally cold weather. Venezia survived the horrific ordeal and moved to Italy after the war, where he worked in a hotel on the Adriatic coast. Later, he and his wife opened a small shop in Rome.

For many years, Venezia did not discuss what he witnessed or what he was forced to do, although the experiences affected him deeply. In the early 1990s, however, when rightist groups in Italy began to emerge and antisemitism became a concern, he decided to speak publicly about his experiences in a variety of venues. He also commenced a long-standing professional relationship with a French journalist, Beatrice Prasquier, who began to interview him at great length about his World War II years. The result, published in 2007 as Inside the Gas Chambers: Eight Months in Sonderkommando at Auschwitz, is a book that provides excruciating—and sometimes macabre—details of his work at Auschwitz. The book has been translated into some two dozen languages, and is only one of a handful of testimonials by a Sonderkommando survivor; Venezia was the only Italian to have provided such a record.

Shlomo Venezia died in Rome on October 1, 2012.

Vichy France

Vichy France (July 1940–August 1944), formally the French State, was a French government led by Marshal Philippe Pétain. Beginning in July 1940, it succeeded the French Third Republic. Following France's military defeat, the National Assembly granted extraordinary powers to Pétain, who held the title of president of the council. The Vichy regime enthusiastically collaborated with Nazi Germany to a significant degree, despite remaining officially neutral in the war. It implemented antisemitic racial policies and conducted raids organized by the French police to round up and deport Jews in both the northern and southern zones of France, and in doing so went further than the orders demanded by the Nazis.

Following the Franco-German Armistice of June 22, 1940, France was divided into two main zones: a northern zone occupied by the German army, and a southern unoccupied “free zone”; the two were separated by a demarcation line. Adolf Hitler divided France as a means for defense, and thus, the unoccupied zone became an independent state, known as Vichy France, named after the government's administrative center in Vichy, southeast of Paris. Paris remained the official capital. The Germans continued to control three-fifths of the country. This included northern and western France, and the entire Atlantic coast. Pétain administered the remainder of the southeastern two-fifths of the country from Vichy.

French politician and statesman Pierre Laval joined Pétain's government after the armistice was signed. Laval persuaded the National Assembly to grant Pétain the authority to enact a new constitution so that he was able to gain full power in the new French government. Pétain, an 84-year-old war hero from World War I, turned the Vichy regime into a nondemocratic collaborationist government. The Vichy government was not limited to the unoccupied zone of southern France, actually holding limited civil jurisdiction that extended over all of metropolitan France except for Alsace-Lorraine. Under the terms of the Armistice, Vichy was able to keep the French navy and the colonial empire under French control, while avoiding full occupation by Germany and maintaining its independence and neutrality. The two million French prisoners of war condemned to forced labor were used to maintain Vichy's tributes and support for Germany. Pétain and his government made a concerted effort to go beyond the armistice and agree with a more permanent treaty with Hitler.

Vichy maintained public order for the first two years after the armistice, and Germany provided little in the way of interference, though, significantly, the Germans ordered the French police to round up immigrant Jews, communists, political refugees, and any individual labeled as “undesirable.” The newly established Vichy government voluntarily enacted its own measures against these “undesirable” individuals. A special commission was set up in July 1940 in order to review naturalizations granted since the 1927 reform of the nationality law. Vichy denaturalized approximately 15,000 individuals, mostly Jews, between June 1940 and August 1944.

Pétain enacted legislation that set up antisemitic laws in October 1940, which applied to metropolitan France and its overseas territories progressively through 1940 and 1941. These laws, known as the Statut des Juifs, were not mandated by Germany. Jews were denied their citizenship and eventually banned from professions such as show business, teaching, the civil service, and journalism. French Jews were forced to wear yellow badges. Police confiscated their telephones and radios, and a curfew was enforced beginning in January 1942. Jews were also required to travel in the last car of the Parisian metro and were limited to certain public areas.

Vichy enacted an intense propaganda campaign within the Commission for Jewish Affairs, which intended on “aryanizing” Jewish businesses. Jewish property was confiscated, while more than 40,000 Jewish refugees were held in concentration camps under French control. Vichy used the internment camps previously opened by the Third Republic to intern enemy aliens, putting them to new use. The camps were established by Vichy as transit camps for the implementation of the Holocaust and to remove all “undesirables” from society, including Jews, homosexuals, and Roma. Drancy internment camp, founded in 1939, initially to intern French communists, became the central transit camp to hold deportees awaiting transport to the death camps in Eastern Europe.

Vichy tightened its antisemitic legislation, applicable in both zones, in 1941. French police in Paris carried out the first mass arrests in May 1941, and a total of 3,747 men were interned. The French police, under the orders of René Bousquet, the secretary general to the Vichy regime, and Jean Leguay, the second in command of the French police, organized the Vel’ d’Hiv raid, which took place on July 16 and 17, 1942. A total of 12,884 Jews were arrested by the French police, including 4,501 children and 5,802 women. The majority of these Jews were held in the winter sports stadium in horrifying conditions for days before being sent to the gas chambers at Auschwitz. The French police were willful in their collaboration with the Nazis. Overall, by the time deportations ended, the Vichy government aided in the deportation of approximately 76,000 Jews to German extermination camps.

French citizens were either eager to collaborate with Nazi Germany, or they favored Pétain without supporting Nazi collaboration. Many actively supported fascist beliefs, played active roles in taking Jewish property, and supported Jewish deportation. For its part, the United States encouraged Vichy to oppose military collaboration with Germany. American concern was that France should not take action that was not specifically laid out in the armistice, as this could adversely affect Allied war efforts.

Within the Vichy government, Pierre Laval remained the force behind the collaboration, which he saw as part of a necessary long-term strategy of Franco-German reconciliation. Pétain claimed that Germany and France shared the common goal of defeating Britain, but he also hoped to keep German troops out of unoccupied France. Vichy officials also went above and beyond what the Germans asked of them in the hope of delaying German intervention in French domestic affairs. The French overestimated exactly how much France mattered to Hitler, which was purely economic rather than political.

On November 10, 1942, German troops occupied Vichy France as a security measure following the Allied landing in Algeria and Morocco. The Germans abolished Vichy’s small armed force, as a result of which France lost its navy and remaining colonies that had not yet crossed over to General Charles de Gaulle’s Free France or been occupied by the Allies. Upon occupying Vichy, Germany continued the ongoing actions to arrest Jews and deport them to the death camps in Eastern Europe. Vichy was able to exercise its remaining jurisdiction over all of metropolitan France, and as Pétain became virtually useless, residual power devolved into the hands of Laval. The Service d’ordre legionnaire (SOL, “Legionary Order Service”), a collaborationist militia created by Joseph Darnand, became independent in 1943. The French militia (malice) was directed by Pierre Laval and led by Darnand, who held an SS rank and pledged loyalty to Hitler. The militia aided German forces with repression of the French Resistance.

Resistance against Vichy, initially started in June 1940 by de Gaulle with the Free French forces to counter the Vichy regime, continued to grow in strength as the resistance movement became more organized. The relationship between France and Britain was also important, as Britain supplied the French with equipment. The French Resistance returned the favor by supplying Britain with intelligence reports. By 1944 there were approximately 100,000 members of the various resistance movements in France.

The liberation of France took place after the success of D-Day (Operation Overlord) in June 1944. German forces surrendered in Paris and Charles de Gaulle, president of the Provisional Government of the French Republic, entered the French capital. The French militia was disbanded, along with many collaborationist organizations.

German forces removed Pétain, along with his ministers, to Germany. They established a government-in-exile at Sigmaringen. Following the liberation there was a period consisting of executions of Nazi collaborationists. In 1945 Pétain voluntarily returned to France; he was charged with treason and convicted to death by firing squad. De Gaulle opted instead to commute his sentence to life in prison. Most of the individuals convicted were given amnesty five years later. Pierre Laval fled to Germany and Austria, but was captured and returned to France, where he was found guilty of collaboration with Germany and was ultimately executed as a traitor to France, along with Joseph Darnand. René Bousquet was assassinated in 1993 while awaiting his prosecution in Paris.

The French undertook efforts to prosecute many individuals for crimes against humanity beginning in the mid-1970s and 1980s. This included Bouquet and Klaus Barbie (the Butcher of Lyon), and Jean Leguay, second in command of the French police. The French government claims that the Vichy regime was an illegal government that differed from the French Republic and was established under foreign influence. In 1995 former French president Jacques Chirac recognized the responsibility of the French State for aiding the French police and assisting the Germans in the enactment of the “Final Solution.”

Vilna Ghetto

The Vilna Ghetto was located in the town Vilna (or Vilnius) in northeastern Poland. Both Lithuania and Poland had claims on the city following World War I; prior to World

A ghetto was established at Vilna by the Nazis in the area known as Reichskommissariat Ostland. Although known before the war as the “Jerusalem of Lithuania,” the Holocaust saw the reduction of the Jewish population from some 40,000 Jews to practically none. Such Jews who managed to survive did so by hiding in nearby forests or, in rare circumstances, obtaining refuge from compassionate non-Jews. (Jewish Chronicle/Heritage Images/Getty Images)

War II, it was considered to be a part of Poland. However, after the Germans and Soviets signed their nonaggression pact in August 1939, Vilna, along with the rest of eastern Poland, was handed over to Soviet occupation. The Soviets, in turn, then considered Vilna to be part of Lithuania. A city of 200,000 people, 30% of whom were Jewish, Vilna was known as the “Jerusalem of the North,” with 106 synagogues, despite a 60% Catholic presence. Approximately 265,000 Jews lived in Lithuania at the time of German occupation in 1941; by the end of World War II, 95% of them had been exterminated. No other Jewish population was so devastated in the Nazi-occupied areas of Eastern Europe.

The Soviet army began to occupy Vilna on September 19, 1939. At that time, of Vilna’s population of 200,000, 55,000 were members of the Jewish community. An additional 12,000 to 15,000 Jews fled from German-occupied Poland to find refuge in the city. In 1940 Lithuania was annexed to the Soviet Union, but on June 22, 1941, German troops attacked the Soviet Union in Operation Barbarossa and invaded Vilna. By June 24, the city belonged to the Nazis.

Nazi administrators and policemen were not far behind the German army. Nazi SS-Standartenführer Franz Walter Stahlecker commanded a taskforce of police and SS officers that were brought to Vilna; also in command with Stahlecker were SS men Horst Schweineberger and Martin Weiss. By July 1941 the Nazis had implemented a series of antisemitic laws in Vilna and the rest of Lithuania, and soon after this the Einsatzgruppen, together with Lithuanian collaborators, began to murder the Jewish population. In short order they were responsible for the murder of 5,000 Jewish men in the Ponary Forest, eight miles outside of Vilna. Such killings at Ponary would continue well into 1944, resulting in the death of more than 100,000 people. Of these, approximately 70,000 were Jews.

The Vilna ghetto was established by a Nazi military administration in September 1941, and from the beginning Vilna was separated into two sections. In Section 1 were placed able-bodied Jews who could work, while Jews who were considered unable to do so were put into Section 2. Families were also evicted from their homes and sent to Lukiszki, a prison outside of Vilna, but would never make it to the ghetto before being taken to Ponary. Soon after the ghetto was established, the Nazi administrations posted an order saying that any workers without permits would have to move into Section 2. In one night, 3,000 Jews attempted to leave Section 1, but only 600 of them survived to Section 2.

The Einsatzgruppen would continue to liquidate Section 2 by murdering its inhabitants at Ponary. Those Jews able to work, and who survived the move from Section 1 to Section 2, underwent forced labor in factories or construction. Jews were often told they were being transferred to new projects, but were then taken to Ponary to be killed. Jacob Gens, the head of the ghetto’s Judenrat (Jewish Council), was responsible for both keeping the peace and ordering deportations. Gens, a controversial member in the history of the ghetto, defended his collaboration with the Nazis as being for the greater good of the community. At one time he stated, “When they ask me for a thousand Jews, I hand them over; for if we Jews will not give them on our own, the Germans will come and take them by force. Then they will take not one thousand, but thousands. With hundreds, I save a thousand. With the thousands that I hand over, I save ten thousand. I will say: I did everything in order to save as many Jews as possible . . . to ensure that at least a remnant of Jews survive.” By the beginning of 1942, the Vilna ghetto had been reduced from 32,000 inhabitants to just 15,000.

On January 21, 1942, the Fareynikte Partizaner Organizatsye, or the United Partisan Organization, or FPO, was organized in the Vilna ghetto. This resistance movement was led by Abba Kovner, Yitzhak Wittenberg, and Josef Glazman. The group was one of the first resistance groups to form in a ghetto within Nazi-occupied territory during World War I. The group hid weapons for self-defense throughout the ghetto, with Kovner making the call to the remaining inhabitants of the ghetto: “Hitler plans to destroy all the Jews of Europe, and the Jews of Lithuania have been chosen as the first in line. We will not be led like sheep to the slaughter! True, we are weak and defenseless, but the only reply to the murderer is revolt!”

In June 1943 Heinrich Himmler ordered the final liquidation of the Vilna ghetto. The FPO found out about Himmler’s plans, and in September they rose, unsuccessfully, against the Nazis who had come into the ghetto to begin forced deportations and killings. Some 80 to 100 members of the FPO managed to flee the ghetto to fight the Germans in the forests outside of Vilna. Establishing their own units and working with Soviet troops, FPO resisters fought until Vilna was liberated in July 1944. Of the 57,000 Jews who lived in the city when the Germans invaded Vilna, it is estimated that only 2,000 to 3,000 Jews survived the German occupation.

Vittel

Vittel (Frontstalag 121) was an internment and transit camp located in northeastern France near Nancy. The Germans established it in 1940 to hold British and American citizens, as well as other citizens of Allied countries, who were of value for later prisoner exchange. Some of these internees included Jews. Several thousand individuals remained at Vittel, either in a long-term period of confinement or a brief stay prior to a destination exchange. These internees were mostly Americans, Russians, British, and also Jews from Poland and Austria who possessed falsified British and American passports. Hundreds of American and British families were interned in Vittel from September 1942 until their liberation by the U.S. Army on September 12, 1944. On February 23 and June 20, 1944, a total of 72 Jews who were citizens of enemy Allied countries were transferred to Vittel from Drancy internment camp in Paris. Across the span of its operation, Vittel sent a total of 300 Jews to Drancy, to be interned prior to being sent to their deaths in Auschwitz.

Vittel was comprised of luxurious hotels inside a park in the Vosges Mountains near the German border and did not

In 1941, the German military established an internment camp in the town of Vittel in occupied France. The Germans used the camp primarily to house British and American citizens residing in France, but over time the SS decided to utilize the site at Vittel as a location for Jewish prisoners from outside France who could be held as hostages to exchange for German citizens interned abroad. Most of Vittel's Jewish detainees were deported to Auschwitz in 1944, where they were murdered. appear to look like a Nazi internment camp. The Germans presented Vittel as a model camp and used propaganda to ensure they did not have opposition from international humanitarian organizations. Vittel received supplies from the Red Cross, while some of the children were permitted to attend school and participate in a variety of activities. However, despite the model of apparent fair treatment of internees, the park where Vittel was situated was surrounded by three rows of barbed wire and was closely guarded by a patrol of the Wehrmacht.

During the 19th century, Vittel had been a well-known spa with many grand hotels that accommodated guests who came for the curative mineral waters. The establishment of an internment camp at Vittel provided the Germans with the opportunity to utilize these hotels for the purpose of housing prisoners recuperating from treatment at the local hospital.

Earlier, the renowned hotel and spa complex had a huge capacity, with more than 2,000 rooms. During the first phase of the war in 1940 the French government had utilized Vittel's 11 hotels to take the place of field hospitals, and hundreds of soldiers and civilians who were bombing victims were treated there. Shortly after the Armistice of June 22, 1940, at the beginning of August, the German command took control and created a closed hospital for prisoners of war. With the German occupation, thousands of French citizens and foreigners were sent to internment camps in France for various reasons. Vittel was one of these. Most of the British families and single women were transferred here from Saint-Denis and Besançon, detained in unused barracks in completely unacceptable conditions. In early 1942 women over the age of 60, men over 75, and children under 16 were released. This reduced the overall population to approximately 2,400. A number of North American families and women were included in this number. Jews arriving in Vittel were housed in separate hotels.

In early 1943 the internees at Vittel included not only British and American citizens but also a group of Polish, Belgian, and Dutch Jews. Some of these internees were transported from the Warsaw Ghetto and held forged Latin American passports or visas. The Jews holding these papers were accommodated at the Providence Hotel and then isolated by barbed wire from the rest of the camp. SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann sent a delegation from Berlin in order to determine the validity of the passports held by these Jews. The delegation determined that the passports were invalid, stating that the Jewish police in the Warsaw Ghetto had forged the papers. When checked further, the Latin American governments in question refused to recognize the passports, leaving the Jews from Warsaw in deadly danger. Jewish organizations such as the American Joint Distribution Committee and humanitarian groups such as the Red Cross urged American and British authorities to pressure the Latin American countries to honor the documents. A written request for protection of the Jews from Vittel was sent to the Latin American countries; however, the governments still refused to recognize the passports. In late March 1944 the passports held by the Jews in Vittel were finally validated, but by this time 250 Jews at Vittel had already been sent to their deaths at Auschwitz.

One of these Jews was Yitzhak Katzenelson, a poet and dramatist in Hebrew and Yiddish. Katzenelson possessed a Honduran passport upon his transfer from the Warsaw Ghetto to Vittel in May 1943. He was transferred to Auschwitz, where he perished on May 3, 1944. Some of Katzenelson's works were hidden in Vittel and were transferred, after the war, to the archives of the Ghetto Fighters' House Museum in Israel, named in his honor. The center was the first Holocaust memorial museum. It is located on a hill overlooking the Acre Valley in the Western Galilee.

Vittel was finally liberated on September 12, 1944, in a combined operation of Allied forces and members of the French Resistance.

Volk

A German word that, depending on its context, could mean “a people” (as an ethnic group), “the people” (as a community), or “a nation” (as in those inhabiting the same homeland). The meaning of the term is actually difficult to convey in English. It implies a “völkisch community” rooted in the soil of the homeland (heimat); this community shares centuries of ancestral tradition and is linked together by deep spiritual forces. The general idea of the Volk had an almost mystical understanding for the Nazis of the ties that bound together the German people as a separate and distinct entity from others.

As a modern concept, the notion of the Volk had its origins in the 19th century, in which various Romantic nationalist movements embraced a folkloric idealized past as a way to include all Germans in a potential glorious future. It provided these German Romantics with a self-description of the nation-state as an organic living entity. Such ideas as these had a strong influence on those who were to become ideological champions of the Nazis during the 1920s and beyond, adding the dimension of race to their idealized Romantic beliefs.

As a result, völkisch ideas were often best expressed by the German expression Blut und Boden (“blood and soil”), reflecting a sense of both the racial purity of the flawless “Aryan” and of a uniquely distinctive Germanic culture. Once adapted to Nazi ideology, the term was able to provide a foundation for the “Final Solution to the Jewish Problem” (Endlösung der Judenfrage) and thus to the elimination of various groups of so-called “undesirables” who could never be part of the German people and who were considered to be completely unassimilable.

The popularization of the term saw it used in many contexts both before the Nazi assumption of power and during the Third Reich itself. Applications abounded: the Germans were referred to as Volk ohne Raum (“a people without space”); one of the greatest political slogans under the Nazis called for the unity that came with “Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer” (“One Nation/People, One Empire, One Leader”); the German people were referred to as a “Herrenvolk,” or “master race”: and the “national” or “people’s” community was known as the “Volksgemeinschaft.” The “people’s car” was the Volkswagen and the “people’s radio” the “Volksempfänger.”

Given that only Germans could belong to the Volk, Jews, as an outside people, could never share in German völkisch life. Moreover, the term Volk referred to all Germanic peoples, not just the Germans themselves—which was convenient in an environment based on race and race hierarchy. By extension, the Germanic Volk could extend beyond Germans and embrace Scandinavians, Dutch and Flemish, and even the English, though each would have its own völkisch traditions.

Volksgemeinschaft

A German term, in Nazi parlance Volksgemeinschaft acquired a pseudo-mystical and racial understanding, which definitionally excluded Jews and other “non-Aryans.” Though originally the result of the work of German sociologist and philosopher Ferdinand Tönnies, who drew a distinction between “community” (Gemeinschaft) and “society” (Gesellschaft), combined with the idea of the Volk (people), it was all too easily adaptable to the Nazi agenda of elevating the status of the German people in the aftermath of their devastating defeat in World War I. (Tönnies himself would later join the Social Democrats, oppose the rise of Nazism, and protest against their use of his ideas.)

The use of the word Volk itself acquired a pseudo-mystical dimension as well, and was reflected in two equally important terms manipulated by the Nazis for their political needs. The first of these was the slogan Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer (“One People, One Empire, One Leader”), and the ultimately more menacing term Herrenvolk (“Master Race”). Linked as well were the Nazi concepts of Blut und Boden (“Blood and Soil”), which argued that the German people were connected, literally and physically, by the reality of their blood, to the very soil that was their home. This elevated the rural agricultural life of the peasant farmer (both men and women) as superior, seeing Lebensraum (“living space”) as the natural right of the German people to expand their geographic base as their population increase warranted, along the way either destroying or enslaving the people already living there.

The racial-biological understanding of Volksgemeinschaft is best seen in its embodiment of the idea of “Aryanism” within Nazi racial thinking, based upon its false developmental perception of a hierarchy of races, with the Nordic (that is, Germanic)—tall, blond hair, blue-eyed, long-headed, straight nose—at the top, and Russians, Serbs, Poles, Roma (called, disparagingly, “Gypsies”), and above all, Jews at the bottom. These were the so-called Untermenschen (subhumans), or inferior human beings. Any intermixing would thus result in a decrease in the “purity” of the Germanic body and the Germanic soul or spirit and must be prevented to the point of the annihilation or extermination of these races at best, or, if this was not possible, then at least their enslavement. Under the Nazis within Germany itself, such persons and groups would come to be labeled Gemeinschaft-fremde (“community aliens” or “community enemies”). Though late in the war and never implemented, a “Law for the Treatment of Community Enemies” was passed in 1944. Such “aliens” or “enemies,” guilty of leading “a worthless, unthrifty or disorderly life” (and thus “a burden or danger to the community”), were to be turned over to the police and/or welfare authorities, and incarcerated in a camp. By that point, however, such groups were already almost nonexistent in Germany itself and under restriction—and worse—in the conquered territories.

As a consequence of all of these factors, given the interweaving of these concepts, Adolf Hitler thus presented himself to the German people as the embodiment of the people; the implementation of his political program, in this sense, thus put into practice the will of the people. German jurist, professor of law, philosopher, and political theorist Carl Schmitt, who joined the Nazi Party in 1933, further legitimized the concept of Volksgemeinschaft in his writings by (1) further denigrating non-Aryans, specifically Jews; (2) justifying the Nazi dictatorship and its leader; and (3) continually praising the “spirit” and “soul” of the German people as superior to all other peoples.

(Volksgerichtshof), which would operate as a special court outside the existing court system and constitution. It was established on April 24, 1934, with jurisdiction over a broad range of political offenses, and exclusive jurisdiction over such offenses as Conspiracy to High Treason, State Treason, Listening to Enemy Radio Broadcasts (from 1939), Criminal Malice, Seditious and Defeatist, and Aiding the Enemy (from mid-1941). “Political crimes” ranged from minor offenses—such as trading on the black market, work slowdowns, criticizing Hitler or the government, or protesting about work conditions—to defeatism, espionage and sabotage, and treason against the Third Reich. These offenses or crimes were viewed by the court as Wehrkraftzersetzung (“incapable of a defense”) and were accordingly punished severely. The court decided the extent of evidence to consider, and defense attorneys could not question the charges.

With almost no exceptions, cases in the People’s Court had predetermined guilty verdicts. There was no presumption of innocence, nor could the defendants adequately represent themselves or consult an attorney. A proceeding before the People’s Court would follow an initial indictment in which a state or city prosecutor would forward the names of the accused to the court for charges of a political nature. Defendants were hardly ever allowed to speak to their attorneys beforehand, and when they did the defense lawyer would usually simply answer questions about how the trial would proceed and refrain from any legal advice.

The People’s Court proceedings began when the accused were led to a prisoner’s dock under armed police escort. The presiding judge would read the charges and then call the accused forward for “examination.” Although the court had a prosecutor, it was usually the judge who asked the questions.

Defendants were often berated during the examination and never allowed to respond with any sort of lengthy reply. After a barrage of insults and condemnation, the accused would be ordered back to the dock with the order “examination concluded.” The defendant was not permitted to choose defense counsel, who had to be a lawyer approved by the chairman of the Senate. Defenders and defendants were often given only a day or even a few hours’ notice before the trial of the prosecution allegations. Often the lawyer and the accused did not know each other until the notice of trial, nor could they contact each other before the hearing.

After examination, the defense attorneys would be asked if they had any statements or questions. Defense lawyers were present simply as a formality and hardly any ever rose to speak. The judge would then ask the defendants for

Volksgerichtshof

The Volksgerichtshof was an important arm of the Nazi judicial system. In 1933, pursuant to the Enabling Act, Adolf Hitler ordered the formation of the “People’s Court” a statement during which time more insults and berating comments would be shouted at the accused. The verdict, which was almost always “guilty,” would then be announced and the sentence handed down at the same time. In all, an appearance before the People’s Court could take as little as 15 minutes.

The death penalty was meted out in numerous cases. There was no possibility of appeal, and verdicts could be carried out immediately.

The Nazi courts did not employ standard legal procedures or principles, like the presumption of innocence, trial by peers, or the right to cross-examine witnesses. Appointed by Adolf Hitler, judges in the People’s Courts were expected to be “reliable.” In some trials, one man alone acted as judge, jury, and court recorder.

The conduct of the Nazi courts worsened after the outbreak of World War II. The number of death sentences increased dramatically: in 1936 11 death sentences were issued; by 1943 there were 1,662 death sentences, about half of which were indictments from the People’s Court. By 1945 approximately 5,200 death sentences were carried out. Death sentences were imposed for offenses such as “disseminating news intercepted on radio,” derogatory remarks about Hitler, or doubts about the so-called “final victory.”

The two notorious judges who shaped the People’s Court were Otto Georg Thierack, who presided from May 1, 1936, to August 19, 1942; and Roland Freisler, who presided from August 20, 1942, to his death on February 3, 1945.

Prior to the Battle of Stalingrad across the winter of 1942–1943, there was a higher percentage of cases in which not guilty verdicts were handed down. In some cases, this was due to defense lawyers presenting the accused as naïve, or defendants adequately explaining the nature of the political charges against them. However, in nearly two-thirds of such cases, the defendants would be rearrested by the Gestapo following the trial and sent to a concentration camp. After the defeat at Stalingrad, and with a growing fear in the German government regarding defeatism among the population, the People’s Court became far more ruthless and hardly any defendants brought before the tribunal escaped a guilty verdict.

Some hearings were very rapid. An example of this was the treatment of the “White Rose” members. On February 18, 1943, this group of Munich University students was caught distributing antiwar leaflets. On February 22, 1943, three of the White Rose group, 21-year-old Sophie Scholl, her brother Hans Scholl (22), and Christof Probst (24) were tried and found guilty in less than an hour, without evidence being presented or arguments made by either side. The three were guillotined just six hours after their arrest. Alexander Schmorell, Willi Graf, and Kurt Hüber, other members of the White Rose group, were later also tried and executed. The People’s Court sentenced other members of resistance groups, such as the Rote Kapelle, the Bästlein-Jacob-Abshagen group, the Edelweiss Pirates, the Kreisau Circle, and the conspirators of the unsuccessful July 20, 1944, Bomb Plot attempt on Hitler’s life.

Many of those found guilty by the court were executed in Plötzensee Prison in Berlin. The president of the court often acted as prosecutor, denouncing defendants, then pronouncing his verdict and sentence without objection from defense counsel, who usually remained silent throughout. The court almost always sided with the prosecution, to the point that being hauled before it was tantamount to a death sentence.

On February 3, 1945, the court’s president, Roland Freisler, was conducting a Saturday session of the People’s Court when U.S. Air Force bombers attacked Berlin. Among the buildings hit was the People’s Court. Freisler was killed when an almost direct hit on the building caused him to be struck down by a beam in his own courtroom. His body was reportedly found crushed beneath a fallen masonry column, clutching the files that he had tried to retrieve.

In 1956 the German Federal High Court of Justice granted the so-called “Judges’ Privilege” to those who had been part of the Volksgerichtshof. This prevented the prosecution of former court members on the basis that their actions had been legal under the laws in effect during the Third Reich. The only member of the Volksgerichtshof to be held liable for his actions was Chief Public Prosecutor Ernst Lautz, who in 1947 was sentenced to 10 years’ imprisonment. He was pardoned after serving less than four years of his sentence and was granted a government pension.

Of the other approximately 570 judges and prosecutors, none were held responsible for their actions related to the Volksgerichtshof. Many, in fact, went on to have successful careers in the West German postwar legal system.

Von Faulhaber, Michael

Michael von Faulhaber was a Roman Catholic priest and prelate and the most senior German Catholic opponent of National Socialism and antisemitism.

He was born on March 5, 1869, in Klosterheidenfeld, Germany, and entered a Catholic seminary in Würzburg in 1889. On August 1, 1892, he was ordained to the priesthood and undertook pastoral work and research in the diocese of Würzburg. He served as chaplain and vicar rector in Rome from 1896 to 1898 and taught sacred scripture in Strasbourg before becoming bishop of Speyer in 1911. He was then appointed archbishop of Munich-Freising in 1917 and four years later was made a cardinal. When Papal Nuncio Eugenio Pacelli (later Pope Pius XII) wrote to Rome in 1923 complaining about the Nazi persecution of Catholics, he noted that the attacks "were especially focused" on the "learned and zealous" Cardinal Faulhaber, who "had denounced the persecutions against the Jews."

In 1934, the year after Adolf Hitler came to power in Germany, Faulhaber published a book that defended the principles of racial tolerance and called for the people of Germany to respect the Jewish religion. In 1933 Faulhaber wrote to the then-secretary of state Pacelli, describing the persecution of the Jews as "unjust and painful." In 1935 Nazi officials called for him to be killed, and in February 1936 police confiscated and destroyed one of his sermons; this also happened twice the following year. During the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, Faulhaber provided a truck to salvage religious objects from a local synagogue before it was destroyed. In May 1939 demonstrations against Faulhaber took place throughout Bavaria, and posters were hung with the message: "Away with Faulhaber, the friend of the Jews and the agent of Moscow."

After World War II began in 1939, Faulhaber gave an address that sharply denounced National Socialism. Martin Niemöller, a noted German Protestant leader who spent seven years in concentration camps for his opposition to Hitler and the Nazis, said that Faulhaber's sermons showed him "to be a great and courageous man." In his 1945 memorandum to U.S. general William Donovan, Fabian von Schlabrendorff praised Faulhaber for stating his opposition to the Nazis and influencing other Catholics to do the same. Schlabrendorff reported that "decisive credit" for the Catholic opposition to Nazism "ought to be given to Cardinal von Faulhaber from Munich . . . whose personal sermons branded Nazism as the enemy of Christendom."

After the war, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, the leading U.S. voice for the Jewish cause, called Faulhaber "a true Christian prelate" who "had lifted his fearless voice" in defense of the Jews. Faulhaber continued to preach that antisemitism was the "scourge of mankind." On June 12, 1952, Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber died in Munich, just one year after having ordained Joseph Ratzinger to the priesthood. Ratzinger went on to serve as Pope Benedict XVI from 2005 until 2013.

Von Moltke, Helmuth James

Helmuth James Graf von Moltke was an aristocratic resister to the Nazi regime, executed for treason in January 1945. He was born on March 11, 1907, on the family estate at Kreisau, Silesia. His mother, Dorothy, was a British subject from South Africa. He was the great-grandnephew of Helmuth von Moltke the Elder, one of Prussia's outstanding military commanders during Germany's wars of unification, and grandnephew of Helmuth Johann Ludwig von Moltke the Younger, who served as chief of the German general staff between 1906 and 1914.

Helmuth James von Moltke's parents were Christian Scientists, though their son became an Evangelical Christian when he was 14. He studied law and political science between 1925 and 1929, moving between universities in Breslau, Vienna, Heidelberg, and Berlin. In 1928 he became involved with an organization called the Löwenberger Arbeitsgemeinschaften, or Löwenberg working groups, in which college teachers, youth movement leaders, young unemployed, students, and young farmers were brought together in a voluntary work camp in Silesia, where all could learn from one another and discuss matters of mutual social and political interest.

In 1931 he married Freya Deichmann, who had begun her own studies in law at the University of Bonn. She also attended seminars at the University of Breslau, where she worked for a time as his research assistant. On October 18, 1931, they were married in Cologne and moved to the family estate at Kreisau before relocating to Berlin, where he finished his law degree; at the same time, Freya also studied law, receiving her degree from Humboldt University in 1935.

The same year he was given the chance to become a judge but declined on the ground that to do so he would have to become a member of the Nazi Party. His personal beliefs regarding democracy held him back; there had been times in earlier years when he had expressed open criticism of Hitler, and he was known to oppose the regime in office. Rather than become part of a system of which he disapproved, he opened his own legal practice in Berlin. Between 1935 and 1938 he undertook additional legal training in the United Kingdom in the hope of joining the British bar. This plan was stymied owing to the outbreak of war in September 1939.

With war, he was drafted into German military intelligence (the Abwehr) within the armed forces high command in Berlin. It was here that he first began to demonstrate his opposition to the Nazi regime, advocating humane treatment for prisoners of war and the observance of international law, and acting to undermine human rights abuses in German-occupied territories.

In early 1940 Helmuth and Freya von Moltke and another aristocrat he had known since 1938, Peter Graf Yorck von Wartenburg, began to gather around them an informal group of around two dozen opponents of Nazism, many of them also aristocrats, to imagine a new and better Germany. What emerged from this was the Kreisau Circle, centered on von Moltke's estate at Kreisau, though meetings also took place in Berlin.

The group became one of the main foci of German opposition to the Nazi regime; small though it was, it was comprised of many elite members of society. Through his contacts, von Moltke reached out to Protestant and Catholic Church leaders, as well as to what was left of the social democratic movement.

In a voluminous correspondence with Freya and others, he asked many questions about where Germany was heading and what degree of responsibility each person would have to acknowledge after the war. In one of his letters from October 1941, referring to the slaughter of the Jews in Russia, he wrote: "Certainly more than a thousand people are murdered in this way every day, and another thousand German men are habituated to murder, . . . What shall I say when I am asked: And what did you do during that time?" In October 1941 Jews in Berlin began to be deported. In the same letter, von Moltke wrote: "Since Saturday the Berlin Jews are being rounded up. Then they are sent off with what they can carry. . . . How can anyone know these things and walk around free?"

He had hoped that he could use the law and his social contacts to bring about some sort of humanitarian dimension to military events, and he knew he was not alone; others, such as Admiral Wilhelm Canaris and General Hans Oster, both of whom were his superiors in the Abwehr, felt the same. Throughout the war, he pleaded for the Geneva Conventions to be respected, and after Operation Barbarossa in the summer of 1941 he wrote a controversial legal opinion urging Germany to adhere to international law. He also ordered the removal of Jews to countries offering a safe haven, possibly not realizing that few states were prepared to do so. In addition, he attempted to reduce the scale of mass murder by writing reports drawing attention to the psychological problems faced by German soldiers who witnessed and/or participated in the wholesale shootings accompanying Einsatzgruppen operations.

From his own perspective, knowing about these things only served to reinforce his own opposition to the war and the Nazi Party. Pursuant to this, one of his actions was to disseminate confidential information on Nazi war crimes to those outside the Nazi Party, in the hope that it would be passed on to the Allies.

Of course, rejection of orders placed him at risk, and on January 19, 1944, he was arrested by the Gestapo after it was discovered that he had warned members of another resistance group, the Solf Circle—an informal resistance gathering of German intellectuals who were arrested and executed in September 1943. Only later was it discovered that von Moltke was also involved in the failed coup attempt of July 20, 1944, against Hitler—something about which he had very mixed feelings, fearing that Hitler would become a martyr if he was assassinated.

Facing Judge Roland Freisler before the People's Court (Volksgerichtshof), von Moltke found himself in a delicate position, fighting for his life. It transpired that no evidence could be found that he had actually participated in any conspiracy to bring about a coup. Freisler therefore was forced to concoct a new capital charge; looking over the record of the Kreisau Circle, he determined that discussions of a future Germany based on moral and democratic principles met the criteria for the death penalty. As von Moltke noted in a letter to Freya, this signified that he was going to his death for his ideas, not for anything he had done—a damning indictment against the regime he was opposing. In what was an inevitable judgment, Helmuth James Graf von Moltke was sentenced to death on January 11, 1945, and executed on January 23 in Berlin-Plötzensee prison.

Von Moltke was not a pacifist, he but believed strongly in international law and the laws of war as essential tools to protect the innocent and reduce the brutalities that war generates. In one of his final letters, written to his sons while awaiting execution, he gave his reasons for acting the way he did, declaring that ever since National Socialism came to power he had attempted to make its consequences “milder for its victims and to prepare the way for a change. In that, my conscience drove me—and in the end, that is a man’s duty.”

Vrba, Rudolf

Rudolf Vrba was a Slovak Jew who escaped from Auschwitz on April 7, 1944, and provided testimony detailing the enormity of the Holocaust in Eastern Europe. He was born Walter Rosenberg in Topoľčany, Czechoslovakia, on September 11, 1924. His father, Elias Rosenberg, owned a sawmill. Walter was excluded from the local high school at the age of 15 because he was a Jew, so he began work as a laborer. He did his best to keep his head down in the early years of the war (and before that, in the Nazi occupation of the Slovak “protectorate”), but in 1942, when antisemitic measures intensified, he decided to try to get to Britain to join the Czechoslovak army-in-exile.

He only made it as far as the Hungarian border before he was picked up and handed over to Slovak authorities. Sent to a transit camp, he escaped but was soon apprehended. On June 15, 1942, he arrived at Majdanek and was then immediately transferred to Auschwitz, where he arrived on June 30.

He was put to work exhuming bodies from mass graves (which were then cremated) and also as an orderly tasked with sorting through the personal possessions of detainees destined for the gas chambers. He rose to become a camp registrar, and it was in this role that he began to calculate and, as he wrote later, “mentally record” statistics relating to those transported to the camp. Before long he was planning an escape.

On April 7, 1944, Rosenberg and fellow prisoner Alfréd Wetzler, also from Slovakia, managed to flee the death camp through finding a flaw in the otherwise impenetrable security system. They managed to return to Czechoslovakia, where they met with the Slovak Jewish Council at Žilina.

After a brief period to recover, they provided the council with extremely detailed testimony of what was occurring at Auschwitz. The testimony, when transcribed and typed, totaled some 40 pages. It contained an exhaustive description of the geography and management of the camp, and of how the prisoners lived and died. It also gave a comprehensive list of every transport that had arrived at Auschwitz since 1942, chronicling their place of origin and how many people from each transport were murdered. The report also included sketches and information regarding the layout of the gas chambers. Rosenberg was later to state that much of his information about the operation of the gas chambers and crematoria came from Sonderkommando workers such as Filip Müller.

The report was copied and passed on to Rudolf Kasztner, head of the Zionist Aid and Rescue Committee in Bratislava. He, in turn, passed it to Gisi Fleischmann and Rabbi Chaim Michael Dov Weissmandl, who arranged for a much wider distribution, including Hungary’s Foreign Ministry and the Vatican. British and American operatives saw copies as early as mid-June 1944, and it was broadcast in part by the BBC and condensed and printed in the New York Times on June 20.

After the report had been handed to the Slovak Jewish Council, Rosenberg was given a new identity and new papers in the name of Rudolf Vrba, which he legalized after the liberation. On August 29, 1944, the Slovak army revolted against the Nazis, and Vrba joined a Czechoslovak partisan unit in September 1944. He gave April 7, the day of his escape, as his birthdate.

When World War II ended, Vrba was celebrated as a national hero. He was awarded the Czechoslovak Medal for Bravery, the Order of Slovak National Insurrection, and the Order of Meritorious Fighter. Moving to Prague in 1945, he read biology and chemistry at Charles University and earned a doctorate in biochemistry. Chafing under the yoke of communism, however, he defected to Israel in 1958 and then moved to Britain in 1960, where he became a British citizen.

In 1963 he published his memoir, Escape from Auschwitz: I Cannot Forgive, which he wrote with the assistance of Irish journalist Alan Bestic. This was based on a series of articles he wrote for the Daily Herald, timed to coincide with the 1961 trial of SS-Obersturmbannführer Adolf Eichmann in Israel. The book was translated into several languages, although, interestingly, it did not appear in Hebrew until 1998. During the trial itself, Vrba presented written testimony against Eichmann.

Vrba detailed not only his daring escape but also the mishandling of his report. He considered that it signaled a lost opportunity that might well have led to the deaths of more than 400,000 Hungarian Jews, who were deported to Auschwitz beginning in May 1944—less than a month after his escape. Vrba maintained that the Zionist Aid and Rescue Committee delayed passing on his testimony, in which he had warned of the Nazi plan to deport the Hungarian Jews. He also claimed that the Allies did not act quickly or forcefully enough given the information he had provided. For the remainder of his life, Vrba believed that more could have been done to mitigate the effects of the Holocaust.

Vrba moved to Canada in 1967, taking a faculty position at the University of British Columbia. He became a Canadian citizen in 1972. In 1985 he testified at the Toronto trial of Ernst Zündel, a publisher of Holocaust denial material who had been charged with knowingly publishing false information in an attempt to foment social or racial intolerance. When Zündel's defense attorney, Doug Christie, accused Vrba of having fabricated the events at Auschwitz, Vrba shot back that he had witnessed the evidence of unmistakable mass murder with his own eyes. The confrontation between the two was a memorable highlight of the trial for those who were there to see it. Rudolf Vrba died of cancer, aged 81, on March 27, 2006, in Vancouver, British Columbia.

Construction on the camp began in May 1942, and it became operational toward the end of the year. The first political prisoners arrived before construction was complete, coming from another Dutch camp at Amersfoort. The initial group of Jewish prisoners arrived at Vught during January 1943, and by May of that year their numbers had increased to 8,684.

In its first design, Vught was divided into two sections, a Jewish camp and one for political prisoners. The Jewish camp was intended to serve as a transit camp, calculated to hold Jews prior to them being deported, first to Westerbork, and from there to death camps situated in Poland. The so-called “security camp” took in Dutch and Belgian political prisoners. In May and August 1943 two additional areas of Vught were created: a camp exclusively for women, and what was essentially a penitentiary within the camp, where prisoners in detention were kept.

The camp measured 500 by 200 meters and consisted of 36 living and 23 working barracks. Surrounding this complex was a double barbed-wire fence, with watchtowers placed every 50 meters around the perimeter. Just outside the camp were the SS barracks. Some prisoners were permitted to work outside the camp in a factory owned by the Dutch electrical company Philips. Here, up to 1,200 prisoners were employed in conditions that the company claimed were decent; these included a cooked meal every day and exemption from deportation. Such conditions were valued, the more so as elsewhere in Vught circumstances were, quite simply, appalling. Particularly at the start, the food was poor and the SS guards were exceptionally brutal (even by SS standards). Hundreds of prisoners died during the first few months of the camp's existence.

With one of the functions of the camp being the transit of Jews to death camps, a number of convoys left Vught during the course of its existence, bound for Germany and Poland. In June 1943, for instance, hundreds of Jewish children were sent to Sobibór, while there were additional transports of Jews sent in November 1943 and June 1944. Most convoys, however, went first to Westerbork, which was the major transit camp for the Netherlands.

By May 1943 Vught held nearly 31,000 prisoners of all backgrounds: Jews, political prisoners, resistance fighters, Roma, Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexuals, and criminals, among others. This period saw the high point of Vught in terms of prisoner numbers, though it took more than another full year before the camp began to be liquidated in the summer of 1944. On June 3, 1944, one final group of prisoners was transported out. It was comprised of 517 workers from

Vught

Vught was a concentration camp established for Dutch political prisoners, located in southern Holland near the city of 's-Hertogenbosch. Called by its Dutch name of Kamp Vught and known to the Germans as Konzentrationslager Herzogenbusch, Vught, together with Natzweiler-Struthof in France, were the only Nazi concentration camps in Western Europe outside of Germany.

the Philips factory. When sent to Auschwitz, they were used as slave labor by another electronics company, Telefunken, though only 160 of these survived. Most of the men had been killed; two-thirds of those who stayed alive until liberation were women, and nine were children.

As Allied forces were approaching Vught during the fall of 1944, the SS began to work on dismantling operations at the camp, and most of the prisoners were transferred to concentration camps further east. Across the period September 4–5, 1944, many of the women were transferred to Ravensbrück; the men were sent to Sachsenhausen. By September 5–6, 1944, Vught was practically empty. On October 26, 1944, the camp was liberated by Canadian troops. They found a total of no more than around 500 prisoners still there, all of whom had been slated for execution by the Nazis that day. Were it not for the arrival of the Canadians, there was every likelihood that they would have been murdered. Another 500 or so inmates were discovered dead in piles near the gates; they had been murdered earlier that same morning.

Altogether, owing to hunger, sickness, murder, and general abuse, some 749 men, women, and children lost their lives during the camp's existence. A large number—329 of them—were killed at an execution site known as the Fusilladeplaats. They were for the most part members of the Dutch resistance, brought to Vught from various prisons and murdered between late July and early September 1944. The perpetrators were members of the Dutch SS, who were routinely used by the Germans to guard the watchtowers.

After the war the camp was used as a prison for Dutch collaborators and up to 6,000 Germans, evacuated from various parts of the Netherlands until their repatriation later in 1945. The camp remained open as an internment facility until 1949. On December 20, 1947, then-Princess Juliana (who would be crowned the following year) unveiled a memorial at the site with the names of all those who had lost their lives at Vught. Then, in April 1990, the National Monument Camp Vught was opened by Queen Beatrix of the Netherlands. It is accompanied by a visitor center and museum, containing exhibitions from the time of the camp's existence. There is also a national monument commemorating the victims of the camp and all those who passed through it.

Waffen-SS

Military component of the German SS that fought alongside the Wehrmacht (German Army) as an elite National Socialist force. Created in 1925 through the merger of the guard organization of the Nazi Party (the Stabswache) and the Nazi Stosstruppe (“shock troops”), the SS initially functioned as a bodyguard unit for the Nazi hierarchy and contained the most ideologically fervent party members. Party leader Adolf Hitler appointed Heinrich Himmler as the SS-Reichsführer in 1929, and Himmler eventually increased SS membership from 280 to 50,000, endowing members with a distinctive black uniform (designed by Hugo Boss), as well as the skull and double runic S symbols. Himmler’s aim was to transform the SS from its security function within the Nazi Party into a separate and powerful bureaucratic policing organ of the German state.

Between 1933 and 1936 Himmler combined all state police functions, merging the Gestapo (Geheime Staatspolizei, or secret state police) with the Nazi Party’s security organization (Sicherheitsdienst, or SD) to create the Reichssicherheitshauptamt (RSHA). He ensured his organization a more pervasive role in 1939 after his appointment as Reichskommissar for the Strengthening of German Ethnicity. Through this post, the SS was assured economic and political control of occupied Europe, especially in the east, where Nazi ideology envisaged a German territorial expansion (Lebensraum) and the subordination—and, eventually, the elimination—of the Jews. To achieve this goal, Himmler created a separate economic office for the SS, the Wirtschafts und Verwaltungs Hauptamt (WVHA) and oversaw the Race and Population Resettlement program (Rasse und Siedlungshauptamt, or RuSHA).

Himmler had much higher ambitions for the SS than mere police functions, however. He wanted it to be a professional military body that might one day subsume the German Army itself. As its political and bureaucratic functions expanded, the SS formed illegal military units, originally known as Verfügungstruppe, or special assignment troops. On March 17, 1933, Josef “Sepp” Dietrich established, on Hitler’s direct order, a personal armed guard, the Liebstandarte. Early on, members of the unit served, among other things, as honor guards and color guards at parades and other events, such as the 1934 Nuremberg party rally. The rally involved Dietrich’s SS Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler, composed of 2,600 men. But Himmler also employed such units in liquidating the leadership of the Sturmabteilung (SA, or storm troops) during the Blood Purge of June 1934.

To qualify for the Verfügungstruppe, males had to be between 17 and 22 years old and at least 5’11” tall. These units were supposed to be superior to army formations in training and morale and were to receive the best weapons. Early armed SS personnel also included concentration camp guards, the SS-Totenkopfverbände (or Death’s Head formations), organized by Theodor Eicke. By March 1936 the SS was subdivided into five Sturmabteilungen (battalions) totaling 3,500 men: No. 1 Oberbayern, No. 2 Elbe, No. 3 Sachsen, No. 4 Ostfriesland, and No. 5 Brandenburg. After Germany

The Waffen-SS was the armed wing of the SS. At its peak strength it numbered 38 divisions during World War II and was deployed in combat roles, particularly on the Eastern Front. Volunteers and conscripts came to the Waffen-SS from German-occupied countries in Europe, as well as other collaborationist regimes not directly involved in the war. As an SS organization, the Waffen-SS was founded on Nazi racial ideology. introduced conscription in 1935, the SS organized two 5,000-man regiments, the Deutschland and the Germania.

On October 1, 1936, the SS Inspectorate was created to supervise the two SS officer training schools in operation at Bad Tolz and Braunschweig, under the supervision of Oberstgruppenführers Paul Hausser and Felix Steiner. Early applicants had to have served at least two years in the army. Training emphasized physical fitness and endurance rather than parade-ground drill, so that fully equipped troops could march or run 1.86 miles (3 kilometers) within 20 minutes. There was also a rigorous combat-training course. Steiner's demanding standards meant that, in 1937, only 15 of every 100 SS applicants were accepted. Steiner also sought to instill a sense of family in each SS unit, encouraging officers to consort with noncommissioned officers (NCOs) and not to address one another by rank but rather as "comrade." In addition, the SS oath contained a sense of elitism and personal bond to the Führer: "I swear to Adolf Hitler, as Fuhrer and Chancellor of the German Reich, loyalty and bravery. I vow obedience to you and to the superiors whom you shall appoint, obedience unto death, so help me God."

The SS motto was "Loyalty is my honor" (Meine Ehre Heisst Treue). Mystique and symbolism were used to entice and muster group solidarity. Only those who had graduated from the two officer training schools and possessed the rank of Untersturmführer or above were permitted to carry a special dagger. SS recruits were also tattooed in their armpits, and the first 10,000 received an SS ring (later on, only officers who had served three years might wear the ring). Himmler also created a pseudo-Arthurian court at Wewelsburg Castle near Paderborn in Westphalia, where he organized a round table of favorite officers (the Circle of Friends of the SS-Reichsführer), with a runic coat of arms for each member.

On August 17, 1938, a decree by Hitler set up a separate headquarters for the military training of these SS units and established their military character as fighting (Waffen) SS. For obvious reasons, the leaders of the Army High Command (OKH) rejected the idea of another military establishment independent of its authority and had some success in limiting its size. By the eve of the war, there were only about 23,000 men in the SS formations, including the Death's Head groups. But with the coming of the war, the size and scope of SS activities increased dramatically. During the Polish Campaign of September 1939, Waffen-SS regiments were merged together within regular Wehrmacht divisions. In October, the first three SS divisions were formed, one each from the Verfügungstruppe (later known as SS-Das Reich Division), the Death's Head units (SS-Totenkopf Division), and the police (Polizedivision). Hitler's Leibstandarte, initially a motorized regiment, became a fourth SS division (SS-Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler). In November, the various SS branches were united under the name Waffen-SS.

SS divisions were fully integrated into the regular army command structure, but that did not mean that there was no tension between regular army and SS commanders. The SS divisions were highly politicized and supported the National Socialist credo and its racial policies, especially in Eastern Europe. They were also guilty of numerous atrocities. The same was not true of many German regular army units. There was also anger in the army over the fact that the SS units had claim on the best weaponry. Sharp tensions and inefficiencies also existed within SS headquarters, where Himmler mirrored his master in practicing a divide-and-rule style of leadership.

The Waffen-SS role was greatly expanded after the German invasion of the Soviet Union began in June 1941. It was a foregone conclusion that the SS would play a paramount role during this ideological war of annihilation. In addition to the 1st SS Panzer Division (Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler), there were five other Waffen-SS divisions at this time: the 2nd SS Panzer Division (Das Reich), the 3rd SS Panzer Division (Totenkopf), the 4th SS Polizei Panzergrenadier Division, the 5th SS Panzer Division (Viking), and the 6th SS Gebirge Division (Nord, composed largely of Norwegians). The SS Einsatzgruppen (special action groups), death squads to murder Jews and communists, were also formed, a third of their membership being recruited from Waffen-SS units. Four of these groups of about 3,000 men each were formed by July 1941 to follow Army Groups North, Center, and South into the Soviet Union. Their role of exterminating Jews and Soviet officials had been decided prior to the Soviet invasion, and it was sanctioned by Hitler through his Commissar Order (Kommissarbefehl) of May 1941, as well as the operational orders to the Wehrmacht stipulating that no German soldiers were to be disciplined for any action against the civilian Soviet population.

SS formations fought on all battlefronts in which Germany was engaged, with the exception of the Western Desert campaigns. As casualties mounted and following the general army reform of May 1943 that reduced divisional size, Waffen-SS units were amalgamated and renamed. By the end of the war, when the total number in the SS mounted to more than 800,000 men in 38 divisions, some 200,000 were foreign volunteers (Freiwilligen). This practice of recruitment was accepted despite the SS pretense of representing only the most racially pure Germanic elements. Among the militarily effective new formations were the 9th SS Panzer Division (Hohenstaufen), the 10th SS Panzer Division (Frundsberg), and the 12th SS Panzer Division (Hitler Jugend, composed largely of Latvians).

Paradoxically, the early Waffen-SS units suffered higher casualties than their regular Wehrmacht counterparts, specifically as a result of their ideological zeal to fight the enemy. As the war progressed, antisemitic and anticommunist elements of the occupied populations formed their own Waffen-SS units: Nordland, which was the first non-German organized unit (Norwegian and Danish); Lettisches (Baltic); Skanderbeg (Albanian); Maria Theresa (Austrian); Kama (Croatian); Nederland (Netherlands); Hunyadi (Hungarian); Charlemagne (French); Bohmen-Mahren (Czech and Slovak); Kalevala (Finnish); Galicia (Ukrainian); and Kaminski (Ukrainian and Russian).

Some Waffen-SS units were among the most effective German military formations and there were a number of capable commanders. Undoubtedly, the most effective of the latter was Hausser, who became the first SS general to command a German field army and directed the Normandy defenses beginning in late June 1944. But Waffen-SS formations were also the most brutal German military units in their treatment of enemy prisoners and conquered peoples, and they committed numerous atrocities. The growing strength of the SS also posed a real threat to the ascendancy of the Wehrmacht, especially in the last year of the war. Hitler despised many of the army generals, and it is clear that, had Germany won the war, the Waffen-SS would have replaced the Wehrmacht as the army of the Reich. In all, as many as 250,000 Waffen-SS members may have been killed during the course of the war.

Wagner, Richard

A composer and music theorist of consummate brilliance, Richard Wagner was one of the world's most controversial artists. His dark and innovative operas, with their unique style of orchestration, use of chromatics, and leading motives, changed the genre of opera forever. He also published hundreds of essays, used mainly to promote artistic idealism and antisemitism. A revolutionary, Wagner was alternately loved and hated and continues to inflame emotions more than 130 years after his death.

Wilhelm Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, in Leipzig, Germany. He was the ninth child of Friedrich and Johanna Wagner, but his true parentage was never certain, least of all to him. Prior to his birth, his mother carried on an affair with an actor-painter friend of her husband's, Ludwig Geyer. When Friedrich died in December 1813, Geyer moved in with the family, marrying Johanna in August 1814. Wagner never knew who his true father was, a question that was to surface in his operas, as all but one of his heroes are fatherless.

Wagner's schooling was sporadic, and he was mostly self-taught. He enrolled at Leipzig University in 1831, studying piano and composition. Unlike other composers, Wagner never became proficient on the piano or any other instrument, and his formal training was brief. Instead, he engaged in close studies of the quartets and symphonies of Ludwig van Beethoven. His first composition, Symphony in C Major, was performed in Leipzig in 1833, the year he left the university to become operatic coach at Würzburg. There he composed his first opera, Die Feen (The Fairies), which was never staged in his lifetime.

Wagner became conductor of the theater in Magdeburg in July 1834 and wrote his second opera, Das Liebesverbot (The Ban on Love), based on William Shakespeare's Measure for Measure. Das Liebesverbot's debut was a disaster, with only three people in the audience and a fistfight between the cast backstage. Wagner never attempted to stage it again. While in Magdeburg, Wagner fell in love with Minna Planer, an emotional actress three years older than him who traveled with a "younger sister" who was actually her illegitimate daughter. Wagner and Planer were married in Königsberg in November 1836, but it did not take Planer long to realize that her husband would probably never hold a job long enough to pay off his debts. She ran off with a businessman in the first months of their marriage but eventually returned to Wagner.

Wagner began conducting the theater in Riga in 1837 and started work on his third opera, Rienzi, the story of a 14th-century Roman who unites his neighbors against corrupt nobles before being assassinated. Rienzi included a ballet and ended with an onstage fire. Wagner's debts in Riga mounted, and after two years there, he decided to try his hand in Paris. Unable to pay his creditors, he and his wife slipped away from Riga by ship to London and then traveled to France.

Wagner stayed in Paris from 1839 to 1842, working as an arranger for publishers and theaters. He wrote the text and score to The Flying Dutchman, as well as several articles that brought his antisemitism to light. Wagner was convinced that the entire Jewish establishment in Paris was conspiring against him, but he used his friendship with Jewish composer Giacomo Meyerbeer for his benefit anyway. With Meyerbeer's help, Das Liebesverbot was accepted for production at a Paris theater, but it went bankrupt before the play could be performed. Rienzi was then accepted for production in Dresden, prompting Wagner to return to Germany. The Flying Dutchman was subsequently accepted in Berlin, largely thanks to Meyerbeer.

Wagner's first years back in Germany were some of his most successful. Rienzi was a huge hit in Dresden when it was first performed on October 20, 1842, despite its six-hour running time, and it was followed the next year by The Flying Dutchman. Innovative in the way it integrated music with drama, Dutchman was initially not as successful but led to Wagner's appointment as conductor of the court opera, directing all music in the theater, palace, and church. His next opera, Tannhäuser (1845), was the first of his works based on Germanic legends and the last staged in Dresden.

Wagner upset the Dresden theater establishment in 1845 by proposing a series of reforms, including more rehearsal time, pensions, a minimum wage, and sick leave for everyone from performers to janitors. He next became involved in the Revolutions of 1848, writing pamphlets and giving speeches advocating revolution. He befriended Russian revolutionary Mikhail Bakunin and participated in the Dresden uprising of 1849. When Prussian troops finally quelled the activity, a warrant was issued for Wagner's arrest. He managed to escape to Weimar, where Franz Liszt staged the first production of Wagner's Lohengrin in August 1850. By then, Wagner had escaped to Switzerland using funds borrowed from Liszt. He would not return to Germany for 11 years.

Wagner arrived in Switzerland in debt and with no prospects. He vented his frustration by writing a pamphlet in August 1850 titled "Judaism in Music," a vicious pronouncement of antisemitism. He wrote several nobler works as well, including Art and Revolution, The Art Work of the Future, A Communication to My Friends, and Opera and Drama, all published between 1849 and 1852. Opera and Drama outlined an operatic production Wagner had actually begun working on in 1848 that would create a new relationship between words, music, and staging and become one of the greatest artistic works of Western civilization—the four-part The Ring of the Nibelung.

From the beginning, Wagner knew The Ring of the Nibelung was a revolutionary work, and it would be years before it was ever staged. He was able to complete the first two parts of the Ring, Das Rheingold (The Rhinegold) and Die Walküre (The Valkyrie), in Zurich, where he relied on the financial resources of Otto Wesendonck, a prosperous merchant with whose wife, Mathilde, Wagner had an affair. Though Wagner called it a "drama," today it is known as the first "music drama," a musical poem set to continuous vocal and symphonic texture. Several basic themes make up the texture and are expressed by both the performers and the orchestra. These leitmotifs, or leading motives, express the dramatic and psychological development of the characters and the story. Wagner knew that he could not afford to stage such a revolutionary and encompassing work, so he set the Ring aside for several years and concentrated on more "normal" productions, composing Tristan und Isolde (1857–1859), considered his most difficult work, and Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (The Mastersingers of Nurnberg, 1868), his only comedy.

In 1859 Wagner left Zurich embarrassed over his public affair with Mathilde Wesendonck. He and his wife agreed to separate, and for the next several years he traveled between Venice, Paris, and Vienna. A production of Tannhäuser in Paris in 1860 was a disaster—it was booed off the stage on three separate nights—and he left Paris to conduct in Germany and Russia before settling in Vienna to prepare for a production of Tristan that never materialized. By 1864 Wagner was 51 years old, more than broke, and in debt all over Europe. Amazingly, he received the miracle he needed.

Dining in Stuttgart in May 1864, he received word that the 18-year-old king of Bavaria, Ludwig II, was a great admirer of his and wished to settle his debts, provide for his well-being, and give him whatever he needed for his work. Never one for pride, Wagner enthusiastically raced to Munich.

The next six years saw the production of all of Wagner's operas in Munich, including the first performances of Tristan und Isolde (1865), Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868), Das Rheingold (1869), and Die Walküre (1870). Die Meistersinger was a huge success despite its length (it is the longest opera ever composed) and was performed throughout Europe, providing Wagner with much needed funds. He remained in debt, however, and compounded his problems by interfering in Ludwig's government and carrying on an affair with the wife of his conductor. All but driven out of Munich, Wagner moved back to Switzerland in 1865, where Ludwig set him up in a lakeside house. There, he set to work completing Siegfried, the third part of the Ring he had stopped work on more than a decade before. Wagner received word of his wife's death in 1865 and in 1870 married Cosima von Bülow, the former wife of his conductor and the daughter of Liszt. They had three children together prior to their marriage.

Wagner completed the four-opera Ring—Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, Siegfried, and Die Götterdämmerung (The Twilight of the Gods)—by 1872 and broke the contract he had made with Ludwig promising it would be performed in Munich. He felt the Munich theatrical facilities were inadequate and proposed building a new theater solely for the Ring. He drummed up funds and support all over Germany after deciding on a location in Bayreuth, a small Bavarian village. The theater's foundation was laid in 1872, and on August 13, 14, 16, and 17, 1876, the first complete production of the Ring of the Nibelung was performed at the Bayreuth Festival House. The entire event took more than 18 hours, comprising a drama cycle about gods, humans, dwarves, and every aspect of the human condition. It took Wagner more than 20 years to complete the Ring; since its first presentation, it has been interpreted in hundreds of different ways, with critics only agreeing that it forever changed the genre of opera.

The performance of the Ring of the Nibelung was a worldwide event, and afterward, Wagner fell into a depression. He conducted a series of concerts in England but otherwise dedicated himself to his last opera, Parsifal, and essay writing. He started a newspaper, the Bayreuther Blätter, to propagate his ideas on everything from vegetarianism to the benefits of a Germany without Jews. A spiritual opera intended for the amazing acoustics of the Bayreuth Festival House, Parsifal was a huge success when it opened in 1882, and many felt that Wagner must surely be finished. He moved his family to Venice and died there of a heart attack on February 13, 1883. He was buried at the family home, Wahnfried, near the Bayreuth Festival House, where the world's largest Wagner festival continues every summer.

One of the most fascinating figures of the 19th century, Wagner arouses emotions like no other composer and is one of the most studied. By the time of his death, he was the most talked about composer in the world, either loved or despised for his music or his life. To many, he was the epitome of Germany and German nationalism, and Adolf Hitler's later adoption of Wagner as the composer of the Third Reich forever associated him with a devastating time in world history. Nevertheless, his influence is immeasurable, his conception of music evident in 20th-century film scores, symphonies, and modern program music.

Because of Wagner's antisemitism, his works were not performed in Israel until recently. In 1981 conductor Zubin Mehta attempted to "insert" a Wagner piece into an encore with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. The audience protested, shouting "shame, shame," while an usher stormed the stage brandishing his arm with a concentration camp tattoo. Mehta was forced to end the performance. Subsequently, the Israel Philharmonic vowed not to play Wagner until all Holocaust survivors had passed away. Attitudes began to change (although controversy remained), and on October 27, 2000, conductor Mendi Rodan led the Israel Symphony orchestra in Siegfried.

Waldheim Affair

The Waldheim Affair consisted of allegations of involvement in Nazi atrocities against Kurt Waldheim, the former secretary-general of the United Nations, when running for the presidency of the Austrian Republic.

Kurt Waldheim was born on December 21, 1918, in Sankt Andra-Wordern, Austria. He was educated at Vienna's

Consular Academy and the University of Vienna, where he received a doctor of jurisprudence degree. His education was interrupted by his draft into the German Army, in which he served on the Russian front until 1941, when he was wounded. He then returned to the university, although some documents suggest that he was a German staff officer stationed in the Balkans from 1942 to 1945.

In his later autobiography, Waldheim claimed that although a junior officer in a German SA unit before 1939, he had spent most of the war in Vienna recuperating from wounds and studying law. After the war, he entered the Austrian Foreign Service and served in numerous capacities both at home and abroad: a delegate to the negotiations on the Austrian State Treaty, the director general for political affairs at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, ambassador to Canada, and foreign affairs minister. He served as Austria's permanent representative to the UN from 1964 to 1968 and again from 1970 until 1971. In that year he failed in his effort to become Austria's president but was, instead, elected as secretary-general of the UN, a post he held until 1982, when he was defeated in an effort to win a third term of office.

As secretary-general, Waldheim visited areas of special concern to the UN that included South Africa, Cyprus, and the Middle East. In 1973 he took part in the Paris International Conference on Vietnam, and in December that year he presided over the first meeting of the Geneva Peace Conference on the Middle East. In 1974 he visited the Sudano-Saharan area of Africa, where the UN had undertaken major relief efforts to assist victims of a prolonged drought. Overall, Waldheim's tenure was efficient but less dynamic than that of some of his predecessors.

Waldheim began his second campaign to become president of Austria in late 1985. He had served two terms as UN secretary-general and established a reputation as a man of peace. His attempt to win a third term in 1981, however, was blocked by the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC), and Waldheim retired to Vienna. He published his autobiography in 1985.

Despite Waldheim's presence, the Austrian presidential campaign of 1986 merited little international attention until Profil, an Austrian news magazine, printed a series of articles alleging that Waldheim had omitted crucial details about his service in the German Army during World War II and in his presidential campaign. Profil revealed evidence that Waldheim had spent considerable time on duty in the Balkans and in Salonika, Greece. Although the magazine did not accuse Waldheim directly, it did note that his unit had murdered Yugoslav partisans and deported Jews to concentration camps during his service. Waldheim responded by saying that he had no knowledge of any atrocities and had simply “done his duty as a soldier.”

The election instantly attracted controversy. The allegations regarding his possible complicity in Nazi war crimes, including vicious reprisals against Yugoslav partisans and the deportation of Jews, prompted sympathy for Waldheim in Austria. This sympathy was instrumental in helping him become elected, at the same time also inspiring an antisemitic backlash. The claims prompted the U.S. government to declare Waldheim an undesirable alien; as a consequence, he became the first head of state ever placed on a watch list of undesirable aliens and was denied entry to the United States. He was an international pariah for most of his tenure; many other states also treated Waldheim as persona non grata, leaving Austria isolated internationally. Only the Vatican, the Soviet Union and its satellites, and a few Middle Eastern states allowed Waldheim to visit.

Waldheim appointed a historical commission to investigate the allegations against him. The commission found no evidence that he was directly involved in war crimes but did conclude that he had to have been aware of crimes committed while he served in the Balkans. The commission also determined that Waldheim had done nothing to stop the atrocities and that he lied about his military career in an effort to avoid exposure. Waldheim claimed the report was full of “manipulations, lies, and forgeries” and asserted that his problems were caused by an international Jewish conspiracy. Nevertheless, he had been included on a list of war criminals compiled by the Yugoslav government after the war, although he was never prosecuted.

The affair quickly became the focus of the presidential election. Older Austrians generally supported Waldheim, claiming that Austria was a victim of Nazi aggression and an unwilling participant in the war. Younger Austrians, however, tended to be more suspicious and called for an open discussion of Austria’s Nazi past. Amid growing tensions, the Austrian government launched its own investigation, which largely exonerated Waldheim. Where the U.S. report had concluded that there was “a prima facie case that Kurt Waldheim assisted or otherwise participated in the persecution of persons because of race, religion, national origin or political opinion,” these new findings found no evidence that Waldheim had participated in war crimes. At the same time, the report concluded that as a translator in the unit, Waldheim must have had knowledge of the atrocities.

After heated debate and a run-off election, Waldheim emerged as president of Austria in June 1986, winning 54% of the vote. Waldheim remained in office after this ambiguous finding, claiming that he did so in the best interests of the Austrian people. He also went on Austrian television to plead his case. He admitted that Austrians had played some role in the Holocaust, which he described as one of the greatest tragedies in human history, and he condemned fanaticism and intolerance in all forms. The international community remained unmoved. Whether or not Waldheim affected Austrian opinion is hard to say. He chose not to run for reelection in 1992. At the very least, Waldheim gave Austrians the chance to discuss a complicated past that had been kept under wraps for nearly 50 years.

Kurt Waldheim served as president of Austria, a primarily ceremonial position, for six years. In July 1992 he was succeeded by Thomas Klestil. Waldheim died in Vienna on June 14, 2007.

Wallenberg, Raoul

Raoul Wallenberg was a Swedish diplomat who volunteered to be sent to Budapest in 1944 on behalf of the World Jewish Congress and the American War Refugee Board in order to save Jews threatened with deportation at the hands of the Nazis.

He was born in Stockholm on August 4, 1912, to Raoul Oscar Wallenberg, a Swedish naval officer, and Maj (Maria) Sofia Wallenberg, née Wising. The large Wallenberg family was one of the most famous in Sweden, comprising bankers, diplomats, industrialists, and politicians over several generations. Wallenberg’s great-great grandfather, a man named Benedicks, was Jewish, a fact of which Wallenberg remained proud all his life.

After completing his compulsory military service, Wallenberg studied for a year in Paris before being sent, in 1931, to the University of Michigan, where he studied architecture

Raoul Wallenberg was a Swedish businessman and diplomatic envoy, widely credited for saving the lives of tens of thousands of Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary during 1944. The protective passports he issued were an important element in his life-saving activities, as were the arrangements he made to shelter Jews in buildings which, through a diplomatic sleight-of-hand, he managed to reclassify as Swedish sovereign territory. and graduated with honors, winning a university medal for academic excellence. Upon returning to Sweden he learned that his American degree did not qualify him to practice as an architect, so he spent the next period of his life wandering through a variety of occupations in various places around the world: in a construction company in Cape Town, South Africa; at a branch office of the Holland Bank in Haifa, Palestine; and finally at an import-export company back in Sweden, the Central European Trading Company. Within eight months he was a joint owner of the company and its international director.

This not only gave him administrative experience but it also enabled him to ascertain at firsthand the nature of conditions in Germany and occupied countries under the Nazis. As a necessary part of his business dealings he also made numerous trips to Hungary. He learned to speak Hungarian and made many contacts in Budapest that would soon be useful for the purpose of saving lives.

As the war progressed and Hungary's earlier successes began to slip away, Germany decided that its ally should be occupied to ensure that it would not surrender as Italy had in September 1943. Accordingly, on March 19, 1944, German troops invaded Hungary and a pro-German puppet government was installed. For the Jews of Hungary—the last large Jewish community thus far untouched by the Holocaust—Nazi antisemitic measures now arrived like the eruption at Vesuvius. By May 1944 the mass deportation of Hungary's Jews was in full swing, at the average rate of 12,000 each day.

In 1944 the United States established the War Refugee Board (WRB) to try to save the remaining Jews of Europe. The WRB soon learned that attempts were being made in Sweden to rescue Hungary's Jews, and a committee was established in Stockholm at its behest to discuss suitable candidates to lead a rescue mission in Budapest. Initially, Count Folke Bernadotte was proposed, but he was rejected by the Hungarian government as someone with whom they could do business. The next to be suggested was Raoul Wallenberg, already known to many Hungarians. He was approved by the committee and by the end of June 1944 was appointed first secretary at the Swedish legation in Budapest. His was a singular mission: to start a rescue operation.

Wallenberg took up his position in July 1944, with the campaign against the Jews of Hungary at its height. Already more than 400,000 Jews from the countryside had been deported, mostly to Auschwitz. Budapest was about to be hit.

Together with fellow Swedish diplomat Per Anger, and building on the precedent established by the Swiss vice-consul in Budapest, Carl Lutz, he issued "protective passports" (Schutzpässe), which placed those holding them under Swedish protection. The Swedish legation negotiated with the Germans for the bearers to be treated as Swedish citizens and exempt from wearing the yellow star. In no time at all, more than 700 passes had been issued, though Wallenberg saw an immediate need for a much greater number. He requested that the Swedish government send more of everything: people, money, and anything that could aid in the creation of a rescue infrastructure.

Even before Wallenberg had commenced his activities, Valdemar Langlet, the head of the Swedish Red Cross in Hungary, had already been finding ways to assist the Swedish legation. He rented buildings for the Red Cross and put Swedish signs on them to give the impression that somehow they were official diplomatic premises. Wallenberg then capitalized on this by renting 32 additional buildings and declared them to have diplomatic immunity. Adorned with Swedish flags, they were then used as hiding places for Jews. It is estimated that these buildings eventually housed well over 10,000 people.

Wallenberg did not use traditional diplomacy, and he employed everything from bribes to threats of extortion to save lives. One way was by employing Jews in the Swedish legation offices. By the time the war ended, at least 340 Jews “worked” in the embassy, with another 700 living in the building.

His “protective passes,” moreover, had no official status whatsoever, though he created credibility for them through the confident manner in which he introduced them—such that Hungarian and German officials accepted them without demur. At the start of his mission, he was only given authority to issue 1,500 passes, but without waiting to be told otherwise he negotiated a further 1,000 and then kept going until he had raised the quota to 4,500.

With the war coming to an end and the Soviet Red Army advancing on Budapest during the late fall of 1944, the Nazis intensified their efforts to deport the remaining Jews. Wallenberg went to train stations from where Jews were to embark, entered railcars with Jews inside, and handed out protective passes. He stood on tracks to make trains stop, after which he repeated the exercise. He was even known to climb on board carriage roofs and stuff protective passes into the air vents for the people inside.

When the Nazis began to deport large numbers of Jews on death marches, in conditions where freezing and starving Jews were subjected to brutal conditions, Wallenberg, like Lutz, Anger, and other members of the diplomatic community, was there too. He accompanied the death marches for as long as he could, handing out more protective passes and demanding that those holding them be freed.

On January 17, 1945, with the end of the war nigh and the liberation of Budapest close, Wallenberg was arrested by Soviet troops on charges of espionage. On his way out of the capital, he stopped at one of the “Swedish Houses” to give its inhabitants a final farewell. He was never seen in public again. Just why he was arrested has ever since remained a mystery, though one explanation is that through his work with the War Refugee Board the Soviets considered him to be an agent of the U.S. government and, therefore, a spy.

Moreover, his fate was for a long time a matter of intense speculation. The actual locations of his imprisonment were never confirmed, and all information about his detention is essentially speculation. Even the date and circumstances of his death are uncertain. At first, the Soviet government denied that he had been arrested at all; then, when they confirmed this, they insisted that he died of a heart attack on July 17, 1947. After the downfall of communism and the end of the Cold War, a former member of the Politburo, Alexander Yakovlev, announced in 2000 that Wallenberg had been executed by the KGB in 1947 in Moscow’s Lubyanka prison.

It has been estimated that Raoul Wallenberg’s actions in Budapest during 1944 and early January 1945 saved the lives of more than 30,000 Jews. His influence, however, far exceeded this number. When Soviet forces liberated Budapest in February 1945, more than 100,000 Jews were still alive, mostly as a result of his efforts and those of other members of the diplomatic community, which, it has been argued, he was instrumental in mobilizing. According to Wallenberg’s colleague at the Swedish embassy, Per Anger, Wallenberg is therefore responsible for saving those 100,000 lives.

Due to his efforts on behalf of the Hungarian Jews, Raoul Wallenberg has been celebrated throughout the world. He has been awarded the status of honorary citizen in the United States, Canada, Hungary, Australia, and Israel, and on November 26, 1963, Yad Vashem recognized him as one of the Righteous among the Nations. Monuments have been dedicated to him, with streets and squares named in his honor, and when the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum was being built in Washington, D.C., its street location was designated as 100 Raoul Wallenberg Place.

Wannsee Conference

A day-long conference of German leaders called to discuss the bureaucratic demands of arranging for the emigration, deportation, concentration, and elimination of the Jewish population within Germany and the occupied territories.

The conferees also established policies for the treatment of Jews who were of mixed blood or in mixed marriages.

The conference was convened and organized by the head of the SD, Reinhard Heydrich, who invited 15 top Nazi bureaucrats and SS officers to plan for the concentration of Jews and their execution. It took place in the Wannsee villa in suburban Berlin on January 20, 1942.

The German invasion and occupation of much of Eastern Europe, especially Poland and the Soviet Union, presented a demographic challenge to the German government because of the large Jewish populations in those areas, especially in Poland and the western Soviet Union. By the end of 1941, the head of the SS, Heinrich Himmler, recognized that deportation and emigration were no longer adequate for the task of eliminating the Jewish population. He authorized Heydrich to create the bureaucracy and arrangements for a “Final Solution of the Jewish Question” (Endlösung der Judenfrage). The Wannsee Conference dealt with these matters. Jews from across Europe were to be “evacuated” to the east, with the “Jewish question” to be resolved first in the area of Poland known by the Nazis as the Generalgouvernement.

Those attending the conference were: Reinhard Heydrich (head of the RSHA), presiding; Adolf Eichmann (Reich Main Security Office, IV B4), in attendance; Alfred Mayer and Georg Leibbrandt (Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories); Wilhelm Stuckart (Reich Ministry for the Interior); Erich Neumann (Head of the Office of the Four Year Plan); Roland Freisler (Reich Ministry of Justice); Josef Bühler (Director General of the Generalgouvernement); Martin Luther (Foreign Office); Gerhard Klopfer (NSDAP Chancellery); Friedrich Wilhelm Kritzinger (Reich Chancellery); Otto Hofmann (Race and Settlement Main Office); Heinrich Müller (Reich Main Security Office); SS-Obersturmbannführer; Karl Eberhard Schöngarth (Commander SD / SiPO Kraków); and Rudolf Lange (Commander SD Latvia).

The organizational challenges of identifying, transporting, housing, and eventually eliminating what the conferees overestimated as a population of 11 million European Jews (this number included those in neutral nations, such as Ireland, Turkey, and Switzerland) demanded that the Nazi government establish an infrastructure and clear procedures for implementing the goals of the regime. Although much of the discussion focused on forced emigration and deportation to Eastern Europe, the underlying objective of the conference was initiating, systematizing, and coordinating the “Final Solution.” Specific topics discussed at the conference included estimating the size of Europe’s Jewish population, organizing a systematic sweep of Europe to eliminate all Jewish remnants, and confronting local resistance in occupied countries.

Using the Nazi racial laws (the Nuremberg Laws), those attending the Wannsee Conference established criteria for dealing with mixed-blood Jews (so-called “Mischlinge”) and mixed marriages. Mischlinge were divided into a complex classification system based on “Mixed Blood of First Degree” and “Mixed Blood of Second Degree.” This juridical understanding of race was designed to bring about the complete extermination of Jews in Europe.

A stenographer carefully documented the day’s events in a complete record of the conversations, of which Adolf Eichmann served as conference secretary. At the end of the meeting, Heydrich gave Eichmann strict instructions about how to draw up the minutes, based on the stenographer’s record. They were to be carefully drafted, using coded, euphemistic language. The result was a short summary document in which the purposes of the meeting were outlined, together with conclusions as to next steps. Only a very limited number of copies of these minutes was sent out, with instructions that all were to be destroyed later. One, however, remained; in 1947 Martin Luther’s copy was located, enabling the story of the conference at Wannsee to be reconstructed. Then, at the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem, many of the conclusions drawn by earlier researchers were confirmed and extended by Eichmann’s own testimony.

Today, the location of the conference, the villa Wannsee, is a Holocaust memorial and museum known as the Haus der Wannsee-Konferenz (House of the Wannsee Conference). It was opened on January 20, 1992—the fiftieth anniversary of the conference.

War Crimes

The broad concept known as “war crimes” is a legal category within international law that identifies punishable offenses for violations of the generally accepted laws of war. Such laws have been evolving for many centuries and received an early codification in the work of the Dutch philosopher Hugo Grotius, particularly his 1625 book De iure belli ac pacis (On the Laws of War and Peace).

The laws of war underwent something of a revolution from the late 19th century onward, beginning with the first Geneva Convention in 1864 (and subsequent Geneva treaties in 1906, 1929, and 1949, with three protocols in 1949, 1977, and 2005). Other important international legislation pertaining to war crimes includes the two Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907; the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928; and an array of multilateral agreements, treaties and conventions passed by the League of Nations and the United Nations.

