Here lies Anne Mann; she lived an Old maid and died an old Mann.
—Bath Abbey.

I conceive disgust at these impertinent and misbecoming familiarities inscribed upon your ordinary tombstone.
—Charles Lamb.

Nobles and heralds, by your leave,
Here lies what once was Matthew Prior,
The son of Adam and of Eve:
Can Bourbon or Nassau claim higher?
—Prior.

These are two friends whose lives were undivided;
So let their memory be, now they have glided
Under the grave; let not their bones be parted,
For their two hearts in life were single-hearted.
—Shelley.

To this sad shrine, whoe'er thou art! draw near,
Here lies the friend most lov'd, the son
most dear:
Who ne'er knew joy but friendship might divide,
Or gave his father grief but when he died.
—Pope.

By foreign hands thy dying eyes were closed,
By foreign hands thy decent limbs composed,
By foreign hands thy humble grave adorned,
By strangers honored, and by strangers mourned.
—Pope.

Beneath these green trees rising to the skies,
The planter of them, Isaac Greentrees, lies;
The time shall come when these green trees shall fall.
And Isaac Greentrees rise above them all.
—Epitaph at Harrow, England.

After your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you lived.—Shakespeare.

The turf has drank a Widow's tear;
Three of her husbands
Slumber here.
—Epitaph at Staffordshire.

Traveller, let your step be light,
So that sleep these eyes may close,
For poor Scarron, till to-night,
Ne'er was able e'en to doze.
—Scarron, Epitaph written by himself.

Johnny Carnegie lies here
Descendit of Adam and Eve,
Gif only can gang hieher,
I'se willing give him leve.
—Epitaph in an old Scottish Churchyard.

Emigravit, is the inscription on the tombstone where he lies;
Dead he is not, but departed,—for the artist never dies.
—Longfellow, Nuremberg.

The hand of him here torpid lies,
That drew th' essential form of grace,
Here closed in death th' attentive eyes
That saw the manners in the face.
—Sam'l Johnson, Epitaph for Hogarth.

Here lies Nolly Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, and talked like poor Poll.
—David Garrick.

If e'er she knew an evil thought
She spoke no evil word:
Peace to the gentle! She hath sought
The bosom of her Lord.
—Ebenezer Elliot.

Thou third great Canning, stand among our best
And noblest, now thy long day's work hath ceased,
Here silent in our minster of the West
Who wert the voice of England in the East.
—Tennyson, Epitaph on Lord Stratford.

Here she lies a pretty bud,
Lately made of flesh and blood;
Who, as soon fell fast asleep,
As her little eyes did peep.
Give her strewings, but not stir
The earth, that lightly covers her.
—Herrick.

Ere sin could blight or sorrow fade,
Death came with friendly care;
The opening bud to Heaven conveyed,
And bade it blossom there.
—Coleridge, Epitaph on an Infant.

Here lie the remains of James Pady, Brickmaker, in hope that his clay will be remoulded in a workmanlike manner, far superior to his former perishable materials.—Epitaph from Addiscombe Churchyard, England.

Underneath this stone doth lie
As much beauty as could die;
Which in life did harbor give
To more virtue than doth live.
If at all she had a fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.

—Ben Jonson.

Man's life is like unto a winter's day,
Some break their fast and so depart away,
Others stay dinner then depart full fed;
The longest age but sups and goes to bed.
Oh, reader, then behold and see,
As we are now so must you be.

—Bishop Henshaw.

Underneath this crust
Lies the mouldering dust

Of Eleanor Batchelor Shoven,
Well versed in the arts

Of pies, custards and tarts,
And the lucrative trade of the oven.

When she lived long enough,
She made her last puff,

A puff by her husband much praised.
And now she doth lie

And make a dirt pie,

In hopes that her crust may be raised.

—Epitaph on a Yorkshire Cook, England.

And here the precious dust is laid;
Whose purely temper'd clay was made
So fine that it the guest betray'd.
Else the soule grew so fast within,
It broke the outward shell of sinne
And so was hatch'd a cherubin.

—Thos. Carew.

From his cradle

He was a scholar, and a ripe, and good one;
Exceeding wise, fair spoken, and persuading;

Lofty and sour to them that lov'd him not,
But to those men that sought him, sweet as summer:

And to add greater honors to his age
Than man could give, he died fearing God.

—Shakespeare.

I came at morn—'twas spring, I smiled,

The fields with green were clad;

I walked abroad at noon,—and lol

'Twas summer,—I was glad;

I sate me down; 'twas autumn eve,

And I with sadness wept;

I laid me down at night; and then

'Twas winter,—and I slept.

—Mary Pyper.

The body of Benjamin Franklin, Printer (like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out and stript of its lettering and gilding), lies here, food for worms; but the work shall not be lost, for it will (as he believed) appear once more in a new and more elegant edition, revised and corrected by the author.—Benjamin Franklin.

Full many a life he saved

With his undaunted crew;

He put his trust in Providence,

And cared not how it blew.

—Epitaph in Deal Churchyard, England.

Here rests his head, upon the lap of earth,
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown;
Fair Science frown'd not on his humble birth,

And Melancholy mark'd him for her own.

Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere;

Heav'n did a recompense as largely send:

He gave to Mis'ry (all he had) a tear.

He gain'd from Heav'n ('twas all he wish'd)

a friend,

No farther seek his merits to disclose,

Or draw his frailties from their dread

abode;

There they alike in trembling hope repose,

The bosom of his Father and his God.

—Gray.

Equality

Mortals are equal; their mask differs.—Voltaire.

We are not all equal, nor can we be so.—Goethe.

Equality is no rule in Love's grammar.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Bliss is the same, in subject or in king.—Pope.

Liberty, equality and fraternity.—The Motto of France.

An equal has no power over an equal.—Law Maxim.

All men are equal before the natural law.—Law Maxim.

The sun shines even on the wicked.—Seneca.

Liberty and equality—lovely and sacred words!—Mazzini.

So let them ease their hearts with prate of equal rights, which man never knew.—Byron.

All men are equal; it is not birth, but virtue alone, that makes the difference.—Voltaire.

All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.—Bible.

Children of wealth or want, to each is given One spot of green, and all the blue of heaven! —O. W. Holmes.

Some must follow, and some command, though all are made of clay!—Longfellow.

Men are made by nature unequal. It is vain, therefore, to treat them as if they were equal.—Froude.

Mean and mighty, rotting
Together, have one dust.
—Shakespeare.

She in beauty, education, blood,
Holds hand with any princess of the world.
—Shakespeare.

Equality of two domestic powers
Breeds scrupulous faction.
—Shakespeare.

Golden lads and girls all must, as chimney-sweepers, come to dust.—Shakespeare.

In the gates of eternity, the black hand and the white hand hold each other with an equal clasp.—Mrs. Stowe.

Man cannot degrade woman without himself falling into degradation; he cannot elevate her without at the same time elevating himself.—Alexander Walker.

It is untrue that equality is a law of nature. Nature has no equality; its sovereign law is subordination and dependence.—Vauvenargues.

The tallest and the smallest among us are so alike diminutive and pitifully base, it is a meanness to calculate the difference.—Thackeray.

Thersites's body is as good as Ajax's when neither are alive.—Shakespeare.

When we leave this world, and are laid in the earth, the prince walks as narrow a path as the day-laborer.—Cervantes.

Spoons and skimmers you can be undistinguishably together; but vases and statues require each a pedestal for itself.—Emerson.

As if the ray which travels from the sun would reach me sooner than the man who blacks my boots.—Thackeray.

The circle of life is cut up into segments. All lines are equal if they are drawn from the centre and touch the circumference.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Sir, your levellers wish to level down as far as themselves; but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves.—Samuel Johnson.

The foolish and vulgar are always accustomed to value equally the good and the bad.—Yriarte.

Kings and their subjects, masters and slaves, find a common level in two places—at the foot of the cross, and in the grave.—Colton.

Who can in reason then or right assume monarchy over such as live by right his equals, if in power or splendour less, in freedom equal?—Milton.

Equality is the share of every one at their advent upon earth, and equality is also theirs when placed beneath it.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Consider man, weigh well thy frame; the king, the beggar, are the same; dust formed us all.—Gay.

The woman's cause is man's. They rise or sink together; dwarfed or god-like, bond or free; if she be small, slight-natured, miserable, how shall men grow?—Tennyson.

There are some races more cultured and advanced and ennobled by education than others; but there are no races nobler than others. All are equally destined for freedom.—Alexander von Humboldt.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.—Thomas Jefferson.

Equality is the life of conversation; and he is as much out who assumes to himself any part above another, as he who considers himself below the rest of the society.—Steele.

My equal he will be again
Down in that cold oblivious gloom,
Where all the prostrate ranks of men
Crowd without fellowship, the tomb.
—J. Montgomery.

Equal nature fashion'd us
All in one mould.
All's but the outward gloss
And politic form that does distinguish us.
—Massinger.

All men are by nature equal, made all of the same earth by one Workman; and however we deceive ourselves, as dear unto God is the poor peasant as the mighty prince.—Plato.

Whatever difference there may appear to be in men's fortunes, there is still a certain compensation of good and ill in all, that makes them equal.—Charron.

Come forward, some great marshal, and organize equality in society, and your rod shall swallow up all the juggling old court gold-sticks.—Thackeray.

For my part, it is not the mystery of the incarnation which I discover in religion, but the mystery of social order, which associates with heaven that idea of equality which prevents the rich from destroying the poor.—Napoleon I.

So far is it from being true that men are naturally equal, that no two people can be half an hour together but one shall acquire an evident superiority over the other.—Johnson.

A leveller has long ago been set down as a ridiculous and chimerical being, who, if he could finish his work to-day, would have to begin it again to-morrow.—Colton.

Your worm is your only emperor for diet: we fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service, two dishes, but to one table: that's the end.—Shakespeare.

The mind of the thinker and the student is driven to admit, though it be awe-struck by apparent injustice, that this inequality is the work of God. Make all men equal to-day, and God has so created them that they shall be all unequal to-morrow.—Anthony Trollope.

It is a commonly observed fact that the enslavement of women is invariably associated with a low type of social life, and that, conversely, her elevation towards an equality with man uniformly accompanies progress.—Herbert Spencer.

All the religions known in the world are founded, so far as they relate to man or the unity of man, as being all of one degree. Whether in heaven or in hell, or in whatever state man may be supposed to exist hereafter, the good and the bad are the only distinctions.—Thomas Paine.

The trickling rain doth fall
Upon us one and all;
The south-wind kisses
The saucy milk-maid's cheek,
The nun's, demure and meek,
Nor any misses. —E. C. Stedman.

The equal right of all men to the use of land is as clear as their equal right to breathe the air—it is a right proclaimed by the fact of their existence. For we cannot suppose that some men have a right to be in this world, and others no right.—Henry George.

Equality is one of the most consummate scoundrels that ever crept from the brain of a political juggler—a fellow who thrusts his hand into the pocket of honest industry or enterprising talent, and squanders their hard-earned profits on profligate idleness or indolent stupidity.—Paulding.

We are foolish, and without excuse foolish, in speaking of the superiority of one sex to the other, as if they could be compared in similar things! Each has what the other has not; each completes the other; they are in nothing alike; and the happiness and perfection of both depend on each asking and receiving from the other what the other only can give.—Ruskin.

Equality is deemed by many a mere speculative chimera, which can never be reduced to practice. But if the abuse is inevitable, does it follow that we ought not to try at least to mitigate it? It is precisely because the force of things tends always to destroy equality that the force of the legislature must always tend to maintain it.—Rousseau.

The king is but a man, as I am; the violet smells to him as it doth to me; the element shows to him as it doth to me; all his senses have but human conditions; his ceremonies laid by, in his nakedness he appears but a man; and though his affections are higher mounted than ours, yet, when they stoop, they stoop with the like wing.—Shakespeare.

As soon the dust of a wretch whom thou wouldest not, as of a prince whom thou couldest not look upon, will trouble thine eyes if the wind blow it thither; and when a whirlwind hath blown the dust of the churchyard into the church, and the man sweeps out the dust of the church into the churchyard, who will undertake to sift those dusts again, and to pronounce, "This is the patrician, this is the noble flower, and this the yeoman, this the plebeian bran?"—Rev. Dr. Donne.

Equanimity

Equanimity is the gem in virtue's chaplet, and St. Sweetness the loveliest in her calendar.—Alcott.

In this thing one man is superior to another, that he is better able to bear adversity and prosperity.—Philemon.

Equity

A good judge decides fairly, preferring equity to strict law.—Law Maxim.

In all things, but particularly in the law, there is equity.—Law Maxim.

All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them.—Bible.

Equity is a roguish thing: for law we have a measure, know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. 'Tis all one as if they should make the standard for the measure we call a foot a chancellor's foot; what an uncertain measure would this be! One chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot. 'Tis the same in the chancellor's conscience.—Selden.

Equivocation

There is no possible excuse for a guarded lie. Enthusiastic and impulsive people will sometimes falsify thoughtlessly, but equivocation is malice premeditated.—Hosea Ballou.

To doubt the Equivocation of the fiend,
That lies like truth: Fear not, till Birnam wood
Do come to Dunsinane. —Shakespeare.

A sudden lie may be sometimes only manslaughter upon truth; but by a carefully constructed equivocation, truth always is with malice aforethought deliberately murdered.—Mortley.

But yet,—
I do not like but yet, it does allay
The good precedence; fye upon but yet;
But yet is as a gaoler to bring forth
Some monstrous malefactor.

—Shakespeare.

Faith, here's an equivocator, that could swear in both the scales against either scale; who committed treason enough for God's sake, yet could not equivocate to heaven.—Shakespeare.

Error

Error is worse than ignorance.—Bailey.

Every error is truth abused.—Boswell.

A man's errors are what make him amiable.—Goethe.

Error is frail.—Zoroaster.

Error is always more busy than truth.—Hosea Ballou.

Error is but the shadow of the truth.—Stillingfleet.

Error is ever talkative.—Goldsmith.

Honest error is to be pitied, not ridiculed.—Lord Chesterfield.

Dark error's other hidden side is truth.—Victor Hugo.

The cautious seldom err.—Confucius.

Man on the dubious waves of error toss'd.—Cowper.

The smallest errors are always the best.—Molière.

Men err from selfishness, women because they are weak.—Mme. de Staël.

While man's desires and aspirations stir, He can not choose but err.—Goethe.

Verily, there is nothing so true that the damps of error hath not warp'd it.—Tupper.

An error is the more dangerous in proportion to the degree of truth which it contains.—Amiel.

Error will slip through a crack, while truth will stick in a doorway.—H. W. Shaw.

If the wise erred not, it would go hard with the fools.—George Herbert.

Shall Error in the round of time Still father Truth? —Tennyson.

Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow; He who would search for pearls must dive below. —Dryden.

Great errors seldom originate but with men of great minds.—Petrarch.

Find earth where grows no weed, and you may find a heart wherein no error grows.—Knowles.

There are few, very few, that will own themselves in a mistake.—Swift.

In all science error precedes the truth, and it is better it should go first than last.—Horace Walpole.

Spurn not a seeming error, but dig below its surface for the truth.—Tupper.

There are some errors so sweet that we repent them only to bring them to memory.—J. Petit-Senn.

An error gracefully acknowledged is a victory won.—Caroline L. Gascoigne.

For to err in opinion, though it be not the part of wise men, is at least human.—Plutarch.

The error of our eye directs our mind: What error leads must err. —Shakespeare.

Our follies and errors are the soiled steps to the Grecian temple of our perfection.—Richter.

Sometimes we may learn more from a man's errors than from his virtues.—Longfellow.

Mistake, error, is the discipline through which we advance.—Channing.

There are men who never err, because they never propose anything rational.—Goethe.

To stumble twice against the same stone is a proverbial disgrace.—Cicero

From the errors of others, a wise man corrects his own.—Syrus.

The progress of rivers to the ocean is not so rapid as that of man to error.—Voltaire.

Weeds are omnipresent; errors are to be found in the heart of the most lovable.—George Sand.

No tempting form of error is without some latent charm derived from truth.—Keith.

Error's monstrous shapes from earth are driven
They fade, they fly—but truth survives the flight. —Bryant.

Truth is a good dog; but beware of barking too close to the heels of an error, lest you get your brains kicked out.—Coleridge.

Error is sometimes so nearly allied to truth that it blends with it as imperceptibly as the colors of the rainbow fade into each other.—W. B. Clulow.

There will be mistakes in divinity while men preach, and errors in governments while men govern.—Sir Dudley Carlton.

How full of error is the judgment of mankind! They wonder at results when they are ignorant of the reasons.—Metastasio.

There is in some minds a nucleus of error which attracts and assimilates everything to itself.—Voltaire.

One deviates to the right, another to the left; the error is the same with all, but it deceives them in different ways.—Horace.

Our understandings are always liable to error. Nature and certainty is very hard to come at; and infallibility is mere vanity and pretense.—Marcus Antoninus.

There is scarcely any popular tenet more erroneous than that which holds that when time is slow, life is dull.—Beaconsfield.

Error, when she retraces her steps, has farther to go before she can arrive at truth than ignorance.—Colton.

By Hercules! I prefer to err with Plato, whom I know how much you value, than to be right in the company of such men.—Cicero.

Knowledge being to be had only of visible and certain truth, error is not a fault of our knowledge, but a mistake of our judgment, giving assent to that which is not true.—John Locke.

It is much easier to meet with error than to find truth; error is on the surface, and can be more easily met with; truth is hid in great depths, the way to seek does not appear to all the world.—Goethe.

How happy he who can still hope to lift himself from this sea of error! What we know not, that we are anxious to possess, and cannot use what we know.—Goethe.

All errors spring up in the neighborhood of some truth; they grow round about it, and, for the most part, derive their strength from such contiguity.—Rev. T. Binney.

My principal method for defeating error and heresy is by establishing the truth. One purposes to fill a bushel with tares, but if I can fill it first with wheat, I may defy his attempts.—Newton.

There are errors which no wise man will treat with rudeness while there is a probability that they may be the refraction of some great truth still below the horizon.—Coleridge.

Consciousness of error is, to a certain extent, a consciousness of understanding; and correction of error is the plainest proof of energy and mastery.—Landor.

For the first time, the best may err, art may persuade, and novelty spread out its charms. The first fault is the child of simplicity; but every other the offspring of guilt.—Goldsmith.

The more secure we feel against our liability to any error to which, in fact, we are liable, the greater must be our danger of falling into it.—Whately.

Error is always more busy than ignorance. Ignorance is a blank sheet on which we may write; but error is a scribbled one from which we must first erase.—Colton.

Those things which now seem frivolous and slight,
Will be of serious consequence to you,
When they have made you once ridiculous.
—Roscommon.

It is only an error of judgment to make a mistake, but it argues an infirmity of character to adhere to it when discovered. Or, as the Chinese better say, "The glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time you fall."—Bovee.

He who only tastes his error will long dwell with it, will take delight in it as in a singular felicity; while he who drains it to the dregs will, if he be not crazy, find it to be what it is.—Goethe.

O hateful Error, Melancholy's child!
Why dost thou show to the apt thoughts of men
The things that are not? O Error, soon conceiv'd,
Thou never com'st unto a happy birth,
But kill'st the mother that engender'd thee.
—Shakespeare.

Truth only is prolific. Error, sterile in itself, produces only by means of the portion of truth which it contains. It may have offspring, but the life which it gives, like that of the hybrid races, cannot be transmitted.—Madame Swetchine.

Error is a hardy plant; it flourisheth in every soil;
In the heart of the wise and good, alike with the wicked and foolish;
For there is no error so crooked, but it hath in it some lines of truth. —Tupper.

Errors to be dangerous must have a great deal of truth mingled with them; it is only from this alliance that they can ever obtain an extensive circulation; from pure extravagance, and genuine, unmingled falsehood, the world never has, and never can sustain any mischief.—Sydney Smith.

If a crooked stick is before you, you need not explain how crooked it is. Lay a straight one down by the side of it, and the work is well done. Preach the truth, and error will stand abashed in its presence.—Spurgeon.

Error soon passes away, unless upheld by restraint on thought. History tells us (and the lesson is invaluable) that the physical force which has put down free inquiry has been the main bulwark of the superstitions and illusions of past ages.—Channing.

The more readily we admit the possibility of our own cherished convictions being mixed with error, the more vital and helpful whatever is right in them will become; and no error is so conclusively fatal as the idea that God will not allow us to err, though He has allowed all other men to do so.—Ruskin.

The blindness of bigotry, the madness of ambition, and the miscalculations of diplomacy seek their victims principally amongst the innocent and the unoffending. The cottage is sure to suffer for every error of the court, the cabinet, or the camp. When error sits in the seat of power and of authority, and is generated in high places, it may be compared to that torrent which originates indeed in the mountain, but commits its devastation in the vale.—Colton.

The little I have seen of the world teaches me to look upon the errors of others in sorrow, not in anger. When I take the history of one poor heart that has sinned and suffered, and represent to myself the struggles and temptations it has passed through, the brief pulsations of joy, the feverish inquietude of hope and fear, the pressure of want, the desertion of friends, I would fain leave the erring soul of my fellowman with Him from whose hand it came.—Longfellow.

Esteem

Esteem all things that are good.—Tibullus.

Esteem never makes ingrates.—Rochefoucauld.

I will never pretend esteem for a man whose principles I detest.—Gustavus III. of Sweden.

We should esteem a person according to his actions, not his nationality.—Varenes.

To be loved, we should merit but little esteem; all superiority attracts awe and aversion.—Helvetius.

Prefer not the esteem of men to the approbation of God.—Jortin.

It is common to esteem most what is most unknown.—Tacitus.

Our esteem is apt to be given where we know the least.—Michelet.

Esteem cannot be where there is no confidence, and there can be no confidence where there is no respect.—Henry Giles.

Esteem incites friendship, but not love; the former is the twin brother of Reverence; the latter is the child of Equality.—Lamartine.

Many men and many women enjoy popular esteem, not because they are known, but because they are not.—Chamfort.

No man can have much kindness for him by whom he does not believe himself esteemed, and nothing so evidently proves esteem as imitation.—Johnson.

Esteem has more engaging charms than friendship, and even love. It captivates hearts better, and never makes ingrates.—Rochefoucauld.

As love without esteem is volatile and capricious, so esteem without love is languid and cold.—Dr. Johnson.

There is no rapture in the love which is prompted by esteem; such affection is lasting, not passionate.—Victor Hugo.

Under the assumption of profound esteem, the flatterer wears an outward expression of fidelity, as foreign to his heart as the smile upon the face of the dead.—E. L. Magoon.

By virtue, integrity, perseverance and true modesty it is possible for all men to win the esteem of their fellow beings.—C. N. Douglas.

There is graciousness and a kind of urbanity in beginning with men by esteem and confidence. It proves, at least, that we have long lived in good company with others and with ourselves.—Joubert.

We have so exalted a notion of the human soul that we cannot bear to be despised by it, or even not to be esteemed by it. Man, in fact, places all his happiness in this esteem.—Pascal.

We esteem in the world those who do not merit our esteem, and neglect persons of true worth; but the world is like the ocean—the pearl is in its depths, the seaweed swims.—G. P. Morris.

The chief ingredients in the composition of those qualities that gain esteem and praise are good nature, truth, good sense, and good breeding.—Addison.

The esteem of wise and good men is the greatest of all temporal encouragements to virtue; and it is a mark of an abandoned spirit to have no regard to it.—Burke.

We acquire the love of people who, being in our proximity, are presumed to know us; and we receive reputation or celebrity, from such as are not personally acquainted with us. Merit secures to us the regard of our honest neighbors, and good fortune that of the public. Esteem is the harvest of a whole life spent in usefulness; but reputation is often bestowed upon a chance action, and depends most on success.—G. A. Sala.

Local esteem is far more conducive to happiness than general reputation. The latter may be compared to the fixed stars which glimmer so remotely as to afford little light and no warmth. The former is like the sun, each day shedding his prolific and cheering beams.—W. B. Clulow.

Estrangement

There is not so agonizing a feeling in the whole catalogue of human suffering, as the first conviction that the heart of the being whom we most tenderly love is estranged from us.—Bulwer.

Eternity

Eternity, thou pleasing, dreadful thought!—Addison.

Eternity forbids thee to forget.—Byron.

God has given to us eternal life; and this life is in His Son.

Who can speak of eternity without a solecism, or think thereof without an ecstasy?—Sir T. Browne.

All that live must die, passing through nature to eternity.—Shakespeare.

Let me dream that love goes with us to the shore unknown.—Mrs. Hemans.

This narrow isthmus 'twixt two boundless seas.—Moore.

That golden key,
That opes the palace of eternity.
—Milton.

If we stretch our thoughts as far as they can reach, eternity is still before us.—J. Edmondson.

Can eternity belong to me, poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?—Young.

The thought of eternity consoles for the shortness of life.—Malesherbes.

Beyond is all abyss, eternity, whose end no eye can reach.—Milton.

What a sublime doctrine it is, that goodness cherished now is eternal life already entered on!—W. E. Channing.

But felt through all this fleshly dresse
Bright shootes of everlastingnesse.
—Henry Vaughan.

All great men find eternity affirmed in the very promise of their faculties.—Emerson.

Eternity looks grander and kinder if Time grow meaner and more hostile.—Carlyle.

"Time restores all things." Wrong! Time restores many things, but eternity restores all.—Joseph Roux.

The youth of the soul is everlasting, and eternity is youth.—Richter.

Darkness, that here surrounds our purblind understanding, will vanish at the dawning of eternal day.—Boyle.

Yes, I live in God, and shall eternally. It is His hand upholds me now; and death will be but an uplifting of me into His bosom.—Wm. Mountford.

If people would but provide for eternity with the same solicitude and real care as they do for this life, they could not fail of heaven.—Tillotson.

Eternity doth wear upon her face the veil of time. They only see the veil, and thus they know not what they stand so near!—Alexander Smith.

O, if we could tear aside the veil, and see but for one hour what it signifies to be a soul in the power of an endless life, what a revelation would it be!—Horace Bushnell.

This is eternal life; a life of everlasting love, showing itself in everlasting good works; and whosoever lives that life, he lives the life of God, and hath eternal life.—Charles Kingsley.

Eternal life does not depend upon our perfection; but because it does depend upon the grace of Christ and the love of the Spirit, that love shall prompt us to emulate perfection.—William Adams.

Sure there is none but fears a future state;
And when the most obdurate swear they do not,
Their trembling hearts belie their boasting tongues. —Dryden.

In time there is no present,
In eternity no future,
In eternity no past. —Tennyson.

'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man. —Addison.

Eternity! How know we but we stand
On the precipitous and crumbling verge
Of Time e'en now, Eternity below?
—Abraham Coles.

Nothing is eternal but that which is done for God and others. That which is done for self dies.—Aughey.

Eternity has no gray hairs! The flowers fade, the heart withers, man grows old and dies, the world lies down in the sepulchre of ages, but time writes no wrinkles on the brow of eternity.—Bishop Heber.

Oh! in that future let us think
To hold each heart the heart that shares;
With them the immortal waters drink,
And, soul in soul, grow deathless theirs!
—Byron.

The more we can be raised above the petty vexations and pleasures of this world into the eternal life to come,
the more shall we be prepared to enter into that eternal life whenever God shall please to call us hence.—Dean Stanley.

O, that a man might know
The end of this day's business, ere it come,
But it sufficeth that the day will end;
And then the end is known.
—Shakespeare.

Yes, what I am to be everlastingly, I am growing to be now—now in this present time so little thought of, this time which the sun rises and sets in, and the clock strikes in, and I wake and sleep in.—Wm. Mountford.

Eternity is the divine treasure-house and hope is the window, by means of which mortals are permitted to see, as through a glass darkly, the things which God is preparing.—Mountford.

Too curious man! why dost thou seek to know
Events, which, good or ill, foreknown, are woe!
Th' all-seeing power, that made thee mortal, gave Thee every thing a mortal state should have. —Dryden.

It is a high, solemn, almost awful thought for every individual man, that his earthly influence, which has a commencement, will never, through all ages, have an end.—Aughey.

He that will often put eternity and the world before him, and who will dare to look steadfastly at both of them, will find that the more often he contemplates them, the former will grow greater, and the latter less.—
Colton.

If there remains an eternity to us after the short revolution of time we so swiftly run over here, 'tis clear that all the happiness that can be imagined in this fleeting state is not valuable in respect of the future.—Locke.

Certainly the highest and dearest concerns of a temporal life are infinitely less valuable than those of an eternal; and consequently ought, without any demur at all, to be sacrificed to them, whenever they come in competition.—South.

There is, I know not how, in the minds of men, a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence; and this takes the deepest root, and is most discoverable, in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls.—Cicero.

Sow the seeds of life—humbleness, pure-heartedness, love; and in the long eternity which lies before the soul, every minutest grain will come up again with an increase of thirty, sixty, or a hundredfold.—F. W. Robertson.

In the life to come, at the first ray of its light our true characters, purified but preserving their identity, will more fully expand, and the result of the infinite diversity will be a complete unity.—Madame de Gasparin.

Eternity invests every state, whether of bliss or of suffering, with a mysterious and awful importance, entirely its own. It gives that weight and moment to whatever it attaches, compared to which all interests that know a period fade into absolute insignificance.—Robert Hall.

"What is eternity?" was a question once asked at the deaf and dumb institution at Paris, and the beautiful and striking answer was given by one of the pupils, "The lifetime of the Almighty."—John Bates.

Eternity, thou pleasing dreadful Thought!
Thro' what variety of untry'd beings, Thro' what new scenes and changes must we pass?

The wide, the unbounded Prospect lies before me;
But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.
—Addison.

None can comprehend eternity but the eternal God. Eternity is an ocean, whereof we shall never see the shore; it is a deep, where we can find no bottom; a labyrinth from whence we cannot extricate ourselves and where we shall ever lose the door.—Boston.

Eternity is a negative idea clothed with a positive name. It supposes in that to which it is applied a present existence, and is the negation of a beginning or of an end of that existence.—Paley.

Consider and act with reference to the true ends of existence. This world is but the vestibule of an immortal life. Every action of our lives touches on some chord that will vibrate in eternity.—Chapin.

Upon laying a weight in one of the scales, inscribed eternity, though I threw in that of time, prosperity, affliction, wealth, and poverty, which seemed very ponderous, they were not able to stir the opposite balance.—Addison.

When at eve, at the bounding of the landscape, the heavens appear to recline so slowly on the earth, imagination pictures beyond the horizon an asylum of hope—a native land of love; and nature seems silently to repeat that man is immortal.—Madame de Staël.

The time will come when every change shall cease,
This quick revolving wheel shall rest in peace;
No summer then shall glow, nor winter freeze;
Nothing shall be to come, and nothing past,
But an eternal now shall ever last.
—Petrarch.

It is only Jesus Christ who has thrown light on life and immortality through the gospel; and because He has done so, and has enabled us by His atoning death and intercession to make the most of this discovery, His gospel is, for all who will, a power of God unto salvation.—H. P. Liddon.

Every natural longing has its natural satisfaction. If we thirst, God has created liquid to gratify thirst. If we are susceptible of attachment, there are beings to gratify that love. If we thirst for life and love eternal, it is likely there are an eternal life and an eternal love to satisfy that craving.—F. W. Robertson.

Life everywhere is in vast and endless variety. So it is with life eternal, that gift of God, constituting, in its length and breadth and height and depth, the reward of the righteous. The penitent, dying thief is not going into heaven like the triumphant, dying Paul.—Herrick Johnson.

Let us be adventurers for another world. It is at least a fair and noble chance; and there is nothing in this worth our thoughts or our passions. If we should be disappointed, we are still no worse than the rest of our fellow-mortals; and if we succeed in our expectations we are eternally happy.—Burnet.

Eternity, thou awful Gulph of Time,
This wide creation on thy surface floats.
Of life—of death—what is, or what shall be,
I nothing know. The world is all a dream,
The consciousness of something that exists,
Yet is not what it seems. Then what am I?
Death must unfold the mystery! —Dowe.

The disappointed man turns his thoughts toward a state of existence where his wiser desires may be fixed with the certainty of faith; the successful man feels that the objects which he has ardently pursued fail to satisfy the cravings of an immortal spirit; the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness, that he may save his soul alive.—Southey,

You reap what you sow—not something else, but that. An act of love makes the soul more loving. A deed of humbleness deepens humbleness. The thing reaped is the very thing sown, multiplied a hundred fold. You have sown a seed of life, you reap life everlasting.—F. W. Robertson.

Our imagination so magnifies this present existence, by the power of continual reflection on it, and so attenuates eternity, by not thinking of it at all, that we reduce an eternity to nothingness, and expand a mere nothing to an eternity; and this habit is so inveterately rooted in us that all the force of reason cannot induce us to lay it aside.—Pascal.

The vaulted void of purple sky
That everywhere extends,
That stretches from the dazzled eye,
In space that never ends;
A morning whose uprisen sun
No setting e'er shall see;
A day that comes without a noon
Such is eternity. —Clare.

Beyond the grave! As the vision rises how this side dwindles into nothing—a speck—a moment—and its glory and pomp shrink into the trinkets and baubles that amuse an infant for a day. Only those things, in the glory of this light, which lay hold of immortality, seem to have any value.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

Those spacious regions where our fancies roam,
Pain'd by the past, expecting ills to come,
In some dread moment, by the fates assign'd,
Shall pass away, nor leave a rack behind;
And Time's revolving wheels shall lose at last
The speed that spins the future and the past
And, sovereign of an undisputed throne,
Awful eternity shall reign alone.
—Petrarch.

The longest time that man may live,
The lapse of generations of his race,
The continent entire of time itself,
Bears not proportion to Eternity;
Huge as a fraction of a grain of dew
Co-measured with the broad, unbounded ocean!
There is the time of man—his proper time,
Looking at which this life is but a gust,
A puff of breath, that's scarcely felt ere gone! —Sheridan Knowles.

Alas! what is man? whether he be deprived of that light which is from on high, or whether he discard it: a frail and trembling creature, standing on time, that bleak and narrow isthmus between two eternities, he sees nothing but impenetrable darkness on the one hand, and doubt, distrust, and conjecture still more perplexing on the other. Most gladly would he take an observation as to whence he has come, or whither he is going. Alas, he has not the means; his telescope is too dim, his compass too wavering, his plummet too short. Nor is that little spot, his present state, one whit more intelligible, since it may prove a quicksand that may sink in a moment from his feet; it can afford him no certain reckoning as to that immeasurable ocean that he may have traversed, or that still more formidable one that he must.—Colton.

Yes, my brethren, Christ will reign—must reign. O what a grand, glorious destiny awaits us who are saved! I stand in the presence of a scheme that I have neither power to comprehend nor to delineate. I tell you, when the end shall come, and God

Almighty shall gather into His kingdom the souls and bodies of men saved upon the earth, they will reach the pinnacle of eternal life in all its splendor! Happy, happy will be the day when you and I, by God's grace, stand in full proportion on the granite platform of an eternal, happy immortality.—Bishop Daggett.

Ethics

Ethics, as has been well said, are the finest fruits of humanity, but they are not its roots.—Miss Mulock.

Ethics may be defined as the obligations of morality.—Kossuth.

Ethics is the doctrine of manners, or science of philosophy, which teaches men their duty and the springs and principles of human conduct.—Maunder.

Art itself is essentially ethical; because every true work of art must have a beauty or grandeur of some kind, and beauty and grandeur cannot be comprehended by the beholder except through the moral sentiment. The eye is only a witness; it is not a judge. The mind judges what the eye reports to it; therefore, whatever elevates the moral sentiment to the contemplation of beauty and grandeur is in itself ethical.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The modern Gamaliel should teach ethics. Ethics is the science of human duty. Arithmetic tells man how to count his money; ethics how he should acquire it, whether by honesty or fraud. Geography is a map of the world; ethics is a beautiful map of duty. This ethics is not Christianity, it is not even religion; but it is the sister of religion, because the path of duty is in full harmony, as to quality and direction, with the path of God.—Professor Swing.

Etiquette

Etiquette is the invention of wise men to keep fools at a distance.—Steele.

What are these wondrous civilizing arts, this Roman polish, and this smooth behavior that render man thus tractable and tame?—Addison.

Trifles themselves are elegant in him.—Pope.

Etiquette has no regard for moral qualities.—Douglas Jerrold.

Starch makes the gentleman, etiquette the lady.—Brummel.

There was a general whisper, toss, and wiggle,
But etiquette forbade them all to giggle.
—Byron.

Etiquette is the ceremonial code of polite life, more voluminous and minute in each portion of society according to its rank.—J. R. MacCulloch.

There's nothing in the world like etiquette
In kingly chambers, or imperial halls,
As also at the race and county balls.
—Byron.

O form! how oft dost thou with thy case, thy habit, wrench awe from fools, and tie the wiser souls to thy false seeming!—Shakespeare.

We show wisdom by a decent conformity to social etiquette: it is excess of neatness or display that creates dandyism in men, and coquetry in women.—Robert Adam.

A man may with more impunity be guilty of an actual breach, either of real good breeding or good morals, than appear ignorant of the most minute points of fashionable etiquette.—Scott.

Evasion

Evasion is unworthy of us, and is always the intimate of equivocation.—Balzac.

Evasions are the common shelter of the hard-hearted, the false and impotent when called upon to assist; the really great alone plan instantaneous help, even when their looks or words presage difficulties.—Lavater.

Evening

Every evening brings us nearer God.—Luther.

At shut of evening flowers.—Milton.

The pale child, Eve, leading her mother, Night.—Alexander Smith.

Dewy evening's soft and sacred lull.
—Paul H. Hayne.

O precious evenings! all too swiftly sped!—Longfellow.

Vast and deep the mountain shadows grew.—Rogers.

Hath not thy heart within thee burned,
At evening's calm and holy hour?
—S. G. Bulfinch.

To me at least was never evening yet
But seemed far beautifuller than its day.
—Robert Browning.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray,
Had in her sober livery all things clad.
—Milton.

Fairest of all that earth beholds, the hues
That live among the clouds, and flush the air,
Lingering and deepening at the hour of dews.
—Bryant.

How dear to me the hour when daylight dies,
And sunbeams melt along the silent sea,
For then sweet dreams of other days arise,
And memory breathes her vesper sigh to thee.
—Moore.

Meek-eyed Eve, her cheek yet warm with blushes, slow retires through the Hesperian gardens of the west, and shuts the gates of day.—Mrs. Barbauld.

One by one the flowers close,
Lily and dewy rose
Shutting their tender petals from the moon.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Now to the main the burning sun descends,
And sacred night her gloomy veil extends.
The western sun now shot a feeble ray
And faintly scatter'd the remains of day.
—Addison.

Women have in their natures something akin to owls and fireflies.
While men grow stupid and sleepy towards evening, they become brighter and more open-eyed, and show a propensity to flit and sparkle under the light of chandeliers.—Abba Gould Woolson.

Sober Evening takes her wonted station in the middle air, a thousand shadows at her beck.—Thomson.

The summer day has clos'd—the sun is set:
Well have they done their office, those bright hours,
The latest of whose train goes softly out
In the red west.
—Bryant.

It was an evening bright and still
As ever blush'd on wave or bower,
Smiling from heaven, as if nought ill
Could happen in so sweet an hour.
—Moore.

The day is done, and the darkness
Falls from the wings of Night,
As a feather is wafted downward
From an eagle in his flight.
—Longfellow.

And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away.
—Longfellow.

Day, like a weary pilgrim, had reached the western gate of heaven, and Evening stooped down to unloose
the latchets of his sandal shoon.—
Longfellow.

The west with second pomp is bright.
Though in the east the dusk is thickening,
Twilight's first star breaks forth in white,
Into night's gold each moment quickening.
—Street.

Evening came.
The setting sun stretched his celestial rods of light
Across the level landscape, and, like the Hebrews
In Egypt, smote the rivers, brooks, and ponds,
And they became as blood.
—Longfellow.

O how grandly cometh Even,
Sitting on the mountain summit,
Purple-vestured, grave, and silent,
Watching o'er the dewy valleys,
Like a good king near his end.
—D. M. Mulock.

Night steals on; and the day takes its farewell, like the words of a departing friend, or the last tone of hallowed music in a minster's aisles, heard when it floats along the shade of elms, in the still place of graves.—

Percival.

The sun is set; the swallows are asleep;
The bats are flitting fast in the gray air;
The slow soft toads out of damp corners
creep;

And evening's breath, wandering here and there

Over the quivering surface of the stream,
Wakes not one ripple from its silent dream.
—Shelley.

Now stir the fire, and close the shutters
fast,

Let fall the curtains, wheel the sofa round,
And while the bubbling and loud-hissing urn
Throws up a steamy column, and the cups
That cheer but not inebriate, wait on each,
So let us welcome peaceful evening in.
—Cowper.

When day is done, and clouds are low,
And flowers are honey-dew,
And Hesper's lamp begins to glow
Along the western blue;
And homeward wing the turtle-doves,
Then comes the hour the poet loves.
—George Croly.

Silence hath set her finger with deep touch Upon creation's brow. Like a young bride
the moon

Lifts up night's curtains, and with countenance mild

Smiles on the beauteous earth, her sleeping child.
—Bigg.

A paler shadow strews
Its mantle o'er the mountains; parting day
Dies like a dolphin, whom each pang im-bues

With a new colour as it gasps away
The last still loveliest 'till 'tis gone—and all is grey.
—Byron.

An eve intensely beautiful; an eve
Calm as the slumber of a lovely girl Dreaming of hope. The rich autumnal woods,

With their innumerable shades and colour-
ings,

Are like a silent instrument at rest:
A silent instrument—whereon the wind
Hath long forgot to play.
—Houseman.

Evening is the delight of virtuous age; it seems an emblem of the tranquil close of busy life—serene, placid, and mild, with the impress of its great Creator stamped upon it; it spreads its quiet wings over the grave, and seems to promise that all shall be peace beyond it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day;
The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea;
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,

And leaves the world to darkness and to me.
Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,

And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,

And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds.
—Gray.

Come to the sunset tree!

The day is past and gone;

The woodman's axe lies free,

And the reaper's work is done;

The twilight star to heaven,

And the summer dew to flowers,

And rest to us is given

By the cool, soft evening hours.

—Mrs. Hemans.

Come, evening, once again, season of peace;
Return, sweet evening, and continue long!
Methinks I see thee in the streaky west,
With matron step, slow moving, while the night

Treads on thy sweeping train; one hand employ'd

In letting fall the curtain of repose

On bird and beast, the other charged for man

With sweet oblivion of the cares of day.
—Cowper.

Sweet was the sound, when oft, at evening's close,

Up yonder hill the village murmur rose;
There as I passed, with careless steps and slow,

The mingling notes came soften'd from below;

The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
The sober herd that low'd to meet their
young;

The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school;

The watch-dog's voice that bay'd the whispering wind,

And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant
mind;

These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,

And fill'd each pause the nightingale had made.
—Goldsmith.

Each evening we should meditate upon the fact that one more day is gone from the list that make up the sum of our years. We have one day less for the seeking and finding Christ;
for cultivating the spirit of holiness
in our hearts, for blessing society, building up the church, gathering sinners to the Savior, and promoting the glory of God. By so much the time is shortened that separates us from the grave, the judgment and the eternal destiny.

It is the hour when from the boughs

The nightingale's high note is heard;

It is the hour when lovers' vows

Seem sweet in every whispered word;

And gentle winds, and waters near,

Make music to the lonely ear.

Each flower the dews have lightly wet,

And in the sky the stars are met,

And on the wave is deeper blue,

And on the leaf a browner hue,

And in the heaven that clear obscure,

So softly dark, and darkly pure.

Which follows the decline of day,

As twilight melts beneath the moon away.

—Byron.

Ave Maria! blessed be the hour!

The time, the clime, the spot where I so oft

Have felt that moment in its fullest power

Sink o'er the earth so beautiful and soft,

While swung the deep bell in the distant tower,

Or the faint dying day-hymn stole aloft,

And not a breath crept through the rosy air,

And yet the forest leaves seem'd stirr'd with prayer.

Soft hour! which makes the wish and melts

the heart

Of those who sail the seas, on the first day;

When they from their sweet friends are torn apart;

Or fills with love the pilgrim on his way,

As the far bell of vesper makes him start,

Seeming to weep the dying day's decay;

Is this a fancy which our reason scorns?

Ah! surely nothing dies but something mourns!

—Byron.

Events

Coming events cast their shadows before.—Campbell.

Certain signs precede certain events.
—Cicero.

Events of great consequence often spring from trifling circumstances.—
Livy.

In the great inconstancy and crowd of events nothing is certain except the past.—Seneca.

What wonderful things are events!
The least are of greater importance than the most sublime and comprehensive speculations.—Beaconsfield.

Great events have sent before them their announcements.—Calderon.

Events of all sorts creep or fly exactly as God pleases.—Cowper.

Man reconciles himself to almost any event, however trying, if it happens in the ordinary course of nature.
It is the extraordinary alone that he rebels against. There is a moral idea associated with this feeling; for the extraordinary appears to be something like an injustice of heaven.—Humboldt.

Evidence

Facts are stubborn things.—Smollett.

One eye-witness is of more weight than ten hearsays.—Plautus.

Some circumstantial evidence is very strong, as when you find a trout in the milk.—Thoreau.

I do not know what arguments mean in reference to any expression of a thought. I delight in telling what I think; but if you ask me how I dare say so, or why it is so, I am the most helpless of men.—Emerson.

It is not true that a man can believe or disbelieve what he will. But it is certain that an active desire to find any proposition true will unconsciously tend to that result, by dismissing importunate suggestions which run counter to the belief, and welcoming those which favor it. The psychological law, that we only see what interests us, and only assimilate what is adapted to our condition, causes the mind to select its evidence.—G. H.
Lewes.

Evil

Of two evils, the less is always to be chosen.—Thomas à Kempis.

From seeming evil still educing good.
Thomson.

And out of good still to find means of evil.—Milton.

A bad heart, bad designs.—Terence

Better one thorn pluck'd out than all remain.—Horace.

None are all evil.—Byron.

I have wrought great use out of evil tools.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Ill deeds are doubled with an evil word.—Shakespeare.

Evil events from evil causes spring.
—Aristophanes.

Evil then results from imperfection.
—Bailey.

Men's evil manners live in brass;
their virtues we write in water.—
Shakespeare.

Evil often triumphs, but never conquers.—Joseph Roux.

An evil life is one kind of death.—
Ovid.

All things can corrupt perverse minds.—Ovid.

The best known evil is the most tolerable.—Livy.

Desperate evils generally make men safe.—Seneca.

No evil is great if it is the last.—
Nepos.

Evil is in antagonism with the entire creation.—Zschokke.

Evil comes not amiss if it comes alone.—Cervantes.

Evil is fittest to consort with evil.—
Livy.

By the very constitution of our nature moral evil is its own curse.—
Chalmers.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil, would men observingly distil it out.—Shakespeare.

We cannot do evil to others without doing it to ourselves.—Desmahis.

Evil, be thou my good.—Milton.

The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones.—Shakespeare.

Be deaf to the quarrelsome, blind to the scorner and dumb to the inquisitive.—Aughey.

Still we love
The evil we do, until we suffer it.
—Johnson.

An evil at its birth is easily crushed, but it grows and strengthens by endurance.—Cicero.

Inasmuch as ill deeds spring up as a spontaneous crop, they are easy to learn.—Cervantes.

Nought is so vile that on the earth doth
live,
But to the earth some special good doth give.—Shakespeare.

The doing an evil to avoid an evil cannot be good.—Coleridge.

This is the curse of every evil deed, that, propagating still, it brings forth evil.—Coleridge.

Evils, like poisons, have their uses, and there are diseases which no other remedy can reach.—Thomas Paine.

Three sparks—pride, envy, and avarice—have been kindled in all hearts.—Dante.

Evil is limited.—One cannot form
A scheme for universal evil.
—Bailey.

The fear of one evil often leads us into a worse.—Boileau.

The first lesson of history is the good of evil.—Emerson.

Only evil grows of itself, while for goodness we want effort and courage.
—Amiel.

Evil report, like the Italian stiletto, is an assassin's weapon, worthy only of the bravo.—Madame de Maintenon

Evil and good are everywhere, like shadow and substance; inseparable (for men) yet not hostile, only opposed.—Carlyle.

It is too late to be on our guard when we are in the midst of evils.—Seneca.

As sure as God is good, so surely there is no such thing as necessary evil.—Southey.

There is no evil in human affairs that has not some good mingled with it.—Guicciardini.

Evil is merely privative, not absolute: it is like cold, which is the privation of heat.—Emerson.

The way to wickedness is always through wickedness.—Seneca.

Evil is wrought by want of thought
As well as want of heart.

—Thos. Hood.

There is no evil in the world without a remedy.—Sannazaro.

He who does evil that good may come, pays a toll to the devil to let him into heaven.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Physical evils destroy themselves, or they destroy us.—Rousseau.

There is nothing evil but what is within us; the rest is either natural or accidental.—Sir P. Sidney.

Every evil in the bud is easily crushed; as it grows older it becomes stronger.—Cicero.

If there be no enemy, no fight; if no fight, no victory; if no victory, no crown.—Savonarola.

Not one false man but doth uncountable evil.—Carlyle.

Wherever the speech is corrupted the mind is also.—Seneca.

Of the origin of evil no universal solution has been discovered.—Paley.

An evil intention perverts the best actions, and makes them sins.—Addison.

Bad conduct soils the finest ornament more than filth.—Plautus.

Life is not the supreme good, but the supreme evil is to realize one's guilt.—Schiller.

An evil-speaker differs from an evil-doer only in the want of opportunity.—Quintilian.

What has this unfeeling age of ours left untried, what wickedness has it shunned?—Horace.

There are thousands hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root.—Thoreau.

It is some compensation for great evils that they enforce great lessons.—Bovee.

He who is in evil is also in the punishment of evil.—Swedenborg.

So far as any one shuns evil, so far he does good.—Swedenborg.

The very curse of an evil deed is that it must always continue to engender evil.—Schiller.

Never throw mud. You may miss your mark; but you must have dirty hands.—Joseph Parker.

Slander is a poison which extinguishes charity, both in the slanderer and in the persons who listen to it.—St. Bernard.

If there is any person to whom you feel a dislike, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak.—Richard Cecil.

Nothing is to be esteemed evil which God and nature have fixed with eternal sanction.—Jeremy Taylor.

He who will fight the devil at his own weapon, must not wonder if he finds him an overmatch.—South.

To overcome evil with good is good, to resist evil with evil is evil.—Mohammed.

There are only two bad things in this world, sin and bile.—Hannah More.

The cardinal method with faults is to overgrow them and choke them out with virtues.—John Bascom.

If you do what you should not, you must bear what you would not.—Franklin.

In the history of man it has been very generally the case that when evils have grown insufferable they have touched the point of cure.—Chapin.

Multitudes think they like to do evil; yet no man ever really enjoyed doing evil since God made the world.—Ruskin.

If thou wishest to get rid of thy evil propensities, thou must keep far from evil companions.—Seneca.

To escape from evil we must be made as far as possible like God; and the resemblance consists in becoming just and holy and wise.—Plato.

After some account of good, evil will be known by consequence, as being only a privation, or absence of good.—South.

Evil into the mind of god or man may come and go, so unapproved, and leave no spot or blame behind.—Milton.

There is evil in every human heart, which may remain latent, perhaps, through the whole of life; but circumstances may rouse it to activity.—Hawthorne.

The sins we do, people behold with optics, Which shew them ten times more than common vices, And often multiply them. —Fletcher.

If we will rightly estimate what we call good and evil, we shall find it lies much in comparison.—Locke.

A man has no more right to say an uncivil thing than to act one; no more right to say a rude thing to another than to knock him down.—Johnson.

A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only our silence, which costs us nothing.—Tillotson.

Evil springs up, and flowers, and bears no seed, And feeds the green earth with its swift decay, Leaving it richer for the growth of truth. —James Russell Lowell.

Many have puzzled themselves about the origin of evil; I observe that there is evil, and that there is a way to escape it, and with this I begin and end.—John Newton.

There are times when it would seem as if God fished with a line, and the devil with a net.—Madame Swetchine.

Nothing can work me damage except myself. The harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and never am a real sufferer but by my own fault.—St. Bernard.

Philosophy triumphs easily over past and future evils, but present evils triumph over philosophy.—Rochefoucauld.

Where evil may be done, it is right to ponder; where only suffered, know the shortest pause is much too long.—Hannah More.

The dread of evil is a much more forcible principle of human actions than the prospect of good.—Locke.

No propagation or multiplication is more rapid than that of evil, unless it be checked; no growth more certain.—Colton.

Nor all that heralds rake from coffin'd clay, Nor florid prose, nor honied lies of rhyme, Can blazon evil deeds, or consecrate a crime. —Byron.

Is the scrupulous attention I am paying to the government of my tongue at all proportioned to that tremendous truth revealed through St. James, that if I do not bridle my tongue, all my religion is vain?—F. W. Faber.

There is this of good in real evils, they deliver us while they last from the petty despotism of all that were imaginary.—Colton.

As there is much beast and some devil in man, so is there some angel and some God in him. The beast and the devil may be conquered, but in this life never destroyed.—Coleridge.

Evil, once manfully fronted, ceases to be evil; there is generous battle-hope in place of dead, passive misery; the evil itself has become a kind of good.—Carlyle.

It is a proof of our natural bias to evil, that gain is slower and harder than loss in all things good; but in all things bad getting is quicker and easier than getting rid of.—Hare.

If evil is inevitable, how are the wicked accountable? Nay, why do we call men wicked at all? Evil is inevitable, but it is also remediable.—Horace Mann.

Néver let man imagine that he can pursue a good end by evil means, without sinning against his own soul! Any other issue is doubtful; the evil effect on himself is certain.—Southey.

With every exertion, the best of men can do but a moderate amount of good; but it seems in the power of the most contemptible individual to do incalculable mischief.—Washington Irving.

Evil is a far more cunning and persevering propagandist than good, for it has no inward strength, and is driven to seek countenance and sympathy.—Lowell.

We sometimes learn more from the sight of evil than from an example of good; and it is well to accustom ourselves to profit by the evil which is so common, while that which is good is so rare.—Pascal.

The aphorism "Whatever is, is right," would be as final as it is lazy, did it not include the troublesome consequence that nothing that ever was, was wrong.—Charles Dickens.

To great evils we submit; we resent little provocations. I have before now been disappointed of a hundred-pound job and lost half a crown at rackets on the same day, and been more mortified at the latter than the former.—Hazlitt.

Evils in the journey of life are like the hills which alarm travelers upon their road; they both appear great at a distance, but when we approach them we find that they are far less insurmountable than we had conceived.—Colton.

Every evil to which we do not succumb is a benefactor. As the Sandwich islander believes that the strength and valor of the enemy he kills passes into himself, so we gain the strength of the temptations we resist.—Emerson.

The truly virtuous do not easily credit evil that is told them of their neighbors; for if others may do amiss then may these also speak amiss. Man is frail, and prone to evil, and therefore may soon fail in words.—Jeremy Taylor.

Even in evil, that dark cloud which hangs over the creation, we discern rays of light and hope, and gradually come to see in suffering and temptation proofs and instruments of the sublimest purposes of wisdom and love.—Channing.

No man, perhaps, is so wicked as to commit evil for its own sake. Evil is generally committed under the hope of some advantage the pursuit of virtue seldom obtains. Yet the most successful result of the most virtuous heroism is never without its alloy.—B. R. Haydon.

Imaginary evils soon become real ones by indulging our reflections on them; as he who in a melancholy fancy sees something like a face on the wall or the wainscot can, by two or three touches with a lead pencil, make it look visible, and agreeing with what he fancied.—Swift.

Evil is easily discovered; there is an infinite variety; good is almost unique. But some kinds of evil are almost as difficult to discover as that which we call good; and often particular evil of this class passes for good. It needs even a certain greatness of soul to attain to this, as to that which is good.—Pascal.

All evil, in fact the very existence of evil, is inexplicable until we refer to the paternity of God. It hangs a huge blot in the universe until the orb of divine love rises behind it. In that apposition we detect its meaning. It appears to us but a finite shadow as it passes across the disk of infinite light.—Chapin.

All animals are more happy than man. Look, for instance, on yonder ass; all allow him to be miserable; his evils, however, are not brought on by himself and his own fault; he feels only those which nature has inflicted. We, on the contrary, besides our necessary ills, draw upon ourselves a multitude of others.—Menander.

When will talkers refrain from evil speaking? When listeners refrain from evil hearing. At present there are many so credulous of evil, they will receive suspicions and impressions against persons whom they don't know, from a person whom they do know—an authority good for nothing.—Hare.

The best antidote against evils of all kinds, against the evil thoughts that haunt the soul, against the needless perplexities which distract the conscience, is to keep hold of the good we have. Impure thoughts will not stand against pure words and prayers and deeds. Little doubts will not avail against great certainties. Fix your affections on things above, and then you will less and less be troubled by the cares, the temptations, the troubles of things on earth.—Dean Stanley.

That which the French proverb hath of sickness is true of all evils, that they come on horseback, and go away on foot; we have often seen a sudden fall or one meal's surfeit bath stuck by many to their graves; whereas pleasures come like oxen, slow and heavily, and go away like post-horses, upon the spur.—Bishop Hall.

Evils * * * can never pass away; for there must always remain something which is antagonistic to good. Having no place among the Gods in heaven, of necessity they hover around the earthly nature and this mortal sphere. Wherefore we ought to fly away from earth to heaven as quickly as we can; and to fly away is to become like God, as far as this is possible; and to become like Him is to become holy and just and wise.—Plato.

The truest definition of evil is that which represents it as something contrary to nature; evil is evil because it is unnatural; a vine which should bear olive-berries, an eye to which blue seems yellow, would be diseased; an unnatural mother, an unnatural son, an unnatural act, are the strongest terms of condemnation.—F. W. Robertson.

It is not good to speak evil of all whom we know bad; it is worse to judge evil of any who may prove good. To speak ill upon knowledge shows a want of charity; to speak ill upon suspicion shows a want of honesty. I will not speak so bad as I know of many; I will not speak worse than I know of any. To know evil of others and not speak it, is sometimes discretion; to speak evil of others and not know it, is always dishonesty. He may be evil himself who speaks good of others upon knowledge, but he can never be good himself who speaks evil of others upon suspicion.—Arthur Warwick.

We are neither obstinately nor willfully to oppose evils, nor truckle under them for want of courage, but that we are naturally to give way to them, according to their condition and our own, we ought to grant free passage to diseases; and I find they stay less with me who let them alone. And I have lost those which are reputed the most tenacious and obstinate of their own defervescence, without any help or art, and contrary to their rules. Let us a little permit nature to take her own way; she better understands her own affairs than we.—Montaigne.

Keep clear of personalities in conversation. Talk of things, objects, thoughts. The smallest minds occupy themselves with persons. Do not needlessly report ill of others. As far as possible, dwell on the good side of human beings. There are family boards where a constant process of depreciating, assigning motives, and cutting up character goes forward. They are not pleasant places. One who is healthy does not wish to dine at a dissecting table. There is evil enough in man, God knows. But it is not the mission of every young man and woman to detail and report it all. Keep the atmosphere as pure as possible, and fragrant with gentleness and charity.—John Hall.

Evolution

Let the great world spin forever down the ringing grooves of change.—Tennyson.

Evolution ever climbing after some ideal good
And Reversion ever dragging Evolution in the mud. —Tennyson.

The expression often used by Mr. Herbert Spencer of the Survival of the Fittest is more accurate, and is sometimes equally convenient.—Charles Darwin.

Is there evil but on earth? Or pain in every peopled sphere?
Well, be grateful for the sounding watchword "Evolution" here. —Tennyson.

The tree of human history, as it has grown from age to age, has been but the unfolding of a single germ—but the development of Christ and Him crucified.—J. McC. Holmes.

Observe constantly that all things take place by change, and accustom thyself to consider that the nature of the universe loves nothing so much as to change the things which are, and to make new things like them.—Marcus Aurelius.

Till o'er the wreck, emerging from the storm,
Immortal Nature lifts her changeful form:
Mounts from her funeral pyre on wings of flame,
And soars and shines, another and the same.
—Erasmus Darwin.

This survival of the fittest, which I have here sought to express in mechanical terms, is that which Mr. Darwin has called "natural selection, or the preservation of favored races in the struggle for life."—Herbert Spencer.

The Lord let the house of a brute to the soul of a man,
And the man said, "Am I your debtor"?
And the Lord—"Not yet: but make it as clean as you can,
And then I will let you a better."
—Tennyson.

As ages roll on there is doubtless a progression in human nature. The intellectual comes to rule the physical, and the moral claims to subordinate both. It is no longer strength of body that prevails, but strength of mind; while the law of God proclaims itself superior to both.—James McCosh.

All true development tends ever to God. Its objective aim is the restoration by the second Adam of the Divine image forfeited by the first; and, incidentally, it transmutes grief into gladness and sighs into songs. But it is always a development in Christ, since it is only "in the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God" that any of our race can come "unto a perfect man."—J. McC. Holmes.

God has been always working, evolving, in His quiet power, from the seeming, the real, from the false, the true

Not for nothing blazed the martyr's fires—not for nothing toiled brave sufferers up successive hills of shame. God's purpose doth not languish. The torture and the trial of the past have been the stern ploughers in His service who never suspended their husbandry, and who have made long their furrows, into those furrows the imperishable seed hath fallen. The heedless world hath trodden it in; tears and blood have watered it; the patient sun hath warmed and cheered it to its ripening; and it shall be ready soon.—Wm. M. Punshon.

Exaggeration

We weaken what we exaggerate.—La Harpe.

There is no greater sin than to be trop prononcé.—Beaconsfield.

Exaggeration is a blood relation to falsehood and nearly as blamable.—Hosea Ballou.

Exaggeration misleads the credulous and offends the perceptive.—Eliza Cook.

There would be few enterprises of great labor or hazard undertaken if we had not the power of magnifying the advantages which we persuade ourselves to expect from them.—Dr. Johnson.

Never believe extraordinary characters which you hear of people. Depend upon it, they are exaggerated. You do not see one man shoot a great deal higher than another.—Dr. Johnson.

Examination

Examinations are formidable even to the best prepared, for the greatest fool may ask more than the wisest man can answer.

Example

Example is more forcible than precept. People look at my six days in the week to see what I mean on the seventh.—Rev. R. Cecil.

Examples hasten deeds to good effects.—Mirror for Magistrates.

Much more profitable and gracious is doctrine by example than by rule.—Spenser.

A true life is at once interpreter and proof of the gospel.—Whittier.

The best teachers of humanity are the lives of great men.—C. H. Fowler.

Example is more efficacious than precept.—Johnson.

We can do more good by being good than in any other way.—Rowland Hill.

Children have more need of models than of critics.—Joubert.

Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.—Goldsmith.

Content to follow when we lead the way.—Homer.

Advice may be wrong, but examples prove themselves.—H. W. Shaw.

Ill patterns are sure to be followed more than good rules.—Locke.

People seldom improve when they have no other model but themselves to copy after.—Goldsmith.

No reproof or denunciation is so potent as the silent influence of a good example.—Hosea Ballou.

Man is an imitative creature, and whoever is foremost leads the herd.—Schiller.

I am satisfied that we are less convinced by what we hear than by what we see.—Herodotus.

No man is so insignificant as to be sure his example can do no hurt.—Lord Clarendon.

How far that little candle throws his beams! So shines a good deed in a naughty world.—Shakespeare.

None preaches better than the ant, and she says nothing.—Franklin.

Example is contagious behavior.—
Charles Reade.

By his life alone,
Gracious and sweet, the better way was shown. —Whittier.

Thieves for their robbery have authority, when judges steal themselves.—Shakespeare.

The road by precepts is tedious, by example, short and efficacious.—Seneca.

Children will imitate their fathers in their vices, seldom in their repentance.—Spurgeon.

We live in an age that hath more need of good example than precepts.—
George Herbert.

Example is a dangerous lure; where the wasp got through the gnat sticks fast.—La Fontaine.

There are follies which are caught like contagious diseases.—Rochefou-cauld.

Other men are lenses through which we read our own minds.—Emerson.

Example acquires tenfold authority when it speaks from the grave.—Wendell Phillips.

Example is the school of mankind, and they will learn at no other.—
Burke.

Every man is bound to tolerate the act of which he himself has set the example.—Phædrus.

He who should teach men to die, would at the same time teach them to live.—Montaigne.

I do not give you to posterity as a pattern to imitate, but as an example to deter.—Junius.

Why doth one man's yawning make another yawn?—Burton.

It is a world of mischief that may be done by a single example of avarice or luxury. One voluptuous palate makes many more.—Seneca.

First find the man in yourself if you will inspire manliness in others.—
A. Bronson Alcott.

Example is a motive of very prevailing force on the actions of men.—
Rogers.

They asked Lucian the fabulist,
From whom did you learn manners?
He answered, From the unmannerly.—
Saadi.

"Not the cry, but the flight of a wild duck," says a Chinese author, "leads the flock to fly and follow."—Richter.

Examples would indeed be excellent things were not people so modest that none will set, and so vain that none will follow them.—Hare.

My advice is to consult the lives of other men, as we would a looking-glass, and from thence fetch examples for our own imitation.—Terence.

Alexander received more bravery of mind by the pattern of Achilles than by hearing the definition of fortitude.
—Sir P. Sidney.

He was indeed the glass
Wherein the noble youth did dress themselves. —Shakespeare.

This noble ensample to his sheepe he gaf,—
That firste he wroughte and afterwarde he taughte. —Chaucer.

Happy thou that learnest from another's griefs, not to subject thyself to the same.—Tibullus.

I shall tread in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessor.—Martin Van Buren, Complimenting Gen. Jackson.

It is well to learn from the misfortunes of others what should be avoided.
—Syrus.

Preaching is of much avail, but practice is far more effective. A godly life is the strongest argument that you can offer to the skeptic.—Hosea Ballou.

Whence do you derive the power and privilege of a parent, when you, though an old man, do worse things (than your child)?—Juvenal.

The people are fashioned according to the example of their kings; and edicts are of less power than the life of the ruler.—Claudianus.

A man improves more by reading the story of a person eminent for prudence and virtue, than by the finest rules and precepts of morality.—Addison.

There is a transcendent power in example. We reform others unconsciously when we walk uprightly.—Madame Swetchine.

So work the honey-bees—creatures that, by a rule in nature, teach the art of order to a peopled kingdom.—Shakespeare.

What you learn from bad habits and in bad society you will never forget, and it will be a lasting pang to you.—John B. Gough.

The corruption of the positively wicked is often less sad and fatal to society than the irregularities of a virtuous man who yields and falls.—Desmahis.

Be a pattern to others, and then all will go well; for as a whole city is infected by the licentious passions and vices of great men, so it is likewise reformed by their moderation.—Cicero.

Examples of vicious courses practiced in a domestic circle corrupt more readily and more deeply when we behold them in persons in authority.—Juvenal.

It is certain that either wise bearing or ignorant carriage is caught, as men take disease, one of another; therefore let men take heed of their company.—Shakespeare.

No man or woman of the humblest sort can really be strong, gentle, pure, and good, without the world being the better for it, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.—Phillips Brooks.

There are bad examples which are worse than crimes; and more states have perished from the violation of morality than from the violation of law.—Montesquieu.

Men trust rather to their eyes than to their ears; the effect of precepts is therefore slow and tedious, whilst that of examples is summary and effectual.—Seneca.

Men judge things more fully by the eye than by the ear; consequently a minister's practice is as much regarded, if not more, than his sermons.—Bridges.

Precept is instruction written in the sand, the tide flows over it and the record is gone. Example is graven on the rock, and the lesson is not soon lost.—Channing.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.
—Longfellow.

These taught us how to live; and (oh, too high
The price for knowledge!) taught us how to die.
—Thomas Tickell.

We are more speedily and fatally corrupted by domestic examples of vice, and particularly when they are impressed on our minds as from authority.—Horace.

Nothing enlarges the gulf of atheism more than the wide passage which lies between the faith and lives of men pretending to teach Christianity.—Stillingleet.

A wise and good man will turn examples of all sorts to his own advantage. The good he will make his patterns, and strive to equal or excel them. The bad he will by all means avoid.—Thomas à Kempis.

When we see men of worth, we should think of becoming like them;

when we see men of a contrary character, we should turn inward and examine ourselves.—Confucius.

The common people do not judge of vice or virtue by morality or immorality, so much as by the stamp that is set upon it by men of figure.—L'Estrange.

It is a well-known psychological fact that the conscience of children is formed by the influences that surround them; and that their notions of good and evil are the result of the moral atmosphere they breathe.—Kichter.

The pulpit only "teaches" to be honest; the market-place "trains" to overreaching and fraud; and teaching has not a tithe of the efficiency of training. Christ never wrote a tract, but He went about doing good.—Horace Mann.

Whatever parent gives his children good instruction, and sets them at the same time a bad example, may be considered as bringing them food in one hand and poison in the other.—Balguy.

Tarquin and Cæsar had each his Brutus—Charles the First his Cromwell—and George the Third—"Treason!" shouted the speaker)—may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it.—Patrick Henry.

As a neighboring funeral terrifies sick misers, and fear obliges them to have some regard for themselves; so, the disgrace of others will often deter tender minds from vice.—Horace.

Think not, Sultan, that in the sequestered vale alone dwells virtue, and her sweet companion, with attentive eye, mild, affable benevolence! No, the first great gift we can bestow on others is a good example.—Sir Charles Morell.

Be more prudent for your children than perhaps you have been for yourself. When they, too, are parents they will imitate you, and each of you will have prepared happy generations, who will transmit, together with your memory, the worship of your wisdom.—La Beaume.

Nothing is so contagious as example; never was there any considerable good or ill done that does not produce its like. We imitate good actions through emulation, and bad ones through a malignity in our nature, which shame conceals, and example sets at liberty.—Rochefoucauld.

For as the light
Not only serves to show, but render us
Mutually profitable; so our lives,
In acts exemplary, not only win Ourselves good names, but do to others give Matter for virtuous deeds, by which we live.
—Chapman.

Example has more followers than reason. We unconsciously imitate what pleases us, and insensibly approximate to the characters we most admire. In this way, a generous habit of thought and of action carries with it an incalculable influence.—Bovee.

Example comes in by the eyes and ears, and slips insensibly into the heart, and so into the outward practice, by a kind of secret charm, transforming men's minds and manners into his own likeness.—Waterland.

I question if Epicurus and Hume have done mankind a greater service by the looseness of their doctrines than by the purity of their lives. Of such men we may more justly exclaim, than of Cæsar, "Confound their virtues, they've undone the world!"—Colton.

The efficacy of good examples in the formation of public opinion is incalculable. Though men justify their conduct by reasons, and sometimes bring the very rules of virtue to the touchstone of abstraction, yet they principally act from example.—Robert Hall.

So admirably hath God disposed of the ways of men, that even the sight of vice in others is like a warning arrow shot for us to take heed. We should correct our own faults by seeing how uncomely they appear in others; who will not abhor a choleric passion, and a saucy pride in himself, that sees how ridiculous and contemptible they render those who are infested with them?—J. Beaumont.

The character, the counsels and example of our Washington * * * they will guide us through the doubts and difficulties that beset us; they will guide our children and our children's children in the paths of prosperity and peace, while America shall hold her place in the family of nations.—Edward Everett.

If thou desire to see thy child virtuous, let him not see his father's vices; thou canst not rebuke that in children that they behold practiced in thee; till reason be ripe, examples direct more than precepts; such as thy behavior is before they children's faces, such commonly is theirs behind their parents' backs.—Quarles.

Though "the words of the wise be as nails fastened by the masters of the assemblies," yet sure their examples are the hammer to drive them in to take the deeper hold. A father that whipped his son for swearing, and swore himself whilst he whipped him, did more harm by his example than good by his correction.—Fuller.

Excellence

To excel is to live.—Beranger.

There is no excellence uncoupled with difficulties.—Ovid.

The variation of excellence among men is rather in degree than in kind.—Bancroft.

It is the witness still of excellency to put a strange face on his own perfection.—Shakespeare.

If you want enemies, excel others; if you want friends, let others excel you.—Colton.

When a man appreciates only eating and sleeping, what excellence has he over the reptiles?—Saadi.

The more we sympathize with excellence, the more we go out of self,

the more we love, the broader and deeper is our personality.—Chapin.

A man that is desirous to excel should endeavor it in those things that are in themselves most excellent.—Epictetus.

Those who attain any excellence commonly spend life in one common pursuit; for excellence is not often gained upon easier terms.—Johnson.

He who excels in his art so as to carry it to the utmost height of perfection of which it is capable may be said in some measure to go beyond it: his transcendent productions admit of no appellations.—La Bruyère.

Born to excel, and to command!
As by transcendent beauty to attract
All eyes, so by pre-eminence of soul
To rule all hearts. —Congreve.

What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again.
—Emerson.

There is a moral excellence attainable by all who have the will to strive after it; but there is an intellectual and physical superiority which is above the reach of our wishes, and is granted to a few only.—Crabb.

Human excellence, parted from God, is like a fable flower, which, according to Rabbis, Eve plucked when passing out of paradise—severed from its native root, it is only the touching memorial of a lost Eden; sad, while charming—beautiful, but dead.—C. Stanford.

Excellence is never granted to man, but as the reward of labor. It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in the habits of industry, without the pleasure of perceiving those advantages which, like the hands of a clock, whilst they make hourly approaches to their point, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The desire of excellence is the necessary attribute of those who excel. We work little for a thing unless we wish for it. But we cannot of ourselves estimate the degree of our success in what we strive for; that task is left to others. With the desire for excellence comes, therefore, the desire for approbation. And this distinguishes intellectual excellence from moral excellence; for the latter has no necessity of human tribunal; it is more inclined to shrink from the public than to invite the public to be its judge.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Excelsior

By steps we may ascend to God.—Milton.

Fearless minds climb soonest unto crowns.—Shakespeare.

O sacred hunger of ambitious minds! Spenser.

Too low they build who build beneath the stars.—Young.

The movement of the species is upward, irresistibly upward.—Bancroft.

Man can only learn to rise from the consideration of that which he cannot surmount.—Richter.

The little done vanishes from the sight of man, who looks forward to what is still to do.—Goethe.

Whilst we converse with what is above us, we do not grow old, but grow young.—Emerson.

Lifted up so high I disdained subjection, and thought one step higher would set me highest.—Milton.

It is but a base, ignoble mind that mounts no higher than a bird can soar.—Shakespeare.

Lift thyself up, look around, and see something higher and brighter than earth, earthworms, and earthly darkness.—Richter.

Our natures are like oil; compound us with anything, yet still we strive to swim upon the top.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

What we truly and earnestly aspire to be, that in some sense we are. The mere aspiration, by changing the frame of the mind, for the moment realizes itself.—Mrs. Jameson.

Who shoots at the midday sun, though he be sure he shall never hit the mark, yet as sure he is that he shall shoot higher than he who aims but at a bush.—Sir P. Sidney.

Besides the pleasure derived from acquired knowledge, there lurks in the mind of man, and tinged with a shade of sadness, an unsatisfactory longing for something beyond the present, a striving towards regions yet unknown and unopened.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Darwin remarks that we are less dazzled by the light at waking, if we have been dreaming of visible objects. Happy are those who have here dreamt of a higher vision! They will the sooner be able to endure the glories of the world to come.—Novalis.

Bright and illustrious illusions! Who can blame, who laugh at the boy, who not admire and commend him, for that desire of a fame outlasting the Pyramids by which he insensibly learns to live in a life beyond the present, and nourish dreams of a good unattainable by the senses?—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is not to taste sweet things, but to do noble and true things, and vindicate himself under God's heaven as a God-made man, that the poorest son of Adam dimly longs. Show him the way of doing that, the dullest day-drudge kindles into a hero. They wrong man greatly who say he is to be seduced by ease. Difficulty, abnegation, martyrdom, death, are the allurements that act on the heart of man. Kindle the inner genial life of him, you have a flame that burns up all lower considerations.—Carlyle.

Exceptions

The exceptions of the scrupulous put one in mind of some general pardons where everything is forgiven except crimes.—Fielding.

Excess

Excess always carries its own retribution.—Ouida.

Allow not nature more than nature needs.—Shakespeare.

Excess weakens the spirits.—Confucius.

Excess of power intoxicates.—Mme. de Rémusat.

All is wholesome in the absence of excess.—Molière.

The ass bears the load, but not the overload.—Cervantes.

A surfeit or the sweetest things
The deepest loathing to the stomach brings.
—Shakespeare.

Let pleasure be ever so innocent, the excess is always criminal.—St. Evremond.

Every morsel to a satisfied hunger is only a new labor to a tired digestion.—South.

Of what delights are we deprived by our excesses!—Joubert.

Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil.—Shakespeare.

To gild refined gold, to paint the lily, is wasteful and ridiculous excess.—Shakespeare.

They are sick that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing.—Shakespeare.

He does nothing who endeavors to do more than is allowed to humanity.—Johnson.

The excesses of our youth are drafts upon our old age, payable with interest, about thirty years after date.—Colton.

As surfeit is the father of much fast, so every scope by the immoderate use turns to restraint.—Shakespeare.

Let us teach ourselves that honorable step, not to outdo discretion.—Shakespeare.

The body oppressed by excesses bears down the mind, and depresses to the earth any portion of the divine spirit we had been endowed with.—Horace.

There can be no excess to love, none to knowledge, none to beauty, when these attributes are considered in the purest sense.—Emerson.

Excessive liberty and excessive servitude are equally dangerous, and produce nearly the same effect.—Zoroaster.

The eye that gazes upon the sun sees not the orb it looks upon, confounded by the excess of its brightness.—Metastasio.

We cannot employ the mind to advantage when we are filled with excessive food and drink.—Cicero.

Most persons are disposed to expend more than they can afford, and to indulge more than they can endure.—Mme. de Puisieux.

The excess of the voluptuary, like the austerities of the recluse, triumphs in the suffrage of perverted reason.—Dr. Parr.

Violent delights have violent ends, and in their triumph die; like fire and powder, which as they kiss consume.—Shakespeare.

In the history of man it has been very generally the case that when evils have grown insufferable they have touched the point of cure.—Chapin.

To regard the excesses of the passions as maladies has so salutary an effect that this idea renders all moral sermons useless.—Boiste.

The misfortune is that when man has found honey, he enters upon the feast with an appetite so voracious that he usually destroys his own delight by excess and satiety.—Knox.

Too much of a good thing.—Shakespeare.

As frost, raised to its utmost intensity, produces the sensation of fire, so any good quality, overwrought and pushed to excess, turns into its own contrary.—William Matthews.

He who indulges his sense in any excesses renders himself obnoxious to his own reason; and, to gratify the brute in him, displeases the man, and sets his two natures at variance.—Walter Scott.

The desire of power in excess caused angels to fall; the desire of knowledge in excess caused man to fall; but in charity is no excess, neither can man nor angels come into danger by it.—Bacon.

If a man get a fever, or a pain in the head with overdrinking, we are subject to curse the wine, when we should rather impute it to ourselves for the excess.—Erasmus.

Pleasures bring effeminacy, and effeminacy foreruns ruin; such conquests, without blood or sweat, sufficiently do revenge themselves upon their intemperate conquerors.—Quarles.

The body, too, with yesterday's excess
Burden'd and tired shall the pure soul depress;

Weigh down this portion of celestial birth,
The breath of God, and fix it to the earth.
—Francis.

Even in evil, that dark cloud which hangs over the creation, we discern rays of light and hope, and gradually come to see in suffering and temptation proofs and instruments of the sublimest purposes of wisdom and love.—Channing.

In its primary signification, all vice, that is, all excess, brings on its own punishment, even here. By certain fixed, settled and established laws of Him who is the God of nature, excess of every kind destroys that constitution which temperance would preserve. The debauchee offers up his body a "living sacrifice to sin."—Colton.

The greatest miracle that the Almighty could perform would be to make a bad man happy, even in heaven; he must unparadise that blessed place to accomplish it. In its primary signification, all vice—that is, all excess—brings its own punishment even here.—Colton.

It is a common thing to screw up justice to the pitch of an injury. A man may be over-righteous, and why not over-grateful, too? There is a mischievous excess that borders so close upon ingratitude that it is no easy matter to distinguish the one from the other; but, in regard that there is good-will in the bottom of it, however distempered; for it is effectually but kindness out of the wits.—Seneca.

There is no unmixed good in human affairs; the best principles, if pushed to excess, degenerate into fatal vices. Generosity is nearly allied to extravagance; charity itself may lead to ruin; the sternness of justice is but one step removed from the severity of oppression. It is the same in the political world; the tranquillity of despotism resembles the stagnation of the Dead Sea; the fever of innovation the tempests of the ocean. It would seem as if, at particular periods, from causes inscrutable to human wisdom, a universal frenzy seizes mankind; reason, experience, prudence, are alike blinded; and the very classes who are to perish in the storm are the first to raise its fury.—Sir A. Alison.

Excitement

He used to raise a storm in a teapot.—Cicero.

Women of the world crave excitement.—Chamfort.

Excitement is the drunkenness of the spirits. Only calm waters reflect heaven in their bosom.—Marguerite de Valois.

Excitement is not enjoyment; in calmness lies true pleasure. The most precious wines are sipped, not bolted at a swallow.—Victor Hugo.

Excuse

An excuse is worse and more terrible than a lie; for an excuse is a lie guarded.—Pope.

Men think they may justly do that for which they have a precedent.—Cicero.

Ofentimes, excusing of a fault
Doth make the fault the worse by the excuse;

As patches, set upon a little breach,
Discredit more in hiding of the fault,
Than did the fault before it was so patched.
—Shakespeare.

An excuse for sin is a statement of the circumstances under which a man did wrong. When we say, "I could not help it; circumstances were too much for me," do our hearts believe it to be true? We say, "My temperament, my inherited appetite, business exigencies, irresistible pressure," as though we were compelled to do wrong. The first man in the long line of apologetic succession said, "The woman tempted me, but did not say, 'and made me eat.'" Whatever he might wish implied, he could only say, "And I did eat." No unconsenting soul can be made to sin, and so sin is inexcusable.

Execution

See they suffer death;
But in their deaths remember they are men;
Strain not the laws to make their tortures grievous. —Addison.

I have seen
When, after execution, judgment hath Repented o'er his doom.
—Shakespeare.

Exercise

Let exercise alternate with rest.—Pythagoras.

It is exercise alone that supports the spirits, and keeps the mind in vigor.—Cicero.

A man must often exercise or fast or take physic, or be sick.—Sir W. Temple.

Exercise is the chief source of improvement in all our faculties.—Blair.

Vigorous exercise will often fortify a feeble constitution.—Mrs. Sigourney.

You will never live to my age without you keep yourself in breath with exercise.—Sir P. Sidney.

I take the true definition of exercise to be labor without weariness.—Johnson.

Such is the constitution of man that labor may be said to be its own reward.—Dr. Johnson.

The wise for cure on exercise depend: God never made His work for man to mend.—Dryden.

Often try what weight you can support,
And what your shoulders are too weak to bear.
—Roscommon.

Take a walk to refresh yourself with the open air, which inspired fresh doth exceedingly recreate the lungs, heart and vital spirits.—Harvey.

Weariness
Can snore upon the flint, when resty sloth Finds the down pillow hard.
—Shakespeare.

There are many troubles which you cannot cure by the Bible and the hymn-book, but which you can cure by a good perspiration and a breath of fresh air.—Beecher.

By looking into physical causes our minds are opened and enlarged; and in this pursuit, whether we take or whether we lose the game, the chase is certainly of service.—Burke.

No body's healthful without exercise:
Just wars are exercises of a state;
Virtue's in motion, and contends to rise,
With generous ascents above a mate.
—Aleyn.

In those vernal seasons of the year when the air is soft and pleasant, it were an injury and sullenness against nature not to go out and see her riches and partake of her rejoicings with heaven and earth.—Milton.

Labor or exercise ferments the humors, casts them into their proper channels, throws off redundances, and helps nature in those secret distributions without which the body cannot subsist in its vigor nor the soul act with cheerfulness.—Addison.

Exertion

With every exertion, the best of men can do but a moderate amount of good; but it seems in the power of the most contemptible individual to do incalculable mischief.—Washington Irving.

Exile

What exile from himself can flee.—Byron.

Beloved country! banish'd from thy shore,
A stranger in this prison-house of clay,
The exil'd spirit weeps and sighs for thee!
Heavenward the bright perfections I adore direct. —Longfellow.

An exile, ill in heart and frame,—
A wanderer, weary of the way;—
A stranger, without love's sweet claim
On any heart, go where I may!
—Mrs. Osgood.

"Farewell, my Spain! a long farewell!" he cried.

"Perhaps I may revisit thee no more,
But die, as many an exiled heart hath died,
Of its own thirst to see again thy shore."
—Byron.

Even now, as, wandering upon Erie's shore,
I hear Niagara's distant cataract roar,
I sigh for England—oh! these weary feet
Have many a mile to journey, ere we meet.
—Moore.

There came to the beach a poor Exile of Erin;
The dew on his thin robe was heavy and chill
For his country he sighed, when at twilight repairing,
To wander alone by the wind-beaten hill.
—Campbell.

Home, kindred, friends, and country—these
Are ties with which we never part;
From clime to clime, o'er land and seas,
We bear them with us in our heart:
But, oh! 't is hard to feel resign'd,
When these must all be left behind!
—J. Montgomery.

Exile is terrible to those who have, as it were, a circumscribed habitation: but not to those who look upon the whole globe but as one city.—Cicero.

Oh! when shall I visit the land of my birth,
The loveliest land on the face of the earth?
When shall I those scenes of affection explore,
Our forests, our fountains,
Our hamlets, our mountains,
With the pride of our mountains, the maid I adore?

Oh! when shall I dance on the daisy-white mead,
In the shade of an elm, to the sound of the reed?
—Montgomery.

But me, not destined such delights to share,
My prime of life in wandering spent and care;
Impell'd, with steps unceasing, to pursue
Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the view
That, like the circle bounding earth and skies,
Allures from far, yet, as I follow, flies;
My fortune leads to traverse realms alone,
And find no spot of all the world my own.
—Goldsmith.

Expectation

Expectation ends only in heaven.—St. Kentijern.

'T is expectation makes a blessing dear.—Pope.

To-day for thee, and to-morrow for me.—Cervantes.

Everything comes if a man will only wait.—Benj. Disraeli.

With what a heavy and retarding weight
Does expectation load the wing of time.
—Mason.

Every beginning is cheerful; the threshold is the place of expectation.—Goethe.

Those who live on expectation are sure to be disappointed.—Joachim Murat.

The gratitude of place expectants is a lively sense of future favors.—Sir Robert Walpole.

Great expectations are better than a poor possession.—Cervantes.

We anticipate our own happiness, and eat out the heart and sweetness of worldly pleasures by delightful forethought of them.—Tillotson.

They that marry ancient people merely in expectation to bury them, hang themselves in hope that one will come and cut the halter.—Fuller.

Of Expectation fails, and most oft there
Where most it promises.

—Shakespeare.

'Tis Expectation makes a blessing dear;
Heaven were not heaven, if we knew what it were.

—Sir J. Suckling.

He who will lose a present good for one in expectation hath some wit, but a small store of wisdom.—Bias.

Expectation whirls me round.
The imaginary relish is so sweet
That it enchants my sense.

—Shakespeare.

Oh! how impatience gains upon the soul
When the long-promis'd hour of joy draws near!

How slow the tardy moments seem to roll!
What spectres rise of inconsistent fear!

—Mrs. Tighe.

So tedious is this day,
As is the night before some festival
To an impatient child, that hath new robes,
And may not wear them.

—Shakespeare.

How slow
This old moon wanes! she lingers my desires,
Like to a stepdame, or a dowager,
Long withering out a young man's revenue.

—Shakespeare.

How the time
Loiters in expectation! Then the mind
Drags the dead burden of a hundred years
In one short moment's space. The nimble heart

Beats with impatient throbs,—sick of delay,
And pants to be at ease.

—Havard.

Although I enter not,
Yet round about the spot
Ofttimes I hover;
And near the sacred gate,
With longing eyes I wait,
Expectant of her.

—Thackeray.

The great source of pleasure is variety. Uniformity must tire at last, though it be uniformity of excellence.
We love to expect, and when expectation is disappointed or gratified, we want to be again expecting.—Johnson.

Uncertainty and expectation are joys of life. Security is an insipid thing; and the overtaking and possessing of a wish discovers the folly of the chase.—Congreve.

Expediency

Expediency is the science of exigencies.—Kossuth.

Expediency often silences justice.—
Seneca.

Expediency is a law of nature. The camel is a wonderful animal, but the desert made the camel.—Beaconsfield.

It is not expedient or wise to examine our friends too closely; few persons are raised in our esteem by a close examination.—Rochefoucauld.

Nothing but the right can ever be expedient, since that can never be true expediency which would sacrifice a great good to a less.—Whately.

Experience

Experience is the extract of suffering.—Arthur Helps.

Experience is retrospect knowledge.—Hosea Ballou.

The bitter past, more welcome is the sweet.—Shakespeare.

Alas, could experience be bought for gold!—Mme. Deluzy.

Experience converts us to ourselves when books fail us.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Years teach us more than books.—
Auerbach.

Believe one who has tried it.—
Virgil.

The finest poetry was first experience.—Emerson.

Great men never require experience.
—Beaconsfield.

God sends experience to paint men's portraits.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Experience makes us wise.—Hazlitt.

All is but lip wisdom which wants experience.—Sir P. Sidney.

Making all futures fruits of all the past.—Edwin Arnold.

Experience is our only teacher both in war and peace.—Landor.

Only so much do I know, as I have lived.—Emerson.

Long-travelled in the ways of men.—Young.

Who heeds not experience, trust him not.—John Boyle O'Reilly.

He jests at scars, that never felt a wound.—Shakespeare.

Experience is the teacher of fools.—Livy.

Experience wounded is the school where man learns piercing wisdom out of smart.—Lord Brooke.

Experience does take dreadfully high school-wages, but he teaches like no other.—Carlyle.

Men may rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things.
—Tennyson.

Our ancestors have travelled the iron age; the golden is before us.—Bernardin de St. Pierre.

Experience is by industry achieved,
And perfected by the swift course of time.
—Shakespeare.

Experience is always sowing the seed of one thing after another.—Manilius.

What we gain by experience is not worth that we lose in illusion.—J. Petit-Senn.

What is every year of a wise man's life but a censure or critic on the past?—Pope.

One thorn of experience is worth a whole wilderness of warning.—Lowell.

Theories are very thin and unsubstantial: experience only is tangible.—Hosea Ballou.

What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?—Shakespeare.

It is the nature of experience to come to us only when too late for use.—Mme. de Rieux.

Experience teaches slowly, and at the cost of mistakes.—Froude.

Experience is the only prophecy of wise men.—Lamartine.

History should be to the political economist a wellspring of experience and wisdom.—Gibbon.

Is there any one so wise as to learn by the experience of others?—Voltaire.

We gain justice, judgment, with years, or else years are in vain.—Owen Meredith.

To Truth's house there is a single door, which is experience.—Bayard Taylor.

Experience is a jewel, and it had need be so, for it is often purchased at an infinite rate.—Shakespeare.

To some purpose is that man wise who gains his wisdom at another's expense.—Plautus.

Experience join'd with common sense,
To mortals is a providence. —Green.

Oh, who can tell, save he whose heart hath tried?
—Byron.

A sadder and a wiser man,
He rose the morrow morn.
—Coleridge.

He teaches best,
Who feels the hearts of all men in his breast,
And knows their strength or weakness through his own. —Bayard Taylor.

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience.—Patrick Henry.

Experience is no more transferable in morals than in art.—Froude.

In almost everything, experience is more valuable than precept.—Quintilian.

Nobody will use other people's experience, nor have any of his own till it is too late to use it.—Hawthorne.

Each succeeding day is the scholar of that which preceded.—Publius Syrus.

Experience is the name men give to their follies or their sorrows.—Alfred de Musset.

Experience, that chill touchstone whose sad proof reduces all things from their hue.—Byron.

The ever-burning lamp of accumulated wisdom.—G. W. Curtis.

That experience which does not make us better makes us worse.—J. Petit-Senn.

I had rather have a fool to make me merry than experience to make me sad.—Shakespeare.

We are often prophets to others only because we are our own historians.—Mme. Swetchine.

Experience is a keen knife that hurts while it extracts the cataract that blinds.—De Finod.

A man who does not learn to live while he is getting a living is a poorer man after his wealth is won than he was before.—J. G. Holland.

To most men, experience is like the stern lights of a ship, which illumine only the track it has passed.—Coleridge.

Everything is worth seeing once, and the more one sees the less one either wonders or admires.—Chesterfield.

To have a true idea of man or of life, one must have stood himself on the brink of suicide, or on the door-sill of insanity, at least once.—Taine.

Experience is a grindstone; and it is lucky for us if we can get brightened by it, and not ground.—H. W. Shaw.

I scarcely exceed the middle age of man; yet between infancy and maturity I have seen ten revolutions!—Lamartine.

Ah! the youngest heart has the same waves within it as the oldest, but without the plummet which can measure their depths.—Richter.

I think there are stores laid up in our human nature that our understandings can make no complete inventory of.—George Eliot.

Would they could sell us experience, though at diamond prices, but then no one would use the article second-hand!—Balzac.

Experience is the common school-house of fools and ill men. Men of wit and honesty be otherwise instructed.—Erasmus.

The experience of others adds to our knowledge, but not to our wisdom; that is dearer-bought.—Hosea Ballou.

The only faith that wears well and holds its color in all weathers is that which is woven of conviction, and set with the sharp mordant of experience.—Lowell.

To wilful men,
The injuries that they themselves procure
Must be their school-masters.—Shakespeare.

Experience is a safe light to walk by, and he is not a rash man who expects to succeed in future from the same means which have secured it in times past.—Wendell Phillips.

Experience only can teach men not to prefer what strikes them for the present moment, to what will have much greater weight with them hereafter.—Lord Chesterfield.

The head learns new things, but the heart forevermore practices old experiences. Therefore our life is but a new form of the way men have lived from the beginning.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Too high an appreciation of our own talents is the chief cause why experience preaches to us all in vain.—Colton.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven.—Young.

Conflicts bring experience; and experience brings that growth in grace which is not to be attained by any other means.—Spurgeon.

Oft have I thought—jabber as he will, how learned soever, man knows nothing but what he has learned from experience!—Wieland.

This is one of the sad conditions of life, that experience is not transmissible. No man will learn from the suffering of another; he must suffer himself.—Aughey.

Taught by experience to know my own blindness, shall I speak as if I could not err, and as if others might not in some disputed points be more enlightened than myself?—Channing.

I learn several great truths; as that it is impossible to see into the ways of futurity, that punishment always attends the villain, that love is the fond soother of the human breast.—Goldsmith.

It may serve as a comfort to us in all our calamities and afflictions that he that loses anything and gets wisdom by it is a gainer by the loss.—L'Estrange.

Experience unveils too late the snares laid for youth; it is the white frost which discovers the spider's web when the flies are no longer there to be caught.—J. Petit-Senn.

The petty cares, the minute anxieties, the infinite littles which go to make up the sum of human experience, like the invisible granules of powder, give the last and highest polish to a character.—William Matthews.

Every man's experience of to-day is that he was a fool yesterday and the day before yesterday. To-morrow he will most likely be of exactly the same opinion.—Charles Mackay.

In all instances where our experience of the past has been extensive and uniform, our judgment concerning the future amounts to moral certainty.—Beattie.

Experience, next, to thee I owe,
Best guide; not following thee, I had remain'd
In ignorance; thou open'st wisdom's way,
And giv'st access, though secret she retire.—Milton.

What matters it that a soldier has a sword of dazzling finish, of the keenest edge, and finest temper, if he has never learned the art of fence.—William Matthews.

All reasoning is retrospect; it consists in the application of facts and principles previously known. This will show the very great importance of knowledge, especially of that kind called experience.—J. Foster.

Thou shalt know by experience how salt the savor is of other's bread, and how sad a path it is to climb and descend another's stairs.—Dante.

Learn the lesson of your own pain—learn to seek God, not in any single event of past history, but in your own soul—in the constant verifications of experience, in the life of Christian love.—Mrs. Humphry Ward.

There are many arts among men, the knowledge of which is acquired bit by bit by experience. For it is experience that causeth our life to move forward by the skill we acquire, while want of experience subjects us to the effects of chance.—Plato.

He hazardeth much who depends for his learning on experience. An unhappy master, he that is only made wise by many shipwrecks; a miserable merchant, that is neither rich nor wise till he has been bankrupt. By experience we find out a short way by a long wandering.—Roger Ascham.

Experience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other, and scarcely in that; for it is true, we may give advice, but we cannot give conduct. Remember this; they that will not be counseled cannot be helped. If you do not hear reason she will rap you over your knuckles.—Franklin.

What man would be wise, let him drink of the river
That bears on his bosom the record of time;
A message to him every wave can deliver
To teach him to creep till he knows how to climb. —John Boyle O'Reilly.

Not only the individual experience slowly acquired, but the accumulated experience of the race, organized in language, condensed in instruments and axioms, and in what may be called the inherited intuitions—these form the multiple unity which is expressed in the abstract term "experience."—G. H. Lewes.

Experience: in that all our knowledge is founded; and from that it ultimately derives itself. Our observation employed either about external or sensible objects or about the internal operations of our minds, perceived and reflected on by ourselves, is that which supplies our understandings with all the materials of thinking.—John Locke.

Each successive generation plunges into the abyss of passion, without the slightest regard to the fatal effects which such conduct has produced upon their predecessors; and lament, when too late, the rashness with which they slighted the advice of experience, and stifled the voice of reason.—Steele.

Young men are as apt to think themselves wise enough, as drunken men are to think themselves sober enough. They look upon spirit to be a much better thing than experience; which they call coldness. They are but half mistaken; for though spirit without experience is dangerous, experience without spirit is languid and ineffective.—Chesterfield.

Just as a tested and rugged virtue of the moral hero is worth more than the lovely, tender, untried innocence of the child, so is the massive strength of a soul that has conquered truth for itself worth more than the soft peach-bloom faith of a soul that takes truth on trust.—F. E. Abbot.

Behold, we live through all things,—famine, thirst,
Bereavement, pain; all grief and misery,
All woe and sorrow; life inflicts its worst
On soul and body,—but we cannot die,
Though we be sick, and tired, and faint,
and worn,—
Lo, all things can be borne!
—Elizabeth Akers Allen.

If I might venture to appeal to what is so much out of fashion at Paris, I mean to experience, I should tell you that in my course I have known and, according to my measure, have cooperated with great men; and I have never yet seen any plan which has not been mended by the observations of those who were much inferior in understanding to the person who took the lead in the business.—Burke.

I know
The past and thence I will essay to glean
A warning for the future, so that man
May profit by his errors, and derive Experience from his folly;
For, when the power of imparting joy
Is equal to the will, the human soul
Requires no other heaven.
—Shelley.

Man little knows what calamities are beyond his patience to bear till he tries them; as in ascending the heights of ambition, which look bright from below, every step we rise shows us some new and gloomy prospect of hidden disappointment; so in our descent from the summits of pleasure, though the vale of misery below may appear, at first, dark and gloomy, yet the busy mind, still attentive to its own amusement, finds, as we descend, something to flatter and to please. Still as we approach, the darkest objects appear to brighten, and the mortal eye becomes adapted to its gloomy situation.—Goldsmith.

No man was ever endowed with a judgment so correct and judicious, in regulating his life, but that circumstances, time and experience would teach him something new, and apprise him that of those things with which he thought himself the best acquainted he knew nothing; and that those ideas which in theory appeared the most advantageous were found, when brought into practice, to be altogether inapplicable.—Terence.

Expression

There's a language in her eye, her cheek,
her lip,
Nay, her foot speaks; her wanton spirits
look out
At every joint and motive of her body.
—Shakespeare.

But true expression, like th' unchanging
sun,
Clears and improves whatever it shines
upon;
It gilds all objects, but it alters none.
—Pope.

Extenuation

Oftentimes excusing of a fault doth make the fault the worse by the excuse; as patches, set upon a little breach, discredit more in hiding of the fault than did the fault before it was so patched.—Shakespeare.

Extravagance

Extravagance is its own destroyer.
—Zeno.

Extravagance is the rich man's pitfall.—Tupper.

Wisdom seldom consorts with extravagance.—Mendemus.

Dreading that climax of all human ills,
The inflammation of his weekly bills.
—Byron.

The man who builds, and wants wherewith
to pay,
Provides a home from which to run away.
—Young.

There is hope in extravagance, there is none in routine.—Emerson.

Expense of time is the most costly of all expenses.—Theophrastus.

If extravagance were a fault, it would not have a place in the festivals of the gods.—Aristippus.

A large retinue upon a small income, like a large cascade upon a small stream, tends to discover its tenuity.—Shenstone.

That is suitable to a man in point of ornamental expense, not which he can afford to have, but which he can afford to lose.—Whately.

He who is extravagant will quickly become poor; and poverty will enforce dependence, and invite corruption.—Dr. Johnson.

Prodigality is indeed the vice of a weak nature, as avarice is of a strong one; it comes of a weak craving for those blandishments of the world which are easily to be had for money.—Henry Taylor.

Profuseness is a cruel and crafty demon, that gradually involves her followers in dependence and debt; that is, fetters them with irons that enter into their souls.—Dr. Johnson.

We sacrifice to dress, till household joys
And comforts cease. Dress drains our cellar dry,
And keeps our larder lean; puts out our fires,
And introduces hunger, frost and woe,
Where peace and hospitality might reign.
—Cowper.

Mansions once
Knew their own masters, and laborious
hinds,
That had surviv'd the father, serv'd the son.
Now the legitimate and rightful lord
Is but a transient guest, newly arrived,
And soon to be supplanted. He that saw
His patrimonial timber cast its leaf,
Sells the last scantling, and transfers the price
To some shrewd sharper ere it buds again.
Estates are landscapes, gazed upon awhile,
Then advertised and auctioneer'd away.
—Cowper.

The passion of acquiring riches in order to support a vain expense corrupts the purest souls.—Fénelon.

When parents put gold into the hands of youth, when they should put a rod under their girdle—when instead of awe they make them past grace, and leave them rich executors of goods, and poor executors of godliness, then it is no marvel that the son being left rich by his father's will, becomes reckless by his own will.—John Lyly.

Extremes

Extremes meet.—Mercier.

Perfect reason avoids all extremes.—Molière.

No violent extreme endures.—Carlyle.

There is danger in all extremes.—James Ellis.

Extremity is the trier of spirits.—Shakespeare.

Women are ever in extremes; they are either better or worse than men.—Bruyère.

Extremes are vicious, and proceed from men; compensation is just, and proceeds from God.—Bruyère.

Men are as much blinded by the extremes of misery as by the extremes of prosperity.—Burke.

Extremes are ever neighbors; 'tis a step from one to the other.—Sheridan Knowles.

Extremes in nature equal good produce, extremes in man concur to general use.—Pope.

Thus each extreme to equal danger tends, Plenty, as well as Want, can separate friends.—Cowley.

Avoid Extremes; and shun the fault of such Who still are pleas'd too little or too much.—Pope.

Shun equally a sombre air and vivacious sallies.—Marcus Antoninus.

Mistrust the man who finds everything good; the man who finds everything evil, and still more, the man who is indifferent to everything.—Lavater.

In everything the middle course is best; all things in excess bring trouble.—Plautus.

Our age knows nothing but reactions, and leaps from one extreme to another.—Niebuhr.

Extreme views are never just; something always turns up which disturbs the calculations formed upon their data.—Beaconsfield.

Those edges soonest turn, that are most keen;

A sober moderation stands secure, No violent extremes endure.—Aleyn.

All extremes are error. The reverse of error is not truth, but error still. Truth lies between these extremes.—Cecil.

That extremes beget extremes is an apothegm built on the most profound observation of the human mind.—Colton.

There is a mean in all things. Even virtue itself hath its stated limits; which not being strictly observed it ceases to be virtue.—Horace.

Extremes are for us as if they were not, and as if we were not in regard to them; they escape from us, or we from them.—Pascal.

We must remember how apt man is to extremes—rushing from credulity and weakness to suspicion and distrust.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Like to the time o' the year between the extremes

Of hot and cold, he was nor sad nor merry.—Shakespeare.

Cruel men are the greatest lovers of mercy, avaricious men of generosity, and proud men of humility; that is to say, in others, not in themselves.—Colton.

Everything runs to excess; every good quality is noxious, if unmixed; and, to carry the danger to the edge of ruin, nature causes each man's peculiarity to superabound.—Emerson.

It is a hard but good law of fate, that as every evil, so every excessive power, wears itself out.—Herder.

Too austere a philosophy makes few wise men; too rigorous politics, few good subjects; too hard a religion, few religious persons whose devotion is of long continuance.—St. Evremond.

The greatest flood has the soonest ebb; the sorest tempest the most sudden calm; the hottest love the coldest end; and from the deepest desire oftentimes ensues the deadliest hate.—Socrates.

Extremes, though contrary, have the like effect; extreme heat mortifies, like extreme cold; extreme love breeds satiety, as well as extreme hatred.—Chapman.

Pleasure and pain, though directly opposite, are yet so contrived by nature as to be constant companions; and it is a fact that the same motions and muscles of the face are employed both in laughing and crying.—Charron.

As great enmities spring from great friendships, and mortal distempers from vigorous health, so do the most surprising and the wildest frenzies from the high and lively agitations of our souls.—Montaigne.

He that had never seen a river imagined the first he met with to be the sea; and the greatest things that have fallen within our knowledge we conclude the extremes that nature makes of the kind.—Montaigne.

Both in individuals and in masses violent excitement is always followed by remission, and often by reaction. We are all inclined to depreciate whatever we have overpraised, and, on the other hand, to show undue indulgence where we have shown undue rigor.—Macaulay.

Extremes are dangerous: a middle estate is safest; as a middle temper of the sea, between a still calm and a violent tempest, is most helpful to convey the mariner to his haven.—Swinnock.

We feel neither extreme heat nor extreme cold; qualities that are in excess are so much at variance with our feelings that they are impalpable: we do not feel them, though we suffer from their effects.—Pascal.

Extremes touch: he who wants no favors from Fortune may be said to have obtained the very greatest that she can bestow, in realizing an independence which no changes can diminish.—Chatfield.

Our senses will not admit anything extreme. Too much noise confuses us, too much light dazzles us, too great distance or nearness prevents vision, too great prolixity or brevity weakens an argument, too much pleasure gives pain, too much accordance annoys.—Pascal.

So near are the boundaries of panegyric and invective, that a worn-out sinner is sometimes found to make the best disclaimer against sin. The same high-seasoned descriptions which in his unregenerate state served to inflame his appetites, in his new province of a moralist will serve him (a little turned) to expose the enormity of those appetites in other men.—Lamb.

'T is in worldly accidents,
As in the world itself, where things most distant
Meet one another: Thus the east and west,
Upon the globe a mathematical point
Only divides: Thus happiness and misery,
And all extremes, are still contiguous.
—Denham.

Let wealth come in by comely thrift,
And not by any sordid shift;
'T is haste
Makes waste;
Extremes have still their fault.
Who gripes too hard the dry and slipp'ry
sand,
Holds none at all, or little, in his hand.
—Herrick.

Extreme old age is childhood; extreme wisdom is ignorance, for so it may be called, since the man whom the oracle pronounced the wisest of men professed that he knew nothing; yea, push a coward to the extreme and he will show courage; oppress a man to the last, and he will rise above oppression.—J. Beaumont.

Eyes

These lovely lamps, these windows of the soul.—Du Bartas.

The eyes are the amulets of the mind.—W. R. Alger.

He travels with his eyes.—Dr. Walter Harte.

Large, musing eyes, neither joyous nor sorry.—Mrs. Browning.

Ah! the soft starlight of virgin eyes.—Balzac.

What a soul, twenty fathom deep, in her eyes!—Leigh Hunt.

Such eyes as may have looked from heaven, but never were raised to it before!—Moore.

Love, anger, pride and avarice all visibly move in those little orbs.—Addison.

A wanton eye is a messenger of an unchaste heart.—St. Augustine.

Love looketh from the eye, and kindly love by looking.—Tupper.

Faster than his tongue did make offense, his eye did heal it up.—Shakespeare.

Drink to me only with thine eyes, and I will pledge with mine.—Ben Jonson.

For brilliancy, no gem compares with the eyes of a beautiful woman.—
Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

The heart's hushed secret in the soft dark eye.—L. E. Landon.

Sometimes from her eyes I did receive fair speechless messages.—
Shakespeare.

Eyes not down-dropped nor overbright, but fed with the clear-pointed flame of chastity.—Tennyson.

What an eye she has! methinks it sounds a parley of provocation.—
Shakespeare.

Who has a daring eye tells downright truths and downright lies.—Lavater.

The eye strays not while under the guidance of reason.—Publius Syrus.

And eyes disclosed what eyes alone could tell.—Dwight.

Where is any author in the world teaches such beauty as a woman's eye?
Shakespeare.

Tell me, sweet eyes, from what di-vinest star did ye drink in your liquid melancholy?—Bulwer-Lytton.

Persuasive, yet denying eyes, all eloquent with language of their own.—
Locke.

Windows, white and azure-laced with blue of heaven's own tinct.—
Shakespeare.

Eyes that displace the neighbor diamond, and outface that sunshine by their own sweet grace.—Crashaw.

The curious questioning eye, that plucks the heart of every mystery.—
Grenville Mellen.

Our eyes when gazing on sinful objects are out of their calling and God's keeping.—Fuller.

The eye of the master will do more work than both his hands.—Franklin.

A withered hermit, fivescore winters worn, might shake off fifty, looking in her eye.—Shakespeare.

We credit most our sight; one eye doth
please
Our trust far more than ten ear witnesses.
—Herrick.

His eye was blue and calm, as is the sky
In the serenest noon. —Willis.

A heaven of dreams in her large lotus eyes, darkly divine.—Gerald Massey.

'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark our coming, and look brighter when we come.—Byron.

Pure vestal thoughts in the translucent fane of her still spirit.—Tenny-son.

The flash of his keen black eyes
Forerunning the thunder.
—Longfellow.

Those laughing orbs, that borrow from azure skies the light they wear.—
Frances S. Osgood.

Within her tender eye
The heaven of April, with its changing light
—Longfellow.

Where did you get your eyes so blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.
—Geo. MacDonald.

And thy deep eyes, amid the gloom,
Shine like jewels in a shroud.
—Longfellow.

Eyes so transparent,
That through them one sees the soul.
—Theophile Gautier.

Her eye in silence hath a speech which eye best understands.—South-well.

And violets, transform'd to eyes,
Inshrined a soul within their blue.
—Moore.

Alack, there lies more peril in thine eye
Than twenty of their swords.
—Shakespeare.

A suppressed resolve will betray it self in the eyes.—George Elliot.

There is no end of affection taken in at the eyes only.—Steele.

Bright as the sun her eyes the gazers strike,
And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
—Pope.

The harvest of a quiet eye,
That broods and sleeps on his own heart.
—Wordsworth.

Blue eyes shimmer with angel glances,
Like spring violets over the lea.
—Constance F. Woolson.

With eyes that look'd into the very soul—

Bright—and as black and burning as a coal.
—Byron.

The eyes of other people are the eyes that ruin us.—Franklin.

His eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming.—Poe.

The eye sees not itself
But by reflection, by some other things.
—Shakespeare.

Folded eyes see brighter colors than the open ever do.—Mrs. Browning.

Her eye in heaven
Would through the airy region stream so bright,
That birds would sing, and think it were not night.
—Shakespeare.

The eyes are the windows of a woman's heart: you may enter that way!
—Eugene Sue.

A lamp is lit in woman's eye, that souls, else lost on earth, remember angels
by.—N. P. Willis.

Eyes and ears, two trade pilots
'twixt the dangerous shores of will and judgment.—Shakespeare.

Thine eyes are springs in whose serene
And silent waters heaven is seen.
William Cullen Bryant—

Her deep blue eyes smile constantly, as if they had by fitness won the secret of a happy dream she does not care to speak.—Mrs. Browning.

The eye of Paul Pry often finds more than he wished to find.—Lessing.

The eyes, being in the highest part,
have the office of sentinels.—Cicero.

This little member can behold the earth, and in a moment view things as high as heaven.—Charnock.

But her's, which through the crystal tears
gave light,
Shone like the moon in water seen by night.
—Shakespeare.

Eyes raised toward heaven are always beautiful, whatever they be.—
Joubert.

Beautiful eyes in the face of a handsome woman are like eloquence to speech.—Bulwer-Lytton.

His eyebrow dark, and eye of fire, showed spirit proud, and prompt to ire.—Sir Walter Scott.

Women's glances express what they dare not speak.—Alphonse Karr.

In her eyes a thought Grew sweeter and sweeter, deepening like the dawn,—
A mystical forewarning. —T. B. Aldrich.

True eyes, too pure and too honest in aught to disguise the sweet soul shining through them.—Owen Meredith.

In those sunk eyes the grief of years I trace,
And sorrow seems acquainted with that face.
—Ickell.

Dear eyes!—do not my heart forsake,
Shine, like the stars within the lake,—
Shine, and the darksome shadows break.
—Augustine J. H. Dugane.

Deep brown eyes running over with glee;
Blue eyes are pale, and gray eyes are sober;

Bonnie brown eyes are the eyes for me.
—Constance F. Woolson.

O lovely eyes of azure,
Clear as the waters of a brook that run
Limpid and laughing in the summer sun!
—Longfellow.

Eyes of most unholy blue!—Moore.

I dislike an eye that twinkles like a star. Those only are beautiful which, like the planets, have a steady, lam-bent light—are luminous, but not sparkling.—Longfellow.

Gradual as the snow, at heaven's breath, melts off and shows the azure flowers beneath, her lids unclosed, and the bright eyes were seen.—Moore.

All the gazers on the skies read not in fair heaven's story expresser truth or truer glory than they might in her bright eyes.—Ben Jonson.

Where such radiant lights have shone, no wonder if her cheeks be grown sunburnt with lustre of their own.—John Cleaveland.

The eye is the inlet to the soul, and it is well to beware of him whose visual organs avoid your honest regard.—Hosea Ballou.

The balls of sight are so formed that one man's eyes are spectacles to another to read his heart with.—Johnson.

When there is love in the heart there are rainbows in the eyes, which cover every black cloud with gorgeous hues.—Beecher.

One of the most wonderful things in nature is a glance; it transcends speech; it is the bodily symbol of identity.—Emerson.

There is a lore simple and sure, that asks no discipline of weary years—the language of the soul, told through the eye.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The eyes have a property in things and territories not named in any title-deeds, and are the owners of our choicest possessions.—Alcott.

Eyes will not see when the heart wishes them to be blind. Desire conceals truth as darkness does the earth.—Seneca.

Those eyes, soft and capricious as a cloudless sky, whose azure depth their color emulates, need needs be conversant with upward looks—prayer's voiceless service.—Wordsworth.

Since your eyes are so sharpe, that you cannot onely looke through a millstone, but cleane through the minde.—Lyly.

The eyes of a man are of no use without the observing power. Telescopes and microscopes are cunning contrivances, but they cannot see of themselves.—Paxton Hood.

Her eyes, like marigolds, had sheathed their light, and, canopied in darkness, sweetly lay, till they might open to adorn the day.—Shakespeare.

Beneath her drooping lashes slept a world of eloquent meaning; passionate but pure, dreamy, subdued, but, oh, how beautiful!—Mrs. Osgood.

With eyes
Of microscopic power, that could discern
The population of a dew-drop.
—James Montgomery.

There are whole veins of diamonds in thine eyes,
Might furnish crowns for all the Queens of earth.
—Bailey.

Guns, swords, batteries, armies and ships of war are set in motion by man for the subjugation of an enemy. Women bring conquerors to their feet with the magic of their eyes.—Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

Speech is a laggard and a sloth; but the eyes shoot out electric fluid that condenses all the elements of sentiment and passion in one single emanation.—Horace Smith.

When a man speaks the truth in the spirit of truth, his eye is as clear as the heavens. When he has base ends, and speaks falsely, the eye is muddy, and sometimes asquint.—Emerson.

Satan turned Eve's eye to the apple, Achan's eye to the wedge of gold, Ahab's eye to Naboth's vineyard, and then what work did he make with them!—Rev. J. Alleine.

Lovers are angry, reconciled, entreat, thank, appoint, and finally speak all things, by their eyes.—Montaigne.

Men are born with two eyes, but with one tongue, in order that they should see twice as much as they say.—Colton.

The learned compute that seven hundred and seven millions of millions of vibrations have penetrated the eye before the eye can distinguish the tints of a violet.—Bulwer-Lytton.

How blue were Ariadne's eyes

When, from the sea's horizon line,
At eve, she raised them on the skies!

My Psyche, bluer far are thine.
—Aubrey De Vere.

There are eyes half defiant,
Half meek and compliant;
Black eyes, with a wondrous, witching charm
To bring us good or to work us harm.
—Phœbe Cary.

O, the eye's light is a noble gift of heaven! All beings live from light; each fair created thing, the very plants, turn with a joyful transport to the light.—Schiller.

Crows pick out the eyes of the dead when they are no longer of any use. But flatterers destroy the souls of the living by blinding their eyes.—Maximus.

Little eyes must be good-tempered or they are ruined. They have no other resource. But this will beautify them enough. They are made for laughing, and should do their duty.—Leigh Hunt.

People forget that it is the eye which makes the horizon, and the rounding mind's eye which makes this or that man a type or representative of humanity with the name of hero or saint.—Emerson.

Some eyes threaten like a loaded and levelled pistol, and others are as insulting as hissing or kicking; some have no more expression than blueberries, while others are as deep as a well which you can fall into.—Emerson.

Somebody once observed—and the observation did him credit, whoever he was—that the dearest things in the world were neighbors' eyes, for they cost everybody more than anything else contributing to housekeeping.—Albert Smith.

Those laughing orbs, that borrow
From azure skies the light they wear,
Are like heaven—no sorrow
Can float o'er hues so fair.

—Mrs. Osgood.

And then her look—Oh, where's the heart
so wise
Could, unbewilder'd, meet those matchless eyes?
Quick, restless, strange, but exquisite withal,
Like those of angels. —Moore.

Why was the sight to such a tender ball as the eye confined, so obvious and so easy to be quenched, and not, as feeling, through all parts diffused, that she might look at will through every pore?—Milton.

The eye observes only what the mind, the heart, and the imagination are gifted to see; and sight must be reinforced by insight before souls can be discerned as well as manners, ideas as well as objects, realities and relations as well as appearances and accidental connections.—Whipple.

If I could write the beauty of your eyes,
And in fresh numbers number all your graces,
The age to come would say, "This poet lies;
Such heavenly touches ne'er touch'd earthly faces."
—Shakespeare.

Men with gray eyes are generally keen, energetic, and at first cold; but you may depend upon their sympathy with real sorrow. Search the ranks of our benevolent men and you will agree with me.—Dr. Leask.

A woman with a hazel eye never elopes from her husband, never chats scandal, never finds fault, never talks too much nor too little—always is an entertaining, intellectual, agreeable and lovely creature.—Frederic Saunders.

Thou tell'st me there is murder in my eye: 'tis pretty, sure, and very probable that eyes—that are the frailest and softest things, who shut their coward gates on atomies—should be called tyrants, butchers, murderers!—Shakespeare.

The eye is continually influenced by what it cannot detect; nay, it is not going too far to say that it is most influenced by what it detects least. Let the painter define, if he can, the variations of lines on which depend the change of expression in the human countenance.—Ruskin.

None but those who have loved can be supposed to understand the oratory of the eye, the mute eloquence of a look, or the conversational powers of the face. Love's sweetest meanings are unspoken; the full heart knows no rhetoric of words, and resorts to the pantomime of sighs and glances.—Bovee.

The eye is the window of the soul, the mouth the door. The intellect, the will, are seen in the eye; the emotions, sensibilities, and affections, in the mouth. The animals look for man's intentions right into his eyes. Even a rat, when you hunt him and bring him to bay, looks you in the eye.—Hiram Powers.

Ahab cast a covetous eye at Naboth's vineyard, David a lustful eye at Bathsheba. The eye is the pulse of the soul; as physicians judge of the heart by the pulse, so we by the eye; a rolling eye, a roving heart. The good eye keeps minute time, and strikes when it should; the lustful, crocheted-time, and so puts all out of tune.—Rev. T. Adams.

Dark eyes—eternal soul of pride!
Deep life in all that's true! * *

Away, away to other skies!
Away o'er seas and sands!
Such eyes as those were never made
To shine in other lands. —Leland.

The eye speaks with an eloquence and truthfulness surpassing speech. It is the window out of which the winged thoughts often fly unwittingly. It is the tiny magic mirror on whose crystal surface the moods of feeling fitfully play, like the sunlight and shadow on a still stream.—Tuckerman.

Thine eyes are like the deep, blue, boundless heaven
Contracted to two circles underneath
Their long, fine lashes; dark, far, measure-less,
Orb within orb, and line through line inwoven. —Shelley.

I never saw an eye so bright,
And yet so soft as hers;
It sometimes swam in liquid light,
And sometimes swam in tears;
It seem'd a beauty set apart
For softness and for signs.
—Mrs. Welby.

That fine part of our construction, the eye, seems as much the receptacle and seat of our passions as the mind itself; and at least it is the outward portal to introduce them to the house within, or rather the common thoroughfare to let our affections pass in and out.—Addison.

The intelligence of affection is carried on by the eye only; good-breeding has made the tongue falsify the heart, and act a part of continued restraint, while nature has preserved the eyes to herself, that she may not be disguised or misrepresented.—Addison.

What a curious workmanship is that of the eye, which is in the body, as the sun in the world; set in the head as in a watch-tower, having the softest nerves for receiving the greater multitude of spirits necessary for the act of vision!—Charnock.

It is wonderful indeed to consider how many objects the eye is fitted to take in at once, and successively in an instant, and at the same time to make a judgment of their position, figure, and color. It watches against our dangers, guides our steps, and lets in all the visible objects, whose beauty and variety instruct and delight.—Steele.

We lose in depth of expression when we go to inferior animals for comparisons with human beauty. Homer calls Juno ox-eyed; and the epithet suits well with the eyes of that goddess, because she may be supposed, with all her beauty, to want a certain humanity. Her large eyes look at you with a royal indifference.—Leigh Hunt.

Whatever of goodness emanates from the soul, gathers its soft halo in the eyes; and if the heart be a lurking-place of crime, the eyes are sure to betray the secret. A beautiful eye makes silence eloquent, a kind eye makes contradiction assent, an enraged eye makes beauty a deformity; so you see, forsooth, the little organ plays no inconsiderable, if not a dominant, part.—Frederick Saunders.

Say, what other metre is it
Than the meeting of the eyes?
Nature poureth into nature
Through the channels of that feature
Riding on the ray of sight,
Fleeter far than whirlwinds go,
Or for service, or delight,
Hearts to hearts their meaning show.
—Emerson.

If the eye were so acute as to rival the finest microscope, and to discern the smallest hair upon the leg of a gnat, it would be a curse, and not a blessing to us; it would make all things appear rugged and deformed; the most finely polished crystal would be uneven and rough; the sight of our own selves would affright us; the smoothest skin would be beset all over with rugged scales and bristly hair.—Bentley.

Her eye (I am very fond of handsome eyes),
Was large and dark, suppressing half its fire
Until she spoke, then through its soft disguise
Flash'd an expression more of pride than ire,
And love than either; and there would arise,
A something in them which was not desire,
But would have been, perhaps, but for the soul,
Which struggled through and chasten'd down the whole. —Byron.

Large eyes were admired in Greece, where they still prevail. They are the finest of all when they have the internal look, which is not common.

The stag or antelope eye of the Orientals is beautiful and laming, but is accused of looking skittish and indifferent. "The epithet of 'stag-eyed,'" says Lady Wortley Montagu, speaking of a Turkish love-song, "pleases me extremely; and I think it a very lively image of the fire and indifference in his mistress' eye."—Leigh Hunt.

A gray eye is a sly eye,
And roguish is a brown eye,—
Turn full upon me thy eye,—
Ah, how its wavelets drown one!
A blue eye is a true eye;
Mysterious is a dark one,
Which flashes like a spark-sun!
A black eye is the best one.
—W. R. Alger.

Long while I sought to what I might compare
Those powerful eyes, which light my dark spirit;
Yet found I nought on earth, to which I dare
Resemble th' image of their goodly light.
Not to the sun, for they do shine by night;
Nor to the moon, for they are changed never;
Nor to the stars, for they have purer sight;
Nor to the fire, for they consume not ever;
Nor to the lightning, for they still persevere;
Nor to the diamond, for they are more tender;
Nor unto crystal, for nought may they sever;
Nor unto glass, such baseness might offend her;
Then to the Maker's self the likest be;
Whose light doth lighten all that here we see.
—Spenser.

A pair of bright eyes with a dozen glances suffice to subdue a man; to enslave him, and inflame; to make him even forget; they dazzle him so that the past becomes straightway dim to him; and he so prizes them that he would give all his life to possess them. What is the fond love of dearest friends compared to his treasure? Is memory as strong as expectancy, fruition as hunger, gratitude as desire?—Thackeray.

A beautiful eye makes silence eloquent, a kind eye makes contradiction an assent, an enraged eye makes beauty deformed. This little member gives life to every other part about us; and I believe the story of Argus implies no more than that the eye is in every part; that is to say, every other part would be mutilated were not its force represented more by the eye than even by itself.—Addison.

Those eyes that were so bright, love,
Have now a dimmer shine;
But what they've lost in light, love,
Is what they gave to mine.
And still those orbs reflect, love,
The beams of former hours,
That ripen'd all my joys, love,
And tinted all my flowers. —Hood.

Eyes are bold as lions, roving, running, leaping, here and there, far and near. They speak all languages; they wait for no introduction; they are no Englishmen; ask no leave of age or rank; they respect neither poverty nor riches, neither learning nor power, nor virtue, nor sex, but intrude, and come again, and go through and through you in a moment of time. What inundation of life and thought is discharged from one soul into another through them!—Emerson.

F

Fable

History is but a fable agreed upon.—Napoleon I.

Fiction or fable allures to instruction.—Franklin.

A certain class of novels may with propriety be called fables.—Whately.

As we are poetical in our natures, so we delight in fable.—Hazlitt.

There should always be some foundation of fact for the most airy fabric; and pure invention is but the talent of a deceiver.—Byron.

Willmott has very tersely said that embellished truths are the illuminated alphabet of larger children.—Horace Mann.

Fables take off from the severity of instruction, and enforce it at the same time that they conceal it.—Addison.

All the fairy tales of Aladdin, or the invisible Gyges, or the talisman that opens kings' palaces, or the enchanted halls underground or in the sea, are only fictions to indicate the one miracle of intellectual enlargement.—Emerson.

The difference between a parable and an apologue is that the former, being drawn from human life, requires probability in the narration, whereas the apologue, being taken from inanimate things or the inferior animals, is not confined strictly to probability. The fables of Æsop are apologues.—Fleming.

Face

The countenance is the portrait of the soul.—Cicero.

The magic of a face.—Thomas Carew.

Thy face the index of a feeling mind.—Crabbe.

Features, the great soul's apparent seat.—Bryant.

Human face divine.—Milton.

The worst of faces still is human.—Lavater.

He had a face like a benediction.—Cervantes.

A face without a heart.—Shakespeare.

Trust not too much to an enchanting face.—Virgil.

Sea of upturned faces.—Sir W. Scott.

Her face, all red and white, like the inside of a shoulder of mutton.—Foote.

An unforgiving eye, and a damned disinheriting countenance.—R. B. Sheridan.

Those faces which have charmed us most escape us the soonest.—Walter Scott.

A February face, so full of frost, of storm and cloudiness.—Shakespeare.

In youth, the artless index of the mind.—Horace Mann.

A face like nestling luxury of flowers.—Gerald Massey.

God has given you one face, and you make yourselves another.—Shakespeare.

Expression alone can invest beauty with supreme and lasting command over the eye.—Fuseli.

A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.—Shakespeare.

The mind, the music breathing from her face.—Byron.

In thy face I see the map of honor, truth, and loyalty.—Shakespeare.

If to her share some female errors fall
Look on her face, and you'll forget 'em all.
—Pope.

Her face is like the Milky Way i' the sky,—
A meeting of gentle lights without a name.
—Sir John Suckling.

A face with gladness overspread!
Soft smiles, by human kindness bred!
—Wordsworth.

That same face of yours looks like the title-page to a whole volume of roguery.—Colley Cibber.

Truth makes the face of that person shine who speaks and owns it.—South.

These faces in the mirrors
Are but the shadows and phantoms of myself.
—Longfellow.

Two similar faces, neither of which alone causes laughter, use laughter when they are together, by their resemblance.—Pascal.

All men's faces are true, whate'er their hands are.
—Shakespeare.

There's no art
To find the mind's construction in the face.
—Shakespeare.

A good face is the best letter of recommendation.—Queen Elizabeth.

Her cheek like apples which the sun had ruddied.—Spenser.

His face was of that doubtful kind,
That wins the eye but not the mind.
—Scott.

A cheerful face is nearly as good for an invalid as healthy weather.—Franklin.

Your face, my Thane, is as a book, where men
May read strange matters. —Shakespeare.

A sweet expression is the highest type of female loveliness.—Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

The countenance is more eloquent than the tongue.—Lavater.

Some women's faces are, in their brightness, a prophecy; and some, in their sadness, a history.—Dickens.

A beloved face cannot grow ugly, because, not flesh and complexion, but expression, created love.—Richter.

Though men can cover crimes with bold, stern looks, poor women's faces are their own faults' books.—Shakespeare.

Her angel's face,
As the great eye of heaven, shyned bright,
And made a sunshine in the shady place.
—Spenser.

For my soul prays, Sweet,
Still to your face in Heaven,
Heaven in your face, Sweet.
—Francis Thompson.

And to his eye
There was but one beloved face on earth,
And that was shining on him. —Byron.

The light upon her face
Shines from the windows of another world.
Saints only have such faces.
—Longfellow.

It is the common wonder of all men how among so many millions of faces there should be none alike.—Sir Thomas Browne.

The loveliest faces are to be seen by moonlight, when one sees half with the eye and half with the fancy.—Bovee.

Fire burns only when we are near it, but a beautiful face burns and inflames, though at a distance.—Xenophon.

Where the mouth is sweet and the eyes intelligent, there is always the look of beauty, with a right heart.—Leigh Hunt.

A face which is always serene possesses a mysterious and powerful attraction: sad hearts come to it as to the sun to warm themselves again.—Joseph Roux.

And her face so fair
Stirr'd with her dream, as rose-leaves with the air. —Byron.

Thou hast a grim appearance, and thy face bears a command in it; tho' thy tackle's torn,
Thou showest a noble vessel. —Shakespeare.

A noble soul spreads even over a face in which the architectonic beauty is wanting an irresistible grace, and often even triumphs over the natural disfavor.—Schiller.

There is in every human countenance either a history or a prophecy, which must sadden, or at least soften, every reflecting observer.—Coleridge.

Look in the face of the person to whom you are speaking, if you wish to know his real sentiments; for he can command his words more easily than his countenance.—Chesterfield.

What furniture can give such finish to a room as a tender woman's face? And is there any harmony of tints that has such stirring of delight as the sweet modulation of her voice?—George Eliot.

There are women who do not let their husbands see their faces until they are married. Not to keep you in suspense, I mean that part of the sex who paint.—Steele.

Not the entrance of a cathedral, not the sound of a passing bell, nor the furs of a magistrate, nor the sables of a funeral, were fraught with half the solemnity of face!—Shenstone.

The face of a woman, whatever be the force or extent of her mind, whatever be the importance of the object she pursues, is always an obstacle or a reason in the story of her life.—Mme. de Staël.

Contending Passions jostle and displace
And tilt and tourney mostly in the Face:

Unmatched by Art, upon this wondrous scroll

Portrayed are all the secrets of the soul.

—Abraham Coles.

Her face betokened all things dear and good,
The light of somewhat yet to come was there
Asleep, and waiting for the opening day,
When childish thoughts, like flowers, would drift away. —Jean Ingelow.

What a man is lies as certainly upon his countenance as in his heart, though none of his acquaintances may be able to read it. The very intercourse with him may have rendered it more difficult.—George MacDonald.

Faces are as legible as books, only with these circumstances to recommend them to our perusal, that they are read in much less time, and are much less likely to deceive us.—Lavater.

Nature cuts queer capers with men's phizzes at times, and confounds all the deductions of philosophy. Character does not put all its goods, sometimes not any of them, in its shop-window.—Wm. Matthews.

There remains in the faces of women who are naturally serene and peaceful, and of those rendered so by religion, an after-spring, and, later, an after-summer, the reflex of their most beautiful bloom.—Richter.

True beauty is in the mind; and the expression of the features depends more upon the moral nature than most persons are accustomed to think.—Frederic Saunders.

Her closed lips were delicate as the tinted pencilling of veins upon a flower; and on her cheek the timid blood had faintly melted through, like something that was half afraid of light.—Willis.

We are all sculptors and painters, and our material is our own flesh and blood and bones. Any nobleness begins at once to refine a man's features, any meanness or sensuality to imbrute them.—Thoreau.

A face that had a story to tell. How different faces are in this particular! Some of them speak not. They are books in which not a line is written, save perhaps a date.—Longfellow.

The countenance may be rightly defined as the title-page which heralds the contents of the human volume, but, like other title-pages, it sometimes puzzles, often misleads, and often says nothing to the purpose.—Wm. Matthews.

Doubtless the human face is the grandest of all mysteries; yet fixed on canvas it can hardly tell of more than one sensation; no struggle, no successive contrasts accessible to dramatic art, can painting give, as neither time nor motion exists for her.—Madame de Staël.

Read o'er the volume of young Paris' face,
And find delight writ there with beauty's pen;
Examine every several lineament,

And what obscur'd in this fair volume lies,
Find written in the margin of his eyes.
—Shakespeare.

A girl of eighteen imagines the feelings behind the face that has moved her with its sympathetic youth as easily as primitive people imagined the humors of the gods in fair weather. What is she to believe in if not in this vision woven from within?—George Eliot.

On his bold visage middle age
Had slightly press'd its signet sage,
Yet had not quenched the open truth
And fiery vehemence of youth;
Forward and frolic glee was there,
The will to do, the soul to dare.

—Scott.

There are faces so fluid with expression, so flushed and rippled by the play of thought, that we can hardly find what the mere features really are. When the delicious beauty of lineament loses its power, it is because a more delicious beauty has appeared, that an interior and durable form has been disclosed.—Emerson.

Her face had a wonderful fascination in it. It was such a calm, quiet face, with the light of a rising soul shining so peacefully through it. At times it wore an expression of seriousness, of sorrow even; and then seemed to make the very air bright with what the Italian poets so beautifully call the "lampeggiar dell' angelico riso,"—the lightning of the angelic smile.—Longfellow.

Alas! how few of nature's faces there are to gladden us with their beauty! The cares and sorrows and hungerings of the world change them as they change hearts; and it is only when those passions sleep, and have lost their hold forever, that the troubled clouds pass off, and leave heaven's surface clear.—Dickens.

Nature has laid out all her art in beautifying the face; she has touched it with vermilion, planted in it a double row of ivory, made it the seat of smiles and blushes, lighted it up and enlivened it with the brightness of the eyes, hung it on each side with curious organs of sense, given it airs and graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing shade of hair as sets all its beauties in the most agreeable light.—Addison.

In vain we fondly strive to trace
The soul's reflection in the face;
In vain we dwell on lines and crosses,
Crooked mouths and short probosces;
Boobies have looked as wise and bright
As Plato and the Stagyrite
And many a sage and learned skull
Has peeped through windows dark and dull.
—Moore.

No human face is exactly the same in its lines on each side, no leaf perfect in its lobes, no branch in its symmetry. All admit irregularity as they imply change; and to banish imperfection is to destroy expression, to check exertion, to paralyze vitality. All things are literally better, lovelier, and more beloved for the imperfections which have been divinely appointed, that the law of human life may be effort, and the law of human judgment mercy.—Ruskin.

As the language of the face is universal, so is it very comprehensive. No laconism can reach it. It is the short-hand of the mind, and crowds a great deal in a little room. A man may look a sentence as soon as speak a word. The strokes are small, but so masterly drawn that you may easily collect the image and proportions of what they resemble.—Jeremy Collier.

Now and then one sees a face which has kept its smile pure and undefiled. It is a woman's face usually; often a face which has trace of great sorrow all over it, till the smile breaks. Such a smile transfigures: such a smile, if the artful but knew it, is the greatest weapon a face can have.—Helen Hunt.

Quite the ugliest face I ever saw was that of a woman whom the world called beautiful. Through its silver veil the evil and ungentle passions looked out, hideous and hateful. On the other hand, there are faces which the multitude, at first glance, pronounce homely, unattractive, and such as "Nature fashions by the gross," which I always recognize with a warm heart-thrill. Not for the world would I have one feature changed; they please me as they are; they are hallowed by kind memories, and are beautiful through their associations.—Whittier.

Faction

So false is faction, and so smooth a liar,
As that it never had a side entire.

—Daniel.

Seldom is faction's ire in baughty minds
Extinguish'd but by death: it oft like fire Suppress'd, breaks forth again, and blazes higher.

—May.

Avoid the politic, the factious fool,
The busy, buzzing, talking harden'd knave;
The quaint smooth rogue that sins against his reason,

Calls saucy loud sedition public zeal,
And mutiny the dictates of his spirit.

—Otway.

Facts

Facts are stubborn things.—Elliot.

Facts are plain spoken; hopes and figures are its aversion.—Addison.

Every fact that is learned becomes a key to other facts.—E. L. Youmans.

But facts are chieftains that winna ding,
An' downa be disputed.

—Burns.

There is nothing I know of so sublime as a fact.—George Canning.

Some people have a peculiar faculty for denying facts.—G. D. Prentice.

One fact is better than one hundred analogies.

From principles is derived probability; but truth, or certainty, is obtained only from facts.

In matters of fact, they say there is some credit to be given to the testimony of men, but not in matters of judgment.—Hooker.

Facts are to the mind the same thing as food to the body. On the due digestion of facts depends the strength and wisdom of the one, just as vigour and health depend on the other. The wisest in council, the ablest in debate, and the most agreeable in the commerce of life, is that man who has assimilated to his understanding the greatest number of facts.—Burke.

Fail — Failure

A first failure is often a blessing.—A. L. Brown.

It is the empiric who never fails.—Willmott.

Half the failures in life come from pulling one's horse when he is leaping.—Thomas Hood.

But screw your courage to the sticking place and we'll not fail.—Shakespeare.

Failure is more frequently from want of energy than want of capital.—Daniel Webster.

There is not a fiercer hell than failure in a great object.—Kents.

A failure establishes only this, that our determination to succeed was not strong enough.—Bovee.

Now a' is done that men can do
And a' is done in vain. —Burns.

To fail at all is to fail utterly.—Lowell.

He only is exempt from failures who makes no efforts.—Whately.

What is failure except feebleness? And what is it to miss one's mark except to aim widely and weakly?—Ouida.

Wherever there is failure, there is some giddiness, some superstition about luck, some step omitted, which Nature never pardons.—Emerson.

Failures always overtake those who have the power to do, without the will to act, and who need that essential quality in life, energy.—James Ellis.

In the lexicon of youth, which fate reserves For a bright manhood, there is no such word
As—fail. —Lytton.

Although strength should fail, the effort will deserve praise. In great enterprises the attempt is enough.—Propertius.

Many men and women spend their lives in unsuccessful attempts to spin the flax God sends them upon a wheel they can never use.—J. G. Holland.

Complaints are vain; we will try to do better another time. To-morrow and to-morrow. A few designs and a few failures, and the time of designing is past.—Johnson.

He who bears failure with patience is as much of a philosopher as he who succeeds; for to put up with the world needs as much wisdom as to control it.—Aughey.

Every failure is a step to success: every detection of what is false directs us toward what is true; every trial exhausts some tempting form of error.

Not only so, but scarcely any attempt is entirely a failure; scarcely any theory, the result of steady thought, is altogether false; no tempting form of error is without some latent charm derived from truth.—Whewell.

Albeit failure in any cause produces a correspondent misery in the soul, yet it is, in a sense, the highway to success, inasmuch as every discovery of what is false leads us to seek earnestly after what is true, and every fresh experience points out some form of error which we shall afterward carefully eschew.—Keats.

What keeps persons down in the world, besides lack of capacity, is not a philosophical contempt of riches or honors, but thoughtlessness and improvidence, a love of sluggish torpor, and of present gratification. It is not from preferring virtue to wealth—the goods of the mind to those of fortune—that they take no thought for the morrow; but from want of forethought and stern self-command. The restless, ambitious man too often directs these qualities to an unworthy object; the contented man is generally deficient in the qualities themselves. The one is a stream that flows too often in a wrong channel, and needs to have its course altered, the other is a stagnant pool.—Wm. Matthews.

Fairies

Moonshine revellers.—Shakespeare.

Fairies use flowers for their charactery.—Shakespeare.

On the tawny sands and shelves trip the pert fairies and the dapper elves.—Milton.

Be secret and discreet; the fairy favours are lost when not concealed.—Dryden.

Wherever is love and loyalty, great purposes and lofty souls, even though in a hovel or a mine, there is fairyland.—Kingsley.

In this state she gallops, night by night, o'er ladies' lips, who straight on kisses dream.—Shakespeare.

Their little nimble forms arrayed in all the tricksy pomp of fairy pride,—
Drake.

This is the fairy land; O spite of spites,
We talk with goblins, owls, and elvish sprites. —Shakespeare.

Then take me on your knee, mother;
And listen, mother of mine.
A hundred fairies danced last night,
And the harpers they were nine.
—Mary Howitt.

In silence sad,
Trip we after the night's shade;
We the globe can compass soon,
Swifter than the wand'ring moon.
—Shakespeare.

But light as any wind that blows
So fleetly did she stir,
The flower, she touch'd on, dipt and rose,
And turned to look at her.
—Tennyson.

O, then, I see Queen Mab hath been with you.
She is the fairies' midwife, and she comes
In shape no bigger than an agate-stone
On the forefinger of an alderman.
—Shakespeare.

Sometimes she driveth o'er a soldier's neck,
And then dreams he of cutting foreign throats,
Of breaches, ambuscadoes, Spanish blades,
Of healths five fathoms deep; and then anon Drums in his ear, at which he starts, and wakes,
And, being thus frightened, swears a prayer
or two,
And sleeps again. —Shakespeare.

Bright Eyes, Light Eyes! Daughter of a Fay!
I had not been a married wife a twelve-
month and a day,
I had not nursed my little one a month
upon my knee,
When down among the blue bell banks rose elfins three times three:
They griped me by the raven hair, I could not cry for fear,
They put a hempen rope around my waist
and dragged me here;
They made me sit and give thee suck as mortal mothers can,
Bright Eyes, Light Eyes! strange and weak and wan! —Robert Buchanan.

The maskers come late, and I think will stay, like fairies, till the cock crow them away.—Donne.

The dances ended, all the fairy train
For pinks and daisies search'd the flow'ry plain. —Pope.

Where the bee sucks, there suck I;
In a cowslip's bell I lie;
There I couch when owls do cry.
On the bat's back I do fly.
—Shakespeare.

Their harps are of the amber shade,
That hides the blush of waking day,
And every gleamy string is made
Of silvery moonshine's lengthen'd ray.
—Drake.

Her mantle was the purple roll'd
At twilight in the west afar;
'Twas tied with threads of dawning gold
And button'd with a sparkling star.
—Drake.

Oft fairy elves,
Whose midnight revels by a forest side,
Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees, while o'erhead the moon
Sits arbitress, and nearer to the earth Wheels her pale course, they on their mirth and dance
Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds. —Milton.

The palace of the sylphid queen—
Its spiral columns, gleaming bright,
Were streamers of the northern light;
Its curtain's light and lovely flush
Was of the morning's rosy blush;
And the ceiling fair, that rose aboon,
The white and feathery fleece of noon.
—Drake.

Did you ever hear
Of the frolic fairies dear?
They're a blessed little race,
Peeping up in fancy's face,
In the valley, on the hill,
By the fountain and the rill;
Laughing out between the leaves
That the loving summer weaves.
—Mrs. Csgood.

He put his acorn-helmet on;
It was plum'd of the silk of the thistle-
down:
The corselet plate, that guarded his breast,
Was once the wild bees' golden vest;
His cloak, of a thousand mingled dyes,
Was form'd of the wings of butterflies;
His shield was the shell of a lady-bug queen,
Studs of gold on a ground of green;
And the quivering lance which he brand-
ish'd bright,
Was the sting of a wasp he had slain in fight. —Drake.

About this spring of ancient fame say true,
The dapper elves their moonlight sports renew;

Their pigmy king and little fairy queen
In circling dances gamboll'd on the green,
With tuneful sprites a merry concert made,
And airy music warbled through the shade.
—Pope.

To pass their lives on fountains and on flowers, and never know the weight of human hours.—Byron.

Faith

Faith is the force of life.—Tolstoi.

Faith is the continuation of reason.
—William Adams.

Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.—Job xiii. 15.

Faith is the heroism of intellect.—
Charles H. Parkhurst.

Faith is a higher faculty than reason.—Bailey.

Faith is not reason's labor, but repose.—Young.

Faith lights us through the dark to Deity.—Sir W. Davenant.

Faith is necessary to victory.—Haz-
litt.

Faith creates the virtues in which it believes.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Faith loves to lean on time's destroying arm.—Holmes.

Faith is deferential incredulity.—
Voltaire.

On argument alone my faith is built.
—Young.

Youth without faith is a day without sun.—Ouida.

Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.—Bible.

The power of faith will often shine forth the most when the character is naturally weak.—Hare.

A perfect faith would lift us absolutely above fear.—George MacDonald.

Our life must answer for our faith.
—Thomas Wilson.

Faith is obedience, not compliance.
—George MacDonald.

The principal part of faith is patience.—George MacDonald.

Faith is love taking the form of aspiration.—William Ellery Channing.

Faith is nothing but spiritualized imagination.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There are no tricks in plain simple faith.—Shakespeare.

Faith builds a bridge from this world to the next.—Dr. Young.

This is faith: it is nothing more than obedience.—Voltaire.

O welcome, pure-eyed Faith, white-handed
Hope,
Thou hovering angel, girt with golden wings.
—Milton.

Faith in a better than that which appears is no less required by art than by religion.—John Sterling.

Faith always implies the disbelief of a lesser fact in favor of a greater.—
Holmes.

Faith is the subtle chain that binds us to the Infinite.—Mrs. E. Oakes
Smith.

Faith is the root of works. A root that produceth nothing is dead.—
Thomas Wilson.

He wears his faith but as the fashion of his hat; it ever changes with the next block.—Shakespeare.

The great world's altar-stairs
That slope thro' darkness up to God.
—Tennyson.

As the flower is before the fruit, so is faith before good works.—Whately.

Faith, amid the disorders of a sinful life, is like the lamp burning in an ancient tomb.—Madame Swetchine.

Man is not made to question, but adore.—Young.

Faith needs her daily bread.—
Georgiana M. Craik.

Faith is the flame that lifts the sacrifice to heaven.—J. Montgomery.

Let us fear the worst, but work with faith; the best will always take care of itself.—Victor Hugo.

The faith which you keep must be a faith that demands obedience, and you can keep it only by obeying it.—
Phillips Brooks.

Without faith a man can do nothing. But faith can stifle all science.—Amiel.

No cloud can overshadow a true Christian but his faith will discern a rainbow in it.—Bishop Horne.

It is impossible to be a hero in anything unless one is first a hero in faith.—Jacobi.

For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.—Pope.

There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.—Tennyson.

The saddest thing that can befall a soul
Is when it loses faith in God and woman.—Alexander Smith.

"Patience!" * * * "have faith and thy prayer will be answered!"—
Longfellow.

But Faith, fanatic Faith, once wedded fast
To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last.—Moore.

Faith is the pencil of the soul
That pictures heavenly things.—Burbidge.

Faith is the soul going out of itself
for all its wants.—Boston.

The faith of immortality gives to every mind that cherishes it a certain firmness of texture.—Wilberforce.

A lively faith will bear aloft the mind, and leave the luggage of good works behind.—Dryden.

Not prayer without faith, nor faith without prayer, but prayer in faith, is the cost of spiritual gifts and graces.—H. Clay Trumbull.

None live so easily, so pleasantly, as those that live by faith.—Matthew Henry.

Faith is among men what gravity is among planets and suns.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Faith converses with the angels, and antedates the hymns of glory.—Jeremy Taylor.

The highest order that was ever instituted on earth is the order of faith.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Heaven alone, not earth, is destined to witness the repose of faith.—Moses Harvey.

Faith makes the discords of the present the harmonies of the future.—Robert Collyer.

It was Lazarus' faith, not his poverty, which brought him into Abraham's bosom.—Trench.

Pin thy faith to no man's sleeve.
Hast thou not two eyes of thy own?—Carlyle.

Systems exercise the mind; but faith enlightens and guides it.—Voltaire.

All I have seen teaches me to trust
the Creator for all I have not seen.—Emerson.

A maxim in law has more weight in the world than an article of faith.—Swift.

Faith makes us, and not we it; and faith makes its own forms.—Emerson.

The steps of faith fall on the seeming void, and find the rock beneath.—Whittier.

For mysterious things of faith, rely on the proponent, Heaven's authority.—Dryden.

In affairs of this world men are saved, not by faith, but by the want of it.—Fielding.

When faith is lost, when honor dies, the man is dead.—Whittier.

Faith is the champion of grace, and love the nurse; but humility is the beauty of grace.—Thomas Brooks.

Let us have faith that right makes might; and in that faith, let us, to the end, dare to do our duty as we understand it.—Abraham Lincoln.

Faith, though it hath sometimes a trembling hand, it must not have a withered hand, but must stretch.—Watson.

Religion is the true Philosophy!
Faith is the last great link 'twixt God and man.—Bigg.

When the soul grants what reason makes her see,
That is true faith, what's more's credulity.—Sir F. Fane.

One in whom persuasion and belief
Had ripened into faith, and faith become
A passionate intuition.—Wordsworth.

All the scholastic scaffolding falls, as a ruined edifice, before one single word —faith.—Napoleon I.

The Americans have no faith, they rely on the power of a dollar; they are deaf to sentiment.—Emerson.

Christians are directed to have faith in Christ, as the effectual means of obtaining the change they desire.—Franklin.

If you have any faith, give me, for heaven's sake, a share of it! Your doubts you may keep to yourself, for I have a plenty of my own.—Goethe.

Faith is the key that unlocks the cabinet of God's treasures; the king's messenger from the celestial world, to bring all the supplies we need out of the fullness that there is in Christ.—J. Stephens.

Our Lord does not praise the centurion for his amiable care of his servants, nor for his generosity to the Jews, nor for his public spirit, nor for his humility, but for his faith.—William Adams.

Have you not observed that faith is generally strongest in those whose character may be called the weakest? —Mme. de Staël.

Faith is letting down our nets into the untransparent deeps, at the Divine command, not knowing what we shall take.—Faber.

Faith is necessary to explain anything, and to reconcile the foreknowledge of God with human evil.—Wordsworth.

Love is a bodily shape; and Christian works are no more than animate faith and love, as flowers are the animate springtide.—Longfellow.

The inventory of my faith for this lower world is soon made out. I believe in Him who made it.—Mme. Swetchine.

Lay not the plummet to the line; religion hath no landmarks; no human keenness can discern the subtle shades of faith.—Tupper.

Strike from mankind the principle of faith, and men would have no more history than a flock of sheep.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Faith draws the poison from every grief, takes the sting from every loss, and quenches the fire of every pain; and only faith can do it.—J. G. Holland.

I wonder many times that ever a child of God should have a sad heart, considering what the Lord is preparing for him.—Rutherford.

Youth, beauty, wit may recommend you to men, but only faith in Jesus Christ can recommend you to God.—Aughey.

The person who has a firm trust in the Supreme Being is powerful in his power, wise by his wisdom, happy by his happiness.—Addison.

Life grows dark as we go on, till only one clear light is left shining on it, and that is faith.—Mme. Swetchine.

Faith is an humble, self-denying grace; it makes the Christian nothing in himself, and all in God.—Leighton.

I'll ne'er distrust my God for cloth and bread while lilies flourish and the raven's fed.—Quarles.

Were it not for an unquestioning faith, human progress would be an intolerable burden.—Aughey.

All sects, as far as reason will help them, gladly use it; when it fails them, they cry out it is a matter of faith, and above reason.—Locke.

That faith which is required of us is then perfect when it produces in us a fiduciary assent to whatever the Gospel has revealed.—William Wake.

Which to believe of her must be a faith that reason without miracle shall never plant in me.—Shakespeare.

Those who have obtained the farthest insight into Nature have been, in all ages, firm believers in God.—Whewell.

Faith is to believe what we do not see; and the reward of this faith is to see what we believe.—St. Augustine.

Faith, like light, should ever be simple and unbending; while love, like warmth, should beam forth on every side, and bend to every necessity of our brethren.—Martin Luther.

Faith and works are necessary to our spiritual life as Christians, as soul and body are to our natural life as men; for faith is the soul of religion, and works the body.—Colton.

Faith, in order to be genuine and of any real value, must be the offspring of that divine love which Jesus manifested when He prayed for His enemies on the cross.—Hosea Ballou.

As a weak limb grows stronger by exercise, so will your faith be strengthened by the very efforts you make in stretching it out toward things unseen.—Aughey.

There never was found in any age of the world, either philosopher or sect, or law or discipline, which did so highly exalt the public good as the Christian faith.—Bacon.

Faith affirms many things, respecting which the senses are silent, but nothing that they deny. It is superior, but never opposed to their testimony.—Pascal.

Faith is mind at its best, its bravest, and its fiercest. Faith is thought become poetry, and absorbing into itself the soul's great passions. Faith is intellect carried up to its transfiguration.—Chas. H. Parkhurst.

In our age faith and charity are found, but they are found apart. We tolerate everybody, because we doubt everything; or else we tolerate nobody, because we believe something.—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

There is one inevitable criterion of judgment touching religious faith in doctrinal matters. Can you reduce it to practice? If not, have none of it.—Hosea Ballou.

A firm faith is the best theology; a good life is the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy, and temperance the best physic.—Aughey.

It is by faith that poetry, as well as devotion, soars above this dull earth; that imagination breaks through its clouds, breathes a purer air, and lives in a softer light.—Henry Giles.

Faith may rise into miracles of might, as some few wise men have shown; faith may sink into credulities of weakness, as the mass of fools have witnessed.—Tupper.

Faith is the key that unlocks the cabinet of God's treasures; the king's messenger from the celestial world, to bring all the supplies we need out of the fullness that there is in Christ.—J. Stephens.

Faith builds a bridge across the gulf of death,
To break the shock blind nature cannot shun,
And lands Thought smoothly on the further shore.
—Young.

Given a man full of faith, you will have a man tenacious in purpose, absorbed in one grand object, simple in his motives, in whom selfishness has been driven out by the power of a mightier love, and indolence stirred into unwearied energy.—Alexander Maclaren.

The only faith that wears well and holds its color in all weathers is that which is woven of conviction and set with the sharp mordant of experience.—Lowell.

The childlike faith that asks not sight, waits not for wonder or for sign, believes, because it loves, aright, shall see things greater, things divine.—Keble.

Not that God doth require nothing unto happiness at the hands of men saving only a naked belief, but that without belief all other things are as nothing.—Hooker.

We cannot live on probabilities. The faith in which we can live bravely and die in peace must be a certainty, so far as it professes to be a faith at all, or it is nothing.—Froude.

Let none henceforth seek needless cause to approve the faith they own; when earnestly they seek such proof, conclude they then begin to fall.—Milton.

Faith must be not only living, but lively, too; it must be brightened and stirred up by a particular exercise of those virtues specifically requisite to a due performance of duty.—South.

Faith in God, faith in man, faith in work: this is the short formula in which we may sum up the teachings of the founders of New England—a creed ample enough for this life and the next.—Lowell.

The faith to which the Scriptures attach such momentous consequences and ascribe such glorious exploits is a practical habit, which, like every other, is strengthened and increased by continual exercise.—Robert Hall.

The highest historical probability can be adduced in support of the proposition that, if it were possible to annihilate the Bible, and with it all its influences, we should destroy with it the whole spiritual system of the moral world.—Edward Everett.

We should act with as much energy as those who expect everything from themselves; and we should pray with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from God.—Colton.

Works without faith are like a fish without water, it wants the element it should live in. A building without a basis cannot stand; faith is the foundation, and every good action is as a stone laid.—Feltham.

Men seldom think deeply on subjects in which they have no choice of opinion: they are fearful of encountering obstacles to their faith—as in religion—and so are content with the surface.—Sheridan.

The great desire of this age is for a doctrine which may serve to condense our knowledge, guide our researches, and shape our lives, so that conduct may really be the consequence of belief.—G. H. Lewes.

Faith is the revealer of knowledge; it is the office of reason to defend that knowledge and to preserve it pure. Independent knowledge—the knowledge that comes not through faith—whether it be of things earthly or things heavenly, never can be ours.—Sunday School Times.

Faith is a homely, private capital: as there are public savings-banks and poor funds, out of which in times of want we can relieve the necessities of individuals, so here the faithful take their coin in peace.—Goethe.

Faith without works is like a bird without wings; though she may hop with her companions on earth, yet she will never fly with them to heaven; but when both are joined together, then doth the soul mount up to her eternal rest.—J. Beaumont.

In your intercourse with sects, the sublime and abstruse doctrines of Christian belief belong to the Church; but the faith of the individual, centred in his heart, is, or may be, collateral to them. Faith is subjective.—Coleridge.

Faith is the very heroism and enterprise of intellect. Faith is not a passivity, but a faculty. Faith is power, the material of effect. Faith is a kind of winged intellect. The great workmen of history have been men who believed like giants.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Faith without evidence is, properly, not faith, but prejudice or presumption; faith beyond evidence is superstition, and faith contrary to evidence is either insanity or willful perversity of mind.—Aughey.

What we believe we must believe wholly and without reserve; wherefore the only perfect and satisfying object of faith is God. A faith that sets bounds to itself, that will believe so much and no more, that will trust thus far and no farther, is none.

Through this dark and stormy night
Faith beholds a feeble light

Up the blackness streaking;
Knowing God's own time is best,
In a patient hope I rest

For the full day-breaking!

—Whittier.

Never yet did there exist a full faith in the Divine word which did not expand the intellect, while it purified the heart: which did not multiply the aims and objects of the understanding, while it fixed and simplified those of the desires and feelings.—S. T. Coleridge.

And we shall be made truly wise if we be made content; content, too, not only with what we can understand, but content with what we do not understand—the habit of mind which theologians call—and rightly—faith in God.—Charles Kingsley.

If faith produce no works, I see
That faith is not a living tree,
Thus faith and works together grow;
No separate life they e'er can know:
They're soul and body, hand and heart:
What God hath joined, let no man part.
—Hannah More.

Ye children of promise, who are awaiting your call to glory, take possession of the inheritance that now is yours. By faith take the promises. Live upon them, not upon emotions. Remember, feeling is not faith. Faith grasps and clings to the promises. Faith says, "I am certain, not because feeling testifies to it, but because God says it."—Mandeville.

When my reason is afloat, my faith cannot long remain in suspense, and I believe in God as firmly as in any other truth whatever; in short, a thousand motives draw me to the consolatory side, and add the weight of hope to the equilibrium of reason.—Rousseau.

All the strength and force of man comes from his faith in things unseen. He who believes is strong; he who doubts is weak. Strong convictions precede great actions. The man strongly possessed of an idea is the master of all who are uncertain or wavering. Clear, deep, living convictions rule the world.—James Freeman Clarke.

Flatter not thyself in thy faith to God, if thou wantest charity for thy neighbor; and think not thou hast charity for thy neighbor if thou wantest faith to God. Where they are not both together, they are both wanting; they are both dead if once divided.—Quarles.

Faith is a practical habit, which, like every other, is strengthened and increased by continual exercise. It is nourished by meditation, by prayer, and the devout perusal of the Scriptures; and the light which it diffuses becomes stronger and clearer by an uninterrupted converse with its object, and a faithful compliance with its dictates.—Robert Hall.

Faith is the inspiration of nobleness, it is the strength of integrity; it is the life of love, and is everlasting growth for it; it is courage of soul, and bridges over for our crossing the gulf between worldliness and heavenly-mindedness; and it is the sense of the unseen, without which we could not feel God nor hope for heaven.—Wm. Mountford.

True faith nor biddeth nor abideth form,
The bended knee, the eye uplift, is all Which men need render; all which God can bear.

What to the faith are forms? A passing speck,
A crow upon the sky. —Bailey.

It is sufficiently humiliating to our nature to reflect that our knowledge is but as the rivulet, our ignorance as the sea. On points of the highest interest, the moment we quit the light of revelation we shall find that Platonism itself is intimately connected with Pyrrhonism, and the deepest inquiry with the darkest doubt.—Colton.

Never yet did there exist a full faith in the Divine Word (by whom light as well as immortality was brought into the world) which did not expand the intellect, while it purified the heart—which did not multiply the aims and objects of the understanding, while it fixed and simplified those of the desires and passions.—Coleridge.

If thy faith have no doubts, thou has just cause to doubt thy faith; and if thy doubts have no hope, thou hast just reason to fear despair; when therefore thy doubts shall exercise thy faith, keep thy hopes firm to qualify thy doubts; so shall thy faith be secured from doubts; so shall thy doubts be preserved from despair.—Quarles.

Faith is the backbone of the social and the foundation of the commercial fabric; remove faith between man and man, and society and commerce fall to pieces. There is not a happy home on earth but stands on faith; our heads are pillowed on it, we sleep at night in its arms with greater security for the safety of our lives, peace, and prosperity than bolts and bars can give.—Thomas Guthrie.

Mahomet made the people believe that he would call a hill to him, and from the top of it offer up his prayers for the observers of his law. The people assembled; Mahomet called the hill to come to him, again and again, and when the hill stood still, he was never awhit abashed, but said, if the hill will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the hill.—Bacon.

Judge not man by his outward manifestation of faith; for some there are who tremblingly reach out shaking hands to the guidance of faith; others who stoutly venture in the dark their human confidence, their leader, which they mistake for faith; some whose hope totters upon crutches; others who stalk into futurity upon stilts. The difference is chiefly constitutional with them.—Lamb.

The light of genius is sometimes so resplendent as to make a man walk through life, amid glory and acclamation; but it burns very dimly and low when carried into "the valley of the shadow of death." But faith is like the evening star, shining into our souls the more brightly, the deeper is the night of death in which they sink.—Mountford.

There are three means of believing—by inspiration, by reason, and by custom. Christianity, which is the only rational institution, does yet admit none for its sons who do not believe by inspiration. Nor does it injure reason or custom, or debar them of their proper force; on the contrary, it directs us to open our minds by the proofs of the former, and to confirm our minds by the authority of the latter.—Pascal.

There is a grand fearlessness in faith. He who in his heart of hearts reverences the good, the true, the holy—that is, reverences God—does not tremble at the apparent success of attacks upon the outworks of faith.

They may shake those who rest on those outworks—they do not move him whose soul reposes on the truth itself. He needs no prop or crutches to support his faith. Founded on a Rock, Faith can afford to gaze undismayed at the approaches of Infidelity.—F. W. Robertson.

He had great faith in loaves of bread
For hungry people, young and old,
And hope inspired; kind words he said
To those he sheltered from the cold.
In words he did not put his trust;
His faith in words he never writ;
He loved to share his cup and crust
With all mankind who needed it.
He put his trust in Heaven and he Worked well with hand and head;
And what he gave in charity
Sweetened his sleep and daily bread.

Faith in Christ

O, for a living faith in a living Redeemer!—Richard Fuller.

There are three acts of faith, assent, acceptance and assurance.—John Flavel.

There can be no faith so feeble that Christ does not respond to it.—Alexander MacLaren.

When you have given yourself to Christ, leave yourself there, and go about your work as a child in His household.—C. S. Robinson

That is faith, cleaving to Christ, twining round Him with all the tendrils of our heart, as the vine does round its support.—Alexander MacLaren.

Faith refers to Christ. Holiness depends on faith. Heaven depends on holiness.—Alexander MacLaren.

This is faith, receiving the truth of Christ; first knowing it to be true, and then acting upon that belief.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Faith is the act of trust by which one being, a sinner, commits himself to another being, a Saviour.—Horace Bushnell.

We have nothing to do but to receive, resting absolutely upon the merit, power, and love of our Redeemer.—William James.

The true confidence which is faith in Christ, and the true diffidence which is utter distrust of myself—are identical.—Alexander MacLaren.

Faith is a simple trust in a personal Redeemer. The simpler our trust in Christ for all things, the surer our peace.—William Adams.

We shall never recover the true apostolic energy, and be endued with power from on high, as the first disciples were, till we recover the lost faith.—Horace Bushnell.

No man's salvation depends on his believing that he believes; but it does depend on his seeing and receiving Jesus Christ as his Saviour.—M. R. Vincent.

Faith does not first ask what the bread is made of, but eats it. It does not analyze the components of the living stream, but with joy draws water from the "wells of salvation."—J. R. Macduff.

I have taken my good deeds and bad deeds, and thrown them together into a heap, and fled from them both to Christ, and in Him I have peace.—David Dickson.

The righteousness which is by faith in Christ is a loving heart and a loving life, which every man will long to lead who believes really in Jesus Christ.—Charles Kingsley.

Faith in Christ is not an exercise of the understanding merely; it is an affection of the heart. "With the heart man believeth." To those who believe Christ is precious.—Gardiner Spring.

We are not saved by nations or by churches or by families, but as individuals, through a personal interest in a personal Saviour.—John James.

Child of God, if you would have your thought of God something beyond a cold feeling of His presence, let faith appropriate Christ.—F. W. Robertson.

Faith is the bond of union, the instrument of justification, the spring of spiritual peace and joy, the means of spiritual peace and subsistence.—John Flavel.

Saving faith is confidence in Jesus; a direct, confidential transaction with Him.—Richard Fuller.

Faith in Jesus Christ is a saving grace, whereby we receive and rest upon Him alone for salvation, as He is offered to us in the gospel.—Westminster Catechism.

Faith is the gift of God, wrought by the Holy Spirit through the means of grace, in the heart of every penitent and seeking sinner; who faithfully uses them.—Evangelical Lutheran Catechism.

We must not think that faith itself is the soul's rest; it is only the means of it. We cannot find rest in any work or duty of our own, but we may find it in Christ, whom faith apprehends for justification and salvation.—John Flavel.

Nothing but Christian faith gives to the furthest future the solidity and definiteness which it must have if it is to be a breakwater for us against the fluctuating sea of present cares and thoughts.—Alexander Maclaren.

These poor people had never heard the distinctions between intellectual faith, historic faith, and saving faith; but they did as they were taught,—reached out their dirty hands to take Christ, and attended to the washing of their hands afterwards.—W. H. Daniels.

True faith, by a mighty effort of the will, fixes its gaze on our Divine Helper, and there finds it possible and wise to lose its fears. It is madness to say, "I will not be afraid;" it is wisdom and peace to say, "I will trust and not be afraid."—Alexander Maclaren.

Faith is the vital artery of the soul. When we begin to believe, we begin to love. Faith grafts the soul into Christ, as the scion into the stock, and fetches all its nutriment from the blessed Vine.—Watson.

Faith then, in its relation to salvation, is that confidence by which we accept it as a free gift from the Saviour, and is the only possible way in which the gift of God could be appropriated.—Mark Hopkins.

The soul is the life of the body, faith is the life of the soul, and Christ is the life of faith. Justification by faith in Christ's righteousness is the golden chain which binds the Christian world in one body.—Aughey.

We believe that the very beginning and end of salvation and the sum of Christianity, consists of faith in Christ, who by His blood alone, and not by any works of ours, has put away sin, and destroyed the power of death.—Martin Luther.

The act of faith, which separates us from all men, unites us for the first time in real brotherhood; and they who, one by one, come to Jesus and meet Him alone, next find that they are come to the city of God "and to an innumerable company."—Alexander Maclaren.

Oh, my soul! why art thou so often disquieted within thee? How is it that thou hast so little faith? Wilt thou never learn that Jesus has even the least of His little boats always under His watchful eye, and all the winds and the waves obey Him?—T. L. Cuyler.

Logically, faith comes first, and love next; but in life they will spring up together in the soul; the interval which separates them is impalpable, and in every act of trust, love is present; and fundamental to every emotion of love to Christ is trust in Christ.—Alexander Maclaren.

Faith, considered as a habit, is no more precious than other gracious habits are; but considered as an instrument to receive Christ and His righteousness, it excels them all; and this instrumentality of faith is noted in the phrases, "by faith," and "through faith."—John Flavel.

Faith is trusting Jesus to lead us and going where He leads. What avails it to me to analyze Saratoga water, and to believe in its virtues? I must drink the water if I want its purifying power. And the soul that has not actually drunk of Christ can never be purged from sin.—T. L. Cuyler.

Faith has a saving connection with Christ. Christ is on the shore, so to speak, holding the rope, and as we lay hold of it with the hand of our confidence, He pulls us to shore; but all good works having no connection with Christ are drifted along down the gulf of fell despair.—C. H. Spurgeon.

The first thing in faith is knowledge. What we know we must also agree unto. What we agree unto we must rest upon alone for salvation. It will not save me to know that Christ is a Saviour; but it will save me to trust Him to be my Saviour.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Faith that trusts on Jesus alone for salvation, and not on your respectable life, and the obedience that follows Him, are the indispensable steps to salvation. You admit that you have not taken these decisive steps. Then, however near you are, you are not in Christ.—T. L. Cuyler.

Faith is the nail which fastens the soul to Christ; and love is that grace that drives the nail to the head. Faith takes hold of Him, and love helps to keep the grip. Christ dwells in the heart by faith, and He burns in the heart by love, like a fire melting the breast. Faith casts the knot, and love draws it fast.—Erskine.

Relying on the atonement which Christ has made, and desiring to be saved in no other way, I commit myself into Thy hands, O God, my Father! Take me, and do with me as Thou seest to be for Thy glory. I consecrate myself forever to Thy service, and trust for acceptance in the merits of Thy Son.—Samuel Irenæus Prime.

Faith is a Christian's right eye, without which he cannot look for Christ; right hand, without which he cannot do for Christ; it is his tongue, without which he cannot speak for Christ; it is his vital spirit, without which he cannot act for Christ.—Thomas Brooks.

To trust God, as seen in the face of His Son, and to believe that He loves us, that is faith, that is what we must do to be saved. And to love God, as seen in the face of His Son, and to seek to testify our love by our whole life,—that is Christian duty; that is all we have to do.—A. H. Boyd.

Faith from its essential nature implies the fallen state of man, while it recognizes the principles of the covenant of grace. It is itself the condition of that covenant. It is a grace which is alike distinguished from the love of angels and the faith of devils. It is peculiar to the returning sinner. None but a lost sinner needs it; none but a humbled sinner relishes it.—Gardiner Spring.

It appears to me that, even within the recollection of living men, the Christian faith has come to be less and less regarded as a commanding and mighty power from heaven, a voice of authority, a law of holy life, but more and more as an easy going guide to future enjoyment, to a universal happiness and an indiscriminate salvation.—Bishop Huntington.

If we bear an inward enmity to all sins because they are offensive to God, if we can say that it is the desire of our souls to love Christ above all things, and to be eternal debtors to free grace, reigning through His righteousness, then we may warrantably conclude, that our faith, however weak, is yet of a saving nature.—Fisher's Catechism.

If you feel sincerely sorry on account of your sins, and believe that Christ is able and willing to forgive you, the work is done. You may trust with all the confidence of a child who confesses his fault, and casts himself into his father's arms. This is faith; a simple trust in the power and willingness of the Father to forgive, for the sake of what Christ the Son has done.—Samuel Irenæus Prime.

Seek for a fresh invoice of grace. Unbelief can scoff or growl; faith is the nightingale that sings in the darkest hour. Faith can draw honey out of the rock and oil out of the flint. With Christ in possession and heaven in reversion, it marches to the time of the One-hundred-and-third Psalm over the roughest road, and against the most cutting blast.—T. L. Cuyler.

Here then is man's duty. It is to receive that free and full salvation that Christ has provided. It is to stretch forth the hand of faith, and with it take the proffered salvation. It is to cling to the cross as the only hope of everlasting life. Will you do it? Weary, working, plodding one, will you, ceasing all this vain attempt to save yourself, receive Christ, and Christ alone as your Saviour?—Henry Darling.

I expect eternal life, not as a reward of merit, but a pure act of bounty. Detesting myself in every view I can take, I fly to the righteousness and atonement of my great Redeemer for pardon and salvation; this is my only consolation and hope. "Enter not into judgment, O Lord, with Thy servant; for in Thy sight shall no flesh be justified."—Elizabeth Rowe.

If faith, then, new birth; if new birth, then sonship; if sonship, then "an heir of God, and a joint-heir with Christ." But if you have not got your foot upon the lowest round of the ladder, you will never come within sight of the blessed face of Him who stands at the top of it, and who looks down to you at this moment, saying to you, "My child, wilt thou not at this time cry unto me, 'Abba, Father?'"—Alexander Maclaren.

This saving faith is the perceiving, believing, and resting upon a fact—the atoning death of Jesus Christ. The failure to understand this is one fruitful cause of the confusion in many minds about this subject. For not unfrequently persons are looking into their own hearts, and trying to discover whether they have faith or not, instead of looking away from themselves altogether at the object of faith.—M. R. Vincent.

True faith is not only a certain knowledge, whereby I hold for truth all that God has revealed to us in His word, but also an assured confidence, which the Holy Ghost works by the gospel, in my heart; that not only to others but to me also, remission of sin, everlasting righteousness, and salvation are freely given by God merely of grace, only for the sake of Christ's merits.—Heidelberg Catechism.

Faith is reliance upon the sacrificial death of Christ for salvation and everlasting life. It is the act of the heart by which we heartily welcome Him into our souls. Faith is the primal grace. Faith is the cardinal grace. By holiness we are made like Christ; by faith we are made one with Christ; and being in Christ, we have peace.—Elihu Noble.

Faith—saving faith—whatever other definition may be framed—is best described as that act of the soul by which the whole man is given over to the guardianship of the Mediator. He who thus resigns himself to Jesus avouches two things: first, his belief that he needs a protector; secondly, his belief that Christ is just that protector which his necessities require.—Henry Melvill.

When a miner looks at the rope that is to lower him into the deep mine, he may coolly say, "I have faith in that rope as well made and strong." But when he lays hold of it, and swings down by it into the tremendous chasm, then he is believing on the rope. Then he is trusting himself to the rope. It is not a mere opinion—it is an act. The miner lets go of every thing else, and bears his whole weight on those well braided strands of hemp. Now that is faith.—T. L. Cuyler.

Faith is not the lazy notion that a man may with careless confidence throw his burden upon the Saviour and trouble himself no further, a pillow upon which he lulls his conscience to sleep, till he drops into perdition; but a living and vigorous principle.

working by love, and inseparably connected with true repentance as its motive and with holy obedience as its fruits.

Above all things I entreat you to preserve your faith in Christ. It is my wealth in poverty, my joy in sorrow, my peace amid tumult. For all the evil I have committed, my gracious pardon; and for every effort, my exceeding great reward. I have found it to be so. I can smile with pity at the infidel whose vanity makes him dream that I should barter such a blessing for the few subtleties from the school of the cold-blooded sophists.—S. T. Coleridge.

Faith has in it the recognition of the certainty and the justice of a judgment that is coming down crashing on every human head; and then from the midst of these fears and sorrows and the tempest of that great darkness there rises up in the night of terrors the shining of one perhaps pale, quivering, distant, but divinely given hope, "My Saviour! My Saviour! He is righteous; He has died; He lives! I will stay no longer; I will cast myself upon Him!"—Alexander MacLaren.

If God made no response except to perfect faith, who could hope for help? But God has regard for beginnings, and His eye perceives greatness in the germ. The hand of the woman in the crowd trembled as it was stretched toward Jesus, and the faith back of it was superstitiously reverent, trusting in the virtue of the robe, rather than in the One who wore it; yet the genuineness of that faith, feeble though it was, triumphed in God's loving sight. Real trust is real power, though the heart and hand be feeble.—Maltbie Babcock.

When there is a clear reception of truth as revealed, declared, or testified to, the soul believes in that truth. There is here the idea of transfer. The truth has been received through or from an accredited witness. "It is revealed from faith to faith." When the soul, conscious of weakness or want, looks to, trusts in, or waits upon, another for help and strength, this is resting on, relying on, acting faith on, that other for the desired blessing. And when the soul believes or acts faith in to another, there is an entire self-surrender to the authority and sovereign will of that other to rule. There is here the idea of the soul going out to rest on the power, and to be subordinate to, the authority of another. Thus the Israelites "were all baptized unto or into Moses in the cloud and in the sea."—John James.

The natural homage which such a creature as Man bears to an infinitely wise and good God, is a firm Reliance on Him for the blessings and conveniences of life, and an habitual Trust in Him for deliverance out of all such dangers and difficulties as may befall us. The man who always lives in this disposition of mind, when he reflects upon his own weakness and imperfection, comforts himself with the contemplation of those Divine attributes which are employed for his safety and welfare. He finds his want of foresight made up by the omniscience of Him who is his support. He is not sensible of his own want of strength when he knows that his Helper is Almighty. In short, the person who has a firm Trust on the Supreme Being, is powerful in his power, wise by his wisdom, happy by his happiness.—Addison.

Faith in God

Large asking and large expectation on our part honor God.—A. L. Stone.

Orthodoxy can be learnt from others; living faith must be a matter of personal experience.—Büchsel.

Faith is letting down our nets into the transparent deeps at the Divine command, not knowing what we shall draw.—Fénelon.

An active faith can give thanks for a promise even though it be not yet performed, knowing that God's bonds are as good as ready money.—Matthew Henry.

If our faith in God is not the veriest sham, it demands, and will produce, the abandonment sometimes, the subordination always, of external helps and material good.—Alexander Maclaren.

The person who has a firm trust in the Supreme Being is powerful in his power, wise by his wisdom, happy by his happiness.—Addison.

God does not give us ready money. He issues promissory notes, and then pays them when faith presents them at the throne. Each one of us has a check-book.—T. L. Cuyler.

He that buildeth his nest upon a Divine promise shall find it abide and remain until he shall fly away to the land where promises are lost in fulfillments.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Let us aspire towards this living confidence, that it is the will of God to unfold and exalt without end the spirit that entrusts itself to Him in well-doing as to a faithful Creator.—W. E. Channing.

If we had strength and faith enough to trust ourselves entirely to God, and follow Him simply wherever He should lead us, we should have no need of any great effort of mind to reach perfection.—Fenelon.

I envy no quality of the mind or intellect in others; not genius, power, wit, nor fancy; but, if I could choose what would be most delightful, and, I believe, most useful to me, I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing.—Sir Humphry Davy.

Serve God, and God will take care of you. Submit to His will, trust in His grace, and resign yourself into His hands with the assurance that the Lord is well pleased with those "that hope in His mercy."—Gardiner Spring.

You cannot be too active as regards your own efforts; you cannot be too dependent as regards Divine grace. Do every thing as if God did nothing; depend upon God as if He did everything.—John Angel James.

The soul seeks God by faith, not by the reasonings of the mind and labored efforts, but by the drawings of love; to which inclinations God responds, and instructs the soul, which co-operates actively. God then puts the soul in a passive state where He accomplishes all, causing great progress, first by way of enjoyment, then by privation, and finally by pure love. Mme. Guyon.

Faith is a grasping of Almighty power; The hand of man laid on the arm of God;—The grand and blessed hour in which the things impossible to me Become the possible, O Lord, through Thee. —A. E. Hamilton.

The last decisive energy of a rational courage which confides in the Supreme Power is very sublime. It makes a man who intrepidly dares every thing that can oppose or attack him within the sphere of mortality—who will press toward his object while death is impending over him—who would retain his purpose unshaken amidst the ruins of the world.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

So for us, the condition and preparation on and by which we are sheltered by that great hand, is the faith that asks, and the asking of faith. We must forsake the earthly props, but we must also believably desire to be upheld by the heavenly arms. We make God responsible for our safety when we abandon other defense, and commit ourselves to Him.—Alexander Maclaren.

God cannot lie; and if, fleeing for refuge, you have run to the hope set before you in the gospel—if, nestling in some invitation or promise of God's changeless word, you are resolved that Death and the Judgment shall find you there, you are safe. The way to honor God is to trust His truth, and hidden in His word you are also hidden in His love. Rest there.—James Hamilton.

Faith, then, generically, is confidence in a personal being. Specifically, religious faith is confidence in God, in every respect and office in which He reveals Himself. As that love of which God is the object is religious love, so that confidence in Him as a Father, a Moral Governor, a Redeemer, a Sauc-tifier, in all the modes of His manifestation, by which we believe whatever He says because He says it, and commit ourselves and all our interests cheerfully and entirely into His hands, is religious faith.—Mark Hopkins.

In reviewing the most mysterious doctrines of revelation, the ultimate appeal is to reason, not to determine whether she could have discovered these truths; not to declare whether, considered in themselves, they appear probable; but to decide whether it is not more reasonable to believe what God speaks than to confide in our own crude and feeble conceptions. No doctrine can be a proper object of our faith, which is not more reasonable to believe than to reject.—Alexander.

Entireness, illimitableness is indispensable to Faith. What we believe, we must believe wholly and without reserve; wherefore the only perfect and satisfying object of Faith is God. A Faith that sets bounds to itself, that will believe so much and no more, that will trust thus far and no further, is none.

There is a power in the soul, quite separate from the intellect, which sweeps away or recognizes the marvelous, by which God is felt. Faith stands serenely far above the reach of the atheism of science. It does not rest on the wonderful, but on the eternal wisdom and goodness of God. The revelation of the Son was to proclaim a Father, not a mystery. No science can sweep away the everlasting love which the heart feels, and which the intellect does not even pretend to judge or recognize.—F. W. Robertson.

Never more than to-day were needed the men of calm and resolute faith. Brothers, to your knees and to your ranks! To your knees in humblest supplication; to your ranks in steadfast bravery which no foe can cause to quail. Stand forth in courage and in gentleness for the truth which you believe to be allied to Freedom and Progress and God. Be so strong that you are not afraid to be just. Cherish a tender humanity and a catholic heart. Then take your stand, calm and moveless as the stars.

—Wm. M. Punshon.

Falsity

Splendidly mendacious.—Horace.

False in one thing, false in everything.—Law Maxim.

Had she been true,
If Heaven would make me such another world
Of one entire and perfect chrysolite,
I'd not have sold her for it.

—Shakespeare.

As false
As air, as water, as wind, as sandy earth;
As fox to lamb; as wolf to heifer's calf;
Pard to the hind, or stepdame to her son.

—Shakespeare.

He who is false to his fellow-man is also false to his Maker.—Stahl.

False as the adulterate promises of favorites in power when poor men court them.—Otway.

False-dealing travels a short road,
and surely detected.—William Penn.

Stealing her soul with many vows of faith;
And ne'er a true one. —Shakespeare.

False as stairs of sand.—Shakespeare.

To be true is manly, chivalrous,
Christian; to be false is mean, cowardly, devilish.—Carlyle.

He seemed for dignity composed and high exploit; but all was false and hollow.—Milton.

It is far better to be deceived than undecieved by those whom we tenderly love.—Rochefoucauld.

So the false spider, when her nets are spread, deep ambushed in her silent den does lie.—Dryden.

Falsehood

Falsehood is cowardice.—Hosea
Ballou.

Falsehood is so easy, truth so difficult.—George Eliot.

Falsehood is for a season.—Landor.

Falsehood always endeavors to copy the mien and attitude of truth.—Dr. Johnson.

Falsehood and death are synonymous.—Bancroft.

Past all shame, so past all truth.—Shakespeare.

O, what a goodly outside falsehood hath!—Shakespeare.

A lie never lives to be old.—Sophocles.

The crime of cowards.—Dr. Johnson.

False as the fowler's artful snare.—Smollett.

This shows that liars ought to have good memories.—Algernon Sidney.

And, after all, what is a lie? 'Tis but
The truth in masquerade. —Byron.

Who dares think one thing, and another tell,
My heart detests him as the gates of hell.
—Homer.

Falsehood and fraud shoot up in every soil
The product of all climes. Addison.

For my part, if a lie may do thee grace,
I'll gild it with the happiest terms I have.—Shakespeare.

Let a man be ne'er so wise, he may be caught with sober lies.—Swift.

False modesty is the most decent of all falsehoods.—Chamfort.

Falsehoods which we spurn to-day were the truths of long ago.—Whittier.

And none speaks false, when there is none to hear. —Beattie.

Cottages have them (falsehood and dissimulation) as well as courts, only with worse manners.—Lord Chesterfield.

For no falsehood can endure touch of celestial temper, but returns of force to its own likeness.—Milton.

There is no such thing as white lies; a lie is as black as a coal-pit, and twice as foul.—Beecher.

The dull flat falsehood serves for policy, and in the cunning, truth's itself a lie.—Pope.

Where fraud and falsehood invade society, the band presently breaks.—South.

These lies are like the father that begets them; gross as a mountain, open, palpable.—Shakespeare.

Sin has many tools, but a lie is the handle which fits them all.—O. W. Holmes.

Money and man a mutual falsehood show,
Men make false money,—money makes men so. —Alecyn.

Dissembling profiteth nothing; a feigned countenance, and slightly forged externally, deceiveth but very few.—Seneca.

It is not without good reason said, that he who has not a good memory should never take upon him the trade of lying.—Montaigne.

Falsehood is often rocked by truth; but she soon outgrows her cradle and discards her nurse.—Colton.

It is more from carelessness about truth than from intentional lying that there is so much falsehood in the world.—Johnson.

Falsehood, like the dry-rot, flourishes the more in proportion as air and light are excluded.—Whately.

Every lie, great or small, is the brink of a precipice, the depth of which nothing but omniscience can fathom.—Reade.

I have seldom known any one who deserted truth in trifles that could be trusted in matters of importance.—Paley.

Falsehoods not only disagree with truths, but usually quarrel among themselves.—Daniel Webster.

Falsehood avails itself of haste and uncertainty.—Tacitus.

Large offers and sturdy rejections are among the most common topics of falsehood.—Johnson.

Wisdom and truth, the offspring of the sky, are immortal; while cunning and deception, the meteors of the earth, after glittering for a moment, must pass away.—Robert Hall.

To lapse in fulness is sorer than to lie for need; and falsehood is worse in kings than beggars.—Shakespeare.

A liar would be brave toward God, while he is a coward toward men; for a lie faces God, and shrinks from man.—Montaigne.

The first great requisite is absolute sincerity. Falsehood and disguise are miseries and misery-makers.—Coleridge.

If an ingenuous detestation of falsehood be but carefully and early instilled, that is the true and genuine method to obviate dishonesty.—Locke.

Every breach of veracity indicates some latent vice or some criminal intention, which the individual is ashamed to avow.—Dugald Stewart.

To tell a falsehood is like the cut of a sabre; for though the wound may heal, the scar of it will remain.—Saadi.

Dissimulation in youth is the forerunner of perfidy in old age; its first appearance is the fatal omen of growing depravity and future shame.—Blair.

Lie not, neither to thyself nor men nor God. Let mouth and heart be one—beat and speak together, and make both felt in action. It is for cowards to lie.—George Herbert.

A lie should be trampled on and extinguished wherever found. I am for fumigating the atmosphere when I suspect that falsehood, like pestilence, breathes around me.—Carlyle.

Not the least misfortune in a prominent falsehood is the fact that tradition is apt to repeat it for truth.—Hosea Ballou.

The gain of lying is nothing else but not to be trusted of any, nor to be believed when we speak the truth.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain that one.—Pope.

A few men are sufficient to broach falsehoods, which are afterwards innocently diffused by successive relaters.—Johnson.

Falsehood, like poison, will generally be rejected when administered alone; but when blended with wholesome ingredients, may be swallowed unperceived.—Whately.

Falsehood is susceptible of an infinity of combinations, but truth has only one mode of being.—Rousseau.

Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom; for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth, and to do it.—Bacon.

There is often seen this anomaly in women, especially in those of childish natures,—that they possess at once great promptness and unskilfulness in falsehood.—Daudet.

Round dealing is the honor of man's nature; and a mixture of falsehood is like alloy in gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth it.—Bacon.

Woe to falsehood! it affords no relief to the breast, like truth; it gives us no comfort, pains him who forges it, and like an arrow directed by a god flies back and wounds the archer.—Goethe.

When a man has once forfeited the reputation of his integrity, he is set fast, and nothing will then serve his turn, neither truth nor falsehood.—Tillotson.

Nothing gives such a blow to friendship as the detecting another in an untruth. It strikes at the root of our confidence ever after.—Hazlitt.

Although the Devil be the father of lies, he seems, like other great inventors, to have lost much of his reputation by the continual improvements that have been made upon him.—Swift.

If there were no falsehood in the world, there would be no doubt; if there were no doubt, there would be no inquiry; if no inquiry, no wisdom, no knowledge, no genius.—Landor.

Habitual liars invent falsehoods not to gain any end or even to deceive their hearers, but to amuse themselves. It is partly practice and partly habit. It requires an effort in them to speak truth.—Hazlitt.

Start a lie and a truth together, like hare and hound: the lie will run fast and smooth, and no man will ever turn it aside; but at the truth most hands will fling a stone, and so hinder it for sport's sake, if they can.—Ouida.

What wit so sharp is found in age or youth, That can distinguish truth from treachery? Falsehood puts on the face of simple truth, And masks i' th' habit of plain honesty, When she in heart intends most villany.
—Mirror for Magistrates.

Falsehood is fire in stubble; it likewise turns all the light stuff around it into its own substance for a moment, one crackling blazing moment, and then dies; and all its converts are scattered in the wind, without place or evidence of their existence, as viewless as the wind which scatters them.—Coleridge.

That a lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies;
That a lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with outright—
But a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight. —Tennyson.

Figures themselves, in their symmetrical and inexorable order, have their mistakes like words and speeches. An hour of pleasure and an hour of pain are alike only on the dial in their numerical arrangement. Outside the dial they lie sixty times.—Méry.

Falsehood is difficult to be maintained. When the materials of a building are solid blocks of stone, very rude architecture will suffice; but a structure of rotten materials needs the most careful adjustment to make it stand at all.—Whately.

Falsehood is never so successful as when she baits her hook with truth, and no opinions so fatally mislead us as those that are not wholly wrong, as no watches so effectually deceive the wearer as those that are sometimes right.—Colton.

There is a set of harmless liars, frequently to be met with in company, who deal much in the marvellous. Their usual intention is to please and entertain; but as men are most delighted with what they conceive to be the truth, these people mistake the means of pleasing, and incur universal blame.—Hume.

How false are men, both in their heads and hearts;
And there is falsehood in all trades and arts.
Lawyers deceive their clients by false law;
Priests, by false gods, keep all the world in awe.
For their false tongues such flatt'ring knaves
are rais'd,
For their false wit, scribblers by fools are prais'd.
—Crown.

Let falsehood be a stranger to thy lips;
Shame on the policy that first began
To tamper with the heart to hide its thoughts!
And doubly shame on that inglorious tongue,
That sold its honesty and told a lie.
—Havard.

Whatever convenience may be thought to be in falsehood and dissimulation, it is soon over; but the inconvenience of it is perpetual, because it brings a man under everlasting jealousy and suspicion, so that he is not believed when he speaks the truth, nor trusted when perhaps he means honestly.—Tillotson.

Falsehood, like a drawing in perspective, will not bear to be examined in every point of view, because it is a good imitation of truth, as a spective is of the reality, only in one. But truth, like that reality of which the perspective is the representation, will bear to be scrutinized in all points of view, and though examined under every situation, is one and the same.—Colton.

Fame

Fame is the perfume of heroic deeds.—Socrates.

The breath of popular applause.—Herrick.

Fame,—a flower upon a dead man's heart.—Motherwell.

A woman's fame is the tomb of her happiness.—L. E. Landon.

The greatest can but blaze and pass away.—Pope.

Fame,—next grandest word to God! —Alexander Smith.

To many fame comes too late.—Cammons.

She comes unnoticed for if she comes at all.—Pope.

Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil.—Milton.

With fame, in just proportion, envy grows.—Young.

Raised by fortune to a ridiculous visibility.—Grattan.

Fame! that common crier.—J. Q. Adams.

Grant me honest fame or grant me none.—Pope.

Short is my date, but deathless my renown.—Homer.

Deathless laurel is the victor's due.—Dryden.

He lives in fame, that died in virtue's cause.—Shakespeare.

Fame sometimes hath created something of nothing.—Thomas Fuller.

I awoke one morning and found myself famous.—Byron.

Fame, the sovereign deity of proud ambition.—Sheridan.

To myself alone do I owe my fame.—Cornéille.

Song forbids victorious deeds to die.—Schiller.

I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety.—Shakespeare.

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives, Live register'd upon our brazen tombs.—Shakespeare.

Fame is the thirst of youth.—Byron.

And yet, after all, what is posthumous fame? Altogether vanity.—Antoninus.

Even the best things are not equal to their fame.—Thoreau.

Celebrity sells dearly what we think she gives.—Emile Souvestre.

Money will buy money's worth: but the thing men call fame, what is it?—Carlyle.

Fame has eagle wings, and yet she mounts not so high as man's desires.—Beaconsfield.

Fame is but the breath of the people, and that often unwholesome.—Rousseau.

Fame must necessarily be the portion of but few.—Robert Hall.

None despise fame more heartily than those who have no possible claim to it.—J. Petit-Senn.

How idle a boast, after all, is the immortality of a name!—Washington Irving.

Many have lived on a pedestal who will never have a statue when dead.—Béranger.

Fame can never make us lie down contentedly on a death-bed.—Pope.

What is the end of fame? it is but to fill a certain portion of uncertain paper.—Byron.

Who despises fame will soon renounce the virtues that deserve it.—Mallet.

Never get a reputation for a small perfection if you are trying for fame in a loftier area.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If fame is only to come after death, I am in no hurry for it.—Martial.

The way to fame is like the way to heaven, through much tribulation.—Steele.

A few words upon a tombstone, and the truth of those not to be depended on.—Bovee.

No true and permanent fame can be founded, except in labors which promote the happiness of mankind.—Charles Sumner.

The love of fame is the last weakness which even the wise resign.—Tacitus.

The love of fame gives an immense stimulus.—Ovid.

What is fame? a fancied life 'n others' breath.—Pope.

He that will sell his fame will also sell the public interest.—Solon.

To have fame follow us is well, but it is not a desirable avant-courier.—Balzac.

Rash combat oft immortalizes man. If he should fall, he is renowned in song.—Goethe.

What a heavy burden is a name that has become too soon famous!—Voltaire.

Though fame is smoke, its fumes are frankincense to human thoughts.—Byron.

Better than fame is still the wish for fame, the constant training for a glorious strife.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It often happens that those of whom we speak least on earth are best known in heaven.—N. Caussin.

Unlike the sun, intellectual luminaries shine brightest after they set.—Colton.

Celebrity is the chastisement of merit and the punishment of talent.—Chamfort.

Fame is the shame of immortality, and is itself a shadow.—Young.

No one would ever meet death in defence of his country without the hope of immortality.—Cicero.

Fame comes only when deserved, and then is as inevitable as destiny, for it is destiny.—Longfellow.

What shall I do to be forever known,
And make the age to come my own?
—Cowley.

Seven cities warr'd for Homer being dead,
Who living had no rooffe to shroud his head.
—Thos. Heywood.

He shines in the second rank, who is eclipsed in the first.—Voltaire.

She is best who is least spoken of among men, whether for good or evil.—Pericles.

Many actions calculated to procure fame are not conducive to ultimate happiness.—Addison.

I have learned to prize the quiet, lightning deed, not the applauding thunder at its heels that men call fame.—A. Smith.

Men have a solicitude about fame; and the greater share they have of it, the more afraid they are of losing it.—Johnson.

The temple of fame stands upon the grave; the flame that burns upon its altars is kindled from the ashes of dead men.—Hazlitt.

The fame of great men ought always to be estimated by the means used to acquire it.—La Rochefoucauld.

Naked glory is the true and honorable recompense of gallant actions.—
Le Sage.

He that would have his virtue published, is not the servant of virtue, but glory.—Ben Jonson.

The love of letters is the forlorn hope of the man of letters. His ruling passion is the love of fame.—
Hazlitt.

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it Fame. —Pope.

I'll make thee glorious by my pen
And famous by my sword.
—Marquis of Montrose.

Fame lulls the fever of the soul, and makes Us feel that we have grasp'd an immortality.
—Joaquin Miller.

Fame! it is the flower of a day, that dies when the next sun rises.—Ouida.

Men's evil manners live in brass;
their virtues we write in water.—
Shakespeare.

Only the actions of the just smell sweet and blossom in the dust.—James Shirley.

Death makes no conquest of this conqueror;
For now he lives in Fame, though not in life. —Shakespeare.

The drying up a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.
—Byron.

Mere family never made a man great. Thought and deed, not pedigree, are the passports to enduring fame.—Skobelev.

Avoid shame, but do not seek glory:
nothing so expensive as glory.—Sydney
Smith.

What rage for fame attends both great and small!
Better be d—n'd than mentioned not at all.
—John Wolcott.

An enduring fame is one stamped by the judgment of the future,—that future which dispels illusions, and smashes idols into dust.—Gladstone.

The way to fame is like the way to heaven—through much tribulation.—
Sterne.

No true and permanent Fame can be founded except in labors which promote the happiness of mankind.—
Charles Sumner.

Ah! who can tell how hard it is to climb
The steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar? —Beattie.

Sloth views the towers of fame with envious
eyes,
Desirous still, still impotent to rise.
—Shenstone.

Go where glory waits thee;
But while fame elates thee,
Oh! still remember me. —Moore.

In fame's temple there is always a niche to be found for rich dunces, importunate scoundrels, or successful butchers of the human race.—Zimmermann.

It deserves with characters of brass,
A fortified residence, 'gainst the tooth of time
And razure of oblivion. —Shakespeare.

He left a name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
—Dr. Johnson.

If you would not be forgotten as soon as you are dead, either write things worth reading or do things worth writing.—Franklin.

Men's fame is like their hair, which grows after they are dead, and with just as little use to them.—George Villiers.

Of all the rewards of virtue, . . .
the most splendid is fame, for it is fame alone that can offer us the memory of posterity.—Cicero.

He who would acquire fame must not show himself afraid of censure.
The dread of censure is the death of genius.—Simms.

As the pearl ripens in the obscurity of its shell, so ripens in the tomb all the fame that is truly precious.—Landor.

Men think highly of those who rise rapidly in the world; whereas nothing rises quicker than dust, straw, and feathers.—Hare.

Fame and admiration weigh not a feather in the scale against friendship and love, for the heart languishes all the same.—George Sand.

The thirst after fame is greater than that after virtue; for who embraces virtue if you take away its rewards?—Juvenal.

It is pleasing to be pointed at with the finger and to have it said, "There goes the man."—Persius.

What is fame? The advantage of being known by people of whom you yourself know nothing, and for whom you care as little.—Stanislaus.

Time magnifies everything after death; a man's fame is increased as it passes from mouth to mouth after his burial.—Propertius.

The splendors that belong unto the fame of earth are but a wind, that in the same direction lasts not long.—Dante.

Fame is the echo of actions, resounding them to the world, save that the echo repeats only the last part; but fame relates all, and often more than all.—Thomas Fuller.

The aspiring youth that fired the Ephesian dome outlives in fame the pious fool that raised it.—Colley Cibber.

Fame, they tell you, is air; but without air there is no life for any; without fame there is none for the best.—Landor.

Fame usually comes to those who are thinking about something else,—very rarely to those who say to themselves, "Go to, now let us be a celebrated individual!"—Holmes.

Your fame is as the grass, whose hue comes and goes, and His might withers it by whose power it sprang from the lap of the earth.—Dante.

Fame, we may understand, is no sure test of merit, but only a probability of such: it is an accident, not a property of a man.—Carlyle.

Were not this desire of fame very strong, the difficulty of obtaining it, and the danger of losing it when obtained, would be sufficient to deter a man from so vain a pursuit.—Addison.

Then shall our names
Familiar in his mouth as household words,
Be in their flowing cups freshly remembered.
—Shakespeare.

Scarcely two hundred years back can Fame recollect articulately at all; and there she but maunders and mumbles.—Carlyle.

If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined,
The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind;
Or, ravished with the whistling of a name,
See Cromwell, damned to everlasting fame!
—Pope.

What of them is left, to tell
Where they lie, and how they fell?
Not a stone on their turf, nor a bone in their graves:
But they live in the Verse that immortally saves.
—Byron.

And glory long has made the sages smile;
'Tis something, nothing, words, illusion,
wind—
Depending more upon the historian's style Than on the name a person leaves behind.
—Byron.

Of all the possessions of this life fame is the noblest; when the body has sunk into the dust the great name still lives.—Schiller.

Fame may be compared to a scold;
the best way to silence her is to let her alone, and she will at last be out of breath in blowing her own trumpet.
—Fuller.

Of all the phantoms fleeting in the mist
Of time, though meagre all and ghostly thin;
Most unsubstantial, unessential shade
Was earthly fame.
—Pollok.

Be not liquorish after fame, found by experience to carry a trumpet, that doth for the most part congregate more enemies than friends.—Osborn.

Sound, sound the clarion, fill the fife!
To all the sensual world proclaim,
One crowded hour of glorious life
Is worth an age without a name.
—Scott.

Fame, as a river, is narrowest where it is bred, and broadest afar off; so exemplary writers depend not upon the gratitude of the world.—Sir W. Davenant.

The love of fame is a passion natural and universal, which no man, however high or mean, however wise or ignorant, was yet able to despise.—Dr. Johnson.

None of the projects or designs which exercise the mind of man are equally subject to obstructions and disappointments with the pursuit of fame.—Dr. Johnson.

In the career of female fame, there are few prizes to be obtained which can vie with the obscure state of a beloved wife or a happy mother.—Jane Porter.

The Duke of Wellington brought to the post of first minister immortal fame: a quality of success which would almost seem to include all others.—Benj. Disraeli.

Fame is a shuttlecock. If it be struck only at one end of a room it will soon fall to the floor. To keep it up, it must be struck at both ends.—Johnson.

Fame is not won on downy plumes nor under canopies; the man who consumes his days without obtaining it leaves such mark of himself on earth as smoke in air or foam on water.—Dante.

The fame which bids fair to live the longest resembles that which Horace attributes to Marcellus, whose progress he compares to the silent, imperceptible growth of a tree.—W. B. Clulow.

When Fame stands by us all alone, she is an angel clad in light and strength; but when Love touches her she drops her sword, and fades away, ghostlike and ashamed.—Ouida.

Fame is an undertaker that pays but little attention to the living, but bedizens the dead, furnishes out their funerals, and follows them to the grave.—Colton.

Fame is the inheritance not of the dead, but of the living. It is we who look back with lofty pride to the great names of antiquity, who drink of that flood of glory as of a river, and refresh our wings in it for future flight.—Hazlitt.

Valor and power may gain a lasting memory, but where are they when the brave and mighty are departed? Their effects may remain, but they live not in them any more than the fire in the work of the potter.—Hartley Coleridge.

The only pleasure of fame is that it proves the way to pleasure; and the more intellectual our pleasure, the better for the pleasure and for us too.—Byron.

There is no employment in the world so laborious as that of making to one's self a great name; life ends before one has scarcely made the first rough draught of his work.—Bruyère.

It is more reasonable to wish for reputation while it may be enjoyed, as Anacreon calls upon his companions to give him for present use the wine and garlands which they propose to bestow upon his tomb.—Dr. Johnson.

Our admiration of a famous man lessens upon our nearer acquaintance with him; and we seldom hear of a celebrated person without a catalogue of some notorious weaknesses and infirmities.—Addison.

It is not without reason that fame is awarded only after death. The cloud-dust of notoriety which follows and envelops the men who drive with the wind bewilders contemporary judgment.—Lowell.

Fame confers a rank above that of gentleman and of kings. As soon as she issues her patent of nobility, it matters not a straw whether the recipient be the son of a Bourbon or of a tallow-chandler.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The desire of posthumous fame and the dread of posthumous reproach and execration are feelings from the influence of which scarcely any man is perfectly free, and which in many men are powerful and constant motives of action.—Macaulay.

If opinion hath lighted the lamp of thy name, endeavor to encourage it with thy own oil, lest it go out and stink; the chronical disease of popularity is shame: if thou be once up, beware; from fame to infamy is a beaten road.—Quarles.

Fame is a good so wholly foreign to our natures that we have no faculty in the soul adapted to it, nor any organ in the body to relish it; an object of desire placed out of the possibility of fruition.—Addison.

Those who despise fame seldom deserve it. We are apt to undervalue the purchase we cannot reach, to conceal our poverty the better. It is a spark which kindles upon the best fuel, and burns brightest in the bravest breast.—Jeremy Collier.

Fame often rests at first upon something accidental, and often, too, is swept away, or for a time removed; but neither genius nor glory is conferred at once, nor do they glimmer and fall, like drops in a grotto, at a shout.—Landon.

Common fame is the only liar that serveth to have some respect still reserved to it; though she telleth many an untruth, she often hits right, and most especially when she speaketh ill of men.—Saville.

It is the penalty of fame that a man must ever keep rising. "Get a reputation and then go to bed," is the absurdest of all maxims. "Keep up a reputation or go to bed," would be nearer the truth.—Chapin.

Among the writers of all ages, some deserve fame, and have it; others neither have nor deserve it; some have it, not deserving it; others, though deserving it, yet totally miss it, or have it not equal to their deserts.—Milton.

Time has a doomsday book, upon whose pages he is continually recording illustrious names. But as often as a new name is written there, an old one disappears. Only a few stand in illuminated characters never to be effaced.—Longfellow.

The best-concerted schemes men lay for fame.

Die fast away; only themselves die faster. The far-fam'd sculptor, and the laurell'd bard,

Those bold insurers of deathless fame, Supply their little feeble aids in vain.

—Blair.

What a wretched thing is all fame! A renown of the highest sort endures, say, for two thousand years. And then? Why, then, a fathomless eternity swallows it. Work for eternity: not the meagre rhetorical eternity of the periodical critics, but for the real eternity, wherein dwelleth the Divine.—Carlyle.

How idle a boast, after all, is the immortality of a name! Time is ever silently turning over his pages; we are too much engrossed by the story of the present to think of the character and anecdotes that gave interest to the past; and each age is a volume thrown aside and forgotten.—Washington Irving.

Thy fanes, thy temple, to the surface bow,
Commingling slowly with heroic earth,
Broke by the share of every rustic plough:
So perish monuments of mortal Birth,
To perish all in turn, save well-recorded Worth.

—Byron.

Fame has no necessary conjunction with praise; it may exist without the breath of a word: it is a recognition of excellence which must be felt, but need not be spoken. Even the envious must feel it,—feel it, and hate in silence.—Washington Allston.

The love of fame is too high and delicate a feeling in the mind to be mixed up with realities,—it is a solitary abstraction. * * A name "fast anchored in the deep abyss of time" is like a star twinkling in the firmament, cold, silent, distant, but eternal and sublime; and our transmitting one to posterity is as if we should contemplate our translation to the skies.

—Hazlitt.

Fame is a revenue payable only to our ghosts; and to deny ourselves all present satisfaction, or to expose ourselves to so much hazard for this, were as great madness as to starve ourselves, or fight desperately for food, to be laid on our tombs after our death.—Mackenzie.

Fame is like a river, that bareth up things light and swollen, and drowns things weighty and solid; but if persons of quality and judgment concur, then it fillet all round about, and will not easily away; for the odors of ointments are more durable than those of flowers.—Bacon.

Popular glory is a perfect coquette; her lovers must toil, feel every inquietude, indulge every caprice, and perhaps at last be jilted into the bargain. True glory, on the other hand, resembles a woman of sense; her admirers must play no tricks. They feel no great anxiety, for they are sure in the end of being rewarded in proportion to their merit.—Goldsmith.

An earthly immortality belongs to a great and good character. History embalms it; it lives in its moral influence, in its authority, in its example, in the memory of the words and deeds in which it was manifested; and as every age adds to the illustrations of its efficacy, it may chance to be the best understood by a remote posterity.—Edward Everett.

To some characters, fame is like an intoxicating cup placed to the lips,—they do well to turn away from it who fear it will turn their heads. But to others fame is “love disguised,” the love that answers to love in its widest, most exalted sense.—Mrs. Jameson.

Posthumous fame is a plant of tardy growth, for our body must be the seed of it; or we may liken it to a torch, which nothing but the last spark of life can light up; or we may compare it to the trumpet of the archangel, for it is blown over the dead: but unlike that awful blast, it is of earth, not of heaven, and can neither rouse nor raise us.—Colton.

It is a very indiscreet and troublesome ambition which cares so much about fame; about what the world says of us; to be always looking in the faces of others for approval; to be always anxious about the effect of what we do or say; to be always shouting, to hear the echoes of our own voices.—Longfellow.

What so foolish as the chase of fame?
How vain the prize! how impotent our aim!
For what are men who grasp at praise sublime,
But bubbles on the rapid stream of time,
That rise and fall, that swell, and are no
more,
Born and forgot, ten thousand in an hour.
—Young.

Reputation being essentially contemporaneous, is always at the mercy of the Envious and the Ignorant. But Fame, whose very birth is posthumous, and which is only known to exist by the echo of its footsteps through congenial minds, can neither be increased nor diminished by any degree of wilfulness.—Mrs. Jameson.

A man who cannot win fame in his own age will have a very small chance of winning it from posterity. True, there are some half-dozen exceptions to this truth among millions of myriads that attest it; but what man of common sense would invest any large amount of hope in so unpromising a lottery?—Bulwer-Lytton.

After upwards of two thousand years Epicurus has been exonerated from the reproach that the doctrines of his philosophy recommended the pleasures of sensuality and voluptuousness as the chief good. Calumny may rest on genius a considerable part of a world's duration: what then is the value of fame?—W. B. Clulow.

Happy indeed the poet of whom, like Orpheus, nothing is known but an immortal name! Happy next, perhaps, the poet of whom, like Homer, nothing is known but the immortal works. The more the merely human part of the poet remains a mystery, the more willing is the reverence given to his divine mission.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The triumphs of the warrior are bounded by the narrow theater of his own age, but those of a Scott or a Shakespeare will be renewed with greater luster in ages yet unborn, when the victorious chieftain shall be forgotten, or shall live only in the song of the minstrel and the page of the chronicler.—Prescott.

Milton neither aspired to present fame, nor even expected it; but (to use his own words) his high ambition was "to leave something so written to after ages, that they should not willingly let it die." And Cato finely observed, he would much rather that posterity should inquire why no statues were erected to him, than why they were.—Colton.

To be read by bare inscriptions, like many in Grütter,—to hope for eternity by enigmatical epithets or first letters of our names—to be studied by antiquarians who we were, and have new names given us like many of the mummies, are cold consolation unto the students of perpetuity, even by everlasting languages.—T. Hughes.

Live for something! Do good and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name in kindness, love, and mercy on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with, year by year, and you will never be forgotten. Your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind, as the stars on the brow of evening. Good deeds will shine as the stars of heaven.—Chalmers.

Vain empty words
Of honour, glory, and immortal fame,
Can these recall the spirit from its place,
Or re-inspire the breathless clay with life?
What tho' your fame with all its thousand trumpets,
Sound o'er the sepulchres, will that awake
The sleeping dead. —Sewell.

One might feel indignant at the injustice which deals out what is called fame with so unequal a hand, were it not for the reflection that men who are competent to add to the intellectual wealth of the world, and enlarge the domain of knowledge, have learned to take popular applause at its true value, and to find in the faithful discharge of honorable duty a satisfaction which is its own reward.—George S. Hillard.

Of present fame think little and of future less; the praises that we receive after we are buried, like the posies that are strewn over our grave, may be gratifying to the living, but they are nothing to the dead: the dead are gone either to a place where they hear them not, or where, if they do, they will despise them.—Colton.

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights and live laborious days;
But the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
Comes the blind Fury with the abhorred
shears,
And slits the thin-spun life. —Milton.

A man's heart must be very frivolous if the possession of fame rewards the labor to attain it. For the worst of reputation is that it is not palpable or present,—we do not feel or see or taste it. People praise us behind our backs, but we hear them not; few before our faces, and who is not suspicious of the truth of such praise?—Bulwer-Lytton.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;—
Footprints, that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwreck'd brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.
—Longfellow.

The highest greatness, surviving time and stone, is that which proceeds from the soul of man. Monarchs and cabinets, generals and admirals, with the pomp of court and the circumstance of war, in the lapse of time disappear from sight; but the pioneers of truth, though poor and lowly, especially those whose example elevates human nature, and teaches the rights of man, so that "a government of the people, by the people, for the people, may not perish from the earth;" such a harbinger can never be forgotten, and their renown spreads so extensive with the cause they served so well.—Charles Sumner.

To be rich, to be famous? do these profit a year hence, when other names sound louder than yours, when you lie hidden away under ground, along with the idle titles engraven on your coffin? But only true love lives after you, follows your memory with secret blessings or pervades you, and intercedes for you. Non omnis moriar, if, dying, I yet live in a tender heart or two; nor am lost and hopeless, living, if a sainted departed soul still loves and prays for me.—Thackeray.

Familiarity

Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.—Shakespeare.

All objects lose by too familiar a view.—Dryden.

Familiarity and satiety are twins.—Mme. Deluzy.

Make not thy friends too cheap to thee, nor thyself to thy friend.—Fuller.

The confidant of my vices is my master, though he were my valet.—Goethe.

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover, fades in his eyes, and palls upon the sense.—Addison.

Though familiarity may not breed contempt, it takes off the edge of admiration.—Hazlitt.

A woman who throws herself at a man's head will soon find her place at his feet.—Louis Desnoyers.

Familiarity is a magician that is cruel to beauty, but kind to ugliness.—Ouida.

Familiarity is the most destructive of all iconoclasts.—Mme. de Genlis.

The ways suited to confidence are familiar to me, but not those that are suited to familiarity.—Joubert.

Familiarities are the aphides that imperceptibly suck out the juice intended for the germ of love.—Landor.

Be not too familiar with thy servants; at first it may beget love, but in the end it will breed contempt.—Fuller.

Familiarity is a suspension of almost all the laws of civility, which libertinism has introduced into society under the notion of ease.—Rochefoucauld.

Familiarity so dulls the edge of perception as to make us least acquainted with things forming part of our daily life.—Julia Ward Howe.

The living together for three long, rainy days in the country has done more to dispel love than all the perfidies in love that have ever been committed.—Arthur Helps.

An idol may be undefied by many accidental causes. Marriage, in particular, is a kind of counter apotheosis, as a deification inverted. When a man becomes familiar with his goddess she quickly sinks into a woman.—Addison.

A man does not wonder at what he sees frequently, even though he be ignorant of the reason. If anything happens which he has not seen before, he calls it a prodigy.—Cicero.

The man that hails you Tom or Jack,
And proves by thumps upon your back
How he esteems your merit,
Is such a friend that one had need
Be very much his friend indeed
To pardon or to bear it. —Cowper.

Famine

Famine ends famine.—Ben Jonson.

This famine has a sharp and meagre face;
'Tis death in an undress of skin and bone,
Where age and youth, their landmark, ta'en away,
Look all one common sorrow. —Dryden.

Fanaticism

Fanaticism is governed by imagination rather than judgment.—Mrs. Stowe.

The child of false zeal.—Chapin.

The false fire of an overheated mind.—Cowper.

Reason is not compatible with zeal run mad.—South.

A fanatic, either religious or political, is the subject of strong delusions.—Whately.

The downright fanatic is nearer to the heart of things than the cool and slippery disputant.—Chapin.

If you see one cold and vehement at the same time, set him down for a fanatic.—Lavater.

That can never be reasoned down which was not reasoned up.—Fisher Ames.

Fanaticism is the child of false zeal and of superstition, the father of intolerance and of persecution.—J. W. Fletcher.

Fanaticism is such an overwhelming impression of the ideas relating to the future world as disqualifies for the duties of life.—Robert Hall.

The blind fanaticism of one foolish honest man may cause more evil than the united efforts of twenty rogues.—Baron de Grimm.

What is fanaticism to-day is the fashionable creed to-morrow, and trite as the multiplication table a week after.—Wendell Phillips.

An uncontrolled imagination may become as surely intoxicated by over-indulgence as a toper may do bodily with strong drink.—Haliburton.

Fanaticism, to which men are so much inclined, has always served not only to render them more brutalized but more wicked.—Voltaire.

Though fanaticism drinks at many founts, its predisposing cause is mostly the subject of an invisible futurity.—Atterbury.

There is such a delusion as evinces itself in cool vehemence; and it is the most dangerous of all expressions of fanaticism.—W. B. Clulow.

Earnestness is good; it means business. But fanaticism overdoes, and is consequently reactionary.—Spurgeon.

E. P. Whipple calls fanaticism "religion caricatured," which is a full definition in a word.—James Parton.

There is no doubt that religious fanatics have done more to prejudice the cause they affect to advocate than have its opponents.—Hosea Ballou.

Painful and corporeal punishments should never be applied to fanaticism; for, being founded on pride, it glories in persecution.—Beccaria.

Fanaticism is a fire, which heats the mind indeed, but heats without purifying. It stimulates and ferments all the passions; but it rectifies none of them.—Warburton.

To conquer fanaticism, you must tolerate it; the shuttlecock of religious difference soon falls to the ground when there are no battledoors to beat it backward and forward.—Chatfield.

Of all things, wisdom is the most terrified with epidemical fanaticism, because, of all enemies, it is that against which she is the least able to furnish any kind of resource.—Burke.

Fanaticism, or, to call it by its milder name, enthusiasm, is only powerful and active so long as it is aggressive. Establish it firmly in power, and it becomes conservatism, whether it will or no.—Lowell.

Fanaticism is an inflamed state of the passions; and nothing that is violent will last long. The vicissitudes of the world and the business of life are admirably adapted to abate the excesses of religious enthusiasm.—Robert Hall.

Everybody knows that fanaticism is religion caricatured; bears, indeed, about the same relation to it that a monkey bears to a man; yet, with many, contempt of fanaticism is received as a sure sign of hostility to religion.—Whipple.

There is no cruelty so inexorable and unrelenting as that which proceeds from a bigoted and presumptuous supposition of doing service to God. The victim of the fanatical persecutor will find that the stronger the motives he can urge for mercy are, the weaker will be his chance for obtaining it, for the merit of his destruction will be supposed to rise in value in proportion as it is effected at the expense of every feeling both of justice and of humanity.—Colton.

Fancy

Fancy light from fancy caught.—Tennyson.

Every fancy you consult, consult your purse.—Franklin.

Fancy tortures more people than does reality.—Ouida.

In maiden meditation, fancy free.—Shakespeare.

Fancy, like the finger of a clock,
Runs the great circuit, and is still at home.
—Cowper.

All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insanity.—Dr. Johnson.

False fancy brings real misery.—Schiller.

Fancy sets the value on the gifts of fortune.—Rochefoucauld.

Do not let fancy outrun your means.—Franklin.

Fancy and pride seeks things at vast expense.—Young.

Who does not know the bent of woman's fancy?—Spenser.

Ever let the fancy roam; pleasure never is at home.—Keats.

Mine eyes he closed, but open left the cell of Fancy, my immortal sight.—Milton.

The devious paths where wanton fancy leads.—Rowe.

Fancy brings us as many vain hopes as idle fears.—Humboldt.

All impediments in fancy's course are motives of more fancy.—Shakespeare.

Pacing through the forest,
Chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancy.
—Shakespeare.

Woe to the youth whom fancy gains
Winning from reason's hand the reins.
—Scott.

Two meanings have our lightest fantasies,
One of the flesh, and of the spirit one.
—James Russell Lowell.

So full of shapes is fancy,
That it alone is high fantastical.
—Shakespeare.

When at the close of each sad, sorrowing day,
Fancy restores what vengeance snatch'd away.
—Pope.

A fretful fancy is constantly flinging its possessor into gratuitous tophets.—W. R. Alger.

Fancy borrows much from memory, and so looks back to the past.—Ruffini.

Fancy runs most furiously when a guilty conscience drives it.—Fuller.

Nothing is so atrocious as fancy without taste.—Goethe.

She's all my fancy painted her,
She's lovely, she's divine.
—Wm. Mer.

The earth hath bubbles, as the water has,
And these are of them. —Shakespeare.

Fancy is imagination in her youth and adolescence. Fancy is always excursive; imagination, not seldom, is sedate.—Landor.

Bright-eyed fancy, hovering o'er,
Scatters from her pictured urn,
Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn.
—Gray.

'Tis not necessity, but opinion, that makes men miserable; and when we come to be fancy-sick, there's no cure.—L'Estrange.

Why will any man be so impertinently officious as to tell me all this is only fancy? If it is a dream, let me enjoy it.—Addison.

In the loss of an object we do not proportion our grief to the real value it bears, but to the value our fancies set upon it.—Addison.

Fancy and humour, early and constantly indulged in, may expect an old age overrun with follies.—Watts.

Fancy is a fairy, that can hear
Ever, the melody of nature's voice,
And see all lovely visions that she will.
—Mrs. Osgood.

Sentiment is intellectualized emotion, emotion precipitated, as it were, in pretty crystals by the fancy.—Lowell.

Tell me where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart, or in the head?
How begot, how nourished?
—Shakespeare.

The mere reality of life would be inconceivably poor without the charm of fancy, which brings in its bosom, no doubt, as many vain fears as idle hopes, but lends much oftener to the illusions it calls up a gay flattering hue than one which inspires terror.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Fancy restrained may be compared to a fountain, which plays highest by diminishing the aperture.—Goldsmith.

Our fancies are more giddy and unfirm, more longing, wavering, sooner lost and won, than women's are.—Shakespeare.

Fancy rules over two thirds of the universe, the past and the future, while reality is confined to the present.—Richter.

Every fancy that we would substitute for a reality is, if we saw aright, and saw the whole, not only false, but every way less beautiful and excellent than that which we sacrifice to it.—Sterling.

It is the fancy, not the reason of things, that makes us so uneasy. It is not the place, nor the condition, but the mind alone, that can make anybody happy or miserable.—L'Estrange.

If ever (as that ever may be near) you meet in some fresh cheek the power of fancy, then shall you know the wounds invisible that love's keen arrows make.—Shakespeare.

Fancy, when once brought into religion, knows not where to stop. It is like one of those fiends in old stories which any one could raise, but which, when raised, could never be kept within the magic circle.—Whately.

When my way is too rough for my feet, or too steep for my strength, I get off it to some smooth velvet path which fancy has scattered over with rosebuds of delights; and, having taken a few turns in it, come back strengthened and refreshed.—Sterne.

That queen of error, whom we call fancy and opinion, is the more deceitful because she does not always deceive. She would be the infallible rule of truth if she were the infallible rule of falsehood; but being only most frequently in error, she gives no evidence of her real quality, for she marks with the same character both that which is true and that which is false.—Pascal.

A confused mass of thoughts, tumbling over one another in the dark: when the fancy was yet in its first work, moving the sleeping images of things towards the light, there to be distinguished and then either chosen or rejected by the judgment.—Dryden.

Fancy has an extensive influence in morals. Some of the most powerful and dangerous feelings in nature, as those of ambition and envy, derive their principal nourishment from a cause apparently so trivial. Its effect on the common affairs of life is greater than might be supposed.

Naked reality would scarcely keep the world in motion.—W. B. Clulow.

The difference is as great between
The optics seeing as the objects seen.
All manners take a tincture from our own;
Or come discolored through our passions shown;
Or fancy's beam enlarges, multiplies,
Contracts, inverts, and gives ten thousand dyes. —Pope.

Most marvellous and enviable is that fecundity of fancy which can adorn whatever it touches, which can invest naked fact and dry reasoning with unlooked-for beauty, make flowerets bloom even on the brow of the precipice, and, when nothing better can be had, can turn the very substance of rock itself into moss and lichens. This faculty is incomparably the most important for the vivid and attractive exhibition of truth to the minds of men.—Fuller.

Fancy, an animal faculty, is very different from imagination, which is intellectual. The former is passive; but the latter is active and creative. Children, the weak minded, and the timid, are full of fancy. Men and women of intellect, of great intellect, are alone possessed of great imagination.—Joubert.

Farewell

The bitter word which closed all earthly friendships, and finished every feast of love,—farewell.—Pollok.

Farewell! "But not for ever."—Cowper.

Sweets to the sweet; farewell!—Shakespeare.

Farewell, happy fields,
Where joy forever dwells; hail, horrors! —Milton.

So sweetly she bade me adieu,
I thought that she bade me return. —Shenstone.

To all, to each, a fair good-night,
And pleasing dreams, and slumbers light. —Scott.

Fare thee well! and if for ever,
Still for ever, fare thee well. —Byron.

Farewell! if ever fondest prayer
For other's weal availed on high,
Mine will not all be lost in air
But waft thy name beyond the sky. —Byron.

Farewell the tranquil mind! farewell content!

Farewell the plumed troops, and the big wars

That make ambition virtue. —Shakespeare.

Fare thee well;
The elements be kind to thee, and make
Thy spirits all of comfort! —Shakespeare.

Farewell! a word that must be, and hath been—

A sound which makes us linger;—yet—farewell. —Byron.

Farewell!
For in that word,—that fatal word,—howe'er

We promise—hope—believe,—there breathes despair. —Byron.

One kind kiss before we part,
Drop a tear, and bid adieu;
Though we sever, my fond heart
Till we meet shall pant for you. —Robert Dodsley.

'Twere vain to speak, to weep, to sigh;
Oh, more than tears of blood can tell
When wrung from guilt's expiring eye,
Are in the word farewell—farewell. —Byron.

The happy never say, and never hear said, farewell.—Landor.

Where thou art gone, adieus and farewells are a sound unknown.—Cowper.

Gude nicht, and joy be wi' you a'. —Lady Nairne.

Give me your hand first; fare you well.—Shakespeare.

"Adieu," she cries, and waved her lily hand.—Gay.

Farewell, and stand fast.—Shakespeare.

So, farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear,
Farewell remorse: all good to me is lost. —Milton.

Here's a sigh to those who love me,
And a smile to those who hate;
And, whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for ev'ry fate.—Byron.

One struggle more, and I am free
From pangs that rend my heart in twain;
One last long sigh to love and thee,
Then back to busy life again. —Byron.

Then fare thee well, deceitful maid,
'Twere vain and fruitless to regret thee;
Nor hope nor memory yield their aid,
But time may teach me to forget thee.
—Byron.

Let's not unman each other—part at once;
All farewells should be sudden, when forever,

Else they make an eternity of moments,
And clog the last sad sands of life with tears. —Byron.

Farewell the plumed troop, and the big wars,
That make ambition virtuel O, farewell!
Farewell the neighing steed, and the shrill trump.

The spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife. —Shakespeare.

Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness!

This is the state of man; To-day he puts forth

The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms

And bears his blushing honors thick upon him:

The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
And—when he thinks, good easy man, full surely

His greatness is a-ripening,—nips his root,
And then he falls as I do. —Shakespeare.

Farming

Farming is a most senseless pursuit, a mere laboring in a circle. You sow that you may reap, and then you reap that you may sow. Nothing ever comes of it.—Stobæus.

Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Man may be civilized in some degree without great progress in manufactures and with little commerce with his distant neighbors. But without the cultivation of the earth, he is, in all countries, a savage. Until he gives up the chase, and fixes himself in some place, and seeks a living from the earth, he is a roaming barbarian. When tillage begins, other arts follow. The farmers, therefore, are the founders of civilization.—Daniel Webster.

Fashion

Fashion is aristocratic-autocratic.—
J. G. Holland.

The fashion wears out more apparel than the man.—Shakespeare.

Fashionability is a kind of elevated vulgarity.—George Darley.

Fashion is the bastard of vanity,
dressed by art.—Fuseli.

As soon as fashion is universal, it is out of date.—Marie Ebner-Eschen-bach.

Lie ten nights awake carving the fashion of a new doublet.—Shakespeare.

He is only fantastical that is not in fashion.—Burton.

Ridiculous modes, invented by ignorance, and adopted by folly.—Smol-
lett.

Fashion is only the attempt to realize art in living forms and social intercourse.—O. W. Holmes.

Every generation laughs at the old fashions, but follows religiously the new.—Thoreau.

Fashion,—a word which knaves and fools may use, their knavery and folly to excuse.—Churchill.

Silks, velvets, calicoes, and the whole lexicon of female fopperies.—
Swift.

While fashion's brightest arts decoy,
the heart, distrustful, asks if this be joy.—Goldsmith.

A woman would be in despair if Nature had formed her as fashion makes her appear.—Mlle. de l'Espi-nasse.

Fashion seldom interferes with nature without diminishing her grace and efficiency.—Tuckerman.

A fashionable woman is always in love—with herself.—La Rochefoucauld

Fashion is the veriest goddess of semblance and of shade.—Colton.

The glass of fashion and the mould of form, The observ'd of all observers.
—Shakespeare.

Fashion is, for the most part, nothing but the ostentation of riches.—Locke.

Women cherish fashion because it rejuvenates them, or at least renews them.—Madame de Preizeux.

Fashion is a potency in art, making it hard to judge between the temporary and the lasting.—Stedman.

Change of fashions is the tax which industry imposes on the vanity of the rich.—Chamfort.

Be not the first by whom the new is tried, Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.
—Pope.

The secret of fashion is to surprise and never to disappoint.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Though wrong the mode, comply; more sense is shown in wearing others' follies than our own.—Young.

Fashion's smile has given wit to dullness and grace to deformity, and has brought everything into vogue, by turns, except virtue.—Colton.

New customs, though they be never so ridiculous,—nay, let them be unmanly,—yet are followed.—Shakespeare.

There would not be so much harm in the giddy following the fashions, if somehow the wise could always set them.—Bovey.

Nothing is thought rare which is not new, and followed; yet we know that what was worn some twenty years ago comes into grace again.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Fashion is gentility running away from vulgarity, and afraid of being overtaken by it. It is a sign the two things are not far asunder.—Hazlitt.

As good be out of the World as out of the Fashion.—Colley Cibber.

Be neither too early in the fashion, nor too long out of it; nor at any time in the extremes of it.—Lavater.

Fashion is the science of appearances, and it inspires one with the desire to seem rather than to be.—Chapin.

He alone is a man who can resist the genius of the age, the tone of fashion with vigorous simplicity and modest courage.—Lavater.

Ladies of fashion starve their happiness to feed their vanity, and their love to feed their pride.—Colton.

It is the rule of rules, and the general law of all laws, that every person should observe those of the place where he is.—Montaigne.

Where doth the world thrust forth a vanity (so it be new, there is no respect how vile) that is not quickly buzzed into the ears?—Shakespeare.

Those who seem to lead the public taste are, in general, merely outrunning it in the direction which it is spontaneously pursuing.—Macaulay.

As the eye becomes blinded by fashion to positive deformity, so, through social conventionalism, the conscience becomes blinded to positive immorality.—Mrs. Jameson.

The coat of the buffalo never pinches under the arm, never puckers at the shoulders; it is always the same, yet never old fashioned nor out of date.—Theodore Parker.

We laugh heartily to see a whole flock of sheep jump because one did so. Might not one imagine that superior beings do the same, and for exactly the same reason?—Greville.

When I would go a-visiting, I find that I go off the fashionable street,—not being inclined to change my dress,—to where man meets man, and not polished shoe meets shoe.—Thoreau.

One would not object to the prevalent notion that whatever is fashionable is right, if our rulers of the mode would contrive that whatever is right should be fashionable.—Chatfield.

Custom is the law of one description of fools and fashion of another; but the two parties often clash; for precedent is the legislator of the first, and novelty of the last.—Colton.

And as the French we conquer'd once,
Now give us laws for pantaloons,
The length of breeches and the gathers,
Port-cannons, periwigs, and feathers.

—Butler.

Thus grows up fashion, an equivocal semblance, the most puissant, the most fantastic and frivolous, the most feared and followed, and which morals and violence assault in vain.—Emerson.

Fashion is a great restraint upon your persons of taste and fancy; who would otherwise in the most trifling instances be able to distinguish themselves from the vulgar.—Shenstone.

We are taught to clothe our minds, as we do our bodies, after the fashion in vogue; and it is accounted fantastical, or something worse, not to do so.—Locke.

Our dress still varying, nor to forms confined,
Shifts like the sands, the sport of every wind.

—Propertius.

Seest thou not, I say, what a deformed thief this fashion is, how giddily he turns about all the hot bloods between fourteen and five-and-thirty?—Shakespeare.

The Empress of France had but to change the position of a ribbon to set all the ribbons in Christendom to rustling. A single word from her convulsed the whalebone market of the world.—J. G. Holland.

Fashion builds her temple in the capital of some mighty empire, and having selected four or five hundred of the silliest people it contains, she dubs them with the magnificent and imposing title of "the world."—Colton.

Fashion being the art of those who must purchase notice at some cheaper rate than that of being beautiful, loves to do rash and extravagant things. She must be forever new, or she becomes insipid.—Lowell.

Fashion is the veriest goddess of semblance and of shade; to be happy is of far less consequence to her worshippers than to appear so; even pleasure itself they sacrifice to parade, and enjoyment to ostentation.—Colton.

Fashion is a tyrant from which nothing frees us. We must suit ourselves to its fantastic tastes. But being compelled to live under its foolish laws, the wise man is never the first to follow, nor the last to keep it.—Pascal.

I'll be at charges for a looking-glass,
And entertain some score or two of tailors.
To study fashions to adorn my body:
Since I am crept in favour with myself,
I will maintain it with some little cost.

—Shakespeare.

Fashion is the abortive issue of vain ostentation and exclusive egotism: it is haughty, trifling, affected, servile, despotic, mean and ambitious, precise and fantastical, all in a breath,—tied to no rule, and bound to conform to every whim of the moment.—Hazlitt.

Avoid singularity. There may often be less vanity in following the new modes than in adhering to the old ones. It is true that the foolish invent them, but the wise may conform to, instead of contradicting, them.—Joubert.

I have seen many men and women of fashion die, and I never saw one of them die well. The trappings off, there they lay on the tumbled pillow, and there were just two things that bothered them, a wasted life and a coming eternity.—Aughey.

Fashion is an odd jumble of contradictions, of sympathies and antipathies. It exists only by its being participated among a certain number of persons, and its essence is destroyed by being communicated to a greater number. * * * Fashion constantly begins and ends in the two things it abhors most,—singularity and vulgarity.—Hazlitt.

The mere leader of fashion has no genuine claim to supremacy; at least, no abiding assurance of it. He has embroidered his title upon his waistcoat, and carries his worth in his watch chain; and, if he is allowed any real precedence for this it is almost a moral swindle,—a way of obtaining goods under false pretences.—Chapin.

I have been told by persons of experience in matters of taste, that the fashions follow a law of gradation, and are never arbitrary. The new mode is always only a step onward in the same direction as the last mode; and a cultivated eye is prepared for and predicts the new fashion.—Emerson.

We ought always to conform to the manners of the greater number, and so behave as not to draw attention to ourselves. Excess either way shocks, and every man truly wise ought to attend to this in his dress as well as language, never to be affected in anything, and follow without being in too great haste the changes of fashion.—Molière.

Manners have been somewhat cynically defined to be a contrivance of wise men to keep fools at a distance. Fashion is shrewd to detect those who do not belong to her train, and seldom wastes her attentions. Society is very swift in its instincts, and if you do not belong to it, resists and sneers at you, or quietly drops you.—Emerson.

Something clearly is wrong with fashionable women. They accept the thinnest gilt, the poorest pinchbeck, for gold. They care more for a dreary social pre-eminence than for home or children. They find in extravagance of living and a vulgar costliness of dress their only expression of vague desire for the beauty and elegance of life.—Mrs. L. G. Calhoun.

Fashion is not public opinion, or the result of embodiment of public opinion. It may be that public opinion will condemn the shape of a bonnet, as it may venture to do always, and with the certainty of being right nine times in ten; but fashion will place it upon the head of every woman in America; and, were it literally a crown of thorns, she would smile contentedly beneath the imposition.—J. G. Holland.

Mark yonder pomp of costly fashion,
Round the wealthy bride;
But when compar'd with real passion
Poor is all that pride,—
What are their showy treasures?
What are their noisy pleasures?
The gay, gaudy glare of vanity and art—
The polish'd jewels blaze
May draw the wond'ring gaze,
But never, never can come near the worthy heart.
—Burns.

Fashion, leader of a chatt'ring train,
Whom man for his own hurt permits to reign
Who shifts and changes all things but his shape,
And would degrade her vot'ry to an ape,
The fruitful parent of abuse and wrong,
Holds a usurp'd dominion o'er his tongue,
There sits and prompts him with his own disgrace,
Prescribes the theme, the tone, and the grimace,
And when accomplish'd in her wayward school,
Calls gentleman whom she has made a fool.
—Cowper.

Beauty too often sacrifices to fashion. The spirit of fashion is not the beautiful, but the wilful; not the graceful, but the fantastic; not the superior in the abstract, but the superior in the worst of all concretes,—the vulgar. The high point of taste and elegance is to be sought for, not in the most fashionable circles, but in the best-bred, and such as can dispense with the eternal necessity of never being twice the same.—Leigh Hunt.

Without depth of thought or earnestness of feeling or strength of purpose, living an unreal life, sacrificing substance to show, substituting the fictitious for the natural, mistaking a crowd for society, finding its chief pleasure in ridicule, and exhausting its ingenuity in expedients for killing time, fashion is among the last influences under which a human being who respects himself, or who comprehends the great end of life, would desire to be placed.—Channing.

Fastidiousness

Fastidiousness is the envelope of indelicacy.—Haliburton.

Fastidiousness is only another word for egotism; and all men who know not where to look for truth save in the narrow well of self will find their own image at the bottom, and mistake it for what they are seeking.—Lowell.

Fate

The die is cast.—The exclamation of Caesar as he crossed the Rubicon.—Suetonius.

Fate is unpenetrated causes.—Emerson.

Fate hath no voice but the heart's impulse.—Schiller.

No one becomes guilty by fate.—Seneca.

The heart is its own fate.—Bailey.

To bear is to conquer our fate.—Campbell.

From no place can you exclude the fates.—Martial.

Yet who shall shut out fate?—Edwin Arnold.

The compulsion of fate is bitter.—Wieland.

He must needs go that the devil drives.—George Peele.

We bear each one our own destiny.—Virgil.

For rarely man escapes his destiny.—Ariosto.

Fulfil thy fate! Be—do—bear—and thank God.—Bailey.

Fair or foul the lot apportioned life on earth, we bear alike.—Robert Browning.

Fate is character.—William Winter.

We can only obey our own polarity.—Emerson.

This day we fashion destiny, our web of fate we spin.—Whittier.

Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate.—Pope.

When fate summons, monarchs must obey.—Dryden.

Wherever the fates lead us let us follow.—Virgil.

Man blindly works the will of fate.—Wieland.

Things are where things are, and, as fate has willed,
So shall they be fulfilled.
—Robert Browning.

A man's power is hooped in by a necessity, which, by many experiments, he touches on every side until he learns its arc.—Emerson.

And out of darkness came the hands
That reach thro' nature, moulding men.
—Tennyson.

What fates impose, that men must needs abide;
It boots not to resist both wind and tide.
—Shakespeare.

Those whom God to ruin has design'd,
He fits for fate, and first destroys their mind.
—Dryden.

With equal pace, impartial fate,
Knocks at the palace and the cottage gate.
—Horace.

But, O vain boast!
Who can control his fate?
—Shakespeare.

Necessity and chance
Approach not me, and what I will is fate.
—Milton.

Fate holds the strings, and men like children move
But as they're led; success is from above
—Lord Lansdowne.

Love lifts the golden balances that show
The fates of mortal men, and things below.
—Homer.

All things are in fate, yet all things are not decreed by fate.—Plato.

One common fate we both must prove;
You die with envy, I with love. —Gay.

'Tis writ on Paradise's gate,
"Woe to the dupe that yields to Fate!"
—Hafiz.

Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate,
Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate?
—Sam'l Johnson.

But blind to former as to future fate,
What mortal knows his pre-existent state?
—Pope.

Whither the fates lead virtue will follow without fear.—Lucan.

Many have reached their fate while lreading fate.—Seneca.

The fates glide with linked hands over life.—Richter.

They only fall that strive to move,
or lose that care to keep.—Owen Meredith.

We are led on, like little children,
by a way we know not.—George Eliot.

We make our fortunes, and we call them fate.—Beaconsfield.

There is no good in arguing with the inevitable.—Lowell.

There is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will.—
Shakespeare.

Fate and the dooming gods are deaf to tears.—Dryden.

If you believe in fate to your harm, believe it, at least, for your good.—
Emerson.

The slippery tops of human state,
the gilded pinnacles of fate.—Cowley.

Men are the sport of circumstances, when circumstances seem the sport of men.—Byron.

The fates lead the willing, and drag
the unwilling.—Seneca.

It is often a comfort in misfortune to know our own fate.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

Man, be he who he may, experiences a last piece of good fortune and a last day.—Goethe.

Every soul has a landscape that changes with the wind that sweeps the sky, with the clouds that return after its rain.—George MacDonald.

Struggle against it as thou wilt, yet heaven's ways are heaven's ways.—
Lessing.

What should be spoken here, where our fate, Hid within an auger-hole, may rush, and seize us? —Shakespeare.

Alas, by what rude fate
Our lives, like ships at sea, an instant meet,
Then part forever on their courses fleet.
—E. C. Stedman.

And sing to those that hold the vital shears;
And turn the adamantine spindle round,
On which the fate of gods and men is wound.
—Milton.

"Whosoever quarrels with his fate,
does not understand it," says Bettine;
and among all her inspired sayings,
she spoke none wiser.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Fate whirls on the bark, and the rough gale sweeps from the rising tide
the lazy calm of thought.—Bulwer-Lytton.

God overrules all mutinous accidents, brings them under His laws of fate, and makes them all serviceable to His purpose.—Marcus Antoninus.

Fate is the friend of the good, the guide of the wise, the tyrant of the foolish, the enemy of the bad.—W. R. Alger.

Fate with impartial hand turns out the doom of high and low: her capacious urn is constantly shaking the names of all mankind.—Horace.

Who is it needs such flawless shafts as fate? What archer of his arrows is so choice, or hits the white so surely?—Lowell.

Fates! we will know your pleasures: that we shall die, we know; 'tis but the time, and drawing days out, that men stand upon.—Shakespeare.

Though fear should lend him pinions like the wind, yet swifter fate will seize him from behind.—Swift.

Stern fate and time will have their victims; and the best die first, leaving the bad still strong, though past their prime.—Ebenezer Elliott.

No power or virtue of man could ever have deserved that what has been fated should not have taken place.—Ammianus Marcellinus.

Our wills and fates do so contrary run
That our devices still are overthrown;
Our thoughts are ours, their ends none of our own. —Shakespeare.

When fate has allowed to any man more than one great gift, accident or necessity seems usually to contrive that one shall encumber and impede the other.—Swinburne.

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
—Shirley.

Lucky he who has been educated to bear his fate, whatsoever it may be, by an early example of uprightness, and a childish training in honor.—Thackeray.

All are architects of Fate,
Working in these walls of Time;
Some with massive deeds and great,
Some with ornaments of rhyme.
—Longfellow.

Fate steals along with silent tread,
Found oftenest in what least we dread;
Frowns in the storm with angry brow,
But in the sunshine strikes the blow.
—Cowper.

A strict belief in fate is the worst of slavery, imposing upon our necks an everlasting lord and tyrant, whom we are to stand in awe of night and day.—Epicurus.

Our life is determined for us; and it makes the mind very free when we give up wishing, and only think of bearing what is laid upon us and doing what is given us to do.—George Eliot.

A man's fate is his own temper; and according to that will be his opinion as to the particular manner in which the course of events is regulated. A consistent man believes in destiny, a capricious man in chance.—Beaconsfield.

Man, tho' limited
By fate, may vainly think his actions free,
While all he does, was at his hour of birth,
Or by his gods, or potent stars ordain'd.
—Rowe.

Ships that pass in the night, and speak
each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in
the darkness;
So on the ocean of life we pass and speak
one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness again
and a silence.
—Longfellow.

A few seem favourites of fate,
In pleasure's lap caress'd;
Yet, think not all the rich and great
Are likewise truly blest. —Burns.

Alas, what stay is there in human state,
Or who can shun inevitable fate?
The doom was written, the decree was past,
Ere the foundations of the world were cast.
—Dryden.

We defy augury; there is a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all.—Shakespeare.

Sometimes an hour of Fate's serenest weather
Strikes through our changeful sky its coming beams;
Somewhere above us, in elusive ether,
Waits the fulfillment of our dearest dreams. —Bayard Taylor.

Let those deplore their doom.
Whose hope still grovels in this dark so journ;
But lofty souls, who look beyond the tomb,
Can smile at Fate, and wonder how they mourn. —Beattie.

Whatever may happen to thee, it was prepared for thee from all eternity: and the implication of causes was from eternity spinning the thread of thy being and of that which is incident to it.—Marcus Antoninus.

It is an awful thing to get a glimpse, as one sometimes does, when the time is past, of some little, little wheel which works the whole mighty machinery of fate, and see how our destinies turn on a minute's delay or advance.—Thackeray.

As fate is inexorable, and not to be moved either with tears or reproaches, an excess of sorrow is as foolish as profuse laughter; while, on the other hand, not to mourn at all is insensibility.—Seneca.

It was a smart reply that Augustus made to one that ministered this comfort of the fatality of things: this was so far from giving any ease to his mind, that it was the very thing that troubled him.—Tillotson.

O beautiful, awful Summer day,
What hast thou given, what taken away?
Life and death, and love and hate,
Homes made happy or desolate,
Hearts made sad or gay. —Longfellow.

Ask me no more; thy fate and mine are seal'd;
I strove against the stream and all in vain:
Let the great river take me to the main:
No more, dear love, for at a touch I yield:
Ask me no more. —Tennyson.

'Tis the best use of fate to teach a fatal courage. Go face the fire at sea, or the cholera in your friend's house, or the burglar in your own, or what danger lies in the way of duty, knowing you are guarded by the cherubim of destiny.—Emerson.

Success, the mark no mortal wit,
Or surest hand, can always hit;
For whatsoe'er we perpetrate,
We do but row—we're steer'd by fate,
Which in success oft disinherits,
For spurious causes, noblest merits. —Butler.

The Stoics held a fatality, and a fixed, unalterable course of events; but they held also that they fell out by a necessity emergent from and inherent in the things themselves, which God Himself could not alter.—South.

The wrath peculiar to ardent natures rudely awakened by the sudden annihilation of a hope—dream, if you will—in which the choicest happinesses were thought to be certainly in reach. In such cases nothing intermediate will carry off the passion,—the quarrel is with fate. * * * It were well in such quarrels if fate were something tangible, to be despatched with a look or a blow, or a speaking personage with whom high words were possible; then the unhappy mortal would not always end the affair by punishing himself.—Lew Wallace.

Father

Oh, who would be a father!—Holcroft.

No one ever knew his own father.—Buckley.

It is a wise father that knows his own child.—Shakespeare.

The child is father of the man.—Wordsworth.

Father of all! in every age
In every clime adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord. —Pope.

To you your father should be as a god;
One that compos'd your beauties; yea, and one,
To whom you are but as a form in wax,
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave the figure, or disfigure it. —Shakespeare.

Fathers that wear rags do make their children blind:
But fathers that bear bags shall see their children kind. —Shakespeare.

Faults

Best men oft are moulded out of faults.—Shakespeare.

Condemn the fault, but not the actor.—Shakespeare.

Faults are beauties in a lover's eye. —Theocritus.

A fault finds its own authors.—Law Maxim.

Is she not a wilderness of faults and follies?—Sheridan.

Bad men excuse their faults, good men will leave them.—Ben Jonson.

Unless you bear with the faults of a friend, you betray your own.—Syrus.

He who overlooks a fault, invites the commission of another.—Syrus.

The greatest of faults, I should say, is to be conscious of none.—Carlyle.

The first fault is the child of simplicity, but every other the offspring of guilt.—Goldsmith.

All his faults are such that one loves him still the better for them.—Goldsmith.

Had we not faults of our own we should take less pleasure in observing those of others.—Rochefoucauld.

Why do we discover faults so much more readily than perfections?—Madame de Sévigné.

We are often more agreeable through our faults than through our good qualities.—Rochefoucauld.

It is not so much the being exempt from faults, as the having overcome them, that is an advantage to us.—Alexander Pope.

Every one fault seeming monstrous till his fellow-fault came to match it.—Shakespeare.

If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, he would draw his hat over his eyes.—Gray.

We easily forget those faults which are known only to ourselves.—La Rochefoucauld.

The faults of our neighbours with freedom we blame,
But tax not ourselves, though we practise the same.—Cunningham.

Excusing of a fault
Doth make the fault worse by the excuse.—Shakespeare.

Only those faults which we encounter in ourselves are insufferable to us in others.—Madame Swetchine.

Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye?—Bible.

No man is born without faults, he is best who has the fewest.—Horace.

A woman will confess her faults sooner than her follies.—Alfred Bougeart.

The great fault in women is to desire to be like men.—De Maistre.

'Tis a meaner part of sense to find a fault than taste an excellence.—Rochester.

It requires less character to discover the faults of others than to tolerate them.—J. Petit-Senn.

He shall be immortal who liveth till he be stoned by one without fault.—Fuller.

Just as you are pleased at finding faults, you are displeased at finding perfections.—Lavater.

Women will sometimes confess their sins, but I never knew one to confess her faults.—Haliburton.

God Himself allows certain faults: and often we say, "I have deserved to err; I have deserved to be ignorant."—Mme. Swetchine.

It is a shrewd device to pretend we have some one unimportant fault,—it overshadows so many serious defects.—Mme. Deluzy.

Most of their faults women owe to us, whilst we are indebted to them for the most of our better qualities.—Lemesles.

It is well that there is no one without a fault, for he would not have a friend in the world. He would seem to belong to a different species.—Hazlitt.

We need not be much concerned about those faults which we have the courage to own.—Rochefoucauld.

Every man has a bag hanging before him, in which he puts his neighbor's faults, and another behind him in which he stows his own.—Knight's Shakespeare.

Relative to getting rid of it, a fault is serious or not in proportion to the depth of its root rather than the amount of its foliage.—George MacDonald.

What sort of faults may we retain, nay, even cherish in ourselves? Those faults which are rather pleasant than offensive to others.—Goethe.

A woman's faults, be they never so small, cast a shadow which all her virtues cannot dispel.—Achilles Poincelot.

While we are indifferent to our good qualities, we keep on deceiving ourselves in regard to our faults, until we at last come to look upon them as virtues.—Heine.

There are some faults which, when well managed, make a greater figure than virtue itself.—Rochefoucauld.

The ability to find fault is believed, by some people, to be a sure sign of great wisdom, when, in most cases, it only indicates narrowness of mind and ill nature.—Aughhey.

None, none descends into himself, to find
The secret imperfections of his mind;
But every one is eagle-ey'd to see
Another's faults, and his deformity.
—Dryden.

Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler, sister woman;
Tho' they may gang a kennin' wrang;
To step aside is human! —Burns.

Men still had faults, and men will have them still;
He that hath none, and lives as angels do,
Must be an angel. —Wentworth Dillon.

O wad some pow'r the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as others see us!
It wad frae mony a blunder free us,
And foolish notion. —Burns.

I like her, with all her faults; nay, like her for her faults. Her faults are so natural, or so artful, that they become her; and those affections which in another woman would be odious serve but to make her more agreeable.

—Congreve.

Moral epochs have their course as well as the seasons. We can no more hold them fast than we can hold sun, moon, and stars. Our faults perpetually return upon us; and herein lies the subtlest difficulty of self-knowledge.—Goethe.

To acknowledge our faults when we are blamed, is modesty; to discover them to one's friends in ingenuousness, is confidence; but to preach them to all the world, if one does not take care, is pride.—Confucius.

He who exhibits no faults is a fool or a hypocrite, whom we should mistrust. There are faults so intimately connected with fine qualities that they indicate them, and we do well not to correct them.—Joubert.

It is not so much the being exempt from faults as the having overcome them that is an advantage to us; it being with the follies of the mind as with weeds of a field, which, if destroyed and consumed upon the place where they grow, enrich and improve it more than if none had ever sprung there.—Swift.

If we were faultless, we should not be so much annoyed by the defects of those with whom we associate. If we were to acknowledge honestly that we have not virtue enough to bear patiently with our neighbor's weaknesses,
we should show our own imperfection,
and this alarms our vanity.—Fénelon.

Do you wish to find out a person's weak points? Note the failings he has the quickest eye for in others. They may not be the very failings he is himself conscious of; but they will be their next door neighbors. No man keeps such a jealous lookout as a rival.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

As there are some faults that have been termed faults on the right side, so there are some errors that might be denominated errors on the safe side.

Thus we seldom regret having been too mild, too cautious, or too humble; but we often repent having been too violent, too precipitate, or too proud.—Colton.

Favor

To accept a favor is to sell one's freedom.—Syrus.

That man is worthless who knows how to receive a favor, but not how to return one.—Plautus.

No free man will ask as favor, what he cannot claim as reward.—Terence.

He only confers favors generously who appears, when they are once conferred, to remember them no more.—Johnson.

Favor exalts a man above his equals, but his dismissal from that favor places him below them.—La Bruyère.

A favor tardily bestowed is no favor; for a favor quickly granted is a more agreeable favor.—Ausonius.

For however often a man may receive an obligation from you, if you refuse a request, all former favors are effaced by this one denial.—Pliny the Younger.

'Tis ever thus when favours are denied;
All had been granted but the thing we beg:
And still some great unlikely substitute—
Your life, your soul, your all of earthly good—
Is proffer'd, in the room of one small boon.
—Joanna Baillic.

Poor wretches, that depend
On greatness' favor, dream as I have done;
Wake, and find nothing. But, alas, I swerve.
Many dream not to find, neither deserve,
And yet are steep'd in favors.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis the curse of service;
Preferment goes by letter, and affection,
And not by old gradation, where each second
Stood heir to the first. —Shakespeare.

Fear

The concessions of the weak are the concessions of fear.—Burke.

Fear not; for I am with thee.—Bible.

Nothing is to be feared but fear.—Bacon.

Fear is the mother of safety.—Burke.

Fear has many eyes.—Cervantes.

Fear always springs from ignorance.—Emerson.

Fear is the mother of foresight.—Henry Taylor.

Fear is the tax that conscience pays to guilt.—Sewell.

Fear naturally quickens the flight of guilt.—Johnson.

Fear is the parent of cruelty.—Froude.

Fear in the world first created the gods.—Statius.

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.—Bible.

Of all base passions fear is most accurs'd.—Shakespeare.

No one loves the man whom he fears.—Aristotle.

Fear is faithlessness.—George MacDonald.

Fear makes men believe the worst.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

In time we hate that which we often fear.—Shakespeare.

To grief there is a limit; not so to fear.—Bacon.

In extreme danger fear feels no pity.—Cæsar.

Fear loves the idea of danger.—Joubert.

Fear makes us feel our humanity.—Beaconsfield.

Fear is cruel and mean.—Emerson

By daring, great fears are often concealed.—Lucan.

Noiseless as fear in a wide wilderness.—Keats.

'Tis time to fear when tyrants seem to kiss.—Pericles.

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Fear though blind is swift and strong.—Dr. Mackay.

He has but one great fear that fears to do wrong.—Bovee.

Fear is the proof of a degenerate mind.—Virgil.

Hang those that talk of fear.—Shakespeare.

Fear is not a lasting teacher of duty.—Cicero.

Less base the fear of death than fear of life.—Young.

Fearless as the strong-winged eagle.—Ossian.

Whistling to keep myself from being afraid.—Dryden.

Fear is the white lipp'd sire
Of subterfuge and treachery.
—Mrs. Sigourney.

Desponding fear, of feeble fancies full,
Weak and unmanly, loosens ev'ry power.
—Thomson.

There is not such a word
Spoke of in Scotland, as this term of fear.
—Shakespeare.

Those linen cheeks of thine
Are counsellors to fear.—Shakespeare.

When our actions do not,
Our fears do make us traitors.
—Shakespeare.

Fear not the proud and the haughty;
fear rather him who fears God.—Saadi.

We Germans fear God, but nothing else in the world.—Prince Bismarck.

Of all faults the greatest is the excess of impious terror, dishonoring divine grace.—Metastasio.

Present fears are less than horrible imaginings.—Shakespeare.

Fear is a dagger with which hypocrisy assassinates the soul.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Mutual fear is a principal link in the chain of mutual love.—Thomas Paine.

There is no fear in love, but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment.—Bible.

The Fear of God is freedom, joy, and peace;
And makes all ills that vex us here to cease.
—Waller.

In politics, what begins in fear usually ends in folly.—Coleridge.

Fear is far more painful to cowardice than death to true courage.—Sir Philip Sidney.

The Lord is my light and my salvation;
whom shall I fear.—Bible.

It is only the fear of God that can deliver us from the fear of man.—Witherspoon.

You are uneasy, * * * you never sailed with me before, I see.—Andrew Jackson.

We are not apt to fear for the fearless, when we are companions in their danger.—George Eliot.

Stared in her eyes and chalk'd her face.—Tennyson.

Fear invites danger; concealed cowards insult known ones.—Chesterfield.

Speechless with wonder and half dead with fear.—Addison.

No one but a poltroon will boast that he never was afraid.—Marshal Lannes.

If you will fear nothing, think that all things are to be feared.—Seneca.

Every one wishes that the man whom he fears would perish.—Ovid.

An immense, misshapen, marvelous monster, whose eye is out.—Virgil.

The absent danger greater still appears; less fears he who is near the thing he fears.—Daniel.

Fear, either as a principle or a motive, is the beginning of all evil.—Mrs. Jameson.

Whom we fear more than love, we are not far from hating.—Richardson.

The only inheritance I have received from my ancestors is a soul incapable of fear.—Julian.

When the truth cannot be clearly made out, what is false is increased through fear.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

Even the bravest men are frightened by sudden terrors.—Tacitus.

From the moment fear begins I have ceased to fear.—Schiller.

Fear on guilt attends, and deeds of darkness;
The virtuous breast ne'er knows it.
—Havard.

Fear is implanted in us as a preservative from evil.—Dr. Johnson.

I rather tell thee what is to be feared than what I fear; for always I am Cæsar.—Shakespeare.

The miser acquires, yet fears to use his gains.—Horace.

To die without fear of death is to be desired.—Seneca.

Why, what should be the fear? I do not set my life at a pin's fee; and, for my soul, what can it do to that, being a thing immortal.—Shakespeare.

A certain degree of fear produces the same effects as rashness.—Cardinal de Retz.

Apprehensions are greater in proportion as things are unknown.—Livy.

He must necessarily fear many, whom many fear.—Seneca.

Or in the night, imagining some fear,
How easy is a bush suppos'd a bear!
—Shakespeare.

Nothing routs us but the villainy of our fears.—Shakespeare.

We must expect everything and fear everything from time and from men.—Vauvenargues.

There is this paradox in fear: he is most likely to inspire it in others who has none himself!—Colton.

From a distance it is something; and nearby it is nothing.—La Fontaine.

Oh! that fear
When the heart longs to know, what it is death to hear.
—Croly.

The direct foe of courage is the fear itself, not the object of it; and the man who can overcome his own terror is a hero, and more.—George MacDonald.

The wounded limb shrinks from the slightest touch; and a slight shadow alarms the nervous.—Ovid.

To fear the foe, since fear oppresses strength,
Gives in your weakness strength unto your foe.
—Shakespeare.

The dove, O hawk, that has once been wounded by thy talons, is frightened by the least movement of a wing.—Ovid.

There is a courageous wisdom; there is also a false, reptile prudence, the result not of caution, but of fear.—Burke.

Fear is that passion which hath the greatest power over us, and by which God and His laws take the surest hold of us.—Tillotson.

Nothing so demoralizes the forces of the soul as fear. Only as we realize the presence of the Lord does fear give place to faith.—Sarah Smiley.

What can that man fear who takes care to please a Being that is able to crush all his adversaries?—Addison.

We often pretend to fear what we really despise, and more often to despise what we really fear.—Colton.

I feel my sinews slackened with the fright, and a cold sweat trills down all over my limbs, as if I were dissolving into water.—Dryden.

Fearfulness, contrary to all other vices, maketh a man think the better of another, the worse of himself.—Sir P. Sidney.

Fear sometimes adds wings to the heels, and sometimes nails them to the ground, and fetters them from moving.—Montaigne.

In how large a proportion of creatures is existence composed of one ruling passion, the most agonizing of all sensations—fear.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is great beauty in going through life fearlessly. Half our fears are baseless, the other half discreditable.—Bovee.

Good men have the fewest fears. He has but one great fear who fears to do wrong; he has a thousand who has overcome it.—Bovee.

And being thus frightened swears a prayer or two,
And sleeps again. —Shakespeare.

Imagination frames events unknown,
In wild, fantastic shapes of hideous ruin,
And what it fears creates. —Hannah More.

We must be afraid of neither poverty nor exile nor imprisonment; of fear itself only should we be afraid.—Epictetus.

Nothing is so rash as fear; and the counsels of pusillanimity very rarely put off, whilst they are always sure to aggravate, the evils from which they would fly.—Burke.

The thing in the world I am most afraid of is fear, and with good reason; that passion alone, in the trouble of it, exceeding all other accidents.—Montaigne.

Fear hath the common fault of a justice of peace, and is apt to conclude hastily from every slight circumstance, without examining the evidence on both sides.—Fielding.

O, fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,—
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong. —Longfellow.

Shun fear, it is the ague of the soul! a passion man created for himself—for sure that cramp of nature could not dwell in the warm realms of glory.—Aaron Hill.

There is nothing so ingenious as fear; it is even more ingenious than hatred, especially when its concern is with the preservation of money.—Bayle St. John.

The fear o' hell's the hangman's whip
To haud the wretch in order;
But where ye feel your honor grip,
Let that aye be your border. —Burns.

A man should always allow his fears to rise to their highest possible pitch, and then some consolation or other will suddenly fall, like a warm rain-drop, upon his heart.—Richter.

Many never think on God but in extremity of fear; and then, perplexity not suffering them to be idle, they think and do as it were in a frenzy.—Hooker.

We are ashamed of our fear; for we know that a righteous man would not suspect danger nor incur any. Wherever a man feels fear, there is an avenger.—Thoreau.

All fear is in itself painful, and, when it conduces not to safety, is painful without use. Every consideration, therefore, by which groundless terrors may be removed adds something to human happiness.—Johnson.

Fear guides more to their duty than gratitude; for one man who is virtuous from the love of virtue, from the obligation he thinks he lies under to the Giver of all, there are ten thousand who are good only from their apprehension of punishment.—Goldsmith.

Must I consume my life—this little life,
In guarding against all may make it less?
It is not worth so much!—it were to die
Before my hour, to live in dread of death.
—Byron.

What are fears but voices airy?
Whispering harm where harm is not,
And deluding the unwary
Till the fatal bolt is shot!
—Wordsworth.

The dreadful fear of hell is to be driven out, which disturbs the life of man and renders it miserable, over-casting all things with the blackness of darkness, and leaving no pure, unalloyed pleasure.—Lucretius.

In every mind where there is a strong tendency to fear there is a strong capacity to hate. Those who dwell in fear dwell next door to hate; and I think it is the cowardice of women which makes them such intense haters.—Mrs. Jameson.

God planted fear in the soul as truly as He planted hope or courage. Fear is a kind of bell, or gong, which rings the mind into quick life and avoidance upon the approach of danger. It is the soul's signal for rallying.—Beecher.

Fear nothing but what thy industry may prevent; be confident of nothing but what fortune cannot defeat; it is no less folly to fear what is impossible to be avoided than to be secure when there is a possibility to be deprived.—Quarles.

In morals, what begins in fear usually ends in wickedness; in religion, what begins in fear usually ends in fanaticism. Fear, either as a principle or a motive, is the beginning of all evil.—Mrs. Jameson.

They who cannot be induced to fear for love will never be enforced to love for fear. Love opens the heart, fear shuts it; that encourages, this compels; and victory meets encouragement, but flees compulsion.—Quarles.

Timidity is a disease of the mind, obstinate and fatal; for a man once persuaded that any impediment is insuperable has given it, with respect to himself, that strength and weight which it had not before.—Dr. Johnson.

Things done well,
And with a care, exempt themselves from fear;
Things done without example, in their issue
Are to be feared. —Shakespeare.

The wretch that fears to drown, will break through flames;
Or, in his dread of flames, will plunge in waves.
When eagles are in view, the screaming doves
Will cower beneath the feet of man for safety.
—Cibber.

Were a man's sorrows and disquietudes summed up at the end of his life, it would generally be found that he had suffered more from the apprehension of such evils as never happened to him than from those evils which had really befallen him.—Addison.

Many men affect to despise fear, and in preaching resent any appeal to it; but not to fear when there is occasion is as great a weakness as to fear unduly without reason. God implanted fear in the soul as truly as He implanted hope or courage.—Aughey.

Man begins life helpless. The babe is in paroxysms of fear the moment its nurse leaves it alone, and it comes so slowly to any power of self-protection that mothers say the salvation of the life and health of a young child is a perpetual miracle.—Emerson.

Fear is implanted in us as a preservative from evil; but its duty, like that of other passions, is not to overbear reason, but to assist it; nor should it be suffered to tyrannize in the imagination, to raise phantoms of horror, or to beset life with super-numerary distresses.—Johnson.

Fear accomplishes much in love. The husband of the Middle Ages was loved by his wife for his very severity. The bride of William the Conqueror, having been beaten by him, recognized him by this token for her lord and husband.—Michelet.

Thou shalt be punish'd for thus frightening me.

For I am sick and capable of fears;
Oppress'd with wrongs, and therefore full of fears;

A widow, husbandless, subject to fears;

A woman, naturally born to fears;

And though thou now confess, thou did'st but jest.

With my vex'd spirits I cannot take a truce,
But they will quake and tremble all this day.

—Shakespeare.

Fear never was a friend to the love of God or man, to duty or conscience, truth, probity, or honor. It therefore can never make a good subject, a good citizen, or a good soldier, and, least of all, a good Christian; except the devils, who believe and tremble, are to be accounted good Christians.—Henry Brooke.

The passion of fear (as a modern philosopher informs me) determines the spirits of the muscles of the knees, which are instantly ready to perform their motion, by taking up the legs with incomparable celerity, in order to remove the body out of harm's way.—Shaftesbury.

The weakness we lament, ourselves create. Instructed from our infant years to court, With counterfeited fears, the aid of man, We learn to shudder at the rustling breeze, Start at the light, and tremble in the dark, Till affectation, rip'ning to belief And folly, frighted at our own chimeras, Habitual cowardice usurps the soul.

—Johnson.

I saw a delicate flower had grown up two feet high, between the horses' path and the wheel-track. An inch more to the right or left had sealed its fate, or an inch higher; and yet it lived to flourish as much as if it had a thousand acres of untrodden space around it, and never knew the danger it incurred. It did not borrow trouble, nor invite an evil fate by apprehending it.—Thoreau.

Such as are in immediate fear of losing their estates, of banishment, or of slavery, live in perpetual anguish, and lose all appetite and repose; whereas such as are actually poor slaves and exiles oftentimes live as merrily as men in a better condition; and so many people who, impatient of the perpetual alarms of fear, have hanged and drowned themselves give us sufficiently to understand that it is more importunate and insupportable than death itself.—Montaigne.

I could a tale unfold whose lightest word Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,

Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres,

Thy knotted and combined locks to part And each particular hair to stand on end, Like quills upon the fretful porpentine.

—Shakespeare.

There is a virtuous fear which is the effect of faith; and there is a vicious fear, which is the product of doubt. The former leads to hope, as relying on God, in whom we believe; the latter inclines to despair, as not relying on God, in whom we do not believe. Persons of the one character fear to lose God; persons of the other character fear to find Him.—Pascal.

When the sun sets, shadows that show'd at noon

But small, appear most long and terrible:

So when we think fate hovers o'er our heads,

Our apprehensions shoot beyond all bounds; Owls, ravens, crickets, seem the watch of death:

Nature's worst vermin scare her godlike sons.

Echoes, the very leaving of a voice,

Grow babbling ghosts, and call us to our graves.

Each mole-hill thought swells to a huge Olympus,

While we, fantastic dreamers, heave and puff,

And sweat with an imagination's weight.

—Lee.

Feasting

The feast of reason and the flow of soul.—Pope.

The turnpike road to people's hearts, I find, Lies through their mouths, or I mistake mankind.

—Peter Pindar.

Their various cares in one great point combine

The business of their lives, that is—to dine.

—Young.

It is not the quantity of the meat, but the cheerfulness of the guests, which makes the feast; at the feast of the Centaurs they ate with one hand, and had their drawn swords in the other; where there is no peace, there can be no feast.—Clarendon.

The latter end of a fray, and the beginning of a feast,

Fits a dull fighter, and a keen guest.
—Shakespeare.

Blest be those feasts with simple plenty crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jests or pranks that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale.
—Goldsmith.

But 'twas a public feast, and public day,
Quite full, right dull, guests hot, and dishes cold,
Great plenty, much formality, small cheer,
And everybody out of their own sphere.

Of all appeals,—although
I grant the power of pathos, and of gold,
Of beauty, flattery, threats, a shilling,—no
Methods more sure at moments to take hold,
Of the best feelings of mankind, which grow
More tender, as we every day behold,
Than that all-softening, overpowering knell,
The tocsin of the soul—the Dinner Bell.
—Byron.

Features

Features—the great soul's apparent seat.—Bryant.

Feeling

A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind.—Garrick.

Feeling comes before reflection—
Hugh R. Haweis.

I would help others, out of a fellow-feeling.—Burton.

The feelings, like flowers and butterflies, last longer the later they are delayed.—Richter.

Life is a comedy to him who thinks, and tragedy to him who feels.—Horace Walpole.

Though there is nothing more dangerous, yet there is nothing more ordinary, than for weak saints to make their sense and feeling the judge of their condition. We must strive to walk by faith.—Thomas Brooks.

Every human feeling is greater and larger than the exciting cause.—Coleridge.

Some feelings are to mortals given with less of earth in them than heaven.—Sir Walter Scott.

A man deep wounded may feel too much pain to feel much anger.—George Eliot.

What unknown seas of feeling lie in man, and will from time to time break through!—Carlyle.

He best shall paint them who shall feel them most.—Pope.

Feeling in the young precedes philosophy, and often acts with a more certain aim.—Wm. Carleton.

But spite of all the criticising elves,
Those who would make us feel, must feel themselves.
—Churchill.

The head best leaves to the heart what the heart alone divines.—A. Bronson Alcott.

He thought as a sage, though he felt as a man.—Beattie.

The heart that is soonest awake to the flowers is always the first to be touched by the thorns.—Moore.

Fine feelings, without vigor of reason, are in the situation of the extreme feather of a peacock's tail—dragging in the mud.—Foster.

Our feelings were given us to excite to action, and when they end in themselves, they are impressed to no one good purpose that I know of.—Bishop Sandford.

Feelings come and go like light troops following the victory of the present; but principles, like troops of the line, are undisturbed, and stand fast.—Richter.

Some people carry their hearts in their heads; very many carry their heads in their hearts. The difficulty is to keep them apart, and yet both actively working together.—Anon.

My friends, does God invite you? If He does, why don't you accept the invitation? If you want to come, just come along, and don't be talking about feeling. Do you think Lazarus had any feeling when Christ called him out of the sepulchre?—D. L. Moody.

The soul of music slumbers in the shell,
Till wak'd and kindled by the master's spell,
And feeling hearts—touch them but lightly
—pour
A thousand melodies unheard before.

—Rogers.

Feeling is deep and still; and the word that floats on the surface
Is as the tossing buoy, that betrays where the anchor is hidden. —Longfellow.

The wealth of rich feelings—the deep—the pure;
With strength to meet sorrow, and faith to endure. —Frances S. Osgood.

Tears never yet saved a soul. Hell is full of weepers weeping over lost opportunities, perhaps over the rejection of an offered Saviour. Your Bible does not say, "Weep, and be saved." It says, "Believe, and be saved." Faith is better than feeling.—T. L. Cuyler.

"Verily I say unto you, he that heareth My word and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." My friend, that is worth more than all the feeling you can have in a lifetime.—D. L. Moody.

A word, a look, which at one time would make no impression, at another time wounds the heart; and like a shaft flying with the wind pierces deep, which, with its own natural force, would scarce have reached the object aimed at.—Sterne.

The heart of man is older than his head. The first-born is sensitive, but blind—his younger brother has a cold, but all-comprehensive glance. The blind must consent to be led by the clear-sighted if he would avoid falling.—Ziegler.

The last, best fruit which comes to perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness toward the hard, forbearance toward the unforbearing, warmth of heart toward the cold, philanthropy toward the misanthropic.—Richter.

It is far more easy not to feel, than always to feel rightly, and not to act, than always to act well. For he that is determined to admire only that which is beautiful imposes a much harder task upon himself than he that, being determined not to see that which is the contrary, effects it by simply shutting his eyes.—Colton.

Some feelings are quite untranslatable; no language has yet been found for them. They gleam upon us beautifully through the dim twilight of fancy, and yet when we bring them close to us, and hold them up to the light of reason, lose their beauty all at once, as glow worms which gleam with such a spiritual light in the shadows of evening, when brought in where the candles are lighted, are found to be only worms like so many others.—Longfellow.

Feelings are like chemicals—the more you analyze them the worse they smell. So it is best not to stir them up very much, only enough to convince one's self that they are offensively wrong, and then look away as far as possible, out of one's self, for a purifying power; and that we know can only come from Him who holds our hearts in His hands, and can turn us whither He will.—Charles Kingsley.

Felicity

True felicity consists of its own consciousness.—Rivarol.

Felicity is in possession, happiness in anticipation.—Racine.

True happiness resides in things not seen.—Young.

Since every man that lives is born to die, and none can boast sincere felicity, with equal minds what happens let us bear.—Dryden.

The world produces for every pint of honey a gallon of gall, for every dram of pleasure a pound of pain, for every inch of mirth an ell of moan; and as the ivy twines around the oak, so does misery and misfortune encompass the happy man. Felicity, pure and unalloyed felicity, is not a plant of earthly growth; her gardens are the skies.—Robert Burton.

Festivity

Oh, leave the gay and festive scenes,
The halls of dazzling light.

—H. S. Vandyke.

Venice once was dear,
The pleasant place of all festivity,
The rival of the earth, the masque of Italy.
—Byron.

We keep the day. With festal cheer,
With books and music, surely we
Will drink to him, whate'er he be,
And sing the songs he loved to hear.
—Tennyson.

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's capital had gather'd then
Her Beauty and her Chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men.
—Byron.

The music, and the banquet, and the wine—
The garlands, the rose odors, and the flowers,
The sparkling eyes, and flashing ornaments—
The white arms and the raven hair—the braids,
And bracelets; swan-like bosoms, and the necklace,
An India in itself, yet dazzling not.
—Byron.

Fickleness

Fickleness has always befriended
the beautiful.—Propertius.

Change amuses the mind, but rarely profits.—Goethe.

Stand firm, don't flutter!—Franklin.

Frailty, thy name is woman!—
Shakespeare.

Woman is a miracle of divine contradictions.—Michelet.

The irresolute man flecks from one egg to another, so hatches nothing.—
Feltham.

Love is not love which alters where it alteration finds.—Shakespeare.

Was ever feather so lightly blown to and fro as this multitude.—Shakespeare.

Men love little and often, women much and rarely.—Basta.

He wears his faith but as the fashion of his hat; it ever changes with the next block.—Shakespeare.

Ladies, like variegated tulips, show
'Tis to their changes half their charms we owe.
—Pope.

There are three things a wise man will not trust—the wind, the sunshining of an April day, and woman's plighted faith.—Southey.

It will be found that they are the weakest winded and the hardest hearted men that most love change.—Ruskin.

There is in all of us an impediment to perfect happiness; namely, weariness of the things which we possess, and a desire for the things which we have not.—Mme. de Rieux.

Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more,
Men were deceivers ever,
One foot in sea and one on shore;
To one thing constant never.
—Shakespeare.

He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew when he pleased he could whistle them back.
—Goldsmith.

We are all of us, in this world, more or less like St. January, whom the inhabitants of Naples worship one day, and pelt with baked apples the next.—Mme. Swetchine.

Oh! the tender ties,
Close twisted with the fibres of the heart!
Which broken, break them, and drain off the
soul
Of human joy, and make it pain to live.
—Young.

The hearts of all his people shall revolt from him, and kiss the lips of unacquainted change.—Shakespeare.

To be longing for this thing to-day and for that thing to-morrow: ♀

change likings for loathings, and to stand wishing and hankering at a venture—how is it possible for any man to be at rest in this fluctuant, wandering humor and opinion?—L'Estrange.

Papillia, wedded to her amorous spark, Sighs for the shades—"How charming is a park?"

A park is purchas'd, but the fair he sees All bath'd in tears—"O odious, odious trees!" —Pope.

It carries too great an imputation of ignorance, lightness or folly for men to quit and renounce their former tenets presently upon the offer of an argument which they cannot immediately answer.—Locke.

It is plain there is not in nature a point of stability to be found; everything either ascends or declines; when wars are ended abroad, sedition begins at home; and when men are freed from fighting for necessity, they quarrel through ambition.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

A man so various that he seem'd to be, Not one, but all mankind's epitome. Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong; Was everything by starts, and nothing long; But, in the course of one revolving moon, Was chymist, fiddler, statesman and buffoon. —Dryden.

Who o'er the herd would wish to reign, Fantastic, fickle, fierce, and vain? Vain as the leaf upon the stream, And fickle as a changeful dream; Fantastic as a woman's mood, And fierce as Frenzy's fever'd blood— Thou many-headed monster thing, Oh, who would wish to be thy king? —Scott.

Fiction

Fiction is the microscope of truth.—Lamartine.

Truth, severe by fairy fiction drest. —Gray.

Parent of golden dreams—romance! —Byron.

The greater portion of our lives is thrown away in fiction; it is only in maturer years that we awake to the stern realities of life.—James Ellis.

Tales that have the rime of age.—Longfellow.

An old novel has a history of its own.—Alexander Smith.

Every novel is a debtor to Homer.—Emerson.

Novels are to love as fairy tales to dreams.—Coleridge.

Wondrous strong are the spells of fiction.—Longfellow.

I have often maintained that fiction may be much more instructive than real history.—John Foster.

Man is a poetical animal, and delights in fiction.—Hazlitt.

Truth and fiction are so aptly mixed that all seems uniform and of a piece. —Roscommon.

More strange than true, I never may believe These antique fables, nor these fairy toys. —Shakespeare.

Unbind the charms that in slight fables lie, and teach that truth is truest poesy.—Cowley.

No author ever drew a character consistent to human nature but what he was forced to ascribe it to many inconsistencies.—Bulwer-Lytton.

In employing fiction to make truth clear and goodness attractive, we are only following the example which every Christian ought to propose to himself. —Macaulay.

Those who relish the study of character may profit by the reading of good works of fiction, the product of well-established authors.—Whately.

Fiction may be said to be the caricature of history.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Who would with care some happy fiction frame, so mimics truth it looks the very same.—Granville.

Fiction is most powerful when it contains most truth; and there is little truth we get so true as that which we find in fiction.—J. G. Holland.

If you would understand your own age, read the works of fiction produced in it. People in disguise speak freely.—Arthur Helps.

He cometh to you with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney-corner.—Sir P. Sidney.

When fiction rises pleasing to the eye,
Men will believe, because they love the lie;
But truth herself, if clouded with a frown,
Must have some solemn proof to pass her down. —Churchill.

Fiction is no longer a mere amusement; but transcendent genius, accommodating itself to the character of the age, has seized upon this province of literature, and turned fiction from a toy into a mighty engine.—Channing.

Fiction is of the essence of poetry as well as of painting; there is a resemblance in one of human bodies, things, and actions which are not real, and in the other of a true story by fiction.—Dryden.

Every fiction since Homer has taught friendship, patriotism, generosity, contempt of death. These are the highest virtues; and the fictions which taught them were therefore of the highest, though not of unmixed, utility.—Sir J. Mackintosh.

Addison acknowledged that he would rather inform than divert his reader; but he recollected that a man must be familiar with wisdom before he willingly enters on Seneca and Epictetus. Fiction allures him to the severe task by a gayer preface. Embellished truths are the illuminated alphabet of larger children.—Willmott.

The most influential books, and the truest in their influence, are works of fiction. * * * They repeat, they re-arrange, they clarify the lessons of life; they disengage us from ourselves, they constrain us to the acquaintance of others; and they show us the web of experience, but with a singular change—that monstrous, consuming ego of ours being, nounce, struck out.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Fidelity

Fidelity is the sister of justice.—Horace.

To God, thy country, and thy friend be true.—Vaughan.

Faithful found among the faithless.—Milton.

The root of all steadfastness is in consecration to God.—Alexander Mac-laren.

Trust reposed in noble natures obliges them the more.—Dryden.

With strength to meet sorrow, and faith to endure.—Mrs. Osgood.

Prosperity asks for fidelity; adversity exacts it.—Seneca.

Ever keep thy promise, cost what it may; this it is to be "true as steel."—Charles Reade.

She is as constant as the stars
That never vary, and more chaste than they.
—Proctor.

The fidelity of barbarians depends on fortune.—Livy.

Through perils both of wind and limb,
Through thick and thin she follow'd him.
—Butler.

Flesh of flesh,
Bone of my bone, thou art, and from thy
state
Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe.
—Milton.

True as the needle to the pole,
Or as the dial to the sun.
—Barton Booth.

But faithfulness can feed on suffering,
And knows no disappointment.
—George Eliot.

Fidelity bought with money is overcome by money.—Seneca.

No man can mortgage his injustice
as a pawn for his fidelity.—Burke.

It is more difficult for a man to be faithful to his mistress when he is favoured than when he is ill treated by her.—Rochefoucauld.

Master, go on, and I will follow thee
To the last gasp, with truth and loyalty.
—Shakespeare.

Years have not seen, Time shall not see
The hour that tears my soul from thee.
—Byron.

Unkindness may do much;
And his unkindness may defeat my life,
But never taint my love. —Shakespeare.

To be true to each other, let 'appen what maay
Till the end o' the daay
An the last load hoam. —Tennyson.

Then come the wild weather, come sleet or come snow,
We will stand by each other, however it blow. —Simon Dach.

I am constant as the Northern Star, of whose true-fixed and resting quality there is no fellow in the firmament.
—Shakespeare.

His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles;
His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate;
His tears pure messengers sent from his
heart;
His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth. —Shakespeare.

Full many a miserable year hath past—
She knows him as one dead, or worse than dead,
And many a change her varied life hath known,
But her heart none. —Maturin.

Confirm'd then I resolve,
Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe:
So dear I love him, that with him all deaths
I could endure, without him live no life.
—Milton.

Nothing is more noble, nothing more venerable than fidelity. Faithfulness and truth are the most sacred excel-lences and endowments of the human mind.—Cicero.

Let it be ours to be self-reliant amidst hosts of the vacillating—real in a generation of shiflers—true amongst a multitude of shams; when tempted to swerve from principle, sturdy as an oak in its maintenance;

when solicited by the enticement of sinners, firm as a rock in our denial.—
Wm. M. Punshon.

Within her heft was his image, Cloth'd in the beauty of love and youth, as last she beheld him,
Only more beautiful made by his death-like silence and absence. —Longfellow.

For me—I have no lingering wish to rove;
For though I worship all things fair and
free,
Of outward grace, of soul nobility,
Happier than thou, I find them all in one,
And I would worship at thy shrine alone.
—Miss Lynch.

He who is faithful over a few things is a lord of cities. It does not matter whether you preach in Westminster Abbey or teach a ragged class, so you be faithful. The faithfulness is all.—
George MacDonald.

Be but faithful, that is all;
Go right on, and close behind thee
There shall follow still and find thee
Help, sure help.
—Arthur Hugh Clough.

No grace is more necessary to the Christian worker than fidelity; the humble grace that marches on in sunshine and storm, when no banners are waving, and there is no music to cheer the weary feet.—S. J. Nicholls.

Come, rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer!
Tho' the herd hath fled from thee, thy home
is still here;
Here is still the smile that no cloud can
o'ercast,
And the heart and the hand all thy own
to the Last! —Moore.

Where is honor,
Innate and precept-strengthen'd, 'tis the rock
Of faith connubial: where it is not—where Light thoughts are lurking, or the vanities
Of worldly pleasure rankle in the heart,
Or sensual throbs convulse it. —Byron.

Oh! it irradiates all our days with lofty beauty, and it makes them all hallowed and divine, when we feel that not the apparent greatness, not the prominence nor noise with which it is done, nor the external consequences which flow from it, but the motive from which it flowed, determines the worth of our deed in God's eyes. Faithfulness is faithfulness, on whatsoever scale it be set forth.—Alexauder Mac-laren.

It goes a great way towards making a man faithful to let him understand that you think him so, and he that does but so much as suspect that I will deceive him gives me a sort of right to cozen him.—Seneca.

He who, being bold
For life to come, is false to the past sweet
Of mortal life, hath killed the world above.
For why to live again if not to meet?
And why to meet if not to meet in love?
And why in love if not in that dear love of old? —Sydney Dobell.

Yes!—still I love thee: Time, who sets
His signet on my brow,
And dims my sunken eye, forgets,
The heart he could not bow;—
Where love, that cannot perish, grows
For one, Alas! that little knows
How love may sometimes last;
Like sunshine wasting in the skies
When clouds are overcast.
—Rufus Dawes.

Believe me, if all those endearing young charms,
Which I gaze on so foldly to-day,
Were to change by to-morrow, and fleet in my arms,
Like fairy-gifts fading away!
Thou would'st still be ador'd, as this moment thou art,
Let thy loveliness fade as it will,
And, around the dear ruin, each wish of my
heart
Would entwine itself verdantly still
—Moore.

I durst, my lord, to wager she is honest,
Lay down my soul at stake: if you think
other,
Remove your thought; it doth abuse your bosom.
If any wretch hath put this in your head,
Let heaven requite it with the serpent's curse!
For, if she be not honest, chaste, and true,
There's no man happy: the purest of their wives
Is foul as slander. —Shakespeare.

There is a third silent party to all our bargains. The nature and soul of things takes on itself the guaranty of the fulfillment of every contract, so that honest service cannot come to loss.

If you serve an ungrateful master, serve him the more. Put God in your debt. Every stroke shall be repaid.
The longer the payment is withholden, the better for you; for compound interest on compound interest is the rate and usage of this exchequer.—Emerson.

Pure as the snow the summer sun—
Never at noon hath look'd upon—
Deep, as is the diamond wave,
Hidden in the desert cave—
Changeless, as the greenest leaves
Of the wreath the cypress weaves—
Hopeless, often, when most fond—
Without hope or fear beyond
Its own pale fidelity—
And this woman's love can be.
—Miss London.

Chain me with roaring bears;
Or shut me nightly in a charnel-house,
O'er-covered quite with dead men's rattling bones,
With reeky shanks and yellow chapless
skulls;
Or bid me go into a new-made grave,
And hide me with a dead man in his shroud;
Things that, to hear them told, have made me tremble;
And I will do it without Fear or Doubt,
To live an unstain'd Wife of my sweet Love. —Shakespeare.

They said her cheek of youth was beautiful
Till withering sorrow blanch'd the bright rose there;
But grief did lay his icy finger on it,
And chill'd it to a cold and joyless statue.
Methought she caroll'd blithely in her youth,
As the couched nestling trills his vesper lay;
But song and smile, beauty and melody,
And youth and happiness are gone from
her,
Perchance—even as she is—he would not scorn her,
If he could know her—for, for him she's chang'd,
She is much alter'd—but her heart—her heart! —Maturin.

Give us a man, young or old, high or low, on whom we know we can thoroughly depend, who will stand firm when others fail; the friend faithful and true, the adviser honest and fearless, the adversary just and chivalrous —in such a one there is a fragment of the Rock of Ages.—Dean Stanley.

Fighting

Fight the good fight.—Bible.

I'll fight till from my bones my flesh
be hacked.—Shakespeare.

The combat deepens. On, ye brave,
Who rush to glory, or the grave!
—Campbell.

Those who in quarrels interpose,
Must often wipe a bloody nose.
—Gay.

For those that fly may fight again,
Which he can never do that's slain.
—Butler.

He who fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day;
But he who is in battle slain
Can never rise and fight again.
—Goldsmith.

Fiend

Satan—the impersonation of that mixture of the bestial, the malignant, the impious, and the hopeless, which constitute the fiend—the enemy of all that is human and divine.—Mrs. Jameson.

Finis

My pen is at the bottom of a page,
Which being finished, here the story ends;
'Tis to be wish'd it had been sooner done,
But stories somehow lengthen when begun.
—Byron.

Finesse

Sure never to o'ershoot, but just to hit.—Pope.

Finesse is the best adaptation of means to circumstances.—Macaulay.

Grant graciously what you cannot refuse safely, and conciliate those you cannot conquer.—Colton.

The moment one begins to solder right and wrong together, one's conscience becomes like a piece of plated goods.—Mrs. Jameson.

A man who knows the world will not only make the most of everything he does know, but of many things he does not know, and will gain more credit by his adroit mode of hiding his ignorance than the pedant by his awkward attempt to exhibit his erudition.—Colton.

"There is no difficulty," says the steward of Molière's miser, "in giving a fine dinner with plenty of money;
the really great cook is he who can set out a banquet with no money at all."
Macaulay.

Fire

From small fires comes oft no small mishap.—George Herbert.

From little spark may burst a mighty flame.—Dante.

Fire that's closest kept burns most of all.—Shakespeare.

A spark neglected makes a mighty fire.—Herrick.

The most tangible of all visible mysteries—fire.—Leigh Hunt.

Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth.—Bible.

The fire i' the flint
Shows not till it be struck.
—Shakespeare.

A little fire is quickly trodden out;
Which, being suffer'd, rivers cannot quench.
—Shakespeare.

And where two raging fires meet together
They do consume the thing that feeds their fury.
—Shakespeare.

Your own property is concerned when your neighbor's house is on fire.
—Horace.

What is more useful than fire? Yet if any one prepares to burn a house, it is with fire that he arms his daring hands.—Ovid.

Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, play the man! We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out.
—Latimer.

Firmness

Stubbornness is not firmness.—Schiller.

Stand firm and immovable as an avvil when it is beaten upon.—St. Ignatius.

It is only dislocated minds whose movements are spasmodic.—Willmott.

It is firmness that makes the gods on our side.—Voltaire.

The greatest firmness is the greatest mercy.—Longfellow.

Firmness is great; persistency is greater.—Ninon de Lenclos.

I am here, here I remain.—Marshal MacMahon.

When firmness is sufficient, rashness is unnecessary.—Napoleon.

He who is firm in will molds the world to himself.—Goethe.

That which is called firmness in a king is called obstinacy in a donkey.—Lord Erskine.

You will hardly conquer; but conquer you must.—Ovid.

Be steadfast as a tower, that doth not bend its stately summit to the tempest's shock.—Dante.

I know no real worth but that tranquil firmness which seeks dangers by duty, and braves them without rashness.—Stanislaus.

Cowards are scared with threatenings; boys are whipped into confession; but a steady mind acts of itself, ne'er asks the body counsel.—Otway.

There is a natural firmness in some minds, which cannot be unlocked by trifles, but which, when unlocked, discovers a cabinet of fortitude.—Thomas Paine.

Firmness of purpose is one of the most necessary sinews of character and one of the best instruments of success. Without it, genius wastes its efforts in a maze of inconsistencies.—Chesterfield.

Rely on principles; walk erect and free, not trusting to bulk of body, like a wrestler, for one should not be unconquerable in the sense that an ass is. Who then is unconquerable? He whom the inevitable cannot overcome.—Epictetus.

That profound firmness which enables a man to regard difficulties but as evils to be surmounted, no matter what shape they may assume.—Colton.

Firmness, both in sufferance and exertion, is a character which I would wish to possess. I have always despised the whining yelp of complaint, and the cowardly, feeble resolve.—Burns.

The aged oak upon the steep stands more firm and secure if assailed by angry winds; for if the winter bares its head, the more strongly it strikes its roots into the ground, acquiring strength as it loses beauty.—Metastasio.

It is only persons of firmness that can have real gentleness; those who appear gentle are in general only of a weak character, which easily changes into asperity.—Rochefoucauld.

I said to Sorrow's awful storm,

That beat against my breast.

Rage on—thou may'st destroy this form,

And lay it low at rest;

But still the spirit that now brooks

Thy tempest raging high,

Undaunted on its fury looks

With steadfast eye. —Mrs. Stoddard.

Fish

It is unseasonable and unwholesome in all months that have not an R in their names to eat an oyster.—Butler.

Master, I marvel how the fishes live in the sea.

Why, as men do a-land: the great ones eat up the little ones.—Pericles.

Our plenteous streams a various race supply,
The bright-eye perch with fins of Tyrian dye,

The silver eel, in shining volumes roll'd,
The yellow carp, in scales bedropp'd with gold,

Swift trouts, diversifed with crimson stains,
And pikes, the tyrants of the wat'ry plains.

—Pope.

They say fish should swim thrice
* * * first it should swim in the sea (do you mind me?), then it should swim in butter, and at last, sirrah, it should swim in good claret.—Swift.

"Will you walk a little faster?" said a whiting to a snail,

"There's a porpoise close behind us, and he's treading on my tail!"

See how eagerly the lobsters and the turtles all advance:

They are waiting on the shingle—will you come and join the dance?"

—Lewis Carroll.

O scaly, slippery, wet, swift, staring wights. What is 't ye do? what life lead? eh, dull goggles?

How do ye vary your vile days and nights? How pass your Sundays? Are ye still but joggles

In ceaseless wash? Still nought but gapes and bites,

And drinks, and stares, diversified with boggles. —Leigh Hunt.

Fitness

When James and John asked Jesus for the best places in His kingdom, they were told in His gentle, gracious way that the main point was not wanting the best places, but being worth them. It is a question of preparation—"For whom they are prepared" is only another way of saying for those who are prepared. We are so used to favoritism in public life that we turn every way for enough influence to get ourselves appointed. But perfect governments are officered, not by official favorites, but by qualified men. "God is no respecter of persons." He does not look twice at a man's petition and signatures. It is wholly a question of personal fitness. Let us put the emphasis of our life, then, in the right place. It is not wanting something, but being worth something. God has plenty of time in which to make discoveries, but we have none too much time in which to become worth discovering. We should care, not so much about being recognized as about being worth recognition. The real values of life are spiritual and eternal, and the fit man will some day succeed the favorite.—Maltbie Babcock.

Flag

The flag of our union forever!—George P. Morris:

A star for every state, and a state for every star.—Robert C. Winthrop.

The meteor flag of England.—Campbell.

This token serveth for a flag of truce
Betwixt ourselves and all our followers.
—Shakespeare.

Under spread ensigns moving nigh, in slow
But firm battalion. —Milton.

When Freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard to the air.

—Joseph Rodman Drake.

If any one attempts to haul down
the American flag, shoot him on the spot.—John A. Dix.

Bastard Freedom waves
Her fustian flag in mockery over slaves.
—Moore.

Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurl'd
Th' imperial ensign, which full high advanced Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind.
—Milton.

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Let it rise! let it rise, till it meet the sun in his coming; let the earliest light of the morning gild it, and the parting day linger and play on its summit.—Daniel Webster.

Flag of the free heart's hope and home!
By angel hands to valor given,
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.
—Joseph Rodman Drake.

Ye mariners of England!
That guard our native seas;
Whose flag has braved a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze.—Campbell.

Nail to the mast her holy flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the God of storms,
The lightning and the gale.
—O. W. Holmes.

"A song for our banner?"—The watchword recall
Which gave the republic her station;
"United we stand—divided we fall!"
It made and preserves us a nation!
—George P. Morris.

Praise the Power that hath made and preserved us a nation!
Then conquer we must when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust!"
And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave. —F. S. Key.

Fling out, fling out, with cheer and shout,
To all the winds Our Country's Banner!
Be every bar, and every star,
Displayed in full and glorious manner!
Blow, zephyrs, blow, keep the dear ensign flying!
Blow, zephyrs, sweetly mournful, sighing, sighing, sighing! —Abraham Coles.

Banner of England, not for a season,
O banner of Britain, has thou
Floated in conquering battle or flap to the battle-cry!
Never with mightier glory than when we had rear'd thee on high,
Flying at top of the roofs in the ghastly siege of Lucknow—
Shot thro' the staff or the balyard, but ever we raised thee anew,
And ever upon the topmost roof our banner of England blew. —Tennyson.

Flattery

All-potent flattery, universal lord!—Pope.

Flatterers are the worst kind of enemies.—Tacitus.

Flatterers are the bosom enemies of princes.—South.

Oh, flatter me; for love delights in praises.—Shakespeare.

Knavery and flattery are blood relations.—Abraham Lincoln.

Flattery is the handmaid of the vices.—Cicero.

Self-love is the greatest of flatterers.—La Rochefoucauld.

Flattery, the dangerous nurse of vice.—Daniel.

No man flatters the woman he truly loves.—Tuckerman.

He that is much flattered soon learns to flatter himself.—Johnson.

Parent of wicked, bane of honest deeds.—Prior.

The lie that flatters I abhor the most.—Cowper.

A flatterer is the shadow of a fool.—Sir Thomas Overbury.

Imitation is the sincerest of flattery.—Colton.

It is easy to flatter; it is harder to praise.—Richter.

If you mean to profit, learn to praise.—Churchill.

See how they beg an alms of flattery!—Young.

Lay not that flattering unction to your soul.—Shakespeare.

Just praise is only a debt, but flattery is a present.—Johnson.

Flattery labors under the odious charge of servility.—Tacitus.

Nothing is so great an instance of ill-manners as flattery.—Swift.

The most subtle flattery that a woman can receive is by actions, not by words.—Mme. Necker.

Those are generally good at flattering who are good for nothing else.—South.

When flatterers meet the devil goes to dinner.—De Foe.

Of all wild beasts preserve me from a tyrant;
Of all tame—a flatterer. —Johnson.

Flattery corrupts both the receiver and the giver; and adulation is not of more service to the people than to kings.—Burke.

The firmest purpose of a woman's heart to well-timed, artful flattery may yield.—Lillo.

He that loves to be flattered is worthy o' the flatterer.—Shakespeare.

Meddle not with him that flattereth with his lips.—Bible.

Flattery is like a painted armor; only for show.—Socrates.

The most dangerous of all flattery is the inferiority of those about us.—Mme. Swetchine.

A man who flatters a woman hopes either to find her a fool or to make her one.—Richardson.

People flatter us because they can depend upon our credulity.—Tacitus.

But when I tell him he hates flatterers, He says he does, being then most flattered.—Shakespeare.

No visor does become black villainy so well as soft and tender flattery.—Shakespeare.

A man finds no sweeter voice in all the world than that which chants his praise.—Fontenelle.

O that men's ears should be to counsel deaf, but not to flattery!—Shakespeare.

Gallantry of mind consists in saying flattering things in an agreeable manner.—La Rochefoucauld.

Sirs, adulation is a fatal thing—
Rank poison for a subject, or a king.
—Dr. Wolcot.

Men are like stone jugs—you may lug them where you like by the ears.—Johnson.

When the world frowns, we can face it; but let it smile, and we are undone.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Flattery is a sort of bad money, to which our vanity gives currency.—La Rochefoucauld.

A fool flatters himself, a wise man flatters the fool.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If we would not flatter ourselves, the flattery of others could not harm us.—Rochefoucauld.

Not kings alone—the people, too, have their flatterers.—Mirabeau.

The most skillful flattery is to let a person talk on, and be a listener.—Addison.

Alas! the praise given to the ear
Ne'er was nor ne'er can be sincere.
—Miss Landon.

If any man flatters me, I'll flatter him again, though he were my best friend.—Franklin.

Flattery, which was formerly a vice, is now grown into a custom.—Publius Syrus.

Flattery is like base coin; it impoverishes him who receives it.—Madame Voiliez.

There is no flattery so adroit or effectual as that of implicit assent.—Hazlitt.

This barren verbiage current among men, Light coin, the tinsel clink of compliment.
—Tennyson.

Who flatters is of all mankind the lowest, Save he who courts the flattery.
—Hannah More.

He does me double wrong, that wounds me with the flatteries of his tongue.—Shakespeare.

If we never flattered ourselves we should have but scant pleasure.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is better to fall among crows than flatterers; for those devour the dead only, these the living.—Antisthenes.

The flatterer easily insinuates himself into the closet, while honest merit stands shivering in the hall or antechamber.—Jane Porter.

You play the spaniel,
And think with wagging of your tongue to win me.
—Shakespeare.

Applause is of too coarse a nature to be swallowed in the gross, though the extract or tincture be ever so agreeable.—Shenstone.

Flatterers are but the shadows of princes' bodies; the least thick cloud makes them invisible.—John Webster.

Though flattery blossoms like friendship, yet there is a vast difference in the fruit.—Socrates.

O flatt'ry!
How soon thy smooth insinuating oil
Supplies the toughest fool —Fenton.

We sometimes think we hate flattery, when we only hate the manner in which we have been flattered.—Rochefoucauld.

Flattery is no more than what raises in a man's mind an idea of a preference which he has not.—Burke.

There is nothing which so poisons princes as flattery, nor anything whereby wicked men more easily obtain credit and favor with them.—Montaigne.

It hath been well said that the arch-flatterer, with whom all the petty flatterers have intelligence, is a man's self.—Bacon.

People generally despise where they flatter, and cringe to those they would gladly overtop; so that truth and ceremony are two things.—Marcus Antonius.

Give me flattery—flattery, the food of courts, that I may rock him, and lull him in the down of his desires.—Beaumont.

The love of flattery in most men proceeds from the mean opinion they have of themselves; in women, from the contrary.—Swift.

Among all the diseases of the mind, there is not one more epidemical or more pernicious than the love of flattery.—Steele.

The rich man despises those who flatter him too much, and hates those who do not flatter him at all.—Talleyrand.

The art of flatterers is to take advantage of the foibles of the great, to foster their errors, and never to give advice which may annoy.—Molière.

Flattery is often a traffic of mutual meanness, where although both parties intend deception, neither are deceived.—Colton.

Beware of flattery, 'tis a weed
Which oft offends the very idol—vice,
Whose shrine it would perfume.
—Fenton.

There is not one of us that would not be worse than kings, if so continually corrupted as they are with a sort of vermin called flatterers.—Montaigne.

No flattery, boy! an honest man cannot live by it; it is a little, sheeking art, which knaves use to cajole and soften fools withal.—Otway.

Very ugly or very beautiful women should be flattered on their understanding, and mediocre ones on their beauty.—Chesterfield.

His nature is too noble for the world; he would not flatter Neptune for his trident, or Jove for his power to thunder.—Shakespeare.

Because all men are apt to flatter themselves, to entertain the addition of other men's praises is most perilous.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Commend a fool for his wit and a knave for his honesty, and they will receive you into their bosoms.—Fielding.

It is possible to be below flattery as well as above it. One who trusts nobody will not trust sycophants. One who does not value real glory will not value its counterfeit.—Macaulay.

We must define flattery and praise; they are distinct. Trajan was encouraged to virtue by the panegyric of Pliny; Tiberius became obstinate in vice from the flattery of his senators.—Louis the Sixteenth.

If you had told Sycorax that her son Caliban was as handsome as Apollo, she would have been pleased, witch as she was.—Thackeray.

Some indeed there are, who profess to despise all flattery, but even these are, nevertheless, to be flattered, by being told that they do despise it.—Colton.

Ah! when the means are gone, that buy this praise,
The breath is gone whereof this praise is made. —Shakespeare.

If you tell a woman she is beautiful, whisper it softly, for if the devil hears, he will echo it many times.—F. A. Durivage.

Women swallow at one mouthful the lie that flatters, and drink drop by drop the truth that is bitter.—Didrot.

Flatterers of every age resemble those African tribes of which the credulous Pliny speaks, who made men, animals, and even plants perish, while fascinating them with praises.—Richter.

Adroit observers will find that some who affect to dislike flattery may yet be flattered, indirectly by a well-seasoned abuse and ridicule of their rivals.—Colton.

Flattery is an ensnaring quality, and leaves a very dangerous impression. It swells a man's imagination, entertains his vanity, and drives him to a doting upon his own person.—Jeremy Collier.

There is no detraction worse than to overpraise a man, for if his worth proves short of what report doth speak of him, his own actions are ever giving the lie to his honor.—Feltham.

Flattery pleases very generally. In the first place, the flatterer may think what he says to be true, but, in the second place, whether he thinks so or not, he certainly thinks those whom he flatters of consequence enough to be flattered.—Johnson.

An ingenuous mind feels in unmerited praise the bitterest reproof. If you reject it, you are unhappy: if you accept it, you are undone.—Lander.

At the throng'd levee bends the vena? tribe:
With fair but faithless smiles each varnish'd o'er,
Each smooth as those that mutually deceive. —Thomson.

I would give worlds, could I believe
One-half that is profess'd me;
Affection! could I think it Thee,
When Flattery has caress'd me. —Miss Landon.

Of praise a mere glutton, he swallow'd what came,
And the puff of a dunce he mistook it for fame;
Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease,
Who pepper'd the highest was surest to please. —Goldsmith.

For praise too dearly lov'd, or warmly sought,
Enfeebles all internal strength of thought;
And the weak soul within itself unblest,
Leans for all pleasure on another's breast. —Goldsmith.

Should the poor be flattered? No;
let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,
and crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning.—Shakespeare.

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,
That flattery's the food of fools,
Yet now and then you men of wit
Will condescend to take a bit. —Swift.

Of folly, vice, disease, men proud we see,
And (stranger still!) of blockhead's flattery,
Whose praise defames; as if a fool should mean,
By spitting on your face, to make it clean. —Young.

Fine speeches are the instruments of fools or knaves, who use them when they want good sense; but honesty needs no disguise or ornament.—Otway.

* * * for ne'er
Was flattery lost on Poet's ear;
A simple race! they waste their toil
For the vain tribute of a smile.—Scott.

The mischief of flattery is, not that it persuades any man that he is what he is not, but that it suppresses the influence of honest ambition by raising an opinion that honor may be gained without the toil of merit.—Johnson.

There is no tongue that flatters like a lover's; and yet, in the exaggeration of his feelings, flattery seems to him commonplace. Strange and prodigal exuberance, which soon exhausts itself by flowing!—Bulwer-Lytton.

First we flatter ourselves; and then the flattery of others is sure of success. It awakens our self-love within—a party who is ever ready to revolt from our better judgment, and join the enemy without.—Steele.

Christian! thou knowest thou carriest gunpowder about thee. Desire them that carry fire to keep at a distance. It is a dangerous crisis when a proud heart meets with flattering lips.—Flavel.

Take care how you listen to the voice of the flatterer, who, in return for his little stock, expects to derive from you considerable advantage. If one day you do not comply with his wishes, he imputes to you two hundred defects instead of perfections.—Saadi.

Let the passion of flattery be ever so inordinate, the supply can keep pace with the demand, and in the world's great market, in which wit and folly drive their bargains with each other, there are traders of all sorts.—Cumberland.

Flattery, though a base coin, is the necessary pocket money at court; where, by custom and consent, it has obtained such a currency that it is no longer a fraudulent, but a legal payment.—Chesterfield.

Flatterers are the worst kind of traitors, for they will strengthen thy imperfections, encourage thee in all evils, correct thee in nothing, but so shadow and paint thy follies and vices as thou shalt never, by their will, discover good from evil, or vice from virtue.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

A flatterer is said to be a beast that biteth smiling. But it is hard to know them from friends, they are so obsequious and full of protestations; for as a wolf resembles a dog, so doth a flatterer a friend.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Praise not people to their faces, to the end that they may pay thee in the same coin. This is so thin a cobweb that it may with little difficulty be seen through; it is rarely strong enough to catch flies of any considerable magnitude.—Fuller.

Know thyself, thy evil as thy good, and flattery shall not harm thee; yea, her speech shall be a warning, a humbling, and a guide. For wherein thou lackest most, there chiefly will the sycophant commend thee.—Tupper.

By God, I cannot flatter: I do defy
The tongues of soothers; but a braver place
In my heart's love, hath no man than yourself;
Nay, task me to my word; approve me,
lord. —Shakespeare.

Delicious essence! how refreshing art thou to nature! how strongly are all its powers and all its weaknesses on thy side! how sweetly dost thou mix with the blood, and help it through the most difficult and tortuous passages to the heart!—Sterne.

It requires but little acquaintance with the heart to know that woman's first wish is to be handsome; and that, consequently, the readiest method of obtaining her kindness is to praise her beauty.—Johnson.

Blinded as they are to their true character by self-love, every man is his own first and chiefest flatterer, prepared, therefore, to welcome the flatterer from the outside, who only comes confirming the verdict of the flatterer within.—Plutarch.

Nature has hardly formed a woman ugly enough to be insensible to flattery upon her person; if her face is so shocking that she must in some degree be conscious of it, her figure and her air, she trusts, make ample amends for it.—Chesterfield.

To be flattered is grateful, even when we know that our praises are not believed by those who pronounce them; for they prove at least our power, and show that our favor is valued, since it is purchased by the meanness of falsehood.—Johnson.

Parent of wicked, bane of honest deeds,
 Pernicious flattery! thy malignant seeds,
 In an ill hour, and by a fatal hand,
 Sadly diffus'd o'er virtue's gleby land,
 With rising pride amidst the corn appear,
 And choke the hopes and harvest of the year. —Prior.

It is scarcely credible to what degree discernment may be dazzled by the mist of pride, and wisdom infatuated by the intoxication of flattery; or how low the genius may descend by successive gradations of servility, and how swiftly it may fall down the precipice of falsehood.—Johnson.

Allow no man to be so free with you as to praise you to your face. Your vanity by this means will want its food. At the same time your passion for esteem will be more fully gratified; men will praise you in their actions; where you now receive one compliment, you will then receive twenty civilities.—Steele.

We must be careful how we flatter fools too little, or wise men too much; for the flatterer must act the very reverse of the physician, and administer the strongest dose only to the weakest patient.—Colton.

Take no repulse, whatever she doth say;
 For, "get you gone," she doth not mean,
 "away."
 Flatter and praise, commend, extol their graces;
 Though ne'er so black, say they have angels' faces.
 That man that hath a tongue, I say, is no
 man,
 If with his tongue he cannot win a woman.
 —Shakespeare.

We must suit the flattery to the mind and taste of the recipient. We do not put essences into hogsheads, nor porter into phials. Delicate minds may be disgusted by compliments that would please a grosser intellect: as some fine ladies who would be shocked at the idea of a dram will not refuse a liqueur.—Colton.

In order that all men may be taught to speak truth, it is necessary that all likewise should learn to hear it; for no species of falsehood is more frequent than flattery, to which the coward is betrayed by fear, the dependent by interest, and the friend by tenderness. Those who are neither servile nor timorous are yet desirous to bestow pleasure; and while unjust demands of praise continue to be made, there will always be some whom hope, fear, or kindness will dispose to pay them.—Johnson.

Flirting

Flirtation is the tomb of virtue.—
 Mme. Roland.

Who is it can read a woman?—
 Shakespeare.

Alas, the transports beauty can inspire!—Bovee.

One expresses well only the love he does not feel.—Alphonse Karr.

It is the same in love as in war; a fortress that parleys is half taken.—
 Marguerite de Valois.

Cupid makes it his sport to pull the warrior's plum.—Sir P. Sidney.

Flirtation is a circulating library, in which we seldom ask twice for the same volume.—N. P. Willis.

Do you know a young and beautiful woman who is not ready to flirt—just a little?—J. Petit-Senn.

There are women who fly their falcons at any game, little birds and all.—
 George MacDonald.

As the excitement of the game increases, prudence is sure to diminish.—
 Bulwer-Lytton.

That soul-subduing sentiment, harshly called flirtation, which is the spell of a country house.—Beaconsfield.

Flirtation and coquetry are so nearly allied as to be identical: both are the art of successful and pleasing deception.—Mme. Louise Colet.

Admiration is natural; and it has been said there are many lovable women, but no perfect ones.—Latéa.

Novelty is to love like bloom to fruit; it gives a luster which is easily effaced, but never returns.—Rochefoucauld.

There are few young women in existence who have not the power of fascinating, if they choose to exert it.—Beaconsfield.

From a grave thinking mouser she was grown
The gayest flirt that coach'd it round the town. —Pitt.

There are some women who are flirts upon principle; they consider it their duty to make themselves as pleasing as possible to every one.—Rivarol.

How happy could I be with either,
Were t'other dear charmer away!
But, while ye thus tease me together,
To neither a word will I say. —Gay.

Never wedding, ever wooing,
Still a love-lorn heart pursuing,
Read you not the wrong you're doing,
In my cheek's pale hue?
All my life with sorrow strewing,
Wed, or cease to woo. —Campbell.

I assisted at the birth of that most significant word flirtation, which dropped from the most beautiful mouth in the world, and which has since received the sanction of our most accurate laureate in one of his comedies.—Chesterfield.

Beautiful objects of the wild-bee's love.—Nicol.

Sweet flowers are slow, and weeds make haste.—Shakespeare.

The moss-clad violet, fragrant and concealed like hidden charity.—J. F. Hollings.

The plants look up to heaven, from whence they have their nourishment.—Shakespeare.

Flowers are sent to do God's work in unrevealed paths, and to diffuse influence by channels that we hardly suspect.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There's rosemary, that's for remembrance; * * * and there is pansies, that's for thoughts.—Shakespeare.

Flowers are the sweetest things that God ever made and forgot to put a soul into.—Beecher.

But the rose leaves herself upon the brier
For winds to kiss and grateful bees to feed.
—Keats.

The daisy is fair, the day-lily rare,
The bud o' the rose as sweet as it's bonnie.
—Hogg.

Roses, and pinks, and violets, to adorn
The shrine of Flora in her early May.
—Keats.

Flowers are words
Which even a babe may understand.
—Bishop Cox.

To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.
—Wordsworth.

Hope smiled when your nativity was cast,
Children of Summer!
—Wordsworth.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desert air.—Gray.

Look how the blue-eyed violets glance love to one another!—T. B.
Read.

Ye living flowers, that skirt the eternal frost!—Coleridge.

The milk-white lilies that lean from the fragrant hedge.—Alice Cary.

Fade, flowers, fade! Nature will have it so; 'tis but what we in our autumn do.—Waller.

With fragrant breath the lilies woo me now, and softly speaks the sweet-voiced mignonette.—Julia C. R. Dorr.

The sweet forget-me-nots that grow for happy lovers.—Tennyson.

The daisies' eyes are a-twinkle with happy tears of dew.—Fitz-Hugh Ludlow.

Sweet flowers alone can say what passion fears revealing.—Moore.

Flowers, leaves, fruit, are the air-woven children of light.—Moleschott.

Foster the beautiful, and every hour thou callest new flowers to birth.—
Schiller.

The buttercups across the field made sunshine rifts of splendor.—Miss Mulock.

And the spring arose on the garden fair like the spirit of Love felt everywhere.—Shelley.

Like saintly vestals, pale in prayer,
their pure breath sanctifies the air.—
Julia C. R. Dorr.

Flowers may beckon towards us, but they speak toward heaven and God.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

The opening and the folding flowers,
that laugh to the summer's day.—Mrs.
Hemans.

He who does not love flowers has lost all love and fear of God.—Ludwig Tieck.

These children of the meadows, born
Of sunshine and of showers!
—Whittier.

Flowers spring up unsown and die
ungathered.—Bryant.

Floral apostles! that in dewy splendor weep without woe, and blush without a crime.—Horace Smith.

I always think the flowers can see us, and know what we are thinking about.—George Eliot.

The gentle race of flowers
Are lying in their lowly beds.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Emblems of our own great resurrection, emblems of the bright and better land.—Longfellow.

In eastern lands they talk in flowers, and they tell in a garland their loves and cares.—Percival.

Lovely flowers are smiles of God's goodness.—Wilberforce.

I do love violets; they tell the history of woman's love.—L. E. Landon.

Happy are they who can create a rose tree or erect a honeysuckle.—Gray.

How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage altar, and the tomb.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

The snowdrop and primrose our woodlands adorn,
And violets bathe in the wet o' the morn.—Burns.

The breath of flowers is far sweeter in the air (where it comes and goes like the warbling of music) than in the hand.—Bacon.

It is with flowers as with moral qualities; the bright are sometimes poisonous; but, I believe, never the sweet.—Hare.

Who that has loved knows not the tender tale which flowers reveal, when lips are coy to tell?—Bulwer-Lytton.

E'en the rough rocks with tender myrtle bloom, and trodden weeds send out a rich perfume.—Addison.

Flowers are the beautiful hieroglyphics of nature, with which she indicates how much she loves us.—Goethe.

If thou wouldst attain to thy highest, go look upon a flower; what that does willessly, that do thou willingly.—Schiller.

The daffodil is our door-side queen; she pushes up the sward already, to spot with sunshine the early green.—Bryant.

May-flowers blooming around him.
Fragrant, filling the air with a strange and wonderful sweetness. —Longfellow.

I regard them, as Charles the Emperor did Florence, that they are too pleasant to be looked upon except on holidays.—Izaak Walton.

Most gladly would I give the blood-stained laurel for the first violet which March brings us, the fragrant pledge of the new-fledged year.—Schiller.

There is not the least flower but seems to hold up its head and to look pleasantly, in the secret sense of the goodness of its Heavenly Maker.—South.

A passion for flowers is, I really think, the only one which long sickness leaves untouched with its chilling influence.—Mrs. Hemans.

The Omnipotent has sown His name on the heavens in glittering stars; but upon earth He planteth His name by tender flowers.—Richter.

Leaves are the Greek, flowers the Italian, phase of the spirit of beauty that reveals itself through the flora of the globe.—T. Starr King.

I think I am quite wicked with roses. I like to gather them, and smell them till they have no scent left.—George Eliot.

As timid violets lade the ambient air
With their heart's richest fragrance, unaware
The fragrance whispers that the flower is there. —Anna Katharine Green.

Sweet flower, thou tellest how hearts as pure and tender as thy leaf, as low and humble as thy stem, will surely know the joy that peace imparts.—Percival.

The harebells nod as she passes by,
The violet lifts its tender eye,
The ferns bend her steps to greet,
And the mosses creep to her dancing feet.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

And all the meadows, wide unrolled,
Were green and silver, green and gold,
Where buttercups and daisies spun
Their shining tissues in the sun.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Spake full well, in language quaint and olden,
One who dwelleth by the castled Rhine,
When he called the flowers, so blue and golden,
Stars, that in earth's firmament do shine.
—Longfellow.

Your voiceless lips, O flowers, are living preachers—each cup a pulpit, and each leaf a book.—Horace Smith.

The herb feeds upon the juice of a good soil, and drinks in the dew of heaven as eagerly, and thrives by it as effectually, as the stalled ox that tastes everything that he eats or drinks.—South.

I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
Where oxlips and the nodding violet grows;
Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine.
—Shakespeare.

Flowers never emit so sweet and strong a fragrance as before a storm. Beauteous soul! when a storm approaches thee, be as fragrant as a sweet-smelling flower.—Richter.

Gorgeous flowerets in the sunlight shining,
Blossoms flaunting in the eye of day,
Tremulous leaves, with soft and silver lining,
Buds that open only to decay.
—Longfellow.

The purple heath and golden broom
On moory mountains catch the gale,
O'er lawns the lily sheds perfume,
The violet in the vale.
—Montgomery.

Not a flower but shows some touch, in freckle, streak, or stain, of His unrivalled pencil. He inspires their balmy odors, and imparts their hues.—Cowper.

The rose is fragrant, but it fades in time:
The violet sweet, but quickly past the prime:
White lilies hang their heads, and soon decay,
And white snow in minutes melts away.
—Dryden.

What a pity flowers can utter no sound! A singing rose, a whispering violet, a murmuring honeysuckle—oh, what a rare and exquisite miracle would these be!—Beecher.

Flowers and fruits are always fit presents—flowers, because they are a proud assertion that a ray of beauty outvalues all the utilities of the world.—Emerson.

Yellow japanned buttercups and star-disked dandelions—just as we see them lying in the grass, like sparks that have leaped from the kindling sun of summer.—O. W. Holmes.

Underneath large blue-bells tented
Where the daisies are rose-scented,
And the rose herself has got Perfume which on earth is not.
—Keats.

Now blooms the lily by the bank,
The primrose down the brae;
The hawthorn's budding in the glen,
And milkwhite is the slae. —Burns.

To analyze the charms of flowers is like dissecting music; it is one of those things which it is far better to enjoy than to attempt to understand.—Tuckerman.

What a desolate place would be a world without a flower! It would be a face without a smile, a feast without a welcome. Are not flowers the stars of the earth, and are not our stars the flowers of heaven?—Mrs. Balfour.

They speak of hope to the fainting heart,
With a voice of promise they come and part,
They sleep in dust through the wintry hours,
They break forth in glory—bring flowers,
Bright flowers! —Mrs. Hemans.

A love-tint flushes the wind-flower's cheek,
Rich melodies gush from the violet's beak,
On the rifts of the rock, the wild columbines grow,
Their heavy honey-cups bending low.
—Sarah Helen Whitman.

Learn, O student, the true wisdom.
See yon bush aflame with roses, like the burning bush of Moses. Listen, and thou shalt hear, if thy soul be not deaf, how from out it, soft and clear, speaks to thee the Lord Almighty.—Hafiz.

Flowers are the bright remembrances of youth; they waft us back, with their bland odorous breath, the joyous hours that only young life knows, ere we have learnt that this fair earth hides graves.—Countess of Blessington.

There is to the poetical sense a ravishing prophecy and winsome intimation in flowers that now and then, from the influence of mood or circumstance, reasserts itself like the reminiscence of childhood, or the spell of love.—Tuckerman.

As for marigolds, poppies, hollyhocks, and valorous sunflowers, we shall never have a garden without them, both for their own sake and for the sake of old-fashioned folks, who used to love them.—Beecher.

Doubtless botany has its value; but the flowers knew how to preach divinity before men knew how to dissect and botanize them; they are apt to stop preaching, though, so soon as we begin to dissect and botanize them.—H. N. Hudson.

The instinctive and universal taste of mankind selects flowers for the expression of its finest sympathies, their beauty and their fleetingness serving to make them the most fitting symbols of those delicate sentiments for which language itself seems almost too gross a medium.—Hillard.

The loveliest flowers the closest cling to earth,
And they first feel the sun: so violets blue;
So the soft star-like primrose—drenched in dew—
The happiest of spring's happy, fragrant birth.
—Keble.

They know the time to go!
The fairy clocks strike their inaudible hour
In field and woodland, and each punctual flower
Bows at the signal an obedient head
And hastes to bed.
—Susan Coolidge.

Flowers are Love's truest language; they betray,
Like the divining rods of Magi old,
Where precious wealth lies buried, not of gold,
But love—strong love, that never can decay!
—Park Benjamin.

Flowers have an expression of countenance as much as men or animals. Some seem to smile; some have a sad expression; some are pensive and diffident; others again are plain, honest and upright, like the broad-faced sunflower and hollyhock.—Henry Ward Beecher.

With roses musky-breathed,
And drooping daffodilly,
And silver-leaved lily,
And ivy darkly-wreathed,
I wove a crown before her,
For her I love so dearly.
—Tennyson.

Flowers belong to Fairyland: the flowers and the birds and the butterflies are all that the world has kept of its golden age—the only perfectly beautiful things on earth—joyous, innocent, half divine—useless, say they who are wiser than God.—Ouida.

To cultivate a garden is to walk with God, to go hand in hand with nature in some of her most beautiful processes, to learn something of her choicest secrets, and to have a more intelligent interest awakened in the beautiful order of her works elsewhere.—Bovee.

There is to me a daintiness about early flowers that touches me like poetry. They blow out with such a simple loveliness among the common herbs of pastures, and breathe their lives so unobtrusively, like hearts whose beatings are too gentle for the world.—Willis.

Every rose is an autograph from the hand of the Almighty God on this world about us. He has inscribed His thoughts in these marvelous hieroglyphics which sense and science have been these many thousand years seeking to understand.—Theodore Parker.

Flowers should deck the brow of the youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine round the tomb, for their perpetually renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and their beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the Most High.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

"If flowers have souls," said Undine, "the bees, whose nurses they are, must seem to them darling children at the breast. I once fancied a paradise for the spirits of departed flowers." "They go," answered I, "not into paradise, but into a middle state; the souls of lilies enter into maidens' foreheads, those of hyacinths and forget-me-nots dwell in their eyes, and those of roses in their lips."—Richter.

The little flower which sprung up through the hard pavement of poor Picciola's prison was beautiful from contrast with the dreary sterility which surrounded it. So here amid rough walls, are there fresh tokens of nature. And O, the beautiful lessons which flowers teach to children, especially in the city! The child's mind can grasp with ease the delicate suggestions of flowers.—Chapin.

Yet, no—not words, for they
But half can tell love's feeling;
Sweet flowers alone can say
What passion fears revealing:
A once bright rose's wither'd leaf,
A tow'ring lily broken—
Oh, these may paint a grief
No words could e'er have spoken.
—Moore.

Daffodils,
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty; violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath; pale primroses,
That die unmarried ere they can behold
Bright Phœbus in his strength—a malady
Most incident to maids; bold oxlips and
The crown-imperial; lilies of all kinds,
The flower-de-luce being one!
—Shakespeare.

I remember, I remember
The roses, red and white,
The violets, and the lily-cups,
Those flowers made of light!
The lilacs, where the robin built,
And where my brother set
The laburnum on his birthday—
The tree is living yet. —Hood.

Often a nosegay of wild flowers, which was to us, as village children, a grove of pleasure, has in after years of manhood, and in the town, given us by its old perfume, an indescribable transport back into godlike childhood; and how, like a flower goddess, it has raised us into the first embracing

Aurora clouds of our first dim feelings!—Richter.

Sweet is the rose, but grows upon a brere;
Sweet is the juniper, but sharp his bough;
Sweet is the eglantine, but sticketh nere;
Sweet is the firbloom, but its branches rough;
Sweet is the cypress, but its rynd is tough;
Sweet is the nut, but bitter is his pill;
Sweet is the broome-flowre, but yet sowre enough;
And sweet is moly, but his root is ill.
—Spenser.

Here eglantine embalm'd the air,
Hawthorne and hazel mingled there;
The primrose pale, and violet flower,
Found in each cliff a narrow bower;
Fox-glove and nightshade, side by side,
Emblems of punishment and pride,
Group'd their dark hues with every stain
The weather-beaten crags retain.—Scott.

There bloomed the strawberry of the wilderness;
The trembling eyebright showed her sapphire blue,
The thyme her purple, like the blush of Even;
And if the breath of some to no caress
Invited, forth they peeped so fair to view,
All kinds alike seemed favorites of heaven.
—Wordsworth.

Sweet letters of the angel tongue,
I've loved ye long and well,
And never have failed in your fragrance sweet
To find some secret spell—
A charm that has bound me with witching power,
For mine is the old belief,
That midst your sweets and midst your bloom,
There's a soul in every leaf!
—M. M. Ballou.

He bore a simple wild-flower wreath:
Narcissus, and the sweet brier rose;
Vervain, and flexile thyme, that breathe
Rich fragrance; modest heath, that glows
With purple bells; the amaranth bright,
That no decay, nor fading knows,
Like true love's holiest, rarest light;
And every purest flower, that blows
In that sweet time, which Love most blesses.
When spring on summer's confines presses. —Thomas Love Peacock.

He must have an artist's eye for color and form who can arrange a hundred flowers as tastefully, in any other way, as by strolling through a garden, and picking here one and there one, and adding them to the bouquet

In the accidental order in which they chance to come. Thus we see every summer day the fair lady coming in from the breezy side hill with gorgeous colors and most witching effects. If only she could be changed to alabaster, was ever a finer show of flowers in so fine a vase? But instead of allowing the flowers to remain as they were gathered, they are laid upon the table, divided, rearranged on some principle of taste, I know not what, but never again have that charming naturalness and grace which they first had.—Beecher.

The foxglove, with its stately bells
Of purple, shall adorn thy dells;
The wallflower, on each rifted rock,
From liberal blossoms shall breathe down,
(Gold blossoms freckled with iron-brown,)
Its fragrance; while the hollyhock,
The pink, and the carnation vie
With lupin and with lavender,
To decorate the fading year;
And larkspurs, many-hued, shall drive Gloom from the groves, where red leaves
lie,
And Nature seems but half alive.

—D. M. Moir.

The windflower and the violet, they perished
long ago,
And the brier-rose and the orchis died amid
the summer glow;
But on the hills the golden-rod, and the
aster in the wood,
And the yellow sunflower by the brook, in autumn beauty stood,
Till fell the frost from the clear cold
heaven, as falls the plague on men,
And the brightness of their smile was gone,
from upland glade and glen.

—Bryant.

Foe

He makes no friend who never made a foe.—Tennyson.

Cursed be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe.

—Pope.

Alike reserved to blame, or to commend,
A timorous foe and a suspicious friend.

—Pope.

A foe to God was ne'er true friend to
man,
Some sinister intent taints all he does.

—Young.

Fool—Folly

Fools are not mad folks.—Shakespeare.

None but a fool is always right.—Hare.

Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.—Pope.

A fool at forty is a fool indeed.—Young.

To the fool-king belongs the world.—Schiller.

No creature smarts so little as a fool.—Pope.

A fool's bolt is soon shot.—Shakespeare.

A rogue is a roundabout fool.—Coleridge.

It needs brains to be a real fool.—George MacDonald.

The wise man knows himself to be a fool.—Shakespeare.

Better a witty fool, than a foolish wit.—Shakespeare.

Fools are apt to imitate only the defects of their betters.—Swift.

Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die.—Young.

A fool may now and then be right by chance.—Cowper.

The fool doth think he is wise.—Shakespeare.

Even the fool is wise after the event.—Homer.

A fool with judges, amongst fools a judge.—Cowper.

Fool beckons fool, and dunce awakens dunce.—Churchill.

Levity of behavior, always a weakness, is far more unbecoming in a woman than a man.—William Penn.

Fools are my theme, let satire be my song.—Byron.

Too many giddy, foolish hours are gone.—Rowe.

Fortune makes folly her peculiar care.—Churchill.

Folly loves the martyrdom of fame.—Byron.

Old fools are more foolish than young ones.—Rochefoucauld.

Mingle a little folly with your wisdom.—Horace.

Who lives without folly is not so wise as he thinks.—La Rochefoucauld.

Fools, to talking ever prone
Are sure to make their follies known.
—Gay.

A man may be as much a fool from the want of sensibility as the want of sense.—Mrs. Jameson.

Women, like men, may be persuaded to confess their faults; but their follies, never.—Alfred de Musset.

'Tis my maxim, he's a fool that marries; but he's a greater that does not marry a fool.—Wycherly.

O noble fool!
A worthy fool! Motley's the only wear.
—Shakespeare.

Thou little thinkest what a little foolery governs the whole world.—John Selden.

Leave such to trifle with more grace and ease,
Whom Folly pleases, and whose Follies please.
—Pope.

Young men think old men are fools; but old men know young men are fools.—George Chapman.

There are well-dressed follies, as there are well-clothed fools.—Chamfort.

No one should so act as to take advantage of another's folly.—Cicero.

If thou hast never been a fool, be sure thou wilt never be a wise man.—Thackeray.

By outward show let's not be cheated;
An ass should like an ass be treated.
—Gay.

People are never so near playing the fool as when they think themselves wise.—Lady Montagu.

Every man's follies are the caricature resemblances of his wisdom.—John Sterling.

Ever since Adam fools have been in the majority.—Casimir Delavigne.

It is the peculiar quality of a fool to perceive the faults of others, and to forget his own.—Cicero.

If the advice of a fool for once happens to be good, it requires a wise man to carry it out.—Lessing.

I am always afraid of a fool. One cannot be sure that he is not a knave as well.—Hazlitt.

A man of wit would often be much embarrassed without the company of fools.—Rochefoucauld.

Generally nature hangs out a sign of simplicity in the face of a fool.—Thomas Fuller.

Of all thieves, fools are the worst; they rob you of time and temper.—Goethe.

Surely he is not a fool that hath unwise thoughts, but he that utters them.—Bishop Hall.

Tricks and treachery are the practice of fools that have not wit enough to be honest.—Benjamin Franklin.

There are follies as catching as contagious disorders.—La Rochefoucauld.

A learned fool is more foolish than an ignorant fool.—Molière.

He must be a thorough fool who can learn nothing from his own folly.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

It would be easier to endow a fool with intellect than to persuade him that he had none.—Babinet.

A fool is often as dangerous to deal with as a knave, and always more incorrigible.—Colton.

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!—Burke.

If you wish to avoid seeing a fool you must first break your looking-glass.—Rabelais.

The instruction of the foolish is a waste of knowledge; soap cannot wash charcoal white.—Kabir.

What matter though the scorn of fools be given,
If the path follow'd lead us on to heaven!
—Mrs. Hale.

I am a fool, I know it; and yet, God help me, I'm poor enough to be a wit.—Congreve.

A fool cannot look, nor stand, nor walk like a man of sense.—La Bruyère.

Men are so necessarily fools that it would be being a fool in a higher strain of folly, not to be a fool.—Pascal.

All men are fools, and with every effort they differ only in the degree.—Boileau.

He who provides for this life, but takes no care for eternity, is wise for a moment, but a fool forever.—Tillotson.

As riches and honor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool, but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.—La Bruyère.

Oh, brother wearers of motley, are there not moments when one grows sick of grinning and trembling and the jingling of cap and bells?—Thackeray.

How can you make a fool perceive that he is a fool? Such a personage can no more see his own folly than he can see his own ears.—Thackeray.

Fools with bookish knowledge are children with edged weapons; they hurt themselves, and put others in pain.—Zimmermann.

There are certain people fated to be fools; they not only commit follies by choice, but are even constrained to do so by fortune.—Rochefoucauld.

A fool who has a flash of wit creates astonishment and scandal, like hack-horses setting out to gallop.—Chamfort.

After a man has sown his wild oats in the years of his youth, he has still every year to get over a few weeks and days of folly.—Richter.

He is one of those wise philanthropists who, in a time of famine, would vote for nothing but a supply of tooth-picks.—Douglas Jerrold.

People have no right to make fools of themselves, unless they have no relations to blush for them.—Haliburton.

Fools and sensible men are equally innocuous. It is in the half fools and the half wise that the greatest danger lies.—Goethe.

Well, thus we play the fools with the time, and the spirits of the wise sit in the clouds and mock us.—Shakespeare.

Fools are very often united in the strictest intimacies, as the lighter kinds of woods are the most closely glued together.—Shenstone.

There is nothing which one regards so much with an eye of mirth and pity as innocence when it has in it a dash of folly.—Addison.

Women are charged with a fondness for nonsense and frivolity. Did not Talleyrand say, "I find nonsense singularly refreshing"?—Alfred de Musset.

The multitude of fools is a protection to the wise.—St. Augustine.

You pity a man who is lame or blind, but you never pity him for being a fool, which is often a much greater misfortune.—Sydney Smith.

Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.—Bible.

Folly is like the growth of weeds, always luxurious and spontaneous; wisdom, like flowers, requires cultivation.—Hosea Ballou.

The compliments of the season to my worthy masters, and a merry first of April to us all. We have all a speck of the motley.—Lamb.

The greatest of fools is he who imposes on himself, and in his greatest concern thinks certainly he knows that which he has least studied, and of which he is most profoundly ignorant.—Shaftesbury.

The imputation of being a fool is a thing which mankind, of all others, is the most impatient of, it being a blot upon the prime and specific perfection of human nature.—South.

To succeed in the world, it is much more necessary to possess the penetration to discover who is a fool than to discover who is a clever man.—Cato.

There is in human nature generally more of the fool than of the wise; and therefore those faculties by which the foolish part of men's minds are taken are more potent.—Bacon.

Men of all ages have the same inclinations, over which reason exercises no control. Thus, wherever men are found, there are follies, ay, and the same follies.—La Fontaine.

Men are so completely fools by necessity that he is but a fool in a higher strain of folly who does not confess his foolishness.—Pascal.

Some old men, by continually praising the time of their youth, would almost persuade us that there were no fools in those days; but unluckily they are left themselves for examples.—Pope.

If a traveler does not meet with one who is his better or his equal, let him firmly keep to his solitary journey; there is no companionship with a fool.—Max Müller.

To pardon those absurdities in ourselves which we cannot suffer in others is neither better nor worse than to be more willing to be fools ourselves than to have others so.—Pope.

I have play'd the fool, the gross fool, to believe
The bosom of a friend will hold a secret
Mine own could not retain.—Massinger.

The right to be a cussed fool
Is safe from all devices human,
It's common (ez a gin'l rule)
To every critter born of woman.—Lowell.

A rational reaction against irrational excesses and vagaries of skepticism may * * * readily degenerate into the rival folly of credulity.—Gladstone.

Nothing exceeds in ridicule, no doubt,
A fool in fashion, but a fool that's out;
His passion for absurdity's so strong,
He cannot bear a rival in the wrong.—Young.

'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay;
'Tis by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven away.—Sill.

Always win fools first. They talk much, and what they have once uttered they will stick to; whereas there is always time, up to the last moment, to bring before a wise man arguments that may entirely change his opinion.—Helps.

Men, when their actions succeed not as they would, are always ready to impute the blame thereof to heaven, so as to excuse their own follies.—Spenser.

A fool and a wise man are alike both in the starting-place—their birth, and at the post—their death; only they differ in the race of their lives.—Fuller.

Folly consists in the drawing of false conclusions from just principles, by which it is distinguished from madness, which draws just conclusions from false principles.—Locke.

At thirty man suspects himself a fool;
Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan;
At fifty chides his infamous delay,
Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve,
Resolves—and re-resolves; then dies the same. —Young.

A harmless hilarity and a buoyant cheerfulness are not infrequent concomitants of genius; and we are never more deceived than when we mistake gravity for greatness, solemnity for science, and pomposity for erudition.—Colton.

If men are to be fools, it were better that they were fools in little matters than in great; dullness, turned up with temerity, is a lively all the worse for the facings; and the most tremendous of all things is a magnanimous dunce.—Sydney Smith.

The wise man has his follies no less than the fool; but it has been said that herein lies the difference—the follies of the fool are known to the world, but are hidden from himself; the follies of the wise are known to himself, but hidden from the world.—Colton.

Were I to be angry at men being fools, I could here find ample room for declamation; but, alas! I have been a fool myself; and why should I be angry with them for being something so natural to every child of humanity? —Goldsmith.

For not only is Fortune herself blind, but she generally causes those men to be blind whose interests she has more particularly embraced. Therefore they are often haughty and arrogant; nor is there anything more intolerable than a prosperous fool. And hence we often see that men who were at one time affable and agreeable are completely changed by prosperity, despising their old friends, and clinging to new.—Cicero.

Foot—Feet

Nay, her foot speaks.—Shakespeare.

Feet like sunny gems on our English green.—Tennyson.

The grass stoops not, she treads on it so light.—Shakespeare.

Feet that run on willing errands!—Longfellow.

Footprints on the sands of time.—Longfellow.

Dance on the sands, and yet no footing seen.—Shakespeare.

And the prettiest foot; Oh, if a man could but fasten his eyes to her feet as they steal in and out, and play at bo-peep under her petticoats, Ah! Mr. Trapland?—Congreve.

Steps with a tender foot, light as on air,
The lovely, lordly creature floated on. —Tennyson.

So lightly walks, she not one mark imprints,
Nor brushes off the dews, nor soils the tints. —Churchill.

O happy earth,
Whereon thy innocent feet doe ever tread! —Spenser.

As if the wind, not she, did walk,
Nor pressed a flower, nor bowed a stalk. —Ben Jonson.

There is as much expression in the feet as in the hands.—Chamfort.

A foot more light, a step more true,
Ne'er from the heath-flower dashed the dew. —Scott.

Her pretty feet, like snails, did creep
A little out, and then,
As if they played at bo-peep,
Did soon draw in again. —Robert Herrick.

So light a foot will ne'er wear out the everlasting flint.—Shakespeare.

The flower she touched on dipped and rose.—Tennyson.

Her feet beneath her petticoat like little mice stole in and out, as if they feared the light.—Suckling.

Fop — Foppery

Foppery is the egotism of clothes.—Victor Hugo.

A dandy is a clothes-wearing man.—Carlyle.

Nature made every fop to plague his brother,
Just as one beauty mortifies another.
—Pope.

Their methods various, but alike their aim; the sloven and the fopling are the same.—Young.

A fop takes great pains to hang out a sign, by his dress, of what he has within.—Richardson.

Ambiguous things that ape goats in their visage, women in their shape.—Byron.

A coxcomb is ugly all over with affectation of a fine gentleman.—Dr. Johnson.

Nature has sometimes made a fool; but a coxcomb is always of a man's own making.—Addison.

So gentle, yet so brisk, so wondrous sweet,
So fit to prattle at a lady's feet.
—Churchill.

Foppery, being the chronic condition of women, is not so much noticed as it is when it breaks out on the person of the male bird.—Balzac.

Foppery is never cured; it is the bad stamina of the mind, which, like those of the body, are never rectified; once a coxcomb always a coxcomb.—Johnson.

A beau is one who arranges his curled locks gracefully, who ever smells of balm, and cinnamon; who hums the songs of the Nile, and Cadiz; who throws his sleek arms into various attitudes; who idles away the whole day among the chairs of the ladies, and is ever whispering into some one's ear; who reads little billets-doux from this quarter and that, and writes them in return; who avoids ruffling his dress by contact with his neighbors sleeve, who knows with whom everybody is in love; who flutters from feast to feast, who can recount exactly the pedigree of Hirpinus. What do you tell me? is this a beau, Cotilus? Then a beau, Cotilus, is a very trifling thing.—Martial.

A fop who admires his person in a glass soon enters into a resolution of making his fortune by it, not questioning that every woman who falls in his way will do him as much justice as himself.—Thomas Hughes.

In form so delicate, so soft his skin,
So fair in feature, and so smooth his chin,
Quite to unman him nothing wants but this;
Put him in coats, and he's a very miss.
—Horace.

A six-foot suckling, mincing in its gait,
Affected, peevish, prim and delicate;
Fearful it seemed, tho' of athletic make,
Lest brutal breezes should so roughly shake
Its tender form, and savage motion spread O'er its pale cheeks, the horrid manly red.
—Churchill.

The all importance of clothes has sprung up in the intellect of the dandy without effort, like an instinct of genius; he is inspired with clothes, a poet of clothes.—Carlyle.

Forbearance

If thou wouldst be borne with bear with others.—Fuller.

Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.—Bible.

The kindest, and the happiest pair
Will find occasion to forbear;
And something every day they live
To pity and perhaps forgive.—Cowper.

Learn from Jesus to love and to forgive. Let the blood of Jesus, which implores pardon for you in heaven, obtain it from you for your brethren here upon earth.—Valpy.

Be to her virtues very kind;
Be to her faults a little blind.
Let all her ways be unconfin'd,
And clap your padlock on her mind.
—Prior.

It is a noble and a great thing to cover the blemishes and to excuse the failings of a friend; to draw a curtain before his stains, and to display his perfections; to bury his weaknesses in silence, but to proclaim his virtues upon the housetop.—South.

Everything has two handles; the one soft and manageable, the other such as will not endure to be touched. If then your brother do you an injury, do not take it by the hot hard handle, by representing to yourself all the aggravating circumstances of the fact; but look rather on the soft side, and extenuate it as much as is possible, by considering the nearness of the relation, and the long friendship and familiarity between you—obligations to kindness which a single provocation ought not to dissolve. And thus you will take the accident by its manageable handle.—Epictetus.

Force

Right reason is stronger than force.
—James A. Garfield.

Gentleness succeeds better than violence.—La Fontaine.

The power that is supported by force alone will have cause often to tremble.—Kossuth.

Force is all-conquering, but its victories are short-lived.—Abraham Lincoln.

That which had no force in the beginning can gain no strength from the lapse of time.—Law Maxim.

Force, force, everywhere force; we ourselves a mysterious force in the center of that. There is not a leaf rotting on the highway but has force in it; how else could it rot?—Carlyle.

It is now as in the days of yore when the sword ruled all things.—Schiller.

Who overcomes by force,
Hath overcome but half his foe.
—Milton.

Force and not opinion is the queen of the world; but it is opinion that uses the force.—Pascal.

Hence it happened that all the armed prophets conquered, all the unarmed perished.—Machiavelli.

Everything is heaving and great events are pending, and it is hard to study Genesis when all is now Revelation.—Dr. M. W. Jacobus.

What otherwise is good and just, if it be aimed at by fraud or violence, becomes evil and unjust.—Law Maxim.

Those glorious days, when man said to man, Let us be brothers, or I will knock you down.—Le Brun.

Forefathers Day

Among the sentiments of most powerful operation upon the human heart, and most highly honorable to the human character, are those of veneration for our forefathers, and of love for our posterity.—John Quincy Adams.

As Mecca is to the Mohammedan and Jerusalem to the Christian, so we make our pilgrimage to-night to Plymouth Rock, hoping that as we lay our tribute upon that hill, we shall gird up our loins to meet the fortunes, the successes, the trials, and the duties that are before us.—Judge Russell.

It was reserved for the first settlers of New England to perform achievements equally arduous, to trample down obstructions equally formidable, to dispel dangers equally terrific, under the single inspiration of conscience.—John Quincy Adams.

No nation since the days of Israel was ever founded with so choice people, selected by the operation of so high and spiritual motives, as those whose vanguard was borne across the sea in the Mayflower. It was truly said of them that "God sifted a whole nation that He might send choice grain into the wilderness."—Rev. H. Wayland.

American history has been too largely written from the English standpoint. Let us divide honors all around and give all of our forefathers their share. England was not the first to lead Europe. It was the Dutch republic that first led Europe.—Judge Russell.

They (the Pilgrims) believed in the existence of right and wrong, and in the infinite supremacy of righteousness. They believed in the intense reality of God and of the unseen and the spiritual; they held that these were the real, and that everything else was the shadow.—Rev. H. Wayland.

Moses and Joshua and Samuel were Puritans in their reverent regard for rigorous righteousness.—Judge Russell.

Poor, but independent, not frilled and powdered, but armed mightily with the sword of the Spirit, and with purpose of freedom pulsating at the very centers of their hearts—these were the men whom God had chosen for the settlement of this land. For a hundred years He had kept the new world waiting until they should be ready to possess it.—Rev. D. J. Burrell, D. D.

Guizot, when he was in exile, asked Mr. Lowell, when he was our minister in London, how long the American union would exist, and Lowell said to him: "It will exist so long as the men of America hold to the fundamental principles of their fathers." Central in these fundamental principles is the determination of fathers and of children that in each day of life the world shall be a better world; that is, in each day of life a man shall live to the glory of God.—Edward Everett Hale.

Why is it that the states lying side by side are not quarreling together as they always do in feudal institutions or in European history? The difference is that the feudal institutions die within fifteen minutes after the immigrant lands in America. The word feudal is a good one, because it describes the eternal war which exists between the men who are educated in that complicated social system of top, bottom, and middle. The feudal system perishes as soon as every man understands that he is his brother's keeper, and in the company of men who know that they live together for the greater glory of God.—Edward Everett Hale.

The theocratic state which the Puritans founded in Massachusetts was not suited to our present civilization, with its representatives of all nations and creeds. But it contained the springs of life which purify our civilization and the seeds of that free government of which our liberty under law is the fairest fruit.—Congregationalist.

But the closer we study their lives, and the better we know their deeds, the more profound is our admiration and the greater our reverence for the Pilgrim fathers. Between the drafting of their immortal charter of liberty in the cabin of the Mayflower and the fruition of their principles in the power and majesty of the republic of the United States of to-day is but a span in the records of the world, and yet it is the most important and beneficent chapter in history. To be able to claim descent from them, either by birth or adoption, is to glory in kinship with God's nobility.—Chauncey Depew.

France lost her Pilgrim element in the expulsion and massacre of the Huguenots, and her noblest political aspirations have lacked the moral strength that comes of a pure and vigorous religious faith. * * * But the men who came hither brought the fundamental conception of man restored as a child of God. Personality was their root idea, the personal soul linked to the personal God; and this was greater than king or parliament, this was greater than church or bishop, and no combination against this could ever crush it.—Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson.

They believed, and truly, that the strength of Romanism in religion, as well as its despotism in politics, lay in the ignorance of the people; and they sought the freedom which is grander than they knew in the education of all the people, while they sought to inculcate a sense of supreme personal obligation to God. Hence came free churches and free schools, the essential elements of the free state. Hence the Puritan aristocracy, not of birth but of character, because the American republic, with vitality to assimilate the incoming multitudes of all nations.—Rev. D. J. Burrell, D. D.

The Pilgrims were right in affirming the paramount authority of the law of God. If they erred in seeking that authoritative law, and passed over the Sermon on the Mount for the stern Hebraisms of Moses; if they hesitated in view of the largeness of Christian liberty; if they seemed unwilling to accept the sweetness and light of the good tidings—let us not forget that it was the mistake of men who feared more than they dared to hope, whose estimate of the exceeding awfulness of sin caused them to dwell upon God's vengeance rather than His compassion; and whose dread of evil was so great that, in shutting their hearts against it, they sometimes shut out the good.—Whittier.

The great west and the awakening south have felt the influence of the same sturdy endurance, enterprise, and resolute faith that drove the famous little company to brave the unknown dangers of a bleak and hostile country. Plymouth, historic and filled with interest as it is, does not, and cannot, hold the full story of the Pilgrims. That story is written in letters of light over the whole continent; all over the country, wherever they have gone, they have carried with them a respect for law, a reverence for God, education and freedom of worship, and a courage to uphold them, that has made this our great nation the "land of the free and the home of the brave." May America, with her churches, her schools, her civil and religious liberty, her great past and her glorious future be truly and forever the "land of the Pilgrims' pride."—Priscilla Leonard.

But while the Jews repudiated the giving of their religion to the nations the Puritans have been and continue to be foremost in giving their gospel to mankind. They sought to serve God with all their hearts, and they believed that in making a nation He could use as freemen only those who sought to serve Him both in their spirit and in their way. But when they could no longer carry out their plan for a nation, they set themselves to maintain in the nation they had planted the ethical impulse which brought them to these shores and controlled their lives.—Congregationalist.

They sailed away from Provincetown Bay
In the fireless light of the sun,
And they came at night to a havened height,
And the journey at last was done.
With rain and sleet were the tall masts iced,

And frosty and dark was the air,
But they looked from the crystal sails to Christ

As they moored in the harbor fair.

The sky was cold and gray,
And there were no ancient bells to ring,
No priests to chant, no choirs to sing,
No chapel of baron, lord or king,
That gray, cold winter day.

—Hezekiah Butterworth.

The revolutions of time furnish no previous example of a nation shooting up to maturity and expanding into greatness with the rapidity which has characterized the growth of the American people. In the luxuriance of youth, and in the vigor of manhood, it is pleasing and instructive to look backwards upon the helpless days of infancy; but in the continual and essential changes of a growing subject the transactions of that early period would soon be obliterated from the memory but for some periodical call of attention to aid the silent records of the historian. Such celebrations arouse and gratify the kindest emotions of the bosom. They are faithful pledges of the respect we bear to the memory of our ancestors and of the tenderness with which we cherish the rising generation. They introduce the sages and heroes of ages past to the notice and emulation of succeeding times; they are at once testimonials of our gratitude, and schools of virtue to our children.—John Quincy Adams.

Shall we be ashamed because our ancestors were trading colonists; because they bought and sold and exchanged the products of the new world for the riches of the old? Nay, rather let us have a care that they have no cause to be ashamed of us. Let us see to it that amid the broadening of our enterprises and the increase of our wealth, we do not lose those principles of uprightness and strict justice and old-fashioned honor which made the merchants of New York and New England respected and renowned. Above all, let us remember with pride and loyalty that we are Americans.—Rev. H. J. Van Dyke.

Thou who didst steer the little Mayflower to her desired haven, bring America to port! Grant that upon this gathering of the people our dear flag may shine with the light of an evangel, pure as the sweet influences of the Pleiades and firm as the bands of Orion. Thou who dost guide Arc-turus, grant that those stars may glow in the coronet of Christ. In the enthusiasm of loyalty to God and serried against the evils and forebodings of the time we will march in the footsteps of a believing ancestry. Let every flag-staff, and belfry, every throbbing dome and thundering cannon, every eloquent orator and voice of multitudes, every prayer of gratitude and every tear of joy, carry the name that is above every name and swear it with a mighty oath: "This God is our God, as He was our fathers' God, and He shall be ours forever and forever."—M. W. Stryker, D. D.

Give a thing time; if it can succeed it is a right thing. Look now at American Saxondom; and at that little fact of the sailing of the Mayflower two hundred years ago * * * ! Were we of open sense as the Greeks were, we had found a poem here; one of nature's own poems, such as she writes in broad facts over great continents. For it was properly the beginning of America. There were straggling settlers in America before, some material as if a body was there; but the soul of it was first this. * * * They thought the earth would yield them food, if they tilled honestly; the everlasting heaven would stretch there, too, overhead; they should be left in peace to prepare for eternity by living well in this world of time, worshipping in what they thought the true, not the idolatrous, way. * * * Hah! these men. I think, had a work! The weak thing, weaker than a child, becomes strong in one day, if it be a true thing. Puritanism was only despicable, laughable then, but nobody can manage to laugh at it now.—Thomas Carlyle.

Not satisfied with great principles, they were avaricious of great achievements. They subdued forests, organized emigration, marched westward under the star of empire. They achieved Louisburg and Concord and Lexington, and Paul Revere's ride and the Charter Oak and Bennington and Gaspee Point, and Harvard and Yale and Bowdoin and Dartmouth. They preserved the union, annihilated slavery, crushed repudiation, made the promises of the nation equal to gold. They have spoken the word of protest and pleading in behalf of the Chinaman and the Indian and the African, in behalf of a reformed civil service, and of honest elections. And where has there been a battle for God and humanity that they and their sons have not been in it?—Rev. H. Wayland, D. D.

With our sympathy for the wrongdoer we need the old Puritan and Quaker hatred of wrongdoing; with our just tolerance of men and opinions a righteous abhorrence of sin. * * * The true life of a nation is in its personal morality, and no excellence of constitution and laws can avail much if the people lack purity and integrity. Culture, art, refinement, care for our own comfort and that of others are well, but truth, honor, reverence, and fidelity to duty are indispensable. * * * It is well for us if we have learned to listen to the sweet persuasion of the Beatitudes, but there are crises in all lives which require also the emphatic "Thou shalt not" of the decalogue which the founders wrote on the gateposts of their commonwealth. * * * The great struggle through which we have passed (the Civil war) has taught us how much we owe to the men and women of the Plymouth colony—the noblest ancestry that ever a people looked back to with love and reverence.—John G. Whittier.

Laugh at their whims and rigid tenets as we may, they have left us a heritage unequalled in the story of the world. Theirs was a mighty struggle for all that may ennoble man or make him better than his fathers were. The hopes and fears of all the ages centered in that shaky ship bound westward on an unknown and tempestuous sea. The spirit of the free was with that little bark, as each day gave its light, the God of the heroic and the true its pilot, when the night came down on the sea. A wild and stormy ride from shore to shore; a fierce and bitter strife with fire and flood, savage and element, their daily portion as they sail and when they rested on the rocky shore they called at last their home. What wonder that they cradled there at once the offspring of their love and the freedom of their kind; what wonder that from their sturdy loins sprang forth a race of giants, fit warriors for the rights of generations yet to be; what wonder that sires and sons have laughed to scorn the fear of tempest or of tyrant in service of their faith through all the years.—David C. Robinson.

Holland's place in history is not fixed by its institutional greatness, but rather by the diffusiveness of the ideas, the spirit, which constitutes its real life. Its part in the making of America is not seen in the separate institutions, civil, educational, religious, which it transplanted, but in the spirit of its scattered people losing everything like organic union, but thereby carrying it into every community and every school and every church the influence of a high ideal of character, a strong sense of human brotherhood, a spirit of conciliation and kindness which is to make it the destiny of Holland to live a still larger life in the America which is to be the strong and helpful neighbor to all the world, hastening the time when all the sons of men shall be the sons of God, and He who "went about doing good" shall be in truth the king of a regenerated humanity, and the whole earth one great neighborhood, where the need of each will be the care of all.—Andrew U. V. Raymond.

But though your forefathers may not have been much, if any, better than yourselves, let us extol them for the fact that they started this country in the right direction. They laid the foundation for American manhood. The foundation must be more solid and firm and unyielding than any other part of the structure. On that Puritanic foundation we can safely build all nationalities. Let us remember that the coming American is to be an admixture of all foreign bloods. In about twenty-five or fifty years the model American will step forth. He will have the strong brain of the German, the polished manners of the French, the artistic taste of the Italian, the stanch heart of the English, the steadfast piety of the Scotch, the lightning wit of the Irish, and when he steps forth, bone, muscle, nerve, brain entwined with the fibers of all the nationalities, the nations will break out in the cry: "Behold the American!" Columbus discovered only the shell of this country. Agassiz came and discovered fossiliferous America. Silliman came and discovered geological America. Audubon came and discovered bird America. Longfellow came and discovered poetic America; and there are a half-dozen other Americas yet to be discovered.—Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D.

A hardy race, worthy to set the pattern of civilization and liberty to the mighty people who to-night affectionately called them "fathers" in blood, in liberty, love and truth. All that nations can owe to founders; all that children can owe to parents; all that truth and self-denial can owe to their especial champions, is laid upon the altar of their memory to-night. Peace to their sacred ashes, those Pilgrim Fathers of our life. Their sacrifices were many and their joys were few. Yet somewhere in the land where faith meets its reward; somewhere in the heaven of the good and pure; somewhere within those temples of magnificent justice where is given alike reward for good and punishment for evil done on earth; somewhere beyond the reach of human toil or strife, those Pilgrim ancestors shall be given meed well-fitted to their high deservings; and

Till the sun grows cold and the stars are old,
And the leaves of the judgment book unfold,

no man among their sons shall feel within his veins the bounding of their consecrating blood without thanks for every drop that links him to their heroic lives.

The breaking waves dashed high
On a stern and rock-bound coast,
And the woods against a stormy sky
Their giant branches tossed,
And the heavy night hung dark
The hills and waters o'er,
When a band of exiles moored their bark
On the wild New England shore.
What sought they thus afar?
Bright jewels of the mine?
The wealth of seas, the spoils of war?
They sought a faith's pure shrine!
Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where first they trod;
They left unstained what there they found—Freedom to worship God.
—Felicia Dorothea Hemans.

Our fathers brought with them from England two priceless possessions—the common law and King James' Bible—the former a vital organism, not of symmetrical form and graceful outline, but full of the vigorous sap of liberty and drawing its growth from the soil of the popular heart; the latter, apart from its transcendent claims as the revelation of God to man, in a purely intellectual aspect the most precious treasure that any modern nation enjoys, preserving as it does our noble language at its best point of growth—just between antique ruggedness and modern refinement—embalming immortal truths in words simple, strong, and sweet, that charm the child at the mother's knee, that nerve and calm the soldier in the dread half hour before the shock of battle, that comfort and sustain the soul that is entering upon the valley of the shadow of death. * * * The progress of our country is not traced by the camp, the café, the theater, and the prison, but by the meeting house, the school house, the court house, and the ballot box—all the legitimate fruits of the Bible and the common law.—Hon. George S. Hillard.

Foresight

To fear the worst, oft cures the worst.—Shakespeare.

Look ere thou leap, see ere thou go.
—Thomas Tusser.

Human foresight often leaves its proudest possessor only a choice of evils.—Colton.

Those old stories of visions and dreams guiding men have their truth; we are saved by making the future present to ourselves.—George Eliot.

It is only the surprise and newness of the thing which makes that misfortune terrible which by premeditation might be made easy to us. For that which some people make light by sufferingance, others do by foresight.—Seneca.

Accustom yourself to submit on all and every occasion, and on the most minute, no less than on the most important circumstances of life, to a small present evil, to obtain a greater distant good. This will give decision, tone, and energy to the mind, which, thus disciplined, will often reap victory from defeat and honor from repulse.—Colton.

That is to be wise to see not merely that which lies before your feet, but to foresee even those things which are in the womb of futurity.—Terence.

Forest

This is the forest primeval.
—Longfellow.

Summer or winter, day or night,
The woods are an ever-new delight;
They give us peace, and they make us strong,

Such wonderful balms to them belong:
So, living or dying, I'll take mine ease
Under the trees, under the trees.

—R. H. Stoddard.

Forethought

In life, as in chess, forethought wins.—Charles Buxton.

Forethought we may have, undoubtedly, but not foresight.—Napoleon I.

If a man take no thought about what is distant, he will find sorrow near at hand.—Confucius.

God will not suffer man to have the knowledge of things to come.—St. Augustine.

Whoever fails to turn aside the ills of life by prudent forethought, must submit to fulfill the course of destiny.
—Schiller.

To have too much forethought is the part of a wretch; to have too little is the part of a fool.—Cecil.

If I foreknew, foreknowledge had no influence on their fault, which had no less proved certain unforeknown.—
Milton.

As a man without forethought scarcely deserves the name of a man, so forethought without reflection is but a metaphorical phrase for the instinct of a beast.—Coleridge.

Forgetfulness

The world forgetting, by the world forgot.—Pope.

Men are men; the best sometimes forget.—Shakespeare.

It is sure the hardest science to forget!—Pope.

Oh, if, in being forgotten, we could only forget.—Lew Wallace.

Forget thyself to marble.—Milton.

And when he is out of sight, quickly also is he out of mind.—Thomas à Kempis.

Quit the world, and the world forgets you.—Beaconsfield.

It is far off; and rather like a dream than an assurance that my remembrance warrants.—Shakespeare.

There is nothing new except what is forgotten.—Mlle. Bertin.

The pyramids themselves, doting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders.—Fuller.

There is no remembrance which time does not obliterate, nor pain which death does not terminate.—Cervantes.

Lethe, the river of oblivion, rolls his watery labyrinth, which whoso drinks forgets both joy and grief.—Milton.

We bury love,
Forgetfulness grows over it like grass;
That is a thing to weep for, not the dead.
—Alexander Smith.

It is sometimes expedient to forget what you know.—Syrus.

When I forget that the stars shine in air—
When I forget that beauty is in stars—
When I forget that love with beauty is—
Will I forget thee: till then all things else.
—Bailey.

Fill with Forgetfulness, fill high! ye stay—
—'Tis from the past we shadow forth the land

Where smiles, long lost, again shall light
our way,
—Though the past haunt me as a spirit—
yet I ask not to forget!

—Mrs. Hemans.

If e'er I win a parting token,
'Tis something that has lost its power—
A chain that has been used and broken,
A ruin'd glove, a faded flower;
Something that makes my pleasure less,
Something that means—forgetfulness.
—Willis.

Some men treat the God of their fathers as they treat their father's friend. They do not deny Him; by no means: they only deny themselves to Him, when He is good enough to call upon them.—J. C. and A. W. Hare

Go, forget me—why should sorrow
O'er that brow a shadow fling?
Go, forget me—and to-morrow
Brightly smile and sweetly sing.
Smile—though I shall not be near thee;
Sing—though I shall never hear thee.
—Charles Wolfe.

Forgotten? No, we never do forget;
We let the years go; wash them clean with
tears,
Leave them to bleach out in the open day,
Or lock them careful by, like dead friends'
clothes,
Till we shall dare unfold them without pain—
But we forget not, never can forget.
—D. M. Mulock.

There is nothing—no, nothing—innocent or good, that dies and is forgotten; let us hold to that faith or none. An infant, a prattling child, dying in the cradle, will live again in the better thoughts of those that loved it, and play its part through them in the redeeming actions of the world, though its body be burnt to ashes or drowned in the deep sea.—Dickens.

Forgiveness

They who forgive most shall be most forgiven.—Bailey.

When women love us they forgive everything.—Balzac.

A coward never forgives.—Sterne.

Write thy wrongs in ashes.—Sir T.
Browne.

Forgive others often, yourself never.
—Syrus.

The brave only know how to forgive.
—Sterne.

Men are less forgiving than women.
—Richardson.

The offender never pardons.—Herbert.

That curse shall be—forgiveness!—
Byron.

She hugged the offender and forgave
the offense—sex to the last!—Dryden.

Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.—
The Lord's Prayer.

We pardon as long as we love.—
Rochefoucauld.

To err is human; to forgive, divine.
—Pope.

Pardon, not wrath, is God's best attribute.—Bayard Taylor.

I pardon him, as God shall pardon me.—Shakespeare.

God pardons like a mother, who kisses the offense into everlasting forgetfulness.—Beecher.

To forgive a fault in another is more sublime than to be faultless one's self.
—George Sand.

Life, that ever needs forgiveness, has, for its first duty, to forgive.—
Lytton.

We may forgive those who bore us,
we cannot forgive those whom we bore.
—La Rochefoucauld.

Never does the human soul appear so strong as when it foregoes revenge, and dares to forgive an injury.—E. H.
Chapin.

The mind that too frequently forgives bad actions will at last forget good ones.—Reynolds.

Good, to forgive;
Best to forget!
—Robert Browning.

As you from crimes would pardon'd be,
Let your indulgence set me free.
—Shakespeare.

It is right for him who asks forgiveness for his offenses to grant it to others.—Horace.

Young men soon give, and soon forget
affronts:
Old age is slow in both. —Addison.

We should always forgive,—the penitent for their sake, the impenitent for our own.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

It is easier to forgive an enemy than a friend.—Mme. Deluzy. .

To bear no malice or hatred in my heart.—Church Catechism.

'Tis easier for the generous to forgive, Than for offence to ask it.—Thomson.

We forgive too little, forget too much.—Mme. Swetchine.

The rarer action is in virtue than in vengeance.—Shakespeare.

The truly great man is as apt to forgive as his power is able to revenge.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is no revenge so complete as forgiveness.—H. W. Shaw.

Forgiveness is commendable, but apply not ointment to the wound of an oppressor.—Saadi.

If we can still love those who have made us suffer, we love them all the more.—Mrs. Jameson.

As nice as we are in love, we forgive more faults in that than in friendship.—Henry Horne.

Only a woman will believe in a man who has once been detected in fraud and falsehood.—Dumas, Père.

Never does the human soul appear so strong as when it foregoes revenge, and dares to forgive an injury.—Chapin.

It is easy enough to forgive your enemies if you have not the means to harm them.—Heinrich Heine.

Yes, we ought to forgive our enemies, but not until they are hanged.—Heinrich Heine.

He that cannot forgive others breaks the bridge over which he must pass himself; for every man has need to be forgiven.—Lord Herbert.

Women do not often have it in their power to give like men, but they forgive like Heaven.—Mme. Necker.

Forgiveness to the injured does belong; but they ne'er pardon, who commit the wrong.—Dryden.

The more we know, the better we forgive; Whoe'er feels deeply, feels for all who live. —Mme. de Staël.

It is necessary to repent for years in order to efface a fault in the eyes of men; a single tear suffices with God.—Chateaubriand.

His heart was as great as the world, but there was no room in it to hold the memory of a wrong.—Emerson.

There is a manner of forgiveness so divine that you are ready to embrace the offender for having called it forth.—Lavater.

Receive no satisfaction for premeditated impertinence; forget it, forgive it, but keep him inexorably at a distance who offered it.—Lavater.

'Tis sweet to stammer one letter of the Eternal's language; on earth it is called forgiveness.—Longfellow.

May I tell you why it seems to me a good thing for us to remember wrong that has been done us? That we may forgive it.—Dickens.

God's way of forgiving is thorough and hearty—both to forgive and to forget; and if thine be not so, thou hast no portion of His.—Leighton.

An old Spanish writer says, "To return evil for good is devilish; to return good for good is human; but to return good for evil is godlike."—Whately.

When a man but half forgives his enemy, it is like leaving a bag of rusty nails to interpose between them.—Latimer.

If you bethink yourself of any crime, unreconciled as yet to heaven and grace, solicit for it straight.—Shakespeare.

If thou wouldst find much favor and peace with God and man, be very low in thine own eyes. Forgive thyself little, and others much.—Leighton.

The narrow soul knows not the god-like glory of forgiving.—Rowe.

If ye forgive men their trespasses, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you.—Bible.

He who has not forgiven an enemy has never yet tasted one of the most sublime enjoyments of life.—Lavater.

We read that we ought to forgive our enemies; but we do not read that we ought to forgive our friends.—Cosmus.

Great souls forgive not injuries till time has put their enemies within their power, that they may show forgiveness is their own.—Dryden.

Humanity is never so beautiful as when praying for forgiveness, or else forgiving another.—Richter.

Thou whom avenging pow'rs obey,
Cancel my debt (too great to pay)
Before the sad accounting day.
—Wentworth Dillon.

God never pardons: the laws of His universe are irrevocable. God always pardons: sense of condemnation is but another word for penitence, and penitence is already new life.—William Smith.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part the kindness should begin on ours.—Tillotson.

More bounteous run rivers when the ice that locked their flow melts into their waters. And when fine natures relent, their kindness is swelled by the thaw.—Bulwer-Lytton.

His great offence is dead,
And deeper than oblivion do we bury
The incensing relics of it.
—Shakespeare.

The world never forgives our talents, our successes, our friends, nor our pleasures. It only forgives our death. Nay, it does not always pardon that.—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

A brave man thinks no one his superior who does him an injury: for he has it then in his power to make himself his superior to the other by forgiveness.—Drummond.

Forgive and forget!—why, the world would be lonely,
The garden a wilderness left to deform,
If the flowers but remember'd the chilling winds only,
And the fields gave no verdure for fear of the storm.
—Charles Swain.

To have the power to forgive,
Is empire and prerogative,
And 'tis in crowns a nobler gem,
To grant a pardon than condemn.
—Butler.

Hath any wronged thee? be bravely revenged; slight it, and the work is begun; forgive it, and it is finished; he is below himself that is not above an injury.—Quarles.

Let us no more contend, nor blame
Each other, blam'd enough elsewhere, but strive
In offices of love, how we may lighten
Each other's burden, in our share of woe.
—Milton.

It is right that man should love those who have offended him. He will do so when he remembers that all men are his relations, and that it is through ignorance and involuntarily that they sin,—and then we all die so soon.—Marcus Aurelius.

The sun should not set upon our anger, neither should he rise upon our confidence. We should forgive freely, but forget rarely. I will not be revenged, and this I owe to my enemy; but I will remember, and this I owe to myself.—Colton.

When thou forgivest,—the man who has pierced thy heart stands to thee in the relation of the sea-worm that perforates the shell of the mussel which straightway closes the wound with a pearl.—Richter.

It is vain for you to expect, it is impudent for you to ask of God forgiveness on your own behalf, if you refuse to exercise this forgiving temper with respect to others.—Hoadley.

"I can forgive, but I cannot forget." Is only another way of saying "I will not forgive." A forgiveness ought to be like a cancelled note, torn in two and burned up, so that it never can be shown against the man.—Beecher.

Of him that hopes to be forgiven it is indispensably required that he forgive. It is, therefore, superfluous to urge any other motive. On this great duty eternity is suspended, and to him that refuses to practise it, the throne of mercy is inaccessible, and the Saviour of the world has been born in vain.—Johnson.

Alas! if my best Friend, who laid down His life for me, were to remember all the instances in which I have neglected Him, and to plead them against me in judgment, where should I hide my guilty head in the day of recompense? I will pray, therefore, for blessings on my friends, even though they cease to be so, and upon my enemies, though they continue such.—Cowper.

The fairest action of our human life

Is scorning to revenge an injury;
For who forgives without a further strife,
His adversary's heart to him doth tie;
And 'tis a firmer conquest, truly said,
To win the heart than overthrow the head.
—Lady Elizabeth Carew.

There is an ugly kind of forgiveness in this world,—a kind of hedgehog forgiveness, shot out like quills. Men take one who has offended, and set him down before the blowpipe of their indignation, and scorch him, and burn his fault into him; and when they have kneaded him sufficiently with their fiery fists, then—they forgive him.—Beecher.

The brave only know how to forgive; it is the most refined and generous pitch of virtue human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions,—cowards have even fought, nay, sometimes even conquered; but a coward never forgave. It is not in his nature; the power of doing it flows only from a strength and greatness of soul, conscious of its own force and security, and above the little temptations of resenting every fruitless attempt to interrupt its happiness.

—Sterne.

The gospel comes to the sinner at once with nothing short of complete forgiveness as the starting point of all his efforts to be holy. It does not say, "Go and sin no more, and I will not condemn thee." It says at once, "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more."—Horatius Bonar.

Behold affronts and indignities which the world thinks it right never to pardon, which the Son of God endures with a divine meekness! Let us cast at the feet of Jesus that false honor, that quick sense of affronts, which exaggerates everything, and pardons nothing, and, above all, that devilish determination in resenting injuries.—Quesnel.

How sure we are of our own forgiveness from God. How certain we are that we are made in His image, when we forgive heartily and out of hand one who has wronged us. Sentimentally we may feel, and lightly we may say, "To err is human, to forgive divine;" but we never taste the nobility and divinity of forgiving till we forgive and know the victory of forgiveness over our sense of being wronged, over mortified pride and wounded sensibilities. Here we are in living touch with Him who treats us as though nothing had happened—who turns His back upon the past, and bids us journey with Him into goodness and gladness, into newness of life.—Maltbie Babcock.

In what a delightful communion with God does that man live who habitually seeketh love! With the same mantle thrown over him from the cross—with the same act of amnesty, by which we hope to be saved—injuries the most provoked, and transgressions the most aggravated, are covered in eternal forgetfulness.—E. L. Magoon.

Formality

Oh, I see thee old and formal, fitted to thy petty part,
With a little hoard of maxims preaching down a daughter's heart!—Tennyson.

Lord Angelo is precise;
Stands at a guard with envy; scarce confesses
That his blood flows, or that his appetite
Is more to bread than stone.

—Shakespeare.

There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do cream and mantle, like a standing pond;
And do a willful stillness entertain,
With purpose to be dressed in an opinion
Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit;
As who should say, I am sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark!

—Shakespeare.

Fortitude

Learn to labor and to wait.—Long-fellow.

Fortitude is a great help in distress.
—Plautus.

Fortitude is the guard and support of the other virtues.—Locke.

He who weighs his burdens, can bear them.—Martial.

Bid that welcome which comes to punish us, and we punish it, seeming to bear it lightly.—Shakespeare.

In struggling with misfortunes lies the true proof of virtue.—Shakespeare.

We men are but poor, weak souls,
after all; women beat us out and out in fortitude.—Charles Buxton.

Where true fortitude dwells, loyalty, bounty, friendship and fidelity may be found.—Gay.

The vulgar refuse or crouch beneath their load; the brave bear theirs without repining.—Mallet.

Gird your hearts with silent fortitude,
Suffering, yet hoping all things.

—Mrs. Hemans.

True fortitude is seen in great exploits, that justice warrants and that wisdom guides.—Addison.

Providence has clearly ordained that the only path fit and salutary for man on earth is the path of persevering fortitude—the unremitting struggle of deliberate self-preparation and humble but active reliance on divine aid.—E.

L. Magoon.

The burden which is well borne becomes light.—Ovid.

'Tis easiest dealing with the firmest mind—
More just when it resists, and, when it yields, more kind.

—Crabbe.

White men should exhibit the same insensibility to moral tortures that red men do to physical torments.—Théophile Gautier.

Though Fortune's malice overthrow my
state,
My mind exceeds the compass of her wheel.

—Shakespeare.

Who fights
With passions and o'ercomes, that man is arm'd
With the best virtue—passive fortitude.

—Webster.

Every man should bear his own grievances rather than detract from the comforts of another.—Cicero.

Fortitude has its extremes as well as the rest of the virtues, and ought, like them, to be always attended by prudence.—Voet.

Brave spirits are a balsam to themselves;
There is a nobleness of mind that heals
Wounds beyond salves.

—Cartwright.

There is a strength of quiet endurance as significant of courage as the most daring feats of prowess.—Tucker-
man.

The fortitude of a Christian consists in patience, not in enterprises which the poets call heroic, and which are commonly the effects of interest, pride and worldly honor.—Dryden.

Fortitude is not the appetite of formidable things, nor inconsult rashness;
but virtue fighting for a truth, derived from knowledge of distinguishing good or bad causes.—Nabb.

The greatest man is he who chooses
the right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from within and without; who is calmest in storms, and whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is the most unflinching.—Channing.

We deem those happy who, from the experience of life, have learned to bear its ills, without being overcome by them.—Juvenal.

True fortitude I take to be the quiet possession of a man's self, and an undisturbed doing his duty, whatever evil besets or danger lies in his way.—Locke.

Blessed are those whose blood and judgment are so well commingled that they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger to sound what stop she please.—Shakespeare.

It is true fortitude to stand firm against All shocks of fate, when cowards faint and die
In fear to suffer more calamity.
—Massinger.

Fortitude is the marshal of thought, the armor of the will, and the fort of reason.—Bacon.

Be not cast down. If ye saw Him who is standing on the shore, holding out His arms to welcome you to land, ye would wade, not only through a sea of wrongs, but through hell itself to be with Him.—Rutherford.

Fortitude implies a firmness and strength of mind that enables us to do and suffer as we ought. It rises upon an opposition, and, like a river, swells the higher for having its course stopped.—Jeremy Collier.

Every man must bear his own burden, and it is a fine thing to see any one trying to do it manfully; carrying his cross bravely, silently, patiently, and in a way which makes you hope that he has taken for his pattern the greatest of all sufferers.—James Hamilton.

The man who is just and resolute will not be moved from his settled purpose, either by the misdirected rage of his fellow citizens, or by the threats of an imperious tyrant.—Horace.

A Christian builds his fortitude on a better foundation than stoicism; he is pleased with everything that happens, because he knows it could not happen unless it first pleased God, and that which pleases Him must be best.—C. C. Colton.

—There is a strength
Deep-bedded in our hearts, of which we reck
But little, till the shafts of heaven have pierced
Its fragile dwelling. Must not earth be rent
Before her gems are found?
—Mrs. Hemans.

Bear your burden manfully. Boys at school, young men who have exchanged boyish liberty for serious business—all who have got a task to do, a work to finish—bear the burden till God gives the signal for repose—till the work is done, and the holiday is fairly earned.—James Hamilton.

It is sufficient to have a simple heart in order to escape the harshness of the age, in order not to fly from the unfortunate; but it is to have some understanding of the imperishable law, to seek them in the forgetfulness against which they dare not complain, to prefer them in their ruin, to admire them in their struggles.—Sénancour.

Existence may be borne, and the deep root Of life and suffering make its firm abode In bare and desolate bosoms: mute The camel labors with the heaviest load. And the wolf dies in silence: Not bestow'd In vain should such examples be; if they, Things of ignoble or of savage mood, Endure and shrink not, we of nobler clay May temper it to bear—it is but for a day.
—Byron.

My sole resources in the path I trod,
Were these—my bark—my sword—my love
—my God.
The last I left in youth—He leaves me
now—
And man but works His will to lay me low.
I have no thought to mock His throne with
prayer,
Wrung from the coward crouching of despair;
It is enough—I breathe—and I can bear.
—Byron.

The bitter dregs of Fortune's cup to drain.—Homer.

The mould of a man's fortune is in his own hands.—Bacon.

It is the fortunate who should extol fortune.—Goethe.

The prudent man really frames his own fortunes for himself.—Plautus.

A just fortune awaits the deserving.—Statius.

The less we deserve good fortune, the more we hope for it.—Molière.

When Fortune means to men most good, She looks upon them with a threatening eye.—Shakespeare.

The good or the bad fortune of men depends not less upon their own dispositions than upon fortune.—La Rochefoucauld.

Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them.—Shakespeare.

Man's fortune is usually changed at once; life is changeable.—Plautus.

Fortune never seems so blind as to those upon whom she confers no favors.—La Rochefoucauld.

Blind fortune pursues inconsiderate rashness.—La Fontaine.

Men are seldom blessed with good fortune and good sense at the same time.—Livy.

Fortune is gentle to the lowly, and heaven strikes the humble with a light hand.—Seneca.

It is doubtful what fortune to-morrow will bring.—Lucretius.

The least reliance can be placed even on the most exalted fortune.—Livy.

Fortune! There is no fortune; all is trial, or punishment, or recompense, or foresight.—Voltaire.

The moderation of fortunate people comes from the calm which good fortune gives to their tempers.—La Rochefoucauld.

If fortune favors you do not be elated; if she frowns do not despond.—Ausonius.

It is fortune, not wisdom, that rules man's life.—Cicero.

The most wretched fortune is safe; for there is no fear of anything worse.—Ovid.

We treat fortune like a mistress—the more she yields, the more we demand.—Mme. Roland.

Fortune molds and circumscribes human affairs as she pleases.—Plautus.

Fortune gives too much to many, enough to none.—Martial.

They make their fortune who are stout and wise.—Tasso.

Men may second fortune, but they cannot thwart her.—Machiavelli.

Fortune does not change men; it only unmasks them.—Mme. Riccoboni.

We make our fortunes, and we call them "fate."—Beaconsfield.

We rise to fortune by successive steps; we descend by only one.—Stanislaus.

We are sure to get the better of fortune if we do but grapple with her.—Seneca.

We do not know what is really good or bad fortune.—Rousseau.

We do not commonly find men of superior sense amongst those of the highest fortune.—Juvenal.

Fortune brings in some boats that are not steered.—Shakespeare.

Many fortunes, like rivers, have a pure source, but grow muddy as they grow large.—J. Petit-Senn.

Those who lament for fortune do not often lament for themselves.—Voltaire.

Fortune is like a market, where many times if you wait a little the price will fall.—Bacon.

Our probity is not less at the mercy of fortune than our property.—Rochefoucauld.

Fortune is the rod of the weak and the staff of the brave.—Lowell.

Fortune is merry,
And in this mood will give us anything.
—Shakespeare.

The good, we do it; the evil, that is fortune; man is always right, and destiny always wrong.—La Fontaine.

Fortune dreads the brave, and is only terrible to the coward.—Seneca.

Whatever fortune has raised to a height, she has raised only that it may fall.—Seneca.

Fortune is like a coquette; if you don't run after her, she will run after you.—H. W. Shaw.

Ill-fortune never crushed that man whom good fortune deceived not.—Ben Jonson.

Fortune is but a synonymous word for nature and necessity.—Bentley.

Fickle Fortune reigns, and, undiscerning, scatters crowns and chains.—Pope.

Fortune, that arrant whore,
Ne'er turns the key to the poor.
—Shakespeare.

Fortune turns everything to the advantage of her favorites.—Rochefoucauld.

Let not one look of Fortune cast you down; she were not Fortune if she did not frown.—Earl of Orrery.

Fortune is like glass; when she shines, she is broken.—Syrus.

Fortune cannot take away what she did not give.—Seneca.

How Fortune piles her sports when she begins to practise them!—Ben Jonson.

Many dream not to find, neither deserve, and yet are steeped in favors.—Shakespeare.

For fortune's wheel is on the turn,
And some go up and some go down.
—Mary F. Tucker.

Receive the gifts of fortune without pride, and part with them without reluctance.—Antoninus.

Dame Nature gave him comeliness and health; and Fortune, for a passport, gave him wealth.—Walter Harte

If a man look sharply and attentively, he shall see Fortune, for, though she be blind, yet she is not invisible.—Bacon.

Fortune makes quick dispatch, and in a day May strip you bare as beggary itself.—Cumberland.

Fortune in men has some small difference made,
One flaunts in rags, one flutters in brocade.—Pope.

Who thinks that Fortune cannot change her mind,
Prepares a dreadful jest for all mankind.—Pope.

Fortune's unjust; she ruins off the brave, and him who should be victor, makes the slave.—Dryden.

Let fortune do her worst, whatever she makes us lose, so long as she never makes us lose our honesty and our independence.—Pope.

It is a madness to make fortune the mistress of events, because in herself she is nothing, but is ruled by prudence.—Dryden.

Men have made of fortune an all-powerful goddess, in order that she may be made responsible for all their blunders.—Mme. de Staël.

Fortune confounds the wise,
And when they least expect it turns the dice.—Dryden.

The Spaniards have a saying that there is no man whom Fortune does not visit at least once in his life.—Ik Marvel.

Since you will buckle fortune on my back,
To bear her burden whe'r I will or no,
I must have patience to endure the load.—Shakespeare.

The power of fortune is confessed only by the miserable; for the happy impute all their successes to prudence and merit.—Swift.

Fortune, to show us her power in all things, and to abate our presumption, seeing she could not make fools wise, has made them fortunate.—Montaigne.

If fortune wishes to make a man estimable she gives him virtues; if she wishes to make him esteemed she gives him success.—Joubert.

Fortune, like a coy mistress, loves to yield her favors, though she makes us wrest them from her.—Bovee.

The old saying is expressed with depth and significance: "On the pinnacle of fortune man does not long stand firm."—Goethe.

Dame Fortune, like most others of the female sex, is generally most indulgent to the nimble-mettled blockheads.—Otway.

Good and bad fortune are found severally to visit those who have the most of the one or the other.—Roche-foucauld.

It is a law of the gods which is never broken, to sell somewhat dearly the great benefits which they confer on us.—Corneille.

Fortune rules in all things, and advances and depresses things more out of her own will than right and justice.—Sallust.

Fortune, my friend, I've often thought
Is weak, if Art assist her not:
So equally all Arts are vain,
If Fortune help them not again.—Sheridan.

The wheel of fortune turns incessantly round, and who can say within himself, I shall to-day be uppermost?—Confucius.

Fortune is ever seen accompanying industry, and is as often trundling in a wheelbarrow as lolling in a coach and six.—Goldsmith.

It is a madness to make fortune the mistress of events, because in herself she is nothing, but is ruled by prudence.—Dryden.

The bad fortune of the good turns their faces up to heaven; and the good fortune of the bad bows their heads down to the earth.—Saadi.

There are some men who are fortune's favorites, and who, like cats, light forever on their legs.—Colton.

The fortunate circumstances of our lives are generally found at last to be of our own producing.—Goldsmith.

Though Fortune's malice overthrow my state, my mind exceeds the compass of her wheel.—Shakespeare.

A broken fortune is like a falling column; the lower it sinks, the greater weight it has to sustain.—Ovid.

Fortune's wings are made of Time's feathers, which stay not whilst one may measure them.—Lilly.

O Fortune, that enviest the brave, what unequal rewards thou bestowest on the righteous!—Seneca.

Fortunes made in no time are like shirts made in no time; it's ten to one if they hang long together.—Douglas Jerrold.

I am amazed how men can call her blind, when, by the company she keeps, she seems so very discriminating.—Goldsmith.

There is nothing which continues longer than a moderate fortune; nothing of which one sees sooner the end than a large fortune.—Bruyère.

He whom fortune has never deceived rarely considers the uncertainty of human events.—Livy.

If a man's fortune does not fit him, it is like the shoe in the story; if too large it trips him up, if too small it pinches him.—Horace.

Luck affects everything; let your hook always be cast; in the stream where you least expect it, there will be a fish.—Ovid.

We should manage our fortune as we do our health—enjoy it when good, be patient when it is bad, and never apply violent remedies except in an extreme necessity.—La Rochefoucauld.

As long as you are fortunate you will have many friends, but if the times become cloudy you will be alone.—Ovid.

Vicissitudes of fortune, which spare neither man nor the proudest of his works, which bury empires and cities in a common grave.—Gibbon.

Let fortune empty her whole quiver on me, I have a soul that, like an ample shield, Can take in all, and verge enough for more.—Dryden.

Adverse fortune seldom spares men of the noblest virtues. No one can with safety expose himself often to dangers. The man who has often escaped is at last caught.—Seneca.

Happy the man who can endure the highest and the lowest fortune. He, who has endured such vicissitudes with equanimity, has deprived misfortune of its power.—Seneca.

Golden palaces break man's rest, and purple robes cause watchful nights. Oh, if the breasts of the rich could be seen into, what terrors high fortune places within!—Seneca.

But assuredly fortune rules in all things; she raises to eminence or buries in oblivion everything from caprice rather than from well-regulated principle.—Sallust.

Whereas they have sacrificed to themselves, they become sacrificers to the inconstancy of fortune, whose wings they thought, by their self-wisdom, to have pinioned.—Bacon.

Many have been ruined by their fortunes; many have escaped ruin by the want of fortune. To obtain it, the great have become little, and the little great.—Zimmermann.

There is some help for all the defects of fortune; for if a man cannot attain to the length of his wishes, he may have his remedy by cutting of them shorter.—Cowley.

It is often the easiest move that completes the game. Fortune is like the lady whom a lover carried off from all his rivals by putting an additional lace upon his liveries.—Bulwer-Lytton.

All our advantages are those of fortune; birth, wealth, health, beauty, are her accidents; and when we cry out against fate, it were well we should remember fortune can take naught save what she gave.—Byron.

It cannot be denied but outward accidents conduce much to fortune's favor,—opportunity, death of others, occasion fitting virtue; but chiefly the mould of a man's fortune is in his own hands.—Bacon.

I have heard Cardinal Imperiali say: "There is no man whom fortune does not visit once in his life; but when she does not find him ready to receive her, she walks in at the door, and flies out at the window."—Montesquieu.

What real good does an addition to a fortune already sufficient procure? Not any. Could the great man, by having his fortune increased, increase also his appetites, then precedence might be attended with real amusement.—Goldsmith.

To be thrown on one's own resources is to be cast on the very lap of fortune; for our faculties undergo a development, and display an energy, of which they were previously unsusceptible.—Franklin.

The fortunate man is he who, born poor or nobody, works gradually up to wealth and consideration, and, having got them, dies before he finds they were not worth so much trouble.—Charles Reade.

The good things of life are not to be had singly, but come to us with a mixture,—like a schoolboy's holiday, with a task affixed to the tail of it.—Lamb.

A fortunate shepherd is nursed in a rude cradle in some wild forest, and, if fortune smile, has risen to empire. That other, swathed in purple by the throne, has at last, if fortune frown, gone to feed the herd.—Metastasio.

Fortune is said to be blind, but her favorites never are. Ambition has the eye of the eagle, prudence that of the lynx; the first looks through the air, the last along the ground.—Bulwer-Lytton.

So is Hope
Changed for Despair—one laid upon the shelf,
We take the other. Under heaven's high cope
Fortune is god—all you endure and do Depends on circumstance as much as you.
—Shelley.

Of, what seems
A trifle, a mere nothing, by itself,
In some nice situation, turns the scale
Of fate, and rules the most important actions.
—Thomson.

If fortune has fairly sat on a man, he takes it for granted that life consists in being sat upon; but to be cod-dled on Fortune's knee, and then have his ears boxed,—that is aggravating.—Charles Buxton.

A man is thirty years old before he has any settled thoughts of his fortune; it is not completed before fifty. He falls to building in his old age, and dies by the time his house is in a condition to be painted and glazed.—Bruyère.

Alas! the joys that fortune brings
Are trifling, and decay,
And those who prize the trifling things,
More trifling still than they.
—Goldsmith.

Fortune, like other females, prefers a lover to a master, and submits with impatience to control; but he that woos her with opportunity and importunity will seldom court her in vain.—Colton.

So quickly sometimes has the wheel turned round that many a man has lived to enjoy the benefit of that charity which his own piety projected.
—Sterne.

The heavens do not send good haps in handfuls; but let us pick out our good by little, and with care, from out much bad, that still our little world may know its king.—Sir P. Sidney.

Fortune has rarely condescended to be the companion of Genius; others find a hundred by-roads to her palace; there is but one open, and that a very indifferent one, for men of letters.—Disraeli.

It is we that are blind, not fortune; because our eye is too dim to discern the mystery of her effects, we foolishly paint her blind, and hoodwink the providence of the Almighty.—Sir Thomas Browne.

In human life there is a constant change of fortune; and it is unreasonable to expect an exemption from the common fate. Life itself decays, and all things are daily changing.—Plutarch.

The old Scythians painted blind fortune's powerful hands with wings, to show her gifts come swift and suddenly, which, if her favorite be not swift to take, he loses them forever.—Chapman.

This is most true, and all history bears testimony to it, that men may second fortune, but they cannot thwart her,—they may weave her web, but they cannot break it.—Machiavelli.

It is with fortune as with fantastical mistresses,—she makes sport with those that are ready to die for her, and throws herself at the feet of others that despise her.—J. Beaumont.

The way of fortune is like the milky way in the sky, which is a meeting or knot of a number of small stars, not seen asunder, but giving light together; so are there a number of little and scarce discerned virtues, or rather faculties and customs, that make men fortunate.—Bacon.

Fortune does us neither good nor hurt; she only presents us the matter, and the seed, which our soul, more powerfully than she, turns and applies as she best pleases; being the sole cause and sovereign mistress of her own happy or unhappy condition.—Montaigne.

Fortune is painted blind in order to show her impartiality; but when she cheers the needy with hope, and depresses the wealthy with distrust, methinks she confers the richest boon on the poorest man, and injures those on whom she bestows her favors.—Chatfield.

Will fortune never come with both hands full,
But write her fair words still in foulest letters?
She either gives a stomach, and no food—
Such as are the poor in health; or else a feast,
And takes away the stomach—such are the rich,
That have abundance, and enjoy it not.
—Shakespeare.

Fortune made up of toys and impudence,
That common judge that has not common sense,
But fond of business insolently dares
Pretend to rule, yet spoils the world's affairs.
—Buckingham.

Fortune, the great commandress of the world,
Hath divers ways t' enrich her followers:
To some she honor gives without deserving;
To other some, deserving without honor;
Some, wit—some, wealth—and some, wit without wealth;
Some, wealth without wit—some, nor wit nor wealth.
—Chapman.

It has been remarked that almost every character which has excited either attention or pity has owed part of its success to merit, and part to a happy concurrence of circumstances in its favor. Had Caesar or Cromwell exchanged countries, the one might have been a sergeant and the other an exciseman.—Goldsmith.

What men usually say of misfortunes, that they never come alone, may with equal truth be said of good fortune; nay, of other circumstances which gather round us in a harmonious way, whether it arise from a kind of fatality, or that man has the power of attracting to himself things that are mutually related.—Goethe.

The Europeans are themselves blind who describe fortune without sight. No first-rate beauty ever had finer eyes, or saw more clearly. They who have no other trade but seeking their fortune need never hope to find her; coquette-like, she flies from her close pursuers, and at last fixes on the plodding mechanic who stays at home and minds his business.—Goldsmith.

To catch Dame Fortune's golden smile,
Assiduous wait upon her;
And gather gear by every wile
That's justified by honor.
Not for to hide it in a hedge,
Nor for a train attendant;
But for the glorious privilege
Of being independent. —Burns.

In losing fortune many a lucky elf
Has found himself.
As all our moral bitters are design'd
To brace the mind,
And renovate its healthy tone, the wise
Their sorest trials hail as blessings in disguise. —Horace Smith.

Fortunes are made, if I the facts may state—
Though poor myself, I know the fortunate:
First, there's a knowledge of the way from whence
Good fortune comes—and this is sterling sense:
Then perseverance, never to decline
The chase of riches till the prey is thine;
And firmness never to be drawn away
By any passion from that noble prey—
By love, ambition, study, travel, fame,
Or the vain hope that lives upon a name. —Crabbe.

Frailty

Man is frail, and prone to evil.—
Jeremy Taylor.

Man with frailty is allied by birth.—
Bishop Lowth.

Frailty, thy name is woman!—
Shakespeare.

Fine by defect, and delicately weak.—
Pope.

Love has a tide.—Helen Hunt.

Great for good, or great for evil.—
Burns.

Unthought-of frailties cheat us in the wise.—Pope.

The French have a significant saying, that a woman who buys her complexion will sell it.—Tuckerman.

A woman filled with faith in the one she loves is the creation of a novelist's imagination.—Balzac.

Universal love is a glove without fingers, which fits all hands alike, and none closely.—Richter.

What is man's love? His vows are broke even while his parting kiss is warm.—Halleck.

All men are frail; but thou shouldst reckon none so frail as thyself.—
Thomas à Kempis.

This is the porcelain clay of human kind.—Dryden.

Alas! our frailty is the cause, not we;
For, such as we are made of, such we be. —Shakespeare.

Court a mistress, she denies you;
let her alone, she will court you.—
Ben Jonson.

Sometimes we are devils to ourselves,
When we will tempt the frailty of our powers,
Presuming on their changeful potency. —Shakespeare.

Weep no more, lady, weep no more,
Thy sorrow is in vain;
For violets plucked, the sweetest showers
Will ne'er make grow again. —Percy.

The summer's flower is to the summer sweet,
Though to itself it only live and die;
But if that flower with base infection meet,
The basest weed outbraves its dignity:
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds;
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds. —Shakespeare.

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy,
What art can wash her guilt away?—
The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To give repentance to her lover,
And wring his bosom—is to die. —Goldsmith.

When with care we have raised an imaginary treasure of happiness, we find at last that the materials of the structure are frail and perishing, and the foundation itself is laid in the sand.—Rogers.

Glass antique! 'twixt thee and Nell
Draw we here a parallel.
She, like thee, was forced to bear
All reflections, foul or fair.
Thou art deep and bright within—
Depths as bright belong'd to Gwynne;
Thou art very frail as well,
Frail as flesh is—so was Nell.
—L. Blanchard.

France

A monarchy tempered by songs.—
Chamfort.

Decayed in thy glory and sunk in thy worth.—Byron.

France is a dog-hole, and it no more merits the tread of a man's foot.—
Shakespeare.

Studious to please, and ready to submit; the supple Gaul was born a parasite.—Johnson.

Gay, sprightly land of mirth and social ease,
Pleased with thyself, whom all the world can please. —Goldsmith.

'Tis better using France than trusting
France;
Let us be back'd with God, and with the seas,
Which He hath given for fence impregnable,
And with their helps only defend ourselves;
In them, and in ourselves, our safety lies.
—Shakespeare.

Frankness

He speaks home; you may relish him more in the soldier than in the scholar.—Shakespeare.

He that openly tells his friends all that he thinks of them, must expect that they will secretly tell his enemies much that they do not think of him.—
Colton.

It is wrong to believe that frank sentiments and the candor of the mind are the exclusive share of the young;
they ornament oftentimes old age, upon which they seem to spread a chaste reflection of the modest graces of their younger days, where they shine with the same brightness as those flowers which are often seen peeping, fresh and laughing, from among ruins.—Poincelot.

Fraud

The first and worst of all frauds is to cheat one's self.—Bailey.

His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth.—Shakespeare.

Some cursed fraud
Of enemy hath beguiled thee, yet unknown,
And me with thee hath ruined.—Milton.

So glistered the dire Snake, and into fraud
Led Eve, our credulous mother, to the Tree
Of Prohibition, root of all our woe.
—Milton.

Though fraud in all other actions be odious, yet in matters of war it is laudable and glorious, and he who overcomes his enemies by stratagem is as much to be praised as he who overcomes them by force.—Machiavelli.

Freedom

The cause of freedom is the cause of God.—Bowles.

Freedom is only in the land of dreams.—Schiller.

The man is free who is protected from injury.—Daniel Webster.

Freedom is a new religion, the religion of our time.—Heine.

Free soil, free men, free speech, Fremont.—Republican Rallying Cry.
1856.

Freedom is not caprice, but room to enlarge.—C. A. Bartol.

Void of freedom, what would virtue be?—Lamartine.

A bird in a cage is not half a bird.
—Beecher.

Knowledge is essential to freedom.
—William Ellery Channing.

O freedom, first delight of human kind!—Dryden.

The cry of the soul is for freedom.
It longs for liberty, from the date of its first conscious moments.—J. G. Holland.

Is it worth the name of freedom to be at liberty to play the fool?—Locke.

Merely to breathe freely does not mean to live.—Goethe.

Freedom's soil hath only place
For a free and fearless race!
—Whittier.

Is any man free except the one who can pass his life as he pleases?—Persius.

Man is created free, and is free, even though born in chains.—Schiller.

Liberty is given by nature even to mute animals.—Tacitus.

That is true liberty which bears a pure and firm breast.—Ennius.

Oh, only a free soul will never grow old!
—Jean Paul Richter.

In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve.—Abraham Lincoln.

Slow are the steps of freedom, but her feet turn never backward.—Lowell.

All special charters of freedom must be abrogated where the universal law of freedom is to flourish.—Heine.

The greatest glory of a free-born people, is to transmit that freedom to their children.
—Havard.

The recovery of freedom is so splendid a thing that we must not shun even death when seeking to recover it.—Cicero.

I intend no modification of my oft-expressed wish that all men everywhere could be free.—Abraham Lincoln.

Nations grow corrupt, love bondage more than liberty; bondage with ease than strenuous liberty.—Milton.

Countries are well cultivated, not as they are fertile, but as they are free.—Montesquieu.

Hope for a season bade the world farewell, and Freedom shrieked as Kosciusko fell.—Campbell.

The whole freedom of man consists either in spiritual or civil liberty.—Milton.

Personal liberty is the paramount essential to human dignity and human happiness.—Bulwer-Lytton.

And ne'er shall the sons of Columbia be slaves,
While the earth bears a plant, or the sea rolls its waves. —Robert Treat Paine.

The man who seeks freedom for anything but freedom's self is made to be a slave.—De Tocqueville.

No, Freedom has a thousand charms to show,
That slaves, howe'er contented, never know.
—Cowper.

A day, an hour of virtuous liberty,
Is worth a whole eternity of bondage.
—Addison.

The only freedom worth possessing is that which gives enlargement to a people's energy, intellect and virtues.
—Channing.

As freedom is the only safeguard of governments, so are order and moderation generally necessary to preserve freedom.—Macaulay.

For Freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeath'd by bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft is ever won.
—Byron.

Service cannot be expected from a friend in service; let him be a free-man who wishes to be my master.—Martial.

And lo! the fullness of the time has come,
And over all the exile's western home,
From sea to sea the flowers of freedom bloom!
—Whittier.

Freedom and slavery, the one is the name of virtue, and the other of vice.

and both are acts of the will.—Epicurus.

We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
That Shakespeare spake; the faith and morals hold
Which Milton held! —Wordsworth.

'Tis liberty alone that gives the flowers
Of fleeting life their luster and perfume.
And we are weeds without it.—Cowper.

There are two freedoms—the false, where a man is free to do what he likes; the true, where a man is free to do what he ought.—Charles Kingsley.

We do not know of how much a man is capable if he has the will, and to what point he will raise himself if he feels free.—J. von Müller.

Freedom is the ferment of freedom.
The moistened sponge drinks up water greedily; the dry one sheds it.—
Holmes.

Know ye not who would be free themselves must strike the blow? by their right arms the conquest must be wrought?—Byron.

In a free country there is much clamor, with little suffering; in a despotic state there is little complaint, with much grievance.—Carnot.

To prove that the Americans ought not to be free, we are obliged to deprecate the value of freedom itself.
—Burke.

Men are qualified for civil liberty in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites.—Burke.

Freedom may come quickly in robes of peace, or after ages of conflict and war; but come it will, and abide it will, so long as the principles by which it was acquired are held sacred.—Edward Everett.

By the laws of God, of nature, of nations, and of your country you are and ought to be as free a people as your brethren in England.—Swift.

I always had an aversion to your apostles of freedom; each but sought for himself freedom to do what he liked.—Goethe.

I am as free as nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran.
—Dryden.

Freedom in a democracy is the glory of the state, and, therefore, in a democracy only will the freeman of nature deign to dwell.—Plato.

Freedom needs all her poets; it is they
Who give her aspirations wings,
And to the wiser law of music sway
Her wild imaginings. —Lowell.

My angel—his name is Freedom—
Choose him to be your king;
He shall cut pathways east and west,
And fend you with his wing.
—Emerson.

When Freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there.
—Joseph Rodman Drake.

How does the meadow flower its bloom unfold?
Because the lovely little flower is free
Down to its root, and in that freedom, bold. —Wordsworth.

Better to dwell in freedom's hall,
With a cold damp floor and mouldering
wall,
Than bow the head and bend the knee
In the proudest palace of slavery.
—Moore.

To have freedom is only to have that which is absolutely necessary to enable us to be what we ought to be,
and to possess what we ought to possess.—Rahel.

The cause of freedom is identified with the destinies of humanity, and in whatever part of the world it gains ground by and by, it will be a common gain to all those who desire it.—
Kossuth.

Blandishments will not fascinate us,
nor will threats of a "halter" intimidate. For, under God, we are deter-mind that, wheresoever, whensoever, or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die freemen.—

Josiah Quincy.

That man is deceived who thinks it slavery to live under an excellent prince. Never does liberty appear in a more gracious form than under a pious king.—Claudianus.

Easier were it
To hurl the rooted mountain from its base,
Than force the yoke of slavery upon men
Determin'd to be free. —Southey.

He was the freeman whom the truth made
free;
Who first of all, the bands of Satan broke;
Who broke the bands of sin, and for his
soul,
In spite of fools consulted seriously.
—Pollok.

Whatever natural right men may have to freedom and independency, it is manifest that some men have a natural ascendancy over others.—Lord Greville.

Oh, Liberty! thou goddess heavenly bright!
Profuse of bliss, and pregnant with delight!
Eternal pleasures in thy presence reign,
And smiling plenty leads thy wanton train.
—Addison.

In the long vista of the years to roll,
Let me not see my country's honor fade;
Oh! let me see our land retain its soul
Her pride in Freedom, and not Freedom's shade. —Keats.

The only freedom which deserves the name is that of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it.—John Stuart Mill.

Progress, the growth of power, is the end and boon of liberty; and, without this, a people may have the name, but want the substance and spirit of freedom.—Channing.

England may as well dam up the waters of the Nile, with bulrushes as to fetter the step of freedom, more proud and firm in this youthful land than where she treads the sequestered glens of Scotland, or couches herself among the magnificent mountains of Switzerland.—Lydia Maria Child.

The water-lily, in the midst of waters, opens its leaves and expands its petals, at the first pattering of the shower, and rejoices in the rain-drops with a quicker sympathy than the packed shrubs in the sandy desert.—
Coleridge.

Yes! to this thought I hold with firm persistence;
The last result of wisdom stamps it true;
He only earns his freedom and existence
Who daily conquers them anew.
—Goethe.

Here the free spirit of mankind, at length, Throws its last fetters off; and who shall place
A limit to the giant's unchained strength,
Or curb his swiftness in the forward race? —Bryant.

Freedom is alone the unoriginated birthright of man; it belongs to him by force of his humanity, and is in dependence on the will and coaction of every other, in so far as this consists with every other person's freedom.—Kant.

The moment men obtain perfect freedom, that moment they erect a stage for the manifestation of their faults. The strong characters begin to go wrong by excess of energy; the weak by remissness of action.—
Goethe.

The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone
I dream'd that Greece might still be free.
For standing on the Persians' grave
I could not deem myself a slave.
—Byron.

Many politicians are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition that no people ought to be free till they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story who resolved not to go into the water till he had learned to swim.—Macaulay.

The sea, as well as the air, is a free and common thing to all; and a particular nation cannot pretend to have the right to the exclusion of all others, without violating the rights of nature and public usage.—Queen Elizabeth.

In a free country every man thinks he has a concern in all public matters,—that he has a right to form and a right to deliver an opinion on them. This it is that fills countries with men of ability in all stations.—Burke.

We grant no dukedoms to the few,
We hold like rights and shall;
Equal on Sunday in the pew,
On Monday in the mall.
For what avail the plough or sail,
Or land, or life, if freedom fail?
—Emerson.

When freedom, on her natal day,
Within her war-rock'd cradle lay,
An iron race around her stood,
Baptiz'd her infant brow in blood,
And through the storm that round her swept,
Their constant ward and watching kept.
—Whittier.

Oh; not yet
May'st thou unbrace thy corslet, nor lay by Thy sword, nor yet, O Freedom! close thy lids
In slumber; for thine enemy never sleeps.
And thou must watch and combat, till the day
Of the new earth and heaven.—Bryant.

Stranger, new flowers in our vales are seen,
With a dazzling eye, and a lovely green.—
They scent the breath of the dewy morn:
They feed no worm, and they hide no
thorn,
But revel and glow in our balmy air;
They are flowers which Freedom hath planted there. —Mrs. Sigourney.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures
you and me;
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
While God is marching on.
—Julia Ward Howe.

The slave will be free. Democracy in America will yet be a glorious reality; and when the top-stone of that temple of freedom which our fathers left unfinished shall be brought forth with shoutings and cries of grace unto it, when our now drooping Liberty lifts up her head and prospers, happy will he be who can say, with John Milton, "Among those who have something more than wished her welfare,

I, too, have my charter and freehold of rejoicing to me and my heirs."—
Whittier.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.
—Richard Lovelace.

Who then is free?—the wise, who well maintains
An empire o'er himself; whom neither chains,
Nor want, nor death, with slavish fear inspire;
Who boldly answers to his warm desire;
Who can ambition's vainest gifts despise;
Firm in himself, who on himself relies;
Polish'd and round, who runs his proper course,
And breaks misfortune with superior force.
—Horace.

Oh, Freedom! thou art not, as poets dream,
A fair young girl, with light and delicate limbs,
And wavy tresses gushing from the cap
With which the Roman master crowned his slave
When he took off the gyves. A bearded
man
Armed to the teeth, art thou; one mail'd hand
Grasps the broad shield, and one the sword; thy brow,
Glorious in beauty though it be, is scarred
With tokens of old wars.
—William Cullen Bryant.

They never fail who die
In a great cause: the block may seak their gore,
Their heads may sodden in the sun; their
limbs
Be strung to city gates and castle walls;—
But still their spirit walks abroad. Though years
Elapse, and others share as dark a doom,
They but augment the deep and sweeping thoughts
Which overpower all others, and conduct
The world at last to freedom. —Byron.

The man who stands upon his own soil, who feels, by the laws of the land in which he lives,—by the laws of civilized nations,—he is the rightful and exclusive owner of the land which he tills, is, by the constitution of our nature, under a wholesome influence, not easily imbibed from any other source.—Edward Everett.

We hail the return of the day of thy birth, Fair Columbial washed by the waves of two oceans—

Where men from the farthest dominions of earth

Rear altars to Freedom, and pay their devotions;

Where our fathers in fight, nobly strove for the Right,

Struck down their fierce foemen, or put them to flight;

Through the long lapse of ages, that so there might be

An asylum for all in the Land of the Free.
—Abraham Coles.

Freedom all winged expands,
Nor perches in a narrow place;
Her broad van seeks unplanted lands;
She loves a poor and virtuous race.
Clinging to a colder zone
Whose dark sky sheds the snow-flake down,
The snow-flake is her banner's star,
Her stripes the boreal streamers are.
Long she loved the Northman well;
Now the iron age is done,
She will not refuse to dwell
With the offspring of the Sun.
—Emerson.

What art thou Freedom? Oh, could slaves
Answer from their living graves
This demand, tyrants would flee
Like a dim dream's imagery!
Thou art Justice—ne'er for gold
May thy righteous laws be sold,
As laws are in England: thou
Shield'st alike high and low.
Thou art Peace—never by thee
Would blood and treasure wasted be
As tyrants wasted them when all
Leagued to quench thy flame in Gaul!
Thou art love: the rich have kist
Thy feet and like him following Christ
Given their substance to be free
And through the world have followed thee.
—Shelley.

Oh, joy to the world! the hour is come,
When the nations to freedom awake,
When the royalists stand agape and dumb,
And monarchs with terror shake!
Over the walls of majesty
"Upharsin" is writ in words of fire,
And the eyes of the bondsman, wherever they be
Are lit with wild desire.
Soon shall the thrones that blot the world,
Like the Orleans, into the dust be hurl'd,
And the word roll on like a hurricane's breath,
Till the farthest slave hears what it saith—
Arise, arise, be free!
—T. Buchanan Read.

There is what I call the American idea. * * * This idea demands, as the proximate organization thereof,
a democracy; that is, a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people; of course, a government of the principles of eternal justice, the unchanging law of God: for shortness' sake I will call it the idea of freedom.—Theodore Parker.

Free Speech

There is tonic in the things that men do not love to hear; and there is damnation in the things that wicked men love to hear. Free speech is to a great people what winds are to oceans and malarial regions, which waft away the elements of disease, and bring new elements of health.
And where free speech is stopped miasma is bred, and death comes fast.
—Beecher.

Fretting

Most men call fretting a minor fault, a foible, and not a vice. There is no vice except drunkenness which can so utterly destroy the peace, the happiness of a home.—Mrs. H. F.
Jackson.

However nervous, depressed, and despairing may be the tone of any one, the Lord leaves him no excuse for fretting; for there is enough in God's promise to overbalance all these natural difficulties. In the measure in which the Christian enjoys his privileges, rises above the things that are seen, hides himself in the refuge provided for him, will he be able to voice the confession of Paul, and say,
"None of these things move me."—
S. H. Tyng, Jr.

Friendless

Deserted at his utmost need,
By those his former bounty fed;
On the bare earth exposed he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.
—Dryden.

Friends

A friend may well be reckoned the masterpiece of nature.—Emerson.

A true friend is one soul in two bodies.—Aristotle.

Oblige a friend.—Stobæus.

Of friends, however humble, scorn not one.—Wordsworth.

Friends are ourselves.—John Donne.

Have no friends not equal to yourself.—Confucius.

The way to gain a friend is to be one.—Michelet.

Make friends of the wise.—Stobæus.

Make friends of equals.—Stobæus.

The greatest medicine is a true friend.—Sir W. Temple.

My friends! There are no friends!—Aristotle.

A friend to everybody is a friend to nobody.—Spanish Proverb.

A true friend is forever a friend.—George MacDonald.

He who reckons ten friends has not one.—Malesherbes.

Men make the best friends.—La Bruyère.

The wretched have no friends.—Dryden.

Amongst true friends there is no fear of losing anything.—Jeremy Taylor.

A friend must not be injured, even in jest.—Syrus.

It is a friendly heart that has plenty of friends.—Thackeray.

Save, oh! save me from the candid friend.—George Canning.

A man dies as often as he loses his friends.—Bacon.