Where the Holocaust is concerned, confusion exists in relation to the application of the term war crimes owing to the fact that antisemitic actions undertaken by the Nazis were for the most part carried out against civilians, not in combat, and often by paramilitary or nonmilitary forces such as the SS (though the Waffen-SS does fit the category of “military”). Often, the related term “crimes against humanity” is more appropriate in describing Nazi mass murders of Jews—though an even more specific legal construct, genocide, is probably the most appropriate descriptor for what the Nazis did to the Jews from mid-1941 onward.

As a legal concept, the notion of war crimes has been further refined through the development of important case-law precedents; first, through the International Military Tribunals at Nuremberg and Tokyo in the aftermath of World War II; and second, through the ad hoc courts set up to cover the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1999 (the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia) and the genocide in Rwanda in 1994 (the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda). On July 1, 2002, the International Criminal Court (ICC) was established after a lengthy period of negotiation. Sitting in The Hague, its role is to prosecute war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. Though the ICC did not possess any retrospective jurisdiction when it was established, it is generally held throughout the world that it represents the best hope for the prosecution of war crimes in the future, and for creating a culture that will reject such crimes as an option available for armies, states, and individuals in times of war.

War Refugee Board

On January 22, 1944, U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9417, establishing the War Refugee Board (WRB). Roosevelt’s action created a board that consisted of top U.S. cabinet officials: the secretaries of state, war, and the Treasury. During its brief lifetime, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, Secretaries of State Cordell Hull and Edward Stettinius, and Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau served on the War Refugee Board.

Roosevelt’s executive order instructed the board to develop plans to rescue and provide relief for the victims of Nazi tyranny. The War Refugee Board, with cooperation from the State, War, and Treasury Departments, worked with both foreign governments and private relief institutions to accomplish their mission. John W. Phele was the first executive director of the WRB. Phele, a part of Morgenthau’s team at the Department of the Treasury, created its basic policies and planned for the rescue and relief operations. He was, however, a part-time director. In Washington, D.C., the War Refugee Board had a small administrative staff and relied on assistance from the larger affiliated departments. In January 1945 Phele resigned from the board and was replaced by a full-time administrator, William O’Dwyer.

The WRB sent special representatives to various parts of Europe (areas conquered by the Allies as well as neutral countries such as Spain, Switzerland, and Sweden) to initiate immediate efforts to provide rescue and relief. Neutral countries were urged to publicly announce the presence of safe havens inside their borders. The board worked with the International Red Cross, the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees (founded in 1938), and, in 1945, with the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) to give help to refugees.

The board, through various surreptitious methods, also used underground forces in Nazi-occupied territories to hide refugees from German forces and helped them to escape to Allied areas or neutral countries. WRB-sponsored operatives used a variety of means, including the issuing of false identification papers and bribery, to assist tens of thousands of refugees.

Sadly, the War Refugee Board's accomplishments were limited. The establishment of the board was too late in the war effort to save millions of Europeans doomed to die in labor and death camps. In addition, the board did not have all the administrative and diplomatic tools necessary to accomplish its tasks in an effective manner. In the final analysis, historians will always debate the nature of the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration's response to the Holocaust. From a historiographical standpoint the scholarly assessment ranges from a belated but wholehearted effort, to complete abandonment.

Despite the valid criticism of the War Refugee Board's record, it must be remembered that it did save tens of thousands of lives by its actions. More than 200,000 Jews were saved by WRB efforts. Romania, for example, provided a safe zone for 48,000 Jews. In Bulgaria, 120,000 Jews were spared deportation to Nazi camps. Ultimately, these refugees fled from the Balkans through Turkey into Palestine.

In September 1945 the new president—Harry S. Truman—signed another executive order (No. 9614) that ended the War Refugee Board. The board issued a “Final Summary Report” the same month. In November 1945 Rabbi Jonah Wise, vice-chairman of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, wrote a letter to the membership of his organization commenting that despite the end of the War Refugee Board, its work was not finished. Wise wrote that the people rescued from the death grip of the Nazis needed to be saved from “hunger and other dangers” in the perilous postwar world. In the wake of the catastrophic tidal wave of the Nazi period in Europe, Wise's thoughtful call to the American Jewish community and others to help displaced Jews who had nothing but the clothes on their back would take years to complete.

Warsaw Ghetto

Prior to the onset of World War II, the Jewish community of Poland was among the largest in the world. Warsaw, Poland's capital, was home to one of the world's most numerically flourishing Jewish communities and was comprised of an extremely rich diversity of religious and secular traditions, from those who were traditionally observant (Orthodox) to those who were progressively observant (Reform), as well as a plethora of secular scholars, intellectuals, and litterateurs.

In the context of the Holocaust, however, it is well to keep in mind the historic Jewish religious concept of Kiddush Ha-Shem (Sanctification of the Divine Name of God), the concept of martyrdom by which Jews went to their deaths refusing to surrender their commitment to their faith and its values, all the while knowing that such refusals to surrender were guarantors of death. (It should also be noted that the Nazi “contribution” to the “journey of antisemitism” was the injection of a racial/biological hatred by which there were, ultimately, no avenues of escape such as conversion or emigration.)

The Jews of Warsaw were confined to the imprisonment of the ghetto on November 16, 1940, and reached a maximum population of 450,000 children, women, and men. That they actively continued and created both a rich cultural and religious life during this time—what some have labeled a form of “spiritual resistance”—is tribute to their ongoing commitments as a distinct people and unique faith community. This active social, cultural, and religious life thus became, in the words of Rabbi Isaac Nissenbaum (himself a victim of one of the Nazi Aktionen), a profound expression of Kiddush Ha-Hayyim (Sanctification of Life).

Soon after their confinement after the initial assault and conquest of Poland and the beginnings of World War II on September 1, 1939, the Nazis imposed a Jewish Council, or Judenrat, on the community. Under the leadership of Adam Czerniakow—who would commit suicide rather than turn over lists of Jewish children to their murderers in the Grossaktion Warschau—synagogues were functioning, schools (both religious and secular) for children of all ages were in place, and adult education classes and cultural events (lectures, symphony concerts, string quartets, poetry readings, choral concerts, literary readings, and theatrical performances) were calendared and publicized. From an early date, all such activities were increasingly banned by the Nazi overlords, and as a consequence (and so as not to be defeated), these activities went underground until the massive roundups and deportations that began in July 1942 and continued to September the same year. Though books were later burned as fuel to warm apartment homes during the brutal Polish winters, libraries were also organized and the Jews regularly made use of them, returning books read so others could momentarily escape from their living hells, and until the final liquidation of the ghetto beginning on Passover Eve, April 19, 1943.

As regards the religious communities, both Orthodox and Reform, holy days were observed with more than 600 groups engaged in prayer in 1940. Passover Seders were held, Yom Kippur fast days were observed, and even Chanukah celebrations, with its emphasis for children, were held. Rabbinical students and others continued to study the Talmud—the central and authoritative texts of postbiblical rabbinic Judaism—as well as the nonlegal Judaic materials. Many of the rabbis continued to teach and give sermons during worship, classes, and other opportunities. For example, Rabbi Kalonymus Shapira, former chief rabbi of Piaseczno, also a victim of Nazi perfidy, would regularly speak publicly while attempting to bolster the faith of his community. Of equal importance regarding the lives of religious Jews was the work of Rabbi Shimon Huberband, Kiddush HaShem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust, translated into English by David Fishman in 1987. His work was part of the collection of artifacts organized by historian and social activist Emanuel Ringelblum and his circle, attempting to document the day-to-day lives and experiences of the ghetto dwellers under the title Oneg Shabbat between September 1939, and January 1943.

The entire collection of Ringelblum's archives was buried in several milk cans and numerous metal boxes. In 1946 ten of the metal boxes were found, and in 1950 two of the milk cans were unearthed. Whatever other boxes there were, as well as the third milk can, have never been discovered. Even partially, it remains the best journey into the reality of those who lived those years but would later be deported to their deaths. Less well known but nonetheless important, however, was the Warsaw Ghetto's "forgotten chronicler," Rabbi Ruben Feldshu, whose pen name, "Ben Shem," translates as "son of the Name (of God)," author of an 800-plus page diary detailing daily life in the ghetto, transcribed from Yiddish into Hebrew, published only in part and yet to be fully published in either Yiddish, Hebrew, or English.

On the educational front, classes in secular subjects as well as Hebrew-language and Yiddish-language instruction were carefully organized, initially in classroom settings, but later in homes as well. Students at all ages attended those classes, perhaps the only occasions for hope in their vulnerable existences as they witnessed their parents' and friends' murders, and saw themselves wasting away as food sources and caloric intakes were regularly diminished by Nazi design. Even without proper school materials (textbooks, paper, pencils, etc.), teachers taught, often from memory, and students learned.

Particularly noteworthy was the work of Janusz Korczak (born Henryk Goldszmit), educator and pediatrician, and director of the orphanage in the ghetto. Refusing to escape, he ultimately led his students to the trains for deportation to Treblinka, where he was murdered in 1942.

Not to be outdone, and central to keeping up the hope and lives of those within the Warsaw Ghetto, were the cultural activities for adults organized by the leading scholars, intellectuals, artists, and musicians who found themselves imprisoned there and who would later become its victims. Among those murdered were poet and dramatist Itzhak Katzenelson, violinist and conductor Simon Pullman, poet and actor Wladyslaw Szlengel, and writer and translator Lidia Zamenhof, among others of equal repute.

Summing up the experience of the Jews of Warsaw, in 1998 scholar Nehemiah Polen wrote that the Jews of the Warsaw Ghetto "truly lived a heroic existence: in the face of the enemy's efforts to destroy them from within, they worked valiantly to preserve their cultural and religious traditions, never giving up hope that the world would one day emerge from darkness." His words still ring true, as he concluded, "In a very real sense, we are the beneficiaries of their heroic struggle."

Warsaw Ghetto Uprising

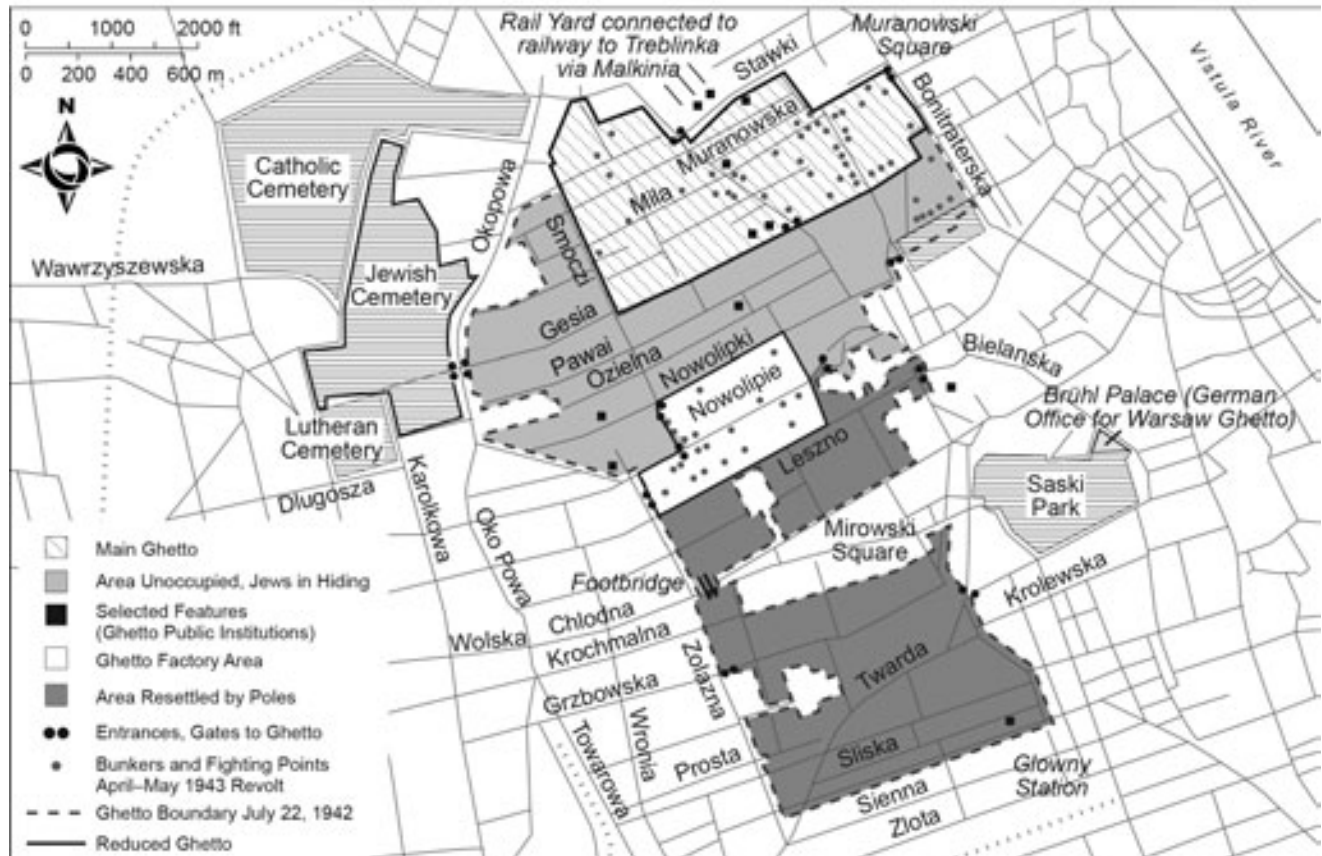

Through the summer of 1942, the Germans deported or executed more than 300,000 Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto, leaving between 55,000 to 60,000 there. Aware through authenticated reports of the mass killings that were taking place of the deported, and resolved to fight back, inhabitants of the ghetto formed the Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB) and prepared to obstruct future German deportations.

Lightly armed and poorly trained for combat, the ŻOB saw its first action against a small German Aktion in January

The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was the 1943 act of Jewish resistance against the Nazis. It began on April 19, 1943, and lasted for over a month. It was the largest single revolt by Jews during World War II and resulted in the total destruction of the ghetto. The intention of the uprising was not to defeat the Nazis but to delay their final effort to transport those still remaining in the ghetto to their certain death at Treblinka. The Nazi commander of the SS, Jürgen Stroop, brought the revolt to an end by ordering that the entire ghetto was to be burned, block by block, until he could pronounce that “the Warsaw Ghetto is no more!” (AP Photo)

WARSAW GHETTO UPRISING 1943

1943. Surprised by the opposition and suffering several casualties, the Germans withdrew from the ghetto to regroup their forces and evaluate the situation.

Shocked that the Jews would arm themselves and fight another round of deportations, the Germans returned in force in April to liquidate the ghetto completely. On April 19, 1943, Waffen-SS, police, and Wehrmacht units moved into the ghetto to complete the January operation. To ensure success, they sent in columns of troops, a tank, and two armored cars. Shortly after they began to fan out to round up the Jews, the ŻOB struck with pistol fire, homemade hand grenades, and Molotov cocktails. The small ŻOB force was reinforced by another 250 fighters attached to a separate group, the Jewish Military Union (ZZW). The battle, beginning on April 19, lasted until May 16.

Despite facing an overwhelming superiority of men and matériel, the ŻOB forced the Nazis from the ghetto within two hours, a noteworthy, though short-lived, achievement. Chagrined and angered by the resistance, SS General Jürgen Stroop, the police chief of Warsaw, ordered his troops back into the ghetto. Using their superior firepower, they forced the ŻOB fighters from the rooftops and into the buildings and below the streets into the sewers. Desiring to force a rapid conclusion to the Aktion, Stroop petitioned and received permission from SS-Reichsführer Heinrich Himmler to use whatever means necessary to eliminate resistance. Unable to quell the ŻOB, the Germans set about systematically destroying each building in the ghetto with explosives and fire.

The commander of the ŻOB forces, Mordecai Anielewicz, was killed with many of his inner circle on May 8, when the command bunker at Miła 18 was destroyed. In a communiqué dated April 23 to another leader of the resistance movement, Yitzhak Zuckerman (who was at that time outside the ghetto), Anielewicz wrote, “my life’s dream has been realized: I have lived to see Jewish defense in the ghetto in all its greatness and glory.” Despite the losses, members of the ŻOB continued to engage the German troops. Increasingly frustrated by his units' inability to subdue the resistance completely, Stroop ordered that the main synagogue be destroyed as a signal that the reduction of the ghetto was at an end. On May 16, with sporadic fighting continuing as small bands of ŻOB fighters persistently engaged the German troops, Stroop declared the operation complete when Warsaw's most prominent synagogue collapsed into a pile of rubble. In his report to his superiors, he acknowledged that 16 of his troops were killed and 85 wounded. Deaths among the ghetto's inhabitants ran into the thousands, with roughly 50,000 taken into custody and either shot outright or deported.

Although some members of the underground Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK) assisted the ŻOB during the ghetto uprising, the majority did not participate in the fighting, waiting instead for their own planned revolt.

A leather-bound scrapbook consisting of German memoranda and pictures of the devastation was later presented directly to Heinrich Himmler, General Friedrich Krupp, and Stroop himself. Though not materially affecting either the outcome of war, nor the Nazi genocide of the Jews, the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising remains the symbol of Jewish resistance to Nazi tyranny.

Warsaw Rising

The Warsaw Rising was an attempt by Polish insurgents to gain control of the city of Warsaw from the Germans, preparatory to holding it prior to a Red Army advance that would liberate the entire region and drive the Nazis out altogether. During the revolt, the Poles generated fierce resistance, which lasted from August 1 to October 2, 1944.

By the summer of 1944 the Red Army had pushed the German Army almost completely out of the Soviet Union, and continued moving west across German-occupied Poland. The Soviets, however, had split with the London-based Polish government-in-exile and established their own communist provisional government. As the Soviet troops advanced, they disarmed the Polish Home Army (Armia Krajowa, or AK), a branch of the London-based government. On July 26, the London Poles ordered AK commander General Tadeusz Bor-Komorowski to capture Warsaw from the Germans before the Soviets arrived.

The AK had around 40,000 fighters in Warsaw, and they were desperately short of arms and ammunition. Although they had some clandestine arms factories in the city, their total armament amounted to little more than 2,000 pistols, 1,000 rifles, 25,000 homemade grenades, and a handful of antitank rifles. The German garrison in Warsaw numbered more than 21,000 well-equipped, combat-experienced troops, including three Waffen-SS divisions and two Wehrmacht panzer divisions. Lieutenant General Reiner Stahel had command of German combat units around Warsaw.

Operation Burza (tempest) began on August 1, 1944. The lead units of the Red Army were only some 12 miles away, closing in on the east bank of the Vistula River. On the first day of the rising, the AK gained control of most of the west bank of the Vistula, but the Poles never managed to take the bridges. Fighting back almost immediately, the Germans took Warsaw's Old Town on August 2. By the next day, German reinforcements were pouring into the battle, and the Luftwaffe had begun round-the-clock bombing of the Polish-controlled areas.

The savage street fighting ground on for weeks, with the Polish insurgents using the city's sewers for lines of communication and as routes of escape. SS Chief Heinrich Himmler ordered that the entire city should be "razed to the ground" and all its inhabitants killed as an object lesson to all other cities under German occupation.

On September 10, Red Army units under General Konstantin Rokossovsky finally moved into Warsaw's Praga district on the east bank of the Vistula. After five days of heavy fighting, the Soviets consolidated their positions on the east bank, and then ceased to advance. Not only did the Soviets provide no further support to AK forces fighting desperately on the other side of the river, they also refused permission for Western Allied aircraft to land on Soviet airfields after making supply drops to the beleaguered insurgents. Under pressure from U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Soviets finally allowed a single wing of 110 U.S. B-17 bombers to refuel at Poltava for a supply drop on September 18.

On September 30, as the Germans systematically reduced the pocket of Polish resistance, Bor-Komorowski appointed General Leopold Okulicki as his successor in command of the AK. Bor-Komorowski and his surviving fighters finally surrendered on October 2, after 63 days of fierce resistance. Some 15,000 insurgents and 150,000 Polish civilians died during the rising. Another 700,000 of Warsaw's inhabitants were sent to concentration or slave labor camps, where 245,000 later died. Approximately 93% of the city was an unrecognizable pile of rubble.

The Germans lost about 10,000 killed during the fighting. Shortly after suppressing the rising, the German army withdrew from Warsaw at its own pace, and the Red Army followed it into the city. Soviet commanders later claimed that stiff German resistance and the lack of supplies had prevented them from giving the AK any more support. Many historians, however, have suggested that the Soviet commanders were following specific orders from their leader, Joseph Stalin, who wanted the German army to eliminate any Polish opposition to the establishment of a postwar communist government under Moscow's control.

Wegner, Armin T.

Armin Theophil Wegner was one of the earliest voices to protest Adolf Hitler's treatment of the Jews and the only popular author in Nazi Germany to publicly remonstrate against it. Born on October 16, 1886, in the town of Elberfeld, Wuppertal, he was descended from an old aristocratic Prussian family with roots reaching back to the Crusades. He was educated in Zürich, Breslau, and Berlin, where he graduated with a doctorate in law. After graduating he took a range of jobs, but always had a love for writing. Already by the age of 16 he had published his first book of poetry, and between 1909 and 1913 he established his reputation as one of Germany's most promising young poets.

With the outbreak of World War I he enlisted in the medical corps as a volunteer nurse in Poland and was decorated with an Iron Cross for assisting wounded troops under enemy fire. In April 1915 he was sent to the Ottoman Empire as a member of the German Sanitary Corps with the rank of second lieutenant. Wegner's unit was stationed along the Baghdad Railway in Syria and Mesopotamia, where he witnessed death marches of Armenians during the Armenian genocide.

Between July and August 1915 he investigated the massacres more closely, traveling throughout the region, speaking to a wide range of people, collecting documents, making notes, and photographing everything he saw. He managed to send some of this material to Germany and the United States, but disclosing what he saw was forbidden and Wegner was arrested by the Germans at the request of the Turks. In December 1916 he was recalled to Germany; although some of his photographs were confiscated and destroyed, he successfully smuggled out hundreds of negatives, which today provide an outstanding archive documenting and testifying to the veracity of the Armenian genocide.

In 1920 Wegner married German Jewish author Lola (Leonore) Landau and became an activist for pacifist movements. In 1921 he testified in court on behalf of Soghomon Tehlirian, an Armenian who shot and killed former Ottoman minister of the interior Mehmed Talaat Pasha in Berlin on March 15, 1921.

A new book published in 1922, Der Schrei von Ararat (The Scream from Ararat), saw Wegner reach the peak of his popularity as a writer. In 1927 he and Lola made a trip to the Soviet Union and the Soviet republic of Armenia, and after this trip he wrote a new work, Five Fingers over You, in which he described the underlying political violence of Soviet communism and predicted the extremes of Stalinism.

Back in Germany, Wegner then witnessed the onset of Nazism, predicting that the antisemitic policies of the Nazis would lead to the destruction of Germany's reputation, possibly forever. Noting how no one appeared to be seeing what he was seeing, he felt he had to do something if he was not to become complicit in the silence surrounding the intensifying persecution of the Jews. In 1933 he wrote a long open letter to Adolf Hitler in which he denounced Nazi antisemitism, and with this he became one of the earliest voices protesting Hitler's treatment of the Jews. The letter was written a few days after the failed nationwide boycott of Jewish businesses on April 1, 1933, but, despite its being an open letter, no newspaper in Germany was willing to publish it. As a result, Wegner forwarded it directly to Nazi Party headquarters in Munich.

The letter was received by the head of the party chancellery, Martin Bormann. A few weeks later Wegner was arrested by the Gestapo, imprisoned, and tortured brutally in the infamous Columbia House prison. He was then sent to concentration camps at Oranienburg, Börgermoor, and Lichtenburg; in all, he suffered imprisonment in seven camps and prisons before he was released and could flee to Rome, where he assumed the alias Percy Eckstein. After these experiences, he never felt at home again in Germany and remained in exile for the rest of his life.

On May 23, 1967, Yad Vashem recognized Armin Wegner as one of the Righteous among the Nations, and in 1968 he received an invitation to Armenia from the Catholics of All Armenians to be awarded the Order of Saint Gregory the Illuminator.

He died in Rome at the age of 92, on May 17, 1978, as it was said “virtually forgotten” by Germany. Some of his ashes were later taken to Armenia to be honored at a posthumous state funeral at Tsitsernakaberd, near the Armenian Genocide Memorial’s perpetual flame.

Weidt, Otto

Otto Weidt was the owner of a Berlin workshop for the blind, in which he protected his Jewish workers against deportation during the Holocaust. He was born on May 2, 1883, to Max and Auguste Weidt, née Grell, in the north German city of Rostock. Upon finishing school he followed in his father’s footsteps and became a paperhanger. After the family moved to Berlin, he became involved in working-class politics, with a special interest in anarchism. A hearing problem saw him avoid service during World War I, which was convenient in view of the fact that he was also a convinced pacifist.

Due to growing blindness, by the 1930s he was forced to abandon his work as a paperhanger, and instead learned the craft of brush making and broom binding. In 1936 he set up a brush- and broom-making workshop for the blind at Grossbeerenstrasse 92. In 1940 he moved to another premises at Rosenthalerstrasse 39 in central Berlin, where he applied for and was assigned a workforce from the Jewish Home for the Blind. Practically all his employees were blind, deaf, or mute—and Jewish.

His small factory was considered important for the war effort, with one of his bigger clients being the Wehrmacht. Having the factory classified as “vital,” therefore, enabled Weidt to continue in business with the workforce at his disposal, even though it was said that he never actually completed his orders for the army in full so as to keep the workshop operating. Up to 30 Jews were thus employed at any one time during the years between 1941 and 1943. Weidt also employed, as office workers, eight Jews without disabilities, which was, of course, strictly forbidden.

In the normal run of events, all Jewish labor had to be negotiated and approved through the labor employment office. Jews would for the most part be sent on forced labor rather than to civilian factories. Weidt, however, managed to pull this off through developing good relationships with the authorities, together with a mixture of bribery and flattery. In this way, he succeeded in keeping his workers and overriding the objections of government inspector Alfred Eschhaus, a notorious antisemite.

In 1942 the Gestapo began to pay careful attention to Weidt’s factory and started arresting and deporting his employees. He confronted them face-to-face over this, emphasizing his workers’ status as “protected” and producing appropriate documents (falsified, as it turned out), together with additional bribes. Of greatest use in the short term, perhaps, was a secure hiding place he created for his workers at the rear of the factory.

Once, when the Gestapo had arrested several of his workers, he went in person to where they were being held near the ancient Jewish cemetery on Grosse Hamburger Strasse. Facing down the SS officers guarding them, the half-blind Weidt succeeded in securing their release at the last minute. Like Moses leading the children of Israel, he then led the group of blind and deaf Jews, walking through the streets of Berlin all wearing their Jewish stars, back to the workshop on Rosenthalerstrasse.

When he was unable to secure the release of others who were deported to Theresienstadt with their families, Weidt made sure they were supported and somehow sustained. At considerable expense, he organized a supply of food parcels for up to 25 people and arranged for them to be delivered to the camp. All in all, more than 150 parcels arrived.

When Weidt received a tipoff that a major pogrom against the last Jews in Berlin was about to take place on February 27, 1943—the so-called Fabrikaktion (“Factory Action”)—he made sure to keep the workshop closed so as not to present the Gestapo with a convenient concentration of Jews all in one place. He was, however, helpless to stop them being arrested in their homes, and many were deported to their deaths.

Among those Weidt managed to save were Inge Deutschkron and Alice Licht, two sighted women who worked in the office, and Hans Israelowicz, who was arrested and imprisoned in the Jewish community building at Rosenstrasse 2–4 until the protest by the non-Jewish wives and mothers of those inside managed to get them released in March 1943.

Alice Licht was one of those who went to Theresienstadt (in her case, to accompany her deported parents), and whom Weidt supported through the provision of food parcels. When she was later deported to Auschwitz, Weidt, pretending to be on a business trip, actually went to the camp in June 1944 in an attempt to help her. Unable to gain access, he hid clothes and money for her nearby. When the inmates of the subcamp in which she was working were taken on a death march, Alice made her escape and eventually returned to Berlin in January 1945. She then lived in hiding with the Weidt family until the end of the war. Her parents never returned.

Weidt managed to obtain an Aryan work permit for Inge Deutschkron from a prostitute. This permit, unfortunately, had to be discarded three months later when the police arrested the prostitute, but in the meantime Inge managed to survive and find a safe space for herself working in the Weidt workshop.

After the war Otto Weidt established an orphanage for child survivors and a retirement home for those who were elderly. The Otto Weidt workshop remained functioning until 1952, when East Berlin communist police closed it down. By that stage, owing to Otto Weidt’s death of heart failure on December 22, 1947, it was managed by his widow, Else. At the time of his death, Otto Weidt was 64 years of age.

On September 7, 1971, Yad Vashem recognized Otto Weidt posthumously as one of the Righteous among the Nations, and in 1993 Inge Deutschkron affixed a plaque honoring him on the site of the workshop. In 1999 a museum was opened there, the Museum Blindenwerkstatt Otto Weidt. Since 2005 this has been administered by Berlin’s German Resistance Memorial Center (Gedenkstätte Deutscher Widerstand).

Weimar Republic

The Weimar Republic is the name given to the government of Germany during the period between World War I and the beginning of the Nazi regime. It was a democratic, liberal government, and as such was an anomaly in German history up to that point.

On October 28, 1918, by which time it was clear that Germany was about to lose World War I, sailors stationed at the Kiel naval base refused to obey orders to prepare for a final—and no doubt disastrous—battle with Britain’s Royal Navy. The Kiel Mutiny was thus the beginning of what became the German Revolution of 1918 (November 1918–August 1919) that would ultimately lead to a dramatic change in the German political structure. It was from this revolution that the Weimar Republic was born.

The revolution, which spread throughout Germany, put great pressure on Kaiser Wilhelm II to abdicate, which he did against his will on November 8, 1918. The next day the Weimar Republic was proclaimed with Friedrich Ebert, leader of Germany’s Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands, or SPD), as its chancellor. Two days later, on November 11, the armistice ending World War I was signed.

Before elections were held on January 19, 1919, to select a National Assembly, Germany found itself confronted with a radical leftist coup attempt by the Spartakusbund (Spartacists) movement that sought a communist takeover of Berlin. It ultimately failed, in part because of the ferocity of the Freikorps (Free Corps), a paramilitary group made up primarily of disenfranchised soldiers returned from the defeat in World War I. The Spartacists would regroup and be renamed the Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (Communist Party of Germany, KPD).

The elections that followed for the National Assembly resulted in the SPD receiving the largest percentage of votes and forming a governing coalition with the German Democratic Party (Deutsche Demokratische Partei, DDP) and the Center Party (Deutsche Zentrumspartei). The National Assembly met in Weimar (not in Berlin because it was still too unsettled) on February 6, 1919, and elected Ebert as its first president.

The National Assembly not only adopted a democratic constitution—the Constitution of the German Reich, referred to as the Weimar Constitution—on July 31, 1919, but it also signed the Treaty of Versailles on behalf of Germany. As it turned out, neither action was popular with the German people. Among other things, the treaty required Germany to concede territory to Belgium, Czechoslovakia, and Poland; admit responsibility for the war; pay reparations; limit its standing army to 100,000 men; and destroy its planes, ships, and submarines. In light of these provisions the treaty's unpopularity was widespread. Germans found it both onerous and humiliating.

The negative reaction to the Weimar Constitution can best be explained by its radically different orientation when compared to what Germany had long been used to. The constitution was based on the U.S. model in the sense that it provided for an elected president and congress, an executive with powers to be used in crises (Article 48), and a strong liberal commitment that focused on the protection of the rights of individuals. This contrasted sharply with the authoritarian government it replaced, with its emphasis on militarism, nationalism, and the primacy of the state.

Other concerns gave rise to the Germans' negative reaction to the constitution and the republic that it defined. World War I had ended in a way that came as a surprise to many Germans, who had been inaccurately told all along that they were winning. The country's defeat was so humiliating and ignominious that the government and the people needed to explain it in a way that would not put the responsibility where it properly belonged, namely, on the German military. Thus was born the myth of the "stab-in-the-back" (Dolchstoßlegende), which declared that the reason for Germany's defeat was the presence of a fifth column at work within Germany. Although other groups were also accused of sedition, the Jews became the primary scapegoat.

This myth brought antisemitism to the forefront at a time of great uncertainty and unrest in Germany. Much of the population saw the new form of government as a threat to the very foundation of society. In an environment where the Jews were blamed for the loss of the world war, it was easy for Germans to associate the unwanted democratic Weimar Republic with them. The democracy brought with it the rationality of the Enlightenment, with its belief in individual rights, and the rejection of monarchies and militant authorities. In short, the Jews were seen as bringing modernity to a society that coveted its long-standing traditions and unbending values.

Modernity was seen not only in a new form of government but also in a new value system that encouraged creativity, emboldened people to think for themselves, and embraced new schools of thought in the fields of art, architecture, dance, music, and morals, to name just a few. The old ways were falling by the wayside while abstract art, the Bauhaus school of architecture, expressive dance, jazz, promiscuity, and an acceptance of homosexuality swept in. These changes, as a component of modernity, were also seen as the fault of the Jews, due, in part, to their high visibility in some of these areas.

With these changes in government and culture, there was also an increased fear of "godless communism," which had only recently taken control in nearby Russia. As seen, efforts were made by the Spartacists to bring a communist government to Berlin, but that was not the only attempt of its kind. Perhaps the most significant such effort occurred in Munich in April 1919, when the state government was replaced by a Soviet Republic. Lasting about four weeks, at which time a strong assault by the military and the Freikorps ousted the communist government, its very presence in the heart of Bavaria increased still further the general fear of communism. This had a direct impact on the Jews of Germany because of the conflation of communism and Judaism in antisemitic thinking, and especially in the Nazi worldview. This was clearly captured in Hitler's coinage of the word "Judeo-Bolshevik" to describe Jews.

The Weimar Republic was challenged not only from the left. In March 1920 a failed coup—the Kapp Putsch—was staged by the conservative and monarchist military in protest of the liberal, reformist Weimar government. These various efforts—from the left and the right—to unseat what was seen by many as a radical and dangerous experiment in democracy gave strong reason to believe that the Weimar Republic was inefficient and unworkable. When Ebert died in 1925, the election to replace him revealed the deep divide in German society, so much so that Field Marshal Paul von Hindenburg was elected to the presidency, an interesting choice to lead a liberal democratic government when he was so clearly a symbol of the old order of the monarchy and the military.

The dire economic conditions that Germany faced in the early years of the Weimar Republic were seen as more proof of the government's weakness and the threat posed by the Jews. The German population was told—and many came to believe—that the crushing postwar economy was the fault of the Jews, or more specifically, of a worldwide Jewish conspiracy that, according to the myth, controlled global finances.

The Weimar Republic faced an economy that had been devastated by four years of war. Unemployment was as common as food was scarce. The homeless multiplied, depending on the succor of the churches and welfare institutions to stay alive. The belief that things could not get worse was soon proved inaccurate when Germany experienced a level of hyperinflation that ultimately made money worthless except to the extent that it could be burned to try to keep a house warm. By the end of November 1923, it took 4.2 trillion German marks to buy what one U.S. dollar bought. This, too, was blamed on the Jews.

Other concerns arose during the 1920s that threatened the Weimar Republic. Under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany had to pay reparations to the Allied countries. In 1921 it was determined that the amount of the reparations was to be the equivalent of $33 billion U.S. dollars, surely a burden that the struggling German economy could not shoulder. When Germany continued to miss payments, France moved troops across the border to occupy a part of western Germany called the Ruhr in an effort to siphon off profits from the Ruhr area or otherwise force Germany to make its payments. The fact that the much-hated French were on German soil—something they were unable to do during the war—was another humiliation to the German people and seen as further proof of the weakness of the struggling Weimar Republic government.

It should be noted that the French occupation of the Ruhr was one reason Adolf Hitler and the nascent Nazi Party attempted a Putsch to remove the Weimar government. It began in Munich in November 1923, and it was Hitler's vision that he would lead an ever-growing horde of followers—angry especially about the French—from Munich (where the Putsch began in a beer hall) to Berlin. This so-called Beer Hall Putsch was an utter failure, resulting in the death of four policemen, 16 Nazi Party members, and the arrest and imprisonment of Hitler and other leaders. In one respect, however, the Putsch was a success for the Nazi Party; it brought Hitler and the party to national attention during the trial of the party leaders. Ultimately it would be the Nazi Party that would put an end to the Weimar Republic in 1933.

By the mid-1920s inflation had been brought under control, reparations payments had been made more palatable under the so-called Dawes Plan of 1924, and a level of prosperity and stability returned to the Germany of the Weimar Republic. In October 1929, however, the Wall Street crash that began in the United States brought all economic progress to a halt. All of Europe, but especially Germany, suffered terribly during these years with skyrocketing unemployment, homelessness, starvation, violence in the streets, and a loss of hope in the future.

The Nazi Party performed better in national elections in inverse proportion to the financial strength of Germany; as conditions deteriorated, the Nazi Party's share of the votes increased. In this terrible depression of the early 1930s, the German people were becoming increasingly desperate, as they looked back on the Weimar Republic as an abject failure. The democratic government and the Jews were held responsible for all of Germany's woes since the loss of World War I, including, most of all, a deep sense of Germany having lost its way, and now being in immediate need of a new path to greatness. The conditions of the 14-year Weimar experiment created a society ripe for a superman (Übermensch) promising to reverse these injustices and recapture Germany's past glory. These were the conditions in which Hitler and the Nazi Party would rise to power.

Weiss, Helga

Helga Weiss is a well-known Czech artist and Holocaust survivor. She was born Helga Hoskova-Weissova in Prague in 1929 to a Jewish family. She began keeping a diary in 1938, as World War II neared and the Germans occupied her country. One of her early entries was a description of her family's terrifying ordeal in a Prague bomb shelter, as German planes flew above the city. In December 1941 Weiss and her family were forced to leave their apartment—and virtually all of their belongings—when the Germans forced them into the ghetto at Theresienstadt, located to the northwest of central Prague. She and her family would remain there until 1944, at which time they were deported to Auschwitz.

Weiss's diary, published in 2013 as Helga's Diary: A Young Girl's Account of Life in a Concentration Camp, mainly details her experiences during 1944 and 1945, after deportation; however, the book also describes events at Theresienstadt. In it, she chronicles the physical and mental strain of living in an enclosed ghetto and then the horrors of the concentration camps at Auschwitz and Mauthausen. Despite the deprivations and hardships of her young life, Weiss nevertheless acknowledges that the years in the Theresienstadt ghetto were not universally bad. There she became a young adult, experienced her first crush, and spent quality time with her family. The diary has not been heavily edited, so readers will experience it through the lens and words of a child and teenager, rather than an adult reflecting back, which Weiss hopes will make it more accessible.

Weiss's most riveting—and harrowing—experiences occurred after her deportation in 1944. Weiss and her mother arrived at Auschwitz in October 1944 (her father was also sent there, but the family was separated by gender and Weiss's father was killed sometime later). Upon arrival, Weiss lied about her and her mother's ages to avoid being sent to the gas chambers. Instead, she and her mother became laborers. Later on, after the Germans began to liquidate Auschwitz as Allied troops closed in on Germany, Weiss and her mother were sent by rail to the camp at Flossenbürg. When Allied troops approached that camp, the Germans sent detainees on a 16-day death march to Mauthausen. Weiss and her mother barely survived the ordeal. When Mauthausen was liberated in the spring of 1945, Weiss writes that she was numb and took no pleasure in the event because she was so sick and had seen so many horrific things.

After the war, Weiss returned to Prague and studied at the Academy of Fine Arts there. She also apprenticed under the well-known Czech artist Emil Filla and went on to become one of the foremost artists in postwar Czechoslovakia. After the 1989 revolution, she displayed her work in Germany, Italy, and Austria. She has since been recognized many times for her courage and artistic talent, receiving the prestigious Medal of Merit in 2009.

Weltsch, Robert

Robert Weltsch was the prewar editor of a twice-weekly Berlin Jewish newspaper, the Jüdische Rundschau (Jewish Review). He was born on June 20, 1891, in Prague to a long-established Jewish family; his father, Theodore Weltsch, was an active member of the Jewish community and played an important administrative role in communal organizations.

Theodore's son, Robert, studied law at the Karl-Ferdinand German University of Prague, where he joined Bar Kochba, a Zionist student association to which many young Jewish intellectuals were attracted. He served as the association's leader in 1911–1912. Between 1910 and 1914 he published articles in German-language Zionist newspapers, an activity he continued after he began serving as an officer on the Russian front in the Austro-Hungarian army during World War I.

After the war, Weltsch was invited to Berlin to serve as editor-in-chief of the Jüdische Rundschau, where he would remain until he left Germany 1938. A committed Zionist, Weltsch was keen to develop the idea of a joint Jewish-Arab commonwealth for Palestine, in which statehood was rarely discussed and never advocated. One of the reasons behind Weltsch's opposition to a singular Jewish state in Palestine stemmed from his reaction to any form of nationalism or chauvinism, which he attributed to the horrors of war he had witnessed in the trenches. Given this, he was fearful as to where the organized Zionist movement might lead. Accordingly, he became one of the leading lights of the movement Brit Shalom, which advocated a binational Arab-Jewish presence in Palestine focusing on ideals such as political equality, cultural autonomy, and socioeconomic coexistence. This led to hostility toward him from some circles within the Zionist movement, and periodically there were moves to have him removed as editor of the Jüdische Rundschau. These were unsuccessful, however, and he retained the post until he departed Berlin.

As one who was in many respects a semi-official voice of German Jewry through the pages of his highly influential newspaper, Weltsch saw that he had an important responsibility to somehow accommodate Nazi antisemitic measures while at the same time showing that the Jewish community would not be cowed.

On April 1, 1933, the Nazis organized a boycott of all Jewish shops, banks, offices, and department stores. This was arguably the first overtly antisemitic measure adopted by the new Nazi government, and it was a failure. The boycott was mostly ignored by the German public, forcing the measure to be called off within three days.

Weltsch, alert to the possibilities the boycott signified for the future, reacted by publishing an article on April 4 that became famous as one of the earliest Jewish responses to Nazi anti-Jewish persecution. Titled “Tragt ihn mit Stolz, den gelben Fleck!” (known around the world by its English title as “Wear it with Pride, the Yellow Badge!”), Weltsch’s editorial was a call for the Jews of Germany to recognize the reality of their situation and confront their changed circumstances with dignity and in solidarity.

He wrote that in light of the new regime, “Today the Jews cannot speak except as Jews. Anything else is utterly senseless. . . . We live in a new period . . . indicating that the world of our previous concepts has collapsed. That may be painful for many, but in this world only those will be able to survive who are able to look reality in the eye.” He continued, in italics, that in view of the Jewish self-deception that they would always be accepted as Germans, “It is not true that the Jews betrayed Germany. If they betrayed anyone, it was themselves, the Jews. Because the Jew did not display his Judaism with pride, because he tried to avoid the Jewish issue, he must bear part of the blame for the degradation of the Jews.”

He noted that during the boycott a number of antisemitic signs appeared on the streets. “One often saw,” he wrote, “windows bearing a large Magen David, the Shield of David the King. It was intended as dishonor.” In light of this new realization, in which “the Jew is marked as a Jew” with “the yellow badge,” he now called upon the Jews of Germany to “take it up, the Shield of David, and wear it with pride!”

The prescience his statement displayed was acute, as the Nazis did not actually require Jews to wear yellow armbands with the Star of David until September 19, 1941. Rather, Weltsch was referring to a German Jewish community that had, until that time, seen itself as a thoroughly integrated part of German society. Now that the Jews were being marked out, he was alerting them to the need to unite in view of what was now their “difference” from mainstream society—a metaphoric “yellow star,” so to speak.

During these early years of the Third Reich Weltsch made a number of trips to Palestine, reporting back to the Jüdische Rundschau on what he saw there. He tried to encourage the Jews to leave Germany, though unconvinced that Palestine was the right place. Still, he foresaw that whatever befell Germany’s Jews would, soon enough, extend across all of Europe, so perhaps any refuge—including Palestine—would have to be considered, as a war would mean that all the Jews in Germany “would be lost.” He acknowledged that with things getting worse by the day he would be lucky to escape with his life—something he was able to do in September 1938, immediately prior to the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, when he left Germany for Palestine.

He worked there for many years as a correspondent for the newspaper Haaretz, and in 1945 moved to London as the newspaper’s European correspondent, covering the Nuremberg Trials during 1945–1946. While in London, Weltsch also edited the Yearbook of the Leo Baeck Institute from 1956 to 1978. This quickly became a high-class academic periodical publishing scholarly articles focusing on German Jewish history. He remained in London as a political journalist until his return to Jerusalem in 1978, where he died on December 22, 1982, aged 91.

Westerbork

Westerbork, a transit camp located about 12 kilometers from the village of Westerbork in the northeast of the Netherlands, had originally been set up in October 1939 by the Dutch government as a place to hold German Jewish refugees who had entered the Netherlands illegally, following the closure of the border on December 15, 1938. Financed partly by Dutch Jews, the first refugees arrived at Westerbork on October 9, 1939.

On May 10, 1940, the German army invaded the Netherlands and had forced the country to surrender by May 14. At the time of the invasion, there were about 750 Jewish refugees at Westerbork. The occupying authorities imposed their antisemitic policies soon after taking over the country, dismissing Jews from the civil service and requiring that they register the assets of their business enterprises. They also took over Westerbork, turning it into a place to detain resisters and then, in late 1941, into a deportation camp. As the year unfolded, the number of Jews increased, to the point where the Nazis had assembled a population of 1,100 Jewish refugees, mostly from Germany, while at the same time the Nazis enlarged the camp for future use.

On July 1, 1942, the Nazis took direct control, and Westerbork became transformed, officially, into a transit camp (Durchgangslager Westerbork). Two weeks later, on July 14, 1942, a “selection” took place to see who was fit enough to work; the rest, numbering 1,135, were deported to Auschwitz two days later. By the end of July nearly 6,000 Dutch Jews had been similarly deported. An SS officer, Erich Deppner, was appointed as commandant, overseeing initial deportation operations across July and August 1942 and taking responsibility for the first transport of Jews to Auschwitz. Upon being relieved, Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler complimented Deppner for his “good work.”

New rail lines were then added, and by November 1942 deportation trains came straight into the camp in order to enable the more rapid loading of Jews for Auschwitz. Over time, other trains were sent to other death camps in German-occupied Poland, as well as places such as Bergen-Belsen, Theresienstadt, and Vittel, France.

From this point on, deportation trains consisting of around 20 cattle wagons or freight cars would arrive each Monday evening. A list of 1,000 people would be compiled by the Jewish Council (Joodse Raad), and on Tuesday the trains would leave Westerbork. From that first train on July 16, 1942, until the procedure came to an end on September 3, 1944, a total of 97,776 Jews were deported from Westerbork: 54,930 to Auschwitz in 68 transports; 34,313 to Sobibór (19); 4,771 to Theresienstadt (7); and 3,762 to Bergen-Belsen (9). Taken overall, 101,000 Dutch Jews and about 5,000 German Jews were deported to their deaths in Poland, together with about 400 Roma. The camp also served as the location of imprisonment for Dutch resisters, and toward the end of the war some 400 female resisters were also deported to their deaths.

Of all those deported, only 5,200 survived. Some, numbering 876, of whom 569 were Dutch citizens, managed to avoid deportation and outlasted the Nazis at Westerbork. Others who had been deported and survived did so at Theresienstadt or Bergen-Belsen. Almost all those who had been sent to Auschwitz and Sobibór were murdered immediately upon arrival.

Regardless of the camp’s core function as a deportation facility, Westerbork also served as a regular concentration camp, with a permanent prisoner population of approximately 2,000 prisoners. Many of these Jews, possessing British or American citizenship, were exempted from deportation. The Nazis considered that they could be used as “currency” for “exchange”; for each Jew, the idea was that several German prisoners of war could be traded. Moreover, it served the Germans to maintain this presence, as the SS could point to the fixed structures—which included a school, a hairdresser, an orchestra, and even a restaurant—as evidence to newcomers that this was the type of environment to which they were being sent in Poland. Certainly, this reduced problems during the deportation process and even encouraged people to board the trains to Auschwitz and Sobibór. The added tragedy of Westerbork was that over time most of the “permanent” residents of the camp were themselves deported to their deaths.

On April 12, 1945, with the Allies approaching, the Nazis abandoned Westerbork and the Canadian 2nd Infantry Division liberated the camp. Westerbork was then given over to house Dutch collaborators with the Nazis, with other uses brought into play in later years. The camp was demolished in 1971, and a monument was erected on the site. In 1983 a museum and memorial site was opened at the location of what had been part of the former camp area.

White Buses

The so-called “White Buses” was an initiative undertaken by the Swedish Red Cross and the Danish government to rescue prisoners from certain concentration camps, in particular Theresienstadt, and then transport them to neutral Sweden. Even though the operation was initially created in order to save concentration camp inmates hailing from Scandinavian countries, it expanded to save prisoners from other countries as well.

A total staff of about 300 rescuers was able to save 15,345 prisoners from the camps. Of these, about 7,795 of those rescued were Scandinavian citizens and 7,550 of those were from elsewhere. Those of non-Scandinavian citizenship included prisoners from Poland and France. In particular, 423 Danish Jews were saved by the “white buses” from Theresienstadt, located in the German-occupied territory of Czechoslovakia. This effort by the Swedish Red Cross and the Danish government contributed to the fact that the Danish Jewish population was one of the least affected Jewish populations in Europe. The term “white buses” was used because the buses were painted white with red crosses, to keep them from being confused with military vehicles.

On April 9, 1940, the countries of Denmark and Norway were invaded by Nazi Germany. Several Norwegians were instantaneously detained, and after only two months of occupation, Nazi administration established the first prison camp at Ulven, outside Bergen, in western Norway. As pressure increased between the Nazi authoritative powers and the Norwegian resistance, growing numbers of Norwegians were put under arrest and held in Norwegian prisons and camps to be later deported to prisons in Germany. The first groups of Norwegian prisoners arrived at Sachsenhausen concentration camp in early 1940. Detentions in Denmark began when the coalition government resigned in the summer of 1943.

The Scandinavian detainees in Germany were separated into several categories. These included the civil prisoners, who lived privately and maintained definite freedoms, to the Nacht und Nebel (NN), or “Night and Fog” inmates who were intended to be worked to death. As the number of Scandinavian resisters and other opponents increased, Scandinavian priests worked to visit concentration camps. In Hamburg, Norwegian priests Arne Berge and Conrad Vogt-Svendsen visited prisoners, brought them food, and brought letters to their families in Norway and Denmark. Vogt-Svendsen also visited and kept correspondence with the civilians jailed at Gross-Kreutz, in Brandenburg, Germany.

The priests and citizens of Gross Kreutz were able to compile a list of all arrested and detained Scandinavians. These lists were sent to the Norwegian government-in-exile in London through the Swedish embassy in Berlin. In Stockholm, Sweden, the Norwegian diplomat Niels Christian Ditleff threw himself heavily into relief work, conscious of the fate of the Scandinavian prisoners. By the end of 1944 there were approximately 8,000 Norwegian prisoners in Germany. Most of these were not Jewish and had been arrested for a variety of reasons. In addition, there were some 1,125 Norwegian prisoners of war.

The Danish admiral Carl Hammerich worked with undisclosed plans for an excursion, code-named the Jyllandskorps, to rescue Danish and Norwegian prisoners from the German camps. Hammerich had strong networks with Norwegian priests who visited the concentration camps, the relief group at Gross-Kreutz, and with Ditleff in Stockholm. By the beginning of 1945 there were roughly 6,000 Danish prisoners in German camps. Again, most of these were not Jewish, though those who were found themselves almost exclusively incarcerated at Theresienstadt. During 1944 the Danes had made extensive preparations, including the registering of inmates and strategies for transferring resources, as well as making food, shelter, and quarantine available for those rescued, if they successfully made it to Denmark. Hammerich visited Stockholm in February, April, and July 1944 to discuss these plans with Ditleff.

In the Norwegian government, Major Johan Koren Christie wrote a memorandum on September 23, 1944, stating that the Norwegian prisoners should “stay put” and wait until they were liberated by the quickly moving Allied forces. The Gross-Kreutz assemblage found out about this memorandum a month later. Johan Bernhard Hjort, a Norwegian Supreme Court lawyer, rejected Christie’s advice, advising against the suggestion to “stay put.” Hjort explained that the prisoners risked being killed, and that they had to be saved before Germany was occupied by Allies.

While Ditleff tried to influence the exiled Norwegian government by discussing the rescue of Norwegian prisoners with Count Folke Bernadotte of the Swedish Red Cross, the Danes obtained a German permit to retrieve prisoners. The first transport, on December 5, 1944, included Danish policemen from Buchenwald. By the end of February 1945, the Danes had freed 341 prisoners, most of them sickly.

White Rose

The White Rose (Die Weisse Rose) was a small, student-led resistance movement based in Munich, Germany, from 1942 to 1943. The group’s opposition to Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party was based on religious morality and humanitarianism, with little, if any, political motivation. The movement's major form of protest involved campaigning for the overthrow of Nazism and the revival of a new Germany dedicated to the pursuit of goodness and founded upon Christian values. The main activity of the group was the distribution of pamphlets that denounced the activities of the Nazi Party and decried the murder of innocent German citizens, including Jews.

The White Rose was founded by brother and sister Hans and Sophie Scholl. Involved with the Hitler Youth as adolescents, the Scholls became increasingly disenchanted with the Nazi Party during their years at the University of Munich. Their father, Robert Scholl, was arrested in 1942 for publicly doubting Germany's ability to win World War II. Joining with fellow students Christoph Probst, Willi Graf, and Alexander Schmorell, and encouraged by their professor, Dr. Kurt Hübner, the Scholls designed an anti-Nazi pamphlet titled The White Rose, after a novel that had inspired them when they were children. That initial pamphlet, one of what eventually became six, was secretly published in June 1942. The pamphlets attracted public attention, and copies were frequently made and distributed. Eventually, White Rose pamphlets were disbursed throughout Germany and Austria.

The range of the White Rose group expanded beyond the University of Munich. Students at the University of Hamburg joined the White Rose, and at its highest point, it had about 80 members. The distribution of the pamphlets continued steadily and was interrupted only in the summer of 1942 when Hans Scholl, Probst, and others were sent to fight on the Russian front.

On February 18, 1943, a janitor spotted Hans and Sophie scattering copies of the sixth White Rose pamphlet from a balustrade in the atrium of the University of Munich. The janitor had the Scholls and Probst arrested. The students were sent to trial before the People's Court (Volksgesichtshof) on February 22, 1943, and stood before Judge Roland Freisler, who berated them for their treasonous activities. They defiantly admitted their crimes and were executed by guillotine that afternoon. Hans was 24, Sophie was 21, and Probst was 22. Later, Dr. Huber, Graf, and Schmorell were also beheaded; the rest of the students caught were sent to concentration camps or also executed later in the year.

An alternative name for the White Rose, used by some, was the Scholl Kreis (Scholl Circle). After World War II ended, the White Rose movement began to be seen by Germans as an admirable example of resistance to evil. The Scholls have become revered, as evidenced by the more than 200 schools and a square at the University of Munich that are named after the brother-sister team. The White Rose Foundation and White Rose International are contemporary organizations that seek to preserve the memory of the White Rose and continue its tradition of "principled resistance."

Wiedergutmachung

The German word Wiedergutmachung (literally, "to make well again") refers to the reparations or compensation the German government agreed to pay in 1953 to the survivors of the Holocaust. The sum would amount, over the years, to more than 100 billion Deutsche Marks (DM)—nearly 60 billion U.S. dollars.

On September 27, 1951, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) stated that compensation for victims of National Socialism was limited by the necessity to support war-disabled persons as well as to provide for refugees and expellees. In response, Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Jewish Congress, convened a meeting in New York a month later in which it was made clear to the 23 major Jewish national and international organization participants attending that a new organization, to be called the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany (the Claims Conference, or JCC) would be created. The Claims Conference was tasked with negotiating with the German government a program of compensation for the actions of the Third Reich through the Holocaust.

To this day, the Claims Conference represents the world's Jews in negotiating for compensation and restitution for individual victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs. It administers compensation funds, recovers unclaimed Jewish property, and distributes funds to institutions providing social welfare services to Holocaust survivors and others, which preserve the memory and lessons of the Shoah.

For the Allies, restitution and compensation was a precondition for the foundation of the West German state. Stipulating the main features of the indemnification laws, France, Britain, and the United States signed the Transition Treaty with the FRG in 1952. In December 1951 a mere 5% of West Germans polled admitted feeling “guilty” toward Jews; a further 29% recognized that Germany owed some recompense to the Jewish people; 40% of those surveyed thought that only people “who really committed something” were accountable to pay; 21% considered the Jews themselves were partly responsible for what happened to them during the Third Reich.

Cold War politics intervened. The FRG stood at the frontlines of the Cold War, and the United States could not afford to strain the economy of a key ally, and as a result the Supplementary Federal Law on Compensation for the Victims of National Socialist Persecution (1953) and the Federal Indemnification Law (1956) limited compensation to a small group of survivors.

Restricting the recipients of disbursements to residents of the FRG, the compensation laws excluded slave laborers, “euthanasia” victims, Roma, homosexuals, Soviet POWs, as well as active members of the Communist Party. Payments did not reflect the scale of the Nazi crimes. Each day spent in a concentration camp, ghetto, or Nazi prison was “compensated” by five DM. The Final FRG Law of 1965 terminated indemnification; the last application deadlines ran out on December 31, 1969.

In the German Democratic Republic (GDR, or East Germany), Wiedergutmachung was mostly directed to Poland and the former Soviet Union. Persons directly victimized for political, racial, religious or ideological reasons by the Third Reich were eligible for compensation under the terms of the Federal Compensation Law (BEG) of 1953 and 1956, including Jews who were interned in camps or ghettos, had to wear the yellow star, or who lived in hiding. By the mid-1980s more than four million claims had been filed and paid. Approximately 40% of the claims were from survivors living in Israel; 20% were from Germany; and 40% were from other countries. To avoid disbursements to individual survivors, agreements with single countries were created, and Adenauer thus began negotiations with Israel and also with the Claims Conference in 1951.

Israel’s relations with Germany in the years following World War II were very tense. Not only was Israel intent on providing a haven for what remained of European Jewry, it was also recovering from the 1948 Arab-Israeli War and facing a deep economic crisis that led to a period of austerity. Unemployment was high, and foreign currency reserves scarce. The Israeli government took a practical approach, arguing that an agreement with West Germany was the only way to sustain the nation’s economy. The opposition, by contrast, argued that this was blood money.

In 1951 Israel made a claim to the four powers occupying Germany regarding compensation and reimbursement, based on the fact that Israel had absorbed and resettled 500,000 Holocaust survivors. They calculated that since absorption had cost 3,000 U.S. dollars per person, they were owed 1.5 billion dollars by Germany. They also figured that six billion dollars’ worth of Jewish property had been pillaged by the Nazis but stressed that the Germans could never make up for what they did with any type of material recompense.

Negotiations were held between Israeli foreign minister Moshe Sharett and Adenauer. Fierce opposition to the agreement came from both the Israeli right and the left, with advocates on both sides arguing that accepting reparation payments was the equivalent of forgiving the Nazis. Within the Knesset (Israeli parliament) the decision was ultimately accepted by a 61–50 margin, but not before riots interrupted the plenum debate for the first time in Knesset history.

The Reparations Agreement between Israel and the FRG was signed on September 10, 1952, and entered in force on March 27, 1953. The Arab League strongly opposed the motion and threatened a boycott of the Federal Republic of Germany after it passed the agreement, but this was abandoned when it was realized that the Arab League would suffer far more from losing trade with West Germany than West Germany would from the Arab League.

Under the agreement, West Germany was to pay Israel for the costs of “resettling so great a number of uprooted and destitute Jewish refugees” after the war, and to compensate individual Jews, via the Claims Conference, for losses in Jewish livelihood and property resulting from Nazi persecution. The payments were made to the State of Israel as the heir to those victims who had no surviving family.

Germany paid Israel a sum of more than 3 billion DM (mostly in deliveries of goods), and 450 million DM to the JCC. In return, Israel turned down the demand that Germany should individually compensate survivors living in Israel. This initiated a series of arrangements with other countries. Between the 1950s and the 1990s, Germany signed treaties with Austria, Belarus, Belgium, Britain, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Russia, Sweden, Switzerland, Ukraine, and the United States. No reparations were paid by Germany to the Roma people.

Contracts with other countries, however, did not sufficiently expand the compensation system. Large numbers of victims were still excluded from payments, which is why new claims for amends emerged persistently. Whenever the FRG faced sufficient pressure, compensation expanded. For example, after Jews from several Eastern European countries migrated to Israel and the United States throughout the 1970s, West Germany established a fund to disburse one-time payments of 5,000 DM to Holocaust survivors. This was one of several “hardship funds” that were meant to fill gaps in the system of indemnification.

A major gap in the West German compensation system concerned former slave laborers. It is estimated that the Nazis forced some 12 million people to work for the German war effort. When the FRG signed the London Debt Agreement in 1953, the contract deferred the question of indemnifying slave laborers to the conclusion of a peace treaty between the Allies and a unified German state. Although this protected West Germany from claims by former slave laborers, survivors and their representatives were able to file legal actions against German companies that used slave labor. As a result, in order to deter future claims, I.G. Farben, Krupp, AEG, Siemens, and Rheinmetall paid small amounts of money between 1957 and 1962. As class actions against the profiteers of slave laborers resurfaced following German reunification on October 3, 1990, the German government negotiated between industry and the plaintiffs. Agreeing to pay 10 billion DM after a long period of consultations, protests, and legal actions, the German government established the Foundation “Remembrance, Responsibility, and Future” in August 2000. Providing funds, 6,500 companies cooperated in creating the endowment. As “work” in the ghettos was not considered to constitute slave labor, moreover, Germany paid one-time pensions of 2,000 Euros to survivors of Nazi ghettos in 2002.

Throughout the long history of compensation, the FRG tried to limit payments; still, the German payments added up to more than 68 billion Euros by 2010. Austria and the German Democratic Republic, by contrast, paid comparably insignificant amounts.

Compensation is still publicly debated in Germany. In November 2012 the government extended payments to survivors from Eastern Europe who had not yet received indemnification. Simultaneously, victims’ lawyers have been struggling to expand pensions for former ghetto laborers.

In the 1990s Jews began making claims for property stolen in Eastern Europe. Various groups also began investigating what happened to money deposited in Swiss banks by Jews outside of Switzerland who were later murdered in the Holocaust, and what happened to money deposited by individual Nazis in Swiss banks. In addition, individual companies (many of them based in Germany) began to be pressured by survivor groups to compensate former forced laborers. Among them are Deutsche Bank, Siemens, Bayerische Motoren Werke (BMW), Volkswagen, and Adam Opel.

In response, early in 1999 the German government proclaimed the establishment of a fund with monies from these companies to help needy Holocaust survivors. A similar fund was set up by the Swiss, as was a Hungarian fund for compensation of Holocaust victims and their heirs. At the close of the 1990s, discussions of compensation were held by insurance companies that had before the war insured Jews who were later murdered by the Nazis. These companies include Allianz, AXA, Assicurazioni Generali, Zürich Financial Services Group, Winterthur, and Baloise Insurance Group. On behalf of U.S. citizens, the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission reached agreements with the German government in 1998 and 1999 to compensate Holocaust victims who immigrated to the United States after the war.

Wiesel, Elie

Elie Wiesel was a Romanian-born American writer, thinker, and teacher, world-renowned for his work in raising awareness of the Holocaust and its meaning for contemporary society. For many, he was the conscience and expression of all Holocaust survivors. A prolific author, his work has been extremely influential in dealing with the moral responsibility of any person to fight hatred, racism, and genocide.

Wiesel was born on September 30, 1928, in the town of Sighet in Transylvania, when it was still part of Romania prior to its occupation by Hungary in 1940. With the Nazi invasion of Hungary in the spring of 1944, his entire village was first incarcerated in two ghettos in Sighet. He was then deported to Auschwitz, where he was tattooed with the number A-7713.

He and his father were at that time separated from his mother and sisters. The two remained together for a year, surviving a death march to Buchenwald in the winter of 1944–1945, until Wiesel's father died just a short time before the camp was liberated by the Americans in April 1945. Both of Wiesel's parents and one of his sisters perished during the Holocaust.

After the liberation, Wiesel was taken to Paris where he lived in an orphanage. Between 1947 and 1950 he studied the Talmud, philosophy, and literature at the Sorbonne, attending lectures by Jean-Paul Sartre and Martin Buber. Working as a teacher of Hebrew and a choirmaster in order to supplement his income, he then became a journalist. He steadfastly refused, however, to write about or discuss his Holocaust experiences. A meeting with the 1952 Nobel Laureate for Literature, François Mauriac, however, convinced him of the need to begin writing about his experiences, and his best known work, Night (1960), was the result. Night came to be a symbolic recording of the experience of all Jews, and as a result Wiesel thereafter dedicated his life to ensuring that no one can forget what happened. For Wiesel, “Never Again” would be more than a phrase; it was his life's mission.

In 1955 Wiesel moved to the United States and made his home in New York. In 1963 he became an American citizen, recognized as one of the most powerful voices in Holocaust consciousness in the world. Wiesel's work received recognition from the U.S. government in 1978, when he was appointed chair of the Presidential Commission on the Holocaust, established by President Jimmy Carter. In 1980 the commission was renamed the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, and Wiesel retained his position as chairman until 1986. In further acknowledgment of his contribution to the betterment of society, Wiesel was awarded the U.S. Congressional Gold Medal of Freedom in 1985, the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986 (for advocating worldwide against violence, repression, and racism), and an honorary knighthood in recognition of his advocacy work for Holocaust education in the United Kingdom. He was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1996.

Wiesel's many writings showed an author possessing a highly diverse range of skills. He made compelling and profound contributions to literature and theology, and it might be said that his input to Holocaust writing was among the most important ever composed. It was his opposition to indifference, and his quest to try to ensure that “Never Again” became the guiding principle directing the actions of everyone, that led Wiesel to condemn, over and over again, what he called the sin of indifference. Putting his own words into practice, one of the first things Wiesel and his wife, Marion, did after he won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986 was to establish a foundation to promote peace and human rights throughout the world, the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity. The foundation's mission, rooted in the memory of the Holocaust, is to combat indifference, intolerance, and injustice through international dialogue and youth-focused programs that promote acceptance, understanding, and equality, and in fulfillment of this mission it runs multiple programs both domestically and internationally.

In November 1992, during the Bosnian War, Wiesel went to Belgrade, Sarajevo, Banja Luka, and the Manjaca concentration camp. Upon his return, he publicly urged U.S. secretary of state Lawrence Eagleburger to speak out against the genocide that was occurring. He was unsuccessful, but 18 months later, at the opening of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., he made a further public plea to President Bill Clinton on the necessity of addressing the Bosnian genocide. Again, however, he was not successful. Such initiatives were not isolated; for decades Wiesel's was an imposing voice in speaking out against injustice and genocide around the world, notably with regard to apartheid in South Africa, the so-called “disappearances” in Argentina, the treatment of dissidents in the Soviet Union, Serb actions in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Saddam Hussein's actions against the Kurds in northern Iraq, and the genocide of black Africans in Darfur at the hands of the government of Sudan. In September 2006 Wiesel addressed the United Nations Security Council in the company of leading actor George Clooney about the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, urging immediate international action for the purpose of saving lives.

In 2007 the Wiesel Foundation issued a letter, signed by 53 Nobel laureates, condemning Armenian genocide denial by the Turkish government and its supporters. Alongside such activities, Wiesel was also a major advocate for Jewish rights around the world, and in earlier times he was an outspoken critic regarding the respective difficulties faced by Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry.

Wiesel's major concern was that in the decades since the end of World War II nothing substantial had been learned as a result of that terrible conflict. All the cries of “Never Again,” so frequently uttered at the time of the liberation of the camps, had, in his view, amounted to little of substance. According to him, after a cataclysm such as the Holocaust, people should be looking out for the welfare and safety of each other, but this, so far, has not yet happened. Having survived the Holocaust, Wiesel devoted his life to fostering the kind of understanding that would enable people to see the necessity of developing compassion and defeating indifference, and thus prevent more atrocities and other genocides. At the age of 87, Elie Wiesel died at his home in New York on July 2, 2016.

Wiesenthal, Simon

The self-proclaimed “bad conscience of the Nazis,” Simon Wiesenthal used his experience during the Holocaust to devote his life to tracking down Nazi officials who escaped prosecution or disappeared at the war’s end. From 1956 onward, Wiesenthal directed Austria’s Jewish Historical Documentation Center, where he collected evidence of Nazi wartime atrocities and analyzed information on the whereabouts of Nazi war criminals.

Wiesenthal was born on December 31, 1908, in Buczacz, Galicia (in present-day Ukraine), in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. His father was killed during World War I. His mother took the family to Vienna, Austria, for a period before returning to Buczacz to remarry.

Simon Wiesenthal was an Austrian Holocaust survivor best known for his postwar successes as a leading Nazi hunter. Surviving several concentration camps during the war, he then worked hard gathering intelligence and tracking down fugitive Nazi war criminals, with the intention that they be brought to trial. Among those he played a role in bringing to justice were Adolf Eichmann and Franz Stangl. He is pictured here in 1967 holding a copy of one of his books, The Murderers Among Us. (Keystone-France/Gamma-Keystone via Getty Images)

Wiesenthal graduated from school in 1928 and applied to the Polytechnical Institute in Lvov. Turned down because of quotas that limited the number of Jews who could be accepted to the institution, he instead attended the Technical University of Prague, where he earned a degree in architectural engineering in 1932.

After graduation, Wiesenthal found work in an architectural firm in Lvov, Poland, and in 1936 he married Cyla Müller. In 1939 their peaceful life was disrupted by the division of Poland by Germany and the Soviet Union under the terms of the German-Soviet Nonaggression Pact. The Soviet Army occupied Lvov and began a purge of Jewish professionals and other bourgeois elements. Wiesenthal's stepfather was arrested in that purge and later died in prison. Wiesenthal was driven from his job, and he and Cyla were interned at a labor camp outside of Lvov.

Conditions for Poland's Jewish community only worsened after Germany rescinded its agreement with the Soviets and launched Operation Barbarossa, the invasion of the Soviet Union. The implementation of Nazi genocide policies that followed all but annihilated Poland's Jewish population. By the end of 1942 most of Wiesenthal's and his wife's relatives had perished in the Nazi death camps.

The Wiesenthals were lucky to avoid a similar fate. Cyla's blond hair made it possible for her to pass as a non-Jew, and Wiesenthal arranged with the Polish underground to provide her with false identity papers. In exchange, Wiesenthal, who had been forced by the Germans to work on the Lvov Eastern Railroad, drew detailed maps of the railroad junction points that the resistance could use for sabotage purposes. Cyla survived the war because of the deal, working first in Warsaw and then in the Rhineland under the Polish name Irene Kowalska.

Wiesenthal himself managed to escape from the labor camp in October 1943. He was recaptured by the Germans in 1944 and sent to the Jancwska concentration camp. He arrived there just as the German Eastern Front collapsed under the advancing Red Army. The Nazi soldiers at the camp forced the remaining 34 prisoners (all that remained of the camp's initial population of 149,000) to retreat westward to Mauthausen in eastern Austria. Wiesenthal barely survived the forced march and weighed an emaciated 100 pounds when Mauthausen was liberated by U.S. troops on May 5, 1945. He and Cyla were reunited at the end of the war, both amazed to find the other still alive. Cyla gave birth to their daughter Pauline in 1946.

Immediately after the war, Wiesenthal began working for the War Crimes Section of the U.S. Army, gathering evidence of Nazi crimes and atrocities. He also worked for a Jewish relief organization. In 1947 he created the Jewish Historical Documentation Center in Linz, Austria. The purpose of the center was to gather evidence for the future prosecution of Nazi war criminals. The center's mission, however, was not to be realized. As Cold War tensions heightened, both the United States and the Soviet Union lost interest in tracking down former Nazi officials, and most of Wiesenthal's volunteer staff turned to other pursuits in frustration. Wiesenthal closed the center in 1954, turning over most of its files to the archives of Yad Vashim in Israel.

Wiesenthal held on to one file—that of Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi bureaucrat who had technically and efficiently implemented and overseen the Holocaust. Eichmann had vanished immediately after the Nazis' defeat, and Wiesenthal painstakingly followed reports of his whereabouts, passing on information to the Israeli government. When Eichmann was captured by Israeli agents in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1959, Wiesenthal was sufficiently encouraged to reopen the Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna. Eichmann was later found guilty by an Israeli court of mass murder, for which he was executed in 1962.

Wiesenthal and his small staff once again began gathering evidence and carefully analyzing information on the possible location of war criminals. They were aided by numerous international informants who included victims of the Nazis, former German soldiers upset by their country's wartime atrocities, and even former Nazi officers. Wiesenthal's efforts resulted in 1963 in the capture of Karl Silberbauer, the Gestapo officer who had arrested Anne Frank and her family. In 1966 nine Nazi officers located by Wiesenthal were put on trial in what was then West Germany for the murder of Jews in Wiesenthal's former home of Lvov.

In 1967 Wiesenthal published The Murderers among Us, a memoir about his Holocaust experiences and efforts as a "Nazi-hunter" and the methods he used to accomplish his goals. He also wrote a second volume, Justice, Not Vengeance, which was published in 1989. Wiesenthal's experiences also became an HBO movie, Murderers among Us: The Simon Wiesenthal Story, which starred Ben Kingsley as Wiesenthal. He was also depicted by Sir Laurence Olivier in the film The Boys from Brazil (director, Franklin J. Schaffner, 1978). Wiesenthal served as a technical consultant for the film The Odessa File (director, Ronald Neame, 1974).

Wiesenthal's dedicated work for more than half a century earned him numerous awards, including the U.S. Congressional Medal of Honor, which he received in 1980, and in 1986 the French Legion of Honor. The Simon Wiesenthal Center, with permission to use his name, was founded in Los Angeles in 1977 with the purpose of keeping the memory of the Holocaust alive and fighting existing bigotry around the world. As lauded as he became, Wiesenthal also had his critics, who variously downplayed his role in the capture of Eichmann and questioned his “sightings” of Josef Mengele.

Toward the end of his life, Wiesenthal maintained a quiet existence with Cyla in Vienna, Austria, doggedly pursuing his lifelong work. Following the Yugoslav Wars of the early 1990s, he spoke out in favor of a war crimes trial, stating that “[Holocaust] survivors should be like seismographs . . . they should sense danger before others do, identify its outlines and reveal them.” In recognition of his tireless efforts, Queen Elizabeth II gave Wiesenthal an honorary knighthood on February 19, 2004. He died at his home in Vienna on September 20, 2005.

Wilde-KZ

Wilde-KZ was the abbreviation for the longer German term Wilde-Konzentrationslager, alluding to unauthorized places of incarceration established in Germany by local Nazis in the earliest stages of the Third Reich. They were given the name because, as it was suggested, they sprang up like wildflowers after refreshing rain following a long period of drought.

These camps frequently operated without any apparent system or direction. There was little in the way of planning or procedure. Often, the very location of these places was impromptu. For example, Dachau was a former gunpowder factory, Oranienburg was originally a brewery (and later a foundry), and Börgermoor and Esterwegen were initially simply rows of barracks set down on open expanses of marshy heathland. Elsewhere, prisoners had to build their own habitations and begin their camp life living in tents. The Wilde-KZ were rapidly established, highly improvised affairs. Little regard was paid to administration, discipline, or utilization. Some were run by SS officers; many were staffed by SA men, often locals, who knew or were known by those they were guarding. The essential function of these camps was to gag political opposition to the new Nazi government of Germany (which was appointed to office on January 30, 1933), and generally to intimidate the wider population through the camps’ reputation for arbitrary brutality. Only with a more coordinated approach to political incarceration through the establishment of the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps in mid-1934 under Theodor Eicke did the Wilde-KZ give way to a unified form of administration, discipline, and ethos. Most of the Wilde-KZs had closed down by the spring of 1934.

Winton, Nicholas

Sir Nicholas Winton was a British stockbroker who organized a rescue operation that brought 669 children, almost all of them Jewish, from Czechoslovakia to safety in Britain before the outbreak of World War II. He was born Nicholas Wertheim (some sources say Wertheimer) on May 19, 1909, in West Hampstead, England. His parents were Rudolf and Barbara Wertheim, German Jews who had come to London in 1907. In an effort to acculturate, they changed their name to Winton, converted to Christianity, and ensured that their son was baptized into the Church of England. Rudolf Wertheim-Winton, a successful banker, saw that his family wanted for nothing, and Nicholas was raised in a life of some comfort. After attending the Stowe School in Buckingham (where he began but left without graduating), Winton followed in his father’s footsteps as a banker, learning his profession working in banks in Hamburg, London, Berlin, and Paris. In 1931, after working for the Banque Nationale de Crédit in Paris, he returned to England and began his career as a stockbroker at the London Stock Exchange.

As a young man Winton held progressive views on a number of issues, aligning himself with many matters close to the agenda of the Labour Party. He was opposed to the Conservative government’s policy of appeasement, and expressed apprehension over German Nazism.

In December 1938 Winton was about to leave for a Christmas skiing holiday in Switzerland when he received a phone call from his friend Martin Blake—a teacher at London’s Westminster School and an associate of the British Committee for Refugees from Czechoslovakia—asking him to forego his vacation and instead come immediately to Prague. The British Committee had been established in October 1938 to provide assistance for refugees created by Germany’s annexation of the Sudeten regions after the Munich Agreement the previous month. Winton was happy to do so, and upon his arrival in Prague Blake introduced him to his colleague, Doreen Wariner, arranging for him to visit refugee camps filled with Jews and political prisoners.

Winton was appalled by what he saw, and Blake and Wariner invited him to assist in helping Jews in danger of their lives. He decided to act and began to establish an organization to aid Jewish children at risk.

The timing could not have been more opportune. On the night of November 9–10, 1938, the Nazis launched the pogrom that became known as Kristallnacht, and Winton learned that in the aftermath the British government had approved a measure to allow the entry of Jewish refugees younger than 17 on the proviso that they had a place to stay and landing money of £50 to enable them eventually to return home. He then also learned that some Jewish relief organizations in Britain were planning to rescue German and Austrian Jewish children on what became known as the Kindertransport (“children’s transport”) program. This was an initiative that eventually brought some 10,000 unaccompanied children to safety in Britain.

Winton was told, however, that whereas the Kindertransport initiative applied to Germany and Austria, there was no organization in Prague to deal with Jewish refugee children. Accordingly, he put together a small team to help organize a rescue operation for children in the Czech lands. Without authorization, he established a Children’s Section of the British Committee for Refugees from Czechoslovakia and began taking applications from parents in Prague. Racing against the clock to find foster homes in Britain, raise funds, and obtain exit papers, Winton opened an office in Vorsilka Street in which his appointees, Trevor Chadwick and Bill Barazetti, worked continually to assist the thousands of parents who soon began lining up trying to find a safe haven for their children. After Winton returned to Britain, leaving Chadwick in charge in Prague, he contacted a number of foreign governments asking if they would be prepared to accept the children. Only Sweden and Britain agreed to do so.

In trying to save as many children as possible, Winton worked to arrange facilities for their reception in Britain. He faced many obstacles. The Dutch government had closed its borders to Jewish refugees after the Kristallnacht, and Winton knew he would have to negotiate an agreement in order to enable the children to transit through Holland for embarkation to Britain. He also had to find foster homes, so that he could assure the Dutch authorities that the children had somewhere to go and would not remain in the Netherlands. To secure places in British homes and hostels, he placed newspaper advertisements seeking families prepared to accept the children and then made arrangements for their transportation. He also had to raise money to fund this and the British government’s £50 pound guarantee required for each child.

At every turn he was successful, and on March 14, 1939—one day prior to the German occupation of the Czech lands—the first of Winton’s transports left Prague by plane for London. He then arranged another seven transports, leaving Prague by train across Germany to the Netherlands, and then by ferry to Britain. In London, the children were met by their British foster parents. The last trainload of children to arrive in Britain from Prague left on August 2, 1939.

One further group of 250, the biggest thus far, was scheduled to leave Prague on September 1, 1939. They did not make it. On that day Germany invaded Poland, and all German borders were closed. Two days later, Britain and Germany were at war, and all further rescue activities ceased. The train carrying the 250 children was shunted out of sight, and the children were never seen again. Overall, Nicholas Winton found homes in Britain for 669 children, many of whose parents would later perish at Auschwitz.

After the war, Winton’s rescue efforts remained practically unknown and unremembered. In 1988 his wife Grete—whom he had married in 1948 and who knew nothing of this earlier episode in his life—found a scrapbook from 1939 chronicling the full story. His attitude was that he did not think anyone would have been interested.

Winton’s achievements were recognized around the world, particularly in Britain and the Czech Republic. In 1993 Queen Elizabeth II awarded him an MBE (Member of the British Empire), and on October 28, 1998, the president of the Czech Republic, Václav Havel, recognized his achievement with the award of the Order of T. G. Masaryk. Queen Elizabeth then went further than her earlier award and knighted him on December 31, 2002, for his services to humanity. In 2008 the Czech government nominated Winton for the 2008 Nobel Peace Prize, and in 2010 he was named a Hero of the Holocaust by the British government. On October 28, 2014, he was awarded the highest honor of the Czech Republic, the Order of the White Lion, by Czech president Miloš Zeman, and finally, on February 23, 2015, he was awarded the Freedom of the City of London. Winton's Jewish birth disqualified him from being declared Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

Sir Nicholas Winton died peacefully in his sleep on the morning of July 1, 2015, at Wexham Park Hospital in Slough. He was 106 years old.

Wirth, Christian

Known for his brutality both to Jewish victims and his own SS staff at Nazi extermination camps, Christian Wirth was involved in—if not, directly responsible for—the mass killings of Jews in three of the six Nazi extermination camps situated in Poland. It seems that he had the perfect experience and temperament for such actions.

Wirth was born on November 24, 1885, in Oberbalzheim in Baden-Württemberg, in southern Germany. His years before World War I, and prior to his association with the Nazi Party in 1931, were spent first in the construction trade and then with the police department in Stuttgart. He served valiantly in World War I, where he was wounded and highly decorated. After the war he returned to Stuttgart, where he became a leading police detective and later was responsible for other detectives working homicide.

His early roles in the Nazi Party were in the SA (Sturmabteilung) in 1933; in the SD (Sicherheitsdienst) in 1937; and in the SS (Schutzstaffel) in 1939, where he was promoted to Obersturmführer (first lieutenant) in October of that year. His brutality was already well known: his success rate for getting confessions from suspects that no one else could was impressive.

His education in the workings of the Nazi regime continued when he was assigned at the end of 1939 to the German “euthanasia” program (Aktion T-4). That was the Nazis’ first large-scale, organized killing operation, addressed this time not at Jews but at German citizens with physical and mental disabilities that under Nazi ideology rendered them as leading “lives not worthy of living.” It was while working as the administrative director at a euthanasia station in Brandenburg that Wirth was first involved in killing by gas. He also learned there and at another euthanasia center in Hartheim Castle that carbon monoxide gas was very effective for killing a large group of people relatively quickly, and that for such a program to be efficient, the victims must be deceived into believing that they were not going to their death until it was too late for them to do anything to stop it. Wirth was so good at this work that he was appointed head of the program in mid-1940.

With this as background, Wirth soon found himself involved from the very beginning with the Operation Reinhard (Aktion Reinhard) program. This program focused on the extermination of the Jews of Poland, and to that end it created three so-called Operation Reinhard extermination camps: Belzec, Sobibór, and Treblinka (all built in the Generalgouvernement). In December 1941 Wirth was ordered to set up the first of these camps, Belzec, and was appointed its first commandant. By mid-March 1942 Belzec’s killing capacity was operational.

As Belzec’s commandant—in which capacity he was referred to as “Christian the Savage”—Wirth was in a position that allowed him to experiment to determine what steps needed to be taken to make the killing center run as efficiently as possible, “efficiently” meaning, in this case, the ability to kill and dispose of the bodies of as many Jews in as short a time as possible. To that end, Wirth, drawing on his Aktion T-4 experience, recognized the importance of deceiving the victims for as long as possible as to the real purpose of the camp. He often personally made a welcoming speech to new arrivals, assuring them that they had come to a transit camp and that they had nothing to fear.

He also recognized the importance of speed in this operation. It was critical that the victims be moved as quickly as possible from arrival to execution. In a manner that seemed to contradict his principle of keeping victims calm, he ordered that they be forced to run from one place to the next, always being beaten or whipped if they did not do so fast enough. The goal was to disorient them so that any thoughts or feelings other than terror would be impossible. Another decision he made was for Jews themselves to do as much of the work in the extermination process as feasible.

Less than six months into Belzec’s killing operations, Wirth was promoted again, this time to be the supervisor of all three of the Operation Reinhard camps, meaning that his command was extended from Belzec to include Sobibór and Treblinka. In that capacity, Wirth set out to increase killing efficiency in those camps as well. In the summer of 1943 Himmler promoted him to Sturmbannführer.

A massacre with a particularly cruel name—"Operation Harvest Festival," committed in November 1943—also was Wirth's doing. As the Operation Reinhard camps began to be closed, Wirth saw to it that the Jewish laborers in Nazi camps, including Trawniki and Madjanek, were killed. Some 42,000 Jews were murdered as a result.

Wirth was now assigned to Trieste, where his job was to establish a death camp in San Sabba and to fight partisans. On May 26, 1944, he was killed by Yugoslav partisans. He was buried with full honors.

Wise, Stephen S.

American Reform rabbi, U.S. Jewish leader, and Zionist, Stephen Samuel Wise was born on May 17, 1874, in Budapest, and emigrated to New York City as a child. He was educated at the City of New York's Columbia College, where he earned a bachelor's degree in 1892. In 1901 he received a PhD from Columbia University and then pursued rabbinical studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary. He became a Reform rabbi and a committed Zionist by 1914. Wise also established several synagogues and participated in a number of meetings of the American and World Jewish Congress. A close associate of future president Franklin D. Roosevelt, Wise was an eloquent proponent of social and economic change and strongly backed the New Deal.

In the early 1930s, when the Nazis ascended to power in Germany, Wise spoke out sharply against the regime and its racial policies and antisemitism. He helped spearhead an effort to boycott German-made goods and organized anti-Nazi protests in New York City, and also attempted to use his influence with President Roosevelt to convince him that the United States must actively resist the Nazis. Strong isolationist sentiments in the United States, however, largely prevented such action. Despite this, Wise was influential in persuading the State Department to increase the number of visas to Jews fleeing Europe during 1936–1939.

By early 1942 reports of the enormity of the Holocaust had begun to trickle into the United States, and Wise moved quickly to publicize it and strategize how to stop it. In November 1942 he held a press conference in which he detailed the reports coming out of Europe. He also appealed to the U.S. public for help in ending the slaughter of innocents. The next month, the United States and 11 of its allies issued a declaration denouncing the Germans' attempts to exterminate European Jewry. Wise repeatedly urged Roosevelt to make cessation of the Holocaust a major war aim, but other exigencies prevented the president from doing so. This greatly saddened Wise, and as the war drew to a close, his influence among American Jews had begun to wane.

In 1945 Wise was sent to the United Nations Conference in San Francisco, where he helped formulate policies designed to help Holocaust survivors and to prevent such an atrocity from happening again. Wise was often criticized for not having taken a strong enough stance with the Roosevelt administration prior to the war, when Nazi policies toward the Jews were already clear and obvious. Others faulted him for not being aggressive enough to stop the Holocaust during the war, but there was only so much Wise could have done in that regard. Roosevelt's primary goal was to defeat Japan and Germany, and he had to act in concert with U.S. allies, for whom the Holocaust was not a central concern.

Rabbi Stephen S. Wise died on April 19, 1949, in New York.

Wolff, Karl

Karl Wolff was SS-Obersturmbannführer and Supreme Head of the German police forces in Italy in 1945. He stood trial in 1964 before the Schwurgericht (Court with a Jury) of the Landgericht Muenchen II. Charged as an accessory to the murder of more than 300,000 Jews killed while he was the adjutant of the Reichsführer-SS, Heinrich Himmler, between 1942 and 1943, Wolff was tried as a so-called “Schreibtischtäter,” literally, a “desk perpetrator,” someone not physically present at the crime but culpable for reasons of administrative responsibility.

Born on May 13, 1900, in Darmstadt, Karl Friedrich Wolff served in World War I. After the German defeat in 1918, he could not continue his military career and started an advertising agency that failed. In 1931 he met Hitler and Himmler, and decided to enroll in Himmler’s newly formed SS. Letters to his wife reveal that Wolff shared the ideas of “eliminating the Jews,” although he might not have dared to believe or plan actively how this could become reality. Wolff, a pragmatic and cool analyst, always followed the easiest path of self-advantage; attracted by the SS ideal of building a new German elite, he was obsessed with becoming part of it.

From 1932 Wolff had the personal attention of Himmler, who was impressed by the character and perfect manners of the “young gentleman.” In 1933 he became Himmler’s chief of personal staff, and as such was drawn into his inner circle, and it was recognized that his notable diplomatic ability was useful to his boss. Wolff became Himmler’s shadow, taking part in every meeting and accompanying Himmler on several inspection tours, including ones to concentration camps. At the same time, Wolff maintained contact with the different circles Himmler wished to address informally, such as industrialists, officers, or journalists. In his position as Himmler’s adjutant, Wolff controlled access to the Reichsführer. To strengthen his position against his political rivals, Wolff became head of the Reichsführer-SS chancellery, and supervised the SS organizations “Ahnenerbe” and “Lebensborn” on Himmler’s behalf.

With the outbreak of World War II in 1939, Wolff was promoted to the position of liaison officer for Himmler at Hitler’s headquarters, and was named a general of the Waffen-SS to emphasize his position, although he was not a trained general staff officer. He became isolated from his duties and powers at Berlin, but at the same time involved in the racial war of the SS in the East. Wolff participated in several meetings dealing with the murder of the Jews; he knew of the so-called “Generalplan Ost” and of the gas chambers. He also participated several times, together with Himmler, in mass shootings of Jews and communists, including in Minsk in 1941.

Wolff’s involvement in planning the deportation of the Jews of Warsaw in July and August of 1942 became obvious after the war. During that period, up to 300,000 Jews had been deported to die in the gas chambers of Treblinka, and Wolff could not deny having personally ordered several trains to start the deportations.

With defeat in sight, Wolff was perfectly clear about his responsibilities and the guilt of staff members of the SS. After the fall of Mussolini in July 1943, Wolff became supreme head of the German police forces in Italy. Besides the police work in occupied territory, he was also concerned with deportation of Italian civilians for slave labor in Germany. And as he controlled the rear areas, he became involved in the war against the partisans.

Although he followed the lines given by his patron, Wolff also looked out for more positive action, because he felt strongly that he had to earn a new reputation. After the deportation of the Jews of Rome by a special SS group from Germany, an action ordered by Himmler against Wolff’s advice, Wolff became more isolated from Himmler. He was on good terms with the Vatican and the Italian bishops, and became one of the most important German negotiators for the surrender in the south of Italy. In exchange, the Allied partners promised Wolff the new life he longed for; in a secret agreement, he was given the promise that he would not be prosecuted for actions committed during his command in Italy, including harsh anti-partisan tactics.

Wolff’s role in the deportation and deaths of the Jews was another matter. Because he never had an official function in the chain of mass murder of the Jews, it was quite difficult to bring Wolff to trial. Only the existence of some letters in which Wolff not only ordered the trains for the deportation but also expressed himself content and happy in very antisemitic phrases allowed him to be tried at all. Several former colleagues testified as to Wolff’s important role as the “right hand of Himmler,” but nobody could testify that Wolff had killed personally, as he had always been eager to remain the image of the “gentleman with white gloves.”

Based on the contents of his letters, in March 1965 Wolff was found guilty and sentenced to 15 years of imprisonment. He was released in 1969 on medical grounds and died in Rosenheim, Germany, on July 17, 1984.

World War II

The origins of World War II lay in the ideological drive for expansion manifest in the Nazi worldview. The basic goal was to create an expanded Germany to the east, thereby capturing “living space” (Lebensraum) in order to form a new superpower: the Thousand Year Reich. In so doing, Adolf Hitler envisaged destroying the Soviet Union and eliminating France as a continental power. Further, this would be combined with an ethnic revolution in the region, promoted by the Nazis as being a defense of all Germanic (or “Aryan”) peoples. It was this racial aspect that distinguished Nazi policy from older forms of German expansionism. As far back as 1934, Hitler ordered his generals to be ready for war “within eight years.” This policy of rearmament was given a substantial fillip by the failure of the West to react to Hitler’s remilitarization of the Rhineland in 1936. Hitler believed that he could forge allegiances with Great Britain and the Soviet Union in order to gain the time to fulfill this plan. With regard to the latter, Nazi diplomacy resulted in the Nazi-Soviet Non-aggression Pact, signed on August 23, 1939. Hitler believed that despite the lack of a formal alliance, this promise of non-aggression by the Soviet Union would deter Britain from fighting. The pact itself was mutually beneficial. For Joseph Stalin, not only did a secret protocol allow for westward territorial expansion but it would also very likely result in a war between Germany and the imperial powers that would engender favorable conditions for the wider spread of communism in Europe. Hitler’s Germany was, therefore, a “friend” of communism—though not an “ally”—and Soviet terminology dubbed Hitler the “icebreaker of the revolution.”

Hitler had offered the Polish government status as a satellite state at the beginning of 1939. When this was turned down, Hitler decided to destroy Poland. After invading the country on the morning of September 1, 1939, it took less than two weeks for the rest of the country to be overrun by the German forces, and this was followed by a Soviet invasion. Initially the German public did not have a great enthusiasm for the offensive. This was a period when the Nazi Party was in decline in the popular consciousness, despite the fact that Hitler’s own standing remained high. However, morale was improved by the swift victory. Unprecedented Blitzkrieg tactics allowed for a new form of warfare, far removed from the trenches of World War I, to be implemented. The combination of modern technology with a belief that the “spirit” of the Teutonic warriors of old was working with them in winning breathtakingly rapid and decisive victories was typical of the Nazi idealization of modern warfare. Following this victory, the ethnic cleansing programs that would develop into the Holocaust began to evolve. For example, Heinrich Himmler was given the role of “Reich Commissar for the Strengthening of Germandom,” and under his governance 1 million Poles were removed from western Polish provinces and replaced with German immigrants. The majority of Poland was placed under the rule of a Nazi governorship, which formed the “Government of Central Poland” (termed more generally, ironically in French, as the Gouvernement), and the Reich directly annexed Upper Silesia, West Prussia, Poznan, and Danzig.

Following the invasion of Poland, German attention turned to Denmark and Norway in the spring of 1940. These invasions were pragmatic, as the supply of Swedish iron ore was essential for the German war machine. A British-occupied Norway might have halted this flow of raw materials. Again, easy victories followed, despite substantial British and French intervention in northern Norway. Attention then switched to Western Europe, and May 10, 1940, saw the Blitzkrieg sweep across Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, and France. In the previous winter, Germany had developed a plan to attack France at the north of the defensive barrier, the Maginot Line, via the Ardennes Mountains. This proved highly effective and split the Allied armies; the French capitulated after only six weeks, and 300,000 British and French troops were forced into a legendary evacuation via the port of Dunkirk. On June 16 Marshal Henri Pétain became the new French head of state, and an armistice was signed. Hitler toured Paris in triumph and returned to Germany to a genuine excitement at the dramatic victories in Western Europe, fueling National Socialist propaganda of a virile “people’s Germany” that was triumphant over Western decadence. The British, now under the newly installed leadership of Winston Churchill, declared that there would be “no surrender”—this despite high-level British discussions for a negotiated peace. Hermann Göring’s plan to defeat Britain in 1940 via Luftwaffe bombing raids—the Battle of Britain—failed to remove Britain from the war or destroy the Royal Air Force (RAF). Both countries maintained aerial bombing raids on civilian and military targets.

Instead of invading Britain, Hitler decided to fulfill a greater objective: the destruction of the Soviet Union. This was an ideological “war of racial annihilation,” as Hitler informed his generals, rather than a battle for expansion. Hitler was convinced that the Red Army had been emasculated as a result of the Great Purges, a belief greatly encouraged by the Soviets’ poor performance in the invasion of Finland in November 1939. After some delays in the spring of 1941, Operation Barbarossa was launched on June 22. Some 147 divisions were allocated to the invasion, initially joined by Romanian and Finnish troops. Despite warnings of an attack, the invasion came as a surprise to Stalin. Consequently, the Soviets lost most of their air force, and Germany soon made vast gains, taking a huge number of prisoners of war. However, by the winter of 1941–1942 the German forces had failed in their initial aspiration of knocking out the Red Army in five months, and they were ill prepared for the freezing conditions of the Russian winter. To compound these logistical problems, German supply lines had become increasingly overstretched by Hitler's decision to split the attack between Moscow and Ukraine. The occupied Soviet territories were chaotically administered, and it is difficult to overstate the brutality that the Germans unleashed on the local populations, which served to unify the Soviet forces in the defense of "Mother Russia" in what now became the "Great Patriotic War." Logistical difficulties were then compounded by the Japanese attack on the United States naval base at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7, 1941, and the resultant German and Italian declaration of war against the United States later that same week. Not only did this draw Germany into a state of war with the United States, thereby demoralizing the home front, but it also freed experienced Soviet troops from the Siberian Front to fight the Nazi invasion: it was clear that Japan would be too busy with Southeast Asian expansion to nurture designs against the Soviet Union.

In 1942 Albert Speer was promoted to minister for armaments and war production, and he brought about dramatic increases in the construction of wartime materials, more than trebling production in three years. This was often achieved through the use of foreign prisoners and slave labor in the concentration camps. From its peak at the start of Operation Barbarossa, enthusiasm in Germany for the war began to dwindle. Optimism was still very much alive and well in Germany during 1942, especially with news of Erwin Rommel's victories in North Africa and U-boat supremacy over British shipping in the North Atlantic. However, 1942 also saw the suspension of Nazi reforms to the state welfare and insurance schemes, and so the redistributive aspect of Nazi "socialism" and plans for a massive increase in social housing were shelved in favor of the essential war economy.

The war turned decisively against Germany in 1943. In February, German forces were defeated at Stalingrad—a battle that Hitler swore he would never lose—and in May, Rommel was defeated in North Africa. By the summer, the U-boat campaign was turning in favor of the Allies and in July the Germans were defeated in a massive tank battle around Kursk. Consequently, it was not until 1943 that the Goebbels propaganda machine reached its height in order to counter the increasingly gloomy news of the war's progress, compounded by rising prices and intensified Allied bombing campaigns. By this time, Hitler's health—mental and physical—had begun to decline. Often meetings with military personnel led to histrionics from the Führer and sometimes to major disputes over tactical matters. Hopes for avoiding a German defeat were dwindling, and they now lay either in the possibility that the Red Army would not be able to maintain its unique ability to absorb a truly colossal rate of attrition, or with the idea that an increased Soviet conquest of Eastern Europe would lead to a squabble that would destroy the Allies' unity. Such hopes were finally dashed with the D-Day landings in Normandy in June 1944. The success of this invasion was made possible by the massive industrial capacity of the United States to produce war materials, in combination with the fact that the Allies had cracked Enigma, the German codes. Although the initial battles were by no means certain, the Allies soon proved successful and began moving eastward.

By 1944 the Nazi regime had become increasingly unstable. The July Plot against Hitler's life augmented the power base of the SS and its leader, Himmler, in whom Hitler now placed a deep trust. He gave the former chicken farmer the position of "commander-in-chief of the reserve army and supreme commander of the Army Group Vistula," the sort of promotion that is indicative of a wider characteristic of the Nazi war machine—placing people in positions for which they had no real training. This gave Himmler prime responsibility for defending Germany from the onslaught of the Red Army, a task in which he failed spectacularly. In these final months, Martin Bormann rose, too, and plotted against Himmler and other high-ranking Nazis, a development that was symptomatic of the fact that the upper echelons of the Nazi Party were riddled with infighting. In the shadow of imminent defeat, Himmler and Göring both sought peace settlements, the latter, incredibly, acting under the false belief that he was now Germany's de facto leader. Hitler, however, was determined that Germany would not surrender. In his final testament, written in his Berlin bunker, he expressed no contrition for the frightful destruction he had unleashed, and prophesied that a new National Socialist Germany would one day rise again from the ruins. It was here, on April 29, 1945, that he married Eva Braun and later committed suicide. Before doing so, he promoted Goebbels to chancellor, Bormann to party secretary, and Admiral Karl Dönitz to Reich president and supreme commander of the armed forces. On May 7, 1945, German representatives signed an initial peace and unconditional surrender order, and the following day they signed an unconditional surrender to all the Allies in Berlin.

For Italy, too, the war followed a tragic path. Although war was central to fascist ideology, it is clear that initially Benito Mussolini had no intention of involving Italy in such a great conflagration. Italy lacked the military infrastructure to mount a major war against Western powers, and Mussolini was happy to limit himself to piecemeal expansionist policies in Africa and the Balkans. Despite the “Pact of Steel” of May 1939, Mussolini did not enter the war immediately. In fact, he regarded the Nazi-Soviet Nonaggression Pact as criminal; backed Finland after the Soviet invasion of that country in November 1939; and sold weapons, including airplanes, to France until May 1940. On June 10, 1940, when France was on the verge of defeat, Italy entered on the side of Germany in hopes of territorial gains. Mussolini wanted only a partial association with Nazi expansionism. Therefore, he decided to fight a “parallel war” in Italy’s interests, basically to make Italy the key regional power in the Mediterranean and North Africa. In October 1940 Mussolini ordered an invasion of Greece that quickly ran into difficulties because of the military strength built up under Greece’s Metaxas regime in the interwar years. Italian troops were forced into retreat. Mussolini was rescued in April 1941 when Hitler overran Yugoslavia and Greece, delaying Operation Barbarossa. This was due to an anti-German coup in Yugoslavia and a British military expedition supporting Greece. After that Italy was stripped of its military independence. Italian troops were sent to aid the invasion of the Soviet Union and also to Rommel’s campaign in Africa. The latter sat awkwardly with the Italians’ self-image, at least at a rhetorical level, of performing a civilizing form of imperialism, emancipating indigenous populations from British and French rule. However, despite their own atrocities committed in Africa, it is worth noting that the Italians did not comply with the Nazi Jewish policy and maintained the second highest survival rate of Jewish populations among occupied countries.

The hostilities highlighted the fact that the Italian fascist war machine was a weak force, negating the ideals of the fascist new man. Further, it became increasingly obvious that the Italian Fascist Party and its associated militia, the MVSN, were both ineffective and corrupt. By 1943 public confidence in the regime collapsed, as it seemed to many that the war was contrary to any Italian interests. Mussolini, however, could see no way out and felt that Italy’s destiny was tied inextricably to Germany. Following the Allied invasion of Sicily on July 9, 1943, a meeting of the Fascist Grand Council was called for July 24. There, Dino Grandi collected signatures supporting a resumption of rule by King Victor Emmanuel III. Mussolini was deposed, and a new government was created under Marshal Pietro Badoglio. Mussolini was placed under arrest, and the new government signed peace terms on September 8, the eve of the Allied invasion of Italy.

German forces then invaded, and the peninsula became the site of civil war between antifascists and a combination of German and fascist forces. Mussolini was rescued on September 12 and coerced by Hitler into running a puppet state. Installed in a villa near Salò, Mussolini was essentially a prisoner of the SS. The Italian Social Republic, or the Salò Republic as it was popularly known, initially attempted to introduce a new “socialization” scheme that would reorder the economy along more corporatist lines. The German Reich terminated these reforms, as it was fearful of a drop in essential wartime production. The republic did gain a genuine minority support, however, and it founded a new army of around 500,000 men and a new militia, the National Republican Guard. However, the Allied invasion was too powerful, and the republic was eventually defeated. Partisans captured Mussolini at the end of April 1945. He was executed, and his body was hung in a square in Milan.

In other invaded territories, Hitler preferred to set up satellite regimes that, in the main, drew on local conservative forces, rather than either drawing on indigenous fascist forces or governing annexed regions directly from Berlin. The Scandinavian countries were given somewhat lenient treatment, and Denmark, Norway, and Holland were allowed relatively autonomous governance. This stemmed from a belief that Scandinavians, the Dutch, and the Flemish were “racially redeemable.” The most notorious of these was the regime of Norway’s Vidkun Quisling, who ruled in Germany’s interests for most of the war, and whose name became synonymous with such a relationship. Holland, Denmark, and Belgium also developed collaborationist regimes. However, because of contingencies of administration, indigenous fascists did gain more significant positions of power in some invaded countries. In Romania, Hitler’s main concern was to make the country a stable satellite and bulwark in support of the invasion of the Soviet Union. The Iron Guard did, however, briefly seize power. In 1940 King Carol realigned Romanian allegiance from Britain to Germany and offered Horia Sima and others from the Iron Guard places in the government. However, when Germany transferred Transylvania to Hungary, Carol’s popularity dropped. Carol installed General Ion Antonescu as dictator, and the latter then forced the king to abdicate in favor of his son Prince Michael. Other parties were unwilling to form a grand coalition, so Antonescu relied on the Iron Guard to back his pro-German Romanian nationalism. Thereafter, the Iron Guard became the only political party in Romania, and Sima became vice-premier. “Romanianization” commissars from the Iron Guard peppered the country and even gained new powers over industry. Overall, this simply resulted in bad (and increasingly unpopular) administration. Antonescu attempted to appropriate the Iron Guard, emulating Francisco Franco’s tactics with the Falange in Spain—a policy that Hitler backed. However, amid increasing political tension, on January 21, 1941, the legion carried out a full revolt, seized local government offices, and enacted a vicious Jewish pogrom. This rebellion was crushed, however, and the Iron Guard was banned. Antonescu remained in power, and Romanian forces were sent to the Eastern Front in return for territorial gains. Antonescu also presided over Romania’s own Jewish genocide, the largest by non-German forces during the war.

Hungary was also reinvented as a Nazi satellite state in which the Arrow Cross, led by Ferenc Szálasi, eventually secured power. The regent, Admiral Miklós Horthy, initially resisted the Arrow Cross. He favored the rise of the new radical-right party, Hungarian Renewal, under Béla Imrédy. Hitler, too, initially resisted Szálasi and preferred to give power to Imrédy after Hungary entered the war as a German ally. The Arrow Cross held representatives in the Hungarian parliament and set up a biological racial office in 1942. The advance of Soviet forces in 1943 led to a full German occupation in March 1944, and Horthy was forced to put a more radical-right government into office; yet Szálasi refused to be a party to this coalition. By the autumn of 1944 German authorities wanted to put Szálasi and the Arrow Cross in power. They seized the existing government, and Szálasi was installed. By this time, half of the Jewish population had been transported to death camps, and under Szálasi the rest were deported. Szálasi developed an ideological project for a new “Hungarian Order,” and a “Corporate Order of the Working Nation” comprising a nationalized and “controlled” economy. By March 1945 the country was under full Soviet occupation, and Szálasi was captured and executed for war crimes.

After invading Yugoslavia, Hitler dismantled the country, following which the Ustashe rose to power in Croatia. The leader of the Ustashe, Dr. Ante Pavelić, was put at the head of the new Independent State of Croatia and remained there throughout the war. He developed a charismatic leadership and “mystical bond” with the nation. Under this administration chaos reigned, and a culture of very high ethnic violence developed. That resulted in the attempted extermination of a large proportion of the Orthodox Serb population, some 1 million strong. The regime also spontaneously executed around 40,000 Jews.

After the French defeat, Marshal Pétain headed what was the most independent of the satellite states, Vichy France. Comprising southeastern and central France, the regime maintained official sovereign status and formal diplomacy throughout the war and was allowed to keep France’s colonial empire. Essentially, this was an authoritarian, right-wing dictatorship modeled on Franco rather than Hitler or Mussolini. It did, however, respond to widespread desires for patriotic reform and announced a “national revolution.” This involved the promotion of conservative values, the reintroduction of religious instruction in schools, and the modernization of industry along corporatist lines. Also, new youth and veterans’ organizations were formed. Antisemitic policies were introduced in 1940, and the French police ended up deporting tens of thousands of Jews to Germany and beyond. In August 1941 the regime became more authoritarian when Pétain suppressed political parties, formed new courts, and created a new national police force. Mandatory labor was introduced in 1942, basically to ensure that French youth worked for German interests. However, by 1942 the Vichy Zone (also called the “Free” or “Unoccupied” Zone) was under direct German occupation, which blocked further constitutional reform. From that point onward, Pétain was a mere figurehead. Marcel Déat and other indigenous French fascists were given positions in the assembly. After the Allied invasion in the summer of 1944 the government was moved to Sigmaringen in Germany, in order to organize guerrilla tactics opposing the liberation.

As the war progressed, it developed an increasingly global aspect. There was a significant Europe-wide, rather than exclusively German, input into the German armed forces, reflective of the way that for many across Europe the war took on the face of a genuine ideological conflict between “European Civilization” and “Asian Bolshevism.” For example, the Waffen-SS drew on not only non-national Volksdeutsche (“ethnic Germans”) but also other volunteers from Northern, Eastern, and Western Europe, and even non-Europeans. This was often constructed in terms of a somewhat convoluted Nietzschean ideal of the emergence of European “supermen.” However, it was more likely that these recruits were inspired by deeply felt anticommunist sentiments that allowed any Nazi atrocities to be justified in the greater good of defeating Bolshevism. Typical of this fusion between increasing Nazification and anti-Bolshevism was the leader of the Belgian Rexist movement, Léon Degrelle, who spent a great deal of time on the Eastern Front. He also developed a “Eurofascism” that argued that Nazi-style racism must become manifest in all nationalisms, which would result in a unified European community of nations after the war.

World War II was devastating for the fascist worldview. Inherent to fascism—especially Nazism—was the idea that war was the ultimate test of the nation and of the new fascist men created in its name. Consequently, the comprehensive defeat of Nazi expansionism, which drew other forms of fascism and authoritarian right politics into its hurricane, revealed the inherently self-destructive nature of fascist ideologies. In the postwar dynamic, this has meant that fascist ideology has sought to build ideological constructions that either attempt to transcend this history through sophisticated metapolitical discourses of “organic nationalism,” or else fetishize these experiences, often in esoteric paramilitary groupuscules.

World War II, Outbreak of

On September 1, 1939, Nazi Germany invaded Poland. Two days later, as a consequence of that invasion, Britain and France declared war on Germany.

Although the conflict that would become World War II was, at that stage, still localized to those countries (as well as the countries of the British and French Empires), it carried an awful potential to spiral into something much worse. Germany was already allied to fascist Italy, and, a few days before the invasion, Germany had signed an alliance with the Soviet Union. For several years prior to this, smaller countries all over Europe had been coalescing into alliances and groupings for their mutual defense in case of the unthinkable.

What did this mean for the Jews of Europe? The beginning of World War II, on September 1, 1939, marked a new phase in German policy toward the Jews.

It is important to realize that the war did not coincide with the start of the Holocaust—though it must also be said that Nazi anti-Jewish measures in Poland were not long in coming. Indeed, within a month the first ghettos were established, with Nazi Germany taking advantage of Poland’s conquest in order to begin persecuting the Jews.

This, however, was a piecemeal persecution. At the beginning of the war the Nazis did not yet quite know what to do with the millions of Jews they had just seized. After all, the previous six years had not seen a complete eradication of Jews from Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia, and Jewish numbers in the “Old Reich” were substantially less than they were in the newly occupied territories. The question of how to deal with the much larger Polish Jewish population was therefore one that made the Nazis pause—though only for a short while. The upshot of Nazi interim measures—which were to remain in place, and would then drive the Final Solution as it developed—was the creation of a system of ghettos throughout Nazi-occupied Poland.

The main tool the Nazis employed to achieve their murderous aims during the Holocaust could be found in the death camps, and it is these institutions, thoroughly unprecedented in purpose and design, that make up the starkest feature of the Holocaust. Nothing, either before or since, approximates the Nazi death camps in design, intention, or operation. Yet the outbreak of war in September 1939 did not see the immediate establishment of these camps, even though the invasion of Poland generated the circumstances that would allow for them later.

Nowhere has any other malevolent regime introduced establishments like the Nazi death camps of Lublin-Majdanek, Treblinka, Belzec, Sobibór, Chelmno, or Auschwitz-Birkenau. They were, and remain, thoroughly unmatched in human history. As such, they became the most lucid and unequivocal statement German National Socialism made about itself, demonstrating beyond doubt that it was an anti-human ideology in which respect for life counted for nothing. Put together, all these aspects of what the death camps represented added up to a new dimension of genocide.

Yet this could not have been foreseen when war broke out in September 1939. For all the persecution that had thus far taken place in the Old Reich, the Holocaust, as we have come to understand it, had not yet begun. The “ground zero” of the Final Solution—the extermination camps—was still several years away.

Wrobel, Eta

Eta Wrobel was a commander of Jewish partisans in the forests of central Poland during the Holocaust. She was born Eta Chajt into a solidly middle-class family of 10 in Łuków, eastern Poland on December 28, 1916. In early 1940, soon after the war began, she began working as a clerk in an employment agency, but quickly began her resistance activities by creating false identity papers for Jews in the work office set up by German Reserve Police Battalion 101 in Łuków. She also smuggled guns she had stolen from Nazis in Łódź, and somehow got them to Łuków. She was, however, eventually denounced and arrested by the Gestapo.

Imprisoned in Lublin, she was beaten and tortured in order to divulge the names of other resisters. She held out for 10 months before being released for work duties building the death camp at nearby Majdanek. This was highly unusual, as Jews were at no time ever permitted to do such work, but Eta had assistance from outside the prison through the intervention of the family of one of the other prisoners. On the way to the worksite, she managed to slip away from the wagon on which she was riding and ran into the forest. Here, she was met by her father, who had escaped the destruction of the Łuków ghetto.

The ghetto had been established in May 1941 and was destroyed before the end of 1942. By then the population had grown to nearly 12,000. Deportations, mainly to Treblinka, took place in early October and early November, while some 2,200 Jews were shot into pits. Whatever remained of the ghetto was transformed into a slave labor camp, but over the next few months thousands of those who had survived the initial deportations, and others who had been relocated there from elsewhere, were shot dead or transported to Treblinka. Only about 150 Jews of Łuków survived the Holocaust.

Under these circumstances, it was ironic that Eta could count herself as one of the survivors of the Łuków ghetto, given that she had already been imprisoned by the Gestapo. Having fled to the woods, she then helped organize an all-Jewish partisan unit numbering about 80, which, because of innate military skills, she ultimately commanded. She was active on missions with men and made important strategic decisions under which the unit would steal German supplies, set mines, and engage in skirmishing.

The unit lived rough. They slept in cramped quarters and had no access to medical attention. Unlike the other seven women in the unit, she refused to cook or clean. On one mission Eta was shot in the leg and went to see a friendly Polish doctor. The bullet was difficult to remove, and he kept asking her to come back when the swelling went down. All that led to was intense pain and sustained swelling over several months, so eventually the doctor gave her a knife and a bottle of alcohol, and she dug the bullet out herself. It was said that the experience she gained from this was beneficial in other ways, as she then learned how to remove bullets from wounded fellow partisans.

In July 1944 the Soviet army liberated Łuków. Eta came out of hiding and was asked if she was interested in becoming the mayor of Łuków. She readily accepted this on the ground that by doing so she could make a positive difference for the future. On December 20, 1944, she was married, and in 1947 she and her husband, Henry, moved to the United States, settling first in Brooklyn before moving to New Jersey. They raised three children, who in turn produced nine grandchildren. Eta, for her part, was the only child in a family of 10 to survive the Holocaust.

After settling in the United States, Eta spent much of her time engaging in community activities such as raising money to assist in anticancer initiatives. In later life she traveled throughout New Jersey educating schoolchildren about her experiences and generally imparting to them a lifetime of accumulated wisdom wrung from the most testing of conditions. In 2006, at the age of 90, she wrote her memoirs, a book titled My Life My Way, written in conjunction with Jeanette Friedman.

Eta Wrobel died on May 26, 2008, in Highland, New York, at the age of 92. Before her death, she summarized her years with the partisans by saying, "The biggest resistance that we could have done to the Germans was to survive."

Yad Vashem

Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, was established in 1953 by an act of Israel's Knesset (parliament) to commemorate the six million Jewish men, women, and children murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators during the Holocaust. Located on the western slope of Mount Herzl on the Mount of Remembrance in Jerusalem, the site was chosen specifically because the area was not at that point crowded out with competing draws of historical significance.

Yad Vashem is charged with educating both Israeli citizens and the global community, through documentation and publication, about the tragic events of the Holocaust (in Hebrew, HaShoah). The site consists of a large complex containing the Holocaust History Museum, memorial sites such as the Children's Memorial and the Hall of Remembrance, the Museum of Holocaust Art, sculptures, outdoor commemorative sites such as the Valley of the Communities, a synagogue, a research institute with archives, a library, a publishing house, and an educational center named the International School for Holocaust Studies.

Included among Yad Vashem's stated tasks are the following: to commemorate the Jews murdered by the Nazis; to commemorate the destroyed communities; to acknowledge the heroism of those who fought against the Nazis; to acknowledge the non-Jews, called Hasidei Umot Ha-Olam, or "Righteous among the Nations," who risked their lives to save Jews; to establish appropriate projects of memorialization; to do appropriate research to tell both the story of the victims and the heroes as well as the lessons to be learned; and to represent the State of Israel where like-minded projects are involved.

In pursuit of its principal mission of education, the International School for Holocaust Studies each year holds courses for over 100,000 students, 50,000 soldiers, and thousands of educators from around the world. Courses for teachers are offered in seven languages in addition to Hebrew, and the school also sends its faculty abroad to advance education about the Holocaust.

Yad Vashem also engages in important publication ventures, such as producing Yad Vashem Studies, a peer-reviewed semi-annual scholarly journal on the Shoah. Published since 1957, it appears in both English and Hebrew editions and deals with the latest research on various aspects of the Holocaust. In addition, Yad Vashem publishes record books of Jewish communities; a multivolume Comprehensive History of the Holocaust; and has primary responsibility for the development, revision, and publication of the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust.

As an academic institution, Yad Vashem's library and archives contain more than 50 million pages of testimony, 80,000 volumes, nearly 100,000 photographs, film footage and the videotaped testimonies of survivors, and 4,500 periodicals. Throughout the year it also hosts numerous conferences on a wide array of issues related to the Holocaust; these are attended by scholars and educators from across the globe. Yad Vashem's extensive website appears in several languages, including English, Hebrew, Russian, German, Spanish, Farsi, and Arabic.

Central state ceremonies are held at Yad Vashem each year on Yom HaShoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day according to the Hebrew calendar, 27th day of Nisan). This corresponds to the start of the Warsaw Ghetto Revolt in April 1943. The focus of the remembrance service takes place at the Hall of Remembrance (Ohel Yizkor), where an eternal flame burns in memory of those murdered by the Nazis. A crypt in front of the memorial flame contains ashes of victims.

A core goal of Yad Vashem's founders was to recognize non-Jews who, at enormous personal risk and without financial or ulterior motives, chose to save Jews during the Holocaust. Those recognized by Israel as among the Righteous are honored in a section of Yad Vashem known as the Garden of the Righteous, an avenue of carob trees planted in honor of the Righteous among the Nations. In many cases, these trees have been planted by the recipients themselves or by members of their family.

Other important sections of Yad Vashem include the Hall of Names, where a display features 600 photographs of Holocaust victims and fragments of Pages of Testimony that are reflected in a pool commemorating the victims whose names are unknown. Inside the hall can be found the approximately 2.2 million Pages of Testimony collected by Yad Vashem thus far. Empty spaces have been set aside for Pages that have not yet been forthcoming from families—it is recognized that in many cases, this will be impossible owing to whole families that were wiped out by the Nazis. In addition, the approximately 1.5 million Jewish children who were murdered by the Nazis have been remembered in a designated Children’s Memorial, where the names, ages, and birthplaces of those known to have died are continually recited.

Yad Vashem also houses the world’s largest collection of artwork produced by Jews and other victims of Nazi occupation in 1933–1945, as well as the Valley of the Communities, a 2.5-acre monument in which the names of over 5,000 Jewish communities that were destroyed (and those few that survived) are engraved.

The name of the overall complex is taken from a verse in the Book of Isaiah: “Even unto them will I give in my house and within my walls a monument and a name [yad vashem] better than sons and of daughters: I will give them an everlasting name that shall never be effaced” (Isaiah 56:5). This reference was considered suitable for the Holocaust memorial, as it symbolized a national place of commemoration from the Jewish people to those who have no one to carry their name after death.

Yellow Star

The yellow star was a badge that Jews throughout Nazi-occupied Europe were forced to wear as a means of identification. Following the German invasion of Poland in September 1939 came several local decrees that required Jews to wear a distinctive sign in the area known as the Generalgouvernement. One of the initial signs was a white armband with a blue Star of David; in other areas a yellow badge in the form of the Star of David was attached to the left side of the breast and on the back. The requirement that all Jews wear the Star of David, inscribed with faux Hebrew lettering spelling out the German word Jude (Jew), was then extended to all Jews over the age of six in the Reich. By the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, a decree issued on September 19, 1941, and signed by SS Reichsprotektor Reinhard Heydrich, spread the requirement to other German-occupied territories in Europe and Northern Africa. The identifying yellow Star of David was similar in design in most of the German-occupied territories, however the local language for the word Jew was used: Juif in French, Jood in Dutch, and so on.

The practice forcing Jews to wear badges or distinguishing articles of clothing by law has been found in Europe as far back as the 13th century. Jews were required to wear distinguishing garments through the Middle Ages and the Renaissance period. The practice was largely phased out during the 17th and 18th centuries, and finally abolished in Western Europe during the French Revolution and the emancipation of the Western European Jews throughout the 19th century.

The Nazis resurrected the practice of making Jews wear identifying articles of clothing during the Holocaust. In 1938 they compelled Jewish shopkeepers to display the words “Jewish business” in their windows but did not introduce distinctive signs to be worn until after the occupation of Poland. Earlier, following the Kristallnacht pogrom known as the “Night of Broken Glass” (November 9–10, 1938), it was Reinhard Heydrich who first recommended that Jews should wear identifying badges, but it was not until after the September 1939 invasion of Poland that the Nazis introduced the mandatory wearing of badges.

The first instance of Jews being forced to wear identifying badges was in the town of Włocławek in central Poland by SS-Obergruppenführer Josef Kramer. On October 24, 1939, without awaiting orders, Kramer ordered that all Jews in Włocławek were to wear a distinctive 15-centimeter sign on their back in the form of a yellow triangle. Other commanders in the occupied east rapidly adopted the identifying badge and by the end of the year, all Jews, regardless of age or sex, in the Polish territories were required to wear badges. It was announced that severe punishment was in store for any Jews who did not wear the identification on the front and back of their clothing. Due to the antisemitic sentiments prevalent among certain sectors of the Polish public, the new German measure was met with enthusiasm. After the invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941 (Operation

A Croatian Jew, left, wears the symbol that all Jews in Yugoslavia had to display on their chest and back during World War II. Alongside, a Jewish woman wears the badge which is of yellow cloth with the Star of David. Jews in many parts of Nazi Europe were required to wear a yellow cloth patch emblazoned with a Star of David in order to mark them off as Jews within a non-Jewish environment. In Poland, the practice began when Jews were forced to wear a white armband with a blue Star of David on it, but this underwent a change over time. In many places, the German word Jude (Jew) was added to the star; this was then gradually introduced in non-German speaking areas in occupied Europe (for example, Juif in French or Jood in Dutch). (AP Photo)

Barbarossa), the Germans continued to require Jews to wear badges in all newly conquered territories.

In the Old Reich proper, the order for all Jews to wear identifying badges was issued on September 1, 1941, and applied on September 19. That date also applied to the Jews of Moravia, Slovakia, and Bohemia. Dates for other parts of Europe varied. In Holland, the order was applied in May 1942; in Belgium and France in June 1942; in Bulgaria, it was September 1942; in Greece, February 1942; and in Hungary in April 1944. It was only in Denmark that the Germans were unable to impose the identification regulation. According to popular legend, King Christian X had threatened to wear the badge himself had the Germans imposed the regulation on his country's Jewish population. The story is apocryphal, but it represents the dedication the Danish king felt for his country's Jews.

The age at which Jews were required to wear the identification badges was six years of age for Germany and most of Western Europe, and 10 years of age for most of Eastern Europe; however, in certain areas the age differed. In some ghettos even Jewish babies had to wear identifying armbands or stars.

The type of identifying badge also varied, though many took varying forms of a yellow badge in the shape of the Star of David. The badge was sometimes inscribed with the letter J, written in the local language, with stylized Hebrew-style lettering. Other forms of identification included white armbands with a blue Star of David, yellow arm bands with or without inscription, a Shield of David in various colors, a yellow button, a metal tag inscribed with a J, a yellow triangle, or a yellow circle. When the Jews were forced to live in ghettos they were sometimes also made to wear distinctive signs indicating the region in which the ghetto was located. In some ghettos, certain individuals were given unique badges to identify them as having special skills; these groups included police officers, doctors, and factory workers. Jews were responsible for buying and distributing their own badges. Jews caught without their badge could be fined, imprisoned, or even executed.

The main objective in the introduction of the identifying badges for Jews was to create a divide between the Jews and the non-Jews, and to restrict Jewish movement. The identification badge was also a psychological tactic aimed at dehumanizing the Jews of Europe, marking them as different and inferior to everyone else. There was little choice to be had: either conceal the identification badge and, if caught, risk severe punishment; or wear the badge and become an easy target. Thus, the distinctive badges became an effective means to help the Germans facilitate their plan to exterminate the Jews. Helmut Knochen, chief of the Security Police in France and Belgium, stated that the yellow badge was “another step on the road to the Final Solution.”

Reactions to the identification badges varied throughout Europe. Some Jews reacted with dignity to the order and wore the identification badge as if it were a decoration, not realizing the danger of wearing the distinctive sign. Nearly all Polish Jews wore the identification badges for fear of severe punishment; however, they felt bitter about having to wear it. Some non-Jewish Poles met the identification policy with enthusiasm, seeing it as an opportunity to remove the Jews from commercial, economic, and public life. In Germany, where Jews had already been experiencing public hatred for years, the introduction of the identification badges was met with a wave of Jewish suicides.

The badge was not made compulsory in the unoccupied zone of France. In the occupied zone, however, the order enforced the wearing of the yellow star for all Jews older than six. Many French Jews refused to wear the badge, while some French non-Jews wore the identification badges themselves to express empathy for the Jews. In Czechoslovakia, the government had to ban hat tipping toward Jews, which became popular as protests against the German occupation. In Holland, an underground newspaper expressed its solidarity with the Jews by printing 300,000 stars, inscribed with words such as, “Jews and non-Jews are one and the same” or “Jews and non-Jews stand united in their struggle!”

Yom Hashoah

Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) is a Jewish commemoration day dedicated to the remembrance of the Holocaust. Shoah is a Hebrew word meaning “catastrophe” or “utter destruction.”

Yom Hashoah is held on the 27th day of the Hebrew month of Nisan (which occurs in late April or early May on the Common Era calendar) and is an official holiday in Israel. In 2005 the United Nations designated January 27 as the international Holocaust Memorial Day, and that date is acknowledged in most of the countries of the European Union. Neither day is recognized in the United States, but the Jewish community and many in the Christian community hold a commemoration on or near Yom Hashoah.

The day was inaugurated by law in Israel in 1953. Yom Hashoah is not a religious day in the Jewish liturgical calendar, and there is no set ritual. Many people will light candles (often 6 candles symbolic of the 6 million who died), though much greater emphasis is placed upon holding some form of commemoration rather than the form the observance will take. In Israel, a siren will sound, at which point everyone stops any activity in which they are engaged—including cars on the roads and highways. Integral to the day is the retelling of the stories of what people experienced. The United Kingdom first celebrated a Holocaust Remembrance Day in 2001, the year following the opening of a permanent Holocaust Exhibition at the Imperial War Museum.

Yoran, Shalom

Shalom Yoran was a Holocaust survivor, a Jewish partisan during World War II, and an author who published a highly acclaimed memoir in 1996. Yoran was born Selim Szyner near Warsaw, Poland, on June 29, 1925. In September 1942, as Nazi troops descended upon his hometown of Raciaz, his world was turned upside down. His family was forced from its home, and as the Nazis were rounding up the town’s Jews

Yoran and his elder brother managed to escape into nearby woods. They left behind their mother and father, both of whom eventually perished (almost all of Raciaz's Jews died in the Holocaust). The brothers spent a frigid winter hidden in an underground shelter in Poland; in the spring of 1943, they began their first insurgency mission against the Nazis by torching a factory that made gun parts for German weapons. "This was the turning point in the war," wrote Yoran in his memoir, as it made him not merely a victim but rather a partisan who could fight back and avenge the death of his parents and others. "No person should succumb to brutality without putting up a resistance," he counseled.

From that point forward, Yoran and his brother engaged in a host of partisan exploits, including sabotage, shooting German soldiers, planting land mines, and destroying bridges and other infrastructure. They eventually reached northeast Poland, near the Belarus border, and joined other Jewish insurgents who were working with Soviet troops. Yoran and his brother encountered rampant antisemitism even among Soviet and non-Jewish Polish forces. It was then, wrote Yoran, that he began to long for a Jewish homeland, which helped him to persevere, even amidst much depravation and discrimination.

Toward the end of World War II, Yoran and his brother joined the Soviet-controlled Polish Army as it made its way into the German homeland. In the immediate aftermath of the war, Yoran made his way to British-controlled Palestine and there helped facilitate Jewish immigration, despite Britain's refusal to allow Jews entry. He eventually became a legal resident of Palestine and adopted the name Shalom Yoran. After the founding of Israel in 1948, he joined the Israeli Air Force and later became an executive for an Israeli aircraft maker. In the late 1970s he moved to the United States, where he remained in the aircraft industry.

When he moved from Israel, he discovered a pile of notebooks and diaries he had kept during and after the war, which became the basis for his 1996 memoir, Defiant: A True Story of Escape, Survival, and Resistance. Yoran was a co-founder of the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York City and spoke widely about his wartime experiences after publishing his book. After a period of declining health, he died in New York on September 9, 2013.

Yugoslavia

A European country in the western Balkans, Yugoslavia was the creation of World War I. It was one of the most diverse and complex of European countries, given that it was a union of multiple countries and provinces, many of which had been at odds—if not at war—with each other, sometimes with histories of conflict going back centuries. The Axis occupation during World War II, and the treatment of Yugoslavia's Jews, was no less complex.

During the interwar years, "Yugoslavia" ("Land of the South Slavs") was a union of various countries and regions, including Serbia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Macedonia, Montenegro, and the provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo. It was also a monarchy—the Kingdom of Yugoslavia—with King Alexander of Serbia as its monarch. It had a total population before the outbreak of World War II of approximately 15.5 million people, 43% of whom were Serbs, 37% Croats, and 7% each Slovenians and Macedonians. Of the approximately 80,000 Jews in Yugoslavia, 40,000 were in Croatia, 16,000 in each of Serbia and the Bačka region of Vojvodina, and 8,000 in Macedonia. Most Jews belonged to the middle class and could be found in industry, commerce, artisan activities, and banking.

Three major religions layered a religious division over the nationalism that already separated the countries. Sitting as it does on the dividing line between Roman Catholicism and Orthodox Christianity, it is no surprise that the westernmost areas in Yugoslavia—Slovenia and Croatia—were predominantly Roman Catholic, while the easternmost country—that is, that which is geographically closest to Istanbul—namely, Serbia, was predominantly Orthodox Christian. With the defeat of Serbia by the Ottoman Empire in 1389, Islam was introduced into the region, explaining why, for example, Bosnia's population includes a plurality of Muslims, and why Kosovo's population is overwhelmingly Muslim.

The Axis invasion and occupation of Yugoslavia in World War II was consistent with the variegated nature of the country. Almost immediately after neutral Yugoslavia finally agreed to join the Axis powers and signed the Tripartite Pact on March 25, 1941, the highly unpopular decision triggered an overthrow of the regent, Prince Paul (brother of Alexander who was assassinated in 1934), who was replaced by Peter, Alexander's son. Hitler, upon hearing of the change in the monarchy and the rejection of the Tripartite Pact, made the decision to invade Yugoslavia.

On April 6, 1941, Germany and its allies, Italy, Hungary, and Bulgaria, invaded Yugoslavia, and within 10 days Yugoslavia surrendered. Occupation of the country was split among the Axis powers: Serbia and the region of Banat in Vojvodina were occupied by Germany; Montenegro, southwest Slovenia, most of the Adriatic coast, and Kosovo were controlled by Italy; Croatia, which annexed Bosnia-Herzegovina, was renamed the Independent State of Croatia, controlled by Germany and governed by the fascist, nationalist Ustashe movement, a puppet government of the Nazis; the Bačka and Baranja regions of Vojvodina were occupied by Hungary; and Macedonia was occupied by Bulgaria. To some degree, how the Jews fared depended on the part of Yugoslavia in which they lived.

Serbia was governed by a Nazi puppet government headed by its prime minister, Milan Nedić. One of the first acts under the German occupation was the requirement that all Jews register with the government, followed shortly by a number of other anti-Jewish laws and restrictions, including removal of Jews from public service, the requirement of wearing a yellow badge, and assignment to forced labor units. Several detention and concentration camps were established, including Topovske Šupe, and later, Semlin (Zemun, or Sajmište). As a result of partisan and Chetnik (pro-monarchists) resistance, Hitler ordered that 100 Jews be killed for each German killed. This proved to be disastrous for the Jews, resulting in the murder of about 8,000 Jewish males. With some 6,300 women and children killed by the use of a gas van over a three-month period in early 1942, almost all of the Jews of Serbia had been murdered.

The Jews in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina suffered greatly under the so-called Independent State of Croatia (Nezavisna Država Hrvatska, or NDH). Headed by Ante Pavelić, the Ustashe government was said to have stunned even the Nazis by its cruelty. It was responsible for the murder of perhaps as many as 340,000 Serbs in 1941 and 1942, and their treatment of the Jews was no less lethal.

The Ustashe government established camps throughout the occupied territory, including Jadovno (an extermination camp established in April 1941) and the infamous Jasenovac (actually a complex of five camps), in which as many as 20,000 Jews were killed. In addition, about 7,000 Jews were turned over to the Germans and sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

The Italian occupation zone of Croatia—along the Adriatic coast—was a much different environment for the Jews. Italy refused to transport the Jews to German camps, and instead sent some to the island of Rab (from which they were liberated) off the Adriatic coast, and others to refugee camps in southern Italy.

The prewar Jewish population of 14,000 in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which had been incorporated into Croatia, found itself in the hands of the Germans. Among other actions, 3,000 Jews were sent by the German occupiers to Jasenovac in the middle of November 1941, with a total of about 9,000 Jews sent there by the end of August 1942. Some 6,000 to 7,000 children were killed there.

In January 1942 the Hungarian occupiers of the Bačka and Baranja regions of Vojvodina shot 600 Jews in the city of Nova Sad. After Germany invaded Hungary in March 1944, 16,000 Jews from the Bačka and Baranja regions were transported to the custody of the Germans who sent them to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

More than 7,000 Jews in Hungarian-occupied Macedonia were sent to a transit camp in Skopje in March 1943, and from there to the extermination camp of Treblinka.

These were only some of the actions taken against the Jews in Yugoslavia during the Holocaust. In total, more than 66,000 Yugoslavian Jews were killed between 1941 and 1945. About 4,500 Jews were active in the partisan resistance movement.

Jews were not the only people to suffer in Yugoslavia during World War II. As many as 25,000 Roma were killed in Croatia alone, while it is estimated that throughout Yugoslavia as many as 90,000 Roma were killed in total. When combined with the approximately 66,000 Jews and over 300,000 Serbs (killed at the hands of the Croats), it is clear that Yugoslavia was the site of widespread mass murder.

Z

Żabiński, Jan

Dr. Jan Żabiński was a Polish Christian zookeeper who, with his wife Antonina Żabiński, née Erdman, protected hundreds of Jews by hiding them in the zoo precincts during World War II.

Born on April 8, 1897, in Warsaw, Żabiński grew up in Jewish neighborhoods and attended Jewish schools, even though he was not Jewish. A Catholic whose father raised him as a staunch atheist in a working-class Jewish neighborhood, at university he studied agriculture and zoology. In 1931 he married Antonina Erdman, who had been born in St. Petersburg in 1908 and whose parents had been killed during the Russian Revolution. By the time war began with the Nazi invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Żabiński was director of the Warsaw Zoo and a teacher of geography in the private Kreczmara high school. He was a well-known author of many popular books about animals and biology.

When war came, the zoo suffered heavy bombardment. Many of the animal cages were blown open, and animals roamed around the city until they had to be shot by Polish troops. Upon their arrival in the city, the Germans appointed Żabiński superintendent of Warsaw's public parks, providing him with an opportunity to visit the Warsaw Ghetto under the pretext of inspecting the trees and small public garden inside. This provided a further chance to keep in touch with Jews he had known from before the war, whom he provided with a means of escape. He extended this help to others—those with whom he shared professional connections, as well as strangers who needed his help.

In trying to find some sort of accommodation for those he was rescuing, Żabiński and Antonina considered the one clear option available to them: to employ the zoo cages that had been left empty of animals as a result of the Nazi occupation. These, Żabiński realized, would make excellent hiding places. In ensuing months and years, these cages became temporary shelter for hundreds of Jews until more permanent places of refuge could be found. And, along the way, the Żabińskis found an unknowing ally to assist them from among the Germans.

A Nazi named Lutz Heck, who was a zoologist, animal researcher, and director of the Berlin Zoo, brought Nazi ideology into animal breeding through the development of a program that would attempt to revivify extinct “German” species such as the aurochs (Bos primigenius) and the tarpan horse (Equus ferus ferus). He would use the disused Warsaw Zoo as his laboratory, and thus, with his authority, the zoo remained open. Heck was far from being an altruist; he was known to be cruel toward some of the animals, and he certainly had no specific love for the Warsaw Zoo, stealing the most valuable animals and taking them to German zoos. Still, by enabling the zoo to remain open, Heck gave Żabiński (whose code name in the Polish resistance was Francis, for Francis of Assisi, patron saint of animals) a place where he could engage in his rescue work, right under the noses of the very people who were seeking the Jews' death.

Jan Żabiński and his wife Antonina were a Christian couple from Warsaw. A zoologist by profession, Żabiński was the Director of the Warsaw Zoo before World War II, doubling as superintendent of the city's public parks during the war years. Along with their son Ryszard, the Żabińskis sheltered hundreds of displaced Jews in the grounds of the zoo once it ceased operations on account of the war. They were later recognized by Jerusalem's Yad Vashem for their heroic acts in saving the lives of Jews during the Holocaust. This photo shows a commemoration of the Żabińskis in Warsaw from 2015. (AP Photo/Czarek Sokolowski)

The Żabińskis also took Jews into their own home located at the zoo. Antonina and their son, Ryszard, took care of the Jews' personal needs, providing warm clothing and food, while Jan Żabiński sought documents that could protect them outside. The underground organization known as Zegota—a code name for the Polish Council to Aid Jews (Rada Pomocy Żydom)—provided funds to assist Żabiński in caring for those he had rescued. At the same time as he was hiding Jews, Jan Żabiński became a leader and active member of the Polish underground Home Army (Armia Krajowa). He taught biology at an underground university and continued smuggling food into the Warsaw Ghetto even as he was trying to save lives in the zoo. In addition, he conducted active military work as a bomb maker, and went on missions sabotaging trains. He eventually fought in the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, was wounded, taken as a prisoner of war, and removed to Germany.

Throughout the war, Antonina Żabiński kept a diary; after the ghetto was liquidated in 1943, she went into hiding and continued to work on it, recording events for posterity. As the fighting in and around Warsaw intensified during the Warsaw Uprising of 1944, she gave one of her notebooks to her husband. He buried it in the zoo grounds, where it was retrieved in April 1945 by author Rachel Auerbach, who later arranged for it to be published.

In the course of the Nazi occupation, Jan and Antonina Żabiński helped to save the lives of approximately 300 Jewish men, women, and children. In recognition of this feat, on September 21, 1965, Yad Vashem recognized them as Righteous among the Nations, and the following month they were present for the conferring ceremony and planted a tree on the Mount of Remembrance in Jerusalem.

When asked several years later about his motivation for helping so many people, at such risk to himself and his family, Jan Żabiński replied that his actions were based on the “progressive-humanistic upbringing” he received at home and at school. He said that he was never able to find any logical reasons for why people hated Jews, only “artificially formed ones.” For her part, Antonina, whose parents had been murdered by the Bolsheviks, was aware of where politically motivated violence could lead. She believed that every living thing is entitled to life and respect, making her incapable of turning away from suffering.

Antonina died on March 19, 1971, in Warsaw; Jan died on July 26, 1974, also in Warsaw. In 2007 an American writer, Diane Ackerman, celebrated the life of Antonina Żabiński with a bestselling book titled The Zookeeper's Wife. It was based in part on Antonina's wartime diary.

Zegota

The term “Zegota” was a code name for the Polish Council to Aid Jews. The council operated from late fall 1942 until the liberation of Poland in 1945. In Polish the name of the organization was Rada Pomocy Żydom, though unlike many such organizations during World War II it did not go by an acronym.

The council originated as the Provisional Committee for Aid to Jews (Tymczasowy Komitet Pomocy Żydom), which was founded on September 27, 1942, by writer Zofia Kossak-Szczucka and a member of Poland's social elite, Wanda Krahelska-Filipowicz, known by her nom de guerre, “Alinka.” This was a largely Catholic group, which was transformed into Zegota on December 4, 1942. Zegota became a broad-based joint organization of Jews and non-Jews from different political orientations. Zegota was the brainchild of Henryk Woliński, a member of the Home Army, who first developed the idea of such an organization; its general secretary was a member of Poland's Socialist Party, and its treasurer was a member of the Polish Democratic Party. Its fundamental aim was the common cause of saving Jews in danger from the Nazis, and in this Poland was the only country in Nazi-occupied Europe where such an organization, run jointly by Jews and non-Jews from a wide range of political movements, existed.

After a circuitous route, by the late spring of 1944 much of the funding it received was coming from the Polish government-in-exile in London. The financial resources needed to save even one Jewish life ranged from 6,000 to 15,000 zlotys. Depending on the situation, Zegota's monthly budget ranged from 500,000 to 2 million zlotys, which, though seemingly large, did not meet the needs of saving many Jewish lives. As a result, and wherever possible, Zegota operatives sought to prop up their resources in alternate ways.

Overall, Zegota helped save some 4,000 Polish Jews. Its means were many, but it was found to be much easier to assist Jews if they were outside ghettos and on the “Aryan” side. Medical attention was provided for Jews in hiding, along with food and false identity documents. Zegota attempted (and often succeeded) in providing help for Jews in forced labor camps, while financial aid was provided when possible. Sometimes, it was able to assist in escapes, though these often could not be planned; it was more usual to take advantage of local circumstances as and when they presented themselves. One of Zegota's major tasks related to the forging of documents, such that on average Zegota was said to have been producing up to a hundred sets of forged papers.

Zegota also played an important role in saving Jewish children by placing them with foster families, or relocating them to orphanages and convents. In Warsaw the head of Zegota's children's section, a Polish social worker named Irena Sendler, assumed near-legendary status through personally taking care of over 2,500 Jewish children. Sendler, who was one of many members of Zegota recognized by Israel's Yad Vashem as Righteous among the Nations, was nominated for a Nobel Prize before her death in 2008.

By the time the council was established, most of Poland's Jews had been killed, but the organization's activists, at enormous personal risk, managed to help several thousand Jews. Indeed, it has been estimated that about half of the Jews who survived the Holocaust in Poland—a figure representing more than 50,000 people—were helped by Zegota in one way or another.

To as great an extent as possible, Zegota operated as a professional organization. Although extensive in its spread, it worked on the basis of smaller cells, with up to 100 of these in Warsaw alone. Elsewhere, it operated in Krakow, Vilna (Vilnius), and Lvov (L'viv), with specific “departments” covering areas such as legal, housing, clothing, children's welfare, medical care, and finances, among others.

Poland, the only Nazi-occupied country where helping Jews was punishable by death, was also the only country that saw the establishment of an organization such as Zegota. It has been estimated that during the war perhaps up to 20,000 members of Zegota were captured and executed by the Germans, with thousands of others imprisoned and sent to concentration camps. It was remarkable that the location of Zegota's head office in Warsaw, at 24 Zurawia Street, was well known to Poles but was never raided by the Germans. Zegota was a truly unique phenomenon within the horror of the Holocaust, which bought the lives of tens of thousands of Jews at the cost of tens of thousands of Poles. In an environment in which the history of Polish relations with Jews has frequently been soured by expressions of antisemitism, this stands as a shining example of what could have been done throughout the rest of Europe if more people of goodwill decided that it was necessary to make a stand.

Zimetbaum, Mala

Mala Zimetbaum was a Jewish woman from Belgium best remembered as the first female prisoner to escape from the Auschwitz extermination camp. She was born on January 26, 1918, in Brzesko, Poland, the fifth daughter in a large family. In 1928 they all emigrated from Poland and settled in Antwerp, Belgium. Mala, an excellent student, became proficient in several languages (Flemish, French, German, English, and Polish) but was forced to leave school because of the family's difficult economic circumstances. She went to work, first as a seamstress for a major fashion house and then in one of Antwerp's many diamond factories.

On or about July 22, 1942, Mala was arrested for the first time by the SS. She was released but arrested a second time during a roundup on September 11–12, 1942. She was sent to the transit camp at Mechelen/Malines, and then, on September 15, to Auschwitz. She reached what would be her final destination two days later. After arrival, and having survived the preliminary selection process, she was sent to the women's camp at Birkenau, with the registration number 19880.

Owing to her proficiency in languages, Mala was chosen to serve as a "runner," or courier, and a translator for the SS.

This position came with privileges; she could move relatively freely between different parts of the camp and could speak up on behalf of her fellow inmates. She was also able to smuggle tiny items between compounds.

Mala's attitude toward her privileged position was that she had been given a gift with which she could help those around her and thereby save lives. It also provided her with an opportunity to make connections with the camp resistance movement.

Her tasks included working in the camp hospital, where she could warn of forthcoming selections among those patients too weak to continue working, or who seemed less likely to recover quickly. She tried to ensure that they would leave the hospital as soon as possible if she knew that a selection was imminent. She also had responsibility for assigning to new work details those who had been sick once they had been released from the hospital. This gave her some measure of discretion in allocating less demanding work to those women who were physically less able to handle harder forms of labor.

Among the prisoners Mala met was a Pole, Edward (Edek) Galiński. Edek was brought to Auschwitz as an early Polish political prisoner, having arrived on June 14, 1940. Determined to escape, he had made attempts before he met Mala, though nothing had materialized. After he met her, however, things changed. The two fell in love, and Mala said she was prepared to escape with him—her motive being to let the world know about Auschwitz in order for the killing to stop.

On Saturday, June 24, 1944, they made their escape. Edek wore an SS uniform and carried a gun obtained from Edward Lubusch, a member of the SS guard detachment known to assist prisoners. Disguised as a guard, Edek led Mala, a prisoner being led to work, out of the camp by showing a bogus SS pass. They succeeded in escaping to a nearby town, but on July 6, 1944, they were captured by a German patrol. Returned to Auschwitz, they were sent to Block 11, the punishment block, where they underwent a long period of interrogation and torture. The Gestapo was particularly interested in learning who their conspirators were in the escape and, in particular, who provided them with the SS uniform. They remained true to their promise to Lubusch and did not break under the torture.

On September 15, 1944, Mala and Edek were executed. Orders were received at Birkenau that the executions were to take place at the same time, though in the men's and women's camp respectively.

As he was hanged, Edek shouted defiantly, "Long Live Poland." Mala's death has become shrouded in legend. According to one version, she was brought forward toward the gallows by SS Unterscharführer Johan Ruiters, and as her sentence was read out by SS officer Maria Mandl she took a razor blade she had hidden in her hair and slit her wrists. At the same time, as blood poured from the wounds, she slapped Ruiters, who attempted to stop her. This resulted in the other SS officers present closing in on her and beating her as they attempted to take the razor blade away.

It is here that reality becomes mixed with fable. With the blood draining away her life, some accounts assert that she shouted at Ruiters, saying that she was dying a hero while he would die a dog. Others assert that she shouted at the prisoners assembled to witness her execution that they should revolt. Another claimed that she told the prisoners they would soon be liberated. Even the precise circumstances of her death are uncertain. Some say she was taken to the camp hospital and died on the way to the crematorium. One account has it that an SS officer had said an order arrived from Berlin that Mala was to be burned alive in the crematorium. Other accounts hold that she was poisoned or shot to death at the crematorium entrance, while yet others say that she actually was thrown into the furnace alive.

Notwithstanding the differences between the various versions of Mala's death, it is clear that this was a remarkable young woman. Her courage in the face of the Nazi terror, her willingness to put herself at risk in order to ease the lives of those around her (and even to save those lives), her attempt to escape in order to tell the world the truth about Auschwitz, even the love she managed to find in the midst of the horror, all these point to a woman who refused to allow the Nazi evil to prevail. Her resistance was truly inspirational to all those around her and remains so today, making Mala Zimetbaum a genuine heroine of the Holocaust.

Zuckerman, Yitzhak

Yitzhak Zuckerman, also known as Antek, was a key leader of the Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa (Jewish Fighting Organization, or ŻOB) in the Warsaw Ghetto, and one of the few survivors of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of April–May 1943.

Born in Vilna in 1915, he attended a Hebrew high school before moving to Warsaw in 1938 to work for the Dror Hechalutz Zionist youth movement. As a young man he embraced socialism as well as Zionism.

Soon after Germany invaded Poland in September 1939, Zuckerman fled to Soviet-occupied eastern Poland, where he organized Zionist youth groups. In April 1940 he returned to Warsaw to try to stimulate resistance to the Nazis. It was at this time that he met another underground leader, Zivia Lubetkin, and the two fell in love.

When the Germans launched mass deportations from Warsaw during the summer of 1942, Zuckerman was among the first calling for armed resistance. This would prove to be difficult to achieve, largely on account of opposition from members of the Warsaw Jewish Council (Judenrat), in particular its chairman, Adam Czerniaków.

On July 22, 1942, the Nazis began what they termed Grossaktion Warschau (Great Action Warsaw), an operation dedicated to the mass extermination of Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto. After Czerniaków's suicide on July 23, 1942, events developed at a rapid pace.

A meeting was called involving several leading members of the organized Jewish community, including Yitzhak Zuckerman, David Guzik, and Emanuel Ringelblum, among many others. Opinions were divided. Representatives of the left wing Zionist parties and Hechalutz called for some form of active intervention; others preferred to wait and see what would happen next. Not willing to wait and simply postpone the inevitable, on July 28, 1942, Hechalutz and its youth movement branches, Hashomer Hatzair, Dror, and Akiva, held a meeting in which it was decided to go ahead and establish a Jewish Fighting Organization (Żydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ŻOB). A command group was formed comprising Shmuel Bresler, Zuckerman, Zivia Lubetkin, Mordecai Tenenbaum, and Josef Kaplan. A delegation was sent to make contact with the Polish underground and obtain weapons on the Aryan side of Warsaw. This included Tova (Tosia) Altman, Frumke Plotnicka, Leah Perlstein and Izrael Chaim (known as "Arie" and "Jurek") Wilner. In November 1942 Mordecai Anielewicz was elected commander-in-chief. Zuckerman became one of his three co-commanders and also helped lead a political affiliate founded at the same time, the Jewish National Committee (Żydowski Komitet Narodowy).

On December 22, 1942, Zuckerman, Miriam (Gole) Mire, and Adolf Liebeskind were sent by the ŻOB to Kraków to meet with resistance fighters there. While in the city, they took part in an attack on a café that was frequented by the SS and the Gestapo. Liebeskind was killed. There is debate regarding Gole's fate. Some say she was killed soon afterward; others assert she played a part in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in the spring of 1943. Zuckerman, although shot in the leg, managed to escape and return to Warsaw.

Back in Warsaw, Zuckerman became the unofficial armorer of the ŻOB. He negotiated through contacts he had made with external resistance groups, attempting to procure rifles, pistols, ammunition, and grenades. These were smuggled into the ghetto via the Warsaw sewers, and his ongoing negotiations meant that he had a good idea of how he might navigate the labyrinth in the future.

When the Nazis initiated another round of deportations in January 1943, it was Zuckerman who led the ŻOB in fighting back against the Germans. This, however, was but a prelude of things to come.

In view of the fact that he spent a lot of his time outside of the ghetto, when the uprising began on April 19, 1943, he found himself on the wrong side of the wall. The ŻOB had been preparing for a revolt should the time arrive for no other alternative and all hope would be lost. From his position, Zuckerman did all he could to spread the word of the revolt and what the Jews in the ghetto were facing, and smuggled in any additional weapons he was able to obtain. By now, however, many suppliers had decided to curtail arms transfers for the Jews.

With the defeat of the uprising and the death of the other main leaders on or around May 8, 1943, Zuckerman returned to the ghetto as the sole surviving commander. He led some 75 ŻOB fighters (including Zivia Lubetkin), together with some of the few survivors of the Żydowski Związek Wojskowy (Jewish Military Union, or ŻZW) through the sewers and onto the Aryan side. While there, he wrote an important report on the ŻOB's role during the uprising, which he managed to send to London. He also maintained his military command role, leading a group of Jewish guerrillas in the Polish underground during the Warsaw Revolt that began on August 1, 1944.

After the war, Yitzhak Zuckerman and Zivia Lubetkin became involved in the Bricha movement, an underground network that helped survivors reach the Mediterranean coast on their way to Palestine. In 1947 he and Zivia Lubetkin married and settled in Israel, and in 1949, along with others who had been ghetto resisters and partisans in Poland and Lithuania, they founded Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot ("Ghetto Fighters' Kibbutz"); here, a memorial museum, House, was established. In 1961 the Zuckermans were prosecution witnesses at the trial of Adolf Eichmann.

When Yitzhak Zuckerman died in Israel on June 17, 1981, he was buried at Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot, recognized by all as a hero of the Jewish people. Among the many mourners present to pay their respects on the day was Israeli president Yitzhak Navon.

Zuehlke Trial

From 1941 to 1944 Willy Zuehlke, a member of the Waffen-SS, served as a guard for two Nazi prisons located in Amsterdam that were run by the German Security Police (SD, or Sicherheitsdienst) and the Gestapo. These prisons held political prisoners, such as Dutch resisters, and Jewish "punishment cases"—that is, Jews who had gone into hiding and were either betrayed or discovered—before their deportation to German labor and concentration camps. Yet, despite his prominent position of authority in the capital city of the occupied Netherlands, Zuehlke's 1948 trial before the Netherlands Special Court in Amsterdam, and his subsequent appeal before the Netherlands Special Court of Cassation, is not especially well known.

Between the years 1943 and 1947, the government of the Netherlands established five Special Courts located around the country and devoted solely to trying wartime crimes. A special Court of Cassation, located in The Hague, was to serve as an appeals court for these dedicated Special Courts. In the summer of 1948, Zuehlke stood trial before Amsterdam's Special Court, accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during his tenure at two prisons. He was charged with two counts, the first concerning the Jewish prisoners in his custody and the second concerning prisoners in general. For the first count, Zuehlke was accused of having "cooperated in the German policy of humiliation and persecution of the Jews" by assisting in the imprisonment of illegally detained Jews. Further, he had allegedly struck, kicked, and forced his Jewish prisoners to engage in humiliating work. The second count alleged Zuehlke's "cooperation in the maintenance of a policy of terrorism and brutality against defenseless arrestees." Here, Zuehlke was charged with the same physical abuse of prisoners as specified in the first count, as well as denying a condemned prisoner “spiritual aid” in the form of a priest. Additionally, Zuehlke was charged both as perpetrator—since he committed these offenses in his capacity as prison warden—and superior, since he commanded the prison guards who committed similar offenses. In his defense, Zuehlke cited his membership in the Waffen-SS as evidence that he had acted under duress and in accordance with superior orders.

The judgment of the Special Court in Amsterdam was rendered on August 3, 1948, and Zuehlke was found guilty on both counts. His offenses were pronounced to be “war crimes and/or crimes against humanity” in accordance with both Articles 6 (b) and (c) of the Nuremberg Charter (London Agreement) and Dutch municipal law concerning illegal detention and “the crime of ill-treatment.” He was, however, acquitted of the charge that he had denied spiritual assistance to condemned prisoners. The court declared that this behavior did not necessarily constitute a war crime. Further, there was no proof that Zuehlke had been authorized to forward such requests from prisoners or that such requests, even if forwarded, would have been successful. The Special Court sentenced Zuehlke to seven years’ imprisonment, taking account of the fact that the accused had not initiated the arrests of prisoners and that his ill-treatment of prisoners had not been of a rather serious nature. Further, the court maintained that Zuehlke had acted not out of a desire to attack his victims but “rather on account of his rough nature.”

Both Zuehlke and the prosecutor appealed this verdict before the Special Court of Cassation in The Hague, with Zuehlke maintaining that the punishment was too severe and the prosecutor arguing that it was too lenient. In December 1948 this appeals court upheld the initial verdict, in essence confirming that the “superior orders” defense did not absolve Zuehlke of criminal responsibility. However, in evaluating mitigating circumstances and the offenses committed, the Court of Cassation reduced his sentence to that of five years’ imprisonment. Furthermore, while the appeals court agreed with the first court’s conclusion that Zuehlke had not been personally responsible for forwarding the requests of condemned prisoners for spiritual assistance, it declared that the denial of spiritual assistance did constitute a punishable offense as both a war crime and a crime against humanity. This judgment perhaps remains the most durable legacy of the Willy Zuehlke case, an otherwise overlooked trial of a wartime prison guard. It is cited, for example, in recognition that the “invasion of the religious rights of occupied territories” constitutes an offense under international criminal law.

Zygielbojm, Shmuel

Shmuel Zygielbojm was a Jewish-Polish socialist politician who committed suicide in London in the aftermath of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising during the spring of 1943. His suicide was in protest of the inaction of the Allied governments to do anything meaningful to assist the Jews during the Holocaust, and was a powerful symbol of resistance in the face of inaction.

Zygielbojm was born to a poor family on February 21, 1895, in the Polish village of Borowica. He was one of 10 children. At the beginning of World War I, he and his family moved to the city of Chełm, and during the war years he became involved in the Jewish labor movement. Joining the Labor Bund, he rose quickly through the leadership, and in 1924 he was elected to the Bund’s Central Committee in Warsaw. By 1936, after a number of years as editor of the Jewish labor movement’s journal Arbeiter Fragen (Worker’s Issues), he was sent to Łódź on behalf of the movement to organize Jewish workers there.

With the Nazi invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, Zygielbojm returned to Warsaw, where he became a member of the defense committee that functioned during the siege and defense of the capital. He also served at this time as editor of the Folkszeitung (People’s Newspaper).

Once the city had been conquered and occupied, the Nazis demanded a dozen hostages from the Polish population who would be held responsible for the maintenance of order in the city. The mayor of Warsaw, Stefan Starzynski, advised the Jewish community that it offer up a worker to be one of the hostages, and named a woman, one Ester Ivinska. Zygielbojm, horrified at the idea of a civilian woman being so endangered, suggested himself instead. He thus became one of two Jewish hostages, along with prominent industrialist, social worker, and philanthropist Abraham Gepner. Upon his release, Zygielbojm was called upon to represent the Bund in the newly established (and Nazi-imposed) Warsaw Judenrat (Jewish Council).

At the same time, he began to organize an underground movement. Despite being a member of the Judenrat, Zygielbojm resisted the very idea of the ghetto, and called on Jews to remain in their homes and not move into the ghetto until they were forced to.

This level of opposition was brought to the attention of the Germans, who summoned him for interrogation. Instead, he went into hiding. His involvement in the formal resistance movement did not, therefore, last long; his fellow party members, recognizing his value as an organizer and publicist and concerned for his welfare, thought it better that he leave Poland. In December 1939, therefore, he was spirited out of the country and moved to still-neutral Belgium. Speaking to a Socialist International meeting in Brussels, he described his observations of the persecution of the Jews—one of the earliest accounts during the war of the Nazi brutalities to reach the West. After the Nazi invasion of Belgium in May 1940, he moved to France; later still, he went to the United States. In both countries he worked to raise awareness of what was happening to the Jews of Poland. In March 1942 he went to London, where he joined the National Council of the Polish government-in-exile.

In May 1942 Zygielbojm received a report from the Bund that had been smuggled out from Warsaw. It was one of the first statements providing detailed information of the carnage. Even by this stage, the report calculated a figure of 700,000 murdered Jews, as well as providing the names and locations of killing sites and extermination camps.

Then, on December 2, 1942, Zygielbojm met with Jan Karski, who had been covertly brought into the Warsaw Ghetto to report on what was taking place there. Upon speaking with Karski, Zygielbojm was at once unnerved and more determined than ever to bring this news to the attention of Allied governments so that some sort of concrete action would follow.

Worse was to come. From April 19, 1943, onward, an uprising of the remaining Jews took place in the Warsaw Ghetto, leading to its destruction and the annihilation of its last inhabitants. News of the uprising was quick to reach London, and compounding Zygielbojm's despair was information he received that his wife Manya and 16-year-old son Tuvia had been killed by the Nazis.

On May 12, 1943, in a final act of protest at the seeming Allied indifference to the fate of the Jews, Zygielbojm committed suicide in London. He left two letters: one for the Polish president, Władysław Raczkiewicz, and one for Prime Minister Władysław Sikorski. His message was straightforward: the Nazis were the ones doing the killing, but it was the Allies who had brought the Jews to their status of worthlessness. "The responsibility for the crime of the murder of the whole Jewish nationality in Poland," he wrote, rested indirectly "upon the whole of humanity, on the peoples of the Allied nations and on their governments, who up to this day have not taken any real steps to halt this crime." Chillingly, he then placed his own death alongside those of the heroes in the Warsaw Ghetto: "I cannot continue to live and to be silent while the remnants of Polish Jewry, whose representative I am, are being murdered. My comrades in the Warsaw ghetto fell with arms in their hands in the last heroic battle. I was not permitted to fall like them, together with them, but I belong with them, to their mass grave." He concluded: "By my death, I wish to give expression to my most profound protest against the inaction in which the world watches and permits the destruction of the Jewish people."

In what was his final act of resistance and in symbolic unity with those murdered in the Holocaust, Zygielbojm's body was then cremated, in accord with his own expressed wishes.

Zyklon-B

Zyklon-B was a commercial form of hydrocyanic acid, manufactured by the German firm Degesch for use as a disinfectant and pesticide. It was used for the purpose of killing Jews in death camps during the Holocaust.