To lose a friend is the greatest of all losses.—Syrus.

A friend is worth all hazards we can run.—Young.

Friends are to incite one another to God's works.—William Ellery Channing.

Be slow in choosing a friend, slower in changing.—Benjamin Franklin.

For his friend is another self.—Aristotle.

A book is a friend that never deceives.—Guilbert De Pixérécourt.

Virtuous men alone possess friends.—Voltaire.

He who hath many friends, hath none.—Aristotle.

Oh, be my friend, and teach me to be thine!—Emerson.

To God, thy country, and thy friend be true.—Vaughan.

Women, like princes, find few real friends.—Lord Lytton.

Nature teaches beasts to know their friends.—Shakespeare.

Friend more divine than all divinities.—George Eliot.

Kiss and be friends.—Farquhar.

True friends have no solitary joy or sorrow.—William Ellery Channing.

A constant friend is a thing rare and hard to find.—Plutarch.

No friend's a friend till he shall prove a friend.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Have friends, not for the sake of receiving, but of giving.—Joseph Roux.

Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not.—Bible.

Keep thy friend under thy own life's key.—Shakespeare.

A man cannot be said to succeed in this life who does not satisfy one friend.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Between friends, frequent reproofs make the friendship distant.—Confucius.

My joy in friends, those sacred people, is my consolation.—Emerson.

A friend should bear his friend's infirmities.—Shakespeare.

Be kind to my remains; and O defend Against your judgment, your departed friend.
—Dryden.

I have loved my friends as I do virtue, my soul, my God.—Sir
Thomas Browne.

Where you have friends you should not go to inns.—George Eliot.

I have myself to respect, but to myself I am not amiable; but my friend is my amiableness personified.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Defend me from my friends; I can defend myself from my enemies.—The French Ana.

The fallying out of faithful friends is the renyung of love.—Richard Edwards.

A foe to God was ne'er true friend to man,
Some sinister intent taints all he does.
—Young.

'Tis thus that on the choice of friends
Our good or evil name depends.
—Gay.

Nothing makes the earth seem so spacious as to have friends at a distance; they make the latitudes and longitudes.—Henry D. Thoreau.

We have been friends together
In sunshine and in shade.
—Caroline E. S. Norton.

Eternal blessings crown my earliest friend,
And round his dwelling guardian saints attend.
—Goldsmith.

Old friends are best. King James used to call for his old shoes. They were easiest for his feet.—John Selden.

May I never sit on a tribunal where my friends shall not find more favor

from me than strangers.—Themistocles.

Friendship is the ideal; friends are the reality; reality always remains far apart from the ideal.—Joseph Roux.

Nothing endears so much a friend as sorrow for his death. The pleasure of his company has not so powerful an influence.—Hume.

A day for toil, an hour for sport,
But for a friend is life too short.
—Emerson.

Two persons will not be friends long if they cannot forgive each other little failings.—La Bruyere.

It is good to have friends at court.—
Charles Lamb.

A friend should be like money, tried before being required, not found faulty in our need.—Plutarch.

Know this, that he that is a friend of himself is a friend to all men.—
Seneca.

Animals are such agreeable friends —they ask no questions. They pass no criticisms.—George Eliot.

My designs and labors
And aspirations are my only friends.
—Longfellow.

He is a friend who, in dubious circumstances, aids in deeds when deeds are necessary.—Plautus.

The wound is for you, but the pain is for me.—Charles IX.

For to cast away a virtuous friend,
I call as bad as to cast away one's own life, which one loves best.— Sophocles.

'Tis something to be willing to commend;
But my best praise is, that I am your friend.
—Southerne.

When our friends are present we ought to treat them well; and when they are absent, to speak of them well.—Epictetus.

Our most intimate friend is not he to whom we show the worst, but the best of our nature.—Hawthorne.

Choose a good disagreeable friend, if you be wise—a surly, steady, economical, rigid fellow.—Thackeray.

Friends are rare, for the good reason that men are not common.—Joseph Roux.

A friend that you have to buy won't be worth what you pay for him, no matter what that may be.—George D. Prentice.

There are three faithful friends—an old wife, an old dog, and ready money.—Benjamin Franklin.

He that will lose his friend for a jest deserves to die a beggar by the bargain.—Thomas Fuller.

He will never have true friends who is afraid of making enemies.—Hazlitt.

If we are long absent from our friends, we forget them; if we are constantly with them, we despise them.—Hazlitt.

It is better to make friends than adversaries of a conquered race.—B. R. Haydon.

Promises may get friends, but it is performance that must nurse and keep them.—Owen Feltham.

Take the advice of a faithful friend, and submit thy inventions to his censure.—Thomas Fuller.

It is virtue which should determine us in the choice of our friends, without inquiring into their good or evil fortune.—La Bruyère.

Poor is the friendless master of a world: A world in purchase for a friend is gain.—Dr. Young.

There is nothing more friendly than a friend in need.—Plautus.

A faithful friend is the true image of the Deity.—Napoleon.

Chance makes our parents, but choice makes our friends.—Delille.

Friends I have made, whom envy must commend,
But not one foe whom I would wish a friend.—Churchill.

A friend loveth at all times; and a brother is born for adversity.—Bible.

The ornaments of a home are the friends who frequent it.—Emerson.

No better relation than a prudent and faithful friend.—Franklin.

O friend! O best of friends! Thy absence ^{more}
Than the impending night darkens the landscape o'er.—Longfellow.

Those who want friends to open themselves unto are cannibals of their own hearts.—Bacon.

From the loss of our friends teach us how to enjoy and improve those who remain.—William Ellery Channing.

Trust not yourself; but your defects to know,
Make use of ev'ry friend—and ev'ry foe.—Pope.

The difficulty is not so great to die for a friend as to find a friend worth dying for.—Henry Home.

Nothing shows one who his friends are like prosperity and ripe fruit.—C. D. Warner.

A friend gives himself to his beloved, and the higher his excellence the richer the gift.—William Ellery Channing.

He who has ceased to enjoy his friend's superiority has ceased to love him.—Madame Swetchine.

We want but two or three friends, but these we cannot do without, and they serve us in every thought we think.—Emerson.

Purchase no friends by gifts; when thou ceasest to give such will cease to love.—Fuller.

Summer friends vanish when the cask is drained to the dregs.—Horatius.

In prosperity it is very easy to find a friend; but in adversity it is the most difficult of all things.—Epictetus.

There have been fewer friends on earth than kings.—Cowley.

Friends, those relations that one makes for one's self.—Deschamps.

Every friend is to the other a sun, and a sunflower also. He attracts and follows.—Richter.

True friends appear less moved than counterfeit.—Roscommon.

Talking with a friend is nothing else but thinking aloud.—Addison.

We want our friend as a man of talent, less because he has talent than because he is our friend.—Joseph Roux.

The genius of life is friendly to the noble, and, in the dark, brings them friends from far.—Emerson.

Some dire misfortune to portend, no enemy can match a friend.—Swift.

Chide a friend in private and praise him in public.—Solon.

Our friends interpret the world and ourselves to us, if we take them tenderly and truly.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Costly followers are not to be liked, lest while a man maketh his train longer, he make his wings shorter.—Bacon.

Friends are much better tried in bad fortune than in good.—Aristotle.

There is no man so friendless but what he can find a friend sincere enough to tell him disagreeable truths.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Friends are the thermometers by which we may judge the temperature of our fortunes.—Lady Blessington.

Friends are the leaders of the bosom, being more ourselves than we are, and we complement our affections in theirs.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The beloved friend does not fill one part of the soul, but, penetrating the whole, becomes connected with all feeling.—William Ellery Channing.

He casts off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew, when he pleased, he could whistle them back. —Goldsmith.

A faithful friend is better than gold—a medicine for misery, an only possession.—Burton.

The loss of a friend is like that of a limb. Time may heal the anguish of the wound, but the loss cannot be repaired.—Southey.

False friends are like our shadow, keeping close to us while we walk in the sunshine, but leaving us the instant we cross into the shade.—Bovee.

Whatever the number of a man's friends, there will be times in his life when he has one too few.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.—Bible.

He is happy that hath a true friend at his need; but he is more truly happy that hath no need of his friend.—Warwick.

Friends are often chosen for similitude of manners, and therefore each palliates the other's failings because they are his own.—Dr. Johnson.

We must love our friends as true amateurs love paintings: they have their eyes perpetually fixed on the fine parts, and see no others.—Mme. d'Epinay.

Friends should be weighed, not told; who boasts to have won a multitude of friends has never had one.—Colesridge.

Nothing is more dangerous than a friend without discretion; even a prudent enemy is preferable.—La Fontaine.

We never know the true value of friends. While they live we are too sensitive of their faults; when we have lost them we only see their virtues.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Thou dost conspire against thy friend, Iago, if thou but think'st him wronged, and mak'st his ear a stranger to thy thoughts.—Shakespeare.

Among real friends there is no rivalry or jealousy of one another, but they are satisfied and contented alike whether they are equal or one of them is superior.—Plutarch.

Sometimes we lose friends for whose loss our regret is greater than our grief, and others for whom our grief is greater than our regret.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is hard to dispraise those who are dispraised by others. He is little short of a hero who perseveres in thinking well of a friend who has become a butt for slander, and a by-word.—Hazlitt.

'Twas sung, how they were lovely in their lives,
And in their deaths had not divided been.
—Campbell.

"Necessarius," the friend, the man who is necessary. * * * A deep word, an ingenious word, a touching word. When will it be French?—Joseph Roux.

Sweet is the memory of distant friends! Like the mellow rays of the departing sun, It falls tenderly, yet sadly, on the heart.
—Washington Irving.

The man abandoned by his friends, one after another, without just cause, will acquire the reputation of being hard to please, changeable, ungrateful, unsocial.—Joseph Roux.

Take heed of a speedy professing friend; love is never lasting which flames before it burns.—Feltham.

When we exaggerate the tenderness of our friends towards us, it is often less from gratitude than from a desire to exhibit our own merit.—La Rochefoucauld.

The poor make no new friends;
But oh, they love the better still
The few our Father sends.
—Lady Dufferin.

One faithful friend is enough for a man's self; 'tis much to meet with such an one, yet we can't have too many for the sake of others.—De La Bruyère.

He that doth a base thing in zeal for his friend burns the golden thread that ties their hearts together.—Jeremy Taylor.

Alas! to-day I would give everything
To see a friend's face, or hear a voice
That had the slightest tone of comfort in it.
—Longfellow.

Real friends are our greatest joy and our greatest sorrow. It were almost to be wished that all true and faithful friends should expire on the same day.—Fénelon.

True friends visit us in prosperity only when invited, but in adversity they come without invitation.—Theophrastus.

To wail friends lost
Is not by much so wholesome—profitable.
As to rejoice at friends but newly found.
—Shakespeare.

Real friendship is a slow grower; and never thrives unless engrafted upon a stock of known and reciprocal merit.—Chesterfield.

It is easy to say how we love new friends, and what we think of them, but words can never trace out all the fibers that knit us to the old.—George Eliot.

Then came your new friend: you began to change—
I saw it and grieved.
—Tennyson.

They who dare to ask anything of a friend, by their very request seem to imply that they would do anything for the sake of that friend.—Cicero.

The place where two friends first met is sacred to them all through their friendship, all the more sacred as their friendship deepens and grows old.—Phillips Brooks.

As you grow ready for it, somewhere or other you will find what is needful for you in a book or a friend.—George MacDonald.

As we sail through life towards death,
Bound unto the same port—heaven—
Friend, what years could us divide?
—D. M. Mulock.

Friends are like melons. Shall I tell you why?

To find one good, you must a hundred try.
—Claude Mermet.

'Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in Paradise our store.
—Keble.

Give, and you may keep your friend if you lose your money: lend, and the chances are that you lose your friend if ever you get back your money.—
Bulwer-Lytton.

The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried, grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel.—Shakespeare.

All are friends in heaven, all faithful
friends,
And many friendships in the days of Time
Begun, are lasting there and growing still.
—Pollok.

When our friends die, in proportion as we loved them, we die with them—we go with them. We are not wholly of the earth.—William Ellery Channing.

Our very best friends have a tincture of jealousy even in their friendship; and when they hear us praised by others, will ascribe it to sinister and interested motives if they can.—Colton.

For men may prove and use their friends, as the poet expresses it, usque ad aras, meaning that a friend should not be required to act contrary to the law of God.—Cervantes.

The attempt to make one false impression on the mind of a friend respecting ourselves is of the nature of perfidy. Sincerity should be observed most scrupulously.—William Ellery Channing.

The friend asks no return but that his friend will religiously accept and wear, and not disgrace, his apotheosis of him.—Thoreau.

Friends are as companions on a journey, who ought to aid each other to persevere in the road to a happier life.—Pythagoras.

Friends should not be chosen to flatter. The quality we should prize is that rectitude which will shrink from no truth. Intimacies which increase vanity destroy friendship.—William Ellery Channing.

I consider beyond all wealth, honor, or even health, is the attachment due to noble souls; because to become one with the good, generous, and true, is to be, in a manner, good, generous, and true yourself.—Dr. Arnold.

A true friend embraces our objects as his own. We feel another mind bent on the same end, enjoying it, ensuring it, reflecting it, and delighting in our devotion to it.—William Ellery Channing.

Wise were the kings who never chose a friend till with full cups they had unmasked his soul, and seen the bottom of his deepest thoughts.—Horace.

The qualities of your friends will be those of your enemies; cold friends, cold enemies—half friends, half enemies—fervid enemies, warm friends.—Lavater.

First on thy friend deliberate with thyself;
Pause, ponder, sift; not eager in the choice;
Nor jealous of the chosen; fixing, fix:—
Judge before friendship, then confide till death.
—Young.

A female friend, amiable, clever, and devoted, is a possession more valuable than parks and palaces; and without such a muse, few men can succeed in life, none be contented.—Beaconsfield.

A true friend is distinguished in the crisis of hazard and necessity; when the gallantry of his aid may show the worth of his soul and the loyalty of his heart.—Ennius.

The lightsome countenance of a friend giveth such an inward decking to the house where it lodgeth, as proudest palaces have cause to envy the gilding.—Sir Philip Sidney.

To act the part of a true friend requires more conscientious feeling than to fill with credit and complacency any other station or capacity in social life.—Sarah Ellis.

The generality of friends puts us out of conceit with friendship; just as the generality of religious people puts us out of conceit with religion.—Rochefoucauld.

No receipt openeth the heart but a true friend, to whom you may impart griefs, joys, fears, hopes, suspicions, counsels, and whatsoever lieth upon the heart to oppress it, in a kind of civil shrift or confession.—Bacon.

A friend is he who sets his heart upon us, is happy with us and delights in us; does for us what we want, is willing and fully engaged to do all he can for us, on whom we can rely in all cases.—William Ellery Channing.

A true friend will appear such in leaving us to act according to our intimate conviction,—will cherish this nobleness of sentiment, will never wish to substitute his power for our own.—William Ellery Channing.

Other blessings may be taken away, but if we have acquired a good friend by goodness, we have a blessing which improves in value when others fail. It is even heightened by sufferings.—William Ellery Channing.

The flatterer's object is to please in everything he does; whereas the true friend always does what is right, and so often gives pleasure, often pain, not wishing the latter, but not shunning it either, if he deems it best.—Plutarch.

We cannot enjoy a friend here. If we are to meet it is beyond the grave. How much of our soul a friend takes with him! We half die in him.—William Ellery Channing.

When true friends meet in adverse hour,
'Tis like a sunbeam through a shower;
A watery ray an instant seen,
The darkly closing clouds between.
—Scott.

So also it is good not always to make a friend of the person who is expert in twining himself around us; but, after testing them, to attach ourselves to those who are worthy of our affection and likely to be serviceable to us.—Plutarch.

Give thy friend counsel wisely and charitably, but leave him to his liberty whether he will follow thee or no; and be not angry if thy counsel be rejected, for advice is no empire, and he is not my friend that will be my judge whether I will or no.—Jeremy Taylor.

Ah! were I sever'd from thy side,
Where were thy friend and who my guide?
Years have not seen, Time shall not see
The hour that tears my soul from thee.
—Byron.

It's an overcome sooth fo' age an' youth,
And it brooks wi' nae denial,
That the dearest friends are the aulddest
friends,
And the young are just on trial.
—Robert Louis Stevenson.

But oh! if grief thy steps attend,
If want, if sickness be thy lot,
And thou require a soothing friend,
Forget me not! forget me not!
—Mrs. Opie.

At death our friends and relatives either draw nearer to us and are found out, or depart farther from us and are forgotten. Friends are as often brought nearer together as separated by death.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Self-love increases or diminishes for us the good qualities of our friends, in proportion to the satisfaction we feel with them; and we judge of their merit by the manner in which they act towards us.—La Rochefoucauld.

A friend whom you have been gaining during your whole life, you ought not to be displeased with in a moment. A stone is many years becoming a ruby; take care that you do not destroy it in an instant against another stone.—Saadi.

Yes, we must ever be friends; and of all who offer you friendship
Let me be ever the first, the truest, the nearest and dearest! —Longfellow.

Dear is my friend—yet from my foe, as from my friend, comes good:
My friend shows what I can do, and my foe what I should. —Schiller.

The most I can do for my friend is simply to be his friend. I have no wealth to bestow on him. If he knows that I am happy in loving him, he will want no other reward. Is not friendship divine in this?—Henry D. Thoreau.

Experience has taught me that the only friends we can call our own, who can have no change, are those over whom the grave has closed; the seal of death is the only seal of friendship. —Byron.

I would not enter on my list of friends,
(Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
Yet wanting sensibility) the man
Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm. —Cowper.

His gain is loss; for he that wrongs his friend
Wrongs himself more, and ever bears about
A silent court of justice in his breast,
Himself a judge and jury, and himself
The prisoner at the bar, ever condemned. —Tennyson.

I have friends in Spirit Land—
Not shadows in a shadowy band,
Not others but themselves are they,
And still I think of them the same
As when the Master's summons came. —Whittier.

When I choose my friend, I will not stay till I have received a kindness; but I will choose such a one that can do me many if I need them; but I mean such kindnesses which make me wiser, and which make me better.—Jeremy Taylor.

This communicating of a man's self to his friend works two contrary effects, for it redoubleth joys, and cutteth griefs in halves; for there is no man that imparteth his joys to his friend but he enjoyeth the more; and no man that imparteth his griefs to his friend, but he grieveth the less.—Bacon.

It is better to decide between our enemies than our friends; for one of our friends will most likely become our enemy; but on the other hand, one of your enemies will probably become your friend.—Bias.

Generally speaking, among sensible persons, it would seem that a rich man deems that friend a sincere one who does not want to borrow his money; while, among the less favored with fortune's gifts, the sincere friend is generally esteemed to be the individual who is ready to lend it.—Disraeli.

"Wal'r, my boy," replied the captain; "in the proverbs of Solomon you will find the following words: 'May we never want a friend in need, nor a bottle to give him!' When found, make a note of."—Dickens.

Now when men either are unnatural or irreligious they will not be friends; when they are neither excellent nor useful, they are not worthy to be friends; when they are strangers or unknown, they cannot be friends actually and practically; but yet, as any man hath anything of the good, contrary to those evils, so he can have and must have his share of friendship. —Jeremy Taylor.

A slender acquaintance with the world must convince every man that actions, not words, are the true criterion of the attachment of friends;

and that the most liberal professions of good-will are very far from being the surest marks of it.—George Washington.

Let no man choose him for his friend whom it shall be possible for him ever after to hate; for though the society may justly be interrupted, yet love is an immortal thing, and I will never despise him whom I could once think worthy of my love.—Jeremy Taylor.

It is a mere and miserable solitude to want true friends, without which the world is but a wilderness; and even in this scene also of solitude, whosoever in the frame of his nature and affections is unfit for friendship he taketh it of the beast, and not from humanity.—Bacon.

The man that hails you Tom or Jack,
And proves by thumps upon your back

How he esteems your merit,
Is such a friend, that one had need
Be very much his friend indeed
To pardon or to bear it.

—Cowper.

In all thy humors, whether grave or mellow,
Thou'rt such a touchy, testy, pleasant fellow,

Hast so much wit and mirth, and spleen
about thee,

That there's no living with thee, nor without thee.

—Addison.

If we take the freedom to put a friend under our microscope, we thereby insulate him from many of his true relations, magnify his peculiarities, inevitably tear him into parts, and, of course, patch him very clumsily together again. What wonder, then, should we be frightened by the aspect of a monster.—Hawthorne.

Nobody who is afraid of laughing, and heartily too at his friend, can be said to have a true and thorough love for him; and, on the other hand, it would portray a sorry want of faith to distrust a friend because he laughs at you. Few men, I believe, are much worth loving in whom there is not something well worth laughing at.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Deliberate long before thou consecrate a friend, and when thy impartial justice concludes him worthy of thy bosom, receive him joyfully, and entertain him wisely; impart thy secrets boldly, and mingle thy thoughts with his: he is thy very self; and use him so; if thou firmly think him faithful, thou makest him so.—Quarles.

The sun is a hundred thousand leagues away, and the water-roses that open to the light of day are in the pool; the moon, friend of the night-blooming lotus, is two hundred thousand leagues distant. Friendship knows no separation that divides it in space.—Vikramacharita.

We learn our virtues from the bosom friends who love us; our faults from the enemy who hates us. We cannot easily discover our real form from a friend. He is a mirror on which the warmth of our breath impedes the clearness of the reflection.—Richter.

Choose your friend wisely,

Test your friend well;

True friends, like rarest gems,

Prove hard to tell.

Winter him, summer him,

Know your friend well.

—Unknown.

True friends are the whole world to one another; and he that is a friend to himself is also a friend to mankind. Even in my studies the greatest delight I take is of imparting it to others; for there is no relish to me in the possessing of anything without a partner.—Seneca.

Friends are discovered rather than made; there are people who are in their own nature friends, only they don't know each other; but certain things, like poetry, music, and paintings are like the Freemason's sign,—they reveal the initiated to each other.—Mrs. Stowe.

The noblest part of a friend is an honest boldness in the notifying of errors. He that tells me of a fault, aiming at my good, I must think him wise and faithful—wise in spying that which I see not; faithful in a plain admonishment, not tainted with flattery.—Feltbam.

We ought to give our friend pain if it will benefit him, but not to the extent of breaking off our friendship; but just as we make use of some biting medicine that will save and preserve the life of the patient. And so the friend, like a musician, in bringing about an improvement to what is good and expedient, sometimes slackens the chords, sometimes tightens them, and is often pleasant, but always useful.—Plutarch.

However we may flatter ourselves to the contrary, our friends think no higher of us than the world do. They see us with the jaundiced or distrustful eyes of others. They may know better, but their feelings are governed by popular prejudice. Nay, they are more shy of us (when under a cloud) than even strangers; for we involve them in a common disgrace, or compel them to embroil themselves in continual quarrels and disputes in our defence.—Hazlitt.

Make not a bosom friend of a melancholy soul; he'll be sure to aggravate thy adversity and lessen thy prosperity. He goes always heavily loaded, and thou must bear half. He is never in a good humor, and may easily get into a bad one, and fall out with thee.—Fuller.

With regard to the choice of friends, there is little to say; for a friend is never chosen. A secret sympathy, the attraction of a thousand nameless qualities, a charm in the expression of the countenance, even in the voice or manner, a similarity of circumstances,—these are the things that begin attachment.—Mrs. Barbauld.

If thy friends be of better quality than thyself, thou mayest be sure of two things: the first, that they will be more careful to keep thy counsel, because they have more to lose than thou hast: the second, they will esteem thee for thyself, and not for that which thou dost possess.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Few of us have been so exceptionally unfortunate as not to find, in our own age, some experienced friend who has helped us by precious counsel, never to be forgotten. We cannot render it in kind, but perhaps in the fulness of time it may become our noblest duty to aid another as we have ourselves been aided, and to transmit to him an invaluable treasure, the tradition of the intellectual life.—Hamerton.

Our friends should be our incentives to right, but not only our guiding, but our prophetic, stars. To love by right is much, to love by faith is more; both are the entire love, without which heart, mind, and soul cannot be alike satisfied. We love and ought to love one another, not merely for the absolute worth of each, but on account of a mutual fitness of temporary character.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

Thou may'st be sure that he that will in private tell thee of thy faults, is thy friend, for he adventures thy dislike, and doth bazard thy hatred; for there are few men that can endure it, every man for the most part delighting in self-praise, which is one of the most universal follies that bewitcheth mankind.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

There is no treasure the which may be compared unto a faithful friend;
Gold soone decayeth, and worldly wealth
consumeth, and wasteth in the winde;
But love once planted in a perfect and pure
minde endureth weale and woe;
The frownes of fortune, come they never so unkinde, cannot the same overthrowe.
—Roxburge Ballads.

The way is short, O friend,
That reaches out before us;
God's tender heavens above us bend,
His love is smiling o'er us;
A little while is ours
For sorrow or for laughter;
I'll lay the hand you love in yours
On the shore of the Hereafter.
—Mary Clemmer.

No man can expect to find a friend without faults; nor can he propose himself to be so to another. Without reciprocal mildness and temperance there can be no continuance of friendship. Every man will have something to do for his friend, and something to bear with in him. The sober man only can do the first; and for the latter, patience is requisite. It is better for a man to depend on himself, than to be annoyed with either a madman or a fool.—Owen Feltham.

What shall I do, my friend,
When you are gone forever?
My heart its eager need will send Through the years to find you never,
And how will it be with you,
In the weary world, I wonder,
Will you love me with a love as true,
When our paths lie far asunder?
—Mary Clemmer.

O friend, my bosom said,
Through thee alone the sky is arched.
Through thee the rose is red;
All things through thee take nobler form,
And look beyond the earth,
The mill-round of our fate appears
A sun-path in thy worth.
Me too thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of my hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair.
—Emerson.

Old friends are the great blessings of one's latter years. Half a word conveys one's meaning. They have memory of the same events, and have the same mode of thinking. I have young relations that may grow upon me, for my nature is affectionate, but can they grow old friends? My age forbids that. Still less can they grow companions. Is it friendship to explain half one says? One must relate the history of one's memory and ideas; and what is that to the young but old stories?—Horace Walpole.

no one.—Napoleon I.

Virtue is presupposed in friendship.
—Landor.

There is flattery in friendship.—
Shakespeare.

Friendship is constant in all other things, save in the office and affairs of love.—Shakespeare.

Kindred weaknesses induce friendships as often as kindred virtues.—
Bovee.

Women bestow on friendship only what they borrow from love.—Chamfort.

Friendship is given us by nature, not to favor vice, but to aid virtue.
—Cicero.

Dread more the blunderer's friendship than the calumniator's enmity.—
Lavater.

Friendship is the shadow of the evening, which strengthens with the setting sun of life.—La Fontaine.

Be slow to fall into friendship;
but when thou art in continue firm and constant.—Socrates.

That friendship will not continue to the end that is begun for an end.
—Quarles.

Let friendship creep gently to a height; if it rush to it, it may soon run itself out of breath.—Fuller.

Honest men esteem and value nothing so much in this world as a real friend. Such a one is, as it were, another self.—Pilpay.

Friendship is a disinterested commerce between equals.—Goldsmith.

The friendships of the world are oft confederacies in vice, or leagues of pleasure.—Addison.

The vulgar herd estimate friend-

To desire the same things and to reject the same things, constitutes true friendship.—Sallust.

Friendship is a cadence of divine melody melting through the heart.—
Mildmay.

Do not allow grass to grow on the road of friendship.—Madame Geoffrin.

The ideal of friendship is to feel as one while remaining two.—Madame Swetchine.

He who has not the weakness of friendship has not the strength.—Joubert.

Neither is life long enough for friendship. That is a serious and majestic affair.—Emerson.

Friendship should be in the singular; it can be no more plural than love.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Friendship needs to be rooted in respect, but love can live upon itself alone.—Ouida.

It is true that friendship often ends in love, but love in friendship never.
—Colton.

Friendship always benefits, while love sometimes injures.—Seneca.

In friendship we find nothing false or insincere; everything is straightforward, and springs from the heart.
—Cicero.

I think there is nothing more lovely than the love of two beautiful women, who are not envious of each other's charms.—Beaconsfield.

Friendship is an order of nobility;
from its revelations we come more worthily into nature.—Emerson.

Friendship is made fast by interwoven benefits.—Sir P. Sidney.

He removes the greatest ornament of friendship who takes away from it respect.—Cicero.

Friendship is the gift of the gods, and the most precious boon to man.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

The essence of friendship is entireness, a total magnanimity and trust.—Emerson.

Friendship should be surrounded with ceremonies and respects, and not crushed into corners.—Emerson.

The corpse of friendship is not worth embalming.—Hazlitt.

A sudden thought strikes me, let us swear eternal friendship.—Caning.

The highest friendship must always lead us to the highest pleasure.—Fielding.

Sincerity, truth, faithfulness, come into the very essence of friendship.—William Ellery Channing.

What is commonly called friendship even is only a little more honor among rogues.—Thoreau.

We inspire friendship in men when we have contracted friendship with the gods.—Thoreau.

Friendship has a power
To soothe affliction in her darkest hour.
—H. K. White.

Friendship is a plant that loves the sun, thrives ill under clouds.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Friendship with a man is friendship with his virtue, and does not admit of assumptions of superiority.—Mencius.

In friendship your heart is like a bell struck every time your friend is in trouble.—Henry Ward Beecher.

True friendship is like sound health, the value of it is seldom known until it be lost.—Colton.

Friendship is cemented by interest, vanity, or the want of amusement; it seldom implies esteem, or even mutual regard.—Hazlitt.

Friendship is the most pleasant of all things, and nothing more glads the heart of man.—Plutarch.

There are no rules for friendship. It must be left to itself; we cannot force it any more than love.—Hazlitt.

Friendship that possesses the whole soul, and there rules and sways with an absolute sovereignty, can admit of no rival.—Montaigne.

O friendship! thou divinest alchemist, that man should ever profane thee!—Douglas Jerrold.

Friendship is a traffic wherein self-love always proposes to be the gainer.—Rochefoucauld.

Friendship requires a steady, constant, and unchangeable character, a person that is uniform in his intimacy.—Plutarch.

Friendship * * * is a long time in forming, it is of slow growth, through many trials and months of familiarity.—La Bruyère.

Friendship is the greatest honesty and ingenuity in the world.—Jeremy Taylor.

Interest, ambition, fortune, time, temper, love, all kill friendship.—Joseph Roux.

I love a friendship that flatters itself in the sharpness and vigor of its communications.—Montaigne.

men of an inferior intellect can never taste.—De La Bruyère.

Great souls by instinct to each other turn,
Demand alliance, and in friendship burn.
—Addison.

As often as I come back to his door, his love met me on the threshold, and his noble serenity gave me comfort and peace.—William Winter.

Ceremony and great professing renders friendships as much suspected as it does religion.—Wycherley.

It is said that friendship between women is only a suspension of hostilities.—Rivarol.

In the forming of female friendships beauty seldom recommends one woman to another.—Fielding.

A true and noble friendship shrinks not at the greatest of trials.—Jeremy Taylor.

Friendship between two women is always a plot against another one.—
Alphonse Karr.

The light of friendship is like the light of phosphorus,—seen plainest when all around is dark.—Crowell.

Life is to be fortified by many friendships. To love, and to be loved, is the greatest happiness of existence.
—Sydney Smith.

True friendship's laws are by this rule ex-press'd,
Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest. —Homer.

"There is nothing that is meritorious but virtue and friendship; and indeed friendship itself is only a part of virtue."—Pope.

The friendship between me and you
I will not compare to a chain; for that the rains might rust, or the falling tree might break.—Bancroft.

Some friendships are made by nature, some by contract, some by interest, and some by souls.—Jeremy Taylor.

A summer friendship, whose flattering leaves, that shadowed us in our prosperity, with the least gust drop off in the autumn of adversity.—Mas-singer.

We cannot expect the deepest friendship unless we are willing to pay the price, a self-sacrificing love.
—Peloubet.

If we would build on a sure four-dation in friendship, we must love our friends for their sake rather than our own.—Charlotte Brontë.

In the opinion of the world marriage ends all, as it does in a comedy. The truth is precisely the reverse; it begins all.—Mme. Swetchine.

Friendship, like love, is self-forgetful. The only inequality it knows is one that exalts the object, and humbles self.—Henry Giles.

Friendship throws a greater luster on prosperity, while it lightens adversity by sharing in its griefs and anxieties.—Cicero.

Friendship consists properly in mutual offices, and a generous strife in alternate acts of kindness.—South.

Friendship is the only thing in the world concerning the usefulness of which all mankind are agreed.—Cicero.

A friendship that makes the least noise is very often the most useful; for which reason I should prefer a prudent friend to a zealous one.—Addison.

To what gods is sacrificed that rarest and sweetest thing upon earth, friendship? To vanity and to interest.—Malesherbes.

I would give more for the private esteem and love of one than for the public praise of ten thousand.—W. R. Alger.

Friendship is too pure a pleasure for a mind cankered with ambition, or the lust of power and grandeur.—Junius.

He who cannot feel friendship is alike incapable of love. Let a woman beware of the man who owns that he loves no one but herself.—Talleyrand.

As the yellow gold is tried in fire, so the faith of friendship must be seen in adversity.—Ovid.

We only need to be as true to others as we are to ourselves, that there may be grounds enough for friendship.—Thoreau.

Friendship improves happiness and abates misery, by the doubling of our joy and the dividing of our grief.—Cicero.

There is no friendship between those associated in power; he who rules will always be impatient of an associate.—Lucan.

Nature loves nothing solitary, and always reaches out to something, as a support, which ever in the sincerest friend is most delightful.—Cicero.

Friendship is seldom lasting, but between equals, or where superiority is reduced by some equivalent advantage.—Johnson.

Love and esteem are the first principles of friendship, which always is imperfect where either of these two is wanting.—Budgell.

We should remember that it is quite as much a part of friendship to be delicate in its demands as to be ample in its performances.—J. F. Boyes.

Friendship is like those ancient altars where the unhappy, and even the guilty, found a sure asylum.—Madame Swetchine.

Friendship is the medicine for all misfortune; but ingratitude dries up the fountain of all goodness.—Riche-lieu.

The services which cement friendship are reciprocal services. A feeling of dependence is scarcely compatible with friendship.—William Smith.

A friendship formed in childhood, in youth,—by happy accident at any stage of rising manhood,—becomes the genius that rules the rest of life.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The most familiar and intimate habitudes, connections, friendships, require a degree of good-breeding both to preserve and cement them.—Lord Chesterfield.

Friendship is to be purchased only by friendship. A man may have authority over others, but he can never have their heart but by giving his own.—Thomas Wilson.

Friendship's said to be a plant of tedious growth, its root composed of tender fibers, nice in their taste, cautious in spreading.—Vanbrugh.

Nature and religion are the bands of friendship, excellence and usefulness are its great endearments.—Jeremy Taylor.

The friendship I have conceived will not be impaired by absence; but it may be no unpleasing circumstance to brighten the chain by a renewal of the covenant.—George Washington.

We are most of us very lonely in this world; you who have any who love you, cling to them and thank God.—Thackeray.

The feeling of friendship is like that of being comfortably filled with roast beef; love, like being enlivened with champagne.—Johnson.

There is a magic in the memory of schoolboy friendships; it softens the heart, and even affects the nervous system of those who have no hearts.—Beaconsfield.

Whosoever in the frame of his nature and affections is unfit for friendship, he taketh it of the beast, and not from humanity.—Bacon.

I hate the prostitution of the name of friendship to signify modish and worldly alliances.—Emerson.

Friendship heightens all our affections. We receive all the ardor of our friend in addition to our own. The communication of minds gives to each the fervor of each.—William Ellery Channing.

That friendship only is, indeed, genuine when two friends, without speaking a word to each other, can, nevertheless, find happiness in being together.—George Ebers.

Fix yourself upon the wealthy. In a word, take this for a golden rule through life: Never, never have a friend that is poorer than yourself.—Douglas Jerrold.

Thou learnest no secret until thou knowest friendship, since to the unsound no heavenly knowledge enters.—Hafiz.

The firmest friendships have been formed in mutual adversity; as iron is most strongly united by the fiercest flame.—Colton.

If a man does not make new acquaintances as he advances through life, he will soon find himself left alone. A man, sir, should keep his friendship in constant repair.—John son.

Friendships are the purer and the more ardent, the nearer they come to the presence of God, the Sun not only of righteousness but of love.—Lander.

A good man is the best friend, and therefore soonest to be chosen, longer to be retained, and, indeed, never to be parted with, unless he cease to be that for which he was chosen.—Jeremy Taylor.

No friendship is so cordial or so delicious as that of girl for girl; no hatred so intense and immovable as that of woman for woman.—Lander.

To find by experience that friendships are mortal, is the hard but inevitable lot of fallible and imperfect men.—Dr. Parr.

Friendship, peculiar boon of Heaven,
The noble mind's delight and pride,
To men and angels only given,
To all the lower world denied.
—Sam'l Johnson.

Hand
Grasps hand, eye lights eye in good friendship,
And great hearts expand,
And grow one in the sense of this world's life.
—Robert Browning.

Friendship's an abstract of this noble
flame,
'Tis love refin'd, and purged from all its dross,
'Tis next to angel's love, if not the same,
As strong in passion is, though not so gross.
Catherine Philips.

O friendship, equal-poised control,
O heart, with kindest motion warm,
O sacred essence, other form,
O solemn ghost, O crowned soul!
—Tennyson.

Friendship, gift of heaven, delight of great souls: friendship which kings, so distinguished for ingratitude, are unhappy enough not to know.—Voltaire.

Charity commands us, where we know no ill, to think well of all;

but friendship that always goes a step higher, gives a man a peculiar right and claim to the good opinion of his friend.—South.

And what is friendship but a name,
A charm that lulls to sleep;
A shade that follows wealth or fame,
And leaves the wretch to weep?
—Goldsmith.

In friendship we only see those faults which may be prejudicial to our friends. In love we see no faults but those by which we suffer ourselves.—De La Bruyère.

As the shadow in early morning, is friendship with the wicked; it dwindles hour by hour. But friendship with the good increases, like the evening shadows, till the sun of life sets.—Herder.

If two men are united, the wants of neither are any greater, in some respects, than they would be were they alone, and their strength is superior to the strength of two separate men.—Sénancour.

We value the devotedness of friendship rather as an oblation to vanity than as a free interchange of hearts; an endearing contract of sympathy, mutual forbearance, and respect!—Jane Porter.

False friendship, like the ivy, decays and ruins the walls it embraces; but true friendship gives new life and animation to the object it supports.—Robert Burton.

He who disguises tyranny, protection, or even benefits under the air and name of friendship reminds me of the guilty priest who poisoned the sacramental bread.—Chamfort.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And days o' lang syne? —Burns.

Friendship hath the skill and observation of the best physician, the diligence and vigilance of the best nurse, and the tenderness and patience of the best mother.—Clarendon.

Thou mayest be sure that he who will in private tell thee of thy faults is thy friend, for he adventures thy dislike and doth hazard thy hatred.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Friendship, mysterious cement of the soul, Sweetener of life, and solder of society, I owe thee much: thou hast deserv'd from me
Far, far beyond what I can ever pay.
—Blair.

Although a friend may remain faithful in misfortune, yet none but the very best and loftiest will remain faithful to us after our errors and our sins.—F. W. Farrar.

What is friendship in virtuous minds but the concentration of benevolent emotions heightened by respect, and increased by exercise on one or more objects?—Robert Hall.

Friendship is made up of esteem and pleasure: pity is composed of sorrow and contempt: the mind may for some time fluctuate between them, but it can never entertain both at once.—Goldsmith.

A generous friendship no cold medium knows,
Burns with one love, with one resentment glows;
One should our interests and our passions be,
My friend must hate the man that injures me.
—Pope.

I account that one of the greatest demonstrations of real friendship, that a friend can really endeavor to have his friend advanced in honor, in reputation, in the opinion of wit or learning, before himself.—Jeremy Taylor.

What is more notorious than that wherever a pecuniary interest appears upon the scene, friendship retires? Whether you take money from me, or whether you give it, the transaction is alike fatal to our old bond of amity.—William Smith.

The soil of friendship is worn out with constant use. Habit may still attach us to each other, but we feel ourselves fettered by it. Old friends might be compared to old married people without the tie of children.—Hazlitt.

A woman's friendship borders more closely on love than man's. Men affect each other in the reflection of noble or friendly acts; whilst women ask fewer proofs and more signs and expressions of attachment.—Coleridge.

It seems to me that a truly lovable woman is thereby unfitted for friendship, and that a woman fitted for friendship is but little fitted for love.—Alexander Walker.

I have too deeply read mankind to be amused with friendship; it is a name invented merely to betray credulity; it is intercourse of interest, not of souls.—Havard.

There is this important difference between love and friendship: while the former delights in extremes and opposites, the latter demands equalities.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Friendship is a calm and sedate affection, conducted by reason and cemented by habit; springing from long acquaintance and mutual obligations, without jealousies or fears, and without those feverish fits of heat and cold, which cause such an agreeable torment in the amorous passion.—Hume.

There is a power in love to divine another's destiny better than that other can, and by heroic encouragements, hold him to his task. What has friendship so signal as its sublime attraction to whatever virtue is in us?—Emerson.

True friendship cannot be among many. For since our faculties are of a finite energy, it is impossible our love can be very intense when divided among many. No, the rays must be contracted to make them burn.—John Norris.

We love everything on our own account; we even follow our own taste and inclination when we prefer our friends to ourselves; and yet it is this preference alone that constitutes true and perfect friendship.—Rochefoucauld.

What is commonly called friendship is no more than a partnership; a reciprocal regard for one another's interests, and an exchange of good offices; in a word, a mere traffic, wherein self-love always proposes to be a gainer.—Rochefoucauld.

These hearts which suck up friendship like water, and yield it again with the first touch, might as well expect to squeeze a sponge and find it hold its moisture, as to retain affections which they are forever dashing from them.—Jane Porter.

As friendship must be founded on mutual esteem, it cannot long exist among the vicious; for we soon find ill company to be like a dog, which dirties those the most whom he loves the best.—Chatfield.

Character is so largely affected by associations that we cannot afford to be indifferent as to who and what our friends are. They write their names in our albums, but they do more, they help make us what we are. Be therefore careful in selecting them; and when wisely selected, never sacrifice them.—M. Hulburd.

O friendship! thou fond soother of the human breast, to thee we fly in every calamity: to thee the wretched seek for succor: on thee the care-tired son of misery fondly relies; from thy kind assistance the unfortunate always hopes relief, and may be sure of—disappointment.—Goldsmith.

In your friendships and in your enmities let your confidence and your hostilities have certain bounds: make not the former dangerous, nor the latter irreconcilable. There are strange vicissitudes in business.—Chesterfield.

It is hard to believe long together that anything is "worth while," unless there is some eye to kindle in common with our own, some brief word uttered now and then to imply that what is infinitely precious to us is precious alike to another mind.—George Eliot.

We hate some persons because we do not know them; and we will not know them because we hate them. The friendships that succeed to such aversions are usually firm; for those qualities must be sterling that could not only gain our hearts, but conquer our prejudices.—Colton.

The friendship between great men is rarely intimate or permanent. It is a Boswell that most appreciates a Johnson. Genius has no brother, no co-mate; the love it inspires is that of a pupil or a son.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Old books, old wine, old nankin blue—
All things, in short, to which belong
The charm, the grace that Time makes strong,
All these I prize, but (entre nous)
Old friends are best.
—Austin Dobson.

Friendship, like love, is but a name,
Unless to one you stint the flame.
The child, whom many fathers share,
Hath seldom known a father's care.
'Tis thus in friendships; who depend
On many, rarely find a friend. —Gay.

It may be worth noticing as a curious circumstance, when persons past forty before they were at all acquainted form together a very close intimacy of friendship. For grafts of old wood to take, there must be a wonderful congeniality between the trees.—Whately.

Once let friendship be given that is born of God, nor time nor circumstance can change it to a lessening; it must be mutual growth, increasing trust, widening faith, enduring patience, forgiving love, unselfish ambition,—an affection built before the throne, that will bear the test of time and trial.—Allan Throckmorton.

Friendship is the unspeakable joy and blessing that result to two or more individuals who from constitution sympathize. Such natures are liable to no mistakes, but will know each other through thick and thin. Between two by nature alike and fitted to sympathize, there is no veil, and there can be no obstacle. Who are the estranged? Two friends explaining.—Thoreau.

Friendship, like love, is destroyed by long absence, though it may be increased by short intermissions. What we have missed long enough to want it, we value more when it is regained; but that which has been lost till it is forgotten will be found at last with little gladness, and with still less if a substitute has supplied the place.—Johnson.

Of all intellectual friendships, none are so beautiful as those which subsist between old and ripe men and their younger brethren in science or literature or art. It is by these private friendships, even more than by public performance, that the tradition of sound thinking and great doing is perpetuated from age to age.—Hamerton.

There are three friendships which are advantageous, and three which are injurious. Friendship with the upright; friendship with the sincere; and friendship with the man of much observation: these are advantageous. Friendship with the man of specious airs; friendship with the insinuatingly soft; and friendship with the glib-tongued: these are injurious.—Confucius.

Perfect friendship puts us under the necessity of being virtuous. As it can only be preserved among estimable persons, it forces us to resemble them. You find in friendship the surety of good counsel, the emulation of good example, sympathy in our griefs, succor in our distress.—Madame de Lambert.

Friendship is the alloy of our sorrows, the ease of our passions, the discharge of our oppressions, the sanctuary to our calamities, the counselor of our doubts, the clarity of our minds, the emission of our thoughts, the exercise and improvement of what we meditate. And although I love my friend because he is worthy, yet he is not worthy if he can do no good.—Jeremy Taylor.

When I see leaves drop from their trees in the beginning of autumn, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world. Whilst the sap of maintenance lasts my friends swarm in abundance; but in the winter of my need they leave me naked.—Warwick.

The friendship of high and sanctified spirits loses nothing by death but its alloy; failings disappear, and the virtues of those whose "faces we shall behold no more" appear greater and more sacred when beheld through the shades of the sepulchre.—Robert Hall.

The most elevated and pure souls cannot hear, even from the lips of the most contemptible men, these words, "friendship," "sensitivity," "virtue," without immediately attaching to them all the grandeur of which their heart is susceptible.—Richter.

Let me take up your metaphor. Friendship is a vase, which, when it is flawed by heat or violence or accident, may as well be broken at once; it can never be trusted after. The more graceful and ornamental it was, the more clearly do we discern the hopelessness of restoring it to its former state. Coarse stones, if they are fractured, may be cemented again; precious stones, never.—Landor.

With a clear sky, a bright sun, and a gentle breeze, you will have friends in plenty; but let fortune frown, and the firmament be overcast, and then your friends will prove like the strings of the lute, of which you will tighten ten before you find one that will bear the stretch and keep the pitch.—Gotthold.

The highest compact we can make with our fellow is,—let there be truth between us two forevermore. * * * It is sublime to feel and say of another, I need never meet, or speak, or write to him; we need not reinforce ourselves or send tokens of remembrance; I rely on him as on myself; if he did thus or thus, I know it was right.—Emerson.

Thy presence sweet
Still through long years of vigil I may share,
For if from that enchanted spirit-land
Thy healthful thought into my soul may shine (E'en though thy voice be still, and cold thy hand.)
To lift my life and make it pure as thine;
Then, though thy place on earth a void must be,
Beloved friend, thou art not dead to me.
—H. H. Boyesen.

Come back! ye friendships long departed!
That like o'erflowing streamlets started,
And now are dwindled, one by one,
To stony channels in the sun!
Come back! ye friends, whose lives are ended,
Come back, with all that light attended,
Which seemed to darken and decay
When ye arose and went away!
—Longfellow.

Fast as the rolling seasons bring
The hour of fate to those we love,
Each pearl that leaves the broken string
Is set in Friendship's crown above.
As narrower grows the earthly chain,
The circle widens in the sky;
These are our treasures that remain,
But those are stars that beam on high.
—O. W. Holmes.

How were friendship possible? In mutual devotedness to the good and true; otherwise impossible, except as armed neutrality or hollow commercial league. A man, be the heavens ever praised, is sufficient for himself; yet were ten men, united in love, capable of being and of doing what ten thousand singly would fail in. Infinite is the help man can yield to man.—Carlyle.

People young, and raw, and self-natured, think it an easy thing to gain love, and reckon their own friendship a sure price of any man's; but when experience shall have shown them the hardness of most hearts, the hollowness of others, and the baseness and ingratitude of almost all, they will then find that a true friend is the gift of God, and that He only who made hearts can unite them.—South.

A wound in the friendship of young persons, as in the bark of young trees, may be so grown over as to leave no scar. The case is very different in regard to old persons and old timber. The reason of this may be accountable from the decline of the social passions, and the prevalence of spleen, suspicion, and rancor towards the latter part of life.—Shenstone.

Rejoice, and men will seek you;
Grieve, and they turn and go,
They want full measure of all your pleasure,

But they do not need your woe.
Be glad, and your friends are many;
Be sad, and you lose them all,—
There are none to decline your nectar'd wine,

But alone you must drink life's gall.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

When the first time of love is over, there comes a something better still. Then comes that other love; that faithful friendship which never changes, and which will accompany you with its calm light through the whole of life. It is only needful to place yourself so that it may come, and then it comes of itself. And then everything turns and changes itself to the best.—Fredrika Bremer.

Such is friendship, that through it we love places and seasons; for as bright bodies emit rays to a distance, and flowers drop their sweet leaves on the ground around them, so friends impart favor even to the places where they dwell. With friends even poverty is pleasant. Words cannot express the joy which a friend imparts; they only can know who have experienced. A friend is dearer than the light of heaven, for it would be better for us that the sun were exhausted than that we should be without friends.—St. Chrysostom.

There are many moments in friendship, as in love, when silence is beyond words. The faults of our friend may be clear to us, but it is well to seem to shut our eyes to them. Friendship is usually treated by the majority of mankind as a tough and everlasting thing which will survive all manner of bad treatment. But this is an exceedingly great and foolish error; it may die in an hour of a single unwise word; its conditions of existence are that it should be dealt with delicately and tenderly, being as it is a sensitive plant and not a roadside thistle. We must not expect our friend to be above humanity.—Ouida.

Frivolity

Frivolity, under whatever form it appears, takes from attention its strength, from thought its originality, from feeling its earnestness.—Madame de Staël.

Alas! that Christians should stand at the door of eternity having more work upon their hands than their time is sufficient for, and yet be filling their heads and hearts with trifles.—John Flavel.

Frost

All the panes are hung with frost
Wild wizard-work of silver lace.
—T. B. Aldrich.

What miracle of weird transforming
Is this wild work of frost and light,
This glimpse of glory infinite!
—Whittier.

Come see the north-wind's masonry,
Out of an unseen quarry evermore
Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer
Curves his white bastions with projected roof
Round every windward stake, or tree, or door.
—Emerson.

These winter nights, against my window-pane
Nature with busy pencil draws designs
Of ferns and blossoms and fine spray of pines,
Oak-leaf and acorn and fantastic vines,
Which she will make when summer comes again—
Quaint arabesques in argent, flat and cold,
Like curious Chinese etchings.
—T. B. Aldrich.

He comes,—he comes,—the Frost Spirit comes!—from the frozen Labrador,—
From the icy bridge of the Northern seas,
Which the white bear wanders o'er,—
Where the fisherman's sail is stiff with ice,
And the luckless forms below
In the sunless cold of the lingering night into marble statues grow!
—Whittier.

Frugality

By sowing frugality we reap liberty, a golden harvest.—Agesilaus.

The world has not yet learned the riches of frugality.—Cicero.

Frugality is founded upon the principle, that all riches have limits.—Burke.

Frugality may be termed the daughter of prudence, the sister of temperance, and the parent of liberty.—Dr. Johnson.

Frugality, when all is spent, comes too late.—Seneca.

He will always be a slave, who does not know how to live upon a little.—Horace.

He seldom lives frugally who lives by chance. Hope is always liberal, and they that trust her promises make little scruple of revelling to-day on the profits of to-morrow.—Johnson.

He that spareth in everything is an inexcusable niggard. He that spareth in nothing is an inexcusable madman. The mean is to spare in what is least necessary, and to lay out more liberally in what is most required in our several circumstances.—Lord Halifax.

Frugality is good if liberality be joined with it. The first is leaving off superfluous expenses; the last is bestowing them to the benefit of others that need. The first without the last begets covetousness; the last without the first begets prodigality.—William Penn.

Fruit

The ripest fruit first falls.—Shakespeare.

Fruits that blossom first will first be ripe.—Shakespeare.

The ripest peach is highest on the tree.—James Whitcomb Riley.

The juicy pear
Lies, in a soft profusion, scattered round.
—Thompson.

As touching peaches in general, the very name in Latine whereby they are called Persica, doth evidently show that they were brought out of Persia first.—Pliny.

But the fruit that can fall without shaking,
Indeed is too mellow for me.
—Lady Montagu.

Oh, happy are the apples when the south winds blow.—Wm. Wallace Harney.

The strawberry grows underneath the nettle
And wholesome berries thrive and ripen best Neighbour'd by fruit of baser quality.
—Shakespeare.

To satisfy the sharp desire I had
Of tasting those fair apples, I resolv'd
Not to defer; hunger and thirst at once
Powerful persuaders, quicken'd at the scent
Of that alluring fruit, urged me so keen.
—Milton.

Superfluous branches
We lop away, that bearing boughs may live.
—Shakespeare.

O,—fruit loved of boyhood!—the old days
recalling,
When wood-grapes were purpling and brown
nuts were falling!
When wild, ugly faces were carved in its skin,
Glaring out through the dark with a candle
within!
When we laughed round the corn-heap, with hearts all in tune,
Our chair a broad pumpkin,—our lantern
the moon,
Telling tales of the fairy who travelled like steam
In a pumpkin-shell coach, with two rats for her team!
—Whittier.

After the conquest of Afric, Greece, the lesser Asia, and Syria were brought into Italy all the sorts of their Mala. which we interpret apples, and might signify no more at first; but were afterwards applied to many other foreign fruits.—Sir
Wm. Temple.

The flowers of life are but visionary.
How many pass away and leave no trace behind! How few yield any fruit,—and the fruit itself, how rarely does it ripen! And yet there are flowers enough; and is it not strange, my friend, that we should suffer the little that does really ripen to rot, decay, and perish unenjoyed?—Goethe.

Nothing great is produced suddenly, since not even the grape or the fig is. If you say to me now that you want a fig, I will answer to you that it requires time: let it flower first, then put forth fruit, and then ripen.—Epictetus.

Fun

To a young heart everything is fun.—Dickens.

Next to the virtue, the fun in this world is what we can least spare.—Agnes Strickland.

Fun is a sugar-coated physic.—H. W. Shaw.

Fun has no limits. It is like the human race and face; there is a family likeness among all the species, but they all differ.—Haliburton.

There is nothing like fun, is there? I haven't any myself, and I do like it in others. Oh, we need it!—we need all the counterweights we can muster to balance the sad relations of life. God has made sunny spots in the heart: why should we exclude the light from them?—Haliburton.

Funeral

It is but waste to bury them preciously.—Chaucer.

The nodding plums,
Which makes poor man's humiliation proud;
Boast of our ruin! triumph of our dust!
—Dr. Young.

Groans and convulsions, and discolour'd faces,
Friends weeping round us, blacks, and obsequies,
Make death a dreadful thing; the pomp of
death
Is far more terrible than death itself.
—Nat. Lee.

The only kind office performed for us by our friends of which we never complain is our funeral; and the only thing which we most want, happens to be the only thing we never purchase—our coffin.—Colton.

Of all

The fools who flock'd to swell or see the show,
Who car'd about the corpse? The funeral
Made the attraction, and the black the woe;
There throbb'd not there a thought which pierc'd the pall. —Byron.

Why is the hearse with scutcheons blazon'd
round,
And with the nodding plume of ostrich
crown'd?

The dead know it not, nor profit gain;
It only serves to prove the living vain,
How short is life; how frail is human trust!
Is all this pomp for laying dust to dust?
—Gay.

But see! the well-plum'd hearse comes nodding on, stately and slow;
But tell us, why this waste?
Why this ado in earthing up a carcass
That's fallen into disgrace, and in the nostrils smells horrible? —Blair.

What though no friends in sable weeds appear,
Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn
a year?
And bear about the mockery of woe
To midnight dances, and the public show!
—Pope.

Thus, day by day, and month by month, we pass'd;
It pleas'd the Lord to take my spouse at last.
I tore my gown, I soil'd my locks with dust,
And beat my breasts—as wretched widows must.
Before my face my handkerchief I spread,
To hide the flood of tears I did—not shed.
—Pope.

Fuss

A paroxysm of nervous efferves-cence.—Douglas Jerrold.

Fuss is the froth of business.—
Hood.

Fuss is half-sister to hurry, and neither of them can do anything without getting in their own way.—
H. W. Shaw.

Future—Futurity

The best preparation for the future is the present well seen to, the last duty done.—George MacDonald.

Futurity is the great concern of mankind.—Burke.

The future is purchased by the present.—Johnson.

Belief in a future life is the appetite of reason.—Landor.

You can never plan the future by the past.—Burke.

But there's a gude time coming.—Scott.

It is easy to see, hard to foresee.—Franklin.

The curtain of the future is always drawn.—John Bigelow.

Oh, could we lift the future's sable shroud.—Bailey.

The glories of the possible are ours.—Bayard Taylor.

Coming events cast their shadows before.—Campbell.

The present is great with the future.—Leibnitz.

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.—Bible.

The mind that is anxious about the future is miserable.—Seneca.

A wise God shrouds the future in obscure darkness.—Horace.

Trust no future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
—Longfellow.

No one sees what is before his feet: we all gaze at the stars.—Cicero.

Man must have some fears, hopes, and cares, for the coming morrow.—Schiller.

O Death, O Beyond,
Thou art sweet, thou art strange!
Mrs. Browning.

We know what we are, but know not what we may be.—Shakespeare.

It is vain to be always looking toward the future and never acting toward it.—J. F. Boyes.

If there was no future life, our souls would not thirst for it.—Richter.

We are always looking into the future, but we see only the past.—Madame Swetchine.

Locked up from mortal eye in shady leaves of destiny.—Crashaw.

Another life, if it were not better than this, would be less a promise than a threat.—J. Petit-Senn.

We always live prospectively, never retrospectively, and there is no abiding moment.—Jacobi.

When all else is lost, the future still remains.—Bovee.

Who knows whether the gods will add to-morrow to the present hour? —Horace.

O heaven! that one might read the book of fate, and see the revolution of the times.—Shakespeare.

Age and sorrow have the gift of reading the future by the sad past.—Rev. J. Farrar.

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction and to rot.
—Shakespeare.

The great world's altar-stairs
That slope thro' darkness up to God.
—Tennyson.

It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,
And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
—Tennyson.

It is heaven itself that points out an hereafter, and intimates eternity to man.—Addison.

After us the deluge.—Mme. Pompadour.

The earth with its scarred face is the symbol of the past; the air and heaven, of futurity.—Coleridge.

The veil which covers the face of futurity is woven by the hand of mercy.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is no hope—the future will but turn
The old sand in the falling glass of time.
—R. H. Stoddard.

The state of that man's mind who feels too intense an interest as to future events, must be most deplorable.—Seneca.

The future does not come from before to meet us, but comes streaming up from behind over our heads.—Rahel.

It ever is the marked propensity of restless and aspiring minds to look into the stretch of dark futurity.—Joanna Baillie.

There is no divining-rod whose dip shall tell us at twenty what we shall most relish at thirty.—N. P. Willis.

How narrow our souls become when absorbed in any present good or ill! It is only the thought of the future that makes them great.—Richter.

No soul is bad enough for a fixed "hell," or good enough for a fixed "heaven," however useful the words may be as pointing to opposite states.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Sure there is none but fears a future state
And when the most obdurate swear they do not,
Their trembling hearts belie their boasting
tongues. —Dryden.

Oh, blindness to the future! kindly giv'n,
That each may fill the circle marked by Heaven. —Pope.

We may believe that we shall know each other's forms hereafter; and in the bright fields of the better land call the lost dead to us.—Willis.

There was a wise man in the East whose constant prayer was that he might see to-day with the eyes of to-morrow.—Alfred Mercier.

Nothing can be reckoned good or bad to us in this life, any further than it indisposes us for the enjoyment of another.—Atterbury.

It has been well observed that we should treat futurity as an aged friend from whom we expect a rich legacy.—Colton.

Cease to inquire what the future has in store, and to take as a gift whatever the day brings forth.—Horace.

The spirit of man, which God inspired, cannot together perish with this corporeal clod.—Milton.

Whatever improvement we make in ourselves, we are thereby sure to meliorate our future condition.—Paley.

Everything that looks to the future elevates human nature; for never is life so low or so little as when occupied with the present.—Landon.

May you live unenvied, and pass many pleasant years unknown to fame; and also have congenial friends.—Ovid.

God will not suffer man to have the knowledge of things to come; for if he had prescience of his prosperity, he would be careless; and, understanding of his adversity, he would be senseless.—St. Augustine.

Trust no future, howe'er pleasant;
Let the dead past bury its dead;
Act,—act in the living present,
Heart within and God o'erhead!
—Longfellow.

When the world dissolves,
And every creature shall be purified,
All places shall be hell that are not heaven. —Marlowe.

O if this were seen!
The happiest youth—viewing his progress through
What perils past, what crosses to ensue—
Would shut the book, and sit him down and die. —Shakespeare.

The golden age is not in the past, but in the future; not in the origin of human experience, but in its consummate flower; not opening in Eden, but out from Gethsemane.—Chapin.

There is, I know not how, in the minds of men, a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence, and this takes the deepest root, and is most discoverable, in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls.—Cicero.

Beyond this vale of tears
There is a life above,
Unmeasured by the flight of years;
And all that life is love.
—Montgomery.

Dear Land to which Desire forever flees;
Time doth no present to our grasp allow,
Say in the fixed Eternal shall we seize
At last the fleeting Now?
—Bulwer-Lytton.

The year goes wrong, and tares grow strong.
Hope starves without a crumb;
But God's time is our harvest time,
And that is sure to come.
—Lewis J. Bates.

But ask not bodies (doomed to die),
To what abode they go;
Since knowledge is but sorrow's spy,
It is not safe to know. —Davenant.

What a world were this How unendurable its weight, if they Whom Death hath sundered did not meet again!
—Southey.

We bewail our friends as if there were no better futurity yonder, and bewail ourselves as if there were no better futurity here; for all our passions are born atheists and infidels.—
Richter.

Look not mournfully into the past,
—it comes not back again; wisely improve the present,—it is thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear, and with a manly heart.
—Longfellow.

My mind can take no hold on the present world, nor rest in it a moment, but my whole nature rushes onward with irresistible force towards a future and better state of being.—
Fichte.

There is something beyond the grave; death does not put an end to everything, the dark shade escapes from the consumed pile.—Propertius.

The things of another world being distant, operate but faintly upon us:
to remedy this inconvenience, we must frequently revolve their certainty and importance.—Atterbury.

Some day Love shall claim his own,
Some day Right ascend his throne,
Some day hidden Truth be known;
Some day—some sweet day.
—Lewis J. Bates.

A. N. hopes in the next world for his felicity to live with Raphael, Mozart, and Goethe. But how can they be happy if they must live with him?
—Auerbach.

We live in the future. Even the happiness of the present is made up mostly of that delightful discontent which the hope of better things inspires.—J. G. Holland.

The present is never the mark of our designs. We use both past and present as our means and instruments, but the future only as our object and aim.—Pascal.

The search of our future being is but a needless, anxious, and uncertain haste to be knowing, sooner than we can, what, without all this solicitude, we shall know a little later.—
Pope.

Ah Christ, that it were possible
For one short hour to see
The souls we loved, that they might tell us
What and where they be. —Tennyson.

What after all remains, when life is sped,
And man is gathered to the silent dead?
Home to the narrow house, the long, long
sleep,
Where pain is stilled, and sorrow doth not weep. —William Winter.

O, that a man might know
The end of this day's business, ere it come!
But it sufficeth that the day will end,
And then the end is known.
—Shakespeare.

To me there is something thrilling and exalting in the thought that we are drifting forward into a splendid mystery,—into something that no mortal eye has yet seen, no intelligence has yet declared.—Chapin.

There's nae sorrow there, John,
There's neither cauld nor care, John,
The day is aye fair,
In the land o' the leal.

—Lady Nairne.

O heavens! that one might read the book of fate,
And see the revolutions of the times
Make mountains level, and the continent,
(Weary of solid firmness,) melt itself
Into the sea. —Shakespeare.

If you can look into the seeds of time,
And say which grain will grow, and which will not;
Speak then to me, who neither beg nor
fear
Your favors nor your hate.

—Shakespeare.

What cities, as great as this, have
* * * promised themselves immortality! posterity can hardly trace the situation of some. The sorrowful traveler wanders over the awful ruins of others.—Goldsmith.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

—Tennyson.

Divine wisdom, intending to detain us some time on earth, has done well to cover with a veil the prospect of life to come; for if our sight could clearly distinguish the opposite bank, who would remain on this tempestuous coast?—Madame de Staël.

It is one of God's blessings that we cannot foreknow the hour of our death; for a time fixed, even beyond the possibility of living, would trouble us more than doth this uncertainty.
—James the Sixth.

The future is lighted for us with the radiant colors of hope. Strife and sorrow shall disappear. Peace and love shall reign supreme. The dream of poets, the lesson of priest and prophet, the inspiration of the great musician, is confirmed in the light of modern knowledge.—John Fiske.

One might as well attempt to calculate mathematically the contingent forms of the tinkling bits of glass in a kaleidoscope as to look through the tube of the future and foretell its pattern.—Beecher.

The dread of something after death,
The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn
No traveller returns, puzzles the will;
And makes us rather bear those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of.
—Shakespeare.

Why will any man be so imperti-nently officious as to tell me all prospect of a future state is only fancy and delusion? Is there any merit in being the messenger of ill news? If it is a dream, let me enjoy it, since it makes me both the happier and better man.—Addison.

The grand difficulty is to feel the reality of both worlds, so as to give each its due place in our thoughts and feelings, to keep our mind's eye and our heart's eye ever fixed on the land of promise, without looking away from the road along which we are to travel toward it.—Hare.

The dead carry our thoughts to another and a nobler existence. They teach us, and especially by all the strange and seemingly untoward circumstances of their departure from this life, that they and we shall live in a future state forever.—Orville Dewey.

We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth; there is a realm where the rainbow never fades, where the stars will be spread before us like islands that slumber on the ocean,— and where the beings that pass before us like shadows will stay in our presence forever.—Bulwer-Lytton.

We are lead to the belief of a future state, not only by the weaknesses, by the hopes and fears of human nature, but by the noblest and best principles which belong to it,—by the love of virtue, and by the abhorrence of vice and injustice.—Adam Smith.

Futurity is impregnable to mortal ken: no prayer pierces through heaven's adamantine walls. Whether the birds fly right or left, whatever be the aspect of the stars, the book of nature is a maze, dreams are a lie, and every sign a falsehood.—Schiller.

While a man is stringing a harp, he tries the strings, not for music, but for construction. When it is finished it shall be played for melodies. God is fashioning the human heart for future joy. He only sounds a string here and there to see how far His work has progressed.—Beecher.

Since we stay not here, being people but of a day's abode, and our age is like that of a fly, and contemporary with that of a gourd, we must look somewhere else for an abiding city, a place in another country, to fix our house in, whose walls and foundation is God, where we must rest, or else be restless forever.—Jeremy Taylor.

God keeps a niche
In Heaven, to hold our idols; and albeit
He brake them to our faces, and denied That our close kisses should impair their white,—

I know we shall behold them raised complete,

The dust swept from their beauty, glorified,
New Memnons singing in the great God-light. —E. B. Browning.

If that marvellous microcosm, man, with all the costly cargo of his faculties and powers, were indeed a rich argosy, fitted out and freighted only for shipwreck and destruction, who amongst us that tolerate the present only from the hope of the future, who that have any aspirings of a high and intellectual nature about them, could be brought to submit to the disgusting mortifications of the voyage?—Colton.

The future is always fairyland to the young. Life is like a beautiful and winding lane, on either side bright flowers, and beautiful butterflies and tempting fruits, which we scarcely pause to admire and to taste, so eager are we to hasten to an opening which we imagine will be more beautiful still. But by degrees, as we advance, the trees grow bleak; the flowers and butterflies fail, the fruits disappear, and we find we have arrived—to reach a desert waste.—G. A. Sala.

There's a good time coming, boys;

A good time coming;

We may not live to see the day,
But earth shall glisten in the ray

Of the good time coming.

Cannon-balls may aid the truth,

But thought's a weapon stronger;

We'll win our battle by its aid,

Wait a little longer.

—Chas. Mackay.

Is there a rarer being,

Is there a fairer sphere

Where the strong are not unseeing,

And the harvests are not sere;

Where, ere the seasons dwindle

They yield their due return;

Where the lamps of knowledge kindle

While the flames of youth still burn?

—E. C. Stedman.

It is the "where I am" that makes heaven. The life after death might become through its very endlessness a burden to our spirits, if it were not to be filled with the infinite variety and freshness of God's love. Some have shrunk from its very infinitude, because they have not realized what God's love can make of it. Human love helps us to understand this. When we have come to love any one with all our power of affection, then there is no monotony or weariness in the days and hours we spend with them.—Maltbie Babcock.

G

Gaiety

Gaiety is often the reckless ripple over depths of despair.—Chapin.

Gaiety is the soul's health; sadness is its poison.—Stanislaus.

Gaiety pleases more when we are assured that it does not cover carelessness.—Mme. de Staël.

Some people are commended for a giddy kind of good-humor, which is as much a virtue as drunkenness.—Pope.

Leaves seem light and useless, and idle and wavering, and changeable—they even dance; yet God has made them part of the oak. In so doing, He has given us a lesson, not to deny the stout-heartedness within because we see the lightness without.—Leigh Hunt.

Gaiety is to good-humor as animal perfumes to vegetable fragrance. The one overpowers weak spirits, the other recreates and revives them. Gaiety seldom fails to give some pain; good-humor boasts no faculties which every one does not believe in his own power, and pleases principally by not offending.—Johnson.

Is there anything in life so lovely and poetical as the laugh and merriment of a young girl, who, still in harmony with all her powers, sports with you in luxuriant freedom, and in her mirthfulness neither despises nor dislikes? Her gravity is seldom as innocent as her playfulness; still less that haughty discontent which converts the youthful Psyche into a dull thick, buzzing, wing-drooping night-moth.—Richter.

Gain

For me to live is Christ, to die is gain.—Bible.

An evil gain equals a loss.—Syrus.

The elegant simplicity of the three per cents.—Lord Eldon.

A captive fetter'd at the oar of gain.—Falconer.

He who seeks for gain must be at some expense.—Plautus.

Counts his sure gains, and hurries back for more.—Montgomery.

Everywhere in life, the true question is not what we gain, but what we do.—Carlyle.

From others' slips some profit from one's self to gain.—Terence.

Little pains
In a due hour employ'd great profit yields.
—John Philips.

Men that hazard all
Do it in hope of fair advantages:
A golden mind stoops not to shows of dress.
—Shakespeare.

That, sir, which serves and seeks for gain,
And follows but for form,
Will pack, when it begins to rain,
And leave thee in a storm.
—Shakespeare.

Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee. Light gains make heavy purses. 'Tis good to be merry and wise.—George Chapman.

As to pay, sir, I beg leave to assure the Congress that as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to accept this arduous employment at the expense of my domestic ease and happiness, I do not wish to make any profit from it.—George Washington.

Gallantry

A gallant man is above ill words.—Selden.

Love is the smallest part of gallantry.—Rochefoucauld.

The gallantry of the mind consists in agreeable flattery.—Rochefoucauld.

Gallantry thrives most in the atmosphere of the court.—Mme. Necker.

Conscience has no more to do with gallantry than it has with politics.—Sheridan.

Gallantry, though a fashionable crime, is a very detestable one; and the wretch who pilfers from us in the hour of distress is an innocent character compared to the plunderer who wantonly robs us of happiness and reputation.—Rev. H. Kelley.

Gallantry to women (the sure road to their favor) is nothing but the appearance of extreme devotion to all their wants and wishes, a delight in their satisfaction, and a confidence in yourself as being able to contribute towards it. The slightest indifference with regard to them, or distrust of yourself is equally fatal.—Hazlitt.

Gambling

It is lost at dice, what ancient honor won.—Shakespeare.

Keep flax from fire, youth from gaming.—Franklin.

A heavy tax placed upon fools.—Castelar.

Games of chance are traps to catch schoolboy novices and gaping country squires, who begin with a guinea and end with a mortgage.—Cumberland.

European lotteries are the tax on fools.—Count Cavour.

The gambler is a moral suicide.—Colton.

Oh, this pernicious vice of gaming! —Ed. Moore.

Could fools to keep their own contrive,
On what, on whom could gamesters thrive?
—Gay.

Curst is the wretch enslaved to such a vice,
Who ventures life and soul upon the dice.
—Horace.

Lookers-on many times see more than gamesters.—Bacon.

The most patient man in loss, the most coldest that ever turned up ace.
—Shakespeare.

It is the child of avarice, the brother of iniquity, and the father of mischief.—Washington.

The gambler is more wicked as he is a greater proficient in his art.—Syrus.

What more than madness reigns, when one short sitting many hundreds drains.—Sir J. Davies.

There is but one good throw upon the dice, which is to throw them away.—Chatfield.

What honest man would not rather be the sufferer than the defrauder?—Richardson.

A mode of transferring property without producing any intermediate good.—Dr. Johnson.

Cards were at first for benefits designed,
Sent to amuse, not to enslave the mind.
—David Garrick.

Gambling with cards, or dice, or stocks, is all one thing—it is getting money without giving an equivalent for it.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Gaming finds a man a cully, and leaves him a knave.—T. Hughes.

A gamester, as such, is the cool, calculating, essential spirit of concentrated, avaricious selfishness.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The deal, the shuffle, and the cut.—Swift.

Gaming is the child of avarice, but the parent of prodigality.—Colton.

Our Quixote bard sets out a monster taming.

Arm'd at all points to fight that hydra, gaming. —David Garrick.

A gamester, the greater master he is in his art, the worse man he is.—Bacon.

Bets at first were fool-traps, where the wise like spiders lay in ambush for the flies.—Dryden.

Play not for gain, but sport. Who plays for more Than he can lose with pleasure, stakes his heart;
Perhaps his wife's too, and whom she hath bore. —Herbert.

All gaming, since it implies a desire to profit at the expense of another, involves a breach of the tenth commandment.—Whately.

Gaming is the destruction of all decorum; the prince forgets at it his dignity, and the lady her modesty.—Marchioness d'Alembert.

Look round, the wrecks of play behold,
Estates dismember'd, mortgag'd, sold!
Their owners now to jails confin'd,
Show equal poverty of mind. —Gay.

The gamester, if he die a martyr to his profession, is doubly ruined. He adds his soul to every other loss, and by the act of suicide, renounces earth to forfeit heaven.—Colton.

It is possible that a wise and good man may be prevailed on to game; but it is impossible that a professed gamester should be a wise and good man.—Lavater.

By gaming we lose both our time and treasure—two things most precious to the life of man.—Feltham.

Ay, rail at gaming—'tis a rich topic, and affords noble declamation. Go, preach against it in the city—you'll find a congregation in every tavern.—Ed. Moore.

Some play for gain; to pass time others play

For nothing; both play the fool, I say:
Nor time nor coin I'll lose, or idly spend;
Who gets by play, proves loser in the end. —Heath.

Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones;

Whose table earth, whose dice were human bones. —Byron.

A night of fretful passion may consume
All that thou hast of beauty's gentle bloom;
And one distemper'd hour of sordid fear
Print on thy brow the wrinkles of a year. —Sheridan.

I look upon every man as a suicide from the moment he takes the dice-box desperately in his hand; and all that follows in his fatal career from that time is only sharpening the dagger before he strikes it to his heart.—Cumberland.

It is well for gamesters that they are so numerous as to make a society of themselves; for it would be a strange abuse of terms to rank those among society at large, whose profession it is to prey upon all who compose it.—Cumberland.

The coldness of a losing gamester lessens the pleasure of the winner. I would no more play with a man that slighted his ill fortune than I would make love to a woman who undervalued the loss of her reputation.—Congreve.

Sports and gaming, whether pursued from a desire of gain or love of pleasure, are as ruinous to the temper and disposition of the party addicted to them, as they are to his fame and fortune.—Burton.

Gaming has been resorted to by the affluent as a refuge from ennui. It is a mental dram, and may succeed for a moment; but, like all other stimuli, it produces indirect debility.—Colton.

That reproach of modern times, that gulf of time and fortune, the passion for gaming, which is so often the refuge of the idle sons of pleasure and often, alas! the last resource of the ruined.—Blair.

I'll tell thee what it says; it calls me villain, a treacherous husband, a cruel father, a false brother; one lost to nature and her charities; or to say all in one short word, it calls me—gamester.—Ed. Moore.

The exercises I wholly condemn are dicing and carding, especially if you play for any great sum of money, or spend any time in them, or use to come to meetings in dicing-houses, where cheaters meet and cozen young gentlemen out of all their money.—Lord Herbert.

Gambling houses are temples where the most sordid and turbulent passions contend; there no spectator can be indifferent. A card or a small square of ivory interests more than the loss of an empire, or the ruin of an unoffending group of infants, and their nearest relatives.—Zimmermann.

Gaming is a kind of tacit confession that the company engaged therein do in general exceed the bounds of their respective fortunes, and therefore they cast lots to determine upon whom the ruin shall at present fall, that the rest may be saved a little longer.—Blackstone.

Be assured that, although men of eminent genius have been guilty of all other vices, none worthy of more than a secondary name has ever been a gamester. Either an excess of avarice or a deficiency of what, in physics, is called excitability, is the cause of it; neither of which can exist in the same bosom with genius, with patriotism, or with virtue.—Landor.

There is nothing that wears out a fine lace like the vigils of the card table, and those cutting passions which naturally attend them. Hollow eyes, haggard looks and pale complexions are the natural indications.—Steele.

Gaming is a vice the more dangerous as it is deceitful; and, contrary to every other species of luxury, flatters its votaries with the hopes of increasing their wealth; so that avarice itself is so far from securing us against its temptations that it often betrays the more thoughtless and giddy part of mankind into them.—Fielding.

An assembly of the states, a court of justice, shows nothing so serious and grave as a table of gamesters playing very high; a melancholy solicitude clouds their looks; envy and rancor agitate their minds while the meeting lasts, without regard to friendship, alliances, birth or distinctions.—Bryere.

If thy desire to raise thy fortunes encourage thy delights to the casts of fortune, be wise betimes, lest thou repent too late; what thou gettest, thou gainest by abused providence; what thou lovest, thou losest by abused patience; what thou winnest is prodigally spent; what thou lovest is prodigally lost; it is an evil trade that prodigality drives; and a bad voyage where the pilot is blind.—Quarles.

This is a vice which is productive of every possible evil, equally injurious to the morals and health of its votaries. It is the child of avarice, the brother of iniquity, and the father of mischief. It has been the ruin of many worthy families, the loss of many a man's honor, and the cause of suicide. To all those who enter the lists, it is equally fascinating. The successful gamester pushes his good fortune, till it is overtaken by a reverse. The losing gamester, in hopes of retrieving past misfortunes, goes on from bad to worse, till, grown desperate, he pushes at everything and loses his all. In a word, few gain by this abominable practice, while thousands are injured.—George Washington.

Games

As to cards and dice, I think the safest and best way is never to learn to play upon them, and so to be incapacitated for those dangerous temptations and encroaching wasters of time.—Locke.

Let the world have their May games, wakes, and whatever sports and recreations please them, provided they be followed with discretion.—Robert Burton.

Games lubricate the body and the mind.—Franklin.

Games are good or bad as to their nature; all may be perverted.—Dr. Johnson.

It is wonderful to see persons of sense passing away a dozen hours together in shuffling and dividing a pack of cards.—Addison.

The games of the ancient Greeks were, in their original institutions, religious solemnities.—Brande.

Garden

God the first garden made, and the first city, Cain.—Cowley.

And add to these retired Leisure,
That in trim gardens takes his pleasure.
—Milton.

The garden lies,
A league of grass, wash'd by a slow broad stream.
—Tennyson.

My garden is a forest ledge
Which older forests bound;
The banks slope down to the blue lake-edge,
Then plunge to depths profound!
—Emerson.

A little garden square and wall'd;
And in it throve an ancient evergreen.
A yew-tree, and all round it ran a walk
Of shingle, and a walk divided it.
—Tennyson.

His gardens next your admiration call,
On every side you look, behold the wall!
No pleasing intricacies intervene,
No artful wildness to perplex the scene;
Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother,
And half the platform just reflects the other.
The suffering eye inverted nature sees,
Trees cut to statues, statues thick as trees;
With here a fountain, never to be play'd,
And there a summer-house that knows no shade.
—Pope.

A garden, sir, wherein all rain-bowed flowers were heaped together.—Charles Kingsley.

The splash and stir
Of fountains spouted up and showering down
In meshes of the jasmine and the rose:
And all about us peal'd the nightingale,
Rapt in her song, and careless of the snare.
—Tennyson.

An album is a garden, not for show
Planted, but use; where wholesome herbs should grow.—Charles Lamb.

Who loves a garden loves a greenhouse, too.—Cowper.

Generosity

Generosity is only benevolence in practice.—Bishop Ken.

Generosity is more charitable than wealth.—Joseph Roux.

One can love any man that is generous.—Leigh Hunt.

Generosity is the flower of justice.
—Hawthorne.

Bounty, being free itself, thinks all others so.—Shakespeare.

Our generosity never should exceed our abilities.—Cicero.

The secret pleasure of a generous act is the great mind's great bribe.—Dryden.

It is not enough to help the feeble up, but to support him after.—Shakespeare.

In this world, it is not what we take up, but what we give up, that makes us rich.—Beecher.

A giving hand, though foul, shall have fair praise.—Shakespeare.

* Some are unwisely liberal; and more delight to give presents than to pay debts.—Sir P. Sidney.

Almost always the most indigent are the most generous.—Stanislaus.

If there be any truer measure of a man than by what he does, it must be by what he gives.—South.

To give awkwardly is churlishness. The most difficult part is to give, then why not add a smile?—La Bruyère.

Generosity, wrong placed, becometh a vice; a princely mind will undo a private family.—Fuller.

The truly generous is the truly wise; And he who loves not others, lives unblest.
—Horace.

Bounty always receives part of its value from the manner it is bestowed.—Dr. Johnson.

A man who suddenly becomes generous may please fools, but he will not deceive the wise.—Phædrus.

Many men have been capable of doing a wise thing, more a cunning thing, but very few a generous thing.—Alexander Pope.

Generosity, to be perfect, should always be accompanied by a dash of humor.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Generosity is the accompaniment of high birth; pity and gratitude are its attendants.—Corneille.

For his bounty, there was no winter in it; an autumn 'twas that grew the more by reaping.—Shakespeare.

What seems generosity is often disguised ambition, that despises small to run after greater interests.—Rochefoucauld.

How much easier it is to be generous than just! Men are sometimes bountiful who are not honest.—Junius.

In giving, a man receives more than he gives; and the more is in proportion to the worth of the thing given.—George MacDonald.

O the world is but a word; were it all yours to give it in a breath, how quickly were it gone!—Shakespeare.

Men of the noblest dispositions think themselves happiest when others share their happiness with them.—Duncan.

The generous who is always just, and the just who is always generous, may, unannounced, approach the throne of heaven.—Lavater.

When you give, take to yourself no credit for generosity, unless you deny yourself something in order that you may give.—Henry Taylor.

To be generous, guiltless, and of a free disposition is to take those things for bird-bolts that you deem cannon-bullets.—Shakespeare.

No one ever sowed the grain of generosity who gathered not up the harvest of the desire of his heart.—Saadi.

Wherever I find a great deal of gratitude in a poor man, I take it for granted there would be as much generosity if he were a rich man.—Pope.

Let us proportion our alms to our ability, lest we provoke God to proportion His blessings to our alms.—Beveridge.

They that do an act that does deserve requital pay first themselves the stock of such content.—Sir Robert Howard.

Any one may do a casual act of good-nature; but a continuation of them shows it a part of the temperament.—Sterne.

There were in him candor and generosity, which, unless tempered by due moderation, lead to ruin.—Tacitus.

There is a greatness in being generous, and there is only simple justice in satisfying creditors. Generosity is the part of the soul raised above the vulgar.—Goldsmith.

He who gives what he would as readily throw away gives without generosity; for the essence of generosity is in self-sacrifice.—Henry Taylor.

It is a pleasure appropriate to man for him to save a fellow-man, and gratitude is acquired in no better way.—Ovid.

All my experience of the world teaches me that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the safe side and the just side of a question is the generous side and the merciful side.—Mrs. Jameson.

True generosity is a duty as indispensably necessary as those imposed upon us by the law. It is a rule imposed upon us by reason, which should be the sovereign law of a rational being.—Goldsmith.

Generosity, when once set going, knows not how to stop; as the more familiar we are with the lovely form, the more enamored we become of her charms.—Pliny the Younger.

God blesses still the generous thought
And still the fitting word He speeds,
And truth, at His requiring taught,
He quickens into deeds. —Whittier.

It is good to be unselfish and generous; but don't carry that too far. It will not do to give yourself to be melted down for the benefit of the tallow-trade; you must know where to find yourself.—George Eliot.

A friend to everybody is often a friend to nobody, or else in his simplicity he robs his family to help strangers, and becomes brother to a beggar. There is wisdom in generosity, as in everything else.—Spurgeon.

He that gives all, though but little, gives much; because God looks not to the quantity of the gift, but to the quality of the givers; he that desires to give more than he can hath equaled his gift to his desire, and hath given more than he hath.—Quarles.

The reputation of generosity is to be purchased pretty cheap; it does not depend so much upon a man's general expense, as it does upon his giving handsomely where it is proper to give at all. A man, for instance, who should give a servant four shillings would pass for covetous, while he who gave him a crown would be reckoned generous; so that the difference of those two opposite characters turns upon one shilling.—Chesterfield.

One great reason why men practice generosity so little in the world is their finding so little there. Generosity is catching; and if so many men escape it, it is in a great degree from the same reason the countrymen escape the smallpox,—because they meet no one to give it to them.—Greville.

There is a story of some mountains of salt in Cumana, which never diminished, though carried away in much abundance by merchants; but when once they were monopolized to the benefit of a private purse, then the salt decreased, till afterward all were allowed to take of it, when it had a new access and increase. The truth of this story may be uncertain, but the application is true; he that envies others the use of his gifts decays then, but he thrives most that is most diffusive.—Spencer.

Genius

Genius is only great patience.—Bulfinch.

Genius is universal.—David Dudley Field.

Genius does not herd with genius.—O. W. Holmes.

Genius is independent of situation.—Churchill.

Genius involves both envy and calumny.—Pope.

Genius speaks only to genius.—Stanislaus.

A happy genius is the gift of nature.—Dryden.

No enemy is so terrible as a man of genius.—Disraeli.

Genius is intensity.—Balzac.

Genius, even, as it is the greatest good, is the greatest harm.—Emerson.

Genius can never despise labor.—
Abel Stevens.

Genius, like humanity, rusts for want of use.—Hazlitt.

Genius has no brother.—Bulwer-
Lytton.

Genius must be born, and never can be taught.—Dryden.

The faculty of growth.—Coleridge.

Genius points the way; talent pursues it.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Genius is ever a riddle to itself.—
Richter.

All great men are in some degree inspired.—Cicero.

One genius has made many clever artists.—Martial.

Genius is clairvoyant.—Abel Stevens.

The freemasonry of genius.—Moses Harvey.

To do what is impossible for talent is the mark of genius.—Amiel.

Genius is that in whose power a man is.—Lowell.

Genius only leaves behind it the monuments of its strength.—Hazlitt.

Genius can only breathe freely in an atmosphere of freedom.—John Stuart Mill.

Great geniuses have the shortest biographies.—Emerson.

The lamp of genius burns quicker than the lamp of life.—Schiller.

The honors of genius are eternal.—
Propertius.

We measure genius by quality, not by quantity.—Wendell Phillips.

Courage of soul is necessary for the triumphs of genius.—Mme. de Staël.

No age is shut against great genius.
—Seneca.

Genius is mainly an affair of energy.—Matthew Arnold.

Genius is always more suggestive than expressive.—Abel Stevens.

Talent should minister to genius.—
Robert Browning.

Patience is a necessary ingredient of genius.—Beaconsfield.

Genius, in one respect, is like gold—numbers of persons are constantly writing about both, who have neither.
—Colton.

A woman must be a genius to create a good husband.—Balzac.

Taste consists in the power of judging; genius in the power of executing.
—Blair.

There are no laws by which we can write Iliads.—Ruskin.

Genius is not a single power, but a combination of great powers.—Whipple.

Genius does what it must; and talent does what it can.—Owen Meredith.

The path of genius is not less obstructed with disappointment than that of ambition.—Voltaire.

One science only will one genius fit,
so vast is art, so narrow human wit.
—Pope.

Genius of the highest kind implies an unusual intensity of the modifying power.—Coleridge.

There is no great genius free from some tincture of madness.—Seneca.

Genius, thou gift of Heaven! thou light divine!—Crabbe.

The proportion of genius to the vulgar is like one to a million.—Lavater.

Nature is the master of talent; genius is the master of nature.—J. G. Holland.

Genius is the highest type of reason—talent the highest type of the understanding.—Hickok.

Genius, the Pythian of the beautiful, leaves its large truths a riddle to the dull.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Genius is an immense capacity for taking trouble.—Carlyle.

Genius is the gold in the mine, talent is the miner who works and brings it out.—Lady Blessington.

The first and last thing which is required of genius is the love of truth.—Goethe.

Genius always gives its best at first, prudence at last.—Lavater.

The life of great geniuses is nothing but a sublime storm.—George Sand.

I know no such thing as genius—genius is nothing but labor and diligence.—Hogarth.

Philosophy becomes poetry, and science imagination, in the enthusiasm of genius.—Isaac Disraeli.

Genius unexerted is no more genius than a bushel of acorns is a forest of oaks.—Beecher.

Many men of genius must arise before a particular man of genius can appear.—Isaac Disraeli.

Fortune has rarely condescended to be the companion of genius.—Isaac Disraeli.

Genius in poverty is never feared, because nature, though liberal in her gifts in one instance, is forgetful in another.—B. R. Haydon.

Every man who observes vigilantly and resolves steadfastly, grows unconsciously into genius.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A man of genius is inexhaustible only in proportion as he is always re-nourishing his genius.—Bulwer-Lytton.

He alone can claim this name, who writes
With fancy high, and bold and daring
Flights. —Horace.

Intelligence is to genius as the whole is in proportion to its part.—De La Bruyère.

Genius is essentially creative; it bears the stamp of the individual who possesses it.—Mme. de Staël.

Wit is the god of moments, but Genius is the god of ages.—La Bruyère.

Steady work turns genius to a loom.—George Eliot.

It is the privilege of genius that to it life never grows commonplace as to the rest of us.—Lowell.

Genius—the free and harmonious play of all the faculties of a human being.—Alcott.

Genius does not care much for a set of explicit regulations, but that does not mean that genius is lawless.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Many a genius has been slow of growth. Oaks that flourish for a thousand years do not spring up into beauty like a reed.—George Henry Lewes.

The scorn of genius is the most arrogant and the most boundless of all scorn.—Ouida.

Genius is inconsiderate, self-relying, and, like unconscious beauty, without any intention to please.—Isaac Mayer Wise.

Genius is subject to the same laws which regulate the production of cotton and molasses.—Macaulay.

Of the three requisitions of genius, the first is soul, and the second, soul, and the third, soul.—E. P. Whipple.

Genius finds its own road and carries its own lamp.—Willmott.

Heaven and earth, advantages and obstacles, conspire to educate genius.—Fuseli.

Genius may be almost defined as the faculty of acquiring poverty.—Whipple.

Genius is the power of carrying the feelings of childhood into the powers of manhood.—Coleridge.

Genius makes its observations in shorthand; talent writes them out at length.—Bovee.

The miracles of genius always rest on profound convictions which refuse to be analyzed.—Emerson.

How often we see the greatest genius buried in obscurity!—Plautus.

Genius may at times want the spur, but it stands as often in need of the curb.—Longinus.

There is genius as well in virtue as in intellect. 'Tis the doctrine of faith over works.—Emerson.

That genius is feeble which cannot hold its own before the masterpieces of the world.—T. W. Higginson.

Genius is always impatient of its harness; its wild blood makes it hard to train.—Holmes.

The gifts of genius are far greater than the givers themselves venture to suppose.—Moses Harvey.

Genius is lonely without the surrounding presence of a people to inspire it.—T. W. Higginson.

Men of genius are often dull and inert in society, as the blazing meteor when it descends to the earth is only a stone.—Longfellow.

A man of genius may sometimes suffer a miserable sterility; but at other times he will feel himself the magician of thought.—John Foster.

Genius cannot escape the taint of its time more than a child the influence of its begetting.—Ouida.

Refined taste forms a good critic; but genius is further necessary to form the poet or the orator.—Blair.

There is none but he whose being I do fear; and, under him, my genius is rebuked, as it is said Antony's was by Cæsar.—Shakespeare.

It is in the heart that God has placed the genius of women, because the works of this genius are all works of love.—Lamartine.

Genius is rarely found without some mixture of eccentricity, as the strength of spirit is proved by the bubbles on its surface.—Mrs. Balfour.

His genius quite obscured the brightest ray Of human thought, as Sol's effulgent beams At morn's approach, extinguished all the stars.—R. Wynn.

The finest flowers of genius have grown in an atmosphere where those of Nature are prone to droop, and difficult to bring to maturity.—Dr. Guthrie.

The greatest genius is never so great as when it is chastised and subdued by the highest reason.—Colton.

Talent, lying in the understanding, is often inherent; genius, being the action of reason and imagination, rarely or never.—Coleridge.

There is hardly a more common error than that of taking the man who has but one talent for a genius.—Arthur Helps.

Some have the temperament and tastes of genius, without its creative power. They feel acutely, but express tamely.—Bulwer.

The true characteristic of genius—without despising rules, it knows when and how to break them.—Channing.

Genius has its fatality. Must we not see in its works a manifestation of the will of Providence?—Arsène Housaye.

When a true genius appears in the world you may know him by this sign, that the dunces are all in confederacy against him.—Swift.

Genius, like a torch, shines less in the broad daylight of the present than in the night of the past.—J. Petit-Senn.

Talent wears well, genius wears itself out; talent drives a brougham in fact; genius, a sun-chariot in fancy.—Ouida.

Not oft near home does genius brightly shine,
No more than precious stones while in the mine. —Omar Khayyam.

Genius and its rewards are briefly told:
A liberal nature and a niggard doom,
A difficult journey to a splendid tomb.
—Forster.

Genius inspires this thirst for fame: there is no blessing undesired by those to whom Heaven gave the means of winning it.—Mme. de Staël.

To think and to feel, constitute the two grand divisions of men of genius—the men of reasoning and the men of imagination.—Isaac Disraeli.

Men of humor are always in some degree men of genius; wits are rarely so, although a man of genius may, amongst other gifts, possess wit, as Shakespeare.—Coleridge.

Men of genius are rarely much annoyed by the company of vulgar people, because they have a power of looking at such persons as objects of amusement of another race altogether.—Coleridge.

Latent genius is but a presumption. Everything that can be, is bound to come into being, and what never comes into being is nothing.—Amiel.

It is the habit of party in England to ask the alliance of a man of genius, but to follow the guidance of a man of character.—Lord John Russell.

The very thrills of genius are disorganizing. The body is never quite acclimated to its atmosphere, but how often succumbs and goes into a decline.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Eccentricity is not a proof of genius, and even an artist should remember that originality consists not only in doing things differently, but also in "doing things better."—Stedman.

This is the highest miracle of genius, that things which are not should be as though they were, that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another.—Macaulay.

There is no work of genius which has not been the delight of mankind, no word of genius to which the human heart and soul have not, sooner or later, responded.—Lowell.

Many have genius, but, wanting art, are forever dumb. The two must go together to form the great poet, painter, or sculptor.—Longfellow.

It is good sense applied with diligence to what was at first a mere accident, and which by great application grew to be called, by the generality of mankind, a particular genius.—Johnson.

This is the method of genius, to ripen fruit for the crowd by those rays of whose heat they complain.—Margaret Fuller.

The greatest geniuses have always attributed everything to God, as if conscious of being possessed of a spark of His divinity.—B. R. Haydon.

Men of genius are often considered superstitious, but the fact is, the fineness of their nerve renders them more alive to the supernatural than ordinary men.—B. R. Haydon.

Genius is only as rich as it is generous. If it hoards, it impoverishes itself. What the banker sighs for, the meanest clown may have—leisure and a quiet mind.—Henry D. Thoreau.

So far from genius discarding law, rather is it the supreme joy of genius to re-enact the eternal and unwritten law in the chamber of its own intellect.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Rising genius always shoots forth its rays from among clouds and vapors, but these will gradually roll away and disappear as it ascends to its steady and meridian lustre.—Washington Irving.

Men of genius do not excel in any profession because they labor in it, but they labor in it because they excel.—Hazlitt.

Unpretending mediocrity is good, and genius is glorious; but the weak flavor of genius in a person essentially common is detestable.—Holmes.

Genius, that power which constitutes a poet; that quality without which judgment is cold and knowledge is inert; that energy which collects, combines, amplifies and animates.—Johnson.

There never appear more than five or six men of genius in an age, but if they were united the world could not stand before them.—Swift.

With the offspring of genius, the law of parturition is reversed; the throes are in the conception, the pleasure in the birth.—Colton.

A nation does wisely, if not well, in starving her men of genius. Fatten them, and they are done for.—Charles Buxton.

Without a genius, learning soars in vain; And, without learning, genius sinks again; Their force united, crowns the sprightly reign. —Elphinstone.

Every age might perhaps produce one or two geniuses, if they were not sunk under the censure and obloquy of plodding, servile, imitating pedants.—Swift.

Genius grafted on womanhood is like to overgrow it and break its stem, as you may see a grafted fruit-tree spreading over the stock which cannot keep pace with its evolutions.—Holmes.

But the sublime, when it is introduced at a seasonable moment, has often carried all before it with the rapidity of lightning, and shown at a glance the mighty power of genius.—Longinus.

Genius is allied to a warm and inflammable constitution; delicacy of taste, to calmness and sedateness. Hence it is common to find genius in one who is a prey to every passion.—Lord Kames.

To be endowed with strength by nature, to be actuated by the powers of the mind, and to have a certain spirit almost divine infused into you.—Cicero.

Who in the same given time can produce more than many others, has vigor; who can produce more and better, has talents; who can produce what none else can, has genius.—Lavater.

Genius, without religion, is only a lamp on the outer gate of a palace. It may serve to cast a gleam of light on those that are without while the inhabitant sits in darkness.—Hannah More.

Genius is supposed to be a power of producing excellences which are out of the reach of the rules of art: a power which no precepts can teach, and which no industry can acquire.—Sir J. Reynolds.

Genius, with all its pride in its own strength, is but a dependent quality, and cannot put forth its whole powers nor claim all its honors without an amount of aid from the talents and labors of others which it is difficult to calculate.—Bryant.

As what we call genius arises out of the disproportionate power and size of a certain faculty, so the great difficulty lies in harmonizing with it the rest of the character.—Mrs. Jameson.

The drafts which true genius draws upon posterity, although they may not always be honored so soon as they are due, are sure to be paid with compound interest in the end.—Colton.

And genius hath electric power,
Which earth can never tame;
Bright suns may scorch, and dark clouds lower—
Its flash is still the same.

—Lydia M. Child.

The highest genius never flowers in satire, but culminates in sympathy with that which is best in human nature, and appeals to it.—Chapin.

Genius is intensity of life; an overflowing vitality which floods and fertilizes a continent or a hemisphere of being; which makes a nature many-sided and whole, while most men remain partial and fragmentary.—Hamilton W. Mabie.

There are two kinds of genius. The first and highest may be said to speak out of the eternal to the present, and must compel its age to understand it; the second understands its age, and tells it what it wishes to be told.—Lowell.

Men of the greatest genius are not always the most prodigal of their encomiums. But then it is when their range of power is confined, and they have in fact little perception, except of their own particular kind of excellence.—Hazlitt.

Genius is nothing more than our common faculties refined to a greater intensity. There are no astonishing ways of doing astonishing things. All astonishing things are done by ordinary materials.—B. R. Haydon.

Obey thy genius, for a minister it is unto the throne of fate. Draw to thy soul, and centralize the rays which are around of the Divinity.—Bailey.

The productions of a great genius, with many lapses and inadvertences, are infinitely preferable to the works of an inferior kind of author which are scrupulously exact, and conformable to all the rules of correct writing.—Addison.

The effusions of genius, or rather the manifestations of what is called talent, are often the effects of distempered nerves and complexional spleen, as pearls are morbid secretions.—Robert Walsh.

The light of genius is sometimes so resplendent as to make a man walk through life amid glory and acclamation; but it burns very dimly and low when carried into "the valley of the shadow of death."—Mountford.

Genius does not seem to derive any great support from syllogisms. Its carriage is free; its manner has a touch of inspiration. We see it come, but we never see it walk.—Count de Maistre.

It is interesting to notice how some minds seem almost to create themselves, springing up under every disadvantage, and working their solitary but irresistible way through a thousand obstacles.—Washington Irving.

The effusions of genius are entitled to admiration rather than applause, as they are chiefly the effect of natural endowment, and sometimes appear to be almost involuntary.—W. B. Clu-low.

Genius never grows old—young to-day, mature yesterday, vigorous to-morrow, always immortal. It is peculiar to no sex or condition, and is the divine gift to woman no less than to man.—Juan Lewis.

We declare to you that the earth has exhausted its contingent of master spirits. Now for decadence and general closing. We must make up our minds to it. We shall have no more men of genius.—Victor Hugo.

As diamond cuts diamond, and one hone smooths a second, all the parts of intellect are whetstones to each other; and genius, which is but the result of their mutual sharpening, is character, too.—C. A. Bartol.

Genius is to other gifts what the carbuncle is to the precious stones. It sends forth its own light, whereas other stones only reflect borrowed light.—A. Schopenhauer.

Some very dull and sad people have genius though the world may not count it as such; a genius for love, or for patience, or for prayer, maybe. We know the divine spark is here and there in the world: who shall say under what manifestations, or humble disguise!—Anne Isabella Thackeray.

Genius, indeed, melts many ages into one, and thus effects something permanent, yet still with a similarity of office to that of the more ephemeral writer. A work of genius is but the newspaper of a century, or perchance of a hundred centuries.—Hawthorne.

High original genius is always ridiculed on its first appearance; most of all by those who have won themselves the highest reputation in working on the established lines. Genius only commands recognition when it has created the taste which is to appreciate it.—Froude.

All the means of action, the shapeless masses—the materials—lie everywhere about us. What we need is the celestial fire to change the flint into transparent crystal, bright and clear. That fire is genius!—Longfellow.

The light of genius never sets, but sheds itself upon other faces, in different hues of splendor. Homer glows in the softened beauty of Virgil, and Spenser revives in the decorated learning of Gray.—Willmott.

The richest genius, like the most fertile soil, when uncultivated, shoots up into the rankest weeds; and instead of vines and olives for the pleasure and use of man, produces to its slothful owner the most abundant crop of poisons.—Hume.

The wild force of genius has often been fated by Nature to be finally overcome by quiet strength. The volcano sends up its red bolt with terrific force, as if it would strike the stars; but the calm, resistless hand of gravitation seizes it and brings it to the earth.—Bayne.

Was genius ever ungrateful? Mere talents are dry leaves, tossed up and down by gusts of passion, and scattered and swept away; but Genius lies on the bosom of Memory, and Gratitude at her feet.—Landor.

The whole genius of an author consists in describing well, and delineating character well. Homer, Plato, Virgil, Horace only excel other writers by their expressions and images; we must indicate what is true if we mean to write naturally, forcibly and delicately.—La Bruyère.

Genius, without work, is certainly a dumb oracle; and it is unquestionably true that the men of the highest genius have invariably been found to be amongst the most plodding, hard-working, and intent men—their chief characteristic apparently consisting simply in their power of laboring more intensely and effectively than others.—Samuel Smiles.

The very greatest genius, after all, is not the greatest thing in the world, any more than the greatest city in the world is the country or the sky. It is the concentration of some of its greatest powers, but it is not the greatest diffusion of its might. It is not the habit of its success, the stability of its serenity.—Leigh Hunt.

Genius is not a single power, but a combination of great powers. It reasons, but it is not reasoning; it judges, but it is not judgment; it imagines, but it is not imagination; it feels deeply and fiercely, but it is not passion. It is neither, because it is all.—Whipple.

All are to be men of genius in their degree,—rivulets or rivers, it does not matter, so that the souls be clear and pure; not dead walls encompassing dead heaps of things, known and numbered, but running waters in the sweet wilderness of things unnumbered and unknown, conscious only of the living banks, on which they partly refresh and partly reflect the flowers, and so pass on.—Ruskin.

Neither can we admit that definition of genius that some would propose—"a power to accomplish all that we undertake;" for we might multiply examples to prove that this definition of genius contains more than the thing defined. Cicero failed in poetry, Pope in painting, Addison in oratory; yet it would be harsh to deny genius to these men.—Colton.

When the great Kepler had at length discovered the harmonic laws that regulate the motions of the heavenly bodies, he exclaimed: "Whether my discoveries will be read by posterity or by my contemporaries is a matter that concerns them more than me. I may well be contented to wait one century for a reader, when God Himself, during so many thousand years, has waited for an observer like myself."—Macaulay.

What we call genius may, perhaps, in more strict propriety, be described as the spirit of discovery. Genius is the very eye of intellect and the wing of thought. It is always in advance of its time. It is the pioneer for the generation which it precedes. For this reason it is called a seer—and hence its songs have been prophecies.—Simms.

As well might a lovely woman look daily in her mirror, yet not be aware of her beauty, as a great soul be unconscious of the powers with which Heaven has gifted him; not so much for himself, as to enlighten others—a messenger from God Himself, with a high and glorious mission to perform. Woe unto him who abuses that mission!—Chambers.

There is nothing so remote from vanity as true genius. It is almost as natural for those who are endowed with the highest powers of the human mind to produce the miracles of art, as for other men to breathe or move. Correggio, who is said to have produced some of his divinest works almost without having seen a picture, probably did not know that he had done anything extraordinary.—Hazlitt.

Genius! thou gift of Heav'n! thou Light divine!
Amid what dangers art thou doom'd to shine!
Oft will the body's weakness check thy force,
Oft damp thy Vigour, and impede thy course;
And trembling nerves compel thee to restrain
Thy noble efforts, to contend with pain;
Or Woe (sad guest!) will in thy presence come,
And breathe around her melancholy gloom:
To Life's low cares will thy proud thought confine,
And make her sufferings, her impatience, thine.
—Crabbe.

The whole difference between a man of genius and other men, it has been said a thousand times, and most truly, is that the first remains in great part a child, seeing with the large eyes of children, in perpetual wonder, not conscious of much knowledge—conscious, rather, of infinite ignorance, and yet infinite power; a fountain of eternal admiration, delight, and creative force within him meeting the ocean of visible and governable things around him.—Ruskin.

The only difference between a genius and one of common capacity is that the former anticipates and explores what the latter accidentally hits upon. But even the man of genius himself more frequently employs the advantages that chance presents to him. It is the lapidary that gives value to the diamond, which the peasant has dug up without knowing its worth.—Abbé Raynal.

Nature seems to delight in disappointing the assiduities of art, with which it would rear dulness to maturity, and to glory in the vigor and luxuriance of her chance productions. She scatters the seeds of genius to the winds, and though some may perish among the stony places of the world, and some may be choked by the thorns and brambles of early adversity, yet others will now and then strike root even in the clefts of the rock, struggle bravely up into sunshine, and spread over their sterile birthplace all the beauties of vegetation.—Washington Irving.

Gentility

How weak a thing is gentility, if it wants virtue.—Fuller.

There cannot be a surer proof of low origin, or of an innate meanness of disposition, than to be always talking and thinking of being genteel.—Hazlitt.

I would have you not stand so much on your gentility, which is an airy and mere borrowed thing from dead men's dust and bones; and none of yours except you make and hold it.—Ben Jonson.

Gentleman

He is gentle that doth gentle deeds.—Chaucer.

The gentleman is a Christian product.—George H. Calvert.

An affable and courteous gentleman.—Shakespeare.

The prince of darkness is a gentleman.—Marlowe.

His tribe were God Almighty's gentlemen.—Dryden.

Since every Jack became a gentleman, there's many a gentle person made a Jack.—Shakespeare.

To make a fine gentleman, several trades are required, but chiefly a barber.—Goldsmith.

When Adam dolve and Eva span
Who was then the gentleman?
—Pegge.

The look of a gentleman is little else than the reflection of the looks of the world.—Hazlitt.

Education begins the gentleman, but reading, good company, and reflection must finish him.—Locke.

He is the best gentleman who is the son of his own deserts.—Victor Hugo.

The gentleman is solid mahogany; the fashionable man is only veneer.—J. G. Holland.

He whom we call a gentleman is no longer the man of Nature.—Diderot.

There is no man that can teach us to be gentlemen better than Joseph Addison.—Thackeray.

He that bears himself like a gentleman, is Worth to have been born a gentleman.—Chapman.

Gentleman is a term which does not apply to any station, but to the mind and the feelings in every station.—Talfourd.

Repose and cheerfulness are the badge of the gentleman—repose in energy.—Emerson.

In a word, to be a fine gentleman is to be a generous and brave man.—Steele.

The gentle minde by gentle deeds is knowne;
For a man by nothing is so well bewrayed
As by his manners. —Spenser.

It is difficult to believe that a true gentleman will ever become a gamester, a libertine, or a sot.—Chapin.

Tho' modest, on his unembarrass'd brow Nature had written—"Gentleman."
—Byron.

Oh! St. Patrick was a gentleman,
Who came of decent people.
—Henry Bennett.

The taste of beauty and the relish of what is decent, just, and amiable perfects the character of the gentleman and the philosopher.—Shaftesbury.

A gentleman is always a gentleman; but the butterflies of society differ as much in their moods as does that insect in its colors.—Mme. Du Fresnoy.

My master hath been an honorable gentleman: tricks he hath had in him which gentlemen have.—Shakespeare.

Religion is the most gentlemanly thing in the world. It alone will gentlize, if unmixed with cant.—Coleridge.

The grand old name of gentleman
Defam'd by every charlatan
And soil'd with all ignoble use.
—Tennyson.

We sometimes meet an original gentleman, who, if manners had not existed, would have invented them.—Emerson.

He had then the grace, too rare in every clime,
Of being, without alloy of fop or beau,
A finish'd gentleman from top to toe.
—Byron.

We are gentlemen,
That neither in our hearts, nor outward eyes,
Envy the great, nor do the low despise.
—Shakespeare.

Propriety of manners and consideration for others are the two main characteristics of a gentleman.—Beaconsfield.

Men of courage, men of sense, and men of letters are frequent; but a true gentleman is what one seldom sees.—Steele.

A gentleman is one who understands and shows every mark of deference to the claims of self-love in others, and exacts it in return from them.—Hazlitt.

God knows that all sorts of gentlemen knock at the door; but whenever used in strictness and with any emphasis, the name will be found to point at original energy.—Emerson.

Perhaps propriety is as near a word as any to denote the manners of the gentleman; elegance is necessary to the fine gentleman; dignity is proper to noblemen, and majesty to kings.—Hazlitt.

The flowering of civilization is the finished man, the man of sense, of grace, of accomplishment, of social power—the gentleman.—Emerson.

A gentleman has ease without familiarity, is respectful without meanness; genteel without affectation, insinuating without seeming art.—Chessterfield.

The best of men
That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer;
A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit.
The first true gentleman that ever breathed.
—T. Dekker.

Measure not thy carriage by any man's eye,
Thy speech by no man's ear; but be resolute
And confident in doing and saying;
And this is the grace of a right gentleman.
—Chapman.

"I am a gentleman." I'll be sworn thou art;
Thy tongue, thy face, thy limbs, actions and spirit,
Do give thee five-fold blazon.
—Shakespeare.

Of the offspring of the gentelman Jafeth, came Habraham, Moyses, Aron and the profetys; and also the kyng of the right line of Mary, of whom that gentelman Jhesus was borne.—Juliana Berners.

A sweeter and a lovelier gentleman,
Fram'd in the prodigality of nature,
Young, valiant, wise, and, no doubt right royal;
The spacious world cannot again afford.
—Shakespeare.

That man will never be a perfect gentleman who lives only with gentlemen. To be a man of the world we must view that world in every grade and in every perspective.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The expression of a gentleman's face is not so much that of refinement, as of flexibility, not of sensibility and enthusiasm as of indifference; it argues presence of mind rather than enlargement of ideas.—Hazlitt.

He that can enjoy the intimacy of the great, and on no occasion disgust them by familiarity, or disgrace himself by servility, proves that he is as perfect a gentleman by nature, as his companions are by rank.—Colton.

To be a gentleman does not depend upon the tailor or the toilet. Good clothes are not good habits. A gentleman is just a gentle-man—no more, no less: a diamond polished, that was first a diamond in the rough.—Bishop Doane.

We may daily discover crowds acquire sufficient wealth to buy gentility, but very few that possess the virtues which ennoble human nature, and (in the best sense of the word) constitute a gentleman.—Shenstone.

A gentleman's first characteristic is that fineness of structure in the body which renders it capable of the most delicate sensation; and of structure in the mind which renders it capable of the most delicate sympathies: one may say simply "fineness of nature."—Ruskin.

Our manners, our civilization, and all the good things connected with manners and civilization, have, in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles: I mean the spirit of a gentleman, and the spirit of religion.—Burke.

Self-command is often thought a characteristic of high breeding. * * * A true gentleman has no need of self-command; he simply feels rightly in all directions on all occasions, and, desiring to express only so much of his feeling as it is right to express, does not need to command himself.—Ruskin.

His qualities depend, not upon fashion or manners, but upon moral worth; not on personal possessions, but on personal qualities. The Psalmist briefly describes him as one "that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."—Samuel Smiles.

He is like to be mistaken who makes choice of a covetous man for a friend, or relieth upon the reed of narrow and poltroon friendship. Pitiful things are only to be found in the cottages of such breasts; but bright thoughts, clear deeds, constancy, fidelity, bounty and generous honesty are the gems of noble minds, wherein (to derogate from none) the true, heroic English gentleman hath no peer.—Sir Thomas Browne.

He is a noble gentleman; withal
Happy in 's endeavours; the gen'ral voice
Sounds him for courtesy, behaviour, language,
And ev'ry fair demeanour, an example:
Titles of honour add not to his worth;
Who is himself an honour to his title.
—John Ford.

The true gentleman is extracted from ancient and worshipful parentage. When a pepin is planted on a pepin-stock, the fruit growing thence is called a reneate, a most delicious apple, as both by sire and dame well descended. Thus his blood must needs be well purified who is genteelly born on both sides.—Fuller.

His years are young, but his experience old;
His head unmellow'd, but his judgment ripe;
And in a word (for far behind his worth Come all the praises that I now bestow)
He is complete in feature and in mind,
With all good grace to grace a gentleman.
—Shakespeare.

The taste of beauty, and the relish of what is decent, just and amiable, perfects the character of the gentleman and the philosopher. And the study of such a taste or relish will, as we suppose, be ever the great employment and concern of him who covets as well to be wise and good, as agreeable and polite.—Shaftesbury.

There are some spirits nobly just, unwarp'd
by pelf or pride,
Great in the calm, but greater still when dash'd by adverse tide;—
They hold the rank no king can give, no station can disgrace;
Nature puts forth her gentleman, and monarchs must give place.
—Eliza Cook.

What is it to be a gentleman? Is it to be honest, to be gentle, to be generous, to be brave, to be wise, and, possessing all these qualities, to exercise them in the most graceful outward manner? Ought a gentleman to be a loyal son, a true husband, an honest father? Ought his life to be decent, his bills to be paid, his taste to be high and elegant, his aims in life lofty and noble?—Thackeray.

But nature, with a matchless hand, sends forth her nobly born,
And laughs the paltry attributes of wealth and rank to scorn;
She moulds with care a spirit rare, half human, half divine,
And cries, exulting, "Who can make a gentleman like mine?"

—Eliza Cook.

A gentleman is a rarer thing than some of us think for. Which of us can point out many such in his circle—men whose aims are generous, whose truth is constant and elevated; who can look the world honestly in the face, with an equal manly sympathy for the great and the small? We all know a hundred whose coats are well made, and a score who have excellent manners; but of gentlemen how many? Let us take a little scrap of paper and each make out his list.—Thackeray.

After all, there is such a thing as looking like a gentleman. There are men whose class no dirt or rags can hide, any more than they could Ulysses. I have seen such men in plenty among workmen, too; but, on the whole, the gentleman—by whom I do not mean just now the rich—have the superiority in that point. But not, please God, forever. Give us the same air, water, exercise, education, good society, and you will see whether this "haggardness," this "coarseness" (etc., for the list is too long to specify), be an accident, or a property, of the man of the people.—Charles Kingsley.

A Christian is God Almighty's gentleman; a gentleman, in the vulgar, superficial way of understanding the word, is the devil's christian. But to throw aside these polished and too current counterfeits for something valuable and sterling, the real gentleman should be gentle in everything, at least in everything that depends on himself—in carriage, temper, constructions, aims, desires. He ought, therefore, to be mild, calm, quiet, even, temperate—not hasty in judgment, not exorbitant in ambition, not overbearing, not proud, not rapacious, not oppressive; for these things are contrary to gentleness. Many such gentlemen are to be found, I trust; and many more would be were the true meaning of the name borne in mind and duly inculcated.—Hare.

Gentleness

Gentleness is the outgrowth of benignity.—Hannah More.

The gentleness of all the gods go with thee.—Shakespeare.

Let gentleness thy strong enforcement be.—Shakespeare.

Gentleness and affability conquer at last.—Terence.

We must be gentle now we are gentlemen.—Shakespeare.

Sweet speaking oft a currish heart reclaims.—Sir P. Sidney.

Let mildness ever attend thy tongue.—Theogius.

The mildest manners and the gentlest heart.—Homer.

The power of gentleness is irresistible.—H. Martyn.

Gentleness! more powerful than Hercules.—Ninon de Lenclos.

A woman's strength is most potent when robed in gentleness.—Lamartine.

Your gentleness shall force, more than your force move us to gentleness.—Shakespeare.

Gentleness and repose are paramount to everything else in woman.—Montaigne.

With all women gentleness is the most persuasive and powerful argument.—Théophile Gautier.

The human heart becomes softened by hearing of instances of gentleness and consideration.—Plutarch.

In the husband, wisdom; in the wife, gentleness.—George Herbert.

Gentleness in the gait is what simplicity is in the dress. Violent gestures or quick movements inspire involuntary disrespect.—Balzac.

Those that do teach young babes
Do it with gentle means and easy tasks.
—Shakespeare.

They are as gentle
As zephyrs blowing below the violet.
—Shakespeare.

Better make penitents by gentleness than hypocrites by severity.—St. Francis de Sales.

Gentleness corrects whatever is offensive in our manners.—Blair.

We do not believe, or we forget, that
"the Holy Ghost came down, not in shape of a vulture, but in the form of a dove."—Emerson.

A man never so beautifully shows his own strength as when he respects a woman's softness.—Douglas Jerrold.

Fearless gentleness is the most beautiful of feminine attractions, born of modesty and love.—Mrs. Balfour.

It is only people who possess firmness who can possess true gentleness. In those who appear gentle, it is generally only weakness, which is readily converted into harshness.—La Rochefoucauld.

Power can do by gentleness that which violence fails to accomplish; and calmness best enforces the imperial mandate.—Claudianus.

What thou wilt, thou rather shalt enforce it with thy smile, than hew to it with thy sword.—Shakespeare.

If you would fall into any extreme, let it be on the side of gentleness. The human mind is so constructed that it resists rigor, and yields to softness.—St. Francis de Sales.

Gentleness, which belongs to virtue, is to be carefully distinguished from the mean spirit of cowards and the fawning assent of sycophants.—Blair.

The golden beams of truth and the silken cords of love, twisted together, will draw men on with a sweet violence, whether they will or not.—Cudworth.

In families well ordered, there is always one firm, sweet temper, which controls without seeming to dictate. The Greeks represented Persuasion as crowned.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Gentleness is far more successful in all its enterprises than violence; indeed, violence generally frustrates its own purpose, while gentleness scarcely ever fails.—Locke.

Experience has caused it to be remarked that in the country where the laws are gentle, the minds of the citizens are struck by it, as it is elsewhere by the most severe.—Catherine the Second.

With regard to manner, be careful to speak in a soft, tender, kind and loving way. Even when you have occasion to rebuke, be careful to do it with manifest kindness. The effect will be incalculably better.—Hosea Ballou.

A crystal river
Diaphanous because it travels slowly,
Soft is the music that would charm
forever;
The flower of sweetest smell is shy and lowly.
—Wordsworth.

True gentleness is founded on a sense of what we owe to Him who made us, and to the common nature which we all share. It arises from reflection on our own failings and wants, and from just views of the condition and the duty of man. It is native feeling heightened and improved by principle.—Blair.

If we were to form an image of dignity in a man, we should give him wisdom and valor, as being essential to the character of manhood. In the like manner, if you describe a right woman, in a laudable sense, she should have gentle softness, tender fear, and all those parts of life which distinguish her from the other sex, with some subordination to it, but such an inferiority as makes her still more lovely.—Steele.

The best and simplest cosmetic for women is constant gentleness and sympathy for the noblest interests of her fellow-creatures. This preserves and gives to her features an indelibly gay, fresh, and agreeable expression. If women would but realize that harshness makes them ugly, it would prove the best means of conversion.—Auerbach.

An accent very low
In blandishment, but a most silver flow
Of subtle-paced counsel in distress,
Right to the heart and brain, though undiscied,

Winning its way with extreme gentleness
Through all the outworks of suspicion's pride.
—Tennyson.

Gesture

The natural language of gesture is God's language. We did not invent it. Surely natural language is the language of nature; and these gestures which make us hang the head, and give us the erect attitude, are proclamations made, not by the will of man, but by the will of that Power which has co-ordinated all things, and given them harmony with each other, and never causes an instinct to utter a lie.—Joseph Cook.

Ghosts

For spirits, freed from mortal laws, with ease
Assume what sexes and what shapes they please.
—Pope.

Thou canst not say, I did it: never shake
Thy gory locks at me. —Shakespeare.

It was about to speak, when the cock crew,
And then it started like a guilty thing
Upon a fearful summons. —Shakespeare.

Many ghosts, and forms of fright,
Have started from their graves to-night;
They have driven sleep from mine eyes away.
—Longfellow.

But, soft: behold! lo, where it comes again!
I'll cross it, though it blast me.—Stay,
illusion!

If thou hast any sound, or use a voice,
Speak to me. —Shakespeare.

I can call up spirits from the vasty deep.—
—Why so can I, or so can any man;
But will they come, when you do call for them?
—Shakespeare.

Avaunt! and quit my sight! Let the earth hide thee!
Thy bones are marrowless, thy blood is cold;
Thou hast no speculation in those eyes,
Which thou dost glare with!
—Shakespeare.

Some have mistaken blocks and posts,
For spectres, apparitions, ghosts,
With saucer-eyes and horns; and some Have heard the devil beat a drum.
—Butler.

I am thy father's spirit;
Doom'd for a certain term to walk the night
And, for the day, confin'd to fast in fires,
Till the foul crimes, done in my days of nature,
Are burnt and purg'd away.
—Shakespeare.

They gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghostly,
That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand
O'er some new-open'd grave, and (strange to tell),
Evanishes at crowing of the cock.
—Blair.

Angels and ministers of grace, defend us!—
Be thou a spirit of health, or goblin damn'd,
Bring with thee airs from heaven, or blasts from hell,
Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
Thou comest in such questionable shape
That I will speak to thee.
—Shakespeare.

O, answer me:
Let me not burst in ignorance! but tell,
Why thy canoniz'd bones, hearsed in death,
Have burst their cerements! why the sepulchre,
Wherein we saw thee quietly in-urn'd,
Hath op'd his ponderous and marble jaws,
To cast thee up again? —Shakespeare.

Gibbet

The gibbet is a species of flattery to the human race. Three or four persons are hung from time to time for the sake of making the rest believe that they are virtuous.—Sanial-Dubay.

Gifts

The more we give to others, the more we are increased.—Lao-Tze.

He gives twice who gives quickly.—
Syrus.

When you give, give with joy and smiling.—Joubert.

Riches, understanding, beauty, are fair gifts of God.—Luther.

For the will and not the gift makes the giver.—Lessing.

We like the gift when we the giver prize.—Sheffield.

For to give is the business of the rich.—Goethe.

Giving requires good sense.—Ovid.

God hands gifts to some, whispers them to others.—W. R. Alger.

Who gives a trifle meanly is meaner
than the trifle.—Lavater.

Of gifts, there seems none more becoming to offer a friend than a beautiful book.—Amos Bronson Alcott.

That which is given with pride and ostentation is rather an ambition than a bounty.—Seneca.

Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.—Shakespeare.

Gifts are as gold that adorns the temple; grace is like the temple that sanctifies the gold.—Burkitt.

There is no grace in a benefit that sticks to the fingers.—Seneca.

Gifts come from above in their own peculiar forms.—Goethe.

For whatever man has, is in reality
only a gift.—Wieland.

The gift derives its value from the rank of the giver.—Ovid.

Those gifts are ever the most acceptable which the giver makes precious.—Ovid.

Give freely to him that deserveth well, and asketh nothing: and that is a way of giving to thyself.—Fuller.

The manner of giving shows the character of the giver more than the gift itself.—Lavater.

He who loves with purity considers not the gift of the lover, but the love of the giver.—Thomas à Kempis.

While you look at what is given,
look also at the giver.—Seneca.

Wear this for me,—one out of suits with fortune,
That could give more, but that her hand
lacks means.—Shakespeare.

Saints themselves will sometimes be,
Of gifts that cost them nothing, free.
—Butler.

The greatest grace of a gift, perhaps, is that it anticipates and admits of no return.—Longfellow.

One must be poor to know the luxury of giving.—George Eliot.

The heart of the giver makes the gift dear and precious.—Luther.

Take gifts with a sigh; most men give to be paid.—Boyle O'Reilly.

How can that gift leave a trace which has left no void?—Mme. Swetchine.

You gave with them words of so sweet breath composed, as made the things more rich.—Shakespeare.

That alone belongs to you which you have bestowed.—Vemuna.

Whoever makes great presents, expects great presents in return.—Martial.

Every gift which is given, even though it be small, is in reality great,
if it be given with affection.—Pindar.

It is a proof of boorishness to confer a favor with a bad grace; it is the act of giving that is hard and painful.
How little does a smile cost?—Bruyère.

Gifts, they weigh like mountains on a sensitive heart. To me they are oftener punishments than pleasures.—

Mme. Fee.

The making presents to a lady one addresses is like throwing armor into an enemy's camp, with a resolution to recover it.—Shenstone.

He was one of those men, moreover, who possess almost every gift except the gift of the power to use them.—Charles Kingsley.

Posthumous charities are the very essence of selfishness, when bequeathed by those who, when alive, would part with nothing.—Colton.

Gifts are like fish-hooks; for who is not aware that the greedy char is deceived by the fly which he swallows?—Martial.

It is a cold, lifeless business, when you go to the shops to buy something, which does not represent your life and talent, but a goldsmith's.—Emerson.

Your gift is princely, but it comes too late,
And falls like sunbeams on a blasted blossom.—Suckling.

The gift, to be true, must be the flowing of the giver unto me, correspondent to my flowing unto him.—Emerson.

Win her with gifts, if she respect not words:
Dumb jewels often, in their silent kind,
More than quick words, do move a woman's mind.—Shakespeare.

She gave me eyes, she gave me ears;
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart, the fountain of sweet tears;
And love, and thought, and joy.—Wordsworth.

A gift—its kind, its value and appearance; the silence or the pomp that attends it; the style in which it reaches you—may decide the dignity or vulgarity of the giver.—Lavater.

Liberty is of more value than any gifts; and to receive gifts is to lose it. Be assured that men most commonly seek to oblige thee only that they may engage thee to serve them.—Saadi.

Gifts are the greatest usury, because a two-fold retribution is an urged effect that a noble mind prompts us to; and it is said we pay the most for what is given us.—J. Beaumont.

If we will take the good we find, asking no questions, we shall have heaping measures. The great gifts are not got by analysis. Everything good is on the highway.—Emerson.

When thou makest presents, let them be of such things as will last long; to the end they may be in some sort immortal, and may frequently refresh the memory of the receiver.—Fuller.

Nature makes us buy her presents at the price of so many sufferings that it is doubtful whether she deserves most the name of parent or step-mother.—Pliny the Elder.

She prizes not such trifles as these are:
The gifts she looks from me are pack'd and lock'd

Up in my heart, which I have given already,
But not deliver'd.—Shakespeare.

He ne'er consider'd it as loath
To look a gift-horse in the mouth,
And very wisely would lay forth
No more upon it than 'twas worth.—Butler.

Policy counselleth a gift, given wisely and in season;

And policy afterwards approveth it, for great is the influence of gifts.—Tupper.

I never cast a flower away,
A gift of one who car'd for me;
A flower—a faded flower,
But it was done reluctantly.—L. E. Landon.

Favors, and especially pecuniary ones, are generally fatal to friendship; for our pride will ever prompt us to lower the value of the gift by diminishing that of the donor.—Chatfield.

The only gift is a portion of thyself. * * * Therefore the poet brings his poem; the shepherd, his lamb; the farmer, corn; the miner, a gem; the sailor, coral and shells; the painter, his picture; the girl, a handkerchief of her own sewing.—Emerson.

People do not care to give alms without some security for their money; and a wooden leg or a withered arm is a sort of draft upon heaven for those who choose to have their money placed to account there.—Mackenzie.

In giving, a man receives more than he gives; and the more is in proportion to the worth of the thing given.—George MacDonald.

We are as answerable for what we give as for what we receive; nay, the misplacing of a benefit is worse than the not receiving of it; for the one is another person's fault, but the other is mine.—Seneca.

No man esteems anything that comes to him by chance; but when it is governed by reason, it brings credit both to the giver and receiver; whereas those favors are in some sort scandalous that make a man ashamed of his patron.—Seneca.

God's love gives in such a way that it flows from a Father's heart, the well-spring of all good. The heart of the giver makes the gift dear and precious; as among ourselves we say of even a trifling gift, "It comes from a hand we love," and look not so much at the gift as at the heart.—Luther.

He gives not best that gives most; but he gives most who gives best. If then I cannot give bountifully, yet I will give freely; and what I want in my hand, supply by my heart. He gives well that gives willingly.—Arthur Warwick.

Those Spaniards in Mexico who were chased of the Indians tell us what to do with our goods in our extremity. They being to pass over a river in their flight, as many as cast away their gold swam over safe; but some, more covetous, keeping their gold, were either drowned with it, or overtaken and slain by the savages:

you have received, now learn to give.—Bacon.

It passes in the world for greatness of mind, to be perpetually giving and loading people with bounties; but it is one thing to know how to give and another thing not to know how to keep. Give me a heart that is easy and open, but I will have no holes in it; let it be bountiful with judgment, but I will have nothing run out of it I know not how.—Seneca.

The secret of giving affectionately is great and rare; it requires address to do it well; otherwise we lose instead of deriving benefit from it. This man gives lavishly in a way that obliges no one; the manner of giving is worth more than the gift. Another loses intentionally at a game, thus disguising his present; another forgets a jewel, which would have been refused as a gift. A generous booby seems to be giving alms to his mistress when he is making a present.—Cornelle.

Some men give so that you are angry every time you ask them to contribute. They give so that their gold and silver shoot you like a bullet. Other persons give with such beauty that you remember it as long as you live; and you say, "It is a pleasure to go to such men." There are some men that give as springs do: whether you go to them or not, they are always full; and your part is merely to put your dish under the ever-flowing stream. Others give just as a pump does where the well is dry, and the pump leaks.—Beecher.

Gipsies

There are men and women who are in life as the wild river and the night-owl, as the blasted tree and the wind over ancient graves.—Charles G. Leeland.

Gipsies, who every ill can cure,
Except the ill of being poor,
Who charms 'gainst love and agues sell,
Who can in hen-roost set a spell,
Prepar'd by arts, to them best known
To catch all feet except their own,
Who, as to fortune, can unlock it,
As easily as pick a pocket.

—Churchill.

Girlhood

A lovely girl is above all rank.—
Charles Buxton.

The blushing beauty of a modest maid.—Dryden.

Girls we love for what they are;
young men for what they promise to be.—Goethe.

The inward fragrance of a young girl's heart is what crystallizes into love.—Richter.

When one is five-and-twenty, one has not chalk-stones at one's finger-ends that the touch of a handsome girl should be entirely indifferent.—George Eliot.

The girl of the period sets up to be natural, and is only rude; mistakes insolence for innocence; says everything that comes first to her lips, and thinks she is gay when she is only giddy.—Beaconsfield.

One must always regret that law of growth which renders necessary that kittens should spoil into demure cats, and bright, joyous school-girls develop into the spiritless, crystallized beings denominated young ladies.—Abba
Gould Woolson.

She was in the lovely bloom and spring-time of womanhood; at the age when, if ever angels be for God's good purpose enthroned in mortal form, they may be, without impiety, supposed to abide in such as hers.—
Dickens.

We love a girl for very different qualities than understanding. We love her for her beauty, her youth, her mirth, her confidingness, her character, with its faults, caprices and God knows what other inexpressible charms; but we do not love her understanding.—Goethe.

The presence of a young girl is like the presence of a flower; the one gives its perfume to all that approach it, the other her grace to all that surround her.—Louis Desnoyers.

Gladness

True gladness doth not always speak; joy, bred and born but in the tongue, is weak.—Ben Jonson.

Nations and men are only the best when they are the gladdest, and deserve heaven when they enjoy it.—
Richter.

For from the crushed flowers of gladness on the road of life a sweet perfume is wafted over to the present hour, as marching armies often send out from heaths the fragrance of trampled plants.—Richter.

Gloom

He who is only just is stern; he who is only wise lives in gloom.—Voltaire.

Gloom and sadness are poison to us, and the origin of hysterics. You are right in thinking that this disease is in the imagination; you have defined it perfectly; it is vexation which causes it to spring up, and fear that supports it.—Madame de Sévigné.

Glory

Glory is priceless.—Lytton.

True glory is a flame lighted at the skies.—Horace Mann.

Glory is the fair child of peril.
—Smollett.

Glory grows guilty of detested crimes.—Shakespeare.

No flowery road leads to glory.—La Fontaine.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.—Gray.

Alas! how difficult it is to retain glory!—Syrus.

Glory paid to our ashes comes too late.—Martial.

For what is glory but the blaze of fame?—Milton.

The glory dies not, and the grief is past.—Brydges.

We rise in glory as we sink in pride.—Young.

His glory now lies buried in the dust.—Quarles.

Nothing is so expensive as glory.—Sydney Smith.

This goin' ware glory waits ye haint one agreeable feetur.—Lowell.

A field of glory is a field for all.—Pope.

Great is the glory, for the strife is hard!—Wordsworth.

Like madness is the glory of this life.—Shakespeare.

So may a glory from defect arise.—Robert Browning.

Fame points the course, and glory leads the way.—Pye.

Glory, the casual gift of thoughtless crowds!
Glory, the bribe of avaricious virtue!
—Johnson.

Rising glory occasions the greatest envy, as kindling fire the greatest smoke.—Spenser.

Our greatest glory consists not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—Goldsmith.

Glory is a poison, good to be taken in small doses.—Balzac.

The love of glory can only create a great hero; the contempt of it creates a great man.—Talleyrand.

Glory built
On selfish principles, is shame and guilt.
—Cowper.

Glory follows virtue as if it were its shadow.—Cicero.

Unless what we do is useful, our glory is vain.—Phædrus.

Glory long has made the sages smile; 'tis, something, nothing, words, illusion, wind.—Byron.

I am climbing a difficult road; but the glory gives me strength.—Proper-tius.

Glories, like glow-worms, afar off shine bright;
But look'd too near, have neither heat nor light.
—Webster.

The smoke of glory is not worth the smoke of a pipe.—George Sand.

Glory can be for a woman but the brilliant morning of happiness.—Mme. de Staël.

The sweetness of glory is so great that, join it to what we will, even to death, we love it.—Pascal.

Men are guided less by conscience than by glory; and yet the shortest way to glory is to be guided by conscience.—Henry Home.

As to be perfectly just is an attribute of the Divine nature, to be so to the utmost of our abilities is the glory of man.—Addison.

Glory fills the world with virtue, and, like a beneficent sun, covers the whole earth with flowers and with fruits.—Vauvenargues.

The glory of a people and of an age is always the work of a small number of great men, and disappears with them.—Baron de Grimm.

Real glory springs from the quiet conquest of ourselves; and without that the conqueror is nought but the first slave.—Thomson.

True glory takes root, and even spreads; all false pretenses, like flowers, fall to the ground; nor can any counterfeit last long.—Cicero.

Let us not disdain glory too much —nothing is finer except virtue. The height of happiness would be to unite both in this life.—Chateaubriand.

Glory is safe when it is deserved; it is not so with popularity; one lasts like a mosaic, the other is effaced like a crayon drawing.—Boufflers.

The pure soul shall mount on native wings, . . . and cut a path into the heaven of glory.—Blake.

'Twas glory once to be a Roman;
She makes it glory, now, to be a man.
—Bayard Taylor.

Glory drags all men along, low as well as high, bound captive at the wheels of her glittering car.—Horace.

Glory darts her soul-pervading ray on thrones and cottages, regardless still of all the artificial nice distinctions vain human customs make.—Hannah More.

The shortest way to arrive at glory should be to do that for conscience which we do for glory.—Montaigne.

Our glories float between the earth and heaven
Like clouds which seem pavilions of the sun,
And are the playthings of the casual wind.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

To a father who loves his children victory has no charms. When the heart speaks, glory itself is an illusion. Napoleon I.

Glory is a shroud that posterity often tears from the shoulders of those who wore it when living.—Béranger.

Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself
Till, by broad spreading it disperse to nought.
—Shakespeare.

The road to glory would cease to be arduous if it were trite and trodden; and great minds must be ready not only to take opportunities but to make them.—Colton.

Those great actions whose luster dazzles us are represented by politicians as the effects of deep design; whereas they are commonly the effects of caprice and passion.—Rochefoucauld.

I have ventured like little wanton boys that swim on bladders, this many summers in a sea of glory, but far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride at length broke under me.—Shakespeare.

Sound, sound the clarion, fill the fife!
To all the sensual world proclaim,
One crowded hour of glorious life
Is worth an age without a name.
—Scott.

True glory consists in doing what deserves to be written, in writing what deserves to be read, and in so living as to make the world happier and better for our living in it.—Pliny.

There are two things which ought to teach us to think but meanly of human glory; the very best have had their calumniators, the very worst their panegyrists.—Colton.

Ye sons of France, awake to glory!
Hark! Hark! what myriads bid you rise!
Your children, wives, and grandsires hoary,
Behold their tears and hear their cries!
—Rouget de l'Isle.

Is death more cruel from a private dagger than in the field from murdering swords of thousands? Or does the number slain make slaughter glorious?—Cibber.

Glory relaxes often and debilitates the mind; censure stimulates and contracts—both to an extreme. Simple fame is, perhaps, the proper medium.—Shenstone.

Gashed with honourable scars,
Low in Glory's lap they lie;
Though they fell, they fell like stars,
Streaming splendour through the sky.
Montgomery.

He that first likened glory to a shadow did better than he was aware of. They are both of them things excellently vain. Glory also, like a shadow, goes sometimes before the body, and sometimes in length infinitely exceeds it.—Montaigne.

There is but one thing necessary to keep the possession of true glory, which is to hear the opposers of it with patience, and preserve the virtue by which it was acquired.—Steele.

Glory is sometimes a low courtesan who on the road entices many who did not think of her. They are astonished to obtain favors without having done anything to deserve them.—Prince de Ligne.

Who is it that does not voluntarily exchange his health, his repose, and his very life for reputation and glory? The most useless, frivolous, and false coin that passes current among us.—Montaigne.

Individuals may wear for a time the glory of our institutions, but they carry it not to the grave with them. Like raindrops from heaven, they may pass through the circle of the shining bow and add to its luster; but when they have sunk in the earth again, the proud arch still spans the sky and shines gloriously on.—James A. Garfield.

The shortest way to arrive at glory should be to do that for conscience which we do for glory. And the virtue of Alexander appears to me with much less vigor in his theater than that of Socrates in his mean and obscure employment. I can easily conceive Socrates in the place of Alexander, but Alexander in that of Socrates I cannot.—Montaigne.

Wood burns because it has the proper stuff for that purpose in it; and a man becomes renowned because he has the necessary stuff in him. Renown is not to be sought, and all pursuit of it is vain. A person may, indeed, by skillful conduct and various artificial means, make a sort of name for himself; but if the inner jewel is wanting, all is vanity, and will not last a day.—Goethe.

What is glory? what is fame?
The echo of a long-lost name;
A breath, an idle hour's brief talk;
The shadow of an arrant naught;
A flower that blossoms for a day,
Dying next morrow;
A stream that hurries on its way,
Singing of sorrow.—Motherwell.

Those who start for human glory, like the mettled hounds of Actæon, must pursue the game not only where there is a path, but where there is none. They must be able to simulate and dissimulate; to leap and to creep; to conquer the earth like Cæsar, or to fall down and kiss it like Brutus; to throw their sword like Brennus into the trembling scale, or, like Nelson, to snatch the laurels from the doubtful hand of Victory, while she is doubting where to bestow them.—Colton.

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
The soldier's last tattoo;
No more on Life's parade shall meet
The brave and fallen few.
On Fame's eternal camping-ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards, with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

—Theodore O'Hara.

Gluttony

He is a very valiant trencher-man.
—Shakespeare.

Born merely for the purpose of digestion.—Bruyère.

Hunger makes everything sweet.—Antiphanes.

Reason should direct and appetite obey.—Cicero.

The turnpike road to people's hearts, I find, lies through their mouths.—Dr. John Wolcott.

Such, whose sole bliss is eating, who can give but that one brutal reason why they live.—Juvénal.

I am a great eater of beef, and I believe that does harm to my wit.—Shakespeare.

Their various cares in one great point combine,
The business of their lives—that is, to dine.
—Young.

As for me, give me turtle or give me death. What is life without turtle? nothing. What is turtle without life? nothing still.—Artemus Ward.

I have come to the conclusion that mankind consume twice too much food.—Sydney Smith.

The belly has no ears.—Plutarch.

Whose god is their belly and whose glory is their shame.—Bible.

Fat paunches have lean pates; and dainty bits
Make rich the ribs, but bankrupt quite the wits. —Shakespeare.

The pleasures of the palate deal with us like Egyptian thieves who strangle those whom they embrace.—
Seneca.

As houses well stored with provisions are likely to be full of mice, so the bodies of those that eat much are full of diseases.—Diogenes.

Gluttony and drunkenness have two evils attendant on them; they make the carcass smart, as well as the pocket.—Marcus Antoninus.

Why, at this rate, a fellow that has but a groat in his pocket may have a stomach capable of a ten-shilling ordinary.—Congreve.

Let me have men about me that are fat; sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights; yonder Cassius has a lean and hungry look; he thinks too much; such men are dangerous.—
Shakespeare.

He was a kind and thankful toad, whose heart dilated in proportion as his skin was filled with good cheer; and whose spirits rose with eating, as some men's do with drink.—Washington
Irving.

Swinish gluttony never looks to heaven amidst its gorgeous feast; but with besotted, base ingratitude, cravens and blasphemous his feeder.—
Milton.

He that prolongs his meals, and sacrifices his time as well as his other conveniences, to his luxury, how quickly does he outset his pleasure!—
South.

Gluttony is the source of all our infirmities, and the fountain of all our diseases. As a lamp is choked by a superabundance of oil, a fire extinguished by excess of fuel, so is the natural health of the body destroyed by intemperate diet.—Burton.

And by his side rode loathsome gluttony,
Deform'd creature, on a filthy swine;
His belly was up-blown with luxury,
And eke with fatness swollen were his eyne. —Spenser.

But for the cravings of the belly not a bird would have fallen into the snare; nay, nay, the fowler would not have spread his net. The belly is chains to the hands and fetters to the feet. He who is a slave to his belly seldom worships God.—Saadi.

Some men find happiness in gluttony and in drunkenness, but no delicate viands can touch their taste with the thrill of pleasure, and what generosity there is in wine steadily refuses to impart its glow to their shriveled hearts.—Whipple.

Some men are born to feast, and not to fight;
Whose sluggish minds, e'en in fair honor's
field,
Still on their dinner turn—
Let such pot-boiling varlets stay at home,
And wield a flesh-hook rather than a sword.
—Joanna Baillie.

When I behold a fashionable table set out in all its magnificence, I fancy that I see gout and dropsies, fevers and lethargies, with other innumerable distempers lying in ambuscade among the dishes. Nature delights in the most plain and simple diet. Every animal but man keeps to one dish.
Herbs are the food of this species, fish of that, and flesh of a third. Man falls upon everything that comes in his way; not the smallest fruit or excrescence of the earth, scarce a berry or a mushroom can escape him.—Addison.

God

For God is love.—Bible.

God's glory is His goodness.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There is a God within us.—Ovid.

I am athirst for God, the living
God.—Jean Ingelow.

God alone is true; God alone is great; alone is God.—Laboulaye.

God, from a beautiful necessity, is love.—Tupper.

Thou Great First Cause, least understood.—Pope.

O Thou above all gods supreme.—Klopstock.

God is the one great employer, thinker, planner, supervisor.—Henry Ward Beecher.

His steps are beauty, and His presence light.—Montgomery.

God is truth, and light His shadow.—Plato.

God's will is the very perfection of all reason.—Edward Payson.

Space is the statue of God.—Joubert.

Where God is, all agree.—Vaughan.

God is the only sure foundation on which the mind can rest.—S. Irenæus Prime.

Fear that man who fears not God.—Abdl-el-Kader.

The rolling year is full of Thee.—Thomson.

All but God is changing day by day.—Charles Kingsley.

We love Him, because He first loved us.—Bible.

His eye is upon every hour of my existence.—Chalmers.

Nothing with God can be accidental.—Longfellow.

The divine essence itself is love and wisdom.—Swedenborg.

The Eternal Being is forever if He is at all.—Pascal.

Nothing reveals character more than self-sacrifice. So the highest knowledge we have of God is through the gift of His Son.—William Harris.

God is able to do more than man can understand.—Thomas à Kempis.

Can we outrun the heavens?—Shakespeare.

Acquaint thyself with God, if thou wouldst taste His works.—Cowper.

God never made His work for man to mend.—Dryden.

Think of God oftener than you breathe.—Epictetus.

God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb.—Laurence Sterne.

These are Thy glorious works, Parent of good.—Milton.

God deceiveth thee not.—Thomas à Kempis.

A foe to God was never true friend to man.—Young.

History is the revelation of Providence.—Kossuth.

By night an atheist half believes a God.—Young.

Let us think less of men and more of God.—Bailey.

There is a God to punish and avenge.—Schiller.

A God all mercy is a God unjust.—Young.

I believe the promises of God enough to venture an eternity on them.—Watts.

As a man is, so is his God; therefore God was so often an object of mockery.—Goethe.

He who knows what it is to enjoy God will dread His loss; he who has seen His face will fear to see His back.—Richard Alleine.

God said, "Let us make man in our image." Man said, "Let us make God in our image."—Douglas Jerrold.

A God alone can comprehend a God.
—Dr. Young.

One on God's side is a majority.—
Wendell Phillips.

God's in His Heaven—All's right with the world!
—Robert Browning.

God enters by a private door into every individual.—Emerson.

Of what I call God,
And fools call Nature,
—Robert Browning.

Naught but God
Can satisfy the soul. —Bailey.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body nature is, and God the soul.
—Pope.

God shall be my hope,
My stay, my guide and lantern to my feet.
—Shakespeare.

To attain the height and depth of Thy eternal ways, all human thoughts
come short.—Milton.

He mounts the storm and walks
upon the wind.—Pope.

God is as great in minuteness as
He is in magnitude.—Colton.

Philosophers call God "the great unknown." "The great mis-known"
would be more correct.—Joseph Roux.

God often visits us, but most of the time we are not at home.—Joseph Roux.

Give me Thy light, and fix my eyes on Thee!—Boethius.

Heaven is above all yet; there sits a Judge that no king can corrupt.—
Shakespeare.

There is no God but God, the living,
the self-subsisting.—Koran.

And God said, Let there be light,
and there was light.—Bible.

God's power never produces what
His goodness cannot embrace.—South.

'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God may he had for the asking.
—Lowell.

It is folly to seek the approbation of any being besides the Supreme.—
Addison.

God governs the world, and we have only to do our duty wisely, and leave the issue to Him.—John Jay.

The perfect love of God knoweth no difference between the poor and the rich.—Pacuvius.

God alone is entirely exempt from all want: of human virtues, that which needs least is the most absolute and divine.—Plutarch.

Thy attributes, how endearing! how parental! all loving, all forgiving.—
Hosea Ballou.

The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him.—
Bible.

Happy the man who sees a God employ'd
In all the good and ill that chequer life!
—Cowper.

God is absolutely good; and so, assuredly, the cause of all that is good.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Men sunk in the greatest darkness imaginable retain some sense and awe of the Deity.—Tillotson.

Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind. —Pope.

He that doth the ravens feed,
Yea, providently caters for the sparrow.
—Shakespeare.

There's a Divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them as we will.
—Shakespeare.

If God were not a necessary being of Himself, He might almost seem to be made for the use and benefit of men.—John Tillotson.

How did the atheist get his idea of that God whom he denies?—Coleridge.

If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent Him.—Voltaire.

O Thou, whose certain eye foresees
The fix'd event of fate's remote decrees.
—Homer.

God is a perfect poet,
Who in His person acts His own creations.
—Robert Browning.

I fear God, and next to God I chiefly fear him who fears Him not.—
Saadi.

At whose sight all the stars
Hide their diminished heads.—Milton.

God had sifted three kingdoms to find the wheat for this planting.—
Longfellow.

There is no creature so small and subject, that it representeth not the goodness of God.—Thomas à Kempis.

'Tis hard to find God, but to comprehend
Him, as He is, is labour without end.
—Herrick.

As long as we work on God's line,
He will aid us. When we attempt to work on our own lines, He rebukes us with failure.—T. L. Cuyler.

God's justice and love are one. Infinite justice must be infinite love.
Justice is but another sign of love.—
F. W. Robertson.

Can we be unsafe where God has placed us, and where He watches over us as a parent a child that he loves?—
Fénelon.

The great soul that sits on the throne of the universe is not, never was, and never will be, in a hurry.—
J. G. Holland.

The presence of God calms the soul,
and gives it quiet and repose.—Fénelon.

The God of merely traditional believers is the great Absentee of the universe.—W. R. Alger.

God is all love: it is He who made everything, and He loves everything that He has made.—Henry Brooke.

God wishes to exhaust all means of kindness before His hand takes hold on justice.—Henry Ward Beecher.

We know God easily, provided we do not constrain ourselves to define Him.—Joubert.

God is a being who gives everything but punishment in over measure.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

Thou awakest us to delight in Thy praise; for Thou madest us for Thyself, and our heart is restless until it repose in Thee.—Augustine.

The vision of the Divine Presence ever takes the form which our circumstances most require.—Alexander Maclaren.

God never makes us sensible of our weakness except to give us of His strength.—Fénelon.

However wickedness outstrips men,
it has no wings to fly from God.—
Shakespeare.

God's truth is too sacred to be expounded to superficial worldliness in its transient fit of earnestness.—F. W.
Robertson.

Born of God, attach thyself to Him, as a plant to its root, that ye may not be withered.—Demophilus.

God is like us to this extent, that whatever in us is good is like God.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

God's sovereignty is not in His right hand; God's sovereignty is not in His intellect; God's sovereignty is in His love.—Henry Ward Beecher.

O, there is naught on earth worth being known but God and our own souls!—Bailey.

We must be in some way like God in order that we may see God as He is.—Chapin.

I believe not only in "special providences," but in the whole universe as one infinite complexity of "special providences."—Charles Kingsley.

To be struck with His power, it is only necessary to open our eyes.—Burke.

Under whose feet (subjected to His grace),
Sit nature, fortune, motion, time, and place.
—Tasso.

To attain the height and depth of Thy eternal ways, all human thoughts
come short.—Milton.

There is no god but God!—to prayer—lo! God is great!—Byron.

Sometimes Providences, like Hebrew letters, must be read backwards.—
John Flavel.

But, oh, Thou bounteous Giver of all good, Thou art, of all Thy gifts,
Thyself the crown!—Cowper.

Everyone is in a small way the image of God.—Manilius.

God can change the lowest to the highest, abase the proud, and raise the humble.—Horace.

Nothing is so high and above all danger that is not below and in the power of God.—Ovid.

There is indeed a God that hears and sees whate'er we do.—Plautus.

God is a shower to the heart burned up with grief; God is a sun to the face deluged with tears.—Joseph Roux.

My God, my Father, and my Friend,
Do not forsake me in the end.
—Wentworth Dillon.

To Him no high, no low, no great, no
small;
He fills, He bounds, connects and equals
all! —Pope.

The very impossibility in which I find myself to prove that God is not, discloses to me His existence.—La Bruyère.

God's mercy is a holy mercy, which knows how to pardon sin, not to protect it; it is a sanctuary for the penitent, not for the presumptuous.—

Bishop Reynolds.

And now we beseech of Thee that we may have every day some such sense of God's mercy and of the power of God above us, as we have of the fullness of the light of heaven before us.—H. W. Beecher.

It is as easy for God to supply thy greatest as thy smallest wants, even as it was within His power to form a system or an atom, to create a blazing sun as to kindle the fire-fly's lamp.—
Thomas Guthrie.

Our God is a household God, as well as a heavenly one. He has an altar in every man's dwelling; let men look to it when they read it lightly, and pour out its ashes.—Ruskin.

If God be infinitely holy, just, and good, He must take delight in those creatures that resemble Him most in these perfections.—Atterbury.

Such was God's original love for man, that He was willing to stoop to any sacrifice to save him; and the gift of a Saviour was the mere expression of that love.—Albert Barnes.

The love of God ought continually to predominate in the mind; and give to every act of duty grace and animation.—Beattie.

It is highly convenient to believe in the infinite mercy of God when you feel the need of mercy, but remember also His infinite justice.—B. R. Haydon.

Mistrusts sometimes come over one's mind of the justice of God. But let a real misery come again, and to whom do we fly? To whom do we instinctively and immediately look up?
—B. R. Haydon.

There is nothing left to us but to see how we may be approved of Him, and how we may roll the weight of our weak souls in well-doing upon Him, who is God omnipotent.—Rutherford

To love God, which was a thing far excelling all the cunning that is possible for us in this life to obtain.—Sir Thomas More.

Not a flower,
But shows some touch, in freckle, streak, or stain,
Of His unrivall'd pencil. —Cowper.

Thou sovereign power, whose secret will controls the inward bent and motion of our souls.—Prior.

Be He nowhere else, God is in all that liberates and lifts, in all that humbles, sweetens, and consoles.—Lowell.

There is no worm of the earth, no spire of grass, no leaf, no twig, wherein we see not the footsteps of a Deity.—Robert Hall.

Remember that there is nothing in God but what is godlike; and that He is either not at all, or truly and perfectly good.—Shaftesbury.

To escape from evil, we must be made as far as possible like God; and this resemblance consists in becoming just and holy and wise.—Plato.

The Providence that watches over the affairs of men works out of their mistakes, at times, a healthier issue than could have been accomplished by their wisest forethought.—J. A. Froude.

It is a most unhappy state to be at a distance with God; man needs no greater infelicity than to be left to himself.—Feltham.

The Omnipotent has sown His name on the heavens in glittering stars, but upon earth He planteth His name by tender flowers.—Richter.

As the soul is the life of the body, so God is the life of the soul. As therefore the body perishes when the soul leaves it, so the soul dies when God departs from it.—St. Augustine.

Let us always remember that God has never promised to supply our wishes, but only our wants, and these only as they arise from day to day.—Alexander Dickson.

Contemplation of human nature doth by a necessary connection and chain of causes carry us up to the Deity.—Sir M. Hale.

When God reveals His march through Nature's night
His steps are beauty, and His presence light. —Montgomery.

All things that are on earth shall wholly pass away,
Except the love of God, which shall live and last for aye. —Bryant.

The very impossibility in which I find myself to prove that God is not discovers to me His existence.—Brüyère.

When we have broken our god of tradition, and ceased from our god of rhetoric, then may God fire the heart with His presence.—Emerson.

Take comfort, and recollect however little you and I may know, God knows; He knows Himself and you and me and all things; and His mercy is over all His works.—Charles Kingsley.

The moral perfections of the Deity, the more attentively we consider, the more perfectly still shall we know them.—Addison.

God, who oft descends to visit men
Unseen, and through their habitations walks
To mark their doings. —Milton.

One sole God;
One sole ruler,—His Law;
One sole interpreter of that law.—Humani-
—Mazzini.

Yet forget not that "the whole world is a phylactery, and everything we see an item of the wisdom, power, or goodness of God"—Sir Thomas Browne.

When we attempt to define and describe God, both language and thought desert us, and we are as helpless as fools and savages.—Emerson.

As a countenance is made beautiful by the soul's shining through it, so the world is beautiful by the shining through it of a God.—Jacobi.

The glorious Author of the universe,
Who reins the winds, gives the vast ocean bounds,
And circumscribes the floating worlds their rounds! —Gay.

God has been pleased to prescribe limits to His own power, and to work
His ends within these limits.—Paley.

What can 'scape the eye
Of God, all-seeing, or deceive His heart, Omniscient! —Milton.

The glory of Him who hung His masonry pendent on nought, when the world He created.—Longfellow.

I sought Thee at a distance, and did not know that Thou wast near. I sought Thee abroad, and behold, Thou wast within me.—St. Augustine.

There is nothing so small but that we may honor God by asking His guidance of it, or insult Him by taking it into our own hands.—John Ruskin.

If thou art fighting against thy sins so is God. On thy side is God who made all, and Christ who died for all,
and the Holy Spirit who alone gives wisdom, purity, and nobleness.—
Charles Kingsley.

If I make the seven oceans ink, if I make the trees my pen, if I make the earth my paper, the glory of God cannot be written.—Kabir.

As the sensation of hunger presupposes food to satisfy it, so the sense of dependence on God presupposes
His existence and character.—O. B.
Frothingham.

Who can know heaven except by its gifts? and who can find out God unless the man who is himself an eman-ation from God?—Manilius.

When the Master of the universe has points to carry in His government

He impresses His will in the structure of minds.—Emerson.

But who with filial confidence inspired,
Can lift to heaven an unpresumptuous eye.
And smiling say, my Father made them all.
—Cowper.

God should be the object of all our desires, the end of all our actions, the principle of all our affections, and the governing power of our whole souls.—
Massillon.

We are never less alone than when we are in the society of a single, faithful friend; never less deserted than when we are carried in the arms of the All-Powerful.—Fénelon.

It is a great truth, "God reigns," and therefore grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord; and, therefore, no sinner on earth need ever despair.—Ichabod Spencer.

God's commandments are the iron door into Himself. To keep them is to have it opened and His great heart of love revealed.—Samuel Willoughby Duffield.

Forgetful youth! but know, the Power above
With ease can save each object of His love;
Wide as His will, extends His boundless grace. —Homer.

It is one of my favorite thoughts that God manifests Himself to men in all the wise, good, humble, generous, great, and magnanimous men.—Lava-
ter.

I know by myself how incomprehensible God is, seeing I cannot comprehend the parts of my own being.—
St. Bernard.

We cannot think too oft there is a never, never-sleeping Eye, which reads the heart, and registers our thoughts.
—Bacon.

In all God's providences, it is good to compare His word and His works together; for we shall find a beautiful harmony between them, and that they mutually illustrate each other.—Matthew Henry.

God governs in the affairs of men; and if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, neither can a kingdom rise without His aid.—Benjamin Franklin.

Tell me how it is that in this room there are three candles and but one light, and I will explain to you the mode of the Divine existence.—John Wesley.

God works in a mysterious way in grace as well as in nature, concealing His operations under an imperceptible succession of events, and thus keeps us always in the darkness of faith.—Fénelon.

Not a sorrow, not a burden, not a temptation, not a bereavement, not a disappointment, not a care, not a groan or tear, but has its antidote in God's rich and inexhaustible resources.—George C. Lorimer.

Converting grace puts God on the throne, and the world at His footstool; Christ in the heart, and the world under His feet.—Joseph Alleine.

Though man sits still, and takes his ease,
God is at work on man;
No means, no moment unemploy'd,
To bless him, if He can. —Young.

A Deity believed, is joy begun;
A Deity adored, is joy advanced;
A Deity beloved, is joy matured.
Each branch of piety delight inspires. —Young.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care. —Whittier.

The God of metaphysics is but an idea. But the God of religion, the Maker of heaven and earth, the sovereign Judge of actions and thoughts, is a power.—Joubert.

God is the light which, never seen itself, makes all things visible, and clothes itself in colors. Thine eye feels not its ray, but thine heart feels its warmth.—Richter.

The sun and every vassal star,
All space, beyond the soar of angel's wings,
Wait on His word: and yet He stays His car
For every sigh a contrite suppliant brings. —Keble.

By tracing Heaven His footsteps may be found:
Behold! how awfully He walks the round!
God is abroad, and wondrous in His ways
The rise of empires, and their fall surveys. —Dryden.

A voice is in the wind I do not know;
A meaning on the face of the high hills
Whose utterance I cannot comprehend.
A something is behind them: that is God. —George MacDonald.

God is everywhere! the God who framed Mankind to be one mighty family,
Himself our Father, and the world our home. —Coleridge.

Praise to our Father-God,
High praise in solemn lay,
Alike for what His hand hath given,
And what it takes away. —Mrs. Sigourney.

Amid so much war and contest and variety of opinion, you will find one consenting conviction in every land, that there is one God, the King and Father of all.—Maximus Tyrius.

He made little, too little of sacraments and priests, because God was so intensely real to him. What should he do with lenses who stood thus full in the torrent of the sunshine.—Phillips Brooks.

To God belongeth the east and the west; therefore, whithersoever ye turn yourselves to pray, there is the word of God; for God is omnipresent and omniscient.—Koran.

They that deny a God destroy man's nobility; for certainly man is like the beasts in his body; and if he is not like God in his spirit, he is an ignoble creature.—Bacon.

I can understand the things that afflict mankind, but I often marvel at those which console. An atom may wound, but God alone can heal.—Mme. Swetchine.

From God derived, to God by nature joined,
We act the dictates of His mighty mind:
And though the priests are mute and temples still,
God never wants a voice to speak His will.
—Rowe.

He who bridles the fury of the billows knows also to put a stop to the secret plans of the wicked. Submitting with respect to His holy will, I fear God, and have no other fear.—Racine.

He hath made the earth by His power, He hath established the world by His wisdom, and hath stretched out the heavens by His discretion.—Bible.

The slender capacity of man's heart cannot comprehend, much less utter, that unsearchable depth and burning zeal of God's love towards us.—Luther.

If we look closely at this earth, where God seems so utterly forgotten, we shall find that it is He, after all, who commands the most fidelity and the most love.—Madame Swetchine.

Since therefore all things are ordered in subserviency to the good of man, they are so ordered by Him that made both man and them.—Charnock.

Give God the margin of eternity to justify Himself in, and the more we live and know of our own souls and of spiritual experience generally, the more we shall be convinced that we have to do with one who is good and just.—Hugh R. Haweis.

God, so to speak, is myriad-minded. We cannot look, therefore, to put ourselves in accord with His plans any more than one man can run a line for a railroad which it requires a small army to survey.—Samuel Willoughby Duffield.

Kircher lays it down as a certain principle, that there never was any people so rude which did not acknowledge and worship one supreme Deity.—Stillingfleet.

God is not dumb that He should speak no more; if thou hast wanderings in the wilderness and find'st no Sinai, 'tis thy soul is poor.—Lowell.

He who can imagine the universe fortuitous or self-created is not a subject for argument, provided he has the power of thinking or even the faculty of seeing.—MacCulloch.

When we would think of God, how many things we find which turn us away from Him, and tempt us to think otherwise. All this is evil, yet it is innate.—Pascal.

Be an observer of providence; for God is showing you ever, by the way in which He leads you, whither He means to lead. Study your trials, your talents, the world's wants, and stand ready to serve God now, in whatever He brings to your hand.—Horace Bushnell.

My bark is wafted to the strand
By breath Divine;
And on the helm there rests a hand
Other than mine. —Dean Alford.

I need Thy presence every passing hour;
What, but Thy grace, can foil the tempter's power?
Who, like Thyself, my guide and stay can be?
Through cloud and sunshine, oh, abide with me!
—H. F. Lyte.

What must be the knowledge of Him, from whom all created minds have derived both their power of knowledge, and the innumerable objects of their knowledge! What must be the wisdom of Him, from whom all things derive their wisdom!—Timothy Dwight.

Chance and change are busy ever;
Man decays, and ages move;
But His mercy waneeth never;
God is wisdom, God is love.
—Bowring.

We never know through what Divine mysteries of compensation the great Father of the universe may be carrying out His sublime plan; but those three words, "God is love," ought to contain, to every doubting soul, the solution of all things.—D. M. Craik.

God is kind; but within the limits of inexorable law. He is good; but you can take no liberties with Him; for back of His pity and kindness is the righteousness that is so exact, and that must be satisfied to the uttermost farthing.—J. R. Paxton.

God's highest gifts—talent, beauty, feeling, imagination, power—they carry with them the possibility of the highest heaven and the lowest hell. Be sure that it is by that which is highest in you that you may be lost.—F. W. Robertson.

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Be Thou our guard while troubles last,
And our eternal home! —Watts.

God's treasury where He keeps His children's gifts will be like many a mother's store of relics of her children, full of things of no value to others, but precious in His eyes for the love's sake that was in them.—Fénelon.

The mystery of the universe, and the meaning of God's world, are shrouded in hopeless obscurity, until we learn to feel that all laws suppose a lawgiver, and that all working involves a Divine energy.—Alexander Maclaren.

God hides nothing. His very work from the beginning is revelation—a casting aside of veil after veil, a showing unto men of truth after truth. On and on from fact Divine He advances, until at length in His Son Jesus He unveils His very face.—George MacDonald.

The man who forgets the wonders and mercies of the Lord is without any excuse; for we are continually surrounded with objects which may serve to bring the power and goodness of God strikingly to mind.—Slade.

Think not thy love to God merits God's love to thee; His acceptance of thy duty crowns His own gifts in thee; man's love to God is nothing but a faint reflection of God's love to man.—Quarles.

How calmly may we commit ourselves to the hands of Him who bears up the world—of Him who has created, and who provides for the joys even of insects, as carefully as if He were their father.—Richter.

It takes something of a poet to apprehend and get into the depth, the lusciousness, the spiritual life of a great poem. And so we must be in some way like God in order that we may see God as He is.—Chapin.

Is there any other seat of the Divinity than the earth, sea, air, the heavens, and virtuous minds? why do we seek God elsewhere? He is whatever you see; He is wherever you move.—Lucan.

There are regions beyond the most nebulous outskirts of matter; but no regions beyond the Divine goodness. We may conceive of tracts where there are no worlds, but not of any where there is no God of mercy.—J. W. Alexander.

Since, in possessing You, we possess all if we had nothing else, and in not possessing You we have nothing if we had all the rest, oh, my God! I will love You that I may possess You upon earth; and I will possess You that I may love You one day in heaven.—Joseph Roux.

A secret sense of God's goodness is by no means enough. Men should make solemn and outward expressions of it, when they receive His creatures for their support; a service and homage not only due to Him, but profitable to themselves.—Dean Stanhope.

There never was a man of solid understanding, whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised, but that he hath found by an irresistible necessity one true God and everlasting being.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Of what consequence is it that anything should be concealed from man? Nothing is hidden from God; He is present in our minds and comes into the midst of our thoughts. Comes, do I say?—as if He were ever absent!—Seneca.

If you wish to behold God, you may see Him in every object around; search in your breast, and you will find Him there. And if you do not yet perceive where He dwells, confute me, if you can, and say where He is not.—Metastasio.

With God is terrible majesty. Touching the Almighty we cannot find Him out. He is excellent in power and in judgment, and in plenty of justice. He will not afflict. Men do therefore fear Him.—Bible.

Though, in debating with regard to theories, it be lawful to say whether this or that is consistent with the Divine attributes, yet, when we find that God has actually done any thing, all question about its justice, wisdom, and benevolence is forever out of place.—Nehemiah Adams.

Who best

Bear His mild yoke, they serve Him best:
His state
Is kingly; thousands at His bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest.
—Milton.

The kingdom of God which is within us consists in our willing whatever God wills, always, in everything, and without reservation; and thus His kingdom comes; for His will is then done as it is in heaven, since we will nothing but what is dictated by His sovereign pleasure.—Fénelon.

Whatever may be the mysteries of life and death, there is one mystery which the cross of Christ reveals to us, and that is the infinite and absolute goodness of God. Let all the rest remain a mystery so long as the mystery of the cross of Christ gives us faith for all the rest.—Charles Kingsley.

It were better to have no opinion of God at all than such an opinion as is unworthy of Him; for the one is unbelief, and the other is contumely; and certainly superstition is the reproach of the Deity.—Bacon.

Dear Lord, our God and Saviour! for Thy gifts
The world were poor in thanks, though every soul
Were to do nought but breathe them, every blade
Of grass, and every atomie of earth
To utter it like dew. —Bailey.

It never frightened a Puritan when you bade him stand still and listen to the speech of God. His closet and his church were full of the reverberations of the awful, gracious, beautiful voice for which he listened.—Phillips Brooks.

If you were to spend a month feeding on the precious promises of God, you would not be going about with your heads hanging down like bulrushes, complaining how poor you are; but you would lift up your heads with confidence, and proclaim the riches of His grace because you could not help it.—D. L. Moody.

God is everywhere present by His power. He rolls the orbs of heaven with His hand; He fixes the earth with His foot; He guides all creatures with His eye, and refreshes them with His influence; He makes the powers of hell to shake with His terrors, and binds the devils with His word.—Jeremy Taylor.

We are not to consider the world as a body of God: He is an uniform being, devoid of organs, members, or parts; and they are His creatures, subordinate to Him, and subservient to His will.—Newton.

Because I believe in a God of absolute and unbounded love, therefore I believe in a loving anger of His which will and must devour and destroy all which is decayed, monstrous, abortive in His universe till all enemies shall be put under His feet, and God shall be all in all.—Charles Kingsley.

So long as the word "God" endures in a language will it direct the eyes of men upwards. It is with the Eternal as with the sun, which, if but its smallest part can shine unobscured, prolongs the day, and gives its rounded image in the dark chamber.—Richter.

In all thy actions think God sees thee; and in all His actions labor to see Him; that will make thee fear Him; this will move thee to love Him; the fear of God is the beginning of knowledge, and the knowledge of God is the perfection of love.—Quarles.

Thou art, O God, the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see;
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from Thee!
Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are thine! —Moore.

Ah, my friends, we must look out and around to see what God is like. It is when we persist in turning our eyes inward and prying curiously over our own imperfections, that we learn to make God after our own image, and fancy that our own darkness and hardness of heart are the patterns of His light and love.—Charles Kingsley.

Whenever I think of God I can only conceive of Him as a Being infinitely great and infinitely good. This last quality of the divine nature inspires me with such confidence and joy that I could have written even a miserere in tempo allegro.—Haydn.

We worship unity in trinity, and trinity in union: neither confounding the person nor dividing the substance. There is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost; but the Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal.—Tertullian.

The hand of God never tires, nor are its movements aimless. It makes all things subservient to its designs, and, at every turn, disappoints the calculations of man, causing the most insignificant events to expand to the mightiest consequences, while those that have the appearance of mountains vanish into nothing.—John Lanahan.

Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty; for all that is in the heaven and in the earth, is Thine; Thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and Thou art exalted as head above all.—Bible.

Nothing is more ancient than God, for He was never created; nothing more beautiful than the world, it is the work of that same God; nothing more active than thought, for it flies over the whole universe; nothing stronger than necessity, for all must submit to it.—Thales.

God's truth and faithfulness "are a great deep." They resemble the ocean itself; always there—vast, fathomless, sublime, the same in its majesty, its inexhaustible fullness, yesterday, today, and forever: the same in calm and storm, by day and by night; changeless while generations come and pass; everlasting while ages are rolling away.—Richard Fuller.

The wisdom of the Lord is infinite as are also His glory and His power. Ye heavens, sing His praises: sun, moon, and planets, glorify Him in your ineffable language! Praise Him, celestial harmonies, and all ye who can comprehend them! And thou, my soul, praise thy Creator! It is by Him and in Him that all exist.—Kepler.

While earthly objects are exhausted by familiarity the thought of God becomes to the devout man continually brighter, richer, vaster; derives fresh luster from all that he observes of nature and Providence, and attracts to itself all the glories of the universe.—Channing.

However dark our lot may be, there is light enough on the other side of the cloud, in that pure empyrean where God dwells, to irradiate every darkness of this world; light enough to clear every difficult question, remove every ground of obscurity, conquer every atheistic suspicion, silence every hard judgment, light enough to satisfy, nay, to ravish the mind forever.—Horace Bushnell.

When my reason is afloat, my faith cannot long remain in suspense, and I believe in God as firmly as in any other truth whatever; in short, a thousand motives draw me to the consolatory side, and add the weight of hope to the equilibrium of reason.—Rousseau.

God! sing, ye meadow-streams, with glad-some voice!
Ye pine-groves, with your soft and soul-
like sounds!
And they too have a voice, yon piles of
snow,
And in their perilous fall shall thunder,
God! —Coleridge.

The Christian will sometimes be brought to walk in a solitary path. God seems to cut away his props, that He may reduce him to Himself. His religion is to be felt as a personal, particular, appropriate possession. He is to feel that, as there is but one Jehovah to bless, so there seems to him as though there were but one penitent in the universe to be blessed by Him.—Richard Cecil.

There is a God! the sky His presence shares,
His hand upheaves the billows in their
mirth,
Destroys the mighty, yet the humble spares
And with contentment crowns the thought of worth. —Charlotte Cushman.

Day and night, and every moment, there are voices about us. All the hours speak as they pass; and in every event there is a message to us; and all our circumstances talk with us; but it is in Divine language, that worldliness misunderstands, that selfishness is frightened at, and that only the children of God hear rightly and happily.—Wm. Mountford.

O Thou, above all gods supreme! who broughtest the world out of darkness, and gavest man a heart to feel!
By whatsoever name Thou art addressed—God, Father, or Jehovah;
the God of Romulus or of Abraham—not the God of one man, but the Father and Judge of all!—Klopstock.

Every created thing glorifies God in its place by fulfilling His will, and the great purposes of His providence; but man alone can give tongue to every creature, and pronounce for all a general orthodoxy.—Kirby.

God shows us in Himself, strange as it may seem, not only authoritative perfection, but even the perfection of obedience—an obedience to His own laws; and in the cumbrous movement of those unwieldiest of his creatures we are reminded, even in His divine essence, of that attribute of uprightness in the human creature "that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not."—Ruskin.

"God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good."
* * * Whosoever I turn my eyes, behold the memorials of His greatness! of His goodness! * * * What the world contains of good is from His free and unrequited mercy; what it presents of real evil arises from ourselves.—Bishop Blomfield.

Thy great name
In all its awful brevity, hath nought
Unholy breeding it, but doth bless
Rather the tongue that uses it; for me,
I ask no higher office than to sing
My spirit at Thy feet, and cry Thy name,
God! through eternity. —Bailey.

There is a beauty in the name appropriated by the Saxon nations to the Deity, unequalled, except by His most venerated Hebrew appellation. They call him "God," which is literally "The Good." The same word thus signifying the Deity, and His most endearing quality.—Turner.

We find in God all the excellences of light, truth, wisdom, greatness, goodness and life. Light gives joy and gladness; truth gives satisfaction; wisdom gives learning and instruction; greatness excites admiration; goodness produces love and gratitude; life gives immortality and insures enjoyment.—Jones of Nayland.

If we can keep our minds calm on the subject of the "Eternity of God," if reason does not totter on her seat at the contemplation of underived existence, it will be strange if any other mystery relating to God should disturb us. He who can bring his reason to bow reverently at the idea of a Being who had no beginning, is well prepared to receive any communication of His will.—Nehemiah Adams.

At last I heard a voice upon the slope
Cry to the summit, "Is there any hope?"
To which an answer pealed from that high
land,
But in a tongue no man could understand;
And on the glimmering limit far withdrawn,
God made Himself an awful rose of dawn.
—Tennyson.

Not a step can we take in any direction without perceiving the most extraordinary traces of design; and the skill everywhere conspicuous is calculated in so vast a proportion of instances to promote the happiness of living creatures, and especially of ourselves, that we feel no hesitation in concluding that, if we knew the whole scheme of Providence, every part would appear to be in harmony with a plan of absolute benevolence.—Lord Brougham.

Was it possible that Napoleon should win the battle of Waterloo? We answer, No! Why? Because of Wellington? Because of Blücher? No! Because of God! For Bonaparte to conquer at Waterloo was not the law of the nineteenth century. It was time that this vast man should fall. He had been impeached before the Infinite! He had vexed God! Waterloo was not a battle. It was the change of front of the universe!—Victor Hugo.

God is not to be worshiped with sacrifices and blood; for what pleasure can He have in the slaughter of the innocent? but with a pure mind, a good and honest purpose. Temples are not to be built for Him with stones piled on high: God is to be consecrated in the breast of each.—Seneca.

The moral government of God is a movement in a line onwards towards some grand consummation, in which the principles, indeed, are ever the same, but the developments are always new—in which, therefore, no experience of the past can indicate with certainty what new openings of truth, what new manifestations of goodness, what new phases of the moral heaven may appear.—Mark Hopkins.

Many people have their own God; and He is much what the French may mean when they talk of Le bon Dieu—very indulgent, rather weak, near at hand when we want anything, but far away, out of sight, when we have a mind to do wrong. Such a God is as much an idol as if He were an image of stone.—Hare.

Whoever studies Divine providence, whether it be in relation to the events that concern us, our families, the cities and nations to which we belong; whoever studies the rise and fall of nations and empires, whoever looks at the clashing of armies, will perceive that these are only parts of one grand movement. God is marching on to the accomplishment of an appointed end; namely, the subjugation of the world to Himself.—J. M. Reid.

All is of God. If He but wave His hand,
The mists collect, the rains fall thick
and loud;
Till, with a smile of light on sea and land,
Lo! He looks back from the departing cloud.
Angels of life and death alike are His;
Without His leave they pass no threshold o'er;
Who, then, would wish or dare, believing this,
Against His messengers to shut the door?
—Longfellow.

A source of cheerfulness to a good mind is the consideration of that Being on whom we have our dependence, and in whom, though we behold Him as yet but in the first faint discoveries of His perfections, we see everything that we can imagine as great, glorious, or amiable. We find ourselves everywhere upheld by His goodness and surrounded by an immensity of love and mercy.—Addison.

God is alpha and omega in the great world: endeavor to make Him so in the little world; make Him thy evening epilogue and thy morning prologue; practice to make Him thy last thought at night when thou sleepest, and thy first thought in the morning when thou awakest; so shall thy fancy be sanctified in the night, and thy understanding rectified in the day; so shall thy rest be peaceful, thy labors prosperous, thy life pious, and thy death glorious.—Quarles.

Of old hast Thou laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the work of Thy hands. They shall perish, but Thou shalt endure; yea all of them shall wax old like a garment: as a vesture shalt Thou change them, and they shall be changed, but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end.—Bible.

Thou, my all!
My theme! my inspiration! and my crown!
My strength in age; my rise in low estate!
My soul's ambition, pleasure, wealth!—my world!
My light in darkness! and my life in death!
My boast through time! bliss through eternity!
Eternity, too short to speak Thy praise!
Or fathom Thy profound of love to man!
—Young.

Do you feel that you have lost your way in life? Then God Himself will show you your way. Are you utterly helpless, worn out, body and soul? Then God's eternal love is ready and willing to help you up, and revive you. Are you wearied with doubts and terrors? Then God's eternal light is ready to show you your way; God's eternal peace ready to give you peace. Do you feel yourself full of sins and faults? Then take heart; for God's unchangeable will is, to take away those sins, and purge you from those faults.—Charles Kingsley.

It is impossible for the mind which is not totally destitute of piety to behold the sublime, the awful, the amazing works of creation and providence—the heavens with their luminaries, the mountains, the ocean, the storm, the earthquake, the volcano, the circuit of the seasons, and the revolutions of empires—without marking in them all the mighty hand of God, and feeling strong emotions of reverence toward the Author of these stupendous works.—Timothy Dwight.

What an immense workman is God! in miniature as well as in the great. With the one hand, perhaps, He is making a ring of one hundred thousand miles in diameter, to revolve round a planet like Saturn, and with the other is forming a tooth in the ray of the feather of a humming-bird, or a point in the claw of the foot of a microscopic insect. When He works in miniature, everything is gilded, polished, and perfect, but whatever is made by human art, as a needle, etc., when viewed by a microscope, appears rough, and coarse, and bungling.—Bishop Law.

The same Being that fashioned the insect, whose existence is only discerned by a microscope, and gave that invisible speck a system of ducts and other organs to perform its vital functions, created the enormous mass of the planet thirteen hundred times larger than our earth, and launched it in its course round the sun, and the comet, wheeling with a velocity that would carry it round our globe in less than two minutes of time, and yet revolving through so prodigious a space that it takes near six centuries to encircle the sun!—Lord Brougham.

God Himself—His thoughts, His will, His love, His judgments are men's home. To think His thoughts, to choose His will, to judge His judgments, and thus to know that He is in us, with us, is to be at home. And to pass through the valley of the shadow of death is the way home, but only thus, that as all changes have hitherto led us nearer to this home, the knowledge of God, so this greatest of all outward changes—for it is but an outward change—will surely usher us into a region where there will be fresh possibilities of drawing nigh in heart, soul, and mind to the Father of us all.—George MacDonald.

Running like a gulf-stream through the sea of times comes the affirmation that God has manifested Himself to man, and the best men have affirmed it most persistently. Wherever this affirmation has made its way, the icebergs of skepticism have disappeared, the temperature of virtue has risen, and the sweet fruits of charity have ripened. If the belief be false, then a lie has blessed the world, and the soul is so organized that it reaches its highest state of development in an atmosphere of deception; for it is a fact that man is purest and woman most virtuous where belief in God's manifestations is most intense and real.—O. P. Gifford.

As Phidias contrived his mechanism so that his memory could never be obliterated without the destruction of his work, so the great name of God is interwoven in the texture of all that He has made. His goodness blooms in every flower; His glory beams in every star. There is a God! The sun speaks it in his splendor by day, and the moon in her radiance by night. There is a God! Inanimate nature, from the pebble upon the beach, to the orb that shines in the vaulted sky, declares it; and animate existence, from the tiniest insect, to Gabriel before the throne. The earth is full of Him. His majesty commands the cherubim; His temple is all space; His arm is around all worlds.—Joseph Dare.

We have a friend and protector, from whom, if we do not ourselves depart from Him, nor power nor spirit can separate us. In His strength let us proceed on our journey, through the storms, and troubles, and dangers of the world. However they may rage and swell, though the mountains shake at the tempests, our rock will not be moved: we have one friend who will never forsake us; one refuge, where we may rest in peace and stand in our lot at the end of the days. That same is He who liveth, and was dead; who is alive forevermore: and hath the keys of hell and of death.—Bishop Heber.

As a man exhibits himself in physical forms and actions, so there is one other Spirit, a great, wide, mighty, infinite, eternal Spirit back there in the depths of space, and in the present, and in the future, and in the abysses of space, who at His will wrestles into existence great globes, and keeps them in their position. He builds them, and places on them these mysterious forms of earth which are signals hung out over these abysses to tell coming spirits who He is, what He is, what He does, how high is His throne, and how vast is His power from eternity to eternity, from infinity to infinity through all ages of all time; He is holding forth to men and angels these external tokens of His almighty power, of His infinite skill, and of His everlasting love.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

Guide me, O Thou great Jehovah,
Pilgrim through this barren land;
I am weak, but Thou art mighty;
Hold me with Thy powerful hand;
Bread of heaven!
Feed me till I want no more.
—W. Williams.

Lead, kindly Light! amid the encircling
gloom,
Lead Thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on;
Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.
—John H. Newman.

Godliness

Godliness is practical religion.—Dewey.

Truthfulness is godliness.—Beecher.

All flows out from the Deity, and all must be absorbed in Him again.—Zoroaster.

The form of godliness may exist with secret and with open wickedness, but the power of godliness cannot.—Phillips Brooks.

Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.—Bible.

Gods (The)

Man is certainly stark mad; he cannot make a flea, and yet he will be making gods by dozens.—Montaigne

The gods play games with men as balls.—Plautus.

The gods my protectors.—Horace.

Who hearkens to the gods, the gods give ear.—Homer.

I would the gods had made thee poetical.—Shakespeare.

Speak of the gods as they are.—Bias.

The matchless Ganymede, divinely fair.—Homer.

The world is the mighty temple of the gods.—Seneca.

As flies to wanton boys, are we to the gods;
They kill us for their sport.
—Shakespeare.

Jove weighs affairs of earth in dubious scales,
And the good suffers while the bad prevails.
—Homer.

Shakes his ambrosial curls, and gives the nod,
The stamp of fate, and sanction of the god.
—Homer.

The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices
Make instruments to plague us.
—Shakespeare.

Some thoughtlessly proclaim the Muses nine;
A tenth is Sappho, maid divine.
—Greek Anthology.

The more we deny ourselves, the more the gods supply our wants.—Horace.

Cease to think that the decrees of the gods can be changed by prayers.—Virgil.

Ye immortal gods! where in the world are we?—Cicero.

For the gods, instead of what is most pleasing, will give what is most proper. Man is dearer to them than he is to himself.—Juvenal.

The gods and their tranquil abodes appear, which no winds disturb, nor clouds bedew with showers, nor does the white snow, hardened by frost, annoy them; the heaven, always pure, is without clouds, and smiles with pleasant light diffused.—Lucretius.

In the elder days of Art,
Builders wrought with greatest care
Each minute and unseen part;
For the gods see everywhere.
—Longfellow.

As sweet and musical
As bright Apollo's lute, strung with his hair;
And when Love speaks, the voice of all the gods
Makes heaven drowsy with the harmony.
—Shakespeare.

Say, Bacchus, why so placid? What can there be
In commune held by Pallas and by thee?
Her pleasure is in darts and battles; thine
In joyous feasts and draughts of rosy wine.
—Greek Anthology.

With ravish'd ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres.
—Dryden.

The gods
Grow angry with your patience. 'Tis their care
And must be yours, that guilty men escape
not:
As crimes do grow, justice should rouse itself.
—Ben Jonson.

The son of Saturn gave
The nod with his dark brows. The ambrosial curls
Upon the Sovereign One's immortal head
Were shaken, and with them the mighty mount,
Olympus trembled.
—Homer.

High in the home of the summers, the seats
of the happy immortals,
Shrouded in knee-deep blaze, unapproachable;
there ever youthful
Hebé, Harmonié, and the daughter of Jove, Aphrodité,
Whirled in the white-linked dance, with the gold-crowned Hours and Graces.
—Charles Kingsley.

When a man is laboring under the pain of any distemper, it is then that he recollects there are gods, and that he himself is but a man; no mortal is then the object of his envy, his admiration, or his contempt, and having no malice to gratify, the tales of slander excite not his attention.—Pliny the Younger.

Janus am I; oldest of potentates!
Forward I look and backward and below
—count—as god of avenues and gates—
The years that through my portals come and go.
I block the roads and drift the fields with snow,
I chase the wild-fowl from the frozen fen;
My frosts congeal the rivers in their flow,
My fires light up the hearths and hearts of men.
—Longfellow.

Creator Venus, genial power of love,
The bliss of men below, and gods above!
Beneath the sliding sun thou runn'st thy race,
Dost fairest shine, and best become thy place;
For thee the winds their eastern blasts forbear,
Thy mouth reveals the spring, and opens all the year;
Thee, goddess, thee, the storms of winter fly,
Earth smiles with flowers renewing, laughs the sky.
—Dryden.

Gold

All that glitters is not gold.—Shakespeare.

Gold all is not that doth golden seem.—Spenser.

All is not golde that outward sheweth bright.—Lydgate.

Gold—what can it not do, and undo?—Shakespeare.

A mask of gold hides all deformities.—Decker.

Gold—the picklock that never fails.—Massinger.

Can pocket states, or fetch or carry kings.—Pope.

Bright and yellow, hard and cold.—Hood.

There is no place invincible, where in an ass loaden with gold may not enter.—Collett.

Saint-seducing gold.—Shakespeare.

Poison is drunk out of golden cups.—Seneca.

Thou more than stone of the philosopher!—Byron.

The dangers gather as the treasures rise.—Dr. Johnson.

If all were rich, gold would be penniless.—Bailey.

For gold in phisik is a cordial;
Therefore he loved gold in special.
—Chaucer.

For gold the merchant ploughs the main,
The farmer ploughs the manor. —Burns.

The plague of gold strikes far and near.—Mrs. Browning.

Accursed thirst for gold! what dost thou not compel mortals to do?—Virgil.

Judges and senates have been bought for gold;
Esteem and love were never to be sold.
—Pope.

How quickly nature falls to revolt when gold becomes her object!—Shakespeare.

How few, like Daniel, have God and gold together!—George Villiers.

Gold adulterates one thing only—the human heart.—Marguerite de Valois.

Gold is a living god, and rules in scorn all earthly things but virtue.—Shelley.

Gold is the fool's curtain, which hides all his defects from the world.—Feltham.

Foul-cankering rust the hidden treasure frets;
But gold, that's put to use, more gold begets.
—Shakespeare.

And mammon wins his way where seraphs might despair.—Byron.

It is much better to have your gold in the hand than in the heart.—Fuller.

As the touchstone tries gold, so gold tries men.—Chilo.

Gold hath no lustre of its own.
It shines by temperate use alone.
—Francis.

Gold is, in its last analysis, the sweat of the poor and the blood of the brave.—Joseph Napoleon.

No, let the monarch's bags and coffers hold
The flattering mighty, nay, all-mighty gold.
—John Wolcott.

Thou true magnetic pole, to which all hearts point duly north, like trembling needles!—Byron.

For gold the hireling judge distorts
the laws.—Dr. Johnson.

Because its blessings are abused, must gold be censured, cursed, accused?—Gay.

Gold can gild a rotten stick, and dirt sully an ingot.—Sir P. Sidney.

O, I cry your mercy;
There is my purse, to cure that blow of thine.
—Shakespeare.

What nature wants, commodious gold bestows;
'Tis thus we cut the bread another sows.
—Pope.

Though authority be a stubborn bear, yet he is oft led by the nose with gold.—Shakespeare.

O cursed lust of gold! when for thy sake
The fool throws up his interest in both worlds.
—Blair.

The lust of gold succeeds the rage of conquest;
The lust of gold, unfeeling and remorseless!
The last corruption of degenerate man.
—Sam'l Johnson.

Gold glitters most where virtue shines no more, as stars from absent suns have leave to shine.—Young.

Midas longed for gold. He got gold, so that whatever he touched became gold; and he, with his long ears, was little the better for it.—Carlyle.

Gold, like the sun, which melts wax and hardens clay, expands great souls and contracts bad hearts.—Rivarol.

Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding; it dissipates every doubt and scruple in an instant.—Addison.

Commerce has set the mark of selfishness, the signet of its all-enslaving power, upon a shining ore and called it gold.—Shelley.

Because my blessings are abus'd,
Must I be censur'd, curs'd, accus'd?
Even virtue's self by knaves is made
A cloak to carry on the trade. —Gay.

O what a world of vile ill-favored faults looks handsome in three hundred pounds a year!—Shakespeare.

Gold loves to make its way through guards, and breaks through barriers of stone more easily than the lightning's bolt.—Horace.

It is observed of gold, by an old epigrammatist, "that to have it is to be in fear, and to want it, to be in sorrow."—Johnson.

Can gold calm passion, or make reason
shine?
Can we dig peace, or wisdom, from the mine?
Wisdom to gold prefer; for 'tis much less
To make our fortune, than our happiness.
—Young.

Gold is the strength, the sinews of the world;
The health, the soul, the beauty most divine;
A mask of gold hides all deformities;
Gold is heaven's physic, life's restorative.
—Decker.

Stronger than thunder's winged force
All-powerful gold can speed its course;
Through watchful guards its passage make,
And loves through solid walls do break.
—Francis.

Gold begets in brethren hate;
Gold in families debate;
Gold does friendship separate;
Gold does civil wars create.
—Abraham Cowley.

It is gold which buys admittance;
and it is gold which makes the true man killed, and saves the thief; nay, sometimes hangs both thief and true man; what can it not do and undo?—Shakespeare.

Gold is Cæsar's treasure, man is God's; thy gold hath Cæsar's image, and thou hast God's; give, therefore, those things unto Cæsar which are Cæsar's, and unto God which are God's.—Quarles.

Abundance is a blessing to the wise;
The use of riches in discretion lies:
Learn this, ye men of wealth—a heavy purse
In a fool's pocket is a heavy curse.

—Cumberland.

There are two metals, one of which is omnipotent in the cabinet, and the other in the camp—gold and iron. He that knows how to apply them both may indeed attain the highest station.—Colton.

You know the Ark of Israel and the calf of Belial were both made of gold. Religion has never yet changed the metal of her one adoration.—Ouida.

There is thy gold, worse poison to men's souls,
Doing more murders in this loathsome
world,
Than these poor compounds that thou
mayst not sell.
I sell thee poison, thou hast sold me none.
—Shakespeare.

I know not whether there exists such a thing as a coin stamped with a pair of pinions; but I wish this were the device which monarchs put upon their dollars and ducats, to show that riches make to themselves wings, and fly away.—Gotthold.

Gold! gold! in all ages the curse of mankind,
Thy fetters are forged for the soul and the
mind.
The limbs may be free as the wings of a bird,
And the mind be the slave of a look and a word.
To gain thee men barter eternity's crown,
Yield honour, affection, and lasting renown.
—Park Benjamin.

By gold all good faith has been banished; by gold our rights are abused; the law itself is influenced by gold, and soon there will be an end of every modest restraint.—Propertius.

How quickly nature falls into revolt
When gold becomes her object!
For this the foolish over-careful fathers Have broke their sleep with thoughts, their brains with care,
Their bones with industry:
For this they have engrossed and pil'd up
The canker'd heaps of strange-achieved
gold;
For this they have been thoughtful to invest
Their sons with arts and martial exercises.
—Shakespeare.

Oh, bane of man! seducing cheat!
Can man, weak man, thy power defeat?
Gold banish'd honor from the mind,
And only left the name behind;
Gold sow'd the world with ev'ry ill,
Gold taught the murderer's sword to kill;
'Twas gold instructed coward hearts
In treachery's more pernicious arts.
—Gay.

Thus, when the villain crams his chest,
Gold is the canker of the breast;
'Tis avarice, insolence, and pride,
And every shocking vice beside:—
But when to virtuous hands 'tis given,
It blesses, like the dews of heaven:
Like heaven, it hears the orphans' cries,
And wipes the tears from widows' eyes.
—Gay.

O thou sweet king-killer, and dear divorce
Twixt natural son and sire! thou bright defiler
Of hymen's purest bed! thou valiant Mars!
Thou ever young, fresh, lov'd, and delicate
wooer,
Whose blush doth thaw the consecrated
snow
That lies on Dian's lip! thou visible god,
That solder'st close impossibilities,
And mak'st them kiss! and speak'st with every tongue,
To every purpose! —Shakespeare.

Why lose we life in anxious cares,
To lay in hoards for future years?
Can these, when tortur'd by disease,
Cheer our sick hearts, or purchase ease?
Can these prolong one gasp of breath,
Or calm the troubled hour of death?
—Gay.

Those who worship gold in a world so corrupt as this we live in have at least one thing to plead in defense of their idolatry—the power of their idol. It is true that, like other idols, it can neither move, see, hear, feel,

nor understand; but, unlike other idols, it has often communicated all these powers to those who had them not, and annihilated them in those who had. This idol can boast of two peculiarities; it is worshipped in all climates, without a single temple, and by all classes, without a single hypocrite.—Colton.

Commerce has set the mark of selfishness,
The signet of its all-enslaving power
Upon a shining ore, and called it gold;
Before whose image bow the vulgar great,
The vainly rich, the miserable proud,
The mob of peasants, nobles, priests, and
kings,
And with blind feelings reverence the
power
That grinds them to the dust of misery.
But in the temple of their hireling hearts
Gold is a living god, and rules in scorn
All earthly things but virtue.—Shelley.

Give him gold enough, and marry him to a puppet, or an aglet-baby; or an old trot with ne'er a tooth in her head, though she have as many diseases as two and fifty horses; why, nothing comes amiss, so money comes withal.—Shakespeare.

Goldenrod

I know the lands are lit
With all the autumn blaze of Goldenrod.
—Helen Hunt Jackson.

Still the Goldenrod of the roadside clod
Is of all, the best!
—Simeon Tucker Clark.

Welcome, dear Goldenrod, once more,
Thou mimic, flowering elm!
I always think that summer's store
Hangs from thy laden stem.
—Horace H. Scudder.

Graceful, tossing plume of glowing gold,
Waving lonely on the rocky ledge;
Leaning seaward, lovely to behold,
Clinging to the high cliff's ragged edge.
—Celia Thaxter.

Nature lies disheveled, pale,
With her feverish lips apart—
Day by day the pulses fail,
Nearer to her bounding heart;
Yet that slackened grasp doth hold
Store of pure and genuine gold;
Quick thou comest, strong and free,
Type of all the wealth to be—Goldenrod!

—Elaine Goodale.

Because its myriad glimmering plumes
Like a great army's stir and wave;
Because its golden billows bloom,
The poor man's barren walks to lave:
Because its sun-shaped blossoms show
How souls receive the light of God,
And unto earth give back that glow—
I thank Him for the Goldenrod.
—Lucy Larcom.

I lie amid the Goldenrod,
I love to see it lean and nod;
I love to feel the grassy sod
Whose kindly breast will hold me last,
Whose patient arms will fold me fast!—
Fold me from sunshine and from song,
Fold me from sorrow and from wrong:
Through gleaming gates of Goldenrod
I'll pass into the rest of God.
—Mary Clemmer.

Golf

Your play needs no excuse.—Shakespeare.

What subtle hole is this?—Shake-
speare.

The harder match'd, the greater victory.—Shakespeare.

Strike, brave boys, and take your turns.—Shakespeare.

So they Doubly redoubled strokes.
—Shakespeare.

Where will I get a little page,
Where will I get a caddie?
—Thistle of Scotland.

Don't drive at a fellow-creature, so long as there is a reasonable chance of hitting him.—W. E. Norris.

When driving ceases, may we still be able To play the shorts, putt and be comfortable.
—G. F. Carnegie.

Welcome, grave stranger, to our green retreats,
Where health with exercise and freedom
meets.
—Scott.

Either a wise man will not go into bunkers, or, being in, he will endure such things as befall him with patience.—A. Lang.

We want a boy extremely for this function.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Time-honored golf! I heard it whispered once
That he who could not play was held a dunce
On old Olympus, when it teemed with gods. —G. F. Carnegie.

One only thought can enter every head;
The thought of golf, to wit—and that engages
Men of all sizes, tempers, ranks and ages.
—G. F. Carnegie.

And we've leeved it every hour,
But say not at all we will loft our ball
And hauff the hole in fower.
Then dorny hame we can sing through the
round,
And die like golfers keen,
We've played fu' weel the short game and lang,
The game on the golfing-green.
—Thomas Dykes.

Good-Breeding

Good-breeding is surface Christianity.—Holmes.

Virtue itself often offends when coupled with bad manners.—Middleton.

A man's good-breeding is the best security against another's bad manners.—Chesterfield.

One may know a man that never conversed in the world, by his excess of good-breeding.—Addison.

Good-breeding shows itself most where to an ordinary eye it appears the least.—Addison.

Good qualities are the substantial riches of the mind; but it is good breeding that sets them off to advantage.—Locke.

The scholar without good breeding is a pedant; the philosopher, a cynic; the soldier, a brute; and every man disagreeable.—Chesterfield.

There are few defects in our nature so glaring as not to be veiled from observation by politeness and good-breeding.—Stanislaus.

As ceremony is the invention of wise men to keep fools at a distance,

so good-breeding is an expedient to make fools and wise men equals.—
Steele.

Good-breeding is as necessary a quality in conversation, to accomplish all the rest, as grace in motion and dancing.—Sir Wm. Temple.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse. Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy is the best bred in the company.—Swift.

It is not wit merely, but temper,
which must form the well-bred man.
In the same manner it is not a head merely, but a heart and resolution, which must complete the real philosopher.—Shaftesbury.

Good-breeding carries along with it a dignity that is respected by the most petulant. Ill-breeding invites and authorizes the familiarity of the most timid.—Chesterfield.

The highest point of good-breeding, if any one can hit it, is to show a very nice regard to your own dignity, and with that in your heart, to express your value for the man above you.—Steele.

Good-breeding is the art of showing men, by external signs, the internal regard we have for them. It arises from good sense, improved by conversing with good company.—Cato.

A man endowed with great perfec-tions, without good-breeding, is like one who has his pockets full of gold, but always wants change for his ordinary occasions.—Steele.

One principal object of good-breeding is to suit our behaviour to the three several degrees of men,—our superiors, our equals, and those below us.—Swift.

Good-breeding is the result of much good sense, some good-nature, and a little self-denial for the sake of others, and with a view to obtain the same indulgence from them.—Chesterfield.

Perhaps the summary of good-breeding may be reduced to this rule. "Behave unto all men as you would they should behave unto you." This will most certainly oblige us to treat all mankind with the utmost civility and respect, there being nothing that we desire more than to be treated so by them.—Fielding.

Some young people do not sufficiently understand the advantages of natural charms, and how much they would gain by trusting to them entirely. They weaken these gifts of heaven, so rare and fragile, by affected manners and an awkward imitation. They tones and their gait are borrowed; they study their attitudes before the glass until they have lost all trace of natural manner, and, with all their pains, they please but little.—Bruyère.

We see a world of pains taken and the best years of life spent in collecting a set of thoughts in a college for the conduct of life, and after all the man so qualified shall hesitate in his speech to a good suit of clothes, and want common sense before an agreeable woman. Hence it is that wisdom, valour, justice and learning cannot keep a man in countenance that is possessed with these excellencies, if he wants that inferior art of life and behaviour called good-breeding.—Steele.

There is no society or conversation to be kept up in the world without good-nature, or something which must bear its appearance, and supply its place. For this reason mankind have been forced to invent a kind of artificial humanity, which is what we express by the word "good-breeding." For, if we examine thoroughly the idea of what we call so, we shall find it to be nothing else but an imitation and mimicry of good-nature, or, in other terms, affability, complaisance, and easiness of temper reduced into an art.—Addison.

Good-By

Why should we hesitate to say "good-by" to each other? Are we not Pagans, to think that a word has power over God's quiet purposes, and that saying "good-by" smells of death? Must men die intestate because they think that making their wills is cutting out their shrouds? If we were old Romans, who thought "vale!" meant "forever," we might be shy of such a word, but "good-by," even if it should be for the last time on earth, is only the difference between "good-night" and "good-morning." Say it, then, like a Christian, and, if it still comes hesitatingly, stretch it out into the loveliest of wishes, "God be with you."—Maltbie Babcock.

Good Friday

Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness.—Bible.

In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time,
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime.

Death is the justification of all the ways of the Christian, the last end of all his sacrifices, the touch of the Great Master which completes the picture.—Mme. Swetchine.

The cross was two pieces of dead wood; and a helpless, unresisting Man was nailed to it; yet it was mightier than the world, and triumphed, and will ever triumph over it.—Hare.

Exalt the Cross! God has hung the destiny of the race upon it. Other things we may do in the realm of ethics, and on the lines of philanthropic reforms; but our main duty converges into setting that one glorious beacon of salvation, Calvary's Cross, before the gaze of every immortal soul.—Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D.

When God's children pass under the shadow of the cross of Calvary, they know that through that shadow lies their passage to the great white throne. For them Gethsemane is as paradise. God fills it with sacred presences; its solemn silence is broken by the music of tender promises, its awful darkness softened and brightened by the sunlight of Heavenly faces and the music of angel wings.—Dear Farrar.

We see that brow bruised; we hear that dying groan; and while the priests scoff and the devils rave, and the lightnings of God's wrath are twisted into a wreath for that bloody mount, you and I will join the cry, the supplication, of the penitent malefactor, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom."—T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D.

The mob that hounded Christ from Jerusalem to "the place of a skull" has never been dispersed, but is augmenting yet, as many of the learned men of the world and great men of the world come out from their studies and their laboratories and their palaces, and cry, "Away with this man! Away with him!" The most bitter hostility which many of the learned men of this day exercise in any direction they exercise against Jesus Christ the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.—T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D.

Christ took hold of the work of the world's saving in a larger way than it is possible for us to do, and therefore the burden of His undertaking came upon Him in a heavier, wider, and more crushing way than it can come upon us; and therefore, while it overwhelmed Him in sorrow, our smaller mission and lighter task can with entire propriety leave us buoyant and gladsome.—Chas. A. Parkhurst, D. D.

The essence of that by which Jesus overcame the world was not suffering, but obedience. Yes, men may puzzle themselves and their hearers over the question where the power of the life of Jesus and the death of Jesus lay; but the soul of the Christian always knows that it lay in the obedience of Christ. He was determined at every sacrifice to do His Father's will. Let us remember that; and the power of Christ's sacrifice may enter into us, and some little share of the redemption of the world may come through us, as the great work came through Him.—Phillips Brooks.

By the cross we, too, are crucified with Christ; but alive in Christ. We are no more rebels, but servants; no more servants, but sons! "Let it be counted folly," says Hooker, "or fury, or frenzy, or whatever else; it is our wisdom and our comfort. We care for no knowledge in the world but this, that man hath sinned, and that God hath suffered; that God has made Himself the Son of Man, and that men are made the righteousness of God."—Dean Farrar.

All His life long Christ was the light of the world, but the very noon-tide hour of His glory was that hour when the shadow of eclipse lay over all the land, and He hung on the Cross dying in the dark. At His eventide "it was light," and "He endured the Cross, despising the shame"—and, lo! the shame flashed up into the very brightness of glory, and the very ignominy and the suffering were the jewels of His crown.—Anglican and American Pulpit Library.