The death camps were institutions designed to methodically and efficiently murder millions of Jews in specially designed gas chambers employing crystallized hydrogen cyanide, which on contact with air oxidized to become hydrocyanic (or prussic) acid gas. This gas was manufactured under the trade name Zyklon-B. Initially, Zyklon-B had been developed as a delousing or fumigating agent for Zyklon-B was the trade name of a cyanide-based pesticide invented in Germany in the early 1920s. It was comprised of hydrocyanic, or prussic, acid. It had been developed by the Degesch chemical company and was purchased by another firm, Degussa, where further development enabled its production for industrial purposes. The new product was also named Zyklon (“Cyclone”), and it was employed for the purposes of delousing clothing and as a disinfectant for public transport. In early 1942 Zyklon-B became a key gassing agent utilized by Nazi Germany in camps such as Auschwitz during the Holocaust. Pictured are canisters containing Zyklon-B pellets. the eradication of vermin, and it was brought to Auschwitz for those purposes in 1941. Where Zyklon-B was not available, or the death machinery had not been equipped for its use, carbon monoxide from diesel engines was used, either in fixed installations or as mobile vans.

As an agent for mass death, Zyklon-B was introduced into the gas chambers through vents in the ceiling and entered the victims’ bodies through the mouth, respiratory organs, and pores of the skin. It killed most of its victims immediately.

By early 1942 Zyklon-B had emerged as the preferred killing tool of Nazi Germany for use in extermination camps. As a result of its use more than a million people were murdered.

The Zyklon-B consignments used at Auschwitz were produced by a firm called Degesch (Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingbekämpfung mbH), a firm headquartered in Frankfurt am Main. Its parent company was I.G. Farben, which, ironically, competed with other corporate companies to exploit concentration camp prisoners as slave labor, just as it was supplying Zyklon-B for the purpose of murdering them.

Zyklon-B Case, 1946

In the Trial of Bruno Tesch and Two Others (March 1–8, 1946), also known as the Zyklon-B Case, the British Military Court in Hamburg tried Tesch, Karl Weinbacher, and Joachim Drosihn of Tesch & Stabenow (Testa), for complicity in the murder by Zyklon-B gassing “of Allied nationals interned in concentration camps, well knowing that the said gas was to be so used.” The indictment charged that the defendants had supplied the Nazi SS with Zyklon-B (prussic acid gas), in full knowledge of its use against human beings. Arguing that private individuals who knowingly provide state institutions with the means to commit mass murder are themselves guilty of war crimes, the prosecution charged that the defendants had violated Article 46 of the Hague Regulations of 1907 by abetting the extermination of citizens in territory under military occupation. The court convicted Tesch and Weinbacher and sentenced them to death, but acquitted Drosihn. The British executed Tesch and Weinbacher on May 16, 1946.

Testa was one among several firms involved in Zyklon-B distribution. In the interwar years, Deutsche-Gold-und-Silber-scheideanstalt (Degussa, German Gold-and-Silver Separation Society), I.G. Farbenindustrie AG (I.G. Farben, Community of Interests, Dye Industry), and Thomas Goldschmidt AG formed a holding company for insecticides, Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingbekämpfung (Degesch, German Society for Pest Control). Degesch furnished gas-absorbent pellets, canisters, and other materials to manufacturers Dessauer Werke and Kali Werke. Heerdt-Lingler (Heli) monopolized sales in southern and western Germany. Founded as a partnership by Tesch and Paul Stabenow in 1923, Testa's territory north and east of the Elbe eventually included Auschwitz, where it sold 12 tons of the fumigant in 1943. Until June 1942 Degesch had a controlling interest in Testa, after which Tesch became sole owner. Except when training personnel in fumigation or the use of Degesch delousing chambers, Testa's employees did not directly handle the product.

Convened under the Royal Warrant of June 14, 1945, the British Military Court of Hamburg consisted of Brigadier R. B. L. Persse (president), Lieutenant Colonel Sir Geoffrey Palmer, Major S. M. Johnstone, and Captain H. S. Marshall (alternate). The Royal Warrant provided for admission of limited hearsay evidence, but confined jurisdiction to war crimes, not crimes against humanity, committed by Germany or Japan against Allied nationals after September 2, 1939. The Royal Warrant also provided for the accused to testify in their own defense, a right availed by each defendant in this case. The indictment excluded German gas victims and, as was then customary, subsumed the Jewish victims' identity under the rubric of Allied nationalities. The British Military Court asserted jurisdiction over the Tesch Case because Testa was headquartered in Hamburg and the charges involved multiple nationalities.

Hearsay testimony and circumstantial evidence played crucial roles in the conviction of Tesch and Weinbacher. Bookkeeper Eric Sehm described a company travel report from late 1942, which summarized Tesch's interview with German officers, allegedly from the Wehrmacht (German Army), not the SS. After mentioning the shooting of Jews on the Eastern Front, the officials solicited Tesch's advice concerning the use of Zyklon-B for the enhancement of killing efficiency. Tesch offered technical assistance on the spot. Sehm took notes about the report but later destroyed them, on the advice of Wilhelm Pook, another witness who partly endorsed his account. Two former stenographers, Erna Biagini and Anna Uenzelmann, confirmed their superior's knowledge of mass murder by Zyklon-B. The court also determined that Tesch had visited Sachsenhausen, Neuengamme, and Gross-Rosen concentration camps, but never Auschwitz. By emphasizing Tesch's meticulousness, his counselor inadvertently aided the case against his client, because the judge advocate subsequently cited that characteristic as proof that Tesch must have known how the SS used his product.

Unable to adduce direct evidence against Weinbacher, the prosecution stressed his position as prokurist, the deputy empowered to transact business in Tesch's absence. Denying that he had seen the damning travel reports, Weinbacher claimed that his heavy workload prevented his reading every document. For 200 days per year, however, Weinbacher directed the firm while Tesch traveled on business. The prosecution argued that Weinbacher was in a circumstantial position to know how the firm's customers used Zyklon-B.

As first gassing technician, Drosihn visited several concentration camps while servicing Degesch chambers. The prosecution was unable to prove that he knew of any illegitimate purposes for Zyklon-B before the end of the war, or that he was in a position to influence company policy.

Like the Nuremberg industrialist cases, the Zyklon-B case established the precedent that private persons could be held accountable for the commission of war crimes. The specific findings contrasted with the I.G. Farben Case, however, in which the defendants who had supervisory roles in Degesch were acquitted of complicity in genocide because the prosecution was unable to establish their direct knowledge of criminal activities.

Chronology

This chronology seeks to outline the essential contours of some of the specific developments in the history of Nazi Germany, the Holocaust, and World War II, while at the same time not simply replicating all of the events listed in the encyclopedia. It has thus been tailored toward the provision of some general dates that have been included in order to enhance historical context, while at the same time offering certain events and dates that might provide a lead-in for further investigation.

Given the fact that the Holocaust played such a huge role in the affairs of nations and peoples, not all events, people, or places could be listed owing to the fact that to do so would, in one sense, become too unwieldy. Not only would this defeat the purpose of providing an accessible chronology but it would also lead to many of the events of the Holocaust becoming buried in the minutiae of other events.

Glossary

This purpose of this glossary is to supplement and explain some of the essential terms found when studying the Holocaust. In that sense, it extends the range of themes not covered within the encyclopedia itself. All, however, relate to the general fields in which the Holocaust can be approached as a field of study, and they can be applied to genocide more broadly as well. As such, the terms here will help to provide a broader context to assist users of the encyclopedia. Of course, it is intended that the definitions here will be a starting point for readers and not the last word on any of the topics being examined.

Assimilation

The process whereby members of an ethnic group replace their cultural practices with those of the dominant culture in a society. When this conversion is imposed upon an entire group of people by the state, it is often referred to as “cultural genocide,” because while members of the group being assimilated might not be systematically killed, their culture is often effectively destroyed. Assimilation policies are often a common precursor to genocide because they can be used by the perpetrators in the initial stages as a way to delegitimize or dehumanize the victims by portraying them as “nonhumans” from a “regressive” culture in need of reintegration into society. This can also be used later as a way for the perpetrators to “justify” the use of increased brutality against their victims if assimilation is seen as being ineffective in achieving the desired goals.

Atrocities

Appalling acts that are extremely brutal or cruel in nature. Within the context of genocide, “atrocities” refer to acts of extreme violence or cruelty typically carried out against civilians, though atrocities can also be committed against military forces on either side. Examples of atrocities that tend to occur during genocide include murder, massacres, torture, rape, starvation, extreme deprivation, forced marches, enslavement, brutal violence, and systematic extermination.

Authoritarianism

At its most basic, an authoritarian regime is one that requires its citizens to submit to its authority, that is, the regime’s perceived right to rule in an autocratic or domineering manner. An authoritarian government is one in which political authority is usually concentrated in a small group or elite that possesses exclusive power over its population. Such power is for the most part antidemocratic, as authoritarianism does not allow for the popular will to predominate.

Bystanders

Those who are aware of the perpetration of crimes against humanity and genocide but do nothing to halt the crimes in question. In that regard, they are neither the perpetrators of genocide, collaborators with the perpetrators, nor the victims of genocide. Those who act as bystanders do so for a variety of reasons. Some, for example, might be hostile toward a victim population, though not sufficiently to involve themselves in the process of persecution; others might simply be apathetic as to what is happening to those without whom they have a direct interest; while yet others might fear for their lives or loved ones should there be repercussions for speaking out against the genocide or attempting to stop it.

Communism

An economic and social system developed by a number of writers during the 19th and 20th centuries, particularly Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov (Lenin), and with localized variations in most other countries. In theory, under communism, all means of production are owned collectively, rather than by individuals. In practice, a single authoritarian party controls both the political and economic systems. Communism as an ideology is diametrically opposed to the Western political and economic concepts of democracy and capitalism.

Crimes against humanity

A legal category within international law that identifies punishable offenses for gross violations of human rights, atrocities, and mass murder of noncombatant civilians. Such offenses are a relatively new category, largely the product of international human rights legislation enacted during the 20th century. Often, crimes against humanity are bracketed alongside war crimes, though they differ from these in that they are not, for the most part, violations of the laws of war; indeed, crimes against humanity need not occur in wartime at all. Acts that can be considered crimes against humanity include, but are not confined to, the following: murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, and persecutions on political, racial, and religious grounds. Other inhumane acts not listed there can also be included, rendering crimes against humanity an evolutionary category over which international (or, less likely, national) courts have some degree of discretion. The term is rendered in the plural, highlighting that this is a category embracing a number of crimes. There is no generally accepted definition of crimes against humanity, and, to date, no universal international legislation covering such crimes exists. Crimes against humanity and genocide are not interchangeable terms, with the latter usually considered to be a crime of greater magnitude.

Deportation

While this term customarily means the expulsion of a person or group of people from any state or country, in most usage it refers to the expulsion of foreigners. Sovereign states reserve the right to deport foreigners who have committed serious crimes, entered the country illegally, or otherwise lost their legal status to remain. In situations of genocide and ethnic cleansing, however, deportation is employed as a euphemism for forced removal to camps or other locations in which the object is slave labor or death. Deportation can also involve summarily removing populations in order to claim the land they have left behind.

Dictatorship

An autocratic form of absolute rule, in which a government is directed by an individual known as a dictator, or by a small clique. In a dictatorship, leaders run a country unrestrained by customary law or a preexisting constitution, which they can themselves draw up, once in power, to serve as the basis of their rule. A dictatorship is thus a form of government that has the power to govern without the consent of those being governed. Allowing the governed no opportunity to have a say in how they are ruled, dictatorship is therefore the diametric opposite of democracy.

- Discrimination The act of making a distinction between individuals and/or groups based on criteria other than qualifications or achievements, and then using such distinctions to prohibit such persons or individuals from realizing their maximum potential physically, intellectually, educationally, socially, economically, or spiritually. Racism and antisemitism are, perhaps, the two most well-known forms of discrimination, though discrimination can also be based on sex, sexual preference, age, physical size, and a plethora of other identifying characteristics. Education is considered to be a primary tool for successfully combating discrimination, but countering it is ultimately most successful when it is backed up by the force of law that prohibits such practices.
- Ethnicity A group that defines itself and/or is defined by others as being of a common descent and sharing a common culture. This could include characteristics having racial, religious, linguistic, and certain other traits in common. In recent times this can serve as a defining characteristic of one cultural group as a way of distinguishing it from others.
- Eugenics A term first used at the end of the 19th century, introduced as a way to explain the improvement of humanity through selective breeding and the elimination of hereditary factors that were seen to weaken the species. The idea was embraced enthusiastically by biologists, anthropologists, social scientists, and others in countries such as Germany, Britain, and the United States. The idea of eugenics became a critical element of Nazi thinking and was incorporated into the social ideologies of many other regimes in the early part of the 20th century.
- Expulsion The removal of a lawful resident from the territory of a state by government authorities. Under Article 32 of the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, national security and public order are the only grounds permitted for the expulsion of a refugee.
- The Convention states that the decision to expel an individual must be fair and just, and the individual must be allowed a “reasonable amount of time” to seek entry to another state. The expulsion of a population from a specified country or region can serve as both a genocide avoidance device or, depending on the circumstances, as an opportunity to engage in genocide. Some expulsions have been explained as being for the good of the affected population, while others have been motivated by a simple quest for land in which members of the existing population are considered superfluous and thus have to be removed. Expulsion, in short, can be based on a number of different premises.
- Fascism A radical authoritarian political movement and system of government based on an extreme form of nationalism, advocating a centralization of authority, rigorous socioeconomic controls, intolerance of opposition, aggressive chauvinism, and racist discourse. While there have been many variations of fascism since it was first developed by the Italian dictator Benito Mussolini, it is most commonly associated with the period of the 1920s to the 1940s, particularly in Europe.
- Genocide A term coined in 1944 by Raphael Lemkin in order to designate the destruction of a group at the hands of another. To form the new term, Lemkin combined the Greek genos (race, tribe), and the Latin suffix -cide (killing). On December 9, 1948, after lengthy debate and substantial compromise, the United Nations adopted the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, defining genocide as “any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.” The means whereby this can take place include: (a) killing members of the group; (b) causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group; (c) deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part; (d) imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group; and (e) forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

Mass graves

The fastest and most convenient means by which to dispose of a large number of bodies, mass graves can have mixed success as a means of concealing war crimes and genocide. Often, vegetation can grow over them quickly, making them difficult to detect, and the longer they are left the greater is the likelihood they may never be found. On the other hand, when sites are located, the evidence they contain can be used to bring perpetrators to justice. Mass graves can be the best source of evidence to determine the site of a massacre and whether or not genocide has actually taken place, though this is a highly skilled task requiring the professional expertise of forensic archaeologists and pathologists.

Mass killing

Both an unspecified number of deaths, and cumulative death by a series of large-scale killings. Defining mass killing can be difficult. Often, it is simply a substitute for the term “massacre.” It can apply to the eradication of a group of people, an entire village, or the inhabitants of a region. If mass killing is repeated often enough, the killing rate may, on some occasions, be deemed genocidal in scale. In some conflicts, mass killing is not necessarily genocide, but the danger always exists that under certain circumstances violence can escalate to such a degree that it might no longer be controllable. This often happens within the context of civil wars and ethnic conflicts. In the popular consciousness, mass killing is almost always viewed as the most obvious expression of genocide.

Massacre

A massacre is the intentional, indiscriminate, and merciless killing of a large number of people, in a situation of general slaughter, by members of a more powerful group or military force. Despite being indiscriminate in its choice of victim, a massacre can be highly planned in advance and methodical in its execution. Massacres are usually accompanied by cruelty and are viewed as both barbarous and contrary to what may be termed “civilized” behavior. The term massacre does not readily equate with genocide, as a massacre is a singular event. Massacres certainly take place within genocide, however, and are frequently the primary manner in which genocidal regimes murder the majority of their victims.

Militia

At its broadest, the term militia refers to a military force comprised of ordinary citizens organized in times of emergency to provide defense, emergency law enforcement, or paramilitary service. However, in its modern usage, a militia is a force that is usually comprised of a number of informal groups that have one main characteristic in common; namely, that they act as armed factions using violence to attain their goals and objectives. In many situations, militias are employed as de facto military forces, but more generally they are looked upon as illegitimate bodies of irregular soldiers that are not endowed with the same moral codes or degrees of military discipline as regular troops. The term militia can be applied to paramilitary groups, guerrilla fighters, revolutionary armies, insurgents, and private armies.

Minority

The status given to subgroups within a society who are different from the majority of other citizens in terms of racial, religious, cultural, ethnic, or linguistic identity. The extent to which a nation-state demonstrates its commitment to its minority populations is a useful index to assessing that state’s overall internal stability and peace. Democratic countries have an avowed commitment to taking care of their minority populations, and most entrench some form of safeguard as to their welfare within the national constitution. In nondemocratic states, however, minorities are frequently scapegoated, singled out, or otherwise

- excluded from the national project. The vulnerability to which this often leads renders minority populations subject to persecution and, worse, all too often to physical violence.
- Nationalism A term embracing the political idea that a group of people, united legally or by common cultural bonds, identify each other as belonging to a unitary nation with the right to self-determination. Nationalism recognizes that a group of people can have a strong identification with a polity that will be defined along national lines. The identity thus defined can embrace those who see themselves linked by common biology (as a race or ethnic group), or by social, cultural, or political bonds, in the form of a shared civic culture. Nationalism can be both inclusive and exclusive, and in some cases the identification of a nationalist culture is combined with a negative view of other races or cultures. When this takes place, violence in the name of ethnic homogeneity can manifest itself as the most lucid expression of nationalistic fervor.
- Peace A state or period of mutual concord between governments, or groups of states, during which there is an absence of war or other hostilities. A period of peace is therefore characterized by a lack of, or no, violent conflict between states or other polities. The term peace is also given to a pact, treaty, or agreement to end hostilities between warring or antagonistic states or polities that have been at war, with the promise that they will abstain from further fighting, aggression, or enmity.
- Persecution The act or practice of systematically mistreating an individual or group by another group. This implies physical actions (the infliction of suffering, harassment, isolation, imprisonment, fear, or pain) undertaken in a manner designed to injure, aggrieve, or afflict the affected group or individual. The most common forms of persecution are those stemming from differences in race, religion, ethnicity, nationality, political opinions, gender, sexual orientation, or beliefs, where these differ from those of the persecutor.
- Prejudice The act of making premature judgment over another human being, community, or group, based on factors irrelevant to merit or ability. Prejudicial behavior is based on an acceptance of common or stereotypical misunderstandings, coupled with a propensity to scapegoat those who are different as a way of explaining how the world operates. Prejudice is therefore unreasonable and unjust, and those who experience it cannot overcome it through their own actions. When coupled with governmental, economic, military, and/or social power, prejudice can escalate into violence, mass murder, massacres, and, sometimes, genocide.
- Propaganda The use of various means for the purpose of promoting or disseminating an ideological doctrine or agenda, usually at the expense of one group over another, and in a highly manipulative manner. Propaganda is usually organized and deliberate, and involves the use of books, newspapers, art, cultural events, theater, movies, radio, television, and electronic media. It has a diverse range of applications, from wartime to peacetime, from government to corporations, from religious to secular. Where genocide is concerned, what can be termed “hate propaganda” plays an important role in alienating a target population from those who would be (or are) its persecutors—in providing justifications to the general population as to why the persecution of the target population is necessary, in offering the means such persecution should employ, and in serving as a bolster for the government (or other authority) undertaking and directing the persecution. Propaganda thus acts to legitimize aggression and persecution. A propagandist’s key aim is to persuade others to share the propagandist’s view about the target group; as a result, simplified messages shorn of any possibility of debate or further discussion are the preferred device for convincing the greatest number of people as to the veracity of the propagandist's claims.

Racism

The prejudicial and pseudoscientific belief that biological characteristics (for instance, skin pigmentation, facial features, bone structures, hair texture, and the like) are the primary determinant of human abilities and capacities, and that the human species is unequally divided between superior and inferior racial groupings based upon these physical attributes. Commitment to such a view has long resulted in active forms of discrimination in the areas of politics, society, culture, economics, religion, and the military. Practical applications of racism can translate into law, socioeconomic exclusion, discrimination, violence, and even genocide of those groups labeled as inferior on the grounds of racial difference.

Refugee

A person who, owing to a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion, is outside the country of his or her nationality and is unable, or, owing to such fear, is unwilling, to avail himself or herself of the protection of that country. Seeking refuge elsewhere, a refugee is a person who is thus either fleeing from conflict or massive human rights violations, or has been expelled from his or her home in advance of such actions. Over time, the definition of refugee has expanded to include those who flee conflict and persecution by leaving their current place of residence to seek safety in another part of their own country.

Resettlement

The movement of refugees from the country in which they have sought refuge to another state that has agreed to allow them entry. While the term implies the transportation of any group of people (whether as a family or colony) to a new settlement, common usage refers to the process of moving people to a different place to live on account of them no longer being permitted to stay in the place in which they are currently living. When such resettlement takes place, there is usually a reasonable chance of them receiving permission to remain and eventually obtain citizenship.

Slavery

A slave is a person who is the legal property of another party (who could be an individual, a family, a corporation, or the state), in which the relationship is unequal, abusive, and established on a principle of total obedience to authority. Slavery almost always implies severe manual labor for little or no reward. While the impulse in a slave-master relationship is that the slave be kept alive in order to engage in the work demanded, the operation of a system of slavery frequently involves massive brutality and death (to say nothing of the violation of individual natural and human rights).

Stereotyping

The act of characterizing a group, or individuals within that group, based upon a preconceived set of mental images about physical (racial, sexual, or gender) or other (religious, educational, social, or political) features. Once labeled, the person doing the stereotyping will base his or her responses on these assumptions. The act of stereotyping involves making value judgments about the worth of the group or individual being stereotyped, most frequently in a negative, discriminatory, or disparaging manner.

Totalitarianism

A system of government in which no political or personal opposition is permitted, demanding total subservience on the part of individuals and institutions to the state. All modern totalitarian states are comprised of at least some of the following characteristics: a single-party state dominated by a single leader or a small clique; a weapons monopoly; a monopoly over the means of disseminating information in any form, public or private; a unifying ideology; an economic system that is either centrally directed, or in which the state plays a dominant role; a police presence that has permanently entrenched extraordinary powers of arrest; and the capacity to employ violence in order to uphold the authority of the central authorities. Totalitarian states can be located on both sides of the political divide, usually on the extremes of a central axis.

War

A state of organized, armed conflict between different states, or different groups coming from within a state, which is usually open and declared. War is characterized by aggression and violence, is often prolonged, and is usually waged by military forces fighting against each other. The reasons for war are many, but generally these can be classified as defense, revenge, the rectification of earlier grievances, economic gain, territorial expansion, or regional dominance and control. Conflict that takes place during war is typified by high mortality, economic and social disruption, and physical devastation in the areas where fighting takes place.

War crimes

Acts committed during armed conflict that violate the international laws, treaties, customs, and practices governing military conflict between belligerent states or parties. War crimes are a legal category within international law, identifying punishable offenses for serious violations (so-called “grave breaches”) of the accepted international rules of war, as defined in any of the international conventions signed at Geneva on August 12, 1949. War crimes recognize individual criminal responsibility where such violations occur, enshrining the idea that individuals can be held accountable for their own actions during wartime, provided a moral choice was able to be made at the time of the offense.

Xenophobia

Like prejudice, discrimination, and stereotyping, xenophobia is based upon a false perception of others, whether as individuals or as groups, and is manifested through an intense or irrational dislike or fear of foreigners or strangers. Xenophobia may be racial, religious, cultural, social, educational, or political, resulting in heightened anxiety, and therefore intense hatred, of others, simply through their existence. Xenophobic behaviors can range from mild forms of discrimination to destruction of property, violent abuse, murder, and sometimes genocide.

Preface

As a volume of personal testimonies from the Holocaust, this book has been arranged to maximize access and ease of reference for users. Because the testimonies are arranged alphabetically, readers can cross-refer to the list of entries at the beginning of the volume; when looking for the context in which the accounts appear, refer to the second list, in which names have been arranged thematically. Within the text, each account is introduced to enable readers to appreciate the setting in which the testimony takes place. Full sourcing of each account is also provided.

For this volume we have worked to locate testimonies that are largely new for a wide readership. In this respect, we have been fortunate to secure the very willing cooperation of three remarkable initiatives across three countries: the “Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program” (through the Azrieli Foundation, Toronto, Canada); the “Writing as Witness” project (through the Sara & Sam Schoffer Holocaust Resource Center at Stockton University, Galloway, New Jersey); and the “Write Your Story” project (Lamm Library, formerly the Makor Jewish Community Library, Melbourne, Australia). Quite clearly, the volume would not have appeared without the assistance of these three superb establishments, and we would like to thank, most sincerely, Elin Beaumont at Azrieli, Maryann McLoughlin at Stockton, and Adele Hulse and Leonie Fleiszig at Lamm, for all their help as our project unfolded.

Eve Grimm provided stalwart service; not only did she manually input everything into a readable format; she actually did it twice, after there was a major hitch involving our original selections. Were it not for her yeoman and uncomplaining service, there would not be a volume 3 in this encyclopedia at all. Elizabeth Snyder and Taylor Neff also provided assistance in a number of important ways, and the editors are grateful to them for their assistance as well.

Introduction

Survivor testimonies play the most crucial role in forming our understanding of what life was like during the Holocaust. As firsthand narratives written by people who lived through the barbarities of the Nazi system, testimonial accounts are among our primary links to the SS state. As such, it can be argued that all accounts, regardless of their artistic quality or historical accuracy, must be considered and respected. There is merit in every survivor account, even those which at first glance would seem to be of little use to the historian.

The testimonies employed in this volume are neither new nor unpublished. They are the reminiscences of European men and women who lived at a particular time in European history, and who were victims, perpetrators, or witnesses to the Nazi genocide of the Jews. They came from all walks of life and from all corners of Europe. Their accounts were produced contemporaneously, or from the perspective of a few months or after the reflection of many years. They offer a representative sample of the Holocaust experience, and what the survivors wish to be understood about that experience.

There are a number of issues relating to the distinctive quality of survivor testimony that need to be considered, however. For a start, we must ask whether (and to what degree) we can utilize survivor accounts as accurate pieces of history. For many, this is far from a clear-cut issue; some scholars actually situate their discussions in the category of literature rather than memoir or autobiography, oblivious to the fact that literature is precisely what testimonial accounts are not.

We therefore need to examine how testimonies may be assessed as a reliable source. After all, most accounts were written after the fact, when the survivors were safely away from the Nazis and their experience was but a nightmarish memory. Moreover, such accounts were for the most part not recounted by accomplished writers. Further, more often than not they were written for publication, suggesting that a sifting process had taken place in an author's mind or by an editor's hand, in which some elements of memory had to be sacrificed for the sake of publication while others were retained—and possibly even enhanced for the same reason.

Such considerations alert us to a type of memoir that needs to be read differently from other forms of historical documentation. Published survivor accounts are quite clearly “subjectively true,”¹ in that they chronicle events either directly witnessed by their authors or told to them by others at the time of their ordeal. It is this truth, and these events, that survivors attempt to impart to their readers. What is the historian, coming on the scene much later, to do with such material?

In his celebrated study published in 1976, Terrence Des Pres addressed this very issue:

To come from fiction to documents is to move from an ideal lucidity to the dense anguish of men and women telling as straightforwardly as they know how the story of what they saw and endured. . . . Their testimony is given in memory, told in pain and often clumsily, with little thought for style or rhetorical device. The experience they describe, furthermore, resists the tendency to fictionalize which informs most remembering.²

For Des Pres, there is thus a certain dimension of truth in survivor testimony that is absent elsewhere. Once the dry statistical data of a prisoner's Holocaust experiences are known—the “why” and “where” elements, which generally differed from one person to another—the contours of their experience can appear remarkably uniform:

the world survivors speak of has been so rigidly shaped by necessity, and so completely shared . . . that from one report to the next the degree of consistency is unusually high. The facts lie embedded in a fixed configuration; fixed, we may come to believe, by the nature of existence when life is circumscribed by death.³

Therefore, survivors aim to tell their stories in as clear a manner as possible, the better to be able to convey to their audience the essence of what they went through.

In a court of law, such evidence serves a different purpose from that of the historian. To those who would argue that the only standard of proof to be adopted by a scholar should be that found in a courtroom, it must be pointed out that the evidence a judge is looking for is altogether different from that of the historian. In a courtroom, the prosecution, defense, judge, and jury all look for specific evidence of a precise type—the kind of evidence that will either acquit or convict a person against whom a certain charge has been brought. The questions asked, therefore, are of a very special nature; generally speaking, they do not look for the textures, smells, sights, and contours of a person's experience, nor do they explore the wider contextual backdrop against which things occurred.

Holocaust historians not only use all these things in an effort to reach an understanding of the past; they also permit the survivor to discuss “what made a special impression . . . at the time.”⁴ Such testimony is based on “an entirely different attitude to events”⁵ than that found in a courtroom, and even if it would not always pass for truth as a court would require it, it is nonetheless often more valuable for the historian than the kind of response that questions from a judge or attorney might elicit.

A point of clarification is in order, however, lest it be thought that all survivor testimony should be accepted at face value and without putting it through any tests. As Kurt Y. Ball-Kaduri wrote in an important essay over half a century ago, “it is impossible to set down theoretical rules for such a selective process” as assessing the value of survivor testimony.⁶ Historians can accept or reject a survivor's account on the basis of known context and a broader understanding of an incident being recounted, but they cannot dismiss the survivor's impressions of the incident once it is firmly established that the survivor saw it take place. As Ball-Kaduri wrote:

testimony given by five to ten witnesses in regard to the same incident, is valid evidence. But it is not true to say that only one testimony, not supported by other evidence is valueless. Especially in the field of active Jewish life [during the Holocaust] there are cases where only one witness has survived, and nevertheless, or even because of this fact, his evidence is of value.⁷

It is quite true that every account should be verified where possible, but often this is simply not possible. After all, the Holocaust saw an immense amount of history taking place. As the Israeli historian Jacob Robinson observed in 1966,

The usual course of any particular community is even and uneventful; ordinarily, little of historical significance takes place, except in those rare times when a peak of military, political, intellectual, and moral activity is reached. Thus, on a continental scale, each year brings a few people, a few ideas, a few groups, to the fore. But the era of Nazi oppression was quite different. Then, in the span of only twelve years, every single Jewish community in Europe perforce was faced with the greatest crisis possible to a group—the crisis of existence. Every single Jewish community perforce reached its peak of activity, called upon its deepest spiritual resources, brought forth its ultimate answers to the questions of life and death, of relations between man and God.⁸

The challenge for the Holocaust scholar is thus “to rescue from oblivion a history as eventful and rich as that of a thousand years.”⁹

Given the event-laden historical richness Robinson described, it might seem as though such rescue would be a relatively easy (if time-consuming) process, but this is not the case. Yes, there was an enormous amount of activity taking place in many areas, but what may we know of such things where no one survived to tell the tale? How does one establish what happened in a community where a population that once numbered several thousand has been totally obliterated? From whom does one obtain eyewitness testimony, if all the eyewitnesses have been killed? How does one examine written records, where none were kept? Are there any advantages in the historian visiting a site, if—as often happened—it had been destroyed by the Nazis? Many hundreds of small villages throughout Eastern Europe were literally expunged from the face of the earth. What happened there? How did the Holocaust manifest itself in these communities? We might never know, but the use of testimony, however fragmentary, will start the process of rescuing the history from the oblivion of which Robinson has warned us.

Further, it is through testimonies that we can appreciate the fears, miseries, and other features of life characterizing the Holocaust. Again, we are drawn to the conclusion that even one survivor account places us in a better position to try to understand what people went through, and we therefore find ourselves relying on whatever we can find to begin the long process of comprehending what happened.

It is thus necessary to consider every piece of survivor testimony individually, and to assess each on its merits. What historians make of these accounts must be up to them, and any scholar contemplating the study of the Holocaust is counseled to treat the subject with a combination of both rigor and respect. If all we have to go on as we attempt to reach an understanding of the Holocaust experience are the written accounts of survivors—and very soon this will be all we have left—then we must treat these accounts seriously.

Above all, we must be aware of just what it is the survivors are trying to convey. Generally speaking, they seek to convey a sense of what happened to them, as they remember it. Do they wish to be seen in a particular light? Perhaps. Is their intention to tell the truth as they understand it? Certainly. Do they hope to compose a particular set of images concerning their persecutors, or humanity in general? In many cases, yes. Overall, however, the reflections and reminiscences of Holocaust survivors are intimate accounts of individual experiences that the survivors wish to share with others.

Implanted within this need to tell the story as they know it is a particular consciousness of what surviving is all about. Of course, the reasons for survival varied from one person to another, but for those who set down their accounts for posterity surviving was frequently accompanied by an urge to bear witness to the evils of the Holocaust. It was, in this respect, its own revenge. As Terrence Des Pres has shown, survivor testimony is unusual as a genre not only “for the experience it describes, but also for the desire it reveals to remember and record.”¹⁰ The need to bear witness was often part and parcel of the reason for survival itself:

The testimony of survivors is rooted in a strong need to make the truth known, and the fact that this literature exists, that survivors produced these documents—is evidence of a profoundly human process. Survival is a specific kind of experience, and “to survive as a witness” is one of its forms.¹¹

It permits the survivor to allow the dead their voice;¹² it serves as a call to humanity, a signal to readers of the power of radical evil, a warning for the generations of the future.

How representative are survivor accounts? When assessing a given situation, can the memoir of any single survivor be held up as exemplary of life and conditions in, say, Auschwitz, and as therefore representative of all other survivor accounts? Do their accounts tell the full—or only—story?

As the testimonies in this volume show, there is no “right” or “wrong” way for survivors to remember their experience. Given that every survivor’s experience was unique and intimate to themselves, we must look at the totality of their experience alongside those of as many of their fellows as we can find, and ask broad questions that might be capable of being narrowed down later. Certain survivors might provide aspects of the picture that are neater, sharper, or more elegantly defined, but none can tell the whole story alone.

We could discuss in depth the literary dimensions of survivor testimony—nuances of language, the artistic merits of characterization, the expression of feelings, or the development of storylines—but these would reduce the survivors’ accounts to nothing other than pieces of literature. If it is the case that most survivors set down their experiences in order to convey something about their past lives to their readers, then the literary quality of their writing is not necessarily as important to them as it would be to a novelist or poet. The most important thing is that the message be conveyed.

Discussing Nazi concentration camps, for example, Cynthia Haft has identified what the differences between art and narrative represent when applied to survivor testimonies. She is careful to emphasize that she is discussing literature only; while many survivors have related their personal accounts as autobiography, those who continue their writing well beyond this often adapt forms of expression differing in style from the testimonial genre:

Because of a desire to render their works as faithful to detail as possible, many authors lost the perspective of their role as writers. The role of the writer is to recreate through language the passions that he wishes to convey to his reader. . . . To tell us how high the [concentration camp barrack] blocks were, how many miles were walked in the fields, how much water there was to drink is not pertinent to literature. And these facts taken out of context, recited without recreating life in camp, will not evoke in a reader's mind what a camp was. The artist's role is not to tell the number of miles that a prisoner walked each morning in order to reach the swamp where he worked. It is rather to impress upon the reader's mind how the prisoner's legs felt, to impress upon the reader that distance is relative and that the longest walk he can take is along a path where at every step his foot digs into a fresh cadaver. These feelings are conveyed not by a strict attention to details in ounces and miles. . . . Details will not communicate the reality of the experience. The passions, the conditions will be transmitted to the reader by the effective and lyric author who never mentions the miles. The reader cannot reconstruct in his mind what Auschwitz was, but, by realizing the totality of the phenomenon, he recreates the subjective truth of the experience.¹³

Haft is fundamentally right, though perhaps a little harsh on those survivors whose accounts are not up to the literary standards she would prefer. If some survivors consciously or unconsciously sacrifice detail for artistic merit, it is because this is the best way for them to put their ordeal into words. The same is true for accounts that sacrifice literary merit for detail. Many survivors identify a powerful duty to get their story down as accurately as possible. As Shoshana Felman has put it, "to bear witness is to take responsibility for the truth." The process of testifying is thus not merely to narrate but to commit oneself, and to commit narrative, to others: to take responsibility—in speech—for history or for the truth of an occurrence, for something which, by definition, goes beyond the personal, in having general (nonpersonal) validity and consequences.¹⁴

Taking responsibility for history is thus not the preserve of either factual details or emotional reconstruction, but both together. A piece of testimony can no more be dismissed because of its paucity of detail than it can for a lack of sensitivity, or, as psychiatrist Dori Laub has noted in relation to his interviewing of a female survivor, "my attempt as interviewer and as listener was precisely to respect—not to upset, not to trespass—the subtle balance between what the woman knew and what she did not, or could not, know."¹⁵

For most survivors, the experiences they depict have become embedded in their souls,¹⁶ and the descriptions they provide almost always recount an atmosphere that is true if not necessarily believable. Not all accounts were written by educated people; many lack self-control and grammatical discipline, but they are no less true for that. Some accounts provide dates, for example, which we know are incorrect, and in other cases even a full chronological sequence of events is dubious. But we need to bear in mind that the Holocaust was a time that was not always dictated by a calendar in the sense that we understand it. What is true of dates, moreover, is equally true of numbers, of Nazi institutions and ranks, and even of activities undertaken by Jews in different parts of the same country. It must be borne in mind that trying to make sense of the whole from ground level was invariably impossible. And all this, of course, was compounded by language differences. Usually, all a survivor could "know" was the reality of which he or she formed a part. The rest inevitably had to be filled in later.¹⁷

Thus, survivor accounts do not ask us to try to "imagine" the Holocaust; for the most part, that is not what they are attempting to achieve. Lawrence L. Langer, the preeminent scholar of Holocaust literature, addressed the issue in an early essay:

The challenge of imagining the Holocaust—not the anti-Semitic tactics which led up to it, but its apocalyptic end in the gas chambers and crematoria of the death camps—is a permanent one, and will indeed grow more difficult for future generations who will lack the advantage of hearing living voices confirm the details of the ordeal they survived. The only evidence we will have available then is the kind we depend on increasingly today: verbal and visual accounts which inspire the imagination to conjure up an unimaginable world.¹⁸

Langer's major interest here is not to consider testimonial accounts as historical documents, but as triggers for the imagination:

the ultimate focus, the one requiring our constant collaboration, must be unambiguous—such art is deceptive and unfaithful if it does not bring us closer to the worst, and beyond the worst—to the unthinkable. Not in tribute to the dead, not to redeem them—but in agonizing confirmation of the catastrophe that consumed them.¹⁹

Most importantly, this confirmation must be recognized and understood by the generations of the future, which will have only published survivor testimonies from which to learn what happened.

For many survivors—possibly most—it is sufficient simply to tell their story, to record, to bear witness, to show that the world through which they lived was in fact all too real. The challenge is not one of “imagining the Holocaust.” Rather, it is of conveying to the world an understanding of what the survivor went through, of explaining the essence of the evil that one group of people inflicted upon another group of people, as seen from the perspective of one who was there as a participant-observer-victim. If there is, in short, nothing mysterious about the Nazis or the Holocaust they perpetrated, neither is there anything mysterious about the testimonies the survivors have written. They do not attempt to make magic, nor do they attempt to imagine the unimaginable. They simply try to tell the story from their own individual perspectives.

How, therefore, may we best employ survivor testimonies when trying to understand the experience of those who lived through those awful times? Certain themes keep reemerging, such as maintenance of morale, separation from loved ones, exposure to death, fleeing and hiding, the nature of relationships, and the struggle to maintain life in the midst of degradation and brutality. In looking at survivor accounts, we can be less concerned with how the survivors remember their experience than with what they actually say; with what they remember, rather than why they remember it.²⁰

Ultimately, a survivor’s testimony should be regarded as much as an historical document as a contemporary government memorandum, a diary entry, a letter, or a newspaper account. As with all documents, its applicability to a particular type of historical writing should be weighed prior to its use, and employed or rejected on that basis rather than according to some more subjective standard. All survivor testimony has its place. It is just a matter of finding where and how to use it.

Finally, a story. It isn’t a survivor’s story, though tragically, it should be. It concerns one of the greatest of Jewish historians, the Russian-Polish-Jewish scholar Simon (Shimon) Dubnow. Given the opportunity to escape the fearsome potential that a Nazi invasion might bring, Dubnow, aged 81, decided instead to remain where he was, in Riga, determined not to flee and hand the Nazis the victory they sought. A number of witnesses to his death were later to provide his biographer, Koppel S. Pinson, with the following record of his last moments:

When the Nazis entered Riga they evicted Dubnow from his home and seized his entire library. They summoned him for questioning at Gestapo headquarters and then placed him in a home for the aged. After a short period of ghetto organization the Nazis liquidated the ghetto at the end of October 1941 and a month later they carried out their first “action” against the Riga Jews. Dubnow was seriously ill, but friends managed to conceal him for a while. On the night of December 7–8 the Nazis carried out their second “action.” All the old and sick as well as the women in advanced pregnancy were herded together in buses. Dubnow was also taken outside to be squeezed into one of these overloaded buses. He was in a high fever at the time and was hardly able to move his feeble legs. A Latvian militiaman then advanced and fired a bullet in Dubnow’s back and the sainted martyr fell dead on the spot. The next day several friends buried him in the old cemetery in the Riga ghetto. A story went round that the last words that Dubnow muttered as he was being led out to the bus were: “Brothers, don’t forget! Recount what you hear and see! Brothers, make a record of it all!”²¹

We cannot be certain whether or not these final words were apocryphal, but there can be little doubt that they were the comments of one with an eye to posterity and the role of witnessing. It is the kind of story with which most survivor-authors could readily identify, and which they would certainly understand. Regardless of the literary or narrative quality of their accounts, all are driven by Dubnow’s exhortation to remember and recount. Those who survived—who confronted their most agonizing memories in order to write down their experiences, and in doing so provided us with a record and left us a legacy founded on human ideals and the value of life—have done their job. As stated earlier, what history will make of such material now rests with the historians.

JUDY ABRAMS

Context: Salvation

Source: Judy Abrams. Tenuous Threads. Toronto: ©Azrieli Foundation, 2012, pp. 25–29. Used by permission.

Judy Abrams was a girl living in Budapest when the Nazis invaded in March 1944. After lengthy periods trying to outlast both the Nazis and the Hungarian fascists, the Arrow Cross Party, she found herself hiding in a shelter. By February 1945—a bitterly cold winter—she and those with whom she had been taking cover finally heard the comforting words of a Soviet soldier, indicating that liberation had come for the Jews of Budapest.

That January 1945—a cold month in Hungary, especially in the unheated cellar—I had my brush with death by firing squad.

Not all the inhabitants of our tenuous shelter were equally fortunate. There was an elderly couple (they were probably in their fifties but seemed old to me) who occupied a small “room” at the far end of the cellar, a space previously used for storing wood or coal. They rarely spoke. Keeping to themselves, they exuded an aura of faded elegance in shades of grey: hair, clothes and the sadness that characterized their slow silent movements. Under the layers of outerwear to protect her from the cold, I imagined the lady wearing a simple dress of soft material in muted colors. She wore her hair in two wing-like rolls, held in place by fine, brown bone combs, a style fashionable in the 1940s. Like my Aunt Marika, she never looked untidy. It was as though their previous life of ease and good taste had followed them into the recesses of the dingy cellar.

Relieved that we had escaped the ominous visit of the Arrow Cross, I was bundled off to our corner. There, in relative safety, I began to hear shouts and screams from the back of the basement. The outer door then slammed while the sound of continuing sobs lingered. A curious child, I listened to the whispered conversations and gradually pieced together the story. The “hoodlums” had not stopped at examining documents and faces. Hungarian gentiles were seldom circumcised. After the outdoor inspection, the Arrow Cross thugs led the elderly couple back into the cellar where the dignified gentleman was told to lower his pants. Their suspicions confirmed, they marched him off to join a contingent of Jews who had been “caught” and made to march toward the Danube, a certain death by firing squad. But before taking him away, the men had done something bad to his wife, to the elegant lady at the back of the cellar. This was a secret nobody allowed me to share. After this event, her hair was no longer carefully rolled on top of her head and the men’s clothes she put on did not give off the faint aroma of perfume.

Strangely, this story has a fortunate ending. One day, two young men arrived at the house carrying on a makeshift stretcher the old man we had taken for dead. In his younger years, he had been an Olympic swimmer. As the victims were lined up along the banks of the river facing the Arrow Cross firing squad, he decided to take a chance. Before the bullets could reach him, he jumped backward into the icy Danube. Through the ice floes he swam to shore, where a woman found him naked and bruised but alive. She nursed him until he was ready to be returned to his wife by the young men. Who were the young men who carried him back? Sons? Friends? Neighbours? They asked for no compensation.

In her eternal black clothes, Nagyi began to look like an old Hungarian peasant. She bustled about baking yeastless bread, much like our ancestors did in the story of the Exodus from Egypt. Only now there was no Land of Canaan in sight. She still tried to maintain a semblance of discipline and refused to give in to my requests for pieces of the fresh loaves. Warm bread was bad for the stomach, according to the dictates of some obscure rules of health. She was the one who carefully portioned out the remaining bits of duck and the ever-shrinking stores of onions and potatoes in jute sacks.

Deprivation and anxiety did not improve her naturally stern disposition, nor did it make me into a more pliant child. I prayed with Mária and Auntie Superintendent, charming them with my faith. But with my grandmother I was more demanding and capricious. We were not well-suited to each other and needed the constant intervention of my gentle Aunt Marika or Mária, who usually took my side and cajoled me into a better mood by calling me “Kis Kutyám” (her little puppy) or other funny endearments. She managed to mollify my grandmother, too.

The thin walls did not muffle the sounds of battle. Bombs and cannon balls crashed into the ruins of the house above us, and sharp bits of shrapnel embedded themselves into the walls. Hand grenades were hurled into the garden as the gunfire came ever nearer. We had mixed feelings toward the Soviet liberators, who did not have a sterling reputation. Stories of looting and more terrible things done to women circulated. Besides, the closer the battle lines came to our house, the less secure our lodgings became. We were only barely below ground level. In the garden adjacent to ours was a real bomb shelter, dug deep and lined with cement. It was decided that we, the cellar-dwellers, would try to stay there during the day and return at night, when the fighting usually slackened. As we emerged from our dark hovel, we found the icy ground covered in debris. We stumbled and slipped, crawling. Keeping low, occasionally lying down as some manner of fire or shell whizzed overhead. Bullets glanced off the icy mounds and I seem to recall seeing bloodstains on the no-longer-white snow. I cried and begged to go back to the relative safety of the basement, but to no avail. Finally, we arrived at the shelter and went down the steps into the deep, narrow tunnel where two parallel rows of benches lined the grey cement walls.

Auntie Superintendent and her respectable friends sat down next to the people already perched on the narrow benches, all of them wrapped in blankets against the cold. Our small group—Mária, Aunt Marika and I—took our places at the back of the shelter. It was wiser not to expose ourselves too much to the scrutiny of strangers in case something in our appearance, speech or behavior betrayed our ethnic origin. We sat there, separate from the others, listening to the muted sounds of battle all day long. Then, under the cover of darkness, we crept back to our insecure shelter, the mattresses on the sagging springs of ancient iron bedsteads, and ate something that passed for an evening meal.

In the morning I was adamant. I wept and screamed and refused to budge. My grandmother, whose nerves by now had been stretched to the limit, gave me one of her withering looks, threw down the pile of blankets she had collected for the journey and muttered angrily, “All right, Miss Hysteria. I’d rather die than listen to this. We will stay. Just stop!”

The epithet, Miss Hysteria, was usually counterproductive and only made me turn up the volume of my protestations. This time, I stopped crying immediately and allowed Nagyi to savour her verbal victory. To my relief, the treacherous trip to the bomb shelter was cancelled. We spent another day in our cellar, listening to the escalating sounds of combat, to my perverse relief.

In the evening, when the other tenants returned, they had terrible news. A bomb had pierced the cement casing of the shelter, thought to be impregnable. It had made a huge hole in the back, where we had sat the previous day. Surely, we would have chosen the same place again. Once more, we had narrowly escaped.

One day in February the sun slanted through gaps in the oilskin covering the glassless panes of the basement door. Everything was quiet. We knew that soon Soviet soldiers would be coming to “liberate” us, in addition to possibly “liberating” us of some of the few belongings we still possessed. Mária and my aunt hid, assuming that the rumours about the soldiers’ behavior toward young women were true.

And then, there he was. A short, dark-haired man in a Soviet uniform with rows of shiny medals on his chest. He had a kind, intelligent face. We had learned a few words of Russian in anticipation and I called out a brave hello—“Zdrastvuiyte.” To our surprise, he did not answer in Russian, but instead asked, “Parlez-vous francais?” (Do you speak French?). This was Nagyi’s moment. In her inimitable Hungarian schoolgirl French, she answered yes, “Vooi,” gradually recovering her air of respectability as she translated for the inhabitants of the cellar the news that the Germans had finally capitulated. The war was over in Budapest.

HANIA AJZNER

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Hania Ajzner. Hania's War. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2000, pp. 129–143. Used by permission.

The testimony of Hania Ajzner, told in the third person and referring to herself as “Ania,” relates to a young Polish Jew who was smuggled out of the ghetto in Warsaw and concealed with a Catholic family. She shows in this extract the steps that were taken to assist her process of adaptation into non-Jewish life, prior to being placed in a Catholic boarding school—where an entirely new set of tactics would need to be developed in order for her to keep her true identity a secret. The account ends on an ominous note, as the girls in her dormitory view the fires coming from the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in April 1943.

“Remember, your name is Ania Zakoscielna. You were born in Rostowiec. Your father’s name was Jozef Zakoscielny. He was killed in 1939, in the army. Your mother’s name was Maria Zakoscielna. She died early in the war. Your grandfather’s name was Wojciech, grandmother’s Zofia. Never, ever mention Hania Ajzner, or anyone called Moniek, Sarenka, Lajzorek, or anyone else from the Ghetto, even if their name was Marisa, Jurek or Marjan. You are a Polish Catholic. You don’t know any Jews. Regard all the people you have known as dead, or, better still, as never having existed. The Germans might have got to know about them, and so they might be able to tie you to them. Now, let’s try again. What is your name?”

Her mother’s words, uttered during her training, immediately after leaving the Ghetto flashed through Ania’s memory. She was aware of her own voice making the possibly fatal slip: “. . . my friend Sarenka always said. . . Her parents called her Bambi. She was like a baby deer, Sarenka . . .,” she tried to cover up. She hoped that her new friend Danka did not notice. However was she going to manage to keep her story straight? This business of remembering two “life stories” was very difficult. That night, she tried to sort out her thoughts and plan her actions. She thought back to how she found herself here in this convent boarding school, away from her mother and everything that she had ever known.

It had been dark when they had arrived at the garage in an outer Warsaw suburb, called Bielany. The driver said to them, gruffly, “I can only take one lot of you at a time to just one address. Decide who’s going first. The rest of you will be safe here in the garage.” Mrs. Cytryn had no doubts about priorities. “We have to get the children out first. Take the Ajzners out now.” But one of the strangers had been talking to the driver and Ania saw him take out a roll of bills and hand it over. The man and his wife threw their bag into the bed of the truck and climbed into the cabin. The driver opened the doors of the garage, drove out, locked the doors again and drove off.

He came back later, parked the truck, locked the garage doors and went home. The escapees had to settle down for the night, a cold January night in Warsaw. Ania was glad that Mother had made her wear two sets of warm woollen underwear, as well as two jumpers, woollen stockings, her warm boots and her warm coat. The cold that was inside her combined with the cold that was outside her. It was so intense that she seemed to turn into an icicle and she wondered whether she would actually wake up in the morning. Halineczka and Ania were settled inside the cabin of the truck, as it was marginally warmer there. Everyone else settled as best they could in the garage. Ania woke up once during the night. Before she realized where she was, she called out, “Mummy, my doona has fallen down again!” Her mother reached into the cabin and hugged her, saying, “Ssh, it’s all right, dear. It will be morning soon, and you will be warm then.” Ania remembered where she was and what had happened, and for the first time she cried.

In the morning the driver came back again, and took the other couple of strangers out. The woman hesitated, looking at the children, but the husband pulled her into the cabin. Only the Ajzners and the Cytryns were left. Ania thought mutinously that if Father had been there, he would have been the first to go. It had been he who had arranged the whole escape, including the place where they were going. As it was, another freezing night was to be borne.

Daylight finally came. The sun was shining outside. The garage was made out of planks roughly nailed together and you could see out through the cracks between them. It stood in the middle of an empty block. Fresh snow glittered on the ground and was heaped up in drifts against the walls of the garage and there were icicles hanging from the beams inside. After relieving themselves into a slop-bucket, the escapees managed to melt some ice and wash their faces and hands with it. Then they ate some bread and jam for breakfast and drank some more of the melted icicles. Ania was worried that they could not light even a small fire, but the smell of it would have betrayed their presence.

At some time during the day they heard the voices of some children who came to play on the empty block. Ania thought to herself that the world seemed all wrong. She should not have to sit there in the dark and the cold. She should be out there, playing tag, or blind man's bluff, or throwing snowballs and building a snowman. It was not so long ago that she would have been doing just that. In those days, she had been a little girl, just like every other girl, with a loving mother and father and lots of friends and cousins. Why did they all have to be sitting absolutely quiet, so that the sharp ears of little children would not hear them? Why should she be now hiding like a rat in a sewer, with all the power and majesty of the law bent on hunting her down? At one time one of the boys tried the lock on the door, but found that he couldn't get in. As it grew dark the children's voices died down and they went away. The truck came back. When the driver pulled in, he said that he could take another lot of them out that night. Mrs. Cytryn stuck to her principles, and said: "Women and children first. The Ajzners are next."

Ania, Halineczka and Mother got into the cabin of the truck, Aunt Marjan and Aunt Tola got into the back, and they set off. They arrived at Mrs. Maciejowska's apartment after dark, on the 25th of January. Their new hostess greeted them warmly. "You poor things, you must be absolutely frozen and hungry!" she exclaimed when she saw them. There were five of them, Ania, Halineczka, Aunt Maria (Mother), Aunt Tola, and Uncle Moniek. . . . "No, Uncle Marjan," she corrected herself. Thank heavens Halineczka was still Halineczka, even if she was now Wengielek instead of Ajzner. Mrs. Maciejowska bustled about, setting out bowls of steaming hot soup on the table. Then she set up a tub and filled it with hot water so that Ania and Halineczka could have a hot bath and go to sleep. They had to share a narrow couch, but they were both so tired that they fell asleep immediately.

The next morning there was a conference. Halineczka played with a doll, but Ania listened closely. First, they decided that staying together was too dangerous. The neighbours would soon notice extra food being brought in, even if Uncle Marjan and the girls remained hidden. So they would have to split up. Madzia would take Ania and move into a room with a reliable family. Uncle Marjan would go into hiding, and Aunt Tola and Halineczka would also find a room with a family. As soon as possible, Ania and Halineczka would be placed somewhere separately, either in a school or with families. Madzia was adamant that they had to keep as separate as possible. She did not say it, but Ania knew that it was so that if one of them got caught, it would not endanger the others. She had often heard her parents discuss it.

Madzia knew where the leather, which Father had sent out of the Ghetto, was stored. She assured Uncle Marjan and Aunt Tola that it was stored with reliable people, and she would pick some up whenever they needed more money. Aunt Tola would help her to sell it afterwards. Aunt Tola and Madzia both had the appearance and language skills to pass for Aryans. Uncle Marjan had to remain in hiding. During the week before they dispersed, they had to become word-perfect in their stories.

Mrs. Maciejowska started to teach the girls catechism, as well as some of the most common hymns and prayers. They had to learn the morning hymn, "When the dawn rises," as well as the grace before and after the meals and the greeting, "Blessed and praised be He" instead of "Good morning" or "Good evening." Then they had to learn the order of the Mass. Mrs. Maciejowska said that they would just have to watch when people knelt down or stood up, and just do the same. "To be on the safe side, at the beginning, just stay on your knees as much as possible." Ania hoped that her knees would not start giving her trouble as they did every now and then since she had been sick.

It was a lot to learn and remember in one week. At all times they had to be very quiet. They all wore slippers so that people on the floor below could not hear them, and they were not allowed to go anywhere near the windows. "Remember, if you can see someone, they can see you too!" taught Mrs. Maciejowska. She had many Jews pass through her home, for high fees, but never staying for very long. If she had been caught giving shelter to Jews, she and all her family would have been shot on the spot.

"Remember, when you are out on the street, always walk decidedly, do not cower, and don't cast a separate shadow. Always walk close enough to people for your shadows to mingle. Don't make eye contact, but don't hang your head and look at your feet. Poles walk straight and proud." Ania thought that her head would burst with all the instructions. She had a further task, to drill Halineczka in all the new facts. Halineczka was very good. She must have been too frightened to ask any questions because she just repeated, conscientiously, everything she was told. She had her fifth birthday when they were still at Mrs. Maciejowska's, but only Ania remembered it and drew a birthday card for her. That got her into trouble, because Halineczka's new birthday was no longer on the 4th of February, and anyway, Polish children did not celebrate birthdays, only name days. That was the day of the saint after whom one was named and was usually, but not always, close to the actual birthday. Babies tended to be named after the saint on whose day they were born and that saint became the baby's patron saint. Ania's and Halineczka's patron saint was Saint Anne, whose day was in August and their new birthdays were also in August.

After some ten days at Mrs Maciejowska's, Ania and her "aunt Maria" left. They moved into a room in a nice quiet apartment in Slowaki Street in a modern suburb called Zoliborz. It was a five-roomed apartment belonging to a couple of teachers called Jankowski. They were a friend of Joziek Ajzner from before the war. They had all belonged to the Socialist Party. When the Germans invaded, they closed most Polish schools so the Jankowskis lost their jobs. . . . Ania like staying with the Jankowskis. The apartment was light, airy and warm. Their room was redolent of the Christmas tree that was still there when they moved in, although it was removed soon after. There was another woman living in the apartment, also subletting a room. She was very quiet and just stayed in her room. All the rules still applied. Ania was not allowed anywhere near the windows, she wore slippers for silence, she was not allowed to flush the toilet or turn on a tap when there was nobody at home. "Aunt Maria" was not supposed to have a child, so Ania was not supposed to exist. . . .

Then one day, the lady who lived in the other room at the Jankowskis' was arrested. Ania saw some men arrive, ask Mrs. Jankowski quite politely for her, knock on her door and lead her out. They never saw her again. Mother was out at the time. Soon after, when Mother was home, they saw some Germans go in through the gateway into their building. Mother grabbed Ania's hand, and they ran out and up the stairs to the attics. They heard the Germans knock on a door of an apartment below theirs, but this time, they left soon after without having arrested anyone.

Ania's mother decided that having Ania with her was too dangerous. Mrs Jankowski told her that she knew of a woman who would take Ania into her home, for a price. One morning Ania found herself walking along a street, just like a normal person. Ania relished the few moments of being outside. They arrived at an apartment nearby where a family was living in two rooms. There was a bedroom crowded with a large double bed, a cot and a sewing machine. The woman, her husband, her sister and Ania were all to sleep in the double bed, and there was a baby in the cot. The other room, which had the kitchen alcove and the bathroom opening off it, was out of bounds for Ania, because the woman's customers, for whom she sewed dresses, would come to try them on there. Ania stayed there a week. She did not like it. The woman made her eat separately and did not give her the same food, even though Ania helped to prepare it. She was not allowed to play with the baby, as though she was suffering from some contagious disease. And for the first time in her life, Ania found lice in her hair. When her mother came a week later, Ania complained, and the woman got very annoyed. Mother didn't say anything, just packed her things and took her away.

After a short time, Mother told Ania that she was going to boarding school. There was a very good boarding school nearby. So this was where Ania found herself at this time. That brought her back to her immediate problem. How was she going to manage to keep her story straight? Her problems were quite different from the ones they had foreshadowed. While she was still at school, she didn't have to pretend not to exist. She could look out of the windows, she could run around, she could play outside. The convent was a five-story building which stood in its own garden. There was a statue of St. Joseph with the Infant Jesus at the front, and a statue of Our Lady, with stars around her head. The school was run by the Sisters of the Resurrection. . . .

There was a strict daily routine, punctuated by the ringing of the Bells. They were woken by the Mass bell for those who attended the early Mass, then there was the dressing bell, breakfast bell, and so on for the whole day. . . .

In spite of the differences in the physical conditions, the school was conducted rather like the school in the Ghetto. . . .

What Ania found to be profoundly different, was that she had to guard her tongue all the time. She was afraid to go to sleep, for fear of talking in her sleep. The business of remembering two "life stories" and keeping them separate was very difficult. If she tried to forget her real life and just tried to concentrate on her "new life," there was not enough to talk about. She would have to not only make up a whole "new" life, but remember not to mix it up with her real life. . . .

While she was trying to find some sort of mental, or perhaps emotional, balance, she also had to cope with the everyday traps that beset her. She went into the Third Grade and found that all the girls in her grade, who were just a little bit older, about ten to her almost nine years, had just had their First Communion. . . .

At first she was glad that the other girls had had their First Communion, because she did not have to go to Communion with them, which meant going to early Mass every morning before breakfast and going to confession every Saturday. But her class-teacher, Sister Wawrzyna, decided that she ought to catch up with the rest of the class and she was given special tuition in Catechism after ordinary school was over. Her "Auntie" came to see her every Sunday, when all the parents visited. During those visits Ania recited to her "Auntie" all that she had learnt during the week. “Auntie” wrote it down furtively, so that she could learn it herself and pass on the knowledge to Ania’s cousins, Rysia and Hala. . . .

The result of all this was that Ania learnt her Catechism very well indeed, so that she came top in the exam. The Sisters organized a special First Communion just for Ania, with a white dress, a veil with a wreath of spring flowers, and a special breakfast. It was all very festive, but what followed was a marked deterioration in Sister Wawrzyna’s attitude to Ania. Ania could not do a thing right. She was very upset and cried to “Auntie” because Sister Wawrzyna made fun of her and picked on her at every turn. Even the other girls noticed, and commiserated with Ania. But “Auntie” explained that that was one of the few nuns who knew that she was Jewish and she did not approve of a Jewish girl getting better results than the Christian girls.

One night, Sister Wawrzyna came into the dormitory after the girls had already settled down. “Get up, girls, come up to the windows,” and she drew aside the black-out curtains. They could see a red glow over the fields to the South. “That is the Ghetto, burning,” she said. “There was an uprising in the Ghetto. You must all pray, girls, for there are heroes fighting and dying there.”

Ania stood there in silence. Her first thought was that she must not show any more concern than the other girls. Then she thought of the people still there, in the Ghetto. She thought of the men who used to come and collect money to buy arms. She even thought of the little gun she had found, and hoped that it was of some use to someone, perhaps even being used right then. It was a long time before they went back to their beds. It was the 19th April, 1943.

After living a precarious life in the ghetto at Będzin, Kitia Altman was sent to a work camp at Annaberg—a place she describes as a “good camp” in a nondescript area. As she describes in this account, however, in July 1944 she and those around her are placed on a truck, and then a train, and transported to Auschwitz. At first, she anticipates that this transfer will see her death, but upon realizing that she is to be moved into a barrack block she is able to start taking stock of her situation. Auschwitz, she begins to understand, will be a place requiring the most profound human realignment of beliefs regarding everything she has previously thought.

I’ve dealt with almost all of them now, faced and sorted them, decided whether to keep them or put them away. They’re all memories of a time I cannot forget yet don’t want to remember. Some I’ve come to like, others I fear. They’re all memories of a time I cannot forget yet don’t want to remember. Some images are etched in my mind so clearly that I think the event took place only recently. But I know it happened more than half a century ago.

There’s only one memory left and I can’t decide where to put it. Does it belong “before” or “after”? Or rather, does it mark the beginning of a unique and bizarre experience? I dare not face it yet, but I yearn to be able to. On occasions I’ve timidly attempted to lift a corner of the cloak that covers it. I feel I can’t postpone it much longer—time is moving fast towards the final hour. I close my eyes, take a deep breath and enter the time capsule.

Annaberg is what might be called a “good camp.” It doesn’t matter where it is. What matters is what it is.

I have with me a few possessions from Będzin—my own shoes still in good condition, a dress, a few blouses, a skirt, a jacket and a couple of changes of underwear. I have a comb and a toothbrush and Cesia has a small mirror. Do I have a coat? No, I don’t remember a coat. We don’t need a coat, we never go out. I sleep with my friend Cesia in one bed. We have a straw-filled mattress and a coarse sheet. The blanket is dark and heavy.

Annaberg is surrounded by forest. There are about 300 men engaged in felling trees. They leave in the morning, return at dusk. Often they sing on their way back. The women like hearing it. It makes us think of home, when men came back from work. We provide them with domestic comforts of sorts. We cook and they eat at a long table. We wash their garments and the men change when they return from work. We repair their torn clothing, sweep their barracks—it’s almost normal. Time is marked by events in camp and not by calendars or clocks. We pray nothing will change until the end.

I have a French “boyfriend,” Sammi. Sammi with his beautiful smile and teeth that are even and white. He sings for me, “Parle-moi d’amour.” We promise ourselves that one day we will exchange our family names and pre-war addresses.

One day we hear trucks rolling towards the forest. Only a small group of men returns. Sammi is not among them.

July 1944 comes to an end and clouds gather above our heads. An electrifying piece of news tears through the camp—there’s been an attempt on Hitler’s life, but he wasn’t killed. Will they kill us? We expect repercussions, but nothing happens.

One day an open truck pulls into the camp and we’re loaded on. We take nothing with us. At the station a long row of cattle wagons is waiting. We are pushed in and the rolling iron doors are closed. We hear the clang of the bar. We are silent and frightened.

The memory stops, covered in darkness. The chapter has ended.

The train comes to a jerky halt. I hear the iron bar being lifted and the rasp of the rolling doors. We fall out, spilling like potatoes from a sack, stumbling. We are hit by silence, the silence of death. There are hundreds of us yet not a sound. A soft rosy glow penetrates the darkness.

“How strange,” my human mind records, “the laws of nature still operate: day follows night. There is a strange smell and an eerie stillness. Figures in striped pyjamas stand motionless. “Are they really alive?” I wonder.

Someone whispers: “Auschwitz.”

“It is all true,” I say.

We fall into formations of five, trying to keep together, already feeling the separation and the loneliness.

The sign above the gate, Arbeit macht frei. The guard mumbles loudly, hardly moving his lips: “Auschwitz you enter through this gate, you leave it . . .” and he jerks his head, looking up. We follow his eyes and see flames and dense smoke vomited by the high chimneys.

“The pink glow, then, isn’t the work of nature,” my terrorized mind self-corrects automatically. Suddenly, it’s not important. I feel I won’t need this information any more.

The dawn breaks, cold and grey. We’re ordered to run. We run between two rows of identical low huts. Shapes crawl out, some wrapped in dark blankets, hair sprouting from skulls, eyes unfocussed. Men or women? We call out: “Where are we? Who are you?”

No answer, no sign they have heard us. Are we in an asylum? No birds or trees, no flowers or grass. Mud, sticky black earth, our shoes sink in. We can’t run fast any more. Suddenly: Stop. A huge, red brick building. Is this the end? Already? Inside, bare floors and walls. We see windows. This can’t be it.

We huddle together, only a few of us. Where are the rest?

People in striped dresses, women with red kerchiefs on their heads rush around. No one looks at us. Our small group is tighter, we tremble, brutalized by the terror of the unknown. No uniform in sight other than the stripes. A man comes towards us—tall, handsome, well dressed, even in his stripes. I catch my thoughts like soap bubble, it lasts only a magic second, perhaps not even that long; a magic second when the bizarre reality of that place ceases to exist. Instead there is a handsome man, a beautiful woman, a meeting of eyes, a promise of a future.

“Are you mad?” my reason demands. “Here, now? This is the end of the world, there is no ‘after,’ there is no more.”

He is good looking in an elegant way.

“Anyone speak German?” A cultured, well-modulated voice. “You can ask me any question you like.”

“Will they kill us?”

“Aber was, meine Damen!”—with a slight, humorous smile. “Try another one, please.” If there is room for another question, I think quickly, then the unspoken answer is “No.” “Will our hair be shaved?” He eyes me boldly, with interest, as if he’d heard my mind ticking. Is it possible I am still attractive? On the threshold of physical destruction, is it the body that still matters? That has a last demand? Is it like the last ejaculation of a hanged man, the biological response of a mind already dead? “Your hair will be cut short,” he looks at me directly, “and it will grow quickly.”

What is he saying? Is it a promise of life, or is it the last comfort given to those who are going to die?

Cesia and I are the only two left talking to him. “My name is Dieter.”

I can’t see a yellow stripe above his red triangle. “Are you Jewish?”

“No.”

“Why are you here then?”

A short amused smile, a laugh. “Mein liebes Fraulein, there are others who hate them too.”

I look at him, surprised. He is serious now.

“In Vienna I was a lawyer. I’ve already forgotten the telephone number of my office, but this,” he points to the piece of white cloth with a number on it, stitched to his jacket, “this I’ll never forget!” He looks me straight in the eyes. “You better remember it too, I might be able to help you.”

“What is Auschwitz?” I ask.

He throws his head back and gives a short, throaty laugh. “Auschwitz exists only in Auschwitz. What is possible in the outside world is impossible here; what is possible here, in Auschwitz, can never happen in the outside world. Are you hungry?”

He snaps his fingers and a boy comes out from nowhere, running towards him. The pants of his pasiak are too long, the sleeves of his coat cover his hands. Without looking at him, Dieter barks a short order. The boy dissolves into the maze of stripes and reappears carrying a white, enamel bucket full of a steaming liquid. A shiny, deep ladle hangs at the side.

Another magic moment, a soap bubble that bursts before it reaches full size. Friday night and my mother ladling out the chicken soup—it looks the same, but it can't be.

“Bitte, trinken Sie.”

We don't move. The aroma of tea invades our nostrils, we feel nauseous from hunger. How strange, are we afraid the tea might be poisoned?

Dieter watches, as if reading our minds. “Ach, so,” he says and plunges the ladle into the bucket and slowly takes a long sip. Without a word he passes the ladle to me. We drink the hot, sweet tea. More, more. We can't stop, we drink and drink. We've never tasted anything like it, there has never been anything like it—this tea from a white bucket, drunk with a ladle like my mother's in a place called Auschwitz.

The boy brings sandwiches. I look inside—honey and sardines. Nothing surprises me anymore. Dieter says “Aufwiedersehen,” and looks at me meaningfully. I don't understand. . . .

A shout. The space around us empties of people in stripes. Suddenly there are many of us girls, women, strangers. We have to undress, leave all our clothes behind and carry shoes in our hands. I lick the oozing honey and push the sandwich into the shoe. Cesia does the same. We are naked and still women. We run in single file between barbed wire, men stand on both sides looking, leering, lecherous. Some laugh, while some shouted obscenities. I see Dieter: there's a lewd twist to his lips that has changed his face. He isn't handsome any more, he isn't elegant any more.

I shout at him in anger: “Are you satisfied with the process of entmenschlichkeit? (dehumanization)?” I've never heard this word before—where did it come from? Has it always been in the human language? Or did it come to me at that very instant, when my humanity was violated and the world outside looked into Auschwitz—and was silent?

Context: Concentration Camps and Prisons

Source: Kitia Altman. Memories of Ordinary People: For Those Who Have No One to Remember Them. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2003, pp. 324–329. Used by permission.

Having survived incarceration at Auschwitz, Kitia Altman was transferred to the women's camp at Ravensbrück, in Mecklenberg, northern Germany. She describes the camp as being “clean and cold” when compared to Auschwitz. In this account, she outlines a little of what life was like for her at Ravensbrück, where discipline was meted out by antisemitic Polish prisoners and there was little opportunity for obtaining the little strategic advantages that would come in a corrupt system. She shows, moreover, that attitudes and behavior among the prisoners were far from predictable, and often did not even align with each other in this strange environment.

If any place could be a colour, Ravensbruck would be ice blue.

If there was only one adjective to describe it, it would be sterile.

And that's how I remember it: Cold and coldly sterile. Perhaps it was the time of year, wet and cold October, or maybe it seemed like that to me because I had come straight from Auschwitz.

Auschwitz, for all its horror, still seethed with humanity, albeit tortured and degraded. Screams, moans and howling were all human sounds. You could hear voices even if the words were incomprehensible. Here and there a name would be called, a name that could belong to hundreds of women, yet occasionally someone answered. But more often a name would be called repeatedly, each time with more despair until the voice ended in a shriek or a sob or simply faded amidst the other voices.

There was the all-prevailing smell of burning flesh and the putrid smell of open latrines, overflowing with human excrement like a mustard-coloured river. And there was the smell of Lysol, trying to suppress all other smells.

Ravensbruck, on the other hand, was clean and cold.

It was silent, the silence of death.

We were marched off to work in the early hours of the morning. Silence. No orchestra, no shouting. Only cold and silence.

The stone quarry was a long way away from the camp. We were given some sort of oilcloth covers as protection, not enough to keep us dry. Our hands turned blue from cold, too stiff to hold tools. It was impossible to work and the guards knew it. Yet we wanted to work, to avoid punishment and to keep warm.

Not even the roof and the four walls of the barracks could keep out the cold.

It was a known fact among us, veterans of several other camps, that Ravensbruck was run by Polish women, unlike Auschwitz, where the top positions were in the hands of Slovak Jewish women.

Our Blockalteste was Zofia. She has a pasty pallor and huge, dark rings under her watery blue eyes. She was a lesbian with a hoarse, rasping voice. She took narcotics and we soon learnt to tell when Zofia had been deprived of her dose. She became wild and raged, her strength was unbelievable and she destroyed everything in her grasp. She broke planks from bunks, tore up sacks filled with straw, hit, mutilated and even crippled other prisoners. To be a Jew on her Block was dangerous.

All the Jewish women were strictly segregated from the other prisoners in one part of the Block. There was no way to hide or protect ourselves from Zofia when she was in a deranged state and charged into our section.

There was only one person who could restrain her rages and calm her down: Pani Maria. Pani Maria was our Stubenalteste. Her family was old Polish aristocracy. Her name was hyphenated and at the time it impressed me greatly, but I have since forgotten it. She came to Ravensbruck when the Germans started to arrest members of the Polish intelligentsia, in a bid to remove leaders from the rest of the populace.

Pani Maria had the looks of a typical Polish noblewoman and not even Ravensbruck could change her demeanour. Her head was held high, her hair worn in a tight knot above her neck. She was a buxom woman with a narrow waist that curved generously into her hips then spread like a fan into a large swaying behind. She spoke German with a hard Polish accent and used only a limited and functional vocabulary. To emphasise that the language had been forced on her, she chose not to speak it correctly or fluently.

She welcomed any opportunity to have a conversation in Polish. Being in the Jewish part of the Block, she only had a chance to speak it when a transport of Polish Jews arrived. Ours was one such transport and soon some of us, myself included, established a respectful contact with Pani Maria.

But nothing prepared me for the scene I witnessed.

One evening our group returned from work, weary, cold, and with profound depression setting in. Gradually we had come to realise that although the threat of the gas chambers was no longer imminent, in this camp we would be worked to death. Here the work was real, not like Auschwitz where it had been devised as another form of torture and degradation. Here there was a daily quota of stones that had to be wrenched from the hostile ground and delivered—or else. Unlike Auschwitz, where a system of “organizing” had been highly developed and widely used and where bartering was part of daily existence, in Ravensbruck it was impossible to obtain an extra portion of bread or watery soup. There was nothing to buy or sell. Occasionally and only if one was there long enough, you could “sell” services, such as mending clothes. My friend Cesia was particularly good at this and succeeded once or twice in scoring an extra portion of bread. As we were unable to supplement our food or obtain warmer clothes, we became more and more disheartened. We felt abandoned by the world and despite not being threatened daily by a “selection,” we had the fear of becoming unfit for work, collapsing and being left to die. Our spirits were sinking rapidly.

On that particular evening, we had returned from work to find the whole Block in a state of uproar and confusion. A transport of Hungarian Jewish girls had arrived. They were bewildered, frightened and could not comprehend what had happened during the few days between Budapest, Auschwitz and Ravensbruck. They had been brutally taken away from their families, yet still hoped that they had just lost them in the confusion of arriving in a strange country where no one spoke their language. They called out names, cried and stretched out their arms in gestures of despair.

It had been a long while since we had seen such a display of emotion. Our descent into the Valley of Degradation had started four years ago. Since then, we had learned not to feel or think. These girls, although not as emaciated as us, were much worse off. They still had in front of them the shock of realizing what had happened.

In the midst of the commotion I distinguished a single voice, soothing and calm, repeating in Polish: “Spokojnie, spokojnie.”

Pani Maria was kneeling in front of a young girl, washing her bleeding knee. She whispered softly: “Quietly, my child, quietly, don’t be afraid.”

The timbre of her voice, if not the actual words, eventually penetrated the consciousness of the girls and one by one, they calmed down. Pani Maria smiled reassuringly, putting her arms around some, stroking the matted hair of others.

I watched the scene, stunned.

After evening roll-call, I timidly approached Pani Maria and asked to speak with her. She had a bed for herself in our part of the barrack. It had a sheet and a thick blanket. She invited me to sit at the foot of the bed.

“Pani Maria”, I asked, “do you like Jews?”

“No, not at all.”

“But,” I said hurriedly, “I saw you being so kind to those Hungarian Jewish girls.”

“My child,” she said, making herself more comfortable on the bed, “these wretched girls are human beings first and Jews only second.”

My mind was confused. I could not understand the neat, surgical separation of human beings from Jews. Back home in Poland, we were always Jews. From time to time, in a condescending manner, someone might say, “But Jews are human beings too.”

Pani Maria continued: “I am a member of the National Democratic Party.”

“The NDP? Endecja? The most anti-semitic party in Poland?”

“Yes, that’s true. But as you know, our motto is: “Economic boycott yes, but physical violence, no.” My child, this place is not Poland. These Jews are not an economic threat. To me they are all poor, persecuted human beings.”

I listened in disbelief. Here we had Zofia, a simple and brutal person to whom the fact of being a human being had no value at all. She was in a position of power given to her by a system based on an ideology of supremacy of one group over another. At the bottom of this hierarchy were Jews. Anyone was superior to a Jew.

And here I was, talking to a cultured, intelligent person in our mother tongue, who put her ideology of civilized hate away to nurture us with the milk of human kindness.

Pani Maria continued: “When the war is over, I’ll be as anti-semitic as before. I’ve accepted the duties of a Stubenalteste in the Jewish barrack only so I can protect the Jews from Zofia’s violence, which is unjustified. I will protect you here as best as I can. But I don’t want you back in Poland. Yet I don’t like to see you suffer like this either! It is inhuman.”

Some time in December 1944, when we were moved from Ravensbruck, I took with me the memory of the humanitarian Maria and vowed always to cherish it. However, the contrasting roles the two women played became blurred with time.

I hope Pani Maria survived and returned to Poland. I have fulfilled her wish and never returned to the land of my birth. It is clear to me now that we were as equally victimized by Zofia’s brutality as we were by Pani Maria’s ideology.

Toward the end of the war, concentration camp prisoners were exploited increasingly as slave labor for the purpose of making up for the rapidly depleting workforce, as all German men were conscripted for military service. Kitia Altman found herself working in an underground facility that produced V-2 rockets. By December 1944, however, with the war in both the West and the East going badly for the Germans, the regime being experienced by the prisoners began to soften slightly. Then, without warning, the factory was evacuated and the women with Kitia were once more on the move. Instead of facing an imminent demise, however, the group was confronted by a thoroughly unanticipated development: their liberation. As Kitia shows though, despite their new status as free women, and with the opportunity to build new lives, “we were never totally liberated from our past.”

I sit in front of a blank page trying to conjure up a memory, any memory, stored in my mind from that time I cannot forget.

I find myself plunging my hand into the seemingly inexhaustible reserve of incidents, faces and events. What will the price be this time? Horror? Redemption? Pain? Humour?

Humour? How can anything that happened during the Holocaust be funny?

Well, it can, and it was.

Galgenhumor, gallows humour. The humour of the condemned was our defence against the dehumanisation, though we were unaware of this at the time.

Once when the air was foul with smoke from the crematoria, I heard a woman say: “That’s him. I can smell his feet.” The pent-up fear broke as we laughed longer and louder than the occasion warranted. The woman must have repeated the words to countless terrorised and frightened “newcomers” to shock them out of their fear, and to make the bizarre familiar. I found out the woman wasn’t married, so the feet she referred to were but a grim joke!

Calling someone a Schmuckstick, literally an ornament, was another endearment meant to ridicule our horror of physical deterioration: “Don’t let yourself go. You’ll look like a Schmuckstick.”

I’ve read that in some camps girls made up funny, satirical verses about the food, their looks and behavior. They sang these to the tune of pre-war tangos, fox-trots and waltzes. Inmates wrote and performed their own “revues” to the great delight and applause of their friends. The fun they made of themselves gave them the courage to face reality and spurred them on to spin dreams of the future.

After the usual Sunday delousing session, my head rested on the knees of my friend who performed the vital task of searching for hair lice, Cesia and I would engage in our own well-rehearsed dialogue which never ceased to amuse us.

One would say: “Oh, how I’ll miss this crackling sound!”—of a crushed louse between two fingernails. To which the other would reply: “Don’t worry! I’ll save you one for after the war.”

Humour was an important tool in our survival kit. It released our fear and gave voice to our hopes. But you needed friends to laugh with and friends whom humour could help. The humour of Auschwitz was cruel and brutal, because it had to prepare and toughen you for the hell into which you had been thrown. It hurt, but it made you stronger. However, not everyone could take the medicine.

This “funny” memory dates from a time long after Auschwitz. Perhaps not that long in terms of calendar days, because we didn’t count that way any more. What we counted were events—the unpredictable, unscheduled and often inexplicable.

We had been out of Auschwitz for three months; however, this was not clear to us until much later. We had almost settled down to a routine of working in the salt mine producing V-2 rockets, Hitler’s last secret weapon. We felt safe, far from the crematoria and falling bombs. We worked among German civilians, highly-skilled professional engineers, technicians and other experts in their respective fields. Our work was considered essential to the war effort and as a result our conditions, by comparison, were bearable.

It was Christmas 1944 and the earth’s belly kept us warm. On Christmas Eve, we were given thick soup and a larger portion of bread. We had heard from a reliable source that the following day everyone was to get a boiled potato, still in its skin.

Cesia and I were joined by another girl from Bedzin, our hometown. Her name was also Cesia and we called her “Little Cesia.” She was sixteen years old and the war was in its fifth year. She speculated whether this would be the pattern of our lives forever.

Just when such thoughts started to penetrate our minds, the journey back from the realm of evil began.

One day, it must have been in April, we didn’t go down the mine. None of us liked any change to the routine as we didn’t know what it would bring. How were we to know whether the next cattle train would be our last, or perhaps the first of our journey back to life?

The female SS officer, the one with a crown of blonde plaits around her head, called us and put her arms on the shoulders of the two girls nearest her. “Meine kinder (my children),” she said. “Anyone who needs clothes, please tell me. The warehouse is full of them.”

No one spoke. We all wore regulation stripes and in a camp no one wants to look different. We immediately suspected a trap. Next, another SS officer addressed us. “Frauleins (young ladies), please follow me in a formation of five. We are leaving the camp.” We felt no joy, just fear, the only human emotion left to us.

The column of undulating stripes moved quickly. Some guards, guns on their shoulders and malicious smirks on their faces, said: “This time you’ve had it! You’ll dig your own graves!” It was possible, but it didn’t add up. Meine kinder and Frauleins from the officers and this from the common guards?

The cattle wagons were waiting. The open doors revealed floors scantily covered with straw, but straw nevertheless! There were ramps in front of doors. No one shouted, no one pushed. The officer carefully counted sixty into each wagon. We had always “travelled” in hundreds before.

“Please sit down and leave a space near the door free.”

An elderly German soldier hopped in and placed a gun across his knees. The door closed and we heard the familiar clang of an iron bar. Inside, the wagon was dark. We uttered a sigh of relief—with a German among us, we felt safe. They wouldn’t drop gas or shoot at random if he was there. Only one German, yet we felt protected by his presence.

Our little group sat on the floor in silence, as did the others. The German calmly puffed at his pipe. We smelt the tobacco and saw flickers of sparks. The train moved slowly and no one knew what direction it took. We lost count of the hours. The little window in the wagon darkened and then after a while, a thin timid light managed to find its way through. Another day.

The German puffed at his pipe, the gun still across his knees. Suddenly the train came to a halt.

“Raus, raus, alle raus! Los!” Perhaps the smirking guards had been right after all.

The station was small and the sign bearing its name had obviously been removed. A tiny white square of a house was the sole visible structure. It seemed to be empty and it was. We were pushed in quickly and roughly. A double bunk was the only furniture and this was demolished in seconds by the surge of striped bodies. The door above a high stone step was slammed loudly. A small window was painted over with white wash.

In no time, we stood ankle deep in urine, faeces and vomit. Girls cried, wailed and called for help. The Germans opened the door and the stinking mass flowed out towards them. The door was quickly shut again.

The guards had been right, we would die here, drowning in our own excrement.

The girls near the window scratched off a bit of the white wash and we took turns to put one eye to it. Someone saw white buses arriving on the clean, empty platform. They had red crosses painted on their sides. We began to scream in terror.

“Alle Juden raus! Schnell, los!”

The door opened again and we scrambled out, our legs and the hems of our dresses stained with brown muck. We watched as horror entered the eyes of men wearing strange uniforms with Red Cross armbands. They motioned for us to enter the white, ambulance-like buses. No one budged. The men looked baffled and approached the German guards. The guards, their backs to us, tried to make them understand we were frightened because we thought the buses were gassing vans. We heard the word “Gaz, Gaz.”

No one knew what the men from the Red Cross thought, but one of them must have understood. He slapped his forehead with an open palm, then smiled broadly. He entered the bus and closed the door behind him. After a few minutes, a triumphant expression on his face, he opened the door and like a stage actor making a sweeping gesture, invited us all in.

Again, no one budged. Puzzled, he looked at the guards. This time we performed the pantomime, pointing to the motor saying “brr, brr” and by twisting a wrist, indicated turning a key. This time the Red Cross men quickly understood.

We wanted the motor turned on and only then for one of their men to enter the bus and close the doors. The men, satisfied they had finally understood our bizarre behavior, waited for us to move. Some of us were so weak we were unable to do so without support.

Erna, a Czech woman, was thin and straight as a rod. Even then, with her glasses askew, she looked like someone’s efficient and dedicated secretary. Her face carried a look of perpetual disapproval mixed with disbelief. Erna had always refused to acknowledge what was happening to her and around her. She believed someone had made a terrible mistake and would soon apologise for messing around with her orderly world. We protected her, so innocent was she of evil.

A young strong man ran and lifted her up in his arms, her thin dirty legs dangling from the wooden clogs. Suddenly we heard Erna’s voice, firm and clear: “At last, in the arms of a man again.”

Initially we just giggled, then the laughter took on a momentum of its own. It was deep, liberating, humanizing laughter. We no longer thought of Erna; we laughed because we had discovered we were alive—not only in a physical sense, our bodies still moving and our eyes still seeing, but also emotionally. We were alive because our senses had started to serve us again! We had registered feelings other than paralyzing, destructive fear.

We saw sunshine, we saw a cleanly swept platform that didn’t hide any gruesome ghosts of terror and we could see the comical side of this unremarkable moment. Smelly, clumsy, pitiful and emaciated, we rejoiced in our freedom to laugh and be human again.

In years to come we used this freedom to rebuild our lives, to start families, learn professions and trades and to acquire experiences.

Yet, we were never totally liberated from our past.

FRED ANTMAN

Context: Before the War

Source: Fred Antman. A Tale of Three Cities: Berlin, Shanghai, Melbourne. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Library, 2011, pp. 28–29, 33–34. Used by permission.

An eight-year-old boy in 1938, Fred Antman came from a Berlin Jewish family. He was subjected to various antisemitic measures at school, and then, in October of that year, witnessed the arrest and deportation of his Polish-born father—part of the much larger events leading, eventually, to the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938. Fred’s young age precluded him from appreciating fully the significance of what was happening, and it is interesting to note that in this account he is vague concerning precise dates. As the account proceeds, however, we see his later thoughts enter the picture, as he reflects on subsequent developments from his country of sanctuary, Australia.

The Nazis gradually began to target religious events. On 28 October 1938 my brother David became bar mitzvah in the Rykestrasse Synagogue. This was an exciting day for us and the reception that evening was our last family simcha (celebration) in Germany. The very next day the Nazi party decreed Jewish gatherings illegal, whether they were social or religious. The Rykestrasse Synagogue was to be burnt down in the following month, along with most of the other synagogues in Berlin, but as it was built within a block of apartments, private interests prevailed and it was only wrecked. Today it is Berlin's oldest synagogue, standing proudly where it always has.

Since I was six years old I had attended a public school not far from our home. Suddenly I found that my classmates began avoiding me and would not allow me to participate in sporting events. I was given the cold shoulder. When I asked one of the boys why they were doing this, he told me that his father had ordered him not to have any contact with "Jew boys." Things deteriorated, and some of the boys began to set on me on the way home. They bashed me every day and called me "Dreckiger Jude" (dirty Jew).

My parents saw my dilemma and made arrangements to enroll me in a prestigious Jewish day school at the other end of the town. This required me to make a long subway journey to get there, but the environment in that school made me very happy. I made new friendships and most importantly was able to participate in the school's sporting events. I was a good athlete. . . .

October and November 1938: I clearly remember that at 6.00 one morning there was a knock at our door. It was the Gestapo. They told my father to get dressed quickly, pack a suitcase with the bare essentials and come with them. They offered no explanation.

My father came into our room and kissed my brother and me before leaving the house. As we were curious kids we ran to the window in time to see him being loaded onto a waiting truck. We did not believe we would ever see him again. This happened between 29 and 29 October 1938, when all Polish-born Jews were deported under the famous Nazi Polenaktion. My father's brother, Kalman, was deported at the same time.

As part of the ongoing campaign to destroy Jewish life in Germany, the authorities began deporting Polish Jews back to Poland. Poland refused to accept the 16,000 to 18,000 Jews who remained stranded in the border town of Zbaszyn. My father and his brother were among them. In November 1938 highly organized gangs from the SA and SS wreaked havoc on the Jewish population. They smashed the windows of all Jewish establishments and looted their contents. Synagogues were burnt to the ground and Torah scrolls trampled in the streets. Any Jews caught on the streets were beaten to a bloody mess with stanchions. Hitler then had the audacity to demand that the Jewish victims pay for the damage! This was the infamous Kristallnacht. I was only eight years old at the time and witnessed the destruction from the window of our third floor apartment. The next day I walked with my grandfather, Robert Vogel, to find it still burning. I saw the Torah scrolls lying in the streets amid the smashed stained-glass windows. I could not understand how anyone could be so cruel. When I asked my grandfather to explain it to me he could not answer.

While this scourge against the Jews continued, the rest of the world remained silent, distancing themselves from the Nazis' hate campaign. Strangely, a rare voice of real protest came from the Aboriginal people in far off Australia. A meeting of the Australian Aboriginal Advancement League moved a resolution protesting against the cruel persecution of the Jewish people by the Nazi government in Germany. They asked that it be brought to an end. A deputation of Aborigines gathered on the steps of the German Consulate in Canberra to present their resolution and ask the Consul to convey its message to his government. We never knew whether the Consul did so.

Hitler confiscated Jewish properties and assets and imposed heavy taxes on Jewish businesses. With these financial gains he began to build the world's biggest war machine, creating a massive army that put the vast numbers of unemployed men into uniforms, and assembling an arsenal of heavy armory. With Herman Goering he built a superpower air force and dreamed of conquering Europe and, indeed, the world. He eventually succeeded in invading many countries, including Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, France, Belgium and Holland.

HENRY BARCLAY

Context: Before the War

Source: Henry Barclay. Run, Henry, Run. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, pp. 73–80, 81, 85–86, 87–89. Used by permission.

In this account, Henry Barclay, a student from Poland studying in France, provides a fascinating view of what it was to be a Jew outside the danger zone. His family remained in Poland, but he was all too aware of developments in Germany and what they represented for the Jews—and also for Poland. On September 1, 1939, Germany attacked Poland; with France and Britain declaring war on Germany two days later, Henry decided that he had little other alternative than to join the French army. Although he received employment in early 1940, he instead joined the French Foreign Legion—a remarkable journey for a Polish Jewish graduate of a French university.

During that last year at university I shared my working space in the laboratory with Lamasuta and ate my meals with the Russian lady as usual. I also met a young student in the library who came from Lvov. His name was William Henshaw.

Anti-Jewish propaganda gathered further strength after a Polish Jew shot dead a German diplomat in Paris in November 1938. That dead man was the third secretary at the German Embassy and that incident led to Kristallnacht, the “night of broken glass.” Antisemitic riots broke out in Germany and Austria. Synagogues were destroyed and shops looted. Many photos of these events were published in the world press. Everyone knew what was going on.

In my mail from home my parents had already mentioned the deportation of Polish Jews from Germany and said that there was now a committee in Lvov to help these German Jews. All kinds of rumours circulated in the coffeehouses I frequented but I had no time for them. I had to study.

I tried to contact Jurek to find out how he had done in his final exams in chemistry. But my search was in vain—he seemed to have vanished into thin air. I got in touch with his friend Nanette, but she too was unable to find him. Nanette began helping me understand the French language terms used in physics, because the Polish-French dictionary I had was useless on this subject. She had worked as a secretary for years and was a very capable young lady. Her linguistic assistance to me regarding the laws of physics was invaluable. We often met in coffeehouses, but sometimes also at my place. She was engaged to a wealthy businessman called Pierre, who also helped me. My uni friends began spreading a rumour about my having a new girlfriend, but Nanette was like a sister to me and she was a big help.

From the beginning of 1939 the money my parents sent from Poland suddenly became irregular. Sometimes it was sent through Belgium. I had the feeling that my financial situation was about to become very unstable. My university situation friends from Poland were experiencing the same problem and I began to wish that the university year was over.

By the beginning of June 1939 I was putting the final touches to my study for the final exams. My program was nearly finished so I contacted a few of my friends who had completed the exam the year before and asked them what it was like. I did not leave one stone unturned. I wanted to know everything I could about the exams from previous years. My first exam was in laboratory work; then came an oral exam and the last exam was in industrial chemistry. I remember the day of my exams well. I left home very early and on approaching the main entrance to the university a black cat ran across the street. I was superstitious and didn't want to use the front entrance so I went to the side entrance to enter the exam hall. This cost me a few minutes of very precious time. I started to run and arrived at the main exam hall in the nick of time, just as they were closing the door. I was lucky.

After the exams my friends stayed back to discuss in great detail what they had written. I was so tired that I did not stay but went straight home and threw myself on my bed, exhausted. Over the next few days I watched the display area where they published the results on the board. When the chemistry results came in everybody was pressing close to the board to see the results. I came second in the year and graduated very well. I immediately wrote to my parents informing them of my marks. The day was 24 June 1939.

At this time a strange feeling came over me. I felt happy but somehow I did not know what to do next. I was very, very confused. After receiving their diplomas most of my friends, who were mainly Hungarian, left France and returned home. Some of my Polish friends suddenly disappeared and I did not know where they had gone. My Siamese friend, Lama-suta, left in a hurry for Paris. I was left with a lot of free time. I did not know what to do.

I started to read the newspapers to find out what was going on in the world. On the streets of Caen I occasionally came across some people speaking Spanish, remnants from the Republican army who had to leave their country. They were starting a fresh life in France to earn their daily bread. I realized that I had missed a lot of news regarding Adolf Hitler. He and his Brown Shirts were strengthening their dictatorship. The German Jews were the special objects of Hitler's attacks and were subjected to severe persecution. They had been eliminated from civil services, the justice system and medical professions. They had also been asked to hand over their precious stones and metals, such as gold, to Hitler's government. Britain, France and Poland signed a pact to support each other in the event of war.

I could not get my hands on any news from Poland, though I did hear that Polish troops had been sent to German borders. Eventually, at the end of July, a letter came from Poland dated 6 July 1939. My father mentioned that this was the second letter he was sending so as to be sure I would receive one of them. One came, but I never received any others. The letter was addressed to me, the “Engineer Chemist.” I was very proud of this and he was very proud of me. In his previous correspondence he had never mentioned anything about the political climate in Poland. This time he mentioned instability but did not explain it any further. He suggested I should continue my study and specialize in my profession.

He also mentioned that he would like to visit me in the beginning of August, but that he did not know if he would be able to get a visa or enough money. My mother was with my sister on holiday in Muszyna and he told me that they would be coming back to Lvov in two weeks' time. When my mail from Poland was delayed and I did not receive my monthly allowance, I knew something bad was going on in Poland. In the paper I could not find any answers and realized I would have to pay more attention to my survival. I had to make myself a program. First, I had to examine the newspapers daily and listen carefully to the news. Secondly, I arranged with my landlady to pay less rent. She agreed and this was a help.

From the day I arrived in France, I had saved money, so by the time my exams were over I had enough to keep me going for a few months. I also went to the employment office at the university and asked about a job. I had a lengthy discussion with the officer and he said that with my diploma I had a good chance of getting employment, yet this would take time and I would have to be very patient.

I sent two letters to my parents in Poland—one registered, one at the normal rate—hoping for the best. But somehow I felt it was no good staying in Caen, so I went to Paris for a few days to find out more information. The day I arrived was 1 September 1939. I felt like I had jumped from boiling water in Caen to the frying pan in Paris. The hotels were full and I arranged to share a room with some other students, because this was the only way I could stay in Paris. Paris was full of activity with lots of people everywhere. The coffeehouses were filled up and people who did not know each other were talking together like old friends. I tried to buy a newspaper, but they were sold out.

The main news was that on the morning of 1 September 1939 the Polish air force had been nearly completely destroyed on the ground by the Luftwaffe, which also knocked out some of the Polish railways. The Luftwaffe had attacked Warsaw and other Polish cities. They were organized and knew where to hurt the Poles the most.

German motorized forces then swept into Poland. It was a blitzkrieg, a lightning-fast war and something new in the way war was conducted. The fast-moving ground troops moved in conjunction with the air forces and the Polish army was no match for them. In other news I read that France and Britain had declared war on Germany. In the papers I found out that New Zealand and Australia had also joined Britain in the war against Germany.

In my hotel I met a young Jewish girl, a refugee from Germany. She spoke little Polish and I spoke little German. She had managed to escape from Germany, where her parents had lived for many years, but had been expelled back to Poland when the Nazis took over. On coming to France she had lost contact with them and now she was searching for them with the help of a philanthropic organization of German Jews. She was also getting some help from an American refugee organization called HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society), which had an office in Paris. She had been trying to get to America but in those days it was very difficult and time was a factor. I tried to find out more about Hitler from her, but she was very reserved.

I was advised to contact the Red Cross in order to receive news from my parents in Poland. They had big offices in Paris where people could send letters through Switzerland to Poland. They had a lot of requests and I was only one of many trying to get news of people in Lvov. From them I found out that Jews in Germany must wear a yellow Star of David on their clothes. There was war fever in Paris and the old army depots were very, very busy. They had a lot of volunteers wanting to join the French army. I was one of them. I asked if I could add my name to the list and was told that the only way I could join the French army was through the Foreign Legion. I wanted to join as soon as possible, but there were so many people wanting the same thing, they told me it would take a good many months before I would get an answer from them.

My Siamese friends had disappeared into thin air so my dream to work in Siam had been shattered. I could not find them anywhere. I abandoned my dream of working overseas and had to find work as soon as possible to be able to eat; it was not easy for a foreigner.

I left Paris on 29 September 1939 to return to Caen, hoping to find a letter on my desk, but my letterbox was empty. The last letter I received from my father was dated 6 July 1939.

Well, no more coming to Paris, Papa! I started reading the last letter he had sent me, over and over again. The more I read it, the more upset I became. I felt tears coming to my eyes. I felt lost.

After I arrived back in Caen, I went to the town hall, where I told them I would like to join the local civil defense. The Mayor of Caen wrote to me and thanked me for that. Wherever you went in Caen, whatever you did, everybody talked about the war. In Paris they had talked about the mystery behind the Maginot Line, whether it was strong or not, and whether or not Paris could defend itself. Everywhere you went, war was all people were talking about. Still, life must go on. . . .

The following day, 30 September 1939, was my lucky day. The university employment office sent me a letter saying that on 4 October I was to start a job with a company called Société Des Sucreries Ternyck, in the north of France. I was to confirm acceptance and start straight away. Beside the employment office was a library where I immediately borrowed some books on processing sugar from beetroot, which is how SST made theirs. For the next four months, my life was guaranteed. I had a job and now I had to improve my knowledge of sugar manufacturing. And that was that. In just a few hours your whole life can change. . . .

My work with the sugar company came to an end and I got my official certificate of leave on 26 February 1940. It stated that I'd been employed from 4 October 1939 until 25 February 1940, and was signed by the director of the company. . . .

I was sorry to be leaving the factory. I felt comfortable there and my employer had looked after me very well. Now I could live off the money I had received for so many months' work. I was tempted to stay in Paris for a week, but remembered that the French army was on the horizon. So I left for Caen by the shortest route I could find. In Caen I had a surprise waiting for me. It was an important letter from the French army requesting my presence at the Legion army depot in Marseilles. The Foreign Legion was founded by King Louis Philippe of France, for operations outside France. It had always been an elite unit within the French army.

I realized that I had very little time to get there. I contacted my friend William Henshaw and we discussed the future, although you can never really discuss what the future holds. I told him that I would be joining the French army until the end of the war and that I would write to him. I left him some of my possessions and told him that I would go to the Red Cross in Paris. I left him my address and told him to keep in contact with me, because during war, you never know what will happen. There are a lot of surprises every day and life is very unpredictable.

My landlady was sorry to see me go and wished me good luck. I told her I was joining the French army and going overseas. After I said goodbye to some of my friends in Caen I left with a lot of hope for the future. Everyone wished me good luck and I left for Paris. I did not stay long in Paris, where my main objective was to go to the Red Cross and leave them my address before I left for Marseilles.

On the train to Marseilles I met a lot of French soldiers and everyone was talking about the Maginot Line. It seemed that everyone had put all their hopes concerning the war into that line. On the other side, the Germans occupied what was called the Siegfried line, consisting of obstacles, concrete barricades, cannons and fortified structures. This ran along the area opposite the Maginot Line. In the train I felt very confused. I was thinking about my parents and my sister, about what they were doing and what was going on in Poland. I was hoping that I had made the right choice in joining the French army. I took a risk and did not know if I had made the right decision. I hoped that I would get used to it. I also knew that in the Foreign Legion soldiers wore a distinctive white cap called a kepi. On arriving in Marseilles, I noticed a soldier on the platform wearing a kepi and asked him for directions to the army base.

It was a very emotional time for me, because I had never been in the army before and did not know what to expect. It was all a big secret to me. As recruits within the Foreign Legion, we were indoctrinated with the saying: "The Legion is my home, is my family, is my nation." The Legion Mystique was important and had resulted in many heroic acts and military victories. Men of fifty nations wore the white kepis of the Foreign Legion. The Legion's motto was Legio Patria Nostra (the Legion is our Homeland). The Legion had always thought that loyalty to the government of France was secondary to the loyalty to the Legion.

When I arrived at the Legion's office I stressed that I was a volunteer and would be there for the duration of the war. I also mentioned that I preferred to be incorporated into the tank division if possible. They knew I had certain factors in my favour, because I had all the necessary French permits for driving. I knew that within the Foreign Legion there were some of the toughest and most dedicated soldiers the world had ever known. They would live for the Legion and die for it too. For them the glory of the Legion surpassed all else. It took me a very short time to adopt this motto, because this is the only way I knew I would be a good Legionnaire.

France had always employed the Legion at the forefront of its colonial wars. I was told that I would be sent to the most famous military depot, at Sidi Bel Abbes in Algeria. The medical examination and physical testing of volunteers were very thorough in the Foreign Legion; they tried to eliminate all people not suitable for the army. I was tired after all the tests and there was no pause for a cup of tea between them; it was all hard work. Finally, they vaccinated us. We all queued up together—the big ones, small ones, skinny ones, fat ones. There was a six-foot-tall chap in front of me with magnificent muscles. I really envied him. I think he was a Yugoslav. I was a little shrimpy beside him. He was vaccinated before me and within the blink of an eye he had fainted into my arms. He was very heavy! Eventually I came before the doctor and asked him for my injection. He said: “You got yours when you were holding the Yugoslav!” And he winked at me. This was my day.

BRONIA BEKER

The love story between Bronia and Joseph (Josio) Beker was, if nothing else, characterized by devotion. In Bronia’s account of their attempt to avoid detection by the Nazis in the ghetto, followed by their escape to a secure refuge in the countryside, we see the physical stamina—and sacrifice—required for a successful time in hiding. We also see the efforts of a young woman to come to terms with why it was that she had the good fortune to fall in with Josio, whose connections enabled him to find ways to stay alive in spite of the many obstacles placed in their way. Finally, Bronia’s story provides us with a glimpse of some of the many challenges facing those who sought to stay ahead of the Nazis and keep away from harm.

One day in April 1943, a few days before Passover, the Germans surrounded the ghetto. Always on the lookout, we saw what was happening. In general, we slept very little, walked around at night on alert, and never got undressed to go to sleep. That day, we all ran down to the bunker, where we had food already prepared and cots to lie on. On a previous occasion, we had stayed there for two days and the Germans had gone through the house without finding anybody. On that day in April, ten of us went down: me, my father and sister, my half-brother with his two daughters, and my sister-in-law and her three children. After about six hours, we heard heavy boots running down the steps to our cellar. They were looking for us, digging.

We held our breath and didn’t move for about half an hour, until they left without finding our bunker. But the pipes through which we got air must have gotten covered during their digging. We couldn’t breathe. I was the weakest of all of us because of the typhus that I had just barely recovered from. I remember seeing my father sitting on the floor in his prayer shawl, praying, and my brother with a hammer in his hand trying to open the entrance to the bunker. Then I fell down and everything went black.

When I woke up, or, rather, when the doctor brought me out of my unconsciousness, I opened my eyes and saw many people around the bed in which I was lying. My cousin Cyla was beside me. The first thing I asked was, “Where is my sister Sarah?” When I saw the looks on their faces, I understood that she was gone. Everybody in that bunker except for me, all nine of them, had suffocated. I was alone.

I became wild with grief. When the doctor tried to give me an injection to calm down I grabbed him by the throat, wanting to kill him for bringing me back to life. I had felt so peaceful while sleeping, and it seemed to me that I had been woken from a good, sound sleep to face a dreadful life, alone and terrified. I could hardly move my right foot, which was very swollen and had a big sore where my garter had been holding my stockings. Because I fell first and was face down, I was close on the ground where there was still oxygen while everybody on top of me struggled for air. Somehow I survived, but I could taste the lime floor in my breath for a long time afterward.

I had been unconscious for about twenty-four hours. I was told that the day after the Germans left, my aunt got out of her bunker and, knowing where ours was, came looking for us. She opened it and called, but no one answered. She found everybody dead. Some neighbours started to pull out the bodies one by one. When they pulled away the body on top of me they tore away my garter, which had dug itself into my swollen flesh and left a wound on my leg.

When Josio came into my room he was stunned. I will never forget the look on his face—he could not believe that I was alive. I couldn’t understand it myself. I believe it was fate. From then on, Josio took care of me. I was completely helpless and couldn’t walk because of my sore leg. I would never have survived on my own and didn’t care at all. On that horrible April day it felt as though I had lost everybody. Only Josio had survived. He told me that the Germans had caught a thousand people, told them to dig their own graves, and then killed them all. Then the Nazis made the ghetto smaller yet again.

As I lay in bed, watching the peasants come into the house to take what they wanted, I thought how dear every little item had been to my mother, how she had collected those things over the years, how she had kept everything. It was a horrible experience, lying there in bed wanting to die, to go to sleep and not wake up. But Josio wanted me to live, so I did. He still had his mother, brother and sister, and their house remained within the new border of the ghetto. He gave me a small room at the back of his house and I moved in, taking the bare necessities and leaving the rest.

I could not figure out why he wanted me. He was so handsome, so good, so everything. He was all a girl could dream of. He could have had his pick of the most beautiful girls in town—there were still a few left—but he wanted me. He took such good care of me, better than a mother would. I lived in that little room in Josio's house for a month. Life was unbearable, but I thought, I can't keep crying and being a burden to Josio, so I told myself that I was away from home on a vacation and would soon be together with my family. Really, I saw no way out, no way of living through that hell. But Josio could get out of the worst situations, and he never gave up.

One day, Josio came running into the house. "The Germans are back in town!" He quickly picked me up and ran, his mother and sister following. We reached the fields outside the village and stayed there the entire night. In the end, we found out that it had been a false alarm, and came back. It was nevertheless clear that we just couldn't live like that anymore. Josio started to look for farmers who would take his mother, brother and sister. He found a few who were willing, but he couldn't trust just anybody. Finally, he found a very nice man, someone he had known for years, who was willing to keep them in a hiding place in his house. Josio and his brother then brought two bullets, thinking that if they were caught they would shoot one German and leave a bullet for themselves.

In the meantime, life in the ghetto became even more unbearable. The Nazis came to town more often, making all kinds of demands. We could tell that the end of the war was near and they were getting desperate. I didn't worry at all. I was not afraid anymore because I just didn't care what happened to me. But Josio did. Josio was making plans with his close friend Kawalek, a dentist, who still had a fair bit of money. The two were very fond of each other. Kawalek had a Protestant friend named Gnidula, who once said to him, "If things go really badly, come to me and I will keep you hidden in my house."

One day, in the middle of May, Josio and Kawalek took Gnidula up on his offer. They went to Gnidula's farm to build a bunker in his barn for us to hide in. They worked for two days, building the bunker under a chicken coop, and then came home. We stayed in the ghetto for two more weeks and then heard an announcement that it was to be liquidated. After June 1, 1943, no one would remain. The Germans were coming to take everybody away. After that date, anyone seen would be shot. We knew that the time had come to leave. Whoever had a place to go, left, and the rest remained, waiting. . . .

I will never forget the exodus from Kozowa. I was leaving everything behind and yet, we were lucky to have a place to go. We sneaked out in the middle of the night so no one would see us. We feared not only the Germans, but also the Ukrainians who lived all around us—they were our greatest enemies after the Germans. Some of them were always ready to point a finger at us, or even kill us themselves.

We left the house and everything in it, leaving the door open. All I took with me was a sheet, a skirt, a coat and pyjamas. We walked for a long time, reaching our destination before sunrise. When Gnidula saw me and Kawalek's wife he was furious. He wanted to take just the men, not the women, and it took a lot of persuasion before he finally agreed to let us stay. I thought that we were in heaven—Gnidula's house stood all alone in the middle of a beautiful field with green grass all around. He was a gardener and he had a strawberry field nearby. It was so very peaceful, a lovely day in June. The sun was shining, everything was green, and I could have stood there forever. But all that beauty was not for me. I had to hide, to bury myself somewhere. When I crawled into our bunker I felt safe. I didn't think that perhaps I was seeing daylight for the last time in my life, or that maybe I would never be able to feel sunshine again or breathe fresh air. It's hard to believe that I was actually happy to be there in the bunker, yet I was. I was thankful to be hidden from the eyes of evil men and to be together with Josio.

The bunker was a dark hole in the ground with an entrance through a camouflaged opening from the chicken coop. In the barn, there was a wall with wheat stacked against it, so when someone came into the barn, only the wheat was visible. We spent our nights in a narrow spot in the barn and moved around a bit in the morning, exercising before going to spend the day in the bunker, where we could only sit or kneel. At night we covered our feet with blankets and for light used a small bottle filled with kerosene and a wick. We played cards to pass the time. Gnidula came once a day to bring us food and tell us the news. He brought me a notebook and a pencil so I could write my thoughts and feelings. He wanted to know what it felt like, being buried alive. I wrote little poems for him, which he always enjoyed reading. I also knitted him a sweater. Every day he left a pail of water in the barn. We washed ourselves even on the very cold days when the water froze. Somehow, despite the ice water, none of us ever caught a cold.

We stayed in Gnidula's bunker for nine months, never raising our voice above a whisper and learning how to sneeze without making a sound so that no one would know we were there. We had to be careful that people who walked by the barn didn't suspect anything because some of them wouldn't have hesitated to call on the Germans. Gnidula kept us well informed about the events of the war. The front lines kept moving closer to us and we had high hopes of surviving. In March 1944, about thirty kilometres from us, the front stopped and remained in one place for a whole month.

We kept waiting for the Soviets to liberate us, but sometimes we couldn't stand it any longer. We felt disgusted, angry and nervous, and we started to fight amongst ourselves. On calmer days we would tell each other our dreams and wishes. I wished that I could go over to a well and drink as much water as I wanted and walk with the wind blowing through my hair. Josio wished that he could cut a piece of bread from a whole loaf. Kawalek wished to drink from a clean, shiny glass. We kept making wishes and playing games and hoping that someday this would all end. When our spirits were low we prayed not to wake up. It would be so easy just to stay asleep forever without thinking.

DONALD (CHIPKIN) BERKMAN

Context: Evading Persecution

Donald Berkman was only an infant when the Nazis attacked the Soviet-occupied part of eastern Poland in the summer of 1941. Moved from his hometown of Druysk to ghettos at Vidzy and then to Swiecziany, the villagers of Druysk eventually arrived at the much larger ghetto of Vilna (Vilnius), where almost all of them were murdered in the enormous bloodletting that took place in the Ponary Forest. While Donald was too young to be fully cognizant of the broader details of his and his family's experience, certain things stand out in his memory—such as his survival with his mother, his being hidden as a result of efforts from a friendly priest, and the experience of “roaming the woods around Vilna until the end of the war.”

1941 had no Halley's Comet, but nonetheless it was a monumental year, a year of great destruction, a year of terrible losses. 1941 was the year of Operation Barbarossa when the Germans, in violation of the Non-Aggression Pact, turned on the Soviets on June 22, 1941, opening the Eastern Front. The Nazis unleashed 4.5 million troops, attacking the Soviet Union along an 1800 mile front, laying waste their lands and killing helpless citizens. In 1941 as the Wehrmacht raped and plundered its way across the USSR, the Einsatzgruppen (special mobile killing units) followed, murdering thousands and thousands of Jews, living in shtetls and cities, for example at the Babi Yar massacre in the Ukraine.

Later in 1941, on December 7, without a declaration of war, the United States Naval Base at Pearl Harbor on the island of O'ahu, Hawaii, was attacked by the Japanese. . . .

1941 was also the year I was born—January 25, 1941. I don't remember much from my early years. I was born in Druysk, a shtetl that my mother has told me about. Druysk was an unusual town because the population consisted of Jews—523; Christians—0.

My father, Yosel Berkman, was a cobbler, just the soles. The customer brought the upper parts of the shoe, and my father attached the uppers to the soles or he repaired the soles on shoes. Yosel had a brother and sister. His father had died young. His mother, Shana, lived with us. My mother, Sara, did handling—she sold salt, herrings, needles, thread, and kerosene and went outside the village and sold these. My parents lived in a one room house with a thatched roof, a dirt floor, an outhouse, and a well for water right outside the house. My mother told me that the Soviets came in after the partition of Poland. They were Communists, but we were not. We were bourgeoisie. They rationed food and other commodities. People did not like them. People who owned land were taken to Siberia. We were not landowners, so they did not bother us. In fact, my mother worked in a Soviet store; they made her work there. She sold only three things in the Soviet store: herring, butter and kerosene.

The Germans came in soon after I was born in 1941. My mother later told me that one day, when I was six months old, there were rumors of a German Aktion (operation involving the mass assembly, deportation and murder of Jews). Everyone ran. However my mother was not in the room, so my aunt who had four children, grabbed me and ran, leaving her own six-month-old baby on the bed. The rumor was a false one. When my mother returned, she asked her sister why she hadn't taken her own baby. My aunt answered: “You have only one child. I had to save him.”

In 1942 the townspeople were removed from Druysk to a ghetto—a small ghetto in Vidzy, where my father and other male relatives cut peat and chopped down trees to be sent back to Germany. The women stayed inside the ghetto—cooking for the men and children. Some worked for the Germans sewing and mending uniforms.

After several months they moved us to Swieciany Ghetto, a bigger ghetto. There too the men worked in the woods cutting trees. When they were finished cutting trees in the one location, they were sent to the forest. They had to be available to work or they were shot.

Then these workers, including my father and all my other relatives, were to be taken to a ghetto near Vilna. Many were transported there from Vilna as well as from the small towns in the Vilna Gubernia. My mother had pneumonia—very bad feelings—about this transport. She hid with me in a closet for three days. When all was quiet again and the commotion had died down, she came out of the hiding place.

From the ghetto near Vilna, my father, his mother, Shana, only fifty two years old, our relatives, and the rest of the Jews from Druysk were taken to Ponar (Ponary) where they were killed in pits. There they were murdered, burned, and buried.

I am haunted to this day, wondering if my father had to watch his mother murdered. I am so glad he did not have to see my mother and me killed.

The six pits there had been used by the Russians for the storage of ammunition, kerosene and gasoline. However the Germans used two of the pits for killing men, women, children and babies. Most of the killing was done by Lithuanians, supported by the Germans. In three other pits, the Sonderkommandos burned the bodies. The Sonderkommandos lived in the sixth pit. The Lithuanians helped because they were grateful to the Germans for expelling the Soviets from Lithuania and promising the Lithuanians their freedom and, after the war, an independent Lithuania.

All the killing of the citizens of Druysk was done in three days in 1942. From the hundreds of Druysk Jews, only twenty-one people survived, including my stepsisters and me—eighteen adults and three children. Of forty-nine members of my family, including first cousins, only my mother and I survived.

After we had escaped deportation to Ponar, I remember we stayed for about three months in a monastery. The priest we knew arranged for us to hide there. The monks kept us for a while. My mother was kept there as a cleaning woman. They gave me a Polish name, Micha. One of the monks made a little cross for me. I walked around the monastery wearing this tiny cross. The monk also taught me Catholic prayers. When the Germans came around, the monks turned us away because they were afraid of being killed.

We then went into the woods, roaming the woods around Vilna until the end of the war. We went around searching for households that were sympathetic to Jews, for people who would give us bread. Basically we lived in the woods for almost three years, scrounging around for food.

My mother was good at healing, using plants from the woods. Once I had a bad infection on my head. During the night she went into a barn and got pitch that was used on the cart wheels, and she put that pitch on my head. Pitch is loaded with coal tar, the same ingredient that is in tar soap and the black salve that people used to use. The wound on my head healed. Another time my hands were covered with an infection. My mother took my urine and put this on my hands and they healed. Urine contains urea so perhaps this healed my infected hands. Another time I had worms that came out in my stool. My mother saw this and fed me garlic, which helped.

At the beginning we tried to hook up with the partisans; however, the partisans would not take my mother because she had a child. The partisans were afraid of children. They thought the children crying, if they were with the group, would disclose their hiding place. They would have taken her if she would leave me because she was handy and strong. But she did not want to leave me—thankfully! Therefore the partisans would not take us. They chased us away. They were afraid that I would cry. Many people had suffocated their children rather than allowing them to cry and betray the group to the enemy. . . .

I remember the cold in the forest. I was always cold. Neither mother nor I had warm clothing. I did not even have a jacket. Lithuania has very cold winters and where we were was particularly cold. I was always cold, cold!

Clothes were definitely a problem. I grew out of mine. Mother's clothing became tattered and worn. Throughout the war she had only one dress. By the end of the war there was no material available, not for anyone. Mother eventually had to carry me in the front of her body. I helped cover her, and also her body heat kept me warm.

To keep warm at night when we slept, my mother would make a shelter of branches, or she would look for potato pits. Poor people, at that time and place, didn't have basements, so they dug holes in the ground where it was colder but where it would not freeze. They stored their extra food such as potatoes in these holes. They would line the holes with leaves, drop the potatoes in, and then cover the opening with a board, and place more leaves on top of the board. Potatoes were very important because they were one of the staples; peasants ate bread, potatoes, and herring.

My mother found these holes by scuffing her shoes along the ground. When she found a pit, we would sleep there. We would crawl in, piling leaves on top of us to keep us warm. At night, in these holes we were warmer than we would have been, exposed to the wind, snow, and cold.

We awoke early in the morning. First thing: we would try to find water. The morning dew settled on the leaves, so we licked the leaves or the blades of grass.

Then mother and I foraged for berries, wild mushrooms, anything that grew in the forest or fields. We often went in to fields to steal a little corn. Corn from the fields was the best—sweet.

Toward the end of the war we found a dead horse. Mother cut pieces from the carcass and we ate them. We ate them raw; we could not have a fire because it would have signaled the Nazis that we were in the woods. In addition, mother had no way to light a fire. I still remember the good taste of meat.

After we ate something, we would hide in the forest for the rest of the day, we could not risk being seen. Mother would make a shelter of branches where we could rest until nightfall. At night we looked for more food. Then we could go up to houses; this was too dangerous during the day. We looked through the windows to see inside if there was a woman alone. Women tended to be more sympathetic. If a woman was in the house alone, my mother would knock. However, my mother would not try to knock if through the window she had seen a man. But sometimes we were so hungry, she had to knock anyway. She was afraid a man would turn us in. Some women and some men helped. Most turned us away.

After we ate, we looked for a place to sleep during that night.

This is how we spent most of our days and nights while we were hiding in the forests.

A boy in the Warsaw Ghetto, Henry Borenstein was left largely to himself as various beloved members of his family became victims of the Holocaust. With little else to keep him in the ghetto, he decided that the only way he could take his revenge on the Nazis was to find a means to escape the ghetto and join the fight outside. This account relates his efforts to leave, and his subsequent flight; wandering the countryside and encountering other, smaller ghettos, he eventually boards a train for one more village—only to experience a shock when he arrives at his destination.

This event happened in the later half of 1942. My mother and my two aunts were both gone. I was alone.

One day I heard shooting in the yards and German voices screaming: “Alle runter! Alle runter!” “Everybody down!” I was living on the second floor. On the staircase was a window leading to a ledge that was about twelve inches wide. Without thinking too much about it, I climbed out of the window and onto the ledge. The drop to the ground was about four to five metres. I shuffled along the ledge, holding onto the wall, and managed to reach the opening to the shul by walking along the rafters.

I think I have mentioned already that in our yard, the second yard at 35 Nawleski, there were three synagogues: a stibl on the ground floor; behind that the Mizrachi place, and the main synagogue. I lay down on the rafters of the main synagogue and covered myself with a lot of holy books, just in case the Germans decided to look around. The women’s balcony was about four metres below me, but the staircase leading to it had been removed. So there was no way anyone could reach me from inside the shul.

Looking out through the holes I recognized someone I knew. Her name was Lonia. She married just before the war broke out and worked as a seamstress for my aunt. She was heavily pregnant with her first child and now the Germans had her. From my shelter I could see her terrified face. Lonia is another person I knew who is now gone.

I could still hear shooting in the yard and lay there under the books until everything went quiet again.

I stepped out into Nalewski Street, where lay the scattered belongings of the people who had just been taken away. I spied some potatoes dropped there by one of the victims and gathered up maybe two or three kilos of them. These potatoes enabled me to survive in the ghetto for another two or three days.

A few days later I managed to escape from the concrete jungle of the ghetto—although that was only the beginning. I was determined that the Germans would never take me alive, that if I could not fight them, then at least I would run and run and run! . . .

I was sitting on the curb of the road, about one hundred metres from the gate on the intersection of Leszno and Zelazna streets, trying to figure out how to sneak out of the ghetto. Suddenly, a Jewish policeman came up to me and asked me if I would go to the baker’s for him and buy some rolls. This shop was about one hundred meters away, on the Aryan side. I said I would go. He told me to come closer to the gate and said he would wave his hand when it is safe for me to go across. He gave me a few zloty, said something to the Polish policeman and then, when the German Żandarm turned his back, he waved to me.

I went through the gate at exactly that moment, while the German had his back turned and the Pole was not watching.

I had only walked a distance of about ten meters on the Aryan side when I was suddenly surrounded by five or six Polish teenagers asking me for money. I knew who these kids were: we called them szchmalcowniki—people who hung around outside the ghetto for the express purpose of black-mailing escapees. They would not hesitate to denounce anyone they found to the Germans.

I already knew that Ukrainian and Latvian soldiers were positioned outside the ghetto to guard the walls and shot anybody who escaped, so I told the Polish boys to move on a bit further where nobody could see us—and then I would give them money.

I continued walking down the road and came to the door of the bakery, where there was a queue of Polish people. I ran inside the shop, leaving the Polish teenagers behind. I saw a door and just ran through it, emerging in the shop's empty back yard. I jumped up onto a tall rubbish bin and managed to scale the high fence. Then I found myself in another yard, but this one led to a street. I stepped out into that street, wondering where I should go next.

I jumped onto a tram and ended up at Dworzec Wschodni, the eastern railway station. I went to the booking office and bought a child's ticket to Rembertow, where my father was living.

There were plenty of Germans standing on the platform, as a hospital train was just passing, full of injured Germans from the Eastern Front. I managed to avoid them and boarded the train to Rembertow, a twenty-minute ride away. Just then I remembered that as a deterrent, the Germans had hanged a few Poles near Rembertow railway station.

I was not long in Rembertow, though I cannot remember exactly how long I stayed there. A couple of weeks after I arrived we heard rumours that the dreaded Einsatzgruppen, the mobile extermination teams, were about to arrive in the town with their killing apparatus. One morning at around seven o'clock I heard some turmoil down at the railway-station end of the ghetto and I just ran out the other side—I think into Okuniewska Street. I didn't even have time to say goodbye to my father. So now I had escaped from two ghettos. By this time it was July and the weather was warm. Where was I to go next?

I had one idea. I decided to go to my uncle Rafael in Falenice. I went to the Rembertow railway station where I saw a few non-Jewish faces. I had been selling cigarettes to an engine driver who drove steam trains and had become friendly with his wife and son, who could not speak. He was mute. He was about seven or eight years old. When I went into the station the little boy saw me and began making noises and pointing his finger at me, to draw his mother's attention to me. I left the station quickly and hid.

Falenice was on the Otwock line, so I decided I would try and go there. I walked from Rembertow to Growchow, a suburb of Warsaw Praga. I took another tram and returned to the railway station to board the train to Falenice, without a ticket. The line to Falenice was narrow gauge. It ran alongside the river Vistula, then turned toward Falenice.

There was a ghetto in Falenice. I sneaked in and found my uncle. I told him what had happened in Warsaw and Rembertow. I had only been there a few days when the Sonderkommando (work unit of Nazi prisoners) arrived at one end of the Falenice Ghetto, and once again I ran out the other end.

Now I was completely on my own, with no friends or relatives to help me. All I had was my burning hatred of the Germans and a passionate desire to live. I did not want to go like a lamb to the slaughter and was determined to manage on my own. I decided I could just walk from village to village, trying to adapt to circumstances as they arose. My only assets were my immaculate Polish language, my green eyes and dark blonde hair.

While in Falenice I heard there were still Jews living in Wysoki Mazowiecki, so once again I jumped on a train without a ticket and went there, only to find that the ghetto had already been liquidated.

MAX BORNSTEIN

Context: Evading Persecution

Jews hid from the Nazis all over Europe. Once a person reached the conclusion that hiding was the most viable option for staying alive, plans had to be made and help sought; successful concealment, essentially a solitary undertaking, was usually not something that could be achieved alone. Max Bornstein was one who tried to do so by himself, and succeeded. As he sought to cross from occupied France into the so-called “free” or Vichy Zone, he faced a number of obstacles which he relates in this absorbing account of his escape.

Restrictions against travel for Jews were becoming increasingly severe, so I had to make a decision based on the most reliable sources of information available and work out a practical strategy that would, I hoped, lead me across the demarcation line. I was afraid that if I waited much longer it would become impossible to get out of occupied France and felt that I had no choice but to act quickly.

Sadly, so many Jews did not see the necessity of escaping, relying instead on Providence, hoping that the good Lord’s mercy would see them safely through this turbulent period. Even when they became aware that there was danger in staying, many chose to ignore it, unwilling to abandon everything they had worked so hard for to flee empty-handed to an unknown fate. My own aunt and uncle with their three children were among them. They lived in a lovely apartment with all the advantages of a secure economic future and chose to remain in Paris. In 1942, the Gestapo came knocking on their door. The three members of my family who were home, my aunt Leah, her son Philippe and her daughter, Luba, were interned in the transit camp in Drancy and from there deported to Auschwitz, where they perished in the gas chambers.

The night before I left Paris for the second time, all my friends again gathered to bid me farewell. We talked long into the night, reminiscing about the many good times we had shared. I will retain these memories of my good and loyal friends forever. I can still hear their last words to me, “Bonne chance, mon vieux. (Good luck, old pal.) We’ll see you after the war.”

A few of my friends came to the station this time to help me buy my ticket in case the clerk asked for identification. One of them was a native-born Frenchman, so the travel restrictions didn’t apply to him. Pretty soon I boarded the train heading for Moulins-sur-Allier, about three hundred kilometres south of Paris. En route, I had time to think about where I should get off the train—an all-important consideration if I was to avoid running into the German inspection that was most likely to occur at the main station there.

When the train got to within thirty kilometres or so of Moulins, I concentrated on looking for a small station or spot in between stations where it might be safe to jump off. All I had with me was a backpack that contained only a few essentials—the best advice I had been given was to travel light. Looking out the window, I saw the train pulling slowly into a small station, probably Saint-Imbert, and when it came to a complete stop, I saw that the station was almost deserted—there was only one station attendant and a couple of other people; there were no German soldiers in sight. I went quickly to the exit and stepped off the train just before it began to pull out of the station. Cautiously, I walked from the station toward Moulins and the border crossing at the demarcation line to assess my chances for crossing over to the free zone. Needless to say, the actual checkpoint was swarming with German guards as far along the banks of the Allier River in either direction as I could see. From where I was standing, my prospects appeared hopeless, but this time I was determined not to turn back.

From my vantage point I could see—with much envy—how easily French people were able to cross over into the free zone. Even if I were remotely inclined to try requesting legal permission to cross over, they would arrest me on the spot for violating the rule that restricted stateless persons from travelling beyond a twenty-kilometre radius from Paris. On top of this, foreign Jews were not permitted into the unoccupied zone without first obtaining a permit from the Kommandantur.

The limited equipment I had brought with me included a pair of binoculars that I had purchased at the Marché aux Puces (flea market) just before leaving Paris. My first escape attempt had made me realize how useful binoculars would be in spotting German soldiers from a distance. Since any attempt to cross the demarcation line at Moulins would clearly be futile, I decided to follow a route south along the river. After trekking along roads and through fields for about four hours, I came across a farmer’s field that seemed like a good place to rest for a while.

I made an important discovery while scrutinizing the area around the field with my binoculars: the German observation posts were thinning out as they got farther away from town. These gaps might give me the opportunity I needed to sneak across the river. From my hiding place in the farmer’s field, I could observe the Germans’ every move and learn their routine. I watched them for hours until my hands were practically numb from holding up the binoculars and my persistence finally paid off. I was able to discern the pattern of their movements that would tell me when exactly to make a break for the river and swim across to freedom.

I noticed that at regular intervals the German guards strolled over to the next post quite a distance away, stopping to chat for up to half an hour at a time. Everything seemed to be in my favour except for the fact that the sun would soon be setting and it would be much too difficult to make my escape in the dark. I didn't look forward to the prospect of spending the night in an open field, but there didn't seem to be any other choice. Fortified by the wonderful sandwiches my aunt had prepared for the journey, I settled down for what felt like the longest night I had ever experienced. As twilight gradually turned into pitch darkness and I could no longer see anything through my binoculars, I tried to use my backpack as a pillow and fall asleep. But try as I might, I couldn't get comfortable and I spent a very cold and restless night. Daylight couldn't come soon enough.

By the time dawn broke, all I wanted was a hot café au lait. My wristwatch told me that it was five o'clock, and it was becoming fairly light out. When I looked through my binoculars, however, I wondered if I was hallucinating. There were no Germans anywhere. By some strange miracle they had all vanished, leaving me free to safely make my escape across the river. I was so nervous that I kept checking to make sure that they weren't just napping or hiding, ready to jump out and grab me. I gathered up my courage, picked up my backpack, slung it across my back and cautiously moved toward the German control post until I was near enough to see that, beyond a doubt, the German sentry was not at his post.

To say I was baffled would be an understatement, but without any further hesitation, I took advantage of the situation and went straight to the river and took off all my clothes except for the bathing suit I wore underneath. I then packed my clothes into the backpack and strapped it tightly across my shoulders. With one final look all around through the binoculars to satisfy myself that I was alone, I plunged into the frigid river. The sudden shock left me gasping for air and my cumbersome backpack made every stroke more laborious than the last.

I wasn't a particularly strong swimmer and could only swim short distances before running out of breath. I also tended to panic unless I stayed close to the shore. Under the circumstances, I had to rely entirely on willpower to keep me going. The freezing water temperature was only a minor concern compared to the far more serious problem of remaining afloat. As my strength waned, my arms felt as heavy as lead, forcing me to stop and rest. I went into a real panic when several times I swallowed mouthfuls of water. When I checked my progress after the incidents, I saw to my dismay that I had only covered about a third of the distance. Using every ounce of energy to increase my pace, I forced myself to labour on mechanically, afraid that my strength would give out at any moment.

The realization that the Germans might spot me and shoot me gave me the impetus to keep going. By the time that I had covered two-thirds of the distance and was within reach of the free zone, however, my strength began to seriously fade and I was consumed with fear. I was so exhausted that I could only occasionally kick my legs. At the very moment when my strength gave out completely and I was no longer able to stay afloat, on the verge of going under, I found within myself a renewed energy that came from pure determination. I managed to fight off my fatigue and before long I found myself grasping the shores of the unoccupied zone of France and my entry into freedom.

Fred (Fritz) Buff was a teenager from Germany who was a passenger on board the ill-fated SS St. Louis, a ship conveying nearly a thousand Jews seeking sanctuary in the New World. Bearing visas for entry to Cuba, they were to be sorely tested when the voyage terminated in Havana harbor on May 17, 1939. This remarkable testimony contains extracts from the diary Fred kept during the voyage, told in a clear and compelling manner. Although lengthy, it is an engaging narrative of a most tragic episode in the West's failure to rescue Jews when provided with the opportunity to do so in the months immediately preceding the outbreak of war.

May 13, 1939

On May 13, 1939, approaching 8:00 PM, the St. Louis, the largest motor ship of the HAPAG line, weighed its anchor to take almost 950 passengers to a distant land, a land where all these men, women and children expect to restart their lives, a land where all our thoughts and our eyes are focused upon—CUBA.

It is with mixed feelings that we board take our personal farewell from Germany by trying to sever all memories of our lives to date, yet to carry forward hitherto memorable life experiences.

With tears in our eyes we could not completely forget what we called our home, our place of birth. We clung to the telephone at the pier to call our loved ones with a last farewell, but one thought filled our hearts, the thought about our future.

This is how I spent the first evening aboard, at the ship's railing, thinking about my parents and my sister who had to stay behind; about the many people, both young and old, whom I had learned to esteem and to love during the short years of my life; and about dozens of other things which jogged my memory, especially the devastating events of the last few years, ever since the Nazi regime came to power in Germany.

It was a clear and pleasant evening on this 13 of May 1939, an evening which was to lead toward happier days. . . .

May 20, 1939

After being underway for seven days, we encountered the first ship on the horizon. It appeared to be a freighter that was sailing in the opposite direction—towards Europe.

With the exception of the glimpse of the Azores, we have seen only sky and water to date. Seeing another vessel provided us with some welcome diversion and conversational material.

Despite all the entertainment and other pleasant goings on, my thought frequently drifts towards Havana and Cuba, our country to be. I am comforted to have made good friends aboard the ship. Hopefully these friendships will continue ashore. With the uncertainties we must expect to face, we should not have to face them alone.

Today is the cut off day for all outgoing mail which is addressed to be returned to Europe with this ship. The assigned personnel have asked passengers to stop submitting mail. The large volume of mail already accumulated needs to be sorted and processed, apparently an overwhelming task for them.

The telegraph station is also a beehive of activity. It looks as if everyone wants to wire greetings and a progress report to relatives and friends about our successful crossing and impending landing. I also stood in line to cable my parents to tell them that all is ok with me.

Now that we have arrived at the doorsteps of a new world, I am filled with anticipation, yet rueful that my parents and sister were not as fortunate as I and had to remain in Germany. My only wish to them is for an early auf Wiedersehen (reunion).

For many fellow passengers Havana will end years of separation from their families and will mean reunification with their spouses and children.

We came aboard this ship in Hamburg as individuals with a common destiny, and we will leave this ship like a community that has had the good fortune to travel together and hopefully will have enjoyed much of a sorrow free two weeks voyage from Hamburg to Havana. When can we ever again experience such joyful days? . . .

May 26, 1939, Friday

The last day before reaching Havana was dedicated to luggage. All suitcases had to be packed and placed outside our cabin door by midnight. Only hand luggage could be held back. Everything was arranged for an immediate disembarkation early the next morning. During the last day land was visible on and off. These must have been groups of islands. Also Florida's shore was in sight, as an announcement had informed us through the loudspeaker system.

On this last day before Havana we were mostly occupied with landing preparations. We read the disembarkation instructions, visited with our newly acquired friends, and made plans to meet again in Havana.

Nervously we went up on deck to see if from there land was visible. May 27, 1939, tomorrow, exactly fourteen days after leaving Hamburg, we should be stepping onto terra firma (Latin for solid earth). . . .

Arrival in Havana, Cuba

May 17, 1939, Saturday

We have reached the harbor all right. At 4:00 AM, the ship's horn blasted several times to awaken us. However, most of us, including me, did not sleep anyway because of all the excitement of our arrival. Those who expected family reunions were already at the railings of the ship. I joined them and witnessed the ship's entering into the harbor. It was dawn. I was able to make out the outline of the palm-tree-lined shore and a bit later the villas of Vedado, Havana's "upscale suburb." This was a beautiful sight.

The streets were already coming to life with car traffic. Also pedestrians kept pace with the slow forward speed of the ship into the harbor. Some of the passengers already recognized their loved ones among those pedestrians and exchanged calls of welcome. What a reunion was ahead for them!

I rushed back to my cabin. I appropriately dressed for the impending landing, gulped down a cup of coffee, and returned to my observation post. I wanted to make sure not to miss anything of this evolving city, within hours our expected place of residence.

The sunrise was bright and rapid. The St. Louis dropped anchor. We were lined up for a medical examination. A doctor had come aboard. The line moved quickly and led into another line for the inspection of our landing permits.

At this rate of progress, getting off the ship should follow shortly.

At 8:00 AM, the ship was already surrounded by small boats, rented by family members and friends. They circled the ship searching for their next of kin among the densely occupied railings. The boats came close enough to the ship to establish eye contact and were within shouting distance.

Indescribable joy prevailed among the successful parties. Some bullhorn equipped boats were still seeking their connections.

More and more boats arrived at the scene. They were left undisturbed by the harbor patrol, but so far there was no indication that disembarkation was about to begin. The time of the early expected morning hour disembarkation had already passed.

Rowboats filled with local teenagers arrived at the scene. They had come to dive for and retrieve coins they begged to be thrown from the ship into the water. Their agility was amazing. Despite the obvious pollution of the harbor's water, they always seemed to come up with their reward.

There was no doubt, as yet, in anyone's mind that these delays were short lived and probably due to a Manana mentality, which we believed was prevalent in tropical environments. We patiently awaited signs of progress.

The horn sounded our call to lunch. The horn sounded again at 3:30 PM, our call to tea, and again at 6:00 PM, our call to dinner. With every sounding of the horn, we expected it to be our last sitting on the ship. Our optimism was premature. Conflicting calls from the circling boats below were not exactly helpful. Some claimed they knew we were still getting off this evening. Others only heard about Manana, while third options assured us that sometime tomorrow we will get off without a doubt! Not that we are in a great hurry, not while the ship's crew is taking good care of us, although those with family ashore would rather be welcomed in person.

May 28, 1939, Sunday

The next day came and went without change. Throughout the ship a degree of unrest and concern spread.

Yet the daily appearance of the small boats and the efforts of relatives, shouting encouragement up to the deck did have a somewhat calming influence.

One person aboard claimed to have heard the reason for the delayed landing: namely, the arrival of two additional shiploads of immigrants. Their disembarkation had taken preference over our ship. We questioned the validity of all those well intended messages; none had come from the captain of the ship or from other authorized sources.

The general unrest and nervousness aboard started to become of real concern as to the true meaning of these delays?

All of us had orderly documents as issued by the Cuban Secretary of Immigration. Without those we could never have boarded the ship in Hamburg.

One day after another, the little boats still appeared every morning and stayed all day. Again and again it was to be Manana, but by now even the shouter's voices had lost all vigor.

Something must have gone amuck. There was no doubt any more, yet we were in the dark as to the real reason. Are we destined to be quarantined? Why? Where? And for what reason?

The bulletin board told us of ongoing negotiations for our release, but there was no mention of a pending solution. All this led to more confusion and doubt.

Instead of lining the railings as we had been doing for the past days, we now took frequently to deck chairs as we brooded over the lack of progress.

An American warship had arrived in the harbor and anchored nearby. The warship fired salutary cannon shots, maybe a dozen or so, which apparently was the practice during diplomatic visitations. The unexpected booms woke us from our semi sleep and deep thoughts about our future. Even the unthinkable return with the ship to Hamburg had entered our minds for the first time. We forced ourselves to discount that possibility. That could not possibly become a reality!

June 1, 1939, Thursday

Six days had gone by—without an encouraging word. Before our eyes lied Havana, the city, its capital dome, the shore—the keys to our rescue and to our future!

Our nerves during these trying days had to endure a severe test. One passenger apparently could not bear the strain, so he cut the veins on both his wrists and jumped overboard in bright daylight. As once before, the call "Man Overboard" was heard and spread like wildfire. A lifesaving ring was again tossed in the victim's direction. Again a seaman courageously jumped into the water, and this time was able to hold the victim from drowning until a boat came to the rescue. This took the man aboard and headed for the shore.

To keep control over our nerves became paramount. Weakness was no help whatsoever. It became our responsibility to deter others from doing likewise. Young men, myself included, were organized into a suicide patrol, to take our turn at policing the decks, especially at nightfall. Soon thereafter an important news announcement was circulated regarding our stalemated predicament, an indication of Cuba's President Brù's intractable stance. "On Friday, June 2, 1939, the St. Louis ship is to leave the harbor of Havana after its seven day stay."

President Brù had refused to continue negotiations unless this edict was carried out.

The boats were here again; this time it was not from happiness and joy, not after the adversity of the latest news. However, our daily visitors still tried to instill us with courage, even with their own heavy hearts.

Negotiations had not been terminated. There was still a ray of hope which should not be given up or set aside. . . .

June 2, 1939, Friday

One day later, on Friday morning, the day of our exit from Havana's harbor, the passengers were summoned to the large ship's lounge. The presidents of the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC or Joint) from New York and from Havana had come aboard to address the group. [Lawrence Berenson, an attorney, represented the American JDC.]

Everyone assembled in silence and in anticipation of the words from the leaders of our destiny. This gathering did not miss its objective and undoubtedly saved passengers and crew alike from further calamities.

The mere thought of being able to rely on the report of those distinguished men renewed our own spirit and strength for facing the immediate critical weeks ahead.

Surprisingly the President of the Cuban Customs Office followed with his own speech. It was difficult to hold back tears as he expressed his foremost wish, the early return of all passengers to Havana.

Most importantly all the speakers expressed the assurance that we will not be returned to Hamburg despite the absence of a favorable outcome as of this date.

These were obviously the most important and promising words for our ears. They eased our ominous suspicions about our future, even in the face of the impending departure from the harbor of Havana. By now, we almost looked forward to our departure from there because as welcome as our visiting small boats were at the outset and after our arrival, the more disquieting they had become as time went on and as our outlook became cloudier day by day.

At 9:45 AM our visiting dignitaries left the ship. This was a dramatic parting for them as well as for all of us.

Soon thereafter, at exactly 10:00 AM the ship's bells rang, the engines started to hum, and the ship started slowly to turn its bow towards the exit of this scenic harbor.

Our hopes and expectations about a return to Havana had been somewhat enhanced by the earlier gathering and by the speeches of the prominent participants, especially since negotiations were alive and, as reported, in a productive atmosphere. . . .

Departure from Havana, Cuba

No one who was a passenger on the St. Louis will ever forget this departure. Everyone was emotionally drained, even the bravest were shaken. After all, hundreds of next of kin had been ashore waiting for our arrival. Just visualize all the women and children who saw their husbands and fathers only from the little boats below or on the nearby shore and who, after long separations, are now suddenly being torn apart.

It was also a calamity for those of us, me included, who had arrived without being welcomed by family members. Our hopes had been dashed. We had been set back in our aspirations and expectations only to return to uncertainty and darkness.

Slowly the St. Louis navigated out of the harbor followed again by a multitude of slower boats. This time they were not manned by friends or relatives, but by members of various organizations who had chartered these boats as a sign of sympathy for our plight. I counted as many as thirty of these boats that had decided to accompany us out of the harbor.

During these hours the passengers and the ship itself had become an international sensation, sadly and involuntarily.

The piers were jammed with people. It looked as if thousands of people were waving their handkerchiefs, as we did from the ship, while drying our teary eyes at the same time. In addition, hundreds of autos with their horns tooting moved along the quay at the ship's slow speed. They kept pace with us until we returned to the open waters of the Caribbean Sea.

Two official boats accompanied the ship well past the harbor's exit. One of these was a Cuban police launch; the other was occupied by the dignitaries of the morning's meeting.

Even the police waved to us and shouted “Hasta la Vista!” (See you later) and “Auf Wiedersehen!” (Farewell until we meet again) as expressions of sympathy.

During the seven days in the harbor several policemen had been assigned to duty aboard the ship. Many of us struck up cordial relationships with these officers. They were interested in our predicament as well as in our backgrounds and did not hesitate to voice verbal concerns for our safety.

It took little time for the ship to distance itself from the land until we lost sight of it altogether. . . .

The Fourteen Day Odyssey

Thrown back into the vast expanse of the sea, the ship seemed to cruise aimlessly between Cuba, the open sea, and the American coastline.

More than ten days after negotiations had taken place, a solution had not yet been found. How difficult must it be to find a place of refuge for less than 1000 desperate people?

Just now an announcement was posted that a decision would be forthcoming within two hours. Hardly anyone took this seriously. Too many times similar messages were prematurely announced and subsequently withdrawn with regrets. These highs and lows had sapped our energy and confidence.

Another day of great excitement was behind us. The ship had taken a northeasterly course which it had maintained for several hours at an advanced rate of speed—in the direction of Hamburg.

The effect on our nervous systems was just as if an exploding bomb had been dropped. The deck could have been compared to an inferno of aroused humanity. This was just too much to bear; any port other than Hamburg could be tolerated. Just the mention of the word brings back recollections, and the resolve of most of the people aboard was to die rather than ever see Hamburg again.

For some unknown reason, the ship’s course was reversed once again by 180 degrees and we sailed again in a southwesterly direction towards Cuba. But it was not long before we again headed northeast. There had to be a reason for this, but it escaped us. This could not just happen by chance.

This time the change caused less excitement because, during the night, a newly received telegram brought the first encouraging news. It stated that an as yet unnamed European country had apparently agreed to accept a certain number of the ship’s passengers, subject to the close of still ongoing negotiations with Havana.

Even this news was accepted with skepticism, but at least it revived a glimmer of hope that work on our behalf was still going on and that all was not lost.

This morning we were treated with a fairylike view as we sailed in close proximity along the Florida coastline. We were close enough to see the miles of beaches and also the tall buildings of the famed Miami Beach resorts. Large pleasure boats were fishing nearby; judging by the size of these yachts they had to be owned by well to do Americans.

An American Coast Guard boat was heading in our direction and a Coast Guard airplane circled the ship to monitor our course and to prevent anyone from attempting to swim ashore, enforcing the US decision of refusal and rejection.

We could not understand why this land of our dreams and also of our likely final destination would not liberate us from our agony and uncertainty? Isn’t this the land of large unpopulated and underdeveloped areas? It was very hard to accept the disinterest of the American government.

After two more days of status quo, a long expected telegram was posted that the ship was to head towards a small Cuban island Pinosa [isla de Pinos] and to land there with all of its passengers.

Although we had never heard of this island before, we were happy beyond words. We hugged and kissed each other. For the second time we rushed to the telegraph counter to inform our dear ones around the world of our fortunate turn of events and to ease their minds from worrying about this seemingly never ending odyssey.

This rerouting required another change in the ship’s course back into the more tropical zones. We were unconcerned that this island had few inhabitants or that we most likely will have to be housed in temporary structures of tents. We were convinced that this arrangement was only of a temporary duration. Again we packed our belongings and awaited further instructions about this new landing site. . . .

June 6, 1939, Tuesday

Within hours the ship turned once again in the direction of Europe, and we had to endure another disappointment. How could that last telegram possibly have been posted? Was it perhaps only intended as a sedative?

How were we expected to trust any further announcements? Are we destined to become another ship like the Flying Dutchman in Wagner’s opera? The ship which had to cruise around for seven years? The only credible answer for us now was to have solid ground to walk on!

Daily, dozens of calls for help from our ship's committee still leave the ship. Silence from everywhere is the only response. By now all the European countries have received our appeals. Europe might yet be the place of last resort, except Germany, although in our own minds we had already drawn the curtains for a final separation from the continent.

Last night the movie showed Mother's Song (Mutterlied) with Benjamin Gigli. It was remembered as a great film. But who could possibly have enjoyed any film, no matter how great, after what we had been through these past days.

As another diversion the activity staff started instructions in various languages. I attended an English class but had serious difficulty keeping my mind on the subject; others could not do much better. All of us were preoccupied with the more serious matter of survival.

We had already left the Gulf Stream behind, and the tropical temperatures are abating. Europe is approaching rapidly and irreversibly. America has been left behind. Our hopes and aspirations of returning there have faded away. The faster we are closing in on Europe, the slower time seems to pass: hours appear like days; days, like weeks. We feel as if we have aged by years.

How concerned our families must be as they follow our whereabouts via the world's news broadcasts. I, for one, am restless about the lack of any message from my parents and sister. It seems like a conspiracy for so many mishaps to occur all at once.

Our last resort now is Europe. We have reached a point of no return. Most of us aboard have assigned quota numbers from the United States and also affidavits that guarantee that applicants will not become a public burden upon our arrival there. These documents for US Immigration had been applied for prior to our embarkation and, therefore, should be honored regardless of where we might get off this ship, including by all the European countries, at least toward temporary asylum.

Several more days have elapsed. These were days of new occurrences and new tensions. Could the world possibly have heard our calls for help? Could our misfortune possibly still turn out for the better? We are now only a few days from Europe and are running out of time. No country has given its permission for our landing on its shores, but we are told that several incoming telegrams have confirmed Holland's willingness to admit 200 people.

Once before Holland [The Netherlands] was inclined to break the deadlock. This response proved to be premature. The question now is, Can it really be true this time, or is it again only a rumor? If true, there are still over 750 more people who need to be admitted elsewhere, and the example set by Holland would have to be followed by others. The mood on board took a big leap for the better with Holland's initiative, which could be the opening development to bringing the odyssey of the St. Louis to an end.

Every day now we are summoned to the lounge to be updated by the ship's committee on rapidly developing events. We are also being reminded to remain calm and composed as the efforts for our release are moving toward success. . . .

June 16, 1939, Friday

We are now only one day from Europe. Another meeting has been called. "The die is cast!" England, France, and Belgium have joined with Holland collectively to absorb all the passengers of the St. Louis in approximately equal numbers.

Our jubilation is fantastic, indescribable and spontaneous. The horizons have opened up. We were not forgotten after five weeks at sea, most of the time under severe duress and mental strain.

Finally a harbor has been found for our rescue—Antwerp, Belgium. . . .

June 17, 1939, Saturday

All the passengers left the ship in Belgium. The Belgium contingency was transferred to Brussels. The three other countries were prepared to transport their allotment of passengers to their respective homelands.

MARIA CENSOR

Context: Eastern Europe

Source: Maria Censor. Letters to My Mother. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2000, pp. 58–65. Used by permission.

A Polish Jewish young woman passing as a Christian, Maria Censor was employed as a care worker in an orphanage in Radosc, near Warsaw, when she became aware of the fate of the Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto in April 1943. In this account she describes her own fate: having been caught by antisemitic Poles, denounced as a Jew and taken to Gestapo headquarters in Warsaw, she was released after being forced to surrender some of her valuables. Upon her release, the traumatic situation in which she found herself wandering the streets until, eventually, she found her way home—still undercover, but at least safe for the time being.

Meanwhile I applied for a job of carer and kindergarten teacher in the children's home in Radosc near Warszawa. The home was run by a "Patronat" society caring for orphans and children of criminal prisoners. During the occupation children of political prisoners were naturally taken under the Patronat's wings. Again, as if by a miracle, I secured the position. The home was in Radosc, about four kilometres' walk through a forest from the railway station. It was beautiful, peaceful countryside, untouched by war. The home was in Radosc, about four kilometres walk through a forest.

The home stood on the edge of the forest, surrounded by a large orchard, the trees heavy with ripening apples, surrounded by a large orchard, the trees heavy with ripening apples and pears. There was a vegetable garden full of fresh vegetables. What bliss! A large dog of uncertain heritage came towards me wagging his tail furiously. He had spotted a sucker. I approached my new place of employment with mixed feelings. I was tired, having lugged my suitcase from the station on this very hot summer's day. I was apprehensive, for it was a live in position. Most of all I was worried about you, Mama. I knew we could not see each other for a long time and I was already missing you.

A man appeared, he introduced himself as Piotr (Peter) and took my suitcase. He was "old," maybe thirty. Mr. Piotr took me inside the house to a little office. He informed me that the "head" would see me in a few minutes. I was left there, standing, my suitcase at my side. The headmistress greeted me in a friendly manner and took me around the two storey building, explaining my duties as we looked at dormitories, dining and recreational areas and of course staff living quarters. I was to have an attic room with another group leader. There was a bed, washstand and a tiny cupboard space for each of us. There was another room for the other two carers right next door to ours. They had to walk through our space to reach their room.

Everything was orderly and clean and appeared well organized. I was happy. I thought of you, Mama, and hoped that you were as comfortable with your new surroundings as I was with mine.

All the children were outside playing on the undulating fields, games children play all over the world. They sounded happy. They looked well fed, so different from the city waifs, dirty and emaciated, congregating around the tannery. And those others, the Jewish children starving on the streets of the Ghetto.

Mr. Piotr was the caretaker. He appeared extremely ill prepared for this demanding manual job. He spoke in educated Polish and looked like a well-to-do city dweller. His hands were clean and not callused. He worked hard and often was visibly exhausted. Who was Mr. Piotr? I suspected that he was in hiding like me. It worried me at the time. I was always very polite to him and felt sorry for him. Then an impossible thing happened. He, Mr. Piotr, fell in love with me. I welcomed the feeling that I had someone older looking after me, like a brother or an old friend of the family. We spent many evenings together, walking, reading, talking. Of course I had a big story, usually improvised, of my life in Swiecie, my two brothers and sister. My fictitious tale led to my present position of being alone and the whole "family" repatriated to their place of origin, which had been annexed to the Third Reich in 1939. Mr. Piotr was very nice, but I had no reason to suspect his attention as anything more than brotherly concern to make this little girl happier.

I had every second Sunday off duty. On one such Sunday Mr. Piotr invited me to go to Warszawa with him to visit his relatives. I had not left Radosc for many months. It was too risky to visit you, Mama. The Ghetto was being "liquidated." Transport after transport of cattle wagons passed through Radosc with their terrible cargo. Although I saw them with my own eyes, I did not want to hear the cries. I blocked my ears and averted my eyes, feeling so helpless, so useless. The children made my life possible. They were a lovely group. Starved of love, insecure, they thrived under my youthful non-disciplinarian care and I loved them all and enjoyed my work immensely.

I gratefully accepted Mr. Piotr's invitation and we travelled to Warszawa to visit his cousins. It became very clear to me that the "cousins," a lady and her partner, were not "working class." The greeting was cordial. The table was set beautifully, the food simple and well presented. Their table manners were impeccable. I was being very closely watched. Who were these people? On that "pleasant" Sunday afternoon the Ghetto was burning. The soot and smoke were in the air. The gunfire could be heard. The clouds of smoke obliterated the sun. The windows in the flat were tightly shut. Suddenly I felt scared, almost out of control and so helpless. For a few moments my usual assurance left me, my emotions took over. Somehow I regained control and was able to continue polite conversation with my hosts, hoping that they did not notice my lapse.

It was an incredible experience. I knew I was not the same person who a few hours previously had arrived at this friendly meeting. I felt empty inside. On arrival back in Radosc Mr. Piotr began to show me more than the usual friendliness. How dare he, this “old” man of thirty! I was totally disgusted and very disappointed in him and I told him so. I had lost a friend when I needed one so desperately. Was Mr. Piotr a friend? Who was he? The other three carers were much older than I and they all fitted the description of “old maids” in my youthful perception. Any of them would have valued Mr. Piotr’s attention, but he just retreated into his quarters and became almost a hermit. He went about his duties in silence hardly acknowledging anybody. I remained friendless.

My work with the children continued. Their state of hygiene had always been important to me. The home had one large area called “the bathroom.” It had not bathtubs, but a row of timber dividers forming square spaces, each with a tap and a shower, or rather a rubber hose with the perforated nozzle of a watering can attached. The dividers were knee high; the floor was tiled in light brown tiles. We only had hot water twice a week, on Wednesdays and Fridays when Mr. Piotr fired a big furnace. I remember scrubbing my charges vigorously, playing the “clean, clean” game, which I invented in order to make the children want to be clean. In summer the children got hot and sweaty and they learned to be “clean, clean” in cold water. Our group was reprimanded for making too much noise on cold water days. Imagine trying to keep twenty-five small children quiet while they are splashing each other with ice-cold water.

I conducted fitness classes for my “littlies” and the headmistress commended me for this enterprise. As a result I was asked to take the whole institution through fitness exercises every day during their summer school holidays. These took place before breakfast at six every morning. Some older children were only a year or two younger than I. The boys gave me a hard time, but after a while I was able to separate them from the group. I formed them into foot-racing teams and they raced against each other, providing entertainment for the others until breakfast time, when the runners received larger portions.

My stay in Radosc strengthened me physically, it toughened me. Mama, I thought of you, I wanted you so much at my side. There were nights when I dreamed of you. You were there, somewhere in the distance and I tried to reach you but my legs would not move. I would wake up in terror, hoping that in my sleep I did not reveal who I was. My roommate would sometimes make some comments about my “nightmares” the next morning and I would be terrified that I had broken my cover.

Scant news wafted into my retreat. The liquidation of the Warszawa ghetto was always hotly debated. I tried to appear uninterested. The march of Dr Korczak and his children was mentioned with some sadness, since it was a well-known fact that the Jewish children were also looked after by the Patronat. The headmistress was very shocked that the whole orphanage had been deported. She kept saying that it could happen to us in Radosc too. Again, I tried to stay out of these discussions.

On the whole I became very complacent, more comfortable, until that fateful day of autumn 1943—the only time I was caught.

After eighteen months in Radosc Children’s Home I thought that with luck I could manage to live there till the end of the war. No such luck! One cold morning, two thugs walked in, and ordered me to come with them to Warszawa. I was in the middle of breakfast. I remember the bright yellow of the hot mamalyga, the cornmeal cereal I was eating. I followed the two men without a word. My workmates sat very quietly, fearful of the sense of danger that hung in the air. On the way out, I managed to throw on my warm coat and grab my “papers.” We walked through the forest, three kilometres to the railway station. It was a cold, beautiful morning. As we walked, the thugs told me that they knew I was Jewish. They were taking me to Gestapo Headquarters in Warszawa.

All the way, I kept denying their “preposterous” accusation. I did not cry. Nearing our destination, I told them I had a gold watch on a chain. Would they let me go if I gave it to them? They snatched the watch from around my neck and tore the little gold ring with its ruby teardrop off my frostbitten finger, leaving a gaping bleeding hole. Then they just let me go.

I ran and ran. Hungry, homeless, penniless, one hour to curfew – where to go, what to do? Cut my hair, change my appearance!

I found myself on Karcelak Square, a place where I had never been before, a market square where only “other people” went and you could have your pockets picked. Wind-swept, dirty, unfriendly. In the dusk I found a little hairdresser’s shop with one chair: “Please cut my hair and accept it as payment,” I said. This was a very dangerous move to make. The barber could have been suspicious. A Jew on the run, call the informers! They would strip this kid clean and throw her to the Germans. The barber cut my hair gently, a thick plait about seventy-five centimetres long, then straightened the line at the back of my neck. I felt cold as I emerged, a short-haired Marysia and I felt different. Did I say Marysia? What a lapse, deadly dangerous. There was no Marysia in 1943. My name was Urszula, Ula, never to be forgotten, even in my sleep.

The curfew was approaching. Where to go, what to do? I, Ula with the short hair, with just what I was standing in: a skirt, a jumper, a coat, still a good coat from home. Shoes with holes in the soles, stuffed with paper, socks darned so many times and with so many colours that the original heels and toes were non-existent. The darns rubbed and blistered my frostbitten feet and made every step difficult, but they were steps I had to take to survive.

That cold evening, alone, lost, hungry, I started walking in the direction of Tatiana's address. By some miracle I had memorized it when some time ago, we had bumped into each other after having lost touch for two years. As in a dream I walked and found the place. Warmth enveloped me, a safe house, at last. No questions were asked.

Tatiana's one rented room with the use of a kitchen was heaven. Nobody asked me any questions and I also did not ask any questions—who the men were who came and went, who ate and drank, and talked and talked. . . . I just cooked and cleaned and I was accepted. I belonged, though I was never told as much in words.

Some days and some nights I was left alone, instructed to answer the phone that never rang. These lonely nights were horrifying. I constantly expected to be discovered, dragged out and shot. I sensed I was playing a dangerous game. It was the Polish Underground that I was working for, but I did not know it at the time.

Mama, after all these years, I cannot imagine how you suffered not having heard from me for months at the time. There was no way I could communicate and actually visiting you was extremely risky for both of us, but I had to see you to let you know I was still alive. I had to see you in the hospice, where you were placed in the care of nuns.

With more freedom to move around the city and living a short distance from the hospice, I decided to visit you. Mama, you were not surprised as I walked into your ward. My heart was beating fast and the relief of finding you still in the hospice was enormous. I felt as if I was going to faint. And you, Mama, you just smiled at me as if you were expecting me to come.

"What happened to your hair?" you asked. "Oh, I just wanted a change," I replied. All matter of fact, even if our hearts were racing, we could not cuddle or kiss, just a peck on the cheek. Remember, you were my "aunt." We had to be careful. Remember, you had to call me Ula. I was wearing a man's suit jacket which was much too large for me. You looked at me and I knew what you were thinking. So I explained that it was fashionable to wear men's jackets in Warszawa in the spring of 1944. Spring of 1944—last time I saw you, touched you, talked to you.