We may say that on the first Good Friday afternoon was completed that great act by which light conquered darkness and goodness conquered sin. That is the wonder of our Saviour's crucifixion. There have been victories all over the world, but wherever we look for the victor we expect to find him with his heel upon the neck of the vanquished. The wonder of Good Friday is that the victor lies vanquished by the vanquished one. We have to look deeper into the very heart and essence of things before we can see how real the victory is that thus hides itself under the guise of defeat.—Phillips Brooks.

And thus He had lived, and thus the world rewarded Him! For lies and baseness, for selfish greed and destructive ambition, for guilty wealth and mean compliance, the world has a diadem; for perfect holiness it has the cross! The darkness quenched the Light, His own disowned Him. They had repaid by hatred that life of love; envy, malice, slander, calumny, false witness, had done its work. Jesus had been excommunicated, hunted as a fugitive, with a price upon His head, buffeted, insulted, spit upon, mocked, scourged, crowned with thorns—thus had the world shown its gratitude to its Redeemer; and the end was here! After thirty hours of sleepless agony Jesus was hanging upon the cross. Infinite malignity! Could there be any greater proof of man's ruin than the fact that this was the sole reward which was required to immeasurable love?—Dean Farrar.

Bound upon th' accursed tree,
Dread and awful, who is He?
By the prayer for them that slew—
"Lord, they know not what they do!"
By the spoiled and empty grave;
By the souls He died to save;
By the conquest He hath won;
By the saints before His throne;
By the rainbow round His brow;
Son of God, 'tis Thou! 'tis Thou!
—Henry Hart Millman.

Yet once more that cross moves closer, and yet more intensely and eagerly He who hangs upon it seems to speak to us, and the burden of His words is: "I bring to you that which is highest and best for time and eternity; I bring to you the assurance that there is no grief and no sorrow that is not always in the Father's sight and may not be turned into blessing. I bring to you a power by which evil thoughts and tendencies may be destroyed. I bring to you whose memories are full of sad and bad recollections the assurance that no life can have been so wicked, no past so foul, no strength so far gone, as to cut off from the love of God and His willingness to save." Are you willing to hear that voice and to respond to its invitation?—Amory H. Bradford, D. D.

So shall we join the disciples of our Lord, keeping faith in Him in spite of the crucifixion, and making ready, by our loyalty to Him in the days of His darkness, for the time when we shall enter into His triumph in the days of His light. And the beauty of it is that the same method runs throughout the disciples' work which ran through His work. Christ's method is repeating itself in the work of His disciples for ever and ever. As He who first gained the great victory overcame by undergoing the power of evil, shall we be surprised if that is the sort of victory that God calls upon us to gain? It is the victory which it is always the best to gain which makes the richest victory for any soul.—Phillips Brooks.

We cannot have the heart that Christ had and not in the same degree have His suffering. We may be sound in our doctrinal position, fight doctrinal heresy as though it were an exhalation from the under-world, be instant in our attendance upon the means of grace, stately participate in the service memorial of our Lord's dying love, but a loving heart is what makes out the major part of the whole Christian matter—a heart, therefore, that feels others' burdens and griefs as though they were its own; and one cannot have such a heart in the midst of this world and not have an aching heart. It is aside from the mark to say that that makes of the Christian religion a gloomy religion. The gloom is not in the religion, the gloom is in the world, and sorrow of spirit like that of our Lord is simply the way tender-heartedness like that of our Lord is certain to be affected when the shadow of the world's suffering falls upon it.—Chas. H. Parkhurst, D. D.

Nothing is further from the way in which Christ's apostles and Christ Himself teach us to regard the cross than the morbid, effeminate, gloating luxury of self-stimulated emotion. The unnatural self-torture of the flagellant, the hysterics of the convulsionary, the iron courage of the mistaken penitents, are manifestly out of place in contemplating that cross, which is the symbol of sin defeated, of sorrow transmuted, of effort victorious, which is the pledge of God's peace with man, and man's peace with God, which is the comfort of the penitent, which is the inspiration of the philanthropist, which is the symbol of divine charity on fields of slaughter, which was the banner in the van of every battle which good has waged with ill! The cross does not mean whipping, anguish, morbid wailing, morose despair; it means joy, it means peace, it means exultation, it means the atonement, it means the redemption, it means the liberty of humanity, it means the advance of holiness, it means the remission of sins!—Dean Farrar.

There is a green hill far away,
Without a city wall,
Where the dear Lord was crucified,
Who died to save us all.
We may not know, we cannot tell
What pains He had to bear;
But we believe it was for us
He hung and suffered there.
He died that we might be forgiven,
He died to make us good,
That we might go at last to heaven,
Saved by His precious blood.
—Mrs. C. F. Alexander.

A more sympathetic consideration of the personal element in the sufferings of our Lord, the meditation upon the sorrows of the Messiah, would prove a source of spiritual quickening not only to those who are accustomed to live in the region of philosophic thought, but also to those who are in the midst of evangelistic work. The following of Christ down into the valley of humiliation and death, the study, day by day, of the last days of His earthly life, the reverent watch by the cross, the waiting for the resurrection—these are spiritual exercises which cannot fail to give warmth and reality to the Christian faith. The majority of Christian believers, without reference to sect, now observe Easter. By the "logic of events" no less than by spiritual sympathy, Passion week deserves its place in the calendar of the private Christian; and the more remote the thoughts which it suggests may be to his ordinary religious thinking, the more helpful they may be to the spirit of devotion.—Christian Age.

Good-Humor

Affability, mildness, tenderness, and a word which I would fain bring back to its original signification of virtue,—I mean good-nature,—are of daily use: they are the bread of mankind and staff of life.—Dryden.

The sunshine of the mind.—Bulwer Lytton.

Good-humor is the clear blue sky of the soul.—Frederic Saunders.

Good-humor makes all things tolerable.—Beecher.

Good-humor is always a success.—Lavater.

Good-nature is stronger than tomahawks.—Emerson.

Good-humor is goodness and wisdom combined.—Owen Meredith.

Good-humor is the health of the soul, sadness its poison.—Stanislaus.

The good-humor of a man elated with success often displays itself towards enemies.—Macaulay.

Good-humor will even go so far as often to supply the lack of wit.—Fielding.

Good-humor is allied to generosity, ill-humor to meanness.—Greville.

Men naturally warm and heady are transported with the greatest flush of good-nature.—Addison.

Learn good-humor, never to oppose without just reason; abate some degree of pride and moroseness.—Dr. Watts.

Gayety is to good-humor as perfumes to vegetable fragrance: the one overpowers weak spirits; the other recreates and revives them.—Dr. Johnson.

Good-humor, gay spirits, are the liberators, the sure cure for spleen and melancholy. Deeper than tears, these irradiate the tophets with their glad heavens. Go laugh, vent the pits, transmuting imps into angels by the alchemy of smiles. The satans flee at the sight of these redeemers.—Alcott.

It is also important to guard against mistaking for good-nature what is properly good-humor,—a cheerful flow of spirits and easy temper not readily annoyed, which is compatible with great selfishness.—Whately.

People are not aware of the very great force which pleasantry in company has upon all those with whom a man of that talent converses.—Steele.

A cheerful temper, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful, and wit good-natured.—Addison.

Good-humor is a state between gaiety and unconcern,—the act or emanation of a mind at leisure to regard the gratification of another.—Dr. Johnson.

When good-natured people leave us we look forward with extra pleasure to their return.—H. W. Shaw.

Good-humor will sometimes conquer ill-humor, but ill-humor will conquer it oftener; and for this plain reason, good-humor must operate on generosity, ill-humor on meanness.—Greville.

Good sense and good-nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good-nature, by which I mean beneficence and candor, is the product of right reason.—Dryden.

Good Intention

Many a good intention dies from inattention. If, through carelessness or indolence, or selfishness, a good intention is not put into effect, we have lost an opportunity, demoralized ourselves, and stolen from the pile of possible good. To be born and not fed, is to perish. To launch a ship and neglect it is to lose it. To have a talent and bury it, is to be a “wicked and slothful servant.” For in the end we shall be judged, not alone by what we have done, but by what we could have done.—Maltbie Babcock.

Good-Nature

Good-nature is one of the richest fruits of true Christianity.—Henry Ward Beecher.

All other knowledge is hurtful to him who has not the science of honesty and good-nature.—Montaigne.

Nothing can constitute good-breeding that has not good-nature for its foundation.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Good-nature is the very air of a good mind, the sign of a large and generous soul, and the peculiar soil in which virtue prospers.—Goodman.

Good-nature is the beauty of the mind, and like personal beauty, wins almost without anything else,—sometimes, indeed, in spite of positive deficiencies.—Hanway.

Honest good-humor is the oil and wine of a merry meeting, and there is no jovial companionship equal to that where the jokes are rather small and the laughter abundant.—Washington Irving.

Good sense and good-nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good-nature, by which I mean beneficence and candor, is the product of right reason.—Dryden.

That inexhaustible good-nature which is the most precious gift of Heaven, spreading itself like oil over the troubled sea of thought, and keeping the mind smooth and equable in the roughest weather.—Washington Irving.

Good-nature is more agreeable in conversation than wit, and gives a certain air to the countenance which is more amiable than beauty. It shows virtue in the fairest light; takes off in some measure from the deformity of vice; and makes even folly and impertinence supportable.—Addison.

Good-nature is worth more than knowledge, more than money, more than honor, to the persons who possess it, and certainly to everybody who dwells with them, in so far as mere happiness is concerned.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There are persons of that general philanthropy and easy tempers, which the world in contempt generally calls good-natured, who seem to be sent into the world with the same design with which men put little fish into a pike pond, in order only to be devoured by that voracious water-hero.—Fielding.

'Tis good nature only wins the heart;
It moulds the body to an easy grace
And brightens every feature of the face;
It smoothes th' unpolish'd tongue with eloquence
And adds persuasion to the finest sense.
—Stillfleet.

Good-nature is that benevolent and amiable temper of mind which disposes us to feel the misfortunes and enjoy the happiness of others, and, consequently, pushes us on to promote the latter and prevent the former; and that without any abstract contemplation on the beauty of virtue, and without the allurements or terrors of religion.—Fielding.

Goodness

Goodness is beauty in its best estate.—Marlowe.

'Tis only noble to be good.—Tennyson.

O goodness! that shall evil turn to good.—Milton.

Seek for good, but expect evil.—Cervantes.

Nothing rarer than real goodness.—Rochefoucauld.

If you wish to be good, first believe that you are bad.—Epictetus.

How goodness heightens beauty!—Hannah More.

The true and good resemble gold.—Jacobi.

And learn the luxury of doing good.—Goldsmith.

Evil and good are God's right hand and left.—Bailey.

Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.—Pope.

How near to good is what is fair!—Ben Jonson.

Sin writes histories, goodness is silent.—Goethe.

The soul is strong that trusts in goodness.—Massinger.

That good diffused may more abundant grow.—Cowper.

Goodness admits of no excess, but error.—Bacon.

Goodness thinks no ill where no ill seems.—Milton.

Man should be ever better than he seems.—Sir Aubrey de Vere.

Virtue is bold and goodness never fearful.—Shakespeare.

He is good that does good to others.—La Bruyère.

Doing good is the only certainly happy action of a man's life.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil, would men observingly distil it out.—Shakespeare.

Good deeds ring clear through heaven, like a bell.—Richter.

Scream as we may at the bad, the good prevails.—Bartol.

My heart contains of good, wise, just, the perfect shape.—Milton.

All are of the race of God, and have in themselves good.—Bailey.

Heaven prepares good men with crosses; but no ill can happen to a good man.—Ben Jonson.

A real man is he whose goodness is a part of himself.—Mencius.

Great hearts alone understand how much glory there is in being good.—Michelet.

Good, the more communicated, the more abundant grows.—Milton.

Real goodness does not attach itself merely to this life; it points to another world.—Daniel Webster.

There is a warp of evil woven in the woof of good.—Manilius.

Be not simply good; be good for something.—Thoreau.

Goodness is the only investment that never fails.—Thoreau.

He who believes in goodness has the essence of all faith. He is a man "of cheerful yesterdays and confident to-morrows."—J. F. Clarke.

Great hearts alone understand how much glory there is in being good.—Michelet.

Every day should be distinguished by at least one particular act of love.—Lavater.

When what is good comes of age, and is likely to live, there is reason for rejoicing.—George Eliot.

He is a truly good man who desires always to bear the inspection of good men.—La Rochefoucauld.

The good are better made by ill,
As odors crushed are sweeter still.
—S. Rogers.

Forever all goodness will be most charming; forever all wickedness will be most odious.—Thomas Sprat.

What is good only because it pleases cannot be pronounced good till it has been found to please.—Johnson.

Men have less lively perception of good than of evil.—Livy.

A charmed life old goodness hath; the tares may perish, but the grain is not for death.—Whittier.

Whatever any one does or says, I must be good.—Aurelius Antoninus.

Few persons have courage enough to seem as good as they really are.—Hare.

A good man enlarges the term of his own existence.—Martial.

His daily prayer, far better understood in acts than words, was simply doing good.—Whittier.

You are not very good if you are not better than your best friends imagine you to be.—Lavater.

If for anything he loved greatness, it was because therein he might exercise his goodness.—Sir P. Sidney.

How far that little candle throws his beams! so shines a good deed in a naughty world.—Shakespeare.

She has more goodness in her little finger than he has in his whole body.—Swift.

Only the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.
—Shirley.

What is beautiful is good, and who is good will soon also be beautiful.—Sappho.

Happy were men if they but understood
There is no safety but in doing good.
—John Fountain.

It is only great souls that know how much glory there is in being good.—Sophocles.

Goodness consists not in the outward things we do, but in the inward thing we are. To be is the great thing.—E. H. Chapin.

He that does good for good's sake seeks neither praise nor reward, though sure of both at last.—William Penn.

Doing good,
Disinterested good, is not our trade.
—Cowper.

Look around the habitable world, how few know their own good, or knowing it, pursue.
—Dryden.

Your goodness must have some edge to it, else it is none.—Emerson.

No good book, or good thing of any sort, shows its best face at first.—Carlyle.

Real excellence, indeed, is most recognized when most openly looked into.—Plutarch.

Goodness does not more certainly make men happy than happiness makes them good.—Landor.

How indestructibly the good grows, and propagates itself, even among the weedy entanglements of evil.—Carlyle.

We may be as good as we please, if we please to be good.—Barrow.

It is not goodness to be better than the very worst.—Seneca.

Experience makes us see a wonderful difference between devotion and goodness.—Pascal.

He whose goodness is part of himself, is what is called a real man.—Mencius.

Good men are the stars, the planets of the ages wherein they live, and illustrate the times.—Ben Jonson.

Everything good in a man thrives best when properly recognized.—J. G. Holland.

There was never law or sect or opinion did so much magnify goodness as the Christian religion doth.—Bacon.

Whatever makes men good Christians, makes them good citizens.—Daniel Webster.

'Tis a kind of good deed to say well,
And yet words are no deeds.
—Shakespeare.

Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.
—Young.

Hard was their lodging, homely was their food,
For all their luxury was doing good.
—Garth.

A good man is kinder to his enemy than bad men are to their friends.—Bishop Hall.

He who loves goodness harbors angels, reveres reverence, and lives with God.—Emerson.

Never be afraid of what is good; the good is always the road to what is true.—Hamerton.

There is in the soul a taste for the good, just as there is in the body an appetite for enjoyment.—Joubert.

He that loveth God will do diligence to please God by his works, and abandon himself, with all his might, well for to do.—Chaucer.

The fragrance of the flower is never borne against the breeze; but the fragrance of human virtues diffuses itself everywhere.—Ramayana.

True goodness is like the glow-worm in this, that it shines most when no eyes except those of heaven are upon it.—J. C. Hare.

Nothing that man ever invents will absolve him from the universal necessity of being good as God is good, righteous as God is righteous, and holy as God is holy.—Charles Kingsley.

As the greatest liar tells more truths than falsehoods, so may it be said of the worst man, that he does more good than evil.—Dr. Johnson.

As I know more of mankind, I expect less of them, and am ready now to call a man a good man upon easier terms than I was formerly.—Dr. Johnson.

A good man doubles the length of his existence; to have lived so as to look back with pleasure on our past existence is to live twice.—Martial.

What a sublime doctrine it is, that goodness cherished now is eternal life already entered on!—Channing.

He that is a good man is three-quarters of his way towards the being a good Christian, wheresoever he lives, or whatsoever he is called.—South.

Experience has convinced me that there is a thousand times more goodness, wisdom, and love in the world than men imagine.—Gehler.

There is no odor so bad as that which arises from goodness tainted. It is human, it is divine carrion.—Thoreau.

Little men build up great ones, but the snow colossus soon melts; the good stand under the eye of God, and therefore stand.—Landor.

The soil out of which such men as he are made is good to be born on, good to live on, good to die for and to be buried in.—Lowell.

Who soweth good seed shall surely reap;
The year grows rich as it groweth old,
And life's latest sands are its sands of gold.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

A good deed is never lost; he who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants kindness gathers love.—Basil.

The good, alas! are few: they are scarcely as many as the gates of Thebes or the mouths of the Nile.—Juvenal.

It is all a mistake that we cannot be good and manly without being scrupulously and studiously good. There is too much mechanism about our virtue.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

A good man will avoid the spot of any sin. The very aspersion is grievous, which makes him choose his way in his life, as he would in his journey.—Ben Jonson.

Abash'd the devil stood,
And felt how awful goodness is, and saw
Virtue in her shape how lovely.—Milton.

Who is a good man? He who keeps the decrees of the fathers, and both human and divine laws.—Horace.

This is a proof of a well-trained mind, to rejoice in what is good and to grieve at the opposite.—Cicero.

And so it happens oft in many instances; more good is done without our knowledge than by us intended.—Plautus.

There is no man so good who, were he to submit all his thoughts and actions to the law, would not deserve hanging ten times in his life.—Montaigne.

It is of unspeakable advantage to possess our minds with an habitual good intention, and to aim all our thoughts, words, and actions at some laudable end.—Addison.

He that does good to another man does also good to himself, not only in the consequence, but in the very act of doing it; for the consciousness of well-doing is an ample reward.—Seneca.

Be good, my child, and let who will be clever;
Do noble deeds, not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever
One grand, sweet song.

—Charles Kingsley.

Whatever any one does or says, I must be good; just as if the emerald were always saying this: "Whatever any one does or says, I must still be emerald, and keep my color."—Marcus Aurelius.

Goodness and love mould the form into their own image, and cause the joy and beauty of love to shine forth from every part of the face.—Swedenborg.

A glass is good, and a lass is good.
And a pipe to smoke in cold weather;
The world is good, and the people are good,
And we're all good fellows together.
—John O'Keefe.

The scent of flowers does not travel against the wind; but the odor of good people travels even against the wind: a good man pervades every place.—Max Müller.

A bad man is like an earthen vessel,—easy to break, and hard to mend. A good man is like a golden vessel,—hard to break, and easy to mend.—Hitopadesa.

While tenderness of feeling and susceptibility to generous emotions are accidents of temperament, goodness is an achievement of the will and a quality of the life.—Lowell.

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good,
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.
—Tennyson.

Nothing good bursts forth all at once. The lightning may dart out of a black cloud; but the day sends his bright heralds before him, to prepare the world for his coming.—Hare.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.—Tillotson.

That which is good to be done, cannot be done too soon; and if it is neglected to be done early, it will frequently happen that it will not be done at all.—Bishop Mant.

In the heraldry of heaven goodness precedes greatness; so on earth it is more powerful. The lowly and the lovely may frequently do more in their own limited sphere than the gifted.—Bishop Horne.

There are people whose good qualities shine brightest in the darkness, like the ray of a diamond; but there are others whose virtues are only brought out by the light, like the colors of a silk.—Justin McCarthy.

Ô, if the good deeds of human creatures could be traced to their source, how beautiful would even death appear; for how much charity, mercy, and purified affection would be seen to have growth in dusty graves!—Dickens.

Our whole life is startlingly moral. There is never an instant's truce between virtue and vice. Goodness is the only investment that never fails.—Thoreau.

The band that hath made you fair hath made you good. The goodness that is cheap in beauty makes beauty brief in goodness; but grace, being the soul of your complexion, should keep the body of it ever fair.—Shakespeare.

God whose gifts in gracious flood
Unto all who seek are sent,
Only asks you to be good
And is content. —Victor Hugo.

Who is only good that others may know it, and that he may be the better esteemed when 'tis known, who will do well but upon condition that his virtue may be known to men, is one from whom much service is not to be expected.—Montaigne.

Goodness is generous and diffusive; it is largeness of mind, and sweetness of temper,—balsam in the blood, and justice sublimated to a richer spirit.—Jeremy Collier.

A good disposition I far prefer to gold; for gold is the gift of fortune; goodness of disposition is the gift of nature. I prefer much rather to be called good than fortunate.—Plautus

Let no man think lightly of good, saying in his heart, It will not benefit me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; the wise man becomes full of good, even if he gather it little by little.—Buddha.

"Good and stupid," is a common saying. I have found that only the judicious are really good. Only clever men know what is good for others; and at the first appearance of disadvantage to himself, the stupid man deserts.—Auerbach.

To love the public, to study universal good, and to promote the interest of the whole world, as far as lies within our power, is the height of goodness, and makes that temper which we call divine.—Shaftesbury.

God's livery is a very plain one; but its wearers have good reason to be content. If it have not so much gold-lace about it as Satan's, it keeps out foul weather better, and is besides a great deal cheaper.—Lowell.

None

But such as are good men can give good things,
And that which is not good, is not delicious
To a well-governed and wise appetite.
—Milton.

We may have an excellent ear for music, without being able to perform in any kind; we may judge well of poetry, without being poets, or possessing the least of a poetic vein; but we can have no tolerable notion of goodness without being tolerably good.—Shaftesbury.

What is good-looking, as Horace Smith remarks, but looking good? Be good, be womanly, be gentle, generous in your sympathies, heedful of the well-being of all around you; and, my word for it, you will not lack kind words of admiration.—Whittier.

Some good we all can do; and if we do all that is in our power, however little that power may be, we have performed our part, and may be as near perfection as those whose influence extends over kingdoms, and whose good actions are felt and applauded by thousands.—Bowdler.

Goodness I call the habit, and goodness of nature the inclination. This of all the virtues and dignities of the mind, is the greatest, being the character of the Deity; and without it man is a busy, mischievous, wretched thing.—Bacon.

No good thing is ever lost. Nothing dies, not even life which gives up one form only to resume another. No good action, no good example dies. It lives forever in our race. While the frame moulders and disappears, the deed leaves an indelible stamp, and molds the very thought and will of future generations.—Samuel Smiles.

Whatever mitigates the woes or increases the happiness of others is a just criterion of goodness; and whatever injures society at large, or any individual in it, is a criterion of iniquity. One should not quarrel with a dog without a reason sufficient to vindicate one through all the courts of morality.—Goldsmith.

Goodness answers to the theological virtue charity, and admits no excess but error. The desire of power in excess caused the angels to fall; the desire of knowledge in excess caused man to fall. But in charity there is no excess; neither can angel or man come in danger by it.—Bacon.

How many people would like to be good, if only they might be good without taking trouble about it! They do not like goodness well enough to hunger and thirst after it, or to sell all that they have that they may buy it; they will not batter at the gate of the kingdom of heaven; but they look with pleasure on this or that aerial castle of righteousness, and think it would be rather nice to live in it.—George MacDonald.

Goodness does not more certainly make men happy, than happiness makes them good. We must distinguish between felicity and prosperity; for prosperity leads often to ambition, and ambition to disappointment; the course is then over, the wheel turns round but once; while the reaction of goodness and happiness is perpetual.—Landor.

It is pleasant to be virtuous and good, because that is to excel many others; it is pleasant to grow better, because that is to excel ourselves; it is pleasant to mortify and subdue our lusts, because that is victory; it is pleasant to command our appetites and passions, and to keep them in due order within the bounds of reason and religion, because this is empire.—Tillotson.

We cannot rekindle the morning beams of childhood; we cannot recall the noontide glory of youth; we cannot bring back the perfect day of maturity; we cannot fix the evening rays of age in the shadowy horizon; but we can cherish that goodness which is the sweetness of childhood, the joy of youth, the strength of maturity, the honor of old age, and the bliss of saints.—Henry Giles.

One of the almost numberless advantages of goodness is, that it blinds its possessor to many of those faults in others which could not fail to be detected by the morally defective. A consciousness of unworthiness renders people extremely quick-sighted in discerning the vices of their neighbors; as persons can easily discover in others the symptoms of those diseases beneath which they themselves have suffered.—Godfrey.

Why is it that the bad side of life seems so much more conspicuous than the good? Is it because predominance of evil makes it more common, or that we being evil see it more readily, or that the abnormal, by its nature, stands out excrecent and disfiguring? Whatever the answer, it should be the ambition of every lover of goodness to make much of goodness, to sound its praises, to flavor his words with its appreciation. Part of hating evil is ignoring it, neglecting it. Thinking of things of good report and speaking of them strengthens good. Shutting our mouths as well as our ears against the bruit of evil, in the scorn of silence, weakens its hold upon us. What the redeemed of the Lord say should strengthen the side of the Lord of the redeemed.—Maltie Babcock.

Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name, in kindness, love, and mercy, on the hearts of thousands you come in contact with year by year; you will never be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind as the stars on the brow of evening. Good deeds will shine as the stars of heaven.—Chalmers.

Natural good is so intimately connected with moral good, and natural evil with moral evil, that I am as certain as if I heard a voice from heaven proclaim it, that God is on the side of virtue. He has learnt much, and has not lived in vain, who has practically discovered that most strict and necessary connection, that does and will ever exist between vice and misery, and virtue and happiness.—Colton.

There shall never be one lost good! What was shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound;
What was good shall be good, with, for evil, so much good more;
On the earth, the broken arcs; in the heaven a perfect round.

—Robert Browning.

For ever and ever, my darling, yes—
Goodness and love are undying;
Only the troubles and cares of earth
Are winged from the first for flying.
Our way we plough
In the furrow "now,"
But after the tilling and growing the sheaf;
Soil for the root, but the sun for the leaf—
And God keepeth watch forever.

—Mary Mapes Dodge.

Goodness conditions usefulness. A grimy hand may do a gracious deed, but a bad heart cannot. What a man says and what a man is must stand together,—must con-sist. His life can ruin his lips or fill them with power. It is what men see that gives value to what we say. Paul had the right order, "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine." Being comes before saying or doing. Well may we pray, "Search me, O God! Reveal me to myself. Cleanse me from secret faults, that those who are acquainted with me, who know my down-sittings and my uprisings, may not see in me the evil way that gives the lie to my words."—Maltbie Babcock.

Men live a moral life, either from regard to the Divine Being, or from regard to the opinion of the people in the world; and when a moral life is practised out of regard to the Divine Being, it is a spiritual life. Both appear alike in their outward form; but in their inward, they are completely different. The one saves a man, but the other does not; for he that leads a moral life out of regard to the Divine Being is led by him, but he who does so from regard to the opinion of people in the world is led by himself.—Swedenborg.

Good-Night

Good night! good night! parting is such sweet sorrow,
That I shall say good night, till it be morrow.
—Shakespeare.

To all, to each, a fair good night,
And pleasing dreams, and slumbers light.
—Scott.

At once, good night—
Stand not upon the order of your going,
But go at once.
—Shakespeare.

Look, the world's comforter, with weary gait,
His day's hot task hath ended in the west:
The owl, night's herald, shrieks—'tis very late;
The sheep are gone to fold, birds to their nest;
And coal-black clouds, that shadow heaven's light,
Do summon us to part, and bid good night.
—Shakespeare.

Good-Taste

Good taste is the modesty of the mind; that is why it cannot be either imitated or acquired.—Madame de Girardin.

Gospel

It is the grand endeavor of the gospel to communicate God to men.—Horace Bushnell.

The true disciple should aim to live for the gospel, rather than to die for it.—Saadi.

Lincoln did but pour the soul of the nation into the monumental act of universal liberty; and that soul was inspired by the gospel.—Edward Thomson.

The gospel breathes the spirit of love. Love is the fulfilling of its precepts, the pledge of its joys, and the evidence of its power.—Gardiner Spring.

Take Christ out of the gospel, and you take its very heart out. He has not only originated a system, but He has put Himself into it, as its very life and soul and power.—Herrick Johnson.

The main object of the gospel is to establish two principles—the corruption of nature, and the redemption by Jesus Christ.—Pascal.

God writes the gospel, not in the Bible alone, but on trees and flowers and clouds and stars.—Luther.

The gospel is the fulfillment of all hopes, the perfection of all philosophy, the interpretation of all revelation, the key to all the seeming contradictions of the physical and moral world.—Max Müller.

No one who has not examined patiently and honestly the other religions of the world can know what Christianity really is, or can join with such truth and sincerity in the words of St. Paul, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ."—Max Müller.

O, marvelous power of the Divine seed, which overpowers the strong man armed, softens obdurate hearts, and changes into divine men those who were brutalized in sin, and removed to an infinite distance from God.—John Wycliffe.

I thank God that the gospel is to be preached to every creature. There is no man so far gone, but the grace of God can reach him; no man so desperate or black, but He can forgive him.—D. L. Moody.

The sweetness of the gospel lies mostly in pronouns, as me, my, thy. "Who loved me, and gave Himself for me." "Christ Jesus my Lord." "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee."—Martin Luther.

I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.—Bible.

The gospel's glorious hope, Its rule of purity, its eye of prayer, Its feet of firmness on temptation's steep, Its bark that fails not, 'mid the storm of death.
—Mrs. Sigourney.

Assertion of truths known and felt, promulgation of truth from the high platform of truth itself, declaration of faith by the mouth of moral conviction—this is the New Testament method, and the true one.—J. G. Holland.

The gospel comes to the sinner at once, with nothing short of complete forgiveness as the starting-point of all his efforts to be holy. It does not say, "Go and sin no more, and I will not condemn thee"; it says at once, "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more."—Rev. Dr. Bonar.

Just as in the Father's house there are many mansions, so to suit the various moods and divers cases of anxious souls, there are many chambers and compartments in the gospel citadel; but the very lowest and simplest, if you can only reach it, is salvation. The nearest to the level, but still cleft in the Rock, is called "The Faithful Saying;" and above its doorway you read, "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners."—James Hamilton.

The idea of preaching the gospel to all nations alike, regardless of nationality, of internal divisions as to rank and color, complexion and religion, constituted the beginning of a new era in history. You cannot preach the gospel in its purity over the world, without proclaiming the doctrine of civil and religious liberty, —without overthrowing the barriers reared between nations and clans and classes of men,—without ultimately undermining the thrones of despots, and breaking off the shackles of slavery,—without making men everywhere free.—Albert Barnes.

Gossip

Gossip, like ennui, is born of idleness.—Ninon de Lenclos.

A long-tongued, babbling gossip.—Shakespeare.

There are male as well as female gossips.—Colton.

How much an ill word may empoison liking!—Shakespeare.

Old maids sweeten their tea with scandal.—H. W. Shaw.

Foul whisperings are abroad.—Shakespeare.

Everybody says it, and what everybody says must be true.—James Fenimore Cooper.

A knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.—Shakespeare.

It is not virtuous women who are so ready to report suspicion of their sisters.—Mme. de Krudener.

Let the greater part of the news thou hearest be the least part of what thou believest.—Quarles.

The subtle sauce of malice is often indulged in by maidens of uncertain age, over their tea.—Rivarol.

Most women indulge in idle gossip, which is the benchmark of rumor and scandal.—Octave Feuillet.

Female gossips are generally actuated by active ignorance.—Rochefoucauld.

Love and scandal are the best sweeteners of tea.—Fielding.

Not only is the world informed of everything about you, but of a great deal more.—Thackeray.

Old gossips are usually young flirts gone to seed.—J. L. Basford.

We are disgusted by gossip; yet it is of importance to keep the angels in their proprieties.—Emerson.

Tale-bearers, as I said before, are just as bad as the tale-makers.—Sheridan.

Our globe discovers its hidden virtues, not only in heroes and arch-angels, but in gossips and nurses.—Emerson.

Half the gossip of society would perish if the books that are truly worth reading were but read.—George Dawson.

Too many individuals are like Shakespeare's definition of "echo,"—babbling gossips of the air.—H. W. Shaw.

It is only before those who are glad to hear it, and anxious to spread it, that we find it easy to speak ill of others.—J. Petit-Senn.

He's gone, and who knows how may he report.
Thy words by adding fuel to the flame?
—Milton.

In fact, there's nothing makes me so much grieve,
As that abominable tittle-tattle,
Which is the cud eschew'd by human cattle.
—Byron.

Truth is not exciting enough to those who depend on the characters and lives of their neighbors for all their amusement.—Bancroft.

Gossip is a sort of smoke that comes from the dirty tobacco-pipes of those who diffuse it; it proves nothing but the bad taste of the smoker.—George Eliot.

It is among uneducated women that we may look for the most confirmed gossips. Goethe tells us there is nothing more frightful than bustling ignorance.—Chamfort.

For my part, I can compare her (a gossip) to nothing but the sun; for, like him, she knows no rest, nor ever sets in one place but to rise in another.—Dryden.

Such as are still observing upon others are like those who are always abroad at other men's houses, reforming everything there while their own runs to ruin.—Pope.

As to people saying a few idle words about us, we must not mind that, any more than the old church-steeple minds the rooks cawing about it.—George Eliot.

Skill'd by a touch to deepen scandal's tints,
With all the high mendacity of hints,
While mingling truth with falsehood, sneers
with smiles,
A thread of candor with a web of wiles.
—Byron.

News-hunters have great leisure, with little thought; much petty ambition to be considered intelligent, without any other pretension than being able to communicate what they have just learned.—Zimmermann.

I will not say it is not Christian to make beads of others' faults, and tell them over every day; I say it is infernal. If you want to know how the Devil feels, you do know, if you are such an one.—Beecher.

I take it as a matter not to be disputed, that if all knew what each said of the other, there would not be four friends in the world. This seems proved by the quarrels and disputes caused by the disclosures which are occasionally made.—Pascal.

Gossip is always a personal confession either of malice or imbecility, and the young should not only shun it, but by the most thorough culture relieve themselves from all temptation to indulge in it. It is a low, frivolous, and too often a dirty business. There are country neighborhoods in which it rages like a pest. Churches are split in pieces by it. Neighbors are made enemies by it for life. In many persons it degenerates into a chronic disease, which is practically incurable. Let the young cure it while they may.—J. G. Holland.

Government

Fortune and caprice govern the world.—Rochefoucauld.

As the government is, such will be the man.—Plato.

Government has been a fossil: it should be a plant.—Emerson.

Those who think must govern those who toil.—Goldsmith.

The end of government is the happiness of the people.—Macaulay.

The duties of government are paternal.—Gladstone.

States are great engines moving slowly.—Bacon.

The right divine of kings to govern wrong.—Pope.

Republics end with luxury: monarchies with poverty.—Montesquieu.

A hated government does not last long.—Seneca.

Influence is not government.—George Washington.

I am the state.—Attributed to Louis XIV.

Governments have their origin in the moral identity of men.—Emerson.

Our domestic affections are the most salutary basis of all good government.—Beaconsfield.

Resolv'd to ruin or to rule the state.—Dryden.

'Tis government that makes them seem divine.—Shakespeare.

Let them obey who know how to rule.—Shakespeare.

Ambassadors are the eye and ear of states.—Guicciardini.

For forms of government let fools contest; Whate'er is best administer'd is best.—Pope.

The essence of a free government consists in an effectual control of rivalries.—John Adams.

The principal foundation of all states are good laws and good arms.—Machiavelli.

Whatever government is not a government of laws is a despotism, let it be called what it may.—Daniel Webster.

If the prince of a State love benevolence, he will have no opponent in all the empire.—Mencius.

All free governments are party governments.—Garfield.

Government is an art above the attainment of an ordinary genius.—South.

A wise man neither suffers himself to be governed, nor attempts to govern others.—La Bruyère.

All governments are, to a certain extent, a treaty with the Devil.—Jacobi.

All men would be masters of others, and no man is lord of himself.—Goethe.

All free governments are managed by the combined wisdom and folly of the people.—James A. Garfield.

If I wished to punish a province, I would have it governed by philosophers.—Frederick the Great.

The government will take the fairest of names, but the worst of realities—mob rule.—Polybius.

Government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants.—Burke.

It is better for a city to be governed by a good man than by good laws.—Aristotle.

All your strength is in your union,
All your danger is in discord.
—Longfellow.

The people's government, made for the people, made by the people, and answerable to the people.—Daniel Webster.

Which is the best government?
That which teaches self-government.
—Goethe.

To govern men, you must either excel them in their accomplishments, or despise them.—Beaconsfield.

The trappings of a monarchy would set up an ordinary commonwealth.—Sam'l Johnson.

Anticipate the difficult by managing the easy.—Lao-Tze.

Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence.—Thomas Paine.

Virtue alone is not sufficient for the exercise of government; laws alone carry themselves into practice.—Mencius.

Institutions may crumble and governments fall, but it is only that they may renew a better youth.—George Bancroft.

A conservative government is an organized hypocrisy.—Benj. Disraeli.

We are more heavily taxed by our idleness, pride and folly than we are taxed by government.—Franklin.

Ill can he rule the great that cannot reach the small.—Spenser.

A thousand years scarce serve to form a state;
An hour may lay it in the dust.—Byron.

For where's the state beneath the Firmament,
That doth excell the Bees for Government?
—Du Bartas.

Though the people support the government the government should not support the people.—Grover Cleveland.

I have considered the pension list of the republic a roll of honor.—Grover Cleveland.

Let men say, we be men of good government; being governed, as the sea is, by our noble and chaste mistress the moon, under whose countenance we steal.—Shakespeare.

Power is detested, and miserable is the life of him who wishes rather to be feared than to be loved.—Nepos.

It may pass for a maxim in State, that the administration cannot be placed in too few hands, nor the legislature in too many.—Swift.

Government arrogates to itself that it alone forms men. * * * Everybody knows that government never began anything. It is the whole world that thinks and governs.—Wendell Phillips.

Governments exist to protect the rights of minorities. The loved and the rich need no protection,—they have many friends and few enemies.—Wendell Phillips.

How, in one house,
Should many people, under two commands
Hold amity? 'Tis hard; almost impossible.
—Shakespeare.

The deterioration of a government begins almost always by the decay of its principles.—Montesquieu.

A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this government cannot endure permanently half-slave and half-free.—Abraham Lincoln.

Oh, it were better to be a poor fisherman than to meddle with the government of men!—Danton.

The freedom of a government does not depend upon the quality of its laws, but upon the power that has the right to create them.—Thaddeus Stevens.

When a government is arrived to that degree of corruption as to be incapable of reforming itself, it would not lose much by being new moulded.—Montesquieu.

The aggregate happiness of society, which is best promoted by the practice of a virtuous policy, is, or ought to be, the end of all government.—George Washington.

All free governments, whatever their name, are in reality governments by public opinion; and it is on the quality of this public opinion that their prosperity depends.—Lowell.

All good government must begin at home. It is useless to make good laws for bad people; what is wanted is this, to subdue the tyranny of the human heart.—Hugh R. Haweis.

All government is an evil, but, of the two forms of that evil, democracy or monarchy, the sounder is monarchy; the more able to do its will, democracy.—B. R. Haydon.

The best government is not that which renders men the happiest, but that which renders the greatest number happy.—Duclos.

The proper function of a government is to make it easy for people to do good, and difficult for them to do evil.—Gladstone.

No government, any more than an individual, will long be respected without being truly respectable.—Madison.

Few consider how much we are indebted to government, because few can represent how wretched mankind would be without it.—Atterbury.

Men who prefer any load of infamy, however great, to any pressure of taxation, however light.—Sydney Smith.

And having looked to government for bread, on the very first scarcity they will turn and bite the hand that fed them.—Burke.

This shall be thy work: to impose conditions of peace, to spare the lowly and to overthrow the proud.—Virgil.

Nothing appears more surprising to those who consider human affairs with a philosophical eye, than the easiness with which the many are governed by the few.—Hume.

In a change of government, the poor seldom change anything except the name of their master.—Phædrus.

A government for protecting the coarser interests of the body, business and bread only, is but a carcass, and soon falls, by its own corruption, to decay.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Nothing will ruin the country if the people themselves will undertake its safety; and nothing can save it if they leave that safety in any hands but their own.—Daniel Webster.

The culminating point of administration is to know well how much power, great or small, we ought to use in all circumstances.—Montesquieu.

The government of man should be the monarchy of reason: it is too often the democracy of passions or the anarchy of humors.—Benjamin Whichcote.

Monarch, thou wishest to cover thyself with glory; be the first to submit to the laws of thy empire.—Bias.

Right is the royal ruler alone; and he who rules with least restraint comes nearest to empire.—Alcott.

Self-government by the whole people is the teleologic idea. The republican form of government is the noblest and the best, as it is the latest.—Henry Ward Beecher.

A mercantile democracy may govern long and widely; a mercantile aristocracy cannot stand.—Landor.

Government is the greatest combination for forces known to human society. It can command more men and raise more money than any and all other agencies combined.—David Dudley Field.

Society is well governed when the people obey the magistrates, and the magistrates the laws.—Solon.

There is no part of government which cannot better suffer derangement than the ballot. If you strike the ballot with disease, it is heart disease.—Henry Ward Beecher.

If any ask me what a free government is, I answer that, for any particular purpose, it is what the people think so.—Burke.

Power exercised with violence has seldom been of long duration, but temper and moderation generally produce permanence in all things.—Seneca.

All government, all exercise of power, no matter in what form, which is not based in love and directed by knowledge, is a tyranny.—Mrs. Jameson.

Our government is built upon the vote. But votes that are purchasable are quicksands, and a government built on them stands upon corruption and revolution.—Henry Ward Beecher.

All government, indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue, every prudent act, is founded on compromise and barter.—Burke.

The surest way of governing, both in a private family and a kingdom, is for a husband and a prince sometimes to drop their prerogative.—Hughes.

The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.—Washington.

The science of government is only a science of combinations, of applications, and of exceptions, according to times, places and circumstances.—Rousseau.

No government can be free that does not allow all its citizens to participate in the formation and execution of her laws. There are degrees of tyranny; but every other government is a despotism.—Thaddeus Stevens.

Every governmental institution has been a standing testimony to the harmonic destiny of society, a standing proof that the life of man is destined for peace and amity, instead of disorder and contention.—Henry James.

A government founded on impartial liberty, where all have a voice and a vote, irrespective of color or of sex—what is there to hinder such a government from standing firm.—Fred Douglass.

The history of governments through the ages is a history red, nay, lurid. Law represents the effort of men to organize society; governments, the efforts of selfishness to overthrow liberty.—Henry Ward Beecher.

No man undertakes a trade he has not learned, even the meanest; yet every one thinks himself sufficiently qualified for the hardest of all trades—that of government.—Socrates.

The administration of government, like a guardianship, ought to be directed to the good of those who confer, and not of those who receive the trust.—Cicero.

A republican government in a hundred points is weaker than an autocratic government; but in this one point it is the strongest that ever existed—it has educated a race of men that are men.—Henry Ward Beecher.

In politics it is almost a triviality to say that public opinion now rules the world. The only power deserving the name is that of masses and of governments while they make themselves the organ of the tendencies and instincts of masses.—John Stuart Mill.

When Tarquin the Proud was asked what was the best mode of governing a conquered city, he replied only by beating down with his staff all the tallest poppies in his garden.—Livy.

The aggregate happiness of society, which is best promoted by the practice of a virtuous policy, is or ought to be the end of all government.—Washington.

In the government of men, a great deal may be done by severity, more by love, but most of all by clear discernment and impartial justice, which pays no respect to persons.—Goethe.

Government owes its birth to the necessity of preventing and repressing the injuries which the associated individuals had to fear from one another.—Abbé Raynal.

Society cannot exist unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere; and the less of it there is within, the more there must be without.—Burke.

When any of the four pillars of government are mainly shaken or weakened—which are religion, justice, counsel and treasure—men need to pray for fair weather.—Bacon.

What makes a governor justly despised is viciousness and ill morals. Virtue must tip the preacher's tongue and the ruler's sceptre with authority.—South.

A statesman, we are told, should follow public opinion. Doubtless, as a coachman follows his horses; having firm hold on the reins and guiding them.—Hare.

Hereditary right should be kept sacred, not from any inalienable right in a particular family, but to avoid the consequences that usually attend the ambition of competitors.—Swift.

If friends to a government forbear their assistance, they put it in the power of a few desperate men to ruin the welfare of those who are superior to them in strength and interest.—Addison.

Government mitigates the inequality of power, and makes an innocent man, though of the lowest rank, a match for the mightiest of his fellow-subjects.—Addison.

Not stones, nor wood, nor the art of artisans make a state; but where men are who know how to take care of themselves, these are cities and walls.—Alcæus.

It is a great error, in my opinion, to believe that a government is more firm or assured when it is supported by force, than when founded on affection.—Terence.

* * * The manners of women are the surest criterion by which to determine whether a republican government is practicable in a nation or not.—John Adams.

Government is a trust, and the officers of the government are trustees; and both the trust and the trustees are created for the benefit of the people.—Henry Clay.

In the early ages men ruled by strength; now they rule by brain, and so long as there is only one man in the world who can think and plan, he will stand head and shoulders above him who cannot.—Beecher.

For government, through high and low and lower,
Put into parts, doth keep in one consent,
Congreering in a full and natural close,
Like music. —Shakespeare.

The surest way to prevent seditious (if the times do bear it) is to take away the matter of them; for if there be fuel prepared it is hard to tell whence the spark shall come that shall set it on fire.—Bacon.

They that govern most make least noise. You see when they row in a barge, they that do drudgery work, slash, and puff, and sweat; but he that governs sits quietly at the stern, and scarce is seen to stir.—Selden.

In all government there must of necessity be both the law and the sword; laws without arms would give us not liberty but licentiousness, and arms without laws would produce not subjection but slavery.—Colton.

The moment you abate anything from the full rights of men each to govern himself, and suffer any artificial positive limitation upon those rights, from that moment the whole organization of government becomes a consideration of convenience.—Burke.

When we have run through all forms of government, without partiality to that we were born under, we are at a loss with which to side; they are all a compound of good and evil. It is therefore most reasonable and safe to value that of our own country above all others, and to submit to it.—La Bruyère.

The people of the United States very deliberately framed their government with the view of remaining the masters of it, and not of being mastered by it; and they are not yet willing to abdicate in favor of any, even the most audacious conspirator against their sovereignty.—John Bigelow.

Government is only a necessary evil, like other go-carts and crutches. Our need of it shows exactly how far we are still children. All governing overmuch kills the self-help and energy of the governed.—Wendell Phillips.

The constitution of England is not a paper constitution. It is an aggregate of institutions, many of them founded merely upon prescription, some of them fortified by muniments, but all of them the fruit and experience of an ancient and illustrious people.—Beaconsfield.

The government of a nation itself is usually found to be but the reflex of the individuals composing it. The government that is head of the people will be inevitably dragged down to their level, as the government that is behind them will in the long run be dragged up.—Samuel Smiles.

One of the most important, but one of the most difficult things to a powerful mind is to be its own master; a pond may lay quiet in a plain, but a lake wants mountains to compass and hold it in.—Addison.

A monarchy is like a man-of-war—bad shots between wind and water hurt it exceedingly; there is danger of capsizing. But democracy is a raft. You cannot easily overturn it. It is a wet place, but it is a pretty safe one.—Joseph Cook.

When any one person or body of men seize into their hands the power in the last resort, there is properly no longer a government, but what Aristotle and his followers call the abuse and corruption of one.—Swift.

A power has arisen up in the government greater than the people themselves, consisting of many and various and powerful interests, combined into one mass, and held together by the cohesive power of the vast surplus in the banks.—John C. Calhoun.

It seems to me a great truth that human things cannot stand on selfishness, mechanical utilities, economies and law courts; that if there be not a religious element in the relations of men, such relations are miserable, and doomed to ruin.—Carlyle.

Forms of government become established of themselves. They shape themselves, they are not created. We may give them strength and consistency, but we cannot call them into being. Let us rest assured that the form of government can never be a matter of choice: it is almost always a matter of necessity.—Joubert.

Freedom of men under government is to have a standing rule to live by, common to every one of that society, and made by the legislative power vested in it; a liberty to follow my own will in all things, when the rule prescribes not, and not to be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of another man.—John Locke.

I look upon parliamentary government as the noblest government in the world, and certainly one most suited to England. But without the discipline of political connection, animated by the principle of private honor, I feel certain that a popular assembly would sink before the power or the corruption of a minister.—Beaconsfield.

Beneath a free government there is nothing but the intelligence of the people to keep the people's peace. Order must be preserved, not by a military police or regiments of horse-guards, but by the spontaneous concert of a well-informed population, resolved that the rights which have been rescued from despotism shall not be subverted by anarchy.—Edward Everett.

The wonder is not that the world is so easily governed, but that so small a number of persons will suffice for the purpose. There are dead weights in political and legislative bodies as in clocks, and hundreds answer as pulleys who would never do for politicians.—Simms.

Government began in tyranny and force, began in the feudalism of the soldier and bigotry of the priest; and the ideas of justice and humanity have been fighting their way, like a thunderstorm, against the organized selfishness of human nature.—Wendell Phillips.

Nothing is more deceptive or more dangerous than the pretence of a desire to simplify government. The simplest governments are despotisms; the next simplest, limited monarchies; but all republics, all governments of law, must impose numerous limitations and qualifications of authority, and give many positive and many qualified rights.—Daniel Webster.

Refined policy ever has been the parent of confusion, and ever will be so as long as the world endures. Plain good intention, which is as easily discovered at the first view as fraud is surely detected at last, is of no mean force in the government of mankind.—Burke.

Well, will anybody deny now that the government at Washington, as regards its own people, is the strongest government in the world at this hour? And for this simple reason, that it is based on the will, and the good will, of an instructed people.—John Bright.

It is among the evils, and perhaps not the smallest, of democratical governments, that the people must feel before they will see. When this happens they are roused to action. Hence it is that those kinds of government are so slow.—Washington.

There is no slight danger from general ignorance; and the only choice which Providence has graciously left to a vicious government is either to fall by the people, if they are suffered to become enlightened, or with them, if they are kept enslaved and ignorant.—Coleridge.

An established government has an infinite advantage by that very circumstance of its being established—the bulk of mankind being governed by authority, not reason, and never attributing authority to anything that has not the recommendation of antiquity.—Hume.

It is necessary for a Senator to be thoroughly acquainted with the constitution; and this is a knowledge of the most extensive nature; a matter of science, of diligence, of reflection, without which no Senator can possibly be fit for his office.—Cicero.

Of all the difficulties in a state, the temper of a true government most felicifies and perpetuates it; too sudden alterations distemper it. Had Nero tuned his kingdom as he did his harp, his harmony had been more honorable, and his reign more prosperous.—Quarles.

A government which takes in the consent of the greatest number of the people may justly be said to have the broadest bottom; and if it be terminated in the authority of one single person it may be said to have the narrowest top; and so makes the finest pyramid.—Sir Wm. Temple.

When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood!—Daniel Webster.

Each petty hand
Can steer a ship becalm'd; but he that will Govern and carry her to her ends, must know

His tides, his currents, how to shift his sails;

What she will bear in foul, what in fair
weathers;

Where her springs are, her leaks, and how to stop 'em;

What strands, what shelves, what rocks
do threaten her. —Ben Jonson.

And the first thing I would do in my government, I would have nobody to control me, I would be absolute; and who but I: now, he that is absolute, can do what he likes; he that can do what he likes, can take his pleasure; he that can take his pleasure, can be content; and he that can be content has no more to desire; so the matter's over.—Cervantes.

Who's in or out, who moves this grand machine,

Nor stirs my curiosity nor spleen.

Secrets of state no more I wish to know

Than secret movements of a puppet show:

Let but the puppets move, I've my desire,

Unseen the hand which guides the master wire. —Churchill.

There is what I call the American idea. * * * This idea demands, as the proximate organization thereof, a democracy—that is, a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people; of course, a government of the principles of eternal justice, the unchanging law of God; for shortness' sake I will call it the idea of Freedom.—Theodore Parker.

We must judge of a form of government by its general tendency, not by happy accidents. Every form of government has its happy accidents. Despotism has its happy accidents. Yet we are not disposed to abolish all constitutional checks, to place an absolute master over us, and to take our chances whether he may be a Caligula or a Marcus Aurelius.—Macaulay.

But I say to you, and to our whole country, and to all the crowned heads and aristocratic powers and feudal systems that exist, that it is to self-government—the great principle of popular representation and administration—the system that lets in all to participate in the counsels that are to assign the good or evil to all—that we may owe what we are and what we hope to be.—Daniel Webster.

The schoolboy whips his taxed top, the beardless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid seven per cent., flings himself back on his chintz bed, which has paid twenty-two per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death.—Sydney Smith.

Our government has been tried in peace, and it has been tried in war, and has proved itself fit for both. It has been assailed from without, and it has successfully resisted the shock; it has been disturbed within, and it has effectually quieted the disturbance. It can stand trial, it can stand assail, it can stand adversity, it can stand everything but the marring of its own beauty and the weakening of its own strength. It can stand everything but the effects of our own rashness and our own folly. It can stand everything but disorganization, disunion and nullification.—Daniel Webster.

There be three sorts of government—monarchical, aristocratical, democratical; and they are apt to fall three several ways into ruin—the first, by tyranny; the second, by ambition; the last, by tumults. A commonwealth grounded upon any one of these is not of long continuance; but, wisely mingled, each guards the other and makes that government exact.—Quarles.

Grace

Grace is the outcome of inward harmony.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

She moves a goddess, and she looks a queen.—Pope.

Beauty and grace command the world.—Park Benjamin.

Beauty loses its relish; the graces never.—Henry Horne.

Graceful to sight and elegant to thought.—Young.

And snatch a grace beyond the reach of art.—Pope.

Natural graces, that extinguish art.—Shakespeare.

Every natural action is graceful.—Emerson.

Her step is music, and her voice is song.—Bailey.

Grace is to the body what good sense is to the mind.—La Rochefoucauld.

Let grace and goodness be the principle loadstone of thy affections.—Dryden.

Grace has been defined, the outward expression of the inward harmony of the soul.—Hazlitt.

Every natural movement is graceful. Did you ever watch a kitten at play?—Anna Cora Mowatt.

The mother grace of all the graces is Christian good-will.—Beecher.

That caressing and exquisite grace—never bold,
Ever present—which just a few women possess.—Owen Meredith.

There is no such way to attain to greater measures of grace, as for a man to live up to that little grace he has.—Thomas Brooks.

Grace is the beauty of form under the influence of freedom.—Schiller.

He does it with a better grace, but I do it more natural.—Shakespeare.

See where she comes, apparell'd like the spring;
Graces her subjects.—Shakespeare.

When once our grace we have forgot,
Nothing goes right.—Shakespeare.

There's language in her eye, her cheek,
her lip,
Nay, her foot speaks.—Shakespeare.

Take time enough—all other graces
Will soon fill up their proper places.—Byron.

Grace imitates modesty, as politeness imitates kindness.—Joubert.

A pleasing figure is a perpetual letter of recommendation.—Bacon.

Beauty, devoid of grace, is a mere hook without the bait.—Talleyrand.

God appoints our graces to be nurses to other men's weaknesses.—Beecher.

To some kind of men their graces serve them but as enemies.—Shakespeare.

Whatever is graceful is virtuous, and whatever is virtuous is graceful.—Cicero.

That word "grace" in an ungracious mouth is but profane.—Shakespeare.

In effective womanly beauty form is more than face, and manner more than either.—Thackeray.

Till all grace be in one woman, one woman shall not come in my grace.—Shakespeare.

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye, in every gesture dignity and love.—Milton.

As prodigal of all dear grace as Nature was in making graces dear.—Shakespeare.

Her walk was like no mortal thing, but shaped after an angel's.—Petrarch.

The light of love, the purity of grace, the mind, the music, breathing in her face.—Byron.

With countenance demure, and modest grace.—Spenser.

Grace comes often clad in the dusky robe of desolation.—Beaumont.

A beautiful form is the finest of the fine arts.—Emerson.

The loveliest hair is nothing, if the wearer is incapable of a grace.—Leigh Hunt.

God giveth true grace to but a chosen few, however many aspire to it.—Dewey.

The king-becoming graces—devotion, patience, courage, fortitude.—Shakespeare.

Oh, mickle is the powerful grace that lies in plants, herbs, stones and their qualities!—Shakespeare.

It is the very nature of grace to make a man strive to be most eminent in that particular grace which is most opposed to his bosom sin.—Thomas Brooks.

Strength is natural, but grace is the growth of habit. This charming quality requires practice if it is to become lasting.—Joubert.

The grace will carry us, if we do not willfully betray our succors, victoriously through all difficulties.—Henry Hammond.

The grace of the spirit comes only from heaven, and lights up the whole bodily presence.—Spurgeon.

Grace is in garments, in movements, in manners; beauty in the nude, and in forms. This is true of bodies; but when we speak of feelings, beauty is in their spirituality, and grace in their moderation.—Joubert.

There are true graces, which, as Homer feigns, are linked and tied hand in hand, because it is by their influence that human hearts are so firmly united to each other.—Robert Burton.

The most divine light only shineth on those minds which are purged from all worldly dross and human uncleanness.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

All actions and attitudes of children are graceful because they are the luxuriant and immediate offspring of the moment—divested of affectation and free from all pretence.—Fuseli.

An inborn grace that nothing lacked
Of culture or appliance—
The warmth of genial courtesies,
The calm of self-reliance. —Whittier.

'Cause grace and virtue are within Prohibited degrees of kin;
And therefore no true saint allows
They should be suffer'd to espouse. —Butler.

She was the pride of her familiar sphere—the daily joy of all who on her gracefulness might gaze, and in the light and music of her way have a companion's portion.—Willis.

Let grace and goodness be the principal loadstone of thy affections. For love, which hath ends, will have an end; whereas that which is founded on true virtue will always continue.—Dryden.

True grace is natural, not artificial, because, however strenuously you strive to gain it, when it is gained it never gives the impression of effort or straining for effect.—F. D. Huntington.

Every man of any education would rather be called a rascal than accused of deficiency in the graces.—Dr. Johnson.

Every degree of recession from the state of grace Christ first put us in is a recession from our hopes.—Jeremy Taylor.

Her grace of motion and of look, the smooth and swimming majesty of step and tread, the symmetry of form and feature, set the soul afloat, even like delicious airs of flute and harp.—Milton.

The feminine graces of Madame de Sévigné's genius are exquisitely charming; but the philosophy and eloquence of Madame de Staël are above the distinction of sex.—Sir J. Mackintosh.

For several virtues
Have I lik'd several women; never any
With so full soul, but some defect in her Did quarrel with the noblest grace she ow'd,
And put it to the foil. —Shakespeare.

Riches may enable us to confer favors; but to confer them with propriety and with grace requires a something that riches cannot give. Even trifles may be so bestowed as to cease to be trifles.—Colton.

Gracefulness cannot subsist without ease; delicacy is not debility; nor must a woman be sick in order to please. Infirmity and sickness may excite our pity, but desire and pleasure require the bloom and vigor of health.—Rousseau.

Graceful, when it pleased him, smooth and still
As the mute swan that floats adown the stream,
And on the waters of th' unruffled lake,
Anchors her quiet beauty.—Wordsworth.

Grace is a quality different from beauty, though nearly allied to it, which is never observed without affecting us with emotions of peculiar delight, and which it is, perhaps, the first object of the arts of sculpture and painting to study and to present.—Sir A. Alison.

Grace can never properly be said to exist without beauty; for it is only in the elegant proportions of beautiful forms that can be found that harmonious variety of line and motion which is the essence and charm of grace.—Winckelmann.

It is graceful in a man to think and to speak with propriety, to act with deliberation, and in every occurrence of life to find out and persevere in the truth. On the other hand, to be imposed upon, to mistake, to falter, and to be deceived, is as ungraceful as to rave or to be insane.—Cicero.

Know you not, master, to some kind of men their graces serve them but as enemies? No more do yours; your virtues, gentle master, are sanctified and holy traitors to you. Oh, what a world is this, when what is comely envenoms him that bears it!—Shakespeare.

Virtue, without the graces, is like a rich diamond unpolished—it hardly looks better than a common pebble; but when the hand of the master rubs off the roughness, and forms the sides into a thousand brilliant surfaces, it is then that we acknowledge its worth, admire its beauty, and long to wear it in our bosoms.—Jane Porter.

Grace in women has more effect than beauty. We sometimes see a certain fine self-possession, an habitual voluptuousness of character, which reposes on its own sensations, and derives pleasure from all around it, that is more irresistible than any other attraction. There is an air of languid enjoyment in such persons, "in their eyes, in their arms, and their hands, and their face," which robs us of ourselves, and draws us by a secret sympathy towards them.—Hazlitt.

Grace is in a great measure a natural gift; elegance implies cultivation, or something of more artificial character. A rustic, uneducated girl may be graceful, but an elegant woman must be accomplished and well trained. It is the same with things as with persons; we talk of a graceful tree, but of an elegant house or other building. Animals may be graceful, but they cannot be elegant. The movements of a kitten or a young fawn are full of grace; but to call them "elegant" animals would be absurd.—Whately.

Grammar

Grammar, which knows how to lord it over kings, and with high hand makes them obey its laws.—Molière.

Grandeur

Grandeur and beauty are so very opposite that you often diminish the one as you increase the other. Vanity is most akin to the latter, simplicity to the former.—Shenstone.

Grant's Birthday

I desire the good-will of all, whether hitherto my friends or not.—Gen. Grant's Easter Message, during his sickness, 1885.

I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer.—Gen. Grant, in the Wilderness, May 11, 1864.

The government has educated me for the army. What I am, I owe to my country. I have served her through one war, and, live or die, will serve her through this.—Gen. Grant, at the outbreak of the Civil War, 1861.

No theory of my own will ever stand in the way of my executing, in good faith, any order I may receive from those in authority over me.—Gen. Grant to Secretary Chase, 1863.

Although a soldier by education and profession, I have never felt any sort of fondness for war, and I have never advocated it, except as a means of peace.—Gen. Grant.

There have been many Presidents of the United States and the roll will be indefinitely extended. We have had a number of brilliant soldiers, but only one great general.—Chauncey M. Depew.

His love of justice was equaled only by his delight in compassion, and neither was sacrificed to the other. His self-advancement was subordinated to the public good. His integrity was never questioned; his honesty was above suspicion; his private life and public career were at once reputable to himself and honorable to his country.—Rev. J. P. Newman.

His soul was the home of hope, sustained and cheered by the certainties of his mind and the power of his faith. He was the mathematical genius of a great general, rather than of a great soldier. By this endowment he proved himself equal to the unexpected, and that with the precision of a seer.—Rev. J. P. Newman.

Grant was not a creator of circumstances; had not opportunities sought him, the world would have been ignorant of the gifts God stored in him.—Rev. H. W. Bolton.

The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us as a free nation. If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on one side, and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other.—Gen. Grant.

His tour around the world exhibited another phase of his character—a simplicity and modesty as extraordinary as it is unparalleled. Received by kings and emperors with all the honors of a king, feted and banqueted by princes and lords, and ennobled by the most distinguished men of the world, he exhibited no pride, no elation, receiving ovations that might well have turned the head of the strongest man with manners and bearing as simple and unostentatious as when a farmer in the west.—J. T. Headley.

The preparations of this wonderful man rarely excited applause of the people, because the workings of his masterful mind were hidden beneath the silence of his lips; but when the supreme moment came, there came also an intellectual elevation, an uplifting of the whole being, a transformation of the silent, thoughtful general, which surprised his foes and astonished his friends. He culminated at the crisis; he was at his best when most needed; he responded in an emergency.—Rev. J. P. Newman.

Out of his great character came the purest motives, as effect follows cause. He abandoned himself to his life mission with the hope of no other reward than the consciousness of duty done. Duty to his conscience, his country, and his God was his standard of successful manhood. With him, true greatness was that in great actions our only care should be to perform well our part and let glory follow virtue. He placed his fame in the service of the state. He was never tempted by false glory. He never acted for effect. He acted because he could not help it. His action was spontaneous. Ambition could not corrupt his patriotism; calumnies could not lessen it.—Rev. J. P. Newman.

As a great soldier leading our armies to victory, he first attracts the eyes of the world. His courage, though lofty and steadfast, was not of that fiery, chivalric kind which dazzles the public. He was not borne up in action by the enthusiasm and pride of the warrior; but apparently unconscious of danger, made battle a business which was to be performed with a clear head and steady nerves. His coolness in deadly peril was wonderful. What was once said of Marshal Ney applies forcibly to him; "In battle he could literally shut up his mind to the one object he had in view." The overthrow of the enemy absorbed every thought within him, and he had none to give to danger or death.—J. T. Headley.

But the supreme will, despotic authority, and the relentless pursuit of an enemy indispensable in a great commander, disappeared when he laid down the sword and became chief magistrate of the union. Not a trace of the military man remained, and his whole thoughts were on peace and the supremacy of law. To the foeman of former days he held out both hands in token of peace, and amid the clamors of excited men and the demands of vindictive passion, he remained unmoved, and breathed the very spirit of kindness and generosity, and exhibited a patriotism that put to shame the partisan zeal of those who constituted themselves his advisers.—J. T. Headley.

Our unconquerable hero has gone forward, until at last he has been called to mingle in the Court of the Most High, and when the roll has been called for the last time, when the last reveille has been sounded, when the last battle has been fought, the honored name of Ulysses S. Grant will be found on the unchanging pages of history as one whom God raised up for a special work; and history will shew how nobly was that work done, how fearlessly were our armies led to victory by the greatest military leader of modern times. A leader who battled not for the advancement of his own interests—not that he might be at the head of an empire, but prompted by his love of right, he fought that the millions in bondage should be slaves no more, and for the triumph of right and the preservation of the union.—Rev. H. W. Bolton.

A brilliant soldier, a calm and just ruler, a true patriot, an humble Christian, he yielded up his spirit without a sigh into the hands of his Maker. That character will shine brighter with time, and his memory grow dearer with each successive generation.—J. T. Headley.

Gratitude

Thankfulness is the tune of angels.—Spenser.

Gratitude is the memory of the heart.—Massieu.

The still small voice of gratitude.—Gray.

If I only have will to be grateful, I am so.—Seneca.

Th' unwilling gratitude of base mankind!—Pope.

Is no return due from a grateful breast?—Dryden.

Thanks, the exchequer of the poor.—Shakespeare.

Gratitude is a species of justice.—Johnson.

Gratitude is expensive.—Gibbon.

Gratitude is a soil on which joy thrives.—Auerbach.

Small service is true service while it lasts.—Wordsworth.

The debt immense of endless gratitude.—Milton.

To receive honestly is the best thanks for a good thing.—George MacDonald.

No metaphysician ever felt the deficiency of language so much as the grateful.—Colton.

O Lord, that lends me life, lend me a heart replete with thankfulness.—Shakespeare.

A single grateful thought towards heaven is the most perfect prayer.—Lessing.

The gratitude of place-expectants is a lively sense of future favors.—Sir Robert Walpole.

It is a species of agreeable servitude, to be under an obligation to those we esteem.—Queen Christina.

Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks, but I thank you.—Shakespeare.

Gratitude is a duty none can be excused from, because it is always at our own disposal.—Charron.

He enjoys much who is thankful for little. A grateful mind is a great mind.—Secker.

A grateful mind
By owing owes not, but still pays, at once Indebted and discharg'd.—Milton.

The heaviest debt is that of gratitude,
When 'tis not in our power to repay it.
—Dr. Thomas Franklin.

Thanks are justly due for things got without purchase.—Ovid.

We seldom find people ungrateful so long as we are in a condition to render them service.—Rochefoucauld.

Gratitude is a duty which ought to be paid, but which none have a right to expect.—Rousseau.

Ingratitude calls forth reproaches as gratitude brings renewed kindnesses.—Mme. de Sévigné.

The gratitude of most men is but a secret desire of receiving greater benefits.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is the will to be grateful which constitutes gratitude.—Joseph Cook.

Gratitude is the fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people.—Dr. Johnson.

Next to ingratitude, the most painful thing to bear is gratitude.—Henry Ward Beecher.

A thankful man owes a courtesy ever; the unthankful but when he needs it.—Ben Jonson.

Every acknowledgment of gratitude is a circumstance of humiliation.—Goldsmith.

My soul, o'erfraught with gratitude, rejects the aid of language. Lord, behold my heart.—Hannah More.

Thou that hast given so much to me, give one thing more—a grateful heart.—George Herbert.

What can I pay thee for this noble usage but grateful praise? So heaven itself is paid.—Rowe.

A thankful heart is not only the greatest virtue, but the parent of all the other virtues.—Cicero.

The feeling of gratitude has all the ardor of a passion in noble hearts.—Achilles Poincelot.

It is not best to refine gratitude; it evaporates in the process of subtilization.—Nicole.

He who receives a good turn should never forget it; he who does one should never remember it.—Charron.

So long as we stand in need of a benefit, there is nothing dearer to us; nor anything cheaper when we have received it.—L'Estrange.

Justice is often pale and melancholy; but Gratitude, her daughter, is constantly in the flow of spirits and the bloom of loveliness.—Landor.

Gratitude is the fairest blossom which springs from the soul; and the heart of man knoweth none more fragrant.—Hosea Ballou.

Gratitude is a nice touch of beauty added last of all to the countenance, giving a classic beauty, an angelic loveliness, to the character.—Theodore Parker.

Indeed, you thanked me; but a nobler gratitude rose in her soul, for from that hour she loved me.—Otway.

He that has nature in him must be grateful; it is the Creator's primary great law, that links the chain of beings to each other.—Madden.

The grateful person, being still the most severe exactor of himself, not only confesses, but proclaims his debt.—South.

Gratitude is the virtue most deified and most deserted. It is the ornament of rhetoric and the libel of practical life.—J. W. Forney.

It is a dangerous experiment to call in gratitude as an ally to love. Love is a debt which inclination always pays, obligation never.—Pascal.

Those who make us happy are always thankful to us for being so. Their gratitude is the reward of their own benefits.—Madame Swetchine.

O call not to my mind what you have done! It sets a debt of that account before me, which shows me poor and bankrupt even in hopes!—Congreve.

There is a selfishness even in gratitude, when it is too profuse; to be over-thankful for one favor is in effect to lay out for another.—Cumberland.

From David learn to give thanks in everything. Every furrow in the book of Psalms is sown with seeds of thanksgiving.—Jeremy Taylor.

If gratitude is due from children to their earthly parents, how much more is the gratitude of the great family of man due to our Father in heaven!—Hosea Ballou.

The reason for misreckoning in expected returns of gratitude is that the pride of the giver and receiver can never agree about the value of the obligation.—Rochefoucauld.

There is as much greatness of mind in the owning of a good turn as in the doing of it; and we must no more force a requital out of season than be wanting in it.—Seneca.

He who has a soul wholly devoid of gratitude should set his soul to learn of his body: for all the parts of that minister to one another.—South.

What I have done is worthy of nothing but silence and forgetfulness, but what God has done for me is worthy of everlasting and thankful memory.—Bishop Hall.

Look over the whole creation, and you shall see that the band, or cement, that holds together all the parts of this great and glorious fabric is gratitude.—South.

There is not a more pleasing exercise of the mind than gratitude. It is accompanied with such an inward satisfaction that the duty is sufficiently rewarded by the performance.—Addison.

There are minds so impatient of inferiority that their gratitude is a species of revenge; and they return benefits, not because recompense is a pleasure, but because obligation is a pain.—Johnson.

Wherever I find a great deal of gratitude in a poor man I take it for granted there would be as much generosity if he were a rich man.—Pope.

God is pleased with no music below so much as the thanksgiving songs of relieved widows and supported orphans; of rejoicing, comforted, and thankful persons.—Jeremy Taylor.

Gratitude is a virtue which, according to the general apprehension of mankind, approaches more nearly than almost any other social virtue to justice.—Dr. Parr.

The law of the pleasure in having done anything for another is, that the one almost immediately forgets having given, and the other remembers eternally having received.—Seneca.

Gratitude is like the good faith of traders—it maintains commerce; and we often pay, not because it is just to discharge our debts, but that we may more readily find people to trust us.—Rochefoucauld.

Almost everyone takes pleasure in repaying trifling obligations, very many feel gratitude for those that are moderate; but there is scarcely anyone who is not ungrateful for those that are weighty.—Rochefoucauld.

Epicurus says "gratitude is a virtue that has commonly profit annexed to it." And where is the virtue, say I, that has not? But still the virtue is to be valued for itself, and not for the profit that attends it.—Seneca.

I thank my Heavenly Father for every manifestation of human love, I thank Him for all experiences, be they sweet or bitter, which help me to forgive all things, and to enfold the whole world with a blessing.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

I've heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds
With coldness still returning;
Alas! the gratitude of men
Hath often left me mourning.
—Wordsworth.

Do not let the empty cup be your first teacher of the blessings you had when it was full. Do not let a hard place here and there in the bed destroy your rest. Seek, as a plain duty, to cultivate a buoyant, joyous sense of the crowded kindnesses of God in your daily life.—Alexander Mac-laren.

We can set our deeds to the music of a grateful heart, and seek to round our lives into a hymn—the melody of which will be recognized by all who come in contact with us, and the power of which shall not be evanescent, like the voice of the singer, but perennial, like the music of the spheres.—Wm. M. Taylor.

Every acknowledgment of gratitude is a circumstance of humiliation; and some are found to submit to frequent mortifications of this kind, proclaiming what obligations they owe, merely because they think it in some measure cancels the debt.—Goldsmith.

When gratitude o'erflows the swelling heart, and breathes in free and uncorrupted praise for benefits received, propitious heaven takes such acknowledgment as fragrant incense, and doubles all its blessings.—Lillo.

It is a very high mind to which gratitude is not a painful sensation. If you wish to please, you will find it wiser to receive, solicit even, favors, than accord them; for the vanity of the obligor is always flattered, that of the obligee rarely.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Now it was well said, whoever said it, "That he who hath the loan of money has not repaid it, and he who has repaid has not the loan; but he who has acknowledged a kindness has it still, and he who has a feeling of it has requited it."—Cicero.

Among the many acts of gratitude we owe to God, it may be accounted one to study and contemplate the perfections and beauties of His work of creation. Every new discovery must necessarily raise in us a fresh sense of the greatness, wisdom, and power of God.—Jonathan Edwards.

How grateful are we—how touched a frank and generous heart is for a kind word extended to us in our pain! The pressure of a tender hand nerves a man for an operation, and cheers him for the dreadful interview with the surgeon.—Thackeray.

As gratitude is a necessary and a glorious, so also is it an obvious, a cheap, and an easy virtue—so obvious that wherever there is life there is place for it, so cheap that the covetous man may be grateful without expense, and so easy that the sluggard may be so likewise without labor.—Seneca.

As flowers carry dewdrops, trembling on the edges of the petals, and ready to fall at the first waft of wind or brush of bird, so the heart should carry its beaded words of thanksgiving; and at the first breath of heavenly flavor, let down the shower, perfumed with the heart's gratitude.—Beecher.

Thus love is the most easy and agreeable, and gratitude the most humiliating, affection of the mind. We never reflect on the man we love without exulting in our choice, while he who has bound us to him by benefits alone rises to our ideas as a person to whom we have in some measure forfeited our freedom.—Goldsmith.

If gratitude, when exerted towards another, naturally produces a very pleasing sensation in the mind of a grateful man, it exalts the soul into rapture when it is employed on this great object of gratitude to the beneficent Being who has given us everything we already possess, and from whom we expect everything we yet hope for.—Addison.

Let but the commons hear this testament—Which, pardon me, I do not mean to read—And they would go and kiss dead Cæsar's wounds
And dip their napkins in his sacred blood,
Yea, beg a hair of him for memory,
And, dying, mention it within their wills,
Bequeathing it as a rich legacy
Unto their issue. —Shakespeare.

Did you ever think of the reason why the Psalms of David have come, like winged angels, down across all the realms and ages—why they make the key-note of grateful piety in every Christian's soul, wherever he lives? Why? Because they are so full of gratitude. "Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"—A. A. Willets.

Grave

Dark lattice! letting in eternal day!
—Young.

The cradle of transformation.—
Mazzini.

The lone couch of his everlasting sleep.—Shelley.

The temple of silence and reconciliation.—Macaulay.

The grave where even the great find rest.—Pope.

Gilded tombs do worms infold.—
Shakespeare.

Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound.—Watts.

To that dark inn, the Grave!—
Scott.

Never the grave gives back what it has won!—Schiller.

Gravestones tell truth scarce forty years.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Lie lightly on my ashes, gentle earth!—Beaumont and Fletcher.

My heart is its own grave!—Miss
L. E. Landon.

How populous, how vital is the grave!—Young.

The grave has a door on its inner side.—Alexander Maclaren.

Who's a prince or beggar in the grave?—Otway.

Death ends our woes, and the kind grave shuts up the mournful scene.—
Dryden.

The reconciling grave.—Southern.

Let's talk of graves, of worms; and epitaphs.—Shakespeare.

Grass grows at last above all graves.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

The graves of those we have loved and lost distress and console us.—
Arsène Houssaye.

Where blended lie the oppressor and the oppressed.—Pope.

And so sepulchred in such pomp dost lie;
That kings for such a tomb would wish to die. —Milton.

They bore him barefac'd on the bier;
And in his grave rain'd many a tear.
—Shakespeare.

Graves they say are warmed by glory;
Foolish words and empty story.
—Heine.

Perhaps the early grave
Which men weep over may be meant to save. —Byron.

Our father's dust is left alone
And silent under other snows.
—Tennyson.

Kings have no such couch as thine,
As the green that folds thy grave.
—Tennyson.

Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.—Gray.

A grave, wherever found, preaches
a short and pithy sermon to the soul.
—Hawthorne.

That unfathomed, boundless sea, the silent grave!—Longfellow.

How peaceful and how powerful is the grave!—Byron.

Earth's highest station ends in—
Here he lies.—Young.

The earth opens impartially her bosom to receive the beggar and the prince.—Horace.

The grave is a common treasury, to which we must all be taken.—Burke.

He spake well who said that graves are the footprints of angels.—Longfellow.

We must be patient; but I cannot choose but weep, to think they should lay him i' the cold ground.—Shakespeare.

Tombs are the clothes of the dead;
a grave is but a plain suit, and a rich
monument is one embroidered.—
Thomas Fuller.

I would rather sleep in the southern corner of a little country churchyard than in the tomb of the Capulets.
—Burke.

Lay her i' the earth: and from her fair and unpolluted flesh may violets spring.—Shakespeare.

Death lies on her like an untimely frost upon the sweetest flower of all the field.—Shakespeare.

All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes that slumber in its bosom.—Bryant.

This is the field and acre of our God: this is the place where human harvests grow.—Longfellow.

The grave, where sets the orb of being,
To rise, ascend, and culminate above
Eternity's horizon evermore.
—Abraham Coles.

The sepulchre,
Wherein we saw thee quietly inurn'd,
Hath op'd his ponderous and marble jaws.
—Shakespeare.

Let's choose executors and talk of wills:
And yet not so, for what can we bequeath
Save our deposed bodies to the ground?
—Shakespeare.

Fond fool! six feet shall serve for all thy store, and he that cares for most shall find no more.—Bishop Hall.

Oh, how a small portion of earth will hold us when we are dead, who ambitiously seek after the whole world while we are living!—Phillip, King of Macedon.

If thou hast no inferiors, have patience awhile, and thou shalt have no superiors. The grave requires no marshal.—Quarles.

O heart, and mind, and thoughts! what thing do you Hope to inherit in the grave below?
—Shelley.

From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections.—Washington Irving.

The reconciling grave swallows distinction first, that made us foes; there all lie down in peace together.—Southern.

We go to the grave of a friend saying, "A man is dead;" but angels throng about him, saying, "A man is born."—Beecher.

An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave—legions of angels can't confine me there!—Young.

The grave—dread thing!—men shiver when thou art named; Nature, appalled, shakes off her wonted firmness.—Blair.

However bright the comedy before, the last act is always stained with blood. The earth is laid upon our head, and there it lies forever.—Pascal.

The earth doth not cover our beloved, but heaven hath received him; let us tarry for awhile, and we shall be in his company.—St. Basil.

One destin'd period men in common have,
The great, the base, the coward, and the brave,
All food alike for worms, companions in the grave.
—Lansdowne.

Who can look down upon the grave of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb that he should have warred with the poor handful of dust that lies mouldering before him?—Washington Irving.

That gloomy outside, like a rusty chest, contains the shining treasures of a soul resolved and brave.—Dryden.

The grave is a very small hillock, but we can see farther from it, when standing on it, than from the highest mountain in all the world.—A. Tholuck.

Without settled principle and practical virtue, life is a desert; without Christian piety, the contemplation of the grave is terrible.—Sir William Knighton.

It is a port where the storms of life never beat, and the forms that have been tossed on its chafing waves lie quiet forevermore.—Chapin.

Under ground—
Precedency's a jest; vassal and lord,
Grossly familiar, side by side consume.
—Blair.

Sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave like one that wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.—Bryant.

There is a calm for those who weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found,
They softly lie and sweetly sleep
Low in the ground. —Montgomery.

Then to the grave I turned me to see what therein lay;
'Twas the garment of the Christian, worn out and thrown away.
—Krummacher.

The grave is heaven's golden gate,
And rich and poor around it wait;
O Shepherdess of England's fold,
Behold this gate of pearl and gold!
—William Blake.

But the grandsire's chair is empty,
The cottage is dark and still;
There's a nameless grave on the battlefield,
And a new one under the hill.
—Wm. Winter.

Oh! let not tears embalm my tomb,
None but the dews by twilight given!
Oh! let not sighs disturb the gloom.
None but the whispering winds of heaven.
—Moore.

The grave is a crucible where memory is purified; we only remember a dead friend by those qualities which make him regretted.—J. Petit-Senn.

The grave is, I suspect, the sole commonwealth which attains that dead flat of social equality that life in its every principle so heartily abhors.—Bulwer-Lytton.

As a tract of country narrowed in the distance expands itself when we approach, thus the way to our near grave appears to us as long as it did formerly when we were far off.—Richter.

The disciples found angels at the grave of Him they loved; and we should always find them too, but that our eyes are too full of tears for seeing.—Beecher.

Here may thy storme-bett vessell safely ryde;
This is the port of rest from troublous toyle,
The worlde's sweet inn from paine and wearisome turnmoyle. —Spenser.

Men cannot benefit those that are with them as they can benefit those that come after them; and of all the pulpits from which human voice is ever sent forth, there is none from which it reaches so far as from the grave.—Ruskin.

Graves, the dashes in the punctuation of our lives. To the Christian they are but the place at which he gathers breath for a nobler sentence. To Christ, the grave was but the hyphen between man and God, for He was God-man.—Duffield.

The most magnificent and costly dome,
Is but an upper chamber to a tomb;
No spot on earth but has supplied a grave,
And human skulls the spacious ocean pave. —Young.

Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave. —Longfellow.

We adorn graves with flowers and redolent plants, just emblems of the life of man, which has been compared in the Holy Scriptures to those fading beauties whose roots, being buried in dishonor, rise again in glory.—Evelyn.

There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest. There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master. —Bible.

Yet shall thy grave with rising flow'rs be dressed,
And the green turf lie lightly on thy breast;
There shall the morn her earliest tears bestow,
There the first roses of the year shall blow. —Pope.

The grave is a sacred workshop of nature! a chamber for the figure of the body; death and life dwell here together as man and wife. They are one body, they are in union; God has joined them together, and what God hath joined together let no man put asunder.—Hippel.

There is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song. There is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! It buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment. From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections. —Washington Irving.

Our lives are rivers gliding free
To that unfathom'd, boundless sea,
The silent grave!
Thither all earthly pomp and boast
Roll, to be swallow'd up and lost
In one dark wave. —Longfellow.

Here the o'erloaded slave flings down his burden
From his gall'd shoulders; and, when the cruel tyrant,
With all his guards and tools of power about him,
Is meditating new, unheard-of hardships,
Mocks his short arm, and, quick as a thought, escapes
Where tyrants vex not, and the weary rest. —Blair.

For ages the world has been waiting and watching; millions, with broken hearts, have hovered around the yawning abyss; but no echo has come back from the engulfing gloom—silence, oblivion, covers all. If indeed they survive; if they went away whole and victorious, they give us no signals. We wait for years, but no messages come from the far-away shore to which they have gone.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

What is the grave?

'Tis a cool, shady harbor, where the Christian Wayworn and weary with life's rugged road,
Forgetting all life's sorrows, joys, and pains,
Lays his poor body down to rest—
Sleeps on—and wakes in heaven.

Mine be the breezy hill that skirts the
down;
Where a green grassy turf is all I crave,
With here and there a violet bestrown,
Fast by a brook or fountain's murmuring wave;
And many an evening sun shine sweetly
on my gravel —Beattie.

Here all the mighty troublers of the earth,
Who swam to sov'reign rule through seas
of blood;
Th' oppressive, sturdy, man-destroying villains,
Who ravag'd kingdoms, and laid empires
waste,
And in a cruel wantonness of power Thinn'd states of half their people, and gave up
To want the rest; now, like a storm that's spent,
Lie hush'd. —Blair.

I see their scattered gravestones gleaming
white
Through the pale dusk of the impending
night.
O'er all alike the imperial sunset throws
Its golden lilies mingled with the rose;
We give to each a tender thought and pass
Out of the graveyards with their tangled grass. —Longfellow.

Where is the house for all the living
found?
Go ask the deaf, the dumb, the dead;
All answer, without voice or sound,
Each resting in his bed;
Look down and see,
Beneath thy feet,
A place for thee;
—There all the living meet.
—James Montgomery.

Always the idea of unbroken quiet broods around the grave. It is a port where the storms of life never beat, and the forms that have been tossed on its chafing waves lie quiet forever-more. There the child nestles as peacefully as ever it lay in its mother's arms, and the workman's hands lie still by his side, and the thinker's brain is pillowed in silent mystery, and the poor girl's broken heart is steeped in a balm that extracts its secret woe, and is in the keeping of a charity that covers all blame.—

Chapin.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase which calls
The burial ground, God's Acre! It is just;
It consecrates each grave within its walls,
And breathes a benison o'er the sleeping
dust. * * * * *

Into its furrows shall we all be cast,
In the sure faith, that we shall rise again
At the great harvest, when the archangel's blast
Shall winnow, like a fan, the chaff and grain. —Longfellow.

Build me a shrine, and I could kneel
To rural Gods, or prostrate fall;
Did I not see, did I not feel,
That one Great Spirit governs all.
O heaven, permit that I may lie
Where o'er my corse green branches wave;
And those who from life's tumults fly
With kindred feelings press my grave.
—Bloomfield.

There are slave-drivers quietly whipped underground,
There bookbinders, done up in boards, are fast bound,
There card-players wait till the last trump be played,
There all the choice spirits get finally laid,
There the babe's that unborn is supplied with a berth,
There men without legs get their six feet
of earth,
There lawyers repose, each wrapped up in his case,
There seekers of office are sure of a place,
There defendant and plaintiff get equally cast,
There shoemakers quietly stick to the last.
—Lowell.

When the dusk of evening had come on, and not a sound disturbed the sacred stillness of the place,—when the bright moon poured in her light on tomb and monument, on pillar, wall, and arch, and most of all (it seemed to them) upon her quiet grave,—in that calm time, when all outward things and inward thoughts teem with assurances of immortality, and worldly hopes and fears are humbled in the dust before them,—then, with tranquil and submissive hearts they turned away, and left the child with God.—Dickens.

Even such is time, that takes on trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust,
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days!
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust!
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The solitary, silent, solemn scene,
Where Casars, heroes, peasants, hermits
lie,
Blended in dust together; where the slave Rests from his labors; where th' insulting proud Resigns his powers; the miser drops his hoard:
Where human folly sleeps. —Dyer.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's
shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mould-
ering heap,
Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.
The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-
built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing
horn,
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.
For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care;
No children run to lisp their sire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share. —Gray.

Gravity

Gravity is a kind of quackery.—
Mme. de Motteville.

Gravity is more suggestive than convincing.—Douglas Jerrold.

Too much gravity argues a shallow mind.—Lavater.

Gravity is the ballast of the soul.—
Fuller.

There is a gravity which is not austere nor captious, which belongs not to melancholy nor dwells in contraction of heart; but arises from tenderness and hangs upon reflection.—

Landor.

The body's wisdom to conceal the mind.—Young.

Piety enjoins no man to be dull.—
South.

Gravity is the best cloak for sin
in all countries.—Fielding.

Gravity is a mysterious carriage of the body invented to cover the defects of the mind.—Rochefoucauld.

Gravity is only the bark of wisdom,
but it preserves it.—Confucius.

Is there anything so grave and serious as an ass?—Montaigne.

There is gravity in wisdom, but no particular wisdom in gravity.—H. W.
Shaw.

Men of gravity are intellectual stammerers, whose thoughts move slowly.—Hazlitt.

To how many blockheads of my time has a cold and taciturn demeanor procured the credit of prudence and capacity!—Montaigne.

Gravity is of the very essence of imposture: it does not only mistake other things, but is apt perpetually almost to mistake itself.—Shaftesbury.

A grave aspect to a grave character is of much more consequence than the world is generally aware of; a barber may make you laugh, but a surgeon ought rather to make you cry.
—Fielding.

I think it is the most beautiful and humane thing in the world, so to mingle gravity with pleasure that the one may not sink into melancholy, nor the other rise up into wantonness.—Pliny
the Elder.

There is a false gravity that is a very ill symptom; and it may be said, that as rivers, which run very slowly, have always the most mud at the bottom: so a solid stiffness in the constant course of a man's life, is a sign of a thick bed of mud at the bottom of his brain.—Saville.

Yorick sometimes, in his wild way of talking, would say that gravity was an arrant scoundrel, and, he would add, of the most dangerous kind, too, because a sly one; and that he verily believed more honest well-meaning people than a man was worth; and that with all its pretensions it was no better, but often worse, than what a French wit had long ago defined it—a mysterious carriage of the body to cover the defects of the mind.—Sterne.

The very essence of gravity was design, and, consequently, deceit; it was a taught trick to gain credit of the world for more sense and knowledge than a man was worth; and that with all its pretensions it was no better, but often worse, than what a French wit had long ago defined it—a mysterious carriage of the body to cover the defects of the mind.—Sterne.

Greatness

All great men are partially inspired.—Cicero.

Greatness knows itself.—Shakespeare.

The most useful is the greatest.—Theodore Parker.

Great men are sincere.—Emerson.

Greatness is its own torment.—Theodore Parker.

The world knows nothing of its greatest men.—Henry Taylor.

Great souls are harmonious.—Joseph Roux.

All great men come out of the middle classes.—Emerson.

Greatness appeals to the future.—Emerson.

Great is not great to the greater.—Sir P. Sidney.

The first step to greatness is to be honest.—Johnson.

Every great man is a unique.—Emerson.

In a great soul everything is great.—Pascal.

Great men should not have great faults.—La Rochefoucauld.

Are not great men the models of nations?—Owen Meredith.

Reproach is a concomitant of greatness.—South.

The civilities of the great are never thrown away.—Johnson.

For he that once is good, is ever great.—Ben Jonson.

To be great is to be misunderstood.—Emerson.

Great men are never sufficiently shown but in struggles.—Burke.

Nothing is great but the inexhaustible wealth of nature.—Emerson.

A great mind becomes a great fortune.—Seneca.

No man ever yet became great by imitation.—Johnson.

A great man is one who affects the mind of his generation.—Beaconsfield.

A great man is made so for others.—Thomas Wilson.

None think the great unhappy but the great.—Young.

Greatness, as we daily see it, is unsociable.—Landor.

The great man is the man who does a thing for the first time.—Alexander Smith.

There is but one method, and that is hard labor.—Sydney Smith.

A man in pursuit of greatness feels no little wants.—Emerson.

No really great man ever thought himself so.—Hazlitt.

That man is great who can use the brains of others to carry on his work.—Donn Piatt.

The greatest man is he who chooses right with the most invincible resolution.—Seneca.

The great are only great because we are on our knees. Let us rise up.—Prud'homme.

The tomb is the pedestal of greatness. I make a distinction between God's great and the king's great.—Landor.

It is the prerogative of great men only to have great defects.—Roche-foucauld.

That man is great who rises to the emergencies of the occasion, and becomes master of the situation.—Donn Piatt.

O! greatness! thou art but a flattering dream,
A wat'ry bubble, lighter than the air.—Tracy.

A great man is made up of qualities that meet or make great occasions.—Lowell.

It is not by his faults, but by his excellences, that we must measure a great man.—George Henry Lewes.

To be great one must be positive, and gain strength through foes.—Donn Piatt.

Everything great is not always good, but all good things are great.—Demosthenes.

What your heart thinks great is great. The soul's emphasis is always right.—Emerson.

In all the world there is nothing so remarkable as a great man, nothing so rare, nothing which so well repays study.—Theodore Parker.

It is to be lamented that great characters are seldom without a blot.—Washington.

Great souls attract sorrow as mountains do storms.—Richter.

No great thought, no great object, satisfies the mind at first view, nor at the last.—Abel Stevens.

Nothing is more simple than greatness; indeed, to be simple is to be great.—Emerson.

Great truths are portions of the soul of man;
Great souls are the portions of eternity.—Lowell.

No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than disbelief in great men.—Carlyle.

Great men are rarely isolated mountain-peaks; they are the summits of ranges.—T. W. Higginson.

In order to do great things, it is necessary to live as if one was never to die.—Vauvenargues.

Greatness, once fallen out with fortune, must fall out with men too.—Shakespeare.

We have not the love of greatness, but the love of the love of greatness.—Carlyle.

Nothing can make a man truly great but being truly good and partaking of God's holiness.—Matthew Henry.

It is, alas! the poor prerogative of greatness, to be wretched and unpitied.—Congreve.

A great man knows the value of greatness; he dares not hazard it, he will not squander it.—Landor.

What millions died that Cæsar might be great!—Campbell.

Great souls are always loyally submissive, reverent to what is over them: only small mean souls are otherwise.—Carlyle.

The difference between Socrates and Jesus Christ? The great Conscious; the immeasurably great Unconscious.—Carlyle.

Greatness lies, not in being strong, but in the right using of strength.—Beecher.

Not that the heavens the little can make great,
But many a man has lived an age too late.
—R. H. Stoddard.

He is great who is what he is from nature, and who never reminds us of others.—Emerson.

It is the curse of greatness
To be its own destruction.
—Nabb.

When greatness descends from its lofty pedestal, it assumes human dimensions.—Mme. Louise Colet.

True greatness is sovereign wisdom. We are never deceived by our virtues.—Lamartine.

Since we cannot attain to greatness, let us revenge ourselves by railing at it.—Montaigne.

It is the age that forms the man, not the man that forms the age.—Macaulay.

The age does not believe in great men, because it does not possess any.—Beaconsfield.

Great men stand like solitary towers in the city of God.—Longfellow.

It is not in the nature of true greatness to be exclusive and arrogant.—Beecher.

The great man is to be the servant of mankind, not they of him.—Theodore Parker.

Great men are among the best gifts which God bestows upon a people.—George S. Hillard.

Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon 'em.—Shakespeare.

A solemn and religious regard to spiritual and eternal things is an indispensable element of all true greatness.—Daniel Webster.

Rightly to be great is not to stir without great argument.—Shakespeare.

The great would not think themselves demigods if the little did not worship them.—Boiste.

Great men lose somewhat of their greatness by being near us; ordinary men gain much.—Landor.

Distinction is an eminence that is attained but too frequently at the expense of a fireside.—Simms.

That man lives greatly, whatever his fate or fame, who greatly dies.—Young.

Greatness, thou gaudy torment of our souls,
The wise man's fetter, and the rage of fools.
—Otway.

Great men are they who see that spiritual is stronger than any material force, that thoughts rule the world.—Emerson.

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them; and if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces.—Shakespeare.

There was never yet a truly great man that was not at the same time truly virtuous.—Benjamin Franklin.

Copiousness and simplicity, variety and unity, constitute real greatness of character.—Lavater.

Great men are more distinguished by range and extent than by originality.—Emerson.

Great men do not content us. It is their solitude, not their force, that makes them conspicuous.—Emerson.

Heaven knows, I had no such intent;
But that necessity so bow'd the state,
That I and greatness were compell'd to kiss.
—Shakespeare.

Greatness is not a teachable nor gainable thing, but the expression of the mind of a God-made great man.—Ruskin.

The use of great men is to serve the little men, to take care of the human race, and act as practical interpreters of justice and truth.—Theodore Parker.

Great souls are not those who have fewer passions and more virtues than the common, but those only who have greater designs.—La Rochefoucauld.

In life, we shall find many men that are great, and some men that are good, but very few men that are both great and good.—Colton.

Earthly greatness is a nice thing, and requires so much chariness in the managing, as the contentment of it cannot requite.—Hall.

The great are only great because we carry them on our shoulders; when we throw them off they sprawl on the ground.—Montandré.

There is a better thing than the great man who is always speaking, and that is the great man who only speaks when he has a great word to say.—William Winter.

It is, in a great measure, by raising up and endowing great minds that God secures the advance of human affairs, and the accomplishment of His own plans on earth.—Albert Barnes.

A really great man is known by three signs—generosity in the design, humanity in the execution, and moderation in success.—Bismarck.

He who comes up to his own idea of greatness must always have had a very low standard of it in his mind.—Hazlitt.

A great man, I take it, is a man so inspired and permeated with the ideas of God and the Christly spirit as to be too magnanimous for vengeance, and too unselfish to seek his own ends.—David Thomas.

The truly great rest in the knowledge of their own deserts, nor seek the conformation of the world.—Alexander Smith.

A solid and substantial greatness of soul looks down with neglect on the censures and applauses of the multitude.—Addison.

Like the air-invested heron, great persons should conduct themselves; and the higher they be, the less they should show.—Sir P. Sidney.

By a certain fate, great acts, and great eloquence have most commonly gone hand in hand, equalling and honoring each other in the same ages.—Milton.

No great intellectual thing was ever done by great effort; a great thing can only be done by a great man, and he does it without effort.—Ruskin.

The greatness of action includes immoral as well as moral greatness—Cortes and Napoleon, as well as Luther and Washington.—Whipple.

Great names stand not alone for great deeds; they stand also for great virtues, and, doing them worship, we elevate ourselves.—Henry Giles.

Greatness, in any period and under any circumstances, has always been rare. It is of elemental birth, and is independent alike of its time and its circumstances.—William Winter.

The world cannot do without great men, but great men are very troublesome to the world.—Goethe.

Avoid greatness; in a cottage there may be found more real happiness than kings or their favorites enjoy in palaces.—Horace.

Nature never sends a great man into the planet, without confiding the secret to another soul.—Emerson.

Great abilities, when employed as God directs, do but make the owners of them greater and more painful servants to their neighbors.—Swift.

Great warriors, like great earthquakes, are principally remembered for the mischief they have done.—Bovee.

Great minds do indeed react on the society which has made them what they are; but they only pay with interest what they have received.—Macaulay.

Philosophy may raise us above grandeur, but nothing can elevate us above the ennui which accompanies it.—Mme. de Maintenon.

If it is a pleasure to be envied and shot at, to be maligned standing and to be despised falling, then it is a pleasure to be great.—South.

The great men of the earth are but the marking-stones on the road of humanity; they are the priests of its religion.—Mazzini.

O, be sick, great greatness, and bid thy ceremony give thee cure! Think'st thou the fiery fever will go out with titles blown from adulation?—Shakespeare.

Those people who are always improving never become great. Greatness is an eminence, the ascent to which is steep and lofty, and which a man must seize on at once by natural boldness and vigor, and not by patient, wary steps.—Hazlitt.

For as much as to understand and to be mighty are great qualities, the higher that they be, they are so much the less to be esteemed if goodness also abound not in the possessor.—Sir P. Sidney.

Be substantially great in thyself, and more than thou appearest unto others; and let the world be deceived in thee, as they are in the lights of heaven.—Sir Thomas Browne.

He only is great who has the habits of greatness: who, after performing what none in ten thousand could accomplish, passes on like Samson, and "tells neither father nor mother of it."—Lavater.

This is the part of a great man, after he has maturely weighed all circumstances, to punish the guilty, to spare the many, and in every state of fortune not to depart from an upright, virtuous conduct.—Cicero.

There never was a great truth but it was revered; never a great institution, nor a great man, that did not, sooner or later, receive the reverence of mankind.—Theodore Parker.

There is something on earth greater than arbitrary power. The thunder, the lightning, and the earthquake are terrific, but the judgment of the people is more.—Daniel Webster.

The truly strong and sound mind is the mind that can embrace equally great things and small. I would have a man great in great things, and elegant in little things.—Johnson.

Speaking generally, no man appears great to his contemporaries, for the same reason that no man is great to his servants—both know too much of him.—Colton.

There is no man so great as not to have some littleness more predominant than all his greatness. Our virtues are the dupes, and often only the plaything of our follies.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A contemplation of God's works, a generous concern for the good of mankind, and the unfeigned exercise of humility only, denominate men great and glorious.—Addison.

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world

Like a Colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find ourselves dishonorable graves.
—Shakespeare.

Great men may jest with saints: 'tis wit in them,
But in the less, foul profanation.

That in the captain's but a choleric word,
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.
—Shakespeare.

He is truly great that is great in charity. He is truly great that is little in himself, and maketh no account of any height of honor. And he is truly learned that doeth the will of God, and forsaketh his own will.—Thomas à Kempis.

Great men, great events, great epochs, it has been said, grow as we recede from them; and the rate at which they grow in the estimation of men is in some sort a measure of their greatness.—Principal Shairp.

Great is Youth—equally great is Old Age—great are Day and Night.

Great is Wealth—great is Poverty—great is Expression—great is Silence.
—Walt Whitman.

Man's unhappiness, as I construe, comes of his greatness; it is because there is an Infinite in him, which with all his cunning he cannot quite bury under the Finite.—Carlyle.

He fought a thousand glorious wars,
And more than half the world was his,
And somewhere, now, in yonder stars,
Can tell, mayhap, what greatness is.
—Thackeray.

The gifts of Nature and accomplishments of art are valuable but as they are exerted in the interests of virtue or governed by the rules of honor.—Steele.

Great men are always exceptional men; and greatness itself is but comparative. Indeed, the range of most men in life is so limited that very few have the opportunity of being great.—Samuel Smiles.

Greatness is the aggregation of minuteness; nor can its sublimity be felt truthfully by any mind unaccustomed to the affectionate watching of what is least.—Ruskin.

A king or a prince becomes by accident a part of history. A poet or an artist becomes by nature and necessity a part of universal humanity.—Mrs. Jameson.

No man has come to true greatness who has not felt in some degree that his life belongs to his race, and that what God gives him He gives him for mankind.—Phillips Brooks.

Great people and champions are special gifts of God, whom He gives and preserves; they do their work, and achieve great actions, not with vain imaginations, or cold and sleepy cogitations, but by motion of God.—Martin Luther.

Such is the destiny of great men that their superior genius always exposes them to be the butt of the envenomed darts of calumny and envy.—Voltaire.

It appears to be among the laws of nature, that the mighty of intellect should be pursued and carped by the little, as the solitary flight of one great bird is followed by the twittering petulance of many smaller.—Lander.

The truly great consider, first, how they may gain the approbation of God, and, secondly, that of their own consciences; having done this, they would then willingly conciliate the good opinion of their fellow-men.—Colton.

We observe with confidence that the truly strong mind, view it as intellect or morality, or under any other aspect, is nowise the mind acquainted with its strength; that here the sign of health is unconsciousness.—Carlyle.

As the stars are the glory of the sky, so great men are the glory of their country, yea, of the whole earth. The hearts of great men are the stars of earth; and doubtless when one looks down from above upon our planet, these hearts are seen to send forth a silvery light just like the stars of heaven.—Heine.

Since, by your greatness, you
Are nearer heaven in place; be nearer it In goodness: rich men should transcend the poor,
As clouds the earth; rais'd by the comfort of The sun, to water dry and barren grounds.
—Tournour.

Great men need to be lifted upon the shoulders of the whole world, in order to conceive their great ideas or perform their great deeds. That is, there must be an atmosphere of greatness round about them. A hero cannot be a hero unless in an heroic world.—Hawthorne

Worthy deeds are not often destitute of worthy relaters; as, by a certain fate, great acts and great eloquence have most commonly gone hand in hand, equalling and honoring each other in the same age.—Milton.

Some men who know that they are great are so very haughty withal and insufferable that their acquaintance discover their greatness only by the tax of humility which they are obliged to pay as the price of their friendship.—Colton.

Subtract from a great man all that he owes to opportunity and all that he owes to chance, all that he has gained by the wisdom of his friends and by the folly of his enemies, and our Brobdignag will often become a Lilliputian.—Colton.

True greatness, first of all, is a thing of the heart. It is all alive with robust and generous sympathies. It is neither behind its age, nor too far before it. It is up with its age, and ahead of it only just so far as to be able to lead its march. It cannot slumber, for activity is a necessity of its existence. It is no reservoir, but a fountain.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

That man is great, and he alone,
Who serves a greatness not his own,
For neither praise nor pelf:
Content to know and be unknown:
Whole in himself. —Lord Lytton.

The great make us feel, first of all, the indifference of circumstances. They call into activity the higher perceptions, and subdue the low habits of comfort and luxury; but the higher perceptions find their objects everywhere; only the low habits need palaces and banquets.—Emerson.

He who does the most good is the greatest man. Power, authority, dignity, honors, wealth and station—these are so far valuable as they put it into the hands of men to be more exemplary and more useful than they could be in an obscure and private life. But then these are means conducting to an end, and that end is goodness.—Bishop Jortin.

He only is great at heart who floods the world with a great affection. He only is great of mind who stirs the world with great thoughts. He only is great of will who does something to shape the world to a great career. And he is greatest who does the most of all these things and does them best.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

Nay, then, farewell!
I have touch'd the highest point of all my greatness;
And from that full meridian of my glory,
I haste now to my setting. I shall fall
Like a bright exhalation in the evening,
And no man see me more. —Shakespeare.

The great men of earth are the shadow men, who, having lived and died, now live again and forever through their undying thoughts. Thus living, though their footfalls are heard no more, their voices are louder than the thunder, and unceasing as the flow of tides or air.—Beecher.

The greatest men have not always the best heads; many indiscretions may be pardoned to a brilliant and ardent imagination. The prudence and discretion of a cold heart are not worth half so much as the follies of an ardent mind.—Baron de Grimm.

The reason why great men meet with so little pity or attachment in adversity would seem to be this: the friends of a great man were made by his fortunes, his enemies by himself; and revenge is a much more punctual paymaster than gratitude.—Colton.

I will not go so far as to say, with a living poet, that the world knows nothing of its greatest men; but there are forms of greatness, or at least of excellence, which "die and make no sign"; there are martyrs that miss the palm, but not the stake; heroes without the laurel, and conquerors without the triumph.—G. A. Sala.

He that makes himself famous by his eloquence, justice or arms illustrates his extraction, let it be never so mean; and gives inestimable reputation to his parents. We should never have heard of Sophroniscus, but for his son, Socrates; nor of Ariosto and Gryllus, if it had not been for Xenophon and Plato.—Seneca.

He alone is worthy of the appellation who either does great things, or teaches how they may be done, or describes them with a suitable majesty when they have been done; but those only are great things which tend to render life more happy, which increase the innocent enjoyments and comforts of existence, or which pave the way to a state of future bliss more permanent and more pure.—Milton.

The greatest man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution, who resists the sorest temptations from within and without, who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully, who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menace and frowns, whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering. I believe this greatness to be most common among the multitude, whose names are never heard.—Channing.

Persons in great stations have seldom their true character drawn till several years after their death. Their personal friendships and enmities must cease, and the parties they were engaged in be at an end, before their faults or their virtues can have justice done them. When writers have the least opportunities of knowing the truth, they are in the best disposition to tell it.—Addison.

Those who have read history with discrimination know the fallacy of those panegyrics and invectives which represent individuals as effecting great moral and intellectual revolutions, subverting established systems, and imprinting a new character on their age. The difference between one man and another is by no means so great as the superstitious crowd suppose.—Macaulay.

Few footprints of the great remain in the sand before the ever-flowing tide. Long ago it washed out Homer's. Curiosity follows him in vain; Greece and Asia perplex us with a rival Stratford-upon-Avon. The rank of Aristophanes is only conjectured from his gift to two poor players in Athens. The age made no sign when Shakespeare, its noblest son, passed away.—Willmott.

He who ascends to mountain-tops shall find
Their loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds of snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below.
Tho' high above the sun of glory glow,
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
Contending tempests on his naked head.
—Byron.

I do not hesitate to say that the road to eminence and power, from an obscure condition, ought not to be made too easy, nor a thing too much of course. If rare merit be the rarest of all things, it ought to pass through some sort of probation. The temple of honor ought to be seated on an eminence. If it be open through virtue, let it be remembered, too, that virtue is never tried but by some difficulty and some struggle.—Burke.

A great man is a gift, in some measure a revelation of God. A great man, living for high ends, is the divinest thing that can be seen on earth. The value and interest of history are derived chiefly from the lives and services of the eminent men whom it commemorates. Indeed, without these, there would be no such thing as history, and the progress of a nation would be little worth recording, as the march of a trading caravan across a desert.—George S. Hillard.

If the title of a great man ought to be reserved for him who cannot be charged with an indiscretion or a vice, who spent his life in establishing the independence, the glory and durable prosperity of his country; who succeeded in all that he undertook, and whose successes were never won at the expense of honor, justice, integrity, or by the sacrifice of a single principle—this title will not be denied to Washington.—Sparks.

The mightier man, the mightier is the thing
 That makes him honor'd, or begets him Hate:
 For greatest Scandal waits on greatest
 state.
 The Moon being clouded presently is miss'd,
 But little Stars may hide them when they list.
 The crow may clothe his coal-black wings
 in mire,
 And unperceived fly with the filth away;
 But if the like the snow-white swan desire,
 The stain upon his silver down will stay.
 Poor grooms are sightless night, Kings glorious day.
 Gnats are unnoted whereso'er they fly,
 But eagles gazed upon with every eye.
 —Shakespeare.

Great men are not the mere products of the times in which they live, the epitome of their age, the creations of those formative currents of thought that are traversing the masses. Great men are the gifts of kind heaven to our poor world; instruments by which the Highest One works out His designs; light-radiators to give guidance and blessing to the travellers of time.
 Though far above us, they are felt to be our brothers; and their elevation shows us what vast possibilities are wrapped up in our common humanity.
 They beckon us up the gleaming heights to whose summits they have climbed. Their deeds are the woof of this world's history.—Moses Harvey.

Greece

Clime of the unforgotten brave!
 Whose land, from plain to mountain-cave,
 Was Freedom's home, or Glory's grave;
 Shrine of the mighty! can it be,
 That this is all remains of thee?
 —Byron.

The isles of Greece, the isles of Greece!
 Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
 Where grew the arts of war and peace—
 Where Delos rose, and Phœbus sprung!
 Eternal summer gilds them yet,
 But all, except their sun, is set.
 —Byron.

Greeting

As ships meet at sea a moment together, when words of greeting must be spoken, and then away upon the deep, so men meet in this world; and I think we should cross no man's path without hailing him, and if he needs giving him supplies.—Beecher.

Grief

No grief reaches the dead.—Sallust.

Grief has its time.—Johnson.

Grief alone can teach us what is man.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Grief, like a tree, has tears for its fruit.—Philemon.

The only cure for grief is action.—
 George Henry Lewes.

Griefs assured are felt before they come.—Dryden.

There is a solemn luxury in grief.—
 Wm. Mason.

My grief lies onward and my joy behind.—Shakespeare.

Grief knits two hearts in closer bonds.—Lamartine.

None can cure their harms by wailing them.—Shakespeare.

The indulgence in grief is a blunder.
 —Beaconsfield.

Every one can master a grief but he that has it.—Shakespeare.

I will instruct my sorrow to be proud.—Shakespeare.

She grieves sincerely who grieves unseen.—Martial.

Grief still treads upon the heels of pleasure.—Congreve.

No grief is so acute but time amelorates it.—Cicero.

He who is resolute conquers grief.—
 Goethe.

Trembling lips, tuned to such grief that they say bright words sadly.—
 Sydney Dobell.

Grief is a stone that bears one down,
 but two bear it lightly.—W. Hauff.

Grief is crowned with consolation.
—Shakespeare.

Great griefs medicine the less.
Shakespeare.

Grief is a species of idleness.
Johnson.

Grief best is pleased with grief's society.
—Shakespeare.

When remedies are past, the griefs are ended.
—Shakespeare.

The flood of grief decreaseth when it can swell no longer.
—Bacon.

Honest plain words best pierce the ear of grief.
—Shakespeare.

In rising sighs and falling tears.
Addison.

That eating canker grief, with wasteful spite, preys on the rosy bloom of youth and beauty.
—Rowe.

Well has it been said that there is no grief like the grief which does not speak.
—Longfellow.

'Tis long ere time can mitigate your grief; To wisdom fly, she quickly brings relief.
—Grotius.

No future hour can rend my heart like this,
Save that which breaks it. —Maturin.

You may my glories and my state depose, But not my griefs; still am I king of those.
—Shakespeare.

He gave a deep sigh; I saw the iron enter into his soul.
—Sterne.

A malady
Preys on my heart that medicine cannot reach.
—Maturin.

He grieves more than is necessary who grieves before it is necessary.
—Seneca.

Some Grief shows much of Love; But much of Grief shows still some want of Wit.
—Shakespeare.

Never morning wore to evening but some heart did break.
—Tennyson.

It is dangerous to abandon one's self to the luxury of grief: it deprives one of courage, and even of the wish for recovery.
—Amiel.

Half of the ills we hoard within our hearts, Are ills because we hoard them.
—Proctor.

Some weep in perfect justice to the dead, As conscious all their love is in arrears.
—Young.

What's gone, and what's past help, Should be past grief.
—Shakespeare.

Light griefs are plaintive, but great ones are dumb.
—Seneca.

What need a man forestall his date of grief, And run to meet what he would most avoid?
—Milton.

Weep I cannot;
But my heart bleeds.
—Shakespeare.

We hear the rain fall, but not the snow. Bitter grief is loud, calm grief is silent.
—Auerbach.

They truly mourn that mourn without a witness.
—Byron.

It is folly to tear one's hair in sorrow, as if grief could be assuaged by baldness.
—Cicero.

Dr. Holmes says, both wittily and truly, that crying widows are easiest consoled.
—H. W. Shaw.

Why must we first weep before we can love so deep that our hearts ache?
—Richter.

It will appear how impertinent that grief was which served no end of life.
—Jeremy Taylor.

Grief has been compared to a hydra; for every one that dies, two are born.
—Calderon.

No greater grief than to remember days of joy when misery is at hand.
—Dante.

A little bitter mingled in our cup leaves no relish of the sweet.
—Locke.

Whose lenient sorrows find relief, whose joys are chastened by their grief.—Sir Walter Scott.

What's the newest grief? Each minute tunes a new one.—Shakespeare.

Heavy hearts, like heavy clouds in the sky, are best relieved by the letting of water.—Rivarol.

Cease to lament for that thou canst not help; and study help for that which thou lamentest.—Shakespeare.

Woman's grief is like a summer's shower—short as it is violent.—Joubert.

Alas! the breast that inly bleeds has nought to fear from outward blow.—
Byron.

The violence of either grief or joy, their own enactures with themselves destroy.—Shakespeare.

The only thing that grief has taught me is to know how shallow it is.—
Emerson.

A plague of sighing and grief! it blows a man up like a bladder.—
Shakespeare.

The sickness of the heart is most easily got rid of by complaining and soothing confidence.—Goethe.

I grieve that grief can teach me nothing, nor carry me one step into real nature.—Emerson.

The grief that does not speak whispers the overfraught heart and bids it break.—Shakespeare.

Grief hallows hearts, even while it ages heads.—Bailey.

I am not mad; I would to heaven I were!
For then, 'tis like I should forget myself:
O, if I could, what grief should I forget!
—Shakespeare.

Grief is the culture of the soul, it is the true fertilizer.—Mme. de Girardin.

Grief is the agony of an instant:
the indulgence of grief the blunder of a life.—Beaconsfield.

A heavier task could not have been imposed,
Than I to speak my griefs unspeakable.
—Shakespeare.

Grief hath two tongues; and never woman
yet
Could rule them both without ten women's wit.
—Shakespeare.

Winter is come and gone,
But grief returns with the revolving year.
—Shelley.

Oft have I heard that grief softens the mind
And makes it fearful and degenerate.
—Shakespeare.

Grief is a tattered tent
Where through God's light doth shine.
—Lucy Larcom.

Who fails to grieve when just occasion
calls,
Or grieves too much, deserves not to be
blest:
Inhuman, or effeminate, his heart.
—Young.

Like the lily,
That once was mistress of the field, and flourished,
I'll hang my head, and perish.
—Shakespeare.

Nothing speaks our grief so well as to speak nothing.—Crashaw.

That grief is the most durable which flows inward, and buries its streams with its fountain, in the depths of the heart.—Jane Porter.

If our inward griefs were seen written on our brow, how many would be pitied who are now envied!—Metastasio.

Excess of grief for the deceased is madness; for it is an injury to the living, and the dead know it not.—
Xenophon.

O the things unseen, untold, undreamt of, which like shadows pass hourly over that mysterious world, a mind to ruin struck by grief!—Mrs. Hemans.

Heaven deprives me of a wife who never caused me any other grief than that of her death.—Louis XIV.

How beautiful is sorrow when it is dressed by virgin innocence! it makes felicity in others seem deformed.—Sir W. Davenant.

Grief knits two hearts in closer bonds than happiness ever can; and common sufferings are far stronger links than common joys.—Lamartine.

Great grief makes sacred those upon whom its hand is laid. Joy may elevate, ambition glorify; but sorrow alone can consecrate.—Horace Greeley.

Grief, which disposes gentle natures to retirement, to inaction, and to meditation, only makes restless spirits more restless.—Macaulay.

While grief is fresh, every attempt to divert only irritates. You must wait till grief be digested, and then amusement will dissipate the remains of it.—Johnson.

The more tender our spirits are made by religion, the more ready we are to let in grief.—Jeremy Taylor.

Grief is so far from retrieving a loss that it makes it greater; but the way to lessen it is by a comparison with others' losses.—Wycherley.

The truth is, we pamper little griefs into great ones, and bear great ones as well as we can.—Hazlitt.

In the loss of an object we do not proportion our grief to its real value, but to the value our fancies set upon it.—Addison.

Give to a wounded heart seclusion; consolation nor reason ever effected anything in such a case.—Balzac.

Sorrow, like a heavy ringing bell, once set on ringing, with its own weight goes; then little strength rings out the doleful knell.—Shakespeare.

Grief is only the memory of widowed affection. The more intense the delight in the presence of the object, the more poignant must be the impression of the absence.—James Martineau.

Each substance of a grief hath twenty shadows,
Which show like grief itself, but are not so:
For sorrow's eye glazed with blinding tears,
Divides one thing entire to many objects.
—Shakespeare.

Why, let the stricken deer go weep,
The heart ungalled play;
For some must watch, while some must sleep;
Thus runs the world away.
—Shakespeare.

The wither'd frame, the ruin'd mind,
The wreck by passion left behind,
A shrivell'd scroll, a scatter'd leaf,
Sear'd by the autumn blast of grief!
—Byron.

Good is that darkening of our lives,
Which only God can brighten;
But better still that hopeless load,
Which none but God can lighten.
—Frederick William Faber.

Upon her face there was the tint of grief,
The settled shadow of an inward strife,
And an unquiet drooping of the eye,
As if its lid were charged with unshed tears.
—Byron.

We know there oft is found an avarice in grief; and the war eye of sorrow loves to gaze upon its secret hoard of treasured woes, and pine in solitude.—William Mason.

All the joys of earth will not assuage our thirst for happiness; while a single grief suffices to shroud life in a sombre veil, and smite it with nothingness at all points.—Mme. Swetchine.

The man who has learned to triumph over sorrow wears his miseries as though they were sacred fillets upon his brow; and nothing is so entirely admirable as a man bravely wretched.

—Seneca.

O, grief hath changed me since you saw me last; and careful hours, with Time's deformed hand, have written strange defeatures in my face!—Shakespeare.

O brothers! let us leave the shame and sin Of taking vainly, in a plaintive mood, The holy name of grief!—holy herein, That, by the grief of One, came all our good.
—Mrs. Browning.

The business of life summons us away from useless grief, and calls us to the exercise of those virtues of which we are lamenting our deprivation.—Dr. Johnson.

'Tis better to be lowly born,
And range with humble livers in content,
Than to be perk'd up in a glistering grief,
And wear a golden sorrow.—Shakespeare.

What an argument in favor of social connections is the observation that by communicating our grief we have less, and by communicating our pleasure we have more.—Greville.

Alas! I have not words to tell my grief;
To vent my sorrow would be some relief;
Light sufferings give us leisure to complain;
We groan, we cannot speak, in greater pain.
—Dryden.

Be free from grief not through insensibility like the irrational animals, nor through want of thought like the foolish, but like a man of virtue by having reason as the consolation of grief.—Epictetus.

In youth, grief comes with a rush and overflow, but it dries up, too, like the torrent. In the winter of life it remains a miserable pool, resisting all evaporation.—Madame Swetchine.

Oh! call my brother back to me!
I cannot play alone;
The summer comes with flower and bee—
Where is my brother gone?
—Mrs. Hemans.

Of permanent griefs there are none, for they are but clouds. The swifter they move through the sky, the more follow after them; and even the immovable ones are absorbed by the other, and become smaller till they vanish.—Richter.

Grief or misfortune seems to be indispensable to the development of intelligence, energy, and virtue. The proofs to which the people are submitted, as with individuals, are necessary then to draw them from their lethargy, to disclose their character.—Fearon.

Grief is a flower as delicate and prompt to fade as happiness. Still, it does not wholly die. Like the magic rose, dried and unrecognizable, a warm air breathed on it will suffice to renew its bloom.—Mme. de Gasparin.

What is grief? It is an obscure labyrinth into which God leads man, that he may be experienced in life, that he may remember his faults and abjure them, that he may appreciate the calm which virtue gives.—Leopold Scheffer.

The person who grieves suffers his passion to grow upon him; he indulges it, he loves it; but this never happens in the case of actual pain, which no man ever willingly endured for any considerable time.—Burke.

Grief, like night, is salutary. It cools down the soul by putting out its feverish fires; and if it oppresses her, it also compresses her energies. The load once gone, she will go forth with greater buoyancy to new pleasures.—Dr. Pulsford.

We may deserve grief; but why should women be unhappy?—except that we know heaven chastens those whom it loves best, being pleased by repeated trials to make these pure spirits more pure.—Thackeray.

Why destroy present happiness by a distant misery, which may never come at all, or you may never live to see it? For every substantial grief has twenty shadows, and most of them shadows of your own making.—Sydney Smith.

Griefs are like the beings that endure them—the little ones are the most clamorous and noisy; those of older growth and greater magnitude are generally tranquil, and sometimes silent.—Chatfield.

He that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down on his little handful of thorns.—Jeremy Taylor.

Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me;

Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
Remembers me of all his gracious parts,
Stuffs out his vacant garment with his form.
—Shakespeare.

Grief! thou art classed amongst the depressing passions. And true it is that thou humblest to the dust, but also thou exaltest to the clouds. Thou shakest us with ague, but also thou steadiest like frost. Thou sickenest the heart, but also thou healest its infirmities.—De Quincey.

Sweet source of virtue,
O sacred sorrow! he who knows not thee,
Knows not the best emotions of the heart,
Those tender tears that harmonize the soul,
The sigh that charms, the pang that gives delight.
—Thomson.

Long thus he chew'd the cud of inward griefe,
And did consume his gall with anguish sore;
Still when he mused on his late mischief, e,
Then still the smart thereof increased more,
And seemed more grievous than it was before.
—Spenser.

As warmth makes even glaciers trickle, and opens streams in the ribs of frozen mountains, so the heart knows the full flow and life of its grief only when it begins to melt and pass away.—Beecher.

I am not prone to weeping as our sex commonly are; the want of which vain dew perchance shall dry your pities; but I have that honorable grief lodged here which burns worse than tears drown.—Shakespeare.

As a fresh wound shrinks from the hand of the surgeon, then gradually submits to and even calls for it; so a mind under the first impression of a misfortune shuns and rejects all comfort, but at length, if touched with tenderness, calmly and willingly resigns itself.—Pliny the Younger.

Oppress'd with grief, oppress'd with care,
A burden more than I can bear,
I sit me down and sigh;
O, life! thou art a galling load,
Along a rough, a weary road,
To wretches such as I.
—Burns.

There is yet a silent agony in which the mind appears to disdain all external help, and broods over its distresses with gloomy reserve. This is the most dangerous state of mind; accidents or friendships may lessen the louder kinds of grief, but all remedies for this must be had from within, and there despair too often finds the most deadly enemy.—Goldsmith.

There are moods in which we court suffering, in the hope that here, at least, we shall find reality, sharp peaks and edges of truth. But it turns out to be scene-painting and counterfeit. The only thing grief has taught me is to know how shallow it is.—Emerson.

Those great and stormy passions do so spend the whole stock of grief that they presently admit a comfort and contrary affection; while a sorrow that is even and temperate goes on to its period with expectation and the distance of a just time.—Jeremy Taylor.

Grotesque

The noble grotesque involves the true appreciation of beauty.—Ruskin.

The true grotesque being the expression of the repose or play of a serious mind, there is a false grotesque opposed to it, which is the result of the full exertion of a frivolous one.—Ruskin.

Wherever the human mind is healthy and vigorous in all its proportions, great in imagination and emotion no less than in intellect, and not overborne by an undue or hardened pre-eminence of the mere reasoning faculties, there the grotesque will exist in full energy.—Ruskin.

I believe that there is no test of greatness in periods, nations or men more sure than the development, among them or in them, of a noble grotesque, and no test of comparative smallness or limitation, of one kind or another, more sure than the absence of grotesque invention, or incapability of understanding it.—Ruskin.

Growth

The lofty oak from a small acorn grows.—Lewis Duncombe.

Gardener, for telling me these news of woe, Pray God the plants thou graft'st may never grow. —Shakespeare.

'Tis thus the mercury of man is fix'd,
Strong grows the virtue with his nature
mix'd. —Pope.

In a narrow circle the mind contracts.
Man grows with his expanded needs.
—Schiller.

Our pleasures and our discontents,
Are rounds by which we may ascend.
—Longfellow.

He builded better than he knew—
The conscious stone to beauty grew.
—Emerson.

And so all growth that is not towards God
Is growing to decay.
—George MacDonald.

Then bless thy secret growth, nor catch
At noise, but thrive unseen and dumb;
Keep clean, be as fruit, earn life, and watch
Till the white-wing'd reapers come.
—Henry Vaughan.

"Ay," quoth my uncle Gloucester,
"Small herbs have grace, great weeds do grow apace;"
And since, methinks, I would not grow so
fast,
Because sweet flowers are slow, and weeds
make haste. —Shakespeare.

Arts and sciences are not cast in a mould, but are found and perfected by degrees, by often handling and polishing, as bears leisurely lick their cubs into shape.—Montaigne.

Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength.—Pope.

Man seems the only growth that dwindles here.—Goldsmith.

What? Was man made a wheel-work to wind up,
And be discharged, and straight wound up anew?
No! grown, his growth lasts; taught, he ne'er forgets;
May learn a thousand things, not twice the same. —Robert Browning.

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere:
A lily of a day
Is fairer far in May,
Although it fall and die that night—
It was the plant and flower of Light.
—Ben Jonson.

Jock, when ye hae naething else to do, ye may be aye sticking in a tree;
it will be growing, Jock, when ye're sleeping.—Scott.

Grumbling

It's a great comfort to some people to groan over their imaginary ills.—
Thackeray.

Grumblers deserve to be operated upon surgically; their trouble is usually chronic.—Douglas Jerrold.

Complaint is the largest tribute
Heaven receives.—Swift.

Those who complain most are most to be complained of.—Matthew Henry.

I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry, it is all barren.—Sterne.

Every one must see daily instances of people who complain from a mere habit of complaining.—Graves.

The very large, very respectable, and very knowing class of misanthropes who rejoice in the name of grumblers,—persons who are so sure that the world is going to ruin, that they resent every attempt to comfort them as an insult to their sagacity, and accordingly seek their chief consolation in being inconsolable, their chief pleasure in being displeased.—Whipple.

When a man is full of the Holy Ghost, he is the very last man to be complaining of other people.—D. L. Moody.

From mad dogs and grumbling professors may we all be delivered; and may we never take the complaint from either of them!—Spurgeon.

There is an unfortunate disposition in a man to attend much more to the faults of his companions which offend him, than to their perfections which please him.—Greville.

No talent, no self-denial, no brains, no character, is required to set up in the grumbling business; but those who are moved by a genuine desire to do good have little time for murmuring or complaint.—Robert West.

Guest

A pretty woman is a welcome guest.—Byron.

Unbidden guests
Are often welcomest when they are gone.—Shakespeare.

Here's our chief guest.
If he had been forgotten,
It had been as a gap in our great feast.—Shakespeare.

For I, who holds sage Homer's rule the best,
Welcome the coming, speed the going guest.—Pope.

See, your guests approach:
Address yourself to entertain them
sprightly,
And let's be red with mirth.—Shakespeare.

Some steam process should be invented for arranging guests when they are above five hundred.—Beaconsfield

The first day a man is a guest, the second a burden, the third a pest.—Laboulaye.

You must come home with me and be my guest;
You will give joy to me, and I will do
All that is in my power to honor you.—Shelley.

For whom he means to make an often guest,
One dish shall serve; and welcome make the rest.—Joseph Hall.

Guilt

Be sure your sin will find you out.—Bible.

The ghostly consciousness of wrong.—Carlyle.

Guilt's a terrible thing.—Ben Jonson.

Guilt is a spiritual Rubicon.—Jane Porter.

The mind of guilt is full of scorpions.—Shakespeare.

No one becomes guilty by fate.—Seneca.

Let the galled jade wince.—Shakespeare.

He who flees from trial confesses his guilt.—Syrus.

Guilt soon learns to lie.—Miss Braddon.

Guilt has very quick ears to an accusation.—Fielding.

My hands are guilty, but my heart is free.—Dryden.

And then it started like a guilty thing
Upon a fearful summons.—Shakespeare.

The guilt being great, the fear doth still exceed.—Shakespeare.

A land of levity is a land of guilt.—Young.

Guilt is ever at a loss, and confusion waits upon it.—Congreve.

Guilt is a timorous thing ere perpetration; despair alone makes guilty men be bold.—Coleridge.

Thus conscience does make cowards of us all.—Shakespeare.

Wickedness consists in the very hesitation about an act, even though it be not perpetrated.—Cicero.

A wicked conscience mouldeth goblins swift as frenzy thoughts.—Shakespeare.

There are no greater prudes than those women who have some secret to hide.—George Sand.

The sin lessens in human estimation only as the guilt increases.—Schiller.

He that commits a sin shall find the pressing guilt lie heavy on his mind.—Creech.

Guiltiness will speak, though tongues were out of use.—Shakespeare.

All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand.—Shakespeare.

From the body of one guilty deed a thousand ghostly fears and haunting thoughts proceed.—Wordsworth.

It is easy to defend the innocent; but who is eloquent enough to defend the guilty?—Publius Syrus.

One fault begets another; one crime renders another necessary.—Southey.

The guilty mind debases the great image that it wears, and levels us with brutes.—Havard.

Beside one deed of guilt, how blest is guiltless woe!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Thou need'st not answer; thy confession
speaks,
Already redd'ning in thy guilty cheeks.
—Byron.

Men's minds are too ingenious in palliating guilt in themselves.—Livy.

Alas! how difficult it is to prevent the countenance from betraying guilt.—Ovid.

How guilt, once harbored in the conscious breast, Intimidates the brave, degrades the great!
—Dr. Johnson.

All fear, but fear of heaven, betrays a guilt,
And guilt is villainy. —N. Lee.

Let guilty men remember, their black deeds
Do lean on crutches made of slender reeds.
—John Webster.

I esteem death a trifle, if not caused by guilt.—Plautus.

He is not guilty who is not guilty of his own free will.—Seneca.

Life is not the supreme good; but of all earthly ills the chief is guilt.—Schiller.

I'll haunt thee like a wicked conscience still.—Shakespeare.

The guilt being great, the fear doth still exceed.—Shakespeare.

God hath yoked to guilt her pale tormentor,—misery.—Bryant.

The greatest incitement to guilt is the hope of sinning with impunity.—Cicero.

They whose guilt within their bosoms lie imagine every eye beholds their blame.—Shakespeare.

If one know them they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.—Bible.

Where, where for shelter shall the guilty fly,
When consternation turns the good man pale?
—Young.

Guilt is the source of sorrow; 'tis the fiend,
The avenging fiend, that follows us behind
With whips and stings. —Rowe.

Let wickedness escape as it may at the bar, it never fails of doing justice upon itself; for every guilty person is his own hangman.—Seneca.

Our sins, like to our shadows, when our day was in its glory, scarce appeared; toward our evening, how great and monstrous!—Suckling.

Thoughts cannot form themselves in words
so horrid
As can express my guilt. —Dryden.

Guilt alone, like brain-sick frenzy in its feverish mood, fills the light air with visionary terrors, and shapeless forms of fear.—Junius.

O, she is fallen
Into a pit of ink, that the wide sea
Hath drops too few to wash her clean again. —Shakespeare.

Every man bears something within him that, if it were publicly announced, would excite feelings of aversion.—Goethe.

Action and care will in time wear down the strongest frame; but guilt and melancholy are poisons of quick despatch.—Thomas Paine.

Let no man trust the first false step of guilt; it hangs upon a precipice, whose steep descent in last perdition ends.—Young.

All good men and women should be on their guard to avoid guilt, and even the suspicion of it.—Plautus.

To what gulfs
A single deviation from the track
Of human duties leads! —Byron.

It is base to filch a purse, daring to embezzle a million, but it is great beyond measure to steal a crown. The sin lessens as the guilt increases.—Schiller.

When guilt is in its blush of infancy, it trembles in a tenderness of shame; and the first eye that pierces through the veil that hides the secret brings it to the face.—Southern.

Guilt has always its horrors and solicitudes; and, to make it yet more shameful and detestable, it is doomed often to stand in awe of those to whom nothing could give influence or weight but their power of betraying.—Johnson.

Fraud and falsehood are his weak and treacherous allies; and he lurks trembling in the dark, dreading every ray of light, lest it should discover him, and give him up to shame and punishment.—Fielding.

He who is conscious of secret and dark designs, which, if known, would blast him, is perpetually shrinking and dodging from public observation, and is afraid of all around him, and much more of all above him.—Wirt.

Guilt was never a rational thing; it distorts all the faculties of the human mind, it perverts them, it leaves a man no longer in the free use of his reason, it puts him into confusion.—Burke.

He swears, but he is sick at heart;
He laughs, but he turns deadly pale;
His restless eye and sudden start—
These tell the dreadful tale
That will be told: it needs no words from thee
Thou self-sold slave to guilt and misery.
—Dana.

Think not that guilt requires the burning torches of the furies to agitate and torment it. Their own frauds, their crimes, their remembrances of the past, their terrors of the future,—these are the domestic furies that are ever present to the mind of the impious.—Robert Hall.

Guilt is a poor, helpless, dependent being. Without the alliance of able, diligent, and let me add, fortunate fraud, it is inevitably undone. If the guilty culprit be obstinately silent, it forms a deadly presumption against him; if he speaks, talking tends only to his discovery, and his very defence often furnishes the materials for his conviction.—Junius.

Guilt, though it may attain temporal splendor, can never confer real happiness; the evil consequences of our crimes long survive their commission, and, like the ghosts of the murdered, forever haunt the steps of the malefactor; while the paths of virtue, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of pleasantness and peace.—Sir Walter Scott.

What we call real estate—the solid ground to build a house on—is the broad foundation on which nearly all the guilt of this world rests.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

They who once engage in iniquitous designs miserably deceive themselves when they think that they will go so far and no farther; one fault begets another, one crime renders another necessary; and thus they are impelled continually downward into a depth of guilt, which at the commencement of their career they would have died rather than have incurred.—Southey.

There is no man so good, that so squares all his thoughts and actions to the laws, that he is not faulty enough to deserve hanging ten times in his life. Nay, and such a one, too, as it were great pity to make away, and very unjust to punish. And such a one there may be, as has no way offended the laws, who nevertheless would not deserve the character of a virtuous man, and that philosophy would justly condemn to be whipped; so unequal and perplexed is this relation.—Montaigne.

H

Habit

Habit is ten times nature.—
Wellington.

Habit, if not resisted, soon becomes necessity.—St. Augustine.

Habit is the nursery of errors.—
Victor Hugo.

Habit is necessary to give power.—
Hazlitt.

Habit is the most imperious of all masters.—Goethe.

Habit is stronger than nature.—
Quintus Curtius Rufus.

Habit is, as it were, a second nature.—Cicero.

Nothing is stronger than habit.—
Ovid.

How use doth breed a habit in a man!—Shakespeare.

Pursuits become habits.—Ovid.

The power of habit is very strong.—
Syrus.

A large part of Christian virtue consists in right habits.—Paley.

Beware of fixing habits in a child.—
Robert Hall.

All habits gather by unseen degrees.—
Dryden.

Habit is a cable. We weave a thread of it every day, and at last we cannot break it.—Horace Mann.

Our second mother, habit, is also a good mother.—Auerbach.

In the great majority of things habit is a greater plague than ever afflicted Egypt.—John Foster.

The chain of habit coils itself around the heart like a serpent, to gnaw and stifle it.—Hazlitt.

Ill habits gather by unseen degrees,
—as brooks make rivers, rivers run to seas.—Dryden.

For use almost can change the stamp of nature.—Shakespeare.

Man yields to custom as he bows to fate,—in all things ruled, mind, body, and estate.—Crabbe.

Unless the habit leads to happiness
the best habit is to contract none.—
Zimmermann.

Habit is altogether too arbitrary a master for me to submit to.—La-
vater.

It is easy to assume a habit; but when you try to cast it off, it will take skin and all.—H. W. Shaw.

Habits are soon assumed; but when we strive to strip them off, 'tis being flayed alive.—Cowper.

It is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors as his knowledge.—Colton.

The chains of habit are generally too small to be felt till they are too strong to be broken.—Johnson.

Habit is the deepest law of human nature.—Carlyle.

Habit, to which all of us are more or less slaves.—La Fontaine.

Every base occupation makes one sharp in its practice and dull in every other.—Sir P. Sidney.

How many unjust and wicked things are done from mere habit.—Terence.

Habit gives endurance, and fatigue is the best night cap.—Kincaid.

Small habits well pursued, betimes,
May reach the dignity of crimes.
—Hannah More.

I will be a slave to no habit: therefore farewell tobacco.—Hosea Ballou.

To learn new habits is everything, for it is to reach the substance of life. Life is but a tissue of habits.—Amiel.

Long customs are not easily broken; he that attempts to change the course of his own life very often labors in vain.—Johnson.

Nothing really pleasant or unpleasant subsists by nature, but all things become so by habit.—Epictetus.

Lord Tenterden, the celebrated judge, expired with these words on his lips, "Gentlemen of the jury, you will now consider your verdict."—Lord Campbell.

If an idiot were to tell you the same story every day for a year, you would end by believing him.—Burke.

Are we not like the actor of old times, who wore his mask so long his face took its likeness?—L. E. Landon.

Vicious habits are so odious and degrading that they transform the individual who practices them into an incarnate demon.—Cicero.

Habits, soft and pliant at first, are like some coral stones, which are easily cut when first quarried, but soon become hard as adamant.—Spurgeon.

That beneficent harness of routine, which enables silly men to live respectably and happy men to live calmly.—George Eliot.

Habit will reconcile us to everything but change, and even to change if it recur not too quickly.—Colton.

I have often found a small stream at its fountain-head, that, when followed up, carried away the camel with his load.—Saadi.

Habits are the daughters of action: but they nurse their mothers, and give birth to daughters after her image, more lovely and prosperous.—Jeremy Taylor.

Acts of virtue ripen into habits; and the goodly and permanent result is the formation or establishment of a virtuous character.—Chalmers.

A single bad habit will mar an otherwise faultless character, as an ink-drop soileth the pure white page.—Hosea Ballou.

Habits are like the wrinkles on a man's brow; if you will smooth out the one, I will smooth out the other.—H. W. Shaw.

Marriage should combat without respite or mercy that monster which devours everything,—habit.—Balzac.

To things which you bear with impatience you should accustom yourself, and, by habit you will bear them well.—Seneca.

Habit with him was all the test of truth; "It must be right: I've done it from my youth."—Crabbe.

My very chains and I grew friends,
So much a long communion tends
To make us what we are; even I Regain'd my freedom with a sigh.
—Byron.

Habit and imitation—there is nothing more perennial in us than these two. They are the source of all working, and all apprenticeship, of all practice, and all learning, in this world.—Thomas Carlyle.

If thou dost still retain the same ill habits, the same follies, too, still thou art bound to vice, and still a slave.—Dryden.

The law of the harvest is to reap more than you sow. Sow an act, and you reap a habit; sow a habit, and you reap a character; sow a character, and you reap a destiny.—G. D. Boardman.

It must be conceded that, after affection, habit has its peculiar value. It is a little stream which flows softly, but freshens everything along its course.—Madame Swetchine.

Habits, though in their commencement like the filmy line of the spider, trembling at every breeze, may in the end prove as links of tempered steel, binding a deathless being to eternal felicity or woe.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The will that yields the first time with some reluctance does so the second time with less hesitation, and the third time with none at all, until presently the habit is adopted.—Henry Giles.

For the honest people, relations increase with the years. For the vicious, inconveniences increase. Inconstancy is the defect of vice; the influence of habit is one of the qualities of virtue.—Madame Necker.

The habit of virtue cannot be formed in a closet. Habits are formed by acts of reason in a persevering struggle through temptation.—Gilpin.

I perceive that the things that we do are silly; but what can one do? According to men's habits and dispositions, so one must yield to them.—Tereuce.

Habit in most cases hardens and encrusts by taking away the keener edge of our sensations: but does it not in others quicken and refine, by giving a mechanical facility and by engraving an acquired sense?—Hazlitt.

Habits are formed, not at one stroke, but gradually and insensibly; so that, unless vigilant care be employed, a great change may come over the character without our being conscious of any.—Whately.

A young man ought to cross his own rules, to awake his vigor, and to keep it from growing faint and rusty. And there is no course of life so weak and sottish as that which is carried on by rule and discipline.—Montaigne.

Make sobriety a habit, and intemperance will be hateful; make prudence a habit, and reckless profligacy will be as contrary to the nature of the child, grown or adult, as the most atrocious crimes are to any of us.—Brougham.

To be perpetually longing and impatiently desirous of anything, so that a man cannot abstain from it, is to lose a man's liberty, and to become a servant of meat and drink, or smoke.—Jeremy Taylor.

Habit is the approximation of the animal system to the organic. It is a confession of failure in the highest function of being, which involves a perpetual self-determination, in full view of all existing circumstances.—Holmes.

I will govern my life and my thoughts as if the whole world were to see the one and to read the other; for what does it signify to make anything a secret to my neighbor, when to God (who is the searcher of our hearts) all our privacies are open?—Seneca.

Vicious habits are so great a stain to human nature, and so odious in themselves, that every person actuated by right reason would avoid them, though he were sure they would be always concealed both from God and man, and had no future punishment entailed upon them.—Cicero.

Habit, if wisely and skillfully formed, becomes truly a second nature, as the common saying is; but unskillfully and unmethodically directed, it will be, as it were, the ape of Nature, which imitates nothing to the life, but only clumsily and awkwardly.—Bacon.

I trust everything, under God, to habit, upon which, in all ages, the lawgiver, as well as the schoolmaster, has mainly placed his reliance,—habit, which makes everything easy, and casts all difficulties upon the deviation from the wonted course.—Lord Brougham.

Like flakes of snow that fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant events of life succeed one another. As the snow gathers together, so are our habits formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change; no single action creates, however it may exhibit, a man's character.—Jeremy Taylor.

And it is a singular truth that, though a man may shake off national habits, accent, manner of thinking, style of dress,—though he may become perfectly identified with another nation, and speak its language well, perhaps better than his own,—yet never can he succeed in changing his handwriting to a foreign style.—Disraeli.

Habit hath so vast a prevalence over the human mind that there is scarce anything too strange or too strong to be asserted of it. The story of the miser who, from long accustoming to cheat others, came at last to cheat himself, and with great delight and triumph picked his own pocket of a guinea to convey to his hoard, is not impossible or improbable.—Fielding.

Give a child the habit of sacredly regarding the truth—of carefully respecting the property of others—of scrupulously abstaining from all acts of improvidence which can involve him in distress, and he will just as likely think of rushing into the element in which he cannot breathe, as of lying or cheating or stealing.—Lord Brougham.

Centres, or centre-pieces of wood, are put by builders under an arch of stone while it is in the process of construction till the key-stone is put in. Just such is the use Satan makes of pleasures to construct evil habits upon; the pleasure lasts till the habit is fully formed; but that done the habit may stand eternal. The pleasures are sent for firewood, and the hell begins in this life.—Coleridge.

If we look back upon the usual course of our feelings, we shall find that we are more influenced by the frequent recurrence of objects than by their weight and importance; and that habit has more force in forming our characters than our opinions have. The mind naturally takes its tone and complexion from what it habitually contemplates.—Robert Hall.

A tendency to resume the same mode of action at stated times is peculiarly the characteristic of the nervous system; and on this account regularity is of great consequence in exercising the moral and intellectual power. All nervous diseases have a marked tendency to observe regular periods; and the natural inclination to sleep at the approach of night is another instance of the same fact.—Dr. Combe.

Hair

Gray hairs are death's blossoms.—Schiller.

When you see fair hair, be pitiful.—George Eliot.

The ungrown glories of his beamy hair.—Addison.

Sweet girl graduates, in their golden hair.—Tennyson.

Robed in the long night of her deep hair.—Tennyson.

Thy fair hair my heart enchained.—Sir Philip Sidney.

Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare.—Pope.

Her luxuriant hair,—it was like the sweep of a swift wing in visions!—Willis.

The robe which curious Nature weaves to hang upon the head.—Decker.

How ill white hairs become a fool and jester!—Shakespeare.

Comb down his hair; look, look! it stands upright.—Shakespeare.

And her sunny locks
Hang on her temples like a golden fleece.
—Shakespeare.

Golden hair, like sunlight streaming
On the marble of her shoulder.
—J. G. Saxe.

I pray thee let me and my fellow have
A hair of the dog that bit us last night.
—John Heywood.

Make false hair, and thatch your poor thin roofs with burthens of the dead.—Shakespeare.

Loose his beard and hoary hair streamed, like a meteor, to the troubled air.—Gray.

For deadly fear can time outgo, and blanch at once the hair.—Sir Walter
Scott.

There seems a life in hair, though it be dead.—Leigh Hunt.

Her hair down-gushing in an armful flows,
And floods her ivory neck, and glitters as she goes. —Allan Cunningham.

Whose every little ringlet thrilled,
as if with soul and passion filled!—
Moore.

The hoary head is a crown of glory
if it be found in the way of righteousness.—Bible.

A large head of hair adds beauty to a good face, and terror to an ugly one.
—Lycurgus.

The glittering tresses which, now shaken loose,
Shower'd gold. —Owen Meredith.

His hair is of a good color,—an excellent color; your chestnut was ever the only color.—Shakespeare.

By common consent gray hairs are a crown of glory: the only object of respect that can never excite envy.—
Bancroft.

Long, glorious locks, which drop upon thy cheek like gold-bued cloudflakes on the rosy morn.—Bailey.

Give me a look, give me a face that makes simplicity a grace—robes loosely flowing, hair as free!—Ben Jonson.

Dear, dead women, with such hair, too—
what's become of all the gold Used to hang and brush their bosoms?
—Robert Browning.

Her hair was not more sunny than her heart, though like a natural golden coronet it circled her dear head with careless art.—Lowell.

The hair is the finest ornament women have. Of old, virgins used to wear it loose, except when they were in mourning.—Luther.

The redundant locks, robustious to no purpose, clustering down—vast monument of strength.—Milton.

An angel face! its sunny "wealth of hair,"
In radiant ripples, bathed the graceful throat
And dimpled shoulders.—Mrs. Osgood.

Her cap of velvet could not hold
The tresses of her hair of gold,
That flowed and floated like the stream,
And fell in masses down her neck.
—Longfellow.

Her hair is bound with myrtle leaves,
(Green leaves upon her golden hair!)
Green grasses through the yellow sheaves
Of autumn corn are not more fair.
—Oscar Wilde.

Come, let me pluck that silver hair
Which 'mid thy clustering curls I see;
The withering type of time or care
Has nothing, sure, to do with thee.
—Alaric Alex. Watts.

Ah, thy beautiful hair! so was it once braided for me, for me;
Now for death is it crowned, only for death, lover and lord of thee.
—Swinburne.

A large bare forehead gives a woman a masculine and defying look. The word "effrontery" comes from it. The hair should be brought over such a forehead as vines are trailed over a wall.—Leigh Hunt.

Her golden locks she roundly did uptie in braided trammels, that no looser hairs did out of order stray about her dainty ears.—Spenser.

Her head was bare, but for her native ornament of hair, which in a simple knot was tied above—sweet negligence, unheeded bait of love!—Dryden.

Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
Sprinkled with perle, and perling flowres atweene,
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre.

—Spenser.

A silver line, that from the brow to the crown,
And in the middle, parts the braided hair,
Just serves to show how delicate a soil
The golden harvest grows in.

—Wordsworth.

Her hair
In ringlets rather dark than fair,
Does down her ivory bosom roll,
And hiding half adorns the whole.

—Prior.

Her locks are plighted like the fleece of wool

That Jason and his Grecian mates achiev'd,
As pure as gold, yet not from gold deriv'd;
As full of sweets as sweet of sweets is full.

—Robert Greene.

Beware of her fair hair, for she excels
All women in the magic of her locks;
And when she winds them round a young man's neck,
She will not ever set him free again.

—Goethe.

Gray hair is beautiful in itself, and so softening to the complexion and so picturesque in its effect that many a woman who has been plain in her youth is, by its beneficent influence, transformed into a handsome woman.
—Miss Oakey.

It was brown with a golden gloss, Janette,
It was finer than silk of the floss, my pet;
'Twas a beautiful mist falling down to your wrist,
'Twas a thing to be braided, and jewelled, and kissed—
'Twas the loveliest hair in the world, my pet.

—Chas. G. Halpine.

God doth bestow that garment, when we die, that, like a soft and silken canopy, is still spread over us. In spite of death, our hair grows in the grave; and that alone looks fresh when all our other beauty's gone.—Decker.

Look on beauty, and you shall see 'tis purchased by the weight; which therein works a miracle in Nature, making them lightest that wear most of it: so are those crisped snaky golden locks which make such wanton gambols with the wind upon supposed fairness, often known to be the dowry of a second head, the skull that bred them in the sepulchre.—Shakespeare.

This nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
Nourish'd two locks, which graceful hung behind

In equal curls, and well conspir'd to deck,
With shining ringlets, the smooth ivory neck.

Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains,
And mighty hearts are held in slender chains,

With hairy springes we the birds betray,
Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey.

—Pope.

Bind up those tresses. O, what love I note
In the fair multitude of those her hairs!
Where but by chance a silver drop hath fallen,

Even to that drop ten thousand wiry friends
Do glue themselves in sociable grief,
Like true, inseparable, faithful loves,
Sticking together in calamity.

—Shakespeare.

Hair is the most delicate and lasting of our materials, and survives us, like love. It is so light, so gentle, so escaping from the idea of death, that, with a lock of hair belonging to a child or friend, we may almost look up to heaven and compare notes with the angelic nature,—may almost say, "I have a piece of thee here not unworthy of thy being now."—Leigh Hunt.

Hand

The mind's only perfect vassal.—Tuckerman.

The hand that gives, gathers.—Eugene Sue.

As expressive as the face.—N. P. Willis.

The white wonder of Juliet's hands.—Shakespeare.

There is no better sign of a brave mind than a hard hand.—Shakespeare.

He who beholds her hand forgets her face.—Mrs. Brooks.

A dazzling white hand, veined cerulean.—Massey.

His noble hand did win what he did spend.—Shakespeare.

My hands are clean, but my heart has somewhat of impurity.—Euripides.

The wise hand does not all the tongue dictates.—Cervantes.

His hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him.—Bible.

I love a hand that meets mine own
With grasp that causes some sensation.
—Mrs. Osgood.

For through the south the custom still commands
The gentleman to kiss the lady's hands.
—Byron.

Even to the delicacy of their hand
There was resemblance such as true blood wears.
—Byron.

Women carry a beautiful hand with them to the grave, when a beautiful face has long ago vanished.—Beaconsfield.

Without the bed her other fair hand was,
On the green coverlet; whose perfect white
Show'd like an April daisy on the grass,
With pearly sweat, resembling dew of night.
—Shakespeare.

Her hand, in whose comparison all whites are ink writing their own reproach, to whose soft seizure the cygnet's down is harsh, and spirit of sense hard as the palm of ploughman! —Shakespeare.

Venerable to me is the hard hand,—crooked, coarse,—wherein, notwithstanding, lies a cunning virtue, indispensably royal as of the sceptre of the planet.—Carlyle.

Neither the naked hand nor the understanding, left to itself, can do much; the work is accomplished by instruments and helps, of which the need is not less for the understanding than the hand.—Bacon.

Other parts of the body assist the speaker, but these speak themselves. By them we ask, we promise, we invoke, we dismiss, we threaten, we entreat, we deprecate; we express fear, joy, grief, our doubts, our assent, our penitence; we show moderation, profusion; we mark number and time.—Quintilian.

I take thy hand, this hand,
As soft as dove's down, and as white as it;
Or Ethiopian's tooth, or the fann'd snow,
That's bolted by the northern blast twice o'er.
—Shakespeare.

The Greeks adored their gods by the simple compliment of kissing their hands; and the Romans were treated as atheists if they would not perform the same act when they entered a temple. This custom, however, as a religious ceremony declined with paganism, but was continued as a salutation by inferiors to their superiors, or as a token of esteem among friends.—Disraeli.

Lavater told Goethe that, on a certain occasion when he held the velvet bag in the church as collector of the offerings, he tried to observe only the hands; and he satisfied himself that in every individual the shape of the hand and of the fingers, the action and sentiment in dropping the gift into the bag, were distinctly different and individually characteristic.—Mrs. Jameson.

'Twas a hand
White, delicate, dimpled, warm, languid,
and bland.
The hand of a woman is often, in youth,
Somewhat rough, somewhat red, somewhat graceless, in truth;
Does its beauty refine, as its pulses grow calm,
Or as sorrow has crossed the life line in the palm?
—Lord Lytton.

There is a hand that has no heart in it, there is a claw or paw, a flipper or fin, a bit of wet cloth to take hold of, a piece of unbaked dough on the cook's trencher, a cold clammy thing we recoil from, or greedy clutch with the heat of sin, which we drop as a burning coal.

What a scale from the talon to the horn of plenty, is this human palm-leaf! Sometimes it is what a knife-shaped, thin-bladed tool we dare not grasp, or like a poisonous thing we shake off, or unclean member, which, white as it may look, we feel polluted by!—C. A. Bartol.

Happiness

The soul's calm sunshine.—Pope.

Happiness is an exotic of celestial birth.—Sheridan.

Happiness is the natural flower of duty.—Phillips Brooks.

Happiness is reflective, like the light of heaven.—Washington Irving.

There is no man but may make his paradise.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Happiness is a rare cosmetic.—G. J. W. Melville.

Every one speaks of it, few know it.—Mme. Roland.

The saddest birds a season find to sing.—Southwell.

He who is good is happy.—Habington.

There are no rules for felicity.—Victor Hugo.

True wisdom is the price of happiness.—Young.

Happiness is unrepented pleasure.—Socrates.

Happiness is a good that Nature sells us.—Voltaire.

Happiness is not perfected until it is shared.—Jane Porter.

Happiness is no laughing matter.—Whately.

They live too long who happiness outlive.—Dryden.

The best happiness will be to escape the worst misery.—George Eliot.

Man is the artificer of his own happiness.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Happiness is an equivalent for all troublesome things.—Epictetus.

Be happy, but be so by piety.—Mme. de Staël.

Happiness seems made to be shared.—Corneille.

Happiness may have but one night, as glory but one day.—Alfred de Musset.

The rays of happiness, like those of light, are colorless when unbroken.—Longfellow.

None are happy but by anticipation of change.—Dr. Johnson.

Happiness lies, first of all, in health.—George William Curtis.

There is in man a higher than love of happiness; he can do without happiness, and instead thereof find blessedness.—Carlyle.

What happiness is there which is not purchased with more or less of pain?—Mrs. Oliphant.

Happiness is where we find it, but very rarely where we seek it.—J. Petit-Senn.

That happiness does still the longest thrive where joys and griefs have turns alternative.—Herrick.

There comes forever something between us and what we deem our happiness.—Byron.

All who joy would win
Must share it—happiness was born a twin.
—Byron.

True happiness ne'er entered at an eye;
True happiness resides in things unseen.
—Young.

Happiness—a good bank account, a good cook, and a good digestion.—Rousseau.

One cannot be fully happy until after his sixtieth year.—Bonstetten.

Fortitude, justice, and candor are very necessary instruments of happiness, but they require time and exertion.—Sydney Smith.

Those who seek for something more than happiness in this world must not complain if happiness is not their portion.—Froude.

Happiness without peace is temporal; peace along with happiness is eternal.—Aughey.

We are never happy: we can only remember that we were so once.—Alexander Smith.

So long as you do not quarrel with sin, you will never be a truly happy man.—J. C. Ryle.

Happiness does away with ugliness, and even makes the beauty of beauty.—Amiel.

The happiest women, like the happiest nations, have no history.—George Eliot.

To be happy is not the purpose for which you are placed in this world.—Froude.

To be strong
Is to be happy! —Longfellow.

We are no longer happy so soon as we wish to be happier.—Landor.

Nothing is more idle than to inquire after happiness, which nature has kindly placed within our reach.—Johnson.

Happiness never lays its finger on its pulse. If we attempt to steal a glimpse of its features it disappears.—Alexander Smith.

Beware what earth calls happiness; beware all joys but joys that never can expire.—Young.

The happiness or unhappiness of men depends no less upon their dispositions than their fortunes.—La Rochefoucauld.

When we reflect on the shortness and uncertainty of life, how despicable seem all our pursuits of happiness.—Hume.

It is no happiness to live long, nor unhappiness to die soon; happy is he that hath lived long enough to die well.—Quarles.

How bitter a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes! —Shakespeare.

Happiness is not the end of duty, it is a constituent of it. It is in it and of it; not an equivalent, but an element.—Henry Giles.

Happiness is always the inaccessible castle which sinks in ruin when we set foot on it.—Arsène Houssaye.

Our happiness in this world depends on the affections we are enabled to inspire.—Duchesse de Praslin.

Human happiness depends mainly upon the improvement of small opportunities.—J. L. Basford.

No one can be said to be happy until he is dead.—Solon.

Happiness is neither within us nor without us, it is the union of ourselves with God.—Pascal.

To be happy is not the purpose of our being, but to deserve happiness.—Fichte.

Real happiness is cheap enough, yet how dearly we pay for its counterfeit! —Hosea Ballou.

The sunshine of life is made up of very little beams, that are bright all the time.—Aikin.

If we cannot live so as to be happy, let us at least live so as to deserve happiness.—Fichte.

We are never so happy, nor so unhappy, as we suppose ourselves to be.—La Rochefoucauld.

Happiness grows at our own firesides, and is not to be picked in strangers' gardens.—Douglas Jerrold

He who has no wish to be happier is the happiest of men.—W. R. Alger.

There must be some mixture of happiness in everything but sin.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The highest happiness, the purest joys of life, wear out at last.—Goethe.

Happiness is no other than soundness and perfection of mind.—Antoninus.

I have enjoyed earthly happiness,
I have lived and loved.—Schiller.

Domestic happiness, thou only bliss
Of paradise that hast survived the fall!
—Cowper.

He that upon a true principle lives, without any disquiet of thought, may be said to be happy.—L'Estrange.

Nature has granted to all to be happy, if we did but know how to use her benefits.—Claudian.

True happiness (if understood)
Consists alone in doing good.
—Thomson.

Beware what earth calls happiness; beware all joys that never can expire.—Young.

In my opinion it is the happy living, and not, as Antisthenes said, the happy dying, in which human happiness consists.—Montaigne.

Happiness is a sunbeam, which may pass through a thousand bosoms without losing a particle of its original ray.—Sir P. Sidney.

The happiness of the tender heart is increased by what it can take away from the wretchedness of others.—J. Petit-Senn.

Happiness and virtue react upon each other—the best are not only the happiest, but the happiest are usually the best.—Lytton.

The happiness of the human race in this world does not consist in our being devoid of passions, but in our learning to command them.—From the French.

I earn that I eat, get that I wear; owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good, content with my harm.—Shakespeare.

Happiness and misery are the names of two extremes, the utmost bounds whereof we know not.—Locke.

Hunting after happiness is like hunting after a lost sheep in the wilderness—when you find it, the chances are that it is a skeleton.—H. W. Shaw.

Happiness is that single and glorious thing which is the very light and sun of the whole animated universe; and where she is not it were better that nothing should be.—Colton.

Happiness is only to be found in a recurrence to the principles of human nature; and these will prompt very simple measures.—Beaconsfield.

It is quite easy for stupid people to be happy; they believe in fables, and they trot on in a beaten track like a horse on a tramway.—Ouida.

The nearest we can come to perfect happiness is to cheat ourselves with the belief that we have got it.—H. W. Shaw.

A sound mind in a sound body is a short but full description of a happy state in this world.—Locke.

Happiness is in taste and not in things; and it is by having what we love that we are happy, not by having what others find agreeable.—Rochefoucauld.

The body is like a piano, and happiness is like music. It is needful to have the instrument in good order.—Beecher.

You traverse the world in search of happiness, which is within the reach of every man; a contented mind confers it on all.—Horace.

Happiness has no limits, because God has neither bottom nor bounds, and because happiness is nothing but the conquest of God through love.—Amiel.

That state of life is most happy where superfluities are not required and necessities are not wanting.—Plutarch.

It is ever thus with happiness;
It is the gay to-morrow of the mind,
That never comes. —Proctor.

Degrees of happiness vary according to the degrees of virtue, and consequently, that life which is most virtuous is most happy.—Norris.

Happiness is the fine and gentle rain which penetrates the soul, but which afterwards gushes forth in springs of tears.—Maurice de Guérin.

Wouldst thou ever roam abroad? See, what is good lies by thy side. Only learn to catch happiness, for happiness is ever by you.—Goethe.

We take greater pains to persuade others that we are happy than in endeavoring to think so ourselves.—Confucius.

Brethren, happiness is not our being's end and aim. The Christian's aim is perfection, not happiness; and every one of the sons of God must have something of that spirit which marked his Master.—F. W. Robertson.

Terrestrial happiness is of short duration. The brightness of the flame is wasting its fuel; the fragrant flower is passing away in its own odors.—Dr. Johnson.

The great blessings of mankind are within us, and within our reach, but we shut our eyes, and, like people in the dark, we fall foul upon the very thing we search for, without finding it.—Seneca.

If the chief part of human happiness arises from the consciousness of being beloved, as I believe it does, these sudden changes of fortune seldom contribute much to happiness.—Adam Smith.

All mankind are happier for having been happy; so that, if you make them happy now, you make them happy twenty years hence by the memory of it.—Sydney Smith.

So endless and exorbitant are the desires of men that they will grasp at all, and can form no scheme of perfect happiness with less.—Swift.

Happy! Who is happy? Was there not a serpent in Paradise itself? And if Eve had been perfectly happy beforehand, would she have listened to the tempter?—Thackeray.

The common course of things is in favor of happiness; happiness is the rule, misery the exception. Were the order reversed, our attention would be called to examples of health and competency, instead of disease and want.—Paley.

It is a great truth, wonderful as it is undeniable, that all our happiness—temporal, spiritual and eternal—consists in one thing; namely, in resigning ourselves to God, and in leaving ourselves with Him, to do with us and in us just as He pleases.—Madame Guyon.

True happiness is of a retired nature, and an enemy to pomp and noise. It arises, in the first place, from the enjoyment of one's self, and, in the next, from the friendship and conversation of a few select friends.—Addison.

Happiness is a roadside flower growing on the highways of usefulness; plucked, it shall wither in thy hand; passed by, it is fragrance to thy spirit. Trample the thyme beneath thy feet; be useful, be happy.—Tupper.

The sweetest bird builds near the ground,
The loveliest flower springs low;
And we must stoop for happiness
If we its worth would know.—Swain.

When we are not too anxious about happiness and unhappiness, but devote ourselves to the strict and unsparing performance of duty, then happiness comes of itself—nay, even springs from the midst of a life of troubles and anxieties and privations.—Humboldt.

Alas! if the principles of contentment are not within us—the height of station and worldly grandeur will as soon add a cubit to a man's stature as to his happiness.—Sterne.

Happiness in this world, when it comes, comes incidentally. Make it the object of pursuit, and it leads us a wild-goose chase, and is never attained.—Hawthorne.

There is a gentle element, and man may breathe it with a calm, unruffled soul, and drink its living waters, till his heart is pure; and this is human happiness.—Willis.

Happiness and comfort stream immediately from God himself, as light issues from the sun; and sometimes looks and darts itself into the meanest corners, while it forbears to visit the largest and the noblest rooms.—Aughhey.

The most happy women within their homes are those who have married sensible men. The latter suffer themselves to be governed with so much the more pleasure, as they are always masters of themselves.—Prince de Ligne.

In the soul, when the supreme faculties move regularly, the inferior passions and faculties following, there arises a serenity infinitely beyond the highest quintessence of worldly delight.—South.

There is something more awful in happiness than in sorrow—the latter being earthly and finite, the former composed of the substance and texture of eternity, so that spirits still embodied may well tremble at it.—Hawthorne.

To be happy is not only to be freed from the pains and diseases of the body, but from anxiety and vexation of spirit; not only to enjoy the pleasures of sense, but peace of conscience and tranquillity of mind.—Tillotson.

Priestly was the first (unless it was Beccaria) who taught my lips to pronounce this sacred truth—that the greatest happiness of the greatest number is the foundation of morals and legislation.—Bentham.

Youth is too tumultuous for felicity; old age too insecure for happiness. The period most favorable to enjoyment, in a vigorous, fortunate, and generous life, is that between forty and sixty. Life culminates at sixty.—Bovee.

So scanty is our present allowance of happiness that in many situations life could scarcely be supported if hope were not allowed to relieve the present hour by pleasures borrowed from the future.—Johnson.

Without strong affection, and humanity of heart, and gratitude to that Being whose code is mercy, and whose great attribute is benevolence to all things that breathe, true happiness can never be attained.—Dickens.

It is something to look upon enjoyment, so that it be free and wild, and in the face of Nature, though it be but the enjoyment of an idiot. It is something to know that Heaven has left the capacity of gladness in such a creature's breast.—Dickens.

If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast this jewel lies,
And they are fools who roam;
The world has nothing to bestow,
From our own selves our bliss must flow,
And that dear hut—our home.
—Nathaniel Cotton.

I have lived to know that the great secret of human happiness is this: Never suffer your energies to stagnate. The old adage of "too many irons in the fire," conveys an untruth—you cannot have too many—poker, tongs—and all, keep them going.—Adam Clark.

The haunts of happiness are varied and rather unaccountable, but I have more often seen her among little children, and home firesides, and in country houses, than anywhere else—at least, I think so.—Sydney Smith.

Perfect happiness, I believe, was never intended by the Deity to be the lot of one of His creatures in this world; but that He has very much put in our power the nearness of our approaches to it, is what I have steadfastly believed.—Jefferson.

It's no' in books, it's no' in lea',
To make us truly blest;
If happiness has not her seat
And center in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest. —Burns.

The utmost we can hope for in this world is contentment; if we aim at anything higher, we shall meet with nothing but grief and disappointment. A man should direct all his studies and endeavors at making himself easy now and happy hereafter.—Addison.

The happiness of life is made up of minute fractions—the little, soon-forgotten charities of a kiss, a smile, a kind look, a heartfelt compliment in the disguise of a playful raillery, and the countless other infinitesimals of pleasant thought and feeling.—Coleridge.

I opened the doors of my heart.
And behold,
There was music within and a song,
And echoes did feed on the sweetness, repeating it long.
I opened the doors of my heart. And behold,
There was music that played itself out in æolian notes:
Then was heard, as a far-away bell at long intervals tolled. —Jean Ingelow.

God loves to see His creatures happy; our lawful delight is His; they know not God that think to please Him with making themselves miserable. The idolaters thought it a fit service for Baal to cut and lance themselves; never any holy man looked for thanks from the true God by wronging himself.—Bishop Hall.

Hume's doctrine was that the circumstances vary, the amount of happiness does not; that the beggar cracking fleas in the sunshine under a hedge, and the duke rolling by in his chariot, the girl equipped for her first ball, and the orator returning triumphant from the debate, had different means, but the same quantity of pleasant excitement.—Emerson.

Every human soul has the germ of some flowers within; and they would open, if they could only find sunshine and free air to expand in. I always told you that not having enough of sunshine was what ailed the world. Make people happy, and there will not be half the quarreling, or a tenth part of the wickedness there is.—Mrs. Child.

The happiness of life consists, like the day, not in single flashes of light, but in one continuous mild serenity. The most beautiful period of the heart's existence is in this calm, equitable light, even although it be only moonshine or twilight. Now the mind alone can obtain for us this heavenly cheerfulness and peace.—Richter.

Happiness no more depends on station, rank, or any local or adventitious circumstances in individuals than a man's life is connected with the color of his garment. The mind is the seat of happiness, and to make it so in reality, nothing is necessary but the balm of gospel peace and the saving knowledge of the Son of God.—

Happiness is much more equally divided than some of us imagine. One man shall possess most of the materials, but little of the thing; another may possess much of the thing, but very few of the materials. In this particular view of it, happiness has been beautifully compared to the man in the desert—he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.—Colton.

No mockery in this world ever sounds to me so hollow as that of being told to cultivate happiness. Happiness is not a potato, to be planted in a mould and tilled with manure. Happiness is a glory shining far down upon us from heaven. She is a divine dew, which the soul feels dropping upon it from the amaranth bloom and golden fruitage of paradise.—

Charlotte Brontë.

Harlot

'Tis the strumpet's plague
To beguile many, and be beguiled by one.
—Shaftesbury.

She weaves the winding-sheets of souls,
and lays
Them in the urn of everlasting death.
—Pollok.

Harmony

Variety is the condition of harmony.
—James Freeman Clarke.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in Man.
—Dryden.

Harmonious words render ordinary ideas acceptable; less ordinary, pleasant; novel and ingenious ones, delightful. As pictures and statues, and living beauty, too, show better by music-light, so is poetry irradiated, vivified, glorified, and raised into immortal life
by harmony.—Landor.

Harvest

Nature's bank-dividends.—Halibur-
ton.

And thus of all my harvest-hope I have Nought reaped but a weedy crop of care.
—Spenser.

To glean the broken ears after the man
That the main harvest reaps.
—Shakespeare.

Our rural ancestors, with little blest,
Patient of labor when the end was rest, Indulg'd the day that hous'd their annual grain,
With feasts, and offerings, and a thankful strain.
—Pope.

Fancy with prophetic glance
Sees the teeming months advance;
The field, the forest, green and gay;
The dappled slope, the tedded hay;
Sees the reddening orchard blow,
The harvest wave, the vintage flow.
—Warton.

Think, oh, grateful, think!
How good the God of Harvest is to you;
Who pours abundance o'er your flowing fields.
—Thomson.

The plump swain at evening bringing home four months' sunshine bound in sheaves.—Lowell.

The feast is such as earth, the general
mother,
Pours from her fairest bosom, when she smiles,
In the embrace of autumn. —Shelley.

For now, the corn house filled, the harvest
home,
Th' invited neighbors to the husking come;
A frolic scene, where work and mirth and play
Unite their charms to cheer the hours away. —Joel Barlow.

The harvest treasures all Now gather'd in, beyond the rage of storms,
Sure to the swain; the circling fence shut up;
And instant winter's utmost rage defy'd.
While loose to festive joy, the country
round
Laughs with the loud sincerity of mirth,
Shook to the wind their cares.
—Thomson.

Glowing scene!
Nature's long holiday! luxuriant—rich,
In her proud progeny, she smiling marks
Their graces, now mature, and wonder fraught!
Hail! season exquisite!—and hail ye sons
Of rural toil!—ye blooming daughters! ye
Who, in the lap of hardy labor rear'd,
Enjoy the mind unspotted.
—Mary Robinson.

Harvest Home

Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks,
And look well to thy herds:
For riches are not forever;
And doth the crown endure unto all generations?
The hay is carried, and the tender grass
showeth itself,
And the herbs of the mountain are gathered in.
The lambs are for thy clothing,
And the goats are the price of the field:
And there will be goat's milk enough for thy food,
For the food of thy household;
And maintenance for thy maidens.
—Bible.

The husbandman is close to the heart of nature, lives in touch with God, and so, more than many, shares His deep content, His tranquillity, and builds up a character of hardy independence, of kindly considerateness for His servants, and of helpful ministry to the poor.—John Clifford, D. D.

As clouds and rain, crashing thunder storms, and the chill airs of many a night all contribute to the wealth and ripeness and glory of harvest, so do pain and sorrow and death ripen the human soul for the "harvest home" of eternal rest.—Presbyterian Witness.

Believe in God, believe in nature, and do your duty; and the farm life, with its regular round of duties, its simple loves, its high thoughts, its wise economies, its immediate touch of earth, its charming gossip, its pleasant human interests, and its many windows through which we may catch sight of the face of God, will yield us all we need for a simple, manly, godly life.—John Clifford, D. D.

The farmer is ever a man of faith. Were he not a firm believer in what he has not seen he would not turn a furrow or sow a grain. Why should he believe in a morrow, in a coming summer or autumn; in springtime or harvest, in growth or ripening? It is all of faith, whether we will or no. The harvest is God's testimony that He is the rewarder of them that diligently work with Him.—Presbyterian Witness.

So the seed was sown and the harvest came; and though four thousand times the tender grain has sprung up from the soil, that pledge has never once been violated. The harvest fields form the tawny ocean which flows uninterruptedly from the diluvian age to this. And this is evident: that it is to the covenant faithfulness of God that we are indebted for the harvests of each year. Let that stand as the one first general condition of the harvest.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

Growth is completed. The fields are at rest, and their green is bordered with russet and gold. The apple-trees are laden with fruit worthy of Eden and reminding one of the forfeited home of the fallen race. Paradise is not wholly gone; rich morsels of precious fruitage still reward the man of well-directed toil. Its flowers bloom for us in summer; its fruits ripen for us in these luscious September days; its fragrance still lingers on the soft wings of the breeze that dances lightly over the fields which the Lord hath blest.—Presbyterian Witness.

On earth we sang harvest-songs as the wheat came into the barn and the barracks were filled; you know there is no such time on a farm as when they get the crops in; and so in heaven it will be a harvest-song on the part of those who on earth sowed in tears and reaped in joy. Angels shout all through the heavens, and multitudes come down the hills crying, "Harvest-home! harvest-home!"—T. De Witt Talmage.

Do not despise your work. Do it well. Be a whole man to it while you are at it. Israel's great men did not think it beneath them to inspect their flocks. The patriarchs were shepherds and cultivators of the soil. Job was a shepherd. Moses was a shepherd. David looked well after his flocks. Gideon was accosted by God when he was threshing wheat. A great and noble life does not depend on rank or place, but on purpose, faith, love, character and service.—John Clifford, D. D.

The year's food only is grown in the year. Each year the world depends for subsistence upon something freshly given it which it cannot provide for itself. As the harvest approaches the wolf is at the door. Nothing stands between us and starvation but the harvest covenant of the ever-faithful God "seed-time and harvest shall not cease." Away, then, with our fancied independence! Our breath is in our nostrils. Back again to old-time simple dependence on the covenant-keeping God—back to the arms of our Father! We pray in the line of the harvest covenant when we say, "Give us this day our daily bread."—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

When the season has become pronounced and settled there is a ripeness in everything. The leaves die and the fruit falls; they die and drop because they have run their course. They tell of completeness and perfection as well as of decay. We are thoughtful, but yet not sad. Autumn wears no weeds in coming to the goal. Her robes of red and gold are put on—a sort of royal attire. It is the crowning of the year.—Zion's Herald.

So the life of agricultural industry has better guaranties than the crowns of kings. Husbandry is more secure than the treasures of the great. Nature is exhaustlessly reproductive. Let men have free access to and free use of it, and its cultivation will be a sure source of support for the family and a source of progress for the nation. "He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread." Mother Earth cares for her children. The landscape of the farm is full of divine feeling and rich in suggestions that inspire calm and quicken industry. It throbs with the tender heart of God. It is alive. In its simple and steady processes it reveals the Father's care for His children.—John Clifford, D. D.

The "harvest home" we sing with cheer,
Now that abundance crowns the year;
The God of harvests now we praise,
To Him our thanks a tribute raise;
For He our anxious care relieves
While reapers home come bringing sheaves,
Till filled are cellars, barns, and bin,
With harvests which are gathered in.
—J. Byington Smith.

Place what value we will on the productiveness of nature, on the regularity, constancy, of the seasons, these things are worthless of themselves. The fact is, man's food will not come to him of itself. It is a peculiarity of all the cereals that they are never found growing wild; they cannot spring up spontaneously. Further, and curiously, they cannot prolong their existence without the care of man; they are never self-sown. A neglected field of wheat or corn may in the first year produce a few scattered stalks of half-filled ears; but soon even these disappear, and a few summers will suffice to obliterate every trace of grain. Thus undoubtedly is the sentence executed, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Life depends on labor—here we have the other condition of the harvest. Man may sow and man may water, but God alone gives the increase. But equally true is it that unless man plants and plows and reaps, seed-time and harvest avail him nothing.—Presbyterian Witness.

In language so clear that the unlearned and the young can understand, the Saviour, in the parable of the wheat and the tares, shows that all along the journey of life mankind are sowing seed of some kind, which at the end of life is going to produce a harvest, the sure outcome of the kind of seed sown. Nature is inflexible in certain results, founded and fixed by the great Creator of nature and her laws. What the farmer sows he will be sure to reap. Never yet since the world began have men gathered grapes from a bush of thorn, or figs from a tuft of thistles. And every one throughout Christendom who is old enough and intelligent enough to read the Bible must know and understand that he occupies the place of a sower who will ultimately reap whatever is sown in the heart as to religious or irreligious belief, as to faith in Christ as a Redeemer, or as to indifference concerning the final condition of the soul.—Christian at Work.

Haste

Haste is of the devil.—Koran.

All haste implies weakness.—George MacDonald.

Hurry is only admissible in catching flies.—Haliburton.

Haste is always ungraceful.—Lady Blessington.

Hurry and cunning are the two apprentices of despatch and skill; but neither of them ever learns his master's trade.—Colton.

Manners require time, as nothing is more vulgar than haste.—Emerson.

Raw Haste, half-sister to Delay.—Tennyson.

Wisely, and slow; they stumble that run fast.—Shakespeare.

Men love in haste, but they detest at leisure.—Byron.

The more haste, ever the worst speed.—Churchill.

Haste is needful in a desperate case.—Shakespeare.

Error is ever the sequence of haste.—Wellington.

Farewell; and let your haste commend your duty.—Shakespeare.

Modern wisdom plucks me from overcredulous haste.—Shakespeare.

Haste trips up its own heels, fetters and stops itself.—Seneca.

Celerity is never more admired Than by the negligent.—Shakespeare.

Stand not upon the order of your going, But go at once.—Shakespeare.

Hasten slowly, and without losing heart put your work twenty times upon the anvil.—Boileau.

It is of no use running; to set out betimes is the main point.—La Fontaine.

Though I am always in haste, I am never in a hurry.—John Wesley.

He tires betimes that spurs too fast betimes; With eager feeding food doth choke the feeder.—Shakespeare.

Haste and rashness are storms and tempests, breaking and wrecking business; but nimbleness is a full, fair wind, blowing it with speed to haven.—Fuller.

Sir Amyas Pawlet, when he saw too much haste made in any matter, was wont to say, "Stay awhile, that we may make an end the sooner."—Bacon.

Fraud and deceit are ever in a hurry. Take time for all things. Great haste makes great waste.—Franklin.

Whoever is in a hurry shows that the thing he is about is too big for him. Haste and hurry are very different things.—Chesterfield.

We are in hot haste to set the world right and to order all affairs; the Lord hath the leisure of conscious power and unerring wisdom, and it will be well for us to learn to wait.—Spurgeon.

Haste turns usually upon a matter of ten minutes too late, and may be avoided by a habit like that of Lord Nelson, to which he ascribed his success in life, of being ten minutes too early.—Bovee.

Hate — Hatred

The madness of the heart.—Byron.

Hatred is self-punishment.—Hosea Ballou.

The heart gnawing on itself.—Mme. du Deffand.

Hatred is blind as well as love.—Plutarch.

People hate, as they love, unreasonably.—Thackeray.

Hatred is stronger than friendship.—Rochefoucauld.

Men love in haste, but they detest at leisure.—Byron.

Take care that no one hates you justly.—Syrus.

I do hate him as I hate the devil.—Ben Jonson.

I like a good hater.—Samuel Johnson.

Men hate those to whom they have to lie.—Victor Hugo.

No man hates him at whom he can laugh.—Dr. Johnson.

Hatred is blind, as well as love.—
Plutarch.

Hatred is a settled anger.—Cicero.

There are no eyes so sharp as the eyes of hatred.—George S. Hillard.

When our hatred is too keen it places us beneath those we hate.—La Rochefoucauld.

The hatred of persons related to each other is the most violent.—
Tacitus.

He, who would free from malice pass his days,
Must live obscure, and never merit praise.
—Gay.

Offend her, and she knows not to forgive;
Oblige her, and she'll hate you while you live. —Pope.

Hate furroweth the brow, and a man may frown till he hateth.—Tupper.

Heaven has no rage like love to hatred
turn'd,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorn'd.
—Congreve.

It is the nature of the human disposition to hate him whom you have injured.—Tacitus.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.—Bible.

Hatred is active, and envy passive disgust; there is but one step from envy to hate.—Goethe.

Hate no one—hate their vices, not themselves.—Brainard.

The passion of hatred is so durable and so inveterate that the surest prognostic of death in a sick man is a wish for reconciliation.—Bruyère.

Plutarch says very finely that a man should not allow himself to hate even his enemies.—Addison.

Hatred is keener than friendship,
less keen than love.—Vauvenargues.

The greatest hatred, like the greatest virtue and the worst dogs, is quiet.—
Richter.

The hatred we bear our enemies injures their happiness less than our own.—J. Petit-Senn.

Never can true reconciliation grow
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierc'd so deep. —Milton.

Life is too short to spare an hour of it in the indulgence of this evil passion.
—Lamartine.

There are glances of hatred that stab and raise no cry of murder.—
George Eliot.

Hate is like fire; it makes even light rubbish deadly.—George Eliot.

Hatred itself may be a praiseworthy emotion if provoked in us by a lively love of good.—Joubert.

Hate belongs with sin. If we do a wrong, we hate either the thing or God, or ourselves, or somebody else.—
Duffield.

The hate which we all bear with the most Christian patience is the hate of those who envy us.—Colton.

Hatred does not cease by hatred at any time; hatred ceases by love; this is an old rule.—Buddha.

There is no faculty of the human soul so persistent and universal as that of hatred.—Henry Ward
Beecher.

Hatred is the vice of narrow souls;
they feed it with all their littlenesses, and make it the pretext of base
tyrannies.—Balzac.

We hate some persons because we do not know them; and we will not know them because we hate them.—
Colton.

I will tell you what to hate. Hate hypocrisy, hate cant, hate indolence oppression, injustice; hate Pharisaism; hate them as Christ hated them—with a deep, living, godlike hatred.—F. W. Robertson.

To be deprived of the person we love is a happiness in comparison to living with one we hate.—La Bruyère.

Were one to ask me in which direction I think man strongest, I should say, his capacity to hate.—Beecher.

National hatred is something peculiar. You will always find it strongest and most violent in the lowest degree of culture.—Goethe.

To harbor hatred and animosity in the soul makes one irritable, gloomy, and prematurely old.—Auerbach.

A woman's head is always influenced by her heart; but a man's heart is always influenced by his head.—Lady Blessington.

Hatred is nearly always honest—rarely, if ever, assumed. So much cannot be said for love.—Ninon de Lenclos.

How apt nature is, even in those who profess an eminence in holiness, to raise and maintain animosities against those whose calling or person they pretend to find cause to dislike!—Bishop Hall.

We are told to walk noiselessly through the world, that we may waken neither hatred nor envy; but, alas! what can we do when they never sleep!—J. Petit-Senn.

All men naturally hate one another. I hold it a fact, that if men knew exactly what one says of the other, there would not be four friends in the world.—Pascal.

If you hate your enemies, you will contract such a vicious habit of mind, as by degrees will break out upon those who are your friends, or those who are indifferent to you.—Plutarch.

Hannah More said to Horace Walpole: "If I wanted to punish an enemy, it should be by fastening on him the trouble of constantly hating somebody."—John Bate.

They did not know how hate can burn
In hearts once changed from soft to stern;
Nor all the false and fatal zeal
The convert of revenge can feel.—Byron.

Had I power, I should
Pour the sweet milk of concord into hell.
Up roar the universal peace, confound
All unity on earth.—Shakespeare.

There was a laughing devil in his sneer,
That rais'd emotions both of rage and fear;
And where his frown of hatred darkly fell,
Hope withering fled, and mercy sigh'd
farewell.—Byron.

Love is rarely a hypocrite; but hate—how detect and how guard against it! It lurks where you least expect it; it is created by causes that you can the least foresee; and civilization multiplies its varieties, whilst it favors its disguise.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I see thou art implacable, more deaf
To pray's than winds and seas. Yet winds to seas
Are reconcil'd at length, and sea to shore:
Thy anger, unappeasable, still rages
Eternal tempest never to be calm'd.
—Milton.

Hate is of all things the mightiest divider, nay, is division itself. To couple hatred, therefore, though wedlock try all her golden links, and borrow to her aid all the iron manacles and fetters of law, it does but seek to twist a rope of sand.—Milton.

Hawthorn

The hawthorn trees blow in the dew of the morning.—Burns.

And every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
—Milton.

Yet, all beneath the unrivall'd rose,
The lowly daisy sweetly blows;
Tho' large the forest's monarch throws
His army shade,
Yet green the juicy hawthorn grows,
Adown the glade.
—Burns

Then sing by turns, by turns the Muses
sing;
Now hawthorns blossom. —Pope.

Head

The head has the most beautiful appearance, as well as the highest station, in a human figure.—Addison.

Their heads sometimes so little, that there is no room for wit; sometimes so long, that there is no wit for so much room.—T. Fuller.

After all, the head only reproduces what the heart creates; and so we give the mocking-bird credit when he imitates the loving murmurs of the dove.—G. J. W. Melville.

Some people carry their hearts in their heads; very many carry their heads in their hearts. The difficulty is to keep them apart, yet both actively working together.—Hare.

Health

Health is the vital principle of bliss.—Thomson.

For life is not to live, but to be well.—Martial.

Health consists with temperance alone.—Pope.

Health and cheerfulness make beauty.—Cervantes.

Thou chiefest good,
Bestow'd by heaven, but seldom understood. —Lucan.

Be sober and temperate, and you will be healthy.—B. Franklin.

Preserving the health by too strict a regimen is a wearisome malady.—La Rochefoucauld.

He who has health has hope, and he who has hope has everything.—Arabian Proverb.

Christ's gospel could never have been delivered by one who was diseased.—John McC. Holmes.

Physic, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of exercise and temperance.—Addison.

What a searching preacher of self-command is the varying phenomenon of health!—Emerson.

From labor health, from health contentment springs.—Beattie.

Health lies in labor, and there is no royal road to it but through toil.—Wendell Phillips.

Gold that buys health can never be ill spent.
Nor hours laid out in harmless merriment. —John Webster.

Health and cheerfulness mutually beget each other.—Addison.

Health and good humor are to the human body like sunshine to vegetation.—Massillon.

In these days half our diseases come from neglect of the body in overwork of the brain.—Lytton.

There is no health; physicians say that we, at best, enjoy but neutrality.—Donne.

Health is the second blessing that we mortals are capable of: a blessing that money cannot buy.—Izaak Walton.

The only way for a rich man to be healthy is, by exercise and abstinence, to live as if he was poor.—Sir W. Temple.

A sound mind in a sound body, if the former be the glory of the latter, the latter is indispensable to the former.—Edwards.

Health is the greatest of all possessions, and it is a maxim with me that a hale cobbler is a better man than a sick king.—Bickerstaff.

The fate of a nation has often depended on the good or bad digestion of a prime minister.—Voltaire.

Gardening, or husbandry, and working in wood, are healthy recreations.—Locke.

The surest road to health, say what they will,
Is never to suppose we shall be ill.
—Churchill.

Health is the soul that animates all enjoyments of life, which fade and are tasteless, if not dead, without it.—Sir W. Temple.

In health there is liberty. Health is the first of all liberties, and happiness gives us the energy which is the basis of health.—Amiel.

Look to your health; and if you have it, praise God, and value it next to a good conscience.—Izaak Walton.

Reason's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense, lie in three words—health, peace, and competence.—Pope.

The root of sanctity is sanity. A man must be healthy before he can be holy. We bathe first, and then perfume.—Mme. Swetchine.

The requirements of health, and the style of female attire which custom enjoins are in direct antagonism to each other.—Abba Gould Woolson.

Infirmary and sickness may excite our pity; but desire and pleasure require the bloom and vigor of health.—Rousseau.

Health is so necessary to all the duties as well as pleasures of life that the crime of squandering it is equal to the folly.—Dr. Johnson.

Physic is of little use to a temperate person, for a man's own observation on what he finds does him good, and what hurts him is the best physic to preserve health.—Bacon.

In the present day, and especially among women, one would almost suppose that health was a state of unnatural existence.—Beaconsfield.

People who are always taking care of their health are like misers, who are hoarding a treasure which they have never spirit enough to enjoy.—Sterne.

The common ingredients of health and long life are:

Great temperance, open air,
Easy labor, little care. —Sir P. Sidney.

One means very effectual for the preservation of health is a quiet and cheerful mind, not afflicted with violent passions or distracted with immoderate cares.—John Ray.

Nor love, nor honor, wealth, nor power,
Can give the heart a cheerful hour
When health is lost. Be timely wise;
With health all taste of pleasure flies.
—Gay.

Refuse to be ill. Never tell people you are ill; never own it to yourself. Illness is one of those things which a man should resist on principle at the onset.—Lytton.

In our natural body every part has a necessary sympathy with every other; and all together form, by their harmonious conspiracy, a healthy whole.—Sir W. Hamilton.

The healthy know not of their health, but only the sick; this is the physician's aphorism, and applicable in a far wider sense than he gives it.—Carlyle.

He who overlooks a healthy spot for the site of his house is mad and ought to be handed over to the care of his relations and friends.—Varro.

The first wealth is health. Sickness is poor-spirited, and cannot serve any one; it must husband its resources to live. But health or fullness answers its own ends, and has to spare, runs over, and inundates the neighborhoods and creeks of other men's necessities.—Emerson.

Anguish of mind has driven thousands to suicide; anguish of body, none. This proves that the health of the mind is of far more consequence to our happiness than the health of the body, although both are deserving of much more attention than either of them receives.—Colton.

O blessed health! thou art above all gold and treasure; 'tis thou who enlargest the soul, and openest all its powers to receive instruction, and to relish virtue. He that has thee has little more to wish for, and he that is so wretched as to want thee, wants everything with thee.—Sterne.

Every man that has felt pain knows how little all other comforts can gladden him to whom health is denied. Yet who is there does not sometimes hazard it for the enjoyment of an hour?—Dr. Johnson.

Adam knew no disease so long as temperance from the forbidden fruit secured him. Nature was his physician; and innocence and abstinence would have kept him healthful to immortality.—South.

The morbid states of health, the irritableness of disposition arising from unstrung nerves, the impatience, the crossness, the fault-finding of men, who, full of morbid influences, are unhappy themselves, and throw the cloud of their troubles like a dark shadow upon others, teach us what eminent duty there is in health.—Beecher.

There are three wicks you know to the lamp of a man's life: brain, blood, and breath. Press the brain a little, its light goes out, followed by both the others. Stop the heart a minute, and out go all three of the wicks. Choke the air out of the lungs, and presently the fluid ceases to supply the other centers of flame, and all is soon stagnation, cold, and darkness.—O. W. Holmes.

Be it remembered that man subsists upon the air more than upon his meat and drink; but no one can exist for an hour without a copious supply of air. The atmosphere which some breathe is contaminated and adulterated, and with its vital principles so diminished that it cannot fully decarbonize the blood, nor fully excite the nervous system.—Thackeray.

There is this difference between those two temporal blessings, health and money: Money is the most envied, but the least enjoyed; health is the most enjoyed, but the least envied; and this superiority of the latter is still more obvious when we reflect that the poorest man would not part with health for money, but that the richest would gladly part with all their money for health.—Colton.

Men that look no further than their outsides, think health an appurtenance unto life, and quarrel with their constitutions for being sick; but I that have examined the parts of man, and know upon what tender filaments that fabric hangs, do wonder that we are not always so; and considering the thousand doors that lead to death, do thank my God that we can die but once.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Health is certainly more valuable than money; because it is by health that money is procured; but thousands and millions are of small avail to alleviate the protracted tortures of the gout, to repair the broken organs of sense, or resuscitate the powers of digestion. Poverty is, indeed, an evil from which we naturally fly, but let us not run from one enemy to another, nor take shelter in the arms of sickness.—Johnson.

Hearing

None so deaf as those that will not hear.—Mathew Henry.

Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears.—Shakespeare.

This is the slowest, yet the daintiest sense; For ev'n the ears of such as have no skill, Perceive a discord, and conceive offence; And knowing not what's good, yet find the ill.
—Sir John Davies.

Hear me for my cause, and be silent that you may hear.—Shakespeare.

Where more is meant than meets the ear.—Milton.

Where did you get that pearly ear?
God spoke and it came out to hear.
—George MacDonald.

I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a
soul
Under the ribs of death. —Milton.

Within a bony, labyrinthean cave,
Reached by the pulse of the aerial wave,
This sibyl, sweet, and mystic sense is
found,
Muse, that presides o'er all the powers of sound. —Abraham Coles.

These wickets of the soul are plac'd so high,
Because all sounds do highly move aloft;
And that they may not pierce too violently,
They are delay'd with turns and twinings oft.
For should the voice directly strike the brain,
It would astonish and confuse it much;
Therefore these plaits and folds the sound restrain.
That it the organ may more gently touch.
—Sir John Davies.

Heart

The precious porcelain of human clay.—Byron.

A loving heart is the truest wisdom.
—Dickens.

The heart does not lie.—Alfieri.

The more heart, the more sorrow.—
Mme. Necker.

Hearts are stronger than swords.—
Wendell Phillips.

Alas! there is no instinct like the heart!—Byron.

All offences come from the heart.—
Shakespeare.

Home-keeping hearts are happiest.—
Longfellow.

The less heart, the more comfort.—
Ninon de Lenclos.

Tears may be dried up, but the heart never.—Marguerite de Valois.

A heart to pity, and a hand to bless.
—Churchill.

The heart will break, yet broken live on.—Byron.

O heart! love is thy bane and thy antidote.—George Sand.

Worse than a bloody hand is a hard heart.—Shelley.

The ear is the avenue to the heart.—
Voltaire.

Better to have the poet's heart than brain.—George MacDonald.

A good heart is worth gold.—Shakespeare.

The head is ever the dupe of the heart.—La Rochefoucauld.

The heart echoes the words of love.
—Mme. de Krudener.

The full heart knows no rhetoric of words.—Bovee.

Leap hearts to lips, and in our kisses meet.—John Fletcher.

That hideous sight—a naked human heart.—Young.

I have a heart with room for every joy.—Bailey.

Love is the pass-key to the heart.—
Mme. Necker.

The heart is the best logician.—
Wendell Phillips.

For his heart was in his work, and thr
heart
Giveth grace unto every art.
—Longfellow.

There is an evening twilight of the heart,
When its wild passion-waves are lulled to rest.
—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Some hearts are hidden, some have not a heart.—Crabbe.

A heart to resolve, a head to contrive, and a hand to execute.—Gibbon.

A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart is at his left.—Bible.

Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh, give me back my heart!
—Byron.

Oh, the heart is a free and a fetterless thing—
A wave of the ocean, a bird on the wing.
—Julia Pardoe.

The heart aye's the part aye
That makes us right or wrang.
—Burns.

Never morning wore
To evening but some heart did break.
—Tennyson.

A temple of the Holy Ghost, and yet
Of lodging fiends. —Pollok.

A noble heart, like the sun, showeth its greatest countenance in its lowest estate.—Sir P. Sidney.

None but God can satisfy the longings of an immortal soul; that as the heart was made for Him, so He only can fill it.—Trench.

Do you think that any one can move the heart but He that made it?—John Lyly.

When the heart speaks, glory itself is an illusion.—Napoleon.

The human heart has a sigh lonelier than the cry of the bittern.—W. R.
Alger.

Mind is the partial side of men; the heart is everything.—Rivarol.

As the heart is, so is love to the heart. It partakes of its strength or weakness, its health or disease.—
Longfellow.

His heart was one of those which most enamours us—wax to receive, and marble to retain.—Byron.

The heart is always young only in the recollection of those whom it has loved in youth.—Arsène Houssaye.

The heart must glow before the tongue can gild.—W. R. Alger.

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?—Bible.

The wrinkles of the heart are more indelible than those of the brow.—
Madame Deluzy.

Memory, wit, fancy, acuteness, cannot grow young again in old age; but the heart can.—Richter.

If wrong our hearts, our heads are right in vain.—Young.

What the heart has once owned and had, it shall never lose.—Beecher.

In aught that tries the heart, how few withstand the proof.—Byron.

A good heart will, at all times, betray the best head in the world.—
Fielding.

I will wear my heart upon my sleeve
For daws to peck at; I am not what I am.
—Shakespeare.

Be persuaded that your only treasures are those which you carry in your heart.—Demophilus.

The human heart is like heaven; the more angels the more room.—Fredrika Bremer.

To try to conceal our own heart is a bad means to read that of others.—
Rousseau.

Of all the paths that lead to a woman's heart, pity is the straightest.—
Beaumont.

There is in the heart of woman such a deep well of love that no age can freeze it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A man's own heart must ever be given to gain that of another.—Goldsmith.

All who know their own minds know not their own hearts.—Rochefoucauld.

Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life.—Bible.

Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.—Bible.

The heart is an astrologer that always divines the truth.—Calderon.

Where there is room in the heart, there is always room in the house.—Moore.

The heart of a good man is the sanctuary of God in this world.—Mme. Necker.

The heart of woman never grows old; when it has ceased to love, it has ceased to live.—Rochepèdre.

The nervous fluid in man is consumed by the brain; in women, by the heart.—Stendhal.

All things but one you can restore; the heart you get returns no more.—Waller.

It is a wonderful subduer—this need of love, this hunger of the heart.—George Eliot.

Look not to a woman's head for her brains, but rather to her heart.—Haliburton.

The heart that has once been bathed in love's pure fountain retains the pulse of youth forever.—Landor.

A woman's heart is as intricate as a raveled skein of silk.—Dumas, Pere.

Alas! that we must dwell—my heart and I—so far asunder.—Christina G. Rossetti.

The heart is a small thing, but desireth great matters. It is not sufficient for a kite's dinner, yet the whole world is not sufficient for it.—Victor Hugo.

The heart is like an instrument whose strings steal nobler music from life's many frets.—Gerald Massey.

The very gnarliest and hardest of hearts has some musical strings in it; but they are tuned differently in every one of us.—Lowell.

A millstone and the human heart are driven ever round,
If they have nothing else to grind, they must themselves be ground.
—Longfellow.

A woman too often reasons from her heart; hence two-thirds of her mistakes and her troubles.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A woman's heart is just like a lithographer's stone; what is once written upon it cannot be rubbed out.—Thackeray.

When the heart is still agitated by the remains of a passion, we are more ready to receive a new one than when we are entirely cured.—Rochefoucauld.

The poor too often turn away unheard,
From hearts that shut against them with a sound
That will be heard in heaven.
—Longfellow.

The heart of a girl is like a convent; the holier the cloister, the more charitable the door.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The heart of a woman is never so full of affection that there does not remain a little corner for flattery and love.—Marivaux.

To judge human character rightly, a man may sometimes have very small experience, provided he has a very large heart.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Some people's hearts are shrunk in them, like dried nuts. You can hear 'em rattle as they walk.—Douglas Jerrold.

When a young man complains that a young lady has no heart, it is pretty certain that she has his.—G. D. Prentice.

The heart is like the tree that gives balm for the wounds of man only when the iron has pierced it.—Chateaubriand.

Every man must, in a measure, be alone in the world. No heart was ever cast in the same mould as that which we bear within us.—Berne.

What sad faces one always sees in the asylums for orphans! It is more fatal to neglect the heart than the head.—Theodore Parker.

Nothing is less in our power than the heart, and, far from commanding it, we are forced to obey it.—Rousseau.

The heart of a wise man should resemble a mirror, which reflects every object without being sullied by any.—Confucius.

The heart is like a musical instrument of many strings, all the chords of which require putting in harmony.—Saadi.

My heart resembles the ocean; has storm, and ebb and flow; and many a beautiful pearl lies hid in its depths below.—Heinrich Heine.

And when once the young heart of a maiden is stolen,
The maiden herself will steal after it soon.
—Moore.

Something the heart must have to cherish,
Must love, and joy, and sorrow learn;
Something with passion clasp, or perish,
And in itself to ashes burn.
—Longfellow.

Wealth and want equally harden the human heart, as frost and fire are both alien to the human flesh. Famine and gluttony alike drive nature away from the heart of man.—Theodore Parker.

The heart must be at rest before the mind, like a quiet lake under an unclouded summer evening, can reflect the solemn starlight and the splendid mysteries of heaven.—Macdonald Clarke.

When the heart of man is serene and tranquil, he wants to enjoy nothing but himself; every movement, even corporeal movement, shakes the brimming nectar cup too rudely.—Richter.

A human heart is a skein of such imperceptibly and subtly interwoven threads that even the owner of it is often himself at a loss how to unravel it.—Ruffini.

A human heart can never grow old if it takes a lively interest in the pairing of birds, the reproduction of flowers, and the changing tints of autumn leaves.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

A good heart is the sun and moon, or, rather, the sun, and not the moon; for it shines bright and never changes, but keeps its course truly.—Shakespeare.

The heart never grows better by age, I fear rather worse; always harder. A young liar will be an old one; and a young knave will only be a greater knave as he grows older.—Chesterfield.

Many flowers open to the sun, but only one follows him constantly. Heart, be thou the sunflower, not only open to receive God's blessing, but constant in looking to Him.—Richter.

There are treasures laid up in the heart—treasures of charity, piety, temperance, and soberness. These treasures a man takes with him beyond death, when he leaves this world.—Buddhist Scriptures.

What we call the heart is a nervous sensation, like shyness, which gradually disappears in society. It is fervent in the nursery, strong in the domestic circle, tumultuous at school.—Beaconsfield.

There is strength deep bedded in our hearts, of which we reck but little till the shafts of heaven have pierced its fragile dwelling. Must not earth be rent before her gems are found?—Mrs. Hemans.

The human heart is often the victim of the sensations of the moment; success intoxicates it to presumption, and disappointment dejects and terrifies it.—Volney.

Oh, no! my heart can never be Again in lightest hopes the same;
The love that lingers there for thee
Hath more of ashes than of flame.
—Miss London.

The flush of youth soon passes from the face,
The spells of fancy from the mind depart;
The form may lose its symmetry, its grace,
But time can claim no victory o'er the heart.
—Mrs. Dinwiddie.

The human heart is like a millstone in a mill: when you put wheat under it, it turns and grinds and bruises the wheat to flour; if you put no wheat, it still grinds on, but then 'tis itself it grinds and wears away.—Martin Luther.

Men, as well as women, are oftener led by their hearts than their understandings. The way to the heart is through the senses; please their eyes and ears, and the work is half done.—Chesterfield.

The heart, when broken, is like sweet gums and spices when beaten; for as such cast their fragrant scent into the nostrils of men, so the heart, when broken, casts its sweet smell into the nostrils of God.—Bunyan.

Oh, if the loving, closed heart of a good woman should open before a man, how much controlled tenderness, how many veiled sacrifices and dumb virtues, would be seen reposing there!—Richter.

A loving heart carries with it, under every parallel of latitude, the warmth and light of the tropics. It plants its Eden in the wilderness and solitary place, and sows with flowers the gray desolation of rock and mosses.—Whittier.

When a woman's heart is touched, when it is moved by love, then the electric spark is communicated and the fire of inspiration kindled: but even then she desires no more than to suffer or to die for what she loves.—Countess Hahn-Hahn.

There are no little events with the heart. It magnifies everything; it places in the same scale the fall of an empire and the dropping of a woman's glove; and almost always the glove weighs more than the empire.—Balzac.

Nothing affects the heart like that which is purely from itself, and of its own nature; such as the beauty of sentiments, the grace of actions, the turn of characters, and the proportions and features of a human mind.—Shaftesbury.

In thy heart there is a holy spot,
As 'mid the waste an isle of fount and palm,
Forever green!—the world's breath enters not,
The passion-tempest may not break its calm,
'Tis thine, all thine.
—Mrs. Hemans.

If you should take the human heart and listen to it, it would be like listening to a sea-shell; you would hear in it the hollow murmur of the infinite ocean to which it belongs, from which it draws its profoundest inspiration, and for which it yearns.—Chapin.

How mighty is the human heart, with all its complicated energies; this living source of all that moves the world! this temple of liberty, this kingdom of heaven, this altar of God, this throne of goodness, so beautiful in holiness, so generous in love!—Henry Giles.

There are chords in the human heart—strange, varying strings—which are only struck by accident; which will remain mute and senseless to appeals the most passionate and earnest, and respond at last to the slightest casual touch.—Dickens.

Intellect alone, however exalted, without strong feelings—without even, irritable sensibility—would be only like an immense magazine of powder, if there were no such element as fire in the natural world. It is the heart which is the spring and fountain of all eloquence.—Lord Erskine.

The heart is like the sky, a part of heaven,
But changes, night and day, too, like the sky;
Now o'er it clouds and thunder must be driven,
And darkness and destruction as on high;
But when it hath been scorch'd and pierc'd and riven,
Its storms expire in water-drops; the eye Pours forth, at last, the heart's blood turn'd to tears. —Byron.

What a proof of the Divine tenderness is there in the human heart itself, which is the organ and receptacle of so many sympathies! When we consider how exquisite are those conditions by which it is even made capable of so much suffering—the capabilities of a child's heart, of a mother's heart,—what must be the nature of Him who fashioned its depths, and strung its chords.—Chapin.