This scene remains in my mind in full colour. So many years passed and yet I still remember your words: "You will survive, you will survive—alone." I did survive; I still feel guilty about it.

FANNY COOPER

When Germany invaded Belgium in May 1940, a large number of Jews and others began a panicked flight south to France, away from the war and the advancing Nazis. Fanny Cooper and her family were among these. As she writes, they ended up in Vichy, or unoccupied, France, where they were left relatively unmolested until July 1942. From that point on, however, antisemitic measures instituted by the collaborationist government of Marshal Philippe Pétain saw the start of deportations from France to Auschwitz. With little other option but further flight, the family sought sanctuary in Switzerland. Fanny's description of what follows traces the family's journey across Lake Geneva by boat—other than her father, who had been arrested and taken to an unknown destination. The account ends on a positive note, however; one of the rare cases of a "happy ending" concerning a deported family reunited intact.

While rummaging in the garage through an old suitcase I found, to my great surprise, a pile of papers. They contained letters and various documents, the existence of which I had completely forgotten since my immigration to Australia in 1950. I also found an exercise book from the school I attended in Lausanne in 1943. I remembered having written that story (in French) and having received good marks for it from the teacher. I was the only refugee girl in the class. It was probably a free topic.

To be suddenly faced with the original and looking at my own handwriting when I was thirteen years old was quite a moving experience. What made it even more emotional was that I also found numerous letters exchanged with my mother, father, sister and cousins, who were each in a different location in Switzerland until the end of the war. We were the remnants of our extended family who were fortunate enough to survive, while my uncles, aunts, and a twenty-one year old cousin were not so lucky. I spent a couple of days (and nights) sitting on the floor, surrounded by all these ghosts from the past strewn around me. Memories of this distant and painful past came flooding back.

It all started in May 1940 when the Germans invaded Belgium. Our family of twenty-three people, including my grandmother, who was wearing a sheitel (wig) and only spoke Yiddish, joined the great exodus of hundreds of thousands of people: some in cars, some on bicycles, some on foot, some with wheelbarrows carrying the elderly and personal effects, some pushing prams with small babies—all running towards the South of France. The huge crowd was easily visible from the air and from time to time German planes came down very low and machine-gunned indiscriminately sending everybody scurrying into the ditches on the sides of the road. My family came out unharmed but not everyone was so fortunate.

We ended up in Nice, in Vichy—“free” France, where we lived in relative safety until July 1942. That was when Marechal Petain and his clique of collaborators decided to assist the Germans and began to round up the Jews, who were subsequently deported to Auschwitz. We immediately tried to find a hiding place. It was not easy. We were, after all, strangers in the city with hardly any acquaintances except for our Jewish refugee friends who were in the same situation. It was sometimes possible to find shelter for money, but we never felt secure, and kept running from one place to another nearly every night. Father, with his rather Jewish features did not dare to come out in the street in broad daylight, so he sent me, an inconspicuous twelve year old to do some necessary errands, such as selling valuables to keep us going. I went around the streets of Nice wearing a chain with a large, very visible crucifix on my chest. Of course I was scared, especially when I saw the black police vans of the French gendarmes roaming the streets and the herding of groups of Jewish families.

I remember one night when we were taken to a place which was supposed to be a private home. It at once looked suspicious to us. It had a long passage with doors on both sides and looked like a small hotel or boarding house. It was already known that a hotel was the most dangerous place to be in. Since most refugees lived in hotels, it was the first place the gendarmes looked for Jews. The owner of that place, to whom we had paid the money, tried to reassure us, telling us that each door was a room of a member of his family. But we did not believe him and although we had nowhere to go, we hurried downstairs and into the street. We walked the streets all night, separately from each other and hiding in doorways when we saw a passerby or worse, a black police van hunting for people like us.

In the end, we managed to get hold of false papers and a smuggler who organized a train to the border and the crossing of Lake Geneva from the French to the Swiss side. That was the topic of the story I had written at school so many years ago and I reproduce a translated version of it below. . . .

Not a sound, not a movement. Little by little the night is approaching. It is dusk. The lake is glittering in the moonlight. Everything is so calm. Suddenly a slight murmur is heard—subdued, whispering voices, the crackling of steps on the gravel. Where is the caravan of dark shadows heading to? How many are there? Five, six, seven, walking straight down to the water? There, moored to the shore, is a flimsy rowing boat rocked by the slight swell, awaiting the passengers it will carry to the other side of the lake. Time is pressing. Furtively, the shadows step into the boat and make themselves as comfortable as possible on nets and pieces of shabby timber. They must not be seen or heard.

Who are these mysterious travelers? Are they smugglers? They may appear to be shady characters but in reality they are a small group of Jews. There is me, Fanny, aged thirteen, my grandmother, my mother, my older sister Berthe, my uncle Max and his wife. There are also the two boatmen.

That they are Jewish, in itself, reveals our predicament—the situation of hunted animals that are fleeing from France as from a fire, because today’s France is for us Germans—death. Taking every conceivable risk, we are attempting to reach Switzerland.

It is about nine in the evening and already quite dark on the October night of 1942. Now starts the crossing of the lake of which we are so eager to see the other side. Little by little the boat moves away from the shore. The boatmen command absolute silence, no sound that could alert the French police who are constantly on the lookout for escapees. Search beams are crisscrossing the lake from time to time. I will make no sound, I am much too terrified. I will pray to God for the success of our undertaking, while looking at the grey mountains of Switzerland discernable in the distance. I pray for patience.

The boat keeps gliding and with every passing second, France, the land of terror, is getting further away. How much I wish not to see France any longer and to reach the other side—Switzerland, the land of freedom! All that is heard is the rhythmic sound of the oars and the splashing of water. At this moment my thoughts are with my father who is not with us. I instantly recall the scene at the Thonon-les-Bais railway station where we disembarked after a long train journey a few days ago. I see the two men dressed in black standing at either side of the exit—Vichy gendarmes. They are not checking documents, they scrutinize the faces of the incoming passengers. A few are arrested, obviously on account of their Jewish features, my father among them. Grandmother makes a move toward her son, but I notice it. I grab her hand, pull her away with all my strength and whisper, “Come, Grandma, come.”

My poor daddy! Where is he now? He who tried to save the family by organizing our escape had been caught himself. What will happen to him? What will become of all of us? I just cannot understand why this is happening to me, to us. What have we done? The sight of a red light appearing on the water suddenly interrupts my thoughts. It is getting nearer and nearer. My eyes are widening in horror. Is it the French police who will arrest us, take us back to the inferno and destroy all hope of staying alive? Auntie Sarah, who sits next to me, puts her arm around me and whispers into my ear, “Let us pray together.” But it is only a fishing net. The panic is over.

The boatmen are working hard and we, the passengers are dreaming. What are we dreaming of? Of our past happiness, present misfortune, future hope?

From the distance I can already catch sight of the lights of Lausanne and Geneva. The sky is like black velvet strewn with diamond-like stars. The tranquility of the landscape should induce calm, but how can I be calm in the present horror?

The shore is approaching. It is getting closer and closer. Here she is—Switzerland—freedom at last. But are we saved? Perhaps we are being cheated by the boatmen who, after depriving us of our money, have taken us to a different part of the lake that may still be in France? Over the last few months we had been cheated so many times by those who were supposed to provide us with safe hiding places.

And now, is it really is Switzerland, will we be allowed to stay here? Rumours had been circulating that the Swiss authorities have begun to expel those attempting to cross the border. The last we heard was that only people with children were allowed to stay. I am the only child in our group—perhaps I am the savior. . . .

After his arrest in Thonon-les-Bains, my father was taken to a transit camp in Rivesaltes near the Spanish border, from where Jews were being deported to Auschwitz. He managed to escape and retraced his steps to the Swiss border, which he crossed a few weeks later, with two little boys, who he found wandering on their own. It was thanks to the children that my father was not expelled, and at the same time they were also saved.

SUSIE CYMBALIST

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Susie Cymbalist. Susie's Story: Surviving in Budapest. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2011, pp. 69–74. Used by permission.

When the Holocaust hit Hungary in March 1944, it did so with overwhelming force and speed. Often, there was little time or opportunity for people to arrange a response adequate to the challenges that now confronted them. Later in the year, for those who managed to survive long enough—especially in Budapest—things began to settle down sufficiently to enable the possibility of escape or concealment for some. As Susie Cymbalist's account demonstrates, help from non-Jews was often crucial in assisting Jews, though some of the usual forms of subsistence (especially food) were often lacking in sufficient quantities. Susie's memoir is a corrective to the view that once people were in hiding they were necessarily saved; all too often, dangers awaited people from others than the Nazis.

Soon afterwards came the order for young Jewish women of around my age to assemble on the sports oval at the local high school where the Kisok met. (Kisok was the sports association for children in their high school years.) The order said what belongings we should bring. We all knew we could be deported to Auschwitz. By this time I was so demoralized I was ready to accept anything. I could see no possible way out and had lost the will to struggle against “the inevitable.”

Our benefactor, Dr Andor Bossányi, turned up at our flat with his usual bag of delectable food. I told him that my age group had been called to assemble and I intended joining them. He objected to this strongly and said, “You are not going anywhere until I tell you what to do!” I said, “What about my mother?” To which he replied, “I will take your mother but not your grandmother.”

The next day Dr Bossányi came to the flat and gave us his instructions: "Take off your yellow stars and walk back to your old block of flats at midnight. The house janitor will know of your arrival. He will put you into a windowless basement room until a taxi arrives to take you to my scarlet fever ward at the contagious diseases hospital." We knew of this hospital, which was located in the periphery of the city. It meant that we had to drive past heavily armed Arrow Cross guards.

Soon a taxi driver did arrive. No doubt he had been well remunerated and had received his instructions. Dr Bossányi told us not to talk to him and that when he called out to us to duck, we should get out of our seats in the back of the taxi and as low to the floor as we could. As we approached the armoured sentries at the border on the outskirts of the city, our driver accelerated and called out to us to duck. As we dived low we heard shots being fired. Luckily, they missed us and we arrived at the hospital safely.

The resident doctor was waiting for us and asked us if we had ever had scarlet fever. We had not, so he injected us with the germ, saying that if we came down with it we would have to stay there for six weeks. We were admitted to a ward with only two beds. Every morning Dr Bossányi, his resident and some nurses came to check us on their wards rounds. He had told them we were refugees from eastern Hungary who had been infected with scarlet fever. We actually did not contract the disease, though we had flu-like symptoms that lasted about a week. We spent about three weeks in that ward.

One morning Dr Bossányi returned to speak to us alone. He was somewhat agitated and told us he had been denounced by somebody on the staff. There was going to be a raid and we had to leave. Dr Bossányi gave us some money for public transport and an address in Buda where we were expected.

By this time the Russian army was halfway to Budapest and had occupied all of eastern Hungary. The Nazis knew they had lost the war but maintained their aim to keep exterminating as many Jews as they could. The Arrow Cross, under their leader, Szálasi, was extremely efficient at doing just that, so the trip to Buda was an anxious one for my mother and me. We went by public transport and had to change trams. We happened to pass our old home and one of the neighbours noticed us but pretended not to have seen us. We had been the only Jewish residents in that block of flats. . . .

On our trip to Buda, eventually we found our destination, the home of a retired army colonel. He had been giving false identification cards to army deserters, but told us he had run out of them. We would have to stay in his and his wife's apartment until a new supply arrived. We felt somewhat safe, for the time being.

The new cards arrived and the retired colonel told us we would be going to two different places. My mother was going to a small Catholic hospital on the Buda side. It was protected by a Papal or Vatican flag. The doctor in charge was, of course, part of the underground. His name was Dr Szentiványi and he neither received nor requested anything for this dangerous work. It was known that if the Hungarian Nazis discovered a Jew being hidden, not only was that Jew shot, so were his accomplices. As well, my mother was in need of some medical treatment; she had fainting spells, possibly brought on by low blood pressure.

An older single woman (whose name and address I have completely forgotten) was introduced to us. She offered to look after me, but for a price. As mother had been brave and clever enough not to have surrendered her diamond jewellery, when the woman came for me, Mother picked a platinum Movado watch surrounded by diamonds out of her little pouch. When she handed it to the woman, she had the good sense to say that she would give her more when she handed me back safely after liberation. The watch was of great value, but this woman risked her life by hiding a Jew.

My identification card was in the name of a refugee from Debrecen, which is in the east of Hungary and already occupied by the Russian army. If a Hungarian soldier had asked me just one question about the city I would not have been able to answer and would have been shot.

The woman took me to her flat which was on the third floor of a modern building in Lipótváros in District V, an area previously popular with middle-class Jewish people. That made me even more anxious about being recognized by somebody. By this time Budapest was being bombed regularly and the order was for tenants to go down into the safety cellar each night, where there were stretchers for everybody. However, I was too nervous to appear among the crowd of about fifty for fear of being recognized, or asked about Debrecen, and stayed in the apartment at first. One morning I woke up and looked out of the window and everything looked different. When the woman I was staying with came upstairs from the shelter, she was white-faced and agitated. "There was a lot of bombing last night," she told me. "One bomb fell opposite this house and you can see the ruins of the building. You can't stay in the flat alone any longer. You must come down the cellar tonight. If anything should happen to you, we would both be in great trouble. It would be most suspicious."

That night I went down to the shelter in great trepidation. The woman introduced me as her relation, a refugee from Debrecen. Luckily nobody knew me and nobody asked me questions about Debrecen. My next big worry was about the Arrow Cross soldiers, who regularly searched the area for Jews in hiding. The rumour was that they were somewhere in the neighbourhood. An announcement was made that all the bridges that crossed the Danube were going to be exploded and if anybody wanted to go across to Buda, the next day would be their last chance to do so. I had the silly (on hindsight) idea that I should go over to visit my mother in the hospital. I did not realise that Arrow Cross soldiers would be checking people's identification papers at each end of the bridge. A couple near me were checked, but they just looked at me and let me go. My mother was looking very frightened and even more worried than when I had left her. She wanted me to stay with her, as apparently the doctor in charge was quite agreeable to this. But I thought the two of us would be even more suspicious and decided to return to the flat in Lipótváros alone. I confronted the same identification checking at the Buda end of the bridge. Once again I was extremely lucky and was not asked to produce my papers nor asked any questions about Debrecen.

After this my problems only increased. My food consisted of one bowl of soup made from potatoes stored in the cellar by an Italian family. They cooked for everybody. There were also red onions piled up high in a corner, by the same family. I ate one raw onion every day. I also may have eaten onion cooked with the potato soup. I can't remember now.

We had only one toilet in the cellar and there was another on the ground floor just inside the building. A man was on his way to this one when he was hit at the entrance of the building with a splinter from a bomb, which proved fatal. It was the nature of Russian bombs to disintegrate into multiple splinters. He just lay there for weeks, as it was impossible to shift him while bombs were falling incessantly. His wife was still in the cellar with us.

I had just one set of clothing, including a skirt. A young man whose stretcher in the cellar was near mine (and who, I later realized, was a military deserter) offered me a pair of army long johns. They were my one precious item of warm clothing for a long time, even much later when I joined queues at bakeries or cycled across the icy Danube to the office I worked at in Pest.

The situation regarding food was becoming more and more difficult. One day, in the few minutes of pause between bombs, somebody called out that there was a dead horse on the road nearby. People rushed out with knives to cut pieces off the still-warm carcass and made soup out of it. I could never touch that. Interestingly, after not having eaten much for a while, I didn't feel hunger any more.

MAUD PEPER DAHME

Context: Western Europe

Source: Maud Peper and Maryann McLoughlin. Chocolate, The Taste of Freedom: The Holocaust Memoir of a Hidden Dutch Child. Margate (NJ): ComteQ Publishing, 2015, pp. 18–25. Used by permission.

Maud Peper was a small Dutch girl who, with her sister, was hidden on a farm in the rural Netherlands during the Holocaust. The Spronks, who took them in, were an elderly Christian pair who arranged for the girls to assume a new identity as part of a charade designed to secure their safety. In recounting her experiences, Maud provides a useful snapshot into how a child perceived the many changes around her; moreover, she shows that the young age at which a child observes these developments need not necessarily preclude her from demonstrating a certain level of understanding of what she sees. Maud's testimony ends with a roll call of those in her circle who lost their lives at the hands of Dutch Nazis on October 3, 1944.

Jan Kanis left us on a farm in Oldebroek with Mr. and Mrs. Spronk, Kobameuje and Hendrik, who were in their sixties and had no children. Mrs. Spronk's brother, Evert Flier, lived with them. He was a deaf mute and used a trumpet-hearing aid that we yelled into so that he could hear us. He had a little building on the side of the house where he made wooden shoes.

The farm was located on a major highway. In the back of the farm were meadows. The area was very poor; these were hard times. The farm had no running water or toilet. We used an outhouse and a water pump.

The first day we were there the Spronks made us hide in the wheat field because German soldiers were walking around. I wasn't scared because they told us we were playing a game—hide and seek. We had just arrived and already had to hide! They gave me a black umbrella in case of rain. We then zigzagged through the wheat. The wheat was very high because it was August but the wheat had not yet been harvested. It started to rain, so I opened the umbrella. You could see the umbrella for miles. Rita started crying, wanting her "mommie." So between the crying and the umbrella, the Spronks decided to take us back into the house. That evening a couple of relatives came over to meet us. I don't recall the conversation other than my telling them, "I am so grown up that I can wear the yellow star. And I know how to spell and write my name."

After the relatives left, the couple took me aside. That very first night they told me why they were concerned.

During that first night on the farm, the Spronks talked to us about our names and our stories. I knew my name, but they changed it. I was now Margje (Margie); my sister, Rika. They said that our last names were now their last name—Spronk. We had to call the Spronks, Auntie and Uncle; him Oom and her Tante. Rita, however, could not say Tante but said Tannie instead, so we called her Tannie.

Then they said that this is your story, and you must remember it: "You are our nieces. Your family was bombed out of the city. You were homeless but are now living with us. You are no longer Jewish. You are now Christian. You have to remember this! If you do not remember this correctly, the German soldiers will take us all away."

A decision was made that we could not attend school. They were afraid that we might reveal something about our previous life to one of our classmates whose parents might be a Dutch Nazi. Our story was drilled into me every single day. I lived in constant fear; I was scared to death, knowing that if I messed up, we would all be taken away. Rita and I were now Onderduikers (literally divers, or underground), the name given to Dutch people who were hiding from the Nazis. The German edict was that anyone hiding Jews would suffer the same fate as the Jews. For a six and a half year old child, this was really scary and overwhelming.

On the highway in front of the farm, there were no cars except military traffic and the Roma's ("Gypsies") wooden carts. When we were first there, we saw the Roma a lot. The adults warned us, "They steal children." We ran like the wind whenever we saw them coming. . . .

Later I remembered that these Roma used to ask for our cats. They were very hungry. So like many Dutch, the Gypsies killed and ate cats and dogs because there was very little food available during the war, especially towards the end of the war.

In addition to the troop movement, the Nazis had placed a huge anti-aircraft gun in the back of the farm. One morning, Rita and I went outside to get eggs the chickens had laid. We saw German soldiers sitting at an anti-aircraft gun. Rita went up to them and asked them if she could shoot the gun. They told her, "You're too little. Wait until you are older." Rita did not realize the danger of conversing with the German soldiers, as I did. This really frightened me. We saw a lot of soldiers walking around. We could have been stopped and questioned at any time. I learned recently that most of the villagers knew who we were but never disclosed our identity until after the war.

Rita was young, so she didn't understand. Therefore, at first, we had to stay in the house most of the time until I learned my new name and story. In the beginning the only time we went out was to go to church on Sundays. . . .

The Spronks were deeply religious. So we too were brought up by the Spronks to be very religious. We read the Bible every night and went to church every Sunday. We began to forget our Jewish religion. In the beginning I knew that Rita and I were Jewish, and I knew that Jews were being hidden. By the end of the war, I remembered nothing about my Jewish upbringing. In preparation for Sunday church, on a Saturday night before bed, we would get a bath in a big wooden tub in the barn attached to the house. The water was heated, and we used the same water to wash ourselves. I remember that once we got lice in our long hair. I remember so well because they cut our hair. They put a paper on the floor, combing out as many lice as they could. Then they covered our hair in powder and then put a kerchief around our head. I found out much later that the powder was DDT.

After church one Sunday, Tannie and Oom took us on the back of their bikes to visit Tannie's widowed sister, the Widow Blaauw, who lived on another farm. There I found my former kindergarten teacher from Amersfoort, Eva Schnell, and her husband Alfred. That was so very exciting! Someone who knew us. Every Sunday after church, we went to see them. Mrs. Schnell was teaching us to read and write. Then she and her husband disappeared; I never saw them again.

I learned what had happened to them much later, long after the war was over. The Widow Blaauw, Eva, and Alfred were betrayed to the Moffe (Germans). The Dutch were given money for uncovering hidden Jews, so there was literally a price on our heads. One day there was a razzia (search and round-up); German soldiers came to the Widow Blaauw's farm and went right to the haystack, which was under a metal roof to keep the hay dry. The Germans found Eva and Alfred in a room under the haystack. Because the widow was hiding Jews, they told her that they were taking her son Jan. She said, "No, take me. This is my farm. I am the one hiding them." They took her son anyway.

The German soldiers took my teacher Eva and her husband, Alfred, to Zwolle for interrogation. The plan was to keep them overnight and then take them to Westerbork in the Netherlands, a German transit camp. From Westerbork, Jews were transported to Sobibor Death Camp. However, that night a pair of Dutch Nazis (NSB) came into that facility taking the couple and four men into a park. They told the Jews to dig six holes. My teacher, with her hands on her hips, protested: “The Germans told us they would be taking us to Westerbork!” She had no idea about Westerbork. The Dutch SS immediately shot her, and she fell on top of the men who were digging holes—their graves. The rest were then shot. The next day the German Nazis could not find the six to transport them to Westerbork. They investigated and found out what had happened the night before. Therefore they had the Dutch Nazis dig up the bodies so they could be accounted for. They then sent their bodies on a train to Westerbork with other detainees, where they were buried in a mass grave.

After the war, one of the Dutch NSB had told the story about what had happened that night when he was arrested.

On October 4, 2001 a monument was unveiled to the six murdered on October 3, 1944. The monument, a small column of dolomite, is located in “Het Engelse Werk (The English Work),” the park in Zwolle where they were shot. The text on the pedestal reads as follows:

Shot on 3 OKTOBER 1944

CORNELIS BAKKER 15-05-1922

ALBERT BROUWER 09-07-1919

HANS MARIUS KOOPAL 15-08-1920

JACOB KOORN 04-11-1922

ALFRED SCHNELL 10-06-1900

EVA SCHNELL-JOLOWICZ 19-11-1913

Tannie’s niece, Bea Kramer, told me that the son, Jan Blaauw, had been spared. He worked in a milk factory, pasteurizing milk. The director of the factory intervened, saving him; he had him released from internment in Zwolle.

It was extremely dangerous to hide Jews. When caught, both the non-Jew and the Jew usually were murdered.

EKATERINA DANOVA

Context: Evading the Nazis

Source: Ekaterina Danova. “A Ghetto in the Cupboard.” In Julie Meadows and Elaine Davidoff (Eds.). Memory Guide My Hand: An Anthology of Life Stories by Members of the Melbourne Jewish Community from the Former Soviet Union. The German invasion of the Soviet Union, Operation Barbarossa, took place on June 22, 1941. After a series of stunning reverses in the months that followed, the Red Army was able eventually to hold the line, and the Nazi offensive stalled outside Moscow before the year was out. Along the way, however, much territory was lost, and a vast number of towns and cities were occupied by the invader. One of these was Simferopol, in the Crimea. Here, a young girl, Ekaterina Danova, hid in a cupboard in order to avoid being picked up by the Nazis. Her ordeal, as she relates, lasted for two-and-a-half years, until the tide of war began to shift and she was able to come out. Managing to reach the forest, she joined a partisan unit and lived to return to the house where she had obtained her original refuge. The rest of her testimony is a poignant statement of the aftermath of the war and her salvation.

Throughout my life—which I can now say has been a long one—I have often had to fill in all manner of forms and write descriptions of myself. Over the years, these multi-paged questionnaires have grown thinner and the last time I fitted myself onto one of these pages was back in 1969 for Leningrad Television. What happened half a century ago is described in simple words: “In 1941 my parents were shot by German fascists and I was adopted as a daughter by the Danovs, spending time with a partisan squad.”

At different times, bureaucrats have drawn different conclusions from these snapshots of my life. In 1953, when I was recommended for postgraduate study by the Science Council of the LGU (Leningrad State University), I wasn’t accepted because I was Jewish. Yet much later, as a Russian, I was confirmed as the chief editor of Leningrad Television.

My children knew even less about my life than the above description—they just knew the part about the partisan squad. Insofar as none of us ever put together documentation about our time with the partisans, that chapter of my life has not been of much interest to my family, which, to my joy, has ended up being uncommonly harmonious and strong.

My sons consider their happiest time to be that spent visiting their grandmother Katya in the Crimea, in her basic little house on the outskirts of Simferopol. That was her own little house, and not the one she, Ekaterina Trofimovna Kolesnikova, her husband, six-year old son and paralysed mother-in-law were living in when the German occupation began. Back then they rented an apartment in a house with a large courtyard, as was the norm in the south. The water supply and communal toilet were all situated in that fine courtyard, and each resident knew everyone else’s business since they saw each other every day. You couldn't have called the apartment their "home"; it was just one small room, and an even smaller kitchen with an oven, and a door which opened right onto the yard.

I'm recalling this not to demonstrate how meagre the life of the Soviet intelligentsia was back then, particularly those working the land, but so that you might understand how difficult, or even impossible, it would have been to hide any living creature there, especially a child.

The Germans entered Simferopol on 1 November 1941 without any resistance, just after the town had suffered two days in the hands of local marauders. The remaining Jews were quickly placed under a system of control: they couldn't appear on the street without a six-pointed star on their clothes, otherwise they could be shot for any sort of offence, or if they simply did "certain things."

"Certain things" was so broad a term that my parents preferred staying at home. No one felt safe, even at home—a soldier could burst into the home of a Jude with impunity, to steal or just to throw his weight around. There were so many of these raids during the next month and a half that on the threshold of winter we found ourselves without food or anything to sell. Nobody even wanted to entertain the thought that soon food might no longer be necessary. Perhaps I was the only one who didn't understand, suffering as I was from a lack of outside exercise and friendship.

Still, everyone was shaken by the new order for all Jews to assemble with their essential items in the student quarter. In the student quarter we saw many old and helpless people who hadn't been evacuated to the East in time; everyone was either standing, sitting or lying down. They were led away in groups and on 16 December it was our turn. Many dragged out the time on the way there, hoping for some miracle. Eventually we reached the place, by which time the shooting was already proceeding at full speed, nine kilometres down the Feodosisky Highway.

Even though Simferopol was the capital of the Crimean USSR, you could walk from one end to the other at a pinch. It's a stone's throw from the students' quarters to the Feodosisky highway, but at that time it felt as though we had to walk for an eternity. Dad carried his newborn niece in his arms. His sister had many children, all boys up till then, but a long-awaited daughter had been born, only to die on the spot. I don't even remember whether she had been given a name.

Mum led me along by the arm. Her sister Eva hadn't turned up at the assembly point, and much later I was told that she had been spotted among the partisans. Obviously, she died during one of the German sweeps of the Crimean woods.

Local women, who had been driven out of the nearby houses by the Germans, were working on widening and deepening the anti-tank ditches set aside supposedly for the defence of the city. The shooting was taking place in front of these women and they were ordered to dig more if the capacity of the ditch was insufficient. I know all this now through various accounts, but back then I was literally only four steps from death (as the words of the famous song goes) in that huge common grave. For me those four steps, alas, weren't a metaphor—it actually happened.

Only later, after turning that day over and over again in my mind, did I fully comprehend everything that happened. In the end there was more than enough time for contemplation. When our column drew level with the crowd of women watching, Mum suddenly pushed me into them, as if discarding me. Who could guess what moved her then—one last desperate impulse or a flash of blinding hope? Perhaps it was Mum's reliance on a one-in-a-million chance to save her child. All I heard was a wild cry behind me, some swearing in German, and then the sound of footsteps as we ran off as fast as we could.

That street, Ishunskaya, no longer exists and the tank ditch is overgrown with grass and poppies. (The poet, Voznesensky, describes its gruesome postwar fate in his poem "The Ditch"). What happened next? "Some woman" and I rushed into an unfamiliar courtyard, then into a house, and suddenly the door of a dress cupboard slammed behind me. It all went too quickly for me to have time to understand anything.

Understanding came later as I endured the stuffiness—until I worked out how to break a hole in the back panel—of the old single-winged cupboard and the rheumatic pain in my writhing child's body and the incessant but quiet sobbing.

From that moment on we were all terror-stricken. I suppose in that instant my female savior had not even thought about what dangers she would be exposing her family to, or that in saving a stranger's child she might be condemning her own. The Germans often made announcements and then actually proved their words were matched to their actions: for any Jew hidden, every member of the family hiding them would be executed. They had already hanged some of Simferopol's imprudent and kind-hearted citizens from the lampposts in the main streets.

But she wouldn't have it any other way. Much later, in a moment of special tenderness, she, a non-believer, told me that Providence had sent me to her and that it had been much harder for her to give life to me than to her own son. This last statement was the utter truth. Her momentary outburst of philanthropy passed and then came the time for unbelievable, daily—even hourly—feats of emotional and physical strength. My “ghetto in the cupboard” lasted for two and a half years!

It started with the whole family, stunned and frightened to death, having to speak in whispers. Six-year-old Volodya, under the pretext of some illness, was not allowed outside until the summer; he had to learn to keep quiet about the “girl in the cupboard.” “She must be from Sevastopol, and the Germans kill people from there.” Alas, this was all too true.

It’s hard to understand how this woman endured it all, how she lived, constantly fearful of arousing suspicion amongst her neighbours through a careless gesture or word, conscious of her responsibility to her husband and relatives, and depressed and anguished by fear.

There was also the problem of how to feed a family with an extra mouth—there was nothing left with which to barter for food. But perhaps one kind deed leads to another.

Whether that is true or not, Ekaterina Trofimovna and her husband joined the anti-fascist underground movement. In the book In the Crimean Underground by Kozlov, she appears under the nickname of “mother” and Lugovoy, the commissar of the northern alliance of Crimean partisans, mentions Danova in his book Blood Brothers.

She and her husband collected medical supplies and clothes for the partisans, but the main thing they did was to take part in organizing the escape of Soviet prisoners of war from a camp on River Street. I have a clear memory of a pilot—or rather the sight of the terrible scarring from his torture and injuries—washing himself at our well, having sought out Ekaterina Trifomovna right after the war to thank her for having saved him.

In March 1944 the arrests of members of the underground began, with those who survived fleeing into the woods to the partisans. This was the most dangerous of all undertakings—to exit unnoticed beyond the city limits, rendezvous with a connecting person, then travel fifty kilometres at night through the ploughed spring fields which intersected with the surrounding road, to finally reach safe cover in the woods before daybreak. For me, who for years had not known fresh air and hence had almost forgotten how to walk, this was another difficult physical trial. It turns out that when you fall flat on the ground it gives you new strength, and if, moreover, the barrel of a machine gun is pointed at your chest (those knowing the place of rendezvous were killed) then miraculously you find your second wind.

Exhausted, Ekaterina Trofimovna dragged her children along behind her; me more often than not. This was the second time she saved my life, since on the very night that we literally crawled into the forest—our new home—the Simferopol Gestapo arrived at our house. One of the underground members, captured earlier, had been unable to endure the interrogations. . . .

We made it to the partisan squad before the liberation of Simferopol, which happened in April 1944, and entered the city along with the army. It seemed that now we would finally be able to live in peace. But new woes awaited us.

It wasn’t enough that we found our humble house ransacked, and the clothes we’d had (I’d long since outgrown mine) lying charred in the fires. The most terrible and unjust of all was the subsequent mass deportations of Tatars, Greeks and, later, Armenians, from the Crimea. Ekaterina Trofimovna, a Russian, was married to an Armenian! Those in mixed marriages were allowed to choose and she chose to stay behind with us, her husband and her children.

I was the deciding factor in the argument at home. Neither Ekaterina nor her husband could contemplate condemning me once again to persecution on the basis of nationality, now coming from our own people. So I never saw Sergei Danov again. All I have left of him is the surname that I share with my brother, and the memory of this good, kind man. Ekaterina Trofimovna, left as she was with two children, couldn’t, of course, have a personal life—she raised us on her own and as far as I remember was constantly working.

My partisan ribbon easily opened the door for me into seventh year at school, although prior to the war I had only finished third year. But my fellow classmates, who had returned from evacuation in the East, helped me catch up and I finished tenth year with a gold medal award.

Then there was Leningrad University, where, by the way, I wasn’t accepted into the journalism department on account of having spent time in occupied territory. Rather I was accepted into the Russian Language Department. Later, I worked with my husband in the far north, before returning to Leningrad, where I eventually did become a journalist.

And through all these years, Grandma Katya, as her grandsons—my children—came to call her, shared our joys and difficulties. I always considered her to be my mother and didn’t want anyone to think otherwise. I dare to hope that I was a good daughter to her. In any case, her letters to me attest to this, especially the ones written in her later years.

She never wanted to leave her beloved Crimea for good. By then a pensioner, she grew flowers and roses, but she did spend the winters with us. In fact, she never lived in a flat of her own, with heat, running water or an inside toilet.

My Simferopol friends, émigrés to Israel, saw trees planted in Jerusalem in honour of those people who had saved Jewish children. They wrote to me about it. In the Spring of 1991, I sent a letter to Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, hoping that by the fiftieth anniversary of this Russian woman's heroic deeds, my people, from my historic homeland, might pass on a word of thanks to her and perhaps help her somehow in the difficult, last years of her life.

Indeed, events in our country at that time promised her all manner of new hardship. While the verification and questioning of witnesses dragged on in Israel, the break-up of the former Soviet Union meant that we ended up living in two different countries, with all the consequences of that division. True, some friends from before the war managed, after a struggle, to finally obtain documents for her stating that she had been a member of the underground and a war veteran; all this was done to help increase her small pension. Despite the food coupons in circulation in St Petersburg and Crimea, we managed to warmly mark her eighty-fifth birthday.

But she could no longer spend the winters with us as she used to—she was afraid of the political instability. Three months after her birthday, on 10 March 1993, she was gone. She had been lifting a heavy bucket of coal to stoke the oven. The doctor said the last question on her mind was whether I knew and if I was coming to her. I was held up. Due to a lack of fuel, there were no flights to Ukraine.

Then finally, a letter came from Yad Vashem: “We inform you that a medal and a ‘Righteous Person of peace’ award of honour go to your adoptive mother, Ekaterina Trofimovna Kolesnikova, and in the very near future these decorations will be sent to the Israeli Consulate in Moscow.”

Now my children know the whole story—I am writing it down for the first time especially for this book of memoirs. Somehow the bitter feeling that everything happened too late, that I was too slow, remains with me. . . .

All that remains to be said is that a long time after the end of the war a miracle occurred: I received one last message in the form of a note from my birth mother. It was on a sheet of paper from a student's exercise book and written with a pencil she'd obtained God-knows-how. In it she is thinking only about me, telling me not to cry, not to believe the ‘rumours’ or fall ill, and asking me to love the people who saved me. This meant that she must have been snatched from me but not shot along with the others. She must have suffered alone with the Gestapo, probably tortured and humiliated before she died!

Until my last year in Ukraine I took flowers, grown by Ekaterina Trofimovna, to the Monument to Those Who Died at the Hands of the German Fascist Occupiers. The monument is situated on the Feodosisky Highway at the beginning of that tank ditch, not far from a traffic-police post positioned there to prevent any further violations of our lives.

Now the names of my parents—Maria Lvovna and Solomon Solomonovich Feldman—are in the Hall of Memory at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. In the Simferopol Cemetery in Crimea there is also a memorial to my second mother, while in Jerusalem her name is inscribed on a marble tablet.

JOZEPH DE HAAN

Context: Western Europe

Source: Jozeph de Haan. My Recollections of Holland 1935–1945. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2009, pp. 10–17. Used by permission.

In this testimony, Jozeph de Haan begins by informing his readers that from mid-1942 he was left alone, but that he was invited by a colleague of his father, Mauritz Trompetter, to come and live in a room in Trompetter's family apartment. When the Trompetters soon decide to go into hiding, however, Jozeph decides not to follow them, but, rather, remain in the apartment alone. The story that then unfolds shows us a young man who is taken under the wing of the Dutch resistance, removing him from the dangers of hiding in the city and taking him to the countryside in Friesland. In the account that then follows, Jozeph recounts a broad variety of adventures in which his life and safety were often threatened, but through which he continually emerged unscathed.

By mid-1942 the situation was becoming hopeless. The razzias (raids, round-ups) conducted by the Grune Polizei (under Nazi rule German police wore green uniforms) were becoming more frequent. Huge areas were blocked off and hundreds of Jewish people rounded up and deported. After my father and stepmother were taken from our home in the Blasiusstraat, I continued to stay on at home alone.

It was during this time that a colleague of my father, Mauritz Trompetter, heard that my parents had been taken by the Germans. He immediately asked me to come and stay in his second floor apartment at number 34, Krugerstraat, which I did. Several weeks passed by before Mauritz, his wife and their son, Gerrie, decided to go into hiding in the northern province of Friesland.

For many Jewish people going into hiding seemed the only way to avoid being rounded-up and deported, but it was not an easy thing to do. It was a matter of having complete trust in people who were often total strangers. Thank God, there were still some very decent God-fearing Dutch people willing to help their Jewish countrymen. It was certainly not without great risk because everything was punishable with the bullet. Nevertheless, these courageous people did help whenever they could.

I was given the option of going into hiding with the Trompetter family but I was too scared to venture out into the streets and declined their offer. The family left everything behind; a lifetime of possessions, taking only a small suitcase with them for their trip into the unknown. As I closed the house door behind them, I hoped this was only a bad nightmare I could be awakened from in the morning. The reality was far bleaker.

I was now in the Trompetters' home in Krugerstraat. I continued to sleep there for many nights and did not go into the street. How I survived those lonely days is hard for me to remember now. I do remember thinking about the family often and hoping they had reached safety. I wondered where they could be, but of course there was no news from them at that stage. Mr. and Mrs. Soeters and their three children lived on the first floor of the apartment complex at number 34. Mrs. Soeters was a member of the Salvation Army and a wonderfully brave Christian woman who was not in the least intimidated by the Germans. This was later proved when the German Jewish couple she was hiding in her house were found when her house was raided. Naturally, they were all taken prisoner, including Mrs. Soeters. The Jewish couple perished, but Mrs. Soeters' faith triumphed and they let her go the next day. I think they were really frightened of her for she knew her bible and used it to her advantage.

For several weeks after that incident Mrs. Soeters told me she suffered from depression. On hearing the Trompetters had left she insisted I come down to sleep in her apartment one floor below. Again I was faced with a dilemma. The Germans were aware she had hidden Jews before. Would they come looking again or would they think she may have learned her lesson? I finally accepted her offer and this wonderful lady looked after me for several weeks. However, I was always very worried in case the Gestapo paid us a return visit. To me, her courage stands out like a lighthouse in the night and I remember her with admiration.

Approximately two months went by when one Tuesday the doorbell rang and two gentlemen from the underground, or resistance movement, arrived to collect some clothes for the Trompetter family who were hiding in a very small place near Birdaard in north-east Friesland. Apparently the family were now enjoying some kind of very limited freedom. During my conversation with these men I asked if I could go back with them to Friesland. They promised to fetch me on Thursday afternoon.

The two days of waiting were agonising and the tension indescribable. Firstly, I was not sure if they would come, and secondly, my false identity card (given to me by a friend of Mrs. Soeters' son, Cor) seemed rather amateurish. Looking down at the roughly stuck together card I read that my name was now Willem Walvis. Luckily I never needed to show this card to any German official because I am sure the deception would have been obvious to a trained eye.

True to their word the two men arrived on that Thursday afternoon. I left the relative safety and warmth of the Soeters' home where I had sheltered in one room for about two months. We had arranged that one fellow walked about one hundred meters in front of me and the other man followed far behind me. I walked without the yellow Star of David which I had taken off my clothing.

We arrived at the Muiderpoort station and as arranged, boarded a railway carriage bound for Enkhuizen. I clearly remember sitting opposite my saviours and not talking at all. Instead, I tried to read a small book brought along for the purpose. I can assure the reader that I never got further than the first page.

After what seemed like an eternity we arrived at Enkhuizen, a small town that lies on the Western side of the IJsselmeer. From there we crossed this stretch of enclosed water by ferry to Stavoren in the province of Friesland. The men from the resistance movement had organized the train and ferry tickets so I did not have to interact with any officials on my journey north. However, to my dismay the boat was packed with German soldiers and some civilians. I knew the ordinary German soldier was not out hunting for me. After a while I started to read and felt slightly better.

After docking at Stavoren we boarded another train for our trip to Leeuwarden City. Previously I had been briefed about the Gestapo control at Leeuwarden railway station. I was terrified at having to pass by these officials at such close proximity. I felt my heart pounding as I walked through the small iron turnstile at the exit where I had to present my railway ticket. My steps felt heavy but to my great relief I was soon outside the station. I followed the men from the resistance and climbed into a taxi (running on coal) and we continued our journey north.

A long trip followed. By now it was getting dark. We were driving through small places that were totally unfamiliar to me. The men spoke in their own language (Fries), a language I could not understand at all. It sounded like Greek to me!

At last we arrived at our destination but where that was I did not know. I was ushered into a small room where I met a farmer and his wife, so I presumed. They offered me some coffee and having not eaten all day I was indeed ravenously hungry and happy for the bread that was also offered. After the two chaps from the organization left the farmer and his wife showed me where I could sleep, for which I was most grateful. Very soon I fell into a deep and exhausted sleep.

The next morning an elderly Jewish couple joined me. They too came from Amsterdam and we exchanged information. Later they were placed in hiding somewhere else. I stayed with this farmer for approximately six weeks and in that time began to understand a bit of their language. I found out that the town I was in was called Rensumageest.

I was soon transferred to a place in Utsigh near Genum, where I spent some time with a farmer called Vermeulan and his wife. If my memory does not fail me, her name was Griet. I recall they had a daughter with blond hair who was going to be married.

To reach Utsigh I was given a bicycle and told to follow another fellow from the resistance movement who was also on a bicycle. Looking at the map later, I realized how far we had cycled from Rensumageest to reach Utsigh. It was a huge trip on a bicycle with no lights to guide me. I had to follow this fellow in front of me and he went hell for leather. I lost him several times along the way, but thank God he waited for me to catch up. It was one of those dark nights with no moon to guide us or any street lights to help us navigate.

Eventually we reached our place of destination and again I met new people who would place themselves in great danger to help me. Meeting different people was now a little easier as I had started to grasp a bit more of the Friesian language.

Whilst staying with the Vermeulens I can recall that one morning a cyclist approached the farm having come from far away. This was an unusual occurrence in such a tiny village. I watched from behind a curtain of the farmhouse, and as the man got nearer I recognized that much to my delight the cyclist was none other than my father's colleague Mauritz Trompetter! He had heard through the grapevine that I was hiding in Utsigh with the Vermeulens!

I was delighted to be reunited with a person from my past but at the same time terrified for his safety, as he had to cycle all the way back to Birdaard, which was a great distance indeed. His reply was, "Don't worry, it's very safe. Here we are as free as birds!" I was amazed and scared at the lack of security, that someone in the underground organization should have simply told him where I was hiding! Clearly all was still well on the Friesian front.

But that feeling of freedom was soon to end. It was clearly the lull before the storm. Early one morning late in the summer of 1943 (I know all this because the cows were still grazing in the meadows and milking always took place at the same time, around 4 am), the Germans struck like thieves in the night. They came in their trucks, rolling along the small country roads with their headlights switched off.

At that time of the morning the flat Friesian countryside was always very quiet. Hardly anybody ever travelled then, except for farmhands going about their early morning routines. It was just after 4.00 am and the farmhands were about to start milking in the meadow opposite the farmhouse where I was hiding. They rushed over to the farm and knocked loudly on the window, alerting the farmer that they had seen Germans in the village of Genum, the nearest village to us, and warning me to get out fast.

I had been sleeping upstairs when the farmhands knocked on the window below. In an instant I was wide awake. I jumped into my boots and trousers, grabbed my jacket and bolted out the back door of the farmhouse. As the night air filled my lungs, I froze in my tracks. It was as if a dark blanket had been thrown over my head. Complete darkness surrounded me. I felt the back door behind me. All I could do was to drop to the ground and crawl on my haunches towards the small canal running behind the farmhouse.

Eventually I felt the water of the canal against my fingers. I knew the only way to get across the two metre wide stretch of water was via a wooden plank that lay across the canal. I crawled around in the darkness until I eventually found the plank, which I crossed on my hands and knees. Once on the other side I ran as far as I could away from the farm.

By now it was getting somewhat lighter or perhaps my eyes were getting used to the darkness. Suddenly in the distance I noticed some cows being milked by the two farmhands who had knocked on the window. Unfortunately, I never found out their names to properly thank them for what they did for me that night.

Again my life had been spared. Within thirty minutes the Germans reached the farmhouse where I had been hiding and demanded to know where I, Jozeph de Haan, was. They knew my name, a fact I only learned after the war. I also subsequently learned that the leader of the underground movement in charge of Jewish placements in Friesland was killed by his own people. He was a traitor and informed the Germans of the whereabouts of the approximately fifteen Jewish people hidden in the area. Unfortunately the Trompetter family must have been caught during that raid as they never returned to Amsterdam after the war. After making several enquiries I heard that they had indeed been taken the very same night I had managed to escape the enemy's clutches.

At that time there must have been several hundred Jewish people in hiding throughout the province of Friesland. From my personal experience I think Friesland should be acknowledged as perhaps the bravest province in the country, for saving the lives of many Jewish people in desperate need of food and shelter. Shelter was the difference between life and death. I cannot speak for any other part of the Netherlands, but in Friesland there were many brave and heroic God-fearing people in small villages and towns doing their bit to save the persecuted and putting their own lives at risk to do so.

After my escape from the Vermeulens' farmhouse I managed to stay ahead of the Germans. A friend of mine from Amsterdam, Appie Rijksman, also managed to escape in the nick of time from his hiding place with the Folkertsma family in the town of Genum when the Germans burst into the farmhouse. Like mine, his escape was also a miracle and he joined me a few hours later somewhere in the middle of nowhere. We teamed up and gave one another moral support.

Soon a local farmer, Klaas Dreijer, found us and directed us to a barn far in the outback which became our temporary home and a good roof over our heads. Appie and I made use of a long pole Klaas gave us to jump over the many canals that crisscrossed the meadows along the way. Klaas, whom we later found out was a major underground resistance worker, provided us with everything to last the six or seven weeks we spent in the forlorn barn. It was only ever used during the autumn and winter months by the farmers. If there was a sudden change in the weather they could take animals there to shelter during a storm.

The farmers in the area were fantastic. Small children, always the same ones, brought us food. Sometimes we had so much food we told the kids to please tell their Mamas not to send us anything for a few days. I can never thank those farmers enough for what they did for us during that time.

When it was time for us to leave the barn, again Klaas Dreijer came to the rescue. He found us a temporary place of safety near Holward where another farmer was willing to risk his life and take us both in. I remember the three of us walked there in pounding rain. Once more we felt most indebted to Klaas for finding us another safe haven.

Unfortunately I lost touch with Klaas and his wife after they immigrated to Canada after the end of the war. I have tried several times over the last forty years to find him but to no avail. I am not sure if he or his wife is still alive today.

From the farm where Klaas took us we could see the island of Ameland. I remember it was a cold wet winter's night and after warm coffee and something to eat, the farmer bade Klaas farewell and took us to a small separate building, away from the main farm building. It was an old hay barn with a hay loft at the top. The farmer (unfortunately I do not know his name) was well prepared for us and had made makeshift sleeping accommodation available in between bales of straw, high up in the loft. To get up there we climbed through the old chimney, stepping left and right on the protruding stones and landing in the middle of bales of hay.

It was nice and warm and soon we were lulled into a deep sleep in our new surroundings by the droning sounds of the wind charger right above our heads, a device that supplied electricity to the farm. The next morning the farmer told us we must stay in the barn at all times. Naturally we agreed to this request as we had no desire to wander around the place. It must have been winter for it was bitterly cold. Many times we climbed back upstairs through the chimney to sleep and get warm.

Food was brought to us by one of the farmer's children, a boy who must have been about six or seven years old and spoke fluent Friesian. With some suspicion Appie and I began to chat to him about the lovely food his Mama had made for us. Then we hesitantly asked him whether he liked kugel and pears, a special Jewish dish prepared in most Jewish households on Friday evenings. He replied, "Oh yes! That's lovely!" Of course we never let on that we were Jewish and actually shed a tear or two, for that boy instinctively knew what we had meant and spent many hours in our company. . . .

We knew our hiding place near Holward was temporary and eventually the day arrived for us to leave. Once again our rescuer Klaas secured a place for me and a different hideout for Appie. I was to go to Heskampen, a farm owned by Jan Rosier and his family, and Appie was placed with another Folkertsma family in Genum. They may have been relatives of the first family where he was hidden. We kept in contact with one another for most of the time and on rare occasions got together for a chat.

Jan Rosier owned the largest farm in the Blija area. I kept myself well hidden and never ventured out during the day whilst staying at the Rosier family farm. Only after dark, at around 9.00 pm, would I stroll around the farmhouse for some much needed fresh air, together with Sieb and Johannes, the farmer's sons. I slept in a well-concealed hiding place behind Johannes's bed. Every evening I removed the wooden partition separating his bed from mine and secured myself into this small cavity by locking the wooden plank from the inside. I slept on a mattress practically in the eaves of the sloping roof. This was the safest place for me in case trouble came knocking, which did happen on two occasions while I was with the Rosier family.

One of my close encounters occurred one morning when two German soldiers, both elderly men from a garrison in a larger village, cycled along the farm road leading to the house. The German Alsatian belonging to Jan Rosier was my hero because he barked like crazy and would have bitten the soldiers if it were not for Johannes calling the dog to back off. The Rosier farm was the largest in the area and the German soldiers were also running out of food. So they scrounged whatever they could get from the local farmers.

Jan Rosier was a real Friesian and detested the Germans. He was not going to give them anything! As for me, well I was sitting in my hiding place not knowing what was going on downstairs. I heard later that Jan had made out as though he did not understand a thing they were saying and they left empty handed. Jan's philosophy was that if you gave once they would come back for more. There were only two such incidents and I survived both. . . .

[D]uring the spring of 1944 I tried my hand at spinning wool on a wheel. I needed to keep busy as I had to stay inside. During this time I made at least one hundred balls of the best handmade wool and I was able to supply all of the family. . . . I stayed inside throughout the autumn and winter of 1944 while the boys went skating on the small canals that had frozen over, wearing their new jumpers. . . .

Having some work to do certainly helped me during this difficult time.

Eventually 14 April 1945 arrived and I was still living with the Rosiers. At first we heard many rumours of the events that were unfolding, but then news broke out that the Canadians had taken Dokkum to the north-east and that the fighting was practically over. Johannes and I took to the tandem bicycle and pedaled at great speed to the village. That was a day I never will forget because on the road to Dokkum we came across hundreds of German soldiers who had surrendered to the Allies. We stopped and all I could do was stare at them. I had to pinch myself to believe it was true.

Standing there it dawned on me that I was free at last. Johannes turned to me and shaking me out of my trance said, "Come on Willem, let's go home!" I have no words to describe the grin on his face and the emotions boiling up inside me. The realization of freedom sank in during the trip back to the Heskampen, which had been my home for nearly sixteen months.

TOMMY DICK

The Nazi invasion of Hungary on March 19, 1944 brought the Holocaust to that country almost immediately, with the occupiers utilizing preexisting Hungarian antisemitic legislation and records in order to maximize the process of Jewish registration prior to arrest and deportation. Tommy Dick, who relates these initial measures, found himself increasingly subjected to tighter and tighter controls over his previously held freedoms. As he explains, once he was called up for compulsory labor service—a euphemism for slave labor—he tried to find ways to make the experience bearable. His one consolation was that if he was working in a labor battalion at least he would not be deported to certain (and immediate) death. This was his only solace, however; absent this from the equation and, he writes, “it was awful.”

Before the war, we experienced discrimination, but life was tolerable. My father was the director of a large brick factory. My mother's four sisters were all married to professional people and her father was an adviser to the government on fiscal and financial matters. I understood that during World War I—when Jewishness was still viewed as a matter of religion and not as a matter of race—my maternal grandfather became Lutheran partly because he had aspirations to be minister of finance.

With the outbreak of World War II, discrimination against Jews intensified. If one's parents were born Jewish, one was classified as a Jew. Universities had quotas placed on Jews to make sure they never represented more than a small fraction of the student body. This effectively barred them from getting a higher education and entering into professions. Jews were deemed too unreliable to be drafted into the army, but they were drafted into labour battalions and sent to the Eastern front to do dangerous hard labour. Many Jews were driven on to minefields to test the ground before soldiers set foot on the area. Laws were passed to protect the “purity” of the Aryan race, making mixed marriages illegal. A Jewish man could be convicted of fornicating with an Aryan woman and would be imprisoned for years.

When I was in high school, students had to engage in elementary military training twice a week. Part of the training consisted of handling a gun, taking it apart, cleaning it and shooting with dummy bullets. As my parents had been born Jewish, I was deemed unreliable and had to train separately from the rest without a gun. Not that I liked guns, but the segregation was humiliating. Still, except that some kids were of the unfortunate age to be drafted into military labour battalions, life was stressful but bearable. Hungary was an ally of Germany but was, at least nominally, an independent country.

Then, on March 19, 1944, the country was occupied by the German army.

Now, years later, I can still recall the horror, the fear and my feeling of total helplessness during those first days of occupation. I remember how surprised we were to learn that the German occupiers considered the elimination of Jews—they called it the “Final Solution”—their number one priority. The German army had been in retreat since the battle of Stalingrad, which took place between August 21, 1942, and February 2, 1943. By the spring of 1944, the Germans were fighting for their survival, and yet they began to arrest prominent and not-so-prominent Jews. One wondered if they did not have strategically more important tasks. They must have had lists of Jewish people and addresses, obviously prepared with the help of Hungarian collaborators. With ruthless efficiency, they sought out Jews. No one knew the criteria that placed someone on the list. For Jews there was no escape from that terror. My father had a bag of necessities packed in case there was a knock on our front door.

Days after the occupation, billboards appeared on the streets declaring that Jews (defined as anyone with two Jewish-born grandparents) must wear a yellow Star of David sewn onto outer clothing while out in public. A curfew was ordered along with many other restrictions, all under the threat of arrest. New orders were posted daily. One listed all the locations of empty stores where Jews had to deliver their radios at designated times. The dilemma we faced is vivid in my memory. On the one hand, there was the humiliation of seeing an endless queue of compliant Jews lining up around the block to hand in their radios; on the other, the question had to be asked: Was it worth risking arrest or having my father taken away for hanging on to a radio? To understand the fear one must also consider the hostility of the vast majority of Hungarians toward Jews. No one could be trusted as most Hungarians were collaborating with the Germans. It must have been easy to be defiant in Denmark where the king had demonstrated his support for Jews. This seemed to encourage the population to follow his example and resist. But nothing like that happened in Hungary. In fact, a large segment of the population actively supported the repressive measures against Jews, while others remained passive. Many couldn't care less. In many cases, I suspect there was a selfish element in this support as it was known that when Jewish families were deported from other German occupied countries, their homes were taken over and the contents, furnishings and other assets were easily looted by collaborators. So why would they not support the system? Why would they not behave like vultures?

I shall not forget the sad sight of my parents' friends who came to our apartment every day wearing the humiliating yellow star on their coats to bring us news of the arrests of friends and relatives. Soldiers would stop one on the street and demand documents. They were looking for escapees from auxiliary military units or for “parasites”—people who were not working.

I had a paper from one of my father's friends stating that I was employed by his company. The paper boosted my confidence, but I don't know if it would have stood the test if questioned. Luckily, I never had to find out. The soldiers conducting the raids had absolute authority and we had absolutely no rights. They could arrest someone because they did not like his or her looks. There was no remedy. One would simply disappear, so there was an impulse to stay at home, not venture out, not tempt fate, not stretch one's luck. Life during those very uncertain times had many facets. We vacillated between great caution and a devil-may-care attitude. Stay at home to avoid getting caught in a raid, or enjoy today because there might not be a tomorrow.

There was an equally compelling urge for hedonism and to use up what little time there was left to enjoy life to its fullest. Of course for a nineteen-year-old boy there is no greater enjoyment than sex. Luckily for me and for my friends, the nineteen-year-old girls in our social circles were of the same view. So we went out and went at it with gusto. I am sure that the parents of these society girls knew about their daughters' affairs, but they did not interfere. They too must have known this might be the end of the line, so they let them enjoy it if they could.

Those of us who were not arrested and whose parents were still at home were able to adjust to life's uncertainties in Budapest. But early in May, distressing news started to trickle in from around the country. Jews in the cities, towns and villages were being rounded up and held in barracks and sports arenas under deplorable conditions. The deportations had started. We knew about concentration camps, although we did not know about the gas chambers and ovens. The news from the outside made it evident that sooner or later it would be our turn. My life caved in on May 20, 1944, when notices appeared on the street ordering Jewish males of my age group to report to designated labour camps on June 5. We were told what clothing and equipment to bring and that the camps would be directed and staffed by the Hungarian army. We were also told that military discipline and law would apply. This meant that if one tried to escape, one could be court-martialed and shot as a deserter.

This was scary stuff. I had never been away from home except to summer camp and I knew this would be no summer camp. Where would we be sent? What would be the conditions in the camp? What kind of labour would we have to perform and how punitive would it be? Would the soldiers guarding us be humane or sadistic? I asked these questions, but expected no answers. I wondered if there was any advantage to becoming a forced labourer. Well, maybe. My friends and I reasoned that it was inevitable that after the deportation of all the Jews from the countryside was completed, they would turn to Budapest to finish off their deadly task. Perhaps from that point of view, the labour camp would temporarily provide a somewhat safer haven as the inmates might not be in their homes to be deported.

Other than that, it was awful.

MARIAN DOMANSKI

While some Jews fleeing the Nazis managed to find a ready hiding place in their town or village, others were not so fortunate, and often had to roam far and wide before locating a safe refuge. Marian Domanski was one such person. Arriving in a small village in Poland, he managed to find sanctuary among a farming community, where he became part of the local scene tending livestock. Unfortunately, his time in hiding here did not last long; as he writes toward the end of his account, local administrators received orders that villagers with horse-drawn carts were to be pressed into service so as to transport Jews to train stations—with deportation to death camps their final destination.

The liquidation of the ghettos, which had been rumoured among the farmers when I was in the village of Kozaki, turned out to be true, and almost everywhere the news of mass killings now became common knowledge. It was strange, because in the little town I came to next, in spite of all the rumours, the Jews didn't know of the liquidations, or maybe they knew, but didn't want to believe it.

But there was a different atmosphere in the air. While I was looking for work, sometimes the villagers' remarks put me on my guard, and I would realize that they were suspicious of me. I knew I would be in serious danger if they discovered my background. I was afraid to approach the village administrators to seek a proper night's accommodation and also didn't dare ask any of the farmers for food. Fortunately, at that time of summer, the gardens were full of vegetables, so I ate carrots and turnips that I picked from gardens. I slept in haystacks and dressed in a homespun, village-made coat jacket that I had received somewhere during my service. I had cracked heels from walking barefoot, and autumn was approaching.

I continued roaming from village to village, losing my sense of direction and circling among the Ukrainian villages that were located in that part of Poland. I hoped to find a farmer who needed my services—it was the only work I could do to survive—but I would need real luck at that time of the summer to find such an opportunity. In spite of all the difficulties, I stayed in the countryside and explored villages where, by instinct, I felt my survival was possible. I wandered to many places, sometimes returning to a village where I had been before because someone had informed me that a farmer there was looking for a herdsman. During my wanderings, I came upon a village named Sokoły, where a sign indicated the direction to the town of Persow, five kilometres away.

Instead of looking for a job in Sokoły, I decided to go to Persow.

The evening had already set in, and as I passed through the village centre, I walked past a group of women. It was common in those villages for women to gather together in the evenings and exchange information while their husbands talked in another group close by. One of the women asked me where I was going. Feigning confidence, I replied, “To see my uncle in Persow.” She shot back, “What’s your uncle’s name?” She caught me off guard. I blurted out “Pinkowski,” a name I had heard elsewhere. She called out to a group of men standing nearby, “Hey, Franiuk, in that Persow town, is there a man by the name of Pinkowski?” “No!” came the answer, but I stubbornly insisted that my uncle did live there. With that, I strode off in the direction of Persow, leaving the interrogators behind. I didn’t realize that in that little town, located not more than five kilometres away and no bigger than the village I had just left, people knew each other. And so I went to Persow and headed for my imaginary Uncle Pinkowski, the name I soon came to adopt.

When I arrived in the town of Persow, I was surprised at how small it was. There weren’t any sidewalks and the road was just dirt, pressed down by use. On both sides of the dirt road stood single houses with no barns attached. There was only one main road, with one or two shops, and a few more houses were scattered around.

On arrival in a new place it was my habit to explore what kind of people lived there. This time, I was more concerned about a roof over my head and therefore I didn’t follow my usual custom, but knocked on a door straight away. It was too good to be true—the people were not only pleasant, but also Jewish. It turned out that nearly the whole town was Jewish and because it was small—similar to Dubeczno—there was no ghetto there. It didn’t mean, however, that the Germans had forgotten them. Close by, the Sobibor death camp was already working at full capacity. Perhaps the town was too small for the Germans to be bothered with yet, or perhaps it was their policy to leave Jews alone in certain places, to allay suspicion until their liquidation was about to be completed.

But now I stood before a kindly Jewish tailor who invited me to stay the night at his home. In the course of our conversation, the family learned about my difficulties and my attempts at finding work. The tailor told me not to worry. “I have three children and will welcome you as my fourth,” he said. I felt grateful and secure. At last I had found someone who was prepared to take care of me.

As a tailor, my host had customers among the local farmers. After several days, he called me to his workroom and introduced me to a man who wished to hire me to look after his cows for the fall season. At the end of the season, I would come back to my newly-adopted family. To my great surprise, the man sitting in the workroom was Franiuk, from the village of Sokoły, who had said that in Persow there was no family named Pinkowski. So it turned out that, contrary to my intentions, the farmer for whom I was to work knew that I was a Jew. When riding with him in his horse-drawn cart, he instructed me not to tell anyone where he had brought me from or of my heritage. He then made a few suggestions, one of them being that the name Czesiek (short for Czesław) would sound more authentic than Grzegorz (Gregory), the name I had been known by in the village of Barczewo. From then on, I became known as Czesław Pinkowski. It felt strange and ironic to be with a farmer who was aware of my identity. All summer I had been running away from farmers who suspected my heritage, and now I was conspiring with one in the hope that no one else would learn the truth.

The next day, I led Franiuk’s cows to the pasture, where I met other boys looking after cows. I introduced myself as Czesław Pinkowski and from that day on I tried to blend in and be part of the community. I was the only non-local among them. Unlike other villages, in Sokoły there were no hired servants except for me; every boy was looking after his own family’s cows. But the boys treated me like one of the crowd; they of course didn’t know my heritage, and were very friendly toward me. I was part of the group and even dressed like them, with bare feet and tanned skin from being outdoors all the time. I even spoke like them. They were Ukrainian and, since I had spoken Ukrainian before in Kozaki and Barczewo, I had the opportunity to expand my knowledge of the language and become more fluent.

The boys were industrious and I soon learned from them how to weave and shape baskets. We collected materials on our way to the meadows. White willow trees grew by the roadside and by the drainage ditches. At the other end of the village was a forest of mixed trees and among them were slim junipers that were useful for basket-making. I would proudly bring some new baskets to Franiuk from time to time. Time passed and the potato harvest had started and rainy days became more frequent. With a sack over my head for protection against the rain and a whip in my hand, I looked after Franiuk’s cows and in exchange I enjoyed a relatively comfortable life with the friendship of Franiuk, his wife and their two children, and the village boys.

One day in the forest, while herding the cows on the other side of the village, I discovered an ideal spot to build a hiding place. Jurek, the boy from Warsaw, and I used to discuss such plans when we were together in Kozaki. But a truly safe hiding place was only a dream. The good times in Sokoły didn’t last—the Germans took care of that. In the autumn of 1942, the Nazis proceeded with their plan to eliminate all the remaining Jews in Poland, particularly those still living in small towns surrounded by villages. The time for the liquidation in our area arrived in October and there were soon no more opportunities for Jews to run away before the transports to the death camps began. All of the village administrators received orders from the municipalities to recruit villagers with horse-drawn carts to transport Jews from all the small towns and villages to the railway stations. There, the Jews were to be loaded onto freight trains and transported to killing centres.

NATHAN DUNKELMAN

Nathan Dunkelman and his family lived in the Jewish district of Łódź. In this account, readers are provided with a portrait of life in the Łódź ghetto. The account is told in the third person, with Nathan's own voice muted. Nonetheless, we see how this one person perceived the developments around him, and, through this, a short history of the Łódź ghetto is provided. Nathan's account is highly detailed and is rich in its narrative style, which extends through the summer of 1944 and the liquidation of the ghetto. It became the last major ghetto surviving in Nazi Europe.

Nathan and his family soon saw what the Germans were capable of. His father lost his business. Markets were closed to Jews. So his father could not sell the dishware and porcelain. Soon they were enclosed in a ghetto where there were few opportunities.

In 1940, the Nazis created a separate district for the Jews in northern Łódź, in the Old Town of Łódź and in the adjacent Baluty Quarter, one of the most dangerous neighborhoods in Łódź. These were the most run down and impoverished parts of the city. The article “The Establishment of the Litzmannstadt [Łódź] Ghetto” explains that the decree, issued by the Chief of Police Johann Schäfer, announcing the “opening of a separated district for Jews in Łódź” appeared on February 8, 1940, in the newspaper Lodscher Zeitung. The decree indicated the borders of the ghetto. Non-Jews who had lived in the ghetto area were forced out. A stockade and barbed wire enclosed the ghetto. After Pesach (Passover), April 23–29, 1940, the ghetto was sealed off from the rest of the city on April 30, 1940. According to the article “Litzmannstadt Ghetto: Introduction” over 180,000 people were packed into an area of 4.13 square kilometers.

The ghetto was like a city, with many streets. Three bridges, guarded by Schupo, or Schutzpolizei, crossed over to the other sections of the ghetto. In the middle were the “Aryans” or non-Jews. The Jews of Łódź, including some Jewish refugees, were moved into the homes on these streets, crowded into apartments and houses. Nathan's street became a ghetto street, so their home where they had lived for twenty-nine years, was in the ghetto. Their apartment was in a three story building with quite a few apartments. In the family apartment were his father, mother, aunt, and five sons. The Germans did not move anyone else into the apartment.

In 1940, Nathan's father, Yacub, became seriously ill with an infection; a carbuncle, a cluster of boils, had become badly infected, spreading over his entire back, and had to be operated on. What his father didn't know was that he “had sugar” or diabetes. There was no medication in the ghetto for this. Nathan's father died during surgery. He was only thirty-nine years old.

During this time, horrible things were going on. People were living on top of other people. When Nathan was twelve years old, and he was confined to the Łódź Ghetto, his schooling ended. There was only underground schooling in the ghetto, and Nathan could not go to the underground schools because he had to work. Nathan said that his mind was not on schooling but on surviving. With their father and grandfather dead, Nathan, thirteen years old, and his older brother, Osher, fourteen years old, had to support the family. They worked for the Sanitation Committee clearing out out-houses. They had to put in a certain number of hours each day because there were so many yards to clean up. This work was very hard.

Luckily his mother, Sara, did not have to go out to work. His mother had very high blood pressure and edema (retaining fluid). They told her not to drink anything. Nathan cooked her food without water until it was pasty. This is what she ate. The only treatment that was efficacious at that time in Europe was leech therapy. The saliva of leeches contains enzymes that can help lower blood pressure. But Nathan and his mother had no access to leeches, so his mother had to stay in bed most of the time.

Because they were sanitation workers, Nathan and Osher had a special ration. Food was rationed in the ghetto from June 2, 1940. . . .

Most people were given ration cards for one pound of bread per person for a week.

In other ghettos, such as Warsaw, food, medicine, and such were smuggled in from outside the ghetto. However, in Łódź this was difficult if not impossible because the Jews were dependent on the Germans for food, medicine, and other necessities. The only legal currency in the ghetto were specially created ghetto marks, the so-called “rumki” or “chaimki” named after the head of the Ältestenrat (Council of Elders), Chaim Rumkowski. Starving Jews traded their remaining possessions and currency for the ghetto marks at the Bank for the Purchase of Valuable Objects and Clothing, a bank founded by Rumkowski. With this currency they bought what they could.

Every week Nathan’s mother went down to the food distribution center where she was given something to cook. The family got more than the others because of the brothers’ demanding work. After a day’s work, Nathan and Osher sat in the house. They were young but exhausted by the work. They went to bed early and slept. There wasn’t much to do in the ghetto and besides they were tired.

In addition to special rations, Nathan and Osher were given tickets for Jewish theatre that was performed in the ghetto. This was a privilege extended to sanitary workers and a treat for the brothers.

When he was thirteen years old in 1940, Nathan should have had his Bar Mitzvah. However it was too hard to make one in the ghetto, especially without his father. People prayed in their houses and yards; they did not go to synagogue. Although it was his religious duty at thirteen years of age, Nathan was not able to fulfill the duty of “laying on” the tefillin until after the war. He did pray, asking G-d many times how it was possible that the good Jews who believed in him were being persecuted and murdered in the ghetto.

Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, a controversial figure, was the chairman of the Ältestenrat (Council of Elders) in the Łódź ghetto. Many loathed him. Others were grateful to him. Nathan said he didn’t know Rumkowski; he never had a close connection to him. Nathan had only seen Rumkowski from a distance; Rumkowski, his white hair billowing, was riding in a carriage protected by two Jewish policemen. Nathan said that Rumkowski was a good old man and intelligent. Rumkowski believed that if the Łódź Jews became indispensable to the war effort, the Germans would leave them in peace. Therefore Rumkowski petitioned the Nazis, asking them to deliver raw materials to the ghetto where workers would transform these raw materials into finished products, such as military uniforms, shoes, and weapons. Orders placed by private individuals were also filled. . . .

Rumkowski believed in survival through work; he set up over 120 factories and found the thousands of workers needed to operate them. For a long time the German occupiers needed the Łódź ghetto, and that is the reason it continued to exist. The Łódź Ghetto lasted longer than any other ghetto, except Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia, a special case.

Nathan says that Rumkowski was controversial because he was asked to do the impossible. Rumkowski was the leader of the ghetto, and people believed he had the responsibility to protect them from harm and supply them with basic necessities such as heat, work, food, housing, and health and welfare services—for 230,000 people. Yet he was also the one asked to supply the Gestapo with whatever they wanted, including people. They would come to him and say, “We need 50,000 Jews.” Rumkowski tried to deal with the Gestapo, saying he could give them 10,000 or 20,000, whatever. He made these deals and saved people’s lives for a time. According to Nathan, some people said he was an evil man; others, that he was a good man. Nathan thinks that Rumkowski had no choice but did the best he could do, considering he was forced to make “choiceless choices.” Ultimately he had to deliver what the Germans wanted. . . .

But from the end of 1942 until 1944, the selections were halted because the Germans needed the products produced in the Łódź ghetto factories.

Many people hid from these selections, not coming out until the selections were over. They hid in cellars and attics, outhouses and cemeteries, wherever people thought would be safe. After two or three days, up to a week, people hid and then came out until the next selection. Some people managed to escape the ghetto. This was extremely difficult because there was not a sewer system in Łódź as there was in the Warsaw Ghetto. Moreover, the Jews did not work outside but inside the ghetto. The escapees went over to the Polish side of Łódź. Some survived; some did not. Nathan met some of the survivors after the war. They had given away whatever they had, money and jewelry, whatever they had. This was the price for a life.

Nathan’s family was not wealthy. But he remembers exactly that in 1940—and he does not know what happened to precipitate this—his father and mother gave the children some money to hide on their bodies; in case it was needed, they would have this money. Then they came to the ghetto, and the money was used little-by-little for buying food.

Jews from Łódź were not the only people in the ghetto. Twenty thousand Jews from outlying areas and also from other countries such as Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia were sent to the Łódź Ghetto in the fall of 1941. Nathan remembers seeing Jews that had come from Austria, Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Luxembourg. They were well-dressed, well-educated, nice people, mostly elderly. These Western European Jews were used to better lives than the Polish Jews. Nathan said they could not stand the hunger and the cold. When he was walking in the ghetto streets, he saw their swollen corpse-like bodies. Many of the Western Europeans had died like flies. Most of these newcomers never adjusted to ghetto life. . . . They were sent seventy kilometers from Łódź to Chelmno death camp and murdered in the gas vans sometime in April and May of 1942.

Nathan said that thousands of “gypsies” (Roma) were also sent to the Łódź Ghetto from Burgenland, a multi-ethnic Austrian state, bordering Slovakia, Hungary and Slovenia. . . .

In December 1941, all the Roma were transported to Chelmno death camp, just days after it opened, where they were murdered in the gas vans. Nathan and his family knew nothing about Chelmno. They knew nothing about what was going on outside the ghetto, nor did they know the course of the war. Nathan said, “Maybe others did, but none of my family knew what was going on—even to the last minute.”

The worst selection was the Gehsperre Aktion (curfew action) carried out in September of 1942. On September 4, Rumkowski made a speech, called the “Give Me Your Children Speech.” In this speech, addressed to the mothers of the Łódź Ghetto, Rumkowski begged them to give him their children. The mothers refused. . . .

During the Gehsperre Aktion, ghetto residents were forced to remain in their homes. Jewish policemen, supervised by the German police, went into homes, one by one, searched them, brutally dragging away children, the handicapped, ill and elderly, and transporting them to Chelmno death camp where they were murdered. (Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration camp had not yet been built.) About 16,000 Łódź Jews were murdered, including 5,800 children under ten years old, elderly over sixty-five, and the infirm, as well as those in the hospitals. The Nazis wanted no one in the Łódź Ghetto who could not work. Nathan did not know, however, at the time where they were being taken.

Nathan’s grandfather was one of those taken away during this selection. His grandfather was a pious Jew who had believed in G-d all his life. His mission in life was to study. His grandfather had many old books bound in leather.

People would come and say that they would like to buy one of these books. His grandfather always said, “No. I will never sell these because they belong to my grandchildren.” These books like everything else were destroyed when the ghetto was destroyed by fire.

Life in the ghetto continued, but it wasn’t much of a life. Working conditions were cruel. There was hardship and hunger. People worked to pay for their rations. People were given a ration of a loaf of bread for a week and ate that in a day or two. If they had money to buy extra food, they ate that in the next two or three days and then starved themselves until the week was up when they received another food ration. First people became like skeletons. Next they swelled up from edema and died in the streets.

Nathan and his brother brought home enough food for the first five or six days for their family. It was not a lot of food, but they survived. Whatever money they had, they spent.

The ghetto was horrible—worse, Nathan says, than the concentration camp. Thousands of people died of starvation, disease, and cold.

People prayed every day, three times a day. Yet although they prayed, they believed G-d had forgotten them.

By June of 1944, the Germans knew that the Soviet Red Army was advancing closer to Poland. Therefore, they had to liquidate the ghetto as quickly as possible. The liquidation was accomplished between June 23 and August 29. Nathan remembers that in the summer Hans Biebow, the German Chief of the Ghetto Administration, who had played a major part in the selection process, called the Jews together at the clothing factory. He spoke to them. “Mein Juden, you will all go to the Reich, to Germany, to work. We need you there. Take your pots and pans. Take your family. Take everything you possess. You are going to the Reich to work.” . . .

The Łódź Jews did not know that this was the end. Although perhaps some few knew, Nathan’s mother, Sara, Nathan, and his brothers didn’t know. They believed they were going to work in the “old” Reich.

The Germans wanted to burn everything, so there would be no evidence. Every day another shipment of Jews was sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau Concentration Camp. Nathan and his brothers were assigned to the ghetto clean up, so they were among the last ones to leave. His mother was with them until the last minute.

That summer of 1944, Nathan became very ill. He had typhoid—diarrhea with blood—and lost weight. He was sick for two or three weeks when their summons to the transport came. People called them “wedding invitations.” People were never told in advance what would happen or when. Within minutes the SS wanted them ready for the trains. Called in August 1944, Nathan and the rest of his family were ready.

HORST PETER EISFELDER

Context: Evading Persecution

Source: Horst Peter Eisfelder. Chinese Exile: My Years in Shanghai and Nanking. Caulfield South (Victoria): Makor Jewish Community Library, 2003, pp. 5–18. Used by permission.

In this account Peter Eisfelder, a young German Jew, recounts the efforts his parents made to secure a safe passage out of Germany from an early date in the Nazi period. It is an excellent review of the struggle facing many German Jews throughout the 1930s, with various options tried and found wanting. With options for the United States, Costa Rica, and Australia falling through, one last chance was the Chinese city of Shanghai—a place in which the immigration regulations were more relaxed than they were practically everywhere else around the world. Eisfelder’s testimony is rich in detail, conveying a story that is little-known outside of a narrow readership.

My parents, Ludwig Leopold (Louis) and Hedwig Eisfelder, foresaw the inevitable outcome of Hitler’s policies and tried, albeit unsuccessfully, to leave Germany from the very early days of the Nazi ascendancy. They both turned forty years of age shortly after Hitler came to power in 1933.

The first and most obvious choice for many people during those days was to migrate to the USA, but at that time America was experiencing the depths of the Great Economic Depression. Entry could only be gained if one could produce an “Affidavit”—evidence that a person within the United States was willing to declare, under oath, that they had sufficient financial assets to guarantee that “the new arrival” would not burden the country’s social services for two years.

One could well have assumed that my family’s solution to the problem was simple, given my father’s considerably older brother Hugo lived in New York and was a wealthy man. He had moved to America before the turn of the twentieth century and it was said that in the mid-1920s he had bought out (or was bought out) by his business partner for something like a million dollars, a staggering sum in those far-off days. Sure, he too lost a great deal during the stock market crash of 1929, but there was more than enough left to ensure him a comfortable retirement. Hugo, however, made it absolutely clear to my father that whilst he was prepared to render some financial aid, namely exactly US $1000, such assistance would only be given upon our arrival in any country other than the United States! (the reasons behind this are a long story in itself).

Consequently, my father applied to the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) for assistance. HIAS was an old-established institution with offices around the globe, including Berlin, who declared themselves willing and able to help us reach the Argentine, where they operated several Jewish farming communities. As a result, the four members of my family learnt Spanish, but after several years of evening classes, it became evident that nothing would come of the frequent promises made by the HIAS staff. As things became increasingly uncomfortable in Hitler’s Third Reich, new plans were made, this time to reach Costa Rica, a seemingly quiet and attractive country. Again, however, nothing eventuated as neither the Argentine nor Costa Rica was issuing entry visas.

In an endeavor to get as far away as possible from the looming prospect of war in Europe, Australia looked like a promising alternative. Rumour had it that a landing permit could be gained with evidence of good health and at least £200 ($400). Although a princely sum in those days, Australian officials deemed it sufficient capital for a family to establish itself in business and prevent any financial burden on the nation.

Our efforts to leave Germany at that time were managed by the Hilfsverein der Juden in Deutschland (Aid Union of German Jews). They informed my parents that apart from the necessary £200, which we could raise thanks to Uncle Hugo’s promise of money, evidence was also required of our ability to conduct some trade, profession or craft. As both my parents were keen cooks, good at baking and producing the most fanciful of cakes, they proposed to open a cake shop upon arrival in Adelaide. Our family’s hopes were set on Adelaide as a new home “because it was neither too large nor too small.” In order to convince the Hilfsverein of their ability to produce cakes of a high standard, my parents were asked to work for one day at Dobrin, Berlin’s leading Jewish cake shop and caterer, to its management’s satisfaction. While my parents performed to everyone’s approval, the firm’s apprentice, young Richard Stern, also watched them. Many years later in Melbourne, Richard and I were to become very close friends.

With all the experts now certain we would have no difficulty in gaining an entry permit for Australia, preparations were set in motion to leave the land of our birth, where our ancestors had lived and toiled for untold generations, and for which my father had fought in the bitter battles of the First World War. We decided to apply for passports to facilitate a quick departure once we received the Australian landing permit. It was a risky decision during those days of Nazi madness when passports issued to Jews usually expired within six months. Once the passports were issued, we would have to leave the country before their expiry date, or risk imprisonment in a concentration camp and face almost certain death. Consequently, after several months of anxiously awaiting news from Australia, all of us were greatly disappointed and despairing when the telegram arrived from Canberra saying: “His Majesty’s Government regrets that it is unable to grant your request for an entry permit.” Hoping against hope that we had misunderstood the telegram’s content, my uncle Alfred, a linguistic expert, was called in to confirm the news.

Now we had to act quickly. There was very little time left before our passports expired and with every door shut, Shanghai remained the only choice. When my father mentioned this to his Jewish employer, he responded: “Since when have you become an adventurer?” His boss thought it was safer to take one’s chances in Germany than risk the unknown quantity of Shanghai. He was not alone in this view. No one seemed to know much, if anything, about the place, not even its exact location. Judging by my school atlas, Shanghai seemed to be on the coast just as its Chinese name implied. Shang “upon” and Hai (the) “sea.” So it transpired that swimsuits were bought for all of the family in anticipation of glorious beaches that didn’t exist—a further miscalculation on our part, as Shanghai is quite a long way from the ocean. The good people at the Hilfsverein tried to be helpful. Through their contacts around the globe, they had answers to every query. When we asked about our destination, their answer was very definite: “It is colder in winter and warmer in summer.” Thus, it seemed, exhausted their knowledge of Shanghai.