The wisdom of the Creator is in nothing seen more gloriously than the heart. It was necessary that it should be made capable of working forever without the cessation of a moment, without the least degree of weariness. It is so made; and the power of the Creator, in so constructing it, can in nothing be exceeded but by His wisdom.—Hope.

Who made the heart, 'tis He alone,
Decidedly can try us,
He knows each chord—its various tone
Each spring its various bias:
Then at the balance let's be mute,
We never can adjust it;
What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted.
—Burns.

Heat

Hither rolls the storm of heat;
I feel its finer billows beat
Like a sea which me infolds;
Heat with viewless fingers moulds,
Swells, and mellow, and matures,
Paints, and flavors, and allures,
Bird and brier inly warms,
Still enriches and transforms,
Gives the reed and lily length,
Adds to oak and oxen strength,
Transforming what it doth infold,
Life out of death, new out of old.
—Emerson.

Heaven

Heaven—it is God's throne. The earth—it is His footstool.—Bible.

Heaven, the treasury of everlasting joy!—Shakespeare.

The redeemed shall walk there.—Bible.

There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.—Bible.

I cannot be content with less than heaven.—Bailey.

There's nothing true but heaven.—Moore.

Beyond the clouds and beyond the tomb.—Mrs. Hemans.

All places shall be hell that are not heaven.—Marlowe.

Heaven, the widow's champion and defence.—Shakespeare.

There is another, and a better world.—August Von Kotzebue.

Heaven means to be one with God.—Confucius.

The love of heaven makes one heavenly.—Shakespeare.

Infinite in degree, and endless in duration.—Franklin.

Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal.—Moore.

Nothing is farther than earth from heaven; nothing is nearer than heaven to earth.—Hare.

Heaven does not make holiness, but holiness makes heaven.—Phillips Brooks.

Think of heaven with hearty purposes and peremptory designs to get thither.—Jeremy Taylor.

As much of heaven is visible as we have eyes to see.—William Winter.

One should go to sleep as homesick passengers do, saying, "Perhaps in the morning we shall see the shore."—H. W. Beecher.

Every Christian that goes before us from this world is a ransomed spirit waiting to welcome us in heaven.—Jonathan Edwards.

No fountain so small but that heaven may be imaged in its bosom.—Hawthorne.

Dreams cannot picture a world so fair; sorrow and death may not enter there.—Mrs. Hemans.

In a better world we will find our young years and our old friends.—J. Petit-Senn.

Heaven will be inherited by every man who has heaven in his soul.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There is but one way to heaven for the learned and the unlearned.—Jeremy Taylor.

The heaven of poetry and romance still lies around us and within us.—Longfellow.

Heaven is a place of restless activity, the abode of never-tiring thought.—Beecher.

The ascent from earth to heaven is not easy.—Seneca.

There I'll rest, as after much turmoil a blessed soul doth in Elysium.—Shakespeare.

Heaven's above all; and there be souls that must be saved, and there be souls that must not be saved.—Shakespeare.

I change my place, but not my company. While here I have sometimes walked with God, and now I go to rest with Him.—Dr. Preston.

Perfect purity, fullness of joy, everlasting freedom, perfect rest, health and fruition, complete security, substantial and eternal good.—Hannah More.

The net of heaven is very wide in its meshes, and yet it misses nothing.—Lao-Tze.

Think how completely all the griefs of this mortal life will be compensated by one age, for instance, of the felicities beyond the grave.—John Foster.

In short, heaven is not to be looked upon only as the reward, but as the natural effect, of a religious life.—Addison.

They had finished her own crown in glory, and she couldn't stay away from the coronation.—Gray.

While resignation gently slopes the way; And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His heaven commences ere the world be past. —Goldsmith.

Heaven is endless longing, accompanied with an endless fruition—a longing which is blessedness, a longing which is life.—Alexander MacLaren.

Do we not hear voices, gentle and great, and some of them like the voices of departed friends—do we not hear them saying to us, "Come up hither?" —Wm. Mountford.

The joy of heaven will begin as soon as we attain the character of heaven, and do its duties.—Theodore Parker.

Heaven
Is as the Book of God before thee set,
Wherein to read His wondrous works. —Milton.

An everlasting tranquility is, in my imagination, the highest possible felicity, because I know of no felicity on earth higher than that which a peaceful mind and contented heart afford.—Zimmermann.

He who seldom thinks of heaven is not likely to get thither; as the only way to hit the mark is to keep the eye fixed upon it.—Bishop Horne.

The loves that meet in paradise shall cast out fear; and paradise hath room for you and me and all.—Christina G. Rossetti.

Heaven's gates are not so highly arched as princes' palaces; they that enter there must go upon their knees.—Daniel Webster.

It is impossible to have a lively hope in another life, and yet be deeply immersed in the enjoyments of this.—Atterbury.

The generous who is always just, and the just who is always generous, may, unannounced, approach the throne of heaven.—Lavater.

Heaven hath many tongues to talk of it, more eyes to behold it, but few hearts that rightly affect it.—Bishop Hall.

If the way of heaven be narrow, it is not long; and if the gate be straight, it opens into endless life.—Bishop Beveridge.

Ah, what without a heaven would be even love!—a perpetual terror of the separation that must one day come.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I must confess, as the experience of my own soul, that the expectation of loving my friends in heaven principally kindles my love to them while on earth.—Richard Baxter.

And so upon this wise I prayed—

Great Spirit, give to me.

A heaven not so large as yours

But large enough for me.

—Emily Dickinson.

Love lent me wings; my path was like a stair;

A lamp unto my feet, that sun was given;

And death was safety and great joy to find;

But dying now, I shall not climb to Heaven.

—Michael Angelo.

The joys of heaven are not the joys of passive contemplation, of dreamy remembrance, of perfect repose; but they are described thus: "They rest not day nor night." "His servants serve Him, and see His face."—Alexander Maclaren.

Our souls, piercing through the impurity of flesh, behold the highest heaven, and thence bring knowledge to contemplate the ever-during glory and termless joy.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

We should carry up our affections to the mansions prepared for us above, where eternity is the measure, felicity the state, angels the company, the Lamb the light, and God the inheritance and portion of His people forever.—Jeremy Taylor.

Heaven is the day of which grace is the dawn; the rich, ripe fruit of which grace is the lovely flower; the inner shrine of that most glorious temple to which grace forms the approach and outer court.—Rev. Dr. Guthrie.

If our Creator has so bountifully provided for our existence here, which is but momentary, and for our temporal wants, which will soon be forgotten, how much more must He have done for our enjoyment in the everlasting world!—Hosea Ballou.

We are born for a higher destiny than earth; there is a realm where the rainbow never fades, where the stars will be spread before us like islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beings that pass before us like shadows will stay in our presence forever.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There are times in the history of men and nations, when they stand so near the vale that separates mortals from the immortals, time from eternity, and men from their God, that they can almost hear the beatings, and feel the pulsations of the heart of the Infinite.—James A. Garfield.

As we look up into these glorious culminations, how grand life becomes! To be forever with the Lord, and forever changing into His likeness, and, still more, forever deepening in the companionship of His thought and bliss, "from glory to glory"—could we desire more?—Bishop R. S. Foster.

What, after all, is heaven, but a transition from dim guesses and blind struggling with a mysterious and adverse fate to the fullness of all wisdom—from ignorance, in a word, to knowledge, but knowledge of what order?—Bulwer-Lytton.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors;

Amid these earthly damps,
What seem to us but sad, funeral tapers
May be heaven's distant lamps.

—Longfellow.

It doth not yet appear what we shall be. We lie here in our nest, unfledged and weak, guessing dimly at our future, and scarce believing what even now appears. But the power is in us, and that power is finally to be revealed. And what a revelation will that be!—Horace Bushnell.

The joys of heaven are without example, above experience, and beyond imagination—for which the whole creation wants a comparison; we, an apprehension; and even the Word of God, a revelation.—Bishop Norris.

Christ and His cross are not separable in this life, howbeit Christ and His cross part at heaven's door, for there is no house-room for crosses in heaven. One tear, one sigh, one sad heart, one fear, one loss, one thought of trouble cannot find lodging there.—Rutherford.

A sea before

The Throne is spread;—its pure still glass
Pictures all earth-scenes as they pass.

We, on its shore,
Share, in the bosom of our rest,
God's knowledge, and are blest.

—Cardinal Newman.

After the fever of life—after wearinesses, sicknesses, fightings and despondings, languor and fretfulness, struggling and failing, struggling and succeeding—after all the changes and chances of this troubled and unhealthy state, at length comes death—at length the white throne of God—at length the beatific vision.—Newman.

Heaven is not to sweep our truths away, but only to turn them till we see their glory, to open them till we see their truth, and to unveil our eyes till for the first time we shall really see them.—Phillips Brooks.

Heaven is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature, is enriching itself by the spoils of earth, and collecting within its capacious bosom whatever is pure, permanent and divine.—Robert Hall.

Heaven, the perfection of all that can Be said, of thought, riches, delight or harmony,

Health, beauty; and all those not subject to
The waste of time, but in their height eternal.

—Shirley.

Some people think black is the color of heaven, and that the more they can make their faces look like midnight, the more evidence they have of grace. But God, who made the sun and the flowers, never sent me to proclaim to you such a lie as that.—Beecher.

Perhaps God does with His heavenly garden as we do with our own. He may chiefly stock it from nurseries, and select for transplanting what is yet in its young and tender age—flowers before they have bloomed, and trees ere they begin to bear.—Rev. Dr. Guthrie.

The poets fabulously fancied that the giants scaled heaven by heaping mountain upon mountain. What was their fancy is the gospel truth. If you would get to heaven you must climb thither by putting Mount Sion upon Mount Sinai.—Bishop Hopkins.

What delight will it afford to renew the sweet counsel we have taken together, to recount the toils, the combats, and the labor of the way, and to approach, not the house, but the throne of God, in company, in order to join in the symphonies of heavenly voices, and lose ourselves amidst the splendor and fruitions of the beatific vision.—Robert Hall.

In our father's house it will not be the pearl gate or the streets of gold that will make us happy. But oh, how transcendently glad shall we be when we see our Lord. Perhaps in that "upper room," also, He may show us His hands and His side, and we may cry out with happy Thomas, "My Lord and my God!"—T. L. Cuyler.

There is a world above,
Where parting is unknown;
A whole eternity of love,
Form'd for the good alone;
And faith beholds the dying here
Translated to that happier sphere.
—Montgomery.

Death must obliterate all memories and affections and ideas and laws, or the awakening in the next world will be amid the welcomes, and loves and raptures of those who left us with tearful farewells, and with dying promises that they would wait to welcome us when we should arrive. And so they do. Not sorrowfully, not anxiously, but lovingly, they wait to bid us welcome.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

O, land of rest, how near thou art! O, judgment-seat of Jesus, how thin are the clouds that veil Thee! Through the rifts of cloudland shine rays from this righteous crown. It is "laid up" for him whose hope can never be satisfied with less than the presence of the King.—Stephen H. Tyng, Jr.

It may be that at this moment every battlement of heaven is alive with the redeemed. There is a sainted mother watching for her daughter. Have you no response to that long hushed voice which has prayed for you so often? And for you, young man, are there no voices there that have prayed for you? And are there none whom you promised once to meet again, if not on earth, in heaven?—D. L. Moody.

No wearisome days, no sorrowful nights; no hunger or thirst; no anxiety or fears; no envies, no jealousies, no breaches of friendship, no sad separations, no distrusts or forebodings, no self-reproaches, no enmities, no bitter regrets, no tears, no heartaches; "And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."—Bishop R. S. Foster.

Look how the floor of Heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.
—Shakespeare.

If I am allowed to give a metaphorical allusion to the future state of the blessed, I should imagine it by the orange-grove in that sheltered glen on which the sun is now beginning to shine, and of which the trees are, at the same time, loaded with sweet golden fruit and balmy silver flowers. Such objects may well portray a state in which hope and fruition become one eternal feeling.—Sir H. Davy.

If one could look a while through the chinks of heaven's door, and see the beauty and bliss of paradise; if he could but lay his ear to heaven, and hear the ravishing music of those seraphic spirits, and the anthems of praise which they sing, how would his soul be exhilarated and transported with joy.—Watson.

The song
Of Heaven is ever new; for daily thus,
And nightly, new discoveries are made Of God's unbounded wisdom, power, and love,
Which give the understanding larger room,
And swell the hymn with ever-growing praise.
—Pollok.

They are kings and priests unto God. They wear crowns that flash in the everlasting light. They wear robes that are spotlessly white. They wave victorious palms. They sing anthems of such exceeding sweetness as no earthly choirs ever approach. They stand before the throne. They fly on ministries of love. They muse on the top of Mount Zion. They meditate on the banks of the river of life. They are rapturous with ecstasies of love. God wipes away all tears from their eyes.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

And then, the quiet of the green, inland valleys of our Father's land, where no tempest comes any more, nor the loud winds are ever heard, nor the salt sea is ever seen; but perpetual calm and blessedness; all mystery gone, and all rebellion hushed and silenced, and all unrest at an end forever! "No more sea;" but, instead of that wild and yeasty chaos of turbulent waters, there shall be the river that makes glad the city of God, the river of water of life, that proceeds "out of the throne of God and of the Lamb."—Alexander Maclaren.

Blessed is the pilgrim, who in every place, and at all times of this his banishment in the body, calling upon the holy name of Jesus, calleth to mind his native heavenly land, where his blessed Master, the King of saints and angels, waiteth to receive him. Blessed is the pilgrim who seeketh not an abiding place unto himself in this world; but longeth to be dissolved, and be with Christ in heaven.—Thos. à Kempis.

There is a land where everlasting suns Shed everlasting brightness; where the
soul
Drinks from the living streams of love that roll
By God's high throne! myriads of glorious ones
Bring their accepted offering. Oh! how blest
To look from this dark prison to that shrine,
To inhale one breath of Paradise divine,
And enter into that eternal rest
Which waits the sons of God.

—Bowring.

And looking back upon "the sea that brought us thither," we shall behold its waters flashing in the light of that everlasting morning, and hear them breaking into music upon the eternal shore. And then, brethren, when all the weary night-watchers on the stormy ocean of life are gathered together around Him who watched with them from His throne on the bordering mountains of eternity, where the day shines forever—then He will seat them at His table in His kingdom, and none will need to ask, "Who art Thou?" or "Where am I?" "for all shall know it is the Lord," and the full, perfect, unchangeable vision of His blessed face will be heaven.—Alexander Maclaren.

Rejoice, oh! grieving heart,
The hours fly past;
With each some sorrow dies,
With each some shadow flies,
Until at last
The red dawn in the east
Bids weary night depart,
And pain is past.

—A. A. Proctor.

What tranquillity will there be in heaven! Who can express the fullness and blessedness of this peace! What a calm is this! How sweet and holy and joyous! What a haven of rest to enter, after having passed through the storms and tempests of this world, in which pride and selfishness and envy and malice and scorn and contempt and contention and vice are as waves of a restless ocean, always rolling, and often dashed about in violence and fury! What a Canaan of rest to come to, after going through this waste and howling wilderness, full of snares and pitfalls and poisonous serpents, where no rest could be found.—Jonathan Edwards.

Yes, thank God! there is rest—many an interval of saddest, sweetest rest—even here, when it seems as if evening breezes from that other land, laden with fragrance, played upon the cheeks, and lulled the heart. There are times, even on the stormy sea, when a gentle whisper breathes softly as of heaven, and sends into the soul a dream of ecstasy which can never again wholly die, even amidst the jar and whirl of daily life. How such whispers make the blood stop and the flesh creep with a sense of mysterious communion! How singularly such moments are the epochs of life—the few points that stand out prominently in the recollection after the flood of years has buried all the rest, as all the low shore disappears, leaving only a few rock points visible at high tide.—

F. W. Robertson.

Beyond the smiling and the weeping,
I shall be soon;
Beyond the waking and the sleeping,
Beyond the sowing and the reaping,
I shall be soon!
Love, rest, and home—
Sweet hope! Lord, tarry not, but come!
—Horatius Bonar.

Heavens (The)

But the day is spent;
And stars are kindling in the firmament,
To us how silent—though like ours, perchance,
Busy and full of life and circumstance.
—Rogers.

Heaven's ebon vault,
Studded with stars unutterably bright,
Thro' which the moon's unclouded grandeur rolls,
Seems like a canopy which love has spread
To curtain her sleeping world.
—Shelley.

This prospect vast, what is it?—weigh'd aright,
'Tis nature's system of divinity,
And every student of the night inspires.
'Tis elder scripture, writ by God's own hand:
Scripture authentic! uncorrupt by man.
—Young.

The blue, deep, glorious heavens!—I lift mine eye,
And bless thee, O my God! that I have met
And own'd thine image in the majesty
Of their calm temple still! that never yet
There hath thy face been shrouded from my sight
By noontide blaze, or sweeping storm of night!
I bless thee, O my God!
—Mrs. Hemans.

Ye stars! which are the poetry of heaven;
If in your bright leaves we would read the fate
Of men and empires—'t is to be forgiven,
That in our aspirations to be great,
Our destinies o'erleap their mortal state.
And claim a kindred with you; for ye are
A beauty and a mystery, and create
In us such love and reverence from afar,
That fortune, fame, power, life, have nam'd themselves a star. —Byron.

One sun by day, by night ten thousand shine;
And light us deep into the deity;
How boundless in magnificence and might!
O what a confluence of ethereal fires,
From urns unnumber'd, down the steep of heaven,
Streams to a point, and centres in my sight!
Nor tarries there; I feel it at my heart:
My heart, at once, it humbles, and exalts;
Lays it in dust, and calls it to the skies.
—Young.

Heirs

"Yet doth he live!" exclaims th' impatient heir,
And sighs for sables which he must not wear.
—Byron.

To heirs unknown descends th' unguarded store,
Or wanders, heaven-directed, to the poor.
—Pope.

What madness is it for a man to starve himself to enrich his heir, and so turn a friend into an enemy! For his joy at your death will be proportioned to what you leave him.—Seneca.

He who sees his heir in his own child, carries his eye over hopes and possessions lying far beyond his grave-stone, viewing his life, even here, as a period but closed with a comma. He who sees his heir in another man's child sees the full stop at the end of the sentence.—Bulwer-Lytton.

An heiress, remaining unmarried, is a prey to all manner of extortion and imposition, and with the best intentions, becomes—through a bounty—a corruption to her neighborhood and a curse to the poor: or, if experience shall put her on her guard, she will lead a life of suspicion and resistance, to the injury of her own mind and nature.—Jeremy Taylor.

Hell

Hell is the wrath of God—His hate of sin.—Bailey.

Hell is truth seen too late.—H. G. Adams.

Hell is both sides of the tomb, and a devil may be respectable and wear good clothes.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Hell is more bearable than nothingness.—Bailey.

Hell is full of good meanings and wishings.—Herbert.

Divines and dying men may talk of hell,
But in my heart her several torments dwell.
—Shakespeare.

Long is the way
And hard, that out of hell leads up to light.
—Milton.

Hell is no other but a soundless pit,
Where no one beame of comfort peeps in it.
—Herrick.

That's the greatest torture souls feel in hell,
In hell, that they must live, and cannot die.
—John Webster.

Self-love and the love of the world constitute hell.—Swedenborg.

I think the devil will not have me damned, lest the oil that's in me should set hell on fire.—Shakespeare.

Hell is paved with good intentions.
—Samuel Johnson.

Hell, their fit habitation, fraught with fire
Unquenchable, the house of woe and pain.
—Milton.

Eternal torments, baths of boiling sulphur,
Vicissitude of fires, and then of frosts.
—Dryden.

Hell is empty,
And all the devils are here.—Shakespeare.

There is nothing that keeps wicked men at any one moment out of hell but the mere pleasure of God.—Jonathan Edwards.

The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
—Milton.

Hell's court is built deep in a gloomy vale,
High walled with strong damnation, moated round
With flaming brimstone.
—Dr. Joseph Beaumont.

Many might go to heaven with half the labor they go to hell, if they would venture their industry the right way.
—Ben Jonson.

No hell will frighten men away from sin; no dread of prospective misery; only goodness can cast hell out of any man, and set up the kingdom of heaven within.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Myself am hell;
And in the lowest deep, a lower deep,
Still threat'ning to devour me, opens wide;
To which the hell I suffer seems a heaven.
—Milton.

There is in hell a place stone-built throughout,
Called Malebolge, of an iron hue,
Like to the wall that circles it about.
—Dante.

We spirits have just such natures
We had for all the world, when human creatures;
And, therefore, I, that was an actress here,
Play all my tricks in hell, a goblin there.
—Dryden.

Nay, then, what flames are these that leap and swell
As 'twere to show, where earth's foundations crack,
The secrets of the sepulchres of hell
On Dante's track? —Swinburne.

The place thou saw'st was hell, the groans thou heard'st
The wailings of the damn'd, of those who would Not be redeem'd.
—Pollok.

Ev'n thus in hell, wander the restless damn'd:
From scorching flames to chilling frosts they run;
Then from their frosts to fires return again,
And only prove variety of pain.
—Rowe.

A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,
As one great furnace, flamed; yet from those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible
Serv'd only to discover sights of woe,
Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
And rest can never dwell, hope never comes
That comes to all; but torture without end.
—Milton.

In the utmost solitudes of nature, the existence of hell seems to me as legibly declared by a thousand spiritual utterances as that of heaven.—Ruskin.

What will you do in a world where the Holy Spirit never strives; where every soul is fully left to its own depravity; and where there is no leisure for repentance, if there were even the desire, but where there is too much present pain to admit repentance; where they gnaw their tongues with pain, and blaspheme the God of heaven?—James Hamilton.

Hell has no limits, nor is circumscribed
In one self place; but where we are is hell
And where hell is, there must we ever be;
And to be short, when all the world dissolves,
And every creature shall be purified,
All places shall be hell that are not heaven. —Marlowe.

A dark
Illimitable ocean, without bound,
Without dimension; where length, breadth,
and highth,
And time, and place, are lost; where eldest
Night
And Chaos—ancestors of Nature, hold Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.
—Milton.

A universe of death
Where all life dies, death lives, and nature breeds
Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things
Abominable, unutterable, and worse
Than fables yet have feign'd, or fear conceived.
—Milton.

Hell is a city much like London—
A populous and a smoky city;
There are all sorts of people undone,
And there is little or no fun done;
Small justice shown, and still less pity.

Lawyers—judges—old hobnobbers
Are there—bailiffs—chancellors—
Bishops—great and little robbers—
Rhymesters—pamphleteers—stock-jobbers—
Men of glory in the wars. —Shelley.

The Lamb is, indeed, the emblem of love: but what so terrible as the wrath of the Lamb? The depth of the mercy despised is the measure of the punishment of him that despiseth. No more fearful words than those of the Saviour. The threatenings of the law were temporal, those of the gospel are eternal. It is Christ who reveals the never-dying worm, the unquenchable fire, and He who contrasts with the eternal joys of the redeemed the everlasting woes of the lost. His loving arms would enfold the whole human race, but not while impenitent or unbelieving; the benefits of His redemption are conditional.—Edward Thomson.

In the throat
Of Hell, before the very vestibule
Of opening Orcus, sit Remorse and Grief,
And pale Disease, and sad Old Age and Fear,
And Hunger that persuades to crime, and Want:
Forms terrible to see. Suffering and
Death
Inhabit here, and Death's own brother
Sleep;
And the mind's evil lusts and deadly War,
Lie at the threshold, and the iron beds
Of the Eumenides; and Discord wild.
Her viper-locks with bloody fillets bound.
—Virgil.

There is a place in a black and hollow vault,
Where day is never seen; there shines no
sun,
But flaming horror of consuming fires;
A lightless sulphur, chok'd with smoky fogs
Of an infected darkness; in this place Dwell many thousand thousand sundry sorts
Of never dying deaths; there damn'd
souls
Roar without pity; there are gluttons fed
With toads and adders; there is burning oil
Pour'd down the drunkard's throat; the usurer
Is forc'd to sup whole draughts of molten
gold;
There is the murderer forever stabb'd,
Yet can he never die; there lies the wanton
On racks of burning steel, while in his
soul
He feels the torment of his raging lust;
There stand those wretched things,
Who have dream'd out whole years in lawless sheets,
And secret incests, cursing one another.
—John Ford.

An immortality of pain and tears; an infinity of wretchedness and despair; the blackness of darkness across which conscience will forever shoot her clear and ghastly flashes—like lightning streaming over a desert when midnight and tempest are there; weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; long, long eternity, and things that will make eternity seem longer—making each moment seem eternity—

oh, miserable condition of the damned!
—Richard Fuller.

Help

God helps those who help themselves.
—Algernon Sidney.

Light is the task when many share
the toil.—Homer.

Heaven's help is better than early rising.—Cervantes.

I would help others, out of a fellow-feeling.—Burton.

In man's most dark extremity
Oft succor dawns from Heaven.
—Scott.

'Tis not enough to help the feeble up,
But to support him after.
—Shakespeare.

I want to help you to grow as beautiful as God meant you to be when He thought of you first.—George Mac-Donald.

Such help as we can give to each other in this world is a debt to each other; and the man who perceives a superiority or a capacity in a subordinate, and neither confesses nor assists it, is not merely the withholder of kindness, but the committer of injury.—
Ruskin.

Heraldry

A court of heraldry sprung up to supply the place of crusade exploits, to grant imaginary shields and trophies to families that never wore real armor, and it is but of late that it has been discovered to have no real jurisdiction.—Shenstone.

We may talk what we please of lilies, and lions rampant, and spread eagles, in fields of d'or or d'argent, but if heraldry were guided by reason, a plough in a field arable would be the most noble and ancient arms.—Cowley.

Herbage

Grass grows at last above all graves.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

The green grass floweth like a stream
Into the ocean's blue.
—Lowell.

How lush and lusty the grass looks!
how green!—Shakespeare.

A blade of grass is always a blade of grass, whether in one country or another.—Samuel Johnson.

Heroes

Troops of heroes undistinguished die.—Addison.

No man is a hero to his valet.—
Mme. de Cornuel.

Heroes are a mischievous race.—
Jeremy Collier.

Yes, Honor decks the turf that wraps their clay.—Byron.

There are heroes in evil as well as in good.—Rochevoucauld.

Heroes as great have died, and yet shall fail.—Homer.

Whoe'er excels in what we prize,
Appears a hero in our eyes.
—Swift.

Worship your heroes from afar;
contact withers them.—Mme. Necker.

If hero means sincere man, why may not every one of us be a hero—
Carlyle.

Of two heroes, he who esteems his rivals the most is the greatest.—Beaumelle.

We can all be heroes in our virtues, in our homes, in our lives.—James Ellis.

Prodigious actions may as well be done
By weaver's issue, as by prince's son.
—Dryden.

The real heroes of this war are the "great, brave, patient, nameless people."—Whitelaw Reid.

Heroes, it would seem, exist always and a certain worship of them.—
Carlyle.

The legacy of heroes—the memory of a great name, and the inheritance of a great example.—Beaconsfield.

Each man is a hero and an oracle to somebody, and to that person whatever he says has an enhanced value.—Emerson.

Our heroes of the former days deserved and gained their never-fading bays.—Roscommon.

I want a hero: an uncommon want,
When every year and month sends forth a new one. —Byron.

Hail, Columbia! happy land!
Hail, ye heroes! heaven-born band!
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause.
—Joseph Hopkinson.

In analyzing the character of heroes, it is hardly possible to separate altogether the share of fortune from their own.—Hallam.

The gentle breath of peace would leave him on the surface neglected and unmoved. It is only the tempest that lifts him from his place.—Junius.

The idol of to-day pushes the hero of yesterday out of our recollection; and will, in turn, be supplanted by his successor of to-morrow.—Washington Irving.

The heroes of literary history have been no less remarkable for what they have suffered than for what they have achieved.—Johnson.

Heroes are not known by the loftiness of their carriage, as the greatest braggarts are generally the merest cowards.—Rousseau.

Nobody, they say, is a hero to his valet. Of course: for a man must be a hero to understand a hero. The valet, I dare say, has great respect for some person of his own stamp.—Goethe.

The prudent sees only the difficulties, the bold only the advantages, of a great enterprise; the hero sees both, diminishes those, makes these preponderate, and conquers.—Lavater.

Heroes in history seem to us poetic because they are there. But if we should tell the simple truth of some of our neighbors, it would sound like poetry.—G. W. Curtis.

Up rose the hero,—on his piercing eye
Sat observation; on each glance of thought
Decision follow'd, as the thunderbolt
Pursues the flash. —Home.

Place moral heroes in the field, and heroines follow them as brides, but the opposite does not hold true; no heroine can create a hero through love of her, but she may give birth to one.—Richter.

Heroes, notwithstanding the high ideas which, by the means of flatterers, they may entertain of themselves, or the world may conceive of them, have certainly more of mortal than divine about them.—Fielding.

There needs not a great soul to make a hero; there needs a God-created soul which will be true to its origin; that will be a great soul.—Carlyle.

But to the hero, when his sword
Has won the battle for the free,
Thy voice sounds like a prophet's word,
And in its hollow tones are heard
The thanks of millions yet to be.
—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

The greatest of all heroes is One—whom we do not name here! Let sacred silence meditate that sacred matter; you will find it the ultimate perfection of a principle extant throughout man's whole history on earth.—Carlyle.

A hero is—as though one should say—a man of high achievement, who performs famous exploits—who does things that are heroic, and in all his actions and demeanor is a hero indeed.—H. Brooke.

The heroic soul does not sell its justice and its nobleness. It does not ask to dine nicely and to sleep warm. The essence of greatness is the perception that virtue is enough. Poverty is its ornament. It does not need plenty, and can very well abide its loss.—Emerson.

He who, with strong passions, remains chaste—he who, keenly sensitive, with manly power of indignation in him, can yet restrain himself and forgive—these are strong men, spiritual heroes.—Robertson.

Great men need to be lifted upon the shoulders of the whole world, in order to conceive their great ideas or perform their great deeds; that is, there must be an atmosphere of greatness round about them. A hero cannot be a hero unless in an heroic world.—Hawthorne.

It hath been an ancient custom among them (Hungarians) that none should wear a fether but he who had killed a Turk, to whom onlie yt was lawful to shew the number of his slaine enemys by the number of fethers in his cappe.—Richard Hansard.

It were well if there were fewer heroes; for I scarcely ever heard of any, excepting Hercules, but did more mischief than good. These overgrown mortals commonly use their will with their right hand, and their reason with their left.—Jeremy Collier.

Whoever, with an earnest soul,
Strives for some end from this low world
afar,
Still upward travels though he miss the goal,
And strays—but towards a star.
—Bulwer.

Yet reason frowns in war's unequal game,
Where wasted nations raise a single name;
And mortgag'd states their grandsire's wreaths regret,
From age to age in everlasting debt;
Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey
To rust on medals, or on stones decay.
—Dr. Johnson.

Heroism

Self-trust is the essence of heroism.
—Emerson.

In a truly heroic life there is no peradventure. It is always either doing or dying.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

Heroism—the divine relation which in all times unites a great man to other men.—Carlyle.

The grandest of heroic deeds are those which are performed within four walls and in domestic privacy.—Jean Paul Richter.

There is more heroism in self-denial than in deeds of arms.—Seneca.

Take away ambition and vanity, and where will be your heroes or patriots?
—Seneca.

Heroes did not make our liberties;
they but reflected and illustrated them.
—James A. Garfield.

Mankind is not disposed to look narrowly into the conduct of great victors when their victory is on the right side.
—George Elliot.

The world's battlefields have been in the heart chiefly, and there the greatest heroism has been secretly exercised.—Beecher.

The true epic of our times is not "Arms and the Man," but "Tools and the Man"—an infinitely wider kind of epic.—Carlyle.

Heroism is active genius; genius, contemplative heroism. Heroism is the self-devotion of genius manifesting itself in action.—J. C. and A. W.
Hare.

A noble life, crowned with heroic death, rises above and outlives the pride and pomp and glory of the mightiest empire of the earth.—Garfield.

Every heroic act measures itself by its contempt of some external good.
But it finds its own success at last,
and then the prudent also extol.—
Emerson.

Those whom the world has delighted to honor have oftener been influenced in their doings by ambition and vanity than by patriotism.—Rochefoucauld.

The greatest obstacle to being heroic is the doubt whether one may not be going to prove one's self a fool; the truest heroism is to resist the doubt, and the profoundest wisdom to know when it ought to be resisted, and when to be obeyed.—Hawthorne.

Heroism works in contradiction to the voice of mankind, and in contradiction, for a time, to the voice of the great and good. Heroism is an obedience to a secret impulse of an individual's character.—Emerson.

Heroism, self-denial, and magnanimity, in all instances where they do not spring from a principle of religion, are but splendid altars on which we sacrifice one kind of self-love to another.—Colton.

A light supper, a good night's sleep, and a fine morning have often made a hero of the same man who, by indigestion, a restless night, and a rainy morning, would have proved a coward.—Chesterfield.

If we must have heroes and wars wherein to make them, there is no war so brilliant as a war with wrong; no hero so fit to be sung as he who has gained the bloodless victory of truth and mercy.—Horace Bushnell.

True heroism is alike positive and progressive. It sees in right the duty which should dominate, and in truth the principle which should prevail. And hence it never falters in the faith that always and everywhere sin must be repressed, and righteousness exalted.—John McC. Holmes.

Enthusiasm springs from the imagination, and self-sacrifice from the heart. Women are, therefore, more naturally heroic than men. All nations have in their annals some of these miracles of patriotism, of which woman is the instrument in the hands of God.—Lamartine.

Heroism is the brilliant triumph of the soul over the flesh; that is to say, over fear: fear of poverty, of suffering, of calumny, of sickness, of isolation, and of death. There is no serious piety without heroism. Heroism is the dazzling and glorious concentration of courage.—Amiel.

Don't aim at any impossible heroisms. Strive rather to be quiet in your own sphere. Don't live in the cloudland of some transcendental heaven; do your best to bring the glory of a real heaven down, and ray it out upon your fellows in this work-day world. Seek to make trade bright with a spotless integrity, and business lustrous with the beauty of holiness.—Wm. M. Punshon.

There is a heroism in crime as well as in virtue. Vice and infamy have their altars and their religion. This makes nothing in their favor, but is a proud compliment to man's nature. Whatever he is or does, he cannot entirely efface the stamp of the divinity on him. Let him strive ever so, he cannot divest himself of his natural sublimity of thought and affection, however he may pervert or deprave it to ill.—Hazlitt.

There is an army of memorable sufferers who suffer inwardly and not outwardly. The world's battlefields have been in the heart chiefly. More heroism has there been displayed in the household and in the closet, I think, than on the most memorable military battlefields of history.—Beecher.

Heroism is no extempore work of transient impulse—a rocket rushing fretfully up to disturb the darkness by which, after a moment's insulting radiance, it is ruthlessly swallowed up,—but a steady fire, which darts forth tongues of flame. It is no sparkling epigram of action, but a luminous epic of character.—Whipple.

We cannot think too highly of our nature, nor too humbly of ourselves. When we see the martyr to virtue, subject as he is to the infirmities of a man, yet suffering the tortures of a demon, and bearing them with the magnanimity of a God, do we not behold a heroism that angels may indeed surpass, but which they cannot imitate, and must admire.—Colton.

Never was there a time, in the history of the world, when moral heroes were more needed. The world waits for such, the providence of God has commanded science to labor and prepare the way for such. For them she is laying her iron tracks, and stretching her wires, and bridging the oceans. But where are they? Who shall breathe into our civil and political relations the breath of a higher life? Who shall touch the eyes of a paganized science, and of a pantheistic philosophy, that they may see God? Who shall consecrate to the glory of God the triumphs of science? Who shall bear the life-boat to the stranded and perishing nations.—Mark Hopkins.

Hero-Worship

Society is founded on hero-worship.—Carlyle.

Worship of a hero is transcendent admiration of a great man.—Carlyle.

Hero-worship exists, has existed, and will forever exist, universally, among mankind.—Carlyle.

If silence is ever golden, it must be * * * beside the graves of * * * men, whose lives were more significant than speech, and whose death was a poem, the music of which can never be sung.—Garfield.

Fortunate men! your country lives because you died. Your fame is placed where the breath of calumny can never reach it, where the mistakes of a weary life can never dim its brightness! Coming generations will rise up and call you blessed.—Garfield.

Unmixed praise is not due to any one. It leaves behind a sense of unreality. We can only do justice to a great man by a discriminating criticism. Hero-worship, which paints a faultless monster, whom the world never saw, is like those modern pictures which are a blaze of light without any shadow.—James Freeman Clarke.

Pure hero-worship is healthy. It stimulates the young to deeds of heroism, stirs the old to unselfish efforts, and gives the masses models of mankind that tend to lift humanity above the commonplace meanness of ordinary life.—Donn Piatt.

They summed up and perfected, by one supreme act, the highest virtues of men and citizens. For love of country they accepted death, and thus resolved all doubts, and made immortal their patriotism and their virtue.—Garfield.

These heroes are dead. They died for liberty—they died for us. They are at rest. They sleep in the land they made free, under the flag they rendered stainless, under the solemn pines, the sad hemlocks, the tearful willows, and the embracing vines. They sleep beneath the shadows of the clouds, careless alike of sunshine or of storm, each in the windowless palace of rest. Earth may run red with other wars; they are at peace. In the midst of battle, in the roar of conflict, they found the serenity of death. I have one sentiment for soldiers living and dead: cheers for the living; tears for the dead.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Historians

To be a really good historian is perhaps the rarest of intellectual distinctions.—Macaulay.

Historians are as perfect as the historian is wise, and is gifted with an eye and a soul.—Carlyle.

Instructed by the antiquary times,
He must, he is, he cannot but be wise.
—Shakespeare.

Every great writer is a writer of history, let him treat on almost any subject he may.—Landor.

It is to me a peculiarly noble work rescuing from oblivion those who deserve immortality, and extending their renown at the same time that we advance our own.—Pliny the Younger.

Historians ought to be precise, faithful, and unprejudiced; and neither interest nor fear, hatred nor affection, should make them swerve from the way of truth.—Cervantes.

Historians, only things of weight, Results of persons, or affairs of State, Briefly, with truth and clearness should relate;
Laconic shortness memory feeds.—Heath.

The historian must be a poet; not to find, but to find again; not to breathe life into beings, into imaginary deeds, but in order to re-animate and revive that which has been; to represent what time and space have placed at a distance from us.—Joseph Roux.

The true historical genius, to our thinking, is that which can see the nobler meaning of events that are near him, as the true poet is he who detects the divine in the casual; and we somewhat suspect the depth of his insight into the past, who cannot recognize the godlike of to-day under that disguise in which it always visits us.—Lowell.

A perfect historian must possess an imagination sufficiently powerful to make his narrative affecting and picturesque; yet he must control it so absolutely as to content himself with the materials which he finds, and to refrain from supplying deficiencies by additions of his own. He must be a profound and ingenious reasoner; yet he must possess sufficient self-command to abstain from casting his facts in the mould of his hypothesis.—Macaulay.

The true historian, therefore, seeking to compose a true picture of the thing acted, must collect facts and combine facts. Methods will differ, styles will differ. Nobody ever does anything like anybody else; but the end in view is generally the same, and the historian's end is truthful narration. Maxims he will have, if he is wise, never a one; and as for a moral, if he tell his story well, it will need none; if he tell it ill, it will deserve none.—Augustine Birrell.

History

History teaches everything, even the future.—Lamartine.

All history is a lie!—Sir Robert Walpole.

There is a history in all men's lives.—Shakespeare.

History is but the unrolled scroll of prophecy.—James A. Garfield.

What is history but a fable agreed upon?—Napoleon I.

Truth is liable to be left-handed in history.—Dumas, Père.

Sin writes history; goodness is silent.—Goethe.

To study history is to study literature.—Willmott.

History is the complement of poetry.—Sir J. Stephen.

Biography is the only true history.—Carlyle.

All history was at first oral.—Dr. Johnson.

Her ample page rich with the spoils of time.—Gray.

The mystery of history is an insoluble problem.—Henry Ward Beecher.

History is a pageant and not a philosopher.—Augustine Birrell.

History is only a confused heap of facts.—Lord Chesterfield.

History is the revelation of Providence.—Kossuth.

History itself is nothing more than legend and romance.—Thomas Wright.

History is clarified experience.—Lowell.

History is, after all, the crystallization of popular beliefs.—Donn Piatt.

History ought to be guided by strict truth: and worthy actions require nothing more.—Pliny the Younger.

History is neither more nor less than biography on a large scale.—Lamartine.

History shows that the majority of men who have done anything great have passed their youth in seclusion.—Heine.

History, which is, indeed, little more than the register of the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind.—Gibbon.

That which history can give us best is the enthusiasm which it raises in our hearts.—Goethe.

The Grecian history is a poem, Latin history a picture, modern history a chronicle.—Chateaubriand.

History casts its shadow far into the land of song.—Longfellow.

History, in whatever way it may be executed, is a great source of pleasure.—Pliny the Younger.

History is little else than a picture of human crimes and misfortunes.—Voltaire.

Anything but history, for history must be false.—Horace Walpole.

They who live in history only seemed to walk the earth again.—Longfellow.

History is the essence of innumerable biographies.—Carlyle.

History is only time furnished with dates and rich with events.—Rivarol.

History is the depository of great actions, the witness of what is past, the example and instructor of the present, and monitor to the future.—Cervantes.

History makes us some amends for the shortness of life.—Skelton.

The historian is a prophet looking backwards.—Schlegel.

History hath triumphed over Time, which besides it, nothing but Eternity hath triumphed over.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

History is but a kind of Newgate calendar, a register of the crimes and miseries that man has inflicted on his fellow-man.—Washington Irving.

History is a mighty drama, enacted upon the theatre of time, with suns for lamps and eternity for a background.—Carlyle.

A Grecian history, perfectly written should be a complete record of the rise and progress of poetry, philosophy, and the arts.—Macaulay.

The impartiality of history is not that of the mirror, which merely reflects objects, but of the judge, who sees, listens, and decides.—Lamartine.

Providence conceals itself in the details of human affairs, but becomes unveiled in the generalities of history.—Lamartine.

History is the witness of the times, the torch of truth, the life of memory, the teacher of life, the messenger of antiquity.—Cicero.

History needs distance, perspective. Facts and events which are too well attested cease, in some sort, to be malleable.—Joubert.

A cultivated reader of history is domesticated in all families; he dines with Pericles, and sups with Titian.—Willmott.

There is no history worthy of attention but that of a free people; the history of a people subjected to despotism is only a collection of anecdotes.—Chamfort.

History is constantly repeating itself, making only such changes of programme as the growth of nations and centuries requires.—Garfield.

History, as it lies at the root of all science, is also the first distinct product of man's spiritual nature; his earliest expression of what can be called thought.—Carlyle.

Not to know what has been transacted in former times is to continue always a child. If no use is made of the labors of past ages, the world must remain always in the infancy of knowledge.—Cicero.

It is when the hour of the conflict is over that history comes to a right understanding of the strife, and is ready to exclaim, "Lo, God is here, and we knew Him not!"—Bancroft.

History, like religion, unites all learning and power, especially ancient history; that is, the history of the nations of the youthful world—Grecian and Roman, Jewish and early Christian.—Richter.

There is nothing that solidifies and strengthens a nation like reading of the nation's own history, whether that history is recorded in books, or embodied in customs, institutions, and monuments.—Joseph Anderson.

What is public history but a register of the successes and disappointments, the vices, the follies, and the quarrels, of those who engage in contention for power?—Paley.

At the bottom there is no perfect history; there is none such conceivable. All past centuries have rotted down, and gone confusedly dumb and quiet.—Carlyle.

Each generation gathers together the imperishable children of the past, and increases them by new sons of light, alike radiant with immortality.—Bancroft.

History maketh a young man to be old, without either wrinkles or grey hairs, privileging him with the experience of age, without either the infirmities or inconveniences thereof.—Fuller.

The history of the past is a mere puppet-show. A little man comes out and blows a little trumpet, and goes in again. You look for something new, and lo! another little man comes out, and blows another little trumpet, and goes in again. And it is all over.—Longfellow.

The student is to read history actively and not passively; to esteem his own life the text, and books the commentary. Thus compelled, the muse of history will utter oracles as never to those who do not respect themselves.—Emerson.

Truth comes to us from the past, as gold is washed down from the mountains of Sierra Nevada, in minute but precious particles, and intermixed with infinite alloy, the debris of the centuries.—Bovee.

In a word, we may gather out of history a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other men's forepassed miseries with our own like errors and ill deservings.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

We must consider how very little history there is—I mean real, authentic history. That certain kings reigned and certain battles were fought, we can depend upon as true; but all the coloring, all the philosophy, of history is conjecture.—Dr. Johnson.

Facts are the mere dross of history. It is from the abstract truth which interpenetrates them, and lies latent among them, like gold in the ore, that the mass derives its whole value; and the precious particles are generally combined with the baser in such a manner that the separation is a task of the utmost difficulty.—Ma-caulay.

Geologists complain that when they want specimens of the common rocks of a country, they receive curious spars; just so, historians give us the extraordinary events and omit just what we want,—the every-day life of each particular time and country.—Whately.

History is a great painter, with the world for canvas, and life for a figure. It exhibits man in his pride, and nature in her magnificence,—Jerusalem bleeding under the Roman, or Lisbon vanishing in flame and earthquake. History must be splendid. Bacon called it the pomp of business. Its march is in high places, and along the pinnacles and points of great affairs.—Willmott.

History presents the pleasantest features of poetry and fiction,—the majesty of the epic, the moving accidents of the drama, the surprises and moral of the romance. Wallace is a ruder Hector; Robinson Crusoe is not stranger than Cæsus; the Knights of Ashby never burnish the page of Scott with richer lights of lance and armor than the Carthaginians, winding down the Alps, east upon Livy.—Willmott.

The world's history is a divine poem of which the history of every nation is a canto and every man a word. Its strains have been pealing along down the centuries, and though there have been mingled the discords of warring cannon and dying men, yet to the Christian philosopher and historian—the humble listener—there has been a divine melody running through the song which speaks of hope and halcyon days to come.—James A. Garfield.

Hobbies

Hobbies should be wives, not mistresses. It will not do to have more than one at a time. One hobby leads you out of extravagance; a team of hobbies you cannot drive till you are rich enough to find corn for them all. Few men are rich enough for that.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Holidays

If all the year were playing holidays,
To sport would be as tedious as to work.
—Shakespeare.

I have a great confidence in the revelations which holidays bring forth.—Beaconsfield.

You sunburnt sicklemen, of August weary,
Come hither from the furrow and be merry:

Make holiday; your rye-straw hats put on
And these fresh nymphs encounter every one
In country footing. —Shakespeare.

The holiest of all holidays are those Kept by ourselves in silence and apart;
The secret anniversaries of the heart,
When the full river of feeling overflows;—
The happy days unclouded to their close;
The sudden joys that out of darkness start
As flames from ashes; swift desires that dart
Like swallows singing down each wind that blows! —Longfellow.

The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the Day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward forevermore.—John Adams.

Holiness

Holiness is an unselfing of ourselves.
—F. W. Faber.

The symmetry of the soul.—Philip Henry.

Holiness is the architectural plan upon which God buildeth up His living temple.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Holiness is happiness; and the more you have of the former, the more you will undoubtedly enjoy of the latter.—

John Angel James.

What Christianity in her antagonism with every form of unbelief most needs is holy living.—Christlieb.

The most holy men are always the most humble men: none so humble on earth as those that live highest in heaven.—Aughey.

Remember that holiness is not the way to Christ, but Christ is the way to holiness.—Aughey.

Whoso lives the holiest life
Is fittest far to die.
—Margaret J. Preston.

Seek and possess holiness, and consolation will follow, as assuredly as warmth follows the dispensation of the rays of the sun.—Upham.

Christ came to give us a justifying righteousness, and He also came to make us holy—not chiefly for the purpose of evidencing here our possession of a justifying righteousness—but for the purpose of forming and fitting us for a blessed eternity.—Chalmers.

If it be heaven toward which we journey, it will be holiness in which we delight; for if we cannot now rejoice in having God for our portion, where is our meetness for a world in which God is to be all in all forever and forever?—Henry Melvill.

It must be a prospect pleasing to God Himself to see His creation forever beautifying in His eyes, and drawing nearer Him by greater degrees of resemblance.—Addison.

The inquirer after holiness should associate with those whose intelligence will instruct him; whose example will guide him; whose conversation will inspire him; whose cautions will warn him.—John Angel James.

Blessed is the memory of those who have kept themselves unspotted from the world. Yet more blessed and more

dear the memory of those who have kept themselves unspotted in the world.—Mrs. Jameson.

Holiness consists of three things—separation from sin, dedication to God, transformation into Christ's image. It is in vain that we talk about the last, unless we know something experimentally about the first.—Aughey.

If it be the characteristic of a worldly man that he desecrates what is holy, it should be of the Christian to consecrate what is secular, and to recognize a present and presiding divinity in all things.—Chalmers.

The narrow way, the way of holiness, not only leads to life, but it is life. Walking there, serene are our days, peaceful our nights, happy—high above the disorders and miseries of a wretched world—shall be our hourly communion with God; happy—full of assurance, of calm and sacred triumph, shall be our dying hour.—Richard Fuller.

But all his mind is bent to holiness,
To number Ave-Maries on his beads;
His champions are the prophets and apostles,
His weapons only saws of sacred writ,
His study is his tilt-yard, and his loves
Are brazen images of canonized saints.
—Shakespeare.

Holiness is religious principle put into motion. It is the love of God sent forth into circulation, on the feet, and with the hands of love to men. It is faith gone to work. It is charity coined into actions, and devotion breathing benedictions on human suffering, while it goes up in intercession to the Father of all piety.—F. D. Huntington.

I make it my constant prayer that God would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion; without a humble imitation of whose example in these things, we can never hope to be a happy nation.—George Washington.

Everything holy is before what is unholy; guilt presupposes innocence, not the reverse; angels, but not fallen ones, were created. Hence man does not properly rise to the highest, but first sinks gradually down from it, and then afterwards rises again; a child can never be considered too innocent and good.—Richter.

It is of things heavenly and universal declaration, working in them whose hearts God inspireth with the due consideration thereof, and habit or disposition of mind whereby they are made fit vessels both for the receipt and delivery of whatsoever spiritual perfection.—Hooker.

He who the sword of heaven will bear
Should be as holy as severe;
Pattern in himself to know,
Grace to stand, and virtue go;
More nor less to others paying
Than by self-offences weighing.
Shame to him whose cruel striking
Kills for faults of his own liking!
—Shakespeare.

Holy Spirit

A religion without the Holy Ghost, though it had all the ordinances and all the doctrines of the New Testament, would certainly not be Christianity.—William Arthur.

There is no reason to believe that the Holy Spirit ever leaves awakened sinners, only as they leave the truth of God for some error or sin.—Ichabod Spencer.

You will find that for a smoking flax there is no specific like heaven's oxygen; for a faint and flickering piety there is no cure comparable to the one without which all our own exertions are but an effort to light a lamp in a vacuum—the breath of the Holy Spirit.—James Hamilton.

Whatever the Holy Spirit prompts a true Christian to do for the glory of God, He allures him to do in a modest way, and with a disposition of indescribable tenderness.—C. S. Robinson.

The work of the Spirit is to impart life, to implant hope, to give liberty, to testify of Christ, to guide us into all truth, to teach us all things, to comfort the believer, and to convict the world of sin.—D. L. Moody.

Culture is good, genius is brilliant, civilization is a blessing, education is a great privilege; but we may be educated villains. The thing that we want most of all is the precious gift of the Holy Ghost.—John Hall.

The believing man hath the Holy Ghost; and where the Holy Ghost dwelleth, He will not suffer a man to be idle, but stirreth him up to all exercises of piety and godliness, and of true religion, to the love of God, to the patient suffering of afflictions, to prayer, to thanksgiving, and the exercise of charity towards all men.—Martin Luther.

I firmly believe that the moment our hearts are emptied of pride and selfishness and ambition and self-seeking and every thing that is contrary to God's law, the Holy Ghost will come and fill every corner of our hearts; but if we are full of pride and conceit and ambition and self-seeking and pleasure and the world, there is no room for the Spirit of God; and I believe many a man is praying to God to fill him when he is full already with something else.—D. L. Moody.

Home

Home is the grandest of all institutions.—Spurgeon.

Home is the chief school of human virtues.—Channing.

Home is the seminary of all other institutions.—Chapin.

Home—the nursery of the Infinite. William Ellery Channing.

Our home is still home, be it ever so homely.—Charles Dibdin.

A happy home is the single spot of rest which a man has upon this earth for the cultivation of his noblest sensibilities.—F. W. Robertson.

Home makes the man.—Samuel Smiles.

Home interprets heaven. Home is heaven for beginners.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

The sweetest type of heaven is home.—J. G. Holland.

Home, in one form or another, is the great object of life.—J. G. Holland.

There is no sanctuary of virtue like home.—Edward Everett.

Home-keeping youth have ever homely wits.—Shakespeare.

The strength of a nation, especially of a republican nation, is in the intelligent and well-ordered homes of the people.—Mrs. Sigourney.

His home, the spot of earth supremely blest,
A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest.
—Montgomery.

Just the wee cot—the cricket's chirr—
Love and the smiling face of her.
—James Whitcomb Riley.

Every one in his own house and God in all of them.—Cervantes.

I value this delicious home-feeling as one of the choicest gifts a parent can bestow.—Washington Irving.

The air of paradise did fan the house, and angels officed all.—Shakespeare.

'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.
—J. Howard Payne.

He is happiest, be he king or peasant, who finds peace in his home.—Goethe.

Home should be an oratorio of the memory, singing to all our after life melodies and harmonies of old-remembered joy.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Communion is the law of growth, and homes only thrive when they sustain relations with each other.—J. G. Holland.

There is no place more delightful than one's own fireside.—Cicero.

The paternal hearth, the rallying-place of the affections.—Washington Irving.

Home should be the centre of joy, equatorial and tropical.—Beecher.

To Adam Paradise was home. To the good among his descendants home is paradise.—Hare.

The first indication of domestic happiness is the love of one's home.—M. de Montlosier.

The spirit and tone of your home will have great influence on your children. If it is what it ought to be, it will fasten conviction on their minds, however wicked they may become.—Richard Cecil.

A Christian home! What a power it is to the child when he is far away in the cold, tempting world, and voices of sin are filling his ears, and his feet stand on slippery places.—A. E. Kittingage.

The house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence, as for his repose.—Sir Edward Coke.

No genuine observer can decide otherwise than that the homes of a nation are the bulwarks of personal and national safety and thrift.—J. G. Holland.

There is a magic in that little word,—it is a mystic circle that surrounds comforts and virtues never known beyond its hallowed limits.—Southey.

A man who in the struggles of life has no home to retire to, in fact or in memory, is without life's best rewards and life's best defences.—J. G. Holland.

To be happy at home is the ultimate result of all ambition, the end to which every enterprise and labor tends, and of which every desire prompts the prosecution.—Johnson.

When home is ruled according to God's word, angels might be asked to stay a night with us, and they would not find themselves out of their element.—C. H. Spurgeon.

There is no happiness in life, there is no misery, like that growing out of the dispositions which consecrate or desecrate a home.—Chapin.

Home is the resort
Of love, of joy, of peace and plenty,
where,
Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss.
—Thomson.

This fond attachment to the well-known
place
Whence first we started into life's long race,
Maintains its hold with such unfailling
sway,
We feel it e'en in age, and at our latest
day.
—Cowper.

'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest
bark
Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home;
'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come.
—Byron.

Stint yourself, as you think good, in other things; but don't scruple freedom in brightening home. Gay furniture and a brilliant garden are a sight day by day, and make life blither.—Charles Buxton.

A house is never perfectly furnished for enjoyment unless there is a child in it rising three years old, and a kitten rising six weeks.—Southey.

We may build more splendid habitations, fill our rooms with paintings and with sculptures, but we cannot buy with gold the old associations.—Longfellow.

How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollection presents them to view:
The orchard, the meadow, the deep-tangled wildwood,
And every lov'd spot which my infancy knew.
—Woodworth.

By the fireside still the light is shining,
The children's arms round the parents twining.
From love so sweet, O who would roam?
Be it ever so homely, home is home.
—D. M. Mulock.

Peace and rest at length have come,
All the day's long toil is past;
And each heart is whispering, "Home, Home at last!"
—Hood.

Our natural and happiest life is when we lose ourselves in the exquisite absorption of home, the delicious retirement of dependent love.—Miss Mulock.

To make a happy fireside clime
To weans and wife,
That's the true pathos and sublime
Of human life.
—Burns.

The little smiling cottagel where at eve
He meets his rosy children at the door,
Prattling their welcomes, and his honest wife,
With good brown cake and bacon slice,
intent
To cheer his hunger after labor hard.
—Dyer.

There's a strange something, which without a brain
Fools feel, and which e'en wise men can't explain,
Planted in man, to bind him to that
earth,
In dearest ties, from whence he drew his birth.
—Churchill.

Breathes there the man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd,
As home his footsteps he hath turn'd,
From wandering on a foreign strand!
—Scott.

It is a woman, and only a woman,
—a woman all by herself, if she likes,

and without any man to help her,—who can turn a house into a home.—
Francis Power Cobbe.

Keep the home near heaven. Let it face toward the Father's house. Not only let the day begin and end with God, with mercies acknowledged and forgiveness sought, but let it be seen and felt that God is your chiefest joy, His will in all you do the absolute and sufficient reason.—James Hamilton.

I have always felt that the best security for civilization is the dwelling, and that upon properly appointed and becoming dwellings depends more than anything else the improvement of mankind. Such dwellings are the nursery of all domestic virtues, and without a becoming home the exercise of those virtues is impossible.—Beaconsfield.

I never heard my father's or mother's voice once raised in any question with each other; nor saw any angry or even slightly hurt or offended glance in the eyes of either. I never heard a servant scolded, nor even suddenly, passionately, or in any severe manner, blamed; and I never saw a moment's trouble or disorder in any household matter.—John Ruskin.

A house is no home unless it contains food and fire for the mind as well as for the body. For human beings are not so constituted that they can live without expansion. If they do not get it in one way, they must in another, or perish.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

The home came from heaven. Modelled on the Father's house and the many mansions, and meant the one to be a training place for the other, the home is one of the gifts of the Lord Jesus—a special creation of Christianity.—James Hamilton.

In the homes of America are born the children of America; and from them go out into American life, American men and women. They go out with the stamp of these homes upon them; and only as these homes are what they should be, will they be what they should be.—J. G. Holland.

It is to Jesus Christ we owe the truth, the tenderness, the purity, the warm affection, the holy aspiration, which go together in that endearing word—home; for it is He who has made obedience so beautiful, and affection so holy; it is He who has brought the Father's home so near, and has taught us that love is of God.—James Hamilton.

If ever household affections and loves are graceful things, they are graceful in the poor. The ties that bind the wealthy and the proud to home may be forged on earth, but those which link the poor man to his humble hearth are of the true metal and bear the stamp of heaven.—Dickens.

The sweetest type of heaven is home—nay, heaven is the home for whose acquisition we are to strive the most strongly. Home, in one form and another, is the great object of life. It stands at the end of every day's labor, and beckons us to its bosom; and life would be cheerless and meaningless, did we not discern across the river that divides us from the life beyond, glimpses of the pleasant mansions prepared for us.—J. G. Holland.

The whitewash'd wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnish'd clock that click'd behind the door;
The chest contriv'd a double debt to pay,
A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day.
—Goldsmith.

The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the Crown. It may be frail, its roof may shake; the wind may blow through it; the storms may enter,—the rain may enter,—but the King of England cannot enter; all his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement!—William Pitt.

Are you not surprised to find how independent of money peace of conscience is, and how much happiness can be condensed in the humblest home? A cottage will not hold the bulky furniture and sumptuous accommodations of a mansion; but if God be there, a cottage will hold as much happiness as might stock a palace.—Dr. James Hamilton.

The domestic relations precede, and in our present existence are worth more than all our other social ties. They give the first throb to the heart, and unseal the deep fountains of its love. Home is the chief school of human virtue. Its responsibilities, joys, sorrows, smiles, tears, hopes, and solitudes form the chief interest of human life.—Channing.

The Cottage Homes of England!
By thousands on her plains,
They are smiling o'er the silvery brooks,
And round the hamlet-farms;
Through glowing orchards forth they peep,
Each from its nook of leaves;
And fearless there the lowly sleep,
As the birds beneath their eaves.

—Mrs. Hemans.

At night returning, every labour sped,
He sits him down, the monarch of a shed;
Smiles by his cheerful fire, and round surveys
His children's looks, that brighten at the blaze;
While his lov'd partner, boastful of her board,
Displays her cleanly platter on the board.
—Goldsmith.

Cling to thy home! If there the meanest shed
Yield thee a hearth and shelter for thy head,
And some poor plot, with vegetables stored,
Be all that Heaven allots thee for thy board,
Unsavory bread, and herbs that scatter'd grow
Wild on the river-brink or mountain-brow;
Yet e'en this cheerless mansion shall provide More heart's repose than all the world beside.
—Leonidas.

Home and heaven are not so far separated as we sometimes think. Nay, they are not separated at all, for they are both in the same great building. Home is the lower story, and is located down here on the ground floor; heaven is above stairs, in the second and third stories; and, as one after another the family is called to come up higher, that which seemed to be such a strange place begins to wear a familiar aspect; and, when at last not one is left below, the home is transferred to heaven, and heaven is home.—Alexander Dickson.

In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting, by repose:
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And as a hare, whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last.
—Goldsmith.

The pleasant converse of the fire-side, the simple songs of home, the words of encouragement as I bend over my school-tasks, the kiss as I lie down to rest, the patient bearing with the freaks of my restless nature, the gentle counsels mingled with reproofs and approvals, the sympathy that meets and assuages every sorrow, and sweetens every little success—all these return to me amid the responsibilities which press upon me now, and I feel as if I had once lived in heaven, and, straying, had lost my way.—J. G. Holland.

Homeliness

Homeliness has this advantage over its enemy, beauty. It is that it is as difficult for an ugly woman to be calumniated as for a pretty woman not to be.—Stahl.

Homer

Like Shakespeare, for all time.—Emerson.

Homer excels all the inventors of other arts in this: that he has swallowed up the honor of those who succeeded him.—Pope.

Milton is the most sublime, and Homer the most picturesque.—Robert Hall.

I can no more believe old Homer blind, Than those who say the sun hath never shin'd; The age wherein he liv'd was dark, but he Could not want sight who taught the world to see. —Denham.

Read Homer once, and you can read no more, For all books else appear so mean, so poor; Verse may seem prose; but still persist to read, And Homer will be all the books you need. —Duke of Buckinghamshire.

Honesty

Honesty is the best policy.—Cervantes.

An honest man's the noblest work of God.—Pope.

No legacy is so rich as honesty.—Shakespeare.

Honest minds are pleased with honest things.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

An honest heart possesses a kingdom.—Seneca.

An honest man is respected by all parties.—Hazlitt.

An honest man's word is as good as his bond.—Cervantes.

Honest men are the gentlemen of nature.—Bulwer-Lytton.

An honest man is always a child.—Martial.

The badge of honesty is simplicity.—Novalis.

Honesty needs no disguise or ornament.—Otway.

Honesty needs no pains to set itself off.—Edward Moore.

Honesty is a warrant of far more safety than fame.—Owen Feltham.

Integrity gains strength by use.—Tillotson.

For honesty coupled to beauty, is to have honey a sauce to sugar.—Shakespeare.

An honest man, sir, is able to speak for himself, when a knave is not.—Shakespeare.

"Honesty is the best policy;" but he who acts on that principle is not an honest man.—Whately.

All other knowledge is hurtful to him who has not honesty and good-nature.—Montaigne.

Friends, if we be honest with ourselves, we shall be honest with each other.—George MacDonald.

What is becoming is honest, and whatever is honest must always be becoming.—Cicero.

I like people to be saints; but I want them to be first and superlatively honest men.—Madame Swetchine.

Honesty is good sense, politeness, amiableness,—all in one.—Richardson.

Rich honesty dwells like a miser, in a poor house, as your pearl in your foul oyster.—Shakespeare.

To be honest as this world goes is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.—Shakespeare.

The more honesty a man has, the less he affects the air of a saint.—Lavater.

Be true, and thou shalt fetter time with everlasting chain.—Schiller.

After all, the most natural beauty in the world is honesty and moral truth; for all beauty is truth.—Shaftesbury.

It is necessary in this life,—at first honesty; then usefulness, which follows nearly always, for they cannot be separated.—Palmieri.

There is no terror in your threats; for I am armed so strong in honesty that they pass by me as the idle wind which I respect not.—Shakespeare.

I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain, what I consider the most enviable of all titles, the character of an "honest man."—George Washington.

A rich man is an honest man, no thanks to him, for he would be a double knave to cheat mankind when he had no need of it.—Daniel De Foe.

Lands mortgaged may return, and more esteem'd,
But honesty once pawn'd, is ne'er redeem'd.
—Middleton.

Money dishonestly acquired is never worth its cost, while a good conscience never costs as much as it is worth.—J. Petit-Senn.

When men cease to be faithful to their God, he who expects to find them so to each other will be much disappointed.—Bishop Horne.

If he does really think that there is no distinction between virtue and vice, why, sir, when he leaves our houses let us count our spoons.—Dr. Johnson.

He who freely praises what he means to purchase, and he who enumerates the faults of what he means to sell, may set up a partnership with honesty.—Lavater.

Honest and courageous people have very little to say about either their courage or their honesty. The sun has no need to boast of his brightness, nor the moon of her effulgence.—Hosea Ballou.

It would be an unspeakable advantage, both to the public and private, if men would consider that great truth, that no man is wise or safe but he that is honest.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

It should seem that indolence itself would incline a person to be honest, as it requires infinitely greater pains and contrivance to be a knave.—Shenstone.

What's the news?
None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest,
Then is doomsday near.
—Shakespeare.

The first step toward greatness is to be honest, says the proverb; but the proverb fails to state the case strong enough. Honesty is not only "the first step toward greatness,"—it is greatness itself.—Bovee.

A prince can mak a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that;
But an honest man's aboon his might,
Guid faith, he maunna fa' that.
—Burns.

It is much easier to ruin a man of principle than a man of none, for he may be ruined through his scruples. Knavery is supple and can bend; but honesty is firm and upright, and yields not.—Colton.

Nothing really succeeds which is not based on reality; sham, in a large sense, is never successful. In the life of the individual, as in the more comprehensive life of the State, pretension is nothing and power is everything.—Whipple.

Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue,
To God, his neighbor, and himself most true:
Whom neither force nor fawning can Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due.
—Herbert.

Nothing more completely baffles one who is full of trick and duplicity himself than straightforward and simple integrity in another. A knave would rather quarrel with a brother-knave than with a fool, but he would rather avoid a quarrel with one honest man than with both.—Colton.

A right mind and generous affection hath more beauty and charms than all other symmetries in the world besides; and a grain of honesty and native worth is of more value than all the adventitious ornaments, estates, or preferments; for the sake of which some of the better sort so oft turn knaves.—Shaftesbury.

It is with honesty in one particular as with wealth,—those that have the thing care less about the credit of it than those who have it not. No poor man can well afford to be thought so, and the less of honesty a finished rogue possesses the less he can afford to be supposed to want it.—Colton.

Put it out of the power of truth to give you an ill character; and if anybody reports you not to be an honest man, let your practice give him the lie; and to make all sure, you should resolve to live no longer than you can live honestly; for it is better to be nothing than a knave.—Marcus Antoninus.

Honesty is not only the deepest policy, but the highest wisdom; since, however difficult it may be for integrity to get on, it is a thousand times more difficult for knavery to get off; and no error is more fatal than that of those who think that Virtue has no other reward because they have heard that she is her own.—Colton.

The man who is so conscious of the rectitude of his intentions as to be willing to open his bosom to the inspection of the world is in possession of one of the strongest pillars of a decided character. The course of such a man will be firm and steady, because he has nothing to fear from the world, and is sure of the approbation and support of heaven.—Wirt.

The root of honesty is an honest intention, the distinct and deliberate purpose to be true, to handle facts as they are, and not as we wish them to be. Facts lend themselves to manipulation. Many a butcher's hand is worth more than its weight in gold. What we want things to be, we come to see them to be; and the tailor pulls the coat and the truth into a perfect fit from his point of view.—Maltbie Babcock.

There is no man but for his own interest hath an obligation to be honest. There may be sometimes temptations to be otherwise; but, all cards cast up, he shall find it the greatest ease, the highest profit, the best pleasure, the most safety, and the noblest fame, to hold the horns of this altar, which, in all assays, can in himself protect him.—Feltham.

An entirely honest man, in the severe sense of the word, exists no more than an entirely dishonest knave; the best and the worst are only approximations to those qualities. Who are those that never contradict themselves? yet honesty never contradicts itself. Who are they that always contradict themselves? yet knavery is mere self-contradiction. Thus the knowledge of man determines not the things themselves, but their proportions, the quantum of congruities and incongruities.—Lavater.

Let honesty be as the breath of thy soul, and never forget to have a penny, when all thy expenses are enumerated and paid: then shalt thou reach the point of happiness and independence shall be thy shield and buckler, thy helmet and crown; then shall thy soul walk upright nor stoop to the silken wretch because he hath riches, nor pocket an abuse because the hand which offers it wears a ring set with diamonds.—Franklin.

Honor

Honor is the moral conscience of the great.—Sir W. Davenant.

Honor lies in honest toil.—Grover Cleveland.

Honor's a lease for life to come.—Samuel Butler.

That chastity of honor which felt a stain like a wound.—Burke.

Probity is true honor.—From the Latin.

Honor, thou strong idol of man's mind.—Sir P. Sidney.

Let us do what honor demands.—Racine.

If I lose mine honor, I lose myself.—Shakespeare.

One honor won is a surety for more.—La Rochefoucauld.

The due of honor in no point omit.—Shakespeare.

What is honorable is also safest.—Livy.

Posts of honor are evermore posts of danger and of care.—J. G. Holland.

Act well your part; there all the honor lies.—Pope.

The strongest passion which I have is honor.—Bailey.

To those whose god is honor, disgrace alone is sin.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Purity is the feminine, truth the masculine, of honor.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

When honor comes to you be ready to take it;
But reach not to seize it before it is near.
—John Boyle O'Reilly.

The noblest spur unto the sons of fame,
Is thirst of honour. —John Hall.

Honor travels in a strait so narrow,
Where one but goes abreast: keep then the path. —Shakespeare.

If honor calls, where'er she points the way
The sons of honor follow, and obey.
—Churchill.

We'll shine in more substantial honours,
And to be noble, we'll be good.
—Thos. Percy.

All is lost save honor.—Francis I.

As the sun breaks through the darkest clouds, so honor peereth in the meanest habit.—Shakespeare.

But if it be a sin to covet honour,
I am the most offending soul alive.
—Shakespeare.

True, conscious honor is to feel no sin:
He's arm'd without that's innocent within.
—Pope.

Better to die ten thousand thousand deaths,
Than wound my honor. —Addison.

Honor is an old-world thing; but it smells sweet to those in whose hand it is strong.—Ouida.

Honors achieved far exceed those that are created.—Solon.

What stronger breastplate than a heart untainted?—Shakespeare.

Hope is a delusion; no hand can grasp a wave or a shadow.—Victor Hugo.

Woman's honor, as nice as ermine, will not bear a soil.—Dryden.

I would not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honour more. —Lovellace.

Let honor be to us as strong an obligation, as necessity is to others.—Pliny.

Our own heart, and not other men's opinions, forms our true honor.—Coleridge.

When a virtuous man is raised, it brings gladness to his friends, grief to his enemies, and glory to his posterity.—Ben Jonson.

Honor is unstable, and seldom the same; for she feeds upon opinion, and is as fickle as her food.—Colton.

That nation is worthless which does not joyfully stake everything on her honor.—Schiller.

The journey of high honor lies not in smooth ways.—Sir P. Sidney.

When about to commit a base deed, respect thyself, though there is no witness.—Ausonius.

There is no praise in being upright, where no one can, or tries to corrupt you.—Cicero.

The giving riches and honors to a wicked man is like giving strong wine to him that hath a fever.—Plutarch.

Honor is like an island, rugged and without a landing-place; we can nevermore re-enter when we are once outside of it.—Boileau.

Honor is the most capricious in her rewards. She feeds us with air, and often pulls down our house, to build our monument.—Colton.

Discretion and hardy valor are the twins of honor, and, nursed together, make a conqueror; divided, but a talker.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Honor and fortune exist for him who always recognizes the neighborhood of the great, always feels himself in the presence of high causes.—Emerson.

Unblemished honor is the flower of virtue! the vivifying soul! and he who slights it will leave the other dull and lifeless dross.—Thomson.

Honour is purchas'd by the deeds we do;
* * * honour is not won,
Until some honourable deed be done.
—Marlowe.

The purest treasure mortal times afford
Is—spotless reputation; that away,
Men are but gilded loam, or painted clay.
—Shakespeare.

Honor is like the eye, which cannot suffer the least injury without damage; it is a precious stone, the price of which is lessened by the least flaw.—Bossuet.

Honor is but the reflection of a man's own actions shining bright in the face of all about him, and from thence rebounding upon himself.—South.

Honour, thou blood-stained god! at whose red altar
Sit war and homicide; oh, to what madness
Will insult drive thy votaries.
—Geo. Coleman, Jr.

Honour is like that glassy bubble,
That finds philosophers such trouble,
Whose least part crack'd, the whole does fly
And wits are crack'd to find out why.
—Butler.

To condemn all the wealth and power in the world, where they stand in competition with a man's honor, is rather good sense than greatness of mind.—Steele.

High honor is not only gotten and born by pain and danger, but must be nursed by the like, else it vanisheth as soon as it appears to the world.—Sir P. Sidney.

The Athenians erected a large statue of Æsop, and placed him, though a slave, on a lasting pedestal, to show that the way to honor lies open indifferently to all.—Phædrus.

Honor is unstable, and seldom the same; for she feeds upon opinion, and is as fickle as her food. She builds a lofty structure on the sandy foundation of the esteem of those who are of all beings the most subject to change.—Colton.

What can be more honorable than to have courage enough to execute the commands of reason and conscience,—to maintain the dignity of our nature, and the station assigned us?—Jeremy Collier.

Keep unscathed the good name; keep out of peril the honor without which even your battered old soldier who is hobbling into his grave on half-pay and a wooden leg would not change with Achilles.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The law of honor is a system of rules constructed by people of fashion, and calculated to facilitate their intercourse with one another.—Paley.

The sense of honor is of so fine and delicate a nature, that it is only to be met with in minds which are naturally noble, or in such as have been cultivated by good examples, or a refined education.—Addison.

Set honor in one eye, and death i' the other,
And I will look on both indifferently;
For, let the gods so speed me as I love
The name of honor more than I fear death.
—Shakespeare.

Man is his own star, and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man,
Commands all light, all influence, all fate;
Nothing to him falls early, or too late.
Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,—
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still!
—Fletcher.

A life of honor and of worth
Has no eternity on earth,—
'Tis but a name—
And yet its glory far exceeds That base and sensual life which leads To want and shame.
—Longfellow.

Honour is
Virtue's allowed ascent: honour that clasps
All perfect justice in her arms; that craves
No more respect than that she gives; that does Nothing but what she'll suffer.
—Massinger.

To be ambitious of true honor, of the true glory and perfection of our natures, is the very principle and incentive of virtue; but to be ambitious of titles, of place, of ceremonial respects and civil pageantry, is as vain and little as the things are which we court.—Sherlock.

Honour's a sacred tie, the law of kings,
The noble mind's distinguishing perfection
That aids and strengthens virtue where it meets her,
And imitates her actions where she is not:
It is not to be sported with.
—Addison.

Honor is not a virtue in itself, it is the mail behind which the virtues fight more securely. A man without honor is as maimed in his equipment as an accoutred knight without helmet. Honor is not simply truthfulness; it is truthfulness sparkling with the fire of a suspective personality. It is something more than an ornament even to the loftiest.—George H. Calvert.

No man of honor, as the word is usually understood, did ever pretend that his honor obliged him to be chaste or temperate, to pay his creditors, to be useful to his country, to do good to mankind, to endeavor to be wise or learned, to regard his word, his promise, or his oath.—Swift.

Your honors here may serve you for a time, as it were for an hour, but they will be of no use to you beyond this world. Nobody will have heard a word of your honors in the other life. Your glory, your shame, your ambitions, and all the treasures for which you push hard and sacrifice much will be like wreaths of smoke. For these things, which you mostly seek, and for which you spend your life, only tarry with you while you are on this side of the flood.—Beecher.

Well, 'tis no matter; honor pricks me on. Yea, but how if honor prick me off, when I come on? how then? Can honor set to a leg? no: or an arm? no: or take away the grief of a wound? no: Honor hath no skill in surgery, then? no. What is honor? a word. What is in that word honor? What is that honor? air. A trim reckoning! Who hath it? he that died o' Wednesday. Doth he feel it? no. Doth he hear it? no. 'Tis insensible, then. Yea, to the dead. But will it not live with the living? no. Why? detraction will not suffer it. Therefore, I'll none of it. Honor is a mere scutecheon: and so ends my catechism.—Shakespeare.

Hope

Hope springs eternal in the human breast.—Pope.

Hope is the mother of faith.—Lan-
dor.

Thou sick man's health!—Cowley.

Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.
—Bible.

Hope is the ruddy morning of joy.
—Richter.

Hope is brightest when it dawns from fears.—Sir Walter Scott.

That star on life's tremulous ocean.
—Moore.

Hope is a light diet, but very stimulating.—Balzac.

Hope springs exulting on triumphant wing.—Burns.

The sickening pang of hope deferred.
—Scott.

Delusive hope still points to distant good.—Euripides.

Hope is a working-man's dream.—
Pliny.

Hope is the poor man's bread.—
Thales.

Hope is such a bait, it covers any hook.—Ben Jonson.

Who against hope believed in hope.
—Bible.

He that lives upon hopes will die
fasting.—Benjamin Franklin.

Hope is a lover's staff.—Shakespeare.

The mighty hopes that make us men.
—Longfellow.

Where no hope is left, is left no fear.
—Milton.

Hope against hope, and ask till ye receive.—Jas. Montgomery.

Folly ends where genuine hope begins.—Cowper.

Hope, deceitful as she is, serves at least to conduct us through life by an agreeable path.—Rochefoucauld.

Hope! thou nurse of young desire.
—Bickerstaff.

The most wretched have yet hope.—
Tupper.

Hope is the most treacherous of all human fancies.—James Fenimore Cooper.

When our hopes break, let our patience hold.—Thomas Fuller.

Where there is no hope there can be no endeavor.—Johnson.

Sire of repentance, child of fond desire!—Cowley.

Hope is love's happiness, but not its life.—Miss L. E. Landon.

He that loses hope may part with anything.—Congreve.

Hope, alas! is our waking dream.—
Madame de Girardin.

The greatest architect and the one most needed is hope.—Henry Ward
Beecher.

It is to hope, though hope were lost.
—Mrs. Barbauld.

Auspicious Hope! in thy sweet garden grow Wreaths for each toil, a charm for every
woe. —Campbell.

Be still, sad heart! and cease repining;
Behind the cloud is the sun still shining.
—H. W. Longfellow.

Things at the worst will cease, or else
climb upward
To what they were before. —Shakespeare.

While there is life, there's hope, (he cried,)
Then why such haste?—so groan'd and died. —Gay.

Hope and fear alternate chase
Our course through life's uncertain race.
—Scott.

Hope ever urges on, and tells us tomorrow will be better.—Tibullus.

Hope is a willing slave; despair is free.—Dawes.

For hope is but the dream of those that wake!—Prior.

The miserable have no other medicine;
But only hope. —Shakespeare.

What can we not endure,
When pains are lessen'd by the hope of cure?
—Nabb.

Hope itself is a pain, while it is overmatched by fear.—Sir P. Sidney.

His worth shines forth the brightest who in hope always confides; the abject soul despairs.—Euripides.

Hope! fortune's cheating lottery; when for one prize an hundred blanks there be!—Cowley.

The shadow of human life is traced upon a golden ground of immortal hope.—Hillard.

If thy hope be any thing worth, it will purify thee from thy sins.—Joseph Alleine.

A religious hope does not only bear up the mind under her sufferings but makes her rejoice in them.—Addison.

Hope will make thee young; for Hope and Youth are children of one mother.—Shelley.

The night is past,—joy cometh with the morrow.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Hope is a leaf-joy which may be beaten out to a great extension, like gold.—Bacon.

Hope is an amusement rather than a good, and adapted to none but very tranquil minds.—Dr. Johnson.

Whatever enlarges hope, will also exalt courage.—Johnson.

The hope of all earnest souls must be realized.—Whittier.

No hope so bright but is the beginning of its own fulfilment.—Emerson.

Hope awakens courage. He who can implant courage in the human soul is the best physician.—Von Knebel.

Hope is the pillar that holds up the world.
Hope is the dream of a waking man.
—Pliny.

With a mind not diseased, a holy life is a life of hope; and at the end of it, death is a great act of hope.—Wm. Mountford.

Hope says to us constantly. "Go on, go on," and leads us thus to the grave.
—Mme. de Maintenon.

Things which you don't hope happen more frequently than things which you do hope.—Plautus.

A woman's hopes are woven of sunbeams; a shadow annihilates them.—George Elliot.

Take hope from the heart of man, and you make him a beast of prey.—Ouida.

Hope is like the sun, which, as we journey towards it, casts the shadow of our burden behind us.—Samuel Smiles.

A propensity to hope and joy is real riches; one to fear and sorrow, real poverty.—Hume.

However deceitful hope may be, yet she carries us on pleasantly to the end of life.—La Rochefoucauld.

A wise Providence consoles our present afflictions by joys borrowed from the future.—Hosea Ballou.

God puts the excess of hope in one man, in order that it may be a medicine to the man who is despondent.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Hope travels through, nor quits us when we die.—Pope.

The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of our life is gone.—Longfellow.

Hope is the best possession. None are completely wretched but those who are without hope; and few are reduced so low as that.—Hazlitt.

Through the sunset of hope,
Like the shapes of a dream,
What paradise islands of glory gleam!
—Shelley.

Hope is like the wing of an angel, soaring up to heaven, and bearing our prayers to the throne of God.—Jeremy Taylor.

Hope is the only good which is common to all men; those who have nothing more possess hope still.—Thales.

Hope animates the wise, and lures the presumptuous and indolent who repose inconsiderately on her promises.—Vauvenargues.

Dear hope! earth's dowry and heav'n's debt,
The entity of things that are not yet:
Subtlest, but surest thing. —Crashaw.

Hope proves man deathless. It is the struggle of the soul, breaking loose from what is perishable, and attesting her eternity.—Henry Melvill.

Hope is the virgin of the ideal world, who opens heaven to us in the midst of every tempest.—Arsène Houssaye.

Man is, properly speaking, based upon hope; he has no other possession but hope; this world of his is emphatically the place of hope.—Carlyle.

It is when our budding hopes are nipped beyond recovery by some rough wind, that we are the most disposed to picture to ourselves what flowers it might have borne, if they had flourished.—Dickens.

There are hopes, the bloom of whose beauty would be spoiled by the trammels of description; too lovely, too delicate, too sacred for words, they should only be known through the sympathy of hearts.—Dickens.

Hope is the last lingering light of the human heart. It shines when every other is put out. Extinguish it, and the gloom of affliction becomes the very blackness of darkness—cheerless and impenetrable.—Aughey.

O Hope, sweet flatterer! thy delusive touch
Sheds on afflicted minds the balm of comfort,
Relieves the load of poverty, sustains
The captive, bending with the weight of bonds,
And smooths the pillow of disease and pain.
—Glover.

Hope is the best part of our riches. What sufficeth it that we have the wealth of the Indies in our pockets, if we have not the hope of heaven in our souls?—Bovee.

Hope is a pleasant acquaintance, but an unsafe friend. Hope is not the man for your banker, though he may do for a traveling companion.—Haliburton.

"Hast thou hope?" they asked of John Knox, when he lay a-dying. He spoke nothing, but raised his finger and pointed upward, and so died.—Carlyle.

A loving heart encloses within itself an unfading and eternal Eden. Hope is like a bad clock, forever striking the hour of happiness, whether it has come or not.—Richter.

Hope is that pleasure of the mind which every one finds in himself upon the thought of a probable future enjoyment of a thing which is apt to delight him.—Locke.

True hope is swift, and flies with swallow's wings:
Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings.
—Shakespeare.

Behind the cloud the starlight lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loveth all His works,
Has left His Hope with all.
—Whittier.

It is necessary to hope, though hope should be always deluded; for hope itself is happiness, and its frustrations, however frequent, are yet less dreadful than its extinction.—Dr. Johnson.

Hope, like the gleaming taper's light,
Adorns and cheers our way;
And still, as darker grows the night,
Emits a brighter ray. —Goldsmith.

Know then, whatever cheerful and serene
Supports the mind, supports the body too:
Hence, the most vital movement mortals feel
Is hope, the balm and lifeblood of the soul.
John Armstrong.

Hope is the mainspring of human action; faith seals our lease of immortality; and charity and love give the passport to the soul's true and lasting happiness.—Street.

A hope unaccompanied with a godly life had better be given up, and the sooner the better; for, if retained, it will prove as a spider's web when God shall take away the soul.—Aughey.

Hope rules a land forever green,
All powers that serve the bright-eyed queen
And confident and gay;
Clouds at her bidding disappear,
Points she to aught?—the bliss draws near
And fancy smooths the way.
—Wordsworth.

Cease, every joy, to glimmer in my mind,
But leave,—oh! leave the light of Hope behind!
What though my winged hours of bliss have been,
Like angel-visits, few and far between.
—Campbell.

Human life has not a surer friend, nor oftentimes a greater enemy, than hope. It is the miserable man's god, which in the hardest gripe of calamity never fails to yield to him beams of comfort. It is the presumptuous man's devil, which leads him a while in a smooth way, and then suddenly breaks his neck.—Owen Feltham.

This comforts me, that the most weather-beaten vessel cannot properly be seized on for a wreck which hath any quick cattle remaining therein. My spirits are not as yet forfeited to despair, having one lively spark of hope in my heart because God is even where He was before.—Fuller.

All which happens in the whole world happens through hope. No husbandman would sow a grain of corn if he did not hope it would spring up and bring forth the ear. How much more are we helped on by hope in the way to eternal life!—Luther.

Hope is a vigorous principle; it is furnished with light and heat to advise and execute; it sets the head and heart to work, and animates a man to do his utmost. And thus, by perpetually pushing and assurance, it puts a difficulty out of countenance, and makes a seeming impossibility give way.—Jeremy Collier.

Hope is our life when first our life grows clear,
Hope and delight, scarce crossed by lines of fear:
Yet the day comes when fain we would not hope—
But forasmuch as we with life must cope,
Struggling with this and that—and who knows why?
Hope will not give us up to certainty,
But still must bide with us.
—Wm. Morris.

The riches of heaven, the honor which cometh from God only, and the pleasures at His right hand, the absence of all evil, the presence and enjoyment of all good, and this good enduring to eternity, never more to be taken from us, never more to be in any, the least degree, diminished, but forever increasing, these are the wreaths which form the contexture of that crown held forth to our hopes.—Bishop Horne.

Never give up! it is wiser and better
Always to hope, than once to despair;
Fling off the load of Doubt's cankering fetter,
And break the dark spell of tyrannical Care:
Never give up or the burden may sink you,
Providence kindly has mingled the cup;
And in all trials and troubles, bethink you
The watchword of life must be,—never give up.
—Tupper.

True hope is based on the energy of character. A strong mind always hopes, and has always cause to hope, because it knows the mutability of human affairs, and how slight a circumstance may change the whole course of events. Such a spirit, too, rests upon itself; it is not confined to partial views or to one particular object. And if at last all should be lost, it has saved itself.—Von Knebel.

Hope is to a man as a bladder to a learning swimmer—it keeps him from sinking in the bosom of the waves, and by that help he may attain the exercise; but yet it many times makes him venture beyond his height, and then if that breaks, or a storm rises, he drowns without recovery. How many would die, did not hope sustain them! How many have died by hoping too much! This wonder we find in Hope, that she is both a flatterer and a true friend.—Feltham.

Used with due abstinence, hope acts as a healthful tonic; intemperately indulged, as an enervating opiate. The visions of future triumph, which at first animate exertion, if dwelt upon too intently, will usurp the place of the stern reality; and noble objects will be contemplated, not for their own inherent worth, but on account of the day-dreams they engender. Thus hope, aided by imagination, makes one man a hero, another a somnambulist, and a third a lunatic; while it renders them all enthusiasts.—Sir J. Stephen.

Failure will hurt but not hinder us. Disillusion will pain but not dishearten us. Sorrows will shake us but not break us. Hope will set the music ringing and quicken our lagging pace. We need hope for living far more than for dying. Dying is easy work compared with living. Dying is a moment's transition; living, a transaction of years. It is the length of the rope that puts the sag in it. Hope tightens the cords and tunes up the heart-strings. Work well, then; suffer patiently, rejoicing in hope. God knows all, and yet is the God of Hope. And when we have hoped to the end here, He will give us something to look forward to, for all eternity. For "hope abideth."—Maltbie Babcock.

Horse — Horsemanship

A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!—Shakespeare.

And witch the world with noble horsemanship.—Shakespeare.

A good rider on a good horse is as much above himself and others as the world can make him.—Lord Herbert.

I will not change my horse with any that treads but on four pasterns. When I bestride him I soar, I am a hawk; he trots the air; the earth sings when he touches it.—Shakespeare.

My beautiful! my beautiful!

That standest meekly by
With thy proudly arch'd and glossy neck,
And dark and fiery eye;—
The stranger hath thy bridle-rein—
Thy master hath his gold—
Fleet-limb'd and beautiful, farewell!
Thou 'rt sold, my steed—thou 'rt sold!
—Mrs. Norton.

Oh! not all the pleasure that poets may praise,—
Not the wildering waltz in the ball-room's blaze,
Nor the chivalrous joust, nor the daring
race,
Nor the swift regatta, nor merry chase,
Nor the sail high heaving waters o'er,
Nor the rural dance on the moonlight shore,—
Can the wild and fearless joy exceed
Of a fearless leap on a fiery steed.
—Sara J. Clarke.

Gamaun is a dainty steed,
Strong, black, and of a noble breed,
Full of fire, and full of bone,
With all his line of fathers known;
Fine his nose, his nostrils thin,
But blown abroad by the pride within;
His mane is like a river flowing,
And his eyes like embers glowing
In the darkness of the night,
And his pace as swift as light.
—Barry Cornwall.

Hospitality

Provision is the foundation of hospitality, and thrift the fuel of magnificence.—Sir P. Sidney.

It is not the quantity of the meat but the cheerfulness of the guests which makes the feast.—Clarendon.

Hospitality sitting with gladness.—
Longfellow.

Hospitality sometimes degenerates into profuseness, and ends in madness and folly.—Atterbury.

Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.—Bible.

There is an emanation from the heart in genuine hospitality which cannot be described, but is immediately felt and puts the stranger at once at his ease.—Washington Irving.

Like many other virtues, hospitality is practiced in its perfection by the poor. If the rich did their share, how would the woes of this world be lightened!—Mrs. Kirkland.

Let not the emphasis of hospitality lie in bed and board; but let truth and love and honor and courtesy flow in all thy deeds.—Emerson.

It is an excellent circumstance that hospitality grows best where it is most needed. In the thick of men it dwindles and disappears, like fruit in the thick of a wood; but where men are planted sparsely it blossoms and matures, like apples on a standard or an espalier. It flourishes where the inn and lodging-house cannot exist.—Hugh Miller.

Blest be that spot, where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire;
Blest that abode, where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair:
Blest be those feasts with simple plenty
crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around Laugh at the jest or pranks, that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale,
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good.

—Goldsmith,

Hours

Hours are golden links—God's tokens reaching heaven.—Dickens.

Catch, then, oh! catch the transient hour,
Improve each moment as it flies;
Life's a short summer—man a flower,
He dies—alas! how soon he dies!
—Dr. Johnson.

House

Houses are like the human beings that inhabit them.—Victor Hugo.

Old houses mended,
Cost little less than new before they're ended.—Colley Cibber.

The house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence as for his repose.—Sir Edward Coke.

My precept to all who build is, that the owner should be an ornament to the house, and not the house to the owner.—Cicero.

A house is never perfectly furnished for enjoyment unless there is a child in it rising three years old, and a kitten rising six weeks.—Southey.

Housekeeping

Nothing lovelier can be found
In woman, than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.—Milton.

Human Nature

A rational nature admits of nothing but what is serviceable to the rest of mankind.—Antoninus.

In so complex a thing as human nature, we must consider it is hard to find rules without exception.—George Eliot.

It is the talent of human nature to run from one extreme to another.—
Swift.

The scrutiny of human nature on a small scale is one of the most dangerous of employments; the study of it on a large scale is one of the safest and truest.—Isaac Taylor.

If we did not take great pains, and were not at great expense to corrupt our nature, our nature would never corrupt us.—Lord Clarendon.

As there is much beast and some devil in man, so is there some angel and some God in him. The beast and the devil may be conquered, but in this life never wholly destroyed.—Cole-ridge.

Console yourself, dear man and brother; whatever you may be sure of, be sure at least of this, that you are dreadfully like other people. Human nature has a much greater genius for sameness than for originality.—Lowell.

Human nature is so weak that the honest men who have no religion make me fret with their perilous virtue, as rope-dancers with their dangerous equilibrium.—De Lévis.

A man's nature is best perceived in privateness, for there is no affectation; in passion, for that putteth a man out of his precepts; and in a new case or experiment, for there custom leaveth him.—Bacon.

There do remain dispersed in the soil of human nature divers seeds of goodness, of benignity, of ingenuity, which being cherished, excited, and quickened by good culture, do by common experience thrust out flowers very lovely, and yield fruits very pleasant of virtue and goodness.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

The fact of our deriving constant pleasure from whatever is a type or semblance of divine attributes, and from nothing but that which is so, is the most glorious of all that can be demonstrated of human nature; it not only sets a great gulf of specific separation between us and the lower animals, but it seems a promise of a communion ultimately deep, close, and conscious, with the Being whose darkened manifestations we here feebly and unthinkingly delight in.—Ruskin.

No doubt hard work is a great police agent. If everybody were worked from morning till night, and then carefully locked up, the register of crime might be greatly diminished. But what would become of human nature? Where would be the room for growth in such a system of things? It is through sorrow and mirth, plenty and need, a variety of passions, circumstances, and temptations, even through sin and misery, that men's natures are developed.—Arthur Helps.

Humanity

Humanity is the Son of God.—Theodore Parker.

Humanity is the equity of the heart.—Confucius.

The still, sad music of humanity.—Wordsworth.

Christianity is the highest perfection of humanity.—Johnson.

Humanity always becomes a conqueror.—Sheridan.

Every human heart is human.—Longfellow.

Poor humanity!—so dependent, so insignificant, and yet so great.—Mme. Swetchine.

So much to pardon, so much to pity, so much to admire!—Longfellow.

I am a man; I count nothing human foreign to me.—Terence.

Our humanity were a poor thing but for the divinity that stirs within us.—Bacon.

One sole God; one sole ruler. His law; one sole interpreter of that law—humanity.—Mazzini.

The gods are immortal men, and men are mortal gods.—Heraclitus.

True men and women are all physicians to make us well.—C. A. Bartol.

What a vile and abject thing is man if he do not raise himself above humanity.—Seneca.

There is nothing on earth divine beside humanity.—Melancthon.

I am not an Athenian, nor a Greek, but a citizen of the world.—Socrates.

When I touch a human hand, I touch heaven.—Malebranche.

The age of chivalry has gone; the age of humanity has come.—Charles Sumner.

Human life is God's outer church. Its needs and urgencies are priests and pastors.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The ingratitude of the world can never deprive us of the conscious happiness of having acted with humanity ourselves.—Goldsmith.

Love, hope, fear, faith—these make humanity;
These are its sign and note and character.
—Robert Browning.

I love my country better than my family; but I love human nature better than my country.—Fénelon.

Woman, above all other educators, educates humanly. Man is the brain, but woman is the heart, of humanity.—Samuel Smiles.

I never knew a young man remarkable for heroic bravery whose very aspect was not lighted up by gentleness and humanity.—Lord Erskine.

Humanity is about the same the world over; and while the earth has its uniformity, with slight differences in mountain and plain, so its products are very nearly alike.—Donn Piatt.

Humanity has won its suit (in America), so that liberty will nevermore be without an asylum.—Lafayette.

Man is the will, and woman the sentiment. In this ship of humanity, Will is the rudder, and Sentiment the sail; when woman affects to steer, the rudder is only a masked sail.—Emerson.

There is a book into which some of us are happily led to look, and to look again, and never tire of looking. It is the Book of Man. You may open that book whenever and wherever you find another human voice to answer yours, and another human hand to take in your own.—Walter Besant.

No piled-up wealth, no social station, no throne, reaches as high as that spiritual plane upon which every human being stands by virtue of his humanity.—Chapin.

Humanity is the peculiar characteristic of great minds; little vicious minds abound with anger and revenge, and are incapable of feeling the exact pleasure of forgiving their enemies.—Chesterfield.

I own that there is a haughtiness and fierceness in human nature which will cause innumerable broils, place men in what situation you please.—Burke.

What proposition is there respecting human nature which is absolutely and universally true? We know of only one,—and that is not only true, but identical,—that men always act from self-interest.—Macaulay.

Humanity is much more shown in our conduct towards animals, where we are irresponsible except to heaven, than towards our fellow-creatures, where we are restrained by the laws, by public opinion, and fear of retaliation.—Chatfield.

There is but one temple in the world, and that is the body of man. Nothing is holier than this high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this revelation in the flesh. We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body.—Novalis.

True humanity consists not in a squeamish ear; it consists not in starting or shrinking at tales of misery, but in a disposition of heart to relieve it. True humanity appertains rather to the mind than to the nerves, and prompts men to use real and active endeavors to execute the actions which it suggests.—Charles James Fox.

The great duty of God's children is to love one another. This duty on earth takes the name and form of the law of humanity. We are to recognize all men as brethren, no matter where born, or under what sky, or institution or religion they may live. Every man belongs to the race, and owes a duty to mankind. Every nation belongs to the family of nations, and is to desire the good of all. Nations are to love one another. * * * Men cannot vote this out of the universal acclamation. * * * Men cannot, by combining themselves into narrower or larger societies, sever the sacred, blessed bond which joins them to their kind. * * * The law of humanity must reign over the assertion of all human rights.—William Ellery Channing

Humility

Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.—Bible.

I believe the first test of a truly great man is his humility.—John Ruskin.

In humility imitate Jesus and Socrates.—Franklin.

The most essential point is lowliness.—Fénelon.

Humbleness is always grace, always dignity.—Lowell.

Modest humility is beauty's crown.—Schiller.

Content thyself to live obscurely good.—Addison.

Love's humility is love's true pride.—Bayard Taylor.

My favored temple is an humble heart.—Bailey.

Do not practise excessive humility.—Dr. John Todd.

Humble things become the humble.—Horace.

Highest when it stoops.—Pollok.

True love is the parent of a noble humility.—William Ellery Channing.

The doctrines of grace humble man without degrading him and exalt him without inflating him.—Charles Hodge.

Heaven's gates are not so highly arched as king's palaces; they that enter there must go upon their knees.—Daniel Webster.

Humility is the altar upon which God wishes that we should offer Him His sacrifices.—La Rochefoucauld.

Humility is the first of the virtues—for other people.—Holmes.

By humility and the fear of the Lord are riches, honor, and life.—Bible.

After crosses and losses, men grow humbler and wiser.—Franklin.

Humility is the solid foundation of all the virtues.—Confucius.

There is nothing so clear-sighted and sensible as a noble mind in a low estate.—Jane Porter.

The street is full of humiliations to the proud.—Emerson.

We cannot think too highly of our nature, nor too humbly of ourselves.—Colton.

Humility, like darkness, reveals the heavenly lights.—Thoreau.

Humility—that low, sweet root from which all heavenly virtues shoot.—Moore.

If man makes himself a worm he must not complain when he is trodden on.—Kant.

The higher a man is in grace, the lower he will be in his own esteem.—Spurgeon.

Humility is eldest-born of Virtue, and claims the birthright at the throne of heaven.—Arthur Murphy.

They that know God will be humble; they that know themselves cannot be proud.—Flavel.

Nothing can be further apart than true humility and servility.—Beecher.

Humanity cannot be degraded by humiliation.—Burke.

'Umble we are, 'umble we have been, 'umble we shall ever be.—Dickens.

The grace that makes every grace amiable is humility.—Richardson.

Humility and resignation are our prime virtues.—Dryden.

It is the cringer to his equal that is chiefly seen bold to his God.—Tupper.

Humility mainly becometh the converse of man with his Maker.—Tupper.

Humility leads to the highest distinction, because it leads to self-improvement.—Sir Benjamin Brodie.

Be very sure that no man will learn anything at all unless he first will learn humility.—Owen Meredith.

Lowliness is the basis of every virtue; and he who goes the lowest builds the safest.—Bailey.

Wellnigh the whole substance of the Christian discipline is humility.—St. Augustine.

I have sounded the very base-string of humility.—Shakespeare.

The fullest and best ears of corn hang lowest toward the ground.—Bishop Reynolds.

The sufficiency of my merit is to know that my merit is not sufficient.—St. Augustine.

Humility is the root, mother, nurse, foundation, and bond of all virtue.—Chrysostom.

It is in vain to gather virtues without humility; for the Spirit of God delighteth to dwell in the hearts of the humble.—Erasmus.

The beloved of the Almighty are the rich who have the humility of the poor, and the poor who have the magnanimity of the rich.—Saadi.

Sense shines with a double lustre when it is set in humility. An able and yet humble man is a jewel worth a kingdom.—William Penn.

May exalting and humanizing thoughts forever accompany me, making me confident without pride, and modest without servility.—Leigh Hunt.

Humility is the Christian's greatest honor; and the higher men climb, the farther they are from heaven.—Burder.

To be humble to our superiors is duty; to our equals, courtesy; to our inferiors, generosity.—Feltham.

True humility—the basis of the Christian system—is the low but deep and firm foundation of all virtues.—Burke.

If thou wouldst find much favor and peace with God and man, be very low in thine own eyes; forgive thyself little, and others much.—Leighton.

The humble soul is like the violet, which grows low, hangs the head downward, and hides itself with its own leaves.—Fredrika Bremer.

Some one called Sir Richard Steele the "vilest of mankind," and he retorted with proud humility, "It would be a glorious world if I were."—Bovee.

"He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." This great law of the kingdom of God is, in the teaching of Christ, inscribed over its entrance-gate.—Thomas Browne.

Shall we speak of the inspiration of a poet or a priest, and not of the heart impelled by love and self-devotion to the lowliest work in the lowliest way of life?—Dickens.

He that places himself neither higher nor lower than he ought to do exercises the truest humility.—Colton.

Whatever obscurities may involve religious tenets, humility and love constitute the essence of true religion; the humble is formed to adore, the loving to associate with eternal love.—Lavater.

God's sweet dews and showers of grace slide off the mountains of pride, and fall on the low valleys of humble hearts, and make them pleasant and fertile.—Leighton.

The high mountains are barren, but the low valleys are covered over with corn; and accordingly the showers of God's grace fall into lowly hearts and humble souls.—Worthington.

Humility is a virtue all preach, none practice, and yet everybody is content to hear. The master thinks it good doctrine for his servant, the laity for the clergy, and the clergy for the laity.—John Selden.

Humility is like a tree, whose root when it sets deepest in the earth rises higher, and spreads fairer and stands surer, and lasts longer, and every step of its descent is like a rib of iron.—Jeremy Taylor.

The loveliest, sweetest flower that bloomed in paradise, and the first that died, has rarely blossomed since on mortal soil. It is so frail, so delicate, a thing, it is gone if it but look upon itself; and she who ventures to esteem it hers proves by that single thought she has it not.—Mrs. E. Fry.

He who sacrifices a whole offering shall be rewarded for a whole offering; he who offers a burnt-offering shall have the reward of a burnt-offering; but he who offers humility to God and man shall be rewarded with a reward as if he had offered all the sacrifices in the world.—The Talmud.

If thou desire the love of God and man, be humble; for the proud heart, as it loves none but itself, so it is beloved of none but by itself; the voice of humility is God's music, and the silence of humility is God's rhetoric. Humility enforces where neither virtue nor strength can prevail nor reason.—Quarles.

I do not know what I may appear to the world; but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the sea shore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me.—Newton.

"If you ask what is the first step in the way of truth? I answer humility," saith St. Austin. "If you ask, what is the second? I say humility. If you ask, what is the third? I answer the same—humility." Is it not as the steps of degree in the temple, whereby we descend to the knowledge of ourselves, and ascend to the knowledge of God? Would we attain mercy? humility will help us.—C. Sutton.

All the world, all that we are, and all that we have, our bodies and our souls, our actions and our sufferings, our conditions at home, our accidents abroad, our many sins, and our seldom virtues, are as so many arguments to make our souls dwell low in the valley of humility.—Jeremy Taylor.

Humor

Humor is wit and love.—Thackeray.

Humor is the pensiveness of wit.—Willmott.

The oil and wine of merry meeting.—Washington Irving.

Humor is the mistress of tears.—Thackeray.

Humor is the harmony of the heart.—Douglas Jerrold.

A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the wisest men.
—Anonymous.

Humor has justly been regarded as the finest perfection of poetic genius.—Carlyle.

Whenever you find Humor, you find Pathos close by its side.—Whipple.

The essence of humor is sensibility; warm, tender fellow-feeling with all forms of existence.—Carlyle.

Humor is of a genial quality, and closely allied to pity.—Henry Giles.

Flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table on a roar.—Shakespeare.

Humor, warm and all-embracing as the sunshine, bathes its objects in a genial and abiding light.—E. P. Whipple.

Men of humor are always in some degree men of genius; wits are rarely so, although a man of genius may, amongst other gifts, possess wit, as Shakespeare.—Coleridge.

What an ornament and safeguard is humor! Far better than wit for a poet and writer. It is a genius itself, and so defends from the insanities.—Walter Scott.

Humor is one of the elements of genius—admirable as an adjunct; but as soon as it becomes dominant, only a surrogate for genius.—Goethe.

The genius of the Spanish people is exquisitely subtle, without being at all acute; hence there is so much humor and so little wit in their literature.—Coleridge.

It is not in the power of every one to taste humor, however he may wish it; it is the gift of God! and a true feeler always brings half the entertainment along with him.—Sterne.

True humor springs not more from the head than from the heart; it is not contempt; its essence is love: it issues not in laughter, but in still smiles, which lie far deeper. It is a sort of inverse sublimity, exalting, as it were, into our affections what is below us, while sublimity draws down into our affections what is above us.—Carlyle.

Humor implies a sure conception of the beautiful, the majestic, and the true, by whose light it surveys and shapes their opposites. It is an humane influence, softening with mirth the ragged inequalities of existence, prompting tolerant views of life, bridging over the spaces which separate the lofty from the lowly, the great from the humble.—E. P. Whipple.

Hunger

Hunger is sharper than the sword.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Cruel as death, and hungry as the grave.—Thomson.

Hunger was the best seasoning for meat.—Cicero.

They that die by famine die by inches.—Matthew Henry.

Famished people must be slowly nursed, And fed by spoonfuls, else they always burst.—Byron.

Hunger is the teacher of the arts, and the bestower of invention.—Persius.

Hunger is the mother of impatience and anger.—Zimmermann.

A hungry people listens not to reason, nor cares for justice, nor is bent by any prayers.—Seneca.

Man is a carnivorous production. And must have meals, at least one meal a day; He cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction, But, like the shark and tiger, must have prey. Although his anatomical construction Bears vegetables, in a grumbling way, Your laboring people think beyond all question, Beef, veal, and mutton better for digestion.—Byron.

Hunting

Hunting is not a proper employment for a thinking man.—Addison.

Proud Nimrod first the bloody chase began, A mighty hunter, and his prey was man.—Pope.

It is very strange and very melancholy that the paucity of human pleasures should persuade us to call hunting one of them.—Dr. Johnson.

A man who can, in cold blood, hunt and torture a poor, innocent animal, cannot feel much compassion for the distress of his own species.—Frederick the Great.

Hunting is a relic of the barbarous spirit that thirsted formerly for human blood, but is now content with the blood of birds and animals.—Bovee.

Poor Jack,—no matter who,—for when I blame
I pity, and must therefore sink the name,— Liv'd in his saddle, lov'd the chase, the
course,
And always ere he mounted, kiss'd his horse. —Cowper.

The healthy huntsman, with a cheerful
horn,
Summons the dogs and greets the dappled Morn.
The jocund thunder wakes the enliven'd
hounds,
They rouse from sleep, and answer sounds
for sounds. —Gay.

Husband

The lover in the husband may be lost.—Lord Lyttleton.

And to thy husband's will Thine shall submit; he over thee shall rule.
—Milton.

I will attend my husband, be his nurse,
Diet his sickness, for it is my office.
—Shakespeare.

With thee goes
Thy husband, him to follow thou art bound;
Where he abides, think there thy native soil. —Milton.

To all married men, be this a caution,
Which they should duly tender as their
life,
Neither to doat too much, nor doubt a wife. —Massinger.

As the husband is, the wife is:
Thou art mated with a clown,
And the grossness of his nature
Will have weight to drag thee down.
—Tennyson.

The wife, where danger or dishonour
lurks,
Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures. —Milton.

A good husband makes a good wife
at any time.—Farquhar.

Marry! no, faith; husbands are like lots in
The lottery, you may draw forty blanks
Before you find one that has any prize
In him; a husband generally is a Careless domineering thing, that grows like Coral; which as long as it is under water
Is soft and tender; but as soon
As it has got its branch above the waves
Is presently hard, stiff, not to be bow'd.
—Marston.

Know then,
As women owe a duty—so do men.
Men must be like the branch and bark to trees,
Which doth defend them from tempestuous rage;—
Clothe them in winter, tender them in age,
Or as ewes' love unto their earlings lives;
Such should be husbands' custom to their wives.
If it appears to them they've stray'd amiss,
They only must rebuke them with a kiss;
Or cluck them as hens' chickens, with kind
call,
Cover them under their wing, and pardon
all. —Wilkins.

Hypocrisy

Every man is a hypocrite.—Friedrich IV.

Trust not him that seems a saint.—Fuller.

Sin is not so sinful as hypocrisy.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue.—La Rochefoucauld.

Saint abroad, and a devil at home.
—Bunyan.

Hypocrisy is the necessary burden of villainy.—Johnson.

Hypocrisy is nothing, in fact, but a horrible hopefulness.—Victor Hugo.

No man is a hypocrite in his pleasures.—Johnson.

If Satan ever laughs, it must be at hypocrites; they are the greatest dupes
he has.—Colton.

Hypocrites do the devil's drudgery in Christ's livery.—Matthew Henry.

Hypocrisy is oftenest clothed in the garb of religion.—Hosea Ballou.

No task is more difficult than systematic hypocrisy.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Oh, what may man within him hide, though angel on the outward side!—Shakespeare.

To wear long faces, just as if our Maker, The God of goodness, was an undertaker.
—Peter Pindar.

If the world despises hypocrites, what must be the estimate of them in heaven?—Madame Roland.

To live a life which is a perpetual falsehood is to suffer unknown tortures.—Victor Hugo.

It will not do to be saints at meeting and sinners everywhere else.—Henry Ward Beecher.

God has given you one face, and you make yourselves another.—Shakespeare.

The only vice that cannot be forgiven is hypocrisy. The repentance of a hypocrite is itself hypocrisy.—Hazlitt.

There is no vice so simple, but assumes Some mark of virtue on its outward parts.
—Shakespeare.

Hypocrisy, the only evil that walks invisible, except to God alone.—Milton.

Whoever is a hypocrite in his religion mocks God, presenting to Him the outside and reserving the inward for his enemy.—Jeremy Taylor.

Hypocrisy is no cheap vice; nor can our natural temper be masked for many years together.—Burke.

The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords.—Bible.

Oh, that deceit should steal such gentle shapes, and with a virtuous vizard hide foul guile!—Shakespeare.

A hypocrite despises those whom he deceives, but has no respect for himself. He would make a dupe of himself, too, if he could.—Hazlitt.

The world's all title-page; there's no contents;
The world's all face; the man who shows his heart
Is looted for his nudities, and scorn'd.
—Young.

Hypocrisy is folly. It is much easier, safer, and pleasanter to be the thing which a man aims to appear than to keep up the appearance of being what he is not.—Cecil.

When you see a man with a great deal of religion displayed in his shop window, you may depend upon it he keeps a very small stock of it within.
—Spurgeon.

He was the mildest manner'd man
That ever scuttled ship, or cut a throat!
With such true breeding of a gentleman,
You never could divine his real thought.
—Byron.

I know of but one garment which the fashionable social life of this country borrows of Christianity; it is that ample garment of charity which covers a multitude of sins—particularly fashionable sins.—J. G. Holland.

The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose.

An evil soul, producing holy witness,
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek;
A goodly apple rotten at the heart;
O, what a goodly outside falsehood hath!
—Shakespeare.

For every man's nature is concealed with many folds of disguise, and covered as it were with various veils. His brows, his eyes, and very often his countenance, are deceitful, and his speech is most commonly a lie.—Cicero.

Hypocrisy itself does great honor, or rather justice, to religion, and tacitly acknowledges it to be an ornament to human nature. The hypocrite would not be at so much pains to put on the appearance of virtue, if he did not know it was the most proper and effectual means to gain the love and esteem of mankind.—Addison.

No man's condition is so base as his;
None more accurs'd than he; for man esteems
Him hateful, 'cause he seems not what he is;
God hates him, 'cause he is not what he seems;
What grief is absent, or what mischief can
Be added to the hate of God and man?
—Quarles.

Surely the mischief of hypocrisy can never be enough inveighed against. When religion is in request, it is the chief malady of the church, and numbers die of it; though because it is a subtle and inward evil, it be little perceived. It is to be feared there are many sick of it, that look well and comely in God's outward worship, and they may pass well in good weather, in times of peace; but days of adversity are days of trial.—Bishop Hall.

Lord love you! when we see what some people do all the week—people who are stanch at church, remember—I can't help thinking there are a good many poor souls who are only Christians at morning and afternoon service.—Dickens.

All live by seeming.
The beggar begs with it, and the gay courtier
Gains land and title, rank and rule, by seeming;
The clergy scorn it not, and the bold soldier
Will eke with it his service.—All admit it,
All practise it; and he who is content
With showing what he is, shall have small credit
In church, or camp, or state.—So wags the world.
—Scott.

Ideality

Ideals are the world's masters.—
J. G. Holland.

Ideality is the avant-courier of the mind.—Horace Mann.

Our ideals are our better selves.—
A. Bronson Alcott.

To have greatly dreamed precludes
low ends.—Lowell.

Ideals we do not make. We discover, not invent, them.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Be true to your own highest convictions.—
William Ellery Channing.

Without the ideal, the inexhaustible source of all progress,—what would man be?—Mme. de Girardin.

When we idealize the real, we sacrifice to artistic fancy.—Fuseli.

Freedom is only in the land of dreams, and the beautiful only blooms in song.—Schiller.

Ideality consists of the rainbow rays of intellect.—Alfred Mercier.

We build statues of snow, and weep to see them melt.—Walter Scott.

It is the vain endeavor to make ourselves
what we are not that has strewn history with so many broken purposes and lives left in the rough.—Lowell.

What we need most is not so much to realize the ideal as to idealize the real.—F. H. Hedge.

Ideal beauty is a fugitive which is never located.—Madame Sévigné.

The ideal itself is but truth clothed in the forms of art.—Octave Feuillet.

The ideal is the flower-garden of the mind, and very apt to run to weeds unless carefully tended.—Mrs. Oliphant.

Every life has its actual blanks, which the ideal must fill up, or which else remain bare and profitless forever.
—Julia Ward Howe.

The true ideal is not opposed to the real, nor is it any artificial heightening thereof, but lies in it; and blessed are the eyes that find it.—Lowell.

The ideal is the only absolute real;
and it must become the real in the individual life as well, however impossible they may count it who never tried it.—George MacDonald.

God hides some ideal in every human soul. At some time in our life we feel a trembling, fearful longing to do some good thing. Life finds its noblest spring of excellence in this hidden impulse to do our best.—Robert Collyer.

All men need something to poetize and idealize their life a little—something which they value for more than its use, and which is a symbol of their emancipation from the mere materialism and drudgery of daily life.—Theodore Parker.

Most people carry an ideal man and woman in their head, and when the practical relations of the men and women of every day are discussed with reference only to these impossible ideals, we need not marvel at any ridiculous conclusions.—Mary Clemmer.

A large portion of human beings live not so much in themselves as in what they desire to be. They create what is called an ideal character, in an ideal form, whose perfections compensate in some degree for the imperfections of their own.—Whipple.

The situation that has not its duty, its ideal, was never yet occupied by man. Yes, here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere is thy ideal; work it out therefrom, and, working, believe, live, be free. Fool! the ideal is in thyself.—Carlyle.

Alas! we know that ideals can never be completely embodied in practice. Ideals must ever lie a great way off—and we will thankfully content ourselves with any not intolerable approximation thereto! Let no man, as Schiller says, too querulously “measure by a scale of perfection the meager product of reality” in this poor world of ours.—Carlyle.

Honor to the idealists, whether philosophers or poets. They have improved us by mingling with our daily pursuits great and transcendent conceptions. They have thrown around our sensual life the grandeur of a better, and drawn us up from contacts with the temporal and the selfish to communion with beauty and truth and goodness.—Chapin.

Every man has at times in his mind the ideal of what he should be, but is not. This ideal may be high and complete, or it may be quite low and insufficient; yet, in all men that really seek to improve, it is better than the actual character. Perhaps no one is so satisfied with himself that he never wishes to be wiser, better, and more holy.—Theodore Parker.

Ideas

The very coinage of your brain.—Shakespeare.

Our ideas are transformed sensations.—Condillac.

Every idea must have a visible enfolding.—Victor Hugo.

Ideas in the head set hands about their several tasks.—A. Bronson Alcott.

An idea, like a ghost (according to the common notion of ghosts), must be spoken to a little before it will explain itself.—Dickens.

Ideas are pitiless.—Lamartine.

It is not my periods that I polish, but my ideas.—Joubert.

The persistence of an all-absorbing idea is terrible.—Victor Hugo.

A fixed idea ends in madness or heroism.—Victor Hugo.

Words are daughters of earth, but ideas are sons of heaven.—Dr. Johnson.

Ideas are like beards; men do not have them until they grow up.—Voltaire.

In these days we fight for ideas, and newspapers are our fortresses.—Heinrich Heine.

Our ideas, like pictures, are made up of lights and shadows.—Joubert.

We live in an age in which superfluous ideas abound and essential ideas are lacking.—Joubert.

Our land is not more the recipient of the men of all countries than of their ideas.—Bancroft.

The material universe exists only in the mind.—Jonathan Edwards.

If the ancients left us ideas, to our credit be it spoken that we moderns are building houses for them.—A. Bronson Alcott.

A sublime idea remains the same, from whatever brain or in whatever region it has its birth.—Menzel.

Ideas must work through the brains and the arms of good and brave men, or they are no better than dreams.—Emerson.

Ideas often flash across our minds more complete than we could make them after much labor.—La Rochefoucauld.

Ideas once planted in the brain fructify, and bear their harvest more or less bountiful and rich as they are fertilized by thought.—Bartol.

To have ideas is to gather flowers. To think is to weave them into garlands.—Madame Swetchine.

Great ideas travel slowly, and for a time noiselessly, as the gods whose feet were shod with wool.—James A. Garfield.

Our ideas, like orange-plants, spread out in proportion to the size of the box which imprisons the roots.—Bulwer-Lytton.

One should conquer the world, not to en throne a man, but an idea; for ideas exist forever.—Beaconsfield.

Time is but the measure of the difficulty of a conception. Pure thought has scarcely any need of time, since it perceives the two ends of an idea almost at the same moment.—Amiel.

To be fossilized is to be stagnant, unprogressive, dead, frozen into a solid. It is only liquid currents of thought that move men and the world.—Wendell Phillips.

Whatsoever the mind perceives of itself, or is the immediate object of perception, thought, or understanding, that I call an idea.—Locke.

Events are only the shells of ideas; and often it is the fluent thought of ages that is crystallized in a moment by the stroke of a pen or the point of a bayonet.—Chapin.

Ideas go booming through the world louder than cannon. Thoughts are mightier than armies. Principles have achieved more victories than horsemen and chariots.—W. M. Faxon.

Ideas are, like matter, infinitely divisible. It is not given to us to get down, so to speak, to their final atoms, but to their molecular groupings the way is never ending, and the progress infinitely delightful and profitable.—Bovee.

Many ideas grow better when transplanted into another mind than in the one where they sprung up. That which was a weed in one intelligence becomes a flower in the other, and a flower again dwindles down to a mere weed by the same change.—O. W. Holmes.

By what strange law of mind is it that an idea long overlooked, and trodden underfoot as a useless stone, suddenly sparkles out in new light, as a discovered diamond?—Mrs. Stowe.

Idleness

Disciplined inaction.—Mackintosh.

Stagnant satisfaction! — Samuel Smiles.

Idleness is the holiday of fools.—Chesterfield.

Idleness is the sepulchre of a living man.—J. G. Holland.

An idler is a watch that wants both hands.—Cowper.

A poor idle man cannot be an honest man.—Achilles Poincelot.

How sweet and sacred idleness is!—Landon.

Lost time is never found again.—Aughey.

I live an idle burden to the ground.—Homer.

Idleness is paralysis.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

To do nothing is in every man's power.—Johnson.

Idleness is the key of beggary.—Spurgeon.

An idle man's brain is the devil's workshop.—Bunyan.

The ruin of most men dates from some idle moment.—Hillard.

Idleness is the nurse of naughtiness.—Robert Burton.

Sluggish idleness—the nurse of sin.—Spenser.

Doing nothing with a deal of skill.—Cowper.

In idleness there is perpetual despair.—Carlyle.

Enjoyment stops where indolence begins.—Pollok.

Watch, for the idleness of the soul approaches death.—Demophilus.

Idleness is emptiness: the tree in which the sap is stagnant, remains fruitless.—Hosea Ballou.

Some people have a perfect genius for doing nothing, and doing it assiduously.—Haliburton.

Absence of occupation is not rest, A mind quite vacant is a mind distress'd.—Cowper.

I look upon indolence as a sort of suicide.—Chesterfield.

There is really nothing left to a genuine idle man, who possesses any considerable degree of vital power, but sin.—J. G. Holland.

If idleness do not produce vice or malevolence, it commonly produces melancholy.—Sydney Smith.

To be idle is the ultimate purpose of the busy.—Dr. Johnson.

Give time to the Evil One, and you give him all he requires.—Gladstone.

Idleness is both a great sin, and the cause of many more.—South.

As idle as a painted ship Upon a painted ocean.—Coleridge.

Every hour of lost time is a chance of future misfortune.—Napoleon I.

Is there anything so wretched as to look at a man of fine abilities doing nothing?—Chapin.

Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do.—Watts.

I pity the man overwhelmed with the weight of his own leisure.—Voltaire.

Idleness is more an infirmity of the mind than of the body.—Rochefoucauld.

Drones suck not eagles' blood, but rob beehives.—Shakespeare.

Stagnation is something worse than death, it is corruption also.—Simms.

Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep; and an idle soul shall suffer hunger.—Bible.

Idleness is the stupidity of the body, and stupidity the idleness of the mind.—Seume.

He is not only idle who does nothing, but he is idle who might be better employed.—Socrates.

Idleness is an inlet to disorder, and makes way for licentiousness. People that have nothing to do are quickly tired of their own company.—Jeremy Collier.

Idleness is many gathered miseries in one name.—Richter.

Laziness grows on people; it begins in cobwebs, and ends in iron chains. The more business a man has to do, the more he is able to accomplish; for he learns to economize his time.—Judge Hale.

Idleness travels very slowly, and poverty soon overtakes her.—Hunter.

Indolent people, whatever taste they may have for society, seek eagerly for pleasure, and find nothing. They have an empty head and seared hearts.—Zimmermann.

There is no remedy for time misspent; No healing for the waste of idleness, Whose very languor is a punishment Heavier than active souls can feel or guess.
—Sir Aubrey de Vere.

Too much idleness, I have observed, fills up a man's time more completely and leaves him less his own master, than any sort of employment whatsoever.—Burke.

So long as idleness is quite shut out from our lives, all the sins of wantonness, softness, and effeminacy are prevented; and there is but little room for temptation.—Jeremy Taylor.

The idle man stands outside of God's plan, outside of the ordained scheme of things; and the truest self-respect, the noblest independence, and the most genuine dignity, are not to be found there.—J. G. Holland.

Idleness is a constant sin, and labor is a duty. Idleness is the devil's home for temptation, and for unprofitable, distracting musings; while labor profiteth others and ourselves.—Baxter.

If you ask me which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall answer pride or luxury or ambition or egotism? No; I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence will conquer all the rest. Indeed, all good principles must stagnate without mental activity.—Zimmermann.

To be idle and to be poor have always been reproaches; and therefore every man endeavors with his utmost care to hide his poverty from others, and his idleness from himself.—Johnson.

He that embarks in the voyage of life will always wish to advance, rather by the impulse of the wind than the strokes of the oar; and many founder in their passage while they lie waiting for the gale.—Johnson.

Sloth makes all things difficult, but industry all easy; and he that riseth late must trot all day, and shall scarce overtake his business at night; while laziness travels so slowly that poverty soon overtakes him.—Franklin.

What is a man, if his chief good and market of his time be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more. Sure, he that made us with such large discourse, looking before and after, gave us not that capability and godlike reason to fust in us unused.—Shakespeare.

Rather do what is nothing to the purpose than be idle; that the devil may find thee doing. The bird that sits is easily shot, when fliers scape the fowler. Idleness is the Dead Sea that swallows all the virtues, and the self-made sepulchre of a living man.—Quarles.

Idleness is the grand Pacific Ocean of life, and in that stagnant abyss the most salutary things produce no good, the most noxious no evil. Vice, indeed, abstractedly considered, may be, and often is engendered in idleness; but the moment it becomes efficiently vice, it must quit its cradle and cease to be idle.—Colton.

In such a world as ours the idle man is not so much a biped as a bivalve; and the wealth which breeds idleness, of which the English peerage is an example, and of which we are beginning to abound in specimens in this country, is only a sort of human oyster bed, where heirs and heiresses are planted, to spend a contemptible life of slothfulness in growing plump and succulent for the grave-worms' banquet.—Horace Mann.

Idleness is the badge of the gentry, the baue of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness, the stepmother of discipline, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, the cushion upon which the devil chiefly reposes, and a great cause not only of melancholy, but of many other diseases; for the mind is naturally active, and, if it is not occupied about some honest business, it rushes into mischief or sinks into melancholy.—Burton.

Time, with all its celerity, moves slowly on to him whose whole employment is to watch its flight.—Dr. Johnson.

If you are idle, you are on the road to ruin; and there are few stopping-places upon it. It is rather a precipice than a road.—Beecher.

The bees can abide no drones amongst them; but as soon as they begin to be idle, they kill them.—Plato.

Idolatry

The idol is the measure of the worshipper.—Lowell.

'Tis mad idolatry,
To make the service greater than the god.
—Shakespeare.

It is not he who forms idols in gold or marble that makes them gods, but he who kneels before them.—Martial.

Man may content himself with the applause of the world, and the homage paid to his intellect; but woman's heart has holier idols.—George Eliot.

Philosophers and common heathen believed one God, to whom all things were referred; but under this God they worshipped many inferior and subservient gods.—Stillingfleet.

Make no man your idol; for the best man must have faults, and his faults will usually become yours in addition to your own. This is as true in art as in morals.—Washington Allston.

Idolatry is certainly the first-born of folly, the great and leading paradox; nay, the very abridgment and sum total of all absurdities.—South.

This idol gold can boast of two peculiarities: it is worshipped in all climates without a single temple, and by all classes without a single hypocrite.—Colton.

God will put up with a great many things in the human heart, but there is one thing that He will not put up with in it—a second place. He who offers God a second place, offers Him no place.—Ruskin.

Ignorance

O thou monster ignorance!—Shakespeare.

The more one endeavors to sound the depths of his ignorance the deeper the chasm appears.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Ignorance is the mother of fear.—Lord Kames.

The common curse of mankind, folly and ignorance.—Shakespeare.

Ignorance never settles a question.—Beaconsfield.

They most assume, who know the least.—Gay.

The law succors the ignorant.—Law Maxim.

Ignorance is the dominion of absurdity.—Froude.

Ignorance is bold, and knowledge reserved.—Thucydides.

Whoever is ignorant is vulgar.—Cervantes.

There is no calamity like ignorance.—Richter.

Positive in proportion to their ignorance.—Hosea Ballou.

Dull, unfeeling, barren ignorance.—Shakespeare.

What ignorance there is in human minds.—Ovid.

The ignorant classes are the dangerous classes. Ignorance is the womb of monsters.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Detraction is the sworn friend to ignorance.—John Webster.

There is no darkness but ignorance.—Shakespeare.

Ignorance is the wet-nurse of prejudice.—H. W. Shaw.

Nothing is more terrible than active ignorance.—Goethe.

Mr. Kremlin was distinguished for ignorance; for he had only one idea, and that was wrong.—Beaconsfield.

To be ignorant of one's ignorance is the malady of the ignorant.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Ignorance is a dangerous and spiritual poison, which all men ought warily to shun.—Gregory.

Where ignorance is bliss
'Tis folly to be wise. —Gray.

How wretched are the minds of men, and how blind their understandings.—Lucretius.

From ignorance our comfort flows,
The only wretched are the wise. —Prior.

It is better to be unborn than untaught; for ignorance is the root of misfortune.—Plato.

Ignorance is a prolonged infancy only deprived of its charm.—De Boufflers.

There is nothing more daring than ignorance.—Menander.

Ignorance is the night of the mind, but a night without moon or star.—Confucius.

Ignorance is the curse of God; knowledge, the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.—Shakespeare.

Ignorant men differ from beasts only in their figure.—Cleanthes.

In friendship, as in love, we are often happier through our ignorance than our knowledge.—Shakespeare.

The truest characters of ignorance are vanity and pride and arrogance.—Samuel Butler.

Well-meant ignorance is a grievous calamity in high places.—Bossuet.

Scholars are frequently to be met with who are ignorant of nothing—saving their own ignorance.—Zimmermann.

A wise man in the company of those who are ignorant has been compared by the sages to a beautiful girl in the company of blind men.—Saadi.

Ignorance is not so damnable as humbug; but when it prescribes pills it may happen to do more harm.—George Eliot.

A man may live long, and die at last in ignorance of many truths, which his mind was capable of knowing, and that with certainty.—Locke.

A man is never astonished or ashamed that he don't know what another does, but he is surprised at the gross ignorance of the other in not knowing what he does.—Haliburton.

Man is arrogant in proportion to his ignorance. Man's natural tendency is to egotism. Man, in his infancy of knowledge, thinks that all creation was formed for him.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Ignorance, when voluntary, is criminal, and a man may be properly charged with that evil which he neglected or refused to learn how to prevent.—Johnson.

Ignorance breeds monsters to fill up all the vacancies of the soul that are unoccupied by the verities of knowledge. He who dethrones the idea of law bids chaos welcome in its stead.—Horace Mann.

Did we but compare the miserable scantiness of our capacities with the vast profundity of things, truth and modesty would teach us wary language.—Glanvill.

So long as thou art ignorant, be not ashamed to learn. Ignorance is the greatest of all infirmities; and when justified, the chiefest of all follies.—Izaak Walton.

Ignorance is mere privation by which nothing can be produced: it is a vacuity in which the soul sits motionless and torpid for want of attraction; and, without knowing why, we always rejoice when we learn, and grieve when we forget.—Johnson.

It is impossible to make people understand their ignorance, for it requires knowledge to perceive it; and, therefore, he that can perceive it hath it not.—Jeremy Taylor.

It is with narrow-souled people as with narrow-necked bottles—the less they have in them the more noise they make in pouring it out.—Pope.

It is thus that we walk through the world like the blind, not knowing whither we are going, regarding as bad what is good, regarding as good what is bad, and ever in entire ignorance.—Madame de Sévigné.

It is with nations as with individuals, those who know the least of others think the highest of themselves; for the whole family of pride and ignorance are incestuous, and mutually beget each other.—Colton.

Do not take the yardstick of your ignorance to measure what the ancients knew, and call everything which you do not know lies. Do not call things untrue because they are marvelous, but give them a fair consideration.—Wendell Phillips.

There is no slight danger from general ignorance; and the only choice which Providence has graciously left to a vicious government, is either to fall by the people, if they are suffered to become enlightened, or with them, if they are kept enslaved and ignorant.—Coleridge.

Without knowledge there can be no sense progress. Vice and barbarism are the inseparable companions of ignorance. Nor is it too much to say that, except in rare instances, the highest virtue is attained only through intelligence.—Charles Sumner.

Ignorance lies at the bottom of all human knowledge, and the deeper we penetrate the nearer we arrive unto it. For what do we truly know, or what can we clearly affirm, of any one of those important things upon which all our reasonings must of necessity be built—time and space, life and death, matter and mind?—Colton.

There are two sorts of ignorance: we philosophize to escape ignorance; we start from the one, we repose in the other; they are the goals from which and to which we tend; and the pursuit of knowledge is but a course between two ignorances, as human life is only a traveling from grave to grave.—Sir William Hamilton.

Thy ignorance in unrevealed mysteries is the mother of a saving faith, and thy understanding in revealed truths is the mother of a sacred knowledge; understand not therefore that thou mayest believe, but believe that thou mayest understand: understanding is the wages of a lively faith, and faith is the reward of an humble ignorance.—Quarles.

Ill-Nature

Think of a man in a chronic state of anger!—Beecher.

Some natures are so sour and ungrateful that they are never to be obliged.—L'Estrange.

Must I give way and room to your rash choler?—Shakespeare.

By indulging this fretful temper, you alienate those on whose affection much of your comfort depends.—Blair.

Ill-nature is a sort of running sore of the disposition.—H. W. Shaw.

Ill-nature consists of a proneness to do ill turns, attended with a secret joy upon the sight of any mischief that befalls another.—South.

Though I carry always some ill-nature about me, yet it is, I hope, no more than is in this world necessary for a preservative.—Marvell.

You have only to watch other ill-natured people to resolve to be unlike them.—Charles Buxton.

Ill-humor is nothing more than an inward feeling of our own want of merit, a dissatisfaction with ourselves which is always united with an envy that foolish vanity excites.—Goethe.

The world is so full of ill-nature that I have lampoons sent me by people who cannot spell, and satires composed by those who scarce know how to write.—Addison.

They give up all sweets of kindness for the sake of peevishness, petulance, or gloom, and alienate the world by neglect of the common forms of civility, and breach of the established laws of conversation.—Dr. Johnson.

Peevishness may be considered the canker of life, that destroys its vigor and checks its improvement; that creeps on with hourly depredations, and taints and vitiates what it cannot consume.—Dr. Johnson.

Ills

Think of the ills from which you are exempt.—Joubert.

Keep what you've got: the ills that we know are the best.—Plautus.

O, yet we trust that somehow good will be the final goal of ill!—Tennyson.

We satisfied ourselves the other day that there was no real ill in life except severe bodily pain; everything else is the child of the imagination, and depends on our thoughts; all other ills find a remedy, either from time or moderation, or strength of mind.—Madame de Sévigné.

Philosophy easily triumphs over past and future ills; but present ills triumph over philosophy.—Rochefoucauld.

All ills spring from some vice, either in ourselves or others; and even many of our diseases proceed from the same origin. Remove the vices, and the ills follow. You must only take care to remove all the vices. If you remove part, you may render the matter worse. By banishing vicious luxury, without curing sloth and an indifference to others, you only diminish industry in the state, and add nothing to men's charity or their generosity.—Hume.

Common and vulgar people ascribe all ill that they feel to others; people of little wisdom ascribe to themselves; people of much wisdom, to no one.—Epictetus.

Illusion

Illusion is the first of all pleasures.—Voltaire.

In youth we feel richer for every new illusion; in maturer years, for every one we lose.—Mme. Swetchine.

A pleasant illusion is better than a harsh reality.—Bovee.

Women are happier in their illusions than in their most agreeable experiences.—Mme. Dufresnoy.

The loss of our illusions is the only loss from which we never recover.—Ouida.

Illusion and wisdom combined are the charm of life and art.—Joubert.

Time is indeed the theater and seat of illusions; nothing is so ductile and elastic. The mind stretches an hour to a century, and dwarfs an age to an hour.—Emerson.

There is no such thing as real happiness in life. The justest definition that was ever given of it was "a tranquil acquiescence under an agreeable delusion"—I forget where.—Sterne.

When the boys come into my yard for leave to gather horse-chestnuts, I own I enter into nature's game, and affect to grant the permission reluctantly, fearing that any moment they will find out the imposture of that showy chaff. But this tenderness is quite unnecessary; the enchantments are laid on very thick. Their young life is thatched with them. Bare and grim to tears is the lot of the children in the hovel I saw yesterday; yet not the less they hang it round with frippery romance, like the children of the happiest fortune.—Emerson.

Every generous illusion of youth leaves a wrinkle as it departs. Experience is the successive disenchanting of the things of life; it is reason enriched with the heart's spoils.—J. Petit-Senn.

Imagination

Imagination rules the world.—Napoleon I.

Imagination is the eye of the soul.—Joubert.

Imagination is the air of mind.—Bailey.

He waxes desperate with imagination.—Shakespeare.

The imagination never dies.—Stedman.

The incurable ills are the imaginary ills.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Imagination is the mightiest despot.—Auerbach.

Keep the imagination sane—that is one of the truest conditions of communion with heaven.—Hawthorne.

The imagination is the secret and harrow of civilization. It is the very eye of faith.—Henry Ward Beecher.

This is the very coinage of your brain; This bodiless creation ecstasy.
—Shakespeare.

We are all of us imaginative in some form or other; for images are the brood of desire.—George Eliot.

There comes a period of the imagination to each—a later youth—the power of beauty, the power of looks, of poetry.—Emerson.

Science does not know its debt to imagination. Goethe did not believe that a great naturalist could exist without this faculty.—Emerson.

The imagination is of so delicate a texture that even words wound it.—Hazlitt.

An uncommon degree of imagination constitutes poetical genius.—Dugald Stewart.

He who has imagination without learning has wings but no feet.—Joubert.

There is nothing more fearful than imagination without taste.—Goethe.

Men speak from knowledge, women from imagination.—Rousseau.

Solitude is as needful to the imagination as society is wholesome for the character.—Lowell.

The soul without imagination is what an observatory would be without a telescope.—Beecher.

The lunatic, the lover, and the poet are of imagination all compact.—Shakespeare.

A ray of imagination or of wisdom may enlighten the universe, and glow into remotest centuries.—Bishop Berkeley.

Women have much more heart and much more imagination than men; hence, fancy often allures them.—Lamartine.

Imagination is not thought, neither is fancy reflection; thought paceth like a hoary sage, but imagination hath wings as an eagle.—Tupper.

But what is the imagination? Only an arm or weapon of the interior energy; only the precursor of the reason.—Emerson.

Imagination disposes of everything; it creates beauty, justice, and happiness, which is everything in this world.—Pascal.

Such is the power of imagination, that even a chimerical pleasure in expectation affects us more than a solid pleasure in possession.—Henry Home.

Imagination without culture is crippled and moves slowly; but it can be pure imagination, and rich also, as folk-lore will tell the vainest.—Ouida.

The sound and proper exercise of the imagination may be made to contribute to the cultivation of all that is virtuous and estimable in the human character.—John Abercrombie.

When I could not sleep for cold
I had fire enough in my brain,
And builded with roofs of gold
My beautiful castles in Spain!
—Lowell.

Imagining is in itself the very height and life of poetry, which, by a kind of enthusiasm or extraordinary emotion of the soul, makes it seem to us that we behold those things which the poet paints.—Dryden.

The world of reality has its limits; the world of imagination is boundless. Not being able to enlarge the one, let us contract the other; for it is from their difference alone that all the evils arise which render us really unhappy.—Rousseau.

Men as yet need some help to their imagination. There remains still room for a little illusion. It is better for men, it is better for women, that each somewhat idealize the other. Much is lost when life has lost its atmosphere, and is reduced to naked fact.—Gail Hamilton.

Imagination is that faculty which arouses the passions by the impression of exterior objects; it is influenced by these objects, and consequently it is in affinity with them; it is contagious; its fear or courage flies from imagination to imagination; the same in love, hate, joy, or grief: hence I conclude it to be a most subtle atmosphere.—Lord John Russell.

Imagination, where it is truly creative, is a faculty, and not a quality; it looks before and after, it gives the form that makes all the parts work together harmoniously toward a given end, its seat is in the higher reason, and it is efficient only as a servant of the will. Imagination, as it is too often misunderstood, is mere fantasy, the image-making power, common to all who have the gift of dreams.—Lowell.

Imagination I understand to be the representation of an individual thought. Imagination is of three kinds: joined with belief of that which is to come; joined with memory of that which is past; and of things present.—Bacon.

A vile imagination, once indulged, gets the key of our minds, and can get in again very easily, whether we will or no, and can so return as to bring seven other spirits with it more wicked than itself; and what may follow no one knows.—Spurgeon.

Imagination is the organ through which the soul within us recognizes a soul without us; the spiritual eye by which the mind perceives and converses with the spiritualities of nature under her material forms; which tends to exalt even the senses into soul by discerning a soul in the objects of sense.—H. N. Hudson.

Fancy can save or kill; it hath clos'd up Wounds when the balsam could not, and without
The aid of salves:—to think hath been a cure.
For witchcraft then, that's all done by the force
Of mere imagination. —Cartwright.

In woman the imagination and fancy have such lively play that the homeliest principles assume forms of beauty. In intellectual pursuits she is destined to excel by her fine sensibilities, her nice observations, and exquisite taste; while man is appointed to investigate the laws of abstruse sciences, and perform in literature and art the bolder flights of genius.—F. D. Fulton.

The imagination acquires by custom a certain involuntary, unconscious power of observation and comparison, correcting its own mistakes, and arriving at precision of judgment, just as the outward eye is disciplined to compare, adjust, estimate, measure, the objects reflected on the back of its retina. The imagination is but the faculty of glassing images; and it is with exceeding difficulty, and by the imperative will of the reasoning faculty resolved to mislead it, that it glasses images which have no prototype in truth and nature.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is the divine attribute of the imagination, that it is irrepressible, unconfined; that when the real world is shut out, it can create a world for itself, and with a necromantic power can conjure up glorious shapes and forms, and brilliant visions to make solitude populous, and irradiate the gloom of a dungeon.—Washington Irving.

And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shape and gives to airy
nothing
A local habitation and a name.
Such tricks has strong imagination
That if he would but apprehend some joy,
It comprehends some bringer of that joy;
Or in the night imagining some fear,
How easy is a bush supposed a bear?
—Shakespeare.

Imitation

Imitation is the sincerest of flattery.—Colton.

Imitators are but a servile kind of cattle.—Dryden.

You may imitate, but never counterfeited.—Balzac.

Even a man's exact imitation of the song of the nightingale displeases us when we discover that it is a mimicry, and not the nightingale.—Kant.

Borrowed wit is the poorest wit.—Lavater.

Man is an imitative creature, and whoever is foremost leads the herd.—Schiller.

I hardly know so true a mark of a little mind as the servile imitation of others.—Lord Greville.

Imitation forms our manners, our opinions, our very lives.—John Weiss.

A good imitation is the most perfect originality.—Voltaire.

We are all easily taught to imitate what is base and depraved.—Juvenal.

Some imitation is involuntary and unconscious.—Willmott.

Human reason borrowed many arts from the instinct of animals.—Dr. Johnson.

He who imitates what is evil always goes beyond the example that is set; on the contrary, he who imitates what is good always falls short.—Guicciardini.

It is certain that either wise bearing or ignorant carriage is caught as men take diseases, one of another.—Shakespeare.

Imitation causes us to leave natural ways to enter into artificial ones; it therefore makes slaves.—Professor Vinet.

Men are so constituted that everybody undertakes what he sees another successful in, whether he has aptitude for it or not.—Goethe.

It is by imitation, far more than by precept, that we learn everything; and what we learn thus, we acquire not only more effectually, but more pleasantly.—Burke.

Imitation pleases, because it affords matter for inquiring into the truth or falsehood of imitation, by comparing its likeness or unlikeness with the original.—Dryden.

For imitation is natural to man from his infancy. Man differs from other animals particularly in this, that he is imitative, and acquires his rudiments of knowledge in this way; besides, the delight in it is universal.—Aristotle.

O imitators, a servile race, how often have your attacks roused my bile and often my laughter!—Horace.

To be as good as our fathers, we must be better. Imitation is not discipleship. When some one sent a cracked plate to China to have a set made, every piece in the new set had a crack in it.—Wendell Phillips.

Since a true knowledge of nature gives us pleasure, a lively imitation of it, either in poetry or painting, must produce a much greater; for both these arts are not only true imitations of nature, but of the best nature.—Dryden.

No single character is ever so great that a nation can afford to form itself upon it. Imitation belittles. This appears in the instance of the Chinese. The Chinese are so many Confucii, in miniature. And so with the Jews. Moses, the lawgiver, is poorly represented by Moses, the old clothesman; or even by Dives, the hanker.—Bovee.

Immigration

If you should turn back from this land to Europe the foreign ministers of the gospel, and the foreign attorneys, and the foreign merchants, and the foreign philanthropists, what a robbery of our pulpits, our court rooms, our storehouses, and our beneficent institutions, and what a putting back of every monetary, merciful, moral, and religious interest of the land! This commingling here of all nationalities under the blessing of God will produce in seventy-five or one hundred years the most magnificent style of man and woman the world ever saw. They will have the wit of one race, the eloquence of another race, the kindness of another, the generosity of another, the æsthetic taste of another, the high moral character of another, and when that man and woman step forth, their brain and nerve and muscle an intertwining of the fibers of all nationalities, nothing but the new electric photographic apparatus, that can see clear through body and mind and soul, can take of them an adequate picture.—T. DeWitt Talmage.

Immodesty

The chariest maid is prodigal enough if she unmask her beauty to the moon.—Shakespeare.

Immodest words admit of no defence
For want of decency is want of sense.
—Pope.

Immortality

Immortality—twin sister of Eternity.—J. G. Holland.

All men desire to be immortal.—Theodore Parker.

I am conscious of eternal life.—Theodore Parker.

What is human is immortal!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Death from sin no power can separate.—Milton.

A good man never dies.—Callimachus.

I look through the grave into heaven.—Théodore Parker.

Immortality is the glorious discovery of Christianity.—William Ellery Channing.

Work for immortality if you will: then wait for it.—J. G. Holland.

The immortality of the soul is assented to rather than believed, believed rather than lived.—O. A. Brownson.

Immortality
Alone could teach this mortal how to die.
—D. M. Mulock.

And in the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives,
—Longfellow.

Let a disciple live as Christ lived, and he will easily believe in living again as Christ does.—Wm. Mountford.

'Tis immortality to die aspiring,
As if a man were taken quick to heaven.
—Geo. Chapman.

All men's souls are immortal, but the souls of the righteous are immortal and divine.—Socrates.

The hope of immortality makes heroes of cowards.—Thomas Guthrie.

The seed dies into a new life, and so does man.—George MacDonald.

There is nothing strictly immortal but immortality.—Sir T. Browne.

Cold in the dust this perished heart may lie, but that which warmed it once shall never die.—Campbell.

To destroy the idea of the immortality of the soul is to add death to death.—Mme. de Souza.

The spirit of man, which God inspired, cannot together perish with this corporeal clod.—Milton.

I have been dying for twenty years, now I am going to live.—Jas. Drummond Burns.

Without a belief in personal immortality, religion surely is like an arch resting on one pillar, like a bridge ending in an abyss.—Max Müller.

No one could ever meet death for his country without the hope of immortality.—Cicero.

May we be satisfied with nothing that shall not have in it something of immortality.—H. W. Beecher.

It is our souls which are the everlastingness of God's purpose in this earth.—Wm. Mountford.

Still seems it strange, that thou shouldst live for ever?
Is it less strange, that thou shouldst live at all?

This is a miracle, and that no more.
—Young.

Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither.
—Wordsworth.

The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which invite me. It is marvelous, yet simple.—Victor Hugo.

Whatsoever that be within us that feels, thinks, desires, and animates, is something celestial, divine, and consequently imperishable.—Aristotle.

Everything is prospective, and man is to live hereafter. That the world is for his education is the only sane solution of the enigma.—Emerson.

Immortality o'ersweeps all pains, all tears, all time, all fears, and peals, like the eternal thunder of the deep, into my ears this truth: Thou livest forever!—Byron.

Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution,
She lives, whom we call dead.
—Longfellow.

'Tis true; 'tis certain; man though dead retains Part of himself; the immortal mind remains.
—Homer.

I came from God, and I'm going back to God, and I won't have any gaps of death in the middle of my life.—George MacDonald.

We do not believe immortality because we have proved it, but we forever try to prove it because we believe it.—James Martineau.

Ah, Christ, that it were possible
For one short hour to see
The souls we loved, that they might tell us
What and where they be. —Tennyson.

Men of dissolute lives have little incentive to look forward to the hopes and glories of immortality. A due conception of these would be incompatible with such a life.—Beecher.

After the sleep of death we are to gather up our forces again with the incalculable results of this life, a crown of shame or glory upon our heads, and begin again on a new level of progress.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Press onward through each varying hour;
Let no weak fears thy course delay;
Immortal being! feel thy power,
Pursue thy bright and endless way.
—Andrews Norton.

Faith in the hereafter is as necessary for the intellectual as the moral character; and to the man of letters, as well as to the Christian, the present forms but the slightest portion of his existence.—Southey.

I feel that I was made to complete things. To accomplish only a mass of beginnings and attempts would be to make a total failure of life. Perfection is the heritage with which my Creator has endowed me, and since this short life does not give completeness, I must have immortal life in which to find it.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

I long to believe in immortality.
* * * If I am destined to be happy with you here—how short is the longest life. I wish to believe in immortality—I wish to live with you forever.—Keats.

Earthly providence is a travesty of justice on any other theory than that it is a preliminary stage, which is to be followed by rectifications. Either there must be a future, or consummate injustice sits upon the throne of the universe. This is the verdict of humanity in all the ages.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

How gloomy would be the mansions of the dead to him who did not know that he should never die: that what now acts shall continue its agency, and what now thinks shall think on forever!—Johnson.

How can it enter into the thoughts of man, that the soul, which is capable of such immense perfections, and of receiving new improvements to all eternity, shall fall away into nothing almost as soon as it is created?—Addison.

The three states of the caterpillar, larva, and butterfly have, since the time of the Greek poets, been applied to typify the human being,—its terrestrial form, apparent death, and ultimate celestial destination.—Sir H. Davy.

O, what a fate is that of man! As often as I hear of some undeserved wretchedness, my thoughts rest on that world where all will be made straight, and where the labors of the sorrowful will end in joy. O that we could call up in the hearts of the afflicted such thoughts!—Fichte.

Man is so created that as to his internal he cannot die; for he is capable of believing in God, and thus of being conjoined to God by faith and love, and to be conjoined to God is to live to eternity.—Swedenborg.

We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth; there is a realm where the rainbow never fades, where the stars will be spread before us like islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beings that pass before us like shadows will stay in our presence forever.—Bulwer-Lytton.

No, no! The energy of life may be kept on after the grave, but not begun; And he who flagg'd not in the earthly strife,
From strength to strength advancing—only he
His soul well-knit, and all his battles won,
Mounts, and that hardly, to eternal life.
—Matthew Arnold.

There may be beings, thinking beings, near or surrounding us, which we do not perceive, which we cannot imagine. We know very little; but, in my opinion, we know enough to hope for the immortality, the individual immortality, of the better part of man.—Sir H. Davy.

It is only our mortal duration that we measure by visible and measurable objects; and there is nothing mournful in the contemplation for one who knows that the Creator made him to be the image of his own eternity, and who feels that in the desire for immortality he has sure proof of his capacity for it.—Southey.

Immortality! We bow before the very term. Immortality! Before it reason staggers, calculation reclines her tired head, and imagination folds her weary pinions. Immortality! It throws open the portals of the vast forever; it puts the crown of deathless destiny upon every human brow; it cries to every uncrowned king of men, "Live forever, crowned for the empire of a deathless destiny!"—George Douglas.

Doth this soul within me, this spirit of thought, and love, and infinite desire, dissolve as well as the body? Has nature, who quenches our bodily thirst, who rests our weariness, and perpetually encourages us to endeavor onwards, prepared no food for this appetite of immortality?—Leigh Hunt.

When I consider the wonderful activity of the mind, so great a memory of what is past, and such a capacity of penetrating into the future: when I behold such a number of arts and sciences, and such a multitude of discoveries thence arising,—I believe and am firmly persuaded that a nature which contains so many things within itself cannot be mortal.—Cicero.

O, listen man!
A voice within us speaks that startling word,
"Man, thou shalt never die!" Celestial voices
Hymn it unto our souls: according harps,
By angel fingers touched, when the mild stars
Of morning sang together, sound forth still
The song of our great immortality.
—Dana.

And now have I finished a work which neither the wrath of Jove, nor fire, nor steel, nor all-consuming time can destroy. Welcome the day which can destroy only my physical man in ending my uncertain life. In my better part I shall be raised to immortality above the lofty stars, and my name shall never die.—Ovid.

It must be so—Plato, thou reasonest well!—
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?
Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis heaven itself, that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.
The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years,
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds.
—Addison.

Whence comes the powerful impression that is made upon us by the tomb? Are a few grains of dust deserving of our veneration? Certainly not; we respect the ashes of our ancestors for this reason only—because a secret voice whispers to us that all is not extinguished in them. It is this that confers a sacred character on the funeral ceremony among all the nations of the globe; all are alike persuaded that the sleep, even of the tomb, is not everlasting, and that death is but a glorious transfiguration.—Chateaubriand.

Impatience

Impatience never commanded success.—Chapin.

Impatience dries the blood sooner than age or sorrow.—Chapin.

Whoever is out of patience is out of possession of his soul.—Bacon.

We waste the power in impatience which, if otherwise employed, might remedy the evil.—Willmott.

Adversity borrows its sharpest sting from our impatience.—Bishop Horne.

Nature is methodical, and doeth her work well. Time is never to be hurried.—Emerson.

Impatient people, according to Bacon, are like the bees, and kill themselves in stinging others.—George Eliot.

Oh! how impatience gains upon the soul,
When the long promised hour of joy draws near!

How slow the tardy moments seem to roll
—Mrs. Tighe.

Impatience turns an ague into a fever, a fever to the plague, fear into despair, anger into rage, loss into madness, and sorrow to amazement.—Jeremy Taylor.

I have not so great a struggle with my vices, great and numerous as they are, as I have with my impatience.—Calvin.

The schoolboy counts the time till the return of the holidays; the minor longs to be of age; the lover is impatient till he is married.—Addison.

Procrastination is hardly more evil than grasping impatience.—Kant.

The beautiful laws of time and space, once dislocated by our inaptitude, are holes and dens. If the hive be disturbed by rash and stupid hands, instead of honey, it will yield us bees.—Emerson.

You are convinced by experience that very few things are brought to a successful issue by impetuous desire, but most by calm and prudent forethought.—Thucydides.

We would willingly, and without remorse, sacrifice not only the present moment, but all the interval (no matter how long) that separates us from any favorite object.—Hazlitt.

Impatience is a quality sudden, eager and insatiable, which grasps at all, and admits of no delay; scorning to wait God's leisure, and attend humbly and dutifully upon the issues of His wise and just Providence.—South.

Such is our impatience, such our hatred of procrastination, in everything but the amendment of our practices and the adornment of our nature, one would imagine we were dragging Time along by force, and not he us.—Landor.

Impenitence

It is not sin that kills the soul, but impenitence.—Bishop Hall.

He that has no present Christ has a future, dark, chaotic, heaving with its destructive ocean; and over it there goes forever—black-pinioned, winging its solitary and hopeless flight, the raven of his anxious thoughts, and finds no place to rest, and comes back again to the desolate ark with its foreboding croak of evil in the present and evil in the future.—Alexander Maclaren.

We pray for those who have ceased to pray. We pray for those that need prayer more than ever, that have fewer and fewer seasons even of thought, that grow hard with years, that are less and less troubled by sin, and that are more and more irreverent of religion. We pray for the children of Christian parents who sometimes weep at the memory of father and mother, but who never have thought of God.—H. W. Beecher.

Ah, sinner, may the Lord quicken thee! But it is a work that makes the Saviour weep. I think when He comes to call some of you from your death in sin, He comes weeping and sighing for you. There is a stone that is to be rolled away—your bad and evil habits—and when that stone is taken away, a still small voice will not do for you; it must be the loud crashing voice, like the voice of the Lord which breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Imperfection

No reckoning made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.
—Shakespeare.

What an absurd thing it is to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities!—Addison.

It is only imperfection that complains of what is imperfect. The more perfect we are, the more gentle and quiet we become towards the defects of others.—Fénelon.

All things are literally better, lovelier, and more beloved for the imperfections which have been divinely appointed, that the law of human life may be Effort, and the law of human judgment Mercy.—Ruskin.

The finer the nature, the more flaws it will show through the clearness of it; and it is a law of this universe, that the best things shall be seldomest seen in their best form.—Ruskin.

Imperfection is in some sort essential to all that we know of life. It is the sign of life in a mortal body, that is to say, of a state of progress and change. Nothing that lives is, or can be rigidly perfect; part of it is decaying, part nascent. The foxglove blossom—a third part bud, a third part past, a third part in full bloom—is a type of the life of this world.—Ruskin.

Imperfection

Where imperfection ceaseth, heaven begins.—Bailey.

Men are more unwilling to have their imperfections known than their crimes.—Chesterfield.

Impertinence

Impertinence will intermeddle in things in which it has no concern, showing a want of breeding, or, more commonly, a spirit of sheer impudence.—Crabbe.

Receive no satisfaction for premeditated impertinence; forget it, forgive it, but keep him inexorably at a distance who offered it.—Lavater.

That man is guilty of impertinence who considers not the circumstances of time, or engrosses the conversation, or makes himself the subject of his discourse, or pays no regard to the company he is in.—Tully.

Imposition

I could hardly feel much confidence in a man who had never been imposed upon.—Hare.

To the generality of men you cannot give a stronger hint for them to impose upon you than by imposing upon yourself.—Fielding.

There are cases in which a man would have been ashamed not to have been imposed on. There is a confidence necessary to human intercourse, and without which men are more injured by their suspicions than they could be by the perfidy of others.—Burke.

Impossibility

Never let me hear that foolish word again.—Mirabeau.

One great difference between a wise man and a fool is: the former only wishes for what he may possibly obtain; the latter desires impossibilities.—Democritus.

Hope not for impossibilities.—Fulder.

Impossible desires are the height of unreason.—Haliburton.

Impossible is a word only to be found in the dictionary of fools.—Napoleon Buonaparte.

To the timid and hesitating everything is impossible because it seems so.—Scott.

Who loves
Believes the impossible.
—Elizabeth B. Browning.

Do not think that what is hard for thee to master is impossible for man; but if a thing is possible and proper to man, deem it attainable by thee.—Marcus Aurelius.

We have more strength than will; and it is often merely for an excuse we say things are impossible.—La Rochefoucauld.

Few things are impossible to diligence and skill.—Sam'l Johnson.

It is not a lucky word, this same impossible; no good comes of those that have it so often in their mouth.—Carlyle.

Nothing is impossible; there are ways which lead to everything; and if we had sufficient will we should always have sufficient means.—Rochefoucauld.

My Lord Anson, at the Admiralty, sends word to Chatham, then confined to his chamber by one of his most violent attacks of the gout, that it is impossible for him to fit out a naval expedition within the period to which he is limited. "Impossible!" cried Chatham, glaring at the messenger: "who talks to me of impossibilities?" Then starting to his feet, and forcing out great drops of agony on his brow with the excruciating torment of the effort, he exclaimed, "Tell Lord Anson that he serves under a minister who treads on impossibilities!"—Whipple.

Imprisonment

Captivity
That comes with honor is true liberty.
—Massinger and Field.

Let them fear bondage who are slaves to fear; the sweetest freedom is an honest heart.—John Ford

Improvement

Improvement is nature.—Leigh Hunt.

Real improvement is of slow growth only.—Seneca.

Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but by ascending a little, you may often look over it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement: we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which could have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.—Helps.

People seldom improve when they have no other model but themselves to copy after.—Goldsmith.

Look up, and not down; look forward, and not back; look out, and not in; and lend a hand.—E. E. Hale.

The improvement of the mind improves the heart and corrects the understanding.—Agathon.

It is necessary to try to surpass one's self always; this occupation ought to last as long as life.—Queen Christiana.

Slumber not in the tents of your fathers. The world is advancing. Advance with it!—Mazzini.

Let us strive to improve ourselves, for we cannot remain stationary: one either progresses or retrogrades.—Mme. du Deffand.

It seems as if the day was not wholly profane in which we have given heed to some natural object.—Emerson.

Judge of thine improvement, not by what thou speakest or writest, but by the firmness of thy mind, and the government of thy passions and affections.—Fuller.

To hear always, to think always, to learn always, it is thus that we live truly. He who aspires to nothing, who learns nothing, is not worthy of living.—Helps.

Where we cannot invent, we may at least improve: we may give somewhat of novelty to that which was old, condensation to that which was diffuse, perspicuity to that which was obscure, and currency to that which was recondite.—Colton.

Improvindence

Buy what thou hast no need of, and ere long thou shalt sell thy necessities.—Benjamin Franklin.

There are men born under that constellation which maketh them, I know not how, as unapt to enrich themselves as they are ready to impoverish others.—Hooker.

It has always been more difficult for a man to keep than to get; for, in the one case, fortune aids, which often assists injustice; but in the other case, sense is required. Therefore, we often see a person deficient in cleverness rise to wealth; and then, from want of sense, roll head over heels to the bottom.—Count Basil.

Impudence

What! canst thou say all this and never blush?—Shakespeare.

A true and genuine impudence is ever the effect of ignorance, without the least sense of it.—Steele.

There is no better provision for life than impudence and a brazen face.—Menander.

What was said by the Latin poet of labor—that it conquers all things—is much more true when applied to impudence.—Fielding.

He that has but impudence,
To all things has a fair pretence;
And put among his wants but shame,
To all the world may lay his claim.
—Butler.

With that dull, rooted, callous impudence,
Which, dead to shame, and ev'ry nicer sense,
Ne'er blushed, unless, in spreading vice's snares,
She blunder'd on some virtue unawares.
—Churchill.

The way to avoid the imputation of impudence is not to be ashamed of what we do, but never to do what we ought to be ashamed of.—Tully.

Impudence is no virtue; yet able to beggar them all; being for the most part in good plight, when the rest starve, and capable of carrying her followers up to the highest preferences; as useful in a court as armor in a camp.—Sir Thomas Osborne.

Impulse

What persons are by starts they are by nature.—Sterne.

Calculation is of the head; impulse is of the heart; and both are good in their way.—Henry Giles.

All our first movements are good, generous, heroical.—Aimé-Martin.

A warm blundering man does more for the world than a frigid wise man.—Cecil.

Act upon your impulses, but pray that they may be directed by God.—Emerson Tennent.

The affection of young ladies is of as rapid growth as Jack's bean-stalk, and reaches up to the sky in a night.—Thackeray.

Women are far more impulsive than men; this is because they are more influenced by the heart than the head.—Mme. Deluzy.

What reason would grope for in vain, spontaneous impulse ofttimes achieves at a stroke, with light and pleasurable guidance.—Goethe.

Impulse is, after all, the best linguist; its logic, if not conformable to Aristotle, cannot fail to be most convincing.—Thoreau.

Since the generality of persons act from impulse, much more than from principle, men are neither so good nor so bad as we are apt to think them.—Hare.

I venture to suggest that the most developed man is he who has the least reason for not simply obeying his impulses, or that perfect impulses mark the perfect man.—James Hinton.

A true history of human events would show that a far larger proportion of our acts are the results of sudden impulses and accidents than of that reason of which we so much boast.—Cooper.

The Indian who fells the tree that he may gather the fruit, and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce are actuated by the same impulse of savage nature, and relinquish for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings.—Gibbon.

On great occasions it is almost always women who have given the strongest proofs of virtue and devotion; the reason is, that with men good and bad qualities are in general the result of calculation, while in women they are impulses springing from the heart.—Montholon.

Incivility

Incivility is the extreme of pride; it is built on the contempt of mankind.—Zimmermann.

A man has no more right to say an uncivil thing, than to act one; no more right to say a rude thing to another, than to knock him down.—Johnson.

Inclination

In this world the inclination to do things is of more importance than the mere power.—Chapin.

Our senses, our appetite, and our passions are our lawful and faithful guides in things that relate solely to this life.—Dr. Johnson.

There is no mind so weak and powerless as not to have its inclinations, and none so guarded as to be without its prepossessions.—Crabbe.

Almost every one has a predominant inclination, to which his other desires and affections submit, and which governs him, though perhaps with some intervals, though the whole course of his life.—Hume.

From the very first instances of perception, some things are grateful and others unwelcome to us; some things we incline to, and others we fly.—

Locke.

Every one follows the inclinations of his own nature.—Propertius.

If you have overcome your inclination and not been overcome by it, you have reason to rejoice.—Plautus.

Inconsistency

Mutability of temper and inconsistency with ourselves is the great weakness of human nature.—Addison.

Woman is a most charming creature, who changes her heart as easily as she does her gloves.—Balzac.

Only imagine a man acting for one single day on the supposition that all his neighbors believe all that they profess, and act up to all that they believe!—Macaulay.

Men talk as if they believed in God,
but they live as if they thought there was none; their vows and promises are no more than words, of course.—
L'Estrange.

There are some who affect a want of affectation, and flatter themselves that they are above flattery; they are proud of being thought extremely humble, and would go round the world to punish those who thought them capable of revenge; they are so satisfied of the suavity of their own temper that they would quarrel with their dearest benefactor only for doubting it.—Colton.

I have known several persons of great fame for wisdom in public affairs and councils governed by foolish servants. I have known great ministers, distinguished for wit and learning, who preferred none but dunces.
I have known men of valor cowards to their wives. I have known men of cunning perpetually cheated. I knew three ministers who would exactly compute and settle the accounts of a kingdom, wholly ignorant of their own economy.—Horace, Walpole.

Inconstancy

They are not constant, but are changing still.—Shakespeare.

Nothing that is not a real crime makes a man appear so contemptible and little in the eyes of the world as inconstancy.—Addison.

Inconstancy falls off ere it begins.
—Shakespeare.

Ladies, like variegated tulips, show
'tis to their changes half their charms
we owe.—Pope.

Inconstancy is the child of satiety.
—Ninon de Lenclos.

Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more;
Men were deceivers ever;
One foot in sea, and one on shore;
To one thing constant never.
—Shakespeare.

We pardon infidelities, but we do not forget them.—Madame de Lafayette.

There are three things a wise man will not trust,—
The wind, the sunshine of an April day,
And woman's plighted faith.
—Southey.

Or as one nail by strength drives out another,
So the remembrance of my former love
Is by a newer object quite forgotten.
—Shakespeare.

I hate inconstancy—I loathe, detest,
Abhor, condemn, abjure the mortal made
Of such quicksilver clay that in his breast
No permanent foundation can be laid.
—Byron.

O, swear not by the moon, the inconstant
moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb,
Lest that thy love prove likewise variable.
—Shakespeare.

The dream on the pillow,
That flits with the day,
The leaf of the willow
A breath wears away;
The dust on the blossom,
The spray on the sea;
Ay,—ask thine own bosom—
Are emblems of thee.
—Miss Landon.

Such an act, that blurs the grace and blush of modesty; calls virtue hypocrite; takes off the rose from the fair forehead of an innocent love, and sets a blister there.—Shakespeare.

Clocks will go as they are set; but man, irregular man, is never constant, never certain.—Otway.

Love, like men, dies oftener of excess than of hunger.—Richter.

How long must women wind in vain

A constant love to find?

No art can fickle man retain,

Or fix a roving mind.

Yet fondly we ourselves deceive,

And empty hopes pursue;

Though false to others, we believe

They will to us prove true.

—Thomas Shadwell.

Inconstancy is but a name,
To fright poor lovers from a better choice.

—Joseph Rutter.

Trust not the treason of those smiling looks,

Until ye have their guileful trains well tried;

For they are like but unto golden hooks,
That from the foolish fish their baits do hide:

So she with flattering smiles weak hearts
doth guide

Unto her love, and tempt to their decay;
Whom, being caught, she kills with cruel pride,

And feeds at pleasure on the wretched prey.

—Spenser.

Incredulity

Incredulity is not wisdom.—Spurgeon.

Incredulity is the wisdom of a fool.
—H. W. Shaw.

The incredulous are the most credulous.—Pascal.

The whole trouble is, that we won't let God help us.—George MacDonald.

There lives more faith in honest doubt, believe me, than in half the creeds.—Tennyson.

Incredulity robs us of many pleasures,
and gives us nothing in return.
—Lowell.

Nothing is so contemptible as that affectation of wisdom, which some display, by universal incredulity.—Goldsmith.

The amplest knowledge has the largest faith. Ignorance is always incredulous. Tell an English cottager that the belfries of Swedish churches are crimson, and his own white steeple furnishes him with a contradiction.—

Willmott.

Some men will believe nothing but what they can comprehend; and there are but few things that such are able to comprehend.—St. Evremont.

Of all the signs of a corrupt heart and a feeble head, the tendency of incredulity is the surest. Real philosophy seeks rather to solve than to deny.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

Incredulity is not wisdom, but the worst kind of folly. It is folly, because it causes ignorance and mistake, with all the consequences of these; and it is very bad, as being accompanied with disingenuity, obstinacy, rudeness, uncharitableness, and the like bad dispositions; from which credulity itself, the other extreme sort of folly, is exempt.—Barrow.

Indecision

The wavering mind is a base property.—Euripides.

When a man has not a good reason for doing a thing, he has one good reason for letting it alone.—Rev. Thomas
Scott.

There is nothing more pitiable in the world than an irresolute man, oscillat-ing between two feelings, who would willingly unite the two, and who does not perceive that nothing can unite them.—Goethe.

In matters of great concern, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind than irresolution; to be undetermined where the case is so plain, and the necessity so urgent. To be always intending to live a new life, but never to find time to set about it; this is as if a man should put off eating, and drinking, and sleeping, from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.—Tillotson.

Independence

Independence now and independence forever.—Daniel Webster.

Independence, like honor, is a rocky island, without a beach.—Napoleon.

For my own private satisfaction, I had rather be master of my own time than wear a diadem.—Bishop Berkeley.

To be truly and really independent is to support ourselves by our own exertions.—Porter.

Can anything be so elegant as to have few wants, and to serve them one's self?—Emerson.

Ourselves are to ourselves the cause of ill; We may be independent if we will.
—Churchill.

The king is the least independent man in his dominions; the beggar the most so.—J. O. and A. W. Hare.

All we ask is to be let alone.—Jefferson Davis.

It is not the greatness of a man's means that makes him independent, so much as the smallness of his wants.—Cobbett.

I would rather sit on a pumpkin, and have it all to myself, than to be crowded on a velvet cushion.—Thoreau.

The man is best served who has no occasion to put the hands of others at the end of his own arms.—Rousseau.

Let Fortune do her worst, whatever she makes us lose, as long as she never makes us lose our honesty and our independence.—Pope.

The greatest of all human benefits, that at least without which no other benefit can be truly enjoyed, is independence.—Parke Godwin.

How happy is he born or taught,
That serveth not another's will;
Whose armor is his honest thought
And simple truth his utmost skill!
—Sir Henry Wotton.

I never thrust my nose into other men's porridge. It is no bread and butter of mine: Every man for himself and God for us all.—Cervantes.

These two things, contradictory as they may seem, must go together,—manly dependence and manly independence, manly reliance and manly self-reliance.—Wordsworth.

The word "independence" is united to the accessory ideas of dignity and virtue. The word "dependence" is united to the ideas of inferiority and corruption.—Bentham.

Hail! Independence, hail! Heaven's next best gift,
To that of life and an immortal soul!
—Thomson.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.—Thomas Jefferson.

* * * but while
I breathe Heaven's air, and Heaven looks down on me,
And smiles at my best meanings, I remain Mistress of mine own self and mine own soul.
—Tennyson.

Gather gear by ev'ry wile
That's justified by honor;
Not for to hide it in a hedge,
Nor for a train attendant;
But for the glorious privilege
Of being independent.
—Burns.

Independence Day

From the year 1789 to the year 1860 no nation has ever known a more unbounded prosperity, a fuller space of happiness. In the short space of seventy years, within the turn of a single life, the nation, poor, weak and despised, raised itself to the pinnacle of power and of glory.—Robert C. Winthrop.

God endowed and set us for a sign to testify the worth of men and the hope there is for man. It is not our national prosperity, great as it is, that is the appropriate theme of our most joyful congratulations, but it is our success in demonstrating that men are equal as God's children, which affords a prophecy of better things for the race.—Leonard Bacon, D. D.

The man, woman or child who hangs out an American flag or a piece of tricolor as a mark of appreciation of July the Fourth does a hundred times more than the noisiest citizen who explodes powder from sundown on the 3d to the morning of the 5th of July.—Vermont Watchman.

Our growth is wreathed and entwined with man's well-being and woman's exaltation. It is a poem of happiness conferred, not of suffering endured. This alone makes our career a blessed one among all the people.—John O'Byrne.

The Fourth of July marks an epoch in the world's history. It marks the birth of a free nation, with all that implies—a nation in the existence of which the oppressed of all lands rejoice, and of which every true American is justly proud.—Selected.

Tracing the progress of mankind in the ascending path of civilization, and moral and intellectual culture, our fathers found that the divine ordinance of government, in every stage of the ascent, was adjustable on principles of common reason to the actual condition of a people, and always had for its objects, in the benevolent councils of the divine wisdom, the happiness, the expansion, the security, the elevation of society, and the redemption of man. They sought in vain for any title of authority of man over man, except of superior capacity and higher morality.—Wm. M. Evarts.

We deplore the decadence of the old-fashioned celebration of the Fourth, with its reading of the Declaration of Independence, patriotic music, and stirring addresses, instinct with the true spirit of the day, American—as they should be—in every syllable, but having a new trend in the direction of sound, sensible consideration of the quality of good citizenship, its practical duties and their faithful performance.—Vermont Watchman.

Many of the features of Independence Day are harmless, enjoyable, inspiring. We would not lessen the sports, processions, excursions, outdoor and indoor entertainments. But the burning of powder, the Chinese fire-crackers, the tin horns, and the ill manners that turn the day into a barbaric carnival are as great an enemy to patriotism as they are a libel on the good sense of the people.—Congregationalist.

Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty Powers!—I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!—Patrick Henry.

"Resolved, That these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, dissolved."—Richard Henry Lee.

If we wish to be free, if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending; if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight; I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms, and to the God of Hosts, is all that is left us!—Patrick Henry.

A century and more has passed, and as the foundations of this government are more firmly settled, as the great structure reared by the fathers now spans the continent from ocean to ocean, and has victoriously established its right to be, political liberty has ceased to be the mere dream of the enthusiast, and has become the every-day fact of the men of thought and action in the world. This was the first step; and we are here to glory in it, and to boast of those ancestors who suffered and toiled and fought to accomplish it.—Judge David J. Brewer.

Grand as have been the achievements of our forefathers under the blessings of Almighty God, there remains a great revolutionary work for us to do; not by dint of arms, not at the sacrifice of fortune, home and life, but with enlightened reason and a pure conscience; we want to do our duty everywhere, and especially at the ballot-box. We no longer want to countenance evil or legalize what will make us blush and cause a net to be spread before our brightest sons and fairest daughters.—Rev. J. W. Loose.

Was it the discipline and skill of the Revolutionists which gave them success? That can hardly be the case as they were not well versed in the tactics of war. We believe that with their loyalty and faithful use of arms in self-defense, they also enjoyed the favor and help of the Almighty, to whom they had appealed for the rectitude of their intentions, and in their greatest extremities sought His aid. They recognized the fact that "the powers that be are ordained of God."—Rev. J. W. Loose.

We shall best honor these men and days of old by signing our own declaration of independence from all those elements of selfishness and sordidness that lead to indifference as to the country's welfare and to an all-absorbing desire for mere personal ease or acquisition.—Princeton Press.

I could not omit to urge on every man to remember that self-government politically can only be successful if it be accompanied by self-government personally; that there must be government somewhere; and that, if the people are indeed to be sovereigns, they must exercise their sovereignty over themselves individually, as well as over themselves in the aggregate—regulating their own lives, resisting their own temptations, subduing their own passions, and voluntarily imposing upon themselves some measure of that restraint and discipline which, under other systems, is supplied from the armories of arbitrary power—the discipline of virtue in the place of the discipline of slavery.—Robert C. Winthrop.

Without Virginia, as we must all acknowledge—without her Patrick Henry among the people, her Lees and Jefferson in the forum, and her Washington in the field—I will not say that the cause of American liberty and American independence must have been ultimately defeated—no, no, there was no ultimate defeat for that cause in the decrees of the Most High; but it must have been delayed, postponed, perplexed, and to many eyes and hearts rendered seemingly hopeless.—Robert C. Winthrop.

The hand that wrote the Declaration of Independence has long ago palsied in death. For more than sixty years Charles Carroll, the last member of that immortal company who appended their names to that famous document, has been slumbering in his grave, but the Declaration is yet a living fact, and to-day the instrument has as much force and meaning as it had one hundred and — years ago.—Christian Enquirer.

Standing, as we do to-day, upon the eminence of more than a century's growth, we can look back the way we have come and see more plainly than it ever appeared before that on the little hill just out of Boston the battle of the 17th of June, 1775, changed, indeed, the front of the universe and set liberty so far in advance of tyranny that liberty will never be overtaken again. Children born in America since that day are heirs to all which that victory portended, and the further up the slope of centuries we go the richer will be our inheritance if we are wise and patriotic enough to appreciate, guard and defend the heritage that our fathers won and handed down.—Rev. W. B. Riley.

The dignity of the act is the deliberate, circumspect, open, and serene performance by these men in the clear light of day, and by a concurrent purpose, of a civic duty, which embraced the greatest hazards to themselves and to all the people from whom they held this deputed discretion, but which, to their sober judgments, promised benefits to that people and their posterity, from generation to generation, exceeding these hazards and commensurate with its own fitness.—Wm. M. Evarts.

The bravest and best men of all times have perished in the struggles against tyranny and despotism, and free government has never secured even a feeble existence save at a most fearful cost. The experiment of republican government in our own country is similar to that of all others. Here, however, liberty has won her grandest triumphs. Here freedom is enthroned securely and is the unchallenged boon of every inhabitant. But we contemplate the cost of the victory with mournful and pitying hearts. To secure it the patriots of the Revolution died; to secure it the hosts who fell in the struggle against the Rebellion were sacrificed.—H. E. Havens.

These are reasons why the most should be made of our national festivals in the direct line of keeping alive our national principles, and it is a happy circumstance that our public schools have become awake to the fact, and are making the exercises of the day before each national holiday point especially to that day. It is a happy circumstance, too, that many of our country towns are going back to the "good old way" of celebrating the "Glorious Fourth": the parade and the reading of the Declaration of Independence and the oration by some genius, local or imported. Even the spread-eagleism which generally characterizes such effusions is not without its value in rekindling the fire of patriotism, which is apt to be pretty deeply buried under the ashes of commonplace self-seeking.—New York Evangelist.

In what region of the earth ever so remote from us, in what corner of creation ever so far out of the range of our communication, does not some burden lightened, some bond loosened, some yoke lifted, some labor better remunerated, some new hope for despairing hearts, some new light or new liberty for the benighted or the oppressed, bear witness this day, and trace itself, directly or indirectly, back to the impulse given to the world by the successful establishment and operation of free institutions on this American continent?—Robert C. Winthrop.

"We wish that whoever in all coming time shall turn his eye hither, may behold that the place is not undistinguished where the first great battle of the Revolution was fought. We wish that this structure may proclaim the magnitude and importance of that event, to every class, in every age. We wish that infancy may learn the purpose of its erection from maternal lips, and that weary and withered age may behold it, and be solaced by the recollections it suggests. We wish that labor may look up here, and be proud, in the midst of its toil. We wish that, in those days of disaster, which, as they come on all nations, must be expected to come on us also, desponding patriotism may turn its eyes hitherward, and be assured that the foundations of our national power still stand strong. We wish that this column, rising toward heaven among the pointed spires of so many temples dedicated to God, may contribute also to produce in all minds a pious feeling of dependence and gratitude. We wish, finally, that the last object on the sight of him who leaves his native shore, and the first to gladden his who revisits it, may be something which shall remind him of the liberty and the glory of his country. Let it rise till it meets the sun in his coming; let the earliest light of the morning gild it, and parting day linger and play on its summit.—Daniel Webster, Dedication Bunker Hill Monument.

Indexes

Time is of more value than type, and the wear and tear of the temper than an extra page of index.—R. H. Busk.

If a book has no index or good table of contents, it is very useful to make one as you are reading it.—Dr. Watts.

I wish you would add an index rerum, that when the reader recollects any incident he may easily find it.—Dr. Johnson.

I certainly think that the best book in the world would owe the most to a good index, and the worst book, if it had but a single good thought in it, might be kept alive by it.—Horace Binney.

So essential did I consider an index to be to every book, that I proposed to bring a bill into Parliament to deprive an author who publishes a book with out an index of the privilege of copyright, and, moreover, to subject him for his offence to a pecuniary penalty.—Lord Campbell.

Indian Summer

It is the Indian summer. The rising sun blazes through the misty air like a conflagration. A yellowish, smoky haze fills the atmosphere, and a filmy mist lies like a silver lining on the sky. The wind is soft and low. It wafts to us the odor of forest leaves, that hang wilted on the dripping branches, or drop into the stream. Their gorgeous tints are gone, as if the autumnal rains had washed them out. Orange, yellow and scarlet, all are changed to one melancholy russet hue. The birds, too, have taken wing, and have left their roofless dwellings. Not the whistle of a robin, not the twitter of an eaves-dropping swallow, not the carol of one sweet, familiar voice. All gone. Only the dismal cawing of a crow, as he sits and curses that the harvest is over; or the chit-chat of an idle squirrel, the noisy denizen of a hollow tree, the mendicant friar of a large parish, the absolute monarch of a dozen acorns.—Longfellow.

Indifference

The indifference of men, far more than their tyranny, is the torment of women.—Michelet.

Indifference is the invincible grant of the world.—Oudia.

Of all heavy bodies, the heaviest is the woman we have ceased to love.—Lemontey.

Selfish people, with no heart to speak of, have the best time of it.—H. W. Shaw.

How chronic is the unconcern of men and women of the world!—Miss Braddon.

The depreciation of Christianity by indifference is a more insidious and less curable evil than infidelity itself.—Whately.

What is a woman's surest guardian angel? Indifference.—Mme. Deluzy.

Indifferent souls never part. Impassioned souls part, and return to one another, because they can do no better.—Mme. Swetchine.

A lady of fashion will sooner excuse a freedom flowing from admiration than a slight resulting from indifference.—Colton.

Affection can withstand very severe storms of vigor, but not a long polar frost of indifference.—Sir Walter Scott.

Mme. Deluzy has said that indifference is a woman's guardian angel,—a remark not only applicable in France, but all over the world.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

Let the world slide, let the world go;
A fig for care, and a fig for woe!
If I can't pay, why I can owe,
And death makes equal the high and low.
—John Heywood.

She commands who is blest with indifference.—Chamfort.

When one becomes indifferent to women, to children, and young people, he may know that he is superannuated and has withdrawn from whatsoever is sweetest and purest in human existence.—Alcott.

Shall I, wasting in despair,
Die because a woman's fair?
Or make pale my cheeks with care,
'Cause another's rosy are?
Be she fairer than the day,
Or the flow'ry meads in May,
If she be not so to me,
What care I how fair she be?
—Geo. Wither.

Indiscretion

Wicked is not much worse than indiscreet.—Donne.

Indiscretion and wickedness, be it known, are first cousins.—Ninon de Lenclos.

The generality of men expend the early part of their lives in contributing to render the latter part miserable.—La Bruyère.

We waste our best years in distilling the sweetest flowers of life into notions which, after all, do not immortalize, but only intoxicate.—Longfellow.

Three things too much and three too little are pernicious to man: to speak much and know little; to spend much and have little; to presume much and be worth little.—Cervantes.

An indiscreet man is more hurtful than an ill-natured one; for as the latter will only attack his enemies, and those he wishes ill to, the other injures indifferently both friends and foes.—Addison.

A man should be careful never to tell tales of himself to his own disadvantage; people may be amused, and laugh at the time, but they will be remembered, and brought up against him upon some subsequent occasion.—Johnson.

Individuality

Every great man is a unique. The Scipionism of Scipio is precisely that part he could not borrow.—Emerson.

Individuals, not stations, ornament society.—Gladstone.

Individuality is everywhere to be spared and respected as the root of everything good.—Richter.

The worth of a state, in the long run, is the worth of the individuals composing it.—J. S. Mill.

Every individual has a place to fill in the world, and is important in some respect, whether he chooses to be so or not.—Hawthorne.

The greatness of an artist or a writer does not depend on what he has in common with other artists and writers, but on what he has peculiar to himself.—Alexander Smith.

Thou art in the end what thou art. Put on wigs with millions of curls, set thy foot upon ell-high rocks. Thou abidest ever—what thou art.—Goethe.

God gave every man individuality of constitution, and a chance for achieving individuality of character. He puts special instruments into every man's hands by which to make himself and achieve his mission.—J. G. Holland.

Let us shun everything which might tend to efface the primitive lineaments of our individuality. Let us reflect that each one of us is a thought of God.—Mme. Swetchine.

The epoch of individuality is concluded, and it is the duty of reformers to initiate the epoch of association. Collective man is omnipotent upon the earth he treads.—Mazzini.

Not nations, not armies, have advanced the race; but here and there, in the course of ages, an individual has stood up and cast his shadow over the world.—Chapin.

Experience serves to prove that the worth and strength of a state depend far less upon the form of its institutions than upon the character of its men; for the nation is only the aggregate of individual conditions, and civilization itself is but a question of personal improvement.—Samuel Smiles.

We move too much in platoons; we march by sections; we do not live in our vital individuality enough; we are slaves to fashion, in mind and in heart, if not to our passions and appetites.—Chapin.

An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man; as, monachism of the Hermit Anthony, the Reformation of Luther, Quakerism of Fox, Methodism of Wesley, abolition of Clarkson. Scipio, Milton called "the height of Rome;" and all history resolves itself easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons. Let a man, then, know his worth, and keep things under his feet.—Emerson.

Every individual nature has its own beauty. One is struck in every company, at every fireside, with the riches of nature, when he hears so many new tones, all musical, sees in each person original manners, which have a proper and peculiar charm, and reads new expressions of face. He perceives that nature has laid for each the foundations of a divine building, if the soul will build thereon.—Emerson.

Human faculties are common, but that which converges these faculties into my identity separates me from every other man. That other man cannot think my thoughts, he cannot speak my words, he cannot do my works. He cannot have my sins, I cannot have his virtues.—Henry Giles.

Indolence

The paralysis of the soul.—Lavater.

The canker-worm of every gentle breast.—Spenser.

Lives spent in indolence, and therefore sad.—Cowper.

The sluggard is a living insensible.—Zimmermann.

Indolence is the sleep of the mind.—Vauvenargues.

Indolence is the devil's cushion.—Dr. Johnson.

As a sex, women are habitually indolent; and everything tends to make them so.—Mary Wollstonecraft.

A useless life is but an early death.—Goethe.

Nothing is difficult; it is only we who are indolent.—B. R. Haydon.

Indolence and stupidity are first cousins.—Rivarol.

Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise.—Bible.

What is often called indolence is in fact the unconscious consciousness of incapacity.—H. C. Robinson.

The want of occupation is no less the plague of society than of solitude.—Rousseau.

The desire of leisure is much more natural than of business and care.—Sir W. Temple.

We bring forth weeds when our quick minds lie still.—Shakespeare.

Indolence, languid as it is, often masters both passions and virtues.—Rochefoucauld.

Who conquers indolence conquers all other hereditary sins.—Zimmermann.

Thou seest how sloth wastes the sluggish body, as water is corrupted unless it moves.—Ovid.

Never suffer youth to be an excuse for inadequacy, nor age and fame to be an excuse for indolence.—B. R. Haydon.

We have more indolence in the mind than in the body.—Rochefoucauld.

I look upon indolence as a sort of suicide; for the man is effectually destroyed, though the appetite of the brute may survive.—Chesterfield.

It should seem that indolence itself would incline a person to be honest; as it requires infinitely greater pains and contrivance to be a knave.—Shenstone.

Indolence is the worst enemy that the church has to encounter. Men sleep around her altar, stretching themselves on beds of ease, or sit idly with folded hands looking lazily out on fields white for the harvest, but where no sickle rings against the wheat.—Bishop Huntington.

If men were weaned from their sauntering humor, wherein they let a good part of their lives run uselessly away, they would acquire skill in hundreds of things.—Locke.

An idle man has a constant tendency to torpidity. He has adopted the Indian maxim—that it is better to walk than to run, and better to stand than to walk, and better to sit than to stand, and better to lie than to sit. He hugs himself into the notion, that God calls him to be quiet.—Richard Cecil.

If you ask me which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall answer pride, or luxury, or ambition, or egotism? No; I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence will conquer all the rest. Indeed all good principles must stagnate without mental activity.—Zimmermann.

To do nothing is in every man's power; we can never want an opportunity of omitting duties. The lapse to indolence is soft and imperceptible, because it is only a mere cessation of activity; but the return to diligence is difficult, because it implies a change from rest to motion, from a privation to reality.—Dr. Johnson.

Indulgence

A fat kitchen makes a lean will.—Franklin.

Rare indulgence produces greater pleasure.—Juvenal.

Feast to-day makes fast to-morrow.—Plautus.

Indulgence, twin sister of guilt.—Mme. Necker.

Indulgence is lovely in the sinless; toleration, adorable in the pious and believing heart.—Mme. Swetchine.

Had doting Priam checked his son's desire, Troy had been bright with fame, and not with fire.—Shakespeare.

Industry

Hell itself must yield to industry.—Ben Jonson.

Keep your working power at its maximum.—W. R. Alger.

Industry need not wish.—Benjamin Franklin.

Sloth makes all things difficult, but industry all things easy.—Benjamin Franklin.

Few things are impossible to diligence and skill.—Johnson.

Plough deep while sluggards sleep.—Franklin.

Nothing is denied to well-directed labor.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Genius begins great works, labor alone finishes them.—Joubert.

Diligence is the mother of good luck.—Franklin.

The laborer is worthy of his hire.—Bible.

In every rank, or great or small,
'Tis industry supports us all.
—Gay.

The sweat of industry would dry, and die,
But for the end it works to.
—Shakespeare.

Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings.—Bible.

The more we do, the more we can do; the more busy we are, the more leisure we have.—Hazlitt.

In this theater of man's life, it is reserved only for God and angels to be lookers-on.—Pythagoras.

One loses all the time which he can employ better.—Rousseau.

Industry has annexed thereto the fairest fruits and the richest rewards.—Barrow.

The end of labor is to gain leisure. It is a great saying.—Aristotle.

That man is but of the lower part of the world that is not brought up to business and affairs.—Feltham.

Earnest, active industry is a living hymn of praise.—a never-failing source of happiness.—Mme. de Wald.

We mistake the gratuitous blessings of heaven for the fruits of our own industry.—L'Estrange.

The great end of all human industry is the attainment of happiness.—Hume.

At the workingman's house, hunger looks in, but dares not enter.—Benjamin Franklin.

Genius is the father of a heavenly line, but the mortal mother, that is industry.—Theodore Parker.

In the ordinary business of life, industry can do anything which genius can do, and very many things which it cannot.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Shortly his fortune shall be lifted higher;
True industry doth kindle honour's fire.
—Shakespeare.

God has so made the mind of man that a peculiar deliciousness resides in the fruits of personal industry.—Wilberforce.

A man who gives his children habits of industry provides for them better than by giving them a fortune.—
Whately.

A plodding diligence brings us sooner to our journey's end than a fluttering way of advancing by starts.—
L'Estrange.

Application is the price to be paid for mental acquisition. To have the harvest, we must sow the seed.—
Bailey.

If you have great talents, industry will improve them; if you have but moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiencies.—Samuel Smiles.

Industry is a Christian obligation, imposed on our race to develop the noblest energies, and insures the highest reward.—E. L. Magoon.

Honorable industry always travels the same road with enjoyment and duty, and progress is altogether impossible without it.—Samuel Smiles.

Mankind are more indebted to industry than ingenuity; the gods set up their favors at a price, and industry is the purchaser.—Addison.

The bread earned by the sweat of the brow is thrice blessed bread, and it is far sweeter than the tasteless loaf of idleness.—Crowquill.

No man is born into the world whose work is not born with him; there is always work, and tools to work withal, for those who will; and blessed are the horny hands of toil!—Lowell.

The way to wealth is as plain as the way to market. It depends chiefly on two words, industry and frugality;

that is, waste neither time nor money, but make the best use of both.—
Franklin.

Well for the drones of the social hive that there are bees of an industrious turn, willing, for an infinitesimal share of the honey, to undertake the labor of its fabrication.—Hood.

I have observed that as long as one lives and bestirs himself, he can always find food and raiment, though it may not be of the choicest description.—
Goethe.

Whenever you see want or misery or degradation in this world about you, then be sure either industry has been wanting, or industry has been in error.
—Ruskin.

The celebrated Galeu said employment was nature's physician. It is indeed so important to happiness that indolence is justly considered the parent of misery.—Colton.

Our remedies oft in ourselves do lie,
Which we ascribe to Heav'n. The fated sky
Gives us free scope; only doth backward pull
Our slow designs, when we ourselves are dull. —Shakespeare.

Everything is sold to skill and labor;
and where nature furnishes the materials, they are still rude and unfinished, till industry, ever active and intelligent, refines them from their brute state, and fits them for human use and convenience.—Hume.

Protected industry, careering far,
Detects the cause and cures the rage of war,
And sweeps, with forceful arm, to their last graves,
Kings from the earth and pirates from the waves. —Joel Barlow.

The great high-road of human welfare lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and work in the true spirit, will invariably be the most successful. Success treads on the heels of every right effort.—Samuel Smiles.

Wherever a ship ploughs the sea, or a plough furrows the field; wherever a mine yields its treasure; wherever a ship or a railroad train carries freight to market; wherever the smoke of the furnace rises, or the clang of the loom resounds; even in the lonely garret where the seamstress plies her busy needle—there is industry.—Garfield.

Industry is not only the instrument of improvement, but the foundation of pleasure. He who is a stranger to it may possess, but cannot enjoy; for it is labor only which gives relish to pleasure. It is the appointed vehicle of every good to man. It is the indispensable condition of possessing a sound mind in a sound body.—Blair.

Why, man of idleness, labor has rocked you in the cradle, and nourished your pampered life; without it, the woven silk and the wool upon your back would be in the shepherd's fold. For the meanest thing that ministers to human want, save the air of heaven, man is indebted to toil; and even the air, in God's wise ordination, is breathed with labor.—Chapin.

There is no art or science that is too difficult for industry to attain to; it is the gift of tongues, and makes a man understood and valued in all countries and by all nations; it is the philosopher's stone, that turns all metals, and even stones, into gold, and suffers not want to break into its dwelling; it is the northwest passage, that brings the merchant's ship as soon to him as he can desire. In a word, it conquers all enemies and makes fortune itself pay contribution.—Clarendon.

Inequality

One-half of the world must sweat and groan that the other half may dream.—Longfellow.

Inevitable (The)

To face the inevitable is to confront something sacred. As long as anything is uncertain, the roads are open in more than one direction, and right and wrong may have many aspects. But let the issue be determined, let the die be cast, and acceptance and adjustment become our immediate duty. Until God's will is known, we may work and wrestle and pray to reach our point, to save the day, to win the prize, spurred only the more by the uncertainty of the result. But let the result be known, however dark and disappointing, and we should view it in the light of God's plan to make us His evident children, and ask what we are to learn, what next we are to do. Chafing, fretting and complaining are more than a waste of time and energy. End that episode with an amen. Refer the inevitable to God, and face the future, not only with knowledge born of new experience, but with the courage born of the faith, that God's will is always best, and sooner or later will seem best to us.

Infancy (See Childhood)

A babe in a house is a well-spring of pleasure.—Tupper.

Of all the joys that brighten suffering earth,
What joy is welcom'd like a new-born child?
—Mrs. Norton.

A young star, who shone
O'er life, too sweet an image for such gloss,
A lovely being scarcely form'd or moulded,
A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded.
—Byron.

Joy thou bring'st, but mix'd with trembling;
Anxious hopes and tender fears,
Pleasing hopes and mingled sorrows,
Smiles of transport dashed with tears.
—Cottle.

'Tis aye a solemn thing to me
To look upon a babe that sleeps—
Wearing in its spirit-deeps
The unrevealed mystery
Of its Adam's taint and woe,
Which, when they revealed lie,
Will not let it slumber so.
—Mrs. Browning.

The hour arrives, the moment wish'd and fear'd,
The child is born by many a pang endeard,
And now the mother's ear has caught his cry;
O grant the cherub to her asking eye!
He comes—she clasps him. To her bosom press'd
He drinks the balm of life, and drops to rest.
—Rogers.

Infatuation

An infatuated man is not only foolish, but wild.—Crabbe.

Passion is the infatuation of the mind.—South.

The evil of infatuation is illustrated by the drunkard.—John B. Gough.

Infatuation is the language of a beautiful eye upon a sensitive heart.—Joseph Bartlett.

Infidelity

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.—Bible.

The nurse of infidelity is sensuality.—Cecil.

Now, infidel, I have thee on the hip.—Shakespeare.

What ardently we wish, we soon believe.—Young.

Infidelity, like death, admits of no degrees.—Mme. de Girardin.

Freethinkers are generally those that never think at all.—Laurence Sterne.

No one is so much alone in the universe as a denier of God.—Richter.

An atheist has got one point beyond the devil.—Swift.

There is not a single spot between Christianity and atheism, upon which a man can firmly fix his foot.—Emmons.

I know not any crime so great that a man could contrive to commit as poisoning the sources of eternal truth.—Samuel Johnson.

There never yet was a mother who taught her child to be an infidel.—Henry W. Shaw.

To destroy the ideas of immortality of the soul is to add death to death.—Madame de Souza.

A foe to God was ne'er true friend to man; Some sinister intent taints all he does.—Young.

General infidelity is the hardest soil which the propagators of a new religion can have to work upon.—Paley.

They that deny a God destroy a man's nobility.—Bacon.

There is but one thing without honor, smitten with eternal barrenness, inability to do or to be—insincerity, unbelief.—Carlyle.

When once infidelity can persuade men that they shall die like beasts, they will soon be brought to live like beasts also.—South.

What can be more foolish than to think that all this rare fabric of heaven and earth could come by chance when all the skill of art is not able to make an oyster?—Jeremy Taylor.

There is one single fact, which one may oppose to all the wit and argument of infidelity, namely, that no man ever repented of being a Christian on his death-bed.—Hannah More.

They that deny a God, destroy a man's nobility; for certainly man is of kin to the beasts by his body; and if he is not kin to God by his spirit he is a base and ignoble creature.—Bacon.

I would rather dwell in the dim fog of superstition than in air rarefied to nothing by the air-pump of unbelief—in which the panting breast expires, vainly and convulsively gasping for breath.—Richter.

A skeptical young man one day conversing with the celebrated Dr. Parr, observed that he would believe nothing which he could not understand. "Then, young man, your creed will be the shortest of any man's I know."—Helps.

Mere negation, mere Epicurean infidelity, as Lord Bacon most justly observes, has never disturbed the peace of the world. It furnishes no motive for action; it inspires no enthusiasm; it has no missionaries, no crusades, no martyrs.—Macaulay.

Infidelity is one of those coinages—a mass of base money that won't pass current with any heart that loves truly, or any head that thinks correctly. And infidels are poor sad creatures; they carry about them a load of dejection and desolation, not the less heavy that it is invisible. It is the fearful blindness of the soul.—Chalmers.

Infidelity gives nothing in return for what it takes away. What, then, is it worth? Everything valuable has a compensating power. Not a blade of grass that withers, or the ugliest weed that is flung away to rot and die, but reproduces something.—Chalmers.

No men deserve the title of infidels so little as those to whom it has been usually applied; let any of those who renounce Christianity, write fairly down in a book all the absurdities that they believe instead of it, and they will find that it requires more faith to reject Christianity than to embrace it.—Colton.

Infidelity and faith look both through the perspective glass, but at contrary ends. Infidelity looks through the wrong end of the glass; and, therefore, sees those objects near which are afar off, and makes great things little—diminishing the greatest spiritual blessings, and removing far from us threatened evils. Faith looks at the right end, and brings the blessings that are far off in time close to our eye, and multiplies God's mercies, which, in a distance, lost their greatness.—Bishop Hall.

Infinite

The thirst for the infinite proves infinity.—Victor Hugo.

Finite mind cannot comprehend infinity.—Jeremiah Seed.

God has thickly strewn infinity with grandeur.—Alexander Smith.

The finite is annihilated in the presence of infinity, and becomes a simple nothing.—Pascal.

It is only the finite that has wrought and suffered; the infinite lies stretched in smiling repose.—Emerson.

Infinity is the retirement in which perfect love and wisdom only dwell with God. In infinity and eternity the skeptic sees an abyss in which all is lost. I see in them the residence of Almighty power, in which my reason and my wishes find equally a firm support. Here, holding by the pillars of heaven, I exist—I stand fast.—Miller.

That which we foolishly call vastness is, rightly considered, not more wonderful, not more impressive, than that which we insolently call littleness; and the infinity of God is not mysterious, it is only unfathomable, not concealed, but incomprehensible: it is a clear infinity, the darkness of the pure, unsearchable sea.—Ruskin.

Influence

Men are what their mothers made them.—Emerson.

I am a part of all that I have met.—Tennyson.

Woman's influence embraces the whole of life.—Alexander Walker.

You can only make others better by being good yourself.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Influence is exerted by every human being from the hour of birth to that of death.—Chapin.

It is by women that nature writes on the hearts of men.—Sheridan.

A woman is more influenced by what she divines than by what she is told.—Ninon de Lenclos.

If woman lost us Eden, such as she alone restore it!—Whittier.

We perceive and are affected by changes too subtle to be described.—Thoreau.

He raised a mortal to the skies;
She drew an angel down.
—Dryden.

Not one false man but does uncountable mischief.—Carlyle.

The humblest individual exerts some influence, either for good or evil, upon others.—Beecher.

The serene, silent beauty of a holy life is the most powerful influence in the world, next to the might of the Spirit of God.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Blessed influence of one true loving human soul on another.—George Eliot.

It is a maxim that no man was ever enslaved by influence while he was fit to be free.—Johnson.

Race and temperament go for much in influencing opinion.—Lady Morgan.

He is greatest whose strength carries up the most hearts by the attraction of his own.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Every thought which genius and piety throw into the world alters the world.—Emerson.

No life
Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife,
And all life not be purer and stronger thereby. —Owen Meredith.

The influence of woman will ever be exercised directly in all good or evil. Give her, then, such light as she is capable of receiving.—Lady Morgan.

Nothing more surely cultivates and embellishes a man than association with refined and virtuous women.—Gladstone.

Every man is a missionary, now and forever, for good or for evil, whether he intends or designs it or not.—Chalmers.

No human being can come into this world without increasing or diminishing the sum total of human happiness.—Elihu Burritt.

If I can put one touch of a rosy sunset into the life of any man or woman, I shall feel that I have worked with God.—George MacDonald.

The work an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden underground, secretly making the ground green.—Carlyle.

We must succumb to the general influence of the times. No man can be of the tenth century, if he would; he must be a man of the nineteenth century.—Macaulay.

Would Shakespeare and Raleigh have done their best, would that galaxy have shone so bright in the heavens had there been no Elizabeth on the throne?—Alcott.

No man or woman of the humblest sort can really be strong, gentle, pure, and good, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.—Phillips Brooks.

The career of a great man remains an enduring monument of human energy. The man dies and disappears, but his thoughts and acts survive, and leave an indelible stamp upon his race.—Samuel Smiles.

Such souls,
Whose sudden visitations daze the world,
Vanish like lightning, but they leave behind
A voice that in the distance far away
Wakens the slumbering ages.
—Sir Henry Taylor.

It is an old saying, and one of fearful and fathomless import, that we are forming characters for eternity. Forming characters! Whose? our own or others? Both—and in that momentous fact lies the peril and responsibility of our existence. Who is sufficient for the thought?—Elihu Burritt.

It is very true that I have said that I considered Napoleon's presence in the field equal to forty thousand men in the balance. This is a very loose way of talking; but the idea is a very different one from that of his presence at a battle being equal to a reinforcement of forty thousand men.—Duke of Wellington.

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.
—Longfellow.

Ingratitude

One ungrateful man does an injury to all who are in suffering.—Syrus.

Ingratitude is treason to mankind.—
Thomson.

The wicked are always ungrateful.
—Cervantes.

Ingratitude is abhorred by God and man.—L'Estrange.

You love a nothing when you love
an ingrate.—Plautus.

He that is ungrateful has no guilt but one; all other crimes may pass for virtues in him.—Young.

How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is
To have a thankless child. —Shakespeare.

To be ungrateful is to be unnatural.
The head may be thus guilty, not the heart.—Rivarol.

Brutes leave ingratitude to man.—
Colton.

Earth produces nothing worse than an ungrateful man.—Ausonius.

Ingratitude is monstrous; and for the multitude to be ungrateful were to make a monster of the multitude.—
Shakespeare.

The animal with long ears, after having drunk, gives a kick to the bucket.—From the Italian.

Ingratitude calls forth reproaches,
as gratitude brings fresh kindnesses.—
Madame de Sévigné.

He that calls a man ungrateful sums up all the evil that a man can be guilty of.—Swift.

Ingratitude dries up the fountain of all goodness.—Richelieu.

There is something noble in hearing myself ill spoken of when I am doing well.—Alexander the Great.

Flints may be melted—we see it daily—but an ungrateful heart cannot; no, not by the strongest and the noblest flame.—South.

Throw no stones into the well
whence you have drunk.—Talmud.

How bitter it is to reap a harvest of evil for good that you have done.—
Plautus.

Men may be ungrateful, but the human race is not so.—De Boufflers.

Ingratitude is the abridgment of all baseness,—a fault never found unattended with other viciousness.—Fuller.

He that forgets his friend is ungrateful to him; but he that forgets his Saviour is unmerciful to himself.—
Bunyan.

One great cause of our insensibility to the goodness of our Creator is the very extensiveness of His bounty.—
Paley.

We seldom find people ungrateful as long as we are in a condition to render them services.—La Rochefoucauld.

Do you know what is more hard to bear than the reverses of fortune? It is the baseness, the hideous ingratitude, of man.—Napoleon.

Ingratitude is always a kind of weakness. I have never seen that clever men have been ungrateful.—
Goethe.

Ingratitude never so thoroughly pierces the human breast as when it proceeds from those in whose behalf we have been guilty of transgressions.
—Fielding.

The worst of ingratitude lies not in the ossified heart of him who commits it, but we find it in the effect it produces on him against whom it was committed.—Landon.

Man is, beyond dispute, the most excellent of created beings, and the vilest animal is a dog; but the sages agree that a grateful dog is better than an ungrateful man.—Saadi.

I hate ingratitude more in a man
Than lying, vainness, babbling, drunkenness,
Or any taint of vice, whose strong corruption
Inhabits our frail blood. —Shakespeare.

Everybody takes pleasure in returning small obligations; many go so far as to acknowledge moderate ones; but there is hardly any one who does not repay great obligations with ingratitude.—Rochefoucauld.

Ingratitude is a nail which, driven into the tree of courtesy, causes it to wither; it is a broken channel, by which the foundations of the affections are undermined; and a lump of soot, which, falling into the dish of friendship, destroys its scent and flavor.—Basil.

The greatest evils in human society are such as no law can come at; as in the case of ingratitude, where the manner of obligation very often leaves the benefactor without means of demanding justice, though that very circumstance should be the more binding to the person who has received the benefit.—Steele.

Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude;
Thy tooth is not so keen,
Because thou art not seen,
Although thy breath be rude.
—Shakespeare.

So the struck eagle stretch'd upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quivered in his heart:
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel
He nurs'd the pinion which impelled the steel.
—Byron.

You may rest upon this as an unfailling truth, that there neither is, nor never was, any person remarkably ungrateful, who was not also insufferably proud. In a word, ingratitude is too base to return a kindness, too proud to regard it, much like the tops of mountains, barren indeed, but yet lofty; they produce nothing; they feed nobody; they clothe nobody; yet are high and stately, and look down upon all the world.—South.

Inheritance

Say not you know another, until you have divided an inheritance with him.—Lavater.

They who provide much wealth for their children, but neglect to improve them in virtue, do like those who feed their horses high, but never train them to the ménage.—Socrates.

Enjoy what thou hast inherited from thy sires if thou wouldst possess it; what we employ not is an oppressive burden; what the moment brings forth, that only can it profit by.—Goethe.

Injuries

No man is hurt but by himself.—Diogenes.

Slight small injuries, and they'll become none at all.—Fuller.

Christianity commands us to pass by injuries; policy, to let them pass by us.—Franklin.

There is no ghost so difficult to lay as the ghost of an injury.—Alexander Smith.

Recompense injury with justice, and recompense kindness with kindness.—Confucius.

Lay silently the injuries you receive upon the altar of oblivion.—Hosea Ballou.

No man ever did a designed injury to another without doing a greater to himself.—Henry Home.

He who has injured thee was either stronger or weaker; if weaker, spare him; if stronger, spare thyself.—Seneca.

Nothing can work me damage except myself; the harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and never am a real sufferer but by my own fault.—St. Bernard.

If men wound you with injuries, meet them with patience; hasty words rattle the wound, soft language dresses it, forgiveness cures it, and oblivion takes away the scar. It is more noble by silence to avoid an injury than by argument to overcome it.—J. Beaumont.

To willful men, the injuries that they themselves procure must be their schoolmasters.—Shakespeare.

As a Christian should do no injuries to others, so he should forgive the injuries that others do to him. It is to be like God, who is a good-giving God, and a sin-forgiving God.—R. Venning.

Injuries accompanied by insults are never forgiven, all men on these occasions are good haters, and lay out their revenge at compound interest.—Colton.

Injustice

Fraud is the ready minister of injustice.—Burke.

The world has no long injustices.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Extremists are seldom just.—Paley.

If thou sustain injustice, console thyself; the true unhappiness is in doing it.—Democritus.

He who commits injustice is ever made more wretched than he who suffers it.—Plato.

The injustice of men subverts the justice of God, and often His mercy.—Mme. Swetchine.

Those who commit injustice bear the greatest burden.—Hosea Ballou.

Did the mass of men know the actual selfishness and injustice of their rulers, not a government would stand a year. The world would foment with revolution.—Theodore Parker.

The greatest of all injustice is that which goes under the name of law; and of all sorts of tyranny the forcing the letter of the law against the equity is the most insupportable.—L'Estrange.

He that acts unjustly
Is the worst rebel to himself; and though ^{now}
Ambition's trumpet and the drum of power
May drown the sound, yet conscience will ^{one day}
Speak loudly to him. —Havard.

Injustice arises either from precipitation or indolence, or from a mixture of both. The rapid and the slow are seldom just; the unjust wait either not at all, or wait too long.—Lavater.

It is not possible to found a lasting power upon injustice, perjury, and treachery. These may, perhaps, succeed for once, and borrow for awhile, from hope, a gay and flourishing appearance. But time betrays their weakness, and they fall into ruin of themselves. For, as in structures of every kind, the lower parts should have the greatest firmness—so the grounds and principles of actions should be just and true.—Demosthenes.

Ink

A drop of ink may make a million think.—Byron.

The colored slave that waits upon thought.—Mrs. Balfour.

Ink is the transcript of thought.—Lamartine.

The blackest of fluid is used as an agent to enlighten the world.—Douglas Jerrold.

Inn

There is nothing which has yet been contrived by man, by which so much happiness is produced as by a good tavern or inn.—Johnson.

Now spurs the lated traveler apace
To gain the timely inn. —Shakespeare.

Whoe'er has travel'd life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome, at an inn.
—Shenstone.

Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on
high,
Where once the sign-post caught the passing eye,
Low lies that house where nut-brown
draughts inspired,
Where graybeard mirth and smiling toil retired,
Where village statesmen talk'd with looks profound,
And news much older than their ale went round. —Goldsmith.

Innocence

Happy the innocent whose equal thoughts are free from anguish as they are from faults.—Waller.

Unto the pure all things are pure.—
Bible.

Innocence is ignorance.—Mme. de Girardin.

The innocent seldom find an uneasy pillow.—Cowper.

Innocence is always unsuspecting.—
Haliburton.

They that know no evil will suspect
none.—Ben Jonson.

Oh, keep me innocent, make others great.—Written on a Window by Caroline.

Who knows nothing base, fears nothing known.—Owen Meredith.

The most effective coquetry is innocence.—Lamartine.

The first of all virtues is innocence;
the next is modesty.—Addison.

He's armed without that's innocent within.—Pope.

There is no courage but in innocence, no constancy but in an honest cause.—Southern.

What can innocence hope for,
When such as sit her judges are corrupted!
—Massinger.

The silence often of pure innocence
Persuades, when speaking fails,
—Shakespeare.

Innocence is like polished armor; it adorns and it defends.—South.

Innocence and mystery never dwell long together.—Madame Necker.

Let our lives be pure as snow-fields, where our footsteps leave a mark, but not a stain.—Madame Swetchine.

Alas! innocence is but a poor substitute for experience.—Bulwer-Lyt-
ton.

Innocence is a flower which withers
when touched, but blooms not again, though watered with tears.—Hooper.

Innocence finds not near so much protection as guilt.—Rochefoucauld.

There is a heroic innocence, as well as a heroic courage.—St. Evremond.

We have not the innocence of Eden;
but by God's help and Christ's example we may have the victory of Gethsemane.—Chapin.

The innocence that feels no risk and is taught no caution is more vulnerable than guilt, and oftener assailed,— Willis.

To dread no eye and to suspect no tongue is the great prerogative of innocence—an exemption granted only to invariable virtue.—Dr. Johnson.

What a power there is in innocence!
whose very helplessness is its safeguard: in whose presence even passion himself stands abashed, and stands worshipper at the very altar he came to despoil.—Moore.

Of all the sights which can soften and humanize the heart of man, there is none that ought so surely to reach it as that of innocent children enjoying the happiness which is their proper and natural portion.—Southey.

Coerced innocence is like an imprisoned lark,—open the door, and it is off forever. The bird that roams through the sky and the groves unrestrained knows how to dodge the hawk and protect itself; but the caged one,
the moment it leaves its bars and bolts behind, is pounced upon by the fowler or the vulture.—Haliburton.

I have mark'd
A thousand blushing apparitions start
Into her face; a thousand innocent shames
In angel whiteness bear away those blushes;
And in her eye there hath appear'd a fire,
To burn the errors that these princes hold
Against her maiden truth. —Shakespeare.

O innocence, how glorious and happy a portion art thou to the breast that possesses thee! thou fearest neither the eyes nor the tongues of men. Truth, the most powerful of all things, is thy strongest friend; and the brighter the light is in which thou art displayed, the more it discovers thy transcendent beauties.—Fielding.

Inquisitiveness

Inquisitiveness is an uncomely guest.—Sir P. Sidney.

Few men are raised in our estimation by being too closely examined.—Balzac.

Shun the inquisitive person, for he is also a talker.—Horace.

Our inquisitive disposition is excited by having its gratification deferred.—Pliny the Younger.

An inquisitive man is a creature naturally very vacant of thought itself, and therefore forced to apply itself to foreign assistance.—Steele.

Inquisitive people are the funnels of conversation; they do not take in anything for their own use, but merely to pass it to another.—Steele.

Inquisitiveness or curiosity is a kernel of the forbidden fruit, which still sticketh in the throat of a natural man, and sometimes to the danger of his choking.—Fuller.

In ancient days the most celebrated precept was, "Know thyself;" in modern times it has been supplanted by the more fashionable maxim, "Know thy neighbor, and everything about him."—Johnson.

Shun the inquisitive, for thou wilt be sure to find him leaky; open ears do not keep conscientiously what has been intrusted to them, and a word once spoken flies never to be recalled.—Horace.

Insanity

Every madman thinks all other men mad.—Syrus.

Fetter strong madness in a silken thread.—Shakespeare.

Insanity is not a distinct and separate empire; our ordinary life borders upon it, and we cross the frontier in some part of our nature.—Taine.

Though this be madness, yet there is method in it.—Shakespeare.

I am not mad; I would to heaven I were! For then, 'tis like I should forget myself.—Shakespeare.

There is a pleasure, sure, In being mad, which none but madmen know! —Dryden.

For those whom God to ruin has designed He fits for fate, and first destroys their mind. —Dryden.

No excellent soul is exempt from a mixture of madness.—Aristotle.

Great wits are sure to madness near allied, and thin partitions do their bounds divide.—Dryden.

He appears mad indeed but to a few, because the majority is infected with the same disease.—Horace.

Oppression makes wise men mad; but the distemper is still the madness of the wise, which is better than the sobriety of fools.—Burke.

All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insanity.—Johnson.

With curious art the brain, too finely wrought, preys on itself, and is destroyed by thought.—Churchill.

The alleged power to charm down insanity, or ferocity in beasts, is a power behind the eye.—Emerson.

We are not ourselves When nature, being oppress'd, commands the mind To suffer with the body. —Shakespeare.

Much madness is divinest sense To a discerning eye; Much sense the starkest madness, 'Tis the majority In this, as all, prevails.

Assent, and you are sane; Demur,—you're straightway dangerous, And handled with a chain. —Emily Dickinson.

Ever as before does madness remain, terrific, altogether infernal, boiling up of the nether chaotic deep, through this fair painted vision of creation, which swims thereon, and which we name the real.—Carlyle.

If the raving be not directed to a single object it is mania, properly so called; if to one object, it constitutes monomania.—R. Duglison.

Insincerity

Nothing is more disgraceful than insincerity.—Cicero.

It is a shameful and unseemly thing to think one thing and to speak another, but how odious to write one thing and to think another.—Seneca.

Insincerity in a man's own heart must make all his enjoyments, all that concerns him, unreal; so that his whole life must seem like a merely dramatic representation.—Hawthorne.

Inspiration

Inspiration and genius—one and the same.—Victor Hugo.

No man was ever great without divine inspiration.—Cicero.

Inspiration must find answering inspiration.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Contagious enthusiasm.—Mrs. Balfour.

Inspiration is solitary, never consecutive.—Lamartine.

Inspiration developed the noblest fantasies of the ancients.—Jules Janin.

He is gifted with genius who knoweth much by natural inspiration.—Pindar.

Do we not all agree to call rapid thought and noble impulse by the name of inspiration?—George Elliot.

Our poesy is as a Gum, which oozes
From whence 'tis nourish'd: The fire i' the flint
Shows not till it be struck; our gentle
Flame
Provokes itself, and, like the current, flies
Each bound it chafes. —Shakespeare.

The glow of inspiration warms us; this holy rapture springs from the seeds of the Divine mind sown in man.—Ovid.

Installation Service

Your employment is that of the Son of God; it makes no great appearance before men, but it will finally arise in majesty to overshadow all created glory.—Robert Hall.

Ever remember you are an ambassador of Christ. You have received a commission from the King of kings to be his representative, and to minister in His name to your fellow men.—Professor Duffield.

But again, may I not presume that I commend myself to you when I say that the essential part of your pastor's power to teach and guide must be derived from your consent and desire to submit to His guidance?—Rev. Alex. McGregor.

I charge you to preach the whole gospel, both sides of the gospel, and the only way of escape through faith in Christ.—Rev. E. O. Bartlett.

The minister of Christ, and all who are associated with him, should make diligent use of all legitimate means to bring to the gospel feast those who are perishing through lack of the bread of life and the water of life.—Professor Duffield.

Be tender, sympathetic, with nothing of arrogance or assumption in your manner or matter; only that earnestness which comes from a hearty faith in the great truths you utter. Contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, but in a kind spirit and with a mild temper, with entire candor, avoiding all that tends to provoke and irritate, seeking at all times to preserve "the bond of peace."—Rev. E. O. Bartlett.

As such, "salute no man by the way." Esteem no man your superior, or rather, esteem no one as having a superior work to do. Yours is the highest office God has committed to earthen vessels. It is the most important as related to this world or the next; important, because you bear the message of the King of kings and herald the gospel that saves souls.—

Rev. E. O. Bartlett.

Speak boldly, with the courage of one whose inspiration and authority come from heaven. Fear no man; be under the dominion of no man or clique of men, for that bringeth a snare. Take counsel with God; and then come into this pulpit unshamed to preach His truth, and His truth only, whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear.—Rev. E. O. Bartlett.

Appropriate a due portion of your time to pastoral work, and cultivate such a personal acquaintance with every member of your charge—the lowliest and the youngest as well as the more prominent—that in their afflictions and temptations, which sooner or later come to all, they will feel that they have in you a sympathizing friend to whom they may tell the heart bitterness “with which a stranger intermeddleth not,” assured of your interest, your friendly counsel, and your prayers.—Professor Duffield.

Study the Word. Know it, believe it, and preach it with your whole heart. It is not only the sword that can pierce all adversaries, it is the power that can draw all men. You are to stand in this pulpit not to preach philosophy and teach history, but to tell the everlasting gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.—Rev. E. O. Bartlett.

The age is intensely practical, and little influenced by formalism or cant or dead orthodoxy or the perfunctory performance of ministerial duty. It appreciates preaching that is direct, unaffected, solemn, sincere; that is adapted to the spiritual wants of men; that presents the profound yet precious truths of our holy religion not in the terminology of the schools, but in the language of familiar speech, and presents them with an earnestness due to a conviction of their vital importance, and an anxious solicitude for the salvation of those addressed.—Professor Duffield.

Instinct

Instinct is intelligence incapable of self-consciousness.—John Sterling.

Instinct is the nose of the mind.—
Mme. de Girardin.

We are too good for pure instinct.—
Goethe.

Instinct is animal strength.—Daniel Webster.

Instinct is a great matter; I was a coward on instinct.—Shakespeare.

Instinct harmonizes the interior of animals, as religion does the interior of men.—Jacobi.

Brutes find out where their talents lie: a bear will not attempt to fly.—
Swift.

And reason raise o'er instinct as you can, in this 'tis God directs, in that 'tis man.—Pope.

Who taught the nations of the field and wood
To shun their poison and to choose their food.
—Pope.

The active part of man consists of powerful instincts.—F. W. Newman.

Tell me why the ant midst summer's plenty thinks of winter's want.—
Prior.

A goose flies by a chart which the Royal Geographical Society could not mend.—Holmes.

All our first movements are good, generous, heroic; reflection weakens and kills them.—Aimé-Martin.

A bird sings, a child prattles, but it is the same hymn: hymn indistinct, inarticulate, but full of profound meaning.—Victor Hugo.

A good man, through obscurest aspirations,
Has still an instinct of the one true way.
—Goethe.

Every animal is providentially directed to the use of its proper weapon.—Ray.

The instinct of brutes and insects can be the effect of nothing else than the wisdom and skill of a powerful, ever-living agent.—Newton.

An instinct is a propensity prior to experience and independent of instruction.—Paley.

An instinct is an agent which performs blindly and ignorantly a work of intelligence and knowledge.—Sir W. Hamilton.

By a divine instinct, men's minds mistrust ensuing danger; as, by proof, we see the waters swell before a boisterous storm.—Shakespeare.

Animals in their generation are wiser than the sons of men; but their wisdom is confined to a few particulars, and lies in a very narrow compass.—Addison.

But honest instinct comes a volunteer; Sure never to o'er-shoot, but just to hit, While still too wide or short in human wit. —Pope.

Five thousand years have added no improvement to the hive of the bee, nor to the house of the beaver; but look at the habitations and the achievements of men!—Colton.

An instinct is a blind tendency to some mode of action, independent of any consideration, on the part of the agent, of the end to which the action leads.—Whately.

There is not, in my opinion, anything more mysterious in nature than this instinct in animals, which thus rise above reason and fall infinitely short of it.—Addison.

Learn from the birds what food the thickets yield;

Learn from the beasts the physic of the field;

Thy arts of building from the bee receive; Learn of the mole to plough, the worm to weave. —Pope.

To the present impulse of sense, memory, and instinct, all the sagacities of brutes may be reduced; though witty men, by analytical resolution, have chemically extracted an artificial logic out of their actions.—Sir M. Hale.

Beasts, birds, and insects, even to the minutest and meanest of their kind, act with the unerring providence of instinct; man, the while, who possesses a higher faculty, abuses it, and therefore goes blundering on.—Southey.

Reason shows itself in all occurrences of life; whereas the brute makes no discovery of such a talent, but in what immediately regards his own preservation or the continuance of his species.—Addison.

Instead of judgment, woman has rather a quick perception of what is fitting, owing to the predominance of her instinctive faculties. The quick perception, indeed, bears the stamp of instinct.—Alexander Walker.

Who taught the parrot his "Welcome?" Who taught the raven in a drought to throw pebbles into a hollow tree where she espied water, that the water might rise so as she might come to it? Who taught the bee to sail through such a vast sea of air, and to find the way from a flower in a field to her hive? Who taught the ant to bite every grain of corn that she burieth in her hill, lest it should take root and grow?—Bacon.

How often we feel and know, either pleasurably or painfully, that another is looking on us, before we have ascertained the fact with our own eyes! How often we prophesy truly to ourselves the approach of friend or enemy just before either has really appeared! How strangely and abruptly we become convinced, at a first introduction, that we shall secretly love this person and loathe that, before experience has guided us with a single fact in relation to their characters!—Wilkie Collins.

Instruction

From one learn all.—Virgil.

It is lawful to be taught by an enemy.—Ovid.

The seeds of first instructions are dropp'd into the deepest furrows.—Tupper.

Instruction enlarges the natural powers of the mind.—Horace.

He need not go away from home for instruction.—Terence.

To be instructed in the arts softens the manners and makes men gentle.—Ovid.

Seek to delight, that they may mend mankind.

And, while they captivate, inform the mind.—Cowper.

Instruction does not prevent waste of time or mistakes; and mistakes themselves are often the best teachers of all.—Froude.

He is wise who can instruct us and assist us in the business of daily virtuous living.—Carlyle.

The wise are instructed by reason, ordinary minds by experience; the stupid by necessity; and brutes by instinct.—Cicero.

The heavens and the earth, the woods and the wayside, teem with instruction and knowledge to the curious and thoughtful.—Hosea Ballou.

We must not contradict, but instruct him that contradicts us; for a madman is not cured by another running mad also.—Antisthenes.

Men must be taught as if you taught them not,
And things unknown propos'd as things forgot.—Pope.

It is a good divine that follows his Own instructions; I can easier teach twenty What were good to be done, than be one Of the twenty to follow mine own teaching: The brain may devise laws for the blood; but
A hot temper leaps o'er a cold decree.—Shakespeare.

Let us consider how great a commodity of doctrine exists in books; how easily, how secretly, how safely they expose the nakedness of human ignorance without putting it to shame. These are the masters who instruct us without rods and ferules, without hard words and anger, without clothes or money. If you approach them they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you.—Richard de Bury.

Insult

Insults admit of no compensation.—Junius.

It is often better not to see an insult than to avenge it.—Seneca.

What wilt thou do to thyself, who hast added insult to injury?—Phædrus.

Even a hare, the weakest of animals, may insult a dead lion.—Æsop.

It is very clear that one way to challenge insults is to submit to them.—Aimé-Martin.

Fate never wounds more deep the generous heart than when a block-head's insult points the dart.—Dr. Johnson.

Insults are engendered from vulgar minds, like toadstools from a dunghill.—Colton.

I once met a man who had forgiven an injury. I hope some day to meet the man who has forgiven an insult.—Charles Buxton.

He who allows himself to be insulted deserves to be so; and insolence, if unpunished, goes on increasing.—Corneille.

A man who insults the modesty of a woman, as good as tells her that he has seen something in her conduct that warranted his presumption.—Richardson.

Injuries may be atoned for, and forgiven; but insults admit of no compensation. They degrade the mind in its own esteem, and force it to recover its level by revenge.—Junius.

Receive no satisfaction for premeditated impertinence; forget it, forgive it, but keep him inexorably at a distance who offered it.—Lavater.

Injuries accompanied with insults are never forgiven: all men, on these occasions, are good haters, and lay out their revenge at compound interest.

—Colton.

The way to procure insults is to submit to them. A man meets with no more respect than he exacts.—Hazlitt.

It is only the vulgar who are always fancying themselves insulted. If a man treads on another's toe in good society, do you think it is taken as an insult?—Lady Hester Stanhope.

Thus the greater proportion of mankind are more sensitive to contemptuous language than unjust acts; for they can less easily bear insult than wrong.—Plutarch.

Whatever be the motive of insult, it is always best to overlook it; for folly scarcely can deserve resentment, and malice is punished by neglect.—Johnson.

The slight that can be conveyed in a glance, in a gracious smile, in a wave of the hand, is often the ne plus ultra of art. What insult is so keen, or so keenly felt, as the polite insult, which it is impossible to resent.—Julia Kavanagh.

As it is the nature of a kite to devour little birds, so it is the nature of some minds to insult and tyrannize over little people; this being the means which they use to recompense themselves for their extreme servility and condescension to their superiors; for nothing can be more reasonable than that slaves and flatterers should exact the same taxes on all below them which they themselves pay to all above them.—Fielding.

Integrity

Integrity is the evidence of all civil virtues.—Diderot.

Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless.—Johnson.

Follow your honest convictions, and be strong.—Thackeray.

Though a hundred crooked paths may conduct to a temporary success, the one plain and straight path of public and private virtue can alone lead to a pure and lasting fame and the blessings of posterity.—Edward Everett.

Our integrity is never worth so much as when we have parted with our all to keep it.—Colton.

Both wit and understanding are trifles without integrity. The ignorant peasant without fault is greater than the philosopher with many. What is genius or courage without a heart?—Goldsmith.

Give us a man, young or old, high or low, on whom we know we can thoroughly depend—who will stand firm when others fail—the friend faithful and true, the adviser honest and fearless, the adversary just and chivalrous; in such an one there is a fragment of the Rock of Ages—a sign that there has been a prophet amongst us.—Dean Stanley.

Aaron Burr was a more brilliant man than George Washington. If he had been loyal to truth, he would have been an abler man; but that which made George Washington the chief hero in our great republic was the sagacity, not of intellectual genius, but of the moral element in him.—A. E. Dunning.

Intellect

Intellect—brain force.—Schiller.

Thou living ray of intellectual fire.
—Falconer.

Light has spread, and even bayonets think.—Kossuth.

The electric force of the brain.—Haliburton.

God has placed no limit to intellect.
—Bacon.

Genius is intellect constructive.—Emerson.

Intellect is stronger than cannon.—Theodore Parker.

Intellect really exists in its products; its kingdom is here.—Coleridge.

The starlight of the brain.—N. P. Willis.

The march of intellect.—Southey.

The hand that follows intellect can achieve.—Michael Angelo.

The march of the human mind is slow.—Burke.

Everything connected with intellect is permanent.—William Roscoe.

There is no creature so lonely as the dweller in the intellect.—William Winter.

Mind is the great lever. . . .
Thought is the process by which human ends are answered.—Webster.

Intellect is the soul of man, the only immortal part of him.—Carlyle.

Character is higher than intellect.
A great soul will be strong to live as well as strong to think.—R. W. Emerson.

If a man empties his purse into his head, no one can take it from him.—
Franklin.

A man cannot leave a better legacy to the world than a well-educated family.—Rev. Thomas Scott.

The intellect of the wise is like glass; it admits the light of heaven and reflects it.—Hare.

It is the nature of intellect to strive to improve in intellectual power.—
Hosea Ballou.

Works of the intellect are great only by comparison with each other.
—Emerson.

In the scale of the destinies, brawn
will never weigh so much as brain.—
Lowell.

'Tis goodwill makes intelligence.—
Emerson.

The brain women never interest us like the heart women; white roses please less than red.—O. W. Holmes.

Intellect annuls fate. So far as a man thinks, he is free.—Emerson.

Nature is good, but intellect is better, as the law-giver is before the law-receiver.—Emerson.

The march of intellect, which licks all the world into shape, has even reached the devil.—Goethe.

The human intellect is the great truth-organ; realities, as they exist, are the subjects of its study; and knowledge is the result of its acquaintance with the things which it investigates.—Moses Harvey.

A man of intellect is lost unless he unites energy of character to intellect.
When we have the lantern of Diogenes
we must have his staff.—Chamfort.

The intellect has only one failing, which, to be sure, is a very considerable one. It has no conscience.—
Lowell.

The intellect of the generality of women serves more to fortify their folly than their reason.—Roche-foucauld.

The term "intellect" includes all those powers by which we acquire, retain, and extend our knowledge; as perception, memory, imagination, judgment, and the like.—William Fleming.

Sensual pleasures are like soap-bubbles, sparkling, evanescent. The pleasures of intellect are calm, beautiful, sublime, ever enduring and climbing upward to the borders of the unseen world.—Aughey.

The intellect of man sits enthroned visibly upon his forehead and in his eye, and the heart of man is written on his countenance; but the soul reveals itself in the voice only.—Longfellow.

The growth of the intellect is spontaneous in every expansion. The mind that grows could not predict the times, the means, the mode of that spontaneity. God enters by a private door into every individual.—Emerson.

The intellect of woman bears the same relationship to that of man as her physical organization; it is inferior in power and different in kind.—Mrs. Jameson.

Glorious indeed is the world of God around us, but more glorious the world of God within us. There lies the Land of Song; there lies the poet's native land.—Longfellow.

Man gains wider dominion by his intellect than by his right arm. The mustard-seed of thought is a pregnant treasury of vast results. Like the germ in the Egyptian tombs, its vitality never perishes; and its fruit will spring up after it has been buried for long ages.—Chapin.

It is only the intellect that can be thoroughly and hideously wicked. It can forget everything in the attainment of its ends. The heart recoils; in its retired places some drops of childhood's dew still linger, defying manhood's fiery noon.—Lowell.

Some men of a secluded and studious life have sent forth from their closet or their cloister rays of intellectual light that have agitated courts and revolutionized kingdoms; like the moon which, though far removed from the ocean, and shining upon it with a serene and sober light, is the chief cause of all those ebbings and flowings which incessantly disturb that restless world of waters.—Colton.

Intelligence

To educate the intelligence is to enlarge the horizon of its desires and wants.—Lowell.

The intelligent have a right over the ignorant; namely, the right of instructing them.—Emerson.

God multiplies intelligence, which communicates itself, like fire, ad infinitum. Light a thousand torches at one touch, the flame remains always the same.—Joubert.

Every breeze wafts intelligence from country to country, every wave rolls it, all give it forth, and all in turn receive it. There is a vast commerce of ideas, there are marts and exchanges for intellectual discoveries, and a wonderful fellowship of those individual intelligences which make up the mind and opinion of the age.—Daniel Webster.

It is no proof of a man's understanding to be able to confirm whatever he pleases; but to be able to discern that what is true is true, and that what is false is false, this is the mark and character of intelligence.—Swedenborg.

Intemperance

Intemperance weaves the winding-sheet of souls.—John B. Gough.

Allow not nature more than nature needs.—Shakespeare.

Bacchus has drowned more men than Neptune.—Garibaldi.

Intemperance is a great decayer of beauty.—Junius.

All learned, and all drunk!—Cowper.

The smaller the drink, the clearer the head.—William Penn.

Gloriously drunk, obey the important call.—Cowper.

Purged from drugs of foul intemperance.—Spenser.

Greatness of any kind has no greater foe than a habit of drinking.—Walter Scott.

He that tempts me to drink beyond my measure, civilly invites me to a fever.—Jeremy Taylor.

O, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!—Shakespeare.

Every inordinate cup is unblessed and the ingredient is a devil.—Shakespeare.

In our world, death deposes intemperance to do the work of age.—Young.

Other vices make their own way; this makes way for all vices. He that is a drunkard is qualified for all vice.

—Francis Quarles.

Sweet fellowship in shame!
One drunkard loves another of the name.
—Shakespeare.

He calls drunkenness an expression identical with ruin.—Diogenes Laertius.

Drunkenness is nothing but voluntary madness.—Seneca.

A sensual and intemperate youth hands over a worn-out body to old age.
—Cicero.

If a man empties his purse into his head, no one can take it from him.—Franklin.

Wine displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

In the bottle discontent seeks for comfort, cowardice for courage, and bashfulness for confidence.—Dr. Johnson.

He is certainly as guilty of suicide who perishes by a slow, as he who is despatched by an immediate, poison.—Steele.

It is little the sign of a wise or good man, to suffer temperance to be transgressed in order to purchase the repute of a generous entertainer.—Atterbury.

It is not fitting that the evil produced by men should be imputed to things; let those bear the blame who make an ill use of things in themselves good.—Isocrates.

Intemperance is the epitome of every crime, the cause of every kind of misery.—Douglas Jerrold.

All the crimes on earth do not destroy so many of the human race, nor alienate so much property, as drunkenness.—Bacon.

In the flowers that wreath the sparkling bowl, fell adders hiss, and poisonous serpents roll.—Prior.

Intemperance is a hydra with a hundred heads. She never stalks abroad unaccompanied with impurity, anger, and the most infamous profligacies.—Chrysostom.

I have very poor and unhappy brains for drinking: I could wish courtesy would invent some other custom of entertainment.—Shakespeare.

In what pagan nation was Moloch ever propitiated by such an unbroken and swift-moving procession of victims as are offered to this Moloch of Christendom, intemperance.—Horace Mann.

Shall I, to please another wine-sprung minde,
Lose all mine own? God hath giv'n me a measure
Short of His can and body; must I find A pain in that, wherein he finds a pleasure.
—Herbert.

Wise men mingle mirth with their cares, as a help either to forget or overcome them; but to resort to intoxication for the ease of one's mind is to cure melancholy by madness.—Charron.

I never drink. I cannot do it, on equal terms with others. It costs them only one day; but me three,—the first in sinning, the second in suffering, and the third in repenting.—Sterne.

The bliss of the drunkard is like the expectation of the dying Atheist who hopes no more than to lie down in the grave with the beasts.—Jane Porter.

The pleasing poison the visage quite transforms of him that drinks, and the inglorious likeness of a beast fixes instead, unmoulding reason's mintage characterized in the face.—Milton.

The body oppressed by excess bears down the mind, and depresses to the earth any portion of the divine spirit we had been endowed with.—Horace.

There is more of turn than of truth in a saying of Seneca, "That drunkenness does not produce but discover faults." Common experience teaches the contrary. Wine throws a man out of himself, and infuses qualities into the mind which she is a stranger to in her sober moments.—Addison.

Hal see where the wild-blazing Grog-shop appears.

As the red waves of wretchedness swell. How it burns on the edge of tempestuous years

The horrible Light-House of Hell!

—M'Donald Clarke.

Every apartment devoted to the circulation of the glass, may be regarded as a temple set apart for the performance of human sacrifices. And they ought to be fitted up like the ancient temples in Egypt, in a manner to show the real atrocity of the superstition that is carried on within their walls.—Beddoes.

The habit of using ardent spirits, by men in office, has occasioned more injury to the public and more trouble to me, than all other causes. And were I to commence my administration again, the first question I would ask, respecting a candidate for office would be, "Does he use ardent spirits?"—Jefferson.

Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.—Bible.

If the bones of all those who have fallen as a prey to intemperance could be piled up it would make a vast pyramid. Who will gird himself for the journey and try with me to scale this mountain of the dead—going up miles high on human carcasses to find still other peaks far above, mountain above mountain, white with the bones of drunkards.—Talmage.

Intentions

Purposes, like eggs, unless they be hatched into action, will run into rottenness.—Samuel Smiles.

If religion might be judged of, according to men's intentions, there would scarcely be any idolatry in the world.—Bishop Hall.

Hell is paved with good intentions.—Johnson.

Many good purposes lie in the churchyard.—Philip Henry.

Intercourse

The kindly intercourse will ever prove A bond of amity and social love.

—Bloomfield.

Intercourse is after all man's best teacher. "Know thyself" is an excellent maxim; but even self-knowledge cannot be perfected in closets and cloisters—nor amid lake scenery, and on the sunny side of the mountains. Men who seldom mix with their fellow-creatures are almost sure to be one-sided—the victims of fixed ideas, that sometimes lead to insanity.—Wm. Matthews.

Interest

Interest makes all seem reason that leads to it.—Dryden.

The virtues and vices are all put in motion by interest.—Rochefoucauld.

The instinct of interest is the universal instinct of mankind.—Charles Macklin.

As the interest of man, so his God; as his God, so he.—Lavater.

Interest blinds some people, and enlightens others.—Rochefoucauld.

Interest speaks all languages, and acts all parts, even that of disinterestedness itself.—Rochefoucauld.

Interest is the spur of the people, but glory that of great souls.—Rousseau.

It is more than possible, that those who have neither character nor honor may be wounded in a very tender part,—their interest.—Junius.

When interest is at variance with conscience, any distinction to make them friends will serve the hollow-hearted.—Henry Home.

How difficult a thing it is to persuade a man to reason against his own interest, though he is convinced that equity is against him.—Dr. John Trusler.

Our interests are grains of opium to our consciences, but they only put it to sleep for a terrible awakening.—J. Petit-Senn.

Interest has the security, though not the virtue of a principle. As the world goes, it is the surest side; for men daily leave both relations and religion to follow it.—William Penn.

Interest makes some people blind and others quick-sighted. We promise according to our hopes, and perform according to our fears. Virtues are lost in interest, as rivers are swallowed up in the sea.—J. Beaumont.

Intolerance

The intolerant man is the real pendant.—Richter.

It were better to be of no church, than to be bitter for any.—William Penn.

The devil loves nothing better than the intolerance of reformers, and dreads nothing so much as their charity and patience.—Lowell.

Some men will not shave on Sunday, and yet they spend all the week in shaving their fellow-men; and many folks think it very wicked to black their boots on Sunday morning, yet they do not hesitate to black their neighbor's reputation on week-days.—Beecher.

It appears an extraordinary thing to me, that since there is such a diabolical spirit in the depravity of human nature, as persecution for difference of opinion in religious tenets, there never happened to be any inquisition, any auto da fé, any crusade, among the Pagans.—Sterne.

As no roads are so rough as those that have just been mended, so no sinners are so intolerant as those that have just turned saints.—Colton.

Intrigue

Intrigue is a court distemper.—Mme. Deluzy.

Every woman is at heart a rake.—Pope.

As love increases, prudence diminishes.—Rochevoucauld.

Audacity as against modesty will win the battle over most men.—Mme. Deluzy.

There are many women who never have had one intrigue; but there are few who have had only one.—Rochevoucauld.

There are many women who have never intrigued, and many men who have never gamed; but those who have done either but once are very extraordinary animals.—Colton.

When women oppose themselves to the projects and ambition of men, they excite their lively resentment; if in their youth they meddle with political intrigues, their modesty must suffer.—Mme. de Staël.

If often happens too, both in courts and in cabinets, that there are two things going on together.—a main plot and an under-plot; and he that understands only one of them will, in all probability, be the dupe of both. A mistress may rule a monarch, but some obscure favorite may rule the mistress.—Colton.

Intuition

Intuition is the clear conception of the whole at once. It seldom belongs to man to say without presumption, "I came, I saw, I conquered."—Lavater.

This, therefore, is a law not found in books, but written on the fleshy tablets of the heart, which we have not learned from man, received or read, but which we have caught up from Nature herself, sucked in and imbibed; the knowledge of which we were not taught, but for which we were made; we received it not by education, but by intuition.—Cicero.

Invention

Necessity, mother of invention.—Wycherley.

Invention is totally independent of the will.—B. R. Haydon.

Invention is not so much the result of labor as of judgment.—Roscommon.

Invention is the talent of youth, and judgment of age.—Swift.

Only an inventor knows how to borrow, and every man is or should be an inventor.—Emerson.

Invention is activity of mind, as fire is air in motion; a sharpening of the spiritual sight, to discern hidden aptitudes.—Tupper.

Very learned women are to be found, in the same manner as female warriors; but they are seldom or never inventors.—Voltaire.

The introduction of noble inventions seems to hold by far the most excellent place among human actions.—Bacon.

A tool is but the extension of a man's hand, and a machine is but a complex tool. And he that invents a machine augments the power of a man and the well-being of mankind.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The great inventor is one who has walked forth upon the industrial world, not from universities, but from hovels; not as clad in silks and decked with honors, but as clad in fustian and grimed with soot and oil.—Isaac Taylor.

Th' invention all admir'd, and each, how he
To be th' inventor miss'd; so easy it seem'd, Once found, which yet unfound most would have thought Impossible.

—Milton.

Invention, strictly speaking, is little more than a new combination of those images which have been previously gathered and deposited in the memory. Nothing can be made of nothing; he who has laid up no material can produce no combinations.—Sir J. Reynolds.

The golden hour of invention must terminate like other hours; and when the man of genius returns to the cares, the duties, the vexations, and the amusements of life, his companions behold him as one of themselves,—the creature of habits and infirmities.—Isaac Disraeli.

It is frivolous to fix pedantically the date of particular inventions. They have all been invented over and over fifty times. Man is the arch machine, of which all these shifts drawn from himself are toy models. He helps himself on each emergency by copying or duplicating his own structure, just so far as the need is.—Emerson.

Founders and senators of states and cities, lawgivers, extirpers of tyrants, fathers of the people, and other eminent persons in civil government, were honored but with titles of worthies or demigods; whereas such as were inventors and authors of new arts, endowments, and commodities towards man's life, were ever consecrated among the gods themselves.—Bacon.

Electric telegraphs, printing, gas,
Tobacco, balloons, and steam,
Are little events that have come to pass
Since the days of the old régime.
And, spite of Lemprière's dazzling page,
I'd give—though it might seem bold—
A hundred years of the Golden Age
For a year of the Age of Gold.
—Henry S. Leigh.

Investigation

Attempt the end and never stand to doubt;
Nothing so hard but search will find it out.
—Herrick.

Nothing has such power to broaden the mind as the ability to investigate systematically and truly all that comes under thy observation in life.—Marcus Aurelius.

Irony

Irony is an insult conveyed in the form of a compliment * * * placing its victim naked on a bed of briars and bristles, thinly covered with rose-leaves; adorning his brow with a crown of gold, which burns into his brain; teasing, and fretting, and riddling him through and through with incessant discharges of hot shot from a masked battery; laying bare the most sensitive and shrinking nerves of his mind, and then blandly touching them with ice, or smilingly pricking them with needles.—E. P. Whipple.

Irony is jesting hidden behind gravity.—John Weiss.

Clap an extinguisher upon your irony, if you are unhappily blessed with a vein of it.—Lamb.

Irresolution

Don't stand shivering upon the bank; plunge in at once and have it over.—Haliburton.

We spend our days in deliberating, and we end them without coming to any resolve.—L'Estrange.

Like a man to double business bound,
I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
And both neglect. —Shakespeare.

I am a heavy stone,
Roll'd up a hill by a weak child: I move
A little up, and tumble back again. —W. Rider.

Not to resolve is to resolve; and many times it breeds as many necessities, and engageth as far in some other sort, as to resolve.—Bacon.

In matters of great concern, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind than irresolution.—Tillotson.

Nothing of worth or weight can be achieved with half a mind, with a faint heart, and with a lame endeavor.—Barrow.

Irresolution on the schemes of life which offer themselves to our choice, and inconstancy in pursuing them, are the greatest causes of all our unhappiness.—Addison.

Irresolution and mutability are often the faults of men whose views are wide, and whose imagination is vigorous and excursive.—Dr. Johnson.

Irresolution is a worse vice than rashness. He that shoots best may sometimes miss the mark; but he that shoots not at all can never hit it. Irresolution loosens all the joints of a state; like an ague, it shakes not this nor that limb, but all the body is at once in a fit. The irresolute man is lifted from one place to another; so hatcheth nothing, but ad-dles all his actions.—Feltham.

Italy

Italia! O Italia! thou who hast
The fatal gift of beauty, which became
A funeral dower of present woes and past,
On thy sweet brow is sorrow plough'd by shame,
And annals graved in characters of flame.
—Byron.

Italy, my Italy!
Queen Mary's saying serves for me—
(When fortune's malice Lost her Calais) —
Open my heart and you will see Graved inside of it, "Italy."
—Robert Browning.

Fair Italy!
Thou art the garden of the world, the home
Of all Art yields, and Nature can decree,
Even in thy desert, what is like to thee?
Thy very weeds are beautiful, thy waste
More rich than other climes' fertility;
Thy wreck a glory, and thy ruin graced
With an immaculate charm which cannot be defac'd. —Byron.

Ivy

Oh, a dainty plant is the ivy green,
That creepeth o'er ruins old!
Of right choice food are his meals I ween,
In his cell so lone and cold.
* * * * *
Creeping where no life is seen,
A rare old plant is the ivy green.
—Dickens.

For ivy climbs the crumbling hall
To decorate decay. —Bailey.

Oh! how could fancy crown with thee,
In ancient days, the God of Wine,
And bid thee at the banquet be Companion of the vine?
Ivy! thy home is where each sound
Of revelry hath long been o'er;
Where song and beaker once went round,
But now are known no more.
—Mrs. Hemans.

J

January
Come, ye cold winds, at January's
call.
On whistling wings, and with white flakes bestrew
The earth. —Ruskin.

Jealousy

Love's sentinel.—Shakespeare.

Jealousy is not love, but self-love.
—Rochefoucauld.

Jealousy lives upon doubts.—Roche-
foucauld.

Jealousy is the paralysis of love.—
Vauvenargues.

He that is not jealous is not in love.
—St. Augustine.

Jealousy is one of love's parasites.
—H. W. Shaw.

What frenzy dictates, jealousy believes.—Gay.

Of my jealousy shapes faults that are not.—Shakespeare.

How many fond fools serve mad jealousy!—Shakespeare.

Jealousy is the apprehension of superiority.—Shenstone.

Self-harming jealousy.—Shake-
speare.

Jealousy is sustained as often by pride as by affection.—Colton.

A jealous man always finds more than he looks for.—Mlle. de Scudéri.

Jealousy is the forerunner of love, and often its awakener.—F. Marion Crawford.

A jealous lover lights his torch from the firebrand of the fiend.—
Burke.

Anger and jealousy can no more bear to lose sight of their objects than love.—George Eliot.

O, what damned minutes tells he o'er, who dotes, yet doubts; suspects, yet strongly loves!—Shakespeare.

Jealousy, thou grand counterpoise for all the transports beauty can inspire!—Young.

Jealousy is the sister of love, as the devil is the brother of angels.—Bouf-fiers.

There is never jealousy where there is not strong regard.—Washington
Irving.

'Tis a monster begot upon itself,
born on itself.—Shakespeare.

The jealous is possessed by a "fine mad devil" and a dull spirit at once.
—Lavater.

Jealousy is an awkward homage which inferiority renders to merit.—
Madame de Puisieux.

Jealousy is always born with love,
but does not always die with it.—La
Rochefoucauld.

Jealousy lives upon doubt, and comes to an end or becomes a fury as soon as it passes from doubt to certainty.

—La Rochefoucauld.

Jealousy, that doats but dooms, and murders, yet adores.—Sprague.

The venom clamours of a jealous woman
Poison more deadly than a mad-dog's tooth.
—Shakespeare.

O jealousy! thou magnifier of trifles.
—Schiller.

Jealousy—it is a green-eyed monster, which doth mock the meat it feeds on.
—Shakespeare.

—No greater mischief could be wrought
Than love united to a jealous thought.
—Greene.

Love often reillumes his extinguished flame at the torch of jealousy.—
Lady Blessington.

Trifles, light as air,
Are to the jealous confirmations strong
As proofs of Holy Writ.—Shakespeare.

Jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame.—Bible.

No true love there can be without Its dread penalty—jealousy.
—Lord Lytton.

Yet he was jealous, though he did not show
it,
For jealousy dislikes the world to know it.
—Byron.

The jealous man's disease is of so malignant a nature that it converts all it takes into its own nourishment.
—Addison.

Men of strong affections are jealous of their own genius. They fear lest they should be loved for a quality, and not for themselves.—Bulwer-Lyt-
ton.

People who are jealous, or particularly careful of their own rights and dignity, always find enough of those who do not care for either to keep them continually uncomfortable.—
Barnes.

Men are the cause of women not loving one another.—La Bruyère.

Jealousy sees things always with magnifying glasses which make little things large,—of dwarfs giants, suspicions truths.—Cervantes.

Women detest a jealous man whom they do not love, but it angers them when a man they do love is not jealous at times.—Mlle. de Scudéri.

Oh! the pain of pains
Is when the fair one, whom our soul is fond of,
Gives transport, and receives it from another.
—Young.

Jealousy is never satisfied with anything short of an omniscience that would detect the subtlest fold of the heart.—George Elliot.

Ten thousand furies lash my soul with whips,
At ev'ry look sharp stings transfix my
heart,
And my chill blood thrills cold through ev'ry vein.
—Darcy.

Jealousy is said to be the offspring of love. Yet, unless the parent makes haste to strangle the child, the child will not rest till it has poisoned the parent.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Foul jealousy! that turnest love divine to joyless dread, and makest the loving heart with hateful thoughts to languish and to pine.—Spenser.

Jealousy is a painful passion; yet without some share of it, the agreeable affection of love has difficulty to subsist in its full force and violence.—
Hume.

Of all the passions, jealousy is that which exacts the hardest service and pays the bitterest wages. Its service is, to watch the success of our enemy, to be sure of it.—Colton.

That anxious torture may I never feel,
Which doubtful, watches o'er a wandering
heart.
O, who that bitter torment can reveal,
Or tell the pining anguish of that smart!
—Byron.

To doubt is an injury; to suspect a friend is breach of friendship; jealousy is a seed sown but in vicious minds; prone to distrust, because apt to deceive.—Lord Lansdowne.

All the other passions condescend at times to accept the inexorable logic of facts; but jealousy looks facts straight in the face, ignores them utterly, and says that she knows a great deal better than they can tell her.—Helps.

It is with jealousy as with the gout. When such distempers are in the blood, there is never any security against their breaking out, and that often on the slightest occasions, and when least suspected.—Fielding.

Yet is there one more cursed than they all, That canker-worm, that monster, jealousy, Which eats the heart and feeds upon the gall,

Turning all love's delight to misery,
Through fear of losing his felicity.
—Spenser.

We are more jealous of frivolous accomplishments with brilliant success, than of the most estimable qualities without. Dr. Johnson envied Garrick, whom he despised, and ridiculed Goldsmith, whom he loved.—Hazlitt.

O jealousy, thou ugliest fiend of hell! thy deadly venom preys on my vitals, turns the healthful hue of my fresh cheek to haggard sallowness, and drinks my spirit up.—Hannah More.

But through the heart
Should jealousy its venom once diffuse
'Tis then delightful misery no more
But agony unmix'd, incessant gall Corroding every thought, and blasting all Love's paradise.
—Thomson.

If you are wise, and prize your peace of mind,

Believe me true, nor listen to your jealousy,
Let not that devil which undoes your sex,
That canker'd curiosity seduce you
To hunt for needless secrets, which, neglected,

Shall never hurt your quiet, but once known
Shall sit upon your heart, pinch it with pain,

And banish sweet sleep forever from you.
—Rowe.

Love may exist without jealousy, although this is rare; but jealousy may exist without love, and this is common; for jealousy can feed on that which is bitter no less than on that which is sweet, and is sustained by pride as often as by affection.—Colton.

Jeering

Abstain from dissolute laughter, uncomely jests, loud talking, and jeering.
—Jeremy Taylor.

Scoff not at the natural defects of any which are not in their power to amend. Oh, it is cruel to beat a cripple with his own crutches.—Fuller.

Jeer not others upon any occasion. If they be foolish, God hath denied them understanding; if they be vicious, you ought to pity, not revile them: if deformed, God framed their bodies, and will you scorn His workmanship? Are you wiser than your Creator? If poor, poverty was designed for a motive to charity, not to contempt; you cannot see what riches they have within.—South.

Jesting

A good jest forever.—Shakespeare.

Jesters do often prove prophets.—Shakespeare.

I do not like this fooling.—Shakespeare.

How ill white hairs become a fool and jester!—Shakespeare.

A jest is a very serious thing.—Churchill.

A jest loses its point when he who makes it is the first to laugh.—Schiller.

No time to break jests when the heartstrings are about to be broken.—Fuller.

A bitter jest, when it comes too near the truth, leaves a sharp sting behind it.—Tacitus.

Judge of a jest when you have done laughing.—Lloyd.

This fellow pecks up wit, as pigeons peace, And utters it again when Jove doth please; He is wit's peddler.—Shakespeare.

Jest with your equals.—Bion.

A jester, a bad character.—Pascal.

If anything is spoken in jest, it is not fair to turn it to earnest.—Plautus.

The jest which is expected is already destroyed.—Johnson.

Wanton jests make fools laugh, and wise men frown.—Fuller.

Jesting, often, only proves a want of intellect.—La Bruyère.

Jests,—brain-fleas that jump about among the slumbering ideas.—Heinrich Heine.

Jesting is frequently an evidence of the poverty of the understanding.—Voltaire.

The fund of sensible discourse is limited; that of jest and badinage is infinite.—Shenstone.

A joker is near akin to a buffoon; and neither of them is the least related to wit.—Chesterfield.

It is good to jest, but not to make a trade of jesting.—Queen Elizabeth.

Harmless mirth is the best cordial against the consumption of the spirit; wherefore jesting is not unlawful, if it trespasseth not in quantity, quality, or season.—Thomas Fuller.

A jest's prosperity lies in the ear
Of him that hears it, never in the tongue
Of him that makes it. —Shakespeare.

Of all the griefs that harass the distress'd,
Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest.
Fate never wounds more deep the generous
heart,
Than when a blockhead's insult points the dart. —Dr. Johnson.

Wit loses its respect with the good when seen in company with malice;
and to smile at the jest which plants a thorn in another's breast is to become a principal in the mischief.—
Sheridan.

As to jest, there ought to be certain things privileged from it,—namely, religion, matters of state, great persons, and man's present business of importance, and any case that deserveth pity.—Bacon.

Beware of biting jests; the more truth they carry with them, the greater wounds they give, the greater smarts they cause, and the greater scars they leave behind them.—Lavater.

He that will lose his friend for a jest deserves to die a beggar by the bargain. Such let thy jests be, that they may not grind the credit of thy friend; and make not jests so long till thou becomest one.—Fuller.

It is dangerous to jest with God, death, or the devil; for the first neither can nor will be mocked; the second mocks all men at one time or another; and the third puts an eternal sarcasm on those that are too familiar with him.—J. Beaumont.

He who never relaxes into sportiveness is a wearisome companion; but beware of him who jests at everything! Such men disparage by some ludicrous association, all objects which are presented to their thoughts, and thereby render themselves incapable of any emotion which can either elevate or soften them; they bring upon their moral being an influence more withering than the blasts of the desert.—Southey.

Jewels

I'll give my jewels for a set of beads.—Shakespeare.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear.
—Gray.

If that a pearl may in a toad's head dwell,
And may be found too in an oyster shell.
—Bunyan.

These gems have life in them: their colors
speak,
Say what words fail of. —George Eliot.

Jewels five-words-long,
That on the stretch'd forefinger of all Time
Sparkle forever. —Tennyson.

There is many a rich stone laid up in the bowels of the earth, many a fair pearl laid up in the bosom of the sea,

that never was seen nor never shall be.—Bishop Hall.

The lively Diamond drinks thy purest rays,
Collected light, compact. —Thomson.

Some ask'd how pearls did grow, and where,
Then spoke I to my girl,
To part her lips, and showed them there
The quarrelets of pearl. —Herrick.

Jews

The Jews were God's chosen people.
—Chrysostom.

There is no clime which they can call home.—Hayes.

Sufferance is the badge of all our tribe.—Shakespeare.

The adherence of the Jews to their religion makes their testimony unquestionable.—J. Perles.

To the Jews only, and not to the Gentiles, was a Saviour promised.—
Elias Hicks.

The great number of the Jews furnishes us with a sufficient cloud of witnesses that attest the truth of the Bible.—Addison.

They are a piece of stubborn antiquity, compared with which Stonehenge is in its nonage. They date beyond the Pyramids.—Lamb.

I am a Jew. Hath not a Jew eyes?
hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?
fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is?—
Shakespeare.

The Jews are among the aristocracy of every land; if a literature is called rich in the possession of a few classic tragedies, what shall we say to a national tragedy lasting for fifteen hundred years, in which the poets and the actors were also the heroes.—George Eliot.

Talk what you will of the Jews,— that they are cursed: they thrive wherever they come; they are able to oblige the prince of their country by lending him money; none of them beg;

they keep together; and as for their being hated, why, Christians hate one another as much.—Selden.

Joke (See Jest)

Jokes are the cayenne of conversation, and the salt of life.—Chatfield.

The next best thing to a very good joke is a very bad one.—J. C. Hare.

And gentle Dullness ever loves a joke.—Pope.

It requires a surgical operation to get a joke well into a Scotch understanding.—Sydney Smith.

Be not affronted at a joke. If one throw salt at thee, thou wilt receive no harm, unless thou art raw.—Junius.

Journalism

Journalism has already come to be the first power in the land.—Samuel Bowles.

The mob of gentlemen who wrote with ease.—Pope.

The press is the fourth estate of the realm.—Carlyle.

Report me and my cause aright
To the unsatisfied. —Shakespeare.

Did Charity prevail, the press would prove
A vehicle of virtue, truth, and love.
—Cowper.

Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets.—Napoleon I.

Journalism is an immense power, that threatens soon to supersede sermons, lectures, and books.—Theodore Tilton.

The journalist should be on his guard against publishing what is false in taste or exceptionable in morals.—
Bryant.

A journal should be neither an echo nor a pander.—G. W. Curtis.

Newspapers always excite curiosity.
No one ever lays one down without a feeling of disappointment.—Charles Lamb.

He's gone, and who knows how he may report

Thy words by adding fuel to the flame?
—Milton.

To serve thy generation, this thy fate:
"Written in water," swiftly fades thy name;
But he who loves his kind does, first and late,
A work too great for fame.

—Mary Clemmer.

They consume a considerable quantity of our paper manufacture, employ our artisans in printing, and find business for great numbers of indigent persons.—Addison.

A would-be satirist, a hired buffoon,
A monthly scribbler of some low lampoon,
Condemn'd to drudge, the meanest of the mean,
And furbish falsehoods for a magazine.

—Byron.

Hear, land o' cakes, and brither Scots,
Frae Maidenkirke to Johnny Groat's;
If there's a hole in a' your coats,

I rede you tent it:
A chiel's amang you taking notes,
And, faith, he'll prent it.

—Burns.

Here shall the Press the People's right maintain,

Unawed by influence and unbribed by gain;
Here Patriot Truth her glorious precepts draw,

Pledged to Religion, Liberty, and Law.
—Joseph Story.

Trade hardly deems the busy day begun
Till his keen eye along the sheet has run;
The blooming daughter throws her needle by,

And reads her schoolmate's marriage with a sigh;

While the grave mother puts her glasses on,
And gives a tear to some old crony gone.
The preacher, too, his Sunday theme lays down,

To know what last new folly fills the town;
Lively or sad, life's meanest, mightiest things,

The fate of fighting cocks, or fighting kings.
—Sprague.

The best use of a journal is to print the largest practical amount of important truth,—truth which tends to make mankind wiser, and thus happier.—Horace Greeley.

The News-writer lies down at Night in great Tranquillity, upon a piece of News which corrupts before Morning, and which he is obliged to throw away as soon as he awakes.—De La Bruyère.

Only a newspaper! Quick read, quick lost,
Who sums the treasure that it carries hence?
Torn, trampled under feet, who counts thy cost,
Star-eyed intelligence? —Mary Clemmer.

Joy

Joyousness is Nature's garb of health.—Lamartine.

Joy is the best of wine.—George Eliot.

Without kindness, there can be no true joy.—Carlyle.

Sorrows remembered sweeten present joy.—Pollok.

I wish you all the joy that you can wish.—Shakespeare.

True joy is only hope put out of fear.—Lord Brooke.

Joys are our wings, sorrows are our spurs.—Richter.

Far beneath a soul immortal is a mortal joy.—Young.

A blithe heart makes a blooming visage.—Scotch Proverb.

A thing of beauty is a joy forever.
—Keats.

Joy in one's work is the consummate tool.—Phillips Brooks.

Joy surfeited turns to sorrow.—Alfieri.

He who can conceal his joys is greater than he who can hide his griefs.—Lavater.

In every exalted joy, there mingles a sense of gratitude.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

The cup of joy is heaviest when empty.—Marguerite de Valois.

Profound joy has more of severity than gayety in it.—Montaigne.

Joy softens more hearts than tears.—Mme. de Sartory.

True joy is a serene and sober motion.—Seneca.

Joy never feasts so high as when the first course is of misery.—Suckling.

Joy is more divine than sorrow; for joy is bread, and sorrow is medicine.—Beecher.

Joys too exquisite to last, and yet more exquisite when passed.—Montgomery.

There is a sweet joy that comes to us through sorrow.—Spurgeon.

The joy of a strong nature is as cloudless as its suffering is desolate.—Ouida.

Deep joy is a serene and sober emotion, rarely evinced in open merriment.—Mme. Roland.

How happy are the pessimists! What joy is theirs when they have proved there is no joy.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Silence is the perfectest herald of joy: I were but little happy if I could say how much.—Shakespeare.

We lose the peace of years when we hunt after the rapture of moments.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Sweets with sweets war not; joy delights in joy.—Shakespeare.

These spiritual joys are dogged by no sad sequels.—Glanvill.

Capacity for joy admits temptation.—Mrs. Browning.

What is joy? A sunbeam between two clouds.—Madame Deluzy.

In this world, full often our joys are only the tender shadows which our sorrows cast.—Beecher.

There is not a joy the world can give like that it takes away.—Byron.

The joy which is caused by truth and noble thoughts shows itself in the words by which they are expressed.—Joubert.

One hour of joy dispels the cares
And sufferings of a thousand years.
—Baptiste.

Joys
Are bubble-like—what makes them,
Bursts them too. —Bailey.

When the power of imparting joy is equal to the will, the human soul requires no other heaven.—Shelley.

Joy is a flame which association alone can keep alive, and which goes out unless communicated.—Lamartine.

Who partakes in another's joys is a more humane character than he who partakes in his griefs.—Lavater.

Joy is an import; joy is an exchange;
Joy flies monopolists: it calls for two;
Rich fruit! Heaven planted! never pluck'd by one. —Young.

Little joys refresh us constantly, like house-bread, and never bring disgust; and great ones, like sugar-bread, briefly, and then satiety.—Richter.

Trouble is a thing that will come without our call; but true joy will not spring up without ourselves.—Bishop Patrick.

Joy is the mainspring in the whole
Of endless Nature's calm rotation.
Joy moves the dazzling wheels that roll
In the great Time-piece of Creation.
—Schiller.

Here below is not the land of happiness: I know it now; it is only the land of toil, and every joy which comes to us is only to strengthen us for some greater labor that is to succeed.—Fichte.

The very society of joy redoubles it; so that, whilst it lights upon my friend it rebounds upon myself, and the brighter his candle burns the more easily will it light mine.—South.

There are joys which long to be ours. God sends ten thousand truths, which come about us like birds seeking inlet; but we are shut up to them, and so they bring us nothing, but sit and sing awhile upon the roof, and then fly away.—Beecher.

Joy wholly from without, is false, precarious, and short. From without it may be gathered; but, like gathered flowers, though fair, and sweet for a season, it must soon wither, and become offensive. Joy from within is like smelling the rose on the tree; it is more sweet and fair, it is lasting; and, I must add, immortal.—Young.

The joy resulting from the diffusion of blessings to all around us is the purest and sublimest that can ever enter the human mind, and can be conceived only by those who have experienced it. Next to the consolations of divine grace, it is the most sovereign balm to the miseries of life, both in him who is the object of it, and in him who exercises it.—Bishop Porteus.

God is merely tuning the soul, as an instrument, in this life. And these joys of the Christian, are only the notes and chords that are sounded out in the preparation—preludes to the perfect harmony that shall flood the soul—forerunners of the perfected and rapturous joy that shall bless the soul, in that exceeding and eternal weight of glory.—Herrick Johnson.

Real joy seems dissonant from the human character in its present condition; and if it be felt, it must come from a higher region, for the world is shadowed by sorrow; thorns array the ground; the very clouds, while they weep fertility on our mountains, seem also to shed a tear on man's grave who departs, unlike the beauties of summer, to return no more; who fades unlike the sons of the forest, which another summer beholds new clothed, when he is unclothed and forgotten.—Rev. Dr. Andrews.

Many men fail to realize that joy is distinctly moral. It is a fruit of the spiritual life. We have no more right to pray for joy, if we are not doing the things that Jesus said would bring it, than we would have to ask interest in a savings bank in which we had never deposited money. Joy does not happen. It is a flower that springs from roots. It is the inevitable result of certain lines followed and laws obeyed, and so a matter of character. Therefore, we cannot say that joy is like a fine complexion, a distinct addition to the charm of the face, which yet would be structurally perfect without this charm. Joy is a feature, and the face that does not have it is disfigured. The Christian life that is joyless is a discredit to God, and a disgrace to itself.—Maltbie Babcock.

Judaism (See Jews)

There was a twilight before the dawn, and a dawn before the morning, and a morning before the day.—W. E. Gladstone.

Stands midway between Heathenism and Christianity. It rose out of Heathenism as twilight out of night and melted into Christianity as twilight into morning.—Anonymous.

Judge

The cold neutrality of an impartial judge.—Burke.

When a man's life is under debate,
The judge can ne'er too long deliberate.
—Dryden.

A wise judge, by the craft of the law, was never seduced from its purpose.—Southey.

What can innocence hope for,
When such as sit her judges are corrupted?
—Massinger.

It is better that a judge should lean on the side of compassion than severity.—Cervantes.

Heaven is above all yet; there sits a judge,
That no king can corrupt. —Shakespeare.

The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
And wretches hang that jurymen may dine.
—Pope

Let the judges answer to the question of law, and the jurors to the matter of fact.—Law Maxim.

A corrupt judge is not qualified to inquire into the truth.—Horace.

Four things belong to a judge: to bear courteously, to answer wisely, to consider soberly, and to decide impartially.—Socrates.

If judges would make their decisions just, they should behold neither plaintiff, defendant, nor pleader, but only the cause itself.—Livingston.

Judges ought to be more learned than witty, more reverent than plausible, and more advised than confident. Above all things, integrity is their portion and proper virtue.—Bacon.

Judges are but men, and are swayed like other men by vehement prejudices. This is corruption in reality, give it whatever other name you please.—David Dudley Field.

A good judge should never boast of his power, because he can do nothing but what he can do justly: he is not the master, but the minister of the law. Authority without virtue is a very dangerous state.—Thomas Wilson.

And then, the justice;
In fair round belly, with good capon lin'd,
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances,
And so he plays his part. —Shakespeare.

He who the sword of heaven will bear
Should be as holy as severe;
Pattern in himself to know,
Grace to stand, and virtue go;
More nor less to others paying
Than by self-offenses weighing.
Shame to him, whose cruel striking
Kills for faults of his own liking!
—Shakespeare.

Judgment

Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all.—Shakespeare.

Wise judges are we of each other!
—Richelieu.

When we love, it is the heart that judges.—Joubert.

Judge thyself with a judgment of sincerity, and thou wilt judge others with a judgment of charity.—Mason.

The more one judges, the less one loves.—Balzac.

No man should be judge in his own case.—Law Maxim.

Extreme justice is extreme injustice.—Cicero.

He hurts the good who spares the bad.—Syrus.

For every event is a judgment of God.—Schiller.

Judgment is forced upon us by experience.—Johnson.

Make not thyself the judge of any man.—Longfellow.

One man's word is no man's word; we should quietly hear both sides.—Goethe.

Who upon earth could live were all judged justly?—Byron.

Every one complains of the badness of his memory, but nobody of his judgment.—Rochefoucauld.

'Tis with our judgments as our watches;
none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own.
—Pope.

The right of private judgment is absolute in every American citizen.—James A. Garfield.

The judgment of a great people is often wiser than the wisest men.—Kossuth.

Judging is balancing an account, and determining on which side the odds lie.—Locke.

I will chide no heathen in the world, but myself, against whom I know most faults.—Shakespeare.

The world is an excellent judge in general, but a very bad one in particular.—Lord Greville.

A judgment is the mental act by which one thing is affirmed or denied of another.—Sir W. Hamilton.

And how his audit stands, who knows, save Heaven?—Shakespeare.

How would you be if He, which is the top of judgment, should but judge you as you are?—Shakespeare.

Men's judgments sway on that side fortune leans.—George Chapman.

Outward judgment often fails, inward justice never.—Theodore Parker.

Hear one side, and you will be in the dark; hear both sides, and all will be clear.—Haliburton.

I can promise to be sincere, but I cannot promise to be impartial.—Goethe.

There are no judgments so harsh as those of the erring, the inexperienced, and the young.—Miss Mulock.

I mistrust the judgment of every man in a case in which his own wishes are concerned.—Wellington.

They, judgment and reason, have been grandjurymen since before Noah was a sailor.—Shakespeare.

Next to sound judgment, diamonds and pearls are the rarest things to be met with.—Bruyère.

O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts, And men have lost their reason! —Shakespeare.

We shall be judged, not by what we might have been, but what we have been.—Sewell.

Woe to him, * * * who has no court of appeal against the world's judgment.—Carlyle.

Human judgment is finite, and it ought always to be charitable.—William Winter.

How little do they see what is, who frame Their hasty judgment upon that which seems. —Southey.

If we will measure other people's corn in our own bushel, let us first take it to the Divine standard, and have it sealed.—J. G. Holland.

Judge thyself with a judgment of sincerity, and thou wilt judge others with a judgment of charity.—Mason.

We judge ourselves by what we feel capable of doing, while others judge us by what we have already done.—Longfellow.

The very thing that men think they have got the most of, they have got the least of; and that is judgment.—H. W. Shaw.

How are we justly to determine in a world where there are no innocent ones to judge the guilty?—Madame de Genlis.

Men are not to be judged by their looks, habits, and appearances; but by the character of their lives and conversations, and by their works.—L'Es-trange.

The most generous and merciful in judgment upon the faults of others, are always the most free from faults themselves.—Aughey.

Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice; Take each man's censure, but reserve by judgment. —Shakespeare.

We neither know nor judge ourselves: others may judge, but cannot know us. God alone judges and knows us.—Wilkie Collins.

In judging of others, a man labor-eth in vain,—often erreth and easily sinneth; but in judging and examining himself, he always laboreth fruitfully. —Thomas à Kempis.

For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.—Bible.

Rashly, nor oft-times truly, doth man pass judgment on his brother; for he seeth not the springs of the heart, nor heareth the reasons of the mind.—Tupper.

Fools measure actions after they are done by the event; wise men beforehand, by the rules of reason and right. The former look to the end to judge of the act. Let me look to the act, and leave the end to God.—Bishop Hale.

O, how full of error is the judgment of mankind. They wonder at results when they are ignorant of the reasons. They call it fortune when they know not the cause, and thus worship their own ignorance changed into a deity.—Metastasio.

In forming a judgment, lay your hearts void of fore-taken opinions; else, whatsoever is done or said, will be measured by a wrong rule; like them who have the jaundice, to whom everything appeareth yellow.—Sir P. Sidney.

It is very questionable, in my mind, how far we have the right to judge one of another, since there is born within every man the germs of both virtue and vice. The development of one or the other is contingent upon circumstances.—Ballou.

The judgment may be compared to a clock or watch, where the most ordinary machine is sufficient to tell the hours; but the most elaborate alone can point out the minutes and seconds, and distinguish the smallest differences of time.—Fontenelle.

Foolish men imagine that because judgment for an evil thing is delayed, there is no justice, but an accident alone, here below. Judgment for an evil thing is many times delayed some day or two, some century or two; but it is sure as life, it is sure as death!—Carlyle.

Ev'n not all these, in one rich lot combined,
Can make the happy man, without the mind,
Where judgment sits clear-sighted, and surveys
The chain of reason with unerring gaze.

—Thomson.

It behooves us always to bear in mind, that while actions are always to be judged by the immutable standard of right and wrong, the judgments which we pass upon men must be qualified by considerations of age, country, station, and other accidental circumstances; and it will then be found that he who is most charitable in his judgment is generally the least unjust.—Southey.

God does not weigh criminality in our scales. We have one absolute, with the seal of authority upon it; and with us an ounce is an ounce, and a pound a pound. God's measure is the heart of the offender,—a balance which varies with every one of us, a balance so delicate that a tear cast in the other side may make the weight of error kick the beam.—Lowell.

Would that our harsh judgments could be restrained, our impatience checked, our selfishness broken down, our passions controlled, our waste of time and life in worthless or unworthy objects corrected, by the thought that there is One in whose hands we are, who cares for us with a parent's love, who will judge us hereafter without the slightest tinge of human infirmity, the All-Merciful and the All-Just.—Dean Stanley.

Judgment Day

Truly at the day of judgment we shall not be examined as to what we have read, but as to what we have done; not as to how well we have spoken, but as to how religiously we have lived.—Thomas à Kempis.

Oh, on that day, that wrathful day,
When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Be Thou, O Christ, the sinner's stay,
Though heaven and earth shall pass away.
—Walter Scott.

We are all approaching that dread tribunal. However diversified our paths, they all converge toward that common centre. The young, with their elastic tread, are striding to the judgment; the old, with their tottering limbs are creeping to the judgment; the rich in their splendid equipages are driving to the judgment; the poor in rags and barefooted are walking to the judgment. The Christian making God's statutes his song, is a pilgrim to the judgment; the sinner, treading upon the mercy of Jesus, and trampling upon His blood, is hastening to the judgment. "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ."—Richard Fuller.

Glorious transformation! glorious translation! I seem already to behold the wondrous scene. The sea and the land have given up their dead! the quickened myriads have been judged according to their works. And now, an innumerable company, out of all nations and tribes and tongues, ascend with the Mediator towards the kingdom of His Father. Can it be that these, who were born children of earth, who were long enemies to God by wicked works, are to enter the bright scenes of paradise? Yes, He who leads them has washed them in His blood; He who leads them has sanctified them by His Spirit.—Henry Melville.

Meanwhile the globe begins to tremble on its axis; the moon is covered with a bloody veil, the threatening stars hang half detached from the vault of heaven, and the agony of the world commences. Then, all at once, the fatal hour strikes; God suspends the movements of the creation, and the earth has passed away like an exhausted river. Now resounds the trumpet of the angel of judgment; and the cry is heard, "Arise, ye dead!" The sepulchres burst open with a terrific noise, the human race issues all at once from the tomb, and the assembled multitudes fill the valley of Jehoshaphat. Behold, the Son of Man appears in the clouds; the powers of hell ascend from the depths of the abyss to witness the last judgment pronounced upon the ages; the goats are separated from the sheep, the wicked are plunged into the gulf, the just ascend triumphantly to heaven, God returns to His repose, and the reign of eternity commences.—Chateaubriand.

June

And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then heaven tries earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays.
—Lowell.

It is the month of June,
The month of leaves and roses,
When pleasant sights salute the eyes
And pleasant scents the noses.
—N. P. Willis.

June falls asleep upon her bier of flowers;
In vain are dewdrops sprinkled o'er her,
In vain would fond winds fan her back to life,
Her hours are numbered on the floral dial.
—Lucy Larcom.

July

The summer looks out from her brazen tower,
Through the flashing bars of July.
—Francis Thompson.

Loud is the summer's busy song
The smallest breeze can find a tongue,
While insects of each tiny size
Grow teasing with their melodies,
Till noon burns with his blistering breath
Around, and day lies still as death.
—Clare.

The linden, in the fervors of July,
Hums with a louder concert. When the wind Sweeps the broad forest in its summer prime,
As when some master-hand exulting sweeps
The keys of some great organ, ye give forth
The music of the woodland depths, a hymn
Of gladness and of thanks. —Bryant.

Jury

Do not your juries give their verdict
As if they felt the cause, not heard it.
—Butler.

The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
And wretches hang, that jurymen may dine.
—Pope.

The jury, passing on the prisoner's life,
May, in the sworn twelve, have a thief or two Guiltier than him they try.—Shakespeare.

In my mind he was guilty of no error, he was chargeable with no exaggeration, he was betrayed by his fancy into no metaphor, who once said, that all we see about us, Kings, Lords, and Commons, the whole machinery of the state, all the apparatus of the system, and its varied workings, end in simply bringing twelve good men into a box.—Lord Brougham.

Justice

Heaven's slow but sure redress of human ills.—Owen Meredith.

Justice is truth in action.—Joubert.

Justice is the soul of the universe.
—Omar Khayam.

Justice satisfies everybody, and justice alone.—Emerson.

Justice delayed is justice denied.—Gladstone.

Justice without wisdom is impossible.—Froude.

Delay of justice is injustice.—Landor.

He who is only just is cruel.—Byron.

Justice always whirls in equal measure.—Shakespeare.

Justice is the great end of civil society.—David Dudley Field.

Moderation is the basis of justice.—George MacDonald.

The great soul of this world is just.—Carlyle.

Justice is lame as well as blind among us.—Otway.

The books are balanced in heaven, not here.—H. W. Shaw.

Let us be sacrificers, but no butchers.—Shakespeare.

Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall.—Motto of Emperor Ferdinand I.

Peace, if possible, but justice at any rate.—Wendell Phillips.

The virtue of justice consists in moderation, as regulated by wisdom.—Aristotle.

Justice discards party, friendship, kindred, and is always, therefore, represented as blind.—Addison.

There is no virtue so truly great and godlike as justice.—Addison.

It is impossible to be just if one is not generous.—Joseph Roux.

Every place is safe to him who lives with justice.—Epictetus.

Be just in all thy actions, and if join'd
With those that are not, never change thy mind.—Denham.

God's mill grinds slow, but sure.—George Herbert.

The sweet remembrance of the just
Shall flourish when he sleeps in dust.
—Paraphrase of Psalm cxii. 6.

Above all other things is justice: success is a good thing; wealth is good also; honor is better; but justice excels them all.—David Dudley Field.

Man is unjust, but God is just; and finally justice triumphs.—Longfellow.

The hope of all who suffer,
The dread of all who wrong.
—Whittier.

Poise the cause in justice's equal scales,
Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails.—Shakespeare.

Whoever fights, whoever falls,
Justice conquers evermore.
—Emerson.

No obligation to justice does force a man to be cruel, or to use the sharpest sentence.—Jeremy Taylor.

Justice, being destroyed, will destroy; being preserved, will preserve.—Manu.

Justice is but the distributing to everything according to the requirements of its nature.—Glanvill.

Justice is like the north star, which is fixed, and all the rest revolve about it.—Confucius.

Justice is the bread of the nation; it is always hungry for it.—Chateaubriand.

Pity and forbearance should characterize all acts of justice.—Franklin.

Sound policy is never at variance with substantial justice.—Dr. Parr.

The injustice of men subverts the justice of God, and often His mercy.—Madame Swetchine.

Justice consists in doing no injury to men; decency, in giving them no offence.—Cicero.

All religion and all ethics are summed up in justice.—Conway.

Men are always invoking justice; yet it is justice which should make them tremble.—Mme. Swetchine.

Liberty, equality,—bad principles! The only true principle for humanity is justice, and justice towards the feeble becomes necessarily protection or kindness.—Amiel.

I beseech you,
Wrest once the law to your authority:
To do a great right, do a little wrong.
—Shakespeare.

Justice is the fundamental and almost only virtue of social life, as it embraces all those actions which are useful to society.—Volney.

Justice offers nothing but what may be accepted with honor; and lays claim to nothing in return but what we ought not even to wish to withhold.—Woman's Rights and Duties.

The sentiment of justice is so natural, so universally acquired by all mankind, that it seems to me independent of all law, all party, all religion.—Voltaire.

Justice is the insurance which we have on our lives and property; to which may be added, and obedience is the premium which we pay for it.—William Penn.

Truth is its handmaid, freedom is its child, peace is its companion, safety walks in its steps, victory follows in its train; it is the brightest emanation from the gospel, it is the attribute of God.—Sydney Smith.

God gives manhood but one clew to success,—utter and exact justice; that he guarantees shall be always expediency.—Wendell Phillips.

God's justice, tardy though it prove perchance,
Rests never on the track until it reach Delinquency. —Robert Browning.

Thrice is he arm'd that hath his quarrel just,
And he but naked, though lock'd up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.
—Shakespeare.

Justice is the idea of God, the ideal of man, the rule of conduct writ in the nature of mankind.—Theodore Parker.

Be just and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's. —Shakespeare.

Justice is the great interest of man on earth. It is the ligament which holds civilized beings and civilized nations together.—Webster.

In matters of equity between man and man, our Saviour has taught us to put my neighbor in place of myself, and myself in place of my neighbor.—Dr. Watts.

Who shall put his finger on the work of justice, and say, "It is there"? Justice is like the kingdom of God: it is not without us as a fact; it is within us as a great yearning.—George Eliot.

At present we can only reason of the divine justice from what we know of justice in man. When we are in other scenes, we may have truer and nobler ideas of it; but while we are in this life, we can only speak from the volume that is laid open before us.—Pope.

Though justice be thy plea, consider this, that in the course of justice none of us should see salvation. We do pray for mercy; and that same prayer doth teach us all to render the deeds of mercy.—Shakespeare.

Ay, justice, who evades her?
 Her scales reach every heart;
 The action and the motive,
 She weigheth each apart;
 And none who swerve from right or truth
 Can 'scape her penalty. —Mrs. Hale.

Justice is immortal, eternal, and immutable, like God Himself; and the development of law is only then a progress when it is directed towards those principles which like Him, are eternal; and whenever prejudice or error succeeds in establishing in customary law any doctrine contrary to eternal justice.—Kossuth.

Justice is passionless and therefore sure;
 Guilt for a while may flourish; virtue sink
 'Neath the shade of calumny and ill; justice
 At last, like the bright sun, shall break
 majestic forth,
 The shield of innocence, the guard of truth.
 —J. F. Smith.

K

Kⁱⁿ Our kindred first.—Chamfort.

The rich never want kindred.—

A little more than kin, and less than kind.—Shakespeare.

Let the white man's country be my country, and his kindred my kindred.—Pocahontas.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.—Shakespeare.

The parted bosom clings to wonted home, if aught that's kindred cheer the welcome hearth.—Byron.

Kindness

Kind words are the music of the world.—F. W. Faber.

Beauty lives with kindness.—Shakespeare.

Kindness is virtue itself.—Lamar-tine.

Heaven in sunshine will requite the kind.—Byron.

Kindness gives birth to kindness.—Sophocles.

Kindness nobler ever than revenge.—Shakespeare.

A small unkindness is a great of-fence.—Hannah More.

How wise must one be to be always kind.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Kindness, the poetry of the heart.—Aimé-Martin.

Paradise is open to all kind hearts.—Béranger.

There is a vast deal of vital air in loving words.—Landor.

Kindness which is not inexhaust-ible does not deserve the name.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

He had a face like a benediction.—Cervantes.

Kindness is the only charm permit-ted to the aged; it is the coquetry of white hairs.—Octave Feuillet.

Kindness has converted more sin-ners than either zeal, eloquence, or learning.—F. W. Faber.

Kindness in women, not their beauteous looks, Shall win my love.—Shakespeare.

That best portion of a good man's life, His little nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love.—Wordsworth.

Wherever there is a human being there is an opportunity for a kindness.—Seneca.

Kindness is wisdom. There is none in life But needs it and may learn.—Bailey.

Yet do I fear thy nature; It is too full o' the milk o' human kind-ness.—Shakespeare.

Wise sayings often fall on barren ground; but a kind word is never thrown away.—Arthur Helps.

If what must be given is given willingly the kindness is doubled.—Syrus.

Kindness is the golden chain by which society is bound together.—Goethe.

An effort made for the happiness of others lifts us above ourselves.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Kind hearts are more than coronets, and simple faith than Norman blood.—Tennyson.

You may ride us with one soft kiss a thousand furlongs, ere with spur we heat an acre.—Shakespeare.

The drying up a single tear has more of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.—Byron.

There is no beautifier of complexion or form or behavior like the wish to scatter joy, and not pain, around us.—Emerson.

There is no dearth of kindness in this world of ours; only in our blindness we gather thorns for flowers.—Gerald Massey.

Their cause I plead—plead it in heart and mind;
A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind.
—David Garrick.

I have sped by land and sea, and mingled with much people, but never yet could find a spot unsunned by human kindness.—Tupper.

What thou wilt,
Thou shalt rather enforce it with thy smile,
Than hew to't with thy sword.
—Shakespeare.

Gentle feelings produce profoundly beneficial effects upon stern natures. It is the spring rain which melts the ice-covering of the earth, and causes it to open to the beams of heaven.—Fredrika Bremer.

Ministers who threaten death and destruction employ weapons of weakness. Argument and kindness are alone effectual, flavored by the principles of Divine love.—Hosea Ballou.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.—Tillotson.

How easy it is for one benevolent being to diffuse pleasure around him; and how truly is a kind heart a fountain of gladness, making everything in its vicinity to freshen into smiles! —Washington Irving.

Oppose kindness to perverseness. The heavy sword will not cut soft silk; by using sweet words and gentleness you may lead an elephant with a hair.—Saadi.

Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindnesses and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart, and secure comfort.—Sir Humphry Davy.

The cheapest of all things is kindness, its exercise requiring the least possible trouble and self-sacrifice. "Win hearts," said Barleigh to Queen Elizabeth, "and you have all men's hearts and purses."—Samuel Smiles.

The happiness of life may be greatly increased by small courtesies in which there is no parade, whose voice is too still to tease, and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention.—Sterne.

He who confers a favor should at once forget it, if he is not to show a sordid ungenerous spirit. To remind a man of a kindness conferred on him, and to talk of it, is little different from reproach.—Demosthenes.

One kindly deed may turn
The fountain of thy soul
To love's sweet day-star, that shall o'er thee burn
Long as its currents roll. —Holmes.

Always say a kind word if you can, if only that it may come in, perhaps, with singular opportuneness, entering some mournful man's darkened room, like a beautiful firefly, whose happy circumvolutions he cannot but watch, forgetting his many troubles.—Helps.

We may scatter the seeds of courtesy and kindness around us at so little expense. Some of them will inevitably fall on good ground, and grow up into benevolence in the minds of others; and all of them will bear fruit of happiness in the bosom whence they spring.—Bentham.

Kind words produce their own image in men's souls, and a beautiful image it is. They soothe and quiet and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.—Pascal.

In the intercourse of social life, it is by little acts of watchful kindness recurring daily and hourly,—and opportunities of doing kindnesses if sought for are forever starting up,—it is by words, by tones, by gestures, by looks, that affection is won and preserved. He who neglects these trifles, yet boasts that, whenever a great sacrifice is called for, he shall be ready to make it, will rarely be loved. The likelihood is, he will not make it; and if he does, it will be much rather for his own sake than for his neighbor's.—G. A. Sala.

Since trifles make the sum of human things, And half our misery from our foibles springs;

Since life's best joys consist in peace and ease,

And few can save or serve, but all may please;

Oh! let th' ungentle spirit learn from hence A small unkindness is a great offense, Large bounties to restore we wish in vain, But all may shun the guilt of giving pain. —Hannah More.

Everyone of us knows how painful it is to be called by malicious names, to have his character undermined by false insinuations, to be overreached in a bargain, to be neglected by those who rise in life, to be thrust on one side by those who have stronger wills and stouter hearts. Everyone knows, also, the pleasure of receiving a kind look, a warm greeting, a hand held out to help in distress, a difficulty solved, a higher hope revealed for this world or the next. By that pain and by that pleasure let us judge what we should do to others.—Dean Stanley.

Kings

A king should be a king in all things.—Adrian.

There's such divinity doth hedge a king.—Shakespeare.

Every monarch is subject to a mightier one.—Seneca.

The right divine of kings to govern wrong!—Pope.

The king's name is a tower of strength.—Shakespeare.

A good king is a public servant.—Ben Jonson.

What is a king? a man condemn'd to bear The public burthen of the nation's care. —Prior.

The king that yields to popular commotions, Is more the slave than sovereign of his people. —Philips.

The king that faithfully judgeth the poor, his throne shall be established forever.—Bible.

Luxurious kings are to their people lost, They live like drones, upon the public cost. —Dryden.

The presence of a king engenders love Amongst his subjects, and his royal friends. —Shakespeare.

What have kings That privates have not too, save ceremony? —Shakespeare.

Oh, happy kings, Whose thrones are raised in their subjects' hearts. —John Ford.

He on whom heaven confers a sceptre knows not the weight till he bears it.—Corneille.

Implements of war and subjugation are the last arguments to which kings resort.—Patrick Henry.

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.—Shakespeare.

Whoever is king, is also the father of his country.—Congreve.

Empire! thou poor and despicable thing, when such as these make or unmake a king!—Dryden.

A man's a man; but when you see a king, you see the work of many thousand men.—George Eliot.

Kings will be tyrants from policy, when subjects are rebels from principle.—Ed. Burke.

Kings are like stars—they rise and set—they have The worship of the world, but no repose.
—Shelley.

A king is the first servant and first magistrate of the state.—Frederick the Great.

Kings are for nations in their swaddling-clothes: France has attained her majority.—Victor Hugo.

The king is but a man, as I am, the violet smells to him as it does to me.—Shakespeare.

O, unhappy state of kings! it is well the robe of majesty is gay, or who would put it on?—Hannah More.

Not all the water in the rough rude sea
Can wash the balm from an anointed king:
The breath of worldly men cannot depose
The deputy elected by the Lord.
—Shakespeare.

A crown! what is it? It is to bear the miseries of a people,—to hear their murmurs, feel their discontents, and sink beneath a load of splendid care.—Hannah More.

Within the hollow crown that rounds the mortal temples of a king, keeps Death his court; and there the antic sits, scoffing his state.—Shakespeare.

The example alone of a vicious prince will corrupt an age; but that of a good one will not reform it.—Swift.

The people are fashioned according to the example of their king, and edicts are of less power than the model which his life exhibits.—Claudianus.

When a king sets himself to bandy against the highest court and residence of all regal powers, he then, in the single person of a man, fights against his own majesty and kingship.
—Milton.

A king may be a tool, a thing of straw; but if he serves to frighten our enemies, and secure our property, it is well enough; a scarecrow is a thing of straw, but it protects the corn.—Pope.

A crown
Golden in show, is but a wreath of thorns;
Brings danger, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights
To him who wears a regal diadem.
—Milton.

He is ours,
T' administer, to guard, t' adorn the state,
But not to warp or change it. We are his,
To serve him nobly in the common cause,
True to the death, but not to be his slaves.
—Cowper.

And while they live, we see their glorious actions
Oft wrested to the worst; and all their life
Is but a stage of endless toil and strife,
Of torments, uproars, mutinies, and factions;
They rise with fear, and lie with danger down;
Huge are the cares that wait upon the crown.
—Earl of Sterling.

He's a king,
A right true king, that dares do aught save wrong:
Fears nothing mortal, but to be unjust;
Who is not blown up with the flatt'ring puffs
Of spongy sycophants; who stands unmov'd
Despite the jostling of opinion.—Marston.

The king-becoming graces,
As justice, verity, temperance, stableness,
Bounty, perseverance, mercy, lowliness,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude,
I have no relish of them; but abound
In the division of each several crime,
Acting in many ways. —Shakespeare.

One of the strongest natural proofs of the folly of hereditary right in kings is, that Nature disapproves it;

otherwise she would not so frequently turn it into ridicule by giving mankind an ass in place of a lion.—Thomas Paine.

Kisses

The blossom of love.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Love's great artillery.—Crashaw.

Kisses are the messengers of love.—Martin Opitz.

Stolen kisses are always sweetest.—Leigh Hunt.

A kiss from my mother made me a painter.—Benjamin West.

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth, and love.—Byron.

"Kiss" rhymes to "bliss" in fact, as well as verse.—Byron.

Eden revives in the first kiss of love.—Byron.

Sweetest memorial, the first kiss of love.—Byron.

Our spirits rushed together at the touching of the lips.—Tennyson.

With this kiss take my blessing. God protect thee!—Shakespeare.

As in the soft and sweet eclipse, when soul meets soul on lovers' lips.—Shelley.

You cannot analyze a kiss any more than you can dissect the fragrance of flowers.—H. W. Shaw.

I clasp thy waist, I feel thy bosom's beat—oh, kiss me into faintness sweet and dim!—Alexander Smith.

Or leave a kiss but in the cup, and I'll not look for wine.—Ben Jonson.

Upon thy cheek lay I this zealous kiss, as seal to the indenture of my love.—Shakespeare.

Lord! I wonder what fool it was that first invented kissing.—Swift.

Some there be that shadows kiss; such have but a shadow's bliss.—Shakespeare.

* * * And when my lips meet thine
Thy very soul is wedded unto mine.
—H. H. Boyesen.

A soft lip
Would tempt you to eternity of kissing!
—Ben Jonson.

What is a kisse? Why this, as some approve:
The sure sweet sement, glue, and lime of love.
—Herrick.

I understand thy kisses, and thou mine,
And that's a feeling disputation.
—Shakespeare.

The fragrant infancy of opening flowers flowed to my senses in that melting kiss.—Southern.

Once more for pity, that I may keep the flavor upon my lips till we meet again.—Dryden.

The kiss you take is paid by that you give:
The joy is mutual, and I'm still in debt.
—Lord Lansdowne.

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part.—Drayton.

Come, lay thy head upon my breast,
And I will kiss thee unto rest.
—Byron.

Thy lips which spake wrong counsel, I kiss close.—E. B. Browning.

Oh! let me live forever on those lips!
The nectar of the gods to these is tasteless.
—Dryden.

And his kissing is as full of sanctity as the touch of holy bread.—Shakespeare.

God pardons like a mother, who kisses the offence into everlasting forgetfulness.—Beecher.

Teach not thy lip such scorn; for it was made for kissing, lady, not for such contempt.—Shakespeare.

Then kissed me hard, as if he plucked up kisses by the roots, that grew upon my lips.—Shakespeare.

Mercy and truth are met together:
righteousness and peace have kissed each other.—Bible.

Sweeter than the stolen kiss
Are the granted kisses,
—Bayard Taylor.

And with a velvet lip print on his brow such language as the tongue hath never spoken.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Give me one kiss, I'll give it to thee again;
And one for interest, if thou wilt have twain.
—Shakespeare.

Kissing with inside lip? stopping the career of laughter with a sigh?—
Shakespeare.

The sound of a kiss is not so loud as that of a cannon, but its echo lasts a deal longer.—Holmes.

Kiss the tear from her lip, you'll find the ^{rose}
The sweeter for the dew. —Webster.

It is the passion that is in a kiss that gives to it its sweetness; it is the affection in a kiss that sanctifies it.—
Bovee.

I rest content, I kiss your eyes, I kiss your hair in my delight; I kiss my hand and say good-night.—Joaquin Miller.

First time he kiss'd me, he but only kiss'd
The fingers of this hand wherewith I write;
And ever since it grew more clean and
white.
—E. B. Browning.

He kissed her and promised. Such beautiful lips! Man's usual fate,— he was lost upon the coral reefs.—
Douglas Jerrold.

Four sweet lips, two pure souls, and one undying affection,—these are love's pretty ingredients for a kiss.—
Bovee.

O Love, O fire! once he drew with one long kiss my whole soul through my lips, as sunlight drinketh dew.—
Tennyson.

She brought her cheek up close, and leaned on his; at which he whispered kisses back on hers.—Dryden.

That farewell kiss which resembles greeting, that last glance of love which becomes the sharpest pang of sorrow.—George Eliot.

I was betrothed that day;
I wore a troth kiss on my lips I could not give away.
—E. B. Browning.

Their lips were four red roses on a stalk,
Which in their summer beauty kiss'd each
other.
—Shakespeare.

Kisses are like grains of gold or silver found upon the ground, of no value themselves, but precious as showing that a mine is near.—George Villiers.

It is delightful to kiss the eyelashes of the beloved—is it not? But never so delightful as when fresh tears are on them.—Landor.

Now by the jealous queen of heaven, that kiss I carried from thee, dear; my true lip hath virgined it ever since.—Shakespeare.

O delicious kiss,
Why thou so suddenly art gone?
Lost in the moment thou art won?
—Peter Pindar.

Her mouth's culled sweetness by thy kisses
^{shed}
On cheeks and neck and eyelids, and so led Back to her mouth which answers there for all. —Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

My lips pressed themselves involuntarily to hers—a long, long kiss, burning intense—concentrating emotion, heart, soul, all the rays of life's light,
into a single focus.—Bulwer.

I came to feel how far above
All fancy, pride, and fickle maidenhood,
All earthly pleasure, all imagined good,
Was the warm tremble of a devout kiss.
—Keats.

Says he—"I'd better call agin;"
Says she—"Think likely, mister!"
Thet last word pricked him like a pin,
An'—Wal, he up an' kist her.
—Lowell.

And steal immortal kisses from her lips; which even in pure and vestal modesty still blush as thinking their own kisses sin.—Shakespeare.

You would think, if our lips were made of horn and stuck out a foot or two from our faces, kisses at any rate would be done for. Not so. No creatures kiss each other so much as the birds.—Charles Buxton.

My lips till then had only known
The kiss of mother and of sister,
But somehow, full upon her own
Sweet, rosy, darling mouth—I kissed her.
—E. C. Stedman.

I felt the while a pleasing kind of smart,
The kiss went tingling to my very heart;
When it was gone the sense of it did stay,
The sweetness cling'd upon my lips all day,
Like drops of honey loth to fall away.
—Dryden.

A pleasing trembling thrills through all my blood
Whene'er you touch me with your melting
hand;
But when you kiss, oh! 'tis not to be spoke.
—Gildon.

Then press my lips, where plays a flame of
bliss—
A pure and holy love-light—and forsake
The angel for the woman in a kiss,
At once I wis,
My soul will wake!
—Victor Hugo.

Give me a kisse, and to that kisse a score;
Then to that twenty, adde a hundred more;
A thousand to that hundred; so kiss on,
To make that thousand up a million;
Treble that million, and when that is done,
Let's kisse afresh, as when we first begun.
—Herrick.

Take, O take those lips away,
That so sweetly were foresworn;
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn;
But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, but sealed in vain.
—Shakespeare.

Give me kisses! Nay, 'tis true
I am just as rich as you;
And for every kiss I owe,
I can pay you back, you know.
Kiss me, then,
Every moment—and again.
—J. G. Saxe.

It is as old as the creation, and yet as young and fresh as ever. It pre-existed, still exists, and always will exist. Depend upon it, Eve learned it in Paradise, and was taught its beauties, virtues, and varieties by an angel, there is something so transcendent in it.—Haliburton.

Touch but my lips with those fair lips of
thine,
(Though mine be not so fair, yet are they red)
The kiss shall be thine own as well as mine;—
What seest thou in the ground? hold up thy
head;
Look in mine eyeballs; there thy beauty lies;
Then why not lips on lips, since eyes in eyes? —Shakespeare.

I love the sex, and sometimes would reverse
The tyrant's wish, "That mankind only had One neck, which he with one fell stroke might pierce;"
My wish is quite as wide, but not so bad,
And much more tender on the whole than fierce;
It being (not now, but only while a lad)
That womankind had but one rosy mouth,
To kiss them all at once from north to south.
—Byron.

There is the kiss of welcome and of parting; the long, lingering, loving, present one; the stolen, or the mutual one; the kiss of love, of joy, and of sorrow; the seal of promise, and the receipt of fulfilment. Is it strange, therefore, that a woman is invincible, whose armory consists of kisses, smiles, sighs, and tears?—Haliburton.

Knavery

Knaves starve not in the land of fools.—Churchill.

Knavery's plain face is never seen till used.—Shakespeare.

Knavery is ever suspicious of knavery.—Addison.

Knaves will thrive when honest plainness knows not how to live.—Shirley.

By fools, knaves fatten; by bigots, priests are well clothed; every knave finds a gull.—Zimmermann.

While I live, no rich or noble knave shall walk the world in credit to his grave.—Pope.

Every knave is a thorough knave, and a thorough knave is a knave throughout.—Bishop Berkeley.

Even knaves may be made good for something.—Rousseau.

Knavery is supple, and can bend, but honesty is firm and upright and yields not.—Colton.

The craftiest wiles are too short and ragged a cloak to cover a bad heart.—Lavater.

Men, who are knaves individually, are in the mass very honorable people.—Montesquieu.

A knave thinks himself a fool, all the time he is not making a fool of some other person.—Hazlitt.

The worst of all knaves are those who can mimic their former honesty.—Lavater.

A man is not born a knave; there must be time to make him so, nor is he presently discovered after he becomes one.—Chief Justice Holt.

After a long experience in the world, I affirm, before God, I never knew a rogue who was not unhappy.—Junius.

Cunning leads to knavery; it is but a step from one to the other, and that very slippery; lying only makes the difference; add that to cunning, and it is knavery.—Bruyère.

There are cases in which a man would be ashamed not to have been imposed upon. There is a confidence necessary to human intercourse, and without which men are often more injured by their own suspicions than they would be by the perfidy of others.—Burke.

A thorough-paced knave will rarely quarrel with one whom he can cheat; his revenge is plunder; therefore he is usually the most forgiving of beings, upon the principle that if he come to an open rupture, he must defend himself; and this does not suit a man whose vocation it is to keep his hands in the pocket of another.—Colton.

Knowledge

Knowledge is power.—Bacon.

Knowledge is the parent of love; wisdom, love itself.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

One cannot know everything.—Horace.

Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers.—Tennyson.

I take all knowledge to be my province.—Bacon.

Half our knowledge we must snatch, not take.—Pope.

Human knowledge is the parent of doubt.—Lord Greville.

Knowledge is folly unless grace guide it.—George Herbert.

He who knows much has many cares.—Lessing.

Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless.—Johnson.

Diffused knowledge immortalizes itself.—Mackintosh.

Half-knowledge is worse than ignorance.—Macaulay.

Knowledge is our ultimate good.—Socrates.

Knowledge advances by steps, and not by leaps.—Macaulay.

The only jewel which will not decay is knowledge.—John Alfred Langford.

Knowledge desecres; wisdom applies.—Quarles.

Diffused knowledge immortalizes itself.—Sir James Mackintosh.

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.—Bible.

Knowledge exists to be imparted.—Emerson.

Knowledge is boundless,—human capacity, limited.—Chamfort.

Knowledge is more than equivalent to force.—Sam'l Johnson.

Every addition to true knowledge is an addition to human power.—Horace Mann.

He that increaseth knowledge increases sorrow.—Bible.

He who binds his soul to knowledge steals the key of heaven.—N. P. Willis.

All wish to possess knowledge, but few, comparatively speaking, are willing to pay the price.—Juvenal.

Knowledge is proud that he has learned so much;
Wisdom is humble that he knows no more.—Cowper.

To be conscious that you are ignorant is a great step to knowledge.—Benj. Disraeli.

If we do not plant knowledge when young, it will give us no shade when we are old.—Chesterfield.

The cultivation of the mind is a kind of food supplied for the soul of man.—Cicero.

Not only is there an art in knowing a thing, but also a certain art in teaching it.—Cicero.

And thou my minde aspire to higher things;
Grow rich in that which never taketh rust.—Sir P. Sidney.

Knowledge is of two kinds. We know a subject ourselves, or we know where we can find information upon it.—Johnson.

What we know here is very little, but what we are ignorant of is immense.—La Place.

The desire of knowledge, like the thirst of riches, increases ever with the acquisition of it.—Sterne.

Our knowledge is our power, and God our strength.—Southey.

Knowledge is like money,—the more a man gets, the more he craves.—H. W. Shaw.

Ignorance is the curse of God, knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.—Shakespeare.

If you have knowledge, let others light their candles at it.—Fuller.

Knowledge is the only fountain, both of the love and the principles of human liberty.—Daniel Webster.

A mind full of knowledge is a mind that never fails.

Our knowledge is the amassed thought and experience of innumerable minds.—Emerson.

I envy no man that knows more than my self, but pity them that know less.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Let no knowledge satisfy but that which lifts above the world, which weans from the world, which makes the world a footstool.—Spurgeon.

That jewel knowledge is great riches, which is not plundered by kinsmen, nor carried off by thieves, nor decreased by giving.—Bhavabhuti.

Knowledge is not happiness, and science but an exchange of ignorance for that which is another kind of ignorance.—Byron.

Seldom ever was any knowledge given to keep, but to impart; the grace of this rich jewel is lost in concealment.—Bishop Hall.

Real knowledge never promoted either turbulence or unbelief; but its progress is the forerunner of liberality and enlightened toleration.—Lord Brougham.

Real knowledge, like every thing else of the highest value, is not to be obtained easily. It must be worked for,—studied for,—thought for,—and, more than all, it must be prayed for.—Thomas Arnold.

Imparting knowledge, is only lighting other men's candle at our lamp, without depriving ourselves of any flame.—Jane Porter.

Knowledge, in truth, is the great sun in the firmament. Life and power are scattered with all its beams.—Daniel Webster.

Knowledge partakes of infinity; it widens with our capacities: the higher we mount in it, the vaster and more magnificent are the prospects it stretches out before us.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Those only who know little, can be said to know anything. The greater the knowledge the greater the doubt.—Goethe.

The first step to self-knowledge is self-distrust. Nor can we attain to any kind of knowledge, except by a like process.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Knowledge is not a shop for profit or sale, but a rich storehouse for the glory of the Creator, and the relief of men's estate.—Bacon.

The mind of man is this world's true dimension; and knowledge is the measure of the mind.—Greville.

Knowledge has its boundary line, where it abuts on ignorance; on the outside of that boundary line are ignorance and miracles; on the inside of it are science and no miracles.—Horace Mann.

There is no knowledge for which so great a price is paid as a knowledge of the world; and no one ever became an adept in it except at the expense of a hardened or a wounded heart.—Lady Blessington.

Knowledge is an excellent drug; but no drug has virtue enough to preserve itself from corruption and decay, if the vessel be tainted and impure wherein it is put to keep.—Montaigne.

That learning which thou gettest by thy own observation and experience, is far beyond that which thou gettest by precept; as the knowledge of a traveler exceeds that which is got by reading.—Thomas à Kempis.

The knowledge which we have acquired ought not to resemble a great shop without order, and without an inventory; we ought to know what we possess, and be able to make it serve us in need.—Leibnitz.

Knowledge is leagued with the universe, and findeth a friend in all things; but ignorance is everywhere a stranger, unwelcome; ill at ease and out of place.—Tupper.

As soon as a true thought has entered our mind, it gives a light which makes us see a crowd of other objects which we have never perceived before.—Chateaubriand.

Knowledge will not be acquired without pains and application. It is troublesome and deep digging for pure waters; but when once you come to the spring, they rise up and meet you.—Felton.

Knowledge always desires increase; it is like fire, which must first be kindled by some external agent, but which will afterwards propagate itself.—Johnson.

Who loves not knowledge? Who shall rail
Against her beauty? May she mix
With men and prosper! Who shall fix
Her pillars? Let her work prevail.
—Tennyson.

Every generation enjoys the use of a vast hoard bequeathed to it by antiquity, and transmits that hoard, augmented by fresh acquisitions, to future ages.—Macaulay.

Man often acquires just so much knowledge as to discover his ignorance, and attains so much experience as to regret his follies, and then dies.—W. B. Clulow.

Then I began to think, that it is very true which is commonly said, that the one-half of the world knoweth not how the other half liveth.—Rabelais.

He who calls in the aid of an equal understanding, doubles his own; and he who profits of a superior understanding raises his powers to a level with the height of the superior understanding he unites with.—Burke.

What is all knowledge, too, but recorded experience, and a product of history; of which, therefore, reasoning and belief, no less than action and passion, are essential materials?—Carlyle.

The highest knowledge can be nothing more than the shortest and clearest road to truth; all the rest is pretension, not performance, mere verbiage and grandiloquence, from which we can learn nothing, but that it is the external sign of an internal deficiency.—Colton.

It is the glorious prerogative of the empire of knowledge, that what it gains it never loses. On the contrary, it increases by the multiple of its own power: all its ends become means; all its attainments help to new conquests.—Daniel Webster.

Every man of sound brain whom you meet knows something worth knowing better than yourself. A man, on the whole, is a better preceptor than a book. But what scholar does not allow that the dullest book can suggest to him a new and a sound idea?—Bulwer-Lytton.

The sure foundations of the State are laid in knowledge, not in ignorance; and every sneer at education, at culture, at book learning, which is the recorded wisdom of the experience of mankind, is the demagogue's sneer at intelligent liberty, inviting national degeneracy and ruin.—G. W. Curtis.

A Persian philosopher, being asked by what method he had acquired much knowledge, answered, "By not being prevented by shame from asking questions where I was ignorant."

Every human being whose mind is not debauched, will be willing to give all that he has to get knowledge.—Dr. Johnson.

Knowledge cannot be stolen from us. It cannot be bought or sold. We may be poor, and the sheriff may come and sell our furniture, or drive away our cow, or take our pet lamb, and leave us homeless and penniless; but he cannot lay the law's hand upon the jewelry of our minds.—Elihu Burritt.

Far must thy researches go
Wouldst thou learn the world to know;
Thou must tempt the dark abyss
Wouldst thou prove what Being is;
Naught but firmness gains the prize,
Naught but fullness makes us wise,
Buried deep truth e'er lies.

—Schiller.

Early knowledge is very valuable capital with which to set forth in life. It gives one an advantageous start. If the possession of knowledge has a given value at fifty, it has a much greater value at twenty-five; for there is the use of it for twenty-five of the most important years of your life; and it is worth more than a hundred per cent interest. Indeed, who can estimate the interest of knowledge? Its price is above rubies.—Winslow.

In reading authors, when you find
Bright passages, that strike your mind,
And which, perhaps, you may have reason
To think on, at another season,
Be not contented with the sight,
But take them down in black and white;
Such a respect is wisely shown,
As makes another's sense one's own.

—Byron.

There is nothing so charming as the knowledge of literature; of that branch of literature, I mean, which enables us to discover the infinity of things, the immensity of Nature, the heavens, the earth, and the seas; this is that branch which has taught us religion, moderation, magnanimity, and that has rescued the soul from obscurity; to make her see all things above and below, first and last, and between both; it is this that furnishes us wherewith to live well and happily, and guides us to pass our lives without displeasure and without offence.—Cicero.

Pleasure is a shadow, wealth is vanity, and power a pageant; but knowledge is ecstatic in enjoyment, perennial in fame, unlimited in space, and infinite in duration. In the performance of its sacred offices, it fears no danger, spares no expense, looks in the volcano, dives into the ocean, perforates the earth, wings its flight into the skies, explores sea and land, contemplates the distant, examines the minute, comprehends the great, ascends to the sublime—no place too remote for its grasp, no height too exalted for its reach.—De Witt Clinton.

L

Labor
Labor conquers all things.—
Homer.

Blessed are the horny hands of toil!
—Lowell.

All true work is sacred.—Carlyle.

Labor, wide as the earth, has its summit in heaven.—Carlyle.

Labor, all labor, is noble and holy.
—Mrs. Osgood.

From labor health, from health contentment springs.—Beattie.

Observe, without labor nothing prosper.—Sophocles.

Work is God's ordinance as truly as prayer.—George D. Boardman.

Virtue's guard is labor; ease, her sleep.—Tasso.

No labor is hopeless.—Joseph Roux.

Labor is the law of happiness.—
Abel Stevens.

Labor humanizes, exalts.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The labor we delight in physics rest.—Shakespeare.

From labor there shall come forth rest.—Longfellow.

Labor is the handmaid of religion.
—Charles H. Parkhurst.

For men must work and women must weep.—Charles Kingsley.

Honest labour bears a lovely face.—
Thos Dekker.

Genius may conceive, but patient labor must consummate.—Horace Mann.

If the power to do hard work is not talent, it is the best possible substitute for it.—James A. Garfield.

Genius begins great works; labor alone finishes them.—Joubert.

No man is born into the world, whose work is not born with him.—Lowell.

Labor is the curse of the world, and nobody can meddle with it without becoming proportionately bruti-fied.—Hawthorne.

Taxation reaches down to the base;
but the base is labor, and labor pays all.—Donn Piatt.

Labor! all labor is noble and holy!
Let thy great deeds be thy prayer to thy God.—Frances S. Osgood.

Bodily labor alleviates the pains of the mind; and hence arises the happiness of the poor.—La Roche-
foucauld.

The fruit derived from labor is the sweetest of all pleasures.—Vauvenargues.

Labour rids us of three great evils:
irksomeness, vice and poverty.—Vol-
taire.

Labor disgraces no man; unfortunately, you occasionally find men who disgrace labor.—U. S. Grant.

Labor, therefore, is a duty from which no man living is exempt, without forfeiting his right to his daily bread.—Thomas Wilson.

Love labor; for if thou dost not want it for food, thou mayst for physic.—William Penn.

Nothing is denied to well-directed labor; nothing is ever to be attained without it.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Labor is the true alchemist that beats out in patient transmutation the baser metals into gold.—Wm. M. Punshon.

God has set labor and rest, as day and night to men successive.—Milton.

Labor is the divine law of our existence; repose is desertion and suicide.—Mazzini.

What is there that is illustrious that is not also attended by labor?—Cicero.

What men want is not talent, it is purpose; not the power to achieve, but the will to labor.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The duty of labor is written on a man's body: in the stout muscle of the arm, and the delicate machinery of the hand.—Theodore Parker.

Hard workers are usually honest. Industry lifts them above temptation.—Bovee.

There is always work, and tools to work withal, for those who will.—Beecher.

Labor is discovered to be the great, the grand conqueror, enriching and building up nations more surely than the proudest battles.—Channing.

The true epic of our times is, not "Arms and the Man," but "Tools and the Man,"—an infinitely wider kind of epic.—Carlyle.

Labor is one of the great elements of society,—the great substantial interest on which we all stand.—Daniel Webster.

Blessed is the man who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. Know thy work, and do it; and work at it like Hercules. One monster there is in the world, the idle man.—Thomas Carlyle.

Moderate labor of the body conduces to the preservation of health, and cures many initial diseases.—Dr. W. Harvey.

If you want knowledge, you must toil for it; if food, you must toil for it; and if pleasure, you must toil for it: toil is the law.—Ruskin.

The lottery of honest labor, drawn by Time, is the only one whose prizes are worth taking up and carrying home.—Theodore Parker.

Labor in all its variety, corporeal and mental, is the instituted means for the methodical development of all our powers under the direction and control of will.—J. G. Holland.

Labor in this country is independent and proud. It has not to ask the patronage of capital, but capital solicits the aid of labor.—Daniel Webster.

Labor is life: from the inmost heart of the worker rises his God-given force, the sacred celestial life-essence breathed into him by Almighty God!—Carlyle.

There is a perennial nobleness and even sacredness in work. Were he ever so benighted, forgetful of his high calling, there is always hope in a man that actually and earnestly works.—Carlyle.

Some relaxation is necessary to people of every degree; the head that thinks and the hand that labors, must have some little time to recruit their diminished powers.—Gilpin.

For as labor cannot produce without the use of land, the denial of the equal right to the use of land is necessarily the denial of the right of labor to its own produce.—Henry George.

Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow.

There is nothing truly valuable which can be purchased without pains and labor. The gods have set a price upon every real and noble pleasure.—Addison.

God gives every bird its food, but He does not throw it into the nest. He does not unearth the good that the earth contains, but He puts it in our way, and gives us the means of getting it ourselves.—J. G. Holland.

To labor rightly and earnestly is to walk in the golden track that leads to God. It is to adopt the regimen of manhood and womanhood. It is to come into sympathy with the great struggle of humanity toward perfection. It is to adopt the fellowship of all the great and good the world has ever known.—J. G. Holland.

What a glorious spectacle is that of the labor of man upon the earth! It includes everything in it that is glorious. Look around and tell me what you see, that is worth seeing, that is not the work of your hands and the hands of your fellows,—the multitudes of all ages.—William Howitt.

It is not work that kills men, it is worry. Work is healthy, you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction. Fear secretes acids, but love and trust are sweet juices.—Beecher.

There is no doubt of the essential nobility of that man who pours into life the honest vigor of his toil, over those who compose the feathery foam of fashion that sweeps along Broadway; who consider the insignia of honor to consist in wealth and indolence; and who, ignoring the family history, paint coats of arms to cover up the leather aprons of their grandfathers.—Chapin.

It is to labor, and to labor only, that man owes everything possessed of exchangeable value. Labor is the talisman that has raised him from the condition of the savage; that has changed the desert and the forest into cultivated fields; that has covered the earth with cities, and the ocean with ships; that has given us plenty, comfort, and elegance, instead of want, misery, and barbarism.—M'Culloch.

Labor is rest—from the sorrows that greet us;
Rest from all petty vexations that meet us,
Rest from sin-promptings that ever entreat us,
Rest from world-sirens that hire us to ill.
Work—and pure slumbers shall wait on thy pillow;
Work—thou shalt ride over Care's coming billow;
Lie not down wearied 'neath Woe's weeping willow!
Work with a stout heart and resolute will —Frances S. Osgowd.

Labor Day

Labor is the crown of true royalty and the splendid scepter of man's highest and noblest sovereignty. As we behold you, O ye hosts of labor, marching through our streets to-day, we hail you as the mightiest social and civic agents of modern civilization.—Mail and Express.

Workingmen are at the foundation of society. Show me that product of human endeavor in the making of which the workingman has had no share, and I will show you something that society can well dispense with.—Samuel Gompers.

As a nation we are shutting our own sons out of the field of American labor, thus filling our prisons and reformatories and almshouses with them, and are letting into that field, for full possession, hordes of foreigners who make it a menace to the safety of American institutions, and a constant peril to the peace and welfare of American society.—The Century.

And from this we learn something of the great importance of land and labor. These two are the sources of all wealth, all well-being, and all comfort. It is the will of God that these two should be joined so as to make this world a paradise of plenty; the laws of man have parted them and made the world barren and filled it with poverty and want.—Rev. Chas. Leach.

The distance between capital and labor is not a great gulf over which is swung a Niagara suspension bridge; it is only a step, and the laborers here will cross over and become capitalists and the capitalists will cross over and become laborers. Would to God they would shake hands while they are crossing, these from one side, and those from the other side.—Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage.

You are a free man, and let no organization come between you and your best interests. Do not let any man, or any body of men, tell you where you shall work, or where you shall not work, when you shall work, or when you shall not work. If a man wants to belong to a labor organization, let him belong. If he does not want to belong to a labor organization, let him have perfect liberty to stay out. You own yourself. Let no man put a manacle on your hand, or foot, or head, or heart.—Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage.

When one individual or class suffers, the whole body of society suffers: an injury to one is the concern of all, and the welfare of each the interest of all; and the common weal requires the improvement in the condition of wage-workers, materially, morally, and intellectually.—Rev. C. H. Zimmermann, D. D.

There has been a marvelous change in England during the last fifty years. Nowhere is labor so thoroughly organized, and nowhere has it acquired greater power. It has representatives in Parliament; has removed from the statute books many laws that were oppressive to wage-earning and tenant classes, and secured the wisest and most elaborate factory legislation to be found in the world. Trades unions are now recognized by the state as legitimate and necessary organizations. Their rights and functions are clearly defined. They are regularly incorporated; are thus made amenable to the law, and are protected by it in the exercise of their proper functions. In these respects labor organization in England is far in advance of this country. It is comparatively new here; and we have had since it began many of the excesses that characterized it during its first century in England.

There is a duty that the employer always owes to the employe, and that is to give him, by way of compensation, the full value of his labor. The disposition on the part of some rich employers to grind the faces of the poor, taking advantage of their necessities and securing their services at half what they are worth, is a shameful wrong, and it will, sooner or later ripen into revolution anywhere.—Southwestern Methodist.

Labor organizations ought to be incorporated. Their purposes, rights, and privileges should be clearly defined by law. They should be held responsible for the conduct of their members, and be compelled to make good any losses or injuries caused by their members under penalties of forfeiting their charters, and of the prosecution and punishment of their officials. Such legislation would be a protection to organizations that are properly conducted, as well as a safeguard against lawless action, and would be an important step toward the solution of the labor problem.—Western Recorder.

We believe that as yet public sentiment is strongly in favor of the laborers and against the powerful corporations and monopolies that seek to oppress them. We are sure it is opposed to the use of private armed force to intimidate or control laborers. But we are equally sure that public sentiment is overwhelmingly opposed to the preconcerted strikes which interrupt commerce and seek to extort unreasonable conditions. If the dissatisfied prefer to quit work, let them do so; but they must not seek by force to prevent others from taking their places who are willing and anxious to do so.—Religious Telescope.

It is capital which sets ten thousand looms in motion, lights the fires in the mills and factories, and starts the idle wheels of commerce. Yet, upon the other hand, capital needs labor to carry out its schemes. The two must work together, and not one against the other. Workmen should be allowed good living wages and capitalists get a fair profit. Some day this golden mean will be reached, but it lies farther in the future than the eye of man can now penetrate, and until it does come the laboring classes can gain nothing by any alliance with anarchy in any form, no matter how specious its words may be.—Presbyterian Banner.

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world.
Who made him dead to rapture and despair—

A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,

Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?
Who loosened and let down his brutal jaw?

Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow?

Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?

O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
How will the Future reckon with this
Man?

How answer his brute question in that hour

When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the
world?

How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—

With those who shaped him to the thing he is—

When this dumb Terror shall reply to God
After the silence of the centuries?

Again, I remark, relief will come to the laboring classes through the religious rectification of the country.

Labor is appreciated and rewarded just in proportion as a country is Christianized. Show me a community that is thoroughly infidel, and I will show you a community where wages are small. Show me a community that is thoroughly Christianized, and I will show you a community where wages are comparatively large. How do I account for it? The philosophy is easy. Our religion is a democratic religion. It makes the owner of the mill understand he is a brother to all the operatives in that mill. Born of the same heavenly Father, to lie down in the same dust, to be saved by the same supreme mercy. No putting on of airs in the sepulcher or in the judgment.—Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage.

When the Golden Rule becomes the law of human life all this will be changed. The employer will ask how much he can pay the worker, not how little. The workman will ask how much he can do, not how little. We may not be able to reach this condition, but the war can be restricted and its evils ameliorated. Our people are at heart of a most friendly disposition toward workmen and women. We have our Gradgrinds, snobs, and purse-proud sons of artisan fathers, our dudes and butterflies, but the mass of the rich, as well as those of only moderate means, have a genuine hearty sympathy and fellowship with the honest sons of toil. The chief trouble is not want of heart, but to hold busy men long enough to hear the tale of wrong, and to discriminate it from false appeals for aid. On the other hand, American workmen are, as a body, intelligent, spirited, and patriotic. They will not bear patronizing, but they are hungry for fraternity. The lodges and chapters, greatly outnumbering the churches, express this longing. The working people, if we give the term its proper scope, are the civil bulk of the nation. Everything—government, social order, production, commerce—is borne up and along by them. They formed the great bulk of the Union army. Why cannot they be called comrades now, as during the war? Why cannot the touch of elbows and the cadenced step be had in civil life with all who love our free civil institutions? They are needed. They give strength and security as well as fellowship.—Ex-President Harrison.

Lady

To be gentle is the test of a lady.—Feltham.

It is easier to make a lady of a peasant-girl than a peasant-girl of a lady.—Herder.

Ladies, like variegated tulips, show 'Tis to their changes half their charms we owe. —Pope.

It is good manners, not rank, wealth, or beauty, that constitute the real lady.—Roger Ascham.

It is true politeness, gentleness, and love for humanity, that constitute a lady.—Annie E. Lancaster.

If the inner life of our fashionable women were known, how few would deserve the title of lady!—James Merrick.

There are many true ladies, and they differ somewhat from society generally. So does a true gentleman, on the same principle of refinement and nobility of character.—Maria McIntosh.

A fine lady; by which term I wish to express the result of that perfect education in taste and manner, down to every gesture, which heaven forbid that I, professing to be a poet, should undervalue. It is beautiful, and therefore I welcome it in the name of the author of all beauty. I value it so highly that I would fain see it extend not merely from Belgravia to the tradesman's villa, but thence, as I believe it one day will, to the laborer's hovel and the needlewoman's garret.—Charles Kingsley.

Landscapes

However, I think a plain space near the eye gives it a kind of liberty it loves; and then the picture, whether you choose the grand or beautiful, should be held up at its proper distance. Variety is the principal ingredient in beauty; and simplicity is essential to grandeur.—Shenstone.

Every antique farm-house and moss-grown cottage is a picture.—Washington Irving.

This is grand! 'tis solemn! 'tis an education of itself to look upon!—James Fenimore Cooper.

There, interspersed in lawns and opening glades, thin trees arise, that shun each other's shade.—Pope.

Oh, what a glory doth this world put on for him who, with a fervent heart, goes forth under the bright and glorious sky!—Longfellow.

There is a property in the horizon which no man has, but he whose eyes can integrate all the parts,—that is, the poet.—Emerson.

Heavens! what a goodly prospect spreads around,
Of hills, and dales, and woods, and lawns,
and spires,
And glittering towns, and gilded streams, till all
The stretching landscape into smoke decays.
—Thomson.

Landscapes are Nature's pictures.—M. E. Lee.

The mind is never more highly gratified than in contemplating a natural landscape.—Lord Kames.

Thou who wouldst see the lovely and the wild
Mingled in harmony on Nature's face,
Ascend our rocky mountains. Let thy foot
Fail not with weariness, for on their tops
The beauty and the majesty of earth,
Spread wide beneath, shall make thee to forget
The steep and toilsome way.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Language

An English tongue, if refined to a certain standard, might perhaps be fixed forever.—Swift.

Language is the picture and counterpart of thought.—Mark Hopkins.

Languages are the keys of science.—Bruyère.

The language of nature is the universal language.—Glück.

Languages are the pedigree of nations.—Johnson.

The language denotes the man.—Bovee.

Language is fossil poetry.—Emerson.

Language is the dress of thought.—Johnson.

Felicity, not fluency, of language is a merit.—Whipple.

Language is the machine of the poet.—Macaulay.

Languages are the barometers of national thought and character.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

There was speech in their dumbness, language in their very gesture.—Shakespeare.

Language is a city to the building of which every human being brought a stone.—Emerson.

Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas.—Sam'l Johnson.

In the commerce of speech use only coin of gold and silver.—Joubert.

A man who is ignorant of foreign languages is also ignorant of his own language.—Goethe.

Language, as well as the faculty of speech, was the immediate gift of God.—Noah Webster.

Language! the blood of the soul, sir, into which our thoughts run, and out of which they grow.—O. W. Holmes.

The love of our own language, what is it, in fact, but the love of our country expressing itself in one particular direction?—Trench.

The language denotes the man. A coarse or refined character finds its expression naturally in a coarse or refined phraseology.—Bovee.

Language is not only the vehicle of thought, it is a great and efficient instrument in thinking.—Sir H. Davy.

Language is the armory of the human mind, and at once contains the trophies of its past, and the weapons of its future conquests.—Coleridge.

Language,—human language,—after all, is but little better than the croak and cackle of fowls, and other utterances of brute nature,—sometimes not so adequate.—Hawthorne.

Language. By this we build pyramids, fight battles, ordain and administer laws, shape and teach religion, and knit man to man, cultivate each other, and ourselves.—John Sterling.

Languages, like our bodies, are in a perpetual flux, and stand in need of recruits to supply those words that are continually falling, through disuse.—Felton.

Language is the expression of ideas, and if the people of one country cannot preserve an identity of ideas they cannot retain an identity of language.—Noah Webster.

Language is an art, and a glorious one, whose influence extends over all others, and in which all science whatever must centre; but an art springing from necessity, and originally invented by artless men.—Tooke.

Fie, fie upon her!
There's language in her eye, her cheek, her lip,
Nay, her foot speaks; her wanton spirits
look out
At every joint and motive of her body.
—Shakespeare.

It is curious that some learned dunces, because they can write nonsense in languages that are dead should despise those that talk sense in languages that are living. "To acquire a few tongues," says a French writer, "is the task of a few years, but to be eloquent in one, is the labor of a life."—Colton.

Language is the amber in which a thousand precious and subtle thoughts have been safely embedded and preserved. It has arrested ten thousand lightning flashes of genius, which unless fixed and arrested might have been as bright, but would have also been as quickly passing and perishing as the lightning.—Trench.

Lark

It was the lark, the herald of the morn.—Shakespeare.

Merry larks are ploughmen's clocks.—Shakespeare.

The busy lark, the messenger of day.—Chaucer.

Rise with the lark, and with the lark to bed.—Hurdis.

They longed to see the day, to hear the lark record her hymns, and chant her carols blest.—Fairfax.

And now the herald lark
Left his ground-nest, high tow'ring to descry
The morn's approach, and greet her with his song. —Milton.

None but the lark so shrill and clear;
Now at heaven's gate she claps her wings,
The morn not waking till she sings. —Lyly.

Lo! here the gentle lark, weary of rest,
From his moist cabinet mounts up on high,
And wakes the morning, from whose silver breast

The sun ariseth in his majesty. —Shakespeare.

Laughter

Laugh and be fat, sir.—Ben Jonson.

Oh, I am stabbed with laughter!—Shakespeare.

They laugh that win.—Shakespeare.

The laughers are a majority.—Pope.

Laughter means sympathy.—Carlyle.

A good laugh is sunshine in a house.—Thackeray.

The laughter of man is the contentment of God.—John Weiss.

With his eyes in flood with laughter.—Shakespeare.

Nothing is more silly than silly laughter.—Catullus.

Life without laughing is a dreary blank.—Thackeray.

Laugh and the world laughs with you.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

He is not always at ease who laughs.—St. Evremond.

The loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind.—Goldsmith.

Least at thine own things laugh.—George Herbert.

And still, laughter is akin to weeping.—Lavater.

I am tipsy with laughing.—Congreve.

Give me an honest laughter.—Sir Walter Scott.

People who do not know how to laugh, are always pompous and self-conceited.—Thackeray.

Did you ever observe that immoderate laughter always ends in a sigh?—Leigh Hunt.

Man is the only creature endowed with the power of laughter.—Greville.

The most completely lost of all days is that on which one has not laughed. Chamfort.

He who always prefaces his tale with laughter is poised between impertinence and folly.—Lavater

Sport, that wrinkled Care derides,
and Laughter, holding both his sides.
—Milton.

Laughter is the chorus of conversation.—Steele.

The house of laughter makes a house of woe.—Young.

To provoke laughter without joining in it greatly heightens the effect.—Balzac.

That laughter costs too much which is purchased by the sacrifice of decency.—Quintilian.

Men show their character in nothing more clearly than by what they think laughable.—Goethe.

How much lies in laughter: the cipher-key, wherewith we decipher the whole man.—Carlyle.

More people laugh at us than with us, however it may appear at the moment.—Rufini.

The laughter of girls is, and ever was, among the delightful sounds of earth.—De Quincey.

Morally considered, laughter is next to the Ten Commandments.—H. W. Shaw.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt;
And every grin, so merry, draws one out.
—Peter Pindar.

With mirth and laughter let old wrinkles come.—Shakespeare.

Though laughter is allowable, a horse-laugh is abominable.—Cicero.

The man who cannot laugh is not only fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils, but his whole life is already a treason and a stratagem.—Carlyle.

Making that idiot, laughter, keep men's eyes,
And strain their cheeks to idle merriment.
—Shakespeare.

Laughter is a most healthful exertion; it is one of the greatest helps to digestion with which I am acquainted.

—Dr. Hufeland.

I am sure that since I had the use of my reason, no human being has ever heard me laugh.—Chesterfield.

I am persuaded that every time a man smiles—but much more so when he laughs—it adds something to this fragment of life.—Sterne.

I like the laughter that opens the lips and the heart,—that shows at the same time pearls and the soul.—Victor Hugo.

Hypocrites weep, and you cannot tell their tears from those of saints; but no bad man ever laughed sweetly yet.—Ouida.

One good, hearty laugh is a bomb-shell exploding in the right place, while spleen and discontent are a gun that kicks over the man who shoots it off.—Talmage.

Low gurgling laughter, as sweet
As the swallow's song i' the south,
And a ripple of dimples that, dancing, meet
By the curves of a perfect mouth.
—Paul Hamilton Hayne.

God made both tears and laughter, and both for kind purposes; for as laughter enables mirth and surprise to breathe freely, so tears enable sorrow to vent itself patiently. Tears hinder sorrow from becoming despair and madness.—Leigh Hunt.

Laughter almost ever cometh of things most disproportioned to ourselves and nature: delight hath a joy in it either permanent or present; laughter hath only a scornful tickling.—Sir Philip Sidney.

You hear that boy laughing?—you think he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has done;
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call,
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all. —O. W. Holmes.

Wrinkle not thy face with too much laughter, lest thou become ridiculous;

neither wanton thy heart with too much mirth, lest thou become vain: the suburbs of folly is vain mirth, and profuseness of laughter is the city of fools.—Quarles.

Then let us laugh. It is the cheapest luxury man enjoys, and, as Charles Lamb says, "is worth a hundred groans in any state of the market." It stirs up the blood, expands the chest, electrifies the nerves, clears away the cobwebs from the brain, and gives the whole system a shock to which the voltaic-pile is as nothing. Nay, its delicious alchemy converts even tears into the quintessence of merriment, and makes wrinkles themselves expressive of youth and frolic.—Wm. Matthews.

While her laugh, full of life, without any control,
But the sweet one of gracefulness, rung from her soul;
And where it most sparkled, no glance could discover
In lips, cheek or eyes, for it brightened all over—
Like any fair lake that the breeze was upon,
When it breaks into dimples, and laughs in the sun. —Moore.

Law

Laws are the sovereigns of sovereigns.—Louis the Fourteenth.

Laws are the silent assessors of God.—W. R. Alger.

All things obey fixed laws.—Lucretius.

The people's safety is the law of God.—James Otis.

Laws can discover sin, but not remove.—Milton.

Who loves law, dies either mad or poor.—Middleton.

Petty laws breed great crimes.—Ouida.

Old father antic the law.—Shakespeare.

The law,—it has honored us, may we honor it.—Daniel Webster.

The laws sometimes sleep, but never die.—Law Maxim.

Alas, the incertitude of the law!—Burke.

Laws are silent in the midst of arms.—John Bate.

There is a higher law than the constitution.—W. H. Seward.

It is only rogues who feel the restraints of law.—J. G. Holland.

Laws grind the poor, and rich men rule the law.—Goldsmith.

Christianity is part of the law of England.—Lord Eldon.

The law discovers the disease. The gospel gives the remedy.—Martin Luther.

Possession is eleven points in the law.—Colley Cibber.

Where law ends, there tyranny begins.—Earl of Chatham.

The law often allows what honor forbids.—Saurin.

The strictest laws sometimes become the severest injustice.—Terence.

Law is a bottomless pit; it is a cormorant,—a harpy that devours everything.—Swift.

When men are pure, laws are useless; when men are corrupt, laws are broken.—Beaconsfield.

The good need fear no law; it is his safety, and the bad man's awe.—Ben Jonson.

When the state is most corrupt, then the laws are most multiplied.—Tacitus.

Reason is the life of the law; nay, the common law itself is nothing else but reason.—Coke.

Of what use are laws inoperative through public immorality?—Horace.

Law should be like death, which spares no one.—Montesquieu.

The English laws punish vice; the Chinese laws do more, they reward virtue.—Goldsmith.

The law sends us to Christ to be justified, and Christ sends us to the law to be regulated.—John Flavel.

Law that shocks equity is reason's murderer.—Aaron Hill.

A mouse-trap; easy to enter, but not easy to get out of.—Mrs. Balfour.

Law is not law, if it violates the principles of eternal justice.—Lydia Maria Child.

Let us consider the reason of the case. For nothing is law that is not reason.—Sir John Powell.

Laws are not masters but servants, and he rules them who obeys them.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Law and equity are two things which God hath joined, but which man hath put asunder.—Colton.

The law is a pretty bird, and has charming wings. It would be quite a bird of paradise if it did not carry such a terrible bill.—Douglas Jerrold.

To make an empire durable, the magistrates must obey the laws, and the people the magistrates.—Solon.

Equity judgeth with lenity, laws with extremity. In all moral cases, the reason of the law is the law.—Walter Scott.

To seek the redress of grievances by going to law, is like sheep running for shelter to a bramble bush.—Dilwyn.

Avoid law suits beyond all things; they influence your conscience, impair your health, and dissipate your property.—La Bruyère.

Laws are the very bulwarks of liberty. They define every man's rights, and stand between and defend the individual liberties of all men.—J. G. Holland.

Coercion is the basis of every law in the universe,—human or divine. A law is not law without coercion behind it.—James A. Garfield.

Our human laws are but the copies, more or less imperfect, of the eternal laws so far as we can read them.—Froude.

There is but one law for all; namely, that law which governs all law,—the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity; the law of nature and of nations.—Burke.

Ignorance of the law excuses no man; not that all men know the law, but because it is an excuse every man will plead, and no man can tell how to confute him.—Selden.

The greatest of all injustice is that which goes under the name of law; and of all sorts of tyranny, the forcing the letter of the law against the equity is the most insupportable.—L'Estrange.

The moment that law is destroyed, liberty is lost, and men, left free to enter upon the domains of each other, destroy each other's rights, and invade the field of each other's liberty.—J. G. Holland.

All beings have their laws; the Deity has His laws, the material world has its laws, superior intelligences have their laws, the beasts have their laws, and man his laws.—Montesquieu.

Use law and physic only for necessity; they that use them otherwise abuse themselves into weak bodies, and light purses; they are good remedies, bad businesses, and worse recreations.—Quarles.

Laws are not made like lime-twigs or nets, to catch everything that toucheth them; but rather like sea-marks, to guide from shipwreck the ignorant passenger.—Sir P. Sidney.

Laws are generally found to be nets of such a texture, as the little creep through, the great break through, and the middle size are alone entangled in.—Shenstone.

The law is a gun, which if it misses a pigeon always kills a crow; if it does not strike the guilty, it hits some one else. As every crime creates a law, so in turn every law creates a crime.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If there be any one principle more widely than another confessed by every utterance, or more sternly than another imprinted on every atom of the visible creation, that principle is not liberty, but law.—Ruskin.

The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the crown. It may be frail,—its roof may shake, the winds may blow through it, the storm may enter, the rain may enter; but the king of England cannot enter.—Chatham.

It is a very easy thing to devise good laws; the difficulty is to make them effective. The great mistake is that of looking upon men as virtuous, or thinking that they can be made so by laws; and consequently the greatest art of a politician is to render vices serviceable to the cause of virtue.—Lord Bolingbroke.

Laws do not put the least restraint Upon our freedom, but maintain 't;
Or, if it does, 'tis for our good,
To give us freer latitude;
For wholesome laws preserve us free,
By stinting of our liberty. —Butler.

To go to law, is for two persons to kindle a fire at their own cost, to warm others, and singe themselves to cinders; and because they cannot agree, to what is truth and equity, they will both agree to unplume themselves, that others may be decorated with their feathers.—Feltham.

What a cage is to the wild beast, law is to the selfish man. Restraint is for the savage, the rapacious, the violent; not for the just, the gentle, the benevolent. All necessity for external force implies a morbid state.

Dungeons for the felon, a straight-jacket for the maniac, crutches for the lame, stays for the weak-backed; for the infirm of purpose, a master; for the foolish, a guide; but for the sound mind in a sound body, none of these.—Herbert Spencer.

Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things do her homage, the very least as feeling her care; and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.—Hooker.

Lawyers

The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers.—Shakespeare.

The plainest case in many words entangling.—Baillie.

Here the fell attorney prowls for prey.—Dr. Johnson.

It is a secret worth knowing that lawyers rarely go to law.—Moses Crowell.

A justice with grave justices shall sit;
He praise their wisdom, they admire his wit.
—Gay.

To succeed as a lawyer, a man must work like a horse and live like a hermit.—Lord Eldon.

As adversaries in law, strive mightily; but eat and drink as friends.—Shakespeare.

A lawyer's dealings should be just and fair;
Honesty shines with great advantage there.
—Cowper.

Our wrangling lawyers * * * are so litigious and busy here on earth, that I think they will plead their clients' causes hereafter, some of them in hell.—Burton.

As to lawyers,—their profession is supported by the indiscriminate defence of right and wrong.—Junius.

A countryman between two lawyers is like a fish between two cats.—Franklin.

Every man should know something of law; if he knows enough to keep out of it, he is a pretty good lawyer.—H. W. Shaw.

I oft have heard him say how he admir'd Men of your large profession, that could speak
To every cause, and things mere contraries,
Till they were hoarse again, yet all be law.
—Ben Jonson.

I know you lawyers can with ease,
Twist your words and meanings as you
please;
That language, by your skill made pliant,
Will bend to favor every client;
That 'tis the fee directs the sense,
To make out either side's pretence.
—Gay.

Lawsuits generally originate with the obstinate and the ignorant, but they do not end with them; and that lawyer was right who left all his money to the support of an asylum for fools and lunatics, saying that from such he got it, and to such he would bequeath it.—Jeremy Bentham.

An eminent lawyer cannot be a dishonest man. Tell me a man is dishonest, and I will answer he is no lawyer. He cannot be, because he is careless and reckless of justice; the law is not in his heart, is not the standard and rule of his conduct.—Daniel Webster.

Laziness

Humanity is constitutionally lazy.—J. G. Holland.

Laziness breeds humors of the blood.—Galen.

Laziness travels so slowly that poverty soon overtakes him.—Benjamin Franklin.

An idler is a watch that wants both hands.—Cowper.

The lazy man aims at nothing, and generally hits it.—James Ellis.

A lazy hand is no argument of a contented heart.—Thomas Fuller.

Rags will always make their appearance where they have a right to do it.—Dr. Johnson.

Laziness is a good deal like money, —the more a man has of it, the more he seems to want.—H. W. Shaw.

Learning

Learning is better worth than house or land.—Crabbe.

Learning makes a man fit company for himself.—Young.

It adds a precious seeing to the eye.—Shakespeare.

To be proud of learning is the greatest ignorance.—Bishop Taylor.

Men learn while they teach.—Seneca.

Out of too much learning become mad.—Burton.

O this learning, what a thing it is! —Shakespeare.

Each day is the scholar of yesterday.—Publius Syrus.

The Lord of Learning who upraised mankind
From being silent brutes to singing men.
—Leland.

Learning hath gained most by those books by which the printers have lost.—Thomas Fuller.

Learning by study must be won;
'Twas ne'er entail'd from son to son.
—Gay.

Learning, to be of much use, must have a tendency to spread itself among the common people.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Reading maketh a full man; conference a ready man; and writing an exact man.—Bacon.

If you want learning, you must work for it.—J. G. Holland.

The great art to learn much is to undertake a little at a time.—Locke.

Learning passes for wisdom among those who want both.—Sir W. Temple.

Learning, like money, may be of so base a coin as to be utterly void of use.—Shenstone.

The three foundations of learning: Seeing much, suffering much, and studying much.—Catherall.

We should ask not who is the most learned, but who is the best learned.—Montaigne.

He who has no inclination to learn more, will be very apt to think that he knows enough.—Powell.

Learning is but an adjunct to ourself, and where we are our learning likewise is.—Shakespeare.

Your learning, like the lunar beam, affords Light, but not heat; it leaves you undevout, Frozen at heart, while speculation shines.
—Young.

The learning and knowledge that we have is at the most but little compared with that of which we are ignorant.—Plato.

Wear your learning like your watch, in a private pocket; and do not pull it out and strike it, merely to show that you have one.—Chesterfield.

He who learns and makes no use of his learning, is a beast of burden, with a load of books. Comprehendeth the ass whether he carries on his back a library or a bundle of fagots?—Saadi.

Learning maketh young men temperate, is the comfort of old age, standing for wealth with poverty, and serving as an ornament to riches.—Cicero.

For ignorance of all things is an evil neither terrible nor excessive, nor yet the greatest of all; but great cleverness and much learning, if they be accompanied by a bad training, are a much greater misfortune.—Plato.

Many persons, after they become learned cease to be good; all other knowledge is hurtful to him who has not the science of honesty and good nature.—Montaigne.

Learning itself, received into a mind
By nature weak, or viciously inclined,
Serves but to lead philosophers astray.
Where children would with ease discern the way.
—Cowper.

The end of learning is to know God, and out of that knowledge to love Him, and to imitate Him, as we may the nearest, by possessing our souls of true virtue.—Milton.

He that wants good sense is unhappy in having learning, for he has thereby only more ways of exposing himself; and he that has sense, knows that learning is not knowledge, but rather the art of using it.—Steele.

The Chinese, whom it might be well to disparage less and imitate more, seem almost the only people among whom learning and merit have the ascendancy, and wealth is not the standard of estimation.—W. B. Clulow.

The sweetest and most inoffensive path of life leads through the avenues of science and learning; and whoever can either remove any obstruction in this way, or open up any new prospect, ought so far, to be esteemed a benefactor to mankind.—Hume.

It is without all controversy that learning doth make the minds of men gentle, amiable, and pliant to government; whereas ignorance makes them churlish, thwarting, and mutinous; and the evidence of time doth clear this assertion, considering that the most barbarous, rude, and unlearned times have been most subject to tumults, seditions, and changes.—Lord Bacon.

Learning is not to be tacked to the mind, but we must fuse and blend them together, not merely giving the mind a slight tincture, but a thorough and perfect dye. And if we perceive no evident change and improvement, it would be better to leave it alone.

learning is a dangerous weapon, and apt to wound its master if it be wielded by a feeble hand, and by one not well acquainted with its use.—Montaigne.

Learning hath his infancy, when it is but beginning and almost childish; then his youth, when it is luxuriant and juvenile; then his strength of years, when it is solid and reduced; and lastly his old age, when it waxeth dry and exhaust.—Bacon.

He that would thoroughly accomplish himself for the government of human affairs, should have a wisdom that can look forward into things that are present, and a learning that can look back into things that are past. * * * Wisdom, however, and learning, should go hand in hand, they are so beautifully qualified for mutual assistance. But it is better to have wisdom without learning, than learning without wisdom; just as it is better to be rich without being the possessor of a mine, than to be the possessor of a mine without being rich.—Colton.

A little learning is a dangerous thing! Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring; There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain, And drinking largely sobers us again. Fired at first sight with what the muse imparts, In fearless youth we tempt the height of arts, While from the bounded level of our mind Short views we take, nor mind the lengths behind; But more advanced, behold with strange surprise, New distant scenes of endless science rise. —Pope.

Leisure

Leisure is empty time.—Countess of Carberry.

He hath no leisure who useth it not.—George Herbert.

Leisure is pain; takes off our chariot wheels; how heavily we drag the load of life.—Young.

Leisure is time for doing something useful; this leisure the diligent man will obtain; but the lazy man, never.—Benjamin Franklin.

Retired Leisure,
That in trim gardens takes his pleasure.
—Milton.

I am never less at leisure than when at leisure, nor less alone than when I am alone.—Scipio Africanus.

Employ thy time well, if thou meanest to gain leisure; and, since thou art not sure of a minute, throw not away an hour.—Benjamin Franklin.

Remove but the temptations of leisure, and the bow of Cupid will lose its effect.—Ovid.

Life is rendered most agreeable by alternate occupation and leisure.—Demophilus.

You cannot find an instance of any man, who is permitted to lay out his own time, contriving not to have tedious hours.—Johnson.

Leisure will always be found by persons who know how to employ their time; those who want time are the people who do nothing.—Mme. Roland.

I pant beyond expression for two days of absolute and unbroken leisure. If it were not for my love of beautiful nature and poetry, my heart would have died within me long ago.—Lord Jeffrey.

Leisure is gone,—gone where the spinning-wheels are gone, and the pack-horses, and the slow wagons, and the peddlers, who brought bargains to the door on sunny afternoons.—George Eliot.

Leisure and solitude are the best effect of riches, because the mother of thought. Both are avoided by most rich men, who seek company and business, which are signs of being weary of themselves.—Sir W. Temple.

Leisure, the highest happiness upon earth, is seldom enjoyed with perfect satisfaction, except in solitude. Indolence and indifference do not always afford leisure; for true leisure is frequently found in that interval of relaxation which divides a painful duty from an agreeable recreation; a toilsome business from the more agreeable occupations of literature and philosophy.—Zimmermann.

Our leisure is the time the Devil seizes upon to make us work for him; and the only way we can avoid conscription into his ranks is to keep all our leisure moments profitably employed.—James Ellis.

Lending

Loan off loses both itself and friend.
—Shakespeare.

I hate him for he is a Christian:
But more, for that, in low simplicity,
He lends out money gratis, and brings down
The rate of usance here with us in Venice.
—Shakespeare.

And whatever you lend, let it be your money, and not your name. Money you may get again, and, if not, you may contrive to do without it; name once lost you cannot get again, and, if you can contrive to do without it, you had better never have been born.—Bulwer-Lytton.

When you ask for it back again, you find a friend made an enemy by your own kindness. If you begin to press still further—either you must part with that which you have intrusted, or else you must lose that friend.—Plautus.

Lenity

Lenity has almost always wisdom and justice on its side.—Hosea Ballou.

Lenity is a part of justice; but she must not speak too loud for fear of waking justice.—Joubert.

Lenity will operate with greater force, in some instances, than rigor. It is, therefore, my first wish to have my whole conduct distinguished by it.—Washington.

Lent

Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; * * * that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret.—Bible.

When thou a fast would'st keep,
Make not thy homage cheap,
By publishing its signs to every eye;
But let it be between Thyself and the Unseen,
So shall it gain acceptance from on high.
—Bernard Barton.

There's winter on the hills to-day,
The sad wind soughs o'er churchyard knolls,
And weary nature seems to say,
" 'Tis Lenten-tide for sinful souls."
The barb is in our heart to-day;
Sore crushed with sense of ail and sin,
We feebly strive and faintly pray,
'Gainst danger near, for grace within.
We mourn our pride and passion's stain,
The earthly in our hearts enshrined;
The rebel flesh, too oft in vain
Commanded by the nobler mind;
And all of human curse or care
Which lurks life's dangerous paths among,
To quench the altar-flame of prayer,
Or hush the heavenward strain of song.
—W. M. Punshon.

Now are the days of humblest prayer,
When consciences to God lie bare,
And mercy most delights to spare.
Oh hearken when we cry.
Now is the season, wisely long,
Of sadder thought and graver song,
When ailing souls grow well and strong.
Oh hearken when we cry.
The feast of penance! Oh so bright,
With true conversion's heavenly light,
Like sunrise after stormy night!
Oh hearken when we cry.
Oh happy time of blessed tears,
Of surer hopes, of chast'ning fears,
Undoing all our evil years.
Oh hearken when we cry.
Chastise us with Thy fear;
Yet, Father! in the multitude
Of Thy compassions, hear!
—F. W. Faber, D. D.

The real Lent is the putting forth of a man's hand to quiet his own passions and to push them aside, that the higher voices may speak to him and the higher touches fall upon him. It is the making of an emptiness about the soul, that the higher fullness may fill it. Perhaps some day the lower needs may themselves become, and dignify themselves by becoming, the meek interpreters and ministers of those very powers which they once shut out from the soul. There will be no fasting days, no Lent, in heaven. Not because we shall have no bodies there, but because our bodies there will be open to God, the helps and not the hindrances of spiritual communication to our souls.

For no law of spiritual life is more certain or more imperative than this law of mortification. There cannot be such a thing as the perseverance in Christian life of an unmortified Christian who has come to years of discretion. Obedience, we repeat, is religion; and mortification is the essential condition of obedience, for it is the condition of its actual expression and of the recovery of that spiritual freedom without which that expression is impossible for sinful men.—George Body.

Our Saviour's fast, like every act of His life, bears the character of an example, and instructs us that this particular exercise of religion, while it exposes to temptations of its own, is yet in itself a great preliminary safeguard against sin—a source of facility for vanquishing all temptation. That there are demoniacal possessions which no means without this can reach effectually, is the express assertion of our Saviour on another occasion; and His example here, no less than His precept to His chosen followers there, instructs us forcibly that, while Christianity is the most mild and liberal of institutions, its founder, no preacher in the desert like Elias, or His forerunner the Baptist, but one who came "eating and drinking," as His censors remarked, neither fearfully flying nor morosely disdaining the ordinary converse and habits of mankind,—it yet requires the highest prudence and assistances of grace proportional, to maintain this intercourse with the world either with safety to ourselves or benefit to others: and these assistances are to be found where our Lord and Saviour Himself sought them—in occasional retirements, in meditation, prayer, and fasting.—W. H. Mill.

Letters

The true character of epistolary style is playfulness and urbanity.—Joubert.

Letters which are warmly sealed are often but coldly opened.—Richter.

In love matters, keep your pen from paper.—Alfred de Musset.

Letters should be easy and natural.—Chesterfield.

Full oft have letters caused the writers
To curse the day they were inditers.
—Butler.

A letter, timely writ, is a rivet to the chain of affection;
And a letter, untimely delayed, is as rust
to the solder. —Tupper.

It is by the benefit of letters that absent friends are in a manner brought together.—Seneca.

A stray volume of real life in the daily packet of the postman. Eternal love and instant payment.—Douglas Jerrold.

Here are a few of the unpleasantest words that ever blotted paper!—
Shakespeare.

In a heavy oppressive atmosphere,
when the spirits sink too low, the best cordial is to read over all the letters of one's friends.—Shenstone.

The post is the grand connecting link of all transactions, of all negotiations.
Those who are absent, by its means become present: it is the consolation of life.—Voltaire.

Kind messages, that pass from land to
land;

Kind letters, that betray the heart's deep
history,

In which we feel the pressure of a hand—
One touch of fire—and all the rest is mystery! —Longfellow.

A profusion of fancies and quotations is out of place in a love-letter.
True feeling is always direct, and never deviates into by-ways to cull flowers of rhetoric.—Bovee.

They are those winged messengers that can fly

From the Antarctic to the Arctic sky;
The heralds and swift harbingers that move
From east to west on embassies of love.
—Howell.

The best time to frame an answer to the letters of a friend is the moment

you receive them. Then the warmth of friendship, and the intelligence received most forcibly co-operate.—Shenstone.

Every day brings a ship,
Every ship brings a word;
Well for those who have no fear,
Looking seaward well assured
That the word the vessel brings
Is the word they wish to hear.
—Emerson.

The earth has nothing like a she epistle,
And hardly heaven—because it never ends.

I love the mystery of a female missal,
Which, like a creed, ne'er says all it intends.

* * * * * You had better
Take care what you reply to such a letter.
—Byron.

Perhaps there is no greater test of a man's regularity and easiness of conscience than his readiness to face the postman. Blessed is he who is made happy by the sound of a rat-tat! The good are eager for it; but the naughty tremble at the sound thereof.—Thackeray.

The pen flowing in love, or dipped black in hate,
Or tipped with delicate courtesies, or harshly edged with censure,
Hath quickened more good than the sun, more evil than the sword.
More joy than woman's smile, more woe than frowning fortune;
And shouldst thou ask my judgment of that which hath most profit in the world,
For answer take thou this, The prudent penning of a letter. —Tupper.

Heaven first taught letters for some wretch's aid,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid;
They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires;
The virgin's wish, without her fears, impart;
Excuse the blush, and pour out all the heart;
Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the pole.
—Pope.

Let your letter be written as accurately as you are able,—I mean with regard to language, grammar, and stops; for as to the matter of it the less trouble you give yourself the better it will be. Letters should be easy and natural, and convey to the persons to whom we send them just what we should say to the persons if we were with them.—Chesterfield.

Levity

Levity of behaviour is the bane of all that is good and virtuous.—Seneca.

There is always some levity even in excellent minds; they have wings to rise, and also to stray.—Joubert.

In infants, levity is a prettiness; in men a shameful defect; but in old age, a monstrous folly.—Rochefoucauld.

The lively and mercurial are as open books, with the leaves turned down at the notable passages. Their souls sit at the windows of their eyes, seeing and to be seen.—Bovee.

Liberality

From bounty issues power.—Aken-side.

Gold that is put to use more gold begets.—Shakespeare.

Be rather bountiful, than expensive.—William Penn.

To the liberal ideas of the age must be opposed the moral ideas of all ages.—Joubert.

Liberality consists less in giving profusely, than in giving judiciously.—La Bruyère.

If you are poor, distinguish yourself by your virtues; if rich, by your good deeds.—Joubert.

Liberality is the best way to gain affection; for we are assured of their friendship to whom we are obliged.—St. Evremont.

Liberality should be tempered with judgment, not with profuseness.—Hosea Ballou.

Men might be better if we better deemed of them.—Bailey.

That which is called liberality is frequently nothing more than the vanity of giving.—Theodore Parker.

He that defers his charity until he is dead is, if a man weighs it rightly, rather liberal of another man's goods than his own.—Bacon.

Liberalism is trust of the people tempered by prudence; conservatism, distrust of the people tempered by fear.—Gladstone.

In defiance of all the torture, of all the might, of all the malice of the world, the liberal man will ever be rich; for God's providence is his estate, God's wisdom and power are his defence, God's love and favor are his reward, and God's word is his security.—Barrow.

There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. The liberal soul shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered also himself. He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will He pay him again.—Bible.

Liberty

Give me liberty, or give me death.—Patrick Henry.

Liberty is not the right of one, but of all.—Herbert Spencer.

Liberty must be limited in order to be enjoyed.—Burke.

Nature gives liberty even to dumb animals.—Tacitus.

Liberty, without wisdom, is license.—Burke.

The love of liberty with life is given.—Dryden.

Liberty is a slow fruit.—Emerson.

Headstrong liberty is lashed with woe.—Shakespeare.

Liberty is no negation. It is a substantive, tangible reality.—Garfield.

Liberty is quite as much a moral as a political growth,—the result of free individual action, energy, and independence.—Samuel Smiles.

The people never give up their liberties but under some delusion.—Burke.

A bird in a cage is not half a bird.—Beecher.

Reason and virtue alone can bestow liberty.—Shaftesbury.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.—John Philpot Curran.

Liberty is worth whatever the best civilization is worth.—Henry Giles.

Perfect love holds the secret of the world's perfect liberty.—J. G. Holland.

A day, an hour of virtuous liberty,
Is worth a whole eternity in bondage.
—Addison.

Few persons enjoy real liberty; we are all slaves to ideas or habits.—Alfred de Musset.

The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time.—Thomas Jefferson.

The tree of liberty grows only when watered by the blood of tyrants.—Barère.

God grants liberty only to those who love it, and are always ready to guard and defend it.—Daniel Webster.

Liberty, when it begins to take root, is a plant of rapid growth.—George Washington.

Liberty, like chastity, once lost, can never be regained in its original purity.—H. W. Shaw.

The tidal wave of God's providence is carrying liberty throughout the globe.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Where slavery is, there liberty cannot be; and where liberty is, there slavery cannot be.—Abraham Lincoln.

Where liberty dwells, there is my country.—Benj. Franklin.

Liberty is from God; liberties from the Devil.—Auerbach.

O liberty! liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name.—Mme. Roland.

Every bondman in his own hand bears the power to cancel his captivity.—Shakespeare.

Interwoven is the love of liberty with every ligament of the heart.—Washington.

Whether in chains or in laurels, liberty knows nothing but victories.—Wendell Phillips.

The greatest glory of a free-born people is to transmit that freedom to their children.—Havard.

Personal liberty is the paramount essential to human dignity and human happiness.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Liberty must be a mighty thing; for by it God punishes and rewards nations.—Mme. Swetchine.

Life is probation: mortal man was made To solve the solemn problem—right or wrong.—John Quincy Adams.

True liberty can exist only when justice is equally administered to all.—Lord Mansfield.

Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable.—Daniel Webster.

The wish, which ages have not yet subdued in man, to have no master save his mood.—Byron.

Give me the centralism of liberty; give me the imperialism of equal rights.—Charles Sumner.

Natural liberty is the right of common upon a waste; civil liberty is the safe, exclusive, unmolested enjoyment of a cultivated enclosure.—Paley.

Give me the liberty to know, to think, to believe, and to utter freely

according to conscience, above all other liberties.—Milton.

'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower Of fleeting life its luster and perfume; And we are weeds without it.—Cowper.

There are two freedoms—the false, where a man is free to do what he likes; the true, where a man is free to do what he ought.—Charles Kingsley.

Do you wish to be free? Then above all things, love God, love your neighbor, love one another, love the common weal; then you will have true liberty.—Savonarola.

The only rational liberty is that which is born of subjection, reared in the fear of God and the love of man.—W. G. Simms.

The love of liberty that is not a real principle of dutiful behavior to authority is as hypocritical as the religion that is not productive of a good life.—Bishop Butler.

O! if there be, on this earthly sphere, A boon, an offering heaven holds dear, 'Tis the last libation Liberty draws From the heart that bleeds and breaks in her cause.—Moore.

Wise laws and just restraints are to a noble nation not chains, but chains of mail,—strength and defense, though something of an incumbrance.—Ruskin.

O liberty,
Parent of happiness, celestial born
When the first man became a living soul;
His sacred genius thou.—Dyer.

Liberty will not descend to a people, a people must raise themselves to liberty; it is a blessing that must be earned before it can be enjoyed.—Colton.

Liberty knows nothing but victories. Soldiers call Bunker Hill a defeat; but liberty dates from it though Warren lay dead on the field.—Wendell Phillips.

The people's liberties strengthen the king's prerogative, and the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties.—Charles I. of England.

Liberty is to the collective body what health is to every individual body. Without health no pleasure can be tasted by man; without liberty, no happiness can be enjoyed by society.—Bolingbroke.

Not until right is founded upon reverence will it be secure; not until duty is based upon love will it be complete; not until liberty is based on eternal principles will it be full, equal, lofty, and universal.—Henry Giles.

Liberty * * * is one of the choicest gifts that heaven hath bestowed upon man, and exceeds in value all the treasures which the earth contains within its bosom, or the sea covers. Liberty, as well as honor, man ought to preserve at the hazard of his life, for without it life is insupportable.—Cervantes.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.—Thomas Jefferson.

But slaves that once conceive the glowing thought
Of freedom, in that hope itself possess
All that the contest calls for; spirit,
strength,
The scorn of danger, and united hearts,
The surest presage of the good they seek.
—Cowper.

The only liberty that is valuable is a liberty connected with order; that not only exists along with order and virtue, but which cannot exist at all without them. It inheres in good and steady government, as in its substance and vital principle.—Burke.

The liberty of a people consists in being governed by laws which they have made themselves, under whatsoever form it may be of government; the liberty of a private man, in being master of his own time and actions, as far as may consist with the laws of God and of his country.—Cowley.

If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn. Human agency cannot extinguish it.

Like the earth's central fire, it may be smothered for a time; the ocean may overwhelm it; mountains may press it down; but its inherent and unconquerable force will heave both the ocean and the land, and at some time or other, in some place or other, the volcano will break out and flame up to heaven.—Daniel Webster.

Eternal Spirit of the chainless mind!
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art,
For there thy habitation is the Heart—
The Heart which love of thee alone can bind;
And when thy sons to fetters are consign'd—
To fetters and the damp vault's dayless
gloom,
Their country conquers with their Martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
—Byron.

Oh! liberty, thou goddess, heavenly bright,
Profuse of bliss, and pregnant with delight!
Eternal pleasures in thy presence reign;
And smiling plenty, leads thy wanton train;
Eas'd of her load, subjection grows more light
And poverty looks cheerful in the sight;
Thou mak'st the gloomy face of nature gay, Giv'st beauty to the sun, and pleasure to the day.
—Addison.

Libraries

Libraries are the wardrobes of literature.—James Dyer.

A library is a land of shadows.—Beecher.

My library was dukedom large enough.—Shakespeare.

A library is but the soul's burial ground.—Beecher.

Shelved around us lie the mummied authors.—Bayard Taylor.

The great consulting-room of a wise man is a library.—George Dawson.

The richest minds need not large libraries.—Alcott.

Every library should try to be complete on something, if it were only the history of pin-heads.—Holmes.

A great library contains the diary of the human race.—George Dawson.

The true university of these days is a collection of books.—Carlyle.

He that revels in a well-chosen library has innumerable dishes, and all of admirable flavor.—William Godwin.

As great a store
Have we of books as bees of herbs or more.
—Henry Vaughan.

All round the room my silent servants wait,
My friends in every season, bright and dim.
—Barry Cornwall.

Errors belong to libraries; truth, to the human mind.—Goethe.

The ponderous tomes are bales of the mind's merchandise.—Willmott.

No place affords a more striking conviction of the vanity of human hopes than a public library.—Dr. Johnson.

Let every man, if possible, gather some good books under his roof, and obtain access for himself and family to some social library. Almost any luxury should be sacrificed to this.—William Ellery Channing.

I love vast libraries; yet there is a doubt,
If one be better with them or without—
Unless he use them wisely, and, indeed,
Knows the high art of what and how to read.
—J. G. Saxe.

A large library is apt to distract rather than to instruct the learner; it is much better to be confined to a few authors than to wander at random over many.—Seneca.

Libraries are as the shrines where all the relics of saints full of true virtue, and that without delusion or imposture, are preserved and reposed.—Bacon.

No possession can surpass, or even equal, a good library to the lover of books. Here are treasured up for his daily use and delectation, riches which increase by being consumed, and pleasures which never cloy.—John Aifred Langford.

The first thing naturally when one enters a scholar's study or library, is to look at his books. One gets a notion very speedily of his tastes and the range of his pursuits by a glance round his book-shelves.—O. W. Holmes.

If I were not a king, I would be a university man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would desire to have no other prison than that library [the Bodleian].—James I.

He has his Rome, his Florence, his whole glowing Italy, within the four walls of his library. He has in his books the ruins of an antique world, and the glories of a modern one.—Longfellow.

What laborious days, what watchings by the midnight lamp, what rackings of the brain, what hopes and fears, what long lives of laborious study, are here sublimized into print, and condensed into the narrow compass of these surrounding shelves!—Horace Smith.

Consider what you have in the smallest chosen library. A company of the wisest and wittiest men that could be picked out of all civil countries, in a thousand years, have set in best order the results of their learning and wisdom. The men themselves were bid and inaccessible, solitary, impatient of interruption, fenced by etiquette; but the thought which they did not uncover to their bosom friend is here written out in transparent words to us, the strangers of another age.—Emerson.

We enter our studies, and enjoy a society which we alone can bring together. We raise no jealousy by conversing with one in preference to another; we give no offence to the most illustrious by questioning him as long as we will, and leaving him as abruptly. Diversity of opinion raises no tumult in our presence: each interlocutor stands before us, speaks or is silent, and we adjourn or decide the business at our leisure.—Landor.

What a place to be in is an old library! It seems as though all the souls of all the writers that have bequeathed their labors to these Bodleians were reposing here as in some dormitory, or middle state. I do not want to handle, to profane the leaves, their winding-sheets. I could as soon dislodge a shade. I seem to inhale learning, walking amid their foliage; and the odor of their old moth-scented coverings is fragrant as the first bloom of those scintial apples which grew amid the happy orchard.—Charles Lamb.

That place that does contain
My books, the best companions, is to me
A glorious court, where hourly I converse
With the old sages and philosophers;
And sometimes, for variety, I confer With kings and emperors, and weigh their counsels;
Calling their victories, if unjustly got,
Unto a strict account, and, in my fancy,
Deface their ill-placed statues.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

License

A popular license is indeed the many-headed tyrant.—Sir P. Sidney.

For there is no air that men so greedily draw in, that diffuses itself so soon, and that penetrates so deep as that of license.—Montaigne.

Human brutes, like other beasts, find snares and poison in the provisions of life, and are allured by their appetites to their destruction.—Swift.

The freedom of some is the freedom of the herd of swine that ran violently down a steep place into the sea and were drowned.—Rev. W. Jay.

Life

The childhood of immortality.—Goethe.

Life is a shuttle.—Shakespeare.

Life's but a walking shadow.—Shakespeare.

Life is the gift of God, and is divine.—Longfellow.

Life is good, but not life in itself.—Owen Meredith.

In the midst of life we are in death.—Church Burial Service.

Life is but a day at most.—Burns.

Life hath quicksands; life hath snares.—Longfellow.

Making their lives a prayer.—Whittier.

Life is but thought.—Coleridge.

Man lives only to shiver and perspire.—Sydney Smith.

Life is as serious a thing as death.—Bailey.

Life hath more awe than death.—Bailey.

Whose life is a bubble, and in length a span.—Wm. Browne.

He lives long that lives well.—Thomas Fuller.

Our lives are but our marches to the grave.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The cradle and the tomb, alas! so nigh.—Prior.

A man's life's no more than to say, One!—Shakespeare.

That life is long which answers life's great end.—Young.

O God, how lovely still is life!—Schiller.

Life and religion are one, or neither is any thing.—George MacDonald.

For life lives only in success.—Bayard Taylor.

Life is the offspring of death.—Moses Harvey.

Man is an organ of life, and God alone is life.—Swedenborg.

May you live all the days of your life.—Swift.

Knowledge, love, power,—there is the complete life.—Amiel.

Life is a dream and death an awakening.—Beaumelle.

Life is short, art long.—Hippocrates.

The grand question of life is, Is my name written in heaven?—D. L. Moody.

Life is a tragedy.—Sir W. Raleigh.

That man lives twice that lives the first life well.—Herrick.

Christian life consists in faith and charity.—Luther.

My life is one demd horrid grind.—Dickens.

And he that lives to live forever never fears dying.—William Penn.

Live virtuously, my lord, and you cannot die too soon, nor live too long.—Lady Rachel Russell.

Life itself is a bubble and a scepticism, and a sleep within a sleep.—Emerson.

The web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together.—Shakespeare.

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!—Burke.

Let those who thoughtfully consider the brevity of life remember the length of eternity.—Bishop Ken.

The end of life is to be like unto God; and the soul following God will be like unto Him.—Socrates.

Life is short, art long, opportunity fleeting, experiment uncertain, and judgment difficult.—Hippocrates.

Life is an art in which too many remain only dilettantes.—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

There is nothing at all in life except what we put there.—Mme. Swetchine.

While we are reasoning concerning life, life is gone.—Hume.

Our life is scarce the twinkle of a star
In God's eternal day.
—Bayard Taylor.

The truest end of life is to know the life that never ends.—William Penn.

Life in itself is neither good nor evil, it is the scene of good or evil, as you make it.—Montaigne.

This narrow isthmus 'twixt two boundless seas,
The past, the future—two eternities.
—Moore.

Life is a problem; mortal man was made to solve the solemn problem right or wrong.—J. Q. Adams.

Life, like the water of the seas, freshens only when it ascends towards heaven.—Richter.

Life's but a means unto an end, that end,
Beginning, mean, and end to all things—
God.
—Bailey.

Every man's life is a fairy-tale, written by God's fingers.—Hans Christian Andersen.

Long life is denied us; therefore let us do something to show that we have lived.—Cicero.

There is no human life so poor and small as not to hold many a divine possibility.—James Martineau.

Life is before you,—not earthly life alone, but life—a thread running interminably through the warp of eternity.—J. G. Holland.

Nor love thy life nor hate; but what thou liv'st
Live well; how long or short permit to heaven.
—Milton.

Human life is everywhere a state in which much is to be endured, and little enjoyed.—Johnson.

I cannot rest from travel; I will drink life to the lees.—Tennyson.

Life is a comedy to him who thinks and a tragedy to him who feels.—Horace Walpole.

And cradles rock us nearer to the tomb:
Our birth is nothing but our death begun.
—Young.

Life is a kind of sleep: old men sleep longest, nor begin to wake but when they are to die.—De La Bruyère.

Life, however short, is made still shorter by waste of time.—Johnson.

On life's vast ocean diversely we sail,
Reason the card, but passion is the gale.
—Pope.

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us.—Sir T.
Browne.

Life is a crucible. We are thrown into it and tried.—Chapin.

This body is not a home, but an inn;
and that only for a short time.—
Seneca.

The earnestness of life is the only passport to the satisfaction of life.—
Theodore Parker.

God is the poet; men are but the actors. The great dramas of earth were written in heaven.—Balzac.

Our bodies are but the anvils of pain and disease, and our minds the hives of unnumbered cares.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

We make provisions for this life as if it were never to have an end, and for the other life as though it were never to have a beginning.—Addison.

For life in general, there is but one decree: youth is a blunder, manhood a struggle, old age a regret.—Beacons-
field.

He most lives who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best; and he whose heart beats the quickest lives the longest.—James Martineau.

Life at the greatest and best is but a froward child, that must be humored and coaxed a little till it falls asleep, and then all the care is over.—Goldsmith.

We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep. —Shakespeare.

Life is like a game of whist. I don't enjoy the game much; but I like to play my cards well, and see what will be the end of it.—George Eliot.

For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow.—Bible.

I would not live alway; I ask not to stay Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way. —William A. Muhlenberg.

So may'st thou live, till like ripe fruit thou drop
Into thy mother's lap. —Milton.

Oft in my way have I stood still, though but a casual passenger, so much I felt the awfulness of life.—
Wordsworth.

Life, as we call it, is nothing but the edge of the boundless ocean of existence where it comes upon soundings.—
Holmes.

To make good use of life, one should have in youth the experience of advanced years, and in old age the vigor of youth.—Stanislaus.

Plunge boldly into the thick of life!
each lives it, not to many is it known;
and seize it where you will, it is interesting.—Goethe.

Yet through all, we know this tangled skein is in the hands of One who sees the end from the beginning; He shall yet unravel all.—Alexander
Smith.

Life is a malady in which sleep soothes us every sixteen hours; it is a palliation; death is the remedy.—
Chamfort.

The vanity of human life is like a river, constantly passing away, and yet constantly coming on.—Pope.

We sail the sea of life; a calm one finds,
And one a tempest; and, the voyage o'er,
Death is the quiet haven of us all.
—Wordsworth.

Pray for and work for fullness of life above everything; full red blood in the body; full honesty and truth in the mind; and the fullness of a grateful love for the Saviour in your heart.—
Phillips Brooks.

Let the current of your being set towards God, then your life will be filled and calmed by one master-passion which unites and stills the soul.—Alexander Maclaren.

So weary with disasters tugg'd with fortune,
That I would set my life on any chance,
To mend, or be rid on't. —Shakespeare.

And so, from hour to hour, we ripe and
ripe,
And then, from hour to hour, we rot and rot;
And thereby hangs a tale. —Shakespeare.

Life is rather a state of embryo,—a preparation for life. A man is not completely born until he has passed through death.—Franklin.

Catch, then, O catch the transient hour;
Improve each moment as it flies;
Life's a short summer—man a flower—
He dies—alas! how soon he dies!
—Dr. Johnson.

The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.—Bible.

Oh, how this spring of life resembleth
The uncertain glory of an April day,
Which now shows all the beauty of the sun,
And, by and by, a cloud takes all away!
—Shakespeare.

They may rail at this life—from the hour I began it,
I've found it a life full of kindness and
bliss;
And, until they can show me some happier
planet,
More social and bright, I'll content me with this. —Moore.

This life is but the passage of a day,
This life is but a pang and all is over;
But in the life to come which fades not
away
Every love shall abide and every lover.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

The early and the latter part of human life are the best, or, at least, the most worthy of respect; the one is the age of innocence, the other of reason.—Joubert.

We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.—Henry Ward Beecher.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts,
not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts
the best. —Bailey.

Life, unexplored, is hope's perpetual blaze—
When past, one long, involved, and dark—some maze:
But, that some mighty power controls the whole,
A secret intuition tells the soul.
—William Winter.

Life is constantly weighing us in very sensitive scales, and telling every one of us precisely what his real weight is to the last grain of dust.—Lowell.

God help us! it is a foolish little thing, this human life, at the best; and it is half ridiculous and half pitiful to see what importance we ascribe to it, and to its little ornaments and distinctions.—Jeffrey.

Coleridge cried, "O God, how glorious it is to live!" Renan asks, "O God, when will it be worth while to live?" In Nature we echo the poet; in the world we echo the thinker.—Ouida.

My notions about life are much the same as they are about travelling; there is a good deal of amusement on the road, but, after all, one wants to be at rest.—Southey.

They who are most weary of life, and yet are most unwilling to die, are such who have lived to no purpose,—who have rather breathed than lived.—Lord Clarendon.

Thus at the flaming forge of life
Our fortunes must be wrought;
Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
Each burning deed and thought!
—Longfellow.

No man lives without jostling and being jostled; in all ways he has to elbow himself through the world, giving and receiving offence.—Carlyle.

The nearest approximation to an understanding of life is to feel it—to realize it to the full—to be a profound and inscrutable mystery.—Bovee.

Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.
—Longfellow.

Our life contains a thousand springs,
And dies if one be gone.
Strange! that a harp of thousand strings
Should keep in tune so long. —Watts.

Shall he who soars, inspired by loftier views,
Life's little cares and little pains refuse?
Shall he not rather feel a double share
Of mortal woe, when doubly armed to bear?
—Crabbe.

What is life? A gulf of troubled waters, where the soul, like a vexed bark, is tossed upon the waves of pain and pleasure by the wavering breath of passions.—Miss L. E. Landon.

This span of life was lent for lofty duties, not for selfishness; not to be wiled away for aimless dreams, but to improve ourselves, and serve mankind.—Sir Aubrey de Vere.

Each thing lives according to its kind; the heart by love, the intellect by truth, the higher nature of man by intimate communion with God.—Chapin.

A few years hence and he will be beneath the sod; but those cliffs will stand, as now, facing the ocean, incessantly lashed by its waves, yet unshaken, immovable; and other eyes will gaze on them for their brief day of life, and then they, too, will close.—H. P. Liddon.

If we were to live here always, with no other care than how to feed, clothe, and house ourselves, life would be a very sorry business. It is immeasurably heightened by the solemnity of death.—Alexander Smith.

Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindness, and small obligations given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart and secure comfort.—Sir Humphry Davy.

Life is a waste of wearisome hours,
Which seldom the rose of enjoyment adorns,
And the heart, that is soonest awake to the flowers,
Is always the first to be touch'd by the thorns.
—Moore.

Since every man who lives is born to die,
And none can boast sincere felicity,
With equal mind what happens let us bear,
Nor joy nor grieve too much for things beyond our care.
—Dryden.

There is no life so humble that, if it be true and genuinely human and obedient to God, it may not hope to shed some of His light. There is no life so meager that the greatest and wisest of us can afford to despise it. We cannot know at what moment it may flash forth with the life of God.—Phillips Brooks.

Uncertainty and expectation are the joys of life. Security is an insipid thing, and the overtaking and possessing of a wish discovers the folly of the chase.—Congreve.

Life is a mission. Every other definition of life is false, and leads all who accept it astray. Religion, science, philosophy, though still at variance upon many points, all agree in this, that every existence is an aim.—Mazzini.

I am convinced that there is no man that knows life well, and remembers all the incidents of his past experience who would accept it again; we are certainly here to punish precedent sins.—Campbell.

Life, which all creatures love and strive to keep,—wonderful, dear and pleasant unto each, even to the meanest,—yea, a boon to all where pity is; for pity makes the world soft to the weak and noble for the strong.—Edwin Arnold.

We have two lives: the soul of man is like the rolling world, one half in day, the other dipt in night; the one has music and the flying cloud, the other silence and the wakeful stars.—

Alexander Smith.

Life's but a walking shadow—a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,

And then is heard no more. It is a tale
Told by idiot, full of sound and fury
Signifying nothing. —Shakespeare.

A sacred burden in this life ye bear,
Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly,
Stand up and walk beneath it steadfastly;
Fail not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win.
—Frances Anne Kemble.

He lives long that lives well, and time misspent is not lived, but lost.
Besides, God is better than His promise, if He takes from him a long lease, and gives him a freehold of greater value.—Fuller.

You and I are now nearly in middle age, and have not yet become soured and shrivelled with the wear and tear of life. Let us pray to be delivered from that condition where life and Nature have no fresh, sweet sensations for us.—James A. Garfield.

Life, whether in this world or any other, is the sum of our attainment, our experience, our character. The conditions are secondary. In what other world shall we be more surely than we are here?—Chapin.

A man is thirty years old before he has any settled thoughts of his fortune; it is not completed before fifty, he falls a-building in his old age, and dies by the time his house is in a condition to be painted and glazed.—
Bruyère.

How mysterious is this human life, with all its diversities of contrast and compensation; this web of checkered destinies; this sphere of manifold allotment, where man lives in his greatness and grossness, a little lower than the angels, a little higher than the brutes.—Henry Giles.

There are three modes of bearing the ills of life: by indifference, which is most common; by philosophy, which is most ostentatious; and by religion, which is the most effectual.—Colton.

Though we seem grieved at the shortness of life in general, we are wishing every period of it at an end.
The minor longs to be at age, then to be a man of business, then to make up an estate, then to arrive at honors, then to retire.—Addison.

Life is a weary interlude—
Which doth short joys, long woes include:
The world the stage, the prologue tears;
The acts vain hopes and varied fears;
The scene shuts up with loss of breath,
And leaves no epilogue but death.
—Bishop King.

Love, hope, and joy, fair pleasure's smiling
train,
Hate, fear, and grief, the family of pain;
These, mix'd with art, and to due bounds
confin'd,
Make and maintain the balance of the mind:
The lights and shades, whose well-accorded strife
Gives all the strength and color of our life.
—Pope.

Say, what is life? 'Tis to be born
A helpless babe, to greet the light
With a sharp wail, as if the morn
Foretold a cloudy noon and night;
To weep, to sleep, and weep again,
With sunny smiles between; and then?
—J. G. Saxe.

I made a posy, while the day ran by:
Here will I smell my remnant out, and tie
My life within this band.
But time did beckon to the flowers, and they
By noon most cunningly did steal away,
And wither'd in my hand.
—Herbert.

See how the World its Veterans rewards!
A Youth of Frolics, an old Age of Cards;
Fair to no purpose, artful to no end,
Young without Lovers, old without a Friend;
A Fop their Passion, but their Prize a Sot;
Alive ridiculous, and dead forgot.—Pope.

Our lives are albums written through
With good or ill, with false or true;
And as the blessed angels turn
The pages of our years,
God grant they read the good with smiles,
And blot the ill with tears!
—Whittier.

Life is what we are alive to. It is not length, but breadth. To be alive only to appetite, pleasure, pride, money-making, and not to goodness and kindness, purity and love, history, poetry, music, flowers, stars, God and eternal hopes, it is to be all but dead.—Maltbie Babcock.

There appears to exist a greater desire to live long than to live well! Measure by man's desires, he cannot live long enough; measure by his good deeds, and he has not lived long enough; measure by his evil deeds, and he has lived too long.—Zimmermann.

O, Life! how pleasant is thy morning,
Young Fancy's rays the hills adorning!
Cold pausing Caution's lesson scorning,

We frisk away,
Like schoolboys, at the expected warning,
To joy and play. —Burns.

If this life is unhappy, it is a burden to us, which it is difficult to bear; if it is in every respect happy, it is dreadful to be deprived of it; so that in either case the result is the same, for we must exist in anxiety and apprehension.—Bruyère.

Life is short—while we speak it flies; enjoy, then, the present, and forget the future; such is the moral of ancient poetry, a graceful and a wise moral,—indulged beneath a southern sky, and all deserving the phrase applied to it,—“the philosophy of the garden.”—Bulwer-Lytton.

For what are men who grasp at praise sub-
lime,
But bubbles on the rapid stream of time,
That rise, and fall, that swell, and are no
more,
Born, and forgot, ten thousand in an hour?
—Young.

The deeper men go into life, the deeper is their conviction that this life is not all. It is an “unfinished symphony.” A day may round out an insect's life, and a bird or a beast needs no to-morrow. Not so with him who knows that he is related to God and has felt “the power of an endless life.”

This world is not a platform where you will hear Thalberg-piano-playing. It is a piano manufactory, where are dust and shavings and boards, and saws and files and rasps and sand-papers. The perfect instrument and the music will be hereafter.—Beecher.

Think of “living”! Thy life, wert thou the “pitifullest of all the sons of earth,” is no idle dream, but a solemn reality. It is thy own; it is all thou hast to front eternity with. Work, then, even as He has done, and does, “like a star, unhasting, yet unresting.”—Carlyle.

Reason thus with life;
If I do lose thee, I do lose a thing
That none but fools would keep: a breath
thou art, (Servile to all the skiey influences,
That dost this habitation, where thou
keep'st,
Hourly afflict. —Shakespeare.

Year chases year, decay pursues decay,
Still drops some joy from withering life
away;
New forms arise, and different views engage,
Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage,
Till pitying Nature signs the last release,
And bids afflicted worth retire to peace.
—Dr. Johnson.

When I reflect upon what I have seen, what I have heard, what I have done, I can hardly persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry and bustle and pleasure of the world had any reality; and I look on what has passed as one of those wild dreams which opium occasions, and I by no means wish to repeat the nauseous dose for the sake of the fugitive illusion.—Chesterfield.

No man can promise himself even fifty years of life, but any man may, if he please, live in the proportion of fifty years in forty,—let him rise early, that he may have the day before him, and let him make the most of the day, by determining to expend it on two sorts of acquaintances only—those by whom something may be got, and those from whom something may be learned.—Colton.

Life consists not of a series of illustrious actions or elegant enjoyments. The greater part of our time passes in compliance with necessities, in the performance of daily duties, in the removal of small inconveniences, in the procurement of petty pleasures; and we are well or ill at ease, as the main stream of life glides on smoothly, or is ruffled by small obstacles and frequent interruption.—Johnson.

Have you found your life distasteful?

My life did, and does, smack sweet.
Was your youth of pleasure wasteful?

Mine I saved and hold complete.

Do your joys with age diminish?

When mine fail me I'll complain.

Must in death your daylight finish?

My sun sets to rise again.

—Robert Browning.

To live is not merely to breathe, it is to act; it is to make use of our organs, senses, faculties, of all those parts of ourselves which give us the feeling of existence. The man who has lived longest is not the man who has counted most years, but he who has enjoyed life most. Such a one was buried a hundred years old, but he was dead from his birth. He would have gained by dying young; at least he would have lived till that time.—Rousseau.

Our brains are seventy-year clocks. The angel of life winds them up at once for all, then closes the cases, and gives the key into the hand of the angel of resurrection. "Tic-tac, tic-tac!" go the wheels of thought; our will cannot stop them; madness only makes them go faster. Death alone can break into the case, and, seizing the ever-swinging pendulum which we call the heart, silence at last the clicking of the terrible escapement we have carried so long beneath our aching foreheads.—Holmes.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;

'Tis hard to part when friends are dear:

Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;

Then steal away, give little warning,

Choose thine own time,

Say not good night—but in some brighter clime

Bid me good morning.

—Anna Letitia Barbauld.

We talk of human life as a journey, but how variously is that journey performed! There are those who come forth girt, and shod, and mantled, to walk on velvet lawns and smooth terraces, where every gale is arrested and every beam is tempered. There are others who walk on the Alpine paths of life, against driving misery, and through stormy sorrows over sharp afflictions; walk with bare feet and naked breast, jaded, mangled, and chilled.—Sydney Smith.

A man's ingress into the world is naked and bare,

His progress through the world is trouble and care;

And lastly, his egress out of the world, is nobody knows where.

If we do well here, we shall do well there;
I can tell you no more if I preach a whole year.
—John Edwin.

A minute analysis of life at once destroys that splendor which dazzles the imagination. Whatsoever grandeur can display, or luxury enjoy, is procured by offices of which the mind shrinks from the contemplation. All the delicacies of the table may be traced back to the shambles and the dunghill; all magnificence of building was hewn from the quarry, and all the pomp of ornament dug from among the damps and darkness of the mine.—Johnson.

So live that when thy summons comes to join

The innumerable caravan which moves

To that mysterious realm where each shall take

His chamber in the silent halls of death.

Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed

By an unflinching trust, approach thy grave,

Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch

About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.
—William Cullen Bryant.

The World's a bubble, and the Life of Man less than a span:

In his conception wretched, from the womb so to the tomb;

Curst from his cradle, and brought up to years with cares and fears.

Who then to frail mortality shall trust,
But limns the water, or but writes in dust.

—Bacon.

Beneath me flows the Rhine, and, like the stream of time, it flows amid the ruins of the past. I see myself therein, and know that I am old. Thou, too, shalt be old. Be wise in season. Like the stream of thy life runs the stream beneath us. Down from the distant Alps, out into the wide world, it bursts away, like a youth from the house of his fathers. Broad-breasted and strong, and with earnest endeavors, like manhood, it makes itself a way through these difficult mountain-passes. And at length in old age, it falters, and its steps are weary and slow, and it sinks into the sand, and through its grave passes into the great ocean, which is its eternity.—Longfellow.

Like to the falling of a star;
Or as the flights of eagles are;
Or like the fresh spring's gaudy hue,
Or silver drops of morning dew;
Or like a wind that chafes the flood,
Or bubbles which on water stood;
Ev'n such is man, whose borrow'd light
Is straight call'd in, and paid to-night.
The wind blows out, the bubble dies;
The spring entombed in autumn lies;
The dew dries up; the star is shot;
The flight is past; and man forgot.

—Bishop King.

What art thou, life, that we must court
thy stay?

A breath one single gasp must puff away!
A short-lived flower, that with the day must fade!

A fleeting vapor, and an empty shade!
A stream that silently but swiftly glides
To meet eternity's immeasured tides!
A being, lost alike by pain or joy?
A fly can kill it, or a worm destroy!
Impair'd by labor, and by ease undone,
Commenced in tears, and ended in a groan.

—Brome.

Four seasons fill the measure of the year;
There are four seasons in the mind of
man;

He has his lusty Spring, when fancy clear
Takes in all beauty with an easy span;
He has his Summer, when luxuriously
Spring's honey'd-cud of youthful thought he loves

To ruminate, and by such dreaming high
Is nearest unto heaven; quiet coves
His soul hath in its Autumn, when his wings

He furleth close; contented so to look
On mists in idleness—to let fair things
Pass by unheeded as a threshold brook.
He has his Winter, too, of pale misfeature,
Or else he would forego his mortal nature.

—Keats.

And thus does life go on, until death accomplishes the catastrophe in silence, takes the worn frame within his hand, and, as if it were a dried-up scroll, crumbles it in his grasp to ashes. The monuments of kingdoms, too, shall disappear. Still the globe shall move; still the stars shall burn; still the sun shall paint its colors on the day, and its colors on the year.

What, then, is the individual, or what even is the race in the sublime recurrings of Time? Years, centuries, cycles, are nothing to these. The sun that measures out the ages of our planet is not a second-hand on the great dial of the universe.—Henry Giles.

Light

And God said, Let there be light!
and there was light.—Bible.

I am the light of the world.—Bible.

And God called the light day.—
Bible.

Light (God's eldest daughter!).—
Fuller.

Hail, holy light! offspring of heaven
first-born.—Milton.

God and Nature met in light.—Tennyson.

Light is but the shadow of God.—
Sir T. Browne.

The sacred influence of light appears.—Milton.

Is not light grander than fire?—
Carlyle.

Light is, as it were, a divine humidity.—Joubert.

Light is, perhaps, the most wonderful of all visible things.—Leigh Hunt.

Light is the symbol of truth.—
Lowell.

Where there is much light, the shade is deepest.—Goethe.

Prime cheerer, light! of all material beings first and best! Efflux divine.—
Thomson.

Light, whether it be material or moral, is the best reformer.—Colton.

The very plants turn with a joyful transport to the light.—Schiller.

The light in the world comes principally from two sources,—the sun, and the student's lamp.—Bovee.

Light is the first of painters. There is no object so foul that intense light will not make it beautiful.—Emerson.

Walk

Boldly and wisely in that light thou hast—
There is a hand above will help thee on.
—Bailey.

All human souls, never so bedarkened, love light; light once kindled, spreads till all is luminous.—Carlyle.

Children always turn towards the light. Oh that grown-up people in this world became like little children! —J. C. Hare.

Only the worm of conscience consorts with the owl. Sinners and evil spirits shun the light.—Schiller.

Light, seeking light, doth light of light beguile; so, ere you find where light in darkness lies, your light grows dark by losing of your eyes.—Shakespeare.

Light itself is a great corrective. A thousand wrongs and abuses that are grown in darkness disappear, like owls and bats, before the light of day.—James A. Garfield.

The first creation of God in the works of the days was the light of the sense; the last was the light of the reason: and His Sabbath-work ever since is the illumination of the spirit.—Bacon.

"Let there be light!" said God; and forth with light
Ethereal, first of things, quintessence pure,
Sprung from the deep; and, from her native east,
To journey through the aery gloom began,
Spher'd in a radiant cloud. —Milton.

We should render thanks to God for having produced this temporal light, which is the smile of heaven and joy of the world, spreading it like a cloth of gold over the face of the air and earth, and lighting it as a torch by which we might behold His works.—Caussin.

And as the eye is the best composer, so light is the first of painters. There is no object so foul that intense light will not make beautiful. And the stimulus it affords to the sense, and a sort of infinitude which it bath like space and time, make all matter gay. —Emerson.

No wonder that light is so frequently used by the sacred oracles as the symbol of our best blessings. Of the Gospel revelation one apostle says, "The night is far spent, and the day is at hand." Another, under the impression of the same auspicious event, thus applied the language of ancient prophecy: "The people who sat in darkness have seen a great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up." —Baseley.

God said—"Let there be light!"
Grim darkness felt His might,
And fled away;
Then startled seas and mountains cold,
Shone forth, all bright in blue and gold,
And cried—" 'Tis day! 'tis day!"
'Hail, holy light!' exclaim'd
The thunderous cloud that flam'd
O'er daisies white;
And lo! the rose, in crimson dress'd,
Lean'd sweetly on the lily's breast;
And blushing murmur'd—"Light!"
—Ebenezer Elliott.

Lilies

The lily of the vale, of flowers the queen,
Puts on the robe she neither sew'd nor spun.
—Michael Bruce.

The lily is all in white, like a saint,
And so is no mate for me. —Hood.

"Look to the lilies how they grow!"
'Twas thus the Saviour said, that we,
Even in the simplest flowers that blow,
God's ever-watchful care might see.
—Moir.

And the stately lilies stand
Fair in the silvery light,
Like saintly vestals, pale in prayer;
Their pure breath sanctifies the air,
As its fragrance fills the night.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

And lilies white, prepared to touch
The whitest thought, nor soil it much,
Of dreamer turned to lover.

—E. B. Browning.

We are lilies fair,
The flower of virgin light;
Nature held us forth, and said,
"Lo! my thoughts of white."
—Leigh Hunt.

I wish I were the lily's leaf
To fade upon that bosom warm,
Content to wither, pale and brief,
The trophy of thy paler form.
—Dionysius.

Yet, the great ocean hath no tone of power
Mightier to reach the soul, in thought's hushed hour,
Than yours, ye lilies! chosen thus and graced!
—Mrs. Hemans.

Lincoln's Birthday

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the Nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."—Abraham Lincoln.

"I know there is a God, and that He hates the injustice of slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that His hand is in it. If He has a place and a work for me, and I think He has, I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know
I am right, because I know that liberty is right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God."—Abraham Lincoln.

The life of Lincoln should never be passed by in silence by young or old.
He touched the log cabin and it became the palace in which greatness was nurtured. He touched the forest and it became to him a church in which the purest and noblest worship of God was observed. His occupation has become associated in our minds with the integrity of the life he lived.
In Lincoln there was always some quality that fastened him to the people and taught them to keep time to the music of his heart.—David Swing.

His biography is written in blood and tears; uncounted millions arise and call him blessed! a redeemed and reunited republic is his monument.—
Rev. H. W. Bolton, D. D.

Not thine the sorrow, but ours, sainted soul! Thou hast indeed entered into the promised land, while we are yet on the march. To us remain the rocking of the deep, the storm upon the land, days of duty and nights of watching; but thou art sphered high above all darkness and fear, beyond all sorrow and weariness. Rest, oh, weary heart!—Henry Ward Beecher.

Men will imitate and admire his unmoved firmness, his inflexible conscience for the right; and yet his gentleness, as tender as a woman's, his moderation of spirit, which not all the heat of party could inflame, nor all the jars and disturbances of this country shake out of its place: I swear you to an emulation of his justice, his moderation, and his mercy—Henry Ward Beecher.

He was compassionate. With what joy he brought liberty to the enslaved.
He was forgiving. In this respect he was strikingly suggestive of the Saviour.
He was great. Time will but augment the greatness of his name and fame. Perhaps a greater man never ruled in this or any other nation. He was good and pure and incorruptible. He was a patriot; he loved his country; he poured out his soul unto death for it. He was human, and thus touched the chord that makes the world akin.—Rev. H. W. Bolton, D. D.

Next to Washington, Lincoln stands forth as the grandest patriot in our American life. Washington was the "Father of his Country"; Lincoln was her most loyal son; Washington brought the United States of America into being;
Lincoln made that being immortal;
Washington unfurled a new flag among the nations of the world; Lincoln made that flag a mighty power among those nations. Dead, they yet speak. The good they did will last through time and on through eternity. And so our Nation has most rightly

and fittingly made the birthdays of these, her illustrious sons, legal holidays, to inspire us to a purer, nobler, holier manhood.—Geo. H. Smythe, Jr.

Abraham Lincoln was a man of profound faith. He believed in God. He believed in Christ. He believed in the Bible. He believed in men. His faith made him great. His life is a beautiful commentary on the words, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." There was a time in Lincoln's experience when his faith faltered, as there was a time when his reason tottered; but these sad experiences were temporary, and Abraham Lincoln was neither an infidel nor a lunatic. It is easy to trace in the life of this colossal character a steady growth of faith. This grace in him increased steadily in breadth and in strength with the passing years, until it came to pass that his last public utterances show forth the confidence and the fire of an ancient Hebrew prophet.—B. B. Tyler, D. D.

The beauty of Lincoln's immortal character has thrown in the shade the splendors of his intellect. The time will be when the severest critics of mental philosophy and mental development will sit in judgment and admiration upon the splendid brain of that great man. He was a logician by nature. His terse and beautiful rhetoric rivals the utterances of the greatest orators of the past and present. He was truly great.—Bishop J. P. Newman.

Through all the pressure and the measureless responsibility Abraham Lincoln stood like a giant girt with the strength of God. The memorial of Abraham Lincoln is in the millions of the Afro-American race, now free. It is in the reverence and love of the freest, greatest, and most progressive nation on the earth. It is in the amended constitution of these United States, which constitution has at last become the formula of freedom and indissoluble bond of union.—Rev. Leroy Hooker.

"We cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground.

The brave men who struggled here have consecrated it far beyond our power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living rather to be dedicated to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; and this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."—Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg.

Who shall recount our martyr's sufferings for this people? Since the November of 1860, his horizon has been black with storms. By day and by night he trod a way of danger and darkness. On his shoulders rested a government dearer to him than his own life. At its integrity millions of men at home were striking; upon it foreign eyes lowered. It stood like a lone island in a sea full of storms; and every tide and wave seemed eager to devour it. Upon thousands of hearts great sorrows and anxieties have rested, but not on one such, and in such measure, as upon that simple, truthful, noble soul, our faithful and sainted Lincoln.—Henry Ward Beecher.

If I have any purpose, it is to strengthen the belief in a Divine Providence; and if I have any further purpose in this time of wars and rumors of wars, it is to show that God Almighty has made nations for higher purposes than mere money making. I am to speak of Abraham Lincoln, the simplest, serenest, sublimest character of the age. Seventy millions of people join in commemorating his greatness. It is not my purpose to review his life; that is too much a part of history. That history should be taught in every public American school and preached from every Christian pulpit. The story of Abraham Lincoln, citizen, President, liberator and martyr, should be in the heart of every American child.—Senator John M. Thurston.

And so they buried Lincoln? Strange and vain!

Has any creature thought of Lincoln hid
In any vault, 'neath any coffin-lid,

In all the years since that wild spring of pain?

'Tis false—he never in the grave hath lain.
You could not bury him altho' you slid
Upon his clay the Cheops pyramid
Or heaped it with the Rocky mountain chain. —James T. Mackay.

The shepherd of the people! that old name that the best rulers ever craved. What ruler ever won it like this dead President of ours? He fed us faithfully and truly. He fed us with counsel when we were in doubt, with inspiration when we sometimes faltered, with caution when we would be rash, with calm, clear, trustful cheerfulness through many an hour, when our hearts were dark. He fed hungry souls all over the country with sympathy and consolation. He spread before the whole land feasts of great duty and devotion and patriotism, on which the land grew strong. He fed us with solemn, solid truths. He taught us the sacredness of government, the wickedness of treason. He made our souls glad and vigorous with the love of liberty that was in his. He showed us how to love truth and yet be charitable—how to hate wrong and all oppression, and yet not treasure one personal injury or insult. He fed all his people, from the highest to the lowest, from the most privileged down to the most enslaved. Best of all, he fed us with a reverent and genuine religion. He spread before us the love and fear of God just in that shape in which we need them most, and out of his faithful service of a higher Master, who of us has not taken and eaten and grown strong? "He fed them with a faithful and true heart." Yes, till the last. For at the last, behold him standing with hand reached out to feed the South with mercy, and the North with charity, and the whole land with peace, when the Lord who had sent him called him, and his work was done!—Phillips Brooks.

Linguist

This is your devoted friend, sir, the manifold linguist.—Shakespeare.

Small Latin, and less Greek.—Ben Jonson.

Lashed into Latin by the tingling rod.—Gay.

He Greek and Latin speaks with greater ease
Than hogs eat acorns, and tame pigeons peas. —Cranfield.

Away with him, away with him! he speaks Latin.—Shakespeare.

Speaks three or four languages word for word without a book.—Shakespeare.

Lion

A lion among ladies is a most dreadful thing; for there is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your lion living.—Shakespeare.

Poor conquer'd lion—from that haughty glance Still speaks the courage unsubdued by time,
And in the grandeur of thy sullen tread
Lives the proud spirit of thy burning clime. —O. W. Holmes.

The lion is beyond dispute
Allow'd the most majestic brute;
His valor and his generous mind
Prove him superior of his kind.
—Gay.

A lioness with udders all drawn dry,
Lay couching, head on ground, with cat-
like watch,
When that the sleeping man should stir;
for 'tis
The royal disposition of that beast
To prey on nothing that doth seem as dead.
—Shakespeare.

Lips

Her lips blush deeper sweets.—Thomson.

There is life in the lips of true lovers.—G. Owain.

Her lips are roses over-washed with dew.—Greene.

He kissed me hard, as though he'd pluck up kisses by the roots that grew upon my lips.—Shakespeare.

Lips in whose rosy labyrinth, when she smiled, the soul was lost.—Moore.

The lips of a fool swallow up himself.—Bible.

Her lips, whose kisses pout to leave their nest.—Byron.

Heart on her lip and soul within her eye.—Byron.

A lip like Persuasion's, calling on us to kiss it.—Anacreon.

O, how ripe in show
Thy lips, those kissing cherries, tempting grow.
—Shakespeare.

Lips moulded in love are tremulously full of the glowing softness they borrow from the heart, and electrically obedient to its impulse.—Grace Greenwood.

Her lips, though they were kept close with modest silence, yet, with a pretty kind of natural swelling, seemed to invite the guests that looked on them.—Sir P. Sidney.

Listening

It takes a great man to make a good listener.—Sir Arthur Helps.

Take care what you say before a wall, as you cannot tell who may be behind it.—Saadi.

Nature has given to men one tongue, but two ears, that we may hear from others twice as much as we speak.—Epictetus.

And this cuff was but to knock at your ear, and beseech listening.—Shakespeare.

He ceas'd; but left so pleasing on their ear
His voice, that list'n'ing still they seem'd to hear.
—Homer.

Were we as eloquent as angels, yet should we please some men and some women much more by listening than by talking.—Colton.

"Take heed how ye hear" is a genuine monition touching happy relations—a real injunction under the law of love. Let us not think it applies only to the way we hear sermons. How do you listen to the conversation of your friends? With half-parted lips ready to break in with your own opinions? With the wandering eye of one evidently uninterested? Is this the love that helps another to be his best? Do you like to be well listened to? Mind, then, the give and take of love, and be a good listener, and for truth's sake as well as love's.—Maltie Babcock.

Literature

Literature is the immortality of speech.—Willmott.

Literature is the fruit of thinking souls.—Carlyle.

Literature is the expression of society.—Charles Nodier.

The classic literature is always modern.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Literature is the garden of wisdom.—James Ellis.

Republic of letters.—Henry Fielding.

Literature is a great staff, but a sorry crutch.—Sir Walter Scott.

It is the life in literature that acts upon life.—J. G. Holland.

No literature is complete until the language in which it is written is dead.—Longfellow.

A nation's literature is always the biography of its humanity.—Robert, Lord Lytton.

It is the glorious doom of literature that the evil perishes and the good remains.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Literature is the daughter of heaven, who has descended upon earth to soften and charm all human ills.—Bernardin St. Pierre.

Literature, taken in all its bearings, forms the grand line of demarcation between the human and the animal kingdoms.—William Godwin.

National literature begins with fables and ends with novels.—Joubert.

Literature, like nobility, runs in the blood.—Hazlitt.

The great standard of literature as to purity and exactness of style is the Bible.—Blair.

Literature is so common a luxury that the age has grown fastidious.—Tuckerman.

Literary history is the great morgue where all seek the dead ones whom they love, or to whom they are related.—Heine.

Experience enables me to depose to the comfort and blessing that literature can prove in seasons of sickness and sorrow.—Hood.

If I might control the literature of the household, I would guarantee the well-being of Church and State.—Bacon.

Literature is an avenue to glory, ever open for those ingenious men who are deprived of honors or of wealth.—Disraeli.

Women excel more in literary judgment than in literary production;—they are better critics than authors.—Lady Blessington.

The writings of women are always cold and pretty like themselves. There is as much wit as you may desire, but never any soul.—Rousseau.

Literature becomes free institutions. It is the graceful ornament of civil liberty, and a happy restraint on the asperities which political controversies sometimes occasion.—Daniel Webster.

The decline of literature indicates the decline of the nation. The two keep pace in their downward tendency.—Goethe.

Literature is a fragment of a fragment. Of all that ever happened, or has been said, but a fraction has been written; and of this but little is extant.—Goethe.

The history of literature is the history of the human mind. It is, as compared with other histories, the intellectual as distinguished from the material, the informing spirit as compared with the outward and visible.—William H. Prescott.

The riches of scholarship, the benignities of literature, defy fortune and outlive calamity. They are beyond the reach of thief or moth or rust. As they cannot be inherited, so they cannot be alienated.—Lowell.

In the modern languages there was not, six hundred years ago, a single volume which is now read. The library of our profound scholar must have consisted entirely of Latin books.—Macaulay.

Whatever the skill of any country be in sciences, it is from excellence in polite learning alone that it must expect a character from posterity.—Goldsmith.

A beautiful literature springs from the depth and fulness of intellectual and moral life, from an energy of thought and feeling, to which nothing, as we believe, ministers so largely as enlightened religion.—Channing.

Writing is not literature unless it gives to the reader a pleasure which arises not only from the things said, but from the way in which they are said; and that pleasure is only given when the words are carefully or curiously or beautifully put together into sentences.—Stopford Brooke.

From the hour of the invention of printing, books, and not kings, were to rule the world. Weapons forged in the mind, keen-edged, and brighter than a sunbeam, were to supplant the sword and battle-axe.—Whipple.

Literature has her quacks no less than medicine, and they are divided into two classes; those who have erudition without genius, and those who have volubility without depth; we shall get second-hand sense from the one, and original nonsense from the other.—Colton.

Literature, properly so called, draws its sap from the deep soil of human nature's common and everlasting sympathies, the gathered leaf-mould of countless generations, and not from any top dressing capriciously scattered over the surface.—Lowell.

The selection of a subject is to the author what choice of position is to the general,—once skilfully determined, the battle is already half won. Of a few writers it may be said that they are popular in despite of their subjects—but of a great many more it may be observed that they are popular because of them.—Bovee.

Other relaxations are peculiar to certain times, places and stages of life, but the study of letters is the nourishment of our youth, and the joy of our old age. They throw an additional splendor on prosperity, and are the resource and consolation of adversity; they delight at home, and are no embarrassment abroad; in short, they are company to us at night, our fellow-travellers on a journey, and attendants in our rural recesses.—Cicero.

There is first the literature of knowledge, and secondly, the literature of power. The function of the first is—to teach; the function of the second is—to move; the first is a rudder, the second an oar or a sail. The first speaks to the mere discursive understanding; the second speaks ultimately, it may happen, to the higher understanding or reason, but always through affections of pleasure and sympathy.—Thomas De Quincey.

Logic

Logic is the armory of reason.—Thomas Fuller.

Logic works; metaphysic contemplates.—Joubert.

Logic is the art of convincing us of some truth.—Bruyère.

Logic helps us to strip off the outward disguise of things, and to behold and judge of them in their own nature.—Dr. Watts.

Logic is to grammar what the sense of words is to their sound.—Joubert.

Logic differeth from rhetoric as the fist from the palm; the one close, the other at large.—Bacon.

Talk logic with acquaintances, and practise rhetoric in your common talk.—Shakespeare.

Grammar is the logic of speech, even as logic is the grammar of reason.—Trench.

If a man can play the true logician, and have judgment as well as invention, he may do great matters.—Bacon.

Logic and metaphysics make use of more tools than all the rest of the sciences put together, and do the least work.—Colton.

The knowledge of the theory of logic has no tendency whatever to make men good reasoners.—Macaulay.

Logic is the essence of truth, and truth is the most powerful tyrant; but tyrants hate the truth.—Kozlay.

For me, who only desire to become wise, not more learned or eloquent, these logical or Aristotelian dispositions of parts are of no use.—Montaigne.