Exactly a year earlier Shanghai had been the scene of heavy fighting between Japanese invaders and the Chinese who frantically tried to fight them off. The fighting resulted in the death of several thousand innocent civilians. Many sought refuge in the neutral territories of Shanghai’s International Settlement and French Concession, but even these regions suffered enormous damage to lives and property as the result of misaimed bombs.

For all our desperate planning, heading into the war zone of Shanghai now seemed like leaping from the frying pan into the fire. Yet left with little choice, we took up the challenge and obtained tickets from the Italian shipping line Lloyd Triestino for passage from Trieste to Shanghai on the passenger line Conte Verde. Our departure was booked for 30 October 1938.

As my bar mitzvah had been planned for late November, it was hurriedly brought forward to be celebrated ten days before our departure from Berlin. After my performance at Synagogue, the family gathered at our apartment to celebrate the event. Our guests found the table spread with delicious, fancy cakes prepared by my parents just for the occasion. Sadly, it would be the last time many of my relatives would be together. Only three relatives would follow us to Shanghai and only two survived. I met with those two in New York some thirty-eight years later. All my other relatives fell victim to the Holocaust.

We left Berlin on 26 October 1938, travelling by train via Vienna, Zagreb in Yugoslavia and on to Trieste. On reaching the German border, we were subjected to a rigorous inspection by customs. No one was allowed to leave the country with any valuables or German currency. Only foreign currency to the value of ten German marks or just over US$2 per person was allowed to be taken out. During inspection of our belongings, one of the customs officers tore open a packet of Persil washing powder, suspecting hidden jewellery.

Covered from head to foot with the stuff, the officer became furious and barked out: “Has anyone still got German currency?” My brother Erwin, almost two years my senior, piped up and said most innocently, “Yes, I still have two Pfenniger (pennies).” Even though this did not even amount to a fraction of a US cent, it made the officer even angrier. “Out with you, everyone out!” he shouted. My mother and our travel companions, a lady acquaintance and her twelve-year-old daughter were consequently marched off and subjected to intimate body searches. We were released only at the very last moment, as the train was about to move on and out of Hitler’s “Thousand Year Reich.”

Unlike so many others, we were not penniless when we arrived in Trieste. A distant relative living in Italy had mailed an envelope containing 1000 Italian lire in notes to our hotel. I don’t know the equivalent value in American dollars, but it was certainly enough to allow us a few carefree days in the city.

We boarded the Conte Verde on 30 October for a voyage that would prove memorable for many reasons—more than the fact that I was often seasick and celebrated my thirteenth birthday at sea. We had many adventures on that journey, much of which I have written about in another narrative. I can still vividly recollect our arrival at the docks the evening we sailed. None of us Eisfelders had ever seen an ocean liner before and on reaching the waterfront we were duly impressed, perhaps in awe, of the huge Conte Verde brightly illuminated against the dark sky. Even though it was close to midnight before we settled into our four-berth “Tourist Class” cabin, a splendid repast was awaiting us in the dining room. Indeed, that’s how it was for the entire four-week voyage; food was plentiful and very, very good, but regretfully I was mostly too seasick to enjoy it. . . .

While there were about another hundred and fifty German-speaking Jewish refugees on board, few of them were children. I found it difficult to communicate with some of them as they spoke dialects I could not understand. Most of the time at sea I was confined to my bed and felt miserable.

Whenever the liner reached port, I was quick to recover and take the opportunity to see a fair bit of the world en route, although the boat never stayed in a port for more than a few hours. I have vague recollections of wandering the streets of Venice, of being taken around Brindisi by horse drawn coach and seeing Port Said at night. I recall witnessing a magnificent sunset over the Egyptian Desert as we moved through the Red Sea, of visiting Aden and viewing Bombay at night. I saw Colombo by taxi, monkeys in Singapore’s Botanical Garden, marveling at the display of neon lights all over Manila that even outlined the city’s churches. I even recall enjoying coffee and cakes at a Hong Kong hotel restaurant. Of course the Italian lire we were given in Trieste held no value ashore, but we managed well with a sum of English sterling my mother had earned baby-sitting a young child travelling first class to India.

During our voyage news reached us of the horrors taking place in Europe. News gleaned by fellow passengers from English language newspapers in Bombay told us of the notorious Krystallnacht (Night of Broken Glass) on 9 November 1938, and of the horror of Nazi mobs burning synagogues all over Germany, taking thousands of Jews into concentration camps and killing a good many in the process.

When, on the morning of Thursday 24 November, as the Conte Verde steamed up the Whangpoo River, we gained our first glimpse of our future hometown, were we surprised! We had a vague notion of what Chinese architecture looked like, taken from such reliable sources as the “Willow Pattern” tea set. What we expected to see were small huts with swept up roofs, bamboo or mud-brick walls. What we saw instead looked like a miniature version of Manhattan—skyscrapers larger than any we had seen in Europe! It seemed unbelievable that this remote corner of the globe had been touched by an American influence yet to reach Europe. We were pleasantly surprised to see such evidence of Western civilization.

After the Conte Verde berthed in Shanghai, several representatives of the International Committee, a local aid committee, met the ship to greet the Jewish refugee migrants. The committee was generally referred to as the “Komor Committee” after its chief executive Paul Komor. He was a Hungarian national and not Jewish. It seems that Mr. Komor also had some close links to the German Consulate in Shanghai.

In anticipation of our arrival, the committee had already arranged accommodation. Each family was duly handed a slip of paper with the address of their new home. We were also instructed to report to the committee rooms the next day for information regarding our future activities and advice about jobs, careers and schooling.

Disembarking along the Shanghai and Hongkew Wharf, we were then carried by small tender (ferry) a couple of kilometers upstream to the customs shed. By the time we had cleared customs it was late in the afternoon and, being a winter’s day, it was also quite dark. On leaving the shed we found ourselves in front of the main customs house, a very imposing building many stories high. From its large clock tower, bells chimed hourly, the peel heard far and wide. Along the street even larger and more impressive buildings towered, headquarters of banks, newspapers, the twenty-story Cathay Hotel (now called Peace Hotel) and equally tall Broadway Mansions (now Shanghai Mansions).

Despite careful planning, most of our luggage failed to arrive at Trieste before we left for Shanghai. With Germany having occupied the Sudetenland at that time, German authorities redirected many trains, emptying their contents to make room for troops and guns. Consequently, as we now boarded a sleek taxicab and gave the Chinese driver the slip of paper bearing our new address, we held all our worldly possessions in our hands, in just a few small suitcases. . . .

To me, a strange town always looks distinctly different the first time I look at it. The many new sights held an atmosphere of anticipation and anxiety for me until I began to find my bearings and become more familiar with my new surroundings.

As our taxi made its way past the big buildings of the “Bund” (an Indian term meaning embankment), Shanghai’s best-known street along the waterfront, we pondered the magnificent accommodation we were being taken to. As the driver crossed Garden Bridge, a large bridge spanning the Soochow Creek, the cab was forced to slow to a halt in front of a small sentry box positioned halfway across. A dwarfish figure of a Japanese soldier appeared from the sentry box and barked: “Pass neezzanee (show your passes),” causing the Chinese driver to bow as low as he could while holding up some kind of document. The soldier peered at us foreigners and, with a growl in his voice, indicated our vehicle could proceed.

It seemed we had now entered that part of the International Settlement north of Soochow Creek, a creek perhaps twice as wide as the Yarra River downtown in Melbourne. This section of the International Settlement formed the Japanese defence sector and had been used by the Japanese as a base for their 1937 invasion of China. During the fighting in August and September 1937, as China tried to expel the Japanese from this bridgehead, large sections of this part of the International Settlement were laid waste. Although foreign-owned wharves and warehouses behind high walls along the riverfront had largely been spared, very little else remained. However, there was an isolated house here and there, and the occasional cluster of houses only slightly damaged and made habitable again. As we now drove on into the night along unlit streets, all we could make out of this desolate expanse were shells of burnt-out homes, shops and the skeletons of factories. We saw very few people.

Less than a kilometer down the road we came upon another bridge spanning a smaller creek and manned with yet another Japanese soldier wishing to inspect the driver’s pass. As we proceeded, we passed a column of Japanese soldiers marching in the opposite direction. What struck us with awe was the fact that many of them were wearing a mask over their nose and mouth. In our innocent ignorance we saw this as a muzzle of some kind, possibly inflicted as a punishment. Only later did we learn that this was a widely practiced health measure designed to prevent the spread of infections such as the common cold.

As we drew closer to our destination, the driver indicated that he could not find the address, ‘125/3 Wayside Road’ that we had given him. Due to the fighting, burning and looting some twelve months earlier, few street signs or street lights remained to guide us, and houses rarely displayed numbers. In short, we found ourselves amid a wilderness of ruins, in a strange city in an even stranger land, lacking a common language with the driver and in almost pitch darkness. In spite of our predicament, I had great confidence that my parents would find a way out.

Suddenly out of this darkness a towering figure loomed, turbaned, with a flowing black beard, dressed in a uniform and carrying a huge electric torch. He was an Indian Sikh and member of an elite unit of the International Settlement’s Police Force. His unit was housed in barracks undamaged by war, a magnificent multi-storey apartment house not far from where we were stranded. He was both courteous and helpful, quickly locating our new home in a little lane off the main street.

As we drew up alongside the house, we saw a small Russian Church to our right and to our left, a fairly respectable three-storey house similar to many found in London. An elderly Russian lady, who had obviously been expecting us, greeted us at the door with a flood of Russian words. Like so many of her compatriots who had fled ‘Mother Russia’ around 1917, she considered her sojourn here in China a purely temporary arrangement. She, and thousands like her, lived in the few remaining houses of Hongkew, as this part of town was called, ready to leave at short notice and return to a Russian ruled by a Tsar and mad monks. Speaking only Russian and dutiful churchgoers, their homes were decorated with pictures of the Tsar and his family and the Imperial Russian flag occupied the place of honour. Their boys wore the uniforms of Tsarist military cadets, indicating their readiness to fight and shed blood for the restoration of the despotic regime.

Our new landlady led us upstairs to a room on the second floor that was to be our home. It was sparsely furnished but still roomy, about 4 m by 7 m and had large windows. It also had a fully enclosed verandah, virtually another room, perhaps 4 m by 2 m in size. It was late evening when we arrived and what was perhaps more important than our immediate surroundings was the thought of food. We had eaten our last meal on board the Conte Verde very early that morning and we had nothing edible, nor any crockery, cutlery or kitchenware of any kind in our small suitcases. Still, rescue it seemed was not too far away.

From the room below we heard what sounded like the old German Imperial Anthem, Heil Dir im Siegerkranz. As our landlady led us downstairs, we discovered it was only the tune we recognized; it was identical to the melody of the former Austrian anthem being played on a creaky gramophone by the Schönfeld family in the room below. Mr Schönfeld had fought in the Austrian Army during the First World War and was taken prisoner by the Russians. He subsequently spent many years in their country and acquired a fluent knowledge of their language. Mr Schönfeld had two sons about the same age as my brother Erwin and me. Both became residents of Melbourne after the war, the older son writing under the pen name of “Robert Amos,” author of many radio and TV plays.

Mr. Schönfeld escorted us to a small Russian general store in Wayside Road, which in later years became part of the commercial hub of the Ghetto. We purchased soap, towels and a few other odds and ends, before proceeding on, under Mr. Schönfeld's guidance, to a Russian restaurant known as The Olympic. It was nestled among a long line of more or less roofless and floorless shops. Here our spirits were revived by a plate of borsht, a traditional Russian soup made from redbeets, potatoes, cabbage, meat and a final addition of fresh cream. This was followed by a big tureen filled with frankfurters floating in pink water and a generous helping of potato salad. To quench our thirst we drank kwass, a Russian lemonade supposedly made from fermenting bread. In hindsight though, I am certain that what we actually drank was just plain lemonade (or "7 Up" as it is called in the USA), made from water, carbon dioxide, sugar and citric acid. Having missed out on many meals on board ship, I greatly enjoyed this modest feast.

On returning to our quarters, we finally began to take in the scene around us. It was cold and wintry, a situation made even more difficult as we had no bedding or much in the way of spare clothing. We covered ourselves with everything we had, from overcoats to raincoats, and managed to settle down for the first night in our new home. Yes indeed, as they had told us in Berlin, Shanghai was colder in winter and warmer in summer! In time we would experience summer shade temperatures in excess of 39° C with very high humidity as the rule rather than the exception. But for now, winter brought the mercury down to hover around freezing point, snow would fall and sometimes remain on the ground long enough to form a white mantle. Having so little to rug ourselves up in, and no means of heating our room, our first few nights in Shanghai fell well short of the tropical beaches we had expected to find.

Having survived the final liquidation of the Bialystok ghetto in August 1943, Elka Ekstein and her friends hid in a bunker in the city, from which they managed to hold body and soul together in trying circumstances. Living between an existence in hiding and outside forays to obtain food and water, the group was finally found and arrested by the Germans in November 1943. In this account Elka shows how she managed to survive despite having contracted typhus, and that, in an astonishing turn of fortune, she was sent to a work camp rather than being murdered on the spot at the time of her arrest.

The second selection in the Bialystok Ghetto, the selection that was to leave the area Judenrein or "cleansed of Jews," began at 4:00 am on 16 August 1943. That's when the Germans entered the ghetto, occupied the factories and set up their headquarters in the Jewish Council building.

Sonia and I and Sonia's friend from Grodno, Nehu Galante, were up and getting ready to go to work when we heard that the gates of the ghetto were already closed and they would not let the outside workers leave. The Germans made loud announcements that everyone was to gather on the square in order to be deported to Lublin for work. We could bring with us one package weighing no more than five kilograms.

On that morning a group of young Jews retaliated. They had stored arms and were determined to fight back. I can't remember now whether or not I knew there was going to be an uprising. We heard the sounds of so much shooting, but the Germans threw a grenade into the wooden house where the young ones were hiding and burned it down with most of the rebels still inside. Those who ran away were shot immediately. I was on the square by that time looking for a place to hide and saw that house burn down.

The ghetto was being liquidated and there were no more hiding places. Apparently 40,000 Jews were taken away during that Aktion, most of them going to Treblinka, the last transport of Jews to be taken there. On 18 August the buildings of Treblinka were all demolished and new grass grown over the site so there was no sign that the place had ever existed.

An official from the Judenrat was standing on Kupiecka Street with a few Nazis and they were calling out the names of families who were to be allowed to continue working in the factories. We realized then that some Jews were going to be left in the ghetto and began to think again about hiding.

Sonia, Neha and I stood on the square beside a big white brick building. I think it was on Jurowiecka Street. Haike Niselkovski, another friend of Sonia's, lived there. We saw people running into that house, which gave us the feeling that there was a bunker in there. This house was not far from the wooden house that had been burned down.

A boy from Grodno, a neighbor of ours, was standing on the square with me. He wanted to come with us but I couldn't make more trouble for the people in the house and just drifted away from him. I never saw him again.

We followed the people into the bunker, a disguised room right up beside the wall of the building. It was behind a wardrobe and a small table stood nearby. At first the people inside didn't want to let us in and said there was no more room for us. I told them that if they didn't let us in I would inform the Nazis and we would all die. So they let us in.

There were quite a few of us in that hidden room, including the three Golding sisters, Dora, Sara and Chayele, who had a son my age and also an older daughter who ran away from the house. We never heard of her again. There was also another Chaya, Chaya Sojka and her sister-in-law, Liza. Liza was married to Chaya Sojka's brother. Several of the women's husbands were there and a couple of other men whose names I don't remember. Haike Niselkowski, Neha Galante, Sonia and I hid with them. . . .

During the first six weeks no one went outside for food. We lived on mouldy bread and corn. Our natural functions were dealt with right on the floor and we took it outside at night.

There was an underground bunker in the same building and we moved between that and the hidden room. The entrance to the underground bunker was under a piece of tin laid in front of ovens so that fire would not burn the floor.

We all stayed in hiding in that building for three months after Judenrein, risking our lives to go out into the empty ghetto to bring back water and any food we could find in the empty houses. We took whatever we could find, even if it was mouldy and rotten. We even managed to find a few vegetables still growing in the gardens, though with the winter coming on there soon wasn't much left. I remember getting some tomatoes. While out foraging during the night we sometimes ran into other Jews who were also still in hiding and getting water from a pipe.

During this period I contracted typhus, which lasted for several weeks. I was burning with fever and couldn't eat.

We went out at night according to a roster and one night it was my turn. However I was still very sick and Chaya's son had already died in the bunker from the typhus. So on this night, when we had been in hiding for three months, Naha Galante said to me: "Elkele, I'll replace you tonight and you swap for me another time." Like Sonia, she was ten years older than me.

Naha stepped outside and they caught her. We heard the shouts and then the shot when they killed her. It should have been me. I felt as though my mother was praying for me and looking after me. This happened on the evening of 4 November 1943. We were in the hidden room at the time and were frightened that the Gestapo had seen where Naha had stepped out from, so we left that room and moved into the underground bunker.

During that night the men went out of the bunker to do some cooking in the attic and one of them returned with a pot in his hands at around 6.00 am when it was just turning light. The Poles had been watching the house very closely since the Germans had shot Naha and this man was seen. The Germans immediately began shooting. They stormed into the house and found our entry into the bunker because the women had not managed to disguise it perfectly. Meanwhile, some of the men managed to run away. That was on 5 November 1943.

We were marched out of the house and taken to the local jail, where we stood for a whole day. Slowly a crowd of several hundred Jews gathered, as quite a few bunkers were hidden away in the ghetto. Some Poles were even keener than the Germans to get rid of the Jews and eagerly ran around hunting us out to hand over. Anyone who tried to make a run for it was shot. All the children who were found that day were put onto a truck standing nearby. We knew they were going straight to the crematorium.

I was miserable with fever and could barely walk. I was so frightened, but my will was stronger than anything else. Another selection was held right there in front of the jail. Someone had a pair of high heeled shoes they told me to put on and I rubbed my cheeks with some red colour from the bricks, so that I would not look like such a child. After the children left, the rest of us were sent either to the right or the left. Fortunately, Sonia and I were both sent to the right side, so we were still together.

We were held in that prison from 5 November until 22 November 1943, about three weeks.

On 22 November the murderer of the Bialystok Ghetto, Kommandant Fridel, greeted us in the prison yard and made a speech in which he declared we were lucky. The first group they found in the bunkers had been shot, but we were going to a work camp.

Arnold Erlanger was a German Jewish refugee living in the Netherlands when, on August 27, 1942, he was called up for labor service. This was the start of a period which, as he writes, saw his “journey through hell.” This account relates Erlanger’s sojourn across a number of Nazi concentration camps in the Netherlands, until he was transferred by boxcar to Auschwitz. Surviving the initial “selection” between those who were to die and those who were to work as slave labor, he was sent to Auschwitz III, known as Monowitz—there to work in the industrial complex at Buna, managed by the I.G. Farben cartel. While a brutal environment, it was nonetheless a place where Erlanger managed to find sufficient space to be able to hold body and soul together for one more day. . . .

On 27th August 1942, without any warning, I received a notice to report to the De Zomp Labour Camp in Ruulo by 1st September. We were told that we would be working for the Heidemaatschappij, a forest company run by the Dutch government, near Ruurlo. As far as I can remember, I was the first one to receive that notice. We thought it would be a great opportunity to remain in Holland and work for the Dutch government instead of being transported to the east. As there were no ghettos in Holland, it seemed too difficult for the Germans to collect the Jews who were spread over the many small villages. It did not take us long to discover that the call-up to work in the Netherlands was just another Nazi ploy to round up Jews.

On our arrival in Ruurlo, the Dutch Federal Police (Marechausee) tried to instill some optimism in us. “It will not be long. Keep your spirits up and it will be all over in a few weeks!” they repeated. Ruurlo was not one of the worst labour camps in the Netherlands. Every two weeks, we were allowed to write to our families. We were not allowed to speak to any of the guards but had to salute them. After two weeks our Commandant was replaced by his deputy. When we asked what had happened to the Commandant, he replied: “The Commandant is in the concentration camp at Ommen learning how to treat Jews.”

In the middle of Ruurlo, opposite the hotel Avenarius, lived Mrs Weijler-Kropfeld. We passed her house every morning at seven o’clock. It was still quite dark and our capo Hess, a German Jew, and another inmate, entered her shed and deposited the mail we had written and at the same time, collected any mail and parcels sent to us by family or friends. We took these into the forest where we worked and the Dutch supervisor from the Heidemaatschappij looked the other way, as we devoured the news and the meagre food.

In the last weeks of September 1942, the Commandant returned from Ommen. He had been taught very well and he very quickly showed us what he had learned. During that week, we were betrayed and the Commandant found out that we had been collecting mail and food parcels. This was strictly prohibited. One day, the man who knew Mrs Weijler and regularly collected the mail, was ill. I took his place and together with Mr. Suesskind, gathered whatever was waiting for us. Before we were able to rejoin the group, the Commandant appeared and screamed the usual Nazi Sau Juden (swine-Jews) and ordered us to return to the camp. He told capo, Hess, Suesskind and me, that we would be sent to the Erika Concentration Camp in Ommen. The following night, Hess escaped.

On 1st October, Suesskind and I were transported by train via Zwolle, to Camp Erika in Ommen, under the supervision of two policemen from the Marechausee. The policemen made us understand that if we wanted to escape, they would look the other way, on the condition that they would not be blamed. My Dutch was not good enough to take such a risk. If caught, the treatment would definitely be worse than anything I imagined at that time. Then I did not know that there could be anything more terrible than Ommen.

I had no friends in the Ruurlo Camp and the only person I became close to was Hans Andriesse from Den Hague. I soon learned that the complete Ruurlo Camp was emptied a few days later and all inmates were sent to the transit camp at Westerbork. The arrival at Ommen was the start of my journey through hell.

Erika Camp in Ommen

On the evening of 3rd October 1942, Suesskind and I were taken to the oval in Camp Ommen to face our initiation ceremony. All the prisoners stood around the oval under the guard of the SS and the Commandant. The center of the oval was covered with loose sand.

“Come and play some enjoyable games,” said the SS officer as he pointed a finger toward Suesskind and me. We were ordered to press one finger from our right hand into the sand and one finger from the other hand into one ear and keep turning our body around the finger in the sand. The Germans called it “grammophonplatten-drehen” which means “gramophone records turning.” The Commandant in Ruurlo had already told us about this game. The intention was that after a few turns, you would feel dizzy and fall to the ground. This is exactly what happened. The game expanded and I had to crawl using my elbows and not my knees, whilst Suesskind stood on my back. Then he had to crawl and I had to stand on his back. Whilst I was lying on the ground, I was kicked by a SS man who broke one of my ribs. The loose sand covered my face and penetrated my eyes. My face swelled and I could barely open my eyes. I am unsure of how long this ceremony lasted, but I still remember that it was the evening of Simchat Torah, the Jewish Festival of the Torah.

After returning to our barracks, one of the SS guards approached my bunk. He could see that I was suffering and unable to work the following day. He quietly talked to me. He told me that every morning, the Commandant walked through the barracks to ensure that everyone went to work. I can still recall the exact words of that SS man: "Tell the Commandant that you had only arrived in the camp yesterday and that during the night, you had to go to the outside toilets. As it was very dark, you walked into one of the light poles and that was the reason for your swollen face. If you don't tell him that, you know exactly what will happen next time you go to work." I knew exactly what he had in mind. I would probably not return alive.

The following morning, as the Commandant approached, I told him exactly what I had to say, remembering only too well what the SS guard said. I was unable to work for five days and was left in the barracks.

The camp in Ommen was one of the smaller KZ (concentration camps) used mostly for anti-Nazis or war criminals. Our work in Ommen consisted of carrying buckets from the toilets to the fields and spreading the manure without gloves.

On 20th October, I and several other Jews were called to the office of the Commandant and told that we would be kept in Westerbork as criminals. This means that we would be kept in Westerbork in a special security barrack and then sent to Auschwitz on the first transport. When the Commandant returned the few personal belongings I had with me on arrival, I wanted to express my appreciation. Unfortunately my conversation skills in Dutch were limited. In Dutch, as in German, you speak to superiors differently than to a friend, unlike the English form "you" which is used for everyone. I unwittingly addressed the Commandant as "je," which in German is "du" instead of addressing him in the respectful "ze." He became terribly offended and taking a broom that stood in the corner, hit me over the head screaming: "You schweine Jude. You address me as if I was one of your friends." The yelling ended when the broom broke. The following day I arrived in Westerbork still believing on our faith. Was it not a miracle that I survived the camp in Ommen?

Westerbork

After my arrival in Westerbork on a penal transport, I learned that several chaverim and chaverot from our Hachshara were already there. The first group came to Westerbork from the Elden Hachshara. They were saved from deportation to the east because they convinced the Nazi commander that they were skilled workers and would be extremely useful. As many more arrived in Westerbork, they joined what was by then called Kvutzat Hachshara. As the camp population grew, it needed a larger, well-trained work force. There was a great shortage of labourers in the Netherlands so the chaverim were all marched off to the farmers in the nearby village of Hooghalen as well as other villages close by.

I was soon able to send my friends a message through one of the inmates from Westerbork. The running of the camp was left to Jews under the leadership of a Mr. Schlesinger. As soon as one of my friends from Enschede learned of my arrival in Westerbork, they immediately smuggled me out of the criminal barrack, the Straf-barracke and hid me in a barrack that was used as a synagogue. This was only necessary on a day a transport was to leave Westerbork, and they were able to do so for three weeks. In the meantime, they added my name to the list of the Kvutzat Hachshara, which made my immediate transport to Auschwitz unlikely.

I was able to make contact with the rabbi of Westerbork, Rabbi Frank. He was the last rabbi in Ichenhausen and we knew each other. I still suffered a lot of pain from my broken rib and the rabbi was able to get me a mustard plaster from the hospital. Within a few days, the pain almost disappeared. Sometimes, when I bent down or made a wrong movement, the shooting pain recurred but on the whole I was much better. Meeting Rabbi Frank in Westerbork was another miracle for me. Unfortunately, he perished in Auschwitz. From the end of October 1942, I was able to go with the other chaverim outside the camp and work on the farms. My name no longer appeared on the list of criminals.

By talking to various inmates, I became aware of the Weinrib list of people who would be candidates for a pogrom. This was a plan to buy visas for entry into Switzerland. The names of all members of the Kvutzat Hachshara were transmitted in the summer of 1943 to Switzerland. My girlfriend, Milly Dzialozinsky was on the list as she had a close connection with someone who established the link with people in Switzerland. Weeks and months went by without any progress towards this exchange, until some of us were placed on the list for transport to the east. My name, together with six others from our Enschede group, was called for transport on 14th September 1943. I tried to have my name removed from the list. I remembered that Mr. Schlesinger was a very distant relative of my father's. Through one of the contacts in his office, I sent a message that an Erlanger is on the transport to Auschwitz and should be taken off the list. My request fell on deaf ears. We did not know then that the transports from Holland went straight to Auschwitz. Much later in my life, I found out that all the transports between March 1943 and July 1943 had gone to Sobibor. Only two Jews survived in Sobibor, the rest were murdered.

In Westerbork we were herded into train wagons—men, women and children. We took some food with us. There were no washing or other facilities in the wagons. In the four corners stood a large barrel that served as the communal toilet, in full view of everyone. It was impossible for every person to sit down at the same time. The train stopped several times but we could not see where we were going until we had arrived. We assumed that since we were travelling eastward, Auschwitz would be our destination for most of the trains went in that direction. . . .

Auschwitz

The doors of the wagons opened to the usual screaming of Nazis in SS uniforms. “Raus, raus (get out, get out!).” We realized that this must be Auschwitz. The people who died in the wagons during the transport were left on the floor. Several younger men were directed to run to the left, whilst the majority, women, men and children were directed to run to the right. We still had no idea about what was going on. If you were directed to go to the left and wanted to go to the right, to join your wife, child or somebody from your family, you could but those who were directed to the right were not allowed to join us on the left.

About two hundred of us, all young men, were taken to Monowitz, to the labour camp called Buna. The information flow worked remarkably well in camp and we soon learned that those on the right were taken to the crematorium in Birkenau, three kilometers from Auschwitz. The slave labourers were mainly employed by I.G. Farben-Industrie to build and work in a factory making synthetic rubber.

As soon as we arrived in Buna, we were taken to the showers. It was usual for the Nazis to act in such a way, so we were not anxious. We took off our clothing and were told to place them together with our other belongings so that we could find them later. When we came out of the shower at a different spot, we were taken into a storeroom to receive our prisoner’s garb. Our belongings had disappeared. We had to walk towards long tables. Other prisoners were sitting at these tables and waiting for us. They tattooed numbers on our left arm. We were numb but in our minds realized that we were no longer human beings with a name. We had become a number. My number was 150645. . . .

Looking at my prison clothes and the numbers on my arm made me realise that my life was no longer in my hands. I hoped and prayed to survive. Luckily, I remained together with chaver Wolf Wolfs. We were ordered to the same barrack but lost contact with the other four chaverim who had arrived with us. Thus began my life in a concentration camp.

We learned that the head of the barrack is the capo, called Blockaelteste. He was usually a co-prisoner who had been a long-time inmate and often a criminal or political prisoner. He did not have the death sentence hanging over his head like we Jews, but it was used by the Nazis to run the inner workings of the various concentration camps, the KZs.

The days were hard and monotonous. Every morning, we were ordered to the oval and divided into various groups. We marched in formation through the gates, accompanied by an orchestra playing at the entrance to the camp. It also played on our return. We were escorted to work by SS guards. Even though I was an arc-welder, as a new arrival, I was directed to work with a group about half an hour’s march away. Our work consisted of digging trenches and throwing the earth into the trolleys. On the last part of this journey, we were forced to sit on trolleys pulled by a tractor. These resembled trolleys used in mining to move coal. The backs were removed and we had to rush to sit on boards that were put in their place. It was a hurried and dangerous journey resulting in injuries when many fell off. The capo, a non-Jew, treated us in the same manner as the Nazis. It was easy for him to find a reason to punish us as individuals. The guards formed an artificial fence, standing perhaps a few hundred meters from where we were working. No one was allowed to go further than this artificial fence.

This work continued for several weeks. It was strenuous and made more difficult with the autumn weather. In our thin prisoner’s uniform, we were exposed to cold and rainy days. I believe that it was a boring job for the SS guards too but they found ways and means to amuse themselves at our expense. Whenever possible, the Nazis showed their disgust, particularly towards intellectuals. We usually worked with six men on a team filling a trolley. One man in our group was an intellectual. This could be seen in the way he used the spade and moved around. It seemed that one of the guards became bored and without any provocation, lifted his rifle and shot this man in the hand. Naturally, the man screamed and the guard fired another shot that also hit his hand. Due to the excruciating pain, he fell to the ground. The gunman approached and shot him. He then ordered us to carry the dead body several hundred meters away behind the artificial fence. We told him that we couldn’t do this, as he may shoot us. The guard told us that we had to obey him. He would come along and nothing would happen to us. We did as we were told. I realized quite soon that some of the Nazis were so indoctrinated that if they killed one of us, they did not kill a human being, just one of the numbers disappeared.

Gross-Rosen was a concentration camp located in eastern Germany. Like many of the more important camps, it embraced several subcamps used for exploiting slave labor. Hanna Granek Erlich was one of these slave workers. The factory in which she was set to hard labor was a weapons manufacturing plant at Peterswaldau. The conditions, as she outlines, were deplorable; in fact, her account is an excellent depiction of just how repellent these conditions were. Moreover, her period at this location was lengthy, lasting from January 1944 until her liberation by Russian forces on May 5, 1945.

Peterswaldau (Pieszyce) concentration camp, where I was sent in January 1944, was a sub-camp of Gross Rosen Concentration Camp in Lower Silesia, Germany. I was there for about a year. Peterswaldau sub-camp was located in the Owl Mountains (Góry Sowie), now part of Poland, about 30 miles north of Wrocław (Breslau); it was a small forced labor camp.

At night we slept in an old, dilapidated factory building, at the Diehl Factory where they manufactured weapons (now Diehl Stiftung & Co), mostly time bombs. We slept in a room with over fifty women. We slept downstairs on bunks covered with straw, and over us, upstairs, the men used to sleep. Conditions were dreadful. The hall was filthy. We were full of lice. We had to put some paper between the upper and lower bunks because lice were falling down from the top bunks. I could hear them; they sounded like uncooked rice when they hit the paper. I slept despite the lice because I was tired from working.

I worked seven days a week, from morning to night, in the Diehl Factory office. We didn't dare make a mistake. We weren't supposed to make mistakes. We were not allowed to make mistakes. They would beat us or even kill us if we made mistakes. At the munitions factory I heard screaming and saw people being beaten.

It was freezing cold in Peterswaldau. We hid straw in our clothes to help us keep warm. We had only cold water. We could take one shower on Saturday, and then we had to rush because other girls were waiting for us to finish. The bathing facilities were only fit for swine.

The food was disgusting—spinach soup again! The SS women were terrible, but one was especially terrible. She used to scream at us and, worse, beat us with a piece of wood. She was horrible. There was no reason for her to hit us; she hit us only because we were Jews. Once I was hit by an SS male guard, but he was not as brutal as this SS woman. Every morning at roll call, the SS used to count us on the hill, where it was particularly cold. One morning I wasn't standing straight or something, so the SS walked over to my row and hit me on the face with her hand—that time she used her hand. We called her Tygrysica, female tiger. She was always hitting and screaming. Every day we had to encounter her; we looked out the window and saw her standing and watching us. After liberation, we tried to find her, but we couldn't. I don't know if she was caught and tried for her cruelty.

In the morning, a group of girls used to get up very early in order to wash up with cold water. The winters were so cold that we could see the ice on the windows.

We also washed our clothes in cold water: that is, what little clothing we had. We did not have uniforms; we wore our own clothes. The SS had given me a smock to wear as a coat.

Some girls tried to escape. They left but were captured. They had an opportunity to escape because we walked to work every day early in the morning when it was dark, and we came back in the darkness. Two tried to escape under cover of darkness. They were both from Sosnowiec. One day when they were counting us, the SS announced that we were short two people. They said, "If we catch them, you know what will wait for them." Those girls, who had tried to escape, were sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau. One survived. How she survived I don't know. . . .

I saw terrible atrocities in Peterswaldau. One evening they brought in two men from a different camp. The SS told us that the men were sick with typhus. They put those men in burlap bags. The men were alive! In the bags we could see that they were moving. We had to stay up all night to watch the men die.

The Lagerführer was a butcher, a real butcher, so he took his truck and ran over the two people. We didn't know why they were treating the men this way. But the whole camp had to turn out to see the Lagerführer run over them.

We had to stand a half a night, and the next morning, when they released us, we went to the latrine. In front of the sinks were wooden slats; under these, on the ground, were pools of blood. Later we discovered that one was a son of the Grajower rabbi, from Będzin. I don't know who the other man was. While we had stood there waiting for the men to die, the SS had given us coffee, a little bit of brown water. It was very cold standing there. When they finally let us go in the morning, we didn't sleep at all because during the night we were awake, forced to watch, and in the morning we had to go to work.

Most of the time the women's section was quiet because we were working. Women worked inside the buildings such as in the office and the factory. Some were in the kitchen; some, in the laundry; they were busy there. The men used to go outside to work. Once in a while, when they were counting the people at roll call, we would realize that someone had died.

But I wanted to mention too that at the same camp I had an uncle, Fischel Gelbart, with his son Herschel. I tried to help them, so I used to go into the kitchen when the kitchen girls used to peel the vegetables and the potatoes. The kitchen was in the same building where I worked. I asked them if I could have a few potatoes for my relatives. I went to my uncle's and my cousin's work detail and asked the Schreiber, the man who took care of them, to let them cook the potatoes. Neither my uncle nor my cousin survived.

Another way that I could help was with food cards because I had access to those. I had a few friends in the camp: my papa's good friend and two school friends were there. I used to give them another ration card, so they could have a little extra bit of water and potato or for spinach with sand. Nobody counted the cards, so I "organized" away two or three cards and gave them to my friends. This was very risky. If I had been caught I would have got twenty with an iron stick on my backside.

But I wanted to help wherever I could. With extra food, people could perhaps survive until the war was over. A little extra food gave them a chance. . . .

In February 1944, while we were still at Peterswaldau camp, we were told that a group of girls were being sent to our camp. We were anxious as we waited for them. We were waiting and waiting. The transport came in the middle of the night. We were standing and waiting for them, thinking: "Maybe I'll see my mother." They arrived—about 1000 young women. We didn't see them disembark the train; we saw them only after they had been processed. They came into the building. Their heads were shaved, and they wore striped uniforms. All were Hungarian girls. They told us that they had come from Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp. They understood German; they had lived on the border with Austria and Hungary. Some of them spoke Yiddish. We usually spoke Polish at home; however, among other family members, my parents spoke Yiddish, so I understood some Yiddish.

We asked what Auschwitz-Birkenau was like. They reported that there was dirt and hunger and typhus. They told us that people in the camp were all dying. They told us about the terrible smell from the dead. People couldn't survive the terrible hunger; they were severely malnourished. They saw this from their barracks. They said that there was no hope, none at all for our relatives. They told us that they knew NOTHING, NOTHING. Auschwitz was hunger and brutality and atrocity. They had just thought about how to survive. They weren't thinking about the war.

The next day these women were sent to work. The Nazis could use everybody to make munitions. We worked as slave laborers in the ammunition factory, assembling fuses for bombs. We made the timing devices for the bombs. The women were treated worse than animals; they were exhausted and hungry. They were punished for the slightest mistake.

We were very close to Bytom (Beuthen) which was not very far from the Będzin border, where the fighting was occurring. Even before the Soviet army arrived, we heard the detonations from the bombing of buildings. Because they were planning to retreat before the Soviet advance, the Germans put all the bomb timing devices in wooden boxes. Next, three days before the Soviets liberated nearby Peterswaldau, the Germans put the wooden boxes into a hole, poured acid on them, and loaded them in too. Then the Germans woke us up in the middle of the night and took us out in trucks. We thought that we were being transported to Auschwitz-Birkenau. We thought that would be our end. Instead they told us to throw all the boxes from the trucks.

Then suddenly one day the war was over. The Judenälteste (Jewish unit leader) came and told us, Children, look out the little windows, and you will see a white flag on the post office. Put your best clothes on [as if we had any "best" clothes—most did not]. The war is over!"

We thought that the Germans would dynamite the building with us inside, but the Czechoslovakian men who worked in the factory shouted from upstairs to the few girls downstairs that nobody was left. The Germans had fled. To reassure us, the Czech workers told us not to worry that they would guard the building.

I had worked in Peterswaldau from January 1944 until May 1945, for about fifteen months. I was liberated on May 5, 1945, by the Soviet Red Army.

After the Nazi takeover of Czechoslovakia, the insecurity felt by many Jews often led to a panicked flight away from what was perceived to be a very real danger. Gary Fabian and his mother sought some measure of safety by moving far to the south of Slovakia, and in this account he describes the perils of living one step ahead of the Nazis as well as the journey to get away from them. While trying to retain some semblance of freedom, they found themselves to be in “double jeopardy”; not only were they Jews on the run from the Nazis, they were also German-speaking in a Czech and Slovak environment. Eventually, as we see, his whole extended family took their chances in Prague, there to try to start life anew.

My mother and I travelled by train to the other end of the country, to Trenchin in Slovakia, not far from the Hungarian border, where friends of ours lived. As we did not hold Czech citizenship and travelled on a German passport, the Czech authorities refused permission for us to stay. It was the ultimate irony, experienced by tens of thousands across the face of Europe in those turbulent days. Germany had by this time declared that Jews were no longer citizens of the Third Reich, and just to give it official confirmation, all passports held by Jews were stamped with a large red “J”—denoting “Jew.” As German passport holders, we were in fact stateless, and constantly threatened with expulsion by the Czech authorities.

Literally hundreds of people in this position were taken daily to the nearest border and sent into the strip of territory between countries, known as “no man’s land.” Both countries on either side refused them entry into their territory. In the late 1930s a whole army of “non persons” spent months on end being expelled, illegally re-entering a country, then being arrested and expelled again. They had become the unwanted and innocent pawns in a deadly game of politics in which they were totally powerless.

About a week or so after arriving, we left Trenchin again and travelled back towards the centre of Czechoslovakia. A week later, sitting on grimy trains, being shunted for hours on end to sidings off the main track to allow troop transports to pass, we arrived in Brno, the capital of Moravia. There we finally met up with my father and my maternal grandparents.

We found a room at the house of a Mrs. Pfeffer. The five of us lived in a room that under normal circumstances was barely adequate for one person. This was our temporary “castle,” living in hiding. If the police had discovered we were living there, we would most likely have been arrested on the spot as illegals, taken to the nearest birder and shoved into no man’s land with little or no ceremony.

If there was a knock on the door we would only open it to a pre-arranged signal, living in constant fear of discovery and arrest. After a few weeks, our landlady, fearful of the consequences of being detected with illegals under her roof, asked us to leave. It was practically impossible to find alternative accommodation under the prevailing circumstances. We decided to head toward Prague, the capital, with the hope that in a larger city we could lose ourselves from the eyes of the authorities.

As the general situation throughout worsened and conditions in Germany became more severe every day, a vast number of refugees were moving around Europe. All countries became extremely strict in trying to control the influx of refugees into their territory. Spot checks were set up on highways, at railway and bus stations and any other points of entry. Anyone found without valid documents was arrested and expelled without ceremony or delay.

Our situation was precarious, but we were helped by a stroke of luck. We met up with a former employee, a Czech named Pavel, who was also anxious to avoid drawing himself to the attention of authorities. He had been an active member of the Communist Party for many years, and the political climate of the day was not exactly welcoming to people of his convictions. Things were getting a little uncomfortable for him, and he decided that Prague would provide a better place in which to lose himself at that time.

We still had our car, a Fiat designed for four. The six of us, my parents, grandparents, Pavel and myself, somehow managed to squeeze ourselves into it and we headed off towards Prague. Just a few kilometers short of it we were stopped at a roadblock where the constabulary was carefully checking documents. There was a hurried conference held in the car on what to do. Pavel assured us to leave things to him and all would turn out well. When our turn came at the checkpoint, he coolly handed his documents to the gendarme and a brief exchange took place between them in Czech, a language we did not then speak or understand. At best our Czech was minimal, as German was the official language of that part of Czechoslovakia in which we lived. Pavel's documents were examined briefly, handed back and we were waved on. Having travelled a few minutes in silence, my father finally asked him what the exchange with the gendarme had been about.

With a grin on his face, Pavel explained, "I told the constable you were relatives from my village and not very bright. It was no good asking you anything as you would not understand anyway." This produced some merriment, probably more from a feeling of relief than humour. Half an hour later we arrived in Prague. While we had arrived at our destination, in reality our overall situation had not really changed for the better. We still were illegal immigrants without valid documentation. The authorities were becoming increasingly more stringent, arresting and expelling aliens. The army of unwilling nomads roaming the face of Europe in search of a sanctuary grew weekly, or even daily, during the dark months of the later part of 1938.

At 11 years of age in May 1945, Gary Fabian had by this stage already been a prisoner in the concentration camp/ghetto of Theresienstadt (Terezín) for three years. In this account he provides us with his recollection of the final hours of camp life, prior to the arrival of the Russians as liberators—and what happened next. The account extends Fabian's story slightly beyond the liberation, as the reality of what he had lived through began to sink in and enable him to reflect on something almost as scary as the past through which he had managed to survive . . . the future.

As 1944 came to a close and 1945 dawned, rumours kept persisting about Allied advances into Europe. Nothing certain was ever learned, but hope springs eternal. Two people with a sense of humour decided to test the bush telegraph. They passed on the "information" that twenty tanks had entered Prague. Within two hours the rumour came back to them that twenty thousand American tanks stood three kilometers from Prague. It was an interesting exercise in mass hysteria, fueled by optimism and despair.

Suddenly, in March 1945, transports from the east started arriving in the ghetto from concentration camps. These contained human wrecks, which the Germans started clearing out of Poland and East Germany as the Russian army advanced. This was part of their frantic bid to remove the evidence of their atrocities. Many of these people had previously been at Theresienstadt. At this point we all learned the whole horrible truth of what had happened. The majority had been in Auschwitz, and it was our first real confirmation of the mass extermination. True, there had been rumours over the years that filtered back somehow, but very few people were told of these rumours. Of those who heard them, most refused to believe them as it was outside normal human comprehension to accept what was happening.

It became obvious that the Germans planned something diabolical in Theresienstadt as their final act. Strange constructions were being built on the outskirts, and the bush telegraph spoke of gas chambers, large moats that were to be filled with people and flooded, and similar plans in the making. Great unrest swept through the ghetto. A new menace also threatened. The human wrecks coming back from the east brought typhoid with them, and an epidemic broke out which ultimately claimed three thousand victims.

The Germans were engaged in frantically burning records and shipping stores out in the daily convoy of army trucks. Something was in the air. An atmosphere of anticipation, fueled by hope, pervaded the ghetto. Despite the threat of diabolical German plans consistent with the pattern of their behaviour over the past twelve years, it seemed that perhaps some light was appearing at the end of the tunnel. There was hope that the nightmare would soon end.

Spring had come again. It was May 1945, and we had been in Theresienstadt for almost three years now. To an eleven-year-old this is almost a third of a lifetime. I could only vaguely recall life before I came there. One night, on 4 May, a great deal of shooting took place around the ghetto. Everyone was terrified. Was this going to be the Germans' final act of destruction? So near to the end and all seemed to be lost. It felt as if it went on for hours, but towards dawn it suddenly stopped and all was silent.

Hours passed, but all remained still. A few of the more adventurous souls ventured outside. The Germans had simply vanished, as in a puff of smoke, and not a single one was left. The word spread and people everywhere rushed out to see for themselves. There were knots of excited people all over the place, talking, laughing or just standing around looking up at the morning sky. I was amongst them, standing in the street.

Suddenly we heard a low noise. It sounded like some motorized vehicles in the distance. “My god, the Germans are coming back,” somebody cried out. Great consternation broke out. Before anyone could take action, three tanks came around the corner. They were Russian tanks. It is doubtful if the Red Army ever got a more enthusiastic welcome anywhere in the world than those three tanks on that day.

It was over. The nightmare had finally ended and freedom dawned for the fifteen thousand inmates still left in the ghetto. But the after-effects were still to take their toll, and for some three thousand typhoid victims it was too late. They died in the weeks after the liberation.

Forty-eight hours after the Russian tanks arrived, the International Red Cross moved in and took charge, in conjunction with the Russian army. At that stage, food and medicine was brought in, as well as doctors and nurses. Some amazing scenes were to be witnessed. Many of the inmates spilled into the adjoining countryside, taking hold of property the Germans had abandoned. Horses were brought in and one fellow, when asked what he would do with the horse, scratched his head and said, “I don’t know, it’s spoils of war.”

The reality of what had happened started to sink in. Many were the only survivors of their whole family and did not really know where to go. It was difficult, often impossible to return to normality after the events of the previous six years. While we did not know what had happened to my grandparents, in our hearts we knew that the chance of their survival was almost nil, but we still hoped we were wrong. . . .

We stayed on in Theresienstadt until late July, and then returned to Bodenbach, called Podmokly in Czech, the town we had hastily left in 1938. The family business, confiscated by the Germans and run as a German enterprise, now became booty of war and the Czech government nationalized it. While our family applied for compensation, our claim was lost somewhere in the system and never came to anything. Our family, however, could be described as fortunate. Both my parents and I had survived, but my grandparents on my mother’s side and my grandmother on my father’s side had perished. We decided Europe no longer had any attraction to us. It was time to seek a new world, a world where greater opportunity could be found, without living with the ghosts of events that lurked in every corner of Europe.

A ghetto was established by the Nazis at Vilna after their occupation of Lithuania on June 25, 1941. The Vilna ghetto was known for its brutality and high mortality rate, as starvation, disease, shootings, and deportations to concentration camps and extermination camps steadily took a horrendous toll on the population. In 1943 Ida, her husband Sender, and her father were deported from the ghetto to the Vaivara concentration camp, the largest Nazi camp in Estonia. Ida survived, despite typhus, malnourishment, hard labor, and a death march. Her memoir is one of the few we have of Holocaust survivors sent to Vaivara. Here, she describes what life was like at Vaivara, up to and including her liberation in 1944.

Upon arrival in Estonia, I discovered the destination of the train that had deported us. We were sent, as were tens of thousands of Jews from other countries, to forced labor camps in Estonia as part of the Nazi resettlement plan. The main holding camp was Vaivara, a concentration and transit camp in northeast Estonia, located near the Soviet/Estonian border. . . .

In 1943, I arrived in Estonia and was sent to Vaivara. . . . My father and Sender had also been deported, but they were not deported in the same cattle car as I. We had arrived from Vilna after a journey of several days, a journey that seemed much longer because of the over-crowded cars, the stench, and the lack of water.

At Vaivara, the cattle cars were unloaded, and we lined up. I saw that the camp was surrounded by barbed wire as well as by a kind of moat—a ditch full of water encircled the camp. I looked for Sender and my father among the others. However, I did not see them. I felt very much alone.

After selection in Vaivara, the women who had been selected for work were taken to a building, stripped, and put on tables. They shaved us all over. Some young girls cried and cried. I said to them, in Yiddish, “Don’t cry! As long as you have a head, you'll have hair. Don't give them the satisfaction of seeing you crying." At this time they gave me a striped uniform and my number, 1055 or 1059, on a shmatte . . . that I pinned to my clothing.

They then put us in wooden huts with thin walls that were not insulated against the heat and cold. These huts, the so-called barracks, were divided into three sections with seventy or eighty prisoners in each section—each hut was very over-crowded. In my barrack, there was a small stove but it didn't heat well; therefore I was very cold—freezing. We slept in three-tiered bunk beds, ten in a row. I wore a blanket in the morning to wrap around me when I went to roll call in the brutally cold early morning air.

Each day we had roll call at 5:00 AM. We waited a long time while they counted us before we could go to work. In the morning we had a watery drink they called coffee. In the afternoon we were given watery soup to drink and a small piece of moldy bread to eat. I was desperately hungry. I "organized" potatoes from the fields so I wouldn't starve. I hid them in my clothing when I returned to the camp. I used to roast them in the small stove in our barrack.

Water was scarce. There were no washing facilities. In the beginning there were just holes to be used as toilets. Later there were boards with holes in them—inadequate because there were many prisoners. I washed in snow or with a little of the drinking water they gave us. I tried to keep myself clean because I was afraid that I would catch diseases if I didn't.

Despite my efforts at cleanliness, I caught typhus. Many people in Vaivara died from typhus carried by lice. These were big lice—all over everyone, thousands of them. I was very ill, but some kind person in my barrack helped me, giving me warm water to drink. Therefore, somehow I survived this deadly disease. I also survived a big selection in which three hundred people who had typhus were taken away to be murdered.

Later there were selections every two weeks, when about 500 prisoners were murdered—often taken to the forest and shot by the German or Estonian SS.

Their bodies were carried away and burned by Jewish men, Sonderkommandos (special Kommando or work duty, dealing with corpses). They were forced to do this. Most Sonderkommando only lasted three or four months, and then they were killed, so they would not tell about what they had seen.

The Germans forced me to do many different kinds of work: I worked in the woods, chopping wood; I cleaned police stations for the Germans; and I worked on the railroad, laying down new railroad ties. All of this was back-breaking work, especially to malnourished people; the SS wanted to work us to death.

We were guarded by a few older German civilians, who could speak Polish. They were good to us, sometimes giving us salt or whatever food they could hide for us.

In July and August of 1944 the Soviet Army advanced north through Nazi-occupied Estonia toward Vaivara.

I saw neither my father nor my husband in Vaivara Concentration Camp. However, over a year after my arrival in Vaivara, when I was sent to a sub camp to work, I saw my father. He was working at different jobs, in the woods or on the railroad. I was so happy to see him and to know that he was still alive. I had hoped to see that Sender may also have survived. Then, I heard, they had taken my father away to the woods and murdered him. They gave me his shoes to hurt me so that I would know he was dead. I was terribly upset. . . .

Ahead of the advancing Soviet army, the SS began to evacuate Vaivara Concentration Camp and its sub-camps in late August 1944. In Western Europe, the Allied armies began liberating other concentration camps in April of 1945. . . . Many prisoners from Vaivara were sent west by the sea to Stutthof Concentration Camp, a camp about 22 miles east of Danzig. Others were sent on death marches along the Baltic coast.

I was sent on a death march to the south, wearing wooden clogs, which were almost impossible to walk in. The weather was already quite frigid. I was freezing. I said to the Germans walking with us, "Kill me here." But they didn't. Other women on the death march encouraged me, coaxing me, "Come with us. We'll help each other." So they shlepped me with them.

One night we stopped at a cement factory to rest. People from the village came to look at us. They didn't know what was going on. In Polish I said to them, "I am a Jew." They may already have known this because the SS had painted a red cross on the back of my coat—to mark me as a Jew. In addition, I wore my number on a shmatte pinned to my coat. One Pole said to me, "I live across the road. I'll walk across. You follow me because, otherwise, they will kill you tomorrow." Four of us escaped like that. (Two of us are still alive.)

I stayed with these Poles for six weeks. They were refugees from other areas of Poland, sent by the Germans to do slave labor. These kind Poles gave me food. In the daytime they hid me and watched for the Germans. At night I slept in a bed with pillows! Other places in the village were hiding the other girls.

When the Germans left the area, the Russians, advancing from the east, arrived near the cement factory. So I was liberated and had to then think what I would do. I decided to go back to Vilna to try to find Sender. I met a Polish woman, also a refugee, who helped me because I was weak and malnourished. She took me on a train. I got off at a small train station, at a suburb to the west of Vilna. When I got off the train and walked into the station, I met this Holocaust survivor group there. I knew some of the people in this group. They were trying to decide where they would go.

I stayed in this village with the other survivors for a while. Then I began walking east towards Vilna to see if I could find anyone alive. I still had a little hope that Sender had survived—but only a glimmer of hope.

JOHN FREUND

Context: Central Europe

A young Jewish boy living in Czechoslovakia, John Freund and his family were citizens of the territory overrun by Nazi Germany in March 1939. The changes wrought by this development were immediate, but to a 9-year-old boy their impact was somewhat muted. As shown in this testimony, the resilience of children provided John and his friends with the opportunity to recalibrate their lives in such a way as to maximize their childhood pleasures while they were able to do so—in an environment of increasing gloom. It is a memoir of light in an ever-darkening world, in which the innocence of children offered hope to those around them—and provided each with the support they needed in order to prevail over the system that would have destroyed them.

I was nine years old in 1939 when the German army rolled across the Austrian border into our town. It was a grim day. The scenery was full of armoured trucks, tanks, soldiers in dark green uniforms and the occasional low-flying airplane. With them, the Germans brought their dreadful Nazi ideology. They were led by their leader, Adolf Hitler, perhaps the greatest criminal political leader of all time.

When the Germans came, most people stayed indoors, but there were some who welcomed them. These were people who hated the Jews. These people were envious of those with more than they and now it was their turn to show their true colours. Nobody knew what would happen. The war had not yet started; the Czech army was ordered not to resist the invaders. The Germans took over quickly and people were arrested on the first day of the invasion. Soon, orders began appearing on bulletin boards and in newspapers.

We Jews were hit the hardest. Signs that read “Jews not permitted” appeared in cinemas, coffee houses, streetcars, public buildings, public parks and elsewhere. Schools were ordered not to allow us in and public swimming areas became prohibited to us. Once, as I walked near my home alone, I noticed my Grade 3 teacher across the street. He crossed toward me and, as we passed, he shook my hand and quickly said. “Be brave.” He took a great risk, as even talking to a Jew was regarded as a crime.

Discussion among the adults at home was often in German—perhaps so that we children could not understand. At night, we would listen to the news from England on our shortwave radio, as Czech radio was now in the hands of the Germans. At this time, there were pessimists and there were optimists. The pessimists thought that in one to two years all would be back to normal, while the optimists thought weeks. In the end, the war lasted six years and, for us, things never got back to normal.

I could no longer play with my non-Jewish friends. My friendship with Zdeněk and other non-Jewish boys came to an end. There were about three hundred Jewish families in town, and I did not know many of them. Some were professionals like us—doctors and lawyers. Others were small storekeepers and several were wealthy manufacturers. I became good friends with a group of four boys who were all my age. In our group, there were two Rudis, one Henry, one Paul and me. Before the war, Henry and one of the Rudis were rich. The other Rudi and Paul were poor. After the Germans took everything from us, we were all poor. We were required to wear a yellow Star of David on our outer garments, over our lapels. Our parents warned us to stay away from certain parts of town where it was known that there were hooligans and Nazis. I do not think that we were subjected to too much abuse at that time. Did all this drive us to despair? No way. Life went on. We wore our Stars of David, but not in shame.

In our town there were about two hundred Jewish youngsters and about one hundred of us were between the ages of ten and eighteen. Excluded from the general community, we formed our own. My schooling moved from the schoolhouse to our living room. Groups of children met and were instructed by young Jewish teachers. Schooling was improvised; the older boys and girls taught the early grades. I was ten years old when I had my first Latin lessons. I still remember “amo, amas, amat” and my introduction to algebra. We read about animals and distant lands. We sang songs in Hebrew which, for me, was a strange language that until that point had been used only in prayer. We dreamed about the faraway land of Palestine where Jews were making a fresh start. Occasionally, a father of a friend would be arrested and would disappear. We had to give away our car. Father was forced to close down his medical office and we had to live off his savings.

Another Jewish family lived in our building. They were simple, poor people who lived next door to the butcher’s store. Their place was warm and smelled of cooked meat. I don’t remember their names, but their daughter Anna and I became friends. I often visited their warm apartment, where we sat around, talked and played cards. In time, we were ordered to give up half of our apartment. We lost two of our four rooms to some insurance office. Our maid, Maria, had to leave us, but she would often come to visit.

Some friends succeeded in leaving the country. They went to Palestine, England, Canada and the United States. It became more and more difficult to get permission to leave. My father was among the optimists and thought all would soon return to normal. He and his friends liked to joke about Hitler and the Nazis. Unfortunately, the whole thing was far from a joke.

Among the more pleasant memories from this time—1940 to 1941—were the summer days spent along the River Vltava. Although we were banned from public swimming, we were allowed to swim along a narrow strip of land by the road. This strip was a half-hour walk from town, or a ten-minute ride by bicycle, and was near a railway bridge. It was called U Vorisku, named after the Voriseks family who owned and leased us the patch between the fields and the river. We bicycled, jogged, walked or ran the U Vorisku. It soon became a hub of activity. Swimming past the shoreline was treacherous, especially for younger children. The older boys had a tiny boat that was used to rescue the daredevils who tried. The water in the river was filthy, with pieces of raw sewage floating on the surface; one never put one’s face into the water. Yet it was a place where we could cool off and have fun.

We were permitted to set up benches and changing rooms along the river. We had space for four ping-pong tables and when everything was cleared we even had room for a small soccer field. Someone brought a soccer ball and volleyball net. We played soccer along the narrow field and when the ball ended up in the river—as it often did—it took several minutes to retrieve it. I was ten and would always play soccer with the older boys. I played the defence position. I was small, tough and daring, and stopped every attack on my team’s goalie.

My real success, however, was in ping-pong. We had two tables situated underneath a shelter behind the changing cabin. I played as often as I could. There was a tournament toward the end of the summer of 1941. We were divided into three age groups: under ten, ten-to-fourteen, and fifteen and older. I had early success, eliminating most of my opponents quickly. In the semifinals and the finals, I won every game. At an evening ceremony, I was awarded a brand-new white cork racquet and a plaque with my name engraved on it. There was dancing and singing. That evening, I felt that everyone liked me. These youngsters were my friends. They were the Harrys, Jirkas, Pavels, Karels, Rudlas, Lilkas, Ritas, Ankas, Suzans, Lidias and Cecalias. There were Poppers, Kopperls, Kohns, Herzes, Holzers, Frishes, Stadlers and Levys. There were even more, but I have forgotten most of the names. We were young, enthusiastic and mischievous, but we were always good to one another. Great warmth was established among us young people and we developed a deep love and respect for each other.

The two summers of 1940 and 1941 were among my happiest. Some days we worked on the Voriseks’ farm, helping with the harvesting. I held a large canvas bag under a chute and filled it with oats or wheat. For our work, we received a large slice of fresh white bread, thickly covered with goose liver and fat.

We all had daytime duties. The older boys and girls were learning trades. Under orders from the Nazis, the Jewish community had to submit information about our properties and compile lists of our addresses, so the younger children, like myself, delivered this information in sealed envelopes. The moment we finished our duties, we would rush to our favourite spot along the river. We played team sports and our friendships intensified. Every moment in the sun was cherished and when it rained we would huddle under trees. In addition to athletics and games, we would sing. Sometimes there were fights, usually ending with someone coming home with a black eye.

When the days began to shorten and the cool air returned, we knew our beautiful summer was coming to an end. Several of the older boys decided that we must not hibernate but continue with our friendships. They started a handmade magazine named Klepy (Gossip). It was typed and illustrated and only one copy of each issue was printed. One issue had a picture of me kicking a ball on the front cover. The first issue merely gossiped about our summer activities at the river.

However, subsequent issues had stories and jokes. Contributions by the readers were sought and published. All readers were given a chance to read the single printed copy and were asked to comment on the issue. There were twenty issues of Klepy. Here is an example from an early issue:

What is the goal and purpose of our Klepy? First of all, to prove that a healthy spirit and sense of humour is within us and that we are not diminished by the difficulties of our days. We are capable, in moments of rest from our labour, to occupy our minds with worthwhile thoughts and humour.

During this time, two boys were afflicted with epilepsy. The worst case was Fricek K. He was new to Budějovice, having come from the Sudetenland a few years earlier. Fricek was always with his cousin Erich. They were both ten years old. Fricek had frequent epileptic fits, sometimes as often as every half hour. He would fall to the ground, lie on his back, and emit terrifying shrieks. When this would happen, his cousin Erich would open Fricek's mouth, which was full of froth, and pull out his tongue, caressing his forehead. The sick boy would shake wildly for three to four minutes and then appear to be in a deep sleep for a few minutes. After that, he would get up, looking weak and dizzy. This frightening event occurred many times each day.

Another person who had the same affliction was an older man we called Mr. Papa. He was a confectionery vendor. He had a wagon with candies, apples and chocolate bars. He could always be found in the shade under the large railway bridge. I used to buy a chocolate rum ball from him whenever I could afford it. His epilepsy was quite different. His attacks came only once every two weeks. When they occurred, he would fall on his back, breathing heavily, and lie in this state for almost a full hour. There was nobody qualified to do anything for him, other than give him a glass of water when he finally came to. After an attack, he would not show up to work for a few days. But when he did come back, it was always with a fresh supply of apples, chocolate bars and candy.

The summer of 1940 passed and we had only our memories to keep us warm. We looked forward to next summer—until it came. During the summer of 1941, our lives were in imminent danger. These threats were not from our fellow citizens, but from the mad dictator in Berlin. As the days became shorter and cooler, we cherished each day and prayed that the summer of 1941 would never end. For many, this would be their last summer.

Around this time, we, the Jews of Budějovice, started to take some interest in religion again. Our beautiful, tall synagogue had two steeples and many beautiful entrances and was located in a fine part of the city. It was built in the late 1800s. The Germans could not stand competition from another God, so they blew up the synagogue—completely wiping out any trace of the original building. Without the synagogue, services were held in a large, decorated warehouse. Our rabbi, Rudolf Ferda, inspired the participation of the children, and soon Friday night services were full of boys and girls. A chorus of ten- to twelve-year-old girls and boys was organized and their beautiful voices made many at the services tremble with joy. The boys learned to pray and, both in fun and seriousness, imitated our cantor by holding services at home. Rabbi Ferda was a good man. His long sermons always included the theme that Jewish history winds itself like a red thread through the ages. He spoke in Czech with a German accent, and sometimes we could not keep from bursting into laughter. However, when he ordered us out of the sermons, we were really sorry.

A special relationship developed among the young Jews who were shunned by the general community and vilified in newspapers and on radio. We found new strength and helped each other through the hard times. When a very poor family came to town with many children, room was quickly found to help them. Our family took in a little girl who lived with us for a while.

My father was no longer permitted to practise medicine and spent the summer days working in a friend's garden. He loved it. We worried about what would happen when our savings were gone. We got used to eating less and eating cheaper food: bread without butter, potatoes and, only rarely, meat.

The summer of 1941 came to an end. We still went to U Vorisku in the fall and sometimes in the winter, where we would walk around and look forward to the next summer. But this was not to be. In April 1942, the whole Jewish community (just under a thousand people) were taken from their homes and resettled in the ghetto Terezín (Theresienstadt, in German).

The testimony that follows is best read alongside that of Marianne Roth, also in this volume. Hans and Marianne, a brother and sister, were living in Berlin before the outbreak of war. When Marianne wrote her recollection of the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 9–10, 1938, Hans decided it was necessary for him to also put pen to paper—if only to give his perspective of the events of that night. It is a testimony that offers a different view of the pogrom, in that Hans was able to view the events from a different vantage point than did his sister. The account is an excellent example of how in the study of history the perception of eyewitnesses is crucial, and that in order to arrive at understanding as many viewpoints as possible need to be considered.

My sister showed me her written account of the Night of the Crystals and I was amazed how my memory of that fateful night differed from hers; sometimes she recalls events of the past which I never knew of or completely “forgot”—or suppressed!

Yes, I do remember one morning when our parents forbade us to go out into the streets of Berlin. Our parents had gone out and my sister and I decided against their wishes, to see for ourselves what was going on. Streets full of broken glass from smashed windows of Jewish shops, a burning synagogue. . . .

I DO REMEMBER. It was in the middle of the night, three or four am, when the phone rang. It was a friend of my father, a headmaster of a secondary school, who said, “Leave your house at once and take your son with you. Nazi ‘stormtroopers’ are on the way to take you to a concentration camp.” My father’s friend had no choice but to become a member of the Nazi party, lest he lose his job or worse, go to prison. I wish I could remember the name of this good German man. He risked his life to save us.

We left our house, leaving behind my mother and sister and walked, all night, the streets of Berlin. We crossed over a fashionable boulevard called “Kurfurstendamm,” a boulevard with many elegant shops, cafes and restaurants. Brown-shirted members of the SA, the Nazi “army,” everywhere, smashing all the windows of Jewish shops and painting anti-Jewish slogans on their walls: “DON’T BUY FROM THE JEWS” and “DOWN WITH THE JEWS.” Broken pieces of glass lying everywhere on the streets, looking like crystals of snow reflecting the light in the early hours of this morning.

It was not beautiful snow—but broken bits of glass from shops owned by Jewish “Germans”—shattering the dreams of my father. He was a proud German and at the same time, a religious Jew.

We walked on, casually and slowly, not to make it obvious that we were afraid, that we were Jews; we passed the beautiful synagogue in the Fasanenstrasse—burning. We were told later that the caretaker who lived in it was burnt alive. I reminded my father to phone my uncle to also leave his house and we quickly phoned him from a phone box—just in time. We were told later that the Gestapo (secret police) came soon after; he was safe, for the time being.

As the morning arrived we phoned my mother who had gone to an aunt of mine. We talked in code just in case the Gestapo was listening in. At night we stayed with relatives and friends at “safe houses.” We were told that households with mixed marriage partners, one Jewish the other not, would not be visited. Where we slept I have forgotten, except that we stayed one night at the Urlands in a fashionable suburb of Berlin, a charming couple. Every night we slept somewhere else.

My father looked pale and worried. The only quarrels I remember witnessing between my parents were concerned with leaving Germany. My mother wanted to leave while my father postponed leaving. After 1938 it was not Germany which did not allow Jews to leave without their possessions or money; all other countries would not allow them to enter, except in small numbers.

Fear of unemployment, of refugees becoming a burden to the State—were given as reasons. My father feared that he would not be able to teach mathematics, physics or chemistry in another language or even get a position in another country. Of course, he never dreamed that a cultured country like Germany could ever sink to such unspeakable depths as to murder its citizens.

I loved my father dearly. . . . He had already suffered greatly under the Nazi regime. He was a Doctor of Mathematics and also taught physics and chemistry in high school. Before the Nazi era he was an adviser and examiner appointed by the Silesian Ministry of Education. He had also studied mineralogy and philosophy.

In 1933 when Hitler came to power, my father was transferred to a little town, and in 1935 was sent to work in a state library—in order not to teach “Aryan students” any more. In 1936 he was pensioned off and taught in a Jewish school in Breslav in an honorary capacity. In 1937 he was appointed assistant headmaster in a Jewish school in Berlin, the school I attended.

After being fugitives for one week, my father went to the police station and gave himself up. Being a man of total integrity and honesty, he could not go on hiding like a criminal. “Go home with your son,” the police officer said, “this aktion (persecution) was organized by the S.A. (Hitler’s army), not the police. We know that you are an honest man and anyway, this aktion only lasted a week. And from now on nothing will happen to you!”

We went home. After one or two days my father suddenly had great stomach pains and was rushed to the Jewish hospital. A stomach ulcer, fully controlled for years, had burst due to the stress and shock of the “CRYSTAL NIGHT.” A few days later he died—a broken man.

He often used to say ironically, “The thanks of the Fatherland are due to you,” the official slogan of the German government after the First World War. . . .

And when thoughts of the Nazi era come to my mind, I push them away and think of something pleasant—I don’t want to cry. . . .

The irony of it all: because my father had died in December 1938, I, a half-orphan, was allowed to get onto a children’s transport in May 1939 that took me by train and boat together with other orphans to London and freedom. When saying goodbye to my mother at the railway station, I did not realise that I would never see her again.

My children have heard little of what I experienced in Nazi Germany. It’s called the “conspiracy of silence” by those who survived and felt guilty having survived. It took me over fifty years to actually write on paper the happenings of this one week.

GEORGE GINZBURG

The Mechelen transit camp, known as Malines in French, was the major assembly point for the Jews of Belgium prior to them being sent on to the death camps in Poland. In this account of what life was like at Mechelen, George Ginzburg provides a detailed record of the daily record and how it was that he managed both to survive and also to undergo the experience of being on one of the deportation trains that left the camp.

Eventually, after several days, he arrived at what he refers to as the Anus Mundi—the asshole of the world—Auschwitz-Birkenau.

The main assembly transit camp was in Maline (Mechelen in Flemish), a town between Brussels and Antwerp. It was an ancient army headquarters, known as Dossin Barracks of St. Georges. Its cobble-stone-paved parade ground could accommodate well over a thousand people. Two senior officers, Kommandants Frank and Rudolph Stackman ran the camp. Here the Gestapo assembled thousands of foreign and Belgian Jews, many of whom had escaped from Nazi Germany years before hoping to find a safe haven in Belgium. The men, women and children came straight from their homes dressed in their best clothes, assembled in the courtyard, clutching their most valued possessions.

As well as the transit camp, Belgium also possessed a concentration camp called Breendonk. It was strictly for political prisoners, mostly Belgian Patriots. The SS Sturmabführer Phillip Schmidt ruled Breendonk. He was in charge of the whole operation, a drunkard, infamous for his sadism and cruelty. The camp was modelled on Germany’s camps, Dachau, Sachsenhausen, Esterwege, Buchenwald and the like. New arrivals to the St Gilles Prison spread the word that anyone taken to those concentration camps would never leave; inmates died from hunger, exhaustion, maltreatment or executions.

The scene that confronted me at Maline (Mechelen) was difficult to fathom. We were thrust onto a large parade ground among hundreds of men, women and children. The SS Kommandants stood at the front, each flanked by a German shepherd, whip by his side and a cigarette dangling from the mouth as he said, “Welcome to Umsatzlager (Transit camp) Mechelen,” he smiled. “My name is Obersturmführer SD Frank. My colleague here is SS Kommandant Steckman. I don’t bite, only my dog Fritzl bites, but then, only Jews. Ha! Ha!” Frank’s laughter pierced our hearts.

We were registered and shown to our living quarters by an “orderly,” one of the inmates of the camp. I saw a kitchen full of provisions. It was stocked with food brought in by prisoners from their homes. It was confiscated, put into a large food store and sorted by a group of ten or so women. There were fruits and preserves, meat and sardines, poultry and sausages, bread and jams, coffee and sugar, rice, flour and plenty of drinks. There was shelf upon shelf of food, including many items we had not seen in recent years. Such foodstuffs were only available on the black market.

SS Obersturmführer Frank was a blond, smartly groomed man in his early thirties, a real ladies' man, always polite and smiling but very firm. Many women flirted with him, putting on their charm in return for little favours, sometimes with the full encouragement of their husbands. It sickened me to witness the passive approval of husbands and boyfriends. We all slept together in a large dormitory-like hall. There was no privacy. Often husbands and wives went missing at night. Everybody had to look after himself. Throughout the day music blasted through loudspeakers, only interrupted by announcements or the calling-up of individuals.

Fresh bread was delivered daily to the food store by our own camp truck with a Flemish driver called Janeke. I often volunteered to load the truck at a bakery in the Maline township; life was a little easier this way and there were also some side benefits. Janeke carried a pistol and there was also a guard sitting in the back of the truck. I was often tempted to jump, but if unlucky, I would have received a bullet in my back.

Life in the transit camp became more pleasant when I befriended an attractive woman who was much older than I. She became my sleeping partner, both literally and sexually; she would keep me warm under the blanket in that big hall. I felt alive again, I felt like a man, at least for a short time, and time with her allowed me to forget my suffering.

At times my mind wandered and I asked myself, "What are my parents doing in Berlin at the moment? Which of my friends remain? Where is Walter now?"

We were given small privileges and I phoned my uncle twice but was only able to speak with my aunt. All phone calls were monitored so I had to be careful what I said. I asked her to phone Berlin and find out if my parents were okay but not to tell them about me; I didn't want them to worry any more than they already did. She asked me if I needed anything for the trip to the labour camp. I thanked her politely and told her that I would contact her again, and I enquired about my baby cousin Marie Louise, asking her to pass on a big kiss.

I volunteered to be an orderly but was given work as an interpreter. I spoke German, French and Russian fluently and was often called on to interpret between the camp internees and the German authorities. More and more people arrived almost daily and despite the fact that at least one transport left every week from Maline Railway Station, the camp was still badly overcrowded. Moving amongst the crowds, I exchanged news with anyone I could on people I had seen or knew to be alive. On occasion I talked with people who knew of the fate of my friend Leon. I had not seen him since the Gestapo grabbed us. They told me that Leon had died from the beatings inflicted on him during Gestapo interrogation. I thought about my own ordeal—why had I survived?

The transports became routine. The luggage, numbered and marked, went separately to the station. Eventually my name appeared on the next transport to Germany or Poland. I was asked if I wanted to be a transport leader and take responsibility, maintain order and protect the children and the elderly. I accepted the role, knowing it would not be easy, especially with the children and the sick. However, I wanted to help those in need. We prepared to depart the following day, 12 September 1942.

We walked slowly to the train station. It was the tenth transport leaving Maline that day—our number totaled 1048 men, women and children. As we walked, we carried what we could hold: handbags and rucksacks filled with food. We knew Poland, or East Germany or wherever we were going, would be freezing cold: women wore their furs and the men dressed in their winter coats. Several fully armed Grüne Sicherheits Polizei (Green Security Police) escorted us.

Waiting for us at the station was a long cattle train, with open sliding doors, straw-covered floors and small windows secured with barbed wire. At least there would be some light and air. We were told to tolerate these conditions because of the war and because all passenger trains were being used by the German armed forces. However, as soon as we reached the German border, we would be transferred to more comfortable trains.

The last two wagons were filled with suitcases, which we helped to load. All cases were well marked and painted with Belgian names and addresses. I noticed that some of the boxcars were marked with the letter "K" for the Polish town Katowice while other wagons were marked with the word "Juden." Some bore the word "Birkenau," but none of us had ever heard of it. While we waited on the platform, we received hot Ersatzkaffee and bread with jam. Everyone filled his or her bottle with drinking water. Two orderlies and I helped to fill bottles and distribute food. Everybody was asking us where we were going, but we had no answers.

We were ordered into the train. For each wagon there was a list of 70 to 90 people. They were so cramped; there was no room to sit. Families stuck together and I appointed one responsible person as supervisor per wagon so he could report any serious problems to me. The only way we could communicate was via the German police guards, and only during train stops.

Hygienic toilet buckets with chloride powder, toilet paper, period binds and aspirin were placed in every wagon. One doctor, some bandages and medication were required for every three wagons. Tears were flowing and people kissed and hugged. The guards closed the doors, bolting them on the outside with iron bars. On the front of the train hung two German swastika flags and the canvas banner, Räder rollen für den Sieg (Wheels rolling to victory). Armed guards then took their places on the wagon rooftops, in their boxcars and hanging on the outside steps.

The whistle blew and the train pulled out of Maline Station. Nobody waved goodbye; the station was empty. Inside our wagon, people stood quietly, contemplating the future. I still felt optimistic. Surely God would bestow His mercy on us. We knew that the war must end one day and we would be telling our stories to our children; but nobody ever imagined what those stories would be.

We settled. Most of the people in our wagon fell asleep. Some moaned and groaned; it was difficult to breathe while others smoked. Fears pervaded conversations. What were the Germans capable of? Would the Germans keep their word and transfer us to a passenger train? Germans had a reputation for keeping their word—the Nazis were supposed to be the party of decent people. But then, as Hitler made clear in Mein Kampf, they also wanted to destroy the Jews and any other opposition. I stopped thinking about all of this and tried to focus on the current situation.

We were moving quickly through the Belgian countryside and took turns to look out of the small windows in each corner of the wagon. Some of us gathered in a corner and sang French, Hebrew and Yiddish songs. Others were talking to their children or rocking then to sleep; some were hugging and kissing; each found his own way to comfort his fears and grief. Sometimes passing through a small country station, children and women waved us by. The train did not stop. Through our window I could see the guards lying flat on the rooftops, their automatic rifles in their hands.

Finally, after many long hours, our train came to a stop at a small station. SS guards were waiting for us on the platform. I looked out and noticed many twenty-five litre army containers with Ersatzkaffee (artificial coffee) and tea ready for distribution. As the train stopped, SS soldiers screamed for every second wagon door to open. I heard the bolts shift and the doors rolled open. “Nobody comes out until told. Whoever jumps out, will be shot on the spot. Children, women or men, do you understand?” There was absolute silence. Then came the order, “All official orderlies and train Führers (train leaders) out on the platform in front of your wagons.” This meant me. Shielding my eyes, I moved out into the bright sunlight. Children with their mothers came out first. An SS officer shouted, “There is coffee, tea and cold fresh water. Take bottles and cups with you.” I helped organize the distribution of drinks.

Out they came. Tired, jaded and pale, no make-up and hair uncombed, in fur coats and jewellery. Many wore coloured scarves around their heads. Women were begging for milk for their babies; they were given one small tin of powdered milk per wagon. The elderly had to be supported. I was busy helping them in the queue and pouring their drinks. Once they had taken a drink, they had to move quickly back into the wagon. The famous Scheisskübel (shit buckets) on the train had to be replaced by empty ones. This was the most awful job I had ever been given. Often I spilled some of the contents. The stench brought me close to vomiting. I regretted volunteering for the position of leader, but thankfully I had some help from other young men.

As everybody returned to the wagons, the counting began. When the doors were locked, those in the other wagons were allowed out. After an hour the whole procedure was completed and we started rolling again.

It was hard to breathe. Not enough fresh air came in through those little windows and the smell of human bodies and cigarette smoke was foul. On many occasions, I asked people to refrain from smoking but it was all in vain. Many were very nervous and the smoking calmed them. Besides, I was a smoker myself at the time and depended on handouts, so I didn’t push the issue. There was a lot of coughing, vomiting, crying and groaning throughout the night. Despite this, exhaustion led me to sleep for a few hours. The train with its human cargo continued rolling throughout the night. There were no more stops.

In the morning, the sun streamed through the small openings and we all tried to get a breath of fresh air and a glimpse of the German countryside. Heading towards Frankfurt over the Rhine, the train stopped many times, sometimes for hours, to give way to military trains laden with soldiers, trucks and tanks, heading for the Russian Front. The odour from human perspiration and waste, cigarette and cigar smoke combined with the lack of fresh air was becoming overpowering. Most of us were nauseous and it was almost unbearable. Water became a critical problem, particularly for the elderly, babies and children. Mothers needed water to mix the powdered milk for their children.

The atmosphere was becoming increasingly desperate and whenever I requested water from the Germans, they would say, “Später, später, bald (Later, later, soon).” We bypassed the cities, only travelling through little country towns until we arrived in Dresden.

We were so grateful to be out of the train. My helpers and I pumped water continuously from the railway wells until our arms hurt, but we were determined to fill as many buckets and bottles as possible with fresh water. During that time, some German peasants approached the railway station with fresh fruit, drinks and sandwiches. They tried to push this food for children through the windows, only to be moved along harshly by the guards. We had three very sick people on our train who needed immediate medical treatment but not nearly enough was available. We were told that many German soldiers in Russia also needed medication, and they came first. The sick would have to wait until we arrived at our destination where they would get the attention they needed.