Logic is the art of thinking well: the mind, like the body, requires to be trained before it can use its powers in the most advantageous way.—Lord Kames.

He was in logic a great critic,
Profoundly skill'd in analytic;
He could distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and south-west side.
—Butler.

It was a saying of the ancients, "Truth lies in a well;" and to carry on this metaphor, we may justly say that logic does supply us with steps, whereby we may go down to reach the water.—Dr. I. Watts.

Men are apt to mistake the strength of their feeling for the strength of their argument. The heated mind represents the chill touch and relentless scrutiny of logic.—Gladstone.

Logic is the science of the laws of thought, as thought,—that is of the necessary conditions to which thought considered in itself is a subject.—Sir W. Hamilton.

London

London! the needy villain's general home,
The common-sewer of Paris and of Rome!
With eager thirst, by folly or by fate,
Sucks in the dregs of each corrupted state.
—Dr. Johnson.

Here malice, rapine, accident, conspire,
And now a rabble rages, now a fire;
Their ambush here relentless ruffians lay
And here the fell attorney prowls for prey;
Here falling houses thunder on your head,
And here a female atheist talks you dead.
—Dr. Johnson.

A mighty mass of brick, and smoke, and shipping,

Dirty and dusty, but as wide as eye
Could reach, with here and there a sail just skipping

In sight, then lost amidst the forestry
Of masts; a wilderness of steeples peeping
On tiptoe through their sea-coal canopy,
A huge, dun cupola, like a foolscap crown
On a fool's head—and there is London
Town. —Byron.

Loquacity

Who think too little, and who talk too much.—Dryden.

No fool can be silent at a feast.—Solon.

Foxes are all tail, and women all tongue.—La Fontaine.

The tongue of a fool is the key of his counsel, which, in a wise man, wisdom hath in keeping.—Socrates.

He draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.—Shakespeare.

Many a man's tongue shakes out his master's undoing.—Shakespeare.

The language of women should be luminous, but not voluminous.—Douglas Jerrold.

Those who have few affairs to attend to are great speakers. The less men think, the more they talk.—Montesquieu.

Woman's tongue is her weapon, her sword, which she never permits to rest or rust.—Mme. Necker.

You shall never take her without her answer, unless you take her without her tongue.—Shakespeare.

Common fluency of speech in many men and most women is owing to the scarcity of matter.—Swift.

Speaking much is a sign of vanity, for he that is lavish in words is a niggard in deed.—Sir W. Raleigh.

But still his tongue ran on, the less
Of weight it bore, with greater ease;
And with its everlasting clack,
Set all men's ears upon the rack.

—Butler.

Women speak at an earlier age, more easily, and more agreeably than men; they are accused also of speaking more: this is as it should be, and I willingly change the reproach into a eulogy.—Rousseau.

Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in Venice: but his reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you seek all day ere you find them; and when you have them, they are not worth the search.—Shakespeare.

I know a lady that loves to talk so incessantly, she won't give an echo fair play; she has that everlasting rotation of tongue that an echo must wait till she dies before it can catch her last words!—Congreve.

O! he's as tedious
As is a tired horse, a railing wife;
Worse than a smoky house;—I had rather

live
With cheese and garlic, in a windmill, far,
Than feed on cates, and have him talk to me
In any summer house in Christendom.
—Shakespeare.

Surely in much talk there cannot choose but be much vanity. Loquacity is the fistula of the mind,—ever running and almost incurable, let every man, therefore, be a Phocion or Pythagorean, to speak briefly to the point or not at all: let him labor like them of Crete, to show more wit in his discourse than words, and not to pour out of his mouth a flood of the one, when he can hardly wring out of his brains a drop of the other.—Spencer.

Loss

No man can lose what he never had.
—Izaak Walton.

Wise men ne'er sit and wail their loss,
But cheerly seek how to redress their harms.
—Shakespeare.

That puts it not unto the touch
To win or lose it all. —Napier.

What's saved affords
No indication of what's lost.
—Lord Lytton.

When wealth is lost, nothing is lost;
When health is lost, something is lost;
When character is lost, all is lost!

Like the dew on the mountain,
Like the foam on the river,
Like the bubble on the fountain,
Thou art gone, and forever!
—Scott.

It is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all.—Tennyson.

We have lost morals, justice, honor, piety and faith, and that sense of shame which, once lost, can never be restored.—Seneca.

A wise man loses nothing, if he but save himself.—Montaigne.

Love

To love is everything; love is God.—
Léon Gozlan.

Love me little, love me long.—Marlowe.

All mankind love a lover.—Emerson.

The religion of humanity is love.—
Mazzini.

Mutual love, the crown of all our bliss.—Milton.

Who can deceive a lover?—Virgil.

Love is the fulfilling of the law.—
Bible.

The law of heaven is love.—Hosea
Ballou.

The truth of truths is love.—Bailey.

O love, the beautiful and brief!—
Schiller.

Paradise is always where love
dwells.—Richter.

Sweet is true love, though given in vain.—Tennyson.

Love is the virtue of woman.—
Mme. Dudevant.

Love understands love: it needs no talk.—F. R. Havergal.

Love makes fools of us all, big and little.—Thackeray.

It is an old story, yet remains ever new.—Heinrich Heine.

Love will find out the way.—Percy's Reliques.

Love can hope, where reason would despair.—Lyttelton.

Soon or late love is his own avenger.—Byron.

In love we are all fools alike.—Gay.

He loves but lightly who his love can tell.—Petrarch.

Wish chastely, and love dearly.—
Shakespeare.

At love's perjuries they say Jove laughs.—Shakespeare.

Heaven's harmony is universal love.
—Cowper.

Imparadis'd in one another's arms.
—Milton.

The sweetest joy, the wildest woe is love.—Bailey.

Love sought is good, but given up sought is better.—Shakespeare.

Love is an affair of credulity.—
Ovid.

Love is the wine of existence.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

Love is ownership.—Henry Ward
Beecher.

Is not every true lover a martyr?—
Hare.

Love can sun the realms of night.
—Schiller.

Love is an egotism of two.—Antoine de Salle.

Scorn, at first, makes after-love the more.—Shakespeare.

Love reflects the thing beloved.—
Tennyson.

Love can make us fiends as well as angels.—Charles Kingsley.

The first sigh of love is the last of wisdom.—Antoine Bret.

Excessive love in loathing ever ends.
—Ovid.

Love has made its best interpreter a sigh.—Byron.

Opposition to a man in love is like oil to fire.—Ouida.

Love must be as much a light as a flame.—Henry D. Thoreau.

None but the brave and beautiful can love.—Bailey.

In love, anger is always false.—
Publius Syrus.

An oyster may be crossed in love.—
Sheridan.

That you may be beloved, be amiable.—Ovid.

True love is better than glory.—
Thackeray.

Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.—David, King of Israel, lamenting Jonathan.

The only victory over love is flight
—Napoleon.

O heart, love is thy bane and thy antidote.—Madame Dudevant.

He whom love guards, is well guarded.—Voltaire.

Words of love are works of love.—
W. R. Alger.

Love will not be spurred to what it loathes.—Shakespeare.

Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turned.—Congreve.

She that is loved is safe.—Jeremy Taylor.

All true love is grounded on esteem.
—Buckingham.

Life is less than nothing without love.—Bailey.

Love has a tide.—Helen Hunt.

'Tis what I love determines how I love.—George Eliot.

Could I love less, I should be happier
now.—Bailey.

For faults are beauties in a lover's eyes.—Theocritus.

The soul of woman lives in love.—
Mrs. Sigourney.

One always returns to his first love.
—St. Just.

Love is a thing full of anxious fears.
—Ovid.

Love is more just than justice.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

None ever loved, but at first sight
they loved.—George Chapman.

The greatest miracle of love is to eradicate flirtation.—La Rochefou-
cauld.

In men desire begets love, and in women love begets desire.—Swift.

Love gives itself, but is not bought.
—Longfellow.

Our first and last love is—self-love.
—Bovee.

If you wish to be loved, love.—Seneca.

True love is the ripe fruit of a lifetime.—Lamartine.

Love lieth deep; love dwells not in lip-depths.—Tennyson.

Love reckons hours for months, and days for years; and every little absence is an age.—Dryden.

Why is it so difficult to love wisely, so easy to love too well?—Miss M. E. Braddon.

A youth's love is the more passionate; virgin love is the more idolatrous.
—Hare.

There is nothing half so sweet in life as love's young dream.—Moore.

Our very wretchedness grows dear to us when suffering for one we love.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is in the heart of woman such a deep well of love that no age can freeze it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

As love without esteem is volatile and capricious, esteem without love is languid and cold.—Johnson.

I have heard that whoever loves is in no condition old.—Emerson.

Though love use reason for its precision, he admits him not for his councillor.—Shakespeare.

The worst thing an old man can be is a lover.—Otway.

Love with men is not a sentiment, but an idea.—Madame de Girardin.

The moods of love are, like the wind; and none knows whence or why they rise.—Patmore.

No disguise can long conceal love where it is, nor feign it where it is not.—Rochefoucauld.

Love, one time, layeth burdens; another time, giveth wings.—Sir P. Sidney.

To reveal its complacency by gifts is one of the native dialects of love.—Mrs. Sigourney.

O love, when thou gettest dominion over us, we may bid good-by to prudence.—La Fontaine.

Friendship often ends in love; but love in friendship—never.—Colton.

If fun is good, truth is still better, and love best of all.—Thackeray.

It is not decided that women love more than men, but is indisputable that they love better.—Sanial-Dubay.

Successful love takes a load off our hearts, and puts it upon our shoulders.—Bovee.

Love is precisely to the moral nature what the sun is to the earth.—Balzac.

Man loves little and often, woman much and rarely.—Basta.

O, how this spring of love resembleth the uncertain glory of an April day!—Shakespeare.

Honest men love women; those who deceive them adore them.—Beaumarchais.

In her first passion, woman loves her lover; in all the others, all she loves is love.—Byron.

Love dies by satiety, and forgetfulness inters it.—Du Cœur.

Love is a smoke raised with the fume of sighs.—Shakespeare.

It is better to desire than to enjoy, to love than to be loved.—Hazlitt.

Love, which is only an episode in the life of man, is the entire history of woman's life.—Madame de Staël.

There are several remedies which will cure love, but there are no infallible ones.—Rochefoucauld.

It is more common to see an extreme love than a perfect friendship.—Du Cœur.

There are few people who are not ashamed of their amours when the fit is over.—Rochefoucauld.

One-half, the finest half, of life is hidden from the man who does not love with passion.—Henri Beyle.

The beings who appear cold, but are only timid, adore where they dare to love.—Madame Swetchine.

Love that has nothing but beauty to keep it in good health is short-lived.—Erasmus.

The pleasure of love is in loving. We are happier in the passion we feel than in that we inspire.—La Rochefoucauld.

The fountain of love is the rose and the lily, the sun and the dove.—Heinrich Heine.

What a miserable world!—trouble if we love, and trouble if we do not love.—Count de Maistre.

To love for the sake of being loved is human, but to love for the sake of loving is angelic.—Lamartine.

Love is a familiar. Love is a devil. There is no evil angel but love.—Shakespeare.

The most precious possession that ever comes to a man in this world is a woman's heart.—J. G. Holland.

Riches take wings, comforts vanish, hope withers away, but love stays with us. Love is God.—Lew Wallace.

No cord or cable can draw so forcibly, or bind so fast, as love can do with only a single thread.—Burton.

Love is the beginning, the middle, and the end of everything.—Lacordaire.

A flower cannot blossom without sunshine, and a man cannot live without love.—George P. Upton.

We never love heartily but once, and that is the first time we love.—La Bruyère.

We never can willingly offend where we sincerely love.—Rowland Hill.

Only those who love with the heart can animate the love of others.—Abel Stevens.

Let those love now who never loved before, Let those that always loved now love the more. —Parnell.

Love without faith is as bad as faith without love.—Beecher.

Love is a child that talks in broken language, Yet then he speaks most plain. —Dryden.

The happiness of love is in action; its test is what one is willing to do for others.—Lew Wallace.

Love's like the measles—all the worse when it comes late in life.—Jerrold.

It is a wonderful subduer—this love, this hunger of the heart.—George Eliot.

Love hath never known a law beyond its own sweet will.—Whittier.

Of the book of books most wondrous is the tender book of love.—Goethe.

He who determines to love only those who are faultless will soon find himself alone.—Vihishti.

Ah! the spendthrift, love: it gives all and everything with the first sigh! —Madame de Genlis.

Compulsion hardly restores right; love yields all things.—Jane Porter.

What woman says to her fond lover should be written in air or the swift water.—Catullus.

Love keeps the cold out better than a cloak. It serves for food and raiment. —Longfellow.

The roots of the deepest love die in the heart, if not tenderly cherished.—Herder.

Love is a reality which is born in the fairy region of romance.—Talleyrand.

In love as in war, a fortress that parleys is half taken.—Marguerite de Valois.

A heart once poisoned by suspicion has no longer room for love.—Kotzebue.

The darts of love are blunted by maiden modesty.—Cervantes.

Love and desire are the spirit's wings to great deeds.—Goethe.

It is one of heaven's best gifts to hold such a dear creature in one's arms.—Goethe.

To enlarge or illustrate this power of the effects of love is to set a candle in the sun.—Robert Burton.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend.—Bible.

There is no more delightful hour in life than that of an unconfessed but mutual love.—E. Lynn Linto

Love is the business of the idle, but the idleness of the busy.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Love is the medicine of all moral evil. By it the world is to be cured of sin.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Who never loved ne'er suffered, he feels nothing,
Who nothing feels but for himself alone.
—Young.

I could not love thee, dear, so much, loved I not honor more.—Lovelace.

Love never dies of starvation, but often of indigestion.—Ninon de Lenclos.

It is not true that love makes all things easy; it makes us choose what is difficult.—George Eliot.

Love is the life of the soul. It is the harmony of the universe.—William Ellery Channing.

Love is the road to God; for love, endless love, is Himself.—Sonnenberg.

Love lives on, and bath a power to bless when they who loved are hidden in the grave.—Lowell.

Where confidence is wanting, the most beautiful flower in the garland of love is missing.—Goethe.

There is nothing holier in this life of ours than the first consciousness of love, the first fluttering of its silken wings.—Longfellow.

Men and women existed before creeds; love is the only religion.—Mrs. Campbell Praed.

Love is the only possession which we can carry with us beyond the grave.—Madame Necker.

To love is to believe, to hope, to know;
'Tis an essay, a taste of heaven below!
—Edmund Waller.

Love is the emblem of eternity; it confounds all notion of time; effaces all memory of a beginning, all fear of an end.—Madame de Staël.

Nothing more excites to everything noble and generous than virtuous love.
—Henry Home.

When words we want, love teacheth to indite;
And what we blush to speak, she bids us write.
—Herrick.

'Tis well to be off with the old love
Before you are on with the new.
—Maturin.

How silver-sweet sound lovers' tongues by night,
Like softest music to attending ears!
—Shakespeare.

Love's history, as Life's, is ended not
By marriage.—Bayard Taylor.

It is love that asks, that seeks, that knocks, that finds, and that is faithful to what it finds.—St. Augustine.

It is astonishing how little one feels poverty when one loves.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Love is old, old as eternity, but not outworn; with each new being born or to be born.—Byron.

Love is more pleasing than marriage, because romances are more amusing than history.—Chamfort.

Of all the paths leading to a woman's love, pity is the straightest.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The greatest tyranny is to love where we are not loved again.—Balzac.

Love is the master-key that opens every ward of the heart of man.—J. H. Evans.

Life is a sleep, love is a dream; and you have lived if you have loved.—Alfred de Musset.

The motto of chivalry is also the motto of wisdom; to serve all and love but one.—Balzac.

Love has no age, as it is always renewing itself.—Pascal.

Humble love, and not proud science, keeps the door of heaven.—Young.

It is the beautiful necessity of our nature to love something.—Douglas Jerrold.

The punishment of those who have loved women too much is to love them always.—Joubert.

If music be the food of love, play on;
Give me excess of it. —Shakespeare.

The great lever by which to raise and save the world is the unbounded love and mercy of God.—Beecher.

The true one of youth's love, proving a faithful helpmate in those years when the dream of life is over, and we live in its realities.—Southey.

Love requires not so much proofs, as expressions, of love. Love demands little else than the power to feel and to requite love.—Richter.

Her eyes, her lips, her cheeks, her shape, her features, seem to be drawn by love's own hand, by love himself in love.—Dryden.

For none can express thee, though all should approve thee.
I love thee so, dear, that I only can love thee. —E. B. Browning.

Love is but another name for that inscrutable presence by which the soul is connected with humanity.—Simms.

Love cannot endure indifference. It needs to be wanted. Like a lamp, it needs to be fed out of the oil of another's heart, or its flame burns low.—Henry Ward Beecher.

If thou wishest to put an end to love, attend to business (love yields to employment); then thou wilt be safe.—Ovid.

Two sentiments alone suffice for man, were he to live the age of the rocks—love, and the contemplation of the Deity.—Watts.

Love is sparingly soluble in the words of men, therefore they speak much of it; but one syllable of woman's speech can dissolve more of it than a man's heart can hold.—Holmes.

Pure love and suspicion cannot dwell together: at the door where the latter enters, the former makes its exit.—Alex. Dumas.

Sweet, good night!
This bud of love, by summer's ripening breath,
May prove a beauteous flower when next we meet. —Shakespeare.

The beginning and the end of love are both marked by embarrassment when the two find themselves alone.—La Bruyère.

Love is the occupation of the idle man, the amusement of a busy one, and the shipwreck of a sovereign.—Napoleon.

In love it is only the commencement that charms. I am not surprised that we find pleasure in frequently recommencing.—Prince de Ligne.

What is it that love does to a woman? Without it she only sleeps; with it, alone, she lives.—Ouida.

Women hope that the dead love may revive; but men know that of all dead things none are so past recall as a dead passion.—Ouida.

There are women who love their husbands as blindly, as enthusiastically, and as enigmatically as nuns their cloister.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Nothing is so fierce but love will soften; nothing so sharp-sighted in other matters but it will throw a mist before its eyes.—L'Estrange.

All these inconveniences are incidents to love: reproaches, jealousies, quarrels, reconcilements, war, and then peace.—Terence.

True love is humble, thereby is it known; Girded for service, seeking not its own; Vaunts not itself, but speaks in self-dispraise. —Abraham Coles.

In lover's quarrels, the party that loves most is always most willing to acknowledge the greater fault.—Scott.

Where there exists the most ardent and true love, it is often better to be united in death than separated in life.

—Valerius Maximus.

I say to you truly, the heart of him who loves is a paradise on earth; he has God in himself, for God is love.—Lamennais.

A woman is more considerate in affairs of love than a man; because love is more the study and business of her life.—Washington Irving.

Ask the child why it is born; ask the flower why it blossoms; ask the sun why it shines. I love you because I must love you.—George P. Upton.

If there is anything that keeps the mind open to angel visits, and repels the ministry of ill, it is human love.—N. P. Willis.

The more a man loves, the more he suffers. The sum of possible grief for each soul is in proportion to its degree of perfection.—Amiel.

The greatest happiness of life is the conviction that we are loved, loved for ourselves—say rather, loved in spite of ourselves.—Victor Hugo.

Love never reasons, but profusely gives; gives, like a thoughtless prodigal, its all, and trembles then lest it has done too little.—Hannah More.

Take away love, and not physical nature only, but the heart of the moral world, would be palsied.—Southey.

Love rules the court, the camp, the grove, And men below, and saints above; For love is heaven, and heaven is love.
—Scott.

Love and you shall be loved. All love is mathematically just, as much as the two sides of an algebraic equation.—Emerson.

My bounty is as boundless as the sea, my love as deep; the more I give to thee, the more I have, for both are infinite.—Shakespeare.

Divine love is a sacred flower, which in its early bud is happiness, and in its full bloom is heaven.—Hervey.

Those who have loved have little relish for friendship. The devotee of strong drink finds wine insipid.—Alex. Dumas.

A man is in no danger so long as he talks his love; but to write it is to impale himself on his own pot-hooks.—Jerrold.

When love once pleads admission to our hearts,
In spite of all the virtue we can boast,
The woman that deliberates is lost.
—Addison.

Art thou not dearer to my eyes than light?
Dost thou not circulate through all my veins?
Mingle with life, and form my very soul?
—Young.

All brave men love; for he only is brave who has affections to fight for, whether in the daily battle of life or in physical contests.—Hawthorne.

Beauty may be the object of liking—great qualities of admiration—good ones of esteem—but love only is the object of love.—Fielding.

The heart of a young woman in love is a golden sanctuary which often enshrines an idol of clay.—Paulin Limayrac.

In love we never think of moral qualities, and scarcely of intellectual ones. Temperament and manner alone, with beauty, excite love.—Hazlitt.

It is possible that a man can be so changed by love that one could not recognize him to be the same person.—Terence.

The heart needs not for its heaven much space, nor many stars therein, if only the star of love has arisen.—Richter.

God gives us love. Something to love He lends us; but when love is grown to ripeness, that on which it throve falls off, and love is left alone.—Tennyson.

Stimulate the heart to love and the mind to be early accurate, and all other virtues will rise of their own accord, and all vices will be thrown out.—Coleridge.

Love seizes on us suddenly, without giving warning, and our disposition or our weakness favors the surprise; one look, one glance, from the fair fixes and determines us.—Bruyère.

Love is full of unbecoming strains; all wanton as a child, skipping, and vain; formed by the eye, and therefore, like the eye, full of strange shapes, of habits, and of forms.—Shakespeare.

It is not love that steals the heart from love; it is the hard world and its perplexing cares, its petrifying selfishness, its pride, its low ambition, and its paltry aims.—Charlotte Bowles.

Love delights in paradoxes. Saddest when it has most reason to be gay, sighs are the signs of its deepest joy, and silence is the expression of its yearning tenderness.—Bovee.

Affection can withstand very severe storms of rigor, but not a long polar frost of downright indifference. Love will subsist on wonderfully little hope, but not altogether without it.—Walter Scott.

The life of a woman may be divided into three epochs; in the first she dreams of love, in the second she makes love, in the third she regrets it.—St. Prosper.

However dull a woman may be, she will understand all there is in love; however intelligent a man may be, he will never know but half of it.—Madame Fée.

Love is like a charming romance which is read with avidity, and often with such impatience that many pages are skipped to reach the dénouement sooner.—Sylvain Maréchal.

Love is of all stimulants the most powerful. It sharpens the wits like danger, and the memory like hatred; it spurs the will like ambition; it intoxicates like wine.—A. B. Edwards.

A man does not entreat for love. It is the irresistible impulse towards each other of two souls, a union in which there is neither conscious giving nor receiving.—Mrs. Campbell Praed.

The first symptom of true love in a young man is timidity, in a girl it is boldness. The two sexes have a tendency to approach, and each assumes the qualities of the other.—Victor Hugo.

If a man really loves a woman, of course he wouldn't marry her for the world, if he were not quite sure that he was the best person she could by any possibility marry.—Holmes.

Love is strong as death. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned.—Bible.

Love is merely a madness; and, I tell you, deserves as well a dark house and whip as madmen do; and the reason why they are not so punished and cured is that the lunacy is so ordinary that the whippers are in love too.—Shakespeare.

No sooner met but they looked, no sooner looked but they loved, no sooner loved but they sighed, no sooner sighed but they asked one another the reason no sooner knew the reason but they sought the remedy.—Shakespeare.

It's gude to be merry and wise,
It's gude to be honest and true,
And afore you're off wi' the auld love
It's best to be on wi' the new.
—Old Scotch Song.

I love thee, I love but thee,
With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold!
—Bayard Taylor.

A woman may live without a lover, but a lover once admitted, she never goes through life with only one. She is deserted, and cannot bear her anguish and solitude, and hence fills up the void with a second idol.—Bulwer.

To love one who loves you, to admire one who admires you,—in a word to be the idol of one's idol—is exceeding the limit of human joy; it is stealing fire from heaven, and deserves death.—Mme. de Girardin.

It is certain that there is no other passion which does produce such contrary effects in so great a degree. But this may be said for love, that if you strike it out of the soul, life would be insipid, and our being but half animated.—Addison.

Love is the purification of the heart from self; it strengthens and ennoble the character, gives higher motives and a nobler aim to every action of life, and makes both man and woman strong, noble, and courageous.—Miss Jewsbury.

The lover's pleasure, like that of the hunter, is in the chase, and the brightest beauty loses half its merit, as the flower its perfume, when the willing hand can reach it too easily. There must be doubt; there must be difficulty and danger.—Walter Scott.

If thou neglectest thy love to thy neighbor, in vain thou professest thy love to God; for by thy love to God the love to thy neighbor is begotten, and by the love to thy neighbor, thy love to God is nourished.—Quarles.

What a man pays for bread and butter is worth its market value, and no more. What he pays for love's sake is gold indeed, which has a lure for angels' eyes, and rings well upon God's touchstone.—Lowell.

The consciousness of being loved softens the keenest pang even at the moment of parting; yea, even the eternal farewell is robbed of half of its bitterness when uttered in accents that breathe love to the last sigh.—Addison.

The accepted and betrothed lover has lost the wildest charms of his maiden in her acceptance of him. She was heaven whilst he pursued her as a star,—she cannot be heaven if she stoops to such a one as he.—Emerson.

Love is the crowning grace of humanity, the holiest right of the soul, the golden link which binds us to duty and truth, the redeeming principle that chiefly reconciles the heart to life, and is prophetic of eternal good.—Petrarch.

Love is a smoke made with the fume of sighs;
Being purg'd, a fire sparkling in lovers' eyes;
Being vex'd, a sea nourished with loving tears;
What is it else? A madness most discreet,
A choking gall, and a preserving sweet.
—Shakespeare.

Days are like years in the love of the young, when no bar, no obstacle, is between their hearts,—when the sun shines, and the course runs smooth—when their love is prosperous and confessed.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Love is a flame which burns in heaven and whose soft reflections radiate to us. Two worlds are opened, two lives given to it. It is by love that we double our being; it is by love that we approach God.—Aimé-Martin.

Nothing but real love—(how rare it is; has one human heart in a million ever known it?)—nothing but real love can repay us for the loss of freedom—the cares and fears of poverty—the cold pity of the world that we both despise and respect.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There are no little events with the heart. It magnifies everything; it places in the same scales the fall of an empire of fourteen years and the dropping of a woman's glove, and almost always the glove weighs more than the empire.—Balzac.

Love is represented as the fulfilling of the law,—a creature's perfection. All other graces, all divine dispensations, contribute to this, and are lost in it as in a heaven. It expels the dross of our nature; it overcomes sorrow; it is the full joy of our Lord.—Hooker.

A heat full of coldness, a sweet full of bitterness, a pain full of pleasantness, which maketh thoughts have eyes, and hearts, and ears; bred by desire, nursed by delight, weaned by jealousy, killed by dissembling, buried by ingratitude; and this is love.—Lyly.

Of all the agonies in life, that which is most poignant and harrowing; that which for the time annihilates reason, and leaves our whole organization one lacerated, mangled heart, is the conviction that we have been deceived where we placed all the trust of love. —Bulwer-Lytton.

The platform or the altar of love may be analyzed and explained; it is constructed of virtue, beauty, and affection. Such is the pyre, such is the offering; but the ethereal spark must come from heaven, that lights the sacrifice. —Jane Porter.

Love may be likened to a disease in this respect, that when it is denied a vent in one part, it will certainly break out in another; hence what a woman's lips often conceal, her eyes, her blushes, and many little involuntary actions betray. —Fielding.

The cure for all the ills and wrongs, the cares, the sorrows, and the crimes of humanity, all lie in that one word "love." It is the divine vitality that everywhere produces and restores life. To each and every one of us, it gives the power of working miracles if we will. —Mrs. L. M. Child.

She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek; she pined in thought,
And, with a green and yellow melancholy,
She sat, like patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief. Was not this love indeed?
—Shakespeare.

And let th' aspiring Youth beware of Love,
Of the smooth glance beware; for 'tis too late,
When on his heart the torrent-softness pours,
Then Wisdom prostrate lies, and fading Fame
Dissolves in air away. —Thomson.

Love is indeed heaven upon earth; since heaven above would not be heaven without it; for where there is not love, there is fear; but, "Perfect love casteth out fear." And yet we naturally fear most to offend what we most love. —William Penn.

Love, it has been said, flows downward. The love of parents for their children has always been far more powerful than that of children for their parents; and who among the sons of men ever loved God with a thousandth part of the love which God has manifested to us? —Hare.

No man, or woman, was ever cured of love by discovering the falseness of his or her lover. The living together for three long, rainy days in the country has done more to dispel love than all the perfidies in love that have ever been committed. —Helps.

That was the first sound in the song of love!
Scarce more than silence is, and yet a sound.
Hands of invisible spirits touch the strings
Of that mysterious instrument, the soul,
And play the prelude of our fate. We hear
The voice prophetic, and are not alone.
—Longfellow.

Love why do we one passion call,
When 'tis a compound of them all?
Where hot and cold, where sharp and sweet,
In all their equipages meet;
Where pleasures mix'd with pains appear,
Sorrow with joy, and hope with fear.
—Swift.

Providence has so ordained it, that only two women have a true interest in the happiness of a man—his own mother, and the mother of his children. Besides these two legitimate kinds of love, there is nothing between the two creatures except vain excitement, painful and vain delusion. —Octave Feuillet.

How many times do I love, again?
Tell me how many beads there are
In a silver chain
Of evening rain
Unravell'd from the trembling main
And threading the eye of a yellow star:—
So many times do I love again.
—Thos. Lovell Beddoes.

For several virtues
Have I lik'd several women; never any
With so full soul, but some defect in her
Did quarrel with the noblest grace she owed,
And put it to the foil: but you, O you,
So perfect, and so peerless, are created
Of every creature's best!
—Shakespeare.

A man may be a miser of his wealth; he may tie up his talent in a napkin; he may hug himself in his reputation;

but he is always generous in his love. Love cannot stay at home; a man cannot keep it to himself. Like light it is constantly traveling. A man must spend it, must give it away.—Rev. Dr. Macleod.

If a man loves a woman for her beauty, does he love her? No; for the smallpox, which destroys her beauty without killing her, causes his love to cease. And if any one loves me for my judgment or my memory, does he really love me? No; for I can lose these qualities without ceasing to be.—Pascal.

A supreme love, a motive that gives a sublime rhythm to a woman's life, and exalts habit into partnership with the soul's highest needs, is not to be had where and how she wills; to know that high initiation, she must often tread where it is hard to tread, and feel the chill air, and watch through darkness.—George Eliot.

For this is Love's nobility,—
Not to scatter bread and gold,
Goods and raiment bought and sold;
But to hold fast his simple sense,
And speak the speech of innocence,
For he that feeds men serveth few;
He serves all who dares be true.
—Emerson.

It is difficult to know at what moment love begins; it is less difficult to know it has begun. A thousand heralds proclaim it to the listening air, a thousand messengers betray it to the eye. Tone, act, attitude and look, the signals upon the countenance, the electric telegraph of touch—all these betray the yielding citadel before the word itself is uttered, which, like the key surrendered, opens every avenue and gate of entrance, and renders retreat impossible.—Longfellow.

Of the systems above us, angelic and seraphic, we know little; but we see one law, simple, efficient, and comprehensive as that of gravitation,—the law of love,—extending its sway over the whole of God's dominions, living where He lives, embracing every moral movement in its universal authority, and producing the same harmony, where it is obeyed as we observe in the movements of nature.—Mark Hopkins.

When God formed the rose, He said, "Thou shalt flourish and spread thy perfume." When He commanded the sun to emerge from chacs, he added, "Thou shalt enlighten and warm the world." When He gave life to the lark, He enjoined upon it to soar and sing in the air. Finally, He created man and told him to love. And seeing the sun shine, perceiving the rose scattering its odors, hearing the lark warble in the air, how can man help loving?—Grün.

But thou, through good and evil, praise and blame,
Wilt not thou love me for myself alone?
Yes, thou wilt love me with exceeding love,
And I will tenfold all that love repay;
Still smiling, though the tender may reprove,
Still faithful, though the trusted may betray.
—Macaulay.

Love is an alchemist that can transmute poison into food—and a spaniel, that prefers even punishment from one hand to caresses from another. But it is in love, as in war, we are often more indebted for our success to the weakness of the defence than to the energy of the attack; for mere idleness has ruined more women than passion; vanity more than idleness, and credulity more than either.—Colton.

Love is all in fire, and yet is ever freezing;
Love is much in winning, yet is more in losing;
Love is ever sick, and yet is never dying;
Love is ever true, and yet is ever lying;
Love does dote in liking, and is mad in loathing;
Love indeed is anything, yet indeed is nothing.
—Thos. Middleton.

Must love be ever treated with profaneness as a mere illusion? or with coarseness as a mere impulse? or with fear as a mere disease? or with shame as a mere weakness? or with levity as a mere accident? whereas it is a great mystery and a great necessity, lying at the foundation of human existence, morality, and happiness,—mysterious, universal, inevitable as death.—Harriet Martineau.

The plainest man that can convince a woman that he is really in love with her has done more to make her in love with him than the handsomest man, if he can produce no such conviction. For the love of woman is a shoot, not a seed, and flourishes most vigorously only when ingrafted on that love which is rooted in the breast of another.—Colton.

Who can fear
Too many stars, though each in heaven shall toll—
Too many flowers, though each shall crown the year?
Say, thou dost love me, love me, love me—
toll
The silver iterance!—only minding, Dear,
To love me also in silence, with thy soul.
—E. B. Browning.

Do anything but love; or if thou lovest and art a woman, hide thy love from him whom thou dost worship; never let him know how dear he is; flit like a bird before him; lead him from tree to tree, from flower to flower; but be not won, or thou wilt, like that bird, when caught and caged, be left to pine neglected and perish in forgetfulness.—Miss L. E. Landon.

This is the great instrument and engine of nature, the bond and cement of society, the spring and spirit of the universe: Love is such an affection as cannot so properly be said to be in the soul, as the soul to be in that. It is the whole man wrapt up into one desire, all the powers, vigor, and faculties of the soul abridged into one inclination.—South.

She is coming, my own, my sweet;
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat,
Were it earth in an earthy bed;
My dust would hear her and beat,
Had I lain for a century dead;
Would start and tremble under her feet,
And blossom in purple and red.
—Tennyson.

Your love in a cottage is hungry,
Your vine is a nest for flies—
Your milkmaid shocks the Graces,
And simplicity talks of pies!
You lie down to your shady slumber
And wake with a bug in your ear,
And your damsel that walks in the morning
Is shod like a mountaineer.
—N. P. Willis.

Oh, how beautiful is love! Even thou that sneerest and laughest in cold indifference or scorn if others are near thee,—thou too must acknowledge its truth when thou art alone, and confess that a foolish world is prone to laugh in public at what in private it reveres as one of the highest impulses of our nature; namely, love.—Longfellow.

Love is the weapon which Omnipotence reserved to conquer rebel man when all the rest had failed. Reason he parries; fear he answers blow for blow; future interest he meets with present pleasure; but love, that sun against whose melting beams the winter cannot stand—that soft subliming slumber which wrestles down the giant, there is not one human being in a million, nor a thousand men in all earth's huge quintillion, whose clay heart is hardened against love.—Tupper.

Ask not of me, love, what is love?
Ask what is good of God above;
Ask of the great sun what is light;
Ask what is darkness of the night;
Ask sin of what may be forgiven;
Ask what is happiness of heaven;
Ask what is folly of the crowd;
Ask what is fashion of the shroud;
Ask what is sweetness of thy kiss;
Ask of thyself what beauty is. —Bailey.

We love a girl for very different things than understanding. We love her for her beauty, her youth, her mirth, her confidingness, her character, with its faults, caprices, and God knows what other inexpressible charms; but we do not love her understanding. Her mind we esteem (if it is brilliant), and it may greatly elevate her in our opinion; nay, more, it may enchain us when we already love. But her understanding is not that which awakens and inflames our passions.—Goethe.

There has fallen a splendid tear
From the passion-flower at the gate.
She is coming, my dove, my dear;
She is coming, my life, my fate;
The red rose cries, "She is near, she is near;"
And the white rose weeps, "She is late;"
The larkspur listens, "I hear; I hear;"
And the lily whispers, "I wait."
—Tennyson.

There can be no barrenness in full summer. The very sand will yield something. Rocks will have mosses, and every rift will have its wind-flower, and every crevice a leaf; while from the fertile soil will be reared a gorgeous troop of growths, that will carry their life in ten thousand forms, but all with praise to God. And so it is when the soul knows its summer. Love redeems its weakness, clothes its barrenness, enriches its poverty, and makes its very desert to bud and blossom as the rose.—Beecher.

Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
 'Tis woman's whole existence; man may range
 The court, the camp, church, vessel, and the mart,
 Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange;
 Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart;
 And few there are whom these cannot estrange;
 Men have all these resources, we but one—
 To love again, and be again undone.
 —Byron.

If I freely may discover
 What should please me in my lover,
 I would have her fair and witty,
 Savouring more of court than city;
 A little proud, but full of pity;
 Light and humorous in her toying,
 Oft building hopes, and soon destroying,
 Long, but sweet in the enjoying;
 Neither too easy nor to hard;
 All extremes I would have barr'd.
 —Ben. Jonson.

Love's arms were wreathed about the neck
 of Hope,
 And Hope kiss'd Love, and Love drew in her breath
 In that close kiss and drank her whisper'd tales.
 They say that Love would die when Hope was gone.
 And Love mourn'd long, and sorrow'd after
 Hope;
 At last she sought out Memory, and they trod
 The same old paths where Love had walked with Hope,
 And Memory fed the soul of Love with tears.
 —Tennyson.

Love is the river of life in this world. Think not that ye know it who stand at the little tinkling rill, the first small fountain. Not until you have gone through the rocky gorges, and not lost the stream; not until you have gone through the meadow, and the stream has widened and deepened until fleets could ride on its bosom; not until beyond the meadow you have come to the unfathomable ocean, and poured your treasures into its depths—not until then can you know what love is.—Henry Ward Beecher.

When a man is in love with one woman in a family, it is astonishing how fond he becomes of every person connected with it. He ingratiates himself with the maids; he is bland with the butler; he interests himself about the footman; he runs on errands for the daughters; he gives advice and lends money to the youngest son at college; he pats little dogs which he would kick otherwise; he smiles at old stories which would make him break out in yawns, were they uttered by any one but papa; he drinks sweet port wine, for which he would curse the steward and the whole committee of a club; he bears even with the cantankerous old maiden aunt; he beats time when darling little Fanny performs her piece on the piano; smiles when wicked, lively little Bobby upsets the coffee over his shirt.—Thackeray.

Love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover to remove;
 O no! it is an ever-fixed mark,
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wandering bark,
 Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
 Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
 Within his bending sickle's compass come;
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
 But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
 If this be error, and upon me proved;—
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.
 —Shakespeare.

Yes—it was love—if thoughts of tenderness, Tried in temptation, strengthen'd by distress,
 Unmov'd by absence, firm in every clime,
 And yet—oh move than all! untired by time,
 Which nor defeated hope, nor baffled wile,
 Could render sullen were she near to smile,
 Nor rage could fire, nor sickness fret to vent
 On her one murmur of his discontent;
 Which still would meet with joy, with calmness part,
 Lest that his look of grief should reach her
 heart;
 Which nought removed, nor menaced to remove—
 If there be love in mortals—this was love!
 —Byron.

Loveliness

There is certainly no beauty on earth which exceeds the natural loveliness of woman.—J. Petit-Senn.

A lovely lady, garmented in light.—
Shelley.

Few have borne unconsciously the spell of loveliness.—Whittier.

The perfection of outward loveliness is the soul shining through its crystalline covering.—Jane Porter.

'Tis not a lip or eye we beauty call, but the joint force and full result of all.—Pope.

Her gentle limbs did she undress, and lay down in her loveliness.—
Coleridge.

Loveliness needs not the foreign aid of ornament, but is, when unadorned, adorned the most.—Thomson.

A thing of beauty is a joy forever;
its loveliness increases! it will never pass into nothingness.—Keats.

Thus was beauty sent from heaven
—the lovely mistress of truth and good in this dark world.—Akenside.

A good woman is the loveliest flower that blooms under heaven; and we look with love and wonder upon its silent grace, its pure fragrance, its delicate bloom of beauty.—Thackeray.

A beautiful envelope for mortality, presenting a glittering and polished exterior, the appearance of which gives no certain indication of the real value of what is contained therein.—Mrs.
Balfour.

What makes woman lovely? Virtue, faith, and gentleness in suffering, an endurance through scorn or trial; then has it the stamp celestial, and is admitted to sisterhood with angels.—
John Brent.

Women are the poetry of the world in the same sense as the stars are the poetry of heaven. Clear, light-giving, harmonious, they are the terrestrial planets that rule the destinies of mankind.—Hargrave.

Lowliness

Lowliness is young ambition's ladder, whereto the climber upward turns his face; but when he once attains the upmost round, he then unto the ladder turns his back, looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees by which he did ascend.—Shakespeare.

Loyalty

When I forget my sovereign, may my God forget me.—Lord Thurlow.

Now let us sing, long live the king.
—Cowper.

The first great work (a task performed by few)
Is that yourself may to yourself be true.
—Wentworth Dillon.

With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right.
—Abraham Lincoln.

We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.—Thomas Jefferson.

Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.—Stephen Decatur.

Not that I loved Cæsar less, but that I loved Rome more.—Shakespeare.

We join ourselves to no party that does not carry the American flag, and keep step to the music of the Union.—
Rufus Choate.

To thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
—Shakespeare.

Master, go on, and I will follow thee,
To the last gasp, with truth and loyalty.
—Shakespeare.

Wake in our breast the living fires,
The holy faith that warmed our sires;
Thy hand hath made our Nation free;
To die for her is serving Thee.
—O. W. Holmes.

Loyalty to God is alone fundamental. Feelings, words, deeds, must be beads strung on the string of duty.
Let the world tell you in a hundred ways what your life is for. Say you ever and only, "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O my God." Out of that dutiful root grows the beautiful life, the life radically and radiantly true to God—the only life that can be lived in both worlds.—Maltbie Babcock.

Luck

Luck cannot change birth.—Horace.

A pound of pluck is worth a ton of luck.—James A. Garfield.

As good luck would have it.—Shakespeare.

Luck, mere luck, may make even madness wisdom.—Douglas Jerrold.

A lucky man is rarer than a white crow.—Juvenal.

A man never has good luck who has a bad wife.—Beecher.

When good luck knocks at the door, let him in and keep him there.—Cervantes.

Good luck lies in odd numbers * * * they say, there is divinity in odd numbers, either in nativity, chance, or death.—Shakespeare.

Good luck is the willing handmaid of upright, energetic character, and conscientious observance of duty.—Lowell.

Wheresoe'er thou move, good luck shall fling her old shoe after.—Tennyson.

Good luck befriend thee, Son; for at thy birth
The fairy ladies danced upon the hearth.
—Milton.

Some people are so fond of ill-luck that they run half way to meet it.—Douglas Jerrold.

The lucky have whole days which still they choose; the unlucky have but hours, and those they lose.—Dryden.

Pitch a lucky man into the Nile, says the Arabian proverb, and he will come up with a fish in his mouth!—Willis.

Things un hoped for happen oftener than things we desire.—Plautus.

Good and bad luck is but a synonyme, in the great majority of instances, for good and bad judgment.—Chatfield.

A good character, good habits, and iron industry are impregnable to the assaults of all the ill-luck that fools ever dreamed of.—Addison.

Virtue without success is a fair picture shown by an ill light; but lucky men are favorites of heaven; all own the chief, when fortune owns the cause.—Dryden.

There are no chances so unlucky from which clever people are not able to reap some advantage, and none so lucky that the foolish are not able to turn to their own disadvantage.—Rochefoucauld.

Hope nothing from luck; and the probability is that you will be so prepared, forewarned, and forearmed that all shallow observers will call you lucky.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A farmer travelling with his load
Picked up a horseshoe on the road,
And nailed it fast to his barn door,
That luck might down upon him pour,
That every blessing known in life
Might crown his homestead and his wife,
And never any kind of harm
Descend upon his growing farm.
—James T. Fields.

Luck is ever waiting for something to turn up. Labor, with keen eyes and strong will, will turn up something. Luck lies in bed, and wishes the postman would bring him the news of a legacy. Labor turns out at six o'clock, and with busy pen or ringing hammer lays the foundation of a competence. Luck whines. Labor whistles. Luck relies on chance. Labor on character.—Cobden.

Never have anything to do with an unlucky place, or an unlucky man. I have seen many clever men, very clever men, who had not shoes to their feet. I never act with them. Their advice sounds very well, but they cannot get on themselves: and if they cannot do good to themselves, how can they do good to me?—Rothschild.

Shallow men believe in luck, believe in circumstances: 'It was somebody's name, or he happened to be there at the time, or it was so then, and another day it would have been otherwise. Strong men believe in cause and effect. The mau was born to do it, and his father was born to be the father of him and of this deed, and, by looking narrowly, you shall see there was no luck in the matter, but it was all a problem in arithmetic, or an experiment in chemistry.—Emerson.

Lust

Light and lust are deadly enemies.—Shakespeare.

Lust—hard by hate.—Milton.

Nature is content with little; grace with less; but lust with nothing.—Matthew Henry.

The blood of youth burns not with such excess as gravity's revolt to wantonness.—Shakespeare.

Any enemy to whom you show kindness becomes your friend, excepting lust, the indulgence of which increases its enmity.—Saadi.

The flesh being proud, Desire doth fight with Grace,
For there it revels, and when that decays,
The guilty Rebel for remission prays.
—Shakespeare.

So long as lust (whether of the world or flesh) smells sweet in our nostrils, so long we are loathesome to God.—Colton.

Capricious, wanton, bold, and brutal Lust
Is meanly selfish; when resisted, cruel;
And, like the blast of Pestilential Winds,
Taints the sweet bloom of Nature's fairest forms.
—Milton.

Lust is a captivity of the reason and an enraging of the passions. It hinders business and distracts counsel. It sins against the body and weakens the soul.—Jeremy Taylor.

Lust is, of all the frailties of our nature, what most we ought to fear; the headstrong beast rushes along, impatient of the course; nor hears the rider's call, nor feels the rein.—Rowe.

I know the very difference that lies 'twixt hallowed love and base unholy lust; I know the one is as a golden spur, urging the spirit to all noble aims; the other but a foul and miry pit, o'erthrowing it in midst of its career.—Fannie Kemble Butler.

Virtue, as it never will be moved,
Though Lewdness court it in a shape of Heav'n;
So Lust, though to a radiant angel link'd,
Will sate itself in a celestial bed,
And prey on garbage.
—Shakespeare.

As pills that are outwardly fair, gilt, and rolled in sugar, but within are full of bitterness: even so lustful pleasure is no sooner hatched but repentance is at hand, ready to supplant her.—Daniel Cawdrey.

Lust is an enemy to the purse, a foe to the person, a canker to the mind, a corrosive to the conscience, a weakness of the wit, a besotter of the senses, and finally, a mortal bane to all the body.—Pliny.

Servile inclinations and gross love,
The guilty bent of vicious appetite;
At first a sin, a horror ev'n in bliss,
Deprave the senses and lay waste the man;
Passions irregular, and next a loathing,
Quickly succeed to dash the wild desire.
—Havard.

It is the grand battle of life, to teach lust the limits of divine law, to break it into the taste of the bread of heaven, and make it understand that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that cometh out of the mouth of God.—Rev. J. B. Brown.

But when lust,
By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
But most by lewd and lavish arts of sin,
Lets in defilement to the inward parts,
The soul grows clotted by contagion,
Imbodies and imbrutes, till she quite lose
The divine property of her first being.
—Milton.

Lust is a vice sooner condemned than banished; easily spoke against, but yet it will fawn as smoothly on our flesh as Circe on the Græcian travelers, when she detained them in the shape of beasts.—W. Mason.

Luxury

All luxury corrupts either the morals or the taste.—Joubert.

O luxury! thou curst by heaven's decree.—Goldsmith.

Avarice and luxury, those pests which have ever been the ruin of every great state.—Livy.

Fell luxury! more perilous to youth than storms or quicksands, poverty or chains.—Hannah More.

On the soft bed of luxury, most kingdoms have expired.—Young.

Luxury is a word of uncertain signification, and may be taken in a good as in a bad sense.—Hume.

Truly, one gets easier accustomed to a silken bed than to a sack of leaves.—Auerbach.

Sedition is bred in the lap of luxury and its chosen emissaries are the begared spendthrift and the impoverished libertine.—Bancroft.

Luxury possibly may contribute to give bread to the poor; but if there were no luxury there would be no poor.—Henry Home.

Luxury is an enticing pleasure, a bastard mirth, which hath honey in her mouth, gall in her heart, and a sting in her tail.—Quarles.

We see the pernicious effects of luxury in the ancient Romans, who immediately found themselves poor as soon as this vice got footing among them.—Addison.

Luxury makes a man so soft that it is hard to please him, and easy to trouble him; so that his pleasures at last become his burden. Luxury is a nice master, hard to be pleased.—Sir G. Mackenzie.

By luxury we condemn ourselves to greater torments than have yet been invented by anger or revenge, or inflicted by the greatest tyrants upon the worst of men.—Sir W. Temple.

Luxury, so far as it reaches the people, will do good to the race of people; it will strengthen and multiply them. Sir, no nation was ever hurt by luxury; for, as I said before, it can reach but a very few.—Johnson.

What will not luxury taste? Earth, sea, and air,
Are daily ransack'd for the bill of fare;
Blood stuff'd in skins is British Christians' food,
And France robs marshes of the croaking brood.
—Gay.

Sofas 'twas half a sin to sit upon,
So costly were they; carpets, every stitch
Of workmanship so rare, they make you wish
You could glide o'er them like a golden fish.
—Byron.

You cannot spend money in luxury without doing good to the poor. Nay, you do more good to them by spending it in luxury—you make them exert industry, whereas by giving it, you keep them idle.—Johnson.

Luxury, that alluring pest with fair forehead, which, yielding always to the will of the body, throws a deadening influence over the senses, and weakens the limbs more than the drugs of Circe's cup.—Claudian.

The more various our artificial necessities, the wider is our circle of pleasure; for all pleasure consists in obviating necessities as they rise; luxury, therefore, as it increases our wants, increases our capacity for happiness.—Goldsmith.

Garriek showed Dr. Johnson his fine house, gardens, statues, pictures, etc., at Hampton Court. "Ah! David, David," said the doctor, "these are the things which make a deathbed terrible."—John Bate.

Luxury and dissipation, soft and gentle as their approaches are, and silently as they throw their silken chains about the heart, enslave it more than the most active and turbulent vices.—Hannah More.

I know it is more agreeable to walk upon carpets than to lie upon dungeon floors, I know it is pleasant to have all the comforts and luxuries of civilization; but he who cares only for these things is worth no more than a butterfly, contented and thoughtless, upon a morning flower; and who ever thought of rearing a tombstone to a last summer's butterfly?—Beecher.

There, in her den, lay pompous luxury, Stretch'd out at length; no vice could boast such high

And genial victories as she had won; Of which proud trophies there at large were shown,

Besides small states and kingdoms ruined Those mighty monarchies that had o'er-spread

The spacious earth, and stretch'd their conquering arms

From pole to pole, by her ensnaring charms Were quite consum'd; there lay imperial Rome,

That vanquish'd all the world, by her o'er-come;

Fetter'd was th' old Assyrian lion there; The Grecian leopard, and the Persian bear; With others numberless, lamenting by, Examples of the power of luxury. —May.

Let us consider what we call vicious luxury. No gratification, however sensual, can of itself be esteemed vicious. A gratification is only vicious when it engrosses all a man's expense, and leaves no ability for such acts of duty and generosity as are required by his situation and fortune. The same care and toil that raise a dish of peas at Christmas would give bread to a whole family during six months.—Hume.

Lying

The truth in masquerade.—Byron.

Liars are verbal forgers.—Chatfield.

Past all shame, so past all truth.—Shakespeare.

Lies can destroy, but not create.—Tupper.

A good memory is needed once we have lied.—Corneille.

Lies exist only to be extinguished.—Carlyle.

It is not right or manly to lie even about Satan.—James A. Garfield.

None but cowards lie.—Murphy.

Lying's a certain mark of cowardice.—Southern.

Lying, like license, has its degrees.—George Sand.

Be sure no lie can ever reach old age.—Sophocles.

A liar is a bravo towards God and a coward towards men.—Bacon.

A lie that is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.—Tennyson.

He will lie, sir, with such volubility that you would think truth were a fool.—Shakespeare.

There are people who lie simply for the sake of lying.—Pascal.

Do the devils lie? No; for then even hell could not subsist.—Sir T. Browne.

Lord, Lord, how this world is given to lying!—Shakespeare.

A lie is the abandonment and, as it were, the annihilation of the dignity of man.—Kant.

A lie is like a vizard, that may cover the face indeed, but can never become it.—South.

He who has not a good memory should never take upon him the trade of lying.—Montaigne.

Liars are the cause of all the sins and crimes in the world.—Epictetus.

Sin has many tools, but a lie is the handle which fits them all.—Holmes.

A lie has no legs, and cannot stand; but it has wings, and can fly far and wide.—Warburton.

Lying is the strongest acknowledgment of the force of truth.—Hazlitt.

The most mischievous liars are those who keep sliding on the verge of truth.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Even a liar tells a hundred truths to one lie: he has to, to make the lie good for anything.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The gain of lying is nothing else but not to be trusted of any, nor to be believed when we say the truth.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The most intangible, and therefore the worst, kind of a lie is a half truth. This is the peculiar device of a "conscientious" detractor. — Washington Allston.

It is more from carelessness about truth, than from intentional lying, that there is so much falsehood in the world.—Johnson.

When thou art obliged to speak, be sure to speak the truth; for equivocation is half-way to lying, and lying is the whole way to hell.—William Penn.

They begin with making falsehood appear like truth, and end with making truth itself appear like falsehood.—Shenstone.

Although the devil be the father of lies, he seems, like other great inventors, to have lost much of his reputation by the continual improvements that have been made upon him.—Swift.

No villainy or flagitious action was ever yet committed but, upon a due inquiry into the cause of it, it will be found that a lie was first or last the principal engine to effect it.—South.

Our opinions are not our own, but in the power of sympathy. If a person tells us a palpable falsehood, we not only dare not contradict him, but we dare hardly disbelieve him to his face. A lie boldly uttered has the effect of truth for the instant.—Hazlitt.

A lie always needs a truth for a handle to it. The worst lies are those whose blade is false, but whose handle is true.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Habitual liars invent falsehoods not to gain any end or even to deceive their hearers, but to amuse themselves. It is partly practice and partly habit. It requires an effort in them to speak the truth.—Hazlitt.

After a tongue has once got the knack of lying, it is not to be imagined how impossible almost it is to reclaim it. Whence it comes to pass, that we see some men, who are otherwise very honest, so subject to this vice.—Montaigne.

A lie is a very short wick in a very small lamp. The oil of reputation is very soon sucked up and gone. And just as soon as a man is known to lie, he is like a two-foot pump in a hundred-foot well. He cannot touch bottom at all.—Henry Ward Beecher.

It is a hard matter for a man to lie all over, nature having provided king's evidence in almost every member. The hand will sometimes act as a vane, to show which way the wind blows, even when every feature is set the other way; the knees smite together and sound the alarm of fear under a fierce countenance; the legs shake with anger when all above is calm.—Washington Allston.

Lying is a disgraceful vice, and one that Plutarch paints in most disgraceful colors, when he says that it is "affording testimony that one first despises God, and then fears men." It is not possible more happily to describe its horrible, disgusting, and abandoned nature; for can we imagine anything more vile than to be cowards with regard to men, and brave with regard to God.—Montaigne.

All lies disgrace a gentleman, white or black, although I grant there is a difference. To say the least of it, it is a dangerous habit, for white lies are but the gentlemen ushers to black ones. I know of but one point on which a lie is excusable, and that it, when you wish to deceive the enemy. Then, your duty to your country warrants your lying till you are black in the face; and, for the very reason that it goes against your grain, it becomes, as it were, a sort of virtue.—Marryat.

M

Madness
Without one glimpse of reason or of heaven.—Moore.

O, that way madness lies; let me shun that.—Shakespeare.

Why, this is very midsummer madness.—Shakespeare.

Moody madness laughing wild.—Gray.

Though this be madness, yet there is method in it.—Shakespeare.

Madness in great ones must not unwatch'd go.—Shakespeare.

There is a pleasure in being mad,
Which none but madmen know.
—Dryden.

Insane people easily detect the nonsense of other people.—Dr. John Hallam.

Insanity is often the logic of an accurate mind overtaken.—O. W. Holmes.

The dreamer is a madman quiescent; the madman is a dreamer in action.—F. H. Hedge.

O this poor brain! ten thousand shapes of fury are whirling there, and reason is no more.—Fielding.

That he is mad, 'tis true; 'tis true, 'tis pity; And pity 'tis 'tis true. —Shakespeare.

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason, like sweet bells jangled, out of time, and harsh.—Shakespeare.

Montesquieu wittily observes that, by building professed madhouses, men tacitly insinuate that all who are out of their senses are to be found only in those places.—Warton.

I am not mad; I would to heaven I were! For then, 'tis like I should forget myself; O, if I could, what grief should I forget! —Shakespeare.

Alas, how is't with you, That you do bend your eye on vacancy, And with the incorporal air do hold discourse? —Shakespeare.

How pregnant, sometimes, his replies are! A happiness that often madness hits on, Which sanity and reason could not be So prosperously deliv'r'd of. —Shakespeare.

Madness is consistent; which is more than can be said for poor reason. Whatever may be the ruling passion at the time continues equally so throughout the whole delirium, though it should last for life. Madmen are always constant in love; which no man in his senses ever was. Our passions and principles are steady in frenzy; but begin to shift and waver, as we return to reason.—Sterne.

Of lunacy,
Innumerable were the causes; humbled pride,
Ambition disappointed, riches lost,
And bodily disease, and sorrow, oft
By man inflicted on his brother man;
Sorrow, that made the reason drunk, and
yet
Left much untasted. So the cup was fill'd.
—Pollok.

Many a man is mad in certain instances, and goes through life without having it perceived. For example, a madness has seized a person of supposing himself obliged literally to pray continually; had the madness turned the opposite way, and the person thought it a crime ever to pray, it might not improbably have continued unobserved.—Dr. Johnson.

Magistrate

A just and wise magistrate is a blessing as extensive as the community to which he belongs; a blessing which includes all other blessings whatsoever that relate to this life.—Atterbury.

Magnanimity

A great mind will neither give an affront nor bear it.—Henry Home.

Magnanimity is above circumstance; and any virtue which depends on that is more of constitution than of principle.—Jane Porter.

Of all virtues, magnanimity is the rarest. There are a hundred persons of merit for one who willingly acknowledges it in another.—Hazlitt.

Magnanimity is sufficiently defined by its name, nevertheless one can say it is the good sense of pride, the most noble way of receiving praise.—La Rochefoucauld.

A brave man thinks no one his superior who does him an injury; for he has it then in his power to make himself superior to the other by forgiving it.—Alexander Pope.

If you desire to be magnanimous, undertake nothing rashly, and fear nothing thou undertakest; fear nothing but infamy; dare anything but injury; the measure of magnanimity is neither to be rash nor timorous.—Quarles.

Magnolia

Majestic flower! How purely beautiful Thou art, as rising from thy bower of green,
Those dark and glossy leaves so thick and full,

Thou standest like a high-born forest
queen

Among thy maidens clustering round so fair,—

I love to watch thy sculptured form unfolding,

And look into thy depths, to image there
A fairy cavern, and while thus beholding,
And while thy breeze floats o'er thee,
matchless flower,

I breathe the perfume, delicate and strong,
That comes like incense from thy petal-
bower;

My fancy roams those southern woods
along,

Beneath that glorious tree, where deep among

The unsunned leaves thy large white flower-cups hung!

—C. P. Cranch.

Maidenhood

The blushing beauties of a modest maid.—Dryden.

In maiden meditation, fancy free,
—Shakespeare.

A maiden bath no tongue—but thought.—Shakespeare.

Nature has thrown a veil of modest beauty over maidenhood and moss-roses.—Willis.

A maiden never bold; of spirit so still and quiet that her motion blushed at herself.—Shakespeare.

Poor maids have more lovers than husbands.—John Webster.

Oh, the spells that haunt the trembling tale a bright-eyed maiden tells!—Edwin Arnold.

The soul whose bosom lust did never touch is God's fair bride; and maiden souls are such.—Decker.

Maids want nothing but husbands;
and when they have them they want everything.—Shakespeare.

Maidens, like moths, are ever caught by glare,
And mammon wins his way where seraphs might despair. —Byron.

A child no more! a maiden now—
A graceful maiden, with a gentle brow;
A cheek tinged lightly and a dove-like eye;
And all hearts bless her as she passes by.
—Mary Howitt.

Let the words of a virgin, though in a good cause, and to as good purpose, be neither violent, many, nor first, nor last; it is less shame for a virgin to be lost in a blushing silence than to be found in a bold eloquence.—Quarles.

She had grown, in her unstained seclusion, bright and pure as a first opening lilac, when it spreads its clear leaves to the sweetest dawn of May.—Percival.

The young girl who begins to experience the necessity of loving seeks to hide it; but the desire of pleasing betrays the secret of her heart, and sometimes reveals her hopes.—Beauchêne.

Majority

One on God's side is a majority.—Wendell Phillips.

Votes should be weighed, not counted!—Schiller.

Justice, not the majority, should rule.—Bovee.

One and God make a majority.—Frederick Douglass.

If the majority is insane, the sane must go to the hospital.—Horace Mann.

The voice of the majority is no proof of justice.—Schiller.

It never troubles the wolf how many the sheep be.—Virgil.

A man in the right, with God on his side, is in the majority, though he be alone, for God is multitudinous above all populations of the earth.—Beecher.

A better principle than this, that "the majority shall rule," is this other, that justice shall rule. "Justice," says the code of Justinian, "is the constant and perpetual desire to render every man his due."—Bovee.

Malice

Malice is poisoned by her own venom.—Lavater.

Truth, wisdom, love, seek reasons; malice only seeks causes.—Lavater.

Malice blunts the point of wit.—Douglas Jerrold.

Wit loses its point when dipped in malice.—Sheridan.

Malice, scorned, puts out itself; but, argued, gives a kind of credit to a false accusation.—Massinger.

For malice will with joy the lie receive, Report, and what it wishes true believe.—Yalden.

Malice drinketh up the greater part of its own poison.—Socrates.

Malice is of the boomerang character, and is apt to turn upon the projector.—Thackeray.

Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice.—Shakespeare.

Publish not men's secret faults, for by disgracing them you make yourself of no repute.—Saadi.

When malice is joined to envy, there is given forth poisonous and feculent matter, as ink from the cuttle-fish.—Plutarch.

There is an alchemy of quiet malice by which women can concoct a subtle poison from ordinary trifles.—Hawthorne.

Wit loses its respect with the good, when seen in company with malice; and to smile at the jest which plants a thorn in another's breast is to become a principal in the mischief.—Sheridan.

Malice and hatred are very fretting and vexatious, and apt to make our minds sore and uneasy; but he that can moderate these affections will find ease in his mind.—Tillotson.

It is to be believed or told that there is such malice in men as to rejoice in misfortunes, and from another's woes to draw delight.—Terence.

Even in the midst of compassion we feel within I know not what tartsweet titillation of malicious pleasure in seeing others suffer; children have the same feeling.—Montaigne.

Malice is the devil's picture. Lust makes men brutish, and malice makes them devilish. Malice is mental murder; you may kill a man and never touch him; "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer."—T. Watson.

When malice has reason on its side, it looks forth bravely, and displays that reason in all its luster. When austerity and self-denial have not realized true happiness, and the soul returns to the dictates of nature, the reaction is fearfully extravagant.—Pascal.

Malice, in its false witness, promotes its tale with so cunning a confusion; so mingles truths with falsehoods, surmises with certainties, causes of no moment with matters capital, that the accused can absolutely neither grant nor deny, plead innocence nor confess guilt.—Sir P. Sidney.

But for that blindness which is inseparable from malice, what terrible powers of evil would it possess! Fortunately for the world, its venom, like that of the rattlesnake, when most poisonous, clouds the eye of the reptile, and defeats its aim.—Simms.

The venom that chills and curdles the warm current of life in man is secreted only in creeping and cold-blooded creatures; and the inveterate malignity that never forgets or forgives is found only in base and ignoble natures, whose aims are selfish, whose means are indirect, cowardly, and treacherous.—George S. Hillard.

There is no small degree of malicious craft in fixing upon a season to give a mark of enmity and ill-will: a word—a look, which at one time would make no impression, at another time wounds the heart, and, like a shaft flying with the wind, pierces deep, which, with its own natural force, would scarce have reached the object aimed at.—Sterne.

As the malicious disposition of mankind is too well known, and the cruel pleasure which they take in destroying the reputation of others, the use we are to make of this knowledge is, to afford no handle for reproach; for bad as the world is, it seldom falls on any one who hath not given some slight cause for censure.—Fielding.

Mammon

What treasures here do Mammon's sons behold!
Yet know that all that glitters is not gold. —Quarles.

Mammon led them on—
Mammon, the least erected Spirit that fell From Heaven; for even in Heaven his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent, admiring more
The riches of Heaven's pavement, trodden
gold,
Than aught divine or holy else enjoyed
In vision beatific. —Milton.

Cursed Mammon be, when he with treasures
To restless action spurs our fate!
Cursed when for soft, indulgent leisures,
He lays for us the pillows straight.
—Goethe.

Man

An honest man's the noblest work of God.—Pope.

The finest fruit earth holds up to its Maker is a finished man.—Humboldt.

God made him, and therefore let him pass for a man.—Shakespeare.

Lords of humankind.—Goldsmith.

Man is more than constitutions.—Whittier.

Man is man, and master of his fate.—Tennyson.

A man's a man for a' that.—Burns.

The Highest Being reveals himself in man.—Carlyle.

The precious porcelain of human clay.—Byron.

Men, in general, are but great children.—Napoleon.

Mankind is unamendable.—Pope.

All true manliness grows around a core of divineness.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Man is a piece of the universe made alive.—Emerson.

Look what a little vain dust we are!—Addison.

Poor pensioner on the bounty of an hour.—Young.

Man is an animal that cooks his victuals.—Burke.

No man is so great as mankind.—Theodore Parker.

Man,—the aristocrat amongst the animals.—Heine.

The lot of man, to suffer and to die.—Pope.

Man is to man either a god or a wolf.—Erasmus.

Man is a reasoning rather than a reasonable animal.—Alexander Hamilton.

God never made anything else so beautiful as man.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Thou pendulum betwixt a smile and tear.—Byron.

Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die.—Young.

Man is a substance clad in shadows.—John Sterling.

A Christian is the gentlest of men; but then he is a man.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Before man made us citizens, great Nature made us men.—James Russell Lowell.

Man, in sooth, marvelous, vain, fickle, and unstable subject.—Montaigne.

Three fifths of him genius, and two fifths sheer fudge.—Lowell.

Mankind are earthen jugs with spirits in them.—Hawthorne.

I am a part of all that I have met.—Tennyson.

The noble man is only God's image.—Ludwig Tieck.

The proper study of mankind is man.—Pope.

We are the miracle of miracles, the great inscrutable mystery of God.—Carlyle.

Trouble teaches men how much there is in manhood.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Men may rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things.—Tennyson.

Man is the merriest species of creation: all above and below him are serious.—Addison.

For we are animals no less, although of different species.—Samuel Butler.

Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes and pompous in the grave.—Sir Thomas Browne.

When faith is lost, when honor dies, the man is dead!—Whittier.

The style is the man himself.—Buffon.

Lord of himself,—that heritage of woe!—Byron.

Man has been lent, not given, to life.—Publius Syrus.

Where soil is, men grow,
Whether to weeds or flowers. —Keats.

Half dust, half deity, alike unfit to sink or soar.—Byron.

Fond man! the vision of a moment made!
Dream of a dream! and shadow of a shade!
—Young.

The manly part is to do with might and main what you can do.—Emerson

Beloved brother, let us not forget that man can never get away from himself.—Goethe.

Man—living, feeling man—is the easy sport of the overmastering present.—Schiller.

Man is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man.—Bible.

Man is the jewel of God, who has created this material world to keep his treasure in.—Theodore Parker.

Obedience, submission, discipline, courage—these are among the characteristics which make a man.—Samuel Smiles.

Man was born for two things—thinking and acting—Cicero.

There are but three classes of men, the retrograde, the stationary, and the progressive.—Lavater.

Man is his own star, and that soul that can be honest, is the only perfect man.
—Fletcher.

Art may make a suit of clothes; but nature must produce a man.—Hume.

The man, whom I call deserving the name, is one whose thoughts and exertions are for others rather than himself.—Walter Scott.

Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long. —Goldsmith.

Unless above himself he can erect himself, how poor a thing is man!—Daniel.

Men are the sport of circumstances, when the circumstances seem the sport of men.—Byron.

Men are made by nature unequal. It is vain, therefore, to treat them as if they were equal.—Froude.

Of all the things which a man has, next to the gods his soul is the most divine and most truly his own.—Plato.

The only competition worthy of a wise man is with himself.—Mrs. Jameson.

Man's moral nature is a riddle which only eternity can solve.—Thoreau.

Nature ne'er meant her secrets to be found,
And man's a riddle which man can't expound.
—R. T. Paine.

That crawling insect, who from mud began, warmed by my beams, and kindled into man!—Dryden.

All go into one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again.—Bible.

The hearts of men are their books, events are their tutors, great actions are their eloquence.—Macaulay.

They say, best men are moulded out of faults,
And, for the most, become much more the better,
For being a little bad. —Shakespeare.

There is but one temple in the universe, and that is the body of man.—Novalis.

Man is not an organism; he is an intelligence served by organs.—Sir W. Hamilton.

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
—Young.

Every man is a volume, if you know how to read him.—Channing.

Let each man think himself an act of God,
His mind a thought, his life a breath of God.
—Bailey.

The history of the race is but that of the individual "writ large."—G. H. Lewes.

Creation lives, grows, and multiplies; man is but a witness.—Victor Hugo.

We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body!—Novalis.

Sent into the world to be a growing and exhaustless force.—Chapin.

Man is of soul and body, formed for deeds of high resolve, on fancy's bold-est wing.—Shelley.

Vast chain of being, which from God began, Nature's ethereal, human, angel, man.—Pope.

God's men are better than the devil's men, and they ought to act as though they thought they were.—Henry Ward Beecher.

To despise our species is the price we must often pay for our knowledge of it.—Colton.

He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.
—Shakespeare.

Vain, weak-built isthmus, which dost proud-ly rise
Up between two eternities!
—Abraham Cowley.

Man is an animal that makes bar-gains; no other animal does this,—one dog does not change a bone with another.—Adam Smith.

Man is the metre of all things, the hand is the instrument of instruments, and the mind is the form of forms.—Aristotle.

The gods are immortal men, and men are mortal gods.—Heraclitus.

God gave man an upright coun-tenance to survey the heavens, and to look upward to the stars.—Ovid.

In their looks divine
The image of their glorious Maker shone,
Truth, wisdom, sanctitude serene and pure.
—Milton.

Man should be ever better than he seems; and shape his acts, and dis-cipline his mind, to walk adorning earth, with hope of heaven.—Sir Au-brey de Vere.

Born to be ploughed with years, and sown with cares, and reaped by Death, lord of the human soil.—Byron.

Bounded in his nature, infinite in his desires, man is a fallen god who has a recollection of heaven.—Lamar-tine.

It has always struck me that there is a far greater distinction between man and man than between many men and most other animals.—Basil Hall.

Men are but children of a larger growth;
Our appetites are apt to change as theirs,
And full as craving, too, and full as vain.
—Dryden.

But we all are men,
In our own natures frail; and capable
Of our flesh, few are angels.
—Shakespeare.

Man that is born of a woman, is of few days and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.—Bible.

What a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! how infinite in fac-ulty! in form and moving, how ex-press and admirable; in action how like an angel, in apprehension how like a God!—Shakespeare.

Man has wants deeper than can be supplied by wealth or nature or do-mestic affections. His great relations are to his God and to eternity.—Mark Hopkins.

Man is that name of power which rises above them all, and gives to every one the right to be that which God meant he should be.—Henry Ward Beecher.

His life was gentle; and the elements
So mix'd in him, that nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"
—Shakespeare.

God's creature is one. He makes man, not men. His true creature is unitary and infinite, revealing him-self, indeed, in every finite form, but compromised by none.—Henry James.

A man may twist as he pleases, and do what he pleases, but he inevitably comes back to the track to which na-ture has destined him.—Goethe.

Make yourself an honest man, and then you may be sure that there is one rascal less in the world.—Carlyle.

There are but three general events which happen to mankind: birth, life, and death. Of their birth they are insensible, they suffer when they die, and neglect to live.—La Bruyère.

Man is the crowning of history and the realization of poetry, the free and living bond which unites all nature to that God who created it for Himself.—F. Godet.

There is the supreme and indissoluble consanguinity between men, of which the heathen poet saith, we are all His generation.—Bacon.

So weak is man, so ignorant and blind, that did not God sometimes withhold in mercy what we ask, we should be ruined at our own request.—Hannah More.

He is a man who knows how to die for his God and his country; his heart, his lips, his arms, are faithful unto death.—Ernest Arndt.

If man should commence by studying himself, he would see how impossible it is to go further.—Pascal.

The way of the superior man is threefold, but I am not equal to it. Virtuous, he is free from anxieties; wise, he is free from perplexities; bold, he is free from fear.—Confucius.

The soul of man createth its own destiny of power; and as the trial is intenser here, his being hath a nobler strength in heaven.—N. P. Willis.

A man is a great thing upon the earth and through eternity; but every jot of the greatness of man is unfolded out of woman.—Walt Whitman.

What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! in form, and moving, how express and admirable! in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals!—Shakespeare.

Mankind divides itself into two classes,—benefactors and malefactors. The second class is vast; the first a handful.—Emerson.

It is better to be a self-made man,—filled up according to God's original pattern,—than to be half a man, made after some other man's pattern.—J. G. Holland.

He is the whole encyclopedia of facts. The creation of a thousand forests is in one acorn; and Egypt, Greece, Rome, Gaul, Britain, America, lie folded already in the first man.—Emerson.

Oh, we are ridiculous animals; and if the angels have any fun in them, how we must divert them!—Horace Walpole.

Man himself is the crowning wonder of creation; the study of his nature the noblest study the world affords.—Gladstone.

Man passes away; his name perishes from record and recollection; his history is as a tale that is told, and his very monument becomes a ruin.—Washington Irving.

A pygmy standing on the outward crust of this small planet, his far-reaching spirit stretches outward to the infinite, and there alone finds rest.—Carlyle.

But what am I?
An infant crying in the night;
An infant crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry.
—Tennyson.

The very substance which last week was grazing in the field, waving in the milk pail, or growing in the garden, is now become part of the man.—Dr. Watts.

What were unenlightened man? A savage, roaming through the woods and wilds in quest of prey.—Thomson.

Of all the animals which fly in the air, walk on the land, or swim in the sea, from Paris to Peru, from Japan to Rome, the most foolish animal in my opinion is man.—Boileau.

It is an error to suppose that a man belongs to himself. No man does. He belongs to his wife, or his children, or his relations, or to his creditors, or to society in some form or other.—G. A. Sala.

'Tis man's pride,
His highest, worthiest, noblest boast,
The privilege he prizes most,
To stand by helpless woman's side.
—Mrs. Holford.

Let us not undervalue the dignity of human nature. Man although fallen, still retains some traces of his primeval glory and excellence—broken columns of a celestial temple, magnificent, even in its ruins.—John McC. Holmes.

Let us (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us and to die)
Expatiate free o'er all this scene of man;
A mighty maze! but not without a plan.
—Pope.

The history of mankind is little else than a narrative of designs which have failed, and hopes that have been disappointed.—Johnson.

Without our hopes, without our fears,
Without the home that plighted love endears,
Without the smile from partial beauty won,
O! what were man?—a world without a sun.
—Campbell.

All that hath been majestic
In life or death, since time began,
Is native in the simple heart of all,
The angel-heart of man.
—James Russell Lowell.

Man is a central creature between the animals, that is to say, the most perfect form, which unites the traits of all in the most complete epitome.—Herder.

Man is too near all kinds of beasts, —a fawning dog, a roaring lion, a thieving fox, a robbing wolf, a dissembling crocodile, a treacherous decoy, and a rapacious vulture.—Cowley.

For man is a plant, not fixed in the earth, nor immovable, but heavenly, whose head, rising as it were from a root upwards, is turned towards heaven.—Plutarch.

Whenever I contemplate man in the actual world or the ideal, I am lost amidst the infinite multiformity of his life, but always end in wonder at the essential unity of his nature.—Henry Giles.

Do you know what a man is? Are not birth, beauty, good shape, discourse, manhood, learning, gentleness, virtue, youth, liberality, and such like, the spice and salt that season a man? —Shakespeare.

In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread,
Till thou return unto the ground; for thou
Out of the ground wast taken; know thy birth.
For dust thou art, and shalt to dust return.
—Milton.

A man ought to carry himself in the world as an orange-tree would if it could walk up and down in the garden,—swinging perfume from every little censer it holds up to the air.—Beecher.

Man is physically as well as metaphysically a thing of shreds and patches, borrowed unequally from good and bad ancestors, and a misfit from the start.—Emerson.

Man is improvable. Some people think he is only a machine, and that the only difference between a man and a mill is, that one is carried by blood and the other by water.—Horace Mann.

An individual man is a fruit which it cost all the foregoing ages to form and ripen. He is strong, not to do, but to live; not in his arms, but in his heart; not as an agent, but as a fact.—Emerson.

Man, if he compare himself with all that he can see, is at the zenith of power; but if he compare himself with all that he can conceive, he is at the nadir of weakness.—Colton.

Man is greater than a world, than systems of worlds; there is more mystery in the union of soul with the physical than in the creation of a universe.—Henry Giles.

As there is much beast and some devil in man, so is there some angel and some God in him. The beast and the devil may be conquered, but, in this life, never wholly destroyed.—Coleridge.

Consider, man; weigh well thy frame,
The king, the beggar, is the same;
Dust form'd us all, Each breathes his day,
Then sinks into his native clay. —Gay.

Man,—whose heaven-erected face
The smiles of love adorn,— Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn!
—Burns.

The record of life runs thus: Man creeps into childhood,—bounds into youth,—sobers into manhood,—softens into age,—totters into second childhood, and slumbers into the cradle prepared for him,—thence to be watched and cared for.—Henry Giles.

I consider how little man is, yet, in his own mind, how great. He is lord and master of all things, yet scarce can command anything.—Burke.

What a chimera is man! what a confused chaos! what a subject of contradiction! a professed judge of all things, and yet a feeble worm of the earth! the great depositary and guardian of truth, and yet a mere huddle of uncertainty! the glory and the scandal of the universe!—Pascal.

Man is by nature weak; he is born in and to a state of dependence; he therefore naturally seeks and looks about for help, and where he observes the greatest power, it is there that he applies and prays for protection.—H. Brooke.

In that vast march, the van forgets the rear; the individual is lost; and yet the multitude is many individuals. He faints and falls and dies; man is forgotten; but still mankind move on, still worlds revolve, and the will of God is done in earth and heaven.—G. W. Curtis.

The older I grow—and I now stand upon the brink of eternity—the more comes back to me that sentence in the Catechism which I learned when a child, and the fuller and deeper its meaning becomes, "What is the chief end of man? To glorify God and enjoy Him forever." —Thomas Carlyle.

Every man's powers have relation to some kind of work; and whenever he finds that kind of work which he can do best—that to which his powers are best adapted—he finds that which will give him the best development, and that by which he can best build up, or make, his manhood.—J. G. Holland.

A sacred spark created by his breath,
The immortal mind of man his image bears;
A spirit living 'midst the forms of death,
Oppressed, but not subdued, by mortal cares.
—Sir H. Davy.

The Divine government of the world is like a stream that rolls under us; men are only bubbles that rise on its surface; some are brighter and larger, and sparkle longer in the sun than others; but all must break; whilst the mighty current rolls on in its wonted majesty!—David Thomas.

He is compounded of two very different ingredients, spirit and matter; but how such unallied and disproportioned substances should act upon each other, no man's learning yet could tell him.—Jeremy Collier.

A man would have no pleasures in discovering all the beauties of the universe, even in heaven itself, unless he had a partner to whom he might communicate his joys.—Cicero.

They that deny a God, destroy man's nobility, for certainly man is of kin to the beasts by his body; and if he be not of kin to God by His spirit, he is an ignoble creature.—Bacon.

Man, considered not merely as an organized being, but as a rational agent and a member of society, is perhaps the most wonderfully contrived, and to us the most interesting specimen of Divine wisdom that we have any knowledge of.—Whately.

Like leaves on trees the race of man is found,—

Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;

Another race the following spring supplies;
They fall successive; and successive rise.

—Homer.

Chaos of thought and passion, all confused;
Still by himself abused and disabused;
Created half to rise, and half to fall;
Great lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
Sole judge of truth, in endless error hurled;
The glory, jest and riddle of the world!

—Pope.

But man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd,—
His glassy essence,—like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep.

—Shakespeare.

Man is the highest product of his own history. The discoverer finds nothing so grand or tall as himself, nothing so valuable to him. The greatest star is at the small end of the telescope,—the star that is looking, not looked after nor looked at.—Theodore Parker.

Every want, not of a low kind, physical as well as moral, which the human breast feels, and which brutes do not feel, and cannot feel, raises man by so much in the scale of existence, and is a clear proof, and a direct instance, of the favor of God toward his so much favored human offspring.—Daniel Webster.

Can anything be imagined so ridiculous that this miserable and wretched creature, who is not so much as master of himself, but subject to the injuries of all things, should call himself master and emperor of the world, of which he has not power to know the least part, much less to command the whole?—Montaigne.

A man that is temperate, generous, valiant, chaste, faithful, and honest, may, at the same time, have wit, humour, mirth, good breeding, and gallantry. While he exerts these latter qualities, twenty occasions might be invented to show he is master of the other noble virtues.—Steele.

Pouter, tumbler, and fantail are from the same source;

The racer and hack may be traced to one Horse;

So men were developed from monkeys of course,

Which nobody can deny.

—Lord Neaves.

Omit a few of the most abstruse sciences, and mankind's study of man occupies nearly the whole field of literature. The burden of history is what man has been; of law, what he does; of physiology, what he is; of ethics, what he ought to be; of revelation, what he shall be.—George Finlayson.

Man doom'd to care, to pain, disease, and strife,

Walks his short journey through the vale of life,

Watchful, attends the cradle and the grave,
And passing generations longs to save:

Last dies himself; yet wherefore should we mourn?

For man must to his kindred dust return;

Submit to the destroying hand of fate,

As ripen'd ears the harvest-sickle wait.

—Euripides.

Behold the child, by Nature's kindly law
Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw;
Some livelier plaything gives his Youth delight,

A little louder, but as empty quite;
Scarfs, Garters, Gold amuse his riper stage;
And beads and pray'r-books are the toys of age;

Pleas'd with this Bauble still, as that before;
Till tir'd he sleeps, and Life's poor play is o'er.

—Pope.

Great men stand like solitary towers in the city of God, and secret passages running deep beneath external nature, give their thoughts intercourse with higher intelligences, which strengthens and consoles them, and of which the labourers on the surface do not even dream.—Longfellow.

Now the basest thought possible concerning man is, that he has no spiritual nature; and the foolishest misunderstanding of him possible is, that he has, or should have, no animal nature. For his nature is nobly animal, nobly spiritual,—coherently and irrevocably so; neither part of it may, but at its peril, expel, despise, or defy the other.—Ruskin.

God hath given to mankind a common library, his creatures; and to every man a proper book, himself, being an abridgement of all the others: if thou read with understanding, it will make thee a great master of philosophy, and a true servant to the divine Author; if thou but barely read, it will make thee thy own wise man, and the Author's fool.—Quarles.

Man perfected by society is the best of all animals; he is the most terrible of all when he lives without law and without justice. If he finds himself an individual who cannot live in society, or who pretends he has need of only his own resources, do not consider him as a member of humanity; he is a savage beast or a god.—Aristotle.

O rich and various man! thou palace of sight and sound, carrying in thy senses the morning and the night, and the unfathomable galaxy; in thy brain, the geometry of the city of God; in thy heart, the power of love and the realms of right and wrong. An individual man is a fruit which it cost all the foregoing ages to form and ripen. He is strong, not to do, but to live; not in his arms, but in his heart; not as an agent, but as a fact.—Emerson.

"We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body!" This sounds much like a mere flourish of rhetoric; but it is not so. If well meditated, it will turn out to be a scientific fact; the expression, in such words as can be had, of the actual truth of the thing. We are the miracle of miracles,—the great inscrutable mystery of God. We cannot understand it, we know not how to speak of it; but we may feel and know, if we like, that it is verily so.—Carlyle.

It is of dangerous consequence to represent to man how near he is to the level of beasts, without showing him at the same time his greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his greatness without his meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either; but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both.—Pascal.

While some animals exhibit individual powers in higher perfection, man stands for their superior, not only in combining in his own body all the senses and faculties which they possess, but in being endowed with moral and intellectual powers which are denied to them, and which at once place him at the head of the living creation, and constitute him a moral, religious, intelligent, and responsible being.—Combe.

Man was sent into the world to be a growing and exhaustless force. The world was spread out around him to be seized and conquered. Realms of infinite truth burst open above him, inviting him to tread those shining coasts along which Newton dropped his plummet, and Herschel sailed,—a Columbus of the skies.—Chapin.

A man in old age is like a sword in a shop window. Men that look upon the perfect blade do not imagine the process by which it was completed. Man is a sword, daily life is the workshop, and God is the artificer; and those cares which beat upon the anvil, and file the edge, and eat in, acid-like, the inscription upon his hilt,—these are the very things that fashion the man.—Beecher.

O man! while in thy early years,
How prodigal of time,
Misspending all thy precious hours,
Thy glorious youthful prime!
Alternate follies take the sway;
Licentious passions burn;
Which tenfold force give nature's law,
That man was made to mourn.
—Burns.

Men are born with two eyes, but with one tongue, in order that they should see twice as much as they say;

but from their conduct one would suppose that they were born with two tongues, and one eye; for those talk the most who observe the least, and obtrude their remarks upon everything, who have seen into nothing.—Colton.

But if, indeed, there be a nobler life in us than in these strangely moving atoms; if, indeed, there is an eternal difference between the fire which inhabits them, and that which animates us,—it must be shown, by each of us in his appointed place, not merely in the patience, but in the activity of our hope, not merely by our desire, but our labor, for the time when the dust of the generations of men shall be confirmed for foundations of the gates of the city of God.—John Ruskin.

Man is an animal, formidable both from his passions and his reasons; his passions often urging him to great evils, and his reason furnishing means to achieve them. To train this animal, and make him amenable to order, to inure him to a sense of justice and virtue, to withhold him from ill courses by fear, and encourage him in his duty by hopes; in short to fashion and model him for society, hath been the aim of civil and religious institutions; and, in all times, the endeavour of good and wise men. The aptest method for attaining this end hath been always judged a proper education.—Bishop Berkely.

It is a painful fact, but there is no denying it, the masts are the tools of circumstances; thistle-down on the breeze, straw on the river, their course is shaped for them by the currents and eddies of the stream of life; but only in proportion as they are things, not men and women. Man was meant to be not the slave, but the master, of circumstances, and in proportion as he recovers his humanity, in every sense of the great obsolete word,—in proportion as he gets back the spirit of manliness, which is self-sacrifice, affection, loyalty to an idea beyond himself, a God above himself, so far will he rise above circumstances, and wield them at his will.—Kingsley.

Management

As in the greater world for man, so in the little world of man,—as in the outward riches of the one, so in the inner treasures of the other, many possess much, and enjoy but little; many have much, and use but little; others use much, and but little well. I shall not so much endeavor to have much wherewithal to do as to do much with that little I have. It shall not so much grieve me that I am a poor treasurer, as joy me if I had been a good steward. I could wish I had more to use well, but more wish well to use that I have. If he were so blamed that employed not one talent well, what would become of me if I had ten and abused them?—Arthur Warwick.

Manners

Fine manners are the mantle of fair minds.—Alcott.

There is a nobility in the world of manners.—Schiller.

Manners are the ornament of action.—Samuel Smiles.

Striking manners are bad manners.—Robert Hall.

Good manners are a part of good morals.—Whately.

It is the manner which is better than all.—Sir P. Sidney.

A company attitude is rarely anybody's best.—Miss Sedgwick.

It is a rule of manners to avoid exaggeration.—Emerson.

Manners,—the final and perfect flower of noble character.—William Winter.

Manners are stronger than laws.—Alexander Carlile.

Better were it to be unborn than to be ill-bred.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Better too much form than too little.—Whately.

Good manners require space and time.—Lamartine.

What's female beauty but an air divine?—Young.

The mildest manners with the bravest mind.—Homer.

Politeness goes far, yet costs nothing.—Samuel Smiles.

Intercourse with women is the element of good manners.—Goethe.

Manners form the great charm of women.—Goethe.

Men make laws; women make manners.—Ségur.

Good manners are made up of petty sacrifices.—Emerson.

Serenity of manners is the zenith of beauty.—Frederika Bremer.

The company of chaste women is the proper atmosphere of good manners.—Goethe.

Good breeding shows itself most where, to an ordinary eye, it appears the least.—Addison.

A man's own good breeding is the best security against other people's ill manners.—Chesterfield.

To be good and disagreeable is high treason against the royalty of virtue.—Hannah More.

A man's worth is estimated in this world according to his conduct.—La Bruyère.

Grace is to the body what good sense is to the mind.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is wonderful how much talent runs into manners.—Emerson.

Polished brass will pass upon more people than rough gold.—Chesterfield.

Fit for the mountains and the barbarous caves,
Where manners ne'er were preach'd.
—Shakespeare.

Men are like wine,—not good before the lees of clownishness be settled.—Feltham.

Men's evil manners live in brass; their virtues we write in water.—Shakespeare.

Civility is but a desire to receive civility, and to be esteemed polite.—Rochefoucauld.

Fine manners need the support of fine manners in others.—Emerson.

Virtue itself offends, when coupled with forbidding manners.—Bishop Middleton.

In manners, tranquillity is the supreme power.—Madame de Maintenon.

Nothing so much prevents our being natural as the desire of appearing so.—Rochefoucauld.

Manners with fortunes, humors turn with climes,
Tenets with books, and principles with times.
—Pope.

Unbecoming forwardness oftener proceeds from ignorance than impudence.—Lord Greville.

A well-bred man is always sociable and complaisant.—Montaigne.

Just as politeness imitates kindness, so does grace imitate modesty.—Joubert.

Manners easily and rapidly mature into morals.—Horace Mann.

A moral, sensible, and well-bred man
Will not affront me, and no other can.
—Cowper.

Air and manners are more expressive than words.—S. Richardson.

If fine manners are so admirable in men, how much more effective are they in women!—Mme. Récamier.

What once were vices, are now the manners of the day.—Seneca.

Many young persons believe themselves natural when they are only impolite and coarse.—Rochefoucauld.

It is gentle manners which prove so irresistible in women.—Theophile Gautier.

A man's manners are a mirror, in which he shows his likeness to the intelligent observer.—Goethe.

In the society of ladies, want of sense is not so unpardonable as want of manners.—Lavater.

Few are qualified to shine in company; but it is in most men's power to be agreeable.—Swift.

There is certainly something of exquisite kindness and thoughtful benevolence in that rarest of gifts,—fine breeding.—Lytton.

All good conversation, manners, and action come from a spontaneity which forgets usages and makes the moment great.—Emerson.

They ask Lucman, the fabulist, From whom did you learn manners? He answered: From the unmannerly.—Saadi.

To be always thinking about your manners is not the way to make them good; because the very perfection of manners is not to think about yourself.—Whately.

As a man's salutation, so is the total of his character; in nothing do we lay ourselves so open as in our manner of meeting and salutation.—Lavater.

An imposing air should always be taken as an evidence of imposition. Dignity is often a veil between us and the real truth of things.—Whipple.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse. Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy, is the best bred in the company.—Swift.

There is a policy in manner. I have heard one, not inexperienced in the pursuit of fame, give it his earnest support, as being the surest passport to absolute and brilliant success.—Tuckerman.

Eye nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners, living as they rise;
Laugh where we must, be candid where we can;
But vindicate the ways of God to man.
—Pope.

Nothing, except what flows from the heart, can render even external manners truly pleasing.—Blair.

The manner of a vulgar man has freedom without ease, and the manner of a gentleman has ease without freedom.—Chesterfield.

Truth, justice, and reason lose all their force, and all their lustre, when they are not accompanied with agreeable manners.—Thomson.

Good breeding consists in having no particular mark of any profession, but a general elegance of manners.—Dr. Johnson.

O form! How often dost thou with thy ease, thy habit, wrench awe from fools, and tie the wiser souls to thy false seeming!—Shakespeare.

The charm of fine manners is music and sculpture and picture to many who do not pretend to appreciation of these arts.—Emerson.

A gentleman has ease without familiarity, is respectful without meanness, genteel without affection, insinuating without seeming art.—Chesterfield.

A well-bred carriage is difficult to imitate; for in strictness it is negative, and it implies a long-continued previous training.—Goethe.

Real good-breeding is independent of the forms and refinements of what has assumed to itself the name of society.—George MacDonald.

Simplicity of manner is the last attainment. Men are very long afraid of being natural, from the dread of being taken for ordinary.—Jeffrey.

One principal part of good breeding is to suit our behavior to the three several degrees of men: our superiors, our equals, and those below us.—Swift.

A man's fortune is frequently decided by his first address. If pleasing, others at once conclude he has merit; but if ungraceful, they decide against him.—Chesterfield.

Good breeding is the result of much good sense, some good nature, and a little self-denial for the sake of others, and with a view to obtain the same indulgence from them.—Chesterfield.

There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world, either to get a good name, or to supply the want of it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Wisdom, valor, justice and learning cannot keep a man in countenance that is possessed of these excellences, if he wants that inferior art of life and behavior called good breeding.—Steele.

The person who screams, or uses the superlative degree, or converses with heat puts whole drawing-rooms to flight. If you wish to be loved, love measure.—Emerson.

Nothing sharpens the arrow of sarcasm so keenly as the courtesy that polishes it; no reproach is like that we clothe with a smile, and present with a bow.—Chesterfield.

What a rare gift, by the by, is that of manners! how difficult to define, how much more difficult to impart! Better for a man to possess them than wealth, beauty, or talent; they will more than supply all.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The scholar without good breeding is a pedant; the philosopher, a cynic; the soldier, a brute; and every man disagreeable.—Chesterfield.

As the sword of the best-tempered metal is most flexible, so the truly generous are most pliant and courteous in their behavior to their inferiors.—Thomas Fuller.

Prepare yourself for the world, as the athletes used to do for their exercises; oil your mind and your manners, to give them the necessary suppleness and flexibility; strength alone will not do.—Chesterfield.

Nobody ought to have been able to resist her coaxing manner; and nobody had any business to try. Yet she never seemed to know it was her manner at all. That was the best of it.—Dickens.

I really think next to the consciousness of doing a good action, that of doing a civil one is the most pleasing; and the epithet which I should covet the most next to that of Aristides, would be that of well-bred.—Chesterfield.

Manners are the shadows of virtues; the momentary display of those qualities which our fellow-creatures love and respect. If we strive to become, then, what we strive to appear, manners may often be rendered useful guides to the performance of our duties.—Sydney Smith.

Manners are the root, laws only the trunk and branches. Manners are the archetypes of laws. Manners are laws in their infancy; laws are manners fully grown,—or, manners are children, which, when they grow up, become laws.—Horace Mann.

The manner of saying or of doing anything goes a great way in the value of the thing itself. It was well said of him that called a good office that was done harshly, and with an ill-will, a stony piece of bread; it is necessary for him that is hungry to receive it, but it almost chokes a man in the going down.—Seneca.

Defect of manners, want of government, Pride, haughtiness, opinion, and disdain; The least of which, haunting a nobleman, Loath men's hearts, and leaves behind a stain Upon the beauty of all parts besides; Beguiling them of commendation.

—Shakespeare.

Manners are the happy ways of doing things; each one a stroke of genius or of love, now repeated and hardened into usage, they form at last a rich varnish, with which the routine of life is washed, and its details adorned. If they are superficial, so are the dew-drops which give such a depth to the morning meadows.—Emerson.

The distinguishing trait of people accustomed to good society is a calm, imperturbable quiet which pervades all their actions and habits, from the greatest to the least. They eat in quiet, move in quiet, live in quiet, and lose their wife, or even their money, in quiet; while low persons cannot take up either a spoon or an affront without making such an amazing noise about it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Manners are of more importance than laws. Upon them, in a great measure, the laws depend. The law touches us but here and there, and now and then. Manners are what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine us, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in. They give their whole form and color to our lives. According to their quality, they aid morals; they supply them or they totally destroy them.—Burke.

March

The stormy March is come at last,
With wind, and cloud, and changing
skies;

I hear the rushing of the blast,
That through the snowy valley flies.

—Bryant.

Ah, March! we know thou art
Kind-hearted, spite of ugly looks and threats,
And, out of sight, art nursing April's violets.

—Helen Hunt Jackson.

Slayer of the winter, art thou here again?

O welcome, thou that bring'st the summer night!

The bitter wind makes not the victory vain,
Nor will we mock thee for thy faint blue
sky.

—William Morris.

The hazel-blossoms, in threads of crimson hue,
Peep through the swelling buds, foretelling Spring,

Ere yet a white-thorn leaf appears in view,
Or March finds throstles pleased enough to sing.

—Clare.

All in the wild March-morning I heard the angels call;

It was when the moon was setting, and the dark was over all;

The trees began to whisper, and the wind
began to roll,

And in the wild March-morning I heard them call my soul.

—Tennyson.

Ah, passing few are they who speak,

Wild, stormy month! in praise of thee;

Yet though thy winds are loud and bleak,

Thou art a welcome month to me.

For thou, to northern lands, again

The glad and glorious sun dost bring,

And thou hast joined the gentle train

And wear'st the gentle name of Spring.

—Bryant.

Martyrs

For some not to be martyred is a martyrdom.—Donne.

It is the cause, and not the death,
that makes the martyr.—Napoleon I.

It is not the death that makes the martyr, but the cause.—Canon Dale.

Who falls for love of God, shall rise
a star.—Ben Jonson.

The martyrs to vice far exceed the martyrs to virtue, both in endurance and in number.—Colton.

Christianity has made martyrdom sublime, and sorrow triumphant.—
Chapin.

There are daily martyrdoms occurring of more or less self-abnegation, and of which the world knows nothing.

—Chapin.

It is admirable to die the victim of one's faith; it is sad to die the dupe of one's ambition.—Lamartine.

Those who completely sacrifice themselves are praised and admired; that is the sort of character men like to find in others.—Rabel.

When we read, we fancy we could be martyrs; when we come to act, we cannot bear a provoking word.—Hannah More.

It is more difficult, and calls for higher energies of soul, to live a martyr than to die one.—Horace Mann.

Arnobius tells us that this martyrdom first of all made them seriously inquisitive into that religion which could endure the mind with so much strength and overcome the fear of death.—Addison.

God discovers the martyr and confessor without the trial of flames and tortures, and will hereafter entitle many to the reward of actions which they had never the opportunity of performing.—Addison.

And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep.—Bible.

O, how much those men are to be valued who, in the spirit with which the widow gave up her two mites, have given up themselves! How their names sparkle! How rich their very ashes are! How they will count up in heaven!—Chapin.

He strove among God's suffering poor

One gleam of brotherhood to send;

The dungeon oped its hungry door

To give the truth one martyr more,

Then shut,—and here behold the end!

—Lowell.

If martyrdom is now on the decline, it is not because martyrs are less zealous, but because martyr-mongers are more wise. The light of intellect has put out the fire of persecution, as other fires are observed to smoulder before the light of the same.—Colton.

He that dies a martyr proves that he was not a knave, but by no means that he was not a fool; since the most absurd doctrines are not without such evidence as martyrdom can produce. A martyr, therefore, by the mere act of suffering, can prove nothing but his own faith.—Colton.

To die for truth is not to die for one's country, but to die for the world. Truth, like the Venus de Medici, will pass down in thirty fragments to posterity; but posterity will collect and recompose them into a goddess. Then, also, thy temple, O eternal Truth! that now stands half below the earth, made hollow by the sepulchres of its witnesses, will raise itself in the total majesty of its proportions, and will stand in monumental granite; and every pillar on which it rests will be fixed in the grave of a martyr.—Richter.

No language can fitly express the meanness, the baseness, the brutality, with which the world has ever treated its victims of one age and boasts of the next. Dante is worshipped at that grave to which he was hurried by persecution. Milton, in his own day, was "Mr. Milton, the blind adder, that spit his venom on the king's person"; and soon after, "the mighty orb of song." These absurd transitions from hatred to apotheosis, this recognition just at the moment when it becomes a mockery, saddens all intellectual history.—Whipple.

Martyrs! who left for our reaping

Truths you had sown in your blood—

Sinners! whom long years of weeping

Chasten'd from evil to good—

* * * * *

Say, through what region enchanted

Walk ye, in Heaven's sweet air?

Say, to what spirits 'tis granted,

Bright souls, to dwell with you there?

—Moore.

His wife and children, being eleven in number, ten able to walk, and one sucking on her breast, met him by the way as he went towards Smithfield: this sorrowful sight of his own flesh and blood, dear as they were to him, could yet nothing move him but that he constantly and cheerfully took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence and support of Christ's Gospel.—Martyrdom of John Rogers.

Master

If thou art a master, be sometimes blind; if a servant, sometimes deaf.—Fuller.

There is nothing so good to make a horse fat, as the eye of his master.—Diogenes.

The many still must labor for the one! It is nature's doom.—Byron.

It is a common law of nature, which no time will ever change, that superiors shall rule their inferiors.—Dionysius.

The measure of a master is his success in bringing all men round to his opinion twenty years later.—Emerson.

I follow him to serve my turn upon him; we cannot all be masters, nor all masters cannot be truly followed.—Shakespeare.

We must truly serve those whom we appear to command; we must bear with their imperfections, correct them with gentleness and patience, and lead them in the way to heaven.—Fénelon.

It is not only paying wages, and giving commands, that constitutes a master of a family, but prudence, equal behavior, with a readiness to protect and cherish them, is what entitles a man to that character in their very hearts and sentiments.—Steele.

It is proper for every one to consider, in the case of all men, that he who has not been a servant cannot become a praiseworthy master; and it is meet that we should plume ourselves rather on acting the part of a servant properly than that of the master, first, towards the laws, (for in this way we are servants of the gods), and next, towards our elders.—Plato.

Mathematics

Mathematics may be briefly defined as the science of quantities, and is one of the most important of disciplining studies which engage the practical student.—Rufus Choate.

Mathematics has not a foot to stand upon which is not purely metaphysical.—De Quincey.

Mathematics are the most abstracted of knowledge.—Bacon.

He that gives a portion of his time and talent to the investigation of mathematical truth will come to all other questions with a decided advantage.—Colton.

The mathematics are friends of religion, inasmuch as they charm the passions, restrain the impetuosity of imagination, and purge the mind from error and prejudice.—Arbuthnot.

As an exercise of the reasoning faculties, pure mathematics is an admirable exercise, because it consists of reasoning alone, and does not encumber the student with any exercise of judgment.—Whately.

The study of the properties of numbers, Plato tells us, habituates the mind to the contemplation of pure truth, and raises us above the material universe. He would have his disciples apply themselves to this study, not that they may be able to buy or sell, not that they may qualify themselves to be shopkeepers or travelling merchants, but that they may learn to withdraw their minds from the ever-shifting spectacle of this visible and tangible world, and to fix them on the immutable essences of things.—Macaulay.

Matrimony

It is not good that the man should be alone.—Bible.

The bloom or blight of all men's happiness.—Byron.

What, therefore, God hath joined together let not man put asunder.—Bible.

Hearts with equal love combined kindle never-dying fires.—Carew.

Of earthly goods the best, is a good wife.—Simonides.

Wedlock's a lane where there is no turning.—Miss Mulock.

Marriages are made in heaven.—Tennyson.

He that takes a wife takes care.—Franklin.

If you wish to ruin yourself, marry a rich wife.—Michelet.

Marriages are best of dissimilar material.—Theodore Parker.

Married in haste, we repent at leisure.—Congreve.

It is hard to wive and thrive both in a year.—Tennyson.

An obedient wife commands her husband.—Tennyson.

Hasty marriage seldom proveth well.—Shakespeare.

Marriage is a desperate thing.—John Selden.

Man is the circled oak; woman the ivy.—Aaron Hill.

Marriage is the nursery of heaven! —Jeremy Taylor.

A light wife doth make a heavy husband.—Shakespeare.

A young man married is a man that's marred.—Shakespeare.

Hanging and wiving go by destiny.—Shakespeare.

Marriage is a feast where the grace is sometimes better than the dinner.—Colton.

Men are April when they woo, December when they wed.—Shakespeare.

Husbands and wives talk of the cares of matrimony, and bachelors and spinsters bear them.—Wilkie Collins.

Strong are the instincts with which God has guarded the sacredness of marriage.—Maria M'Intosh.

No man can either live piously or die righteous without a wife.—Richter.

I chose my wife, as she did her wedding gown, for qualities that would wear well.—Goldsmith.

Hail, wedded love, mysterious law, true source of human offspring!—Milton.

A man finds himself seven years older the day after his marriage.—Bacon.

The instances, that second marriage move, are base respects of thrift, but none of love.—Shakespeare.

A wife is a gift bestowed upon a man to reconcile him to the loss of paradise.—Goethe.

The world well tried, the sweetest thing in life
Is the unclouded welcome of a wife.
—Willis.

Humble wedlock is far better than proud virginity.—St. Augustine.

Never marry but for love; but see that thou lovest what is lovely.—William Penn.

Should all despair that have revolted wives, the tenth of mankind would hang themselves.—Shakespeare.

If you would have the nuptial union last, Let virtue be the bond that ties it fast.
—Rowe.

Domestic happiness, thou only bliss Of paradise that has survived the fall.
—Cowper.

Men are generally more careful of the breed of their horses and dogs than of their children.—William Penn.

As the husband is, the wife is; thou art mated with a clown.—Tennyson.

The amity that wisdom knits not, folly may easily untie.—Shakespeare.

Go down the ladder when thou marriest a wife; go up when thou choosest a friend.—Rabbi Ben Azai.

It is in vain for a man to be born fortunate, if he be unfortunate in his marriage.—Dacier.

Ay, marriage is the life-long miracle,
The self-begetting wonder, daily fresh.
—Charles Kingsley.

Two consorts in heaven are not two, but one angel.—Swedenborg.

There are good marriages, but there are no delightful ones.—Rochefoucauld.

Maids are May when they are maids, but the sky changes when they are wives.—Shakespeare.

Oh! how many torments lie in the small circle of a wedding ring.—Colley Cibber.

I will fasten on this sleeve of thine;
Thou art an elm, my husband, I, a vine.
—Shakespeare.

There swims no goose so gray, but soon or late
She finds some honest gander for her mate.
—Pope.

When men enter into the state of marriage, they stand nearest to God.
—Henry Ward Beecher.

Matrimony,—the high sea for which no compass has yet been invented.—Heine.

Look down, you gods,
And on this couple drop a blessed crown.
—Shakespeare.

She that weds well will wisely match her love,
Nor be below her husband nor above.
—Ovid.

A husband is a plaster that cures all the ills of girlhood.—Molière.

Marriage must be a relation either of sympathy or of conquest.—George Eliot.

O marriage! marriage! what a curse is thine,
Where hands alone consent and hearts abhor.
—Hill.

Wedlock's a saucy, sad, familiar state,
Where folks are very apt to scold and hate.
—Dr. Wolcot.

God has set the type of marriage everywhere throughout the creation.—Luther.

She's not well married, that lives married long;
But she's best married, that dies married young.
—Shakespeare.

When I said I would die a bachelor, I did not think I should live till I were married.—Shakespeare.

Heaven will be no heaven to me if I do not meet my wife there.—Andrew Jackson.

No navigator has yet traced lines of latitude and longitude on the conjugal sea.—Balzac.

There is more of good nature than of good sense at the bottom of most marriages.—Thoreau.

For parents to restrain the inclinations of their children in marriage is an usurped power.—Fielding.

The Italians have this proverb: In buying houses and taking a wife, shut your eyes and commend yourself to God.—Duclos.

Let still the woman take an elder than herself; so wears she to him, so sways she level in her husband's heart.—Shakespeare.

It goes far towards reconciling me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of ever marrying one.—Lady Montagu.

Men should keep their eyes wide open before marriage, and half shut afterwards.—Mlle. Scudéri.

If people only made prudent marriages, what a stop to population there would be!—Thackeray.

God, the best maker of all marriages, combine your hearts in one, your realms in one.—Shakespeare.

Marriage, by making us more contented, causes us often to be less enterprising.—Bovee.

When a man and woman are married, their romance ceases and their history commences.—Rochebrune.

There cannot be any great happiness in the married life except each in turn give up his or her own humors and lesser inclinations.—Richardson.

When thou choosest a wife, think not only of thyself, but of those God may give thee of her, that they reproach thee not for their being.—Tupper.

Marriage is the best state for man in general; and every man is a worse man in proportion as he is unfit for the married state.—Johnson.

Love in marriage should be the accomplishment of a beautiful dream, and not, as it too often proves, the end.—Alphonse Karr.

The reason why so few marriages are happy is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages.—Swift.

The first bond of society is marriage; the next, our children; then the whole family and all things in common.—Cicero.

Her gentle spirit commits itself to yours to be directed, as from her lord, her governor, her king.—Shakespeare.

Marriage to maids is like a war to men; The battle causes fear, but the sweet hopes Of winning at the last, still draws 'em in.
—Nat. Lee.

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief.—Bacon.

They that marry ancient people, merely in expectation to bury them, hang themselves, in hope that one will come out and cut the halter.—Thomas Fuller.

For what thou art is mine:
Our state cannot be sever'd; we are one,
One flesh; to lose thee were to lose myself.
—Milton.

It happens, as with cages, the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair of getting out.—Montaigne.

And, to all married men, be this a caution,
Which they should duly tender as their
life,
Neither to doat too much, nor doubt a wife.
—Massinger.

I have met with women whom I really think would like to be married to a Poem, and to be given away by a Novel.—Keats.

From my experience, not one in twenty marries the first love; we build statues of snow and weep to see them melt.—Walter Scott.

But happy they, the happiest of their kind!
Whom gentle stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend.
—Thomson.

As a walled town is more worthier than a village, so is the forehead of a married man more honorable than the bare brow of a bachelor.—Shakespeare.

But earthlier happy is the rose distilled than that which, withering on the virgin thorn, grows, lives, and dies in single blessedness.—Shakespeare.

To be man's tender mate was woman born, and in obeying nature she best serves the purposes of heaven.
—Schiller.

It is to be feared that they who marry where they do not love will love where they do not marry.—Fuller.

To love early and marry late is to hear a lark singing at dawn, and at night to eat it roasted for supper.—Richter.

However old a conjugal union, it still garners some sweetness. Winter has some cloudless days, and under the snow a few flowers still bloom.—Mme. de Staël.

From that day forth, in peace and joyous bliss

They liv'd together long without debate;
Nor private jars, nor spite of enemies,
Could shake the safe assurance of their state.—Spenser.

The kindest and the happiest pair
Will find occasion to forbear;
And something, ev'ry day they live,
To pity, and perhaps forgive.—Cowper.

Man and wife are equally concerned, to avoid all offence of each other, in the beginning of their conversation. Every little thing can blast an infant blossom.—Jeremy Taylor.

Such a large sweet fruit is a complete marriage, that it needs a very long summer to ripen in and then a long winter to mellow and season it.—Theodore Parker.

Every effort is made in forming matrimonial alliances to reconcile matters relating to fortune, but very little is paid to the congeniality of dispositions, or to the accordance of hearts.—Massillon.

No jealousy their dawn of love o'ercast,
Nor blasted were their wedded days with strife;
Each season look'd delightful as it past,
To the fond husband, and the faithful wife.—Beattie.

Happy and thrice happy are they who enjoy an uninterrupted union, and whose love, unbroken by any complaints, shall not dissolve until the last day.—Horace.

A good wife is like the ivy which beautifies the building to which it clings, twining its tendrils more lovingly as time converts the ancient edifice into a ruin.—Dr. Johnson.

God has set the type of marriage everywhere throughout the creation. Each creature seeks its perfection in another. The very heavens and earth picture it to us.—Luther.

Let us no more contend, nor blame
Each other, blamed enough elsewhere, but strive
In offices of love, how we may lighten
Each other's burden, in our share of woe.—Milton.

She is mine own,
And I as rich in having such a jewel
As twenty seas, if all their sand were pearl,
The water nectar and the rocks pure gold.—Shakespeare.

A man may be chieerrui and contented in celibacy, but I do not think he can ever be happy; it is an unnatural state, and the best feelings of his nature are never called into action.—Southey.

Wedlock's a saucy, sad, familiar state,
Where folks are very apt to scold and hate:—
Love keeps a modest distance, is divine,
Obliging, and says ev'ry thing that's fine.—Peter Pindar.

An unhappy gentleman, resolving to wed nothing short of perfection, keeps his heart and hand till both get so old and withered that no tolerable woman will accept them.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

The joys of marriage are the heaven on earth,
Life's paradise, great princess, the soul's quiet,
Sinews of concord, earthly immortality,
Eternity of pleasures.—John Ford.

Marriage, from love, like vinegar from wine—
A sad, sour, sober beverage—by time
Is sharpened from its high celestial flavor
Down to a very homely household savor.—Byron.

All of a tenor was their after-life,
No day discolor'd with domestic strife;
No jealousy, but mutual truth believed,
Secure repose, and kindness undeceiv'd.—Dryden.

The man at the head of the house can mar the pleasure of the household; but he cannot make it. That must rest with the woman, and it is her greatest privilege.—Helps.

I am asham'd, that women are so simple
To offer war, where they should kneel for peace
Or seek for rule, supremacy, and sway,
When they are bound to serve, love, and obey. —Shakespeare.

What is wedlock forced, but a hell,
An age of discord and continual strife?
Whereas the contrary bringeth forth bliss,
And is a pattern of celestial peace.
—Shakespeare.

She shall watch all night:
And if she chance to nod I'll rail and brawl
And with the clamour keep her still awake.
This is the way to kill a wife with kindness.
—Shakespeare.

It resembles a pair of shears, so joined that they cannot be separated;
often moving in opposite directions, yet always punishing any one who comes between them.—Sydney Smith.

A man of sense and education should meet a suitable companion in a wife. It is a miserable thing when the conversation can only be such as whether the mutton should be boiled or roasted, and probably a dispute about that.—Dr. Johnson.

An idol may be undefied by many accidental causes. Marriage, in particular, is a kind of counter-apotheosis, or a deification inverted. When a man becomes familiar with his goddess, she quickly sinks into a woman.
—Addison.

Marriage enlarges the scene of our happiness and miseries. A marriage of love is pleasant; a marriage of interest, easy; and a marriage where both meet, happy. A happy marriage has in it all the pleasures of friendship, all the enjoyments of sense and reason, and, indeed, all the sweets of life.—Addison.

The most unhappy circumstance of all is, when each party is always laying up fuel for dissension, and gathering together a magazine of provocations to exasperate each other with when they are out of humor.—Steele.

As a looking-glass, if it is a true one, faithfully represents the face of him that looks in it, so a wife ought to fashion herself to the affection of her husband not to be cheerful when he is sad, nor sad when he is cheerful.
—Erasmus.

As unto the bow the cord is,
So unto the man is woman;
Though she bends him she obeys him
Though she draws him, yet she follows,
Useless each without the other!
—Longfellow.

Here love his golden shafts employs, here lights
His constant lamp, and waves his purple
wings,
Reigns here and revels. —Rowley.

Therefore God's universal law
Gave to the man despotic power
Over his female in due awe,
Not from that right to part an hour,
Smile she or lour. —Milton.

In the opinion of the world, marriage ends all; as it does in a comedy.
The truth is precisely the reverse. It begins all. So they say of death, "It is the end of all things." Yes, just as much as marriage.—Madame Swetchine.

That alliance may be said to have a double tie, where the minds are united as well as the body; and the union will have all its strength when both the links are in perfection together.—
Colton.

Are we not one? are we not join'd by heav'n?
Each interwoven with the other's fate?
Are we not mix'd like streams of meeting rivers
Whose blended waters are no more distinguish'd,
But roll into the sea one common flood?
—Rowe.

He that marries is like the doge who was married to the Adriatic. He knows not what there is in that which he marries; mayhap treasures and pearls, mayhap monsters and tempests, await him.—Heinrich Heine.

I believe marriages would in general be as happy, and often more so, if they were all made by the lord chancellor, upon a due consideration of the characters and circumstances, without the parties having any choice in the matter.—Dr. Johnson.

The moment a woman marries, some terrible revolution happens in her system; all her good qualities vanish, presto, like eggs out of a conjuror's box. 'Tis true that they appear on the other side of the box, but for the husband they are gone forever.—Bulwer.

Though fools spurn Hymen's gentle powers,
We, who improve his golden hours,

By sweet experience know
That marriage rightly understood,
Gives to the tender and the good
A paradise below. —Cotton.

Up to twenty-one, I hold a father to have power over his children as to marriage; after that age, authority and influence only. Show me one couple unhappy merely on account of their limited circumstances, and I will show you ten who are wretched from other causes.—Coleridge.

It is a mistake to consider marriage merely as a scheme of happiness. It is also a bond of service. It is the most ancient form of that social ministration which God has ordained for all human beings, and which is symbolized by all the relations of nature.—Chapin.

It is the most momentous question a woman is ever called upon to decide, whether the faults of the man she loves are beyond remedy and will drag her down, or whether she is competent to be his earthly redeemer and lift him to her own level.—Holmes.

Save the love we pay to heaven, there is none purer, holier, than that a virtuous woman feels for him she would cleave through life to. Sisters part from sisters, brothers from brothers, children from their parents, but such woman from the husband of her choice never!—Sheridan Knowles.

When it shall please God to bring thee to man's estate, use great providence and circumspection in choosing thy wife. For from thence will spring all thy future good or evil; and it is an action of life, like unto a stratagem of war; wherein a man can err but once!—Sir P. Sidney.

It is a delightful thought, that, during the familiarity of constant proximity, the heart gathers up in silence the nutriment of love, as the diamond, even beneath water, imbibes the light it emits. Time, which deadens hatred, secretly strengthens love.—Richter.

Across the threshold led,
And every tear kissed off as soon as shed,
His house she enters, there to be a light,
Shining within, when all without is night;
A guardian angel o'er his life presiding,
Doubling his pleasures, and his cares dividing!
—Rogers.

He is the half-part of a blessed man
Left to be finished by such a she;
And she a fair divided excellence,
Whose fulness of perfection lies in him.
O, two such silver currents, when they join,
Do glorify the banks that bound them in!
—Shakespeare.

Such duty as the subject owes the prince,
Even such a woman oweth to her husband;
And, when she's froward, peevish, sullen,
sour,
And not obedient to his honest will,
What is she, but a foul contending rebel,
And graceless traitor to her loving lord?
—Shakespeare.

Before I trust my Fate to thee,
Or place my hand in thine,
Before I let thy Future give Color and form to mine,
Before I peril all for thee,
Question thy soul to-night for me.
—Adelaide Ann Procter.

Marriage is the strictest tie of perpetual friendship, and there can be no friendship without confidence, and no confidence without integrity: and he must expect to be wretched, who pays to beauty, riches, or politeness that regard which only virtue and piety can claim.—Dr. Johnson.

Mothers who force their daughters into interested marriage, are worse than the Ammonites who sacrificed their children to Moloch—the latter undergoing a speedy death, the former suffering years of torture, but too frequently leading to the same result.—Lord Rochester.

True it is, as society is instituted, marriage becomes somewhat of a lottery, for all its votaries are either the victims of Cupid or cupidity; in either instance, they are under the blinding influence of passion, and consequently but little subject to the control of reason.—Frederic Saunders.

The good husband keeps his wife in the wholesome ignorance of unnecessary secrets. They will not be starved with the ignorance, who perchance may surfeit with the knowledge of weighty counsels, too heavy for the weaker sex to bear. He knows little who will tell his wife all he knows.—Steele.

Deceive not thyself by over-expecting happiness in the marriage state. Look not therein for contentment greater than God will give, or a creature in this world can receive, namely, to be free from all inconveniences. Marriage is not, like the hill of Olympus, wholly clear without clouds.—Fuller.

Jars concealed are half reconciled; 'tis a double task, to stop the breach at home and men's mouths abroad. To this end, a good husband never publicly reproves his wife. An open reproof puts her to do penance before all that are present; after which, many study rather revenge than reformation.—Fuller.

Were a man not to marry a second time, it might be concluded that his first wife had given him a disgust for marriage; but by taking a second wife he pays the highest compliment to the first by showing that she made him so happy as a married man that he wishes to be so a second time.—Dr. Johnson.

The good wife is none of our dainty dames, who love to appear in a variety of suits every day new; as if a good gown, like a stratagem in war, were to be used but once. But our good wife sets up a sail according to the keel of her husband's estate; and if of high parentage, she doth not so remember what she was by birth, that she forgets what she is by match.—Fuller.

Two persons who have chosen each other out of all the species with a design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment have, in that action, bound themselves to be good-humored, affable, discreet, forgiving, patient, and joyful, with respect to each other's frailties and perfections, to the end of their lives.—Addison.

Thou art mine, thou hast given thy word,
Close, close in my arms thou art clinging;
Alone for my ear thou art singing
A song which no stranger hath heard:
But afar from me yet, like a bird,
Thy soul in some region unstir'd
On its mystical circuit is winging.
—E. C. Stedman.

A married man falling into misfortune is more apt to retrieve his situation in the world than a single one, chiefly because his spirits are soothed and retrieved by domestic endearments, and his self-respect kept alive by finding that although all abroad be darkness and humiliation, yet there is a little world of love at home over which he is a monarch.—Jeremy Taylor.

We are not very much to blame for our bad marriages. We live amid hallucinations, and this especial trap is laid to trip up our feet with, and all are tripped up first or last. But the mighty mother, who had been so sly with us, as if she felt she owed us some indemnity, insinuates into the Pandora box of marriage some deep and serious benefits, and some great joys.—Emerson.

As a great part of the uneasiness of matrimony arises from mere trifles, it would be wise in every young married man to enter into an agreement with his wife, that in all disputes of this kind the party who was most convinced they were right should always surrender the victory. By which means both would be more forward to give up the cause.—Fielding.

Marriage has in it less of beauty, but more of safety, than the single life; it hath not more ease, but less danger; it is more merry and more sad; it is fuller of sorrows and fuller of joys; it lies under more burdens, but is supported by all the strengths of love and charity; and those burdens are delightful.—Jeremy Taylor.

There's a bliss beyond all that the minstrel has told,
When two, that are link'd in one heavenly tie,
With heart never changing, and brow never cold,
Love on thro' all ills, and love on till they die.
One hour of a passion so sacred is worth
Whole ages of heartless and wandering bliss;
And oh! if there be an Elysium on earth,
It is this—it is this! —Moore.

Cling closer, closer, life to life,
Cling closer, heart to heart;
The time will come, my own wed Wife,
When you and I must part!
Let nothing break our band but Death,
For in the world above
'Tis the breaker Death that soldereth
Our ring of Wedded Love.
—Gerald Massey.

To tell the truth, however, family and poverty have done more to support me than I have to support them. They have compelled me to make exertions that I hardly thought myself capable of; and often when on the eve of despairing, they have forced me, like a coward in a corner, to fight like a hero, not for myself, but for my wife and little ones.—Power.

The best time for marriage will be towards thirty, for as the younger times are unfit, either to choose or to govern a wife and family, so, if thou stay long, thou shalt hardly see the education of thy children, who, being left to strangers, are in effect lost; and better were it to be unborn than ill-bred; for thereby thy posterity shall either perish, or remain a shame to thy name.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Marriages on earth—because they are the seminaries of the human race and of the angels of heaven also; because, likewise, they proceed from a spiritual origin, that is, from the marriage of good and truth; and since, in addition, the Lord's divine proceeding principally flows into conjugal love—are most holy in the estimation of the angels.—Swedenborg.

Oh, happy, happy, thrice happy state,
When such a bright Planet governs the fate
Of a pair of united lovers!
'Tis theirs' in spite of the Serpent's hiss,
To enjoy the pure primeval kiss
With as much of the old original bliss
As mortality ever recovers! —Hood.

The husband's sullen, dogged, shy,
The wife grows flippant in reply;
He loves command and due restriction,
And she as well likes contradiction.
She never slavishly submits;
She'll have her way, or have her fits.
He his way tugs, she t'other draws;
The man grows jealous and with cause.
—Gay.

She that hath a wise husband must entice him to an eternal dearness by the veil of modesty and the grave robes of chastity, the ornament of meekness and the jewels of faith and charity. She must have no painting but blushings; her brightness must be purity, and she must shine round about with sweetness and friendship; and she shall be pleasant while she lives, and desired when she dies.—Jeremy Taylor.

To the nuptial bower
I led her, blushing like the morn; all
Heaven,
And happy constellations on that hour
Shed their selectest influence; the earth
Gave sign of gratulation, and each hill;
Joyous the birds; fresh gales and gentle airs Whisper'd it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, flung odours from the spicy shrub. —Milton.

My fond affection thou hast seen,
Then judge of my regret
To think more happy thou hadst been
If we had never met!
And has that thought been shared by thee?
Ah, no! that smiling cheek
Proves more unchanging love for me
Than labor'd words could speak.
—Thos. Haynes Bayly.

A good wife is heaven's last best gift to man; his angel and minister of graces innumerable; his gem of many virtues: his casket of jewels: her voice his sweet music; her smiles his brightest day; her kiss the guardian of his innocence; her arms the pale of his safety, the balm of his health, the balsam of his life; her industry, his surest wealth; her economy, his safest steward; her lips, his faithful counselors; her bosom, the softest pillow of his cares; and her prayers, the ablest advocates of heaven's blessings on his head.—Jeremy Taylor.

Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign: one that cares for thee,

And for thy maintenance: commits his body
To painful labor, both by sea and land;
To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,

While thou liest warm at home, secure and safe,

And craves no other tribute at thy hands,
But love, fair looks, and true obedience;
Too little payment for so great a debt.

—Shakespeare.

Why do not words, and kiss, and solemn pledge,

And nature that is kind in woman's breast,
And reason that in man is wise and good,
And fear of Him who is a righteous Judge,—

Why do not these prevail for human life,
To keep two hearts together, that began
Their spring-time with one love.

—Wordsworth.

Oh, the music and beauty of life lose their worth,

When one heart only joys in their smile;
But the union of hearts gives that pleasure its birth,

Which beams on the darkest and coldest of earth

Like the sun on his own chosen isle;

It gives to the fireside of winter the light,

The glow and the glitter of spring—

O sweet are the hours, when two fond hearts unite,

As softly they glide, in their innocent flight
Away on a motionless wing.

—Bohn.

Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities and churches, and heaven itself.

* * * Marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house, and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labors and unites into societies and republics, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys their king, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good things to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world.—Jeremy Taylor.

Cursed be the man, the poorest wretch in life,

The crouching vassal to the tyrant wife,
Who has no will but by her high permission;
Who has not sixpence but in her possession;
Who must to her his dear friend's secret tell;

Who dreads a curtain lecture worse than hell.

Were such the wife had fallen to my part,
I'd break her spirit or I'd break her heart.

—Burns.

How near am I to happiness

That earth exceeds not? not another like it.
The treasures of the deep are not so precious,

As are the conceal'd comforts of a man

Lock'd up in woman's love. I scent the air
Of blessings, when I come but near the house;

What a delicious breath marriage sends forth.

The violet-bed's not sweeter. Honest wedding

Is like a banqueting-house built in a garden,
On which the spring's chaste flowers take delight

To cast their modest odors. —Middleton.

But happy they! the happiest of their kind!
Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend

'T is not the coarser tie of human laws,
Unnatural oft, and foreign to the mind,
That binds their peace, but harmony itself,
Attuning all their passions into love

Where friendship full exerts her softest power

Perfect esteem enlivened by desire

Ineffable, and sympathy of soul;

Thought meeting thought, and will preventing will

With boundless confidence: for nought but love

Can answer love, and render bliss secure.

—Thomson.

Have ever more care that thou be beloved of thy wife, rather than thyself besotted on her; and thou shalt judge of her love by these two observations: first, if thou perceive she have a care of thy estate, and exercise herself therein; the other, if she study to please thee, and be sweet unto thee in conversation, without thy instruction; for love needs no teaching nor precept.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

And now your matrimonial Cupid,
Lash'd on by time, grows tired and stupid.
For story and experience tell us
That man grows old and woman jealous.
Both would their little ends secure;
He sighs for freedom, she for power:
His wishes tend abroad to roam,
And hers to domineer at home.—Prior.

Ev'n in the happiest choice, where fav'ring
heaven
Has equal love and easy fortune giv'n,— Think not, the husband gain'd, that all is done;
The prize of happiness must still be won:
And, oft, the careless find it to their cost,
The lover in the husband may be lost;
The graces might alone his heart allure;
They and the virtues, meeting, must secure. —Lord Lyttelton.

1. The very nearest approach to domestic happiness on earth is in the cultivation on both sides of absolute selfishness.

2. Never both be angry at once.

3. Never talk at one another, either alone or in company.

4. Never speak loud to one another unless the house is on fire.

5. Let each one strive to yield oftenest to the wishes of the other.

6. Let self-denial be the daily aim and practice of each.

7. Never find fault unless it is perfectly certain that a fault has been committed, and always speak lovingly.

8. Never taunt with a past mistake.

9. Neglect the whole world besides rather than one another.

10. Never allow a request to be repeated.

11. Never make a remark at the expense of each other,—it is a meanness.

12. Never part for a day without loving words to think of during absence.

13. Never meet without a loving welcome.

14. Never let the sun go down upon any anger or grievance.

15. Never let any fault you have committed go by until you have frankly confessed it and asked forgiveness.

16. Never forget the happy hours of early love.

17. Never sigh over what might have been, but make the best of what is.

18. Never forget that marriage is ordained of God, and that His blessing alone can make it what it should ever be.

19. Never be contented till you know you are both walking in the narrow way.

20. Never let your hopes stop short of the eternal home.—Cottager and Artisan.

Maxims

Good maxims are the germs of all excellence.—Joubert.

Strongly stamped, medallion-like sayings.—Emerson.

Collect as precious pearls the words of the wise and virtuous.—Abd-el-Kader.

Axioms are delightful in theory, but impossible in practice.—Rivarol.

Maxims are the condensed good sense of nations.—Sir J. Mackintosh.

Maxims are often quoted by those who stand in more need of their application.—James Ellis.

A maxim is like the seed of a plant, which the soul it is thrown into must expand into leaves and flowers and fruit.—Mme. de Sartory.

Maxims are to the intellect what laws are to actions; they do not enlighten, but they guide and direct, and, although themselves blind, are protective.—Joubert.

I am of opinion that there is no proverb which is not true, because they are all sentences drawn from experience itself, the mother of all the sciences.—Cervantes.

A maxim is a conclusion upon observation of matters of fact, and is merely speculative; a "principle" carries knowledge within itself, and is prospective.—Coleridge.

May

O month when they who love must love and wed.—Helen Hunt Jackson.

As full of spirit as the month of May.—Shakespeare.

But winter lingering chills the lap of May.—Goldsmith.

For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May.—
Tennyson.

Among the changing months, May stands confessed
The sweetest, and in fairest colors dressed.
—Thomson.

When April steps aside for May,
Like diamonds all the rain-drops glisten;
Fresh violets open every day:
To some new bird each hour we listen.
—Lucy Larcom.

Sweet May hath come to love us,
Flowers, trees, their blossoms don;
And through the blue heavens above us
The very clouds move on.
—Heine.

For thee, sweet month, the groves green
liveries wear.
If not the first, the fairest of the year;
For thee the Graces lead the dancing hours,
And Nature's ready pencil paints the flowers.
When thy short reign is past, the feverish
sun
'The sultry tropic fears, and moves more slowly on.
—Dryden.

'Tis like the birthday of the world,
When earth was born in bloom;
The light is made of many dyes,
The air is all perfume:
There's crimson buds, and white and blue,
The very rainbow showers
Have turned to blossoms where they fell,
And sown the earth with flowers.
—Hood.

Now the bright morning star, day's har-
binger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with
her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip, and the pale primrose.
Hail, bounteous May, that doth inspire
Mirth, and youth, and warm desire;
Woods and groves are of thy dressing,
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing,
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee, and wish thee long.
—Milton.

Meanness

The mean man suffers more from his selfishness than he from whom meanness withholds some important benefit.—Emerson.

A nation cannot afford to do a mean thing.—Charles Sumner.

An infallible characteristic of meanness is cruelty.—Johnson.

There has never been a man mean and at the same time virtuous.—Confucius.

There are some things I am afraid of: I am afraid to do a mean thing.—
James A. Garfield.

We can easily forgive want of means; but littleness, with means, is disgusting.—Mme. de Lambert.

Who gives a trifle meanly, is meaner
than the trifle.—Lavater.

There is something in meanness which excites a species of resentment that never subsides, and something in cruelty which stirs up the heart to the highest agony of human hatred.—
Thomas Paine.

I have great hope of a wicked man, slender hope of a mean one. A wicked man may be converted and become a prominent saint. A mean man ought to be converted six or seven times, one right after the other, to give him a fair start and put him on an equality with a bold, wicked man.—Beecher.

I have so great a contempt and detestation for meanness, that I could sooner make a friend of one who had committed murder, than of a person who could be capable, in any instance, of the former vice. Under meanness,
I comprehend dishonesty; under dishonesty, ingratitude; under ingratutude, irreligion; and under this latter, every species of vice and immorality
in human nature.—Sterne.

Meddlers

A long-tongued, babbling gossip.—
Shakespeare.

We should enjoy more peace if we did not busy ourselves with the words and deeds of other men, which appertain not to our charge.—Jeremy Taylor.

Ah, how happy would many lives be if individuals troubled themselves as little about other people's affairs as about their own!—Lichtenberg.

Medicine

I firmly believe that if the whole materia medica could be sunk to the bottom of the sea, it would be all the better for mankind and all the worse for the fishes.—O. W. Holmes.

The poets did well to conjoin music and medicine, because the office of medicine is but to tune the curious harp of man's body.—Bacon.

The medicine increases the disease.—Virgil.

Learn from the beasts the physic of the field.—Pope.

Time is generally the best doctor.—Ovid.

Some remedies are worse than the disease.—Syrus.

Extreme remedies are very appropriate for extreme diseases.—Hippocrates.

By medicine life may be prolonged, yet death
Will seize the doctor too. —Shakespeare.

So liv'd our sires, ere doctors learn'd to kill,
And multiplied with theirs the weekly bill.
—Dryden.

Joy, temperance, and repose,
Siam the door on the doctor's nose.
—Longfellow.

Physicians, of all men, are most happy; whatever good success soever they have, the world proclaimeth; and what faults they commit, the earth covereth.—Quarles.

The disease and its medicine are like two factions in a besieged town; they tear one another to pieces, but both unite against their common enemy, nature.—Jeffrey.

Better to hunt in fields for health unbought,
Than fee the doctor for a nauseous draught.
The wise for cure on exercise depend;
God never made his work for man to mend.
—Dryden.

Before the curing of a strong disease,
Even in the instant of repair and health,
The fit is strongest; evils that take leave,
On their departure most of all show evil.
—Shakespeare.

But nothing is more estimable than a physician who, having studied nature from his youth, knows the properties of the human body, the diseases which assail it, the remedies which will benefit it, exercises his art with caution, and pays equal attention to the rich and the poor.—Voltaire.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd,
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
And with some sweet oblivious antidote
Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff
Which weighs upon the heart?
Therein the patient
Must minister to himself.
Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it.
—Shakespeare.

Mediocrity

Mediocrity is beneath a brave soul.—Lady Blessington.

Half talent is no talent.—Layater.

I find that most people are made only for the common uses of life.—John Foster.

Nothing is thoroughly approved but mediocrity. The majority have established this.—Pascal.

Mediocrity makes the most of its native possessions.—Pascal.

Mediocrity is excellence to the eyes of mediocre people.—Joubert.

Most people would succeed in small things, if they were not troubled with great ambitions.—Longfellow.

Mediocrity can talk; but it is for genius to observe.—Disraeli.

Mediocrity is less sensitive than genius, and therefore suffers less under nearly any possible exigency.—William Winter.

A quiet mediocrity is still to be preferred before a troubled superfluity.—Suckling.

The art of putting well into play mediocre qualities often begets more reputation than true merit achieves.—Rochefoucauld.

Mediocrity is not allowed to poets, either by the gods or men.—Horace.

Minds of moderate calibre ordinarily condemn everything which is beyond their range.—Rochefoucauld.

Persevering mediocrity is much more respectable, and unspeakably more useful, than talented inconstancy.—Dr. James Hamilton.

The virtue of the soul does not consist in flying high, but walking orderly; its grandeur does not exercise itself in grandeur, but in mediocrity.—Montaigne.

Mediocrity is now, as formerly, dangerous, commonly fatal, to the poet; but among even the successful writers of prose, those who rise sensibly above it are the very rarest exceptions.—Gladstone.

How many of these minds are there to whom scarcely any good can be done! They have no excitability. You are attempting to kindle a fire of stone. You must leave them as you find them, in permanent mediocrity.—John Foster.

Among many parallels which men of imagination have drawn between the natural and moral state of the world, it has been observed that happiness as well as virtue consists in mediocrity.—Dr. Johnson.

The highest order of mind is accused of folly, as well as the lowest. Nothing is thoroughly approved but mediocrity. The majority has established this, and it fixes its fangs on whatever gets beyond it either way.—Pascal.

We meet with few utterly dull and stupid souls: the sublime and transcendent are still fewer; the generality of mankind stand between these two extremes: the interval is filled with multitudes of ordinary geniuses, but all very useful, and the ornaments and supports of the commonwealth.—La Bruyère.

There are circumstances of peculiar difficulty and danger, where a mediocrity of talent is the most fatal quantum that a man can possibly possess. Had Charles the First and Louis the Sixteenth been more wise or more weak, more firm or more yielding, in either case they had both of them saved their heads.—Colton.

The maxim of Cleobulus, "Mediocrity is best," has been long considered a universal principle, extending through the whole compass of life and nature. The experience of every age seems to have given it new confirmation, and to show that nothing, however specious or alluring, is pursued with propriety or enjoyed with safety beyond certain limits.—Dr. Johnson.

Meditation

He is divinely bent on meditation.—Shakespeare.

Chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancy.—Shakespeare.

In maiden meditation, fancy-free.—Shakespeare.

Meditation is the tongue of the soul and the language of our spirit.—Jeremy Taylor.

Thy thoughts to nobler meditations give,
And study how to die, not how to live.
—Lord Lansdowne.

Meditation is the soul's perspective glass, whereby, in her long remove, she discerneth God, as if He were nearer at hand.—Owen Feltham.

The man of meditation is happy, not for an hour or a day, but quits round the circle of his years.—Isaac Taylor.

Divinely bent to meditation;
And in no worldly suits would he be mov'd,
To draw him from his holy exercise.
—Shakespeare.

It is not he that reads most, but he that meditates most on Divine truth, that will prove the choicest, wisest, strongest Christian.—Bishop Hall.

Where a man has a passion for meditating without the capacity of thinking, a particular idea fixes itself fast, and soon creates a mental disease.—Goethe.

Though reading and conversation may furnish us with many ideas of men and things, yet it is our own meditation must form our judgment.—Dr. I. Watts.

Meditation is that exercise of the mind by which it recalls a known truth,—as some kinds of creatures do their food, to be ruminated upon.—Bishop Horne.

Meditation is the life of the soul; action is the soul of meditation; honor is the reward of action; so meditate, that thou mayst do; so do, that thou mayst purchase honor; for which purchase, give God the glory.—Quarles.

The art of meditation may be exercised at all hours, and in all places; and men of genius, in their walks, at table, and amidst assemblies, turning the eye of the mind inwards, can form an artificial solitude; retired amidst a crowd, calm amidst distraction, and wise amidst folly.—Isaac Disraeli.

Profound meditation in solitude and silence frequently exalts the mind above its natural tone, fires the imagination, and produces the most refined and sublime conceptions. The soul then tastes the purest and most refined delight, and almost loses the idea of existence in the intellectual pleasure it receives. The mind on every motion darts through space into eternity; and raised, in its free enjoyment of its powers by its own enthusiasm, strengthens itself in the habitude of contemplating the noblest subjects, and of adopting the most heroic pursuits.—Zimmermann.

Meditation is the tongue of the soul and the language of our spirit; and our wandering thoughts in prayer are but the neglects of meditation and recessions from that duty; and according as we neglect meditation, so are our prayers imperfect, meditation being the soul of prayer and the intention of our spirit.—Jeremy Taylor.

Happy the heart that keeps its twilight hour,
And, in the depths of heavenly peace reclined,
Loves to commune with thoughts of tender power,
Thoughts that ascend, like angels beautiful,
A shining Jacob's-ladder of the mind!
—Paul H. Hayne.

Meditation is a busy search in the storehouse of phantasy for some ideas of matters, to be cast in the moulds of resolution into some forms of words or actions; in which search, when I have used my greatest diligence, I find this is the best conclusion, that to meditate on the best is the best of meditations; and a resolution to make a good end is a good end of my resolutions.—Arthur Warwick.

Meekness

O blessed well of love! O flower of grace.—Spenser.

He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth: He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth.—Bible.

Meekness is the grace which, from beneath God's footstool, lifts up a candid and confiding eye, accepting God's smile of Fatherly affection, and adoring those perfections which it cannot comprehend.—James Hamilton.

The flower of meekness on a stem of grace.—James Montgomery.

Meeting

The joy of meeting not unmixed with pain.—Longfellow.

In life there are meetings which seem Like a fate. —Lord Lytton.

Absence, with all its pains,
Is by this charming moment wip'd away.
—Thomson.

The joys of meeting pay the pangs of absence; else who could bear it?
—Rowe.

Ah me! the world is full of meetings such as this,—a thrill, a voiceless challenge and reply, and sudden part-ings after!—Willis.

As two floating planks meet and part on the sea,
O friend! so I met and then drifted from thee. —Wm. R. Alger.

Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in
the darkness:
So on the ocean of life, we pass and speak
one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness
again and a silence. —Longfellow.

Sir, you are very welcome to our house; it must appear in other ways than words, therefore I scant this breathing courtesy.—Shakespeare.

Melancholy

Demoniac frenzy, moping melancholy.—Milton.

Melancholy is the nurse of frenzy.
—Shakespeare.

Melancholy is the pleasure of being sad.—Victor Hugo.

A lazy frost, a numbness of the mind.—Dryden.

I can suck melancholy out of a song.
—Shakespeare.

There is not a string attuned to mirth but has its chord of melancholy.—Hood.

Great men are always of a nature originally melancholy.—Aristotle.

Melancholy is the convalescence of grief.—Madame Dufrenoy.

Melancholy is a fearful gift. What is it but the telescope of truth!—
Byron.

No grief so soft, no pain so sweet,
as love's delicious melancholy.—Mrs.
Osgood.

How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world!—Shakespeare.

It is impious in a good man to be sad.—Shakespeare.

Employment and hardships prevent melancholy.—Johnson.

Nothing is so dainty sweet as lovely melancholy.—Samuel Fletcher.

Melancholy advanceth men's con-ceits more than any humor whatever.
—Burton.

O melancholy, who ever yet could sound thy bottom?—Shakespeare.

We're not ourselves when Nature, being oppressed, commands the mind
to suffer with the body.—Shakespeare.

Religion is no friend to laziness and stupidity, or to supine and sottish despondencies of mind.—Jeremy Taylor.

Melancholy
Is not, as you conceive, indisposition
Of body, but the mind's disease.
—John Ford.

Melancholy spreads itself betwixt heaven and earth, like envy between man and man, and is an everlasting mist.—Byron.

Oh, if you knew the pensive pleasure
That fills my bosom when I sigh,
You would not rob me of a treasure
Monarchs are too poor to buy.
—Sam'l Rogers.

In sooth, I know not why I am so sad; it wearies me. You say it wearies you; but how I caught it, found it, or came by it, what stuff 'tis made of, whereof it is born, I am to learn.—Shakespeare.

If you are melancholy for the first time, you will find, upon a little inquiry, that others have been melancholy many times, and yet are cheerful now.—Leigh Hunt.

Melancholy sees the worst of things,—things as they may be, and not as they are. It looks upon a beautiful face, and sees but a grinning skull.—Bovee.

There were moments of despondency when Shakespeare thought himself no poet, and Raphael no painter; when the greatest wits have doubted the excellence of their happiest efforts.—Colton.

With eyes uprais'd, as one inspir'd,
Pale melancholy sat retir'd,
And from her wild sequester'd seat,
In notes by distance made more sweet,
Pour'd through the mellow horn her pensive soul.
—Collins.

When soured by disappointment, we must endeavor to pursue some fixed and pleasing course of study, that there may be no blank leaf in our book of life. Painful and disagreeable ideas vanish from the mind that can fix its attention upon any subject.—Zimmermann.

Whatever is highest and holiest is tinged with melancholy. The eye of genius has always a plaintive expression, and its natural language is pathos. A prophet is sadder than other men; and He who was greater than all prophets was "a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief."—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Ah, there are moments for us here, when, seeing Life's inequalities, and woe, and care,
The burdens laid upon our mortal being Seem heavier than the human heart can bear.
—Phoebe Cary.

There are some people who think that they should be always mourning, that they should put a continual constraint upon themselves, and feel a disgust for those amusements to which they are obliged to submit. For my own part, I confess that I know not how to conform myself to these rigid notions. I prefer something more simple, which I also think would be more pleasing to God.—Fénelon.

O'er the twilight groves and dusky caves,
Long-sounding aisles, and intermingled graves,
Black Melancholy sits, and round her throws
A death-like silence and a dread repose;
Her gloomy presence saddens all the scene,
Shades ev'ry flower, and darkens ev'ry green;
Deepens the murmur of the falling floods,
And breathes a browner horror on the woods.
—Pope.

I once gave a lady two-and-twenty receipts against melancholy: one was a bright fire; another, to remember all the pleasant things said to her; another, to keep a box of sugar-plums on the chimney-piece and a kettle simmering on the hob. I thought this mere trifling at the moment, but have in after life discovered how true it is that these little pleasures often banish melancholy better than higher and more exalted objects; and that no means ought to be thought too trifling which can oppose it either in ourselves or in others.—Sydney Smith.

I have neither the scholar's melancholy,
Which is emulation; nor the musician's,
Which is fantastical; nor the courtier's,
Which is pride; nor the soldier's, which is Ambition; nor the lawyer's, which is politic; Nor the lady's, which is nice; nor the lover's,
Which is all these: but it is a melancholy Of mine own; compounded of many simples, Extracted from many objects, and, indeed, The sundry contemplation of my travels; In which my often rumination wraps me In a most hum'rous sadness.
—Shakespeare.

Memory

Memory, bosom-spring of joy.—Coleridge.

No canvas absorbs color like memory.—Willmott.

Nothing now is left but a majestic memory.—Longfellow.

Grant but memory to us, and we can lose nothing by death.—Whittier.

A sealed book, at whose contents we tremble.—L. E. Landon.

Memory, the warder of the brain! —Shakespeare.

Memory is what makes us young or old.—Alfred de Musset.

Our memories are independent of our wills.—Sheridan.

And fondly mourn the dear delusions gone.—Prior.

We ne'er forget, tho' there we are forgot.—Byron.

Tho' lost to sight to mem'ry dear
Thou ever wilt remain.
—Geo. Linley.

O memory, thou bitter sweet,—both a joy and a scourge!—Madame de Staël.

The sweet remembrance of the just
Shall flourish when he sleeps in dust.
—Tate and Brady.

Memory tempers prosperity, mitigates adversity, controls youth, and delights old age.—Lactantius.

Memory is ever active, ever true. Alas, if it were only as easy to forget!—Ninon de Lenclos.

To live in hearts we leave behind,
Is not to die. —Campbell.

But O for the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still!—Tennyson.

To endeavor to forget any one is the certain way to think of nothing else.—La Bruyère.

It is the treasure-house of the mind, wherein the monuments thereof are kept and preserved.—Thomas Fuller.

Memory is not so brilliant as hope, but it is more beautiful, and a thousand times more true.—George D. Prentice.

Good things have to be engraved on the memory; bad ones stick there of themselves.—Charles Reade.

The leaves of memory seem to make a mournful rustle in the dark.—Longfellow.

When musing on companions gone,
We doubly feel ourselves alone.
—Scott.

A man's real possession is his memory. In nothing else is he rich, in nothing else is he poor.—Alexander Smith.

And scenes, long past, of joy and pain,
Came wildering o'er his aged brain.
—Scott.

The memory is the receptacle and sheath of all science.—Cicero.

What exile from his country is able to escape from himself.—Horace.

Thou comest as the memory of a dream, which now is sad because it hath been sweet.—Shelley.

Memory seldom fails when its office is to show us the tombs of our buried hopes.—Lady Blessington.

How can such deep-imprinted images sleep in us at times, till a word, a sound, awake them?—Lessing.

Memory is the treasury and guardian of all things.—Cicero.

We must always have old memories and young hopes.—Arsène Houssaye.

Experience teaches that a strong memory is generally joined to a weak judgment.—Montaigne.

Hail, Memory, hail! in thy exhaustless mine from age to age unnumbered treasures shine.—Rogers.

The life of the dead is placed in the memory of the living.—Cicero.

Of all the faculties of the mind, memory is the first that flourishes and the first that dies.—Colton.

While memory watches o'er the sad review of joys that faded like the morning dew.—Campbell.

Remembrance wakes with all her busy train, swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.—Goldsmith.

Memory is a paradise out of which fate cannot drive u.—Dumas, Fils.

Through the shadowy past, like a tomb-searcher, memory ran, lifting each shroud that time had cast o'er buried hopes.—Moore.

I have a room whereinto no one enters save I myself alone. There sits a blessed memory on a throne; there my life centres.—Christina G. Rossetti.

Remember thee!
Yea, from the table of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond records.
—Shakespeare.

A memory without blot or contamination must be an exquisite treasure, an inexhaustible source of pure refreshment.—Charlotte Brontë.

As the dew to the blossoms, the bud to the bee,
As the scent to the rose, are those memories to me. —Amelia B. Welby.

There is nothing steadfast in life but our memories. We are sure of keeping intact only that which we have lost.—Madame Swetchine.

Memory is the cabinet of imagination, the treasury of reason, the registry of conscience, and the council-chamber of thought.—Basile.

A land of promise, a land of memory,
A land of promise flowing with the milk
And honey of delicious memories!
—Tennyson.

Slight withal may be the things which bring back on the heart the weight which it would fling aside forever.—Byron.

Memory is the primary and fundamental power, without which there could be no other intellectual operation.—Johnson.

The memory is a treasurer to whom we must give funds, if we would draw the assistance we need.—Rowe.

Memory can glean, but can never renew. It brings us joys faint as is the perfume of the flowers, faded and dried, of the summer that is gone.—Beecher.

There are moments of life that we never forget, which brighten and brighten as time steals away.—J. G. Percival.

The erection of a monument is superfluous; the memory of us will last, if we have deserved it in our lives.—Pliny the Younger.

When time has assuaged the wounds of the mind, he who unseasonably reminds us of them, opens them afresh.—Ovid.

Ah! memories of sweet summer eves,
Of moonlit wave and willow way,
Of stars and flowers, and dewy leaves,
And smiles and tones more dear than they!
—Whittier.

The pure memories given
To help our joy on earth, when earth is past
Shall help our joy in heaven.
—Margaret J. Preston.

Though varying wishes, hopes, and fears,
Fever'd the progress of these years,
Yet now, days, weeks, and months but seem
The recollection of a dream. —Scott.

A place in thy memory, Dearest!
Is all that I claim:
To pause and look back when thou hearest
The sound of my name.
—Gerald Griffin.

What peaceful hours I once enjoy'd!
How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.
—Cowper.

Oft in the stilly night
E'er slumber's chain has bound me,
Fond memory brings the light
Of other days around me. —Moore.

Sweet memory, wafted by the gentle gale,
Oft up the stream of time I turn my sail,
To view the fairy haunts of long-lost hours,
Blest with far greener shades, far lovelier flowers.
—Rogers.

Memory is the power to revive again in our minds those ideas which after imprinting have disappeared, or have been laid aside out of sight.—Locke.

Memory, like a purse, if it be overfull that it cannot shut, all will drop out of it; take heed of a gluttonous curiosity to feed on many things, lest the greediness of the appetite of thy memory spoil the digestion thereof.—Thomas Fuller.

Lull'd in the countless chambers of the brain,
Our thoughts are link'd by many a hidden chain;

Awake but one, and lo, what myriads rise!
Each stamps its image as the other flies!
—Rogers.

How are such an infinite number of things placed with such order in the memory, notwithstanding the tumult, marches, and counter-marches of the animal spirits?—Jeremy Collier.

There are moments of life that we never forget,

Which brighten, and brighten, as time steals away;

They give a new charm to the happiest lot,
And they shine on the gloom of the loneliest day.
—J. G. Percival.

Oh, how cruelly sweet are the echoes that start

When Memory plays an old tune on the heart!
—Eliza Cook.

In literature and art memory is a synonyme for invention. It is the life-blood of imagination, which faints and dies when the veins are empty.—Willmott.

Hail, Memory, hail! in thy exhaustless mine
From age to age unnumber'd treasures shine!

Thought and her shadowy brood thy call obey,
And Place and Time are subject to thy sway!
—Rogers.

The memory of past favors is like a rainbow, bright, vivid, and beautiful; but it soon fades away. The memory of injuries is engraved on the heart, and remains forever.—Haliburton.

When time who steals our years away
Shall steal our pleasures too,
The mem'ry of the past will stay
And half our joys renew.
—Moore.

How a thing grows in the human memory, in the human imagination, when love, worship, and all that lies in the human heart, is there to encourage it.—Carlyle.

And when the stream
Which overflowed the soul was passed away,
A consciousness remained that it had left,
Deposited upon the silent shore
Of memory, images and precious thoughts,
That shall not die, and cannot be destroyed.
—Wordsworth.

It is a suggestive idea to track those worn feet backward through all the paths they have trodden ever since they were the tender and rosy little feet of a baby, and (cold as they now are) were kept warm in his mother's hand.—Nath. Hawthorne.

In that instant, o'er his soul
Winters of Memory seem'd to roll,
And gather in that drop of time
A life of pain, an age of crime.
O'er him who loves, or hates, or fears,
Such moment pours the grief of years.
—Byron.

The memory is perpetually looking back when we have nothing present to entertain us. It is like those repositories in animals that are filled with food, on which they may ruminate when their present pastures fail.—Adison.

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean; tears from the depth of some divine despair rise in the heart and gather in the eyes in looking on the happy autumn fields, and thinking of the days that are no more.—Tennyson.

There is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song; there is a remembrance of the dead, to which we turn even from the charms of the living. These we would not exchange for the song of pleasure or the bursts of revelry.—Washington Irving.

It is a fact, well attested by experience, that the memory may be seriously injured by pressing upon it too hard and continuously in early life. Whatever theory we hold as to this great function of our nature, it is certain that its powers are only gradually developed, and that if forced into premature exercise they are impaired by the effort.—Sir H. Holland.

I remember, I remember,
The house where I was born,
The little window where the sun
Came peeping in at morn;
He never came a wink too soon,
Nor brought too long a day,
But now, I often wish the night
Had borne my breath away!
—Hood.

When I remember all
The friends so link'd together,
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather
I feel like one who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed. —Moore.

The course of none has been along so beaten a road that they remember not fondly some resting-places in their journeys, some turns of their path in which lovely prospects broke in upon them, some soft plats of green refreshing to their weary feet. Confiding love, generous friendship, disinterested humanity, require no recondite learning, no high imagination, to enable an honest heart to appreciate and feel them.—Talfourd.

I've wandered east, I've wandered west,
I've bourne a weary lot;
But in my wanderings far or near Ye never were forgot.
The fount that first burst frae this heart
Still travels on its way
And channels deeper as it rins
The love o' life's young day.
—Wm. Motherwell.

It is an old saying, that we forget nothing, as people in fever begin suddenly to talk the language of their infancy; we are stricken by memory sometimes, and old affections rush back on us as vivid as in the time when they were our daily talk, when their presence gladdened our eyes, when their accents thrilled in our ears,—when, with passionate tears and grief, we flung ourselves upon their hopeless corpses. Parting is death,—at least, as far as life is concerned. A passion comes to an end;
it is carried off in a coffin, or, weeping in a postchaise, it drops out of life one way or the other, and the earth-clouds close over it, and we see it no more. But it has been part of our souls, and it is eternal.—

Thackeray.

Certainly it is one of the most blessed things about "the faith that is in Christ Jesus," that it makes a man remember his own sinfulness with penitence, not with pain—that it makes the memory of past transgressions full of solemn joy, because the memory of past transgressions but brings to mind the depth and rushing fullness of that river of love which has swept them all away as far as the east is from the west.
Oh, my brother, you cannot forget your sins; but it lies within your own decision whether the remembrance shall be thankfulness and blessedness, or whether it shall be pain and loss forever.—Alexander Maclaren.

Mercantile

Despatch is the soul of business.—
Earl of Chesterfield.

No mortal thing can bear so high a price,
But that with mortal thing it may be bought.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

To business that we love we rise betime,
And go to 't with delight.
—Shakespeare.

That which is everybody's business, is nobody's business.—Izaak Walton.

A manufacturing district * * * sends out, as it were, suckers into all its neighborhood.—Hallam.

Traffic's thy god; and thy god confound thee!—Shakespeare.

In every age and clime we see,
Two of a trade can ne'er agree.
—Gay.

There is no better ballast for keeping the mind steady on its keel, and saving it from all risk of crankiness, than business.—Lowell.

They (corporations) cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicated, for they have no souls.
—Sir Edward Coke.

Business dispatched is business well done, but business hurried is business ill done.—Bulwer-Lytton.

To found a great empire for the sole purpose of raising up a people of customers, may at first sight appear a project fit only for a nation of shopkeepers.—Adam Smith.

Mercy

Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.—Bible.

The greatest attribute of Heaven is mercy.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Sweet mercy is nobility's true badge.—Shakespeare.

Let us be merciful as well as just.—Longfellow.

Mercy turns her back to the unmerciful.—Quarles.

A God all mercy is a God unjust.—Young.

Nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy.—Shakespeare.

'Tis godlike to have power, but not to kill.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Mercy to him that shows it, is the rule.—Cowper.

Mercy often inflicts death.—Seneca.

Who will not mercy unto others show, how can he mercy ever hope to have?—Spenser.

If mercy were not mingled with His power, this wretched world could not subsist one hour.—Sir W. Davenant.

Great minds erect their never-failing trophies on the firm base of mercy.—Massinger.

If thou hast fear of those who command thee, spare those who obey thee.—Rabbi Ben Azai.

If the end of one mercy were not the beginning of another, we were undone.—Philip Henry.

Hate shuts her soul when dove-eyed Mercy pleads.—Charles Sprague.

We hand folks over to God's mercy, and show none ourselves.—George Eliot.

Mercy more becomes a magistrate than the vindictive wrath which men call justice.—Longfellow.

Open thy gate of mercy, gracious God! My soul flies through these wounds to seek out thee.—Shakespeare.

We do pray for mercy; and that same prayer doth teach us all to render the deeds of mercy.—Shakespeare.

Among the attributes of God, although they are all equal, mercy shines with even more brilliancy than justice.—Cervantes.

Lenity will operate with greater force, in some instances, than rigor. It is therefore my first wish to have my whole conduct distinguished by it.—Washington.

Good Heaven, whose darling attribute we find is boundless grace, and mercy to mankind, abhors the cruel.—Dryden.

Kinds hearts are here; yet would the tenderest one Have limits to its mercy; God has none.—A. A. Procter.

God's mercy is a holy mercy, which knows how to pardon sin, not to protect it; it is a sanctuary for the penitent, not for the presumptuous.—Bishop Reynolds.

Nothing humbles and breaks the heart of a sinner like mercy and love. Souls that converse much with sin and wrath, may be much terrified; but souls that converse much with grace and mercy, will be much humbled.—Thomas Brooks.

Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.
—Pope.

There is no better rule to try a doctrine by than the question, Is it merciful, or is it unmerciful? If its character is that of mercy, it has the image of Jesus, who is the way, the truth, and the life.—Hosea Ballou.

How would you be if He, which is the top of judgment, should but judge you as you are? O, think on that, and mercy then will breathe within your lips like man new made.—Shakespeare.

It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,
It is an attribute to God himself;
And earthly power doth then show likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice.

—Shakespeare.

Merciful heaven!

Thou rather, with thy sharp and sulphurous bolt,
Split'st the unwedgeable and gnarled oak,
Than the soft myrtle. —Shakespeare.

When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view I'm lost,
In wonder, love and praise,
—Addison.

No ceremony that to great ones belongs,—not the king's crown nor the deputed sword, the marshal's truncheon nor the judge's robe, become them with one half so good a grace as mercy does.—Shakespeare.

We may imitate the Deity in all His attributes; but mercy is the only one in which we can pretend to equal Him. We cannot, indeed, give like God; but surely we may forgive like Him.—Sterne.

The quality of mercy is not strain'd;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice bless'd;
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown.
—Shakespeare.

Think not the good,
The gentle deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all; the poor, the pris'nér,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of thy hand,
Shall cry to heav'n, and pull a blessing on thee.
—Rowe.

As the sun's rays will irradiate even the murky pool, and make its stagnant waters to shine like silver, so doth God's goodness and tender mercy, towards the greatest sinner, and the blackest heart, make his own image visible there!—Hosea Ballou.

The sun is the eye of the world; and he is indifferent to the negro or the cold Russian; to them that dwell under the line, and them that stand near the tropics,—the scalded Indian, or the poor boy that shakes at the foot of the Riphean hills; so is the mercy of God.—Jeremy Taylor.

O mercy, heav'ly born! Sweet attribute.
Thou great, thou best prerogative of power!
Justice may guard the throne, but join'd with thee,
On rocks of adamant, it stands secure,
And braves the storm beneath.
—Somerville.

As freely as the firmament embraces the world, so mercy must encircle friend and foe. The sun pours forth impartially his beams through all the regions of infinity; heaven bestows the dew equally on every thirsty plant. Whatever is good and comes from on high is universal and without reserve; but in the heart's recesses darkness dwells.—Schiller.

'Tis mercy! mercy!
The mark of heav'n impress'd on human kind,
Mercy, that glads the world, deals joy around;
Mercy that smooths the dreadful brow of power,
And makes dominion light; mercy that saves,
Binds up the broken heart, and heals despair.
—Rowe.

Merit

There is a proud modesty in merit.
—Dryden.

Merit was ever modest known.—Gay.

On their own merits modest men are dumb.—George Colman.

Merit challenges envy.—Dryden.

There is merit without elevation, but there is no elevation without some merit.—Roche foucauld.

Nature makes merit, and fortune puts it to work.—Roche foucauld.

The world more frequently recompenses the appearance of merit, than merit itself.—Rochefoucauld.

Merit is born with men; happy those with whom it dies!—Queen Christina.

Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul.—Pope.

True merit, like a river, the deeper it is, the less noise it makes.—Lord Halifax.

The sufficiency of my merit is to know that my merit is not sufficient.—St. Augustine.

It never occurs to fools that merit and good fortune are closely united.—Goethe.

Be thou the first true merit to befriend,
His praise is lost who waits till all commend.
—Pope.

The sufficiency of merit is to know that my merit is not sufficient.—Quarles.

The mark of extraordinary merit is to see those most envious of it constrained to praise.—La Rochefoucauld.

I love the lineage of heroes, but I love merit more.—Frederick the Great.

Whoever gains the palm by merit, let him hold it.—Nelson.

Contemporaries appreciate the man rather than his merit; posterity will regard the merit rather than the man.—Colton.

The best evidence of merit is a cordial recognition of it whenever and wherever it may be found.—Bovee.

Oh, that estates, degrees, and offices were not derived corruptly, and that clear honor were purchased by the merit of the wearer!—Shakespeare.

The art of being able to make a good use of moderate abilities wins esteem and often confers more reputation than real merit.—La Bruyère.

I am told so many ill things of a man, and I see so few in him, that I begin to suspect he has a real but troublesome merit, as being likely to eclipse that of others.—Bruyère.

Good actions crown themselves with lasting bays
Who deserves well, needs not another's praise. —Heath.

There's a proud modesty in merit!
Averse from asking, and resolv'd to pay
Ten times the gifts it asks.
—Dryden.

Merit is never so conspicuous as when coupled with an obscure origin, just as the moon never appears so lustrous as when it emerges from a cloud.—Bovee.

Merit has rarely risen of itself, but a pebble or a twig is often quite sufficient for it to spring from to the highest ascent. There is usually some baseness before there is any elevation.—Landor.

Real merit of any kind cannot long be concealed; it will be discovered, and nothing can depreciate it, but a man's exhibiting it himself. It may not always be rewarded as it ought; but it will always be known.—Chesterfield.

Real merit requires as much labor, to be placed in a true light, as humbug to be elevated to an unworthy eminence; only the success of the false is temporary, that of the true, immortal.—F. A. Durivage.

If you wish particularly to gain the good graces and affection of certain people, men or women, try to discover their most striking merit, if they have one, and their dominant weakness, for every one has his own, then do justice to the one, and a little more than justice to the other.—Chesterfield.

I know not why we should delay our tokens of respect to those who deserve them, until the heart that our sympathy could have gladdened has ceased to beat. As men cannot read the epitaphs inscribed upon the marble that covers them, so the tombs that we erect to virtue often only prove our repentance that we neglected it when with us.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Merit is a work for the sake of which Christ gives rewards. But no such work is to be found, for Christ gives by promise. Just as if a prince should say to me, "Come to me in my castle, and I will give you a hundred florins." I do a work, certainly, in going to the castle, but the gift is not given me as the reward of my work in going, but because the prince promised it to me.—Martin Luther.

O, that estates, degrees, and offices,
Were not deriv'd corruptly! and that dear honour
Were purchas'd by the merit of the wearer!
How many then should cover, that stand bare?
How many be commanded, that command?
How much low peasantry would then be glean'd
From the true seed of honour? and how much honour
Pick'd from the chaff and ruin of the times,
To be new varnish'd? —Shakespeare.

Distinguished merit will ever rise to oppression, and will draw lustre from reproach. The vapors which gather round the rising sun, and follow him in his course, seldom fail at the close of it to form a magnificent theatre for his reception, and to invest with variegated tints and with a softened effulgence the luminary which they cannot hide.—Robert Hall.

Mermaid

I sat upon a promontory,
And heard a mermaid, on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song;
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,
To hear the sea-maid's music.
—Shakespeare.

Slow sail'd the weary mariners and saw,
Betwixt the green brink and the running foam,
Sweet faces, rounded arms, and bosoms prest
To little harps of gold; and while they mused
Whispering to each other half in fear,
Shrill music reach'd them on the middle sea.
—Tennyson.

Who would be
A mermaid fair,
Singing alone,
Combing her hair
Under the sea,
In a golden curl
With a comb of pearl,
On a throne?

I would be a mermaid fair;
I would sing to myself the whole of the day;
With a comb of pearl I would comb my hair;
And still as I comb I would sing and say,
"Who is it loves me? who loves not me?"
—Tennyson.

Merriment

As merry as the day is long.—Shakespeare.

I had rather have a fool to make me merry, than experience to make me sad.—Shakespeare.

Nothing is more hopeless than a scheme of merriment.—Johnson.

As 'tis ever common
That men are merriest when they are from home.
—Shakespeare.

Jog on, jog on, the foot-path way,
And merrily hent the stile-a:
A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile-a.
—Shakespeare.

And frame your mind to mirth and merriment,
Which bars a thousand harms and lengthens life.
—Shakespeare.

Hostess, clap to the doors; watch to-night, pray to-morrow. Gallants, lads, boys, hearts of gold, all the titles of good fellowship come to you! What, shall we be merry? Shall we have a play extempore?—Shakespeare.

Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee
Jest, and youthful Jollity,
Quips, and Cranks, and wanton Wiles,
Nods, and Becks, and wreathed Smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.
—Milton.

Metaphor

Figured and metaphorical expressions do well to illustrate more abstruse and unfamiliar ideas, which the mind is not yet thoroughly accustomed to.—Locke.

An epithet or metaphor drawn from nature ennobles art; an epithet or metaphor drawn from art degrades nature.—Johnson.

Metaphor gives light and strength to description.—John Brent.

Metaphor is no argument, though it be sometimes the gunpowder to drive one home, and imbed it in the memory.—Lowell.

Of metaphors, those generally conduce most to energy or vivacity of style which illustrate an intellectual by a sensible object.—Whately.

Metaphysics

All parts of knowledge have their origin in metaphysics.—De Quincey.

Metaphysics,—the science which determines what can and what cannot be known of being and the laws of being.—Coleridge.

He knew what's what, and that's as high As metaphysic wit can fly. —Butler.

Metaphysics, in whatever latitude the term be taken, is a science, or complement of sciences, exclusively occupied with mind.—Sir W. Hamilton.

The fame of Locke is visibly on the decline; the speculations of Malebranche are scarcely heard of in France; and Kant, the greatest metaphysical name on the Continent, sways a doubtful sceptre amidst a host of opponents.—Robert Hall.

Method

Method is the arithmetic of success.—H. W. Shaw.

Methods are the masters of masters.—Talleyrand.

Make the most of time, it flies away so fast; yet method will teach you to win time.—Goethe.

Method is the hinge of business, and there is no method without order and punctuality.—He-wah More.

To live is not to learn, but to apply.—E. Legouvé.

Method, like perseverance, wins in the long run.—Duclos.

Dispatch is the soul of business; and nothing contributes more to dispatch than method. Lay down a method for everything, and stick to it inviolably, as far as unexpected incidents may allow.—Lord Chesterfield.

Irregularity and want of method are only supportable in men of great learning or genius, who are often too full to be exact, and therefore choose to throw down their pearls in heaps before the reader rather than be at the pains of stringing them.—Addison.

You must elect your work; you shall take what your brains can, and drop all the rest. Only so can that amount of vital force accumulate which can make the step from knowing to doing. No matter how much faculty of idle seeing a man has, the step from knowing to doing is rarely taken. It is a step out of a chalk circle of imbecility into fruitfulness.—Emerson.

Method means primarily a way or path of transit. From this we are to understand that the first idea of method is a progressive transition from one step to another in any course. If in the right course, it will be the true method; if in the wrong, we cannot hope to progress.—Coleridge.

Though every one who possesses merit is not necessarily a great man, yet every great man must possess it in a very superior degree, whether he be a poet, a philosopher, a statesman, a general; for every great man exhibits the talent of organization or construction, whether it be in a poem, a philosophical system, a policy, or a strategy. And without method there is no organization nor construction.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Method is essential, and enables a larger amount of work to be got through with satisfaction. "Method."

said Cecil (afterward Lord Burleigh), "is like packing things in a box; a good packer will get in half as much again as a bad one." Cecil's despatch of business was extraordinary; his maxim being, "The shortest way to do many things is to do only one thing at once."—Samuel Smiles.

Midnight

About the noon of night.—Ben Jonson.

In the dead vast and middle of the night.—Shakespeare.

Hushed as midnight silence.—Dryden.

That hour, of night's black arch the keystone.—Burns.

Now had night measured, with her shadowy cone, half-way up hill this vast sublunar vault.—Milton.

The iron tongue of midnight hath told twelve;
Lovers, to bed; 'tis almost fairy time.
—Shakespeare.

Midnight! the outpost of advancing day!
The frontier town and citadel of night!
—Longfellow.

Midnight brought on the dusky hour friendliest to sleep and silence.—Milton.

Midnight,—strange mystic hour,—when the veil between the frail present and the eternal future grows thin.
—Mrs. Stowe.

This dead of midnight is the noon of thought, and wisdom mounts her zenith with the stars.—Mrs. Barbauld.

It is the hour when from the boughs
The nightingale's high note is heard;
It is the hour when lovers' vows
Seem sweet in every whisper'd word.
—Byron.

It is now the very witching time of night; when churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out contagion to this world: now could I drink hot blood, and do such business as the bitter day would quake to look on.—Shakespeare.

The night, proceeding on with silent pace, stood in her noon, and viewed with equal face her sleepy rise and her declining race.—Dryden.

'Tis midnight now. The bent and broken moon,
Batter'd and black, as from a thousand battles,
Hangs silent on the purple walls of Heaven.
—Joaquin Miller.

O wild and wondrous midnight,
There is a might in thee
To make the charmed body
Almost like spirit be,
And give it some faint glimpses
Of immortality!
—Lowell.

The stifled hum of midnight, when traffic has lain down to rest, and the chariot wheels of Vanity, still rolling here and there through distant streets, are bearing her to halls roofed in and lighted to the due pitch for her; and only vice and misery, to prowling or to moan like night birds, are abroad.—Carlyle.

Military

The sex is ever to a soldier kind.—Homer.

And the stern joy which warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel.
—Scott.

Ay me! what perils do environ
The man that meddles with cold iron!
—Butler.

His breast with wounds unnumber'd riven,
His back to earth, his face to heaven.
—Byron.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried.
—Chas. Wolfe.

May that soldier a mere recreant prove
That means not, bath not, or is not in love!
—Shakespeare.

Soldier, rest! thy warfare o'er,
Dream of fighting fields no more;
Sleep the sleep that knows not breaking.
Morn of toil, nor night of waking.
—Scott.

Yet what can they see in the longest kingly line in Europe, save that it runs back to a successful soldier?—

Scott.

He slept an iron sleep,—
Slain fighting for his country.
—Homer.

As we pledge the health of our general,
who fares as rough as we,
What can daunt us, what can turn us, led to death by such as he?
—Charles Kingsley.

God's soldier be he!
Had I as many sons as I have hairs,
I would not wish them to a fairer death:
And so his knell is knoll'd.—Shakespeare.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Not in sheet nor in shroud we wound
him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest
With his martial cloak around him.
—Chas. Wolfe.

Sleep, soldiers! still in honored rest
Your truth and valor wearing:
The bravest are the tenderest,—
The loving are the daring.
—Bayard Taylor.

The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay;
Sat by his fire, and talked the night away;
Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow
done,
Shoulder'd his crutch, and show'd how fields were won.—Goldsmith.

Then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth.
—Shakespeare.

"What are the bugles blowin' for?" said
Files-on-Parade.
"To turn you out, to turn you out," the Colour Sergeant said.
"What makes you look so white, so white?" said Files-on-Parade.
'I'm dreadin' what I've got to watch,' the Colour-Sergeant said.
"For they're hangin' Danny Deever, you can hear the dead march play.
The regiment's in 'ollow square—
They're hangin' him to-day;
They're taken of his buttons off an' cut his stripes away.
And they're hangin' Danny Deever in the morning."—Rudyard Kipling.

Give them great meals of beef and iron and steel, they will eat like wolves and fight like devils.—Shakespeare.

All quiet along the Potomac they say
Except now and then a stray picket
Is shot as he walks on his beat, to and fro.
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.
—Ethel Lynn Beers.

Millennium

It is, indeed, right that we should look for, and hasten, so far as in us lies, the coming of the day of God;
but not that we should check any human effort by anticipations of its approach. We shall hasten it best by endeavoring to work out the tasks that are appointed for us here; and, therefore, reasoning as if the world were to continue under its existing dispensation, and the powers which have just been granted to us were to be continued through myriads of future ages.—Ruskin.

Wearily have the years passed, I know; wearily to the pale watcher on the hill who has been so long gazing for the daybreak; wearily to the anxious multitudes who have been waiting for his tidings below. Often has the cry gone up through the darkness, "Watcher, what of the night?"
and often has the disappointing answer come, "It is night still; here the stars are clear above me, but they shine afar, and yonder the clouds lower heavily, and the sad night winds blow." But the time shall come, and perhaps sooner than we look for it, when the countenance of that pale watcher shall gather into intenser expectancy, and when the challenge shall be given, with the hopefulness of a nearer vision, "Watcher, what of the night?" and the answer will come,
"The darkness is not so dense as it was; there are faint streaks on the horizon's verge; mist is in the valleys, but there is a radiance on the distant hill. It comes nearer—that promise of the day. The clouds roll rapidly away, and they are fringed with amber and gold. It is, it is the blest sunlight that I feel around me—
Morning! It is morning!"—Wm. M.
Punshon.

Mind

Systems exercise the mind, but faith enlightens and guides it.—Voltaire.

The mind is the eyesight of the soul.
—Schiller.

The mind is the atmosphere of the soul.—Joubert.

Mind moves matter.—Virgil.

It is the mind that makes the body rich.—Shakespeare.

The mind is the proper judge of the man.—Seneca.

Mind unemployed is mind unenjoyed.—Bovee.

The forehead is the gate of the mind.—Cicero.

The garden of the mind.—Tennyson.

Few minds wear out; more rust out.—Bovee.

We disjoint the mind like the body.—Joubert.

My mind to me an empire is.—Southwell.

A narrow mind begets obstinacy.—Dryden.

Stern men with empires in their brains.—Lowell.

The march of the human mind is slow.—Burke.

The pen is the tongue of the mind.—Cervantes.

Each mind has its own method.—Emerson.

The mind alone can not be exiled.—Ovid.

The sick mind can not bear anything harsh.—Ovid.

The diseases of the mind are more and more destructive than those of the body.—Cicero.

The common mind is the true Parian marble, fit to be wrought into likeness to a god.—George Bancroft.

'Tis but a base ignoble mind that mounts no higher than a bird can soar.—Shakespeare.

The mind doth shape itself to its own wants, and can bear all things.—Joanna Baillie.

Minds that have nothing to confer find little to perceive.—Wordsworth.

A mind once cultivated will not lie fallow for half an hour.—Bulwer-Lytton.

How many minds—almost all the great ones—were formed in secrecy and solitude!—Matthew Arnold.

The mind is its own place, and in itself Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.—Milton.

Minds of moderate calibre ordinarily condemn everything which is beyond their range.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is the mind that maketh good or ill, That maketh wretch or happy, rich or poor.—Spenser.

The mind grows narrow in proportion as the soul grows corrupt.—Rousseau.

Guard well thy thoughts: our thoughts are heard in heaven.—Young.

We plainly perceive that the mind strengthens and decays with the body. Lucretius.

The brain is the citadel of the senses: this guides the principle of thought.—Pliny the Elder.

What is this little, agile, precious fire, this fluttering motion which we call the mind?—Prior.

Cultivation is as necessary to the mind as food is to the body.—Cicero.

We measure minds by their stature; it would be better to esteem them by their beauty.—Joubert.

Babylon in all its desolation is a sight not so awful as that of the human mind in ruins.—Scorpe Davies

A well-balanced mind is the best remedy against affliction.—Plautus.

The first sure symptom of a mind in health,
Is rest of heart, and pleasure felt at home.
—Young.

Great minds lower, instead of elevate, those who do not know how to support them.—Rochefoucauld.

The mind wears the colors of the soul, as a valet those of his master.—Madame Swetchine.

Minds which never rest are subject to many digressions.—Joubert.

Do not overwork the mind any more than the body; do everything with moderation.—Bacon.

As sight is in the eye, so is the mind in the soul!—Sophocles.

The more accurately we search into the human mind, the stronger traces we everywhere find of His wisdom who made it.—Burke.

The mind of man is ignorant of fate and future destiny, and can not keep within due bounds when elated by prosperity.—Virgil.

The mind wishes for what it has missed, and occupies itself with retrospective contemplation.—Petronius Arbiter.

The mind, like all other things, will become impaired, the sciences are its food,—they nourish, but at the same time they consume it.—Bruyère.

The mind does not know what diet it can feed on until it has been brought to the starvation point.—Holmes.

Different minds incline to different objects; one pursues the vast alone, the wonderful, the wild; another sighs for harmony and grace, and gentlest beauty.—Akenside.

It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free; their passions forge their fetters.—Burke.

As the soil, however rich it may be, cannot be productive without culture, so the mind without cultivation can never produce good fruit.—Seneca.

The very might of the human intellect reveals its limits.—Madame Swetchine.

As the mind must govern the hands, so in every society the man of intelligence must direct the man of labor.—Dr. Johnson.

Mind is the great leveller of all things; human thought is the process by which human ends are alternately answered.—Daniel Webster.

The mind is the master over every kind of fortune: itself acts in both ways, being the cause of its own happiness and misery.—Seneca.

The true, strong, and sound mind is the mind that can embrace equally great things and small.—Sam'l Johnson.

Our minds are like our stomachs; they are whetted by the change of food, variety supplies both with fresh appetite.—Quintilian.

A weak mind is like a microscope, which magnifies trifling things, but cannot receive great ones.—Chesterfield.

Every mind was made for growth, for knowledge; and its nature is sinned against when it is doomed to ignorance.—Channing.

Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean with my span,
I must be measur'd by my soul:
The mind's the standard of the man.
—Watts.

It is the mind that makes us rich and happy, in what condition soever we are, and money signifies no more to it than it does to the gods.—Seneca.

The mind has its arrangement; it proceeds from principles to demonstrations. The heart has a different mode of proceeding.—Pascal

The great business of a man is to improve his mind and govern his manners; all other projects and pursuits, whether in our power to compass or not, are only amusements.—Pliny.

Nothing can be so quick and sudden as the operations of the mind, especially when hope, or fear, or jealousy, to which the other two are but journeymen, set it to work.—Fielding.

A well-cultivated mind is, so to speak, made up of all the minds of preceding ages; it is only one single mind which has been educated during all this time.—Fontenelle.

The mind is but a barren soil; a soil which is soon exhausted, and will produce no crop, or only one, unless it be continually fertilized and enriched with foreign matter.—Sir J. Reynolds.

I had rather believe all the fables in the Legends and the Talmud and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind.—Bacon.

There are some cloudy days for the mind as well as for the world; and the man who has the most genius is twenty times a day in the clouds.—Beaumelle.

Every great mind seeks to labor for eternity. All men are captivated by immediate advantages; great minds alone are excited by the prospect of distant good.—Schiller.

Our minds are like certain vehicles, —when they have little to carry they make much noise about it, but when heavily loaded they run quietly.—Elihu Burritt.

The intellectual faculty is a goodly field, capable of great improvement; and it is the worst husbandry in the world to sow it with trifles and impertinences.—Sir M. Hale.

The shadows of the mind are like those of the body. In the morning of life they all lie behind us; at noon we trample them under foot; and in the evening they stretch long, broad, and deepening before us.—Longfellow.

The mind is like a sheet of white paper in this, that the impressions it receives the oftenest, and retains the longest, are black ones.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

How fleet is a glance of the mind!
Compared with the speed of its flight,
The tempest itself lags behind,
And the swift-winged arrows of light.
—Cowper.

The mind has a certain vegetative power, which cannot be wholly idle. If it is not laid out and cultivated into a beautiful garden, it will of itself shoot up in weeds or flowers of a wild growth.—Steele.

There is nothing so elastic as the human mind. Like imprisoned steam, the more it is pressed the more it rises to resist the pressure. The more we are obliged to do, the more we are able to accomplish.—T. Edwards.

If the minds of men were laid open, we should see but little difference between them and that of the fool; there are infinite reveries and numberless extravagancies pass through both.—Addison.

Sublime is the dominion of the mind over the body, that for a time, can make flesh and nerve impregnable, and string the sinews like steel, so that the weak become so mighty.—Mrs. Stowe.

No barriers, no masses of matter, however enormous, can withstand the powers of the mind; the remotest corners yield to them; all things succumb, the very heaven itself is laid open.—Manilius.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain;
And, with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the foul bosom of that perilous stuff,
Which weighs upon the heart?

—Shakespeare.

We ought, in humanity, no more to despise a man for the misfortunes of the mind than for those of the body, when they are such as he cannot help; were this thoroughly considered we should no more laugh at a man for having his brains cracked than for having his head broke.—Pope.

He that has no resources of mind, is more to be pitied than he who is in want of necessities for the body; and to be obliged to beg our daily happiness from others, bespeaks a more lamentable poverty than that of him who begs his daily bread.—Colton.

My mind to me a kingdom is;

Such perfect joy therein I find,
That it excels all other bliss

That God or Nature, hath assign'd, Though much I want that most would have,

Yet still my mind forbids to crave.
—Wm. Byrd.

The failure of his mind in old age is often less the result of natural decay than of disuse. Ambition has ceased to operate; contentment brings indolence; indolence, decay of mental power, ennui, and sometimes death. Men have been known to die, literally speaking, of disease induced by intellectual vacancy.—Sir Benjamin Brodie.

The sovereign good of man is a mind that subjects all things to itself and is itself subject to nothing; such a man's pleasures are modest and reserved, and it may be a question whether he goes to heaven, or heaven comes to him; for a good man is influenced by God Himself, and has a kind of divinity within him.—Seneca.

The immortal mind, superior to his fate,
Amid the outrage of external things,
Firm as the solid base of this great world,
Rests on his own foundation. Blow, ye winds!
Ye waves! ye thunders! roll your tempests on!

Shake, ye old pillars of the marble sky!
Till at its orbs and all its worlds of fire
Be loosen'd from their seats; yet still serene,
The unconquer'd mind looks down upon the wreck;

And ever stronger as the storms advance,
Firm through the closing ruin holds his way,
When nature calls him to the destin'd goal.—Akenside.

A lofty mind always thinks nobly, it easily creates vivid, agreeable, and natural fancies, places them in their best light, clothes them with all appropriate adornments, studies others' tastes, and clears away from its own thoughts all that is useless and disagreeable.—La Rochefoucauld.

Mankind are in the end always governed by superiority of intellectual faculties, and none are more sensible of this than the military profession. When, on my return from Italy, I assumed the dress of the Institute, and associated with men of science, I knew what I was doing: I was sure of not being misunderstood by the lowest drummer boy in the army.—Napoleon I.

Ministers

It is not the way to convert a sinner to knock him down first and then reason with him.—S. Irenaeus Prime.

I do not envy a clergyman's life as an easy life, nor do I envy the clergyman who makes it an easy life.—Samuel Johnson.

Your great employment is to bring the individual souls of men to Christ.—E. N. Kirk.

But the unfaithful priest, what tongue
Enough shall execrate?—Pollok.

The life of a pious minister is visible rhetoric.—Hooker.

Surely that preaching which comes from the soul works most on the soul.—Fuller.

The priesthood hath in all nations, and all religions, been held highly venerable.—Atterbury.

I find on inquiring among successful pastors, successful in the sense of winning men to Christ in profession, that they depend largely on personal contact.—D. A. Goodsell.

There are passages of the Bible that are soiled forever by the touches of the hands of ministers who delight in the cheap jokes they have left behind them.—Phillips Brooks.

The minister is to be a live man, a real man, a true man, a simple man, great in his love, great in his life, great in his work, great in his simplicity, great in his gentleness.—John Hall.

This is the ministry and its work—not to drill hearts and minds and consciences into right forms of thought and mental postures, but to guide to the living God who speaks.—F. W. Robertson.

Of right and wrong he taught
Truths as refined as ever Athens heard;
And (strange to tell!) he practised what he preach'd. —Armstrong.

Love and meanness
Become a churchman better than ambition;
Win straying souls with modesty again,
Cast none away.—Shakespeare.

It would be well if some who have taken upon themselves the ministry of the Gospel, that they would first preach to themselves, then afterwards to others.—Cardinal Pole.

Men of God have always, from time to time, walked among men, and made their commission felt in the heart and soul of the commonest hearer.—Emerson.

The day that witnesses the conversion of our ministers into political and philosophical speculators or scientific lecturers, will witness the final decay of clerical weight and influence.—Bayne.

I venerate the man whose heart is warm,
Whose hands are pure, whose doctrine and whose life
Coincident, exhibit lucid proof
That he is honest in the sacred cause.
—Cowper.

At church with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevail'd with double
sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to prayer. —Goldsmith.

The minister who would be most like the Master must go and, like Him, lay the warm, kindly hand on the leper, the diseased, the wretched. He must touch the blind eyes with something from himself. The tears must be in his own eyes over the dead who are to be raised to spiritual life. Jesus is our great exemplar.—John Hall.

Nor to rebuke the rich offender fear'd;
His preaching much, but more his practice wrought,
(A living sermon of the truths he taught,)
For this by rules severe his life he squar'd,
That all might see the doctrine which they heard. —Dryden.

He that negotiates between God and man,
As God's ambassador, the grand concerns
Of judgment and of mercy, should beware
Of lightness in his speech. 'Tis pitiful To court a grin where you should woo a
soul;
To break a jest, when pity would inspire
Pathetic exhortation; and address
The skittish fancy with facetious tales,
When sent with God's commission to the heart. —Cowper.

One great want of the times is a commanding ministry—a ministry of a piety at once sober and earnest, and of mightiest moral power. Give us these men, "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," who will proclaim old truths with new energy, not cumbering them with massive drapery nor hiding them beneath piles of rubbish. Give us these men! men of sound speech, who will preach the truth as it is in Jesus, not with faltering tongue and averted eye, as if the mind blushed at its own credulity—not distilling into it an essence so subtle and so speedily decomposed that a chemical analysis alone can detect the faint odor which tells it has been there—but who will preach it apostlewise, that is, "first of all," at once a principle shrouded in the heart and a motive mighty in the life—the source of all morals and the inspiration of all charity—the sanctifier of every relationship, and the sweetener of every toil. Give us these men! men of zeal untiring—whose hearts of constancy quail not although dull men sneer, and proud men scorn, and timid men blush, and cautious men deprecate, and wicked men revile.—Wm. M. Punshon.

Minority

Votes should be weighed, not counted!—Schiller.

This minority is great and formidable. I do not know whether, if I aimed at the total overthrow of a kingdom, I should wish to be encumbered with a large body of partisans.—Burke.

Miracles

Miracle is the pet child of faith.—Goethe.

Every believer is God's miracle.—Bailey.

The miracles of earth are the laws of heaven.—Jean Paul Richter.

When I look to my guiltiness, I see that my salvation is one of our Saviour's greatest miracles, either in heaven or earth.—Rutherford.

Miracles are ceased; and therefore we must needs admit the means, how things are perfected.—Shakespeare.

What is a miracle?—'Tis a reproach,
'Tis an implicit satire on mankind;
And while its satisfies, it censures too.
—Young.

Great floods have flown
From simple sources, and great seas have dried
When miracles have by the greatest been denied.
—Shakespeare.

Man is the miracle in nature. God
Is the One Miracle to man. Behold,
"There is a God," thou sayest. Thou sayest
well:

In that thou sayest all. To Be is more
Of wonderful, than being, to have wrought,
Or reigned, or rested.—Jean Ingelow.

What is thy thought? There is no miracle?
There is a great one, which thou hast not
read,

And never shalt escape. Thyself, O man,
Thou art the miracle. Ay, thou thyself,
Being in the world and of the world,
thyself,

Hast breathed in breath from Him that made the world.

Thou art thy Father's copy of Himself,—
Thou art thy Father's miracle.

—Jean Ingelow.

A miracle is a supernatural event, whose antecedent forces are beyond our finite vision, whose design is the display of almighty power for the accomplishment of almighty purposes, and whose immediate result, as regards man, is his recognition of God as the Supreme Ruler of all things, and of His will as the only supreme law.—A. E. Kittredge.

We must not sit down, and look for miracles. Up, and be doing, and the Lord will be with thee. Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do anything.—John Eliot.

Mirth

Mirth is God's medicine.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Mirth itself is too often but melancholy in disguise.—Leigh Hunt.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt;
And ev'ry grin so merry, draws one out.
—Dr. Wolcot.

Man is the merriest species of the creation; all above or below him are serious.—Addison.

Mirth is the sweet wine of human life. It should be offered sparkling with zestful life unto God.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Fun gives you a forcible hug, and shakes laughter out of you, whether you will or no.—Garrick.

Frame your mind to mirth and merriment,
Which bars a thousand harms and lengthens life.
—Shakespeare.

Mirth is a Proteus, changing its shape and manner with the thousand diversities of individual character, from the most superfluous gayety to the deepest, most earnest humor.—E. P. Whipple.

Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles.
—Milton.

Blessed be mirthfulness! It is one of the renovators of the world. Men will let you abuse them if only you will make them laugh.—Henry Ward Beecher.

I love such mirth as does not make friends ashamed to look upon one another next morning.—Izaak Walton.

Harmless mirth is the best cordial against the consumption of the spirit; wherefore jesting is not unlawful, if it trespasseth not in quantity, quality or season.—Fuller.

The greatness that would make us grave,
Is but an empty thing.
What more than mirth would mortals have?
The cheerful man's a king.

—Bickerstaff.

Let me play the fool
With mirth and laughter let old wrinkles come;
And let my liver rather heat with wine,
Than my heart cool with mortifying groans.

—Shakespeare.

A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal:
His eye begets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest.

—Shakespeare.

There is nothing like fun, is there?
I haven't any myself, but I do like it in others. O, we need it! We need all the counterweights we can muster to balance the sad relations of life.
God has made many sunny spots in the heart; why should we exclude the light from them?—Haliburton.

From the crown of his head to the sole of his foot he is all mirth; he has twice or thrice cut Cupid's bow-string, and the little hangman dare not shoot at him; he hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper; for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks.—Shakespeare.

Mirth is God's medicine. Everybody ought to bathe in it. Grim care, moroseness, anxiety,—all this rust of life, ought to be scoured off by the oil of mirth. It is better than emery.
Every man ought to rub himself with it. A man without mirth is like a wagon without springs, in which one is caused disagreeably to jolt by every pebble over which it runs.—Beecher.

Mirthfulness is in the mind, and you cannot get it out. It is the blessed spirit that God has set in the mind to dust it, to enliven its dark places, and to drive asceticism, like a foul fiend, out at the back door. It is just as good, in its place, as conscience or veneration. Praying can no more be made a substitute for smiling than smiling can for praying.—Beecher.

Misanthropy

Man delights not me,—nor woman
neither.—Shakespeare.

Let the misanthrope shun men and abjure; the most are rather lovable than hateful.—Tupper.

I am misanthropos, and hate mankind,
For thy part, I do wish thou wert a dog,
That I might love thee something.

—Shakespeare.

Men possessing minds which are morose, solemn, and inflexible, enjoy, in general, a greater share of dignity than of happiness.—Bacon.

The opinions of the misanthropical rest upon this very partial basis, that they adopt the bad faith of a few as evidence of the worthlessness of all.—
Bovee.

There cannot live a more unhappy creature than an ill-natured old man, who is neither capable of receiving pleasures, nor sensible of doing them to others.—Sir W. Temple.

Sombre thoughts and fancies often require a little real soil or substance to flourish in; they are the dark pine-trees which take root in, and frown over the rifts of the scathed and petrified heart, and are chiefly nourished by the rain of unavailing tears, and the vapors of fancy.—J. F. Boyes.

We readily excuse paralytics from labor; and shall we be angry with a hypocondriac for not being cheerful in company? Must we stigmatize such an unfortunate person as peevish, positive, and unfit for society? His disorder may no more suffer him to be merry, than the gout will suffer another to dance. The advising a melancholic to be cheerful is like bidding a coward to be courageous, or a dwarf be taller.—Wollaston.

Out of the ashes of misanthropy benevolence rises again; we find many virtues where we had imagined all was vice, many acts of disinterested friend-

chip where we had fancied all was calculation and fraud—and so gradually from the two extremes we pass to the proper medium; and, feeling that no human being is wholly good or wholly base, we learn that true knowledge of mankind which induces us to expect little and forgive much. The world cures alike the optimist and the misanthrope.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Mischief

She who means no mischief does it all.—Aaron Hill.

To mourn a mischief that is past and gone,
Is the next way to draw new mischief on.
—Shakespeare.

O, mischief! thou art swift
To enter in the thoughts of desperate men!
—Shakespeare.

When to mischief mortals bend their will,
How soon they find fit instruments of ill!
—Pope.

Few men are so clever as to know
all the mischief they do.—Rochefoucauld.

The sower of the seed is assuredly the author of the whole harvest of mischief.—Demosthenes.

The mischief of children is seldom actuated by malice; that of grown-up people always is.—Rivarol.

Mischief and malice grow on the same branch of the tree of evil.—
Aaron Hill.

Man is no match for woman where mischief reigns.—Balzac.

In life it is difficult to say who do you the most mischief,—enemies with the worst intentions, or friends with the best.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The opportunity to do mischief is found a hundred times a day, and that of doing good once a year.—Voltaire.

Miser

Avarice is the miser's dream.—
Hazlitt.

A mere madness, to live like a wretch, and die rich.—Burton.

The miser robs himself.—Lavater.

O cursed hunger of pernicious gold!
—Dryden.

Groan under gold, yet weep for want of bread.—Young.

A miser grows rich by seeming poor; an extravagant man grows poor by seeming rich.—Shenstone.

He heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.—Bible.

Misers mistake gold for their good;
whereas it is only the means of obtaining it.—Rochefoucauld.

History tells us of illustrious villains, but there never was an illustrious miser.—St. Evremond.

The life of a miser is a play of which we applaud only the closing scene.—Sanial-Dubay.

Misers, as death approaches, are heaping up a chest of reasons to stand in more awe of him.—Shenstone.

Foul cankering rust the hidden treasure
frets;
But gold that's put to use more gold begets.
—Shakespeare.

The miser, poor fool, not only starves his body, but also his own soul.
—Theodore Parker.

The cleverness of avarice is but the cunning of imbecility.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Of all the vices, avarice is the most generally detested; it is the effect of an avidity common to all men; it is because men hate those from whom they can expect nothing. The greedy misers rail at sordid misers.—Helvetius.

Famine is in thy cheeks,
Need and oppression starveth in thine eyes,
Contempt and beggary hang upon thy back;
The world is not thy friend, nor the world's law.—Shakespeare.

A miser is sometimes a grand personification of fear. He has a fine horror of poverty; and he is not content to keep want from the door, or at arm's length, but he places it, by heaping wealth upon wealth, at a sublime distance!—Lamb.

A thorough miser must possess considerable strength of character to bear the self-denial imposed by his penuriousness. Equal sacrifices, endured voluntarily in a better cause, would make a saint or a martyr.—W. B. Clulow.

Money never can be well managed if sought solely through the greed of money for its own sake. In all meanness there is a defect of intellect as well as of heart. And even the cleverness of avarice is but the cunning of imbecility.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Misery

The miserable are sacred.—Seneca.

Misery makes sport to mock itself.—Shakespeare.

Misery acquaints a man with strange bedfellows.—Shakespeare.

Half our misery from our foibles springs.—Hannah More.

One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
So fast they follow. —Shakespeare.

He that is down need fear no fall.—Bunyan.

Man is only miserable so far as he thinks himself so.—Sannazaro.

Misery still delights to trace
Its semblance in another's case.
—Cowper.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions. —Shakespeare.

The gods from heaven survey the fatal strife, and mourn the miseries of human life.—Dryden.

When a few words will rescue misery out of her distress, I hate the man who can be a churl of them.—Sterne.

There are a good many real miseries in life that we cannot help smiling at,

but they are the smiles that make wrinkles and not dimples.—O. W.
Holmes.

This iron world brings down the stoutest hearts to lowest state; for misery doth bravest minds abate.—
Spenser.

Miserable men commiserate not themselves; boweless unto others, and merciles unto their own bowels.—Sir
Thomas Browne.

Misery is caused for the most part,
not by a heavy crash of disaster, but by the corrosion of less visible evils, which canker enjoyment and undermine security.—Dr. Johnson.

Misery and ignorance are always the cause of great evils. Misery is easily excited to anger, and ignorance soon yields to perfidious counsels.—
Addison.

One more Unfortunate
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death. —Hood.

Misery is so little appertaining to our nature, and happiness so much so, that we in the same degree of illusion only lament over that which has pained us, but leave unnoticed that which has rejoiced us.—Richter.

If misery be the effect of virtue, it ought to be revered; if of ill-fortune, to be pitied; and if of vice, not to be insulted, because it is perhaps itself a punishment adequate to the crime by which it was produced.—
Dr. Johnson.

Small miseries, like small debts, hit us in so many places and meet us at so many turns and corners, that what they want in weight they make up in number, and render it less hazardous to stand one cannon ball than a volley of bullets.—Colton.

Man is so great that his greatness appears even in the consciousness of his misery. A tree does not know itself to be miserable. It is true that it is misery indeed to know one's self to be miserable; but then it is great—ness also. In this way, all man's miseries go to prove his greatness. They are the dethroned of a mighty potentate, of a dethroned monarch.—Pascal.

Nothing is a misery,
Unless our weakness apprehend it so:
We cannot be more faithful to ourselves,
In anything that's manly, than to make
Ill-fortune as contemptible to us
As it makes us to others.

—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The misery of human life is made up of large masses, each separated from the other by certain intervals. One year the death of a child; years after, a failure in trade; after another longer or shorter interval, a daughter may have married unhappily; in all but the singularly unfortunate, the integral parts that compose the sum-total of the unhappiness of a man's life are easily counted and distinctly remembered.—Coleridge.

Misfortune

We have seen better days.—Shakespeare.

The lowest ebb is the turn of the tide.—Longfellow.

Misfortunes should always be expected.—Johnson.

Our greatest misfortunes come to us from ourselves.—Rousseau.

Misfortunes have their dignity and their redeeming power.—George S. Hillard.

A soul exasperated in ills, falls out
With everything, its friend, itself.

—Addison.

Sick in the world's regard, wretched and low.—Shakespeare.

Our bravest lessons are not learned through success, but misadventure.—Alcott.

Oh, give me thy hand, one writ with me in sour misfortune's book.—Shakespeare.

If misfortune comes, she brings along the bravest virtues.—Thomson.

Little minds are tamed and subdued by misfortune; but great minds rise above it.—Washington Irving.

Who hath not known ill-fortune, never knew
Himself, or his own virtue. —Mallet.

We have all of us sufficient fortitude to bear the misfortunes of others.—La Rochefoucauld.

Misery and misfortune is all one; and of misfortune fortune hath only the gift.—Sir P. Sidney.

Many men, seemingly impelled by fortune, hasten forward to meet misfortune half way.—Rousseau.

It is good to see in the misfortunes of others what we should avoid.—Syrus.

When one is past, another care we have;
Thus woe succeeds a woe, as wave a wave.

—Herrick.

Sick in the world's regard, wretched and low.—Shakespeare.

Heaven sends us misfortunes as a moral tonic.—Lady Blessington.

After all, our worst misfortunes never happen, and most miseries lie in anticipation.—Balzac.

The less we parade our misfortunes the more sympathy we command.—Orville Dewey.

Most of our misfortunes are more supportable than the comments of our friends upon them.—Colton.

I believe, indeed, that it is more laudable to suffer great misfortunes than to do great things.—Stanislaus.

Misfortune makes of certain souls a vast desert through which rings the voice of God.—Balzac.

Men do not go out to meet misfortune as we do. They learn it; and we—we divine it.—Mme. Swetchine.

The greatest misfortune of all is not to be able to bear misfortune.—Bias

How true it is that, sooner or later, the most rebellious must bow beneath the yoke of misfortune!—De Staël.

The quivering flesh, though torture-torn, may live, but souls, once deeply wounded, heal no more.—Ebenezer Elliott.

Mishaps are like knives, that either serve us or cut us, as we grasp them by the blade or the handle.—Lowell.

There is nothing so wretched or foolish as to anticipate misfortunes. What madness it is in your expecting evil before it arrives!—Seneca.

When I was happy I thought I knew men, but it was fated that I should know them in misfortune only.—Napoleon.

Some souls are ennobled and elevated by seeming misfortunes, which then become blessings in disguise.—Chapin.

When any calamity has been suffered, the first thing to be remembered is, how much has been escaped.—Johnson.

We exaggerate misfortune and happiness alike. We are never either so wretched or so happy as we say we are.—Balzac.

Men are prostrated by misfortune; women bend, but do not break, and martyr-like live on.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

Misfortune is never mournful to the soul that accepts it; for such do always see that every cloud is an angel's face.—St. Jerome.

The good man, even though overwhelmed by misfortune, loses never his inborn greatness of soul. Camphor-wood burnt in the fire becomes all the more fragrant.—Sataka.

There is a chill air surrounding those who are down in the world; and people are glad to get away from them, as from a cold room.—George Eliot.

I am convinced that we have a degree of delight, and that no small one, in the real misfortunes and pains of others.—Burke.

I do not myself believe there is any misfortune. What men call such is merely the shadowside of a good.—George MacDonald.

We should learn, by reflecting on the misfortunes which have attended others, that there is nothing singular in those which befall ourselves.—Melmoth.

It is seldom that God sends such calamities upon man as men bring upon themselves and suffer willingly.—Jeremy Taylor.

The diamond of character is revealed by the concussion of misfortune, as the splendor of the precious jewel of the mine is developed by the blows of the lapidary.—F. A. Durivage.

Misfortunes are, in morals, what bitters are in medicine: each is at first disagreeable; but as the bitters act as corroborants to the stomach, so adversity chastens and ameliorates the disposition.—From the French.

Misfortune, like a creditor severe,
But rises in demand for her delay;
She makes a scourge of past prosperity
To sting thee more and double thy distress.
—Young.

It is often better to have a great deal of harm happen to one; a great deal may arouse you to remove what a little will only accustom you to endure.—Lord Greville.

When misfortunes happen to such as dissent from us in matters of religion, we call them judgments: when to those of our own sect, we call them trials; when to persons neither way distinguished, we are content to attribute them to the settled course of things.—Shenstone.

In misfortune we often mistake dejection for constancy; we bear it without daring to look on it; like cowards, who suffer themselves to be murdered without resistance.—Rochefoucauld.

If all men would bring their misfortunes together in one place, most would be glad to take his own home again, rather than to take a proportion out of the common stock.—Solon.

Flowers never emit so sweet and strong a fragrance as before a storm. Beauteous soul! when a storm approaches thee, be as fragrant as a sweet-smelling flower.—Richter.

What man's life is not overtaken by one or more of those tornadoes that send us out of the course, and fling us on rocks to shelter as best we may?—Thackeray.

Then was I as a tree whose boughs did bend with fruit; but in one night, a storm or robbery, call it what you will, shook down my mellow hangings, nay, my leaves, and left me bare to weather.—Shakespeare.

I may grieve with the smart of an evil as soon as I feel it, but I will not smart with the grief of an evil as soon as I hear of it. My evil, when it cometh, may make my grief too great; why, then, should my grief, before it comes, make my evil greater?—Arthur Warwick.

My May of life is fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf; and that which should accompany old age, as honor, love, obedience, troops of friends, I must not look to have; but in their stead, curses, not loud but deep, mouth-honor, breath which the poor heart would fain deny and dare not.—Shakespeare.

But strong of limb
And swift of foot misfortune is, and, far
Outstripping all, comes first to every land,
And there wreaks evil on mankind, which prayers
Do afterwards redress. —Homer.

Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,
Fallen from his high estate,
And weltring in his blood;
Deserted at his utmost need,
But those his former bounty fed;
On the bare earth expos'd he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.
—Dryden.

There is a Russian proverb which says that misfortune is next door to stupidity; and it will generally be found that men who are constantly lamenting their ill luck are only reaping the consequences of their own neglect, mismanagement, improvidence, or want of application.—Samuel Smiles.

Missions

Palestine was the West Point and Annapolis for the world. In that little country God was training up a people out of whom, when the fullness of the time should come, His gospel cadets should emerge, fitted by all the training of all their national history for going out among the heathen and proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ.—Wm. M. Taylor.

A man may make his way across the Atlantic in a skiff, for all I know; but if you are intending to cross the sea, take my advice, and secure passage in a first-class steamer, and you will be more likely to get there. So it is with these heathen millions. I do not know but some of them may drift, and we shall find them in the city of God. But I do know that by giving them the gospel, by building up and supporting among them a Christian church, we shall greatly multiply their chances for heaven.—C. H. Fowler.

Every impulse and stroke of missionary power on earth is from the heart of Christ. He sows, and there is a harvest. He touches nations, and there arises a brotherhood, not only civilized by His light, but sanctified by His love. The isles of the ocean wait for Him. He spreads His net and gathers of every kind, and lo! the burden of the sea is not only fishes, but fishermen, who go and gather and come again. If there are activity, free giving, ready going, a full treasury, able men who say, "Here am I, send me," it is because through all the organization Christ lives, and His personal Spirit works. There is no other possible spring for that enthusiasm.—Bishop Huntington.

The movement has indeed been slow, and not such as man would have expected; but it has been analogous to the great movements of God in His providence and in His works. So, if we may credit the geologists, has this earth reached its present state. So have moved on the great empires. So retribution follows crime. So rise the tides. So grows the tree with long intervals of repose and apparent death. So comes on the spring, with battling elements and frequent reverses, with snow-banks and violets, and, if we had no experience, we might be doubtful what the end would be. But we know that back of all this, beyond these fluctuations, away in the serene heavens, the sun is moving steadily on; that these very agitations of the elements and seeming reverses, are not only the sign, but the result of his approach, and that the full warmth and radiance of the summer noontide are sure to come. So, O Divine Redeemer, Sun of Righteousness, come Thou! So will He come. It may be through clouds and darkness and tempest; but the heaven where He is, is serene; He is "traveling in the greatness of His strength;" and as surely as the throne of God abides, we know He shall yet reach the height and splendor of the highest noon, and that the light of millennial glory shall yet flood the earth.—Mark Hopkins.

Mistake

To step aside is human.—Burns.

All flesh doth frailty breed!—Spenser.

Any man may commit a mistake, but none but a fool will continue in it.—Cicero.

Being a mortal, you have stumbled; in this mortal life it is a wonder when a man has been happy throughout his life.—Bato.

We learn wisdom from failure much more than from success; we often discover what will do by finding out what will not do; and probably he who never made a mistake never made a discovery. Horne Tooke used to say of his studies in intellectual philosophy, that he had become all the better acquainted with the country through having had the good luck sometimes to lose his way.—Samuel Smiles.

Mistrust

It is more disgraceful to distrust than to be deceived by our friends.—La Rochefoucauld.

I hold it cowardice,
To rest mistrustful, where a noble heart
Hath pawn'd an open hand in sign of love.
—Shakespeare.

The world is an old woman, that mistakes any gilt farthing for a gold coin; whereby, being often cheated, she will henceforth trust nothing but the common copper.—Carlyle.

Mob

The multitude is always in the wrong.—Roscommon.

Mobs are multiplied ignorance.—Sir W. Jones.

The scum that rises upmost, when the nation boils.—Dryden.

The mob has nothing to lose, everything to gain.—Goethe.

License they mean when they cry liberty.—Milton.

The multitude unaw'd is insolent;
Once seiz'd with fear, contemptible and vain.
—Mallet.

The blind monster with uncounted heads, the still discordant, wavering multitude.—Shakespeare.

The mob is man voluntarily descending to the nature of the beast.—Emerson.

It has been very truly said that the mob has many heads, but no brains.—Rivarol.

Mankind in the gross is a gaping monster, that loves to be deceived, and has seldom been disappointed.—Mackenzie.

It is the proof of a bad cause when it is applauded by the mob.—Seneca.

The mob have neither judgment nor principle,—ready to bawl at night for the reverse of what they desired in the morning.—Tacitus.

The mob is a monster, with the hands of Briareus, but the head of Polyphemus,—strong to execute, but blind to perceive.—Colton.

The dregs may stir themselves as they please; they fall back to the bottom by their own coarseness.—Joubert.

'Tis ever thus: indulgence spoils the base;
Raising up pride, and lawless turbulence,
Like noxious vapors from the fulsome marsh
When morning shines upon it.

—Joanna Baillie.

Let there be an entire abstinence from intoxicating drinks throughout this country during the period of a single generation, and a mob would be as impossible as combustion without oxygen.—Horace Mann.

The mob is a sort of bear; while your ring is through its nose, it will even dance under your cudgel; but should the ring slip, and you lose your hold, the brute will turn and rend you.—Jane Porter.

Inconstant, blind,
Deserting friends at need, and duped by foes;
Loud and seditious, when a chief inspired
Their headlong fury, but, of him deprived,
Already slaves that lick'd the scourging hand.

—Thomson.

What would you have, you curs,
That like nor peace, nor war? the one affrights you,
The other makes you proud. He that trusts to you,
Where he should find you lions, finds you hares;

Where foxes, geese: you are no surer, no,
Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,
Or hailstone in the sun.

—Shakespeare.

A mob is usually a creature of very mysterious existence, particularly in a large city. Where it comes from, or whither it goes, few men can tell. Assembling and dispersing with equal suddenness, it is as difficult to follow to its various sources as the sea itself; nor does the parallel stop here, for the ocean is not more fickle and uncertain, more terrible when roused, more unreasonable or more cruel.—Dickens.

The many-headed multitude, whom inconstancy only doth by accident guide to well-doing! Who can set confidence there, where company takes away shame, and each may lay the fault upon his fellow?—Sir P. Sidney.

It is an easy and vulgar thing to please the mob, and not a very arduous task to astonish them; but essentially to benefit and to improve them is a work fraught with difficulty, and teeming with danger.—Colton.

They praise, and they admire they know not what,
And know not whom, but as one leads the other;
And what delight to be by such extoll'd,
To live upon their tongues, and be their talk,
Of whom to be disprais'd were no small praise?

—Milton.

When roused to rage the maddening populace storms, their fury, like a rolling flame, bursts forth unquenchable; but give its violence ways, it spends itself, and as its force abates, learns to obey and yields it to your will.—Euripides.

Mocking-Bird

Then from the neighboring thicket the mocking-bird, wildest of singers,
Swinging aloft on a willow spray that hung o'er the water,
Shook from his little throat such floods of delirious music,
That the whole air and the woods and the waves seemed silent to listen.

—Longfellow.

Winged mimic of the woods! thou motley fool!

Who shall thy gay buffoonery describe?
Thine ever-ready notes of ridicule
Pursue thy fellows still with jest and jibe:
Wit, sophist, songster, Yorick of thy tribe
Thou sportive satirist of Nature's school;
To thee the palm of scoffing we ascribe,
Arch-mocker and mad abbot of misrule!

—Robert Wilde, D. D.

Living echo, bird of eve,
Hush thy wailing, cease to grieve;
Pretty warbler, wake the grove—
To notes of joy, to songs of love.
—Thomas Morton.

Moderation

The just medium.—Louis Philippe.

Moderation is the pleasure of the wise.—Voltaire.

True happiness springs from moderation.—Goethe.

To live long, it is necessary to live slowly.—Cicero.

All the operations of Nature are gradual.—Bacon.

The most haste, ever the worst speed.—Churchill.

Tranquil pleasures last the longest.—Bovee.

Moderate pleasure relaxes the spirit, and moderates it.—Seneca.

They are sick that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing.—Shakespeare.

In everything the middle course is best: all things in excess bring trouble to men.—Plautus.

Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.—Fuller.

It is best to rise from life as from a banquet, neither thirsty nor drunken.—Aristotle.

Moderation consists in being moved as angels are moved.—Joubert.

There are times when moderation must be hypocrisy.—Bayle St. John.

There is a German proverb which says that Take-it-Easy and Live-Low are brothers.—Bovee.

There is a mean in all things. Even virtue itself hath its stated limits; which not being strictly observed, it ceases to be virtue.—Horace.

Fortify yourself with moderation; for this is an impregnable fortress.—Epictetus.

Everything that exceeds the bounds of moderation has an unstable foundation.—Seneca.

The superior man wishes to be slow in his words and earnest in his conduct.—Confucius.

Unlimited activity, of whatever kind, must end in bankruptcy.—Goethe.

Health, longevity, beauty, are other names for personal purity; and temperance is the regimen for all.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Equally inured by moderation either state to bear, prosperous or adverse.—Milton.

Moderation is commonly firm; and firmness is commonly successful.—Dr. Johnson.

Moderation is the key-note of lasting enjoyment.—Hosea Ballou.

Who loves the golden mean is safe from the poverty of a tenement, is free from the envy of a palace.—Horace.

Moderation resembles temperance. We are not so unwilling to eat more, as afraid of doing ourselves harm by it.—Rochefoucauld.

Only actions give life strength; only moderation gives it a charm.—Richter.

The boundary of man is moderation. When once we pass that pale our guardian angel quits his charge of us.—Feltham.

Moderation is the inseparable companion of wisdom, but with it genius has not even a nodding acquaintance.—Colton.

It is a little stream, which flows softly, but freshens everything along its course.—Mme. Swetchine.

A thing moderately good is not so good as it ought to be. Moderation in temper is always a virtue; but moderation in principle is always a vice.—Thomas Paine.

It is certainly a very important lesson to learn how to enjoy ordinary things, and to be able to relish your being, without the transport of some passion, or gratification of some appetite.—Steele.

There is a limit to enjoyment, though the sources of wealth be boundless, And the choicest pleasures of life lie within the ring of moderation. —Tupper.

Moderation cannot have the credit of combating and subduing ambition, —they are never found together. Moderation is the languor and indolence of the soul, as ambition is its activity and ardor.—Rochefoucauld.

Education and study, and the favors of the muses, confer no greater benefit on those that seek them than these humanizing and civilizing lessons, which teach our natural qualities to submit to the limitations prescribed by reason, and to avoid the wildness of extremes.—Plutarch.

For aught I see, they are as sick, that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing; it is no mean happiness, therefore, to be seated in the mean; superfluity comes sooner by white hairs, but competency lives longer.—Shakespeare.

Let a man take time enough for the most trivial deed, though it be but the paring of his nails. The buds swell imperceptibly, without hurry or confusion,—as if the short spring days were an eternity.—Thoreau.

Moderation, which consists in an indifference about little things, and in a prudent and well-proportioned zeal about things of importance, can proceed from nothing but true knowledge, which has its foundation in self-acquaintance.—Lord Chatham.

To go beyond the bounds of moderation is to outrage humanity. The greatness of the human soul is shown by knowing how to keep within proper bounds. So far from greatness consisting in going beyond its limits, it really consists in keeping within it.—Pascal.

Modesty

Modesty is the conscience of the body.—Balzac.

Praise thyself never.—Seneca.

Modesty is of the color of virtue.—Diogenes.

Modesty is the citadel of beauty and virtue.—Demades.

Modesty is policy, no less than virtue.—Simms.

Everything that is exquisite hides itself.—Joseph Roux.

'T is modesty that makes them seem divine.—Shakespeare.

Virtue which shuns the day.—Addison.

A modest man never talks of himself.—La Bruyère.

Avoid pretension; Nature never pretends.—Lavater.

True modesty is a discerning grace.—Cowper.

Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue.—Addison.

What can be found equal to modesty, uncorrupt faith, the sister of justice, and undisguised truth?—Horace.

No padlocks, bolts, or bars can secure a maiden so well as her own reserve.—Cervantes.

Immodest words admit of no defence; For want of decency is want of sense. —Wentworth Dillon.

The woman and the soldier who do not defend the first pass will never defend the last.—Fielding.

Modesty is a sweet song-bird no open cage-door can tempt to flight.—Hafiz.

Modesty is a diamond setting to female beauty.—Fanny Kemble Butler.

Modesty is bred of self-reverence. Fine manners are the mantle of fair minds.—Alcott.

Modesty once extinguished knows not how to return.—Seneca.

Her modest looks the cottage might adorn, Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn. —Goldsmith.

True modesty avoids everything that is criminal; false modesty everything that is unfashionable.—Addison.

I think that few people are aware how early it is right to respect the modesty of an infant.—Harriet Martineau.

Nothing can atone for the want of modesty, without which beauty is ungraceful and wit detestable.—Steele.

No age, sex, or condition is above or below the absolute necessity of modesty; but without it one is vastly beneath the rank of man.—Barton.

That chastity of look which seems to hang, a veil of purest light, over all her beauties, and by forbidding most inflames desires.—Young.

The crimson glow of modesty o'erspread Her cheek, and gave new lustre to her charms. —Dr. Thomas Franklin.

"God will punish," say the Orientals, "him who sees and him who is seen." Beautiful and terrible recommendation of modesty!—Joubert.

Modesty never rages, never murmurs, never pouts when it is ill-treated; it pines, it beseeches, it languishes.—Steele.

Modesty is silent when it would be improper to speak; the humble, without being called upon, never recollects to say anything of himself.—Lavater.

Let us be careful to distinguish modesty, which is ever amiable, from reserve, which is only prudent.—Shenstone.

Modesty is a bright dish-cover, which makes us fancy there is something very nice underneath it.—Douglas Jerrold.

Modesty is a kind of shame or bashfulness proceeding from the sense a man has of his own defects compared with the perfections of him whom he comes before.—South.

The greatest ornament of an illustrious life is modesty and humility, which go a great way in the character even of the most exalted princes.—Napoleon.

The modest man has everything to gain, and the arrogant man everything to lose; for modesty has always to deal with generosity, and arrogance with envy.—Rivarol.

Be simple and modest in your deportment, and treat with indifference whatever lies between virtue and vice. Love the human race; obey God.—Marcus Antoninus.

Women and men of retiring timidity are cowardly only in dangers which affect themselves, but the first to rescue when others are endangered.—Richter.

Modesty in women has two special advantages,—it enhances beauty and veils uncomeliness.—Fontenelle.

How beautiful is modesty! It winneth upon all beholders; but a word or a glance may destroy the pure love that should have been for thee.—Tupper.

Modesty is the lowest of the virtues, and is a confession of the deficiency it indicates. He who undervalues himself is justly undervalued by others.—Hazlitt.

God intended for women two preventatives against sin, modesty and remorse; in confession to a mortal priest the former is removed by his absolution, the latter is taken away.—

Miranda of Piedmont.

The first of all virtues is innocence;
the next is modesty. If we banish modesty out of the world, she carries away with her half the virtue that is in it.—Addison.

You little know what you have done, when you have first broke the bounds of modesty; you have set open the door of your fancy to the devil, so that he can, almost at his pleasure ever after, represent the same sinful pleasure to you anew.—Baxter.

Wrap thyself in the decent veil that the arts or the graces weave for thee, O human nature! It is only the statue of marble whose nakedness the eye can behold without shame and offence!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Virtue she finds too painful an endeavor,
Content to dwell in decencies for ever.
—Pope.

Can it be that modesty may more betray
Our sense than woman's lightness?
—Shakespeare.

It is often found that modesty and humility not only do no good, but are positively hurtful, when they are shown to the arrogant who have taken up a prejudice against you, either from envy or from any other cause.—
Machiavelli.

The violet droops its soft and bashful brow,
But from its heart sweet incense fills the air;—
So rich within—so pure without—art thou,
With modest mien and soul of virtue rare. —Mrs. Osgood.

True modesty is a discerning grace
And only blushes in the proper place;
But counterfeit is blind, and skulks through
fear,
Where 'tis a shame to be ashamed t' appear:
Humility the parent of the first,
The last by vanity produc'd and nurs'd.
—Cowper.

The mark of the man of the world is absence of pretension. He does not make a speech; he takes a low business tone, avoids all brag, is nobody, dresses plainly, promises not at all,

performs much, speaks in monosylla-bles, hugs his fact. He calls his employment by its lowest name, and so takes from evil tongues their sharpest weapon.—Emerson.

A just and reasonable modesty does not only recommend eloquence, but sets off every great talent which a man can be possessed of; it heightens all the virtues which it accompanies; like the shades in paintings, it raises and rounds every figure and makes the colors more beautiful, though not so glaring as they would be without.—
Addison.

The gravest events dawn with no more noise than the morning star makes in rising. All great developments complete themselves in the world, and modestly wait in silence, praising themselves never, and announcing themselves not at all. We must be sensitive, and sensible, if we would see the beginnings and endings of great things. That is our part.—
Beecher.

Bashfulness is not so much the effect of an ill education, as the proper gift and provision of wise nature.
Every stage of life has its own set of manners, that is suited to it, and best becomes it. Each is beautiful in its season: and you might as well quarrel with the child's rattle, and advance him directly to the boy's top and span-farthing, as expect from diffident youth the manly confidence of riper age.—Bishop Hurd.

The chariest maid is prodigal enough.
If she unveil her beauty to the moon:
Virtue itself escapes not calumnious strokes:
The canker galls the infants of the Spring,
Too oft before their buttons be disclosed;
And in the morn and liquid dew of Youth,
Contagious blastments are most imminent.
Be wary then: best safety lies in fear.
—Shakespeare.

Moments

When Youth and Pleasure meet to chase the glowing hours with flying feet.—Byron.

I see that time divided is never long,
and that regularity abridges all things
—Mme. de Staël.

There is not a moment without some duty.—Cicero.

Arrow-swift the present sweepeth, and motionless forever stands the past.—Schiller.

A moment is a mighty thing
Beyond the soul's imagination;
For in it, though we trace it not,
How much there crowds of varied lot
How much of life, life cannot see,
Darts onward to eternity!
—Robert Montgomery.

The ill usage of every minute is a new record against us in heaven.—Zimmermann.

The present moment is a powerful deity.—Goethe.

Money

The life-blood of the nation.—Swift.

Greatest god below the sky.—Spenser.

The almighty dollar!—Washington Irving.

The picklock that never fails.—Massinger.

Wisdom, knowledge, power,—all combined.—Byron.

Money is a necessity; so is dirt.—Haliburton.

Ready money is Aladdin's lamp.—Byron.

We are all slaves to the shining metal.—Douglas Jerrold.

The dangers gather as the treasures rise.—Dr. Johnson.

Money is life to us wretched mortals.—Hesiodus.

If money go before, all ways do lie open.—Shakespeare.

This bank-note world.—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Put not your trust in money, but put your money in trust.—Holmes.

Money is a good soldier, sir, and will on.—Shakespeare.

Money lost is bewailed with unfeigned tears.—Juvenal.

Money, Paul, can do anything.—Dickens.

Excess of wealth is cause of covetousness.—Marlowe.

What's money without happiness?—Bulwer-Lytton.

Money makes a man laugh.—John Shelden.

Money makes up in a measure all other wants in men.—Wycherley.

The wretched impotence of gold.—Young.

Labor not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom.—Solomon.

All-powerful money supplies the place of birth and beauty.—Horace.

Mammon is the largest slaveholder in the world.—Frederic Saunders.

Money is a handmaiden, if thou knowest to use it; a mistress if thou knowest not.—Horace.

The use of money is all the advantage there is in having money.—Benjamin Franklin.

If you make money your god, it will plague you like the devil.—Fielding.

Gold is the fool's curtain, which hides all his defects from the world.—Feltham.

A wise man should have money in his head, but not in his heart.—Swift.

For gold the merchant ploughs the main, the farmer ploughs the manor.—Burns.

Money is power, and rare are the heads that can withstand the possession of great power.—Beaconfeld.

Mammon wins his way where seraphs might despair.—Byron.

He that wants money, means and content, is without three good friends.—Shakespeare.

Money is the god of our time, and Rothschild is his prophet.—Heine.

The deepest depth of vulgarism is that of setting up money as the ark of the covenant.—Carlyle.

Make all you can, save all you can, give all you can.—Wesley.

Money is a good servant, but a dangerous master.—Bouhours.

But the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that Honor feels.—Tennyson.

All love has something of blindness in it, especially the love of money.

To despise money on some occasions is a very great gain.—Terence.

Money brings honor, friends, conquest, and realms.—Milton.

Money is a bottomless sea, in which honor, conscience, and truth may be drowned.—Kozlay.

Money is not required to buy one necessity of the soul.—Thoreau.

There is no place invincible, where in an ass loaded with gold may enter.—Stephen Collett.

Money often costs too much, and power and pleasure are not cheap.—Emerson.

The philosophy which affects to teach us a contempt of money does not run very deep.—Henry Taylor.

What can money do to console a man with a headache?—George MacDonald.

Many people take no care of their money till they come nearly to the end of it, and others do just the same with their time.—Goethe.

One spade of gold undermines faster than a hundred mattocks of steel.—Lilly.

The persons who have the most sublime contempt for money are the same that have the strongest appetite for the pleasures it enables them to procure.—Shenstone.

Money is a defence, but the excellency of knowledge is that wisdom giveth life.—Bible.

As men advance in life, all passions resolve themselves into money. Love, ambition, even poetry, end in this.—Beaconsfield.

If you would know the value of money, go and try to borrow some; for he that goes a-borrowing goes a-sorrowing.—Franklin.

Get to live; then live and use it, else it is not true that thou hast gotten. Surely use alone makes money not a contemptible stone.—George Herbert.

The god of this world is riches, pleasure, and pride, wherewith it abuses all the creatures and gifts of God.—Luther.

Covetous men need money least, yet most affect it; and prodigals, who need it most, do least regard it.—Theodore Parker.

Commerce has set the mark of selfishness, the signet of its all-enslaving power, upon a shining ore, and called it gold.—Shelley.

By doing good with his money, a man as it were stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current for the merchandise of heaven.—Rutledge.

Money, in truth, can do much, but it cannot do all. We must know the province of it, and confine it there, and even spurn it back when it wishes to get farther.—Carlyle.

The love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.—Bible.

Trade it may help, society extend,
But lures the pirate, and corrupts the friend:
It raises armies in a nation's aid,
But bribes a senate, and the land's betray'd. —Pope.

What a dignity it gives an old lady, that balance at the bankers! How tenderly we look at her faults if she is a relative; what a kind, good-natured old creature we find her!—Thackeray.

Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the unhappiest of all mortals are those who have more of either than they know how to use. —Johnson.

Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding; it dissipates every doubt and scruple in an instant, accommodates itself to the meanest capacities, silences the loud and clamorous, and brings over the most obstinate and inflexible.—Addison.

Money, which represents the prose of life, and which is hardly spoken of in parlors without an apology, is, in its effects and laws, as beautiful as roses.—Emerson.

It is my opinion that a man's soul may be buried and perish under a dung-heap, or in a furrow of the field, just as well as under a pile of money. —Hawthorne.

Money does all things,—for it gives and it takes away; it makes honest men and knaves, fools and philosophers; and so forward, mutatis mutandis, to the end of the chapter.—L'Estrange.

Money was made, not to command our will, But all our lawful pleasures to fulfil.
Shame and woe to us, if we our wealth obey;
The horse doth with the horseman run away. —Abraham Cowley.

Money does all things for reward; some are pious and honest so long as they thrive upon it, but if the devil himself gives better wages, they soon change their party.—Seneca.

Whoever has sixpence is sovereign over all men,—to the extent of the sixpence; commands cooks to feed him, philosophers to teach him, kings to mount guard over him,—to the extent of sixpence.—Carlyle.

To cure us of our immoderate love of gain, we should seriously consider how many goods there are that money will not purchase, and these the best; and how many evils there are that money will not remedy, and these the worst.—Colton.

O money, money, how blindly thou hast been worshipped, and how stupidly abused! Thou art health and liberty and strength, and he that has thee may rattle his pockets at the foul fiend!—Lamb.

The Romans worshipped their standard; and the Roman standard happened to be an eagle. Our standard is only one tenth of an eagle,—a dollar,—but we make all even by adoring it with tenfold devotion.—E. A. Poe.

The love of money is a vertiginous pool, sucking all in to destroy it. It is troubled and uneven, giddy and unsafe; serving no end but its own, and that also in a restless and uneasy motion.—Jeremy Taylor.

Character is money; and according as the man earns or spends the money, money in turn becomes character. As money is the most evident power in the world's uses, so the use that he makes of money is often all that the world knows about a man.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Genius scorns the power of gold: it is wrong. Gold is the war-scythe on its chariot, which mows down the millions of its foes, and gives free passage to the sun-couriers with which it leaves those heavenly fields of light for the gross battlefields of earth.—Ouida.

But for money and the need of it, there would not be half the friendships in the world. It is powerful for good if divinely used. Give it plenty of air, and it is sweet as the hawthorn; shut it up, and it cankers and breeds worms.—George MacDonald.

That I might live alone once with my gold!
O, 'tis a sweet companion! kind and true:
A man may trust it when his father cheats
him,
Brother, or friend, or wife. O wondrous self!
That which makes all men false, is true itself. —Ben Jonson.

This yellow slave
Will knit and break religions; bless the accurs'd;
Make the hoar leprosy ador'd; place thieves,
And give them title, knee, and approbation,
With senators on the bench.
—Shakespeare.

The avaricious love of gain, which is so feelingly deplored, appears to us a principle which, in able hands, might be guided to the most salutary purposes. The object is to encourage the love of labor, which is best encouraged by the love of money.—Sydney Smith.

When money represents many things, not to love it would be to love nearly nothing. To forget true needs can be only a feeble moderation; but to know the value of money and to sacrifice it always, maybe to duty, maybe even to delicacy,—that is real virtue.—De Senancour.

Money never made a man happy yet, nor will it. There is nothing in its nature to produce happiness. The more a man has, the more he wants. Instead of its filling a vacuum, it makes one. If it satisfies one want, it doubles and trebles that want another way. That was a true proverb of the wise man, rely upon it; "Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure and trouble there with."—Franklin.

Money is both the generation and corruption of purchased honor; honor is both the child and slave of potent money: the credit which honor hath lost, money hath found. When honor grew mercenary, money grew honorable. The way to be truly noble is to condemn both.—Quarles.

We must learn that competence is better than extravagance, that worth is better than wealth, that the golden calf we have worshiped has no more brains than that one of old which the Hebrews worshiped. So beware of money and of money's worth as the supreme passion of the mind. Beware of the craving for enormous acquisition.—Bartol.

The value of a dollar is to buy just things; a dollar goes on increasing in value with all the genius and all the virtue of the world. A dollar in a university is worth more than a dollar in a jail; in a temperate, schooled, law-abiding community than in some sink of crime, where dice, knives, and arsenic are in constant play.—Emerson.

Midas longed for gold, and insulted the Olympians. He got gold, so that whatever he touched became gold, and he, with his long ears, was little the better for it. Midas had insulted Apollo and the gods; the gods gave him his wish, and a pair of long ears, which also were a good appendage to it. What a truth in these old fables! —Carlyle.

Monomania

Adhesion to one idea is monomania; to few, slavery.—Bovee.

The man with but one idea in his head is sure to exaggerate that to top-heaviness, and thus he loses his equilibrium.—Aaron Hill.

The greatest part of mankind labor under one delirium or another; and Don Quixote differed from the rest, not in madness, but the species of it. The covetous, the prodigal, the superstitious, the libertine, and the coffee-house politician, are all Quixotes in their several ways.—Fielding.

Month

Thirty days hath November,
April, June, and September,
February hath xxviii. alone,
And all the rest have xxxi.

—Richard Crafton

Fourth, eleventh, ninth, and sixth,
Thirty days to each affix;
Every other thirty-one Except the second month alone.
—Common in Chester County, Pa.

Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one
Excepting February alone:
Which hath but twenty-eight, in fine,
Till leap year gives it twenty-nine.
—Common in New England States.

Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
February eight-and-twenty all alone,
And all the rest have thirty-one:
Unless that leap-year doth combine,
And give to February twenty-nine.
—Return from Parnassus. *

Monuments

Brave deeds are the monuments of brave men.—Napoleon I.

Tombs are the clothes of the dead:
a grave is but a plain suit, and a rich
monument is one embroidered.—
Thomas Fuller.

Monuments, like men, submit to fate.—Pope.

Monuments and eulogy belong to the dead.—Daniel Webster.

Footprints of history on the pages of time.—Macaulay.

Monuments themselves memorials need.—Crabbe.

Wouldst thou behold his monument?
Look around!—Rogers.

Monuments are the grappling-irons that bind one generation to another.—
Joubert.

When old Time shall lead him to his end, goodness and he fill up one monument.—Shakespeare.

If I have done any honorable exploit, that is my monument; but if I have done none, all your statues will signify nothing.—Agesilaus.

Those only deserve a monument who do not need one, that is, who have raised themselves a monument in the minds and memories of men.—

Hazlitt.

Monuments may be builded to express the affection or pride of friends, or to display their wealth, but they are only valuable for the characters which they perpetuate.—Garfield.

If by good government I could raise a memorial in my people's hearts, that would be the statue for me.—Czar Peter III.

If a man do not erect in this age his own tomb ere he dies, he shall live no longer in monument than the bell rings and the widow weeps. * * *
An hour in clamor, and a quarter in rheum.—Shakespeare.

Tombs decked by the arts can scarcely represent death as a formidable enemy; we do not, indeed, like the ancients, carve sports and dances in the sarcophagus, but thought is diverted from the bier by works that tell of immortality, even from the altar of death.—Mme. de Staël.

Monuments! what are they? the very pyramids have forgotten their builders, or to whom they were dedicated. Deeds, not stones, are the true monuments of the great.—Motley.

There is great incongruity in this idea of monuments, since those to whom they are usually dedicated need no such recognition to embalm their memory; and any man who does, is not worthy of one.—Hawthorne.

I have completed a monument more lasting than brass, and more sublime than the regal elevation of pyramids, which neither the wasting snow, the unavailing north-wind, or an innumerable succession of years, and the flight of seasons, shall be able to demolish.—Horace.

The monument means a world of memories, a world of deeds, a world of tears, and a world of glories. * * *
By the subtle chemistry that no man knows, all the blood that was shed by our brethren, all the lives that were devoted, all the grief that was felt, at last crystallized itself into granite, rendering immortal the great truth for which they died, and it stands there to-day.—Garfield.

When we see the many grave-stones which have fallen in, which have been defaced by the footsteps of the congregation, which lie buried under the ruins of the churches, that have themselves crumbled together over them; we may fancy the life after death to be as a second life, into which man enters in the figure, or the picture, or the inscription, and lives longer there than when he was really alive. But this figure also, this second existence, dies out too, sooner or later. Time will not allow himself to be cheated of his rights with the monuments of men or with themselves.—Goethe.

Moon

Like a great phantom slowly sweeping through the sky.—Tennyson.

The silver empress of the night.—Tickell.

The silver-footed queen.—Milton.

Moonlight is sculpture; sunlight is painting.—Hawthorne.

The maiden moon in her mantle of blue.—Joaquin Miller.

Ye moon and stars, bear witness to the truth.—Dryden.

O, swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon.—Shakespeare.

The moon, like to a silver bow new bent in heaven.—Shakespeare.

The full-orb'd moon with her nocturnal ray
Shed o'er the scene a lovely flood of day.
—Wheelwright.

Waning moons their settled periods keep,
to swell the billows and ferment the deep.—Addison.

Day glimmered in the east, and the white moon hung like a vapor in the cloudless sky.—Rogers.

The queen of night shines fair with all her virgin stars about her.—Otway.

It is the very error of the moon; she comes more near earth than she was wont, and makes men mad.—Shakespeare.

That orb'd maiden, with white fire laden,
Whom mortals call the moon.
—Shelley.

The young moon has fed
Her exhausted horn
With the sunset's fire.
—Shelley.

O! moon old boughs lisp forth a holier din,
The while they feel thine airy fellowship:
Thou dost bless everywhere with silver lip,
Kissing dead things to life.
—John Keats.

Cynthia, fair regent of the night,
oh, may thy silver lamp from heaven's high bower direct my footsteps in the midnight hour.—Gay.

How like a queen comes forth the lonely
Moon
From the slow opening curtains of the clouds;
Walking in beauty to her midnight throne!
—George Croly.

The silver light, which, hallowing tree and tower,
Sheds beauty and deep softness o'er the whole,
Breathes also to the heart, and o'er it throws
A loving languor which is not repose.
—Byron.

And be their rest unmov'd
By the white moonlight's dazzling power:
None, but the loving and lov'd,
Should be awake at this sweet hour.
—Moore.

Still and pale
Thou movest in thy silver veil,
Queen of the night! the filmy shroud
Of many a mild, transparent cloud
Hides, yet adorns thee.
—Praed.

* * * now glow'd the firmament
With living sapphires; Hesperus, that led
The starry host rode brightest, till the Moon,
Rising in clouded majesty, at length,
Apparent queen, unveil'd her peerless light,
And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw.
—Milton.

The moon, the governess of floods,
pale in her anger, washes all the air.

that rheumatic diseases do abound;
and, through this distemperature, we see the seasons alter.—Shakespeare.

See yonder fire! It is the moon
Slow rising o'er the eastern hill.
It glimmers on the forest tips,
And through the dewy foliage drips
In little rivulets of light,
And makes the heart in love with night.
—Longfellow.

Like the young moon,
When on the sunlit limits of the night
Her white shell trembles amid crimson air,
And whilst the sleeping tempest gathers might,
Doth, as the herald of its coming, bear
The ghost of its dead mother, whose dim form
Bends in dark ether from her infant's chair.
—Shelley.

Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop,
Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime.
Wide the pale deluge floats, and streaming mild
O'er the sky'd mountain to the shadowy vale,
While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam
The whole air whitens with a boundless tide
Of silver radiance, trembling round the world.
—Thomson.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth;
Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole.
—Addison.

The cold chaste Moon, the Queen of Heaven's bright isles,
Who makes all beautiful on which she smiles!
That wandering shrine of soft, yet icy
flame,
Which ever is transform'd yet still the same,
And warms, but not illumines.
—Shelley.

I know not that there is anything in nature more soothing to the mind than the contemplation of the moon, sailing, like some planetary bark, amidst a sea of bright azure. The subject is certainly hackneyed: the moon has been sung by poet and poetaster. Is there any marvel that it should be so?—Simms.

The rising moon has hid the stars,
Her level rays, like golden bars
Lie on the landscape green,
With shadows brown between,
And silver white the river gleams,
As if Diana, in her dreams,
Had dropt her silver bow
Upon the meadows low.
—Longfellow.

The Queen of night, whose large command
Rules all the sea, and half the land,
And over moist and crazy brains,
In high spring-tides, at midnight reigns,
Was now declining to the west,
To go to bed, and take her rest.
—Butler.

Beholding the moon rise
Over the pallid sea and the silvery mist of the meadows:
Silently one by one, in the infinite meadows
of heaven,
Blossom'd the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels.
—Longfellow.

My own lov'd light,
That very soft and solemn spirit worships,
That lovers love so well—strange joy is
thine,
Whose influence o'er all tides of soul hath
power,
Who lend'st thy light to rapture and despair;
The glow of hope and wan hue of sick
fancy
Alike reflect thy rays: alike thou lightest
The path of meeting or of parting love—
Alike on mingling or on breaking hearts
Thou smil'st in throned beauty!
—Maturin.

Morality

Morality is the vestibule of religion.
—Chapin.

Morality is the object of government.—Emerson.

Women are the guardians of morality.—Prince de Ligne.

What can laws do without morals?
—Franklin.

By the very constitution of our nature, moral evil is its own cure.—
Chalmers.

Ten men have failed from defect in morals where one has failed from defect in intellect.—Horace Mann.

Good manners are a part of good morals.—Whately.

Know that morality is a curb, not a spur.—Joubert.

There are many religions, but there is only one morality.—Ruskin.

There is nothing which strengthens faith more than the observance of morality.—Addison.

The health of a community is an almost unfailling index of its morals.—James Martineau.

Morality will be very difficult for the man who does not pray.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Morality must always precede and accompany religion, and yet religion is much more than morality.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Moral supremacy is the only one that leaves monuments, and not ruins, behind it.—Lowell.

Morality is good, and is accepted of God, as far as it goes; but the difficulty is, it does not go far enough.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The moral influence of woman over man is almost always salutary.—J. Stuart Mill.

I have no two separate moral standards for the sex.—Caroline H. Dall.

If we are told a man is religious, we still ask what are his morals.—Boufflers.

To give a man a full knowledge of true morality, I would send him to no other book than the New Testament.—Locke.

All sects are different, because they come from men; morality is everywhere the same, because it comes from God.—Voltaire.

Moral virtues are so many sweet flowers strewed over a dead corpse, which hide the loathsomeness of it, but inspire not life into it.—Flavel.

Morality is character and conduct, such as is required by the circle or community in which the man's life happens to be placed.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Morality, when vigorously alive, sees farther than intellect, and provides unconsciously for intellectual difficulties.—Froude.

It is generally a feminine eye that first detects the moral deficiencies hidden under the "dear deceit" of beauty.—George Eliot.

The true grandeur of humanity is in moral elevation, sustained, enlightened, and decorated by the intellect of man.—Charles Sumner.

Morality may exist in an atheist without any religion, and in a theist with a religion quite unspiritual.—Frances Power Cobbe.

Do not be too moral. You may cheat yourself out of much life so. Aim above morality. Be not simply good; be good for something.—Thoreau.

In moral action divine law helpeth exceedingly the law of reason to guide life, but in the supernatural it alone guideth.—Hooker.

Morality is the fruit of religion: to desire the former without the latter is to desire an orange without an orange-tree.—Joseph Roux.

The system of morality to be gathered from the ancient sages falls very short of that delivered in the gospel.—Swift.

Morality rests upon a sense of obligation; and obligation has no meaning except as implying a divine command, without which it would cease to be.—J. A. Froude.

Morality without religion is only a kind of dead reckoning,—an endeavor to find our place on a cloudy sea by measuring the distance we have run, but without any observation of the heavenly bodies.—Longfellow.

The ideal of morality has no more dangerous rival than the ideal of highest strength, of most powerful life. It is the maximum of the savage.—Novalis.

The moral law is written on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or unrighteous deed, for cruelty and oppression, for lust or vanity, the price has to be paid at last.—Froude.

Whatever may be the laws and customs of a country, women always give the tone to morals. Whether slaves or free, they reign, because their empire is that of the affections.—Aimé-Martin.

Beautiful it is, and a gleam from the same eternal pole-star visible amid the destinies of men, that all talent, all intellect, is in the first place moral. What a world were this otherwise!—Carlyle.

It is a notable circumstance that mothers who are themselves open to severe comments as to their moral character, are generally most solicitous as to the virtuous behavior of their daughters.—Rivarol.

Moral principles require reasoning and discourse to discover the certainty of their truths; they lie not open as natural characters engraven on the mind.—Locke.

I find the doctors and the sages
Have differ'd in all climes and ages,
And two in fifty scarce agree
On what is pure morality. —Moore.

In cases of doubtful morality, it is usual to say, Is there any harm in doing this? This question may sometimes be best answered by asking ourselves another: Is there any harm in letting it alone?—Colton.

Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but, by ascending a little, you may often overlook it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement, we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which could have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.—Helps.

Let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.—Washington.

If we are told a man is religious we still ask what are his morals? But if we hear at first that he has honest morals, and is a man of natural justice and good temper, we seldom think of the other question, whether he be religious and devout.—Shaftesbury.

We are come too late, by several thousand years, to say anything new in morality. The finest and most beautiful thoughts concerning manners have been carried away before our times, and nothing is left for us but to glean after the ancients, and the most ingenious of the moderns.—Bruyère.

Everywhere the tendency has been to separate religion from morality, to set them in opposition even. But a religion without morality is a superstition and a curse; and anything like an adequate and complete morality without religion is impossible. The only salvation for man is in the union of the two as Christianity unites them.—Mark Hopkins.

The morality of an action depends upon the motive from which we act. If I fling half a crown to a beggar with intention to break his head, and he picks it up and buys victuals with it, the physical effect is good; but with respect to me, the action is very wrong.—Johnson.

All systems of morality are fine. The gospel alone has exhibited a complete assemblage of the principles of morality, divested of all absurdity. It is not composed, like your creed, of a few common-place sentences put into bad verse. Do you wish to see that which is really sublime? Repeat the Lord's Prayer.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

The system of morality which Socrates made it the business of his life to teach was raised upon the firm basis of religion. The first principles of virtuous conduct which are common to all mankind are, according to this excellent moralist, laws of God; and the conclusive argument by which he supports this opinion is, that no man departs from these principles with impunity.—Enfield.

Socrates taught that true felicity is not to be derived from external possessions, but from wisdom, which consists in the knowledge and practice of virtue; that the cultivation of virtuous manners is necessarily attended with pleasure as well as profit; that the honest man alone is happy; and that it is absurd to attempt to separate things which are in nature so closely united as virtue and interest.—Enfield.

In that fearful loneliness of spirit, when those who should have been his friends and counsellors only frowned upon his misgivings. * * * and everything seems wrapped in hideous uncertainty, I know but one way in which a man may come forth from his agony scathless: it is by holding fast to those things which are certain still—the grand, simple landmarks of morality. In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain. If there be no God and no future state, yet even then it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward. Blessed beyond all earthly blessedness is the man who in the tempestuous darkness of the soul has dared to hold fast to these venerable landmarks.—Frederick W. Robertson.

Every age and every nation has certain characteristic vices, which prevail almost universally, which scarcely any person scruples to avow, and which even rigid moralists but faintly censure. Succeeding generations change the fashion of their morals with the fashion of their hats and their coaches; take some other kind of wickedness under their patronage, and wonder at the depravity of their ancestors.—Macaulay.

Morning

Rise, happy morn! rise, holy morn!
—Tennyson.

The eye of day hath oped its lids
—Shakespeare.

The early morning has gold in its mouth.—Franklin.

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn.—Gray.

O word and thing most beautiful!
—Susan Coolidge.

When rosy morning glimmered o'er the dales.—Pope.

The meek-eyed Morn appears,
mother of dews.—Thomson.

Under the opening eyelids of the morn.—Milton.

You gray lines that fret the clouds are messengers of day.—Shakespeare.

The dewy morn, with breath all incense and with cheek all bloom.—Byron.

Sweet is the breath of Morn, her rising sweet,
With charm of earliest birds. —Milton.

Jocund day stands tiptoe on the misty mountain-top.—Shakespeare.

The morrow, fair with purple beams, dispersed the shadows of the misty night.—Spenser.

Morn in the white wake of the morning star
Came furrowing all the orient into gold.
—Tennyson.

Sweet as dew-drops on the flowery lawns when the sky opens, and the morning dawns.—Tickell.

Morn, waked by the circling hours, with rosy hand unbarred the gates of light.—Milton.

When the glad sun, exulting in his might, comes from the dusky-curtained tents of night.—Emma C. Embury.

The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn, doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat wake the god of day.
—Shakespeare.

Mornings are mysteries; the first world's
youth,
Man's resurrection, and the future's bud
Shroud in their births.

—Henry Vaughan.

Spill not the morning (the quintessence of the day) in recreation, for sleep itself is recreation. Add not, therefore, sauce to sauces.—Fuller.

Bright as does the morning star appear,
Out of the east with flaming locks bedight,
To tell the dawning day is drawing near.
—Spenser.

Darkness is fled. Now flowers unfold their beauties to the sun, and blushing kiss the beam he sends to wake them.—Sheridan.

Behold the morning! Rise up, O youth, and quickly fill thyself with this rosy wine sparkling from the crystal cup of the dawn!—Omar Khayam.

Its brightness, mighty divinity! has a fleeting empire over the day, giving gladness to the fields, color to the flowers, the season of the loves, harmonious hour of wakening birds.—
Calderon.

For night's swift dragons cut the clouds full fast, and yonder shines Aurora's harbinger; at whose approach ghosts, wandering here and there, troop home to churchyards.—
Shakespeare.

So, on the eastern summit, clad in gray, morn, like a horseman girt for travel, comes, and from his tower of mist night's watchman hurries down.
—H. K. White.

Mighty Nature bounds as from her birth,
The sun is in the heavens, and life on
earth;
Flowers in the valley, splendor in the beam,
Health on the gale, and freshness in the stream.
—Byron.

Let the day have a blessed baptism by giving your first waking thoughts into the bosom of God. The first hour of the morning is the rudder of the day.—Beecher.

Now the bright Morning-star, Day's har-
binger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
The flow'ry May, who from her green lap
throws
The yellow Cowslip, and the pale Primrose.
—Milton.

Morn on the mountain, like a summer bird,
Lifts up her purple wing, and in the vales
The gentle wind, a sweet and passionate
wooer,
Kisses the blushing leaf. —Longfellow.

But now the clouds in airy tumult fly;
The sun, emerging, opes an azure sky;
A fresher green the smiling leaves display,
And glittering as they tremble, cheer the day.
—Parnell.

I was always an early riser.
Happy the man who is! Every morning day comes to him with a virgin's love, full of bloom and freshness. The youth of nature is contagious, like the gladness of a happy child.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The morn is up again, the dewy morn,
With breath all incense, and with cheek
all bloom,
Laughing the clouds away with playful
scorn,
And living as if earth contain'd no tomb,—
And glowing into day. —Byron.

The rosy-fingered morn did there disclose
Her beauty, ruddy as a blushing bride,
Gilding the marigold, painting the rose,
With Indian chrysolites her cheeks were dy'd.
—Baron.

Nor is a day lived if the dawn is left out of it, with the prospects it opens. Who speaks charmingly of nature or of mankind, like him who comes bibulous of sunrise and the fountains of waters?—Alcott.

O how beautiful is morning!
How the sunbeams strike the daisies
And the kingcups fill the meadow
Like a golden-shielded army Marching to the uplands fair.
—D. M. Mulock.

At the morning hour, when the halfawakened sun, trampling down the lingering shadows of the west, spreads

his ruby-tinted tresses over jessamines and roses, drying with cloths of gold Aurora's tears of mingled fire and snow, which the sun's rays converted into pearls.—Calderon.

The grey-eyed morn smiles on the frowning night,
Checking the eastern clouds with streaks of light;
And decked darkness like a drunkard reels
From forth day's path, and Titan's fiery wheels.
—Shakespeare.

Measure your health by your sympathy with morning and spring. If there is no response in you to the awakening of nature, if the prospect of an early morning walk does not banish sleep, if the warble of the first bluebird does not thrill you, know that the morning and spring of your life are past.—Thoreau.

At last the golden oriental gate
Of greatest heaven 'gan to open fair;
And Phœbus, fresh as bridegroom to his mate,
Came dancing forth shaking his dewy hair,
And hurl'd his glist'ring beams through gloomy air.
—Spenser.

Lo, here the gentle lark, weary of rest,
From his moist cabinet mounts up on high,
And wakes the morning, from whose silver breast
The sun ariseth in his majesty;
Who doth the world so gloriously be'old,
That cedar-tops and hills seem burnish'd gold.
—Shakespeare.

Let your sleep be necessary and healthful, not idle and expensive of time, beyond the needs and conveniences of nature; and sometimes be curious to see the preparation which the sun makes when he is coming forth from his chambers of the east.—Jeremy Taylor.

I see the spectacle of morning from the hilltop over against my house, from daybreak to sunrise, with emotions which an angel might share. The long slender bars of cloud float like fishes in the sea of crimson light. From the earth, as a shore, I look out into that silent sea. I seem to partake its rapid transformations; the active enchantment reaches my dust, and I dilate and conspire with the morning wind.—Emerson.

The eastern hanging crescent climbeth higher;
See, purple on the azure softly steals,
And Morning, faintly touched with quivering fire,
Leans on the frosty summits of the hills,
Like a young girl over her hoary sire.
—Roscoe.

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain-tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
Anon permit the basest clouds to ride
With ugly rack on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace.
—Shakespeare.

What various scenes, and O! what scenes of Woe,
Are witness'd by that red and struggling beam!
The fever'd patient, from his pallet low,
Through crowded hospitals beholds it stream;
The ruined maiden trembles at its gleam,
The debtor wakes to thought of gyve and jail,
The love-lorn wretch starts from tormenting dream;
The wakeful mother, by the glimmering pale,
Trims her sick infant's couch, and soothes his feeble wail.
—Scott.

Day!
Faster and more fast,
O'er night's brim, day boils at last;
Boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's brim
Where spurning and suppress'd it lay—
For not a froth-flake touched the rim
Of yonder gap in the solid gray
Of the eastern cloud, an hour away;
But forth one wavelet, then another, curled,
Till the whole sunrise, not to be suppress'd,
Rose, reddened, and its seething breast
Flickered in bounds, grew gold, then overflowed the world.
—Robert Browning.

Moroseness

Moroseness is the evening of turbulence.—Landor.

Mortality

To smell a fresh turf of earth is wholesome for the body; no less are thoughts of mortality cordial to the soul. "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."—Fuller.

Short is the life of those who possess great accomplishments, and seldom do they reach a good old age.

Whatever thou lovest, pray that thou mayest not set too high a value on it.
—Martial.

This muddy vesture of decay.—
Shakespeare.

All, that in this world is great or gay,
Doth, as a vapor, vanish and decay.
—Spenser.

What surety of the world, what hope,
what stay,
When this was now a king, and now is clay! —Shakespeare.

Who breathes must suffer; and who thinks,
must mourn;
And he alone is bless'd, who ne'er was born. —Prior.

Like bubbles on the sea of matter borne,
They rise, they break, and to that sea return. —Pope.

All that's bright must fade—
The brightest still the fleetest;
All that's sweet was made
But to be lost when sweetest.
—Moore.

There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one dead lamb is there!
There is no fireside, howsoe'er defended,
But has one vacant chair.
—Longfellow.

'Tis but an hour ago, since it was nine;
And, after one hour more, 'twill be eleven;
And so, from hour to hour, we ripe and
ripe,
And then, from hour to hour, we rot and
rot. —Shakespeare.

To contemplation's sober eye,
Such is the race of man;
And they that creep, and they that fly,
Shall end where they began,
Alike the busy and the gay,
But flutter through life's little day.
—Gray.

'Tis a stern and a startling thing to think
How often mortality stands on the brink
Of its grave without any misgiving;
And yet in this slippery world of strife,
In the stir of human bustle so rife,
There are daily sounds to tell us that Life
Is dying, and Death is living! —Hood.

When we see our enemies and friends gliding away before us, let us not forget that we are subject to the general law of mortality, and shall soon be where our doom will be fixed forever.—Johnson.

Mother

A mother is a mother still—the holiest thing alive.—Coleridge.

Heaven is at the feet of mothers.—
Roebuck.

All that I am, my mother made me.—J. Q. Adams.

Nature's loving proxy, the watchful mother.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The mother's heart is the child's schoolroom.—Beecher.

Men are what their mothers made them.—Emerson.

A babe is a mother's anchor.—
Beecher.

Where there is a mother in the house, matters speed well.—A. Bronson Alcott.

One good mother is worth a hundred school masters.—George Herbert.

"An ounce of mother," says the Spanish proverb, "is worth a pound of clergy."—T. W. Higginson.

Youth fades; love droops; the leaves of friendship fall:
A mother's secret hope outlives them all.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

But one on earth is better than the wife; that is the mother.—Leopold Schefer.

I would desire for a friend the son who never resisted the tears of his mother.—Lacretelle.

The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother.—Napoleon.

At first babes feed on the mother's bosom, but always on her heart.—
Beecher.

If there be aught surpassing human deed or word or thought it is a mother's love!—Marchioness de Spadara.

A mother's prayers, silent and gentle, can never miss the road to the throne of all bounty.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Maternal love! thou word that sums all bliss.—Pollok.

Mother is the name of God in the lips and hearts of little children.—Thackeray.

France needs nothing so much to promote her regeneration as good mothers.—Napoleon I.

What instruction the baby brings to the mother!—T. W. Higginson.

No language can express the power and beauty and heroism of a mother's love.—Chapin.

The bearing and the training of a child is woman's wisdom.—Tennyson.

The only love which on this teeming earth asks no return for passion's wayward birth.—Mrs. Norton.

His sweetest dreams were still of that dear voice that soothed his infancy.—Southey.

I have not wept these forty years; but now my mother comes afresh into my eyes.—Dryden.

A mother's love, in a degree, sanctifies the most worthless offspring.—Hosea Ballou.

And all my mother came into mine eyes
And gave me up to tears.

—Shakespeare.

Unhappy is the man for whom his own mother has not made all other mothers venerable.—Richter.

If the whole world were put into one scale, and my mother into the other, the world would kick the beam.—Lord Langdale.

Mother love * * * hath this unlikeness to any other love: Tender to the object, it can be infinitely tyrannical to itself, and thence all its power of self-sacrifice.—Lew Wallace.

A woman's love
Is mighty, but a mother's heart is weak,
And by its weakness overcomes.

—James Russell Lowell.

I think it must somewhere be written that the virtues of mothers shall, occasionally, be visited on their children, as well as the sins of fathers.—Dickens.

A mother is as different from anything else that God ever thought of, as can possibly be. She is a distinct and individual creation.—Henry Ward Beecher.

There is in all this cold and hollow world no fount of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within a mother's heart.—Mrs. Hemans.

What are Raphael's Madonnas but the shadow of a mother's love, fixed in permanent outline forever?—T. W. Higginson.

When God thought of mother, He must have laughed with satisfaction, and framed it quickly—so rich, so deep, so divine, so full of soul, power, and beauty, was the conception.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The future of society is in the hands of the mothers. If the world was lost through woman, she alone can save it.—De Beaufort.

The mother's love is at first an absorbing delight, blunting all other sensibilities; it is an expansion of the animal existence.—George Eliot.

The child takes most of his nature of the mother, besides speech, manners, and inclination.—Herbert Spencer.

A grandam's name is little less in love than is the doting title of a mother: they are as children but one step below.—Shakespeare.

One lamp, thy mother's love, amid the stars shall lift its pure flame changeless, and before the throne of God burn through eternity.—N. P. Willis.

Happy he
With such a mother! faith in womankind
Beats with his blood, and trust in all things high Comes easy to him, and though he trip
and fall,
He shall not blind his soul with clay.
—Tennyson.

There is a sight all hearts beguiling—
A youthful mother to her infant smiling,
Who with spread arms and dancing feet,
A cooing voice, returns its answer sweet.
—Baillie.

O wondrous power! how little understood,—
Entrusted to the mother's mind alone,
To fashion genius, form the soul for good,
Inspire a West, or train a Washington!
—Mrs. Hale.

A mother has, perhaps, the hardest earthly lot; and yet no mother worthy of the name ever gave herself thoroughly for her child who did not feel that, after all, she reaped what she had sown.—Henry Ward Beecher.

She was my friend—I had but her—no
more,
No other upon earth—and as for heaven,
I am as they that seek a sign, to whom No sign is given. My mother! Oh, my mother!
—Taylor.

I miss thee, my mother! thy image is still
The deepest impress'd on my heart,
And the tablet so faithful in death must be chill,
Ere a line of that image depart.
—Eliza Cook.

The instruction received at the mother's knee, and the paternal lessons, together with the pious and sweet souvenirs of the fireside, are never effaced entirely from the soul.—
Lamennais.

It is generally admitted, and very frequently proved, that virtue and genius, and all the natural good qualities which men possess, are derived from their mothers.—Hook.

No mother who stands upon low ground herself can hope to place her children upon a loftier plane. They may reach it, but it will not be through her.—Julia C. R. Dorr.

In after-life you may have friends—fond, dear friends; but never will you have again the inexpressible love and gentleness lavished upon you which none but a mother bestows.—Macaulay.

Who ran to help me when I fell,
And would some pretty story tell;
Or kiss the place to make it well?
My mother. —Jane Taylor.

Maternal love! thou word that sums all
bliss,
Gives and receives all bliss,—fullest when most
Thou givest! spring-head of all felicity, Deepest when most is drawn! emblem of God!
O'erflowing most when greatest numbers
drink! —Pollok.

A mother should give her children a superabundance of enthusiasm, that after they have lost all they are sure to lose on mixing with the world, enough may still remain to prompt and support them through great actions.—J. C. Hare.

Even He who died for us upon the cross, in the last hour, in the unutter-able agony of death, was mindful of His mother, as if to teach us that this holy love should be our last worldly thought—the last point of earth from which the soul should take its flight for heaven.—Longfellow.

A mother's love is indeed the golden link that binds youth to age; and he is still but a child, however time may have furrowed his cheek, or silvered his brow, who can yet recall, with a softened heart, the fond devotion or the gentle chidings of the best friend that God ever gives us.—Bovee.

The mother, in her office, holds the key
Of the soul; and she it is who stamps the coin
Of character, and makes the being who would be a savage,
But for her gentle cares, a Christian man.
Then crown her Queen o' the world.
—Old Play.

The tie which links mother and child is of such pure and immaculate strength as to be never violated, except by those whose feelings are withered by vitiated society. Holy, simple, and beautiful in its construction, it is the emblem of all we can imagine of fidelity and truth.—Washington Irving.

Observe how soon, and to what a degree, this influence begins to operate! Her first ministration for her infant is to enter, as it were, the valley of the shadow of death, and win its life at the peril of her own! How different must an affection thus founded be from all others!—Mrs. Sigourney.

My mother!—manhood's anxious brow
And sterner cares have long been mine,
Yet turn I to thee fondly now,

As when upon thy bosom's shrine
My infant griefs were gently hush'd to rest,
And thy low whisper'd prayers my slumber blessed. —George W. Bethune.

The loss of a mother is always keenly felt, even if her health be such as to incapacitate her from taking an active part in the care of the family. She is the sweet rallying-point for affection, obedience, and a thousand tendernesses. Dreary the blank when she is withdrawn!—Lamartine.

Sweet is the image of the brooding dove!
Holy as heaven a mother's tender love!
The love of many prayers, and many tears,
Which changes not with dim declining
years—

The only love, which, on this teeming
earth,
Asks no return for passion's wayward birth. —Mrs. Norton.

A mother's love—how sweet the name!
What is a mother's love?

—A noble, pure and tender flame,
Enkindled from above,
To bless a heart of earthly mould;
The warmest love that can grow cold;
This is a mother's love.

—James Montgomery.

They say that man is mighty,

He governs land and sea,
He wields a mighty scepter
O'er lesser powers that be;
But a mightier power and stronger
Man from his throne has hurled,
For the hand that rocks the cradle
Is the hand that rules the world.

—Wm. Ross Wallace.

Mother, when your children are irritable, do not make them more so by scolding and fault-finding, but correct their irritability by good nature and mirthfulness. Irritability comes from errors in food, bad air, too little sleep, a necessity for change of scene and surroundings; from confinement in close rooms, and lack of sunshine. —Herbert Spencer.

Never, never has one forgotten his pure, right-educating mother! On the blue mountains of our dim childhood, towards which we ever turn and look, stand the mothers who marked out to us from thence our life; the most blessed age must be forgotten ere we can forget the warmest heart. You wish, O woman, to be ardently loved, and forever, even till death. Be, then, the mothers of your children.—Rich-ter.

Would, Mother, thou couldst hear me tell

How oft, amid my brief career,
For sins and follies lov'd too well,
Hath fallen the free, repentant tear.

And, in the waywardness of youth,
How better thoughts have given to me
Contempt for error, love for truth,
'Mid sweet remembrances of thee.

—James Aldrich.

Mighty is the force of motherhood!
It transforms all things by its vital heat; it turns timidity into fierce courage, and dreadless defiance into tremulous submission; it turns thoughtlessness into foresight, and yet still all anxiety into calm content; it makes selfishness become self-denial, and gives even to hard vanity the glance of admiring love.—George Eliot.

She led me first to God;
Her words and prayers were my young spirit's dew—

For when she us'd to leave
The fireside every eve,
I knew it was for prayer that she withdrew.

How often has the thought
Of my mourn'd mother brought Peace to my troubled spirit, and new power

The tempter to repel!
Mother, thou knowest well
That thou hast bless'd me since my natal hour. —John Pierpont.

A father may turn his back on his child, brothers and sisters may become inveterate enemies, husbands may desert their wives, wives their husbands. But a mother's love endures through all; in good repute, in bad repute, in the face of the world's condemnation, a mother still loves on, and still hopes that her child may turn from his evil ways, and repent; still she remembers the infant smiles that once filled her bosom with rapture, the merry laugh, the joyful shout of his childhood, the opening promise of his youth; and she can never be brought to think him all unworthy.—Washington Irving.

I miss thee, my mother, when young health has fled.

And I sink in the languor of pain,
Where, where is the arm that once pil-
lowed my head,

And the ear that once heard me complain?

Other hands may support me, gentle accents may fall—

For the fond and the true are still mine:
I've a blessing for each; I am grateful to all,—

But whose care can be soothing as thine?
—Eliza Cook.

When Eve was brought unto Adam, he became filled with the Holy Spirit, and gave her the most sanctified, the most glorious of appellations. He called her Eva—that is to say, the Mother of All. He did not style her wife, but simply mother—mother of all living creatures. In this consists the glory and the most precious ornament of woman.—Luther.

Motive

In the motive lies the good or ill.—
Dr. Johnson.

Pure motives do not insure perfect results.—Bovee.

What makes life dreary is the want of motive.—George Eliot.

A good intention clothes itself with sudden power.—Emerson.

In the eye of that Supreme Being to whom our whole internal frame is uncovered, dispositions hold the place of actions.—Blair.

Whatever touches the nerves of motive, whatever shifts man's moral position, is mightier than steam or caloric or lightning.—Chapin.

Take from men ambition and vanity and you will have neither heroes nor patriots.—Seneca.

Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws, makes that and the action fine.
—George Herbert.

Take away the motive, and you take away the sin.—Cervantes.

No labor is hard, no time is long, wherein the glory of eternity is the mark we level at.—Quarles.

Real motives, however seemingly apparent, are still bidden.—Alfred Mercier.

Selfishness is the grand moving principle of nine-tenths of our actions.
—Rochefoucauld.

What society wants is a new motive,
not a new cant.—Macaulay.

The whole world is put in motion by the wish for riches and the dread of poverty.—Dr. Johnson.

He who does evil that good may come pays a toll to the devil to let him into heaven.—Hare.

Many actions, like the Rhone, have two sources,—one pure, the other impure.—Hare.

The two great movers of the human mind are the desire of good, and the fear of evil.—Johnson.

However brilliant an action, it should not be esteemed great unless the result of a great motive.—La
Rochefoucauld.

In a promise, what you thought, and not what you said, is always to be considered.—Cicero.

Prudent men lock up their motives, letting familiars have a key to their hearts, as to their garden.—Shenstone.

In general, we do well to let an opponent's motives alone. We are seldom just to them. Our own motives on such occasions are often worse than those we assail.—W. E. Channing.

Let the motive be in the deed, and not in the event. Be not one whose motive for action is the hope of reward.—Krishna.

The true worth of a soul is revealed as much by the motive it attributes to the actions of others as by its own deeds.—J. Petit-Senn.

Never fear to bring the sublimest motive to the smallest duty, and the most infinite comfort to the smallest trouble.—Phillips Brooks.

The mingled incentives which lead to action are often too subtle and lie too deep for us to analyze.—Lavater.

If a man speaks or acts with a pure thought, happiness follows him like a shadow that never leaves him.—Buddha.

He that does good for good's sake seeks neither praise nor reward, though sure of both at last.—William Penn.

It is motive alone that gives real value to the actions of men, and disinterestedness puts the cap to it.—Bruyère.

We should often have reason to be ashamed of our most brilliant actions if the world could see the motives from which they spring.—Rochefoucauld.

All merit ceases the moment we perform an act for the sake of its consequences. Truly, in this respect "we have our reward."—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

The difference there is betwixt honor and honesty seems to be chiefly the motive; the mere honest man does that from duty which the man of honor does for the sake of character.—Shenstone.

God made man to go by motives, and he will not go without them, any more than a boat without steam, or a balloon without gas.—Beecher.

Man, it is not thy works, which are mortal, infinitely little, and the greatest no greater than the least, but only the spirit thou workest in, that can have worth or continuance.—Carlyle.

For there's nothing we read of in torture's inventions,
Like a well-meaning dunce, with the best of intentions. —Lowell.

The impulse to perform a worthy action often springs from our best nature, but is afterwards tainted by the spur of selfishness or sinister interest.—Emile Souvestre.

Motives are better than actions. Men drift into crime. Of evil they do more than they contemplate, and of good they contemplate more than they do.—Bovee.

We must not inquire too curiously into motives. They are apt to become feeble in the utterance; the aroma is mixed with the grosser air. We must keep the germinating grain away from the light.—George Eliot.

What if a man save my life with a draught that was prepared to poison me? The providence of the issue does not at all discharge the obliquity of the intent. And the same reason holds good even in religion itself. It is not the incense, or the offering that is acceptable to God, but the purity and devotion of the worshipper.—Seneca.

Motives are symptoms of weakness, and supplements for the deficient energy of the living principle, the law within us. Let them then be reserved for those momentous acts and duties in which the strongest and best-balanced natures must feel themselves deficient, and where humility no less than prudence prescribes deliberation.—Coleridge.

The motives of the best actions will not bear too strict an inquiry. It is allowed that the cause of most actions, good or bad, may be resolved into the love of ourselves; but the self-love of some men inclines them to please others, and the self-love of others is wholly employed in pleasing themselves. This makes the great distinction between virtue and vice.—Swift.

Men's minds are as variant as their faces. Where the motives of their actions are pure, the operation of the former is no more to be imputed to them as a crime, than the appearance of the latter; for both, being the work of nature, are alike unavoidable.—Geo. Washington.

The attendant on William Rufus, who discharged at a deer an arrow, which glanced against a tree and killed the king, was no murderer, because he had no such design. And, on the other hand, a man who should lie in wait to assassinate another, and pull the trigger of a gun with that intent, would be morally a murderer, not the less though the gun should chance to miss fire.—Whately.

As the grand discordant harmony of the celestial bodies may be explained by the simple principles of gravity and impulse, so also in that more wonderful and complicated microcosm, the heart of man, all the phenomena of morals are perhaps resolvable into one single principle, the pursuit of apparent good; for although customs universally vary, yet man in all climates and countries is essentially the same.—Colton.

Mountain

On every mountain-height is rest.—Goethe.

Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps among Alps arise!—Pope.

Men meet; mountains, never.—Lewis Cass.

Round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.—Goldsmith.

See the mountains kiss high heavens, and the waves clasp one another.—Shelley.

Whoever has not ascended mountains knows little of the beauties of Nature.—William Howitt.

Whose sun-bright summit mingles with the sky.—Campbell.

Without mountains the air could not be purified, nor the flowing of the rivers sustained.—Ruskin.

A proud heart and a lofty mountain are never fruitful.—George Eliot.

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,
And robes the mountain in its azure hue.—Campbell.

Mountains have a grand, stupid, lovable tranquillity.—O. W. Holmes.

The hills, rock-ribbed, and ancient as the sun.—Bryant.

The ragged cliff has thousand faces in a thousand hours.—Emerson.

Mountains interposed
Make enemies of nations, who had else
Like kindred drops been mingled into one.—Cowper.

Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains;
They crown'd him long ago
On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
With a diadem of snow.—Byron.

No vernal blooms their torpid rocks array,
But winter lingering chills the lap of May;
No zephyr fondly sues the mountain's breast,
But meteors glare, and stormy glooms invest.—Goldsmith.

Your peaks are beautiful, ye Apennines!
In the soft light of these serenest skies;
From the broad highland region, black with pines,
Fair as the hills of Paradise they rise,
Bathed in the tint Peruvian slaves behold
In rosy flushes on the virgin gold.—William Cullen Bryant.

I know a mount, the gracious Sun perceives
First when he visits, last, too, when he leaves
The world; and, vainly favored, it repays
The day-long glory of his steadfast gaze
By no change of its large calm front of snow.—Robert Browning.

Mountains never shake hands.
Their roots may touch; they may keep together some way up; but at length they part company, and rise into individual, insulated peaks. So is it with great men.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

He who first met the Highland's swelling blue,
Will love each peak that shows a kindred hue;

Hail in each crag a friend's familiar face,
And clasp the mountain in his mind's embrace.
—Byron.

Above me are the Alps.
The palaces of Nature, whose vast walls
Have pinnaced in clouds their snowy scalps,
And thrond Eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche—the thunderbolt of snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appals,
Gather round these summits, as to show How Earth may pierce to Heaven, yet leave vain man below. —Byron.

Mourner

Great sorrow makes sacred the sufferer.—Owen Meredith.

He mourns the dead who lives as they desire.—Young.

How wretched is the man who never mourned!—Young.

Smit with exceeding sorrow unto death.—Tennyson.

They truly mourn, that mourn without a witness.—Baron.

There is a tear for all that die;
A mourner o'er the humblest grave.
—Byron.

I have that honorable grief lodged here which burns worse than tears drown.—Shakespeare.

Many a smiling face hides a mourning heart; but grief alone teaches us what we are.—Schiller.

Moderate lamentation is the right of the dead; excessive grief the enemy to the living.—Shakespeare.

Sorrows when shared are less burdensome, though joys divided are increased.—J. G. Holland.

To be impatient at the death of a person concerning whom it was certain he must die, is to mourn because thy friend was not born an angel.—Jeremy Taylor.

Heavy sorrow is silent, and the deepest mourning is the most solitary.
—Charles Buxton.

The true way to mourn the dead is to take care of the living who belong to them.—Burke.

Away! we know that tears are vain, that death ne'er heeds nor hears distress.—Byron.

Of permanent mourning there is none; no cloud remains fixed. The sun will shine to-morrow.—Richter.

Excess of grief for the deceased is madness; for it is an injury to the living, and the dead know it not.—Xenophon.

No longer mourn for me when I am dead,
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
Give warning to the world that I am fled.
—Shakespeare.

Why is the hearse with scutcheons blazon'd
round,
And with the nodding plume of ostrich
crown'd?
No: the dead know it not, nor profit gain;
It only serves to prove the living vain.
—Gay.

Do not, for ever, with thy veiled lids
Seek for thy noble father in the dust;
Thou know'st 'tis common; all that lives
must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.
—Shakespeare.

O, very gloomy is the House of Woe,
Where tears are falling while the bell is knelling,
With all the dark solemnities which show
That Death is in the dwelling!
O, very, very dreary is the room
Where Love, domestic Love, no longer nestles,
But smitten by the common stroke of doom,
The corpse lies on the trestles! —Hood.

To be left alone in the wide world with scarcely a friend,—this makes the sadness which, striking its pang into the minds of the young and the affectionate, teaches them too soon to watch and interpret the spirit-signs of their own hearts.—Hawthorne.

He that lacks time to mourn, lacks time to mend.

Eternity mourns that. 'Tis an ill cure
For life's worst ills to have no time to feel them. —Sir Henry Taylor.

Let us weep in our darkness—but weep not for him!

Not for him—who, departing, leaves millions in tears!

Not for him—who has died full of honor and years!

Not for him—who ascended Fame's ladder
so high.

From the round at the top he has stepped to the sky. —N. P. Willis.

Murder

Carcasses bleed at the sight of the murderer.—Burton.

I will kill thee a hundred and fifty ways.—Shakespeare.

No place, indeed, should murder
sanctuarize.—Shakespeare.

Mercury but murders, pardoning those that kill.—Shakespeare.

Murder itself is past all expiation,
The greatest crime that nature doth abhor.
—Goffe.

Is there a crime
Beneath the roof of heaven, that stains the
soul
Of man, with more infernal hue, than damn'd Assassination? —Cibber.

Murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most miraculous organ.
—Shakespeare.

Murder may pass unpunish'd for a time,
But tardy justice will o'ertake the crime.
—Dryden.

Murder, like talent, seems occasionally to run in families.—George Henry Lewes.

One to destroy is murder by the law,
And gibbets keep the lifted hand in awe;
To murder thousands takes a specious
name.
War's glorious art, and gives immortal fame. —Young.

Every unpunished murder takes away something from the security of every man's life.—Daniel Webster.

Blood, though it sleep a time, yet never dies.—Chapman.

Nor cell, nor chain, nor dungeon speaks to the murderer like the voice of solitude.—Maturin.

Other sins only speak, murder shrieks out.
The element of water moistens the earth,
But blood flies upwards and bedews the heavens. —Webster.

Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood

Clean from my hand? No, this my hand will rather

The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
Making the green one red.—Shakespeare.

Come, thick night,
And pall thee in the dunest smoke of hell!
That my keen knife see not the wound it makes

Nor heaven peep through the blanket of the dark
To cry, hold, hold! —Shakespeare.

'Twas not enough
By subtle fraud to snatch a single life;
Puny impiety! whole kingdoms fell
To sate the lust of power: more horrid still,
The foulest stain and scandal of our nature,
Became its boast. One murder made a villain;
Millions a hero. —Dr. Porteus.

The scream of rage, the groan, the strife,
The blow, the gasp, the horrid cry,
The panting, throttled prayer for life,
The dying's heaving sigh,
The murderer's curse, the dead man's fix'd,
still glare,
And fears, and death's cold sweat—they all are there! —Dana.

Twice it call'd, so loudly call'd,
With horrid strength, beyond the pitch of nature;
And murder! murder! was the dreadful cry.
A third time it return'd with feeble
strength,
But o' the sudden ceas'd, as though the words
Were smother'd rudely in the grapp'd
throat,
And all was still again, save the wild blast
Which at a distance growl'd—
Oh! it will never from my mind depart!
That dreadful cry, all i' the instant still'd.
—Joanna Baillie.

Music

The soul of art best loved when love is by.—Rev. B. Brown.

Sweet music! sacred tongue of God.
—Charles G. Leland.

Music is well said to be the speech of angels.—Carlyle.

Music's golden tongue.—Keats.

Music is the universal language of mankind.—Longfellow.

It is the medicine of the breaking heart.—Sir A. Hunt.

The hidden soul of harmony.—Milton.

The language spoken by angels.—
Longfellow.

Is there a heart that music cannot melt?—Beattie.

The ordered music of the marching troops.—Edwin Arnold.

All of heaven we have below.—Addison.

Music is the poetry of the air.—
Jean Paul Richter.

Music is the poor man's Parnassus.
—Emerson.

I am never merry when I hear sweet music.—Shakespeare.

Why should the devil have all the good tunes?—Rowland Hill.

The stormy music of the drum.—
Campbell.

For discords make the sweetest airs.—Butler.

Music hath charms to soothe the savage
breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak.
—Congreve.

Music, which gentler on the spirit lies than tired eyelids upon tired eyes.
—Tennyson.

Music should strike fire from the heart of man, and bring tears from the eyes of woman.—Beethoven.

There is music in all things, if men had ears.—Byron.

Let me have music dying, and I seek no more delight.—Keats.

Music so softens and disarms the mind
That not an arrow does resistance find.
—Waller.

O music, sphere descended maid,
Friend of pleasure, wisdom's aid.
—Collins.

Music!—O, how faint, how weak, language fades before thy spell!—
Moore.

Music is the child of prayer, the companion of religion.—Chateaubriand.

Let me die to the sounds of the delicious music.—Last words of Mirabeau.

It is in learning music that many youthful hearts learn love.—Ricard.

I was all ear, and took in strains that might create a soul under the ribs of death.—Milton.

Music washes away from the soul
the dust of every-day life.—Auerbach.

How sour sweet music is, when time is broke, and no proportion kept!
—Shakespeare.

Music waves eternal wands,— Enchantress of the souls of mortals!
—E. C. Stedman.

There is a sadness in sweet sound
That quickens tears.—T. B. Aldrich.

Music, where soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory.—Shelley.

Music is the metre of this poetic movement, and is an invisible dance,
as dancing is a silent music.—Richter.

Music stands in a much closer connection with pure sensation than any of the other arts.—H. L. F. Helmholtz.

Music, rather than poetry, should be called "the happy art."—Richter.

Had I children, my utmost endeavors would be to make them musicians.
—Horace Walpole.

Is there a heart that music cannot melt?
Alas! how is that rugged heart forlorn.
—Beattie.

Sentimentally I am disposed to harmony, but organically I am incapable of a tune.—Lamb.

Sweetest melodies are those that are by distance made more sweet.—Wordsworth.

Melodies die out, like the pipe of Pan, with the ears that love them and listen for them.—George Eliot.

Music, among those who were styled the chosen people, was a religious art.—Addison.

See deep enough, and you see musically; the heart of nature being everywhere music, if you can only reach it.—Carlyle.

Men, even when alone, lighten their labors by song, however rude it may be.—Quintilian.

The harmony of things, as well as that of sound, from discord springs.—Sir J. Denham.

Music that brings sweet sleep down from the blissful skies.—Tennyson.

How light the touches are that kiss
The music from the chords of life!
—Coventry Patmore.

Give me some music; music, moody food
Of us that trade in love.—Shakespeare.

Music is nothing else but wild sounds civilized into time and tune.—Thomas Fuller.

Music is not merely a study, it is an entertainment; wherever there is music there is a throng of listeners.—Bryant.

Music cleanses the understanding, inspires it, and lifts it into a realm which it would not reach if it were left to itself.—Henry Ward Beecher.

O Music! how it grieves me that imprudence, intemperance, gluttony, should open their channels into thy sacred stream.—Landor.

Music, when combined with a pleasurable idea, is poetry; music without the idea is simply music; the idea without the music is prose from its very definiteness.—Edgar Allan Poe.

Music was a thing of the soul; a rose-lipped shell that murmured of the eternal sea; a strange bird singing the songs of another shore.—J. G. Holland.

Music, in the best sense, does not require novelty; nay, the older it is, and the more we are accustomed to it, the greater its effect.—Goethe.

All musical people seem to be happy. It is the engrossing pursuit, almost the only innocent and unpunished passion.—Sydney Smith.

Music is not a science any more than poetry is. It is a sublime instinct, like genius of all kinds.—Ouida.

Where painting is weakest, namely, in the expression of the highest moral and spiritual ideas, there music is sublimely strong.—Mrs. Stowe.

Music, if only listened to, and not scientifically cultivated, gives too much play to the feelings and fancy; the difficulties of the art draw forth the whole energies of the soul.—Richter.

Music is a kind of inarticulate unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite, and lets us for moments gaze into that.—Carlyle.

Not the rich viol, trumpet, cymbal, nor horn,
Guitar, nor cittern, nor the pining flute,
Are half so sweet as tender human words.
—Barry Cornwall.

Music resembles poetry; in each
Are nameless graces which no methods teach,
And which a master-hand alone can reach.
—Pope.

Music is a discipline, and a mistress of order and good manners; she makes the people milder and gentler, more moral and more reasonable.—Luther.

Lord, what music hast thou provided for Thy saints in heaven, when Thou affordest bad men such music on earth!—Izaak Walton.

The man that bath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils.
—Shakespeare.

O, it came over my ear like the sweet south, that breathes upon a bank of violets, stealing and giving odor!—Shakespeare.

Music is the fourth great material want of our natures,—first food, then raiment, then shelter, then music.—Bovee.

Music exalts each joy, allays each grief,
Expels diseases, softens every pain,
Subdues the rage of poison and of plague.
—Armstrong.

If music be the food of love, play on, give me excess of it; that, surfeiting, the appetite may sicken, and so die.—Shakespeare.

I ever held this sentence of the poet as a canon of my creed, "that whom God loveth not, they love not music."—T. Morley.

It wakes a glad remembrance of our youth, calls back past joys, and warms us into transport.—Rowe.

Music when thus applied raises in the mind of the hearer great conceptions. It strengthens devotion, and advances praise into rapture.—Addison.

Music is a prophecy of what life is to be, the rainbow of promise translated out of seeing into hearing.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Music is the only sensual gratification which mankind may indulge in to excess without injury to their moral or religious feelings.—Addison.

Music,—we love it for the buried hopes, the garnered memories, the tender feelings it can summon at a touch.—Miss L. E. Landon.

There is no feeling, perhaps, except the extremes of fear and grief, that does not find relief in music,—that does not make a man sing or play the better.—George Eliot.

Yea, music is the Prophet's art;
Among the gifts that God hath sent,
One of the most magnificent!
—Longfellow.

He is dead, the sweet musician!
He has moved a little nearer
To the Master of all music.
—Longfellow.

O, pleasant is the welcome kiss
When day's dull round is o'er;
And sweet the music of the step
That meets us at the door.
—J. R. Drake.

Orpheus' lute was strung with poets' sinews;
Whose golden touch could soften steel and
stones;
Make tigers tame, and huge leviathans Forsake unsounded deeps to dance on sands.
—Shakespeare.

When gripping griefs the heart doth wound,
And doleful dumps the mind oppress,
Then music, with her silver sound,
With speedy help doth lend redress.
—Shakespeare.

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
Not to the sensual ear, but more endear'd,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone.
—Keats.

Music's force can tame the furious beast;
Can make the wolf or foaming boar restrain
His rage; the lion drop his crested mane
Attentive to the song.
—Prior.

Music can noble hints impart,
Engender fury, kindle love;
With unsuspected eloquence can move,
And manage all the man with secret art.
—Addison.

Explain it as we may, a martial strain will urge a man into the front rank of battle sooner than an argument, and a fine anthem excite his devotion more certainly than a logical discourse.—Tuckerman.

Next to theology I give to music the highest place and honor. And we see how David and all the saints have wrought their godly thoughts into verse, rhyme, and song.—Luther.

Such is the sociableness of music, it conforms itself to all companies, both in mirth and mourning; complying to improve that passion with which it finds the auditors most affected.—Fuller.

Music is the only one of the fine arts in which not only man, but all other animals, have a common property,—mice and elephants, spiders and birds.—Richter.

And music too—dear music! that can touch
Beyond all else the soul that loves it much—
Now heard far off, so far as but to seem Like the faint, exquisite music of a dream.
—Moore.

The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls,
As if that soul were fled.
—Moore.

Music, of all the liberal arts, has the greatest influence over the passions, and is that to which the legislator ought to give the greatest encouragement.—Napoleon.

It is a bird-flight of the soul, when the heart declares itself in song. The affections that clothe themselves with wings are passions that have been subdued to virtues.—Simms.

Music is God's best gift to man, the only art of heaven given to earth, the only art of earth that we take to heaven. But music, like all our gifts, is given us in the germ. It is for us to unfold and develop it by instruction and cultivation.—Charles W. Landon.

Music is one of the fairest and most glorious gifts of God, to which Satan is a bitter enemy; for it removes from the heart the weight of sorrow, and the fascination of evil thoughts.—Luther.

The direct relation of music is not to ideas, but emotions. Music, in the works of its greatest masters, is more marvellous, more mysterious, than poetry.—Henry Giles.

Music is the harmonious voice of creation, an echo of the invisible world, one note of the divine concord which the entire universe is destined one day to sound.—Mazzini.

Music is the medicine of an afflicted mind, a sweet sad measure is the balm of a wounded spirit; and joy is heightened by exultant strains.—Henry Giles.

The lines of poetry, the periods of prose, and even the texts of Scripture most frequently recollected and quoted, are those which are felt to be pre-eminently musical.—Shenstone.

Some of the fathers went so far as to esteem the love of music a sign of predestination; as a thing divine, and reserved for the felicities of heaven itself.—Sir W. Temple.

Music is the art of the prophets, the only art that can calm the agitations of the soul: it is one of the most magnificent and delightful presents God has given us.—Luther.

Music religious heat inspires,
It wakes the soul, and lifts it high,
And wings it with sublime desires,
And fits it to bespeak the Deity.
—Addison.

Amongst the instrumentalities of love and peace, surely there can be no sweeter, softer, more effective voice than that of gentle, peace-breathing music.—Elihu Burritt.

Arcadians skilled in song will sing my woes upon the hills. Softly shall my bones repose, if you in future sing my loves upon your pipe.—Virgil.

God is its author, and not man; He laid The key-note of all harmonies; He planned All perfect combinations, and He made Us so that we could hear and understand.
—J. G. Brainard.

In the germ, when the first trace of life begins to stir, music is the nurse of the soul: it murmurs in the ear, and the child sleeps; the tones are companions of his dreams,—they are the world in which he lives.—Betina.

Those who love music are gentle and honest in their tempers. I always loved music, and would not, for a great matter, be without the little skill which I possess in the art.—Luther.

Without the definiteness of sculpture and painting, music is, for that very reason, far more suggestive. Like Milton's Eve, an outline, an impulse, is furnished, and the imagination does the rest.—Tuckerman.

The cause of freedom, in music as elsewhere, is now very nearly triumphant; but at a time when its adversaries were many and powerful, we can hardly imagine the sacred bridge of liberty kept by a more stalwart trio than Schubert the Armorer, Chopin the Refiner, and Liszt the Thunderer.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Music is thus, in her health, the teacher of perfect order, and is the voice of the obedience of angels, and the companion of the course of the spheres of heaven; and in her depravity she is also the teacher of perfect disorder and disobedience.—Ruskin.

Music is a sacred, a divine, a God-like thing, and was given to man by Christ to lift our hearts up to God, and make us feel something of the glory and beauty of God, and of all which God has made.—Charles Kingsley.

A well-composed song strikes and softens the mind, and produces a greater effect than a moral work, which convinces our reason, but does not warm our feelings, nor affect the slightest alteration in our habits.—Napoleon I.

The time is probably not far distant when music will stand revealed perchance as the mightiest of the arts, and certainly as the one art peculiarly representative of our modern world, with its intense life, complex civilization, and feverish self-consciousness.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Music, once admitted to the soul, becomes a sort of spirit, and never dies. It wanders perturbedly through the halls and galleries of the memory, and is often heard again, distinct and living as when it first displaced the wavelets of the air.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Music is in all growing things;
And underneath the silky wings
Of smallest insects there is stirred
A pulse of air that must be heard;
Earth's silence lives, and throbs, and sings.
—Lathrop.

What rapturous flights of sound!
what thrilling, pathetic chimes! what wild, joyous revelry of passion! what an expression of agony and woe! All the feelings of suffering and rejoicing humanity sympathized with and finding a voice in those tones.—Longfellow.

'Tis God gives skill,
But not without men's hands: He could not make
Antonio Stradivari's violins
Without Antonio. —George Eliot.

Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
Married to immortal verse,
Such as the meeting soul may pierce,
In notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out.
—Milton.

And wheresoever, in his rich creation,
Sweet music breathes—in wave, or bird,
or soul—
'Tis but the faint and far reverberation
Of that great tune to which the planets roll! —Frances S. Osgood.

Music moves us, and we know not why; we feel the tears, but cannot trace their source. Is it the language of some other state, born of its memory? For what can wake the soul's strong instinct of another world, like music?—Miss L. E. Landon.

There is in souls a sympathy with sounds,
And as the mind is pitch'd, the ear is pleas'd
With melting airs or martial, brisk or grave;
Some chord in unison with what we hear
Is touch'd within us, and the heart replies.
—Cowper.

I think sometimes could I only have music on my own terms; could I live in a great city, and know where I could go whenever I wished the ablution and inundation of musical waves, that were a bath and a medicine.—

Emerson.

There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full voiced quire below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
—Milton.

We know they music made
In heaven, ere man's creation;
But when God threw it down to us that strayed,
It dropt with lamentation,
And ever since doth its sweetness shade
With sighs for its first station.
—Jean Ingelow.

When Music, heavenly maid, was young,
While yet in early Greece she sung,
The Passions oft, to hear her shell,
Throng'd around her magic cell,
Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
Possess beyond the Muse's painting.
—Collins.

Curran's favorite mode of meditation was with his violin in his hand;
for hours together would he forget himself, running voluntaries over the strings, while his imagination, collecting its tones, was opening all his faculties for the coming emergency at the bar.—Disraeli.

Music is the mediator between the spiritual and the sensual life. Although the spirit be not master of that which it creates through music, yet it is blessed in this creation, which, like every creation of art, is mightier than the artist.—Beethoven.

Of all the arts beneath the heaven,
That man has found, or God has given,
None draws the soul so sweet away,
As music's melting, mystic lay;
Slight emblem of the bliss above,
It soothes the spirit all to love.—Hogg.

Music the fiercest grief can charm,
And fate's severest rage disarm.
Music can soften pain to ease,
And make despair and madness please;
Our joys below it can improve,
And antedate the bliss above. —Pope.

I always loved music; whoso has skill in this art, is of a good temperament, fitted for all things. We must teach music in schools. A schoolmaster ought to have skill in music, or I would not regard him; neither should we ordain young men as preachers, unless they have been well exercised in music.—Martin Luther.

And sure there is music even in the beauty, and the silent note which Cupid strikes, far sweeter than the sound of an instrument; for there is music wherever there is harmony, order, or proportion; and thus far we may maintain the music of the spheres.—
Sir Thomas Browne.

Tunes and airs have in themselves some affinity with the affections,—as merry tunes, doleful tunes, solemn tunes, tunes inclining men's minds to pity, warlike tunes,—so that it is no marvel if they alter the spirits, considering that tunes have a predisposition to the motion of the spirits.—
Bacon.

By music, minds an equal temper know,
Nor swell too high, nor sink too low:
If in the breast tumultuous joys arise,
Music her soft, assuasive voice applies;
Or, when the soul is press'd with cares,
Exalts her in enliv'ning airs. —Pope.

It reveals us to ourselves, it represents those modulations and temperamental changes which escape all verbal analysis, it utters what must else remain forever unuttered and unutterable; it feeds that deep, ineradicable instinct within us of which all art is only the reverberated echo, that craving to express, through the medium of the senses, the spiritual and eternal realities which underlie them.
—Hugh R. Haweis.

Yet what is music, and the blended power
Of voice with instruments of wind and string,
What but an empty pageant of sweet noise?
'Tis past: and all that it has left behind
Is but an echo dwelling in the ear
Of the toy-taken fancy, and beside,
A void and countless hour life's brief day.
—Crowe.

Music, according to Wagner, is no longer to be considered merely a means of exciting "the pleasure which we derive from beautiful forms;" it is, instead, the most immediate means possessed by the will for the manifestation of its inner impulses. Far from exercising a determining influence of its own, "the æsthetic form must itself be determined by the artist's inner intuition of the idea."—Albert R. Parsons.

Music!—O! how faint, how weak,
Language fades before thy spell!
Why should Feeling ever speak,
When thou can'st breathe her soul so well?
Friendship's balmy words may feign—
Love's are even more false than they;
Oh! 'tis only music's strain
Can sweetly soothe, and not betray.

—Moore.

Ring out ye crystal spheres!
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the base of Heaven's deep organ
blow,
And with your ninefold harmony,
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

—Milton.

Lord Bacon had music often played in the room adjoining his study. Milton listened to his organ for his solemn inspirations; and music was ever necessary to Warburton. The symphonies which awoke in the poet sublime emotions might have composed the inventive mind of the great critic in the visions of his theoretical mysteries.—Disraeli.

If you love music, hear it; go to operas, concerts, and pay fiddlers to play to you; but I insist upon your neither piping nor fiddling yourself. It puts a gentleman in a very frivolous, contemptible light; brings him into a great deal of bad company; and takes up a great deal of time, which might be much better employed.—Chesterfield.

In part of Lord Kames' Elements of Criticism, he says that "music improves the relish of a banquet." That I deny,—any more than painting might do. They may both be additional pleasures, as well as conversation is, but are perfectly distinct notices; and cannot, with the least propriety, be said to mix or blend with the repast, as none of them serve to raise the flavor of the wine, the sauce, the meat, or help to quicken appetite. But music and painting both add a spirit to devotion, and elevate the ardor.—Sterne.

Is it any weakness, pray, to be wrought on by exquisite music? to feel its wondrous harmonies searching the subtlest windings of your soul, the delicate fibres of life where no memory can penetrate, and binding together your whole being, past and present, in one unspeakable vibration; melting you in one moment with all the tenderness, all the love, that has been scattered through the toilsome years, concentrating in one emotion of heroic courage or resignation all the hard-learned lessons of self-renouncing sympathy, blending your present joy with past sorrow, and your present sorrow with all your past joy?—George Eliot.

Mutability

Man must be prepared for every event of life, for there is nothing that is durable.—Menander.

The uncertainty of events disturbs the purest enjoyments.—De Lévis.

All our life goeth like Penelope's web,—what one hour effects the next destroys.—St. Augustine.

Look at the fate of summer flowers, which blow at daybreak, droop ere even-song.—Wordsworth.

In human life there is a constant change of fortune; and it is unreasonable to expect an exemption from the common fate. Life itself decays, and all things are daily changing.—Plutarch.

The blessings of health and fortune, as they have a beginning, so they must also have an end. Everything rises but to fall, and increases but to decay.—Sallust.

Time, whose millioned accidents creep in betwixt vows, and change decrees of kings, tan sacred beauty, blunt the sharpest intents, divert strong minds to the course of altering things.—Shakespeare.

Nothing maintains its bloom forever; age succeeds to age.—Cicero.

shazzar derived its horrifying influence from the want of a body.—Colton.

The mystery of the Bible should teach us, at one and the same time, our nothingness and our greatness; producing humility and animating hope.—Henry Melville.

For every grain of sand is a mystery; so is every daisy in summer, and so is every snow-flake in winter. Both upwards and downwards, and all around us, science and speculation pass into mystery at last.—Wm. Mountford.

Whoever believes in a God at all, believes in an infinite mystery; and if the existence of God is such an infinite mystery, we can very well expect and afford to have many of His ways mysterious to us.—Ichabod Spencer.

The nature of Christ is, I grant it, from one end to another, a web of mysteries; but this mysteriousness does not correspond to the difficulties which all existence contains. Let it be rejected, and the whole world is an enigma; let it be accepted, and we possess a wonderful explanation of the history of man.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

Were there no mysteries in the Bible, we should doubt its being the transcript of the Eternal Mind. The "mystery of godliness" adapts it to our ruined race. Those mysteries of the Bible are like the mountains of the world; they give grandeur to the landscape and fertility to the soil.—Joseph Dare.

Most men take least notice of what is plain, as if that was of no use; but puzzle their thoughts to be themselves in those vast depths and abysses which no human understanding can fathom.—Bishop Sherlock.

The Bible tells me explicitly that Christ was God; and it tells me, as explicitly that Christ was man. It does not go on to state the modus or manner of the union. I stop, therefore, where the Bible stops. I bow before a God-man as my Mediator, but I own as inscrutable the mysteries of His person.—Henry Melville.

We injure mysteries, which are matters of faith, by any attempt at explanation in order to make them matters of reason. Could they be explained, they would cease to be mysteries; and it has been well said that a thing is not necessarily against reason because it happens to be above it.—Colton.

To a man who is uncorrupt and properly constituted, woman always remains something of a mystery and a romance. He never interprets her quite literally. She, on her part, is always striving to remain a poem, and is never weary of bringing out new editions of herself in novel bindings.—James Parton.

Can anything be more mysterious than the union of soul and body, unless it be the still greater mystery, which some have professed to believe, that matter can be so organized as to produce the amazing intellectual results which we witness in man? In believing our own existence we believe a mystery as great as any that the Christian religion presents.—William Wirt.

We live in the midst of infinite existence; and widely as we can see, and vastly as we have discovered, we have but crossed the threshold, we have but entered the vestibule of the Creator's temple. In this temple there is an everlasting worship of life, an anthem of many choruses, a hymn of incense that goes up forever.—Henry Giles.

Mythology

Mythology is not religion. It may rather be regarded as the ancient substitute, the poetical counterpart, for dogmatic theology.—Hare.

The heathen mythology not only was not true, but was not even supported as true; it not only deserved no faith, but it demanded none. The very pretension to truth, the very demand of faith, were characteristic distinctions of Christianity.—Whately.

N

Names

He lives who dies to win a lasting name.—Drummond.

O name forever sad, forever dear!—Pope.

I cannot tell what the dickens his name is.—Shakespeare.

Certain names always awake certain prejudices.—Joseph Roux.

Ravished with the whistling of a name.—Pope.

Some to the fascination of a name surrender judgment hoodwinked.—Cowper.

Good name in man and woman is the immediate jewel of their souls.—Shakespeare.

"A person with a bad name is already half hanged," saith the old proverb.—Whipple.

'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print;
A book's a book, although there's nothing in 't.—Byron.

Great names degrade instead of elevating those who know not how to sustain them.—La Rochefoucauld.

I do beseech you—chiefly that I may set it in my prayers—what is your name?—Shakespeare.

Some men do as much begrudge others a good name, as they want one themselves; and perhaps that is the reason of it.—William Penn.

To possess a good cognomen is a long way on the road of success in life.—Chamfort.

Named softly as the household name of one whom God had taken.—Mrs. Browning.

A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches.—Bible.

Go back; the virtue of your name Is not here passable.—Shakespeare.

One of the few, the immortal names, that were not born to die.—Hallock.

A great name without merit is like an epitaph on a coffin.—Mme. de Pui-sieux.

May see thee now, though late, redeem thy name,
And glorify what else is damn'd to fame.—Richard Savage.

Out of his surname they have coined an epithet for a knave, and out of his Christian name a synonyme for the Devil.—Macaulay.

In honest truth, a name given to a man is no better than a skin given to him; what is not natively his own falls off and comes to nothing.—Lan-dor.

A virtuous name is the precious only good, for which queens and peasants' wives must contest together.—Schiller.

He left the name at which the world grew pale, to point a moral or adorn a tale.—Dr. Johnson.

Imagine for a moment Napoleon I. to have borne the name of Jenkins, or Washington to have sustained the appellation of John Smith!—Artemus Ward.

Who hath not own'd, with rapture-smitten frame,
The power of grace, the magic of a name.
—Campbell.

A name is a kind of face whereby one is known; wherefore taking a false name is a kind of visard whereby men disguise themselves.—Thomas Fuller.

I have a passion for the name of "Mary,"
For once it was a magic sound to me,
And still it half calls up the realms of fairy,
Where I beheld what never was to be.
—Byron.

In ancient days the Pythagoreans were used to change names with each other,—fancying that each would share the virtues they admired in the other.—Thoreau.

The generality of men are wholly governed by names in matters of good and evil, so far as the qualities relate to and affect the actions of men.—South.

Who swerves from innocence, who makes divorce
Of that serene companion—a good name.
Recovers not his loss; but walks with shame,
With doubt, with fear, and haply with remorse.
—Wordsworth.

Oh! never breathe a dead one's name,
When those who lov'd that one are nigh;
It pours a lava through the frame
That chokes the breast and fills the eye.
—Eliza Cook.

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls;
Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed.
—Shakespeare.

My name and memory I leave to men's charitable speeches, to foreign nations, and to the next age.—Bacon.

He that has complex ideas, without particular names for them, would be in no better case than a book-seller who had volumes that lay unbound and without titles, which he could make known to others only by showing the loose sheets.—Locke.

'Tis but thy name that is my enemy,—
Thou art thyself, though not a Montague.
What's Montague? it is nor hand, nor foot,
Nor arm, nor face, nor any other part
Belonging to a man. O, be some other name!

What's in a name? that which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.
—Shakespeare.

Make Hamilton Bamilton, make Douglas Puglas, make Percy Bercy, and Stanley Tanley, and where would be the long-resounding march and energy divine of the roll-call of the peerage?—G. A. Sala.

A man's name is not like a mantle, which merely hangs about him, and which one perchance may safely twitch and pull, but a perfectly fitting garment, which like the skin has grown over and over him, at which one cannot rake and scrape without injuring the man himself.—Goethe.

Call me pet names, dearest! Call me thy bird,
That flies to thy breast at one cherishing word,
That folds its wild wings there, ne'er dreaming of flight,
That tenderly sings there in loving delight!
Oh! my sad heart keeps pining for one fond word,—
Call me pet names, dearest! Call me thy bird!
—Mrs. Osgood.

Brutus and Cæsar: what should be in Cæsar?
Why should that name be sounded more than yours?
Write them together, yours is as fair a name;
Sound them, it doth become the mouth as well;
Weigh them, it is as heavy; conjure with them,
Brutus will start a spirit as soon as Cæsar.
Now in the names of all the gods at once,
Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he is grown so great?—Shakespeare.

It is quite as easy to give our children musical and pleasing names as those that are harsh and difficult; and it will be found by the owners, when they have grown to knowledge, that there is much in a name.—Locke.

He that is ambitious for his son, should give him untried names,
For those have serv'd other men, haply may injure by their evils;
Or otherwise may hinder by their glories; therefore set him by himself,
To win for his individual name some clear praise. —Tupper.

Nation

Nations, as well as individuals, are mortal.—Oliver B. Seward.

Nations, like individuals, interest us in their growth.—Landor.

Like men, nations are purified and strengthened by trials.—Samuel Smiles.

When nations are to perish in their sins, 'tis in the Church the leprosy begins.—Cowper.

Nationality is the aggregated individuality of the greatest men of the nation.—Kossuth.

Individuals may form communities, but it is institutions alone that can create a nation.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

A nation is a thing that lives and acts like a man, and men are the particles of which it is composed.—J. G. Holland.

No nation can be destroyed while it possesses a good home life.—J. G. Holland.

The greater number of nations, as of men, are only impressible in their youth; they become incorrigible as they grow old.—Rousseau.

Nations, like individuals, are powerful in the degree that they command the sympathies of their neighbors.—Bovee.

There was never a nation great until it came to the knowledge that it had nowhere in the world to go for help.—Charles Dudley Warner.

In the youth of a State, arms do flourish; in the middle age of a State, learning; and then both of them together for a time; in the declining age of a State, mechanical arts and merchandise.—Bacon.

A nation's character is the sum of its splendid deeds; they constitute one common patrimony, the nation's inheritance. They awe foreign powers; they arouse and animate our own people.—Henry Clay.

In the life of a nation ideas are not the only things of value. Sentiment also is of great value; and the way to foster sentiment in a people, and to develop it in the young, is to have a well-recorded past, and to be familiar with it.—Joseph Anderson.

A people that studies its own past, and rejoices in the nation's proud memories, is likely to be a patriotic people, the bulwark of law, and the courageous champion of right in the hour of need.—Joseph Anderson.

Whatever of true glory has been won by any nation of the earth; whatever great advance has been made by any nation in that which constitutes a high Christian civilization, has been always at the cost of sacrifice; has cost the price marked upon it in God's inventory of national good.—J. G. Holland.

It may be too much to expect that nations should be governed in their relations towards each other by the precepts of Christian morality, but surely it is not too much to ask that they should conform to the code of courtesy and good breeding recognized among gentlemen in the intercourse of social life.—Geo. S. Hillard.

Nationality

Nationality is the aggregated individuality of the greatest men of the nation.—Kossuth.

There is a great difference between nationality and race. Nationality is the miracle of political independence. Race is the principle of physical analogy.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Native Land

Cling to thy native land, for it is the land of thy fathers!—Schiller.

My native land, good-night!—Byron.

How dear is our native land to all noble hearts!—Voltaire.

The love for our native land strengthens our individual and national character.—Alexander Hamilton.

Let our last sleep be in the graves of our native land!—Osceola.

Breathes there a man, with soul so dead, who never to himself hath saith, This is my own, my native land!—Sir Walter Scott.

A man's love for his native land lies deeper than any logical expression, among those pulses of the heart which vibrate to the sanctities of home, and to the thoughts which leap up from his father's graves.—Chapin.

Nature

Nature is God's Old Testament.—Theodore Parker.

Nature is a revelation of God.—Longfellow.

Nature alone is permanent.—Longfellow.

The living, visible garment of God.—Goethe.

Nature, the vicar of the Almighty Lord.—Chaucer.

Nature and wisdom never are at strife.—Juvenal.

There is but one book for genius, —nature.—Madame Deluzy.

Nature is frugal, and her wants are few.—Young.

Art may err, but nature cannot miss.—Dryden.

Nature is a vast repository of manly enjoyments.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The poetry of earth is never dead.—Keats.

Nature and wisdom always say the same.—Juvenal.

We by art unteach what Nature taught.—Dryden.

Love can be founded upon Nature only.—Shenstone.

Nature is always wise in every part.—Lord Thurlow.

Looks through nature up to nature's God.—Pope.

Nature means Necessity.—Bailey.

There is no solitude in nature.—Schiller.

Every form as nature made it is correct.—Propertius.

Nature never gives everything at once.—Johnson.

Nature is a volume of which God is the author.—Harvey.

Nothing in nature is unbeautiful.—Tennyson.

The natural alone is permanent.—Longfellow.

To hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature.—Shakespeare.

Nature ever provides for her own exigencies.—Seneca.

Nature tells every secret once.—Emerson.

The laws of nature are the thoughts of God.—Zschokke.

Extremes in nature equal ends produce.—Pope.

Laws of nature are God's thoughts thinking themselves out in the orbits and the tides.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Nature, in her most dazzling aspects or stupendous parts, is but the background and theatre of the tragedy of man.—John Morley.

Nature is the chart of God, mapping out all His attributes.—Tupper.

Nature cannot be surprised in undress. Beauty breaks in everywhere.—Emerson.

Nature is man's religious book, with lessons for every day.—Theodore Parker.

Nature has given us the seeds of knowledge, not knowledge itself.—Seneca.

Nature, through all her kingdoms, insures herself.—Emerson.

Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her.—Wordsworth.

Flowers, leaves, fruit are therefore air-woven children of light.—Moleschott.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.—Shakespeare.

Nature is but a name for an effect, whose cause is God.—Cowper.

All Nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance direction, which thou canst not see.
—Pope.

Nature is a mutable cloud which is always and never the same.—Emerson.

Accuse not Nature, she hath done her part;
Do thou but thine! —Milton.

Nature has given man no better thing than shortness of life.—Pliny the Elder.

E'en from the tomb the voice of nature
cries,
E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires.
—Gray.

In nature things move violently to their place, and calmly in their place.—Bacon.

Go forth under the open sky, and list to nature's teaching.—Bryant.

So true it is, that nature has capacities which art cannot imitate.—Macaulay.

All nature is a vast symbolism; every material fact has sheathed within it a spiritual truth.—Chapin.

Nature ever faithful is
To such as trust her faithfulness.
—Emerson.

All art, all education, can be merely a supplement to nature.—Aristotle.

Where nature is sovereign, there is no need of austerity and self-denial.—Froude.

You may turn nature out of doors with violence, but she will return.—Horace.

Virtue, as understood by the world, is a constant struggle against the laws of nature.—De Finod.

Nature is too thin a screen; the glory of the One breaks in everywhere.—Emerson.

Not a ray is dimmed, not an atom worn; nature's oldest force is as good as new.—Emerson.

Come forth into the light of things; let nature be your teacher.—Wordsworth.

Nature and wisdom are not, but should be, companions.—Smollett.

A tree is a nobler object than a prince in his coronation-robcs.—Pope.

Drive away what springs from nature; it returns at a gallop.—P. N. Destouches.

Nothing in nature, much less conscious being, was ever created solely for itself.—Young.

Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night; God said, Let Newton be; and all was light.—Pope.

All things are artificial, for nature is the art of God.—Sir T. Browne.

Where order in variety we see, and where, though all things differ, all agree.—Pope.

No tears
Dim the sweet look that Nature wears.
—Longfellow.

All things in the natural world symbolize God, yet none of them speak of Him but in broken and imperfect words.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God.—Bible.

Nature and truth are one, and immutable, and inseparable as beauty and love.—Mrs. Jameson.

Nature is no spendthrift, but takes the shortest way to her ends.—Emerson.

Nature repairs her ravages,—repairs them with her sunshine and with human labor.—George Eliot.

Hear ye not the hum
Of mighty workings? —Keats.

Hill and valley, seas and constellations, are but stereotypes of divine ideas appealing to and answered by the living soul of man.—Chapin.

There is a majesty and mystery in nature, take her as you will. The essence of poetry comes breathing to a mind that feels from every province of her empire.—Carlyle.

The path of nature is, indeed, a narrow one, and it is only the immortals that seek it, and when they find it, do not find themselves cramped therein.—Lowell.

Nature, the handmaid of God Almighty, does nothing but with good advice, if we make research into the true reason of things.—James Howell.

Read nature; nature is a friend to truth; Nature is Christian, preaches to mankind; And bids dead matter aid us in our creed.
—Young.

Nature is just to all mankind, and repays them for their industry. She renders them industrious by annexing rewards in proportion to their labor.—Montesquieu.

Nature is an Æolian harp, a musical instrument whose tones are the re-echo of higher strings within us.—Novalis.

And go from Nature up to Nature's God, But down from Nature's God look Nature through. —Robert Montgomery.

Nature, like a kind and smiling mother, lends herself to our dreams and cherishes our fancies.—Victor Hugo.

If we did not take great pains, and were not at great expense to corrupt our nature, our nature would never corrupt us.—Clarendon.

Nature knows no pause in progress and development, and attaches her curse on all inaction.—Goethe.

If we see nature as pausing, immediately all mortifies and decays; but seen as progressing, she is beautiful.—Thoreau.

Thou fool! Nature alone is antique, and the oldest art a mushroom; that idle crag thou sittest on is six thousand years of age.—Carlyle.

Since a true knowledge of nature gives us pleasure, a lively imitation of it in poetry or painting must produce a much greater.—Dryden.

I follow nature as the surest guide, and resign myself with implicit obedience to her sacred ordinances.—Cicero.

O Lord, how manifold are Thy works; in wisdom, hast Thou made them all; the earth is full of Thy riches.—Bible.

I have often thought that the nature of women was inferior to that of men in general, but superior in particular.—Greville.

Everything made by man may be destroyed by man; there are no ineffaceable characters except those engraved by nature; and nature makes neither princes nor rich men nor great lords.—Rousseau.

Nature has perfections, in order to show that she is the image of God; and defects, in order to show that she is only His image.—Pascal.

Nature is the most thrifty thing in the world; she never wastes anything; she undergoes change, but there's no annihilation, the essence remains—matter is eternal.—Binney.

The day is Thine, the night also is Thine; Thou hast prepared the light and the sun, Thou hast set all the borders of the earth, Thou hast made summer and winter.

—Bible.

Unerring Nature, still divinely bright,
One clear, unchanged, and universal light,
Life, force, and beauty must to all impart,
At once the source, and end, and test of art.

—Pope.

Nature forever puts a premium on reality. What is done for effect is seen to be done for effect; what is done for love is felt to be done for love.—Emerson.

There is religion in everything around us,—a calm and holy religion in the unbreathing things of nature, which man would do well to imitate.—Ruskin.

The scientific study of Nature tends not only to correct and ennoble the intellectual conceptions of man; it serves also to ameliorate his physical condition.—J. W. Draper.

It is a great mortification to the vanity of man, that his utmost art and industry can never equal the meanest of nature's productions, either for beauty or value.—Hume.

O Nature, gracious mother of us all,
Within thy bosom myriad secrets lie
Which thou surrenderest to the patient eye
That seeks and waits.

—Margaret A. Preston.

Divine Providence has spread her table everywhere, not with a juiceless green carpet, but with succulent herbage and nourishing grass, upon which most beasts feed.—Sir T. Moore.

You will find something far greater in the woods than you will find in books. Stones and trees will teach you that which you will never learn from masters.—St. Bernard.

Search out the wisdom of nature, there is depth in all her doings; she seemeth prodigal of power, yet her rules are the maxims of frugality.—Tupper.

Nature is a frugal mother, and never gives without measure. When she has work to do, she qualifies men for that and sends them equipped.—Emerson.

The more a man follows nature, and is obedient to her laws, the longer he will live; the farther he deviates from these, the shorter will be his existence.—C. W. Hufeland.

Nature paints not
In oils, but frescoes the great dome of heaven
With sunsets, and the lovely forms of clouds
And flying vapors. —Longfellow.

How mean the order and perfection sought
In the best product of the human thought,
Compar'd to the great harmony that reigns
In what the spirit of the world ordains!

—Prior.

Nature is avariciously frugal; in matter, it allows no atom to elude its grasp; in mind, no thought or feeling to perish. It gathers up the fragments, that nothing be lost.—David Thomas.

No, no! I do nature injustice. She gave us inventive faculty, and set us naked, and helpless on the shore of this great ocean,—the world; swim those who can, the heavy may go to the bottom.—Schiller.

Look at nature with science as a lens. The rock swarms, the cloud dances; the mineral is but the vegetable stepping down, and the animal an ascending plant; the man, a beast extended; and the angel, a developed human soul.—Bartol.

This world could not exist if it were not so simple. The ground has been tilled a thousand years, yet its powers remain ever the same; a little rain, a little sun, and each spring it grows green again.—Goethe.

What is nature? Art thou not the living government of God? O Heaven, is it in very deed He then that ever speaks through thee,—that lives and loves in thee, that lives and loves in me?—Carlyle.

Nature is a tropical swamp in sunshine, on whose purlieus we hear the song of summer birds and see prismatic dewdrops; but her interiors are terrific,—full of hydras and crocodiles.—Emerson.

I wondered over again for the hundredth time what could be the principle which, in the wildest, most lawless, fantastically chaotic, apparently capricious work of nature, always kept it beautiful.—George MacDonald.

There is no more lovely worship of God than that for which no image is required, but which springs up in our breast spontaneously when nature speaks to the soul, and the soul speaks to nature face to face.—Goethe.

Nature, exerting an unwearied power,
Forms, opens, and gives scent to every flower;
Spreads the fresh verdure of the field, and leads
The dancing Naiads through the dewy meads. —Cowper.

Nature gives to every time and season some beauties of its own; and from morning to night, as from the cradle to the grave, is but a succession of changes so gentle and easy that we can scarcely mark their progress.—Dickens.

Lavish thousands of dollars on your baby clothes, and after all the child is prettiest when every garment is laid aside. That becoming nakedness, at least, may adorn the chubby darling of the poorest home.—T. W. Higginson.

Nature always springs to the surface and manages to show what she is. It is vain to stop or try to drive her back. She breaks through every obstacle, pushes forward, and at last makes for herself a way.—Boileau.

Surely there is something in the unruffled calm of nature that overawes our little anxieties and doubts; the sight of the deep-blue sky and the clustering stars above seems to impart a quiet to the mind.—T. Edwards.

Nature, like a loving mother, is ever trying to keep land and sea, mountain and valley, each in its place, to hush the angry winds and waves, balance the extremes of heat and cold, of rain and drought, that peace, harmony, and beauty may reign supreme.—Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

God is infinite; and the laws of nature, like nature itself, are finite. These methods of working, therefore,—which correspond to the physical element in us,—do not exhaust His agency. There is a boundless residue of disengaged energy beyond.—James Martineau.

Nature imitates herself. A grain thrown into good ground brings forth fruit; a principle thrown into a good mind brings forth fruit. Everything is created and conducted by the same Master; the root, the branch, the fruits,—the principles, the consequences.—Pascal.

In nature, all is managed for the best with perfect frugality and just reserve, profuse to none, but bountiful to all; never employing on one thing more than enough, but with exact economy retrenching the superfluous, and adding force to what is principal in everything.—Shaftesbury.

Who loves not the shady trees,
The smell of flowers, the sound of brooks,
The song of birds, and the hum of bees,
Murmuring in green and fragrant nooks,
The voice of children in the spring,
Along the field-paths wandering?
—T. Millar.

It were happy if we studied nature more in natural things; and acted according to nature, whose rules are few, plain, and most reasonable. Let us begin where she begins, go her pace, and close always where she ends, and we cannot miss of being good naturalists.—William Penn.

Nature, at all events, humanly speaking, is manifestly very fond of color; for she has made nothing without it. Her skies are blue; her fields, green; her waters vary with her skies; her animals, vegetables, minerals, are all colored. She paints a great many of them in apparently superfluous hues, as if to show the duller eye how she loves color.—Leigh Hunt.

Lo! the poor Indian—whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the
wind;
His soul proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk or milky way;
Yet simple nature to his hope has given,
Behind the cloud-topped hill, an humbler heav'n. —Pope.

Though nature is constantly beautiful, she does not exhibit her highest powers of beauty constantly; for then they would satiate us, and pall upon our senses. It is necessary to their appreciation that they should be rarely shown. Her finest touches are things which must be watched for; her most perfect passages of beauty are the most evanescent.—Ruskin.

I can pass days
Stretch'd in the shade of those old cedar trees,
Watching the sunshine like a blessing fall,—
The breeze like music wandering o'er the boughs,
Each tree a natural harp,—each different leaf
A different note, blent in one vast thank-giving. —Miss Landon.

If thou art worn and hard beset
With sorrows, that thou wouldst forget,
If thou wouldst read a lesson, that will keep Thy heart from fainting, and thy soul from sleep,
Go to the woods and hills! No tears
Dim the sweet look that Nature wears.
—Longfellow.

The truths of nature are one eternal change, one infinite variety. There is no bush on the face of the globe exactly like another bush; there are no two trees in the forest whose boughs bend into the same network, nor two leaves on the same tree which could not be told one from the other, nor two waves in the sea exactly alike.—Ruskin.

Nature eschews regular lines; she does not shape her lines by a common model. Not one of Eve's numerous progeny in all respects resembles her who first culled the flowers of Eden. To the infinite variety and picturesque inequality of nature we owe the great charm of her uncloying beauty.—Whittier.

It seems strange that a butterfly's wing should be woven up so thin and gauzy in the monstrous loom of nature, and be so delicately tipped with fire from such a gross hand, and rain-bowed all over in such a storm of thunderous elements. The marvel is that such great forces do such nice work.—Theodore Parker.

The works of nature and the works of revelation display religion to mankind in characters so large and visible that those who are not quite blind may in them see and read the first principles and most necessary parts of it, and from thence penetrate into those infinite depths filled with the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.—Locke.

Nature does not capriciously scatter her secrets as golden gifts to lazy pets and luxurious darlings, but imposes tasks when she presents opportunities, and uplifts him whom she would inform. The apple that she drops at the feet of Newton is but a coy invitation to follow her to the stars.—Whipple.

To him who in the love of nature holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware.
—Bryant.

Nature is sanitive, refining, elevating. How cunningly she hides every wrinkle of her inconceivable antiquity under roses and violets and morning dew! Every inch of the mountains is scarred by unimaginable convulsions, yet the new day is purple with the bloom of youth and love.—Emerson.

Our old mother nature has pleasant and cheery tones enough for us when she comes in her dress of blue and gold over the eastern hill-tops; but when she follows us upstairs to our beds in her suit of black velvet and diamonds, every creak of her sandals and every whisper of her lips is full of mystery and fear.—Holmes.

So Nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand

Leads us to rest so gently, that we go,
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand How far the unknown transcends the what we know. —Longfellow.

See, through this air, this ocean, and this
earth,

All matter quick, and bursting into birth.
Above, how high! progressive life may go!
Around, how wide; how deep extend below!

Vast chain of being! which from God began,

Nature's ethereal, human, angel, man,
Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,

No glass can reach, from infinite to Thee,
From Thee to nothing. —Pope.

Nature is no sentimentalist,—does not cosset or pamper us. We must see that the world is rough and surly, and will not mind drowning a man or a woman, but swallows your ships like a grain of dust. The cold, inconsiderate of persons, tingles your blood, benumbs your feet, freezes a man like an apple. The diseases, the elements, fortune, gravity, lightning, respect no persons.—Emerson.

I trust in Nature for the stable laws
Of beauty and utility. Spring shall plant
And Autumn garner to the end of time.
I trust in God—the right shall be the right
And other than the wrong, while He endures;

I trust in my own soul, that can perceive
The outward and the inward, Nature's good
And God's. —Robert Browning.

The laws of nature are just, but terrible. There is no weak mercy in them. Cause and consequence are inseparable and inevitable. The elements have no forbearance. The fire burns, the water drowns, the air consumes, the earth buries. And perhaps it would be well for our race if the punishment of crimes against the laws of man were as inevitable as the punishment of crimes against the laws of nature,—were man as unerring in his judgments as nature.—Longfellow.

Those who devote themselves to the peaceful study of nature have but little temptation to launch out upon the tempestuous sea of ambition; they will scarcely be hurried away by the more violent or cruel passions, the ordinary failings of those ardent persons who do not control their conduct; but, pure as the objects of their researches, they will feel for everything about them the same benevolence which they see nature display toward all her productions.—Cuvier.

"Behold the lilies of the field; they toil not, neither do they spin, yet your heavenly Father careth for them." He expatiates on a single flower, and draws from it the delightful argument of confidence in God. He gives us to see that taste may be combined with piety, and that the same heart may be occupied with all that is serious in the contemplations of religion, and be at the same time alive to the charms and loveliness of nature.—Dr. Chalmers.

By fate, not option, frugal Nature gave
One scent to hyson and to wall-flower,
One sound to pine-groves and to waterfalls,

One aspect to the desert and the lake.
It was her stern necessity: all things Are of one pattern made; bird, beast, and flower,
Song, picture, form, space, thought, and character

Deceive us, seeming to be many things,
And are but one. —Emerson.

The best thing is to go from nature's God down to nature; and if you once get to nature's God, and believe Him, and love Him, it is surprising how easy it is to hear music in the waves, and songs in the wild whisperings of the winds; to see God everywhere in the stones, in the rocks, in the rippling brooks, and hear Him everywhere, in the lowing of cattle, in the rolling of thunder, and in the fury of tempests. Get Christ first, put Him in the right place, and you will find Him to be the wisdom of God in your own experience.—C. H. Spurgeon.

What profusion is there in His work! When trees blossom there is not a single breastpin, but a whole bosom full of gems; and of leaves they have so many suits that they can throw them away to the winds all summer long. What unnumbered cathedrals has He reared in the forest shades, vast and grand, full of curious carvings, and haunted evermore by tremulous music; and in the heavens above, how do stars seem to have flown out of His hand faster than sparks out of a mighty forge!—Beecher.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
That chang'd thro' all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in th' ethereal frame;
Warm in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glow in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
Lives thro' all life, extends thro' all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart.
—Pope.

Like two cathedral towers these stately pines Uplift their fretted summits tipped with cones;
The arch beneath them is not built with
stones,
Not Art but Nature traced these lovely lines,
And carved this graceful arabesque of vines;
No organ but the wind here sighs and moans,
No sepulchre conceals a martyr's bones,
No marble bishop on his tomb reclines.
Enter! the pavement, carpeted with leaves,
Gives back a softened echo to thy tread!
Listen! the choir is singing; all the birds,
In leafy galleries beneath the eaves,
Are singing! listen, ere the sound be fled,
And learn there may be worship without words.
—Longfellow.

It is good for any man to be alone with nature and himself, or with a friend who knows when silence is more sociable than talk, "In the wilderness alone, there where nature worships God." It is well to be in places where man is little and God is great,
—where what he sees all around him has the same look as it had a thousand years ago, and will have the same, in all likelihood, when he has been a thousand years in his grave. It abates and rectifies a man, if he is worth the process.—Sydney Smith.

All things are engaged in writing their history. The planet, the pebble, goes attended by its shadow. The rolling rock leaves its scratches on the mountain; the river, its channel in the soil; the animal, its bones in the stratum; the fern and leaf, their modest epitaph in the coal. The falling drop makes its sculpture in the sand or the stone. Not a foot steps into the snow or along the ground, but prints, in characters more or less lasting, a map of its march. Every act of the man inscribes itself in the memories of its fellows, and in his own manners and face. The air is full of sounds, the sky of tokens, the ground is all memoranda and signatures, and every object covered over with hints which speak to the intelligent.—Emerson.

Navigation

Here's to the pilot that weathered the storm.—Canning.

The winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators.—
Gibbon.

A strong nor'wester's blowing, Bill!
Hark! don't yet hear it roar now?
Lord help 'em, how I pities them
Unhappy folks on shore now!
—William Pitt.

Skill'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,
And, with his compass, measures seas and lands.
—Dryden.

And as great seamen, using all their wealth
And skills in Neptune's deep invisible paths,
In tall ships richly built and ribbed with brass,
To put a girdle round about the world.
—Geo. Chapman.

Thou bringest the sailor to his wife,
And travell'd men from foreign lands,
And letters unto trembling hands;
And, thy dark freight, a vanish'd life.
—Tennyson.

The royal navy of England has ever been its greatest defence and ornament; it is its ancient and natural strength; the floating bulwark of the island.—Sir Wm. Blackstone.

Behold the threaden sails,
Borne with the invisible and creeping wind,
Draw the huge bottoms through the fur-
row'd sea,
Breasting the lofty surge.—Shakespeare.

A wet sheet and a flowing sea,
A wind that follows fast
And fills the white and rustling sails,
And bends the gallant mast!
And bends the gallant mast, my boys,
While, like the eagle free,
Away the good ship flies, and leaves
Old England in the lee.
—Allan Cunningham.

Speed on the ship;—But let her hear
No merchandise of sin,
No groaning cargo of despair
Her roomy hold within;
No Lethean drug for Eastern lands,
Nor poison-draught for ours;
But honest fruits of toiling hands
And Nature's sun and showers.
—Whittier.

She comes majestic with her swelling sails,
The gallant Ship: along her watery way,
Homeward she drives before the favouring
gales;
Now flirting at their length the streamers
play,
And now they ripple with the ruffling breeze.
—Southey.

Neatness

Neatness is a crowning grace of womanhood.—Fontenelle.

We must be neat; not neat, but cleanly.—Shakespeare.

As a general thing, an individual who is neat in his person is neat in his morals.—H. W. Shaw.

We must avoid fastidiousness; neatness, when it is moderate, is a virtue; but when it is carried to an extreme, it narrows the mind.—Fénelon.

Necessity

Necessity, thou mother of the world!—Shelley.

Necessity is stronger than duty.—Seneca.

Nature means Necessity.—Bailey.

Necessity does everything well.—Emerson.

Necessity is stronger than human nature.—Dionysius.

Necessity, the mother of invention.—Wycherly.

There is no virtue like necessity.—Shakespeare.

Not even the gods contend with necessity.—Simonides.

Necessity has no law.—Franklin.

Necessity never made a good bargain.—Franklin.

Necessity is the last and strongest weapon.—Livy.

The argument of the weak.—Sheridan.

Accident is veiled necessity.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Necessity makes dastards valiant men.—Herrick.

He must needs go that the devil drives.—Shakespeare.

Fate and necessity are unconquerable.—Joubert.

Necessity is often the spur to genius.—Balzac.

To make virtue of necessity.—Chaucer.

Necessity does not submit to debate.—Garibaldi.

Necessity urges desperate measures.—Cervantes.

Necessity can sharpen the wits even of children.—Timothy Dwight.

Even God is said to be unable to use force against necessity.—Plato.

Our necessities are few, but our wants are endless.—H. W. Shaw.

What fate imposes, men must needs abide; it boots not to resist both wind and tide.—Shakespeare.

The necessities that exist are in general created by the superfluities that are enjoyed.—Zimmermann.

Soul of the world, divine Necessity,
Servant of God, and master of all things.
—Bailey.

Necessity is the argument of tyrants, it is the creed of slaves.—William Pitt.

Necessity may render a doubtful act innocent, but it cannot make it praiseworthy.—Joubert.

Necessity—thou best of peacemakers,
As well as surest promoter of invention.
—Scott.

Learn on how little man may live,
and how small a portion nature requires.—Lucan.

Necessity, like electricity, is in ourselves and all things, and no more without us than within us.—Bailey.

Fear is the underminer of all determinations; and necessity, the victorious rebel of all laws.—Sir P. Sidney.

Necessity is cruel, but it is the only test of inward strength. Every fool may live according to his own likings.
—Goethe.

Necessity of action takes away the fear of the act, and makes bold resolution the favorite of fortune.—Quarles.

What was once to me mere matter of the fancy now has grown the vast necessity of heart and life.—Tennyson.

Necessity is the only real sovereign in the world, the only despot for whom there is no law.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Necessity, that great refuge and excuse for human frailty, breaks through all law; and he is not to be accounted in fault whose crime is not the effect of choice, but force.—Pascal.

Necessity, oftener than facility, has been the mother of invention; and the most prolific school of all has been the school of difficulty.—Samuel Smiles.

The mother of useful arts is necessity; that of the fine arts is luxury. For father, the former has intellect; the latter, genius, which itself is a kind of luxury.—Schopenhauer.

We ought to be thankful to nature for having made those things which are necessary easy to be discovered; while other things that are difficult to be known are not necessary.—Epicurus.

When God will educate a man, He compels him to learn bitter lessons. He sends him to school to the Necessities rather than to the Graces, that by knowing all suffering he may know also the eternal consolations.—Celia Burleigh.

No picture of life can have any veracity that does not admit the odious facts. A man's power is hopped in by a necessity, which, by many experiments, he touches on every side, until he learns its arc.—Emerson.

There is no contending with necessity, and we should be very tender how we censure those that submit to it. It is one thing to be at liberty to do what we will, and another thing to be tied up to do what we must.—L'Estrange.

The iron hand of necessity commands, and her stern decree is supreme law, to which the gods even must submit. In deep silence rules the uncounselled sister of eternal fate. Whatever she lays upon thee, endure; perform whatever she commands.—Goethe.

Manhood begins when we have, in a way, made truce with necessity; begins, at all events, when we have surrendered to necessity, as the most part only do; but begins joyfully and hopefully only when we have reconciled ourselves to necessity, and thus, in reality, triumphed over it, and felt that in necessity we are free.—Carlyle.

We are ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do. Therefore never go abroad in search of your wants; if they be real wants, they will come home in search of you. For he that buys what he does not want, will soon want what he cannot buy.—Colton.

The word "necessary" is miserably applied. It disordereth families, and overturneth government, by being so abused. Remember that children and fools want everything because they want judgment to distinguish; and therefore there is no stronger evidence of a crazy understanding than the making too large a catalogue of things necessary.—Lord Halifax.

Necessity is always the first stimulus to industry, and those who conduct it with prudence, perseverance and energy will rarely fail. Viewed in this light, the necessity of labor is not a chastisement, but a blessing,—the very root and spring of all that we call progress in individuals and civilization in nations.—Samuel Smiles.

Negligence

Negligence is the rest of the soul, that corrodes through all her best resolves.—Feltham.

A wise and salutary neglect.—Burke.

Every man has something to do which he neglects, every man has faults to conquer which he delays to combat.—Johnson.

In persons grafted in a serious trust, Negligence is a crime. —Shakespeare.

The best ground untilled, soonest runs out into rank weeds. A man of knowledge that is negligent or uncorrected, cannot but grow wild and godless.—Bishop Hall.

The heavens, with their everlasting faithfulness, look down on no sadder contradiction than the sluggard and the slattern in their prayers.—James Martineau.

A little neglect may breed great mischief. For want of a nail the shoe was lost; for want of a shoe the horse was lost; and for want of a horse the rider was lost, being overtaken and slain by the enemy; all for want of a little care about a horse-shoe nail.—Benjamin Franklin.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace:
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free;
Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Than all the adulteries of art;
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.
—Ben Jonson.

Negro

The image of God cut in ebony.—Fuller.

We've scrub'd the negroes till we've nearly kill'd em,
And finding that we cannot wash them
white,
We mean to gild 'em. —Thos. Hood.

In the negro countenance you will often meet with strong traits of benignity. I have felt yearnings of tenderness towards some of these faces, or rather masks, that have looked out kindly upon one in casual encounters in the streets and highways.—Lamb.

The negro is an exotic of the most gorgeous and superb countries of the world, and he has deep in his heart a passion for all that is splendid, rich, and fanciful; a passion which, rudely indulged by an untrained taste, draws on him the ridicule of the colder and more correct white race.—Mrs. Stowe.

Neighbor

Christianity teaches us to love our neighbor as ourself: modern society acknowledges no neighbor.—Beaconsfield.

Nerves

So delicate is the fine tracery of the nervous structure, that the damage of a single fibre, or a set of fibres destroys the unity of the whole. It is like a grand orchestra, in which one instrument alone out of time or tune disturbs the harmony of the rest, and the finest musical composition in the world is entirely spoiled by its discord. And this serious evil is apparent, not only in old age, but even in the young, in whom the disastrous consequences of injury to the brain, etc., are far more important both to themselves and to the world.—Dr. Forbes Winslow.

Neutrality

The heart is never neutral.—Shaftesbury.

Neutral men are the devil's allies.—Chapin.

The cold neutrality of an impartial judge.—Burke.

Neutrality, as a lasting principle, is an evidence of weakness.—Kossuth.

A wise neuter joins with neither, but uses both, as his honest interest leads him.—William Penn.

Neutrality is dangerous, whereby thou becomest a necessary prey to the conqueror.—Quarles.

It is well to be independent also well not to be neutral.—Kossuth.

As for the ass's behavior in such nice circumstances, whether he would starve sooner than violate his neutrality to the two bundles of hay, I shall not presume to determine.—Addison.

Neutrality is no favorite with Providence, for we are so formed that it is scarcely possible for us to stand neuter in our hearts, although we may deem it prudent to appear so in our actions.—Colton.

There is in some men a dispassionate neutrality of mind, which, though it generally passes for good temper, can neither gratify nor warm us: it must indeed be granted that these men can only negatively offend; but then it should also be remembered that they cannot positively please.—Lord Greville.

Neutrality in things good or evil is both odious and prejudicial; but in matters of an indifferent nature is safe and commendable. Herein taking of parts maketh sides, and breaketh unity. In an unjust cause of separation, he that favoereth both parts may perhaps have least love of either side, but hath most charity in himself.—Bishop Hall.

News

News, the manna of a day.—Green.

News as wholesome as the morning air.—Chapman.

Ill news is winged with fate, and flies apace.—Dryden.

Evil news rides post, while good news bates.—Milton.

Yet the first bringer of unwelcome news Hath but a losing office; and his tongue Sounds ever after as a sullen bell, Remember'd tolling a departed friend.—Shakespeare.

Tell him, there's a post come from my master, with his horn full of news.—Shakespeare.

Master, master! news, old news, and such news as you never heard of.—Shakespeare.

Ill news are swallow-winged, but what is good walks on crutches.—Massinger.

Though it be honest, it is never good To bring bad news; give to a gracious message
An host of tongues; but let ill tidings tell Themselves when they be felt.—Shakespeare.

The news! our morning, noon and evening cry,
Day after day repeats it till we die.
For this the city, the critic, and the fop,
Dally the hour away in tonsor's shop;
For this the gossip takes her daily route,
And wears your threshold and your patience out;
For this we leave the parson in the lurch,
And pause to prattle on our way to church;
Even when some coffin'd friend we gather round,
We ask—"what news?"—then lay him in the ground.—Sprague.

When ill news comes too late to be serviceable to your neighbor, keep it to yourself.—Zimmermann.

There is nothing new except what is forgotten.—Mademoiselle Bertin.

The nature of bad news affects the teller.—Shakespeare.

Newspaper

Newspapers are the world's mirrors.—James Ellis.

The educators of the common people.—Theodore Parker.

The most efficacious secular book that ever was published in America is the newspaper.—Henry Ward Beecher.

In these times we fight for ideas, and newspapers are our fortresses.—Heine.

In the long, fierce struggle for freedom of opinion, the press, like the Church, counted its martyrs by thousands.—Garfield.

The highest reach of a news-writer is an empty reasoning on policy, and vain conjectures on the public management.—La Bruyère.

The newspaper is a greater treasure to the people than uncounted millions of gold.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Printer's ink is the great apostle of progress, whose pulpit is the press.—Horace Greeley.

Every editor of newspapers pays tribute to the devil.—La Fontaine.

Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets.—Napoleon I.

Newspapers will ultimately engross all literature.—Lamartine.

Newspapers are to the body politic what arteries are to the human body, their function being to carry blood and sustenance and repair to every part of the body.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Over no nation does the press hold a more absolute control than over the people of America, for the universal education of the poorest classes makes every individual a reader.—Washington Irving.

These papers of the day have uses more adequate to the purposes of common life than more pompous and durable volumes.—Dr. Johnson.

The careful reader of a few good newspapers can learn more in a year than most scholars do in their great libraries.—F. B. Sanborn.

Let me make the newspapers, and I care not what is preached in the pulpit or what is enacted in congress.—Wendell Phillips.

Turn to the press—its teeming sheets survey,
Big with the wonders of each passing day;
Births, deaths, and weddings, forgeries,
fires and wrecks,
Harangues and hailstones, brawls and broken necks. —Sprague.

Only a newspaper! Quick read, quick lost,
Who sums the treasure that it carries hence?

Torn, trampled under feet, who counts thy cost,
Star-eyed Intelligence. —Mary Clemmer.

The follies, vices, and consequent miseries of multitudes, displayed in a newspaper, are so many admonitions and warnings, so many beacons, continually burning, to turn others from the rocks on which they have been shipwrecked.—Bishop Horne.

The press, important as is its office, is but the servant of the human intellect, and its ministry is for good or for evil, according to the character of those who direct it. The press is a mill which grinds all that is put into its hopper. Fill the hopper with poisoned grain, and it will grind it to meal, but there is death in the bread.—Bryant.

Before this century shall run out, journalism will be the whole press. Mankind will write their book day by day, hour by hour, page by page. Thought will spread abroad with the rapidity of light—instantly conceived, instantly written, instantly understood at the extremities of the earth.—Larmartine.

A newspaper, like a theatre, must mainly owe its continuance in life to the fact that it pleases many persons; and in order to please many persons it will, unconsciously perhaps, respond to their several tastes, reflect their various qualities, and reproduce their views. In a certain sense it is evolved out of the community that absorbs it, and, therefore, partaking of the character of the community, while it may retain many merits and virtues, it will display itself, as in some respects ignorant, trivial, narrow, and vulgar.—William Winter.

Trade hardly deems the busy day begun,
Till his keen eye along the sheet has run;
The blooming daughter throws her needle
by,
And reads her schoolmate's marriage with
a sigh;
While the grave mother puts her glasses on,
And gives a tear to some old crony gone.
The preacher, too, his Sunday theme lays
down,
To know what last new folly fills the town;
Lively or sad, life's meanest, mightiest
things,
The fate of fighting cocks, or fighting kings.
—Sprague.

New Year's Day

"A. D."—the world writes the letters carelessly as it turns the page to record for the first time the new year; but in these letters is the "open secret" of the ages, for this, too, 's a "year of our Lord," an "acceptable year," a "year of grace."—Jesse B. Thomas, D. D.

If this be a happy new year, a year of usefulness, a year in which we shall live to make this earth better, it is because God will direct our pathway. How important, then, to feel our dependence upon Him!—Bishop Mathew Simpson.

A new year is upon us, with new duties, new conflicts, new trials, and new opportunities. Start on the journey with Jesus—to walk with Him, to work for Him, and to win souls to Him. The last year of the century, it may be the last of our lives! A happy year will it be to those who, through every path of trial, or up every hill of difficulty, or over every sunny height, march on in closest fellowship with Jesus, and who will determine that, come what may, they have Christ every day.—Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

Let us give it (the new year) nothing to keep which will not prove an honor to God's name and a blessing to the world; nothing which we shall not be willing to learn of again when we stand before the great white throne.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

Every day is a fresh beginning,
Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain,
And spite of old sorrow, and older sinning,
And troubles forecasted, and possible
pain,
Take heart with the day, and begin again.
—Susan Coolidge.

Let the new year be a year of freedom from sin, a year of service, a year of trust in God, and it will be a happy year from first to last. It may be the hardest year we have known, but it will be the happiest.—J. M. Buckley, D. D.

The wave is breaking on the shore,—
The echo fading from the chime—
Again the shadow moveth o'er
The dial-plate of time! —Whittier.

Enter upon thy paths, O year!
Thy paths, which all who breathe must tread,
Which lead the Living to the Dead,
I enter; for it is my doom
To tread thy labyrinthine gloom;
To note who round me watch and wait;
To love a few; perhaps to hate;
And do all duties of my fate.
—Barry Cornwall.

He who has found upon earth the city of his affections, and who with every onward step is only advancing toward a mist, may well look upon New Year's day as a day of sorrow. Well may it be a dark and gloomy day to the man who, as a poor and humble pilgrim, is journeying to some royal city where he has not a single friend to welcome his arrival or offer him the shelter of a roof. A poor and humble pilgrim am I; but, God be thanked! I know of One who long ago prepared for me a place. Hence it is that as I pass the milestones each in succession becomes an altar, on which I present oblations of gratitude and praise. There are many, I am aware, to whom the thought of the flight of time is dispiriting. For me, I feel that He hath not given the spirit of fear, but of power.—Dr. A. Tholuck.

But just in proportion as we are not contented with our sphere, nor satisfied with ourselves, do we reach out longingly to a better sphere and a worthier course of life; and therefore it is that, to so many of us, the end of an old year brings a sense of relief, in that its shortcomings and failures are now to be left behind, while the approach of a new year suggests a hope of something different and better beyond, in the path we are treading.—Sunday School Times.

I see not a step before me
As I tread on another year,
But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future His mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance
May brighten as I draw near.

Mary G. Brainard.

There exists a very beautiful custom in Germany, which it would be well to imitate everywhere. On the first day of the New Year, whatever may have been the quarrels or estrangement between friends and relatives, mutual visits are interchanged, kindly greetings given and received—all is forgotten and forgiven. Let this custom begin with reconciliation to God, then friendship and fellowship may be found that shall be blessed and lasting.—Foster.

O, tender Christ, bless Thou this year!
Bless Thou its dawn, and bless
Its noontide and its evening, Lord;
And let each heart confess,
As days and weeks and months go by
To help the year grow old,
That of Thy glory, King of Kings,
The half not yet is told.

—Mary D. Brine.

Not till that last day, the day that closes our mortal existence, shall we fully understand the brevity of time. Yet time is our life; its passage is our death. The moment we began to live, that moment we began to die. We forget too often that the departure of time means the departure of our life. When the warm blood flows full and strong through all the swelling veins, and full-robed joy animates body and mind; when in the series of our days and years there occurs no startling circumstance to arrest our notice or awake our thought, we forget that we are not moored, but are ever gliding, though we notice not our motion, down the stream of time.—Chas. R. Stoddard, D. D.

Whatever the past year may have meant to you, make it dead history. But let the new year be a living issue. With a big, fresh sponge, dripping with the clear water of forgiveness, wipe clean the slate of your heart. Enter the year with a kind thought for every one. You need not kiss the hand that smote you, but grasp it in cordial good feeling, and let the electricity of your own resolves find its connecting current—which very often exists where we think it not. Make the new year a happy one in your home; be bright of disposition; carry your cares easy; let your heart be as sunshine, and your life will give warmth to all around you. And thus will you and yours be happy.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Flower unblown: a Book unread:
A Tree with fruit unharvested:
A Path untrod: a House whose rooms
Lack yet the heart's divine perfumes:
A Landscape whose wide border lies
In silent shade 'neath silent skies:
A wondrous Fountain yet unsealed:
A Casket with its gifts concealed:—
This is the Year that for you waits
Beyond To-morrow's mystic gates.
—Horatio Nelson Powers.

No one ever regarded the first of January with indifference. It is that from which all date their time, and count upon what is left. It is the nativity of our common Adam. Of all sound of bells (bells the music highest bordering upon heaven), most solemn and touching is the peal which rings out the old year. I never heard it without a gathering-up of my mind to a concentration of all the images that have been diffused over the past twelve-month. All I have done or suffered, performed or neglected—in that regretted time. I begin to know its worth as when a person dies. It takes a personal color; nor was it a poetical flight of a contemporary, when he exclaimed: "I saw the skirts of the departing year." It is no more than what in sober sadness, every one of us seems to be conscious of in that awful leave-taking.—Charles Lamb.

I want the New Year's opening days
To fill with love, and prayer, and praise.
Some little things to do for Thee,
For Thou hast done great things for me.

I want some other soul to bring
To Thee, my Saviour and my King.
Thou wilt not, Lord, in prayer deny,
For Thou canst all my wants supply.

In Jesus' name our prayer we raise,
Whose guiding hand has blessed our days.
And may we, Lord, in godly fear Serve Thee through all this coming year.
—Selected.

The old year is dead, the new year is born. Humbly, fearfully, we sink on our knees, and slowly, in answer to our prayers, comes back something of the old faith of our childhood, and we rejoice that we are granted one more New Year's day on which to "begin again"—not in our childish way, with utter disregard of the past, but trustingly, patiently, knowing that we must ever carry with us our past, and rejoicing that, with God's help, we may make the future better because of the past. Then, as we rise from our knees, we look bravely forward to the veiled figure that stands at our threshold; we know nothing of what it brings, we know only that it is God's new year. May He bless it to us all!—Golden Rule.

Niagara

Flow on for ever in thy glorious robe
Of terror and of beauty; * * * God hath set
His rainbow on thy forehead; and the cloud
Mantles around thy feet. And He doth give Thy voice of thunder power to speak of
Him
Eternally, bidding the lip of man
Keep silence, and upon thy rocky altar
pour
Incense of awe-struck praise.
—Mrs. Sigourney.

"Niagral wonder of this western world,
And half the world besidel hail, beauteous
queen
Of cataracts!" An angel who had been O'er heaven and earth, spoke thus, his bright wings furled,
And knelt to Nature first, on this wild cliff
unseen.
—Maria Brooks.

Nickname

Names alone mock destruction; they survive the doom of all creation.—H. Trevanion.

A nickname is the heaviest stone the devil can throw at a man.—Anon.

A good name will wear out; a bad one may be turned; a nickname lasts forever.—Zimmermann.

Nicknames stick to people, and the most ridiculous are the most adhesive.—Haliburton.

There is also an evil report; light, indeed, and easy to raise, but difficult to carry, and still more difficult to get rid of.—Hesiodus.

Night

O majestic night! nature's great ancestor!—Young.

Night, when deep sleep falleth on men.—Bible.

By night an atheist half believes a God.—Young.

Wisdom mounts her zenith with the stars.—Mrs. Barbauld.

Then stars arise, and the night is holy.—Longfellow.

The night is long that never finds the day.—Shakespeare.

The night comes on that knows no morn.—Tennyson.

Night is a lively masquerade of day.—J. Montgomery.

There never was night that had no morn.—D. M. Mulock.

Even lust and envy sleep.—Dryden

In the dead vast and middle of the night.—Shakespeare.

Night's black Mantle covers all alike.—Du Bartas.

The great shadow and profile of day.—Richter.

Sable-vested Night, eldest of things! —Milton.

The crickets sing, and man's over-labored sense repairs itself by rest.—Shakespeare.

O mysterious Night! thou art not silent; many tongues hast thou.—Joanna Baillie.

Awful Night! Ancestral mystery of mysteries.—George Eliot.

How absolute and omnipotent is the silence of night!—Longfellow.

Mind and night will meet, though in silence, like forbidden lovers.—Bailey.

Night drew her sable curtain down, and pinned it with a star.—Macdonald Clarke.

In her starry shade of dim and solitary loveliness, I learn the language of another world.—Byron.

Night is the Sabbath of mankind,
To rest the body and the mind.
—Butler.

There's husbandry in heaven;
Their candles are all out. —Shakespeare.

The night shows stars and women in a better light.—Byron.

O radiant Dark! O darkly fostered ray!
Thou hast a joy too deep for shallow Day.
—George Eliot.

I heard the trailing garments of the Night
Sweep through her marble halls.
—Longfellow.

The day is done, and the darkness falls from the wings of night.—Longfellow.

Come, civil night, thou sober-suited matron, all in black.—Shakespeare.

As his wife has been given to man as his best half, so night is the half of life, and by far the better part of life.—Goethe.

All is gentle; nought
Stirs rudely; but congenial with the night,
Whatever walks is gliding like a spirit.
—Byron.

I love night more than day—she is so lovely;
But I love night the most because she brings
My love to me in dreams which scarcely lie.
—Bailey.

Now sunk the sun; the closing hour of day
Came onward, mantled o'er with sober grey;
Nature in silence bid the world repose.
—Parnell.

When the searching eye of heaven is hid
Behind the globe, and lights the lower world,
Then thieves and robbers range abroad unseen,
In murders and in outrage boldly here.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis now the very witching time of night
When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out
Contagion to this world. —Shakespeare.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear
What man has borne before!
Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
And they complain no more.
—Longfellow.

Now black and deep the night begins to fall, a shade immense; sunk in the quenching gloom, magnificent and vast, are heaven and earth.—Thomson.

Night is fair virtue's immemorial friend;
The conscious moon, through every distant age,
Has held a lamp to wisdom, and let fall
On contemplation's eye her purging ray.
—Young.

Now began
Night with her sullen wing to double-shade
The desert; fowls in their clay nests were couch'd,
And now wild beasts came forth, the woods to roam.
—Milton.

The cripple, tardy-gaited night, who, like a foul and ugly witch, doth limp so tediously away.—Shakespeare

When pleasure, like the midnight flower that scorns the eye of vulgar light, begins to bloom for sons of night and maids who love the moon.—Moore.

And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares, that infest the day,
Shall fold their tents, like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away.

—Longfellow.

Fair eldest child of love, thou spotless night!
Empress of silence, and the queen of sleep;
Who, with thy black cheek's pure complexion,
Mak'st lovers' eyes enamour'd of thy beauty.

—Marlowe.

The night is made for tenderness,—so still that the low whisper, scarcely audible, is heard like music,—and so deeply pure that the fond thought is chastened as it springs and on the lip made holy.—Willis.

The contemplation of night should lead to elevating rather than to depressing ideas. Who can fix his mind on transitory and earthly things, in presence of those glittering myriads of worlds; and who can dread death or solitude in the midst of this brilliant, animated universe, composed of countless suns and worlds, all full of light and life and motion?—Richter.

Night, sable goddess! from her ebon throne,
In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
Her leaden sceptre o'er a slumb'ring world.
Silence, how dead! and darkness, how profound!

Nor eye, nor list'ning ear, an object finds;
Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the gen'ral pulse
Of life stood still, and nature made a pause;

An awful pause! prophetic of her end.

—Young.

Night is the time for rest;

How sweet, when labours close;

To gather round an aching breast

The curtain of repose,

Stretch the tired limbs, and lay the head
Down on our own delightful bed!

—Montgomery.

Why does the evening, does the night, put warmer love in our hearts? Is it the nightly pressure of helplessness? or is it the exalting separation from the turmoils of life,—that veiling of the world in which for the soul nothing then remains but souls?—Richter.

How is night's sable mantle labour'd o'er,
How richly wrought with attributes divine!
What wisdom shines! what love! this midnight pomp,

This gorgeous arch, with golden worlds inlaid!

Built with divine ambition. —Young.

The stars are forth, the moon above the tops

Of the snow-shining mountains—Beautiful!

I linger yet with nature, for the night

Hath been to me a more familiar face

Than that of man; and in her starry shade

Of dim and solitary loveliness,

I learn'd the language of another world.

—Byron.

O comfort-killing Night, image of hell!

Dim register and notary of shame!

Black stage for tragedies and murders fell!

Vast, sin-concealing chaos! nurse of blame!

Blind, muffled bawd! dark harbor for de-

fame!

Grim cave of death! whispering conspira-

tor

With close-tongued treason and the raw-isher!

—Shakespeare.

The crackling embers on the hearth are dead;

The indoor note of industry is still;

The latch is fast; upon the window-sill

The small birds wait not for their daily bread;

The voiceless flowers—how quietly they

shed

Their nightly odours;—and the household mill

Murmurs continuous dulcet sounds that fill

The vacant expectation, and the dread

Of listening night.

—Hartley Coleridge.

Dark the Night, with breath all flowers,

And tender broken voice that fills

With ravishment the listening hours,—

Whisperings, wooings,

Liquid ripples, and soft ring-dove cooings

In low-toned rhythm that love's aching stills!

Dark the night

Yet is she bright,

For in her dark she brings the mystic star,

Trembling yet strong, as is the voice of

love,

From some unknown afar.

—George Eliot.

How absolute and omnipotent is the silence of night! And yet the stillness seems almost audible! From all the measureless depths of air around us comes a half-sound, a half-whisper, as if we could hear the crumbling and falling away of earth and all created things, in the great miracle of nature, decay and reproduction, ever beginning, never ending,—the gradual lapse and running of the sand in the great hour-glass of Time.—Longfellow.

How beautiful is night!
A dewy freshness fills the silent air,
No mist obscures, nor cloud, nor speck,
nor stain
Breaks the serene heaven:
In full-orb'd glory yonder moon divine
Rolls through the dark blue depths,
Beneath her steady ray
The desert circle spreads,
Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky,
How beautiful is night! —Southey.

Nightingale

The nightingale is sovereign of song.
—Spenser.

The nightingale, their only vesper-bell, sung sweetly to the rose the day's farewell.—Byron.

The love-lorn nightingale nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well.—
Milton.

Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly, most musical, most melancholy!—Milton.

It was the nightingale, and not the lark, that pierced the fearful hollow of thine ear; nightly she sings on yon pomegranate tree.—Shakespeare.

It is the hour when from the boughs
The nightingale's high note is heard;
It is the hour when lovers' vows
Seem sweet in every whisper'd word.
—Byron.

'Tis the merry nightingale that crowds and hurries and precipitates, with fast thick warble, his delicious notes, as he were fearful that an April night would be too short for him to utter forth his love-chant, and dis-burden his full soul of all its music.—
Coleridge.

O nightingale, that on yon blooming spray warblest at eve, when all the woods are still,—thou with fresh hope in ~~lover's~~ heart doth fill!—Milton.

The nightingale, if she should sing
by day, when every goose is cackling, would be thought no better a musician than the wren. How many things by season seasoned are to their right praise and true perfection!—Shakespeare.

Nobility

Nobility should be elective, not hereditary.—Zimmermann.

Noblest minds are easiest bent.—
Homer.

All nobility in its beginnings was somebody's natural superiority.—Emerson.

Nobility, without virtue, is a fine setting without a gem.—Jane Porter.

He who is lord of himself, and exists upon his own resources, is a noble but a rare being.—Sir E. Brydges.

O lady, nobility is thine, and thy form is the reflection of thy nature!—
Euripides.

What is highest and noblest in man conceals itself.—Richter.

Nature makes all the noblemen; wealth, education, or pedigree never made one yet.—H. W. Shaw.

For he who is honest is noble,
Whatever his fortunes or birth.
—Alice Cary.

We'll shine in more substantial honours,
And to be noble we'll be good.
—Thomas Percy.

Noble blood is an accident of fortune; noble actions characterize the great.—Goldoni.

Noble by birth, yet nobler by great deeds.—Longfellow.

The noblest character is stained by the addition of pride.—Claudianus.

If a man be endued with a generous mind, this is the best kind of nobility.
—Plato.

A noble life crowned with heroic death rises above and outlives the pride and pomp and glory of the mightiest empire of the earth.—James A. Garfield.

Be noble! and the nobleness that lives
In other men, sleeping, but never dead,
Will rise in majesty to meet thine own.
—Lowell.

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.
—Tennyson.

Fond man! though all the heroes of your line
Bedeck your halls, and round your galleries shine
In proud display; yet take this truth from me—
Virtue alone is true nobility! —Gifford.

Whene'er a noble deed is wrought,
Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts, in glad surprise,
To higher levels rise. —Longfellow.

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them, all day long;
And so make life, death and that vast forever,
One grand, sweet song.
—Charles Kingsley.

Nobility of birth does not always ensure a corresponding nobility of mind; if it did, it would always act as a stimulus to noble actions; but it sometimes acts as a clog, rather than a spur.—Colton.

Of all varieties of fopperies, the vanity of high birth is the greatest. True nobility is derived from virtue, not from birth. Title, indeed, may be purchased, but virtue is the only coin that makes the bargain valid.—Burton.

Noble souls, through dust and heat,
Rise from disaster and defeat
The stronger;
And conscious still of the divine
Within them, lie on earth supine
No longer. —Longfellow.

Nobility is a river that sets with a constant and undeviating current directly into the great Pacific Ocean of time; but, unlike all other rivers, it is more grand at its source than at its termination.—Colton.

Talent and worth are the only eternal grounds of distinction. To these the Almighty has affixed His everlasting patent of nobility. Knowledge and goodness,—these make degrees in heaven, and they must be the graduating scale of a true democracy.—Miss Sedgwick.

Nature's noblemen are everywhere,—in town and out of town, gloved and rough-handed, rich and poor. Prejudice against a lord, because he is a lord, is losing the chance of finding a good fellow, as much as prejudice against a ploughman because he is a ploughman.—Willis.

Vain-glorious man, when fluttering wind
Does blow
In his light wings, is lifted up to sky;
The scorn of knighthood and true chivalry,
To think, without desert of gentle deed
And noble worth, to be advanced high,
Such praise is shame, but honour, virtue's
meed,
Doth bear the fairest flower in honourable seed. —Spenser.

We must have kings, we must have nobles; nature is always providing such in every society; only let us have the real instead of the titular. In every society some are born to rule, and some to advise. The chief is the chief all the world over, only not his cap and plume. It is only this dislike of the pretender which makes men sometimes unjust to the true and finished man.—Emerson.

Nonsense

I had rather have a fool to make me merry than experience to make me sad.—Shakespeare.

A little nonsense now and then,
Is relish'd by the best of men.—Anon.

Nonsense and noise will oft prevail,
When honor and affection fail.—Lloyd.

The more sparingly we make use of nonsense, the better.—Coleridge.

Nonsense, when earnest, is impressive, and sometimes takes you in. It you are in a hurry, you occasionally mistake it for sense.—Beaconsfield.

For daring nonsense seldom fails to hit,
Like scattered shot, and pass with some for
wit. —Butler.

There are greater depths and obscurities, greater intricacies and perplexities, in an elaborate and well-written piece of nonsense, than in the most abstruse and profound tract of school divinity.—Addison.

Hudibras has defined nonsense, as Cowley does wit, by negatives. Nonsense, he says, is that which is neither true nor false. These two great properties of nonsense, which are always essential to it, give it such a peculiar advantage over all other writings, that it is incapable of being either answered or contradicted.—Addison.

Noon-time

A silence, the brief sabbath of an hour,
Reigns o'er the fields; the laborer sits within

His dwelling; he has left his steers awhile,
Unyoked, to bite the herbage, and his dog Sleeps stretched beside the door-stone in the shade.

Now the gray marmot, with uplifted paws,
No more sits listening by his den, but steals
Abroad, in safety, to the clover-field,
And crops its juicy-blossoms.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Nothing

Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing.—Shakespeare.

Nothing! thou elder brother ev'n to shade!
Thou hadst a being ere the world was made,
And, well-fix'd, art alone of ending not afraid. —Rochester.

O mighty nothing! unto thee,
Nothing, we owe all things that be;
God spake once when He all things made,
He saved all when He nothing said,
The world was made of nothing then;
'Tis made by nothing now again.
—Crashaw.

If any man thinks that he can conceive well enough how there should be nothing, I will engage that what he means by nothing is as much something as anything that he ever thought of in his life; and I believe that if he knew what nothing was, it would be intuitively evident to him that it could not be. * * * Absolute nothing is the aggregate of all the contradictions in the world.—Jonathan Edwards.

Notoriety

A proverb and a byword among all people.—Bible.

Notoriety is short-lived; fame is lasting.—Bancroft.

The more you are talked about, the less powerful you are.—Beaconsfield.

What a heavy burden is a name that has become too soon famous!—Voltaire.

As for being much known by sight, and pointed out, I cannot comprehend the honor that lies withal; whatsoever it be, every mountebank has it more than the best doctor.—Cowley.

Even the greatest actions of a celebrated person labor under this disadvantage, that however surprising and extraordinary they may be, they are no more than what are expected from him.—Addison.

Novels

Romance is the poetry of literature.—Mme. Necker.

Fiction is a potent agent for good—in the hands of the good.—Mme. Necker.

Books of entertainment first led Adam Clarke to believe in a spiritual world.—G. W. Curtis.

Novels teach the youthful mind to sigh after happiness that never existed.—Goldsmith.

The habitual indulgence in such reading is a silent, mining mischief.—Hannah More.

Fiction is of the essence of poetry as well as of painting.—Dryden.

Honest fiction may be made to supplement the pulpit.—Willmott.

We gild our medicines with sweets; why not clothe truth and morals in pleasant garments as well?—Chamfort.

Novels may teach us as wholesome a moral as the pulpit. There are "sermons in stones," in healthy books, and "good in everything."—Colton.

Weak minds may be injured by novel-reading; but sensible people find both amusement and instruction therein.—Beecher.

Lessons of wisdom have never such power over us as when they are wrought into the heart through the groundwork of a story.—Sterne.

Those who are too idle to read, save for the purpose of amusement, may in these works acquire some acquaintance with history, which, however inaccurate, is better than none.—Sir Walter Scott.

Novels do not force their fair readers to sin, they only instruct them how to sin; the consequences of which are fully detailed, and not in a way calculated to seduce any but weak minds; few of their heroines are happily disposed of.—Zimmermann.

Sir Anthony Absolute, two or three years before Evelina appeared, spoke the sense of the great body of sober fathers and husbands when he pronounced the circulating library an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge.—Macaulay.

Out of the fictitious book I get the expression of the life, of the times, of the manners, of the merriment, of the dress, the pleasure, the laughter, the ridicules of society. The old times live again. Can the heaviest historian do more for me?—Thackeray.

A little grain of the romance is no ill ingredient to preserve and exalt the dignity of human nature, without which it is apt to degenerate into everything that is sordid, vicious and low.—Swift.

The new novel is sought more eagerly, and devoured more greedily, than the New Testament.—Guthrie.

Thackeray and Balzac will make it possible for our descendants to live over again the England and France of to-day. Seen in this light, the novelist has a higher office than merely to amuse his contemporaries.—P. G. Hamerton.

Do not fear to put novels into the hands of young people as an occasional holiday experiment, but above all, good poetry in all kinds,—epic, tragedy, lyric. If we can touch the imagination, we serve them; they will never forget it.—Emerson.

At present, the novels which we owe to English ladies form no small part of the literary glory of our country. No class of works is more honorably distinguished for fine observation, by grace, by delicate wit, by pure moral feeling.—Macaulay.

Novels are sweets. All people with healthy literary appetites love them; almost all women; a vast number of clever, hard-headed men. Judges, bishops, chancellors, mathematicians, are notorious novel readers, as well as young boys and girls, and their kind, tender mothers.—Thackeray.

Writers of novels and romances in general bring a double loss on their readers,—they rob them both of their time and money; representing men, manners and things that never have been, nor are likely to be; either confounding or perverting history and truth, inflating the mind, or committing violence upon the understanding.—Mary Wortley Montagu.

A fiction which is designed to inculcate an object wholly alien to the imagination sins against the first law of art; and if a writer of fiction narrow his scope to particulars so positive as polemical controversy in matters ecclesiastical, political or moral, his work may or may not be an able treatise, but it must be a very poor novel.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I suppose as long as novels last, and authors aim at interesting their public, there must always be in the story a virtuous and gallant hero; a wicked monster, his opposite; and a pretty girl, who finds a champion. Bravery and virtue conquer beauty; and vice, after seeming to triumph through a certain number of pages, is sure to be discomfited in the last volume, when justice overtakes him, and honest folks come by their own.—Thackeray.

Legitimately produced, and truly inspired, fiction interprets humanity, informs the understanding, and quickens the affections. It reflects ourselves, warns us against prevailing social follies, adds rich specimens to our cabinets of character, dramatizes life for the unimaginative, daguerreotypes it for the unobservant, multiplies experience for the isolated or inactive, and cheers age, retirement and invalidism with an available and harmless solace.—Tuckerman.

We must have books for recreation and entertainment, as well as books for instruction and for business; the former are agreeable, the latter useful, and the human mind requires both. The cannon law and the codes of Justinian shall have due honor, and reign at the universities; but Homer and Virgil need not therefore be banished. We will cultivate the olive and the vine, but without eradicating the myrtle and the rose.—Balzac.

The importance of the romantic element does not rest upon conjecture. Pleasing testimonies abound. Hannah More traced her earliest impressions of virtue to works of fiction; and Adam Clarke gives a list of tales that won his boyish admiration. Books of entertainment led him to believe in a spiritual world; and he felt sure of having been a coward, but for romances. He declared that he had learned more of his duty to God, his neighbor and himself from Robinson Crusoe than from all the books, except the Bible, that were known to his youth.—Willmott.

Novelty

Novelty is the storehouse of pleasure.—Ninon de Lenclos.

It is not only old and early impressions that deceive us; the charms of novelty have the same power.—Pascal.

Novelty is both delightful and deceptive.—Balzac.

Change, change,—we all covet change.—Chamfort.

Newness hath an evanescent beauty.—Heinrich Heine.

Novelty is the great parent of pleasure.—South.

Novelties please less than they impress.—Dickens.

Novelty is an essential attribute of the beautiful.—Beaconsfield.

Human nature craves novelty.—Pliny.

All wonder is the effect of novelty upon ignorance.—Johnsoz.

Novelty is the foundation of the love of knowledge.—Sydney Smith.

Novelty has charms that our minds can hardly withstand.—Thackeray.

Human nature is fond of novelty.—Pliny the Elder.

New customs,
Though they be never so ridiculous.
Nay, let them be unmanly, yet are follow'd.—Shakespeare.

Such is the nature of novelty that where anything pleases, it becomes doubly agreeable if new; but if it displeases, it is doubly displeasing upon that very account.—Hume.

All, with one consent, praise newborn gauds, though they are made and moulded of things past.—Shakespeare.

Novelty serves us for a kind of refreshment, and takes off from that satiety we are apt to complain of in our usual and ordinary entertainments.—Addison.

In science, as in common life, we frequently see that a novelty in system or in practice, cannot be duly appreciated till time has sobered the enthusiasm of its advocates.—Maud.

Novelty is indeed necessary to preserve eagerness and alacrity; but art and nature have stores inexhaustible by human intellects; and every moment produces something new to him who has quickened his faculties by diligent observation.—Dr. Johnson.

The enormous influence of novelty—the way in which it quickens observation, sharpens sensation, and exalts sentiment—is not half enough taken note of by us, and is to me a very sorrowful matter. And yet, if we try to obtain perpetual change, change itself will become monotonous.—Ruskin.

Novelty has charms that our minds can hardly withstand. The most valuable things, if they have for a long while appeared among us, do not make any impression as they are good, but give us a distaste as they are old. But when the influence of this fantastical humor is over, the same men or things will come to be admitted again by a happy return of our good taste.—Thackeray.

November

Fie upon thee, November! thou dost ape
The airs of thy young sisters;—thou hast stolen

The witching smile of May to grace thy lip,
And April's rare capricious loveliness Thou'rt trying to put on!

—Julia C. R. Dorr.

The wild November comes at last
Beneath a veil of rain;
The night wind blows its folds aside,
Her face is full of pain.

The latest of her race, she takes
The Autumn's vacant throne:
She has but one short moon to live,
And she must live alone.—R. H. Stoddard.

In rattling showers dark November's rain,
From every stormy cloud, descends amain.
—Ruskin.

On my cornice linger the ripe black grapes
ungathered;
Children fill the groves with the echoes of
their glee,
Gathering tawny chestnuts, and shouting when beside them
Drops the heavy fruit of the tall black-walnut tree.

Dreary is the time when the flowers of earth are withered.
—William Cullen Bryant.

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year,
Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sere.
Heaped in the hollows of the grove, the autumn leaves lie dead;
They rustle to the eddying gust, and to the rabbit's tread;
The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrubs the jay,
And from the wood-top calls the crow through all the gloomy day.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Nun

Love, to her ear, was but a name,
Combin'd with vanity and shame;
Her hopes, her fears, her joys, were all
Bounded within the cloister wall.—Scott.

Know of your youth, examine well your
blood,
Whether, if you yield not to your father's choice,

You can endure the livery of a nun;
For aye to be in shady cloister mewed;
To live a barren-sister all your life,
Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless
moon.

Thrice blessed they, that master so their
blood,
To undergo such maiden pilgrimage.
—Shakespeare.

O

Oak

The oak, when living, monarch of the wood;
The English oak, which, dead, commands the flood.

—Churchill.

Those green-robed senators of mighty
woods,
Tall oaks, branch-charmed by the earnest
stars,
Dream, and so dream all night without a stir.

—Keats.

The tall Oak, towering to the skies,
The fury of the wind defies,
From age to age, in virtue strong.
Inured to stand, and suffer wrong.

—Montgomery.

The monarch oak, the patriarch of the trees,
Shoots rising up, and spreads by slow degrees.
Three centuries he grows, and three he stays
Supreme in state; and in three more decays.

—Dryden.

A sturdy oak, which nature forms
To brave a hundred winter's storms,
While round its head the whirlwinds blow,
Remains with root infix'd below:
When fell'd to earth, a ship it sails
Through dashing waves and driving gales
And now at sea, again defies
The threat'ning clouds and howling skies.

—Hoole.

A song to the oak, the brave old oak,
Who hath ruled in the greenwood long;
Here's health and renown to his broad
green crown,

And his fifty arms so strong.
There's fear in his frown when the Sun
goes down,

And the fire in the West fades out;
And he showeth his might on a wild mid-
night,

When the storms through his branches shout.

—H. F. Chorley.

Oath

Oaths are but words, and words but wind.—Butler.

A liar is always lavish of oaths.—
Corneille.

A good mouth-filling oath.—Shakespeare.

With oaths like rivets forced into your brain.—Cowper.

Recognized probity is the surest of all oaths.—Mme. Necker.

'Tis not the many oaths that makes the truth,
But the plain single vow that is vow'd true.

—Shakespeare.

It is a great sin to swear unto a sin,
But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.

—Shakespeare.

He that imposes an oath makes it,
Not he that for Convenience takes it.

—Butler.

Or, having sworn too hard a keeping oath,
Study to break it and not break my troth.

—Shakespeare.

Jack was embarrassed—never hero more,
And as he knew not what to say, he swore.

—Byron.

Oaths were not purposed more than law to keep the good and just in awe.
—Samuel Butler.

I'll take thy word for faith, not ask thine
oath;
Who shuns not to break one, will sure crack both.

—Shakespeare.

A careless and blasphemous use of the name of the Divine Being is not only sinful, but it is also prima facie evidence of vulgar associations.—Hosea Ballou.

It's a hard world, neighbors, if a man's oath must be his master.—Dryden.

What use of oaths, of promise, or of test, where men regard no God but interest?—Waller.

With a bloody flux of oaths vows deep revenge.—Quarles.

Rash oaths, whether kept or broken, frequently produce guilt.—Dr. Johnson.

Oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer-cakes, and hold-fast is the only dog.—Shakespeare.

Oaths are the counterfeit money with which we pay the sacrifice of love.—Ninon de Leuclos.

An oath, an oath, I have an oath in heaven:
Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?
No, not for Venice. —Shakespeare.

I have sworn deep oaths of thy deep kindness,
Oaths of thy love, thy truth, thy constancy;
* * * I have sworn thee fair. —Shakespeare.

The gods are deaf to hot and peevish vows;
They are polluted offerings, more abhor'd
Than spotted livers in the sacrifice. —Shakespeare.

Take not His name, who made thy mouth,
in vain;
It gets thee nothing, and hath no excuse. —Herbert.

I take the official oath to-day with no mental reservations and with no purpose to construe the Constitution by any hypercritical rules.—Abraham Lincoln.

And for the support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.—Thomas Jefferson.

For it comes to pass oft that a terrible oath, with a swaggering accent sharply twanged off, gives manhood more approbation than ever proof itself would have earned him.—Shakespeare.

An oath is a recognizance to heaven, binding us over in the courts above to plead to the indictment of our crimes. —Southern.

Do not swear at all;
Or, if thou wilt, swear by thy gracious self,
Which is the god of my idolatry,
And I'll believe thee. —Shakespeare.

You can have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government; while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect, and defend" it.—Abraham Lincoln.

A father who whipped his son for swearing and swore at him while he whipped him, did more harm by his example than good by his correction. —Thomas Fuller.

An oath! why, it is the traffic of the soul, it is law within a man; the seal of faith, the bond of every conscience; unto whom we set our thoughts like hands.—Decker.

Of all men, a philosopher should be no swearer; for an oath, which is the end of controversies in law, cannot determine any here, where reason only must induce.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Come, swear it, damn thyself, lest, being like one of heaven, the devils themselves should fear to seize thee; therefore be double-damned, swear,—thou art honest.—Shakespeare.

They fix attention, heedless of your pain,
With oaths like rivets forced into the brain;
And e'en when sober truth prevails throughout,
They swear it, till affirmation breeds a doubt. —Cowper.

Lord Melbourne was so accustomed to garnish his conversation in this way that Sydney Smith once said to him, "We will take it for granted that everybody is damned, and now proceed with the subject."—L'Estrange.

The accusing spirit, which flew up to heaven's chancery with the oath blushed as he gave it in; and the recording angel, as he wrote it down, dropped a tear upon the word and blotted it out forever.—Sterne.

Nay, but weigh well what you presume to swear,
Oaths are of dreadful weight! and, if they are false,
Draw down damnation.

—Sir Thomas Overbury.

Myself, myself confound!
Heaven, and fortune, bar me happy hours!
Day, yield me not thy light; nor night, thy rest!

Be opposite all planets of good luck
To my proceeding, if, with pure heart's love,
Immaculate devotion, holy thoughts,
I tender not thy beauteous princely daughter!
—Shakespeare.

Whoever considers the number of absurd and ridiculous oaths necessary to be taken at present in most countries, on being admitted into any society or profession whatever, will be less surprised to find prevarication still prevailing, where perjury has led the way.—Abbé Raynal.

Obduracy

A callousness and numbness of soul.
—Bentley.

Distends with pride, and hardening in his strength.—Milton.

There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart; he does not feel for man.—Cowper.

Argument does not soften, but rather hardens, the obdurate heart.—Dewey.

Fattened in vice, so callous and so gross, he sins and sees not, senseless of his loss.—Dryden.

God may, by almighty grace, hinder the absolute completion of sin in final obduracy.—South.

Obedience

To obey is better than sacrifice.—Bible.

Obedience completes itself in understanding.—Phillips Brooks.

Obedience is the mother of success.—Æschylus.

Obedience sums up our entire duty.—Hosea Ballou.

Obedience is the key to every door.—George MacDonald.

The first great law is to obey.—Schiller.

The virtue of Christianity is obedience.—J. C. Hare.

An obedient wife commands her husband.—Beaconsfield.

I hourly learn a doctrine of obedience.—Shakespeare.

I would rather obey than work miracles.—Luther.

To be a Christian is to obey Christ no matter how you feel.—H. W. Beecher.

Let them obey that know not how to rule.—Shakespeare.

True obedience is true liberty.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Obedience is the Christian's crown.—Schiller.

Command is anxiety; obedience, easy.—Paley.

Obedience alone gives the right to command.—Emerson.

Everywhere the flower of obedience is intelligence. Obey a man with cordial loyalty and you will understand him.—Phillips Brooks.

Charms by accepting, by submitting sways, yet has her humor most when she obeys.—Pope.

Woman's happiness consists in obeying; she objects to a man who yields too much.—Michelet.

Let thy child's first lesson be obedience, and the second will be what thou wilt.—Benjamin Franklin.

Women are perfectly well aware that the more they seem to obey the more they rule.—Michelet.

Light is a special help to obedience, and obedience is a singular help to increase light.—Flavel.

Obey thy parents; keep thy word justly; swear not.—Shakespeare.

When the ruler is obedient to God, God is his protector and friend.—Saadi.

All the good of which humanity is capable is comprised in obedience.—J. Stuart Mill.

No principle is more noble, as there is none more holy, than that of a true obedience.—Henry Giles.

I find the doing of the will of God leaves me no time for disputing about His plans.—George MacDonald.

We will obey the voice of the Lord our God, that it may be well with us.—Bible.

I know
My God commands, whose power no power resists. —Robert Greene.

Obedience, we may remember, is a part of religion, and therefore an element of peace; but love which includes obedience is the whole.—George Sewell.

We need only obey. There is guidance for each of us, and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word.—Emerson.

Prepare the soul calmly to obey; such offering will be more acceptable to God than every other sacrifice.—Metastasio.

That was a judicious mother who said, "I obey my children for the first year of their lives, but ever after I expect them to obey me."—Beecher.

The history of all the great characters of the Bible is summed up in this one sentence: They acquainted themselves with God, and acquiesced in His will in all things.—Richard Cecil.

He praiseth God best that serveth and obeyeth Him most: the life of thankfulness consists in the thankfulness of the life.—Burkitt.

Ascend, I follow thee, safe guide, the path
Thou lead'st me, and to the hand of heav'n submit. —Milton.

Obedience is not truly performed by the body of him whose heart is dissatisfied. The shell without a kernel is not fit for store.—Saadi.

Obedience insures greatness, whilst disobedience leads to a repulse. Who-soever possesseth the qualities of righteousness placeth his head on the threshold of obedience.—Saadi.

How will you find good? It is not a thing of choice; it is a river that flows from the foot of the Invisible Throne and flows by the path of obedience.—George Eliot.

As unto the bow the string is, so unto the man is woman; though she bends him, she obeys him; though she draws him, yet she follows,—useless each without the other.—Longfellow.

Women never really command until they have given their promise to obey; and they are never in more danger of being made slaves than when the men are at their feet.—Farguhar.

Obedience, as it regards the social relations, the rules of society, and the laws of nature and nature's God, should commence at the cradle and end only at the tomb.—Hosea Ballou.

Love naturally reverses the idea of obedience, and causes the struggle between any two who truly love each other to be, not who shall command, but who shall yield.—Frances Power Cobbe.

Be it remembered that we command nature, as it were, by obeying nature's laws; so the woman who would control her husband does so through obedience.—Haliburton.

Let the ground of all thy religious actions be obedience; examine not why it is commanded, but observe it because it is commanded. True obedience neither procrastinates nor questions.—Francis Quarles.

'Tis the same, with common natures,

Use 'em kindly, they rebel,

But, be rough as nutmeg graters,

And the rogues obey you well.

—Aaron Hill.

"His kingdom come!" For this we pray in vain,

Unless He does in our affections reign.

How fond it were to wish for such a King,

And no obedience to His sceptre bring,

Whose yoke is easy, and His burthen light;

His service freedom, and His judgments right.

—Waller.

Obedience is our universal duty and destiny; wherein whose will not bend must break; too early and too thoroughly we cannot be trained to know that "would," in this world of ours, is a mere zero to "should," and for most part as the smallest of fractions even to "shall."—Carlyle.

O God, the strength of all those who put their trust in Thee, mercifully accept our prayer; and because through the weakness of our mortal nature, we can do no good thing without Thee, grant us the help of Thy grace, that in keeping Thy commandments we may please Thee, both in will and deed; through Jesus Christ our Lord. —Book of Common Prayer.

Obedience is, indeed, founded on a kind of freedom, else it would become mere subjugation, but that freedom is only granted that obedience may be more perfect; and thus while a measure of license is necessary to exhibit the individual energies of things, the fairness and pleasantness and perfection of them all consist in their restraint.—Ruskin.

O Lord, who art our guide even unto death, grant us, I pray Thee, grace to follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest. In little daily duties to which Thou callest us, bow down our wills to simple obedience.—Christina G. Rossetti.

It is foolish to strive with what we cannot avoid; we are born subjects, and to obey God is perfect liberty; he that does this shall be free, safe and quiet; all his actions shall succeed to his wishes.—Seneca.

Heaven doth divide

The state of man in divers functions,
Setting endeavour in continual motion;

To which is fix'd, as an aim or butt,
Obedience.

—Shakespeare.

I believe that the fewer the laws in a home the better; but there is one law which should be as plainly understood as the shining of the sun is visible at noonday, and that is, implicit and instantaneous obedience from the child to the parent, not only for the peace of the home, but for the highest good of the child.—A. E. Kittredge.

Strengthen the female mind by enlarging it, and there will be an end to blind obedience; but as blind obedience is ever sought for by power, tyrants and sensualists are in the right when they endeavor to keep women in the dark, because the former only want slaves, and the latter a plaything.—Mary Wollstonecraft.

The first law that ever God gave to man was a law of pure obedience; it was a commandment naked and simple, wherein man had nothing to inquire after, or to dispute, forasmuch as to obey is the proper office of a rational soul, acknowledging a heavenly superior and benefactor. From obedience and submission spring all other virtues, as all sin does from self-opinion.—Montaigne.

Look carefully that love to God and obedience to His commands be the principle and spring from whence thy actions flow; and that the glory of God and the salvation of thy soul be the end to which all thy actions tend; and that the word of God be thy rule and guide in every enterprise and undertaking. "As many as walk by this rule, peace be unto them, and mercy." —Burkitt.

Filial obedience is the first and greatest requisite of a state; by this we become good subjects to our emperors, capable of behaving with just subordination to our superiors, and grateful dependents on heaven; by this we become fonder of marriage, in order to be capable of exacting obedience from others in our turn; by this we become good magistrates, for early submission is the truest lesson to those who would learn to rule. By this the whole state may be said to resemble one family.—Goldsmith.

Obesity

As many suffer from too much as too little. A fat body makes a lean mind.—Bovee.

Falstaff sweats to death, and lards the lean earth as he walks along.—Shakespeare.

There is something cordial in a fat man, everybody likes him, and he likes everybody. Food does a fat man good; it clings to him; it fructifies upon him; he swells nobly out, and fills a generous space in life.—Henry Giles.

Let me have men about me that are fat; sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights; yonder Cassius has a lean and hungry look; he thinks too much; such men are dangerous.—Shakespeare.

Obligation

Obligation is the bitterest thralldom. Mme. Necker.

Most men remember obligations, but not often to be grateful for them.—W. G. Simms.

An obligation is something which constrains or induces us to act.—Jeffrey.

A tender conscience is a stronger obligation than a prison.—Thomas Fuller.

Obligation is thralldom, and thralldom is hateful.—Hobbes.

We are solemnly obliged to the children of those who have loved us.—Achilles Poincelot.

Base natures ever judge a thing above them, and hate a power they are too much obliged to.—Otway.

To owe an obligation to a worthy friend is a happiness, and can be no disparagement.—Charron.

You find in some a sort of graceless modesty, that makes them ashamed to requite an obligation.—Seneca.

Trifling favors are readily acknowledged, though cheaply esteemed; but important ones are most rarely remembered.—Ruffini.

It is no great misfortune to oblige ungrateful people, but an unsupportable one to be forced to be under an obligation to a scoundrel.—Bailey.

We are always much better pleased to see those whom we have obliged than those who have obliged us.—Rochefoucauld.

There is one thing diviner than duty, namely, the bond of obligation transmuted into liberty.—W. R. Alger.

What do I owe to my times, to my country, to my neighbors, to my friends? Such are the questions which a virtuous man ought to ask himself often.—Lavater.

It is a secret, well known to all great men, that by conferring an obligation they do not always procure a friend, but are certain of creating many enemies.—Fielding.

Every man has obligations which belong to his station. Duties extend beyond obligation, and direct the affections, desires and intentions as well as the actions.—Whewell.

Some pretend want of power to make a competent return; and you shall find in others a kind of graceless modesty, that makes a man ashamed of requiting an obligation, because it is a confession that he has received one.—Seneca.

To feel oppressed by obligation is only to prove that we are incapable of a proper sentiment of gratitude. To receive favors from the unworthy is simply to admit that our selfishness is superior to our pride. Most men remember obligations, but not often to be grateful for them. The proud are made sour by the remembrance and the vain silent.—Simms.

Oblivion

Oblivion is not to be hired.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Among our crimes oblivion may be set.—Dryden.

And steep my senses in forgetfulness.—Shakespeare.

A sweet forgetfulness of human care.—Pope.

And o'er the past oblivion stretch her wing.—Homer.

And blind oblivion swallowed cities up.—Shakespeare.

Fame is a vapor; popularity an accident; riches take wings; the only certainty is oblivion.—Horace Greeley.

Darkness of slumber and death, forever sinking and sinking.—Longfellow.

Oblivion is the rule, and fame the exception, of humanity.—Rivarol.

Oblivion is a second death, which great minds dread more than the first.—De Boufflers.

Through age both weak in body and oblivious.—Latimer.

What's past and what's to come is strew'd with husks
And formless ruin of oblivion.
—Shakespeare.

But from your mind's chilled sky
It needs must drop, and lie with stiffened wings

Among your soul's forlornest things;
A speck upon your memory, alack!
A dead fly in a dusty window-crack.
—Francis Thompson.

Without oblivion, there is no remembrance possible. When both oblivion and memory are wise, when the general soul of man is clear, melodious, true, there may come a modern Iliad as memorial of the past.—Carlyle.

It is the lot of man to suffer; it is also his fortune to forget. Oblivion and sorrow share our being, as darkness and light divide the course of time.—Beaconsfield.

Obscurity

The palpable obscure.—Milton.

Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity.—Shenstone.

Content thyself to be obscurely good.—Addison.

The obscurity of a writer is generally in proportion to his incapacity.—Quintilian.

The swallowing gulf of dark forgetfulness and deep oblivion.—Shakespeare.

He who has lived obscurely and quietly has lived well.—Ovid.

How happy is the blameless vestal's lot!
The world forgetting, by the world forgot.
—Pope.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.
—Gray.

Obscurity and Innocence, twin sisters, escape temptations which would pierce their gossamer armor, in contact with the world.—Chamfort.

I give the fight up; let there be an end,
A privacy, an obscure nook for me,
I want to be forgotten even by God.
—Robert Browning.

There is no defense against reproach but obscurity; it is a kind of concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph.—Addison.

Thus let me live, unseen, unknown,
Thus unlamented let me die;
Steal from the world, and not a stone
Tell where I lie.
—Pope.

To be nameless in worthy deeds exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name than Herodias with one; and who would not rather have been the penitent thief than Pilate?—Sir Thomas Browne.

Some write their wrongs in marble: he more just,

Stoop'd down serene and wrote them in the
dust,

Trod under foot, the sport of every wind, Swept from the earth and blotted from his mind.

There, secret in the grave, he bade them
lie,

And grieved they could not 'scape the Almighty eye. —Samuel Madden.

Observation

Each one sees what he carries in his heart.—Goethe.

Only so much do I know as I have lived.—Emerson.

The hearing ear and the seeing eye.
—Bible.

Keep your eyes and ears open, if you desire to get on in the world.—
Douglas Jerrold.

Objects imperfectly discerned take forms from the hope or fear of the beholder.—Johnson.

Those who cannot themselves observe can at least acquire the observation of others.—Beaconsfield.

The eyes of a man are of no use without the observing power.—Paxton
Hood.

Observation—activity of both eyes and ears.—Horace Mann.

How hast thou purchased this experience?
By my penny of observation.—Shakespeare.

He alone is an acute observer who can observe minutely without being observed.—Lavater.

Swift defined observation to be an old man's memory.—James A. Garfield.

To learn by observation is traveling, people must also bring knowledge with them.—Bayard Taylor.

We pass by common objects or persons without noticing them; but the keen eye detects and notes types everywhere and among all classes.—

Thackeray.

When general observations are drawn from so many particulars as to become certain and indisputable, these are jewels of knowledge.—Dr. Watts.

Observation made in the cloister or in the desert will generally be as obscure as the one and as barren as the other; but he that would paint with his pencil must study originals, and not be over-fearful of a little dust.—Colton.

Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life.
—Dr. Johnson.

How little of our knowledge of mankind is derived from intentional accurate observation! Most of it has, unsought, found its way into the mind from the continual presentations of the objects to our unthinking view.
It is a knowledge of sensation more than of reflection.—John Foster.

You should not only have attention to everything, but a quickness of attention, so as to observe at once all the people in the room—their motions, their looks and their words—and yet without staring at them and seeming to be an observer.—Chesterfield.

To behold, is not necessary to observe, and the power of comparing and combining is only to be obtained by education. It is much to be regretted that habits of exact observation are not cultivated in our schools;
to this deficiency may be traced much of the fallacious reasoning, the false philosophy which prevails.—Humboldt.

It is the close observation of little things which is the secret of success in business, in art, in science, and in every pursuit in life. Human knowledge is but an accumulation of small facts made by successive generations of men—the little bits of knowledge and experience carefully treasured up by them growing at length into a mighty pyramid.—Samuel Smiles.

An observant man, in all his intercourse with society and the world, carries a pencil constantly in his hand, and, unperceived, marks on every person and thing the figure expressive of its value, and therefore instantly on meeting that person or thing again, knows what kind and degree of attention to give it. This is to make something of experience.—John Foster.

Obstinacy

Stiff opinion, always in the wrong.—Dryden.

Obstinacy is the strength of the weak.—Lavater.

Contention is a hydra's head.—Robert Burton.

An obstinate man does not hold opinions, but they hold him.—Pope.

Obstinacy and vehemency in opinion are the surest proofs of stupidity.—Barton.

There are few, very few, that will own themselves in a mistake.—Swift.

Obstinacy is ever most positive when it is most in the wrong.—Madame Necker.

Obstinacy and contention are common qualities, most appearing in, and best becoming, a mean and illiterate soul.—Montaigne.

Firmness or stiffness of the mind is not from adherence to truth, but submission to prejudice.—Locke.

Narrowness of mind is often the cause of obstinacy; we do not easily believe beyond what we see.—Rochefoucauld.

The obstinacy of the indolent and weak is less conquerable than that of the fiery and bold.—Lavater.

Obstinacy in opinions holds the dogmatist in the chains of error, without hope of emancipation.—Glanvill.

People first abandon reason, and then become obstinate; and the deeper they are in error the more angry they are.—Blair.

Obstinacy is the strength of the weak. Firmness founded upon principle, upon the truth and right, order and law, duty and generosity, is the obstinacy of sages.—Lavater.

Obstinacy and heat in argument are surest proofs of folly. Is there anything so stubborn, obstinate, disdainful, contemplative, grave, or serious, as an ass?—Montaigne.

Fools are stubborn in their way,
As coins are harden'd by th' alloy;
And obstinacy's ne'er so stiff
As when 'tis in a wrong belief.
—Butler.

You may as well
Forbid the sea for to obey the moon,
As, or by oath, remove, or counsel, shake
The fabric of his folly, whose foundation
Is pill'd upon his faith. —Shakespeare.

Whatever excites the spirit of contradiction is capable of producing the last effects of heroism; which is only the highest pitch of obstinacy, in a good or bad cause, in wisdom or folly.—Hazlitt.

His still refuted quirks he still repeats,
New-raised objections with new quibbles
meets;
Till sinking in the quicksand he defends,
He dies disputing, and the contest ends.
—Cowper.

I believe that obstinacy, or the dread of control and discipline, arises not so much from self-willedness as from a conscious defect of voluntary power; as foolhardiness is not seldom the disguise of conscious timidity.—Coleridge.

There is something in obstinacy which differs from every other passion. Whenever it fails, it never recovers, but either breaks like iron, or crumbles sulkily away, like a fractured arch. Most other passions have their periods of fatigue and rest, their sufferings and their cure; but obstinacy has no resource, and the first wound is mortal.—Johnson.

If it be true that men of strong imaginations are usually dogmatists—and I am inclined to think it is so—it ought to follow that men of weak imaginations are the reverse; in which case we should have some compensation for stupidity. But it, unfortunately happens that no dogmatist is more obstinate or less open to conviction than a fool.—Colton.

Obstinacy, sir, is certainly a great vice; and in the changeful state of political affairs it is frequently the cause of great mischief. It happens, however, very unfortunately, that almost the whole line of the great and masculine virtues—constancy, gravity, magnanimity, fortitude, fidelity, and firmness—are closely allied to this disagreeable quality, of which you have so just an abhorrence; and in their excess all these virtues very easily fall into it.—Burke.

Obtuseness

Obtuseness is sometimes a virtue.—Rivarol.

O ye gods! what thick encircling darkness blinds the minds of men!—Ovid.

You can reach stupidity only with a cannon ball.—H. W. Shaw.

For the greatest fool and rascal in creation there is yet a worse condition; and that is, not to know it, but to think himself a respectable man.—George MacDonald.

There are few things more singular than the blindness which, in matters of the highest importance to ourselves, often hides the truth that is plain as noon to all other eyes.—Rev. Dr. Croly.

Instead of watching the bird as it flies above our heads, we chase his shadow along the ground; and, finding we cannot grasp it, we conclude it to be nothing.—Hare.

Occupation

No woman or man need ever suffer from ennui or despair; the panacea is occupation.—Mme. de Surin.

The busy have no time for tears.—Byron.

Occupied people are not unhappy people.—Dewey.

Occupation is the scythe of time.—Napoleon.

All that is great in man comes through work; and civilization is its product.—Samuel Smiles.

Occupation is the armor of the soul.—Hillard.

One of the principal occupations of man is to divine woman.—Lacretelle.

The want of occupation is no less the plague of society than of solitude.—Rousseau.

Every base occupation makes one sharp in its practice, and dull in every other.—Sir P. Sidney.

Nature fits all her children with something to do.—Lowell.

The price of excellence is labor, and time that of immortality.—Fuseli.

No thoroughly occupied man was ever yet very miserable.—Landor.

Blessed is that man who knows his own distaff and has found his own spindle.—J. G. Holland.

To business that we love we rise betime, and go to 't with delight.—Shakespeare.

O God, impress upon me the value of time, and give regulation to all my thoughts and to all my movements.—Chalmers.

Occupation is the necessary basis of all enjoyment.—Leigh Hunt.

Want of occupation is the bane of both men and women, perhaps more especially of the latter.—Horace Mann.

If every man works at that for which nature fitted him, the cows will be well tended.—La Fontaine.

Occupation alone is happiness.—Dr. Johnson.

Be always resolute with the present hour. Every moment is of infinite value; for it is the representative of eternity.—Goethe.

The happiest man is he, who being above the troubles which money brings, has his hands the fullest of work.—Anthony Trollope.

The great happiness of life, I find, after all, to consist in the regular discharge of some mechanical duty.—Schiller.

Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life purpose. Labor is life.—Carlyle.

Let parents who hate their offspring rear them to hate labor, and to inherit riches; and before long they will be stung by every vice, racked by its poison, and damned by its penalty.—H. W. Beecher.

I believe one reason why women are generally so much more cheerful than men is because they can work with the needle, and so endlessly vary their employment.—Sydney Smith.

Occupation is the best safeguard for women under all circumstances—mental or physical, or both. Cupid extinguishes his torch in the atmosphere of industry.—Mme. de Sévigné.

One only "right" we have to assert in common with mankind—and that is as much in our hands as theirs—is the right of having something to do.—Miss Mulock.

Woman is largely occupied with man's work; in the sweat of her face she eats bread. It is like taking a Damascus blade to hew timber withal.—Gail Hamilton.

Let every man be occupied, and occupied in the highest employment of which his nature is capable, and die with the consciousness that he has done his best.—Sydney Smith.

The crowning fortune of a man is to be born to some pursuit which finds him employment and happiness, whether it be to make baskets, or broadswords, or canals, or statues, or songs.—Emerson.

We must strive to make ourselves really worthy of some employment. We need pay no attention to anything else; the rest is the business of others.—Bruyère.

Employment, which Galen calls "nature's physician," is so essential to human happiness that indolence is justly considered as the mother of misery.—Burton.

Cheerfulness is the daughter of employment; and I have known a man come home in high spirits from a funeral, merely because he has had the management of it.—Dr. Horne.

No amount of preaching, exhortation, sympathy, benevolence, will render the condition of our working women what it should be, so long as the kitchen and needle are substantially their only resources.—Horace Greeley.

It is observed at sea that men are never so much disposed to grumble and mutiny as when least employed. Hence an old captain, when there was nothing else to do, would issue the order to "scour the anchor."—Samuel Smiles.

We protract the career of time by employment, we lengthen the duration of our lives by wise thoughts and useful actions. Life to him who wishes not to have lived in vain is thought and action.—Zimmermann.

The ugliest of trades have their moments of pleasure. Now, if I were a grave-digger, or even a hangman, there are some people I could work for with a great deal of enjoyment.—Douglas Jerrold.

You see men of the most delicate frames engaged in active and professional pursuits who really have no time for illness. Let them become Idle—let them take care of themselves, let them think of their health—and they die! The rust rots the steel which use preserves.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Who does not observe the immediate glow and security that is diffused over the life of woman; before restless or fretful, by engaging in gardening, building, or the lowest department of art? Here is something that is not routine—something that draws forth life towards the infinite.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

One man, perhaps, proves miserable in the study of law, who might have flourished in that of physic or divinity; another runs his head against the pulpit, who might have been serviceable to his country at the plough; and a third proves a very dull and heavy philosopher, who possibly would have made a good mechanic, and have done well enough at the useful philosophy of the spade or anvil.—South.

Let a man choose what condition he will, and let him accumulate around him all the goods and all the gratifications seemingly calculated to make him happy in it—if that man is left at any time without occupation or amusement, and reflects on what he is, the meager, languid felicity of his present lot will not bear him up. He will turn necessarily to gloomy anticipations of the future; and except, therefore, his occupation calls him out of himself, he is inevitably wretched.—Pascal.

It is a great temptation, in these days of fresh activity, for women to leave the more confined field of home duty, and take a place among the workers in apparently more extended spheres of usefulness; but it is, in most instances, a mere exchange of a birthright for a mess of pottage. The glory is very poor, very evanescent; the struggles, the pains, the sorrows, the heart-breaks, in full measure; the loss of sweet home associations and memories, very real and very sure.—Mrs. F. C. Croly.

Ocean

Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste.—Bryant.

Neptune's white herds lowing o'er the deep.—Ariosto.

How the waves of the sea kiss the shore!—Anacreon.

Wave rolling after wave in torrent rapture.—Milton.

The sea is flowing ever; the land retains it never.—Goethe.

Swelling in anger or sparkling in glee.—Bayard Taylor.

Ye who dwell at home, ye do not know the terrors of the main.—Southey.

Whilst breezy waves toss up their silvery spray.—Hood.

The free
Mighty, music-haunted sea,
—Anna Katharine Green.

The rolling billows beat the rugged shore, as they the earth would shoulder from her seat.—Spenser.

The land is dearer for the sea,
The ocean for the shore.
—Lucy Larcom.

How the giant element from rock to rock leaps with delirious bound!—Byron.

Love the sea? I dote upon it—from the beach.—Douglas Jerrold.

I never was on the dull, tame shore,
but I loved the great sea more and more.—Barry Cornwall.

Ye waves
That o'er th' interminable ocean wreath
Your crisped smiles.
—Æschylus.

Once more upon the waters! yet once more!
And the waves bound beneath me as a steed
That knows his rider.
—Byron.

The sea drowns out humanity and time. It has no sympathy with either, for it belongs to eternity; and of that it sings its monotonous song forever and ever.—O. W. Holmes.

While black with storms the ruffled ocean rolls, and from the fisher's art defends her finny shoals.—Sir R.
Blackmore.

And evermore the waters worship God;—
And bards and prophets tune their mystic lyres
While listening to the music of the waves!
—Mrs. Hale.

Whosoever commands the sea, commands the trade; whosoever commands the trade of the world, commands the riches of the world, and consequently the world itself.—Sir
Walter Raleigh.

Neptune has raised up his turbulent plains; the sea falls and leaps upon the trembling shore. She remounts, groans, and with redoubled blows makes the abyss and the shaken mountains resound.—St. Lambert.

And I have loved thee, Ocean! and my joy
Of youthful sports was on thy breast to be Borne, like thy bubbles, onward; from a boy
I wanton'd with thy breakers. —Byron.

The pleased sea on a white-breasted shore—
A shore that wears on her alluring brows Rare shells, far brought, the love-gifts of the sea,
That blushed a tell-tale.
—Alexander Smith.

One height
Showed him the ocean, stretched in liquid
light,
And he could hear its multitudinous roar,
Its plunge and hiss upon the pebbled shore.
—George Eliot.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean—
roll!
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore. —Byron.

The sea! the sea! the open sea!
The blue, the fresh, the ever free!
Without a mark, without a bound,
It runneth the earth's wide regions round;
It plays with the clouds; it mocks the skies;
Or like a cradled creature lies.
—Barry Cornwall.

For now I stand as one upon a rock
environed with a wilderness of sea, who marks the waxing tide grow wave by wave, expecting ever when some envious surge will in his brinish bowels swallow him.—Shakespeare.

The image of Eternity—the throne
Of the Invisible; even from out thy slime
The monsters of the deep are made; each zone
Obeys thee; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless, alone. —Byron.

Behold the Sea,
The opaline, the plentiful and strong,
Yet beautiful as is the rose in June,
Fresh as the trickling rainbow of July;
Sea full of food, the nourisher of kinds,
Purger of earth, and medicine of men;
Creating a sweet climate by my breath,
Washing out harms and griefs from memory,
And, in my mathematic ebb and flow,
Giving a hint of that which changes not.
—Emerson.

October

October is the opal month of the year. It is the month of glory, of ripeness. It is the picture-month.—
Henry Ward Beecher.

October's gold is dim—the forests rot,
The weary rain falls ceaseless, while the
day
Is wrapped in damp. —David Gray.

And suns grow meek, and the meek suns grow brief,
And the year smiles as it draws near its death. —Bryant.

October is the month for painted leaves. * * * As fruits and leaves and the day itself acquire a bright tint just before they fall, so the year near its setting. October is its sunset sky: November the later twilight.
—Henry D. Thoreau.

Autumn is here; we cull his lingering flowers.

* * * * *
The sweet calm sunshine of October, now Warms the low spot; upon its grassy mould
The purple oak-leaf falls; the birchen bough Drops its bright spoil like arrow-heads of gold. —William Cullen Bryant.

October is nature's funeral month.
Nature glories in death more than in life. The month of departure is more beautiful than the month of coming—October than May. Every green thing loves to die in bright colors.—

Henry Ward Beecher.

O'er hill and field October's glories fade;
O'er hill and field the blackbirds southward
fly;
The brown leaves rustle down the forest
glade,
Where naked branches make a fitful shade,
And the lost blooms of Autumn withered
lie.
—George Arnold.

October turned my maple's leaves to gold;
The most are gone now; here and there one lingers;
Soon these will slip from out the twig's weak hold,
Like coins between a dying miser's fingers.
—T. B. Aldrich.

There is no season when such pleasant and sunny spots may be lighted on, and produce so pleasant an effect on the feelings, as now in October. The sunshine is peculiarly genial; and in sheltered places, as on the side of a bank, or of a barn or house, one becomes acquainted and friendly with the sunshine. It seems to be of a kindly and homely nature. And the green grass strewn with a few withered leaves looks the more green and beautiful for them. In summer or spring nature is farther from one's sympathies.—Hawthorne.

Offence

The offender never pardons.—
George Herbert.

All's not offence that indiscretion finds.—Shakespeare.

Love the offender, yet detest the offence.—Pope.

Oh, my offence is rank; it smells to heaven.—Shakespeare.

Where the offence is, let the great axe fall.—Shakespeare.

We never can willingly offend
where we sincerely love.—Rowland
Hill.

Who has not seen how women bully women? What tortures have men to endure compared to those daily repeated shafts of scorn and cruelty with which poor women are riddled by the tyrants of their sex?—Thackeray.

Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.—Bible.

What dire offence from amorous causes springs;
What mighty contests rise from trivial things!
—Pope.

We are so desirous of vengeance that people often offend us by not giving offence.—Madame Deluzy.

Who fears t' offend takes the first step to please.—Cibber.

In such a time as this it is not meet that every nice offence should bear its comment.—Shakespeare.

When any one has offended me, I try to raise my soul so high that the offence cannot reach it.—Descartes.

If a man offend a harmless, pure, and innocent person, the evil falls back upon that fool, like light dust thrown up against the wind.—
Buddha.

A very small offence may be a just cause for great resentment: it is often much less the particular instance which is obnoxious to us than the proof it carries with it of the general tenor and disposition of the mind from whence it sprung.—Greville.

Office

Office without pay makes thieves.—
Heinsius.

The gratitude of place-expectants is a lively sense of future favors.—
Horace Walpole.

Here and there some stern high patriot stood,
Who could not get the place for which he sued.
—Byron.

Some few have a natural talent for office-holding; very many for office-seeking.—James Ellis.

The office should seek the man, not man the office.—Silas Wright.

When impious men bear sway, the post of honor is a private station.—Shakespeare.

When a king creates an office, Providence creates immediately a fool to buy it.—Colbert.

High office is like a pyramid; only two kinds of animals reach the summit—reptiles and eagles.—D'Alembert.

Every fresh appointment I make produces for me one cool friend and one hundred earnest enemies.—Marcus Morton.

It is the curse of service; preferment goes by letter and affection, not by the old gradation where each second stood heir to the first.—Shakespeare.

Five things are requisite to a good officer—ability, clean hands, despatch, patience, and impartiality.—William Penn.

If a due participation of office is a matter of right, how are vacancies to be obtained? Those by death are few; by resignation, none.—Jefferson.

All see, and most admire, the glare which hovers round the external happiness of elevated office.—Washington.

Thou hast seen a farmer's dog bark at a beggar? * * * And the creature run from the cur? There thou might'st behold the great image of authority: a dog's obeyed in office.—Shakespeare.

He who performs his duty in a station of great power must needs incur the utter enmity of many, and the high displeasure of more.—Atterbury.

If ever this free people, if this government itself is ever utterly demoralized, it will come from this human wriggle and struggle for office—that is, a way to live without work.—Abraham Lincoln.

Office of itself does much to equalize politicians. It by no means brings all characters to a level; but it does bring high characters down and low characters up towards a common standard.—Macaulay.

O place and greatness! millions of false eyes
Are stuck upon thee; volumes of reports Run with these false and most contrarious quests
Upon thy doings: thousand escapes of wit
Make thee the father of their idle dream,
And wrack thee in their fancies.
—Shakespeare.

Old Age

They say, an old man is twice a child.—Shakespeare.

Old age is an incurable disease.—Seneca.

The fears of old age disturb us, yet how few attain it?—La Bruyère.

Age, like woman, requires fit surroundings.—Emerson.

A good old man, sir. He will be talking;
as they say,
When the age is in, the wit is out.
—Shakespeare.

What makes old age so sad is, not that our joys, but that our hopes then cease.—Richter.

Age is a tyrant who forbids at the penalty of life all the pleasures of youth.—La Rochefoucauld.

We hope to grow old, and yet we fear old age; that is, we are willing to live, and afraid to die.—La Bruyère.

It is indeed the boundary of life, beyond which we are not to pass; which the law of nature has pitched for a limit not to be exceeded.—Montaigne.

Age is not all decay; it is the ripening, the swelling of the fresh life within, that withers and bursts the husk.—George MacDonald.

An aged Christian with the snow of time on his head may remind us that those points of earth are whitest that are nearest heaven.—E. H. Chapin.

Old age is the repose of life; the rest that precedes the rest that remains.—Robert Collyer.

When he is forsaken,
Withered and shaken,
What can an old man do but die?
—Hood.

It is a characteristic of old age to find the progress of time accelerated. The less one accomplishes in a given time, the shorter does the retrospect appear.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Old age, especially an honored old age, has so great authority that this is of more value than all the pleasures of youth.—Cicero.

The happiest end of life is this: when the mind and the other senses being unimpaired, the same nature which put it together takes asunder her own work.—Cicero.

The second childhood of a saint is the early infancy of a happy immortality, as we believe.—Wm. Mountford.

The day of life spent in honest and benevolent labor comes in hope to an evening calm and lovely; and though the sun declines, the shadows that he leaves behind are only to curtain the spirit unto rest.—Henry Giles.

'Tis our fast intent
To shake all cares and business from our age,
Conferring them on younger strengths, while we
Unburden'd crawl toward death.
—Shakespeare.

My days are in the yellow leaf;
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief,
Are mine alone.
—Byron.

Old Age, a second child, by nature curst
With more and greater evils than the first,
Weak, sickly, full of pains: in ev'ry breath
Railing at life, and yet afraid of death.
—Churchill.

My God! my time is in Thine hands. Should it please Thee to lengthen my life, and complete, as Thou hast begun, the work of blanching my locks, grant me grace to wear them as a crown of unsullied honor.

—Christian Scriver.