I grew agitated and thought of escaping. But how could I? If only I could lift the floorboards of the wagon! I could see the rails through the slits in the floorboards, which were mostly old and rotten and held together by big steel bolts. Desperately I tried to break or lift them with a scout's knife but only broke the blade. If only I had a crowbar! I even tried to burn the boards from the inside but they would not burn; they were too moist. Some of my co-passengers started abusing and screaming at me, afraid of trouble. I soon gave up on the idea and tried to think of other possibilities. From past experience, I knew that the best approach would be to keep my eyes and ears open and to exercise patience.

It must have been our third or fourth day on the cattle train when it rolled into Upper Silesia in Poland. I could see people standing alongside the track waiting for us to pass. They gave us all sorts of signs that were difficult to understand. It seemed that they wanted us to throw our money and watches through the windows. When we did not comply, they made signs with their hands, which could only be interpreted one way; we would have our throats cut. We tried not to make too much of this, especially as we could not understand the Polish dialect.

We saw Catholic nuns standing on railway platforms, offering us drinks for the children. They were stretching out their hands and begging us in broken French, German and Polish to pass the babies to them through the windows. We could not believe what we were hearing, nor did we grasp the enormity of our situation. Later, I was told that some mothers did actually hand their babies over to the nuns. They were mostly from Poland and already were aware of their fate. Those of us from Germany still believed that we were going to work for the German war industry.

It was barely dawn when our train came to a halt. We could see open fields and a huge brick gateway with no signs or names anywhere. I knew we had recently passed Breslau and Katowice and that these were occupied territories in Poland, now incorporated into the Third Reich. We sat for thirty minutes, then the train started to roll again, but only for a few minutes before stopping again. We heard orders shouted. Floodlights lit a ramp revealing numerous SS soldiers and high-ranking officers with dogs and whips. Further along stood others in striped prison uniforms. We had arrived at the terminus, Auschwitz-Birkenau. Anus Mundi.

PAULETTE GOLDBERG-SZABASON

Context: Western Europe

Moving from place to place in France during the war, Paulette Goldberg-Szabason was a child during the Holocaust. In this account, she provides a listing of some of the locations where she and her sister sojourned while being looked after by the OSE—the Œuvre de Secours aux Enfants, or Children's Aid Society) a French Jewish humanitarian organization that assisted hundreds of Jewish refugee children during World War II. As a child she did not recall the time of passing from war to liberation, though certain events stood out toward the end of the war that remained in her memory. This is an excellent account of what it was to be a child in occupied and unoccupied France during the years of the Holocaust.

In the next few years, we kept on moving from place to place. I checked the names of those places with OSE records, but I could only verify that my sister and I were there, not exactly when the following stories happened. We were in Toulouse, Meripeix, Pau Gelos, Chateau de Chabbes in Creuse and Châtillon sur Indre, but not necessarily in that order.

Toulouse

We were taken to an OSE children's home in Toulouse. I had big sores on my head and body, probably infected bites from lice. They cleaned us up and shaved my head. My room was occupied only by girls. I was sick and in bed for most of my time there. I slept in a cot.

One night the building was bombed. Everybody ran outside, but I was carried down the stairs by someone. We stood in our nighties and watched half the chateau burning. I was not afraid and enjoyed feeling warm from the fire. Next day, we could see there was a terrible mess and we were taken down to a cellar where underground passages led to other buildings in the grounds.

I remember one girl, taller than me, who was in Toulouse when we got there. Her arm had been blown off during a bombing, not the one from the night before. She said they had pulled her skin and tied the ends together with strings. It was horrible. She was in so much pain and the wound kept seeping with infection. She asked the other children to wipe it for her. The adults kept promising to take her to a hospital, but when she begged them, they always said tomorrow. After a while, she disappeared, and I assumed that she must have gone to hospital, but these days I wonder if she died. We moved again. We had so many changes, that moving meant nothing to me. I never let myself become attached to anything or anyone.

Pau

When we were moving from place to place, my sister resumed responsibility for me. She went where people directed her to go and I followed blindly, not knowing what I was doing or where I was going. We arrived at the train station at Pau and walked down a road, passing farm after farm. We asked every farmer on the way for direction and each time, they said to keep going. We thought we would never find the farm of Jeanne-Marie Dubois. We walked for many hours and my feet hurt.

We eventually arrived and saw Madame Dubois looking out for us from a first-floor window. She waved as we came towards the house. It seemed like a warm welcome, but we were in for a hard time there. We were always kept very hungry at that house, although she herself seemed to have plenty to eat. I remember going out very early in the morning to pick up snails. I would bring them to Madame Dubois and she would wash them outside and bring them inside to cook them live in boiling water. We all ate them, and they tasted beautiful, like chicken. I remember stealing potatoes from the ground in her garden and eating them raw, and being constantly on the lookout for scraps.

I remember one episode when I was walking with a few children down a path. We were always looking for food and were so happy when we found apples on an overhanging branch of a tree. Suddenly, we were being chased. I screamed for the others to wait, but they ran off, and as I was the youngest and the slowest, I got caught. A man grabbed my hand, took my apple away, and told me severely, never to steal again. I have dreamt about this moment throughout my life: running and running and getting caught, my hand frozen like a lump.

I was allowed to go to school each day to get a plate of soup. My sister was not given the same privilege. It was only for the littlest children. I remember lining up for the soup, and the nuns walking me back to the farm from where we were living. They were very nice to me. I don't know what went wrong, but suddenly we weren't allowed to stay inside Madame Dubois' house any more. For some time—days or weeks—we slept in the chook and rabbit shed. There was not enough room to lie down properly, and it was freezing cold. I ate fruit kernels and carrot and potato peelings, anything they threw out to the chooks. One night, we were taken away.

Someone must have reported the situation. I have since found out that the OSE had their people come around to check on our well-being and to pay our hosts for our keep but I can't recall having had contact with any other adults in that place.

Chabannes

This was how we got to Chateau Chabannes. We got a train to a station nearest to the Chateau and started walking. We were hungry, tired and cold and my sister made me walk and walk. I dragged my heels and resented her making me, when I was so tired. She never seemed to be tired, just determined to get us to the next place as soon as possible. Again, she kept asking farmers which way to go and they pointed in the direction we were going. We walked for half a day.

We stayed a short time at Chabannes, probably only a couple of weeks. It was a children's home in one of those large chateaux. I remember hardly anything about it, only a large empty ballroom with murals on the walls, where we were given a hot drink in the company of other children. Leaving Chabannes brings back a terrifying memory. The people looking after us woke my sister and me up very early in the morning. It was still dark outside. We had to be very quiet. They gave us each a hot cocoa and I was put into some clean clothes and a new pair of shoes. The skirt was long and the shoes, two sizes too big. We were put onto a wagon, hidden under a lot of hay and told not to move or do anything to alert people to our presence. Two farmers sat in front, and the wagon moved out of the grounds, pulled by two cows. I could hear the clatter of the wooden wheels on the stony path. The farmers were stopped by some men (were they German soldiers or some check-point manned by French police?) who speared the hay with big forks. I curled up very small, scared to breathe. Only when the noise of wheels could be heard turning again did I feel relieved. I will never forget this.

After a while, I fell asleep as we travelled to the train station for our next destination. I found out only four years ago that the Germans were beginning to take the children away from these homes, so the OSE was spirited them away, a few at a time.

Mirepeix

Madame Forgue was a widow and always dressed in black. I did not know it at the time, but her husband had just died early in 1944, some months before we arrived. Her first name was Esther, an unusual name for a Frenchwoman, but she was not Jewish. In fact, she was a pious Catholic. I arrived at her house with a head full of lice and sores. She shaved me. I was always being shaved. I also had to let her know if there were worms in my stools. There were, but I always used to cut them into pieces with a wooden stick so that she would not see them. I didn't want to be different from the others. No one else was asked if they had worms in their stools. I always seemed to be the sick one. I remember having a swollen stomach, but I didn't think it was a sign of sickness.

The house was in a hamlet that consisted of a few farms and orchards, a church, a school and a marketplace. Madame Forgue's property must have been a farm when her husband was alive, but now she only kept her large kitchen-garden going. There was a huge barn, still filled with hay, but there were no cattle. The toilet was way down near the back fence next to a cemetery, and you could see big statues and crosses above the stone wall. I played hide and seek in the cemetery with the local children. I was the littlest, and the older kids teased me that the ghosts were after me. I felt scared, but did not run away from the game, because I wanted the company of the other children.

There were big crosses above our beds, and at night, Madame Forgue told me to pray, especially for my parents to be well. There was another boy, George, living in the house at the time. He was a few years older than me. He wanted to be a priest when he grew up and I learned to pray on my hands and knees from him. A number of times, George forced me and another little girl to go into the barn with him, where he would sexually abuse us with a stick. It hurt a lot. Fortunately, he was caught hurting the other child, and the abuse stopped.

I attended school, but don't remember learning anything. I just sat and fantasized. I was in my own world, but what it consisted of, I can't remember. I enjoyed being on my own and walking to and from school. I always stopped at the river and stared into the water or threw stones to watch the ripples. The sight and sound of it was very peaceful and soothing. I often passed the women washing their clothes in the river. They were cheerful and friendly and always greeted me as I walked by and encouraged me to stay and chat for a while.

One day, I was undressed and examined at school by some visiting doctors and they thought something was really wrong. I left the room, talking silently to my stomach. I told it, "There's nothing wrong with you because you aren't hurting." The OSE archives tell that I was very sick and spent some time in hospital then. But the memory of it is blurry. I remember doctors and nurses, the ward with rows of beds and sleeping most of the time.

Chatillion-Sur-Indre

This was the last place where we were hidden and the memories are good and bad.

My sister and I took a long train journey and eventually came to a station called Chatillion-Sur-Indre. The train stopped and the guard called for everyone to get out, so it must have been the end of the line. It was dark and there were other children also coming off the train. People were waiting in the shadows to pick the children up. We were all gone from the platform in three or four minutes. A woman came up to us and asked if we had anywhere to sleep that night, and when we said no, took each of us by the hand. I trusted her straight away. She walked us to her home, gave us a wash and put us to sleep in a bed with beautiful white sheets.

Her name was Madame Henriette Gateault. We spent several months with her and this was the happiest period for me throughout the war years.

We had food and warmth, and I felt loved and cared for. She asked me to call her Maman Gateault. I went with her to church and to Mass and learned the practices of the Catholic religion. I remember looking at the image of Jesus and thinking how much pain he was in but I loved the image of the Virgin Mary holding her baby to her in the sunlight. She seemed real to me and it was her I used to pray to. I felt secure and happy . . . as if I belonged. My sister refused to attend religious services and was never pushed to participate. Only once did Madame Gateault ask her where we came from, if our names were real and our ages. Celine would not tell her anything and was never asked again. . . .

Another memory that haunted me for many years, was when we were reciting the ABC and came to C which stood for “coq”—rooster. I had a panic attack and screamed hysterically. No one could stop me. I was put in the corner but continued crying. I was ordered to stop but I just couldn’t, so I was put out in the corridor. Years later, I realized why I had been affected like this. It was because of the animals we had slept with in Pau. There was a rooster there, I was scared stiff of. It kept menacing me and pecked me a couple of times.

Dinner time with Maman Gateault was always memorable. I would get the crouton (crust) and the heart of the lettuce. Pierre Doliveux was a lovely man and very kind to me, always joking and making me laugh. No one had ever tried to amuse me before. He made me feel special and important. He told me that if I ate the heart of the lettuce, I would become as strong as he was. I would be asked to find the lettuce heart on the platter at mealtimes, and when I had transferred it to my plate, he rolled up some lettuce leaves on his plate and said he’d found another heart. Imagine, a lettuce with two hearts! I was puzzling over this when Maman Gateault would whisper, “Don’t tease the child. You are upsetting her!” I remember, I couldn’t put my arms around Maman Gateault because she was so fat. My hands couldn’t reach around to her back, and she’d laugh when I tried.

Everything was wonderful until the day the Germans marched in without warning. Normally, news spread in advance and by the time the Germans came, the streets were empty. On this occasion, we had not time to go to the shelters. Maman Gateault and Lucienne quickly closed all the shutters. The Germans marched into the square, in their usual way. Then scattered and started shooting at houses and people randomly. Our poor shoe-maker and his whole family were ordered to come out but wouldn’t. As a result, they burnt down the whole building and he and his family were shot because of being Jewish.

Pierre was expected back for lunch and Maman Gateault kept praying that he would stay on his farm. We saw him as he turned the corner through the cracks in the shutters. He was pushing a wheel-barrow full of grass with the scythe on top, the scythe that I was never allowed to touch. Two German soldiers came up to him and started shouting at him. They disappeared in the direction of the square, which was only up the street. Maman Gateault was crying. We were later told that he was interrogated and severely pistol-whipped. He died in hospital from his injuries a little while later. It was on the 15th August 1944. When I went back there nine years ago, I saw the names of those murdered by the Germans on a plaque in the City Square, and his name was amongst them. It was the worst time in the world for that town. There was death all around. I was numb and felt nothing. I didn’t fear death; I knew from an early age that it was coming, if not today, then tomorrow.

The wheel-barrow did a lot of work after the Germans left. I walked to the square and nobody stopped me. They were picking up bodies and silently walking down the street to bury them. I just looked and walked behind them with the other children, like a zombie.

The next time, we were all warned that the Germans were coming and we managed to hide. They didn’t interfere with the population this time. They simply took everything worth taking, even the cattle. When we came out of hiding, our home had been emptied of all the food, linen, blankets and tools. When I returned to Chatillion in 1993, I found out that the Germans had retreated through our village in August 1944 and committed atrocities and looted many farmhouses.

I don’t remember when liberation came, but I remember that suddenly I found the Germans sweeping the school grounds, and some of the children were saying you could spit on them or put your tongue out to them. There was a lot going on without us children knowing it. One day, they marched the town candle-maker down the main street, stripped him down to his waist, with what seemed the entire township walking behind. Then the farmers hung him. They had been given information that he had betrayed people to the Germans.

In November 1945, we were returning from visiting Lucienne in the hospital. She had just given birth to a baby boy. It was a sunny, peaceful afternoon and we were strolling home. I was lagging behind Madam Gateault and my sister, picking flowers from the footpath. Suddenly a black car stopped and two men in dark suits and hats ran out and grabbed us. They said, “Don’t be scared, we are Jewish. We are taking you back.” I could hear Maman Gateault screaming, “These are my children, don’t take them away.” I heard those words for many years to come. She loved me. She was good to me and I was so happy with her.

I hated those two men for so many years. What they did seemed so brutal at the time. I didn’t want to go with them, I didn’t want to be Jewish. Later I discovered that some families who had harboured children refused to part with them.

Some did so because they had grown to love them, others because they had baptized them and wanted to “save their souls.” Some even held them to ransom, demanding a large monetary reward. Maman Gateault did not fit any of these categories. We should have been given a chance to say good-bye properly.

JULIUS GOLDFARB

The life of a Polish Jew during the Holocaust was never intended by the Nazis to last long—certainly not long enough to be able to keep a diary, which was an illegal activity in any case. And yet Julius Goldfarb was one who did so, and in this account we see something of the type of entries he managed to keep. Essentially a record of how people lived their lives in small towns and ghettos in Poland, Goldfarb's diary entries in the summer and late fall of 1942 offer valuable descriptions from which much understanding can be gleaned of the challenges facing Jews under the most trying of conditions during one of the Holocaust's bitterest periods.

July 18, 1942 Dębica

I received a card from Dora that things were very bad. The Germans were talking about moving the Jews out from Sedziszów. At the same time, twenty-one kilometers away in Dębica, they were talking about the same thing—moving Jews out. They were taking people from surrounding areas; the whole area was to be resettled. I had a passport (legitymacje-ID cards) stamped by the Germans, protecting me because I did work on the railroad.

In Dębica they collected all the Jews in one safe place, a pasture near the Dębica train station. All had to sit in a circle on the ground; no one at all was allowed to stand up. They were not allowed to move around even to keep warm (it was very cold at night). They were not even allowed to shiver. Around the circle, a whole company of SS and the blue uniformed Polish police were standing. It was pouring rain without stopping. The mothers cuddled their children to their breasts to protect them from the rain and cold. The children were begging, “Mom, give me some bread. Give me some milk.” The people suffered all night sitting on the ground—the rain never ceased.

I decided to go back to Sedziszów to see what was happening there. I wanted to see for myself. I wanted to see my family. I decided to smuggle myself out of the camp. That was easy. The hardest thing was not to be caught outside the camp because that meant death. I hopped on a freight train and rode the 21 kilometers to Sedziszów.

I saw the same sight in Sedziszów as I had seen in Dębica. The Germans took all the people from the town and also from nearby towns, such as Wiele Pole. The people from Wiele Pole had to walk to Sedziszów. People who were beaten and died on the way were thrown on a wagon. The Nazis purposely let someone's head hang out and rub on one of the back wheels, mutilating the head. They often did this. They wanted everyone to see the cruelty of the Nazis so they would be feared.

They gathered the people from Sedziszów and from the nearby towns in a circle and they were not allowed to move. In the evening, they took the older people in our town to the Jewish cemetery where they had dug a giant pit. The barrels of the German machine guns were pointed at all the poor, old people who had to stand naked, squashed all together. After they began shooting, all the old people started to fall together, forever in a collective grave. Berta Pelenberg, a pregnant woman in her ninth month, was dragged by her long hair to the cemetery where she was murdered. Later the SS tapped young people and told them to cover up that collective grave.

Some took their own lives, rather than be deported to their deaths by the Nazis. Dr. Goldman lived with my best friend, Izzy, and his family. Dr. Goldman's wife, daughter, Yanka, and son Yurick, as well as Mr. Gold, his wife and daughter were told to go to the Sedziszów Train Station. Yanka Goldman was engaged to a Polish Christian, Pasternak, who wanted her to leave with him, so he could save her. Yanka refused to live without the rest of her family. The family knew what would happen. Dr. Goldman had prepared cyanide pills, so they took these pills before the trains were loaded. (I later saw where their bodies were buried in the cemetery.)

I ran back to the railroad station where the rest of my people were surrounded. I was looking for my family—for my dear wife and mother and all the rest of my family. I could not recognize anyone. It was pouring rain. I was far away from the people, hiding in the grass. I lay in the grass in the rain far away—looking—for almost the whole night. I couldn't clear my mind; it was as if I were in a trance. I couldn't get back to reality to believe this whole thing was really happening. Who could have imagined this? They were shooting the people. Why?

As early as 9:00 PM, I heard echoes of shooting. In fact, I confirmed the tragic truth. They had shot everyone. Why? What did the poor people do wrong? I thought and I thought, but I couldn't get those suffering words out of my mind. However, I could not find the answer! My head was splitting from the pain.

I had to go back to Dębica to the camp barrack for morning roll call. Ironically, after roll call, all the workers were collected and taken to the Dębica train station. All the workers' faces had turned pale from what they had seen. They went back to Dębica depressed. In Dębica train station, people said to us, "Everybody should hide because they are shooting Jews wherever they see them."

It happened to us that they called to us on the train tracks and told us to report in. Around the station I saw dead people covered up like in a hill. A lot of other people were standing four in a row near the Gestapo and SS. Later the military was chasing them like cattle to the station where the cattle wagons were waiting—a whole train. They herded the people into cattle wagons. The floors of these wagons were deep with lime. One hundred and twenty people were in each car, thrown one on top of one another. They pushed them in and locked the doors. On each side, at the top, were little slits of windows covered with barbed wire. Inside there was no air to breathe and no water. On the steps of the wagons stood guards with machine guns. They were watching and saying to people, "You are going to another place to work in the Ukrainian fields." The same lie was repeated at every village and town—that people were leaving to be resettled in the East.

In the territories and in other places when Nazis deported people they generally would send out every one of them. In yet other places they left the people that they needed, such as specialists, to work. For example, in Dębica only a part of the city was settled out. Quite a while passed and no letters or post cards from where they had been taken were received by family. A few post cards had been thrown out from the wagons. If a good person found these on the tracks, he mailed it because it had been addressed.

We found that the trains from the Dębica area were going in the vicinity of the Belzec Death Camp where there was a crematorium. We had no other information from them. We worked on the tracks at the station and were left without homes or families.

We were six friends from Sedziszów where we worked. [Julius was the only survivor.] I talked with them and proposed that we should hold on together and have a collective life like a family. We should embrace each other as family and watch over each other like brothers. We should hold together because we have had a tragedy happen to all of us.

From the day that they sent away the people all had to sleep in the barracks that belonged to the firm Ostbahn [the German company, operating the east railroad, a Polish railway system]. The director of the firm ordered that all Jewish workers had to live outside the city in barracks. The area was fenced in with barbed wire all around so they would not be able to escape. They squeezed in two hundred and fifty persons, all belonged to the company Ostbahn but who had worked in different workshops.

November 15, 1942

For the second time, on November 15, 1942, they started to "resettle" people, sending them to the gas chambers. On a Sunday, all firms had to work. We were standing by the magazine (warehouse). The people who worked there told us that SS and blue Polish police surrounded the whole ghetto. The head of the firm, Mazurkiewicz, told us to pick up our tools and go out to work as always. We were all very anxious. On the same day the workers who lived in the ghetto did not go out to work. We talked about what this meant. Because of what was happening, a German supervisor went to find out what was going on. The German came back with an answer: after this Aktion, our friends would go back to work. We were working on the main track of the station.

While we were out, they chased out all the brothers, sisters, mothers, and children from the ghetto. The same thing happened as the first time when they were shipped out in cattle wagons. On the way many people died. They suffocated to death in these cattle wagons—without air, the floors covered in lime. The lime was very dangerous.

We were looking at this. Can anyone imagine this? They are killing poor, innocent people. They push them in and one grabs the other and follows. They do this to satisfy their sadism. Those killers, part of the Fascist Socialist State, kill as if instinctively. The Germans did not forget about anything. They prepared crematoriums and different places of torture.

At noon, at lunchtime, we had a break to eat something. (At 5:00 AM we had twelve decagrams of bread, raw sugar, and kava [ersatz coffee, watered down coffee]. The bread had to last us the whole day. In the evening we had soup and whatever bread we had left.) We heard a loud whistle, and I became scared. We thought this was a signal that more people would be taken to be “resetled.” However, it was only a locomotive whistle. The train carried people who had been relocated by the Nazis from other ghettos. We were looking out as they passed by; and heard the screaming, “Water. Water. Water.” Three times I heard them yelling for water. I felt the heat radiating from people’s bodies. From the little window in the train I felt the heat and smell coming out, and then screams from the people begging for water. [Because Julius worked on the railroad, he saw these trains.] It was so hot that the people undressed themselves in the train wagons—kids, women, men, the elderly! Even this did not help them. They desperately needed air and water, but although we tried to go around the wagons to help, the guards with machine guns wouldn’t let us. The atmosphere threatened us, and we were very sad and upset. The culture and civilization of the twentieth century was fading before our very eyes as the train moved away in the distance.

We were left with hearts of stone. In our mouths there were no words. All that was left were heavy sighs.

After we finished the work in the evening, we went back to our barracks in Dębica, which was three kilometers from the railroad station. We were all very troubled and depressed. We felt that every day there were fewer and fewer of us. Now there were very few left.

After we slept through the night, we again marched to work. When we were walking on the tracks, we saw a mound near the tracks. Under the mound were dead bodies—those who had died from hunger or who had suffocated to death because they had no air to breathe. The Nazis had thrown these bodies out of the train. The territory they died in had to bury them.

We then found out that a train had come to Dębica [which the Nazis had occupied since September of 1939 and where a ghetto had been established in 1941]. Until 1943 the Jews of Dębica had been deported to Belzec Death Camp. The first time, on June 29, 1943, not all the people had been deported; however, on December 15–16, 1943—for the second time—the Nazis were to deport people [this time to Auschwitz]. Now the ghetto of Dębica would be liquidated. Only a few people, like us, who were necessary, were left. The Gestapo gave us special passports (legitymacje—ID cards) with our photographs and Gestapo stamps; the text of the passports stated that we were living because we were needed to work for the company.

We were brought into the city together with another group of people who also had special passports. We were altogether about 350 workmen, and about 300 other people were hiding in bunkers.

The Gestapo gave a strict order to the Ordnungsdienst [OD], the Jewish police, leaders from the camp: they should search for people hiding in the vicinity of the camp. Many people had escaped from where they were supposed to be, so many so that even in one day they caught sixteen people. These Jews were brought to the cemetery in Dębica, where they were tortured and murdered. They had to strip naked. Then they had to dig their own grave, climb into the grave, and had to lie one next to the other, tied up, and then they were executed. Next machine guns did their duty. Some of them were only slightly wounded; some were not even touched. The OD paid no attention to us while they were covering up the grave.

The next day the OD took fifty-four people from the camp—most of them females and children. These people were so numb and depressed that they no longer cared what would happen to them. They had given up.

Then they let us know that at 9:00 PM in the evening, the Kommandant of the camp and a high chief of the Sicherdienst (SD) [Nazi Party security service and intelligence service] wanted to speak with us. This SD was a terrible person—a sadist. He liked to be honored but he treated people as if they were nothing. If any littlest thing that he did not like was done, he took out his gun and shot the person or persons. He was a tall, heavy man and always had a big cigar in his snout. He always had a revolver in his fist, and he always had a smile on his face.

He came at exactly 9:00 PM and ordered the Kommandant to bring him two ODs. He told the ODs to bring slowly in fifty-four people in a line. With a cigar in his mouth, he shot all fifty-four with a smile on his face. This was a game to him. At the time, during the execution no one had permission to leave the barrack. Even to look out of the window was forbidden. Everybody stayed in his own corner; we were all very scared and very sad. Nobody said a word. We stayed without any protection and without any power. Everybody’s heart was bleeding.

After a while the sound of gun shots was like an orchestra. After he left, I called him a cutthroat and a sadist. Then a wagon with two horses came and they slowly loaded the bodies, one by one. The horses did not even need to be guided to the cemetery.

How could this Nazi stoop so low! He called little kids to himself, “Komm, Komm, Kleine. Hab keine Angst. Willst du Bonbons? Geh Dorthin.” (Come little ones. Don’t be afraid. Do you want candy? Go there.) And when they went there he grabbed a little brother by the hair, lifted him with one hand, held him up, and shot him. He did the same things to many other children. When he left, the SS began their killings. They shipped two wagonloads of people with the horses a third time. The horses took the bodies to a big grave, into which the SS dumped all the bodies.

One person stood up in the grave—an older man who had come from Mjelec. He had two wounds to his head, but he spoke with everyone. He told us he didn't feel anything. I was part of the group unloading the bodies into the grave, and he spoke to us. He begged us to help him. But the guards were fifty meters away, surrounding the area, and no one could help. The guards were watching the group that was covering the bodies.

One of the soldiers saw this man standing up. He ran over, and he told him to stand in the grave. With a clear mind, the man stood near the grave and begged for mercy, looking right in the soldier's face. But the soldier shot him anyway.

That whole week in the evenings the orchestra of shots was heard. In our camp in Dębica every day there were all kinds of death sentences—sacrificial victims from the Jewish people. The train police (German—Ranschutz) were always looking for people to murder—the intelligentsia, strong people, people in jail. They also looted them, stealing even their clothing. One day the Ranschutz came with the chief of the Gestapo; they took fifty of our workers—Jews—and put them in cattle cars and they hooked these up to a passenger train. They shipped them off to Tarnów, Poland, about fifty kilometers away [by 1941, a haven for Jews]. They hanged them. After a few weeks they finished everybody off.

The Richter Firm was liquidated. Under the Richter Firm thirty-four of our people were working. One day they went to work. The train police and the soldiers told us to stay away. Afterwards they let us know what had happened. The police were standing under the train bridge (an overpass). They waited there until the thirty-four came back from work. On both sides of the bridge the police and soldiers stood with machine guns. When the men came close they encircled them. The Ranschutz took them at 7:00 PM. The Kommandant of the camp begged them to let the people go because he needed them. But his pleas were for naught. In late evening, around 8:30 PM, we heard shots from the so-called “dead pastures,” where they had shot a lot of Jews. This pasture area was close to our camp. They were killed down to the last person. For what? I am asking, Why?

The camp was in panic. Chaos! People running around not knowing what to do. They ran around, trying to escape. But where? To the city? The chief of the Gestapo had warned us that if one person escaped, he would take five people from the barrack and shoot them. In the camp this brought an even heavier burden.

Within a short period of time, they transferred people to Rzeszów. More than half of our people, this little bit, worked at the same place until the end when they were deported.

In the fall of 1942, on the day of the High Holidays, as always they collected us near the gates and lined us up. They took us four in a row to march to work. When we crossed the gate, we were marching through lines of Gestapo. A taxi cab was waiting there and from the cab an SS leader got out. He rubbed his hands together and ordered them back to the barracks. Meanwhile the Ukrainian Schutzpolizei surrounded us. Then trucks arrived to take us away. They loaded us up and took us to Płaszów Ghetto that they had liquidated. They left in Płaszów thirty-seven people for three weeks. After the work was finished, one person had run away—an OD man. Therefore, Samuel and I became ODs for three days before they left Płaszów. I had to take the place of the man who escaped. They ordered me to do this and I functioned as an OD afterwards too. They took us all to Rzeszów when we left Płaszów.

MARIKA GOLDFAYL

The majority of Jews in France who were victims of the Holocaust were those referred to as “foreign” Jews—those who had arrived in France as immigrants before the war, or their French-born children. Marika Goldfayl’s father was an immigrant from Hungary who arrived in transit to the United States in 1924 and decided to remain. Although the family he established did well in France, the war and the collaborationist Vichy government combined to render the family vulnerable. By 1942, when Marika was eight years of age, her parents decided that she would be safer if hidden as an orphan in a convent school. The memoir here is a segment from Marika’s personal account of what it was like to be placed in this situation. It is a detailed document of orphanage life, and as a result a valuable depiction of this aspect of the Holocaust.

My father, Alexandre Rosenthal, came to Paris from Hungary in 1924, looking for political stability and work, but mainly hoping it would be a stepping stone to America.

However, the quotas were full for years to come. He was twenty and had extended family in Paris. In 1929 he went back home to the large provincial town of Kalocsa to visit his family. It was summer and one day he took off on his bicycle to visit Maria Mandel, a distant relative, a widow. She lived in Simontornya, about sixty kilometers cross-country. There he met her sixteen-year-old daughter, Magda, and fell in love with the shy, pretty girl. He wooed her through letters. In 1930 my mother, now eighteen, was brought to Paris by her mother to be married. They stayed in Paris but, like all foreigners, were unable to get French citizenship.

It was during the depression. They were poor but very much in love, a love that did not diminish with the years. My father was an observant Jew who prayed and laid teffilin every day. My mother worked as a seamstress and my father took whatever work he could find. He had trained as a pleater, but at times, he had to work as a housepainter, locksmith and noodle salesman.

I was born in March 1934, by which time my parents had opened a food store at 65 rue Villier de L'isle Adam, in the 20th Arrondissement. We lived at the back of the shop. The business flourished and the small area around our home was like a village, where everybody knew each other. My parents were a popular young couple, with friends both Jewish and non-Jewish. We soon moved to a small but pretty first-floor apartment a few houses up the street. We had to relinquish ownership to an Aryan in 1941 soon after the Germans invaded France.

I had started going to a state school, but my mother removed me and placed me in a Catholic school, by way of camouflage. After a while, she took me to a village not far from Paris, where she paid a kindly older couple without children to keep me. As the situation worsened, I was deemed too much of a risk to be kept on. I spent a few weeks with family friends in Alsace, but that didn't work out either.

In 1942 my father decided that our best chance of survival was for the family to split up. Because of his Semitic looks, he thought he would put Maman and me in greater danger of deportation by staying. Papa volunteered to work in Germany, as many men did during the war. It was a gamble for him. He was swarthy and had curly black hair—which was considered a “Jewish appearance.” His reasoning was that if anyone had a doubt as to his origins, they would dismiss the thought, since a Jew trying to evade detection would hardly volunteer to go to Germany. He was right, and he survived.

I was eight years old in the spring of 1942, when I was told by my mother that I had to go to yet another hiding place, an orphanage. Acquaintances of my parents, Monsieur and Madame Massault, had arranged with the Mother Superior of a convent in the quartier San Michel that I should become a boarder in the St Vincent de Paul Orphanage located in the convent, while my mother fended for herself in whichever way she could.

The Messaults worked for a wholesaler at Les Halles wholesale market, where my father used to buy fruit and vegetables for the shop. They were a business connection, no more. They had no friendship links with my family, and yet they took the responsibility, at the risk of their safety and that of their three children, to organize my next hiding place.

Maman took me to the orphanage by metro. We only carried a small suitcase, as it was important to be inconspicuous. We got to the narrow rue de la Parcheminerie in the Latin Quarter, and there it was, the inhospitable building that would be my new home for some time. I noticed an old-fashioned shiny brass bell, the type that is set into the wall and is pulled but makes no sound on the street side. Maman pulled the bell and a thin, small, bent woman, nearly bald, came to the door. We entered through a smaller door cut into the large green metal front gate. There was a smell of cabbage and mustiness. Later, it became for me the ubiquitous smell of the orphanage. The concierge led us into the parloir, a cobble-stoned, enclosed waiting area just inside this green metal porte-cochère.

Inside it was dark, daylight only coming into one side of this forbidding parlour from a glass door. There were two long wooden benches lining the sides of the walls. At the back left-hand corner was a glassed-in, cage-like loge for the concierge, a dark stairwell and the glass door to the courtyard, through which I could see the statue of a saint in a recess in the wall, which was covered with ivy. We were told to be seated and to wait. I was frightened by this forbidding place, knowing that I was going to be left there. Writing this down now, more than sixty years later, my body and emotions easily recall that same feeling. My belly aches and my throat feels tight.

After a while, a nun came in. She was the Mother Superior—a large-bellied woman dressed in the St Vincent de Paul habit of that time, a starched white corner coif and a long blue garb. She walked in front of us, the wings of her headgear gently flapping. She showed us to her office and told us WHAT WOULD BE REQUIRED OF ME. I was to fit in as quickly as possibly or, more correctly, blend in with the rest of the children, attend chapel and mass, learn the prayers and catechism as quickly as I could, mother the bits I initially did not know. Under no circumstances was I to go to confession or take communion. And I should not disclose my real identity to anyone, even the priests, even though I had no false identity papers and my surname remained Rosenthal throughout the war. Mother Superior gave me a pink rosary, which was to be in my pocket at all times, because these beads had been blessed! What did all this mean? Neither Maman nor I understood the meaning of many of those words, but we acquiesced. There was a lot to learn and I learnt it all fast.

I would never set foot in Mother Superior's office again. After this initial preparation, Maman and I were directed back to the dark parloir. We said goodbye silently. Maman held me tight. I can still remember her familiar smell—Chipre, that old-fashioned sweet perfume. A tall, slim nun came to take me into the cold bosom of the Christian place. Maman walked out through that green metal door. I remember it making a bang and she was gone. Would we ever be together again? Papa had said that we would be, and that I should remember Shema Israel (Hear oh Israel) every day and do this even in a church. "Do not forget that you are Jewish, but tell no one, and we will be together again." Most of the time I believed him, but often I would sink into fear and despair.

As Maman left, the nun led me away. I reached for her hand but with a light smack on the hand, she told me never to do this again. My initiation into the life of a waif had begun. I was then handed over to a young woman called Mademoiselle Christiane, who took me to the second floor and the attic dormitory where she had a grown-up's single bed with a curtain around it. There were two large rooms leading one into the other. I was shown to a chipped black iron bed at the end of the second room and told that this was now mine, and I was to make the bed after getting up. At home we had doonas and not blankets, so I looked carefully at how I was to make the bed. Nothing in what I did should indicate that I came from a foreign home.

My personal clothes were to be stored in a large wooden box with all of the other children's Sunday clothes. I was handed a dress, a navy cape and a long calico pocket. This pocket with a vertical opening was to be tied around my waist under my dress, and to reach for a handkerchief I had to go through the vertical slit in the uniform and find the pocket beneath it. I changed from my grey and black velvet dress and fur coat into these very worn and thin clothes. I was given the number 79 and told to remember it, as it would always be my number. Most of the time, I would be addressed as 79. This first evening and night, I was cold and lonely but I did not cry. Shema Israel—Hear oh Israel, we will be together again.

At the orphanage most of the children had no parents, though a few were visited by their mothers, or other relatives. Some children had some disability like a club-foot or some minor intellectual retardation. The orphanage would have been funded by the social services of the time and by the Church. School was a little distance away from the orphanage. I do not recall any learning other than that which pertained to the catechism and copying from the blackboard.

I was hungry, lonely and in a general state of fear—more for my parents than for myself, as I thought that children would perhaps be spared. Why did I think this after I had seen my best friend Helen and her parents and sister Marie dragged screaming into a police car? They were Polish and were taken in the early days of the deportations. I had seen all this from our first floor window, I hid behind the curtain but I was a witness to their drama, their terror. Of course they never returned.

In July of 1942, I was able to spend the school holidays with my mother and uncle and family in Plessis, on the outskirts of Paris, where they were hiding. A photo taken during that time shows me with skinny limbs and a huge tummy, probably the effects of malnutrition. For a few weeks I was happy. I played and fought with my cousin Andre. Sadly, I had to go back to the orphanage and Maman had to fend for herself back in the apartment until she too had to seek shelter elsewhere. She was offered a non-paying job as a maid to a well-to-do family in the country.

I did not see my mother for a long time after that. Increasingly, I feared the future for me and my parents. I didn't know where Maman was. I only knew that she had to hide somewhere away from home. I clung to the knowledge that my parents' love for me was boundless; this was the only thing that gave me strength to cope. Their strength and love was lodged within me when I didn't know whether they were alive or not, or whether I would be abandoned and become like the other children in the orphanage, grey-faced, emotionless, and alone.

On the first floor of the orphanage was the chapel and a large school-like room where we would sit and do our homework. The girl who made the best religious drawing would receive a holy picture. The other room on this first floor had a chapel where we went every morning during the month of May, the month that celebrates the Holy Virgin. In contrast to the dirt and drabness of the rest of the orphanage, the chapel was the only place to have polished floors and flowers—white lilies on either side of the altar. The nuns looked different in this pious environment; even Sister Marie, who directed our routine, looked serene there. She was a short, dark, perpetually angry Italian woman, and when she got really very cross, her starched coif would slide back somewhat, showing the dark stubble on top of her head. The children sniggered at this. I kept quiet . . . and another day would pass.

In the orphanage there were no toys or any understanding of children and their need for affection and imagination. There was some playtime, when we went out into the yard, but I was reticent, always aware that I might reveal my identity. At that time, before the notion of weekends was adopted in France, we had Thursdays and Sundays off schools. To occupy us on those long days, we would sit in the school-like room and clean our combs—one ordinary comb and another fine one for lice. This activity would take a whole afternoon because the process was designed to keep us occupied. We were given a small piece of white cotton cloth and by pulling some threads out in one direction of the cloth, it was possible to lodge a comb in it and by moving it up and down, clean it. As we were bathed rarely, both we and our combs were dirty.

I can only remember being bathed twice in the time I spent in the orphanage. The bathing took place in the basement. The bath was half-filled and a number of children would be washed with a cloth, but front and backside were not included in this ablution. The trick was not to be first, as the water was too hot, and not to be last, as the water was too dirty. I learnt to volunteer for the bath after the first couple of girls had gone through. I wasn't fussed about being dirty. We changed knickers only once a week, but the weekly hankie bothered me a lot. As I tended to have a constant cold, it had to be left at night over the rail at the end of my bed. It had usually somewhat dried by the morning, but it was smelly and stiff from days of snot!

Thursday afternoons we were allowed visitors and I saw my mother once, or perhaps twice. After that, she had to hide away from our home and Paris. I did not know where she was or whether she was alive, deported or in hiding somewhere. I had overheard grown-ups say that it was best if children did not know their parents' whereabouts. I feared that I would be abandoned in this cold place where I was unloved, hungry and alone. My identity had to be my secret. This was so much in contrast to the open and honest relationship I had with everyone prior to this time of shame—shame of being a Jew.

On Sundays children were allowed to go to their family for lunch and had to be back by 4.30 pm. Monsieur Massault picked me up before lunch most Sundays and I would wear my own clothes. I felt happy and normal but tried not to show it, so as not to bring attention to myself. The interior of the Massault home looked like a typical French provincial house with its solid oak furniture, which had been in their family for a long time. The apartment had a smell of beeswax and food cooked with wine. The food was delicious, and I mostly won the games the Massault children, Simone and Pierre, played with me. I was a little younger than them and they kindly often let me win. There was also a baby, Chantal. The Massault home was warm, friendly and safe. Without their kindness and the weekly supplement of a decent meal, I do not know how I would have survived as well as I did.

The food at the orphanage was bad and severely rationed. It was neither sufficient nor nourishing enough, but I ate what I could. I had developed some stomach problems and was told to avoid vinegar and cabbage. In contrast, the nuns ate well.

Many a time I was on vegetable duty, which consisted of scraping the carrots and rutabaga—a sort of beet used as animal feed and given to cows in winter. I found it inedible but some kids ate it. The only good food was the small portion of wartime bread we got twice a day. I was most hungry before bedtime, and I began hiding a piece of bread in my pocket. I got caught once and after that became more careful about my smuggling activity. We ate out of old and dented metal dishes and then dunked them in a bucket of warm water on the way out of the refectory. These dishes were then stacked up, ready for the next meal.

Cold and hungry at bedtime, I devised a puppet show with my toes. No one could see this and I had a story to tell myself about what it would be like after the war. I think that I usually fell asleep before my story finished.

None of the children who were complete orphans played, learnt or made friends. They were passive and sad. One of the most unfortunate was a girl who wet her bed most nights. In the morning the nun on duty would rub the unfortunate child's face in her wet bedding. The sheet would then be hung over her bed to dry and the whole dormitory stank of it. At night a bucket was placed in the middle of the room as a toilet. If I had to use it, I would stumble half-asleep toward the bucket and if the thing was full, I would be awakened by the wet and cold feeling on my bottom. Nights were long and cold. At times, we could hear and see through the mansard windows the bombing that never felt far away and frightened us a great deal. The allies were bombing the railway yards and armament factories on the outskirts of Paris, possibly five to seven kilometers away.

Most nights a nun, Seour Cecile, who looked after the infants, would come to the dormitory for evening prayer. She told us that if we slept with our arms crossed on our chest, not only would she give the lucky child a picture of a saint, but also if we died during the night in that position, we would become God's angels. These pictures were prized and collected by the children and I recall trying to sleep in that position, but I was too busy with my toes' thespian roles and my rescued piece of bread to keep my arms crossed over the blanket in the cold. Damn the consequences, I was cold and hungry! I followed the path of my own redemption by putting something in my belly and hope in my inner self. The evening prayer included a turgid passage in which we asked for God's forgiveness for having a body. We would kneel next to our beds, get undressed still on our knees and put on pyjamas, a task that required some agility in that position. I doubt that the nuns ever tried that exercise!

The refectory was a long room with a large framed picture of St Therèse de Lisieux behind glass. I was told to sit with the girls of my group. There were three groups, but I never saw the babies and rarely the older girls. I was one of the moyennes—the in-between age. There may have been twenty or twenty-five of us children sitting on a narrow bench at one long table. The first prayer was said over food. There was a prayer for many activities and the longest one was the bedtime one, said on our bony knees in the cold dormitory. Never mind the meaning, just be like the other children and never cry. A self-taught lesson swiftly learned. This was wartime and I had to survive well, as I thought that my responsibility towards my parents was to remain the child they knew.

One day I was told that the convent had been informed that there would be an inspection by the police, as they were looking for certain children. The word "Jew" was never mentioned but there was no need to say who they were looking for: clearly, it could only be Jewish children. I was told I had to leave and return perhaps after the inspection. The Mother Superior had died some time before this event, and my fear of being abandoned if my parents did not return was appeased. Some nuns must have known I was Jewish and I would not have to stay in this place for ever.

I left for our apartment. My mother had sewn a key and a little money in between the lining and the interlining of my fur coat. I took the metro, got home and found that the door was sealed. That is, the police had come for us and, as we were not home, had put seals all around the front door. The seals were wide, packaging-type tape with swastika stamps all over. With the edge of the key, I cut the tape going as high as I could but I was too short and our concierge, Monsieur Cuvilliez, helped me in the task. He apologized for not taking me in and giving me some food. I didn't realise to what extent this was dangerous for him. I went inside and hid behind my old ebony piano for some time, as it was across the corner of the room. Was I there just one night? Was it more? I don't remember, but I do remember the chalk marks on the hessian at the back of the piano. Somehow—I can't remember how—I ended up back at the orphanage and safety.

I stayed there until the middle of winter 1943, when a man I didn't know came for me. Carrying my little suitcase, we went by train to what turned out to be his summer property, where his family lived and my mother was hiding as their maid. The man was a Monsieur Bach. He was the assistant CEO in a firm that manufactured submarine equipment, at that stage for the Germans. He never said a word to me from the time he picked me up, other than warning me that if there was an identify check, he would deny knowing me. He didn't know how well I had trained myself. I would not have revealed his connection to me. Better wet myself if I had to. We walked and walked and in the distance to the right there was a lake with the moonlight reflected in it. In the distance I could see electric light. He said, talking for the second time, that this was his home and I would find my mother there. I did not wet myself . . . and found absolute happiness when she held me with all the love I needed.

At last I had arrived at the end of my "Calvary." Anything could happen now, I had found my mother. By the end of summer 1944, Maman and I were back in our flat in Paris. This part of the war had ended. Now we had to wait until Papa came back from Germany. Maman took a job in a local button factory and together we waited for his return. By some miracle, we were reunited as a family on Mother's Day 3 June 1945 and on 25 November 1946 my little sister Annie was born.

VERA HERMAN GOODKIN

A little girl born in 1930, Vera Herman Goodkin was a Czech Jew whose parents initially found it difficult to accept that the German people could become transformed into Nazi antisemites seemingly overnight. After the extension of German rule into the Czech lands in March 1939, however, reality had to be accepted. In this account, Vera offers her recollections of what it was like to live under Nazi rule—not only in Czechoslovakia, but also in the family’s land of refuge, Hungary. She provides a testimony that covers a considerable number of topics, taking readers through January 1944. This was just two months before Germany invaded Hungary and the most intense period of mass killing against a single national Jewish community during the Holocaust.

In 1934, when I was about four years old, I started seeing guests I did not recognize in our home. They were neither relatives nor friends. Most stayed a few days, some a few weeks—only to disappear mysteriously and be replaced by others. A couple of years into this process, in 1936, I was old enough to wonder about the meaning of a conversation I overheard between my mother and my beloved maternal grandmother, Sally Burger, who happened to be visiting. “These German Jews who enjoy your hospitality as they seek a safe haven in England, Canada, Israel, or the United States may be seeing the handwriting on the wall. Don’t you think you and your little family should do the same?” My mother was quite upset as she answered, “This is the Republic of Czechoslovakia, our utopia—nothing bad could happen to us here, in this perfect democracy! The German economy is very bad, and Jews are used as scapegoats.” This view had been shared by the majority of German Jews who had learned to love their country and were reluctant to abandon the cultured lifestyle they had carved out for themselves through the generations, reiterating: “What, the nation of Beethoven, Mozart and Goethe, murderers? Never. If we just endure one more indignity, it will all blow over.”

Well, what grandma intuited did happen in our wonderful utopia, soon after the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia on March 15, 1939. Needless to say, as we fled for our lives and tried to warn our Hungarian brothers and sisters, they said—with just as much conviction as my mother did three years before: “In this country, where Jews are among the greatest patriots and members of the aristocracy? Never!” And, of course, they too were wrong! Had we listened to grandma, she and other members of the family may not have been murdered in Auschwitz.

I have often been asked: “Why did the Jews of Europe LET it happen?” A simple question, in retrospect the answer is that while we had some options, we did not want to believe the dangers—and the world stood idly by. When we finally did believe, it was too late. Ultimately the Nuremberg Laws of 1935—race, citizenship, and marriage laws that discriminated against Jews—stripped Jews, all over Europe of their constitutional rights, their dignity, and, eventually, their sense of humanity.

Volumes have been filled with variations on the dehumanization theme. We were stripped of our human dignity by degrees, with a never-ending series of edicts, harassments, and deprivations. Above all, we had become non-citizens, non-human beings—we could no longer vote or fly the flag; we were barred from parks and movie houses. We were no longer under the protection of the law. We could be beaten, spat on, or killed in broad daylight, and the perpetrators could walk away with impunity. In all Central European countries, the pattern was pretty much the same. After we were no longer allowed to practice a profession, run a business, own property, be admitted to universities or public schools, hospitals or parks, we were even required to surrender our winter outerwear.

Then in the summer of 1939, the professional men in my hometown, including my father, were put on wheelbarrow brigades to ferry large rocks across wooden planks connecting sheer cliffs. These laborers endured humiliation and abuse—aside from the obvious danger to life and limb. Work began at 4:00 AM without a lunchbreak, ending at sundown, and they were not even paid for this labor.

In view of the escalating brutality, in mortal fear of their own and their children’s future, friends of ours made a fateful decision. Parents of two boys aged six and twelve, they heard an SS patrol approaching their hideout and had to make an agonizing decision. Knowing that the twelve year old had the survival skills to try to make it on his own, they hid him, while keeping the six year old with them, thereby opting for life for one of their children and death for the other. Is it any wonder that a member of the Danish clergy, Pastor Ivar Lange, declared: “I would rather die with the Jews than live with the Nazis.”

To make sure that Jews could readily be identified and targeted for ridicule and abuse, a yellow felt star, six inches in diameter, was sewn on the left side of the chest of all adults and children. In Hungary, even infants did not escape this badge of shame that had to be pinned to their carriages and strollers. Failure to display the star prominently was a criminal offence punishable by penalties ranging from fines to sentences of death, depending on judicial whim.

My parents and I were subjected to dehumanization and persecution in many settings between 1939–1945. As a person saved by Raoul Wallenberg, I can emphasize the staggering contrast between a man like Wallenberg and the predominant majority of people in Nazi-dominated countries.

The process of dehumanization began with incredible manifestations and grew like a malignancy toward the ultimate goal of murder. The jovial barber refused to cut my father's hair. My third-grade classmates started to call me names. Family friends reduced the amount of contact, and, finally, appealed to my parents' sense of fairness to let them go completely, so they would not be troubled for associating with Jews.

Then came the curfew from sunset to sunrise. All the while, I heard and watched my father get up and go downstairs with a pail of water and a brush before dawn each day to scrub the scurrilous propaganda off his office sign, so that his remaining patients would not be affronted by that obscene graffiti. Soon he was forbidden to practice medicine and drafted into forced labor.

How prophetic were my hysterical screams of fear when I heard the Nazi troops in the town square on March 15, as I lay in bed recovering from a severe cold. "They're going to kill us!" I cried, and that was exactly what they had in mind, but in slow, painful stages.

In the fall of 1939, I remember being delegated to take a goose to the Shochet (a man in the Jewish community who is authorized to kill animals) for ritual slaughtering (a ceremony strictly forbidden by the authorities) when we still managed to have meat for the holidays, on the theory that no one would suspect a nine-year-old girl of such nefarious activity. Their reasoning was flawless, but even after all these years, I still shudder recalling the fear each time the bird stirred inside the bag and imagining a whole squadron of police descending on me, should it decide to squawk.

One might well ask: "Where did all this cruelty come from in a former ideal democracy?" I guess, I must agree with Voltaire that given a few rabble rousers, the rabble soon surfaces everywhere.

Throughout the fall of 1939, I remember my parents' frequent mysterious late night trips into Prague to meet with high officials who were afraid to associate with their now disgraced Jewish citizens by daylight. Whatever my parents sought, they were only partially successful. They did obtain permission to ship part of their belongings to storage in the United States. When survival was at stake, efforts to immigrate to the United States failed because of a technicality. The authorities refused to grant us a passport, and my father, a law-abiding citizen, would not leave the country illegally. Imagine that: a law-abiding citizen who has paid his taxes and honored his country, a man who would do nothing illegally, being refused a passport, being harassed, forbidden to practice his profession, and then forced to perform hard labor!

Thus, the last door to freedom was shut tight, and we became hostages. Homeless and virtually penniless, my parents admitted defeat. Shortly thereafter, in late 1939, we became seasoned escapees. With the exception of a few months spent in relative safety with my grandparents, as well as with my Uncles Zoltan and Denes in 1940 and 1941, for the next three and a half years, we huddled in more attics, cellars, and behind more false walls than we could have imagined. We managed, somehow, to keep ourselves one step ahead of the Nazis and their collaborators who were always ready, willing, and able to do the Nazis' dirty work by delivering three more Jews for bondage and destruction.

In the Spring of 1941, we left Hungary for a hiding place in Losonc (Czech name: Lučenec) in Slovakia, the area of the former Czechoslovakia with a large Hungarian-speaking minority. For a few months, in the daytime, the three of us occupied a tiny, windowless space like a walk-in closet in a summer cottage. At night, it became safe for me to sleep in an adjacent closet. Separated from my parents—if only by a thin wall—created tremendous anxiety, so much so that I would knock lightly on the wall at various times throughout the night, listening for the reassuring knock on the other side of the wall before I could fall asleep again. We had minimal contact with our rescuer, a "closet Social Democrat," my father's former colleague.

In the fall of 1941, when our rescuer began to feel at risk, we had to find another place—this time in a village east of Losonc, where our accommodations were even more claustrophobic. We hid behind a false wall and our diet was much more sparse. However, we were immensely grateful for the farmer's kindness and generosity that afforded us an opportunity to survive a bit longer. He, however, was reluctant to continue putting his family in harm's way. Consequently, we were on our way again in a matter of weeks, passed on from one member of a rescuer network to another. We were truly becoming "wandering Jews," spending the spring and summer of 1942 in a hideout in the densely wooded Tatra Mountains of Slovakia. With the threat of a cold winter coming, our next destination was the small town of Banská Bystrica where we were living in one rescuer's attic from December 1942 and another's cellar from late April until our capture in November 1943.

Having been denounced in our last hiding place in Banská Bystrica, Slovakia, in November of 1943, we were visited by four members of the Jewish property confiscation team. The group consisted of one member of the SS, one representative of the Slovak Secret Police, one local collaborator (probably the one who had given us away) and one member of the Jewish community, a young attorney forced to join the unholy trio to draw up papers, making this confiscation legal. We wondered why on earth they had bothered. There was nothing worth confiscating.

Within a few weeks after this visit, after the SS kidnapping of Jewish women between the ages of 18–25, both single and married, for the use of the German troops at the front, the Jewish community of Banská Bystrica was included on the Auschwitz deportation list. We knew that, as aliens, we would be part of the first transport. The situation looked truly hopeless until my mother found out that there was an underground group, akin to the underground railroad for slaves, consisting of some families whose farm properties spanned the Slovak-Hungarian border. Occasionally, members of these families were willing to guide escapees across to Hungary. Although it was common knowledge that almost the entire population of Hungary had already been deported in May and June 1944, there was still one notable exception: the Jewish Community of Budapest. Why? Because the War Refugee Board, the International Red Cross, the Vatican and the Swedish government intervened to stop the deportations of the Budapest Jews. While this last intact Jewish community in Europe was subject to the same edicts and harassment as the rest had been before deportation, they were still on home ground and ALIVE. As a result, getting to Budapest gave those capable of it a ray of hope for survival. We survived one day, one hour, at a time.

Understandably, there was great demand for the services of this underground group. My mother had many doors slammed in her face before she was able to make contact. We were instructed to remove the yellow stars, to be careful not to leave any tell-tale yellow threads behind, to get on a local train without any luggage, and try to look inconspicuous in the hopes of not being asked for identification papers. When we got off the train, we were to follow, at a respectable distance, a tall young man at the end of the platform.

We lucked out: the train trip went off without a hitch. The young man led us to a cottage in the woods consisting of one large room that held three generations of his family and some small farm animals. As we approached, he propped a long ladder against the attic window, motioning us to climb in through the partially opened window. Just before we did so, he whispered: “Please be quiet; my mother-in-law is a Nazi sympathizer. If she knew you were here, you would not be here very long.”

Obviously, we followed his admonition to the letter. We did get a bit stressed out when we realized that we were sharing the attic with the farmer’s rats. I remember removing my head scarf and tying it round my father’s balding head to keep him from being attacked by those creatures. The next night, when the family was asleep, the young farmer propped the ladder against the window, signaling to us that it was time to go. We had heard rain on the roof all day, but we had no idea of its torrential proportions. By the time we reached the bottom of the ladder, we were soaked to the skin. Then the trek began. The young farmer led us into the darkness of a nightmarish November night. The downpour drenched our bodies, and the mud made walking difficult and painful. With each step, we sank ankle-deep into the mud. We literally had to extract each foot from the mud and shake off the excess before taking another step. That labor-intensive process kept us focused on getting ahead one step at a time. Our guide, however, noticed an unaccustomed flicker of light at a distance. Quite logically, he feared we might be apprehended because of a change in the usual guard, and he certainly did not want to be caught with us. His spontaneous decision was to turn on his heels and head home without a word, leaving us to our own devices in the pitch-dark forest in the pouring rain.

I can still remember the crippling exhaustion that overtook me, along with an eerie sense of relief that the journey was over. In my almost thirteen year old mind, I could only picture how wonderful it would be to slump down against one of those giant trees and go to sleep—the rationale being that I may just wake from this nightmare safe and sound. Then, of course, if the experience was real, not waking up may not have been the worst solution. I said so to my mother, but she was not impressed. Giving up my fantasy, I watched in utter amazement as she broke away from us, pursuing our guide at an incredible pace. “You have children of your own,” she cried out, “Are you going to let this one die?” Miraculously, she won.

He motioned to us to follow him to the border. The next night, we made it across the Hungarian border and boarded a train for Budapest where Jews, while harassed, still lived in relative safety. This successful escape bought us two more months, into January 1944, a miracle we could, at the time, appreciate more than the native Jewish population. As alien Jews, we had to appear for daily roll call at a police station. Aware of our poverty and special vulnerability, members of the Jewish community, particularly those fortunate enough to still be in their own homes, tried to help us out with frequent dinner invitations. We were especially befriended by one family. They had two young daughters, and our mothers had become close friends. One Friday evening when we were unable to let them know we would be late for a Sabbath eve dinner because of some extra police harassment, the hostess was quite perturbed, bemoaning the fact that her excellent meal had grown stale. We tried to reassure her that it was still delicious, but she seemed inconsolable. When our reprieve, and theirs, was over, we lost contact with the family. At a random post-war meeting my mother found out that our fate was ultimately much more merciful than theirs. They had been deported to Auschwitz, with only the mother and one daughter surviving. Most poignantly, as soon as mother's friend saw her, she threw her arms about her and exclaimed: "Oh, Margit, Margit! Now I know why cold potatoes don't matter!"

SHIRLEY BERGER GOTTESMAN

Shirley Berger Gottesman's memoir of Kanada II in Auschwitz, and various other slave labor camps in Germany, is an astonishing testimony that both horrifies and inspires. Originally from Záluž, in Transcarpathian Poland/Ukraine, she lived with her parents and four siblings in a community that included her extended family, grandmother, aunts, and uncles. In April 1944 the family was deported to a ghetto in nearby Munkács, and a short time later they were sent to Auschwitz. Shirley, then sixteen, was assigned to Kanada II, given a uniform (the red polka-dotted dress), and told to sort the possessions brought from the cattle cars. Her barrack was only ten feet away from Crematorium IV. In her memoir (named for the red polka-dotted dress she wore), she describes the horror of what she both lived through and witnessed on a daily basis.

In the morning the Kapos (prisoners in charge of a group of inmates) took us to the big camp in Birkenau where Lagers A, B, and C were located. . . . They directed us to a barrack full of bunk beds.

Each morning we had to awake early and go outside for Appell (roll call) for a few hours, during which time we were counted. After Appell, they gave us food or something to drink. The food was unbelievably disgusting. We had one bowl for coffee and soup. We had no spoon; therefore we had to drink everything. We always had to share with the women in our row.

Because I had just arrived, I could not grasp what was happening. I was not even hungry. I was in shock.

At Appell we had to stand in alphabetical order. They counted us off—there were so many of us! They wrote down names: our parents' names and our names. They gave us numbers with the Star of David insignia. My number was A5812. They painted a red line on the back of our grey dresses with enamel paint, so it would not come off. They were very professional and efficient.

The Aryans had green triangles; they worked in the offices. There were other colors as well. Some Russians wore red triangles because they were Communists, political prisoners.

I was assigned to the Effektenlager II (camp of belongings), called Kanada II Kommando (work group). It was called Kanada because many considered Canada a wealthy country and a desired emigration destination.

They took us to Kanada II, or Section BIIg, where the thirty barracks for workers assigned to Kanada II were located—between Crematoria III and IV. . . . At first, they took us every day from the Birkenau women's camp to Kanada II—back and forth. Then they emptied two barracks for Kanada II women, so we did not have to go back and forth to the camp. My barrack was ten feet away from Crematorium IV that had a disrobing area, a large gas chamber, and crematorium ovens. Across the street were barracks for "Aryans," for SS and office workers.

Each barrack had a Kapo, a foreman (Führerarbeiter), and a few helpers. The Kapos watched over us all; the SS over everything. The Kapos were on good terms with the Germans—not a friendship, certainly; however, they would schmooze around a lot of the time. I remember an Austrian from Vienna, an elderly gentleman, an office worker. He was sitting on a windowsill across from our barracks, playing a song on his harmonica: "Vienna. Vienna. You alone, You will always be in my dreams." I suppose he was homesick for Vienna. I was homesick and lonely. I wanted my mother and aunts.

There were fifteen barracks in the compound. These were for different commodities that we were sorting as well as for the bathhouse and the mechanics and carpenters. Shoes, dishes, and pans were sorted outside in huge piles.

We could go to Barracks 5, 6, 7; that is, we could go where we worked and to the bathhouse. We could go to these as we pleased. If we had to go farther, however, we had to have guards with us.

Very few people in comparison to the numbers in the camp worked in Kanada. There were a lot of Slovaks who had been there a long time. They spoke perfect German because Slovakia was so close to the border. Jewish people tended to learn a number of languages. I remember we were with people from Poland. I spoke Yiddish and Czech, so I learned Polish quickly. The women I worked with were older: I remember Guta, Genya, and Mikla; we worked in groups. I was like a child to them because I was younger.

One had had a child. At the selection, she was told, "Give the girl to her grandfather. That will be easier. You will work and her grandfather will take care of her."

Both the child and her grandfather were murdered.

We talked about our past and our future hopes. We tried to make the best of our present. Of the future we were frightened, at times.

We were lucky in that we could have showers there. Thousands in Auschwitz-Birkenau did not have that chance; instead, they were murdered in the so-called showers. We also could have all the clean clothes that we wanted. At first we wore grey dresses. However, they decided that they wanted to know who was who. Therefore, each barrack was assigned a different colored dress: the women in my barrack wore red dresses with white polka dots; another barrack had blue dresses with the white polka dots. To me this seemed incongruous—bizarre! To be wearing cheerily colored uniforms, and ten feet away people were being gassed and burned. They still painted the red stripe on the back of our dresses.

In early June 1944, I began working in Kanada II. From the cattle cars everything was brought to Kanada I or II. We were isolated in our section of Kanada, sorting. I saw only what happened near my section. I worked sorting what people had brought in. I sorted these into different piles. Then the trucks came and hauled the bundles away.

When I went to the barracks to work, I looked at what was happening in Crematoria III and IV. Long lines went into the building but never came out. Girls who had already been there for years told us, the more recent arrivals, that everybody not selected for work was gassed and burned.

They said, "It is only a matter of time; we will all go there."

When later I found my two aunts, Helen and Pepe, still alive in the camp, they said to me: "Imagine, the Blockova (Polish barrack leader), said, 'You will never see your parents again.' Imagine how mean she is."

I said, "No. She is correct. Look over there."

Helen said, "No!"

I said, "Yes. Believe it."

Two crematoria were on one side; two on the other side. When we went to work, we had to go between the crematoria. We could see inside. Near the crematoria the grass was nicely kept—green. I saw chimneys. The fumes were terrible, especially in the summer. The odor of burning flesh! Years after, when I smelled burning, I would scream. For example, when my husband was burning trash.

Once I saw a bunch of men with black faces marching from the crematoria; they looked like chimney sweeps. As they marched past me, I offered one a hankie. We could say a word or two, always we mentioned the town where we were from. If the Kapos saw us talking longer, we were beaten. These men, I learned, were the Sonderkommandos, who emptied the gas chambers, pulled the gold teeth of the victims and cut their hair; they also searched the bodies for valuables that they may have hidden. Then they burnt the bodies in the ovens, and when the bodies were consumed by the flames, they removed the ashes. They said that the Sonderkommando who worked inside prayed. I also heard that every three months, they changed the Sonderkommandos. The work was very hard on them; they rapidly deteriorated. Then the older ones were themselves put in the gas chambers. They selected new strong Sonderkommandos from incoming groups.

Daily and nightly I saw lines and lines, ten or fifteen feet away, all marching in a line. They motioned to us. We couldn't tell them. We motioned back, rubbing our cheeks—we meant by this to wash or to shower. . . .

I never saw anyone I knew in line for the gas chambers and crematorium. Our group had come in one transport. When I went home, people my age, as well as those younger and older, had not come back. Only a dozen or so returned. . . .

The people were usually quiet, walking slowly; rarely did they talk—they were too exhausted. The people had usually traveled for days. They didn't resist. They had been made to give up life before they were even in the gas chambers. The whole set up, traveling for days and everything! They were debilitated and despondent.

The transports usually arrived at night. People didn't know where they were going or where they had arrived. The SS sent them through quickly. Once they were inside the building we didn't hear anything. I heard that they prayed. . . .

It was unbelievable. No one could have imagined that they would do to people what they did. They were so systematic and so organized. Everything was planned to the T. Scientists must have worked on the plan. It was so unbelievable. I can't even conceive of what they did. Impossible! We were ready for work. We were even ready not to have enough food.

We were not ready to be gassed. It is unbelievable to think that some of us could live through this and not lose our sanity.

I. BETTY GREBENSCHIKOFF

Context: Before the War

Like many Jewish children who witnessed firsthand the German antisemitic pogrom of November 9–10, 1938—the so-called Reich Kristallnacht—Ilse Kohn (Betty Grebenschikoff) was horrified by the violence that was brought against the Jewish community. In one sense, however, this was, as she writes, a “culmination” of the Nazi measures since 1933. Betty’s account relates how it was that her father sought ways to secure safety for her and her sister Edith, in particular by finding a means to send them to Palestine. When this did not eventuate due to their mother’s refusal to part with them, another attempt was made to relocate the whole family to some Latin American country, but this, too, fell through. Finally, after these false starts, the family secured passage on a Japanese ship for Shanghai, there to start a new life that would see them escape Germany just four months before the outbreak of war.

Smoldering anti-semitism in Central Europe finally burst into full bloom, with the encouragement and active participation of the Hitler regime. Restrictions and penalties levied at Jews, so-called Aryanization of Jewish businesses and enterprises in Germany became more and more widespread, culminating with what came to be known as Crystal Night, in November of 1938. Hundreds of Jewish stores, homes and synagogues were destroyed by the Nazis while the police looked the other way. In many cases, the authorities helped in the destruction, as well as taking part in beatings and abuse of Jewish people, who had the misfortune of being out on the streets that night.

Every pane of glass in our synagogue on Levetzstrasse was shattered. We used to go to this temple, with my parents, on the High Holidays and for Friday evening Shabbat services.

After the Kiddush was sung by the Cantor and the congregation, the children were always invited by the Rabbi to gather on the Bimah, where little glasses of grape juice were poured for us. We all stood in a row, drinking our wine, then we went back to sit with our parents, as the service continued.

The building was gutted, the prayer books and torahs with their embroidered velvet covers set on fire. The police, aided by mobs of hooligans, forced Jewish men and women to clean up the debris in the street on their hands and knees. Several weeks later on the way to my grandparents’ house, we walked by some of the looted Jewish shops and synagogues. We could still hear glass crunching beneath our feet.

Old, confident beliefs of security and safety in the civilized world of German life and culture were shattered along with the glass that night. That security proved to be just an illusion, was difficult for German Jews to comprehend at first. But the time had come to face reality. Nothing would ever be the same again.

Beginning on a small scale in 1933, Hitler’s regime of terror escalated over the next few years. The assimilation of the Jews into German sciences, their contributions to musical, educational and cultural pursuits ended in arrests, persecution and death.

By the late thirties, my parents were desperately looking for ways to escape from Germany. Besides trying to get the family to safety, my father also tried to avoid the expected summons by the Gestapo. They were rounding up Jewish males for what was euphemistically known as “Questioning.” Frequently these sessions were followed by imprisonment.

“Well children, aren’t we lucky? We are all getting new middle names.” My father was still trying to appear optimistic, while at the same time my mother was in tears.

In the summer of 1938, another edict had been handed down by the Germans. It was the addition of the name Sara for Jewish females, and Israel, for Jewish males, to be used as legal middle names. All our papers had to be changed to the new names at the police station, to better identify us officially as Jews.

At the age of eight, the significance of this latest intentional degradation escaped me at the time.

I was fast becoming confused by all my names anyhow. My middle name of Margot was dropped for the time being. From my great-grandmother Bettina, I had inherited a third name, Betty. That name disappeared altogether for several years, until I resurrected it later, when I was about sixteen.

According to the Germans, from now on I was officially Ilse Sara Kohn. My last two school report cards were made out in this name. My teachers signed them, including their new middle names. However, my father ignored the whole business and sent my report cards back to school, using his original Max Kohn signature.

Emigrating to the United States or other desirable countries was difficult for us, as we did not have necessary quota numbers or visas. Born in Czechoslovakia, my father carried a Fremdenpass, which was an identity certificate for people without a proper passport. This Fremdenpass had to be renewed punctually by the German police. For reasons known only to themselves, the Germans did not choose stateless Jews for the concentration camps, when they first started with their selections. Later, no more exceptions were made.

Living in Berlin since he was a young man, my father fought for the Germans in the First World War. He never held a German passport and did not qualify for German quota numbers for immigration to the U.S.A. Not having a proper passport, he was also denied entry into many other countries. Beside all these problems, the fact remained that we did not have any relatives outside of Germany who could sponsor us anyway.

Jewish leaders urged their people to leave the country as soon as possible, or at least to send their children out of Germany. My sister and I were put on the list of Aliyah children who were being sent out to Palestine.

These children became part of the early kibbutzim settlers of what later became the State of Israel. My cousin Heinz Kohn whose Bar-Mitzvah I attended two years earlier, went to Palestine on one of these transports. As it turned out later, he was the only member of his family to survive the war. He told me his story some five decades later, when we re-established contact with each other.

Heinz became a volunteer soldier in the British Army in Palestine when he was eighteen years old. He was to spend nearly five years in the army, serving in Egypt and Libya and was present at the Allied invasion in Salerno, Italy. During that time, his mother Rosa, who was my maternal grandfather's sister, her husband Karl and a sister Lizzy were sent to Theresienstadt by the Germans. They did not survive. Heinz, whose Hebrew name is Seew, now lives in Israel with his wife Deborah, surrounded by their children and grandchildren.

Edith and I were all excited about leaving for Palestine. We belonged to a Theodore Herzl Club in Berlin, where we learned to sing Hebrew pioneer songs. We had heard all about kibbutz life in sunny Palestine, where everyone lived and worked together, marching off into the fields to pick oranges, wearing little sunhats and waving blue and white flags. At least that was the way it looked in picture books. It sounded good to us, we could not wait to pack our bags. But my mother did not want to split the family up. At last, after much agonizing, she refused to let us go, afraid that she would never see us again. Her instinct was of course quite right, but we were rather disappointed that we were not going to be pioneers after all.

For a while it looked as though my father might be successful in getting us all out to South America. Spanish lessons by a tutor started at home. The one phrase we all remembered was "Vaya con Dios, señor, pero vaya." In later years this became a family joke. One of us would whisper it to the other, when a guest overstayed his welcome. "Go with God, Sir, but go."

The South American venture fell through and the Spanish tutor was quickly replaced by an English speaking one, just in case we could go somewhere where English was needed.

I remember waking up one night, that spring, when my Onkel Ernst came to say goodbye to us. His white scarf contrasted against his navy blue coat, as he stood in the dark corridor embracing my mother. Carrying only a small suitcase, and a summons from the Gestapo tucked in his pocket, he fled to Prague, where he had arranged to meet his fiancée, Martel. After a quick marriage ceremony, they went across to England, where they made a living hiring themselves out as a butler and maid team.

When the war was over they settled in Nottingham. My uncle, by then known as an anglicized Ernest Miller, went into the insurance business, Aunt Martel operated a boarding house for many years.

Our family made several trips to the Berlin train station to say good-bye to friends and relatives. There was a distant cousin whose name was Ilse, just like mine. She was from the Koeppler family and was being sent out to England along with a group of Jewish children. Her navy beret jammed over her straight brown hair, she waved to us out of the train window, until we could not see her anymore. She survived the war, living with an English family, who later adopted her. Her sister, Marianne, was a nurse and was not allowed to leave by the authorities. The Germans used her to work in their hospitals during the early part of the war. Later she was sent to her death in a concentration camp, along with her parents.

As more and more countries refused entry to us, it finally became clear to my parents, that the one place left for us to save our lives was China. Many thousands of miles away, accessible only by a long sea voyage, it was a totally different country whose climate, oriental environment and questionable political and economic outlook, not to mention the language problem, was largely unknown to us. Shanghai was, however, the one spot where European Jews were permitted to land without a visa, affidavit or certificate of guarantee, considered so necessary by other countries.

The Japanese shipping company, Nippon Yusen Kaisha, whose ships sailed to the Orient, gave my father a negative reply, when he tried to buy tickets for a sailing to Shanghai. They were booked for months ahead. However, when my father returned again and pleaded with them to re-examine his papers, which incidentally contained 500 German marks for the shipping officer folded inside, the reply was more hopeful.

A few days later, my father received a telephone call with the good news. Two first class cabins were reserved for us on the Kashima Maru, sailing from Naples to Shanghai, on May 21, 1939.

Bergen-Belsen was perhaps the supreme example of the chaos, overcrowding, and general horror that struck all the Nazi concentration camps, and the image of the camp at the time of its liberation by the British in April 1945 has left just as indelible an image of the Nazi system on the Western mind as Auschwitz has in its. Born in the Polish city of Będzin, Jadzia Greenbaum survived a series of labor camps and a death march before arriving at Belsen. Even at that time, she was barely alive, and then she contracted typhus, as well. The account here describes her recollections of that awful time in Belsen, and the liberation of the camp by the British that saved her life.

From Flossenbürg, they took us on a cattle train. We were on this train for one week with little food. They gave us black, clay-like bread and told us to save it for a few days. There was no water unless it rained. Then we would stick our hands out and get a little rainwater. There was only a bucket for a toilet. But who needed to go! We didn't eat. We didn't have water except for a little rainwater.

While we were traveling, we thought that they were taking us north. But then they took us south. Then the train stopped and we stayed a half-day on the tracks not moving. After this they brought us to Bergen-Belsen. By this time there were a lot of dead people on our train.

When we stopped we saw a little gully with big frogs in the water. The water was clear so we ran over and drank the water in that gully. What did we care about being sick! We needed water.

One German soldier said to us, "You are going to a paradise, to Hotel Paradise." We could not believe him. An older German soldier passing by said, "Kinder, you won't get out from here." . . .

Then they began to march us into the camp. At the entrance to Bergen-Belsen we saw little bungalows with little ribboned curtains on the windows and flower gardens around the bungalows. Initially we thought these were for us. (Actually, the SS lived in them.) However, once past the bungalows, we started to see barracks, then we saw dead bodies, and we saw skeletal people barely walking—musselman. As we were walking down the road, we saw a wheeled wagon that people were pushing. The wagon was loaded with dead bodies. We started to smell something dreadful. We could not understand what the smell was. Then we realized that dead people were piled up behind the barracks and the bodies were being burned. We let that wagon through and then we saw the barrack-section where we would be staying.

I saw that Bergen-Belsen had two main sections with a road running through the middle; one section on one side of the road and the other section on the other side. They took us into one section where we saw a huge tent and a big barrack. There were three rooms in this long barrack. In the first room were non-Jewish Polish women from the Warsaw Uprising (not the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in which Jewish Poles fought). In the second room, more Polish women. In the third we went in to take a look and dead people were lying there. We looked in the tent—dead people there too. Next they took the dead bodies from the third room, putting these in the big tent. We were given the third room.

We went into the big room. Then we looked down at the cement floor. The floor seemed to be writhing. We looked closer and saw white crawling things—maggots from the dead bodies that had been in the room or big lice from their bodies. We wanted to leave immediately. The guard said, "No one leaves." We started to stamp on the maggots or lice. They told us to sit down on the floor. There was only one straw bed; this Mitzi and her two sisters took.

Next day when we woke up we were covered in lice. Mitzi came out and she and both sisters were also full of lice. She said, "Don't be shy." Each one took the back of the other girl.

“Lice each other.” She said, “You are full of lice. This is how you kill them.” Then she showed us to how to crush them with our nails. From then until the end of the war, I had lice. A lot of girls became ill from typhus that the lice carried. But I didn’t have typhus then.

We had no water not even to drink, and no toilet. Sometimes we needed to use the toilet. We had to go outside to an open pit that had a few seats. Running water was on the other side to clean away the waste. I went over one time.

Because we were so crowded the non-Jewish Polish women figured they could take a few Jewish women in their barracks. They took in forty of us. I was one. That was a little, teeny bit better. At least I was not on cement but on plywood on top of cement. But I still had the lice. Polish women had lice too. The whole place was full of lice.

Behind us was a road and barbed wire. On one side they were burning the dead. On the other side were foreigners, civilians—English, American, South American, and Chinese, wearing their own belongings—dressed nicely. The Germans had taken them as hostages, I suppose.

One night the Polish priest, a prisoner, came into the Polish barrack. He told them to pray. He said, “The war will soon be over.” I said, “We’re Jewish.” He said to us, “You pray in your way. We’ll pray in ours.” So we prayed. . . .

Suddenly we heard little tanks approaching and stopping. We ran to the wires, screaming, and sticking our hands out the wire. We ran so hard that the dust from the ground came up in clouds. We saw a star on the tanks. I thought, “O my God! We’re liberated.” Then the tank turned around and went away. We were so disappointed that some girls began to cry and sob.

Later that day a jeep with four speakers drove in, broadcasting in many languages. “The war is not over, but you are liberated. However, we cannot open the gate and let you out because of the typhus in the camp. We still have to fight the Germans; we cannot let our soldiers become ill with typhus. We are bringing you food.” We never got this food for two or three days. . . .

At last we knew we had been liberated. No one was on the watchtowers anymore. The Germans had run away before the British had arrived. The Germans had told the Hungarian POWs to watch us. Some girls got out and went over the ditches and the Hungarian guards shot them just before the end. Two girls tried to escape and one was shot. This was heartbreaking!

When the Germans left they had taken the foreign citizens with them, they left only the sick foreigners and a lot of clothing. We didn’t have clothing, just rags. We went over, opened the wire between the barracks, and took some clothing. I took myself a fur coat. At least I was warm. But I was still hungry!

When we came back, the English started to give us food. We sent girls to the kitchen with a clean garbage can and they brought us back the food. At first they fed us a hearty soup with big pieces of meat and fat. They meant well, but this was not good for people who had not eaten for days and who were not used to a rich diet. People became very sick and some died.

MIRIAM YONISH GREENMAN

Escaping to the forest was a tactic adopted by many Jews when the opportunity (and inclination) was present, though all too often the forest was a false haven. Overall, it has been estimated that only around 10% of all those who adopted this strategy survived World War II. Most of those who found themselves in the partisan unit commanded by Tuvia Bielski and his brothers, however, did manage to survive. Miriam Yonish Greenman and her mother were among them. Miriam’s account, part of which is reproduced here, outlines her experiences with the Bielski otriad (unit), and shows how the opportunities for survival were enhanced as a result of membership in this unique Jewish self-defense formation. The efforts of the Bielskis and those who found their way into their forest stronghold were life-saving and life-affirming, providing hope in an environment of hopelessness.

A few months after the May 1943 Aktion, my mother decided that we should escape to the forest to join the Bielski partisans. My stepfather did not want to go, he said that he felt safe working in the hot houses. He joined us later. My mother told him that she had to save her child. She dressed me in an outfit on which she had sewn special buttons; these buttons were gold coins, covered with cloth.

So many people left the Lida Ghetto for the partisans that when the area-commissar saw that the ghetto was being diminished, he instituted measures in order to stop people fleeing the ghetto. He issued a command to the Judenrat that the ghetto was to be fenced in with a three layered high barbed-wire fence. . . .

Despite the fence . . . the young partisan emissaries from the Bielski partisans continued to come to the Lida Ghetto. They gathered our group together. We took off the Jewish stars, and in broad daylight, we walked out of the ghetto. We walked a few days to reach the forests. On the way, we slept in Polish villages. The men guarded us with rifles. We were as much afraid of the other partisans as we were of the Germans. Some of them would kill Jews and take any money or weapons that they had. We finally reached the Bielski Otriad sometime in the summer of 1943.

When I first saw Tuvia Bielski, he had a lot of people gathered around him. Sitting on a white horse, he greeted us—mother and me and the other refugees. He greeted us with so much love. I adored him. He told us, “I don’t know who will survive because we are always chased by Germans. I do promise you that no one will shoot you in the back.” I couldn’t have imagined that I would ever see this legend—this tall, handsome soldier.

Tuvia could feel when morale was low in the camp. He would gather us together and speak to us. He had this knack, this power, to convince us that we would survive. He told us that we had been left to die, but that we had the right to live. He gave us hope. After he spoke, we felt that we would be safe. I’m sorry that I lost touch with him. In Israel they didn’t acknowledge his heroism.
